For the past two years Asia Minor and Africa have been shaken by a series of disquieting events. This brings us to the Iranian oil question, the question of treaties between England and Egypt, the uprising of the negroes in Kenya, the racial question in South Africa. I say these things to show that, from the point of view of international strategy, the area of the territories where large-scale manoeuvres could be undertaken to bring about the victory of our armies is more and more narrowing, more and more shrinking. If Russia, through its agents urging the indigenous population of African countries to revolt, succeeded in putting the political, economic and military situation of our allies and the member states of the North Atlantic treaty in a precarious position should war break out anew, which heaven forbid, then it will be possible to win it only by the virtual obliteration of the enemies of the liberty and security of all peoples, a solution that would annihilate more than half the globe. It means that we would have to use atomic bombs as well as the hydrogen bomb, whose unavoidable use would be equivalent to a real betrayal of our civilization. As between losing and winning, of course we will have to win, but at what a shameful price.

In the face of this pessimistic view of things, I wonder whether it would not be advisable to revise the international policy of free peoples and revert to secret diplomacy rather than this open diplomacy which has been practised since the last war. We well realize that the meetings of the United Nations are a forum for Moscow-inspired diplomats. They are thus in a position to submerge the whole world, as they do indeed, with their insidious and skilful propaganda. So far as our side is concerned, Russia by all means conceivable, as much within its own borders as beyond those of satellite countries, prevents the diplomats of the member nations of the North Atlantic treaty from reciprocating by informing their nationals of the objectives which we intend to achieve in order to maintain universal order in an atmosphere of peaceful stability, and in adopting for this purpose only amicable solutions liable to produce earnest advantages for all peace loving and progressive peoples. As long as the United Nations are serving the objectives of Russia and communism in the world, would it not be better to rely on a much more secret diplomacy which would plunge Russian diplomats and Russophiles into perplexity as regards our means, and leave the Russian people in a troublesome anxiety?

Is it not true that controversies break out here and there within the member nations of the North Atlantic pact to the effect that the United Nations is not able to achieve the end it had in view? It seems also that the Korean war will not be settled by the general assembly of the United Nations, as it appears that the meetings of the United Nations are becoming a source of conflict between member nations. France, for instance, complains bitterly of the stand taken by the United States on the claims made by the people of Tunisia and Morocco. The United Nations meetings are truly marathons of oratory by the Russians and advocates of the so-called people's democracies, who stir up throughout the world a kind of propaganda which is likely to push farther and farther back the horizon where, at one point, it appeared to us that the star of peace had risen in a sky still red with the fires of destruction. Russia and communism profit considerably by our divisions and our disagreements which, however normal and understandable they may be, show that notwithstanding our efforts toward peace we are far from seeing eye to eye on the means of attaining it.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) deserves to be complimented on his appointment to the general assembly of the United Nations. His appointment reflects the position our country occupies among the nations of the world, and it shows up the personality of our Secretary of State for External Affairs, a personality which is acknowledged by the government of Canada, the House of Commons and the Canadian people. The Secretary of State for External Affairs wants peace. If he does not attain it we shall know where to put the blame, for he will waste no opportunity to make use of his ability and wisdom in order to find and have accepted a formula which will respect the rights based on international justice. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is not far from the views I have just expressed when, in the foreword to the book "Canada and the United Nations, 1951-1952" he writes:

> The United Nations is neither a military alliance against communism nor an embryonic form of world government. Essentially the charter of the United Nations is a multilateral treaty which has been ratified by the great majority of sovereign states. It is a treaty with enormous scope and has led to the establishment of machinery for nearly every form of international political, social, economic, cultural and humanitarian co-operation. Yet it is a treaty which is meant specifically to protect the jurisdiction of states in essentially domestic matters. Moreover, it is a treaty which in collective security matters requires for its full enforcement unanimity among the great powers. Not only does this unanimity not exist; there is acute division between these powers—between the free world and the Soviet world. The United Nations did not create this division but it does reflect it.

In view of the fact that the United Nations seems unable to reach our objective of peace without taking the risk of being involved in a general conflict, it might be wiser to revert to ancient diplomacy and try to ward off war by a web of military defensive alliances. These alliances would see nations bind themselves through clauses similar to article 5 of the North Atlantic treaty which reads as follows:

> The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by article 51 of the charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

The North Atlantic treaty will undoubtedly become the stumbling block on the road to peace because, under this treaty, in order to deter aggression rather than as a menace to Russia and her satellites, the member nations are engaged in building military strength capable of holding in check any possible enemy who might be tempted to infringe the security of the United Nations or threaten their territorial integrity. In order to reinforce the clauses of the treaty, multilateral pacts should be signed, even between nations who are parties to the North Atlantic treaty and their immediate neighbours. Such treaties could be arranged between groups of Asiatic, African or South American nations which would, at a later date, become part of the North Atlantic alliance. This would ensure that the clauses of the United Nations charter would become the law of all nations.

The study of diplomacy shows us that offensive and defensive military treaties did not prevent the wars of 1914 and 1939. Let us not forget, however, that the parties to those alliances were separated by other countries which demanded that their neutrality be respected by their neighbours. Because of these neutrality agreements, the nation which was ready to wage a war and hoped to turn its aggression to the best advantage has always attacked one or other of these "neutral" countries which had fondly believed that it would not be engulfed in a conflict or become victim of an invasion. Once disarmed, these nations were easy prey. This neutrality was one of the reasons the military agreements remained ineffective. The signing of agreements similar to the North Atlantic treaty between groups of two or three adjoining nations would ensure a more effective defence of their territory, and offer a salient of resistance which would permit the forces set up by the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to rush to the rescue of the country which might be attacked or invaded directly by Russia or her satellites. Mr. Heeney, Canada's permanent representative to the North Atlantic council, in a speech at Oxford on September 10, 1952, made the following statement, which I quote from the External Affairs Bulletin of October, 1952, page 342 of the English edition:

> Now it is true, of course, that our fourteen nations have much in common beyond our determination to remain free and to build up our strength to deter, and, if need be, to fight together against aggression. But, if it is difficult to delimit in terms of strategy the extent of our community, how much more difficult is it to set geographical boundaries to the spiritual community of free men?
> I am not suggesting that there is no essential unity, no political or other logic in the present grouping of nations in NATO. Much less am I suggesting that NATO should put on a drive for new members! Of course the present composition of the alliance makes sense—but it is primarily military sense at the present stage of events. All that I am trying to say is that we should remember that NATO does not comprise the whole community of free men. And we should look forward to the widening, as well as the deepening, of our association, particularly in those fields of endeavour associated with article 2 of the treaty which, in NATO parlance, have come to be known as the "non-military aspects".

I shall go further. If a war is in the making by the enemies of freedom, the whole community of free peoples should be militarily organized, not to launch an attack but to defend itself more effectively. The nations which have become conscious of their ability to resist aggression may want to avail themselves increasingly of the provisions of article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty concerning peaceful and friendly international relations. It is impossible to stabilize free institutions when people are living in a state of uncertainty and insecurity.

War itself must be looked upon as an institution. Mythology had a god of war. Mankind, since it has been able to form groups and societies, has always waged war and, alas, always had to bear it. There have been racial and religious wars, wars of conquest and revenge, slave wars and so forth. Even the most developed civilizations could not stop them, and it must be granted that the more men have been policed and civilized, the more wars have destroyed lives, wealth, cities and countries. Before our Christian era conquerors took prisoners and put them into slavery. In more recent times prisoners have been taken and put into concentration camps to die, or been subjected to experiments that are loathsome to the mind. Were the mass slaughters practised in China thousands of years before Christ more inhuman than the executions that took place during the last great war? If war itself is an institution then it should be dealt with as such, especially when we know that a nation or a group of nations takes pleasure in creating situations and difficulties that may cause an outbreak at any moment.

Multifarious military alliances would make nations, great and small, more realistic about their security and their governments would be less inclined to rely on the armies of America to safeguard their territorial integrity. There is great danger of the people of America being led to believe that they will be the sole guardians of peace and security for the western bloc of nations. Our economic power is acting as a sedative on many European individuals. If nations that we have undertaken to protect and to defend were unable to offer the least resistance in case of an invasion, our armies on the spot could be destroyed far from their homeland, our own means of defence would be weakened, and our people would have to endure a siege of aerial war that could last a long time. There exists such a trend in United States policy. I can see this trend in connection with the Korean war. A well-known Republican representative, Joseph W. Martin, Jr., of Massachusetts, declared during a recent interview:

> We must waste no time in building up the anti-communist forces in Asia. We have got to build up the Korean army so that our boys can be withdrawn from the front line. I think we should build up the Japanese forces to deter aggression and we should encourage rebellions on the mainland of China.

I do not agree with the last part of Mr. Martin's statement because under the principle of self-determination for nations and peoples, they must be free to adopt the means they find proper to avoid and to defeat aggression. It would be a mistake on the part of United States diplomacy to make itself the agent of revolutions and rebellions. This would irritate the Chinese masses and enlarge the gap between Asiatic and American thought. On the other hand, if we could set up a Korean army with sufficient power to end the conflict and, at the same time, to bring home our troops, this would be a great step toward ensuring a better understanding between Asia, Europe and America.

From the moment he assumed command of the United Nations troops in Korea, General Van Fleet turned his activity in that direction. He has recruited young Koreans, and has instructed and trained them with great success. Korean soldiers proved equal to ours during the recent fighting to hold the hills. The presence of United Nations soldiers in Asia was necessary. However, one should not try to hide the fact that hundreds of millions of individuals consider it rather as a symbol of territorial claims rather than a move to defeat an unjust aggression. The United Nations army looks as though it were starting on a conquest of Asia where, according to Russian and Chinese propaganda, we are imposing by force our way of life, our ideas, etc. In time it would become possible, through the efforts of skilful diplomacy, to bring the populations of Asia to live in peace with one another and with ourselves, and to have relations with Europe and America which would, little by little, rescue them from the influence of Moscow.

I have not lost faith in the United Nations. We must not, either, lose faith in the efforts made by the general assembly of the United Nations to bring about a better understanding among all the nations of the world, among nations and peoples of different religions and races. There is much to be expected from what is going on in Europe. For the first time in history, France, Germany and Italy, to mention only the principal nations which have adopted the Schuman plan, have agreed to pool their resources of coal and steel to ensure a better distribution; for this has been the cause, in the past, of many conflicts. Another step is being made with a constituent assembly of Europe organizing itself to form a true European community with supranational powers granted by the states which will join that new and unique community of nations.

Freedom is one and indivisible; it exists for all human beings wherever they happen to live by reason of their birth. To retain its value, freedom requires a peaceful atmosphere. Such an atmosphere will exist only when war has been defeated. It is the spirit which prevailed in 1945 at the signing of the charter of the United Nations. The principles enunciated in the charter of the United Nations cannot be too often reiterated; and it is important for all of us to seek to bring about, at long last, the state of things which should exist, and then to ensure a lasting peace for the world at any cost whatever, be it money or gold. Gold and money can be recovered, but human lives cannot be restored.

Dark as may appear the sky under which the sessions of the general assembly of the United Nations are being held, one must share the views which were recently expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in the following terms:

> After seven years the United Nations is still a young organization, still largely an experiment. But one thing has become increasingly evident. Despite the disappointments we have all encountered, there is no doubt that the spirit of interdependence in the world is growing . . . The progress is slow, but it is in the right direction and is constantly being made, often in the United Nations bodies which receive very little publicity. We must not, then, think of the United Nations solely in terms of the bitter disputes which now loom so large in the headlines. Our hope for the future of our world organization has a deeper and more solid foundation than these headlines would suggest. The battle against ignorance and prejudice and, yes, even against fear is steadily and perseveringly being fought. It must continue until one day victory is achieved.

I wish I could have expressed opinions on the question of radio television, the St. Lawrence seaway project and federal-provincial relations. I am sure we shall be given the opportunity to do so during the debates which will follow on those matters of great interest that will, of course, influence the progress and development of our country toward a destiny which we want all nations to envy and which should be based on law, justice, broad-mindedness, mutual understanding and, above all, respect of the human person and dignity.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 8, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TELEVISION

EXTENSION OF SERVICE—APPLICATIONS FOR LICENCES BY PRIVATE STATIONS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement of government policy on television.

For some time the government has been giving careful consideration to the development of television broadcasting in Canada. In its consideration it has had in mind the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. The commission recommended that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with the production of television programs and with plans for national coverage. It spoke of extension of national coverage both through publicly and privately-owned stations. It said that no private station should be licensed until the C.B.C. had available national television programs and that all private stations established should be required to serve as outlets for national programs. It emphasized the need for direction and control of television broadcasting in Canada to prevent Canadian stations from becoming mere channels for broadcasting material from outside Canada and to encourage Canadian content.

The government believes, with the royal commission, that television should be developed in Canada with the aim of benefiting our national life and that it should have the structure and the means required by Canadian conditions to ensure an adequate amount of suitable Canadian programs for Canadians as well as using some material from outside the country. Television will undoubtedly play a considerable part in the lives of many Canadian families. It is bound to have a strong effect on the growing minds of young people watching it in their own homes. The government believes it should be so developed in Canada that it is capable of providing a sensible pattern of programming for Canadian homes with at least a good portion of Canadian content reflecting Canadian ideas and creative abilities of our own people and life in all parts of Canada.

The government knows also that, because of the nature of our country, there must be a wide integration of effort and resources if we are to have adequate television service suitable to our national needs and reaching at least a major part of the public in all regions. Now that national television service has started, the government believes that it should be extended as widely and as quickly as possible to other areas. Therefore, it is proposed to ask parliament to approve a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of building stations on the Pacific coast, in the prairie provinces, and in the Atlantic provinces. These would be established in the Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax areas. Thus, in addition to the stations at Montreal and Toronto, and that to be built at Ottawa, there would be publicly-owned stations with some production facilities at least in each of the main regions of the country.

In addition the government will now be ready to receive applications for licences for private stations to serve areas not now served or to be served by publicly-owned facilities already announced. The government has indicated to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that it is prepared to consider applications for such licences which may be recommended by the corporation after being made in the usual way to the Department of Transport.

The objective will be to make national television service available to as many Canadians as possible through co-operation between private and public enterprise. Under this plan the private stations licensed will carry national program service, besides having time for programming of their own. There will be plenty of opportunity for enterprise by private interests in television broadcasting, and at the same time provision for wide extension of the national service. Since the objective will be to extend services as widely throughout Canada as is practicable, no two stations will be licensed at the present to serve the same area. A television station can serve only a comparatively small area. Canada is very large and it will require a good many stations before television can be brought to the people in most parts of our country. It is desirable to have one station in as many areas as possible before there are two in any one area.

The government believes that the policy adopted will provide for the integration of effort and resources, both public and private, that is necessary for the development of our television broadcasting serving our family and national life, and reaching as great a number as possible of Canadians.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the presentation of a statement of policy such as that which we have just received is by concurrence of the house and not by strict rule, I assume that it will be permissible to make comments on this statement which has been accepted in this way.

I would point out that what has been said seems to be an intermediate stage between the speech from the throne and the presentation of the actual legislation which will deal with the subject matter of the comments now before us. And since this is merely in anticipation of further steps to be taken, I believe it is appropriate to place before the government considerations which I think should be in their minds in regard to this very important subject, in the hope that an irretrievable plan will not be made in regard to this vitally important medium of communicating thought and news and the presentation of the events which come before our eyes.

The minister responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this house has reiterated the previous statement that was made that private stations are not to receive licences in those places where public stations are now operating, or are to operate, as stated to us today, in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax, in addition to Montreal and Toronto.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, for the consideration of the government, before they present this legislation or take further steps, a proposition which it seems to me is inherent in the whole concept of the C.B.C. as I understood it, and as I believe many other Canadians understood it.

The idea of the publicly-owned system was that it was designed to assure the reception of broadcasting to the people in Canada who otherwise might not receive it, unless there were a publicly-owned system, because of the economic factors involved in a very large country of this kind. In the case of the broadcasting of radio broadcasts as distinct from television broadcasts, it was obviously essential to provide networks into areas where the ordinary competitive private systems might not find it financially attractive to operate. All parties in this house have subscribed to that idea. There are differences of opinion as to the way in which it has been carried out; there are differences of opinion as to the manner in which the administration and supervision of this system should be carried out. But in the case of television, which now enters the scene and is brought under the authority of the C.B.C., an entirely different factor presents itself. In the first place, as the minister has just pointed out, television covers at this time, no matter what may happen in future years, only a relatively small radius surrounding each television station. There are the two main devices for carrying the program, the co-axial cable and the microwave relay. Either one of those systems however will in turn carry only the television broadcast to another station, which in turn has a limited area of coverage, and not the wide coverage of those great radio broadcasting stations which now reach the most remote parts of Canada. Therefore, if the concept of the C.B.C., in relation to this new medium of communicating thoughts, news and pictures of events as well, is to be carried forward consistently with the original idea, then surely it should be the purpose of the C.B.C. to provide television broadcasts in those areas where private broadcasting will not find it economically convenient to do so.

That was the intention of the C.B.C. in relation to radio broadcasting. If the same principle is carried forward, then surely the whole purpose of the C.B.C. in relation to television should be to let the private stations, without public expense, broadcast the television broadcasts in the great areas of concentrated population where that is financially possible, and for the C.B.C. to provide the television broadcasts in those areas where the ordinary financial returns will not justify private investment. Surely that is a clear, a simple concept of the role of the C.B.C. in this new medium of communicating ideas and pictures, if we follow the same concept which has always been accepted as the guiding purpose of the C.B.C. in regard to radio broadcasting, no matter how much any one of us may think they have departed from it.

I strongly urge the government to review its position in relation to that basic concept of public ownership in relation to broadcasting, either radio or television, and that before a bill to authorize this step be presented to the house they will have given full consideration to the purpose of the C.B.C., to the reason why it was decided to have a publicly-owned system in this country. And I would hope that in reviewing the situation they would come to the conclusion that if they return to basic principles they will change the policy as now announced.

Then may I also point out that there has been no reason placed before us at this time as to why there should be only one station in any one centre. No explanation has been given to us as to why there is this fundamental difference between television and radio broadcasting in regard to programs of this type. Whether they be private or public stations, surely competition in such areas will be beneficial from the point of view of the ultimate programs and the variety of programs available in the larger centres.

After all, what should be remembered is that in many of the large Canadian centres today Canadians already have a variety of programs available to them. They are able now in Toronto, Vancouver, Windsor, Sarnia, Niagara Falls and in many other places in Ontario and other parts of Canada to bring in several different programs which are competing with our own programs.

If we want to raise the standard of our television to the point where people will watch our television instead of American television in those areas now served, it would be well for us to take advantage of competition here in Canada as well as in the United States.

Also might I point out one inconsistency in the statement made to the house by the minister in regard to the policy just announced. He has stated it is the intention of the government to do what it can to prevent stations becoming mere outlets for programs from the United States. Now, that sounds like a very admirable purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, the interesting thing is that, although the apparent desire of the C.B.C. is to prevent our stations becoming outlets for programs from the United States, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation already, at very considerable expense, has built a microwave relay connection with what is hardly a Canadian station at Buffalo, so that we can pipe in Canadian programs from there.

We do not need to pipe programs from Buffalo because the Buffalo programs are already coming in. As a matter of fact the record shows that they are being watched by a much larger Canadian audience than Canadian programs in that area.

Mr. McCann: The C.B.C. has no relay.

Mr. Drew: What is that?

Mr. McCann: The C.B.C. has not built any microwave relay anywhere.

Mr. Sinclair: Is this a debate?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think now the house is entering upon a debate on the subject. Of course I cannot allow a debate on it at this time. The remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) should be directed strictly to the statement which has been read. We cannot generalize.

Mr. Drew: I am dealing strictly with what the minister has said. I was pointing out his reference to the introduction of programs here. I was referring to the fact that the C.B.C. has made facilities available for the introduction of United States programs into Canada, and indicated that the C.B.C. has expressed its regrets that it has been unable to make appropriate arrangements to bring those programs in because of certain pending discussions that are still under way.

I submit, again, that there should be a clear policy in this respect, and that the House of Commons should know what that policy is. It should be given further consideration. Although the purpose is to provide Canadian programs, if Canadian money is going to be put up for publicly-owned stations in areas where private enterprise has indicated that it is ready to go on, then I suggest that Canadian money does not need to be put up to bring programs in from the United States, because those commercial interests are ready to bring them in in any event.

PROGRAM ENTITLED "HILDA MORGAN"

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): When the minister refers to the quality of the programs I would express the hope, in relation to what I said in the house the other day, that he will also tell us what his answer is to be in regard to that disgraceful program which was put over the C.B.C., and which I mentioned in the house a few days ago.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): May I answer that now? I think the hon. member is referring to the program called "Hilda Morgan". The government does not propose to take any action regarding the play "Hilda Morgan" recently telecast by the C.B.C. Under the Canadian Broadcasting Act, the C.B.C. itself has the full responsibility for all programming matters.

The C.B.C. has received only three unfavourable comments on the play, and a considerable number more of favourable comments. The only press comment found was in the Toronto Telegram, and that was favourable.

CRIMINAL CODE

COMMUNIST CAMPAIGN TO DISCREDIT PROPOSED REVISION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Most members of the House of Commons have been receiving postcards reading as follows:

I am deeply disturbed by sections 46, 49, 63, 365 and 372 of Bill H8 (the proposed revision of the Criminal Code), now being reviewed by the standing committee on banking and commerce in the Senate.

These and other sections of the bill have no place on the statute books of a democratic country, and I strongly urge you to oppose such police state legislation if and when it comes before the House of Commons.

The name and address of each hon. member to whom these cards are sent is not typewritten but printed on each postcard, indicating clearly that those responsible for this campaign are making it as easy as they can for the citizens to whom cards are circulated to merely sign the card and send it on under the franking privileges of the hon. member to whom it is addressed. The contents and purport of the sections of the code referred to are not indicated in any way, so that it is impossible for those who send the cards to get from the cards themselves any idea as to what they are protesting against. These cards are the latest phase of a well-organized and financed campaign directed against the enactment of these clauses of Bill "O" of the Senate. Although the revised code, or as it is now numbered Bill "O" of the Senate is not yet before the house, it is desirable in the public interest to place before the house information about the true origin, character and intent of this systematic campaign to discredit this legislation.

Certain hon. members have indicated some puzzlement as to what the significance of it was and suggested that it might be of interest to all hon. members that a statement be made.

This intensive campaign is conducted by the communists in Canada. To disguise the real communist control behind the campaign, the attack on Bill "O" is operated through the league for democratic rights, a front organization which is thoroughly communist-controlled and communist-inspired. The propaganda by the league for democratic rights, while directed to a wide variety of groups, is especially aimed at the trade unions.

Long before these postcards were circulated amongst many Canadian unions, I checked with the Ottawa head offices of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress to make sure that they were aware of what was going on. Not only had they been for some time well aware of the efforts the league for democratic rights was putting forth to line up their respective unions in opposition to Bill "O" but I am glad to pay tribute to the measures which they have taken to expose this barefaced communist manoeuvre to influence their locals and members.

[Mr. Garson.]

As examples of the measures they took, I think perhaps hon. members would welcome my quoting from some of the editorials in the labour papers, if for no other reason than that the hon. members themselves might use those quotations in replying to the postcards they have received. In many cases, I am sorry to say, good, patriotic, innocent Canadians have been taken in by this sort of propaganda. I should like to quote from the November issue of the Trades and Labour Congress Journal which, I believe, has not yet come to the attention of all hon. members of the house. It is as follows:

One of the most difficult problems confronting democratically elected governments is how to frame laws that will give needed protection against those who work and scheme to destroy democracy and democratic institutions and at the same time not infringe on the fundamental freedoms and rights which people in the free world cherish.

Most right thinking citizens desire some protection from the treachery or the Boyers, the Allens, the Mays and the Roses, and many others who are actively and continually exploiting the weaknesses of democracy with the sole objective of substituting dictatorship for democracy and slave camps for freedom. None recognize this problem more than the international communist party. It was for this reason that such fronts as the league for democratic rights came into being. In Britain they are known as the National Council of Civil Liberties.

At the present time a flood of circulars are being mailed out by the so-called league for democratic rights regarding some of the proposed amendments to Canada's Criminal Code as contained in Bill H8. Reading this stuff one is supposed to believe that the writers of the circular are really concerned with the organized labour movement and are fronting an expensive campaign on its behalf in order to protect Canadian workers from the hangman for the well-established crime of criticizing the government. To cinch this eyewash, the league for democratic "wrongs" with the assistance of the communist-controlled press (which has instructions to play it up) is quoting: "British opinion deplores Canada's Criminal Code amendments". Take a look at this British opinion. It is not that of the British Trades Union Congress, the British Labour party or the Churchill government, but it is the propaganda views of the counterpart of the same front in Britain.

The reference there to Bill H8 is really to Bill "O" of the Senate. This bill was introduced into the Senate last year and was given lengthy and careful consideration by the Senate. It has been reintroduced in the Senate this year and is now being considered by the Senate banking and commerce committee. When it is reported to this house we shall set up a committee with power to hear evidence from interested persons and organizations, as I stated in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just the other day. The unions of Canada from the beginning, as I am informed, have planned to study this bill from the standpoint of organized labour and will have an adequate opportunity to make representations concerning it.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this bill is based upon the authority vested in the parliament of Canada to amend the British North America Act in respect to matters which are exclusively federal. The purpose of this bill is to increase the quorum of the House of Commons from a minimum of 20 to a minimum of 30 members. A still higher figure might well have been proposed, but this bill suggests 30 because that will at least maintain the proportion established in 1867. The house then had 181 members with a quorum of 20. On that basis, since we now have 262 members and will have 265 members after the next election, it would seem that the quorum should be at least 30 members.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

RECOVERY OF INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. Chevrier: Section 7 of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act allows a taxpayer, who in that case would be a ship owner, to claim as an item of deduction in his income tax return an amount which he is likely to expend in a quadrennial or any special survey under the Canada Shipping Act. This bill will provide for the recapture of any amount which he may have claimed but has not actually spent because the ship has either been lost, destroyed, sold or disposed of or for any other reason within the meaning of the section.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Proposed Legislation

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

TREATMENT AND RECLAMATION OF YOUNG OFFENDERS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 10 (from the Senate), to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 13, for the relief of Frances Wavertree Harris McClure.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 14, for the relief of Nicole Jeanne Andree Marion Comys.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 15, for the relief of Joseph Mattioli. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 16, for the relief of Gabrielle Bertrand McCullough.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 17, for the relief of Katherine Jessie McArthur.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 11, for the relief of Barbara Carrique Cordeau.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 12, for the relief of Frederick Kenneth Hare.—Mr. Winkler.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION

INCREASED SEVERITY IN IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Before the orders of the day are called may I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of which I have given notice. Has the attention of the government been called to the apparent increasing severity of religious persecution behind the iron curtain, particularly in Bulgaria?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is "yes". Possibly I might be permitted to make a very short statement in regard to this persecution.

During the past few years the civilized world has been repeatedly shocked by the brutal persecution of religious leaders which has taken place behind the iron curtain. Protests have been made by this government in this house and in the general assembly of the United Nations against these attacks.

Recently 40 members of a religious order in Bulgaria were brought to trial charged with subversive activities. The trial followed the usual horrible and grotesque communist pattern, and death was decreed for the principal defendants, in this case on four priests, including Monsignor Eugene Bossilkoff, Passionist Bishop of Nicopol.

I am sure I am reflecting the view of every member of this house when I express our detestation and condemnation of this additional and shocking case of religious persecution. It is our intention at the first opportunity to voice our protest in the general assembly of the United Nations.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE—EXTENSION TO POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to answer a question which was asked on December 5 by the Leader of the Opposition with reference to Poland. I shall not repeat the question but in answer will say that there are no regular programs of the international service directed to Poland. Policy matters such as this are decided in consultation with the Department of External Affairs. The importance of the Polish people in the future of Europe and their trials of the present are fully recognized. Transmitter time for Europe, however, is limited and is fully occupied. It has so far been felt, taking all factors into consideration, that the transmission time and funds available should be divided as they are at present. Of the countries behind the iron curtain, regular services are directed to the U.S.S.R. in Russian and Ukrainian, and to Czechoslovakia in Czech and Slovak. Other European language services are French, German, Italian, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian and Finnish.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house whether a gentleman of Polish extraction or Polish stock has been engaged for the purpose of starting such a program? If so, what is his name?

Mr. McCann: I have no knowledge of such an appointment or of consideration thereof.

Mr. Drew: I would ask the minister to take this as notice of a question, to check the name of the man who, it is reported, has been engaged and inform the house whether or not that is correct and, if so, what the name of the man is.

COMMUNICATIONS

NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF B.C. TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give any information as to the progress of negotiations for the sale of the government telegraph and telephone service facilities in British Columbia? Can he outline what arrangements will be made to protect the position of the employees of the service with respect to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —their continuation in employment and their pension rights?

Mr. Speaker: Could that question not appear on the order paper?

Mr. Fulton: There are a number of employees and others in the province who are interested in this matter. Negotiations have been under way for some time—

Mr. Howe: The question can wait till Wednesday.

Mr. Fulton: —and I think it is a matter of sufficient importance and urgency to those concerned. I believe the minister may be ready to answer. I telephoned his office this morning and told him I was going to make the inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, if the Minister of Transport would like to answer the question now—

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer. The hon. gentleman did advise me he was going to ask the question but I feel, as I am sure the house feels, that it is a matter for the order paper. I do not want to be unjust to my hon. friend. I can answer it if it is the wish of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances perhaps the minister might reply.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I should say in fairness that the Minister of Fisheries and the Solicitor General, both before their appointments and since, as well as the hon. members for Cariboo and Skeena, have shown a very keen interest in the question which my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. Fulton: Why were they objecting to having it answered?

Mr. Sinclair: We know the answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I gathered the house was objecting, but in any event the simple answer to my hon. friend's question is no. I should perhaps add that negotiations did take place and a substantial and complete report respecting government facilities has been made by Canadian National Telegraphs and the British Columbia Telephone Company, but it has not been possible to study the report. I have seen officers of both companies, and I do not believe it will be possible to begin negotiations until early next year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMINISTRATION AT PETAWAWA CAMP—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. Is he in a position yet to inform us definitely when we may receive a copy of the report by Mr. Currie which was promised us last spring?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Acting Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say because I have not received the report yet myself.

Mr. Drew: Will the acting minister take steps to find out from Mr. Currie when the report will be available?

Mr. Campney: From the remarks which the minister made in the house a few days ago I understood that Mr. Currie had indicated that the report would be forthcoming within a week or ten days. I presume that estimate was made with knowledge of what was possible on his part. I do not mind making inquiry if it is desired.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that the minister made a general statement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —with regard to that before he made the statement in the house that he had not been in touch with Mr. Currie. It is for that reason I ask the direct question: Will the acting minister find out from Mr. Currie when the report will be ready?

Mr. Graydon: What is all the delay about anyway?

PROPOSED ARMY TRAINING AREA, N. B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has he at any time discussed with Mr. Donald Gordon, or any of the directors or officials of the Canadian National Railways, the location of the administration site or installations of the proposed army training area in New Brunswick?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no. I have not discussed that subject with Mr. Donald Gordon or with any director of the railway, and in fact have not seen any of them, for several months, except that I sat beside Mr. Gordon at a luncheon the other day, when we did not discuss that subject. I have no knowledge of the problem. It is a problem for the Department of National Defence. I have not discussed it with anyone and am not competent to do so.

Mr. Riley: I should like to direct the same question to the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I think I would have to make the same answer. I would say, however, that I have conversations with Mr. Donald Gordon from time to time but I have no recollection of having discussed that subject with him at any time, and in any event it is a matter for the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: Better try another minister.

REPORTS ON MORALE OF TROOPS IN EUROPE

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General, the Acting Minister of National Defence. In view of the Canadian Press story in this morning's Montreal Gazette regarding low morale among our troops in Europe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the last sitting of the house I brought to the attention of hon. members that the proper procedure for them to follow, if they wished to bring a press dispatch to the attention of a minister, is to send it to the minister. I cannot allow the practice to continue of reading press dispatches.

Mr. Wright: I was not reading a press dispatch. I merely asked whether it had been brought to the minister's attention. Can the Acting Minister of National Defence inform the house whether or not he has received a report or reports from the clergymen of several Canadian denominations who visited our troops in Europe earlier this year, and will the minister table such reports?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Acting Minister of National Defence): I am not aware of any such reports having been received by the minister but I will make inquiry.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED OFFERING OF IMMIGRANT'S CHILD FOR SALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I understand he has investigated the case of the immigrant who offered to sell a child—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put his question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister what action the government is taking with respect to the immigrant who offered to sell a child for $1,000. I understand he has investigated.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am wholly uninformed as to what is in the hon. member's mind except that he may have read in the newspapers this morning that some magistrate in Sarnia was reported to have said in a speech that he knew of a case where an immigrant mother had been trying to dispose of her child by adoption for the sum of $1,000. My knowledge is only to the extent of reading the report this morning. If my hon. friend wants me to look into the matter and find out why the mother is doing it I suppose I can, but I fancy I would receive the answer that it was her business and not the government's.

Mr. Fraser: The reason I ask is that if it is true the immigrant should be deported.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BISHOP FULTON SHEEN—INQUIRY AS TO TELECASTING OF PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. I am sorry that I was not able to give him notice, and perhaps he would like to take it as notice. Has Bishop Fulton Sheen or have his sponsors applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to have their program telecast? If so, has the application been refused? Would the minister care to make a statement with respect to the application?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I shall take the hon. member's question as notice and answer tomorrow or the next day.

HOUSING

PURCHASING TERMS FOR WORKERS' HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the minister or the government received any requests from workers' organizations to the effect that the government consider the feasibility of giving workers, such as those caught in a move like that of the Ford Company to Oakville, the opportunity of buying homes on the same terms as defence workers? If so, what consideration has the government given to these requests?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The questions asked by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) should, I feel, appear on the order paper. Those hon. members might put their questions on the order paper.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

ISSUANCE OF CHEQUES PRIOR TO CHRISTMAS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): May I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McCusker). Is it the intention of the department to issue the December cheques for old age pensions before Christmas, as was the practice formerly when these cheques were handled by the provinces?

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

NEWFOUNDLAND

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT BY SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe). Why is the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) in Newfoundland at the present time?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I will be glad to refer that question to the Secretary of State when he returns and I have no doubt as to what his answer will be.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) as house leader. Will the minister indicate the date on which it is proposed that the house will adjourn—in view of the necessity of making reservations with the Christmas holidays coming on?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would be ready to do that if I knew on what date we could dispose of the debate on the address. It is the intention of the government to proceed with this debate to its conclusion. We do not think it would be reasonable to postpone the debate until after the recess. With some co-operation from all members of the house I will in the near future give an answer as to the date.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that Christmas is not a variable date and this debate cannot adjust itself to that time. It is perfectly certain that members from some distance, who expect to be with their families, are going to leave here by the twentieth, and it might just as well be decided now that this house will adjourn on the twentieth.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last year during the session Christmas was on the twenty-fifth of December.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We remained here until New Year's eve.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding, this is a perfectly normal procedure that we are now contemplating. At that time last year we were taking steps to try to prevent the government from ramming through some very objectionable legislation.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Did his first answer imply that, should the debate conclude tomorrow, the house would then adjourn?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not go that far, Mr. Speaker, because we have about two pages of legislation that we are ready to proceed with.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DECORATION OF OPPOSITION CAUCUS ROOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). Was it in his mind, when he renovated the caucus room of the opposition, that after the next election there would be a few of the present government occupying that particular room?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, December 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity, an opportunity which I have not had before in this session, of intervening in the debate to make a statement that will be as brief as I can make it, although I am going to try to cover a good deal of ground, more particularly on the work of the United Nations assembly which I have just left and to which I am returning. Also, if there is time, I will speak on one or two other questions of international interest.

Mr. Speaker, I have been attending the seventh assembly of the United Nations and though while doing so I have been engaged in international discussions, I have been conscious of the fact during those discussions that there is a very direct connection between what we have been talking about in New York at the United Nations and matters of more immediate domestic concern and, possibly, which have been under discussion in this house. We have been discussing international questions which bear on peace, welfare and good relations between states; mutual aid between states; and all those questions have a very direct effect on domestic policies and domestic interests in this country —even on such matters as trade and taxation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that foreign policy is merely domestic policy with its hat on.

This afternoon, therefore, I propose to keep that hat on and discuss for a short time, I hope, the work of the United Nations assembly, and, possibly, the forthcoming NATO council meeting in Paris.

I should say in the beginning that this parliament is, I think, well represented at what is turning out to be a very important assembly indeed. It is one which may well represent a critical turning point in the fortunes of the United Nations. In our delegation which is working in New York—and I think it is accurate to say it is working hard—all parties in this house are represented and are working together. They are working in different ways, of course, but they are working together as, if I may say so, a Canadian team. It is true that members of the delegation who represent the party in charge of government have a special responsibility. Other members who represent other parties have their own responsibilities of opposition. Nevertheless that has never prevented them from working together in a friendly and useful way in New York.

The main question before the United Nations assembly, the main challenge to the United Nations at this session, has been Korea. Almost at the beginning of our session it was agreed, and I think it was agreed unanimously if I recollect correctly, that that question should be given priority in our discussions. It was quite right that we should do that because fighting is going on in Korea and surely it is the first responsibility of the United Nations to bring that fighting to an end if that can be done on honourable and acceptable terms. In the discussion of this question of Korea much of the debate and much of our thoughts centred around the one remaining obstacle to the achievement of such an honourable armistice in Korea—the question of prisoners of war.

In the discussion of that particular question the communist delegations have exploited to the full the situation which they claim, without adequate evidence to back it up, has existed in the prisoner of war camps and more particularly the Koje island camp. I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in reading the debates of this house, to learn that at least one member, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), displayed particular interest in what had gone on in that camp and the relationship of that issue to the retirement of an officer of the Canadian army. By way of interpolation, and to dispel any remaining suspicion which may linger in his mind in regard to the relationship of myself and my department to that matter, I would merely say at this time—to clear the matter up, and I hope that it will as far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned—that neither I nor my department made any representations, oral or written, formal or informal, to the Department of National Defence about Brigadier Connelly and the Koje incident at any time. Neither I nor my department have had anything whatever to do with his retirement. That, Mr. Speaker, is by way of an aside which I consider in the circumstances to be necessary, as I did not have the privilege of attending the session of the house when this matter came up.

This question of prisoners of war, we are told even by the communists, is the only obstacle to the completion of armistice negotiations. It is the only question that remains unsettled. In respect of it and of Korea generally—and some hon. members in this house who have been in New York will particularly be aware of this—there were four resolutions submitted to our assembly which dealt with this question.

One was a resolution of those members of the United Nations who had forces in Korea, participating in operations there. That resolution became known as the 21-power resolution. Canada was one of the sponsoring members of that resolution which endorsed the steps that had been taken and the effort that had been made by the unified command in Korea and the other side for an armistice, and called on the other side to accept those proposals and to bring about an armistice.

There were two other resolutions from delegations from Mexico and Peru which dealt with more specialized aspects of the question; and there was at the same time introduced by the Soviet delegation a resolution which would have set up an 11-power commission representing both sides of the conflict, and which would have had authority to deal not only with the prisoners of war question but with Korea generally and indeed with other Asiatic questions. On the face of it, that resolution by the Soviet delegation may have seemed to be not without some aspects of reason and possibility. The 11-power commission had four communist members but, in order to make quite certain that this 11-power commission would not be able to act, the Soviet, within a day of the introduction of this resolution, introduced an amendment to make it quite clear that that commission could act only by a two-thirds majority. A two-thirds majority of eleven is seven and a quarter; that would have meant that eight members of the commission would have been required to agree in order to reach a decision. The meaning of that provision, of course, is quite obvious. It would have given the Soviet and their satellites a veto on all the actions and all the activities of the commission.

After the introduction of these four resolutions the Indian delegation, after consultation with a good many Asian and Arab delegations—and indeed other delegations—introduced a resolution which narrowed the issue before the assembly and before the political committee to the prisoners of war question alone and left out of the resolution all that had gone on before and other aspects of the questions than that of prisoners of war. They produced a proposal which attempted to reconcile the two ideas, the one to which our side clung as right and just and the other which the communists said was a sine qua non of any agreement on their part to a prisoners of war solution. Those two ideas were, on the one hand, the right to repatriation guaranteed under the Geneva convention of 1949, and on the other the refusal to use force to drive prisoners of war back to communist territories if they did not wish to go.

As to the first, although we had a great deal of discussion on the subject, I think it is quite clear, from the legal point of view, that the right of repatriation is guaranteed under the Geneva convention in question. The right is clear, I think, and the right is unambiguous. It seems that the delegations which made that prisoners of war convention—that is the Red Cross convention in Geneva in 1949—were at that time, quite naturally, thinking more of a future war when the problem would be forced retention rather than forced repatriation. The question of forced repatriation did not enter into their calculations at that time to any noticeable extent. So this right of repatriation, without that particular qualification in its terms, does exist.

Mr. Graydon: That is the right of the prisoner?

Mr. Pearson: The right of the prisoner; the right of repatriation.

Mr. Graydon: That is the right of the prisoner to repatriation?

Mr. Pearson: Freedom of the prisoner and the right of the prisoner to be repatriated and go back home; the right of the individual prisoner to be repatriated.

On the other hand the other issue—no force to be used in connection with prisoners of war—involves a principle which we on our side could not and would not give up; because if we had done so, we would have violated the understanding we had and the undertaking which we gave to some of these prisoners who came over from the other side.

The Indian resolution was an effort to reconcile these two points of view in a way which should have been acceptable to all men of good will on either side. It did that in terms of the resolution; and to carry out those terms and make this reconciliation effective in practice as well as in principle, it set up a repatriation commission to which prisoners would be immediately released as the first stage of their repatriation. That repatriation commission, which would have taken over the prisoners from the detaining powers, would have consisted of Czechoslovakia and Poland, two communist states; Sweden and Switzerland, two non-communist states; and provision was made for the appointment of an umpire who will be an important member of that commission if it is ever set up. If that kind of commission could not be established, an alternative procedure for setting one up is embodied in the resolution.

We considered this resolution to be, on the part of the Indian delegation, an important and constructive move to solve this question. It was not a perfect resolution; it was not clear in all of its terms, and there were reasons for some of those ambiguities. But we felt that it was a resolution which could work and which, if it did work, would bring the fighting in Korea to an end; so we in the Canadian delegation gave it our support from the beginning.

We were then confronted by two problems. One was whether we should give this resolution priority over our own 21-power resolution, and we agreed to do that as did all the other sponsoring powers of the 21-power resolution. The other problem was to achieve the maximum support possible for this Indian resolution. To do that certain clarifications —certain changes, if you like—were required. These in their turn required long and difficult discussions and negotiations between the authors of the resolution and certain other governments who wished to see it clarified in certain respects.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to pay a tribute to the honesty of purpose, the industry and the refusal to give way to discouragement of the Indian authors of this resolution who, at this time, and at the United Nations, took a responsibility which I think we must all applaud. In the press, of course, there were reports of differences. In the process of negotiating clarification between the United States delegation and between other delegations there were such differences, but they were not as fundamental or as important as might appear from reading some of the reports. There were, however, sincere differences of approach and differences of opinion about what should be clarified in this resolution in order to make it acceptable to everybody.

Eventually, those differences were overcome. Some changes were made by the Indian delegation which made the text perfectly acceptable to practically all delegations at the assembly. That process of acceptance and that process of coming together was made less difficult, I think, by the Soviet attitude toward the resolution, which was one of complete, unalterable and violent opposition to a constructive initiative by the nation putting it forward; indeed it was referred to by the leader of the Soviet delegation himself as a "rotten compromise". Their opposition was based on the fact that we should first have an automatic cease-fire declared and then armistice negotiations later. The objection to that, of course, was that, if the cease-fire took place and it was without an armistice, the prisoners would still be prisoners, the issues which centred around the prisoners of war would not be solved, and there was no assurance that they would be solved.

Meanwhile, from the point of view of military security, the cease-fire would have meant that one side was under a military disadvantage in comparison with the other side which had its base close at hand.

However, as I said, the Indian text was clarified; it was put to the vote a few days ago, with a result which is not usual these days in the United Nations assembly. Fifty-four nations of the assembly voted for it, including every Asian, Arab, Latin-American and African state, and only five members of the assembly voted against it: the Soviet delegation and its four communist satellites. One delegation, China, abstained. Therefore that Indian resolution has now become a resolution of the United Nations; and in my capacity as president of the assembly, under the terms of the resolution, I have submitted it to the foreign minister of the communist government at Peking, and the foreign minister of the North Korean regime, together with a covering letter in which I attempted to meet some of the objections which they had previously put forward over the radio, and in other ways, and to clarify some of the points which they claimed were still doubtful. At the same time I thought it was probably not inappropriate, as president of the assembly, to make an appeal to them to accept these proposals as the basis of an armistice and eventual peace, if they really wish to bring the war there to an end.

I do not know, of course, what the result of this transmission and appeal will be. It may mean an armistice, or it may not. I would not like to give odds on one side of the question; but whether the communists accept this United Nations resolution or not, it surely has very great value to the United Nations and to us all even if it is turned down, because that resolution now becomes the United Nations' basis from which negotiations must now begin, if they are to be resumed. And in the future that may turn out to be a very important and very useful development because, of course, this resolution, having been accepted by the United States government, now becomes operative in respect of the unified command in Korea. And I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that whatever may happen to this resolution in Peking and Pyongyang, it has been a very worth-while initiative to have taken, and a very valuable result has been achieved, since this initiative was taken by a great Asian country and supported enthusiastically by every other Asian, Arab and African state.

If this resolution is rejected, what do we do then? Well, of course there are at least three courses: The United Nations can preserve and hold on in Korea along the present line, bringing about as much military success as is possible within the limits of the present strategy. It may be possible within those limits—consideration by the military authorities in the unified command is being given to this—to add to the number of Koreans who are defending their own country. But in respect of that it should not be forgotten —indeed it was mentioned in this house the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—that at the present time a 155-mile line in Korea is being defended by 15 divisions, of which I think 9 are from the Republic of Korea, 5 from the United States and 1 division is from the commonwealth. Of this line, 60 per cent is being held now by Korean troops; 25 per cent by United States troops, and 15 per cent by other United Nations' forces. This course, following our present strategy, will require of course a steadiness and patience not only in Korea, among the soldiers, but at home; it will require military steadiness, and it will certainly require political steadiness.

The second course would be to increase military pressure, to formulate new strategy in the hope that by doing so we will bring this struggle to an end by military means. There are obvious risks in following that course. There is the risk that we might extend the war to the continent of Asia without ending the war in Korea, and that is a risk which is in all our minds, and which indeed we have discussed in this house before.

But there is a third course, to withdraw and turn Korea over to the aggressor, and that is one that will not be supported I am sure by any government, any parliament or any people, which have accepted United Nations' intervention in Korea against the attacker

It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, to recall that the president-elect of the United States—with whom I had the pleasure of renewing acquaintance the other day in New York—has returned from Korea and has already stated that there is no easy, no trick solution, no panacea for this Korean campaign, and he is quoted in the press as having said in Seoul during his visit to Korea:

> How difficult it seems to be in a war of this kind to work out a plan that would bring a positive and definite victory without possibly running grave risks of enlarging the war.

But while we may be discouraged about our lack of immediate progress in ending this campaign, with its great drain on resources and men of the United Nations, and particularly on those of the United States, and those from the Korean forces, which are bearing the brunt of the struggle and bearing it steadily and courageously, apart from that difficulty, we must not forget that we have gained also by intervention in Korea, because we have stopped aggression there, and the lesson of that action is not lost on those who would begin aggression elsewhere. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not only the course of honour, it is the course of ultimate safety not to weaken in this United Nations' operation which we have taken in Korea, while always emphasizing, taking advantage of every opportunity to emphasize, that we are ready for an honourable political solution with the Chinese communist government.

The Indian resolution—indeed my letter to the foreign minister of communist China—emphasized that fact, that once an armistice can be achieved in Korea—and there is supposed to be only one obstacle to that achievement—then we should be ready to sit down with the Chinese at a political conference to deal with Korean political problems generally. It is not only implicit, it is actually written in the terms of this United Nations' resolution.

If the Chinese communist government will abandon the aggression that has been going on in Korea and refrain from participating in aggression elsewhere they have nothing to fear from us on the other side, and much indeed to gain by that course.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all that I think I need to say on Korea at this time. But in concentrating on Korea I would not wish the house to be left with the impression—as I am sure it would not be, because of its knowledge of international developments—that Korea is the only danger spot in Asia. One has only to mention Indo-China, where the situation is not propitious; Malaya, where the banditry and the fighting still goes on, though the situation is improving; Iran, where there are elements of discontent which might deteriorate into chaos, and we know who exploits chaos; and indeed in the whole of the Middle East, where there is division, disruption, social unrest and political awakening.

There were of course other important questions before the United Nations assembly, and some of them are still before the assembly. I heard the other day, at a plenary session of the assembly, the leader of one of the important Asian delegations speaking in connection with a resolution which has been supported by all the Arab and all the African, but opposed by a good many of the western powers—I heard this delegate, who is not unfriendly to the West, in deploring this division on resolutions of that kind, say that Asia and Africa are on the march, and will not be denied.

We should realize, and the realization is not always a pleasant one, that they are not invariably marching with the West as they move. That philosopher and historian, Arnold Toynbee, in a very interesting article which appeared the other day under the significant title "The World and The West" gives three explanations for this discouraging development, why Asia and the Asians do not always seem to be with us on issues that we think are fundamental to the development of freedom and democracy in their own part of the world.

These three reasons lie, he said, in the appeal that communist doctrine inevitably makes to the people in those countries of the world. It is a threefold Russian communist appeal, and it is not always easy to resist. Certainly it is not easy to resist at the United Nations, and the Russians there know how to exploit this appeal to a maximum value.

The first appeal they make to the Asian is: If you follow the Russian example, communism will give you strength to stand up against the West, as communist Russia does today. To some Asians the West does not mean what we know it should mean—freedom and democracy—and that is an appeal which makes its impression on certain Asian minds.

The second appeal is to the Asian peasantry, and that is that communism can and private enterprise neither can nor, if it could, would, get rid of the extreme inequality between the rich luxury-loving minority and the poverty-stricken majority.

Then the third appeal from the communists, about which we hear so much in the United Nations and elsewhere—and it is offered most confidently and dogmatically—is an appeal for a unity in policy and in doctrine which, in some form or another, is the only alternative to self-destruction in the atomic age. We know it is a spurious and fatal unity; but our knowledge is not shared by all the peoples of Asia to whom it is addressed.

Now, the danger of this kind of appeal is being shown today, and the effect that it is having today is being shown in the other great and difficult complex of problems which are before the United Nations assembly. That complex of connected problems involves the relationship of colonial peoples to administering states, and expresses itself in charges of racial discrimination, in tensions between the haves and the have-nots, and in the responsibility of the former for technical and other kinds of help for the latter; it also expresses itself in worries on the part of the haves that the have-not blocs are pushing extreme and premature resolutions through the United Nations by force of a mathematical majority.

These problems appear in various items of our United Nations agenda today, some of which have not yet come up for discussion. In considering them it is depressing to realize that Asian and Arab states are nearly always together and not always on our side. On our side sometimes we are restricted to some of the countries of the western world.

The United Nations assembly, with all its faults and with all its possibilities, has become the forum for the expression of these discontents, confusions and divisions, for the expression of these aspirations and, indeed, these fears. The problems which they involve and the solutions we find to these problems may in the long run have just as important a relationship to peace and, indeed, to the future of the United Nations as the question of Korea itself. We have to try to reconcile the domestic jurisdiction of sovereign states, and the administrative responsibility of some of those sovereign states over dependent peoples in their progress toward independence —with the legitimate interests of the United Nations in human rights and racial discrimination, and freedom for all peoples.

The United Nations is not having an easy time in this assembly in making this reconciliation. The United Nations is not there, I suggest—and its charter did not intend it—to make this progress, which we all agree is so essential, either explosive or violent; but it is there to make this progress steady and sure.

In a delegation like the Canadian delegation, as it confronts these fundamental long-range issues, decisions on individual resolutions are never easy, especially in respect of the disputes between colonial powers and members who have only recently evolved from colonial status, and others who have gone beyond the colonial status.

In those disputes many resolutions are put forward which do not provide an easy problem for a delegation such as the Canadian delegation.

I should like, if I may, for a moment or two, to try to explain some of these difficulties and the principles upon which in our delegation we have tried to act, principles which have been approved by our government.

In the United Nations charter the administering powers accepted as a binding international obligation a concept of progress toward self-government for all dependent peoples, which they had long recognized as a moral imperative. Their acceptance was completely voluntary. At the time of San Francisco there was no external power which could have forced the victor states to surrender the smallest portion of this aspect of their sovereignty. Their response was not due to outside pressure, but to their own consciences; and if world opinion played a part in their decision—and this it did—it was able to do so only because it reinforced those irresistible currents that were already at work within the democratic states.

That is the inevitable consequence of the acceptance of colonial responsibilities by a democratic state. Yet, can anyone believe that these same consequences would ever have been accepted by a totalitarian state? Would they have been accepted by totalitarian states which at the United Nations assembly attack, and very often viciously attack, what they call colonial powers?

Would India and Burma have won their freedom from a totalitarian system, with its slave labour camps and its secret police? Would world opinion have been of the slightest help to Indonesia if it had been in the grip of such masters?

For that matter, has dialectical materialism any way of explaining how such advances to freedom could possibly take place, not merely with the assent but with the positive co-operation of the administering powers?

We have watched the exponents of this totalitarian philosophy in the United Nations and elsewhere in their assiduous efforts to capture such noble words as freedom and democracy and put them to slave labour. We have seen them reduced at this session of the United Nations assembly to denying all evidence of colonial advancement in the face of the plain accomplished facts.

On their side, the administering powers have pledged themselves to work towards the progressive replacing of their own authority by that of the peoples hitherto subject to them. The charter accepts and establishes them as the instruments for achieving this end. In doing so it recognizes what is called colonialism as an integral aspect of the effort to establish peace and stability. But it gives no comfort to the illusion that the immediate and unconditional abandonment of the dependent territories would be a good thing for the international community.

The whole tenor of the United Nations charter assumes a balanced process of evolution. It lays commitments on the administering powers and it recognizes in every paragraph that the fulfilment of those commitments must be a gradual process whose rapidity will vary with each case. Colonialism, in short, is made the instrument of its own disappearance.

That is a responsibility whose formidable nature must surely be recognized and respected by those of us who do not share it. It is the task of fitting various societies, some of them primitive societies, to take place in this modern and highly integrated world. It is not enough to waken in these societies a desire to run their own affairs; they must also be trained to the necessary level of ability, and if this essential process is interfered with or frustrated, or if on the other hand it is rushed too recklessly and precipitately, it will be to the detriment of the prosperity and security and future advancement of these colonial territories themselves.

While accepting these principles, Canadian decisions on specific colonial questions at the United Nations are based on our judgment of their merits, conditioned only by our sincere desire to help reach the maximum common agreement that is consistent with the welfare of the dependent peoples themselves and the interests of the international community.

I think this problem has come most concretely to our attention in connection with the South African items which are now on the agenda of the United Nations and which were dealt with last week. They are not in themselves colonial problems, but they represent a problem of the relationship of dependent people to a sovereign state and a sovereign government. They are problems of discrimination.

These South African items illustrate the difficulties of that problem and they also illustrate the danger of friendly nations dividing in their approach to it. Probably the best single example of this difficulty is the item on the agenda itself called "race conflict in South Africa" and the introduction under that item of a resolution by certain Asian states challenging the South African legislation, challenging South African policy and setting up an agency of the United Nations to intervene in this matter.

At the same time there have been introduced other resolutions on the same subject. South Africa's defence against these charges —this defence has been carried on lengthily, vigorously and skilfully by the South African representative at the United Nations—has been the legal defence that the assembly is simply not competent even to consider these matters under article 2, paragraph 7, of the charter which reserves domestic jurisdiction to the states themselves.

On the other hand, members on the other side of the argument pointed to articles of the charter which pledged its members to co-operate for the achievement of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms without distinction as to race. Members on the other side of this argument, that is the other side from the South African side, have attempted to show that this kind of legislation, this kind of policy in South Africa is itself a threat to international peace by what it is stirring up in the minds of the coloured people on that continent.

As far as the decisions of the Canadian delegation were concerned—I gather that these decisions have caused some comment in this country—we joined the majority of the assembly in voting against South Africa's contention that under the charter the United Nations was not competent even to consider these matters. In voting in that way we drew a distinction between consideration in the form of discussion and consideration in the form of intervention.

We felt, and I think it is becoming the established jurisprudence and established doctrine of the United Nations, that the assembly is now competent to discuss anything as the town meeting of the world, but that that does not mean that the assembly is competent to interfere in the domestic affairs of member states by certain types of resolutions or by setting up committees and commissions to visit those countries and report and possibly take action at succeeding assemblies. It was in the light of those considerations that we made our decision in respect to this particular resolution.

We voted for a resolution inspired by the Scandinavian states and supported by I think 18 delegations which, while not singling out South Africa in terms, while not setting up any machinery to go to South Africa, and while not calling on South Africa to rescind any item of domestic legislation, called upon South Africa and all other member states to bring their policies into conformity with their obligation under the charter to co-operate for the achievement of and universal respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

It has been said that in voting for this and abstaining from voting on other resolutions we were avoiding our responsibilities. As the head of our delegation the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) said:

> The Scandinavian resolution is not just a means of dodging the issue, but rather of dodging a reaction which will be harmful to the people who would like to help.

As far as the Asian resolution was concerned, we abstained on that because we thought it was of doubtful legality. For the same reason we also abstained on the South African resolution which said that this particular Asian resolution was ultra vires. In the committee considering this matter 21 other delegations joined us in abstention on this issue. In the plenary session, which was held last Friday, most of these delegations switched their vote from abstention to voting against the Asian contention and in favour of the South African contention that a particular clause of this resolution was ultra vires. We did not switch; we remained and abstained on that issue.

However, abstention on this particular issue, which was caused by doubt in our minds as to the legality of this action and as to the practical effect the action would have, did not mean on our part any judgment one way or the other on the issue of the question. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out when he spoke on this measure:

> Our friendship for the South African people is deep and abiding. We in Canada recognize the immensity of the racial problem—which is not only a South African problem, but we are also very acutely conscious of the concern of the Canadian people and of people throughout the world on questions involving racial discrimination. Discriminatory policies of any kind anywhere are contrary to the spirit both of the charter and of our times. We do not believe that in the long run history offers much hope that such policies can accomplish their purpose or can endure.

There are other questions of this kind which are before the assembly but which have not yet come up for decision and I think it would be inappropriate for me to speak of them at this time. In concluding my observations on the United Nations and on the assembly I should like to make one or two general remarks. The United Nations Organization—and this assembly certainly shows it—is in a very difficult stage of its development. It is having troubles and new obstacles to overcome. It is having its discouragements and its defeats, but those of us who are inclined to criticize it too prematurely, too rashly or too strongly should realize, I think, that the United Nations is not either a court or a superstate. If I may put it this way, it is only a mirror which reflects the picture of what is going on in the world today, and if the picture is unpleasant, and indeed at times terrifying, that is not the fault of the mirror if the reflection is an honest one. It is the fault of those who belong to the United Nations and who, by their policies, do not make it possible for that organization to work as it was intended it should work by those who drew up the charter at San Francisco.

Above all, it is the fault of this division of the world into two camps, which is reflected in the cold war. Practically every item that comes before any United Nations body now, including the general assembly, is interpreted in terms of the cold war, even the most minute and technical item. That indeed is a tragic development and one which we could hardly have foreseen when the charter was drawn up. When you are confronted at New York now with a resolution, a proposal or a statement, the first reaction of most people is not "what does it say" but "who said it" or "who wrote it"? That in itself gives a fairly discouraging picture of our chances of making constructive progress in these major political issues as long as this tragic division continues.

These difficulties are increased, I think, by the uneasiness and low morale in the secretariat of the United Nations which is the agent for conducting the day to day business of the organization. It is a fact that in some minds and because of certain developments the international character of the secretariat, which we so rightly stressed at San Francisco, may be lost and that members of the secretariat will merely become the nominees of their respective governments owing loyalty not primarily to the international organization, which should be the case, but to these governments.

Yet with all these difficulties, difficulties outside the United Nations and difficulties inside the United Nations, I suggest that this is no time to weaken in our support for, let alone abandon support for, this indispensable piece of international machinery merely because it has falsified some of the illusions that we may have had when the charter was drafted. After all, we do not throw away a car because the wrong kind of gas stalls it.

Having painted a rather gloomy picture of some aspects of the work of the assembly, I think it is only fair I should add that real achievements are being made in the seventh assembly, and that in one sense it is a tribute to the United Nations itself and to the importance of the assembly that these controversial political issues are being discussed there and that the big powers take this agency so seriously as to discuss them in the terms that they do. It would indeed be the end of all hope for the United Nations if it became a body merely for the exchange of meaningless courtesies. Furthermore, headline controversies should not lead to ignoring the solid achievements made by the United Nations in the social, humanitarian and economic fields. Progress is being made along those lines in this seventh session but the progress is not such as to command very much attention.

I should like to say a few words now on another but not unrelated subject, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the ministerial council of which meets in Paris a week from today. In NATO we have continued to make progress since the last report I made to the house on this matter. The accession to membership of Greece and Turkey, with their considerable national forces, has added to the strength of the organization particularly on the southeastern flank. A NATO command on the Atlantic has been established with headquarters at Norfolk, Virginia. General Ridgway's forces in Europe have been increasing in numbers and improving in effectiveness from the point of view of defence installations, particularly airfields, and through training exercises. I had the privilege of attending one of the latter last September, and it showed how much experience in co-operation between national forces has been gained in the relatively short time that these operations have been conducted.

There have been comments in the press from time to time that the NATO program for 1952, agreed upon at Lisbon last February and so strongly criticized in certain quarters, will not be 100 per cent completed by the end of this year. This will, I suppose, turn out to be the case though we do not yet know exactly what the total NATO forces available by the end of this year will be. Yet on the information that has been made available to me I am quite confident now that the so-called "Lisbon goals" for 1952—this will surprise many who thought these goals were unattainable and that the very effort to reach them would result in economic chaos—will be in very large measure achieved. I do not think I should say anything more on this subject until after the council meeting.

In any event, I do not think we should lay too great emphasis on mathematical targets for any given date for forces under arms, provided we are making steady progress towards our goals and are not at any time dangerously short of what has been planned for a particular period.

In one important respect, which is sometimes overlooked, the NATO countries certainly are much stronger. Production lines for military equipment are now rolling in North America and in the United Kingdom, and very considerable progress has been made in this field in western Europe. The equipment position of NATO forces is steadily and encouragingly improving.

If there are some signs of lessening international tension—and there are—this is because of the growing strength and continuing unity of the North Atlantic alliance. But there is certainly nothing to warrant resting on our oars because of that fact, though, as we settle down to the long pull—I believe this is good rowing technique—we may decide to strike a somewhat slower rate. There is certainly no evidence that the Russian military strength has been reduced. There is evidence that an increasing proportion of their military budget is being spent in developing and producing new equipment to strengthen their already huge forces. They are certainly preparing for the long pull, confident that they can outlast the west and, if necessary, wait for the "inherent and inevitable contradictions and conflicts of capitalist society" to divide, weaken and ultimately destroy us.

In this long pull we must not ignore of course—and we do not—the effects of rearmament on the economies of member nations. The national economy of nearly every European member of NATO has been a tender plant since the war, and in the case of European members particularly rearmament has meant continued sacrifices for their peoples. However urgent rearmament is, it has to proceed in accordance with the economic and political capabilities of the member states. Otherwise we would invite those economic and social conditions within member nations which would create a favourable climate for the growth of communism in our society.

It was to avoid this sort of danger that the council of NATO, as hon. members know, established at its Ottawa meeting over a year ago a temporary committee to review military requirements and national programs in the light of the economic, social and political capabilities of member nations. A similar review for the current year is now under way and will be shortly completed; but that review has been conducted in a different fashion. I think this is of some interest in the light of the fears that were expressed here at the time of the last meeting—that NATO might fall completely under the military. The council of NATO, which has established its position, is the directing and controlling body of NATO and is now in permanent session. That council, through its secretariat, is conducting these annual studies and will control the decisions which will be made and passed on to various governments and parliaments arising out of the studies. When this review is concluded, and it should be concluded shortly, NATO members will no doubt have further guidance on NATO requirements and on their national programs. These, while agreed plans, must be flexible and constantly reviewed in the light of changing circumstances and requirements.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to military security and national security, it is certain that we have not yet achieved it. Although we have made real progress there is still a long way to go in making NATO a defensive bulwark against aggression and as one element in that security. The risk of aggression remains and our recent gains in defensive strength must be consolidated and extended, and our co-operation strengthened and enlarged before we can feel safe. So, I suggest, we must press ahead in our own country, and in other countries of NATO, not merely with strengthening the military side of the alliance but also with building its political, economic and moral strength as well, where progress is sometimes difficult and discouragingly slow.

We have no reason to assume on our part that there has been any change of policy or of heart on the part of the Kremlin and its satellites in recent months since Stalin has laid down the new party line—characteristically enough in an article in a magazine. It is possible, however, that there has been a switch in tactics in Moscow, as has frequently happened before in the history of communist imperialism. During the immediate post-war period its aim in the west was to extend political control over whatever areas its armies occupied, and to exploit the post-war instability in other countries of western Europe so as to bring into power governments which would be friendly and could ultimately be controlled by the Kremlin. But the governments and peoples of the democracies have awakened to the danger and, particularly through NATO, have begun to organize their defences against it. An immediate present aim of the Kremlin is clearly to stop this progress toward security and unification by dividing and wrecking the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, by exploiting distrust of the United States within and without that organization.

With this object in view communist imperialists have mounted an offensive of propaganda and subversion designed to weaken, confuse, and discourage the democracies. The main vehicle of this offensive, that is up to the present although there have been some signs that it has been reduced, is the so-called "peace campaign" in which not only the formal peace organization but all communist-front organizations are actively working. Meanwhile, much emphasis is being placed on the possibility of peaceful co-existence between the communist world and the democratic world which only the warmongering policies of the United States prevent—so goes the line, and some misunderstanding is being caused by it.

The ideal of "peaceful co-existence", in which indeed every man of good will must believe, presupposes an absence of aggressive intention. The communist imperialists have not produced any evidence that their policies have in fact become compatible with their peaceful professions. They certainly have not produced any such evidence in the present assembly of the United Nations. A genuine policy of peaceful co-existence implies a readiness to co-operate for the purposes of peace and for the promotion of human welfare. Instead of a readiness to co-operate for these purposes, the communist imperialists resort to propaganda campaigns of hatred and falsehood. "Peaceful co-existence" in Soviet terminology seems indeed to mean simply all mischief short of war, just as Soviet policy seems to mean military aggression if necessary but not necessarily military aggression.

I have left out a good many of the subjects on which I had hoped to touch this afternoon but considerations of time and your patience prevent me from doing so. I hope to have another opportunity before this session has gone too far of making another statement on the final results of the United Nations assembly and, indeed, on the results of the NATO council meeting which takes place this month. What I have said, however, about our policies at the United Nations, and about the policies which we continue to pursue in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, does, I hope, confirm what indeed probably does not need confirmation—that Canadian policy is directed solely toward bringing about in the United Nations and in NATO, and in any other organization devoted to peace, a peace which will be more than the kind of peace we have today. It is directed toward a peace which will mean more than merely the absence of fighting; and to the bringing about of a security that can ultimately be based upon something stronger and more permanent than force.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister just one question. He is not here very much and I would like to ask him, if I may: Is Trygve Lie going to resign from the position of secretary general, and, if so, is there any speculation about his successor?

Mr. Pearson: To the first part of the question, there is an item on the agenda of the assembly which, I think, reads: appointment of a new secretary general. I think that may answer the first part of the question. To the second part, there has indeed been a great deal of speculation as to who might be his successor—much of it very academic and hypothetical.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if he would make a statement concerning the Pacific?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry about that. It was one of the matters I had down on my list to talk about but I did not wish to appear to underestimate the importance of the matter by saying just a few casual words on it. If the hon. member will wait until my next appearance I promise to devote to that very important subject both the time and the attention which it deserves.

Mr. Hansell: Might it not be to the advantage of all members if the minister would place on Hansard, perhaps as an appendix, the United Nations resolutions to which he has referred? We would then be better able to analyse the minister's speech and the situation that exists.

Mr. Pearson: If the house desires, that can be very easily done.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: If that is being done, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs include copies of his letters to the foreign ministers of China and North Korea to which he referred?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of above, see Appendix to Hansard for Tuesday, December 9, pages 500-506.)

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Although I have the great honour of following the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I am sure no one will expect from me any comment upon the interesting report which he has brought to us from the United Nations in New York. I think, however, that I am safe in saying, and that I am expressing the opinion of all members of the house, that we are grateful to him for giving us a good idea of what has been going on down there and some of the difficulties with which the United Nations Organization is confronted.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in congratulating the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) on his maiden speech in the house. I am sure that all members have found his speech very interesting and very intelligently prepared.

I wish also to convey my most respectful congratulations to His Eminence Cardinal Paul-Emile Leger, Archbishop of Montreal, on the occasion of his recent elevation to the Sacred College of Cardinals, by our holy father the Pope.

We are happy to have again two cardinals in Canada, and the honour of being the second youngest member of the Sacred College, which is enjoyed by our new cardinal, is shared by all French Canadians. I am sure that all Canadians unite in presenting to him their most respectful wishes.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) on his maiden speech and to call attention to his hope that over the new sound system which has been installed—and for which we are all grateful to you, sir, and to the committee and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)—we shall hear constructive and helpful criticism. I am afraid that it has not met with unanimous approval, because in a report of a speech made recently by a distinguished and venerable member of the press gallery we find he said that "we could hear better but did anyone notice that the speeches were any better?"

I have been reading in Hansard the speeches which have been made, because I have not been able to attend all the sittings of the house, and it seems to me that there have been many interesting speeches. I should like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) on the magnificent speech he made here and also the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) on his maiden speech. While congratulations are being given, I think something should be said about the wonderful speech made the other day by the hon. member for Edmonton West, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). If he had not said so, I would not have thought he had written that speech because it was given with such verve and seemed to be such a racy account of the Social Credit misfortunes and the misconduct of the government in Alberta.

An hon. Member: Misrepresentation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should also like to congratulate the new Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) and also the new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). The new Minister of Fisheries is, I am sure, the youngest member in the cabinet. He has the reputation of being able and energetic, and of saying what he thinks. I shall have something more to say concerning him when I come to speak of affairs in Newfoundland.

At this time I should like to express my gratitude and that of a small community in my riding in Newfoundland, namely the people of Colinet island, to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for having established there a system of radio communication. This island is situated about three miles from the nearest telephone but six miles from the connecting road. This system of communication by radio which has been established has been a great boon to them. A number of other places in Newfoundland are to have the same facilities. I am sure all of them will be grateful for the work of the Minister of Transport in putting these radiotelephones there. Colinet island is an admirable community which has two settlements. Most of the men are fishermen. With the co-operation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who is putting in wharves and making canals to shelter their boats, and with the system of communication that has been put in by the Minister of Transport they are very pleased.

I should also like to thank the Minister of Transport for his efforts in assisting the various organizations concerned in reducing the rates for long distance telephone calls between Newfoundland and the mainland. The other day he read for us the report which had been submitted to him as to the negotiations that had taken place between the six different organizations concerned. They were the two government agencies, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and the Canadian National Telegraphs; the Avalon Telephone Company in Newfoundland, the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company, the Bell Telephone Company and the New Brunswick Telephone Company. All these have met together and have brought into effect certain reductions.

I may say in the first place that a telephone call between Ottawa and St. John's, Newfoundland, or any part of Newfoundland cost $7.50 for three minutes and was regarded in the same way as an overseas telephone call. Newfoundland was looked upon almost as a foreign country and did not enjoy the same privileges as did people living on the mainland in other parts of Canada. The greatest reductions have been made in calls between Newfoundland and the maritimes. The minister announced that they will be on a mileage basis instead of a flat rate. Although roughly only 100 miles of water extends between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, the cost of a call between the two places was $7.20. It has now been reduced to $2.65. For a call between Newfoundland and the province of Quebec the cost is $4.50 and for one between Newfoundland and the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, it is $6.

I drew the minister's attention immediately to the fact that in Canada and the United States there is a practice of having lower rates out of business hours; that is after six o'clock in the evening and on Sundays. This is reasonable because these are the times when social calls are made, when members of the family put in calls. There is a special rate from station to station. That is, if you wish to call your telephone number in Winnipeg or in Vancouver you get a special low rate if it does not matter who answers the phone; whereas if you are calling a particular person you have to pay on a person to person basis, which is the highest rate. Therefore there are four different rates in Canada. Of day rates there are two, namely person to person and station to station; and for nights and Sundays, there are two more, namely person to person and station to station. During the past week or so I have been able to make three calls to New York for less than the price of one call to Newfoundland, although the distance to New York is nearly 600 miles. The distance to Ottawa, of course, is much greater.

With regard to the objection which I raised, the minister said that the companies are going to look upon these rates as an experiment, that they will see how they get on and then will give consideration to introducing new rates. But I make this submission, Mr. Speaker. Why are we not entitled to better rates immediately? After three and a half years of confederation, what is the sense of Newfoundland being treated differently from the rest of Canada? Why should it not get those rates at the present time? Why should it not have had those rates from the beginning? I certainly submit that no prolonged period is necessary for experiment in order to see whether the present rates are satisfactory and acceptable.

I made out a little list showing the different distances, because the minister said that the rate between Newfoundland and the maritime provinces was going to be on a mileage basis instead of a flat rate cost of $7.20. For example, the price of a call now from Corner Brook to Moncton will be $2.65; from St. John's to Halifax it will be $3.20. I have worked out the distances. It is 572 miles from Corner Brook to Moncton. I should like to point out that you can speak to New York for 75 cents—that is the low rate—and that is for the same distance. St. John's to Montreal is 1,629 miles and the cost is $4.50. That is ·25 cents per mile. The old rate was $7.20. It is a 40 per cent reduction. I have here a little table, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members would permit me to do so I could put it on Hansard instead of reading it. However, from St. John's to Ottawa is 1,746 miles and a call now costs $6 or ·34 cents per mile. The old rate was $7.50. That is a reduction of 20 per cent. From St. John's to Winnipeg is 2,988 miles, and it is the same rate as St. John's to Ottawa, although it is two-thirds farther. It costs ·20 cents a mile, the cheapest rate granted. The old rate was $9, therefore the reduction is 33 per cent.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a comparison of the rates between Ottawa and various parts of Canada by telephone. Do you wish me to read these, or may I put them on Hansard?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member shall put them on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The rates follow:

	Dist.	New Rate $	Rate per mi. ¢	Old Rate $	Per cent Reduction
Corner Brook to Moncton	572	2·65	·45	7·20	63
St. John's to Halifax	915	3·20	·34	7·20	55
St. John's to Montreal	1,629	4·50	·25	7·20	40
St. John's to Ottawa	1,746	6·00	·34	7·50	20
St. John's to Winnipeg	2,988	6·00	·20	9·00	33

	Dist.	Day Rate St. -St.	Day Rate Pers.-Pers.	Night Rate St. -St.	Night Rate Pers.-Pers.
Ottawa—Saint John, N.B.	600	1·70 (·28)	2·20 (·37)	1·00 (·16)	1·50 (·25)
Ottawa—Moncton		1·85	2·40	1·10	1·60
Ottawa—Charlottetown	795	2·35 (·30)	3·10 (·40)	1·35 (·17)	2·10 (·26)
Ottawa—Halifax	957	2·35 (·25)	3·10 (·30)	1·35 (·14)	2·10 (·22)
Ottawa—Winnipeg	1,242	3·00 (·25)	3·85 (·30)	1·80 (·15)	2·65 (·21)

A perusal of these rates will show that Newfoundland is not being fairly treated in this matter.

I said a moment ago that I intended to make some reference to the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in regard to Korea which, I am glad to see, has top priority at the United Nations. The speech from the throne has this to say about Korea:

> Nevertheless, because of the steadfast resistance of our Canadian forces and their comrades in arms to aggression in Korea and because of the increasing strength of the forces of freedom in Europe, there are signs of a lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale.

It is certainly right that every tribute should be paid to our brave soldiers who are doing a grand job in Korea, but I think it was a good thing that someone should say something about the South Koreans themselves. The South Koreans have been recognized as very patriotic people. They are very anxious to take a larger part in the war, although at the present time they are carrying on the bulk of the fighting. This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that they supply 60 per cent of the soldiers of nine divisions. They want to get better training. It seems to me very essential that the South Korean soldiers, who are just as good as any others when they are properly trained, should be armed and equipped so that less drain would be made upon the United States and the other countries of the United Nations who have sent forces to Korea.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to an article which appeared in the Ensign back in June, 1951, that has a bearing upon this suggestion. When we realize that practically no progress has been made since that time; when we realize from the report given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs today that no progress is being made at the present time, and no progress is expected to be made, because the Chinese reds are going to reject this appeal which he has sent to them; and when we realize, sir—at least many of us on this side of the house—that from the very beginning most of us were of the opinion that those negotiations were bound to end in this way, or to be carried on in this way, then I think it is important to see what a writer, Edgar Ansel Mowrer, said back as long ago as June, 1951:

> Asia can be saved from communism without a third world war. It can be saved by the immediate creation of local anti-communist forces roughly equal in strength to the local communist forces. Whether Americans side with General MacArthur or with the joint chiefs of staff, they can surely agree on one point: the weakness of the free world in Asia is that it is forced to use its chief armies—American, British and French against satellite Asiatics—North Koreans, Chinese, Indo-Chinese and Malayans, while the U.S.S.R. preserves its forces intact outside local wars.

Is that not what General Eisenhower is reported to have said the other day, when he said that we were using our best troops against a second team? This writer then laid down six conditions which he thought should be met if it was considered necessary to defeat communism in Asia, and I am sure we all agree to that. I was astonished that some of the words used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs today were identical with words used in this article. His first condition is:

1. Hold on in Korea until the Chinese communists either surrender or until the French and Viet-Namese have smashed the communist rebels in Indo-China, the British have crushed them in Malaya and the Filipinos have eliminated them from their islands. These are not impossible.

2. Settle the Kashmir dispute on any reasonable basis, thus freeing Pakistan's great energy and influence for use elsewhere and giving Indian opponents of neutralism a chance to assert themselves.

3. Bring Burma, Siam and free Viet-Nam into a southeast Asian alliance to include India and Pakistan as soon as either is ready to join.

4. Extend the new Pacific pact between the United States, New Zealand and Australia to include the Philippines and a rearmed Japan. At the appropriate time, link it with the southeast Asian alliance.

5. Instead of recognizing red China, create all possible difficulties for that regime. This means supporting Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa and encouraging any other anti-communist forces that emerge.

6. Urge the Japanese, once they again become independent, to create a sizable military force as quickly as possible.

I believe that carrying out these six undertakings, or most of them, would save Asia—and that nothing less will.

Now, sir, for the remainder of my time I should like to devote some attention first of all to the amendment to the amendment introduced by the C.C.F., and lastly to the fisheries situation in Newfoundland. May I first of all deal with the amendment to the amendment which asks for the immediate introduction of national health insurance. It seems to me that the C.C.F. party is out to get this during this session for some reason or other. I notice from the reports that have been filed by the different provinces that Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan seem to favour the idea, but the other provinces do not. Newfoundland is the only province which has not reported up to the present time, but my understanding of the situation there is that it would be chaotic to introduce national health insurance at the present time.

Hon. members from Alberta and Saskatchewan, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) all have spoken about the wonderful progress that has been made in their provinces. I think representatives from all provinces could give a similar story. I know that in Newfoundland, going back as far as 1934, we can tell a story of almost the elimination of tuberculosis as a major cause of death; the erection of 26 cottage hospitals, and the extension of hospital and medical facilities to at least 60 per cent of the people. But, although a great number of beds have been provided in the past ten years, they are certainly not yet sufficient to justify an all-out health insurance plan.

I think the matter was considered by the people of Ontario in the election last year. The leader of the Liberal party went to the country at that time with a national health insurance plan as his chief policy. The premier of Ontario said it would be a fraud upon the people to allow them to think that such a program could be put into force at that time. Neither could it. Therefore it seems to me that the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) is the wisest course for this country to pursue.

Members of the Liberal party have suggested that we should have a committee of the house. That would not go far enough; for it is necessary to have concurrence between the governments of the different provinces and the principal municipalities that operate hospitals and have to do with health matters. Therefore it seems to me that until the C.C.F. party can show how it can be done, the best way would be to hold a conference between representatives of the dominion government, the provinces, the municipalities and the medical profession, as outlined by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech the other day.

I should like to refer to the fisheries situation at this time. I am glad the minister is present while I am making these remarks. I know he is interested. I know that already he has sent the deputy minister down to Newfoundland to look over the situation, and I suppose he has brought back a report.

Perhaps what I have to say is an analysis of what has been happening during the last few years, but I think it is just as well that we should have it in summary form. There has been in Newfoundland in the last ten or twelve years a distinct trend toward the development of fresh fish markets, especially in the United States. During the war we had a big fresh fish market in Great Britain, but that is now completely lost, so that we are dependent now upon the fresh fish market in the United States. Emphasis has been directed toward this by the government of Newfoundland, with the result that everyone is fresh-fish minded.

It seems to me, however, that a word of caution is necessary, because what the United States gives now the United States can take away by the stroke of a pen, by the alteration of the tariff. In that way the fresh fish market could be lost. We should know that in Gloucester there are fish interests deeply concerned with the entry of Canadian fish on the United States market, and at any time they may ask the United States government to make it more difficult for Canadian and other foreign fish to enter that market.

There can be no doubt that the United States market has been beneficial to the fisheries of Newfoundland, generally speaking. However it has helped to bring about a decline in the salt codfish industry. The salt cod fisheries constitute an industry which has existed since the days of discovery by Cabot. He brought back his report stating that the waters around the new land, around Newfoundland, were teeming with cod. People from England, from Spain and from Portugal, as well as from France, visited there every year. They have been coming out from Spain, Portugal and France almost every year since that time, with the exception of the war years. All those people have been interested in the salt cod fisheries.

As Newfoundland developed, the salt cod fisheries became the staple industry. It can no longer be regarded as the principal industry of Newfoundland, however, because one brings to mind the great volume of paper produced, and the increasing wealth due to the discovery and operation of mines producing mineral ores. Nevertheless the salt codfish industry is regarded very highly, because so many people take part in the salt cod fisheries. These people have their homes situated around the numerous bays and inlets and harbours along the six thousand miles of coast line. They have little gardens and farms which, with the fisheries, give them a very comfortable living in most cases.

The cod fisheries declined for the following reasons, it seems to me. First of all there were the effects of the war. Many enlisted, left their homes and did not return. Then there has been the construction by the United States government as well as by the Canadian government of defence bases in Newfoundland. Especially since the war there has been a great expansion of United States forces there. All this has drawn thousands of people away from the fisheries. I was surprised recently to be in several fishing villages and find them eating fish bought in St. John's. There was not a boat on the beach, not a fisherman in the place. Then hundreds more are going to Seven Islands to work on the railway, and to do such other work as is necessary for the development of the iron ore deposits found along the border between Quebec and Labrador.

In addition there has been a program of government industrial spending. In my opinion the government of Newfoundland has very unwisely gone into the experiment of starting business enterprises, establishing a cement plant, gypsum plant, hardwood plant, machine plant and the like, the outcome of which to say the least is very problematical. Nevertheless it has drawn many people away from the fisheries. Indeed this was a deliberate policy intended to take people from the fisheries.

We remember, too, the low prices of 1950. In that year the prices of fish were the lowest they had been in ten years. Many were discouraged and did not return to the fisheries in 1951 or since. Then the government of Canada made the stipulation that it would not give any assistance, through the fisheries prices support board, to any fisherman who decided to go to Labrador and take part in the Labrador fisheries. If they did so it would be at their own risk.

Then there has been the loss of markets due to exchange. Brazil, a country in South America with a population of 53 million people, used to buy thousands of quintals of our fish, but has not been buying it recently. Spain has not been buying our fish, and this year we had to practically beg the Portuguese government to buy some of it. The situation is changed, and this has had a great effect upon our people. I think therefore the minister has a difficult task ahead of him. I have every sympathy for him, and I shall be glad to help in any way I can.

The government of Newfoundland, in conjunction with that of the dominion, has been making experiments in the manner of catching fish. I believe it was the provincial government that was responsible for the idea that people must get away from the slavery of producing salt codfish. "Slavery" was the word used by the premier of the province. I do not agree with him at all; I think it produces a most unwise psychological approach. However, four boats were brought from Iceland. The experiment cost $450,000. The Icelanders were going to show the Newfoundlanders how to catch fish. The boats are down at St. John's harbour now, and anyone who looks at them will say, "How did they happen to bring out these four tubs?"

That experiment failed. Then they introduced long liners. I believe the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) cherishes the idea that the long liners are going to be the solution of the difficulties of fishermen in Newfoundland. The federal and provincial governments have been experimenting with these long liners. I believe the provincial government has now abandoned the experiment and switched over to the Danish seine, so that the Danes can teach us how to fish. The federal government had the misfortune to have one of their long liner vessels blow up last year. There has not been sufficient data published to enable us to judge the value of these experiments. I have no doubt that probably managed with a small crew, if the boat and the equipment do not cost too much, operations of that kind might prove profitable; but I cannot see how it could ever replace cod fishing operations with the use of traps, where in a month or two people can catch 800, 900 or 1,000 quintals of fish, a quintal being 112 pounds of dried fish.

In addition to this problem connected with experiments, within the next year or so the minister will have to face the problem of the marketing of codfish. The marketing of salt cod is always a difficult problem. In the old days, when we had free trade, it is notorious that merchants would undersell one another; and on one occasion at the close of the first world war there was chaos in the salt codfish industry because of this marketing difficulty.

In 1936, at the time of the commission of government, a fisheries board was set up. It was later on agreed that the merchants should have exclusive control of the marketing of salt codfish, and that this control would be under an organization known as the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited. That body still has the right to export fish. It is composed entirely of merchants, and hon. members will have some idea as to the organization itself when I state that it costs $10,000 to join it. Only a wealthy merchant can belong to the organization.

Therefore eventually all fish must come to the members who export it. A 3 per cent charge is made, and put in the coffers of NAFEL. Whether those concerned make the distribution or not, I cannot say. When the deputy minister of fisheries, Mr. Bates, was in St. John's recently, he threw out a suggestion that he would like to know what the fishermen wanted. Do they want to continue this method of exporting their fish, or what do they want?

His invitation was taken up by the Daily News, and in an article on November 8 it said that there seemed to be only two alternatives to the association which exists at present. There would have to be either a fishermen's marketing co-operative or a board. It seems to me that the board they had in mind was something along the lines of the wheat board in western Canada. Because I was interested in the matter I took time to look up the constitution of the board which was organized under the act passed in 1935 by the Bennett government. I read it through and it seemed to me that the idea was sound, that if a board could handle the export of millions of bushels of wheat a similar board could handle the export of a million quintals of salt codfish from Newfoundland.

There is in Newfoundland at the present time another organization which has a great deal to say about fisheries matters, and I refer to the fishermen's federation. Some hon. members will remember that on February 6, 1951, I made a speech during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne during which I discussed the fisheries of Newfoundland and recommended that the government should follow the example that was set in 1929 when a commission recommended the teaching of co-operative methods to the fishermen. I suggested that Dr. Coady should be sent to Newfoundland to establish a school for the training of fishermen in co-operative methods. The provincial government took up the idea, got Dr. Coady down there and subsidized the formation of the fishermen's federation which now has ten to fifteen thousand fishermen members all around Newfoundland. The majority of the men interested in the catching of salt codfish, and fresh fish as well, are members of this federation. According to an article in the Daily News of August 8, 1951, Mr. Lane, the secretary of the federation, indicated that the federation was opposed to the continuation of the NAFEL organization.

I notice that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) was down there recently and said that this organization was there to stay. I did not read the full report of what he said, but I did read the comments made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) the other day in answer to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). I believe the situation is still fluid and I hope the minister is giving consideration to what will be best for the fishermen. That is the criterion that should always be used in connection with the fisheries of Newfoundland: what is going to be best for the fishermen.

There are three things that can be done. The present association can be continued or fishermen's marketing co-operatives can be set up. I am sure the minister will realize that that involves a lot of teaching, as it would be an educational process. It is not something that can be done in a day. It will take some time to train these men in the principles of co-operation, although during the past twelve or fifteen years many of them have become familiar with co-operative methods in buying and in the operation of credit societies. They have not had a great deal of experience with co-operative marketing. The third thing would be to set up a board similar to the wheat board. Eventually the minister will have to decide which is best. I do not know which would be the best at the present time. Under the terms of union the present fisheries board continues for five years after April 1, 1949, so it will cease operations on April 1, 1954 unless legislation is brought in to continue it.

There was one other criticism in the Daily News article to which I referred. They said that the deputy minister seemed to be overlooking the premier of the province, that he did not consult with the government but asked only for suggestions from the public and the press as to what future methods of marketing should be adopted in Newfoundland. As the federal government has the responsibility in regard to fisheries it seems to me there was nothing that should arouse great objection by anybody in his simply asking for suggestions.

I am not prepared at the present time to say which is the best, but I do feel that the criterion I mentioned before, that is, what is going to be for the best interests of the fishermen, should be followed. No doubt the minister since taking over his office has realized something of the difficulties that exist down there.

Before I conclude I should like to draw his attention to certain other features of the situation facing the fisheries in Newfoundland.

He knows that trawlers and bankers come out from Portugal, Spain and France every year in hundreds. Most of these are sailing vessels with diesel power and they carry from 50 to 75 dories, which means that there are 50 to 75 fishermen because one fisherman goes out in a dory. The speech from the throne forecasts that legislation is to be introduced in connection with these Portuguese and Spanish fishermen coming into Newfoundland ports for bait and supplies.

This practice was stopped on July 1 as far as the other maritime provinces are concerned, but because Newfoundland at the time of union had an agreement with these countries permitting these fishermen to come into Newfoundland ports, the practice was continued there. I do not know if it is the intention of the government to forbid these vessels coming into Newfoundland ports, but I urge the minister to give earnest consideration to the matter before he refuses them entrance.

These are very industrious people. They undergo great hardship. They are brave men fishing the hard way, and they cause no trouble in St. John's. Many of them are married men with families and they live in countries where the standard of living is much lower than ours. Therefore I suggest that consideration be given to the problem before a hard and fast rule is laid down that they be not allowed to come into Newfoundland ports to purchase bait and supplies as they have been doing for so many years.

The Portuguese government has taken a great interest in their fishermen to see that they have the latest boats and equipment. It looks after their welfare at home by providing houses, maternity benefits for wives and recreational benefits for the fishermen and their families. No one seems to be taking a similar interest in the fishermen of Newfoundland.

On previous occasions I have drawn attention to the benefits which are available to the farmers of western Canada, and other regions too, through farm improvement loans. The farmers of Newfoundland have received very little benefit from this legislation because for some reason or another they have not been able to get loans. The fishermen of Canada have no benefits under any comparable act. I believe the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) has a resolution on the order paper asking that the government give consideration to providing advantages for the fishermen similar to those being provided for our farmers.

Does it not seem strange that thousands of houses are going up in and around our cities at a cost of millions of dollars provided either by the government or government agencies, when nothing is being provided for the thousands and thousands of fishermen who live in small places, merely because they are not located on serviced land. It will be a thousand years before they will have serviced land in some of these small settlements. It is impossible. Yet does it not seem unfair that the privilege of being able to borrow a sum of money to improve their means of earning a livelihood or to improve their homes is denied them? It seems to me a sound proposition that a fisherman should be treated in such a manner as to enable him to obtain a loan of that kind. I know plenty of fishermen who, if they were given seven years to repay, would be very glad to get loans and improve their homes and their means of earning a livelihood.

Then there is the question of storm damage which was brought up in the house the other day, on which occasion the minister replied to a question by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter). This fall I was a witness of the after-effects of a storm. I stood on the cliff at the little village of St. Michaels, Ferryland. I looked out at the rough seas and saw pieces of boats, pieces of stages and wharves floating around and the fishermen on the beach trying to salvage what they could. Only a village or two were affected at that time. The other day there was another storm of greater proportions which caused greater damage. As the result the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, whose district was more affected than that of anybody else, asked his question.

I understand the matter is under consideration by the government. The previous minister told us that he was considering a method of two-way insurance involving the federal and provincial governments, and perhaps the fishermen concerned as well, so that when damage of that kind was suffered the fishermen would be insured and would be able to rehabilitate themselves without delay. I do not know what is going to happen now, but I do know that whether a storm is nation-wide or only affects one or two villages it is most disastrous for the fishermen concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I only have one more point to make.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With unanimous consent the hon. member may proceed, but I must tell him that his time expired three minutes ago.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is only one point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will understand it is not up to me to give him permission. He only has to stand up and ask for it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I only wanted to compliment the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West has obtained unanimous consent to carry on.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wanted to make reference to a statement which I saw in a newspaper recently regarding bait depots. I did not hear any statement made in the house about the matter, but perhaps the minister intends to make one later. I brought the matter up on several occasions before and recommended to the previous minister that he should try to make bait depots available to as many fishermen as possible. It is not much good having a bait depot ten miles away if you have to go there by boat. The fishermen want to be able to obtain fresh bait at three o'clock in the morning so they can go out early and fish. I am glad the minister is giving consideration to the matter, and I hope he will be able to make a statement soon as to when the policy will come into effect and the conditions that are to be attached to it.

Mr. Sinclair: I am very grateful to the hon. member for St. John's West for his helpful speech, to which I will reply some time later. However, I think in fairness to my deputy minister I should correct one remark he made. The deputy minister did consult the Newfoundland government when he made his recent visit to Newfoundland, and in return the Newfoundland minister of fisheries came up here last week. I am very grateful to the hon. member for the speech he has made.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Might I make one observation?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It was after Mr. Bates had made his statement that he saw the government.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, coming from British Columbia, as I do, I think I may say that all agree that two better appointments could not have been made than the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the present Solicitor General (Mr. Campney). British Columbia is a young province and deserves the type of representation these two young men will give it. With the present growth of the province and the influx of new people from Saskatchewan and Alberta, I look forward to the day before too long when our growth will require another minister from that province.

I wish to discuss first the amendment to the amendment in the name of the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell) which reads in part as follows:

> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed: (a) to recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program.

It seems to me that no one is more qualified to speak about health and hospitalization than a member from British Columbia. We have seen confusion over the years not only under the present government but under the former government which was made up in part of representatives of the Liberal party. I do not think anything was the matter with hospitalization in British Columbia in the first place. The idea was good. The trouble with the administration was that the plan was introduced a year or two too soon. Because of the insistence of certain gentlemen in authority, the law was introduced and the hospitalization plan came into being in British Columbia before we were ready for it.

In the first instance the premiums were set at a rather low level, and my recollection is that they were increased two or three times. We found that the hospitals of British Columbia were not built to take care of the influx arising from the increased number of patients. We found that our nursing schools could not take care of the necessary nursing staffs required for a hospitalization scheme of the type instituted in British Columbia. We found that the cost of construction of new hospitals was, as the Social Credit minister of health and welfare said the other day in the provincial capital, "beyond the power of the people of British Columbia to support." Nowhere at any time will there be as good an example as the hospitalization scheme in British Columbia of something being done long before the proper time and without proper investigation.

As I say, the idea was good. I do not think anyone in British Columbia would argue that the hospitalization plan as we now know it in that province does not benefit the type of people who should receive benefit, people who cannot afford to pay their hospital bills in the first place. However, it is an outstanding example of a government doing something before the people first of all were prepared to accept the extra load on their tax bills and second, before the government knew how to give proper administration covering a matter of that kind. We have confusion in British Columbia so far as hospitalization is concerned. The present government went into office not only because of the things the coalition did not do but because they said that immediately upon taking office the hospitalization plan would become a voluntary scheme. Gone would be the premiums, gone would be the extra taxes, but anyone who wanted to belong to the hospitalization scheme could do so on a contributory basis. If you didn't want to belong to it and wanted to pay your hospital bills in the regular way, why then they would be in agreement with that idea. I do not say this because my hon. friends of the Social Credit party are sitting across the house from me now. Except for one man, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), they did not have anything to do with the provincial set-up. He must accept responsibility for any statements made by Social Credit candidates before the last election in British Columbia. Against the wishes of their own convention, that hon. gentleman from Macleod was brought into British Columbia. There is no doubt that he, of all people, laid down the law as far as Social Credit and the provincial party are concerned. I am not surprised that my hon. friends on the other side in the Social Credit party have said they do not agree with some of the views expressed in that election.

Nevertheless we have had a government in office for not too long which said it would give hospitalization to the people of that province if they wanted it, and for free. However, I find in the Vancouver Province of December 1 that notwithstanding the extra cost of construction of hospitals, notwithstanding the fact that the government there knows that under agreements made quite recently extra costs are going to be taken by hospital boards—and in my own locality in connection with our new Burnaby hospital wage costs will go up many thousands of dollars though it is only a 100 bed hospital—notwithstanding the fact that the deficit of the Vancouver general hospital next year will be something like $1 million, this temporary government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Goode: —have seen fit to freeze their payments to hospitals throughout the province. Not only did they tell the people of British Columbia that we were going to have voluntary hospitalization, but they intimated that there would be larger grants to hospitals. I heard them say that. I also heard the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) say the other night that, in his experience, this psychology would result in placing more expense upon the municipalities in every province in Canada.

Mr. Wylie: Do you believe him?

Mr. Goode: I only believe what I read and what I study and there is the evidence in the paper. If my hon. friend wishes to get up and deny this, and say he does not agree with his party's freeze on hospitalization payments, I would willingly resume my seat now.

Mr. Wylie: That is not what you are talking about.

Mr. Goode: The minister said the onus was going to be put on the municipalities. How true! If the government in Victoria freezes payments to hospitals, considering the extra costs that are going to take place in 1953, then the municipalities must pay the difference. I think that confirms the words of the minister when he said that with a Social Credit government in power in any province the municipalities would have to carry the load.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: That is not the case.

Mr. Goode: It is in Alberta.

Mr. Wylie: You will hear more about that.

Mr. Goode: When my hon. friends finish arguing from their side of the house they will please remember that when they speak in this house I take it that their opinions are being expressed and that those are sincere opinions. I listen to them on that basis and all I ask is the same respect.

Mr. Wylie: With a few interruptions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wylie: It is hard to take.

Mr. Goode: Having said what I wanted to say about hospitalization in British Columbia, I want to come back again to a statement I made at home before I left. I made it because I had an idea that this subamendment would be proposed by the C.C.F. party. I believe the idea is good, but I think they are a little before their time. Anyone coming from British Columbia can prove that a national health scheme now is years before its time. The people are not ready for it. If you took a vote on it throughout the country, beyond some misguided people who vote for the C.C.F., I do not think that too many would support it at this time.

I have much respect for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He did say in his speech that he brought it to the attention of the house for their consideration. I think that was a fair statement and I do not think he took the subamendment too seriously himself. It will be a move toward the idea presented by my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) when he said the other day that he thought the best way to approach this was through a committee. I think he said a joint committee of the House and Senate, but at least he said a committee. That committee would fully investigate the matter and avoid the serious problem which we in British Columbia now face.

If the federal government takes on this national health program we will have not only the difficulties which exist in British Columbia, small as they may be nationally, but we will have to multiply those difficulties a hundredfold. I think nothing would be as tragic as for the government to embark on a national health program at this time, ill prepared as it is in regard to facilities, and with the people ill prepared to accept the cost that must result from the subamendment. I am going to vote against the subamendment not merely because it is a matter of non-confidence in the government, which to my mind is not too important, though I will say that if the subamendment had been worded a little differently I might have risen in my place and voted for it.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us the wording you would have voted for.

Mr. Goode: If my hon. friend wishes me to suggest the policy of the C.C.F. party I will be glad to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Just tell us the wording you would have voted for.

Mr. Cruickshank: We will bring it in at the right time.

Mr. Goode: When the time comes for national health insurance in Canada, I will tell my hon. friends that a Liberal government will bring it in and it will be brought in properly.

Mr. Johnston: How many years will that take?

Mr. Cruickshank: You won't be here.

Mr. Knowles: Does that mean it will be another 33 years before the Liberals take action?

Mr. Goode: My hon. friend will not be here.

Mr. Johnston: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. Goode: If my hon. friend will come to see me in my office I will tell him. Now I come to another matter on which my hon. friends will not argue too much.

An hon. Member: Having disposed of that one.

Mr. Goode: If the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) is quoted correctly in the Ottawa Citizen of December 6, he proposes to bring to the attention of the house this week a certain matter that happened in Korea during the visit of the next president of the United States. I was very surprised that the hon. member did not bring the matter to the attention of the government today, and if he had I would most likely not be making the remarks I am going to make.

In the Citizen of December 6 there is an article written by Bill Boss, Canadian Press staff reporter in Korea. I think I can say that he is a man with whom I have not always agreed when he reports on Korean incidents. Nevertheless he brought to the attention of the Canadian public, I think, the fact that a guard of honour in Korea, in which was included a number of Canadian troops, was held on a parade ground for seven hours. Perhaps this question and the discussion of it would have come better from the opposition, but some of us in this house know exactly what this means. The article says this:

> For Eisenhower's parade, scheduled at 3 p.m. the troops marched on to the airstrip at 1.15 p.m. They kept warm by beating their hands together, kicking their feet and pounding one another's backs.
> The Canadians didn't complain, considering it an honour to be able to pay their respects to General Eisenhower. But there was much criticism by newspapermen over the lack of consideration shown the troops . . .
> The Canadians evoked all-round admiration the hard way Wednesday. On the wind-swept airstrip in five above zero weather they discarded comfortable parkas to parade more efficiently in their beautifully pressed battledress.

In consequence of that story, if the newspapers are correct, the next president of the United States has had to apologize to certain people in Korea for keeping our troops and other troops on a parade ground for seven hours. The hon. member for Nanaimo said that he was going to bring this matter before the House of Commons, and I quite agree that he should do so. But before he does it, may I say that I remember standing on a parade ground, with some hundreds of men, for five and a half hours one day waiting for the hon. member for Nanaimo; and I must say that when he arrived on that parade ground he was on time. I happened to be the sergeant major on the parade at that time. I checked the parade and found that he was a minute and a half late. I took issue with certain senior officers at that time, just as I take issue now. I do not expect for a moment that a Canadian officer was in charge of that Korean guard of honour, but I suggest that there was a Canadian officer in charge of the Canadian men in that composite guard.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, officers are funny people. You may have a man who works at a desk and who, when he gets home at night, walks the dog around the block, is run by his wife and children, and has Milquetoast tastes in his daily habits; but when, all of a sudden, you put a pip on his shoulder he becomes a roaring lion. I have known officers of this type. Thank goodness they are few in number. I am quite sure that they do not include any former army officer in this House of Commons, but there are some of this type in the Canadian army. I do not say that this man Hanson, who cannot defend himself—and I am certainly not going to attack him here—is that type or is responsible, but somebody is responsible for keeping those Canadian troops on the parade ground for seven hours; and then to have the audacity to tell me, one who has had a little bit to do with troops, that Canadian troops said: "We want to do small arms drill without parkas at five below zero" is something I cannot understand, having regard to the stupidity of it. I think this is the worst type of reporting possible.

I have complained about this gentleman before. You will remember that I said something about casualties being mentioned in the paper, or units being mentioned in the paper, before the people at home knew about it, so that we could save some of our mothers and our wives in Canada unnecessary trouble and worry. This is the same gentleman. He tells us now that Canadians, in newly pressed serge, wanted to do parade ground drill in battledress rather than use parkas. Most of us know that is not true. Nevertheless, this is true: Canadian troops along with others were held on the parade ground for several hours at practically zero temperatures.

I do not say this is a responsibility of government. Goodness knows the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) does not know everything that goes on with regard to these minor matters, although he does in most major matters; but I think an investigation should be started immediately, when the next president of the United States is practically forced to make an apology; when he himself arrives at the parade ground immediately upon the proper time that is appointed; and we have taken seven hours to put a few men on a guard of honour.

I was a member of the Canadian forces and did not do nearly as much as did most of the veterans in this House of Commons. But I will guarantee now that I can take a thousand men on a guard of honour and put them in their proper positions in half an hour; and I know of no sergeant major in the Canadian army—especially in the regular Canadian army—who could not do it in 15 minutes. I think there were perhaps some thirty or forty men on this guard of honour, although I do not know; but there is not a sergeant major in the Canadian army who could not have done it in a quarter of an hour. Yet this article says we kept our troops rehearsing for seven hours. A Canadian infantryman, after he has been in the army for six months, knows more about small arms drill than do most soldiers in other armies. I think it has been recognized that the Canadian soldier is a specialist in small arms. Yet we have to take seven hours before a guard of honour is held, so these boys can learn basic training that they most likely knew two years previously.

I would suggest to the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) that this occurrence be fully investigated. I am going to ask more questions about it in the house. I want to know why Canadian troops were held there for seven hours, on whose orders they were held there, and who was the senior Canadian officer on that parade.

Having said something that perhaps might be construed as against the Department of National Defence—although it is not so intended—I think this also should be said, because in regard to the same department we have heard many things this session as to the shortcomings of certain officials. I have here quite a long article which was printed in the New York Times of Monday, November 10, 1952, and I propose to put it on the record. It will take about ten minutes, but I think it should be put on the record now. This is an article written in France by a staff reporter of the New York Times. It reads as follows:

Quietly and efficiently the Canadians have developed a jet fighter base here in the last four months that will compare—in speed of construction, operational efficiency and living conditions for officers and men—with any of the twenty-one other North Atlantic Treaty Organization air bases already built in France.

This is the home of the alliance's first F-86E Sabre jet fighter wing on the European continent, and all sixty of the Sabres here are Canadian-built. Manned entirely by regulars of the second Canadian Air Force fighter wing, the Canadian group is the first of four such wings scheduled to be flown to the continent during the next eighteen months to join the allied air forces, central Europe, under Lieut.-General Lauris Norstad of the United States air forces.

This 1,000-acre Canadian base is more than just a technical installation; it is an example in co-operation between Canada and France that can be held up to the United States in its heavy task of building a chain of air bases in foreign lands for the defence of the free world.

The progress being made here would be outstanding by any test. On July 3, for instance, there was nothing to see here but a French-built 8,000-foot concrete fighter runway, a parallel taxiway, other hard-surface areas and a few hangars.

Now, four months later, French civil engineers, working with Canadian plans, have built sixty new aluminum-sheathed prefabricated buildings that already house nearly 1,000 Canadian officers and men plus operational equipment and supplies. Another 1,000 Canadians are due to arrive in the coming year.

As autumn rains and cold sweep over this bare tableland in the Moselle valley the Canadian personnel are comfortably installed in steam heated, insulated French-built prefabs, each of which can house 104 officers or men or can be used as recreational halls, administration buildings, chapels, mess halls or supply quarters. Each building, shaped like a giant H, costs approximately $88,000.

"We are very pleased with French materials and construction work," Group Capt. C. F. Johns, Canadian construction supervisor, said yesterday, "These buildings compare well with our own air stations in Canada."

Under the Atlantic pact organization's rules, France selects the sites and builds the runways and some hangars for the organization's air bases in France, but then the country whose air unit uses the fields must build its own barracks, warehouses, recreation halls, etc. It now appears that the Canadians have avoided some of the pitfalls that have delayed the United States' base building here.

The Canadians' progress seems to be due to three factors: Close preparation and co-operation with the French before the earth was turned; a delegation of real authority from Ottawa to Canadian officials sent to France to supervise the work; and diplomacy in dealing with the French from the government down to the local contractor. The combination of the three has paid dividends.

The Canadian air force made a close study of French building techniques long before it sent its first Sabre wing to Grostenquin on Oct. 11. It knew back in Ottawa a year ago what the French could build well and what they should not be expected to build.

When the Canadian air force started drawing up detailed plans and specifications for barracks and other semi-permanent buildings last winter it checked these with engineers in the French embassy in Ottawa. It then completed plans in both English and French and in both the inch-scale and the metric scale used on the continent. When the plans were finally laid before the French government and its engineers and civil contractors in the spring, all knew just what the Canadians wanted. The French reacted sympathetically from the start.

Some of the most experienced construction engineers in the United States have been hired by the United States air force to come to Europe and spend at least one year until October, 1953, supervising building work on three American Atlantic pact bases in France.

Some of this group of technicians have flown up to the Canadian base to look for new ideas. It is too early for their full recommendations, but they have already noted by comparison two major weaknesses in the present American way of base building in France.

That is an example to the rest of the world. Therefore in saying something about some Canadian officers who are in a very small minority, I also wish to congratulate those permanent force officers who are doing such a wonderful job, and who are in a large majority in our forces in Canada.

I have two matters concerning my own riding that I wish to speak on for a moment. One has to do with the fishing industry on the Fraser river. This also concerns the hon. members for New Westminster (Mr. Mott) and Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Most likely in their turn they will speak on the same matter, and perhaps do a much better job than I. I wish to take a few minutes to bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) the marketing conditions in Canada as far as canned salmon is concerned. The hon. member who spoke before me referred to the condition of fisheries on the east coast. A like condition prevails now in British Columbia. We are starting an overlay of warehouse stocks of canned salmon of high grade, and before the next fishing season something must be done for the Canadian salmon industry, at least in some way to help them to finance through the next year.

I am not going to suggest to the Minister of Fisheries what should be done, but I do say to him that conditions, especially among some of the packers in regard to their debts to the bank, are getting to the point where I am sure the federal government will have to step in. I have said during my time at home between sessions that perhaps a subsidy to the fishing industry might be the final solution. I am not too sure of that now. It could be, but a man in this position, representing 6,000 or 7,000 fishermen, as the members from British Columbia do, must go very carefully in making statements that could be wrong. I do not say that my subsidy idea is wrong, but I want to leave it open to the Minister of Fisheries to make up his own mind, perhaps after conversations with the rest of us, as to what should be done for the canned salmon industry in British Columbia. I am sure some veterans with fishing boats are going to be in dire circumstances by the end of next year unless in some way we step in to finance the surplus warehouse stocks of canned salmon we now have throughout Canada.

I do not think the government should step in at this moment to make a large loan, or anything of that kind. Perhaps they could purchase some stocks on condition that the fishing industry find extra markets. But, as I say, these small suggestions from me are not in any way meant to influence, and certainly will not in any way influence the Minister of Fisheries in his final analysis of the situation. I do hope, however, that our fishermen in British Columbia will be assured of at least a reasonable resale market for their fish in 1953.

In conclusion I should like to touch on one other matter. As we all know the Canadian Legion has asked each of us, both at home and here, either to support or go against their brief. We all know what that brief is. Some of us are prepared to support it; some of us are not. I have always found the Legion, especially in my own riding, to be pretty reasonable men. There is no doubt in my mind that the recipients of war veterans' allowance, in some instances, are having a pretty tough time. I would suggest to the minister that until another session comes on and another veterans affairs committee is set up, this $10 from the assistance fund that we give to some under a means test—and some we do not give it to at all—should be added to the war veterans' allowance without the means test; that is, without that second means test. Let us add that $10 to the basic rate. It may not be very much, but I know of cases where that $10 would just mean the difference this year between a decent Christmas for some of our older veterans and a Christmas that might mean going somewhere other than their own home for a meal.

I want to say this to the Minister of Public Works. The Fraser river concerns British Columbia members. I wish only to speak about my own part that borders the municipality of Richmond. Rightly or wrongly the engineers of the department at New Westminster decided on a scheme which will narrow the Fraser river so as to allow the current to carry the silt out into the Pacific and, so far as I can see, their plan is a good one. Across from Richmond at the moment, on the south side of the river, they have put in many hundreds of thousands of tons of rock, and have fortified that southern bank. In doing this they have pushed the strong part of the current over to the north side of the river, bordering on the municipality of Richmond.

All there is at that point at the moment to hold the water is an old dike built many years before my time. I suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that that dike will not hold at the time of the next Fraser river freshet, should we have normal snow at the headwaters of the Fraser. I would ask him to co-operate with the reeve and council of the municipality of Richmond to do something to strengthen the north side of the river; because if the freshet ever breaks through that dike we are going to have a crisis on our hands that will cost many millions of dollars. If the Fraser river breaks through the dike, and if the water is sufficiently high, as it usually is at the time of a freshet, the water could proceed almost to the locality of Brighouse, and many thousands of people would be affected. I suggest investigation of the matter should be made now because, as most of us from British Columbia know, it will not be too long before the Fraser river will go on its yearly rampage.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation of the loudspeaker system installed in the house. For the first time in the seventeen years I have been here I find I am able to hear what is being said in all corners of the chamber. That is indeed a pleasant change, because there used to be many occasions when we could not possibly hear what was said. It certainly does add to the interest one takes in debate when he can hear clearly and distinctly what is being said.

I notice that many members on the opposite side of the house are showing an increased interest in the Social Credit movement. That is especially true of those members coming from our sister province of British Columbia, a number of whom have been most vociferous in their interjections.

I have in mind particularly the hon. members for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) and Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). At least they should have the satisfaction of realizing that their constituents are becoming more progressive. If those hon. members are not able to give leadership, at least they should try to keep up with those whom they represent. It is quite evident that the people in British Columbia, including those in Fraser Valley, are no longer willing to sit back and let George do it.

Mr. Cruickshank: They will send us back here again; don't worry about that.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder if, before I proceed to the next portion of my speech, we might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) spoke on December 4 he adopted a somewhat critical attitude toward the policies of the provincial government of Alberta and implied that they had placed a somewhat undue burden upon the municipalities. When the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) spoke this afternoon he adopted the same argument and made the same charge. I think the record of the provincial government of Alberta in regard to the municipalities is fine, and will compare most favourably with that of any other provincial government. The assistance given to the municipalities by the provincial government has been considerable. I should like to place on the record a summary of the assistance given as recorded in an official publication issued by the department of economic affairs, legislative buildings, Edmonton, Alberta. It is entitled, "Summary of Assistance to Municipalities" and is as follows:

Education:
School grants	$9,870,000
Teachers' retirement fund	565,000
School building assistance act	2,000,000
Public health:
Per diem hospital grants	1,102,000
Special hospitalization grants	1,504,000
Hospital construction grants	500,000
Grants for health services	58,000
Public works:
Grants for road in municipal and improvement districts	3,880,000
Grants for bridges	800,000
Treasury department:
Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation on certain government buildings	30,000
Grants under the municipal assistance act	5,991,000
Lands and forests department:
Increased payments to municipalities from grazing leases	200,000
Total direct financial assistance	$26,500,000

That is for the year 1952-53. Then there are some additional amounts as follows:

Increased Share of Welfare Paid by Province
60 per cent of indigent relief and child welfare	$ 585,000
The 10 per cent of basic old age and blind pensions formerly paid by municipal authorities	500,00
Reduction of municipality's share of the cost of mothers' allowance from 25 per cent to 20 per cent	50,000
Cost of hospitalization for pensioners formerly paid by municipal authorities	1,450,000

That represents approximately 40 per cent of the estimated provincial expenditures on income account for 1952-53. The minister was also critical of the fact that municipal debt in Alberta has been increasing. The same would be true of the municipalities in any other province. There is a definite reason why the debts of the municipalities in Alberta have been increasing. It is largely due to the fact that municipalities throughout the province are taking advantage of the credit that is made available by the Alberta government at the rate of only 2 per cent under the self-liquidating projects legislation. These loans are granted at 2 per cent with repayment spread over a period of 20 years.

Many municipalities throughout Alberta, and I am glad it is so, are taking advantage of this legislation in order to put in water systems, sewage disposal plants and other services. I think we will all agree that this is definitely to the advantage of the people because it makes it easier for them to carry on in their homes, and makes conditions far more healthy than is the case in small towns where there is no water available in the homes. I was interested in an article which appeared in the Edmonton Journal of November 1, 1951 dealing with this matter, which reads:

> Twenty-seven Alberta municipal governments have been granted 2 per cent loans totalling $4,770,950 from the Alberta self-liquidating projects fund since March 31, it was stated by Kenneth Hawkins, deputy provincial treasurer.
> A total of $7,000,000 was voted for the fund by the legislature this year, and more than $2,500,000 remains to be lent to local governments to finance self-liquidating projects such as installation of water and sewer systems.

The Alberta self-liquidating projects act was passed two years ago, and during the first year almost $5,000,000 was lent to the local governments, so the total amount lent by the fund is approaching $10,000,000. In the initial year, loans numbered 34 and totalled $4,978,353.

That was as at November 1, 1951, and I understand that since that time additional loans amounting to $6 million have been granted, making a total of $16 million at 2 per cent. I am quite sure that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will not criticize such a policy because it is to the advantage of Alberta. Mind you, this is not something imposed upon the people; it is done at their own request. A plebiscite is held to determine whether or not the debt will be incurred in order to instal water systems or other services. It is only after it has been voted upon that a loan can be made.

I suggest that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys would be doing a service to his province and to the people of Canada if he would put pressure upon the federal government to adopt a similar policy in regard to loans in connection with federal projects. I believe there is still legislation on the statute books to provide for the granting of municipal improvement assistance with loans at the rate of 2 per cent. That legislation was suspended during the war and no loans have been made under it since that time. I think the minister should put pressure upon the federal government to once more make these loans available.

It is true that municipalities in Alberta can get money from the provincial government at 2 per cent, but that is not the case in the majority of the other provinces. If a municipality wants to finance a project of this kind it has to pay 4½ or 5 per cent or even a higher interest rate. I think the minister would be doing a great service if instead of criticizing Alberta he would have the government make money available to municipalities at these low rates of interest.

Let me go a step further. I think the minister would be making a real contribution if he would urge upon the federal government the desirability of reducing the interest rate on loans for housing to 2 per cent. He would make a contribution if he would exert pressure upon the federal government to reduce the interest rate to veterans from 3½ per cent to 2 per cent.

Mr. Prudham: Can my hon. friend tell me what the Alberta government has ever done to help housing?

Mr. Quelch: By making loans at 2 per cent for the installation of water systems and sewage disposal plants they are making a direct contribution. I want to turn now—

Mr. Low: I think the minister would do well if he kept quiet.

Mr. Quelch: —to the question of agriculture.

Mr. Blackmore: Let him inform himself a bit.

Mr. Quelch: I think most hon. members will agree that the present situation in agriculture is a matter for grave concern. Certainly the farmers themselves are concerned about the situation. I say that because in spite of the fact that there have been two record crops in the west, farm income is down 5 per cent this year. That is largely due to the fact that the price received for farm products has dropped by 10 per cent while at the same time the cost of those things the farmer has to buy has gone up by approximately 5 per cent. My authority for that statement is to be found in the "Current Review of Agricultural Conditions in Canada, November, 1952", where on page 9 there is the following:

Farm income.—Although farm cash income from the sale of farm products and from participation payments, including those on previous years' crops, may reach a new all-time high, it is estimated that a lower income in kind, reduced values of year-end inventory changes and higher operating costs will serve to provide a net farm income about 5 per cent below that of a year ago.

On the next page under the heading "Farm Prices of Agricultural Products" I read the following:

With the exception of the month of January, the index of farm prices of agricultural products was substantially lower during the first eight months of 1952 than for the corresponding period of 1951 . . . Even if the present level of the index can be maintained until the end of the year, it is estimated that the annual average for 1952 will be at least 10 per cent below that of a year ago.

Under the heading "Prices of Commodities and Services Used by Farmers" I read the following:

Prices paid by farmers for commodities and services used for production and for living continued to rise during 1952. The composite price index number of goods, service and cost of living in 1952 is nearly 5 per cent above that for 1951 with the greatest increase occurring in farm wages followed closely by family living costs, equipment and materials.

I should like to point out that if it had not been for the large crops that were harvested in the west the drop in income would have been considerably greater than 5 per cent. But we cannot always expect the kind of crops we have had out there for the past two years. The present situation is causing a good deal of concern already. The moisture content in the soil today is about 70 per cent of normal and unless there is very heavy rainfall between now and next June we cannot hope for a crop next year anything like those we have had during the past two years.

I will admit frankly that the condition of the grain grower is far better than that of the livestock man. It is the livestock man who is really taking the beating in Canada today. I have in mind the hog producer, the poultry producer and the dairy producer. These men are really hard hit. The cost of their feed is high and the price of the things they have to sell is falling fast. The result is that today there is a good deal of talk among farm organizations about the need, and even the desirability, of reducing production of their commodities. In that connection I should like to refer to the issue of the Rural Co-operator under date of November 25, 1952. On the front page under the heading "Time to cut production?" there is the following:

> Regulated production or government assistance are the two courses open to farmers, C. A. Milligan, Napanee, president of the Ontario federation of agriculture, said in an address at the recent annual meeting of the Ontario cream producers association in Toronto. The farmer cannot continue to produce on today's prices, Mr. Milligan said. He posed the question of whether it might not be the time to cut production to domestic requirements to insure a fair price.

If the government is not prepared to maintain agricultural prices at a level that will bear a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities, then it would seem that the only solution for farmers is to reduce their production. If farmers are going to be forced to operate under the so-called law of supply and demand, then of course the logical thing for them is to play the game according to the law of supply and demand and cut down their production, thus reducing supply so that demand will catch up with supply and prices will rise. That is what the manufacturers do. That is what they did during the depression years. They did not reduce their prices in order to try to increase sales. They reduced their production, and while the prices of agricultural products fell in those years by 65 per cent the prices of manufactured goods only fell by 25 per cent during the same period as a result of the manufacturers operating under the so-called law of supply and demand.

Let me make this point. If the farmers adopt a policy of that kind, if they do reduce their production, then the federal government will have to take the full responsibility for that action. If farmers today, in the face of the world situation, reduce their production then that will be an extremely vicious policy and, as I say, the federal government will have to take the responsibility for it. I would say that if such action is taken it will be the result of a breach of faith on the part of the federal government.

In the first place I would point out that a reduction in production cannot possibly be justified in the face of the present world situation. We heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) speak this afternoon and the picture he painted was somewhat gloomy. He told us about the difficulties of the have-not nations and the difficulty of making supplies available to them. I was very much struck by an article written recently by Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, former deputy minister of mines and resources. I understand he is head of the United Nations technical assistance program. The article is published in the December 6 issue of Saturday Night. I am going to quote from it because, while I realize that some members will have read it, there are many others, no doubt, who have not read it. I think the article brings out some very important points which should be given careful consideration by hon. members and by the government. The heading of the article is, "Is Military Defence Enough?" I read from page 23 as follows:

> There can be valid arguments as to the amount of effort and the precise allocation of our resources that should be devoted to each aspect of this basic problem. It is argued by some of our political leaders that, as far as Canada is concerned, the present division of approximately $100 for direct defence to $1 for technical and economic aid to the fermenting and revolutionary areas of the world is about right.
> To many others such a distribution of our democratic resources seems dangerously unrealistic. This view is shared by the commission on foreign economic policy appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. Nelson Rockefeller by the president of the United States, and by a whole galaxy of equally distinguished and equally conservative statesmen and economists.
> It can be and is argued that in the case of Canada our people are not prepared to make the additional financial sacrifices that would be necessary to provide both kinds of protection. At the moment that may be true. But that is not necessarily the final word of the Canadian people on this subject.
> Our government has worked with great courage, skill and persistence to convince the Canadian people that guns are necessary. I am satisfied that a similar persistence, skill and courage would produce a similar response on our other defensive front. This is a time for leadership, not for simple compliance with existing opinion. If the public knew the facts, opinion might change. Popularity is not the final test of governmental greatness. What are some of these facts that the public should know? Well, let's look at the world around us.

I am going to cite two examples that he gives. He says:

> Half the people in the world are ill, and expect to die before reaching the age of 35. But they know that they could and should be cured, and that if they were Canadians or New Zealanders or Swedes they would probably live to the age of 70.
> Half the people in the world have an income of less than $100 a year; or, in other words, most of the people in the world are hungry most of the time. But they know that there could be enough food, and enough clothing and shelter, for all.

This article states that perhaps public opinion is not ready for this, but it points out that if people were educated with respect to what the situation is in the world they would no doubt support greater economic aid. Well, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) told the people in Edmonton that down in Ottawa they had a bunch of statesmen, not politicians. Surely if the cabinet is composed of a bunch of statesmen they would be prepared to risk their reputation on a policy of economic aid instead of just going along as far as they thought the people might support them. The people at this time need leaders and not merely men who will follow general public opinion.

Now the question is, in the light of that situation can reduced production of food be possibly justified? I am satisfied that the vast majority of people in Canada knowing of the situation would say that the answer is no. No doubt increased production of food and its distribution to hungry people would be one of the greatest weapons we could use to keep peace. Government policy should be to encourage an increase in the production of food, not a decrease. Unfortunately there might very well be a decrease unless the government gives some kind of a guarantee to agriculture that in the event of their increasing production they will not have to take a reduced price, which may mean they will have to take a lesser price for their increased production than they would receive for the decreased production.

The article by Dr. Keenleyside suggests that it might mean some sacrifices. I would suggest that by maintaining a high level of production, and furthermore by expanding production, in this country we would actually have an increase in prosperity. Certainly you would have greater prosperity than you would by allowing decreased production. No country can become prosperous by decreasing its production.

Some people will say: Well, if we are going to give some of that production to other nations, does that not necessarily mean increased taxation? I would say, in the light of the situation in Canada today, that the total cost of aid given to foreign nations would not have to be met by taxation. I would say that for this reason. We have a situation today where inventories in the country are building up. There are surpluses in many industries; there are surpluses in agriculture; the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) referred to a surplus of fish. You can go right down the line and find many surpluses. Unfortunately in many parts of Canada today we also find people with reduced purchasing power to buy the goods they require and hence we find buying on the instalment plan and credit buying has expanded very rapidly, for the simple reason that people have not the money and therefore they buy on time. That situation indicates a lack of effective demand.

We have a certain amount of unemployment and undeveloped resources. In order to bring about the distribution of surplus goods the government would be justified in going to the Bank of Canada for funds, and not depending upon the borrowing of the savings of the people or increased taxation. That would mean a saving in interest charges and would not increase our debt burden.

I would say that the government has forced the farmers into a position where, in order to secure a good price, they have to reduce their production; and if that is so they will be guilty of a breach of faith with the farmers. I say so for this reason. It will be recalled by members who were in the house during the latter years of the war that price ceilings were placed on agricultural production. It was announced that that was part of a stabilizing program. The government asked the farm organizations to support that program, giving them the definite assurance that it would be part and parcel of a stabilization program under which prices of agricultural production would be stabilized after the war. The government also established the agricultural prices support board which was to prevent prices falling below a certain level.

As years went by the farm organizations were not satisfied that prices were being maintained at a fair level, and asked the government to establish a formula. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), when speaking to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in annual convention two years ago at Niagara, announced what the formula would be. At the last session he also announced the formula in the house. He said then that the support prices would be maintained so that the price of agricultural products today would bear the same relationship to the prices of other commodities as they existed in the base years, 1943, 1944, and 1945.

Would anybody say that today prices are being maintained in line with that formula? I was satisfied that such was not the case, and I wrote to the dominion bureau of statistics and asked what the price of agricultural products would be on the basis of that formula. I put this information on the record at the last session, but just to remind members I want to place a few figures on the record now.

On the basis of that formula the price of hogs would be $29.72 per hundred pounds. The support price is only $26, and I understand that in January the price is to be reduced to $23. What possible justification can there be for reducing that price from $26 to $23 when it is already 3 cents per pound below the formula, and when the price of everything else is going up?

Then we can take the price of eggs. Under the formula they should be 73 cents a dozen, but the floor price is 38 cents. The price of butter should be 64 cents per pound, but the floor price as of January of this year was 58 cents; it may have changed since then. On the basis of the formula farmers are perfectly justified in asking that the government maintain support prices at a higher level in order to assure them that the prices of farm produce today will bear a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities on the basis of the base years, 1943-45. I say that no stone should be left unturned by the government in order to expand production of food in order to help meet the tremendous need that exists in the world today and to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) referred this afternoon.

Now for a few minutes I wish to turn to the international wheat agreement, because the Agricultural Prices Support Act does not deal with wheat. As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) said when he spoke in the house, we in this group would like to see a new international wheat agreement signed, but we insist on certain changes being made before it is signed. Certain weaknesses that exist in the agreement should be taken care of; and we were very glad to hear the minister state that he is going to strive for higher prices under the new agreement.

The main weaknesses I refer to under the international wheat agreement are these. It will be recalled that when the British wheat agreement was signed in 1945 most people were of the opinion that price levels were bound to go down. Everybody seemed to think that, and certainly the government thought it. So the British wheat agreement was signed; but instead of the price of everything going down the price of everything else went up and, as a result, the farmers took a beating. When the 1948 agreement came up, everybody again seemed to take it for granted that the price of everything was bound to go down and when the international wheat agreement was signed there was the provision in it that the floor price would drop 10 cents every year without regard to what happened to the price level.

At that time, speaking for this group, I warned of the danger of that provision. I pointed out that there was no assurance that price levels would go down, that it was quite possible prices would go up, and that if the price levels went up there was no reason why the floor price should go down. At that time I wanted the price of wheat under the international wheat agreement to be tied to the price levels of importing nations so that if the price of everything else went down the price of wheat would go down, but if the price of everything else went up then the price of wheat would go up too. The result of that would be that our exports of wheat to a particular country would bring back the same amount of imports to this country.

At that time there was no support from farm organizations for the suggestion we made in the house. I am glad to say, however, that today farm organizations are asking for that very thing, an escalator clause. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) must agree with that proposition, because I remember a speech by him some years ago in which he said he did not like to have to sell wheat in advance, without knowing what the price should be. He did not like to set the price ahead four years. When you set the price, as it is set under the international wheat agreement, you are merely guessing what the price should be. But if you set a price in the first year on a basis that seems fair in relation to the prices of other commodities, and then tie that price to the price level of other commodities, you are not guessing. You know that in the next few years the price of that wheat will still continue to bear a fair relation to the price of other commodities. Therefore in any wheat agreement that is signed I think there should be some provision—and I am not trying to be dogmatic about it—that would take care of that situation so that if in future instead of going down the price level went up, the farmer would not suffer as a consequence, as he has suffered under the international wheat agreement and under the British wheat agreement. I am hoping that some action will be taken along that line.

The price of wheat today is, of course, low as compared with the actual price of wheat in 1948. In addition to that, the prices of the things the farmer has to buy have gone up considerably, putting the wheat grower in an unfavourable position. Although wheat does not come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, it is nevertheless interesting to note that if the formula announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), using the basis of 1943-44-45 were used in connection with wheat, the price today would be $2.53 a bushel, according to the bureau of statistics. I am not suggesting that we should try to get $2.53 a bushel. I merely mention that fact in order to show that the price of wheat today is low in comparison with the prices of other commodities. I am suggesting that, first of all, we should try to get a higher price—and the minister has assured us that he is going to try to get that—and have a higher floor. Then there should be a clause in the agreement which would make it possible to adjust those prices in relation to changing conditions. In other words, there should be some form of escalator clause.

I should also like to join with the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) in what he said about the wheat board. I think the wheat board have done a magnificent job under extremely difficult conditions. I know I speak for the people back in my constituency when I say that they have no desire to see the wheat board done away with. They want the wheat board to continue as a 100 per cent marketing agency. They do not want to be thrown back to the mercy of the vagaries of the grain exchange under which every time they try to expand production, they are penalized by reduced prices. The world today needs expansion of production and we must have a policy that will make it possible to have that expansion without penalizing the producers by reducing their prices.

I believe my time is rapidly being exhausted, but before concluding I should like to say a few words with regard to income tax. I see that the minister is in his seat. I am not going to say a great deal at this time because I know that the proper time to discuss this matter is in the budget debate, but I want to make a protest on behalf of the people I represent about a policy that was instituted this fall, and that caused a great deal of hard feeling.

About October a number of the farmers of my district received letters telling them to appear before a federal investigator at either Drumheller or Stettler, and to bring with them a full statement showing all expenditures and receipts, as well as their bank books, the titles to any property they possessed, their bonds and everything else, dating back to the year 1946. You can understand just what the reaction of these farmers was. This is 1952. The department were going back to 1946. The situation caused a great deal of hard feeling, and they ran into all kinds of trouble. The first thing they ran into was this. When they went to the bank and wanted to get documents of title, the banks in many instances said no, we are not going to give you the titles; we are holding them as security; and you could not expect them to do so. The farmers arrived with only about half what the investigators wanted. In some cases I have heard from farmers that they were treated decently by the investigators. On the other hand some farmers have told me the opposite. I guess it depended on the position the farmer was in.

I suggest to the minister that, whether it was good policy or not, it was poor politics, just before an election, to pull off a stunt like that. Of course I am not a Liberal, so I am not worrying any; but I do not think it is good politics. If the letter written had just contained a line or two saying: "We want to help you with your income tax return; we do not think your statements are quite correct and if you will come down to the office, we will help you formulate it" there would not have been anything like the amount of hard feeling. But the content of the letter was to the effect: You have been doing something that is wrong, and we are going to find out what it is. There was a kind of dictatorial attitude that people do not like. As I say, it is poor politics.

There is one other case that I have had brought to my attention; it is the case of the housekeeper on the farm. The farmers feel that they should be allowed a deduction for the wages of a housekeeper. I know that matter was discussed in this house two or three years ago and it was not allowed; but this is one thing I wish the minister would take into consideration. A farmer is allowed a deduction for farm help; yet in many cases the person employed as a housekeeper is actually doing quite a large percentage of farm work, such as milking the cows, maybe, or looking after the poultry, feeding the pigs and so on. I suggested to one or two of the people who wrote to me that it had not been allowed in the past, but I would bring it to the attention of the minister again. I suggested in the meantime that if there was anybody employed on the farm in that way, instead of saying that the wages were $50, if she was working partly as housekeeper and partly as hired help, to put it in as $25 for hired help and $25 for housekeeper. I do not know whether or not I was giving them advice that might get them into trouble. I told them that I did not have anything official to go on, but it looked to me like common sense. I hope the minister will give the matter consideration.

I believe that my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker, but before I sit down I should like to say this. I have made a plea asking that greater economic aid be given to certain foreign countries, to what are considered the "have-not" nations. That can be done without any sacrifice on the part of the people because it can be done out of an increase in production. But before we start to give greater aid to people in foreign countries we should first of all make sure that we are doing everything we can to look after our own people.

There is one class of people that I believe should have attention, and I think that attention is long overdue; I refer to that class of people who are physically incapacitated. Many resolutions have been introduced by private members, and I think by some on the other side of the house, with regard to this matter; and every hon. member of this house who has spoken on it has spoken sympathetically. If a free vote were taken tomorrow as to whether or not pensions should be granted to people who are physically incapacitated, I am satisfied that it would pass unanimously in this house. I hope the government will give consideration to the matter, because I am satisfied that a country such as Canada should be in a position to guarantee a fairly decent standard of living to all people provided they are willing to work and, if they are not able to work, through physical incapacity, then that aid should be granted to them as a pension.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, one must realize in taking part in this debate, which is going into its third week, that it is going to be rather difficult to make an address without repeating what has already been said but I will try to avoid that. This evening, I do not intend to make a political speech; I think it is too early to start the election campaign. I prefer to conduct that campaign later on. I have not had much experience in election campaigns but, when they start, I like to make them hot and juicy; and I will save my ammunition for that time.

There are a few subjects on which I should like to speak, and the one that I will deal with mainly is the amendment to the amendment, with regard to national health insurance or a national health scheme. However, there are a few other subjects I wish to touch on briefly. To begin with I want to say a little bit about trade.

We in western Canada are naturally interested in trade because we produce much more than our country can consume. Hence we are definitely interested in trade. Perhaps I might mention what has been directed as a criticism toward the government. It has to do with our loss of foreign trade, particularly with Great Britain. It may be true in part that we have lost our trade with Great Britain, but we should examine why. It is said that Great Britain finds herself short of dollars, and therefore she cannot buy our products. I do not think that is the whole story. I find that Great Britain bought more in Canada during last year than she did in 1939. It is true that during the war our trade increased considerably with Great Britain, but after the war and since 1946 and 1947 it has been dropping off. The fact remains that Great Britain spent roughly over $600 million in Canada last year as compared with $300 million in 1939. If they are spending twice as many dollars in Canada as they did before the war, I do not think it is telling the whole story to say that there is a shortage of dollars.

If they are spending twice as much money in Canada as they did before the war one might ask, and rightly so, what are they buying? Britain finds herself in a position where she believes that she needs our raw products much worse than our food, though it is true that she can use our food. But she can buy some of the products which we grow much cheaper in other countries. The Englishman has always been quite a statesman. He is the same today as he always has been, and he buys where he gets what he wants cheaper.

Take beef, cheese and butter. In western Canada we are mostly interested in beef; to some extent butter, but we do not produce cheese. What is the position? I am sure it was put on the record before by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), but I should like to cite again what the position is. In June the Canadian floor price for beef was 25 cents in Toronto or Montreal. On that same date Great Britain had a contract with New Zealand which called for beef at $14.20, f.o.b. New Zealand. Therefore it is easy to understand why we are not selling beef to Great Britain at the present time. There is only one reason, only one sensible and logical reason, namely that we have a better market somewhere else and can receive much more for it. That is in the United States.

At the same time butter was selling in Canada at 58 cents, or at least the guaranteed floor price was 58 cents, and 35 cents in New Zealand. Last spring the guaranteed initial price of cheese was 24 cents in Ontario and 19 cents in New Zealand. Judging by these figures, if the Canadian government or the Minister of Trade and Commerce has lost these markets—and we all agree that there is a mighty good reason why we are not in them—I do not think the people in western Canada, particularly the beef growers, would look very favourably toward the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government doing anything to force us to sell our beef and compete with New Zealand when we have a much better and higher market to the south.

We hear of trade and quite a bit about protection. I never did agree with protection. I always thought that those tariffs and subsidies were something that somebody was getting for something they did not really have. In western Canada we have to grow products and we have to compete on the markets of the world, and naturally we think that others should do the same thing.

That is all I am going to say on trade, but for a few minutes I am going to say something about freight rates. I confess immediately that I know very little about freight rates. Perhaps there are other hon. gentlemen in this house who know just as little as I do, or possibly less. My reason for mentioning freight rates is that I noticed that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has been quoted in the Regina Leader-Post of July 17 as having spoken to a C.C.F. provincial convention in Saskatoon. The Leader-Post says:

> Argue says federal vote June 29, 1953

I do not know whether or not he was trying to convince that convention that he knew just when the election was going to be held.

Under the heading we find the following:

> He scored the federal government on freight rates, handling of foot-and-mouth disease outbreak and floor prices.
> "The railway had asked for rate increases which would permit them to operate at a surplus. Considering the government we have at Ottawa and the mentality of that government I say that they will get all they ask for," he said.

I said that I did not know much about freight rates, Mr. Speaker, but I think the statement I have quoted is far from being the fact. It is my understanding—and I am sure I shall be corrected if I am wrong, or at least I hope I shall be—that the federal government has little or nothing to do with freight rates. The board of transport commissioners deals with that subject wholly. It is my understanding that in 1938 the act was amended to give the board of transport commissioners full control and full jurisdiction to decide whether or not freight rates would be increased. The provincial governments, those representing agriculture and any other bodies, may go before that board and put their case, and the board's duty is to decide whether there shall be any increase in freight rates or not.

I was speaking to a friend from my constituency who attended the convention I have just referred to; naturally he was not a supporter of mine. He asked me whether the statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia was correct; whether the federal government was going to give the railways all the increases they asked for. I asked him who told him that. He said: "Mr. Hazen Argue told us that at the C.C.F. convention." Well, the only thing I could say to him, and what I did say to him, was this: "Don't take Mr. Argue too seriously on the platform. If you get him off to the side and speak to him privately he is not a bad fellow. That has been my personal experience." That is why I mention freight rates. I am sure the hon. member will not be able to say now that I have ignored him this evening.

I have been following the hon. member since I came to this house, and I must say that generally he makes a speech that is pretty well covered up, a good defence. But in the one he made the other night he was boxing wide open, with no defence at all. I am not going to deal with that speech, but I do wish to refer to what he described as a private deal in the city of Estevan, which is in my constituency, and which he said at that time was common knowledge. Well, I have to say that I did not know anything about it. I have inquired since. I noticed that a few days later the weekly Free Press carried the story of the hon. member for Assiniboia under the heading: "Barter deal in Estevan". The Leader-Post had an article some time later, but the figures are somewhat different. The Free Press quoted the figures of the hon. member for Assiniboia, which were 100,000 bushels, as he stated in this chamber. The Leader-Post had it down to 10,000 bushels. The information I have received privately out there is to the effect that it was 8,500 bushels. Anyway, we shall take the Leader-Post and the Free Press. That is 10,000 bushels as against 100,000 bushels. Well, if my arithmetic is correct—and it is only simple arithmetic—the hon. member was 10 per cent right and 90 per cent wrong. I must admit that he is improving. I have made inquiries on the deal and I am told by the motor people that they have taken in some grain, or that at least they have agreed to take in some grain against the sale of vehicles. But in most cases the grain has remained on the farm, and must be sold through the farmer's quota book.

I am now going to turn to the amendment to the amendment, and speak for a few moments on the subject of national health insurance. I think all are agreed that a national health insurance plan is desirable. I believe we have agreed in the House of Commons that it is going to have to be paid for. I think, too, we are pretty well agreed where the money will come from, that it will be from the taxpayer.

It may be recalled that when the old age pension legislation making provision for our citizens 70 years of age and over, without a means test, was before the house, I was not 100 per cent in favour of it. I declared at that time that I had some concern in respect of the taxpayer. I pointed out that those who were receiving family allowances were riding on one end of the stick, the old age pensioner was on the other, and the man in the middle was carrying the load. I believe the people in my constituency expect me to give some consideration to the man in the middle, because he is important. If he breaks down, the other two ends of the stick will have no support and those who are riding on them will have to get off and walk.

The amendment to the amendment asks that the government bring in immediately a national health scheme. According to the figures offered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who proposed the amendment to the amendment, it will cost somewhere between $500 million and $600 million, something more than half a billion dollars. I do not think I could justify that expenditure to the people of my constituency at this time.

Furthermore, if we accepted a scheme of this kind, it has been pointed out that we would likely find, as they did in Great Britain when they instituted their health scheme, that it would cost considerably more than was originally expected. Over there we are told it cost about $300 million more than they had anticipated. It is my opinion that if such a scheme is to be made work properly, it will be essential that those whose responsibility it is to make it work must be in favour of it. This would refer, of course, both to the people in general and to the medical men. As time goes on it would seem that professional men engaged in the practice of medicine are beginning to agree at least to some extent that a national health scheme is necessary.

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke in the debate he made reference to what had been said at Laval university by Dr. Jobin, chairman of the Canadian association of French-speaking physicians. He pointed out that this doctor had suggested it was time we had such a program, and that he was in favour of it. Those of us who are interested in such a program are glad to note that a medical man holds that view; but I think we will have to have more of them stating a similar view because, whether we like it or not, it is the medical men who will have to put over such a scheme, or at least who will have to help put it over if it is to be a success.

Mention has been made of our hospitalization plan in Saskatchewan, and I shall refer to it briefly. We have in our province free hospitalization available at a fee of $30 per family, as a maximum, or $10 per individual, plus a sales tax, and plus $6 million a year out of the provincial treasury. I give full credit to the part the government in Saskatchewan has played in bringing about this hospitalization scheme. I also give full credit to the premier of that province for what he did when he was minister of health to help put such a scheme across.

It has been said that one in public life in Saskatchewan dare not criticize the hospitalization scheme of that province. I take no heed of that warning. As a representative of my constituency I believe I can stand in my place in this House of Commons and point out both the good and the bad in that scheme, without suffering in any way politically.

I believe I am free to speak in that way because it is well known in my constituency where I stood in this matter before I became interested in politics. I spent a considerable amount of time and effort in putting across the hospitalization scheme in health region No. 3 of my province. That was the Weyburn-Estevan area, taking in to a large degree the constituency I now represent in the House of Commons.

On that occasion we took the municipal plans to which reference has been made in the debate, and incorporated them into an over-all plan in order to give the hospitalization service to all people in that health region. We were watched closely by the health department in Saskatchewan. The municipal representatives on the board were given assistance by the health department in Saskatchewan to make the effort a success. I believe what was done was a success, and that other provinces throughout Canada would do well to institute a similar scheme.

Although it worked well when divided into health units, the provincial government decided to take it over and operate it on a provincial level. I have no criticism to offer on that score because I thought at that time, and I still think, that was a good idea. However, we must not lose sight of the fact that instituting a hospitalization scheme is much easier than would be a medical scheme. We had only to make deals with the various hospitals, after we had drawn a rate, and this was not too difficult. But then the medical end might be more difficult.

It has been said in the house, and I think properly so, that we in Saskatchewan are more health conscious than are the people in some of the other provinces. When the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was speaking the other evening he said that if there was an issue in the last provincial election in Saskatchewan it was not the hospitalization plan, and indicated that all parties, including the Liberal party, were in favour of it. It is nothing new for Liberals to be in favour of social services in Saskatchewan. Indeed, any examination of the record will prove that this was the case long before we ever heard about the C.C.F.

I said a moment ago that in Saskatchewan we are health conscious, but I believe I should not leave that only as a general statement. I recall a provincial election not long ago when a hospitalization plan was an issue. I recall listening over the radio to the recent election campaign in Ontario when the Liberals promised that if they were elected they would provide free hospitalization. I heard the leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Thomson, say over the radio that that would be done, and he referred to what was being done in Saskatchewan. Seemingly the people of Ontario were not ready for such a scheme, and I do not need to tell you what happened to that party.

I think if other provinces had a hospitalization scheme such as we have in our province it would be easier to put this across. I understand that the federal government have asked the provincial governments to give their opinions of such a scheme and so far only three have reported favourably. I hope I will be excused for talking so much about my own province, but I should like to quote what Dr. Taylor, director of the Saskatchewan health planning commission, had to say about an over-all hospitalization plan. An article which appeared in the Toronto Star reads:

> Dr. Taylor has suggested that this would depend on the answers to the following, among other questions:
> 1. Should it be a national scheme, on the British model, or should there be ten different schemes, evolved by the provinces?
> 2. Should professional associations have administrative authority? Should government funds be turned over to a profession or an association for distribution to its own members?
> 3. How shall health insurance be paid for? Should it be entirely or partly financed by the state? Should it be compulsory or voluntary? Which of the three levels of government should participate and in what proportion? Should individuals pay according to a flat rate or by graded income tax levy? Should employers contribute?
> 4. Should all services be provided from the start? If not, what should be included and what left out?

Dr. Taylor asked how health insurance would be paid for. I suggested how it should be paid for, and in my opinion that is the only way. I think his last question is possibly the best of all. I do not think even the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment could answer very many of those questions, and a great deal of consideration will have to be given to the matter. When the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was speaking on this subject the other night he pleaded with the federal government to enact legislation to provide an over-all health plan, and I quote from page 153 of Hansard of November 27 where he is reported as follows:

> As a matter of fact, our people are so interested in the matter of health that even if this government should continue to delay the provision of health insurance, they are not going to stand still. It will be much more difficult, but, step by step, we shall add various health measures to our present hospitalization plan until finally, with or without the help of the federal government, we shall have a health insurance program established in that province.

I do not think the hon. member for Assiniboia will suggest that we in Saskatchewan have been getting no help from the federal government to put over our plan. Surely he knows that millions of dollars have been paid in the way of grants to assist in the building of hospitals and to provide other health services. The hon. member continued:

> But if we can obtain from the federal treasury, from the federal government, even so much as a hospitalization program in which we can participate, then the moneys which would be released from our own hospitalization program would indeed help us in the province of Saskatchewan to provide medical care, dental care and other health measures in a very short time.

I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia that we can do lots of things; we can do many more things in the province of Saskatchewan, if the federal government will collect the taxes and pay for them. The hon. member continued:

> I hear one of the Social Credit members say, "Go easy, now". That is exactly what his leader said to the government: "Go easy on health insurance". The Conservative party says, "let us have another conference with the provinces." Rather, in my opinion the people of Canada want action. If action is not forthcoming I believe the people of Canada will to a larger extent turn to the C.C.F., a party which when given the opportunity will provide a health insurance program for the people of all Canada.
> Mr. Fair: Tell them the truth.

I think possibly that is a good remark by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and perhaps it should be given more consideration. When the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was speaking the other night on this subject he told us a very sentimental story about what was going on in our province. I take it that he was speaking of homestead days. He told us of people taking a chance to go out west, and he described how people had had to go to a grave on the side of a hill by lantern light in order to bury a mother and her unborn child who had died because of a lack of medical care. Touching as that story was, I think we will have to dry up our tears and advance toward our medical set-up for hospitalization in a very mannerly way.

I could tell a very short story, although not so sad, about what has happened in our part of the province. This will illustrate the difference between conditions in pioneer days and those that exist today. My parents went west some 45 years ago and I am told that 40 years ago last May my father rode horseback for some 27 miles during the night to get a doctor. I was not there when he left, but I was there when he returned. They tell me that I got here before the doctor got there. But that was 40 years ago. Today we have hospitals and doctors in our district and people are taken care of in a medical way. If we can advance in our medical set-up during the next 40 or 50 years as we have during the last 40 years we will be doing very well.

I have had something to do with doctors, as I was a member of the municipal council during the depression. When people have the money with which to pay their doctor bills everything goes along fine, but at times those who have not the necessary finances must be looked after. We sometimes hear that when such and such a doctor was called to such and such a place he would not operate or do anything until he found out whether the people had the necessary money. I cannot subscribe to that sort of talk at all. There may be one doctor in a million who would be mean enough to do such a thing, but I question even that. Sometimes I think the doctors are being asked to carry more than their share of responsibility, and possibly they have had to refuse to do certain things because they did not have the necessary funds. Possibly it was the municipality, city or town that was not living up to its responsibility to see that the doctors received some pay. A doctor can only go so long without receiving some money for his services. It is true that we sometimes figure that doctors charge fairly stiffly, but at the same time if we knew all the work they do for nothing I suppose we would not consider that on the whole it was too bad.

We also hear people saying that so and so did not go to a doctor for lack of money. Rather than being lack of money, I think in most cases it is carelessness. If I may be excused for citing myself again, I have an insurance policy and on three occasions in the last few years I have had a form sent to me by which I could go to any medical man and have a complete examination without it costing me a cent. It was not because of lack of money that I did not go, but just carelessness. However I promise, Mr. Speaker, that I will do better in the future.

An hon. Member: Before the next election.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Yes. We also hear about state medicine. I do not know that there is very much difference between state medicine and what is called for in the amendment to the amendment. I noticed that when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was speaking the other day he tapped his desk and said that one thing we do not want in this country is state medicine. I also notice that some of the Liberals tapped their desks too but I did not do so, because whether it is state medicine or national health insurance to me they are the same. You may water one down or dress up the other but they are the same thing. I do not think in a country like ours we will go on for many years before we head toward one or the other. No question about it; it is in the cards.

If I were asked—and I likely will be—when in my opinion further steps will be taken toward an over-all national health scheme the only way I could answer would be to say—and I think it would be an honest answer—that it will take place when our expenditures for defence become less. Today we are spending 50 cents of the tax dollar on national defence. When I am talking to my people about the budget I tell them that we break it into four parts. I refer to it as $4 billion although it is slightly more than that. I tell them there is a quarter of the budget for social services, a quarter for Doug Abbott to run the country and the other half for national defence. It is my opinion that when the defence program drops off it might be well to undertake a national health scheme, but I am sorry to say that I cannot in any way support the amendment to the amendment at this time.

Although I am in sympathy with it I cannot support it because I think the taxpayer is carrying a big enough load at the present time. If I should happen to be a candidate in the next election I do not think I could convince the people of my constituency that I should come down here and vote for anything that would add another half billion dollars to their taxes. I could not do that.

I want to refer to the speech made the other afternoon by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I thought he made a very good address to the house. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) also placed many facts on the record, and I suggest that if anyone did not hear these addresses they should read them. If one does any thinking at all one will naturally do some thinking after reading them. The hon. member for Spadina suggested we should have a committee. I can support the idea of a committee because I believe there are many things we must consider including the questions of Dr. Taylor found in the quotation I read from the Toronto Star. These things must be considered.

The Leader of the Opposition suggested a dominion-provincial conference. I do not think that would be a bad idea either, because a lot of work is going to have to be done. I do not think we can dive headlong into any such scheme without giving it a great deal of consideration. I like the way the hon. member for Spadina summed up the whole question, and I should like to quote what he said when he gave the positions of the various parties, as found at page 339 of Hansard for December 4:

> The position of the official opposition is found at page 29 of Hansard for November 24:
> "For that reason there should be general agreement that the first and necessary step in dealing with this subject is to institute an inquiry which would be conducted by representatives of the medical profession, the hospital boards, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments."
> The position of the Social Credit party is found at page 56 of Hansard for November 24:
> "The Social Credit kind of national health program would ensure that sufficient doctors, dentists, nurses, technicians, clinics and hospital beds would be made available first to take on the work as the scheme is extended".

The leader of the Social Credit party made that statement and you can criticize it if you like, but I think it is worth considering. The hon. member for Spadina went on to say:

> In so far as the C.C.F. position is concerned, they say: "Health insurance here and now; we have had enough committees and surveys. What we want now is action".

The hon. member for Spadina goes on to say:

> It is obvious from the statements on the record, and we who are parliamentarians know exactly what all the parties mean. We can reach only one conclusion. The Liberal party is the only party that can bring health insurance to the Canadian people because the Tories won't and the C.C.F. can't.

We have had the positions of the various parties, but we have not had a spokesman for the government yet. I am hopeful that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) returns he will tell us what the government has in mind with respect to this matter. I think we should move onward so far as the health plan is concerned. We may be going slowly, but I think we should go slowly so that when we build our national health plan we will build it on a foundation that will last. There is no sense in building it on stilts because it will fall over. I think the government should not pay too much attention to the amendment to the amendment, because if they increased the taxes of the people at this time by half a billion dollars then I believe the people of Canada should do the same thing to them as I suggested the people of my constituency would do to me if I helped load more taxes on them.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Cruickshank: Go right to town.

Mr. Ferguson:—there are two very famous magazines which are internationally known. One is Life and the other is Punch. Punch is noted all over the world for its satire and wit. Life is known as a great magazine for depicting world news, in a very authentic manner as a rule. On November 17 I wondered whether Life was changing in an attempt to steal the position Punch has always held in the world as a witty magazine and a depicter of funny happenings. In that magazine I saw pictures of the great development of the Dominion of Canada in oil and iron, and I also saw a picture that was as nearly an old-fashioned tintype as anything I have seen in years. It was taken by a very famous photographer by the name of Karsh. There he showed the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the five-man government of the Liberal party. He was giving them credit for all the great development of resources that has been taken place in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: Let me tell you gentlemen that you had better go back to Punch and get something authentic as far as wit is concerned, because there is no wit in that one.

Mr. Dickey: You are doing all right.

Mr. Ferguson: It reminded me of what the old Kaiser used to say: Me und Gott, at least giving credit to somebody else, though putting him in second place. This magazine, however, does not give nature or the great Creator any praise at all. You would think that these five men of the government had put the oil and iron ore there and developed it. No credit is given to the provinces or to the millions and millions of dollars that have come into this country from our great neighbours to the south, the United States. These are the five men who have punched it through. One of the group in the tintype, the Minister of Agriculture, was in such a hurry to get in the picture that he could not even find a chair; he had to stand up.

What about the other cabinet ministers? Mind you, there is not so much humour in this as may appear. A lot of people in Canada read that magazine and I believe they will realize that this is a five-man government. There are other cabinet ministers—

Mr. Cruickshank: They will be in the next issue.

Mr. Ferguson: They will be in the next issue, to prove conclusively that the Liberal party is well divided.

Mr. Gibson: You are just thinking of the Social Crediters.

Mr. Ferguson: They have been pretty well split and, as far as I am concerned, I believe it has been a five-man government and it is the greatest example of planning in reverse that I have ever seen. We have the gifts of God in Canada, resources unlimited; and the Liberal government has been in power long enough to have planned and set the path for great development in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: You said it.

Mr. Ferguson: I said they have been in power long enough to have planned and set the course, but they have not done so. There has been absolutely no concrete, positive planning by this government. This government has grown in spite of itself, in spite of the people. This country has grown in spite of this government—

Mr. Dickey: The humour is improving.

Mr. Ferguson: The men who developed this oil and these iron ore bodies went to the provincial authorities and, with their wisdom and knowledge of iron and oil, planned and conceived schemes to develop these resources of Canada. That was before they came here to ask this government for a charter. All the spade work and ground work had been done.

Mr. Cruickshank: We gave them a charter.

Mr. Howe: After a struggle.

Mr. Ferguson: We, as Canadians, must realize that this country today should have a population of at least 20 or 25 million.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: What have we got? Well, just look over the history of some of the junior planners on the second shelf of the cabinet, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) and all others except the five. What have they got to be proud about so far as planning is concerned? Today we are short of skilled labour in Canada. If the government had planned the development of the great resources of Canada, which was absolutely in their power, they could have had all the immigrants they could have brought here in five times the number of ships that have been used to bring immigrants to this country. There is even talk today of curtailment of immigration because of lack of planning. These people from foreign countries come out here and make great Canadians, but what happens? The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration says: We have to watch this carefully; there are no homes and no jobs, and there is no development.

That is the kind of planning that is done by this government. I certainly compliment the mover and seconder of the throne speech for making a good job out of nothing. The throne speech divulged nothing to Canadians at all. It gave us no encouragement about what this government proposes as far as this great country is concerned. As a Canadian, I am sick and tired of watching this great country creep along.

An hon. Member: Mostly tired.

Mr. Ferguson: I will say that I have seen the country creep under Conservative governments in the past, but this is the government in power today and this is the government which makes this country creep along still. We are not here listening to our grandfathers in the House of Commons; we are listening to men who came here in 1949, and the people of Canada want them to carry out their promises for the development of this country. They do not want them depicted in Life magazine, the five of them, taking all the credit for the development of this country when it should go to private enterprise.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Turn over the page.

Mr. Ferguson: I have three or four pages here. Do you know that this country is in such a state that there is a shortage of mortgage money for the building of houses?

Mr. Gibson: They have not asked you.

Mr. Cruickshank: A mortgage is the easiest thing I can get.

Mr. Ferguson: During the war, and after the war too, mortgage companies were told to invest their money in government bonds at 3 per cent. There was no demand for the development of houses and business structures at that time, so they bought the bonds, being promised by this government that they would be able to sell the bonds at par whenever they needed the money to develop the country and build the much needed homes. Now, what has happened? The bonds are selling at around $92 as against a par value of $100.

Mr. Gibson: Not at $92.

Mr. Ferguson: If they sell them they lose 8 per cent. You go to the mortgage companies today and you will find they are short of mortgage money for the development of Canada. That is an awfully sorry plight for Canadians to find themselves in. Young men come to me and say: I have saved $3,000. I have really performed a miracle. I have been able, in the last ten years, after I have paid these exorbitant taxes and boosted Abbott's surplus, to eke out $3,000 and I want to build a house for myself and family.

Mr. Gibson: Dig him a hole.

Mr. Ferguson: He says: I want to borrow $4,000—and just let me say this to you, British Columbia, you try to get that amount of money. That man has been thrifty, wise, hard-working, a good Canadian citizen; yet it is hard to get that man $4,000 to go with his own $3,000 or $4,000 in order that he may build a home in Canada today.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) conceived the taxation of tobacco. He boosted the tax 3 cents. He is one of the five gentlemen depicted in the tintype in Life, one of the great geniuses and developers of Canada. What are the actual results of that brain wave? Here they are: Mr. Abbott predicted an increase in national revenue of $26 million, but instead he has lost money for the treasury. He has caused unemployment in the processing plants in southwestern Ontario and the factories in Quebec. He has decreased income by thousands of dollars all across the country.

An hon. Member: Bingo.

Mr. Ferguson: I have shown conclusively what has happened. I wanted to prove it to the interrupters who do not want to learn. They never get on their feet and tell you about anything they have observed that is wrong. I do not know whether they have had time to observe the progress of this country and its lack of guidance under this government; yet they are elected and come here to make inane remarks when somebody else is on his feet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: To prove that the Minister of Finance took a stab in the dark, here is what happened. Though tremendous pressure was placed upon him he made up his mind that he would do what he liked. "I will do it when I see fit, not because I do not believe it is wrong but just when I see fit. I am Minister of Finance; I advise my government." He took the tax off. Just what occurred when he took the tax off? Here it is. The chart definitely showed this. The present Canadian cigarette tax was approximately 22 cents per package of 20 as against 8 cents in the United States. When the minister took that added tax off, here is what occurred. This chart shows a spectacular increase in the consumption of cigarettes following the removal of the 3 cent tax in April, 1952. It covers the six months from May to October inclusive. The minister predicted a revenue loss to the treasury of $10 million. What happened? When the tax was cut by 3 cents, he gained $10 million in the period from May until October. Talk about stabbing in the dark.

Not long ago in this house the Prime Minister said that a cabinet minister cannot be held responsible for this or that any more than can a member of the Boyd gang. He even brought Kingston inmates and murderers into it, and said, "Do not compare us with them". But he wants to take the credit, from Life magazine, from the thing which provides that profit. He wants to take all the credit from the premiers of the provinces for their work for the five-man cabinet. So let him take credit for this one, for one of his associates in that cabinet whose predictions were out $10 million one way, on reverse planning; and then when he took this tax off and said he was going to lose $26 million, he was out again. But not only is he out; the people are out. I do not mind what he is out, but I certainly object to what the people of Canada are out. It is the people I am thinking of. Those are the people I am sent here to represent. Some of these men do not realize that they are sent here to represent the people, but I do. I represent a large group of tobacco growers. I have seen these women walk out of those tobacco fields in their bare feet after working from sun-up until six o'clock. One woman said to me, "A horse wouldn't do it" and she broke down and cried. That effort—these are realistic figures—is worth $215 million to Mr. Abbott's coffers. Just let us get down to earth. There will be an election. There is no doubt about that.

An hon. Member: When will it be?

Mr. Ferguson: I hope it will be in the fall of 1953. I hope the people of Canada read Punch and realize that their puns and their jokes are well thought out. But when Life tried to step into the same field, it certainly made a mess of wit and humour, and sincerity. Either that or there is more behind the article and the tintype picture than I can see. But I believe it was a sincere effort to try to misguide the people of Canada into thinking that these smart geniuses had been responsible for all the oil development and the great iron ore development across our country. In the fall of 1953 I am sure that the people of Canada will show that they do not believe the article in Life, that they realize the way in which they have been burdened with taxes, and will see to it that the newly decorated opposition caucus room will be occupied by a few gentlemen only who are now sitting on the government benches.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was amazed at the facility with which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi moved from English into French and back into English again. I would certainly be pleased to be able to speak in the manner in which he spoke in his first address in the House of Commons.

I was indeed proud of the hon. member for Waterloo North, who is a worthy successor to a man who was one of the most popular members of the House of Commons and who is now acquitting himself in a most distinguished manner in another sphere of public service in this country. I was particularly impressed with the remarks by the hon. member for Waterloo North with regard to pensions for the blind. I agree with the opinion he expressed in his speech in this house, and believe that the means test which is imposed on the $40 per month pensions for the blind should be abolished.

Blind people bear a heavy burden. They assume that burden and bear it admirably. They are less able to supplement their incomes than are those pensioners who are senior citizens over the age of 70, and who are not subject to the means test. Those blind people have acquired the initiative and the courage to develop their talents and skill, thus providing themselves with congenial occupations. It seems to me that an act which stipulates that a single person may not earn more than $840 a year and a married person not more than $1,320 a year discourages initiative and employment. I might say that I am in accord with the sentiment expressed in this regard by the hon. member for Waterloo North.

Most Canadians are pleased that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) have gone to London to attend the conference of commonwealth ministers. We wish them well. We hope they will devise a scheme for the conversion of pounds sterling into Canadian dollars in order that our trade relations with the United Kingdom may be restored. In this country we have the products that are required in Great Britain, and I am sure we all hope they will return to this house later this week with a satisfactory arrangement that will bring prosperity and a flow of trade from Canada to the United Kingdom.

News that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will lead a good-will trade tour to South and Central American countries has been met with great enthusiasm by businessmen in this country. I am informed that this trade mission will visit nine countries. The principal purpose of the mission is to aid in the development of trade between Canada and the countries visited, and to strengthen our general relations with those countries.

Canada has benefited from previous trade missions to South America, Mr. Speaker. In 1941 Hon. James MacKinnon headed a delegation to South American countries. Again in 1946 he returned to eight countries in South and Central America. In 1939, before the trade mission went to South American countries, our aggregate trade with those countries was $27 million. After the two visits by the trade mission, in 1951 our aggregate trade had reached $404 million. I know that the mission headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is in good hands, and he will take with him leading businessmen who will strengthen our position in those South American countries.

My fellow citizens in the county of Lincoln will be gratified to hear that the St. Lawrence-great lakes scheme and power development will commence immediately. We need power in our area to keep the great industrial machine moving, and we can only make the most of the great Welland ship canal, with its 27-foot channel, by eliminating all the bottlenecks and providing for a great waterway leading from the Atlantic seaboard to Port Arthur and Fort William. I see a great growth in industry in the completion of this plan.

This fall I had the honour of assisting, with the present Secretary of Defence of the United States, in the opening of the new McKinnon foundry along the banks of the Welland ship canal, and this is only the forerunner of many more industries to be located in that area. It is the establishment of plants such as these that are providing full employment for the people of our district. I should like to refer for a moment to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) on November 25, 1952, as reported at page 89 of Hansard. He is reported to have said:

> People do not mind paying for aeroplanes, guns and other supplies for our troops, but I think the people of Canada are getting sick and tired of this arm chair army for which we are buying supplies.

I assume that the hon. member was not referring to the troops who are now serving in Korea; for we are all aware of the great difficulties, the serious weather conditions and the hardships they are enduring there. I am sure he would not be referring to the three destroyers that have been carrying out their battle duties at sea on a rotation basis in Korean waters, or to the Royal Canadian Air Force which has carried on in a fine manner in taking troops to Korea. The 27th brigade in Germany have established a fine record for themselves there, and I refer only to two or three quotations in newspapers to show what the editorialists feel about our Canadian troops. I refer first to the Globe and Mail and an editorial on October 18, 1952, headed: "R.C.N. destroyer leads raid on Korean coast".

> Censorship has just permitted disclosure of the fact that the Iroquois directed a four-nation amphibious assault in September that killed and wounded 200 enemy troops and knocked a hole in the communist defences along the western shores of Korea.

I refer also to the Sudbury Star of October 15, 1952, headed: "Boosting Canadians".

> No greater praise can be given to Canadian airmen than that expressed by Britain's vice-chief of the air staff, Air Chief Marshal Sir Ralph Cochrane, following the Canadian participation in a nine-day test of that country's air defences.
> "The Canadians are excellent airmen. They have done very well indeed in this exercise", commented Sir Ralph.
> Young Canadian airmen are "making their mark" on international air fronts and when praise comes from Britain's air chiefs, it is praise not to be lightly regarded.

Lastly I would like to refer to the Montreal Daily Star of September 3, 1952, which says:

> In Germany, Canada's 27th infantry brigade, commanded by Brigadier Geoffrey Walsh of St. Catharines, Ontario, has just completed its first full-scale manoeuvres in which the training of the past ten months was put to rigorous test.
> Military observers said the manoeuvres were an unqualified success and showed that the Canadian NATO brigade now formed one of the main defence posts opposite the iron curtain. New, roomier quarters are under construction for the brigade at Soest near the Rhine, but for the present the troops will remain at Hannover, where they are extremely popular.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to three men who were raised in the county which I represent. One: Brigadier Geoffrey Walsh, C.B.E., Canada's commander of the 27th brigade in Germany. Brigadier Walsh was an outstanding recruit at the Royal Military College at Kingston, and on graduation joined Canada's active army, went overseas and served in a theatre of war during the whole of the second world war. After returning from overseas service he continued as a member of Canada's permanent force, and now has assumed command of the 27th brigade in Germany. Two: Captain Herbert S. Rayner, who occupies a high place in the Royal Canadian Navy. Captain Rayner originally graduated from the Royal naval school of gunnery at Whale island. He returned to Canada as a member of the Royal Canadian Navy, and served on fighting ships during world war II. He is now commanding officer of H.M.C.S. Magnificent. Three: Group Captain Leonard J. Birchall is another prominent member of Canada's armed forces, and is now director of planning of the R.C.A.F. at Ottawa. He was known during the war as the saviour of Ceylon, having warned of enemy troops about to attack that point. He was confined as a prisoner of war in Japan. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe we have not an arm chair army, and that these men are not arm chair generals. I salute each of the three.

I should now like to refer for a few moments to the words of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) which were spoken in this house on November 26 last, as reported at page 114 of Hansard. Speaking of defence expenditures he said this:

> There is no possible way of explaining or justifying expenditures on this scale except that they are being made now with a conscious view toward making friends for this government.

I live in an industrial community. It is true that many orders from the Department of Defence Production have come to this area. They have been awarded on a competitive basis; they have been awarded to people who are able to do the job. We have a well-geared industrial capacity, aided by conscientious, experienced workers, ready, able and willing to do the job required of them. That is why they have received contracts in our area.

Contracts for over $50,000 have been awarded to such firms as Metal Craft Company of Grimsby; Canada Hair Cloth; ETF Tools Limited; Genaire Limited; Grout's Limited; Guaranty Silk Dyeing and Finishing; Thompson Products; Conroy Manufacturing Company Limited; Foster Wheeler Limited; English Electric Company Limited and Newman Brothers, Limited. Other smaller transactions to local firms have been to subcontractors such as Hayes Steel Products; Court Radiator Plant Limited; McKinnon Industries Limited; Anthes-Imperial Company. I would ask the hon. member for Eglinton who are the friends or favourites of the government in that list? Will he tell us? I would like to know, because so far as I know these people have been awarded their contracts on grounds of merit and because of their ability to do the job.

Yes, it is a fact that the county of Lincoln, which I represent, has received defence work worth approximately $11 million in the last 18 months, and much of this money remains in that county. But those contracts were awarded in a fair and businesslike manner. I know they have provided employment for the people of that area, and I think that in fairness to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) and the officials of his department it should be made known, and made clearly known, that one hundred cents in value has been received for every dollar spent.

I should like to associate myself with those who have spoken in the debate in favour of the appointment of a joint parliamentary committee to investigate all phases of a national system of health insurance. I do not say I am in favour of an immediate plan to provide for such a system. Many citizens are now protected by various plans such as Blue Cross, and physicians' and surgeons' services but there are others who have not been able to bring themselves within this classification.

I do not favour state medicine. It is my view that patients are entitled to have the doctor of their choice. This may not be the time to carry out such a program. As a matter of fact it is my belief that, in the light of the many heavy and necessary expenditures that must be made, such a scheme could not be embarked upon at this time. This is a problem requiring great study, one that demands the attention of members in all parts of the house. It is with that in mind I state my belief that the appointment of a committee to investigate and study the problem thoroughly would be in the interests of the country. I am sure it would be the desire of all that no one among the sick, injured or infirm should suffer through lack of medical attention or hospital treatment. I feel therefore that we should put forth our best endeavours to see that the problem is studied, and studied carefully, so that a serious and detailed report may be brought before the house.

On motion of Mr. MacInnis the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 9, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CROWN LIABILITY

TORTS AND CIVIL SALVAGE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage so as to place the crown in substantially the same position as a private person as regards liability for (a) torts committed by servants; (b) torts, arising out of breach of duty attaching to the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property; (c) damages caused by a motor vehicle upon a highway, and (d) civil salvage, and to permit certain actions to be taken against the crown in the provincial courts.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

DEPARTMENTAL ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct to the Postmaster General a question of which I have given him notice. Is the special pre-Christmas advertising of the Postmaster General's department going to all of the weekly newspapers across Canada? If not, what policy is followed in this respect?

If the Postmaster General answers this question perhaps he might include in his answer what policy is being followed with regard to year-round advertising of the same department.

An hon. Member: Put it on the order paper.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I regret that I did not receive any notice of the question, but I shall be glad to take it as notice and will give an answer in due course.

Mr. Speaker: The first part of the question is in order at this time; the latter part of the question would not be in order at this time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE—POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asked a question which was as follows:

I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house whether a gentleman of Polish extraction or Polish stock has been engaged for the purpose of starting such a program? If so, what is his name?

He had reference to programs to Poland. The answer is that no one has been engaged to start a Polish program for the international service or to advise on possible Polish progress.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BISHOP FULTON SHEEN—INQUIRY AS TO TELECASTING OF PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to answer a question that was asked by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). The question was:

Has Bishop Fulton Sheen or have his sponsors applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to have their program telecast? If so, has the application been refused? Would the minister care to make a statement with respect to the application?

The answer is: I am advised that the C.B.C. has made no final decision regarding acceptance of the television program of Bishop Sheen sponsored by an advertiser. The C.B.C. has asked for the opinion of its national religious advisory council on the matter. The council has considered the question, but has not yet given a definite opinion. When it does, which is expected very shortly, the C.B.C. will take a decision.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

ISSUE OF CHEQUES PRIOR TO CHRISTMAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) inquired yesterday as to the issue of old age security cheques prior to Christmas.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall give the answer now.

It is planned to issue these cheques a day or two before the end of the month, just as is the custom in all other months of the year. There are a number of reasons why the decision was made to stick with the usual practice to issue old age security cheques at the end of the month, even in December.

(1) To issue them at an earlier date would leave a longer than usual gap between pension payments in December and at the end of January. This would undoubtedly prove confusing to numerous pensioners and would cause considerable correspondence.

(2) Experience has shown that any marked alteration in the date of issue of cheques is followed by a wave of correspondence the next month and by great pressure of telephone calls where our offices are in principal cities, as in Toronto for example. If cheques were issued on the 20th of December, for instance, thousands of pensioners for some reason or other would expect them to be issued on the 20th of January, and so on.

Mr. Knowles: Why not?

Mr. McCusker: (3) The mechanical side of the issue of cheques has also to be considered. In all our offices the issue of old age security cheques is closely tied in with the issue of family allowances cheques. It would be most awkward to have to try to get both family allowances cheques and old age security cheques issued by the 20th or 22nd of the month. Our custom is to prepare all family allowances cheques in the first half of the month and the old age security cheques in the latter part of the month. In an office such as Toronto, where more than 600,000 family allowances cheques are prepared, and where about 250,000 old age security cheques are also issued, it is most important to spread the load evenly throughout the month.

(4) Finally, we have been under considerable pressure from the Post Office Department to keep down the volume of mail going out just before Christmas. The issue of nearly 700,000 old age security cheques just before Christmas would add appreciably to the volume of first-class mail and might well mean the loss, misplacement or delay of pension cheques with resulting hardship to pensioners.

On the whole it is felt that the interests of all, pensioners not the least, would be best served by maintaining the usual date of issue at the end of the month. It is the intention to get the cheques out so that, if at all possible, they will be received just before New Year's day.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask this supplementary question: Has the department taken into consideration the fact that the pensioners have been in the habit of getting these cheques before Christmas?

Mr. McCusker: Pensioners have not been in the habit of getting them from the federal government. When the provinces issued cheques, under the means test regulation, three of the provincial governments sent them out prior to Christmas. The other provinces adhered to the procedure we are following.

Mr. Graydon: Are you keeping government circulars out of the mail at Christmas time?

FISHERIES

LOBSTER CANNING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. What changes, if any, were made or discussed in the lobster canning regulations at the maritime meeting held on Monday, December 8?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor in office, Mr. Mayhew, followed the procedure of having very full discussions with the fishing industry and fishermen in the matter of any proposed change in regulations. In line with that policy a meeting was held in the Department of Fisheries on Monday, December 8, 1952, with delegates representing the lobster processing industry for the purpose of discussing proposed amendments to the regulations under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, governing the inspection of canned fish and shellfish, and the operation of canneries.

A brief was submitted to the department, recommending certain changes regarding the compulsory inspection of fresh and frozen lobster meat. These recommendations are at present being considered by the department.

Proposed amendments to the regulations regarding weight designations for canned lobster and fresh and frozen lobster meat were also discussed. The discussion was most harmonious. Any change in regulations will be announced in the usual way.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT CONCERNING IRREGULARITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister of immigration. Is the minister in a position to report to the house what steps have been taken in connection with the disclosure of fraudulent conduct which was discussed in the house last session, and in respect of which we were informed inquiries were being conducted, and that action would be taken.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes. The charges against five or six people are now being prepared, in consultation with the Department of Justice. I think—although this is my own opinion—that they will likely be laid in the course of the next month, at the outside.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX ON PENSION FUND REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Will the minister take up with his colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), the request of employees of the Canadian National Railways that pension fund refunds, now being received, be taxed not as income in 1952 but on the basis of amended returns for the years in which the payments being refunded were actually made?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question just as I came to the house, and I read it as carefully as I could in the time I had at my disposal. It is a novel kind of question, inasmuch as it is not so much a question seeking information as one which asks me to make representations to two of my colleagues about a certain matter.

All I can say to the hon. member is that, so far as I can recall, I have not received representations from the general chairmen's association on the subject. I may have, but I have no recollection. If I have not, and the general chairmen's association will make representations to me, I shall give them the consideration I think they deserve.

Until that time, however, I think this is the kind of question which should be addressed to my colleagues, either of national revenue or of finance, on its merits—and not on the question of representation, as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Knowles: My reason for asking the Minister of Transport was that I thought he would be ready to support the case of the Canadian National employees in connection with this matter.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

CHARLOTTETOWN—FEDERAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Are the plans and specifications for the oft-promised dominion building at Charlottetown being completed? If not, why?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the way this question is drafted, I believe it deserves a special answer. It asks first: Are the plans and specifications for the oft-promised dominion building at Charlottetown completed? First of all, it is known that the hon. member has promised that building for a long time, and he is having trouble to implement that political promise.

Secondly, the plans are not completed.

Then he asks: If not, why? Well, we are trying to make perfect plans for a perfect building at Charlottetown.

Mr. McLure: It is strange, is it not, that the plans are not completed, when—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

FERRY SERVICE

WOOD ISLAND-CARIBOU—FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Canadian maritime commission reported to the minister with reference to federal aid for improvements to the ferry service between Wood Island and Caribou, the connecting line between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia? If not, why not?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, December 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, as I listened during the past two weeks to hon. members who have participated in this debate I had the feeling that though we represent different political and economic schools of thought and disagree on many subjects there is one thing on which we all agree, that is that we are most fortunate to be living in this favoured land.

We are continually being told of our expanding economy, of our increasing national income and our rising standards of living. To a large extent what is said in that regard is true. Canada is a rich country; there can be no doubt about that. At no time in our history have we been more prosperous than we are today. However, as I see it, there is a fly in the ointment of our prosperity. It may not be a very large fly, but still it is there and it does those things which a fly in the ointment is supposed to do.

Our wealth is not equitably distributed. I have not in mind now a system where everyone gets an even share of the wealth. What I have in mind is the fact that a few of our people have a great deal more than they need, indeed, a great deal more than is good for them. The great mass of our people have enough, as the saying is, to get by on. But a considerable number of our people suffer acutely during a great portion of their lives because of a lack of the very essentials of life.

I do not think that that should be so in a rich country such as this where we have all the means of preventing it. This afternoon I am going to take advantage of the opportunity which this debate offers to draw to the attention of the government and the House of Commons the plight of certain groups among us who are not aware that they are citizens of the richest country on earth. I know that they see the prosperity parade going by but they themselves have no part in it.

The first group I want to mention has been mentioned here many times before. I refer to the recipients of war veterans allowances. In The Legionary for December, a copy of which I presume all hon. members have received, is an article by the editor which ought to be "must" reading for members of the government and indeed for Liberal members generally. It is entitled "The Case for W. V. A. Increases". The writer outlines some of the conditions under which some of those who are in receipt of war veterans allowances exist.

He refers to one Ottawa veteran, a man who enlisted and fought in the first world war, was wounded and gassed, as a result of which he has suffered ill health since 1918. This ill health did not prevent him from working altogether but it did prevent him from holding a job very long. He lost one job after another. His wife is also in poor health. His last job was with the Department of Public Works and he stayed there for quite a long time, for jobs of that kind, nearly ten years.

He and his wife are bringing up a grandson. He applied for and received a war veterans allowance. He is living in what they term a two-room basement suite, but from the conditions described I would call it a cellar, as it is seven feet below the pavement. It was originally used to store coal, which of course was removed before this man and wife and grandchild moved in.

This man is receiving a war veterans allowance of $90 per month and they receive an additional $5 per month as a family allowance for the child. They spend $25 per month on rent, $60 for food, $4 for gas for cooking and $4 for Blue Cross. It will be noted that this man even with his meagre income is making provision for sickness, for doctors' attendance and hospitalization. Then he pays $2.36 for insurance, making a total of $95.36 or 36 cents more than his total income.

The writer in The Legionary points out that this does not leave room for things such as books, a radio, clothing, china, replacement of furniture and the hundred and one things that most of us consider absolute essentials of present-day life.

Perhaps it would not be fair to say that this case is typical, but it is not an isolated case. It indicates quite clearly that the war veterans allowance at the present time is not adequate. The article refers to a survey which the Legion carried out across Canada, and states:

> In case after case, food and rent devour three quarters of their budgets. In a dozen cases, they report they are living in shacks, others in cabins or in cottages. They live in single rooms, in homes that frequently need repair, live with relatives and friends. One totally disabled veteran lives with his wife and three children in three basement rooms.

And so on. Over a period of time the Legion has made representations to the government and to the veterans committee that dealt with this matter. I believe that they are asking for $60 a month for single veterans and $120 a month for married veterans. I think any hon. member of this house who will consider the present cost of living is bound to say that the Legion is most modest in the demands that it makes, that no single man could live decently today on $50 a month, nor could any married man and his wife live decently on $90 a month. I say it is a disgrace to us who live in Canada, a country as richly endowed as ours, that these things should exist.

There is another still smaller group to which I wish to refer. I have in mind those receiving the blind persons' allowance. I am not going to say very much about them. If my memory serves me right, there are only about 12,000 in Canada altogether, but I believe they are entitled to our particular consideration because of their infirmity. They are entitled to more thought and sympathy than we would perhaps give to less handicapped people. I think I can put the case best as I see it by reading from an article that appeared in the Vancouver Province on April 14 of this year. The author is Mr. D. A. McGregor. I do not know whether he is a columnist or one of the editors of the paper. He has this to say:

> If an ordinary individual has an income of $1,000 or less, he is not required to pay any income tax. The assumption is that he isn't financially able to do so. But if a blind person on a pension dares, by his own efforts, to push his income beyond $840 the same compassionate law which awards him the pension will take everything beyond $840 away.

That is the way it is, and put that way it is most striking. Then he goes on to deal with the married blind person as follows:

> The Income Tax Act assumes a married couple need $2,000 a year. But if the married blind pensioner, or his wife, adds more than $360 to the pension, and brings the family income over $1,320 he too will have the excess deducted. The money is not taxed away, but it is lifted from the pensioner's purse as effectively as if it were.

So far as those on the blind persons allowance and those on war veterans allowance are concerned, I say that we should remove at once the limit on their outside income. Why in the world should a person on war veterans allowance be restricted to earning not more than $10 a month? You know, that is not only bad for that person but it is bad for everyone. Work is good for a man. It adds to his self-respect and self-esteem. It makes him a better citizen, and I cannot see who would be hurt if we allowed a person receiving the war veterans allowance to earn $50 a month. No one would be hurt and everyone would be better off including, I am sure, the government because the standard of citizenship in this country would be improved.

There is one class comprising quite a number of people, although not very large, with which I wish to deal. I refer to the superannuated federal civil servants who are living on a very small income which they put aside with the assistance of the government at a time when the amount of the pension they now receive meant a great deal more than it does today. I do not believe we should say that we have no responsibility for these people. After all, they are citizens of Canada who gave service to Canada during the years when they were able to give service, and if what they put aside during those years is not sufficient today to provide anything like a decent standard of living that is not their fault. If there is fault then it is our collective fault, and collectively we should remedy it by making further provision for them.

The number of people involved and the amounts they receive have been put on the record so often by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that perhaps I should not take the time of the house today to repeat this information. However, I will put some figures on the record and those I wish to quote are as of March, 1952. There are 1,106 receiving less than $20 per month. From $20 to $29.99—let us say $30 because it is simpler—there are 1,365. From $30 to $40 there are 1,417. From $50 to $60 there are 1,384 and from $60 to $70 there are 1,017. There are approximately another 4,000 who receive from $80 to $100. All these people, and particularly where there are dependents involved, are not receiving sufficient income—and I say again through no fault of their own—to be able to provide themselves and their dependents with a decent standard of living. During this session of parliament, while our economy is booming, is the time to take action in all the cases I have mentioned, and I hope that those responsible will remedy these defects and enable these people to partake of the prosperity which is a part of the life of most citizens of Canada.

I now wish to say a few words with respect to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) which urges that at this session of parliament a measure be introduced to provide for national health insurance. In listening to the speeches and the references to this matter I have found that there is very little opposition in the house to such a program. There has been a little double talk but as far as I have been able to see there is no general opposition. I believe there was one speaker who opposed national health insurance. Today it is something that is accepted in every civilized country as an essential part of their social security legislation. Some members said they were going to vote against the C.C.F. amendment because it proposed state medicine.

Really, I don't know what state medicine is. No one has told me during this debate, but, if they have read that into the amendment, they have read a great deal more into the amendment than is in it. After all, what does the amendment do? It does not outline any system of health insurance. It asks this government at this session to introduce a measure for national health insurance. What that measure would be would depend on the kind of legislation this government would introduce.

May I just say in passing that I have been in this house for some considerable time and, looking at these matters objectively, I am sure that this group would give its support to any measure—no matter what we considered or thought of it ourselves, and whether we thought it was what we would do or not, but we would support any measure that we considered to be in the interests of the people of Canada. We would consider it on its merits and we would not boggle at whether there was this in it or that in it if we felt it would serve the people of this country. Those who say that they are opposed to the amendment because the C.C.F. wants state medicine are just talking through their hats.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair)—and I may say here that there is no man in this house for whom I have greater respect—got himself all balled up over this question, largely, in my opinion, because the hon. gentleman is himself in favour of national health insurance, though he is not quite sure that the party to which he belongs is in favour of national health insurance. In the course of his speech, the written and the oral one, he has made two or three proposals and concludes by saying that he is opposed to the C.C.F. amendment and is going to vote against it because it is state medicine. I just suggest to him that whether it is his party or the party now in power that brings in a national health insurance measure—as I said before, whether it completely agrees with what we have in mind or not—if it will serve the people of Canada we will support it.

By the way, the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) said that he too was opposed to state medicine and I noticed that when he said that he looked towards this group. I think that what differentiates so-called state medicine from ordinary health insurance, or what my friends would consider satisfactory health insurance, is the question of whether doctors are on salary or on a fee-for-service basis.

Mr. McCann: Regimentation.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not hear what the Minister of National Revenue said.

Mr. McCann: I said it means regimentation.

Mr. MacInnis: It means regimentation? I really do not know what that means in regard to medicine at the present time. If my hon. friend has ever had to go to the outpatient clinic at a hospital in one of our big cities and wait around sitting on a bench until someone came to feel his pulse and look at his tongue—

Mr. Graydon: He sits inside.

Mr. MacInnis: —he will understand what regimentation is.

I have been reading something on this and I have noticed that where doctors themselves set up an institution for medical service, let us say such as the Mayo clinic at Rochester, Minnesota, the doctors in the clinic are on a salary basis while the patients are on a fee-for-service basis. I have in my hand a copy of the Atlantic magazine for December and there is a very informative article in it by Dr. James Howard Means, who for twenty-seven years was professor of clinical medicine at Harvard university and chief of medical services at the Massachusetts General Hospital. I will quote just what Dr. Means says in this regard:

> Altogether it is my belief that the best method of paying the doctor is by salary—best for him and best for his patients, provided at least that some safeguards against overloading are included.

I do not need to go farther in that regard except to mention once again what I have said before. We had, as far as I know, no particular method of health insurance in mind because we did not give it that kind of study.

Before I leave the point, the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made an excellent speech on this subject. Really it could not have been better except that although he wants health insurance he does not want it now. We need it "terrible bad"—but not so badly that we should have it now. We should first have a committee. Now, I want to tell the member for Spadina that this group has asked for a committee. As a matter of fact we have not only asked for a committee but we have been promised a committee. We were promised a committee on health insurance by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the first session of 1952. It is because the Minister of National Health and Welfare had another thought and decided not to go ahead with the committee that we have now said that, if they will not give us a committee, the people of Canada are entitled to national health insurance. So there is not much point in saying now that what we need is a committee.

I am not opposed to committees; they do good work. I have been on a number of them and I know they do good work. Suppose a committee is set up now—a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, how would we proceed? We would ask the Department of National Health and Welfare to get us information from various countries on what has been done in that regard in those countries. Everything that would come before us would come from the Department of National Health and Welfare. The members of the committee would express opinions, favourable or against, but everything that we would discuss would come from the Department of National Health and Welfare—and everything that it could bring to a committee it could use now in preparing a measure to bring before this house.

Mr. Knowles: They have it now.

Mr. MacInnis: I would not be surprised. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says they have it now. In certain parts of this country we have gone some little distance in providing health services. In the provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia there is fairly complete hospital service—that is about half of the services required in a national health insurance plan.

I am going to read to the house two short items in regard to the British Columbia hospital insurance service. When I got my bill for the year 1953 the other day I found enclosed with it a personal message from the provincial minister of health and welfare, Hon. E. C. F. Martin.

Mr. Knowles: Any relation to Paul Martin?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know, but I do not think it matters. I shall read only a short paragraph from this note. He says:

> Your enclosed billing is more than a bill which should be paid.

I believe this statement was thought necessary by the fact that in British Columbia hospital insurance is compulsory. I understand the present government is opposed to compulsory hospital insurance.

Mr. Laing: Both ways.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps there is some confusion as to what they favour, and also as to what they are opposed to. I understand it works out something like this. So far as the member for Vancouver South and I are concerned, we may pay our own hospital insurance premiums—as I assume the member for Vancouver South does and I do—but it is not compulsory that we should. We will be sent a bill, but we will not be compelled to pay it.

Mr. Laing: They pray you to pay it.

Mr. MacInnis: However, if we happen to be employees in an industry in which there is a payroll deduction plan, then they are going to see that the deductions are made every month or so. However, I was not going to refer to that.

Mr. Low: The compulsory part was inherited from the old Liberal regime.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) says that it was compulsory under the former government. If the present government is not going to make it compulsory, I suggest to them they make it non-compulsory for the employee as well as for the other fellow.

This note says:

> Your enclosed billing is more than a bill which should be paid; it is your peace of mind in the event that you may have to go to hospital; it is your protection against high hospital bills which could ruin your finances;

I know some finances which it would not take much to ruin.

> It ensures that the best hospital care is available; it provides the best answer to the problem of acute hospital care and accommodation.
> In short, when you pay this bill, you are investing, at less than 11 cents a day, in your most precious possessions—good health and freedom from hospital bills.

I do not think that any government should be ashamed to make a thing like that compulsory. I believe a government that does not make it compulsory is delinquent in its duties.

There is another item I want to read, merely to show the general opinion in my province in regard to health insurance of which, as I said before, this is a very essential part. I have here an editorial from the Nelson News, and I regret that I did not put a date on it. I believe it appeared about two days before the provincial election, which would be about June 10, 1952. The editorial reads:

> Hospital insurance service is giving hospitalization to those who need it probably as cheaply as it is possible to do so. This is a fact easily recognized by those who have had to foot hospital, X-ray, therapeutic or laboratory services and drug bills in the past. Moreover, because it is supported chiefly by direct payments we know what it is costing, avoiding the necessity of additional hidden taxes.
> The service and coverage has its faults. But the introduction of any scheme of its scope is likely to initial hesitancies and errors. There is no need to excuse them, but sensible people who have something good can always correct faults to make it better. In the meantime,—

This is what I want the members of this house to notice.

> —during the 3½-year history of the hospital insurance scheme over 740,000 patients have found their hospital bills relatively trifling because of this social legislation.

I was unfortunate enough to be one of those 740,000 patients, but fortunate that I had the benefit of the hospital insurance service. I would hate to tell this house what it cost on my behalf. When we propose, as we have proposed, that a measure be brought in to this house to make this complete, we appreciate it is a matter of dominion-provincial co-operation. When the federal government initiated other social services, we did not always wait until all the provinces were ready. In the case of old age pensions, for instance, some of the provinces were not ready for many years. I believe the only province that was ready when the legislation became law was the province of British Columbia. That province had legislation passed and was ready to take advantage of the federal enactment as soon as it became law. From 1927 until the last province came in about 1936, if my memory serves me correctly, there was a nine-year period before some of the other provinces were ready. But that is no reason why those provinces that are willing to proceed with national health insurance should not be given an opportunity. It is extremely democratic. It is legislation by consent, and no one need be ashamed of proposing it; certainly, we are not.

There was one other matter to which I wished to refer, and I hope I may have time to say a few words about it because I believe that, as the days go by, it will become more and more important. I was interested in the statement made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) when he spoke in this debate on December 1. He was asked the following question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as it appears at page 236 of Hansard for that date:

> Mr. Knowles: Would you do away with welfare legislation? . . .
> Mr. Hansell: I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I may. It has always been found that you cannot readily retract or undo something the country has already done;—

I should like to know exactly what the implication is in that.

An hon. Member: That is the $64 question.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps for you, but not for me. I continue the quotation:

> —but I would say that the greatest welfare that can come to the people is to leave with them their absolute freedom to act according to their own conscience and will, and see that their incomes are such that they can make available to themselves the highest standard of living the resources of the country can give without interfering with that freedom. That to me is the greatest possible welfare state.

If that means anything at all, it means that what our Social Credit friends have in mind is that enough money will be made available to every person to do whatever he wants to do. I am not opposed to that if such a thing could be done. But after all, that must mean one of two things. It must mean that there is an unlimited pool, trunk or bank of money into which everyone can dip ad lib and take whatever he wants, or it has to be given out by somebody. If it is the first—well, all they have to do is to dip. But if the second—and I should like to hear some explanation of this—someone has to decide how much each one will get.

Now, while I am on the subject, there is another thing that I have asked on various occasions when I have been on the platform with Social Crediters. A fundamental part of the Social Credit system is the just price and the national dividend. What I want to know first of all is, who is going to set the just price? Can the just price be set without government interference? Somebody has to set it. Who is to say what the size of the dividend will be? These questions are important, because in my opinion, the people are being deluded with certain economic proposals, mixing them up with reference to the "eternal verities", whatever that may be. But some day, if the people are not wise, they will be confronted with a situation they did not foresee, and instead of having a bank of money into which they can dip ad lib, they will have chaos.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I am sorry, but I am following an hon. member for whom I have the greatest respect, and I think everybody in the house has. He is one of the oldest members—I mean in years of service—here, and I can assure you that in my province he is highly thought of by all parties. In my own riding he is welcome at any time, and I should be glad to introduce him. That is more than I can say of some. In my riding we respect anybody who is sincere. For sectional hypocrites I have no respect, and I have no desire to have them in my riding.

First of all, I want to congratulate the government, because so far congratulations have been going the other way. I want to congratulate the government on their appointing two cabinet ministers from the province of British Columbia. I do not think anybody disputes the fact that we are the fastest growing province in Canada. I do not say we are the best province—I will attend to that later—but we are the fastest growing of any province of Canada. We thought long ago that we were entitled to two ministers. Fortunately, at this time, two men were available of such high calibre. I can assure the house that each and every Liberal member in the province of British Columbia is proud of these two cabinet ministers, and will work in perfect harmony with them.

I intend to get right down to health insurance, seeing that my friend has got into it. I think we had better say what health insurance is. Every member on this side of the house is in favour of health insurance. I can well remember that some years ago, believe it or not, I tried to have adopted some of the legislation that they had in Saskatchewan or perhaps Alberta. I refer to the municipal health insurance plan. I tried to get the municipal act amended in British Columbia so that we could put it in. I ran into my first experience with lobbying at the Empress hotel. Ninety-eight per cent of the doctors of Vancouver were over there to see that I did not get the amendment to the legislation. They did that by lobbying. I have come to the conclusion that probably they were right and I was wrong at that time.

We were criticized outside the house when we brought in family allowances, and particularly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) who did his utmost to defeat it. I presume he had the entire support of his party. They said that we brought it in at a certain date for political purposes. If you will remember, Mr. Speaker, although the legislation was brought down, it did not go into effect at once. If my memory serves me correctly it did not come into effect until July. They said that it was an election dodge. The reason it was not brought in immediately it was passed was that they had to perfect an organization for administration, and so on. The result was that when family allowances were first paid they were paid without a hitch.

You will remember another piece of legislation we brought in, namely, unemployment insurance. We did not put that into effect the date we passed it in this house, or that month, because we had to perfect an organization to carry unemployment insurance into effect without any hitches. I ask you, I ask any labour man, if it has not been administered in that way? The reason I mentioned that is this: I am sorry to say that in British Columbia we had a government that had some Liberals in it. I will not say they were Liberals, but they thought they were. They brought in a hospital insurance scheme. Ninety-five per cent of the people of the province of British Columbia were and are in favour of hospital insurance; but at least 95 per cent also were not in favour of maternity wards being placed in corridors.

I know very little about maternity wards, but I know something about hospitals. I have not had any experience with maternity wards except to watch expectant fathers gaze through glass partitions, but I know a corridor of a hospital is not the proper place for one. What I am getting at is this. I believe that every hon. member on this side of the house would be just as much in favour of hospital insurance as are our good friends of the C.C.F. party. But we believe it must be brought in in an orderly manner. We brought hospital insurance into effect in the province of British Columbia in a half-baked way through overzeal and high pressure. A clerk from the Public Works Department was put in charge of it to begin with, instead of bringing in somebody qualified, perhaps from one of the big corporations, insurance or otherwise. The result was that our hospital insurance in British Columbia was a farce. The intent was there; the intent was good. Perhaps the premier was not careful enough. I think we had three different assessments in one year. We did not have the system organized. We do know that at Christmas time—I think it was about a year ago—people could not get into the hospital; they could not even get into the corridors of the hospitals in the province of British Columbia.

A new outfit came along. I was going to say a new government came along, but, Mr. Speaker, even I cannot use flattering language when it is not deserved. This temporary organization moved into Victoria and they said: "We are going to make it non-compulsory." We happened to be at Ottawa when they came out with this story. I understand that a few members elected to the federal house to represent their federal ridings were not here in Ottawa, but were out there campaigning. They were going around on the hustings saying that they were going to make it non-compulsory. I ask any hon. member in this house—and I believe that 261 of them have common sense—how you can make a hospital insurance scheme non-compulsory. Is it reasonable to expect Jones to pay when Smith does not? I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) thinks he will collect his income tax on a voluntary basis? Will the city of Ottawa collect its municipal taxes on a voluntary basis? No. It was a good hoax to get the people to vote; that is all it was. But it did not work. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) read the little document that you get with your bill now. They have found it would not work and that it was not common sense. Why should I waste so much of my time talking about a non-existent government in British Columbia? But I do want to make it clear that at least I am, as I think every member on this side of the house is, in favour of health insurance, but we do not believe that we are in a position to put it into effect. In my opinion, what we should do is this—and I shall just quote you one possible scheme about to be put into effect in my own riding.

A minimum amount of $800,000 is being secured to construct a new fifty-bed hospital. As I understand it, the federal government gives $1,000 a bed now. I think we should double that, and double it immediately, for the construction of new hospitals and hospital accommodation. I believe we should give scholarships to provide more doctors and more dentists. If we had all the hospital beds we needed today, we have not the doctors and dentists in Canada that would be required to provide a health insurance scheme. I believe this government should double whatever we are giving at the present time to construct new hospitals and to provide scholarships or some other means so that we may have more doctors and dentists and nurses.

Then, I think the government has fallen down, and that we as members of parliament have fallen down in another respect. This year out west we had a serious polio epidemic. There was one in eastern Canada too, but I understand it was worse in the west. To my mind it is a disgrace to know that a country like this found it necessary to improvise in the matter of iron lungs. I am not sure how they operate, but I do know that we had to improvise, and fly them in. I say that at this session, as one of the first steps in health insurance, parliament should provide an iron lung to each hospital in Canada that has the facilities to use it.

There is one point that has not been stressed by my hon. friends in the C.C.F., and that is that there should be no hospital in the country in which the poorest patient should not be permitted to have exactly the same medical treatment as the richest patient. It is a disgrace in a country like Canada that at the time of a polio epidemic we have had to improvise in the matter of iron lungs, and fly them in from other parts of Canada or from the United States. At this session we should arrange to see that each hospital in this country that has the facilities should have as many as it needs. I believe we should double our grants to hospitals for new beds.

I find it difficult to speak about war veterans, because this subject has been so well covered by several other speakers in the debate, both on this side and the other side of the house. Since coming to Ottawa I have had the privilege of serving on the war veterans committee. I hope one will be set up this year and that I may serve on it again. I would hope, too, that it might be made a permanent committee.

I wish to support wholeheartedly what has been said by the Canadian Legion in connection with war veterans. I do not think that a country as wealthy as this one has done what it should have done for our burnt-out veterans. Newspaper articles have been quoted, and perhaps I might be permitted to quote briefly from the Vancouver Sun. I do so because I fear that too many of my colleagues in the House of Commons, possibly because they are not veterans, lose sight of the fact that the war veterans allowance was first brought in to care for those who, through their service in France in the first great war, were pre-aged. The estimate given at that time was ten years. I am speaking about the veterans of the first war, because I do not know about the second one. I do have knowledge of the first great war because I was there. Anyone who served then in France was pre-aged by at least ten years, and this regulation was brought in to cover that pre-ageing. The editorial to which I am referring, and which is headed "They Deserve Better", states:

> But as the Legion puts it, the whole concept of WVA was based on recognition that the nation owes a special debt to men who sacrificed health and years of their lives to their country in overseas service. It's not comparable with similar awards to civilians.

I was one who for many years, even before I came to the House of Commons, worked for old age pensions. I am sure any recipient of that pension will agree that a veteran of similar age is entitled to different recognition. If, in other words, the old age pensioner is to receive his payment at the age of 65, then surely the veteran should receive his at the age of 60. To me that seems reasonable, and I suggest the government should take action at this present session in that matter. I would prefer to see a committee set up; but even if it is not, it would be a simple matter to amend the legislation. And if it were done I do not believe the final cost would be much more than it now costs to have the gestapo floating around the country and prying into the lives of men and women who gave so much for us, and whose ability is impaired. But, even if it is not, they are not allowed to earn any substantial sum of money, owing to the fool regulations now in existence. It would not cost as much to treat those people properly as it does to have the gestapo running around.

I wish now to speak about a matter which concerns particularly my own riding, but I believe also concerns the whole of British Columbia as well. I refer to river bank erosion. One of my colleagues from Quebec has on the order paper a resolution dealing with this subject, and referring particularly to the St. Lawrence river. Nothing is of greater concern to the Fraser valley or to the economy of British Columbia than river bank erosion. It is serious enough when any municipality in the Fraser valley is flooded out, but it is a much more serious thing if, as happened in 1948, the third largest city in Canada is cut off from the rest of the country for a month or two. Particularly is it important to the rest of Canada that that third city, our Pacific port, the outlet to Korea and other eastern ports, should not be cut off during a time of war.

I wish to point out to the government how serious this matter it. It is not enough to say that this is a matter of local concern. Anyone who knows anything about river bank erosion or flooding knows that local districts cannot afford to pay to avoid it, and that they should not be asked to when they are protecting the economy of the whole country. One of the reasons our floods are more frequent now is that our country has been logged over.

There is a paragraph in the speech from the throne which, through the co-operation of federal, provincial and municipal authorities, would afford some relief. I believe this problem could be handled under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. There is no reason why it should not be effective in every province, and it should not be restricted only to two or three provinces. That act should cover every province in Canada, and I would hope that the government might take this fact into consideration at the present session.

I wish to speak briefly about another subject. I do not want to deal with it at length, because I have been a lone wolf for too long in the matter. I refer to the subject of margarine. Today I am not going to worry about margarine as margarine. I will admit it is here to stay, except in two provinces.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hear one of my colleagues say "Hear, hear". I am wondering if he realizes how much the dairy industry means to the Dominion of Canada. I have been surprised in the last few years that this industry has not had more co-operation from some members coming from Quebec and Ontario. In this connection let me read one paragraph which I believe is of importance. The fact is that there is no industry in Canada so vitally important to the welfare of each and every one of us as is that of agriculture; and dairying is probably the most difficult part of agriculture. Do not forget that it is a job which has to be carried out 365 days each year.

This paragraph reads:

> Please note that with today's price of butterfat at around 75 cents the dairy farmer is being asked to compete with another product costing between 10 and 15 cents per pound. Please note that our dairy farmer, in competing for labour in one of the world's costliest labour markets, would be asked to face up to competition from a product harvested, in many cases, in areas where the labour standard is the lowest in the world, as low as 25 cents a day even in these times.

Assuming that there could be improved efficiency—and there could be improvements in the dairy industry—it is true to say that there is no margin of economy that would put butterfat on a competitive basis with coconut oil. That just does not make sense. It just does not make sense to me to know that we are allowing the importation of these cheap oils so that, as is stated in this article, they may compete with us in this country. The article points out that these oils are produced at labour rates as low as 25 cents a day. A couple of years ago some hon. members representing fishing ridings opposed me on this margarine matter. I do not intend to read what the Fisheries Association of British Columbia has to say, but for the benefit of the hon. member from a small riding in New Brunswick who questioned the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) the other day may I say that we produce as much fish in British Columbia as any other five provinces in Canada and that the Minister of Fisheries himself represents some 5,000 fishermen.

The Fisheries Association of British Columbia is composed of all the large operators in the province. My friend and great admirer of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), H. R. MacMillan, is a member of that association. They are not finding it so easy to sell their herring oil and all this is coming back at them a little bit. Here is what they say:

> The herring oil market is neither as stable nor as clearcut as the market for other fish products. In Canada, our biggest buyers are Procter and Gamble and Canada Packers; in the United States, the same type of outlet which manufactures soap, shortening and margarine.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps you have never been in a margarine factory, but if you should visit one you will see a tank over on one side into which they dump this fish oil, coconut oil and all this junk. You see a pipe coming across and out comes a pound of an article which the Social Credit in British Columbia insist on having coloured and which, like the rest of their policies, deceives the public and makes them believe it is butter.

I am not contending that margarine is going to be abolished as I know perfectly well it is here to stay. But surely the dairy farmers of Canada are of sufficient value to Canada to be entitled to a certain amount of protection. I should like to quote just one paragraph from a speech made by a great sponsor of margarine. He said:

> If you women of Canada would have just one extra meal of fish per week for your family, the export problem of the industry would be largely solved. You will be helping build a stronger and healthier fishing industry, and more important to you, you will be building stronger and healthier children. There is an old saying that fish makes brains. I don't know whether it has ever been really proved true, but I do know that the converse is true—smart people eat fish, because smart people know it to be a delicious, easily digestible food, rich in food values.

The hon. gentleman who said that now sits in the cabinet and is in a better position to assist the dairy farmers than he was as a private member. That speech was made by the Minister of Fisheries on November 25, 1952. I hope he will do his best on behalf of the dairy farmers.

I am not going to take up my full time, but there is just one other matter I should like to deal with. I believe the radio licence fee should be abolished and the cost of operating this service taken out of the general revenues. I know it is quite easy to argue that when you abolish a tax you may have trouble finding the money with which to get along, but if we are honest about it we will admit that the radio licence fee is something like the Social Credit hospital insurance tax in that half the people are paying it and half are not. You cannot be half free and half slave, unless you want to live under that form of government, which I certainly do not. I strongly urge the government to abolish that fee.

On another thing I want to say I may not be in complete agreement with my party, and I refer to the action that should be taken in connection with television. A week ago I was in Toronto to see the Grey Cup game. I never before had been in a city where they had television. When I first saw these things on the houses I did not know what they were but I was told that these towers were for television. I see no reason why Toronto and Montreal can have television service at the expense of Vancouver, Winnipeg and the rest of Canada. If the C.B.C. cannot provide this service right away then private enterprise should be permitted to do it. I may not be in accord with the C.C.F. on that, but we have given the C.B.C. money enough to play around with it.

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Cruickshank: Apparently they cannot put it into effect on the Pacific coast. If private enterprise is not permitted to provide this service, the people will have to be satisfied either with the soap opera television broadcasts of the C.B.C. or with programs that come from the United States stations.

I urge the government to abolish the radio licence fee and to allow private industry to have a hand in providing television. Above all, I ask the government at this session of parliament to remember one thing. It is a good thing to have surpluses because anyone in private business would rather have a surplus than a deficit. But if there is a surplus I cannot think of a better way to use it than to pay off our debts, and I do not know of a better way of doing that than to pay the debt we owe to the veterans who have served us so well.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, with special reference to the remarks by the seconder about the blind. I should like to add my voice to his in urging the government to give greater consideration to these seriously handicapped persons. The blind associations for years pressed to have blind pensions separated from old age pensions and brought under a separate act. They asked also that the description be changed from blind pension to blindness allowance. This was provided for when the Old Age Security Act was passed along with the separate Blind Persons Act.

I am informed that a few blind persons have discovered that they are actually receiving less under the new legislation than they received before. I am sure that when these acts were passed no one envisaged such a situation arising. I understand this is brought about by the provincial grants for which they are eligible. I would hope that the department concerned will take up this matter and if necessary introduce an amendment to the Blind Persons Act so that no blind person will be in the position where he is actually receiving less than he was before the act was passed.

I should like also to urge the government to remove the means test from the blindness allowance. There are far more reasons for doing this than there were for removing the means test in the case of the old age pensions. It is an anachronism that the means test for the blind should be retained when it has been removed at age 70 as far as old age pensioners are concerned. All the arguments we have heard for years for the removal of the means test in the case of the old age pensions apply equally to the blindness allowance. It kills initiative. It discourages many blind people from going out and earning a little money, and particularly the cost of administration must represent a considerable proportion of any amount which is saved to the taxpayers by the maintenance of the means test.

The total cost of removing the means test would be quite small and I would hope that in the forthcoming budget it will be provided that this means test be done away with. As a matter of fact, some time ago I saw a newspaper account which reported that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had held out some hope that this action might be taken. I certainly hope that that report is correct.

There is one other matter in connection with the blind. I remember that the late Arthur Smith, my colleague from Calgary West, urged at practically every session he was here that a greater pension should be paid to the blind and particularly that the age limit in connection with the blindness allowance should be lowered. He could never see, and neither could I, why a blind person should only receive the allowance on reaching the age of 21. I would think that the age could very well be lowered to at least 16 when family allowance payments cease. Certainly the parents of a blind child have considerably greater expenses in bringing up that child than do the parents of a sighted child, and it seems to me that, the parents having carried the full burden up to the age of 16, at which time the family allowance ceases, blind persons should then be given the blindness allowance.

I should now like to touch briefly on certain matters which are of great concern to our most important industry in Canada, agriculture. In my own province of Alberta, in spite of the fact that world attention has been focused on that area because of the great discoveries of gas and oil in the past few years, it remains a fact that the great majority of the people are dependent for their living, either directly or indirectly, upon agriculture.

This year in western Canada we had in aggravated form the difficulty experienced for some time past in getting the grain delivered to the elevators and moved to an export position. Shortly before I came down here I talked to a number of farmers who had large amounts of grain on their farms in granaries and in open piles in fields because they were unable to deliver it to the elevators. One man, whose story I shall give as an example, grew a very large crop of oats this year. He happens to be in a coarse grain growing area, and his yield was better than 100 bushels to the acre. He was allowed to deliver 6 bushels to the acre, I believe, which brought him a cash advance of about $3 per acre. His expenses for harvesting the oats had been $1 an acre for swathing and $4 an acre for combining, or a total of $5 an acre. All the money he got back, and as far as he could see all he was going to get back for some time, was $3 an acre which left him in the position where he was not able to pay his harvesting expenses, his store bills and so on.

The situation is worse this year than ever before because the largest crop on record was harvested this fall. We had good weather for harvesting and the crop was all brought in. None of it had to be left in the fields over the winter. In addition, the situation is bad because at the time that the new crop began to be ready the elevators and the entire handling system were clogged by the poor quality crop harvested last year. The government is responsible for this condition to a very large extent because the policy they followed was one which made it impossible to dispose of the large amount of low quality wheat delivered to the elevators last year and this spring. That wheat was No. 6 and feed wheat which is unfit for milling purposes and must be used for livestock feed and things of that kind.

Feed wheat was held at a price of $1.50 a bushel and at that price no one feeding livestock would buy it who had experimented with it and knew the situation, when at the same time No. 1 feed barley was available at $1.20 to $1.30 a bushel. There is a great deal more feed value in a bushel of No. 1 feed barley than in a bushel of feed wheat. The result was that a large amount of such wheat remained on hand clogging the handling facilities.

The general situation is that the handling method we have now is out of date. It was built up during a period when harvesting was carried on by binders and wheat was delivered from the farms to elevators by teams and wagons during the course of the winter. Therefore the rate of delivery of the grain was spread out and was gradual. Harvesting methods have changed. The crop in a given year is now taken off very rapidly. It is hauled immediately to elevators by means of trucks, and the present handling facilities are not capable of dealing with it.

Unfortunately, however, nothing has been done to improve the situation. The difficulty in delivering grain is going to continue until some remedy is found, and a remedy must be found. It is not a situation that we can let go on indefinitely. The government has done absolutely nothing with respect to the matter and is to be censured for its inaction. Some farm organizations have suggested that a system of storage of grain on the farms combined with cash advances for grain so stored should be instituted by the wheat board. This may be the solution. I do not know because I am not sufficiently expert on these things to be able to tell.

However, I am quite certain that there are solutions to the problem, but the government is not going to find them by following its present course. It has shirked its responsibility completely. It has done nothing, and as a result western farmers have been left holding the bag so far as getting a return for their grain is concerned.

I should like to turn now to the livestock industry. Everyone engaged in that industry knows that things have not been good for most of the past year. The foot-and-mouth outbreak cut off our one remaining market for livestock outside Canada. Fortunately it was announced a short time ago that the United States ban on imports to that country will be lifted on March 1 next, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when this announcement was made a great load of anxiety was also lifted from cattle producers right across the country. They are assured of a market in the coming year for the surplus of cattle that has been built up on farms and ranches throughout the past year, and in particular it removes the fear of a yet more serious drop in prices which a large number of these producers anticipated if the ban was not lifted by early spring or by summer at the latest.

An hon. Member: Are you going to compliment the government on that?

Mr. Harkness: No, I do not compliment the government on it. As a matter of fact I compliment the United States government. Last year when the standing committee on agriculture was investigating the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease the dominion government was busy trying to shush up the matter and was also trying to say that everything that we said with respect to the question was going to prevent the United States government from ever lifting the ban. The fact that the United States government have done what they said they would do, lift the ban as soon as it was shown that the disease had been stamped out, disproves completely the suggestions which were put before the committee and the means which were used to stifle any further inquiry in the committee, and shows them to be complete nonsense. The announcement evidently came as a surprise to the government. Otherwise the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would have announced it in the house himself. According to newspaper reports it caught him completely by surprise.

An hon. Member: That was not the way I heard it.

Mr. Brooks: He had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Harkness: In any event I should like to point out that the extent to which cattle prices have declined in the past year is not realized by most people across Canada except those engaged in that particular industry. I should like to put on the record a comparison of prices at the beginning of December this year and one year ago as found in the Winnipeg Free Press. It makes the picture abundantly clear in spite of some of the speeches that have been made. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) is one who tried to maintain in the house a week or ten days ago that the level of cattle prices was still excellent, that it was fine, that nobody was suffering, and so on.

The following comparison will show what has happened in the cattle industry during the past year:

Choice steers, per hundredweight	24 to 24.50	34
Good steers	21 to 23	32 to 33.50

In other words, as far as choice and good steers are concerned the decline has been approximately one-third. When we come to cows the situation is worse.

Good cows, per hundredweight	12.50 to 14	23 to 24.50
Medium cows	11 to 12	21.50 to 24.50

When we come to canners and cutters, unfortunately the kind of meat I think I had for dinner last night in the parliamentary restaurant, we have these figures:

Canners and cutters per hundredweight	7 to 10	16 to 21

Then coming to stocker steers—frequently referred to as stockers and feeders—we find the picture midway between those for cows and steers respectively. I will not bother to put the details on record but the drop in price has been between one-third and one-half. Taking it altogether we find the drop in price since a year ago has ranged from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent, or a little more than 50 per cent in some cases. That has seriously reduced the income of farm families throughout this country. Unfortunately that drop in price has not been reflected to anything like the same extent in the retail price of meat to the consumer. The result is that most urban people, city people generally, still think the farmer is getting too much for his livestock and they would probably like to see any measures taken which would drive the price of livestock down ever farther.

Now, where the difference in this decline has gone I do not know. Certainly it lies between the packers and the retail butchers. I would think that possibly there might be a little investigation by the bureau of statistics people, on the basis of the numerous statistics they require sent in anyhow, which might produce information about the difference. Publication of the information might do something to reduce the spread in prices.

When we had the prices committee three or four years ago we made an investigation which showed then what the spread in prices was and who got what out of the price paid by the consumer for meat. I would hesitate to recommend that such a committee be set up again although possibly the time has arrived when one should be. Certainly when the farmers in this country have to take a reduction of 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent for the cattle they market, the retail price of meat should go down proportionately; but certainly it has not done so.

When we come to hogs the present situation can only be described as disastrous; and when the drop in floor price of $3 per hundred comes into effect on January 1, as announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the hog situation will be absolutely impossible. A little over a year ago, on January 15, 1951, I put on the record here a breakdown of the cost of raising hogs, showing that the feed cost alone to bring a pig to market in Ontario at that time was $39. Since then the price of grain has gone up and I would estimate that the cost at the present time for feed alone to produce a 200 pound pig is $41. The price paid for the best pigs, A grade, is $26 per hundredweight in Toronto and Montreal. The return to the farmer on a 200 pound pig which dresses 155 pounds—really a little above average—is $40.30. To this must be added the $2 premium which is paid by the dominion government for the production of high quality bacon. So the farmer receives $42.30 for his pig—$1.30 more than the cost of his feed alone. Out of that $1.30 he has to pay the cost of transporting the pig to market. He has to pay condemnation insurance and in many cases he has to pay commission. So you can take it, generally speaking, that for every A grade pig a farmer produces it has cost him for feed alone as much as he receives for the pig—feed which he had to buy or, if he produced it himself, he could have sold for that figure.

An hon. Member: There are not very many grade A pigs.

Mr. Harkness: As my hon. friend points out, the number of A grade pigs is relatively small. I have forgotten what the percentage is at the present time, but I think it runs something like 10 to 15 per cent. For every lower grade pig that the farmer produces he has an actual loss on the feed alone, to say nothing of his ordinary costs—costs for repairs to fences and buildings, labour and overhead, and all the rest of it.

That is the situation at the present time. But let us look at what the situation will be when the $3 is taken off the support price and it becomes $23 on January 1, 1953. Then the farmers' return on a 200 pound grade A pig will be $35.65. For every such hog the farmer produces after January 1, for feed alone he will be out of pocket $3.35, and in addition he has his labour and other costs. On his lower grade hogs the loss will, of course, be correspondingly greater.

The only people who are still in the hog business, or who are not getting out of it as fast as they can, are those who do not know what their costs are and therefore do not know what they are losing. Another class, those largely in the purebred business, are still holding on. In many cases they have cut down production and are holding on waiting for the day when present conditions will bring about a scarcity and prices will shoot away up—a thing which of course a large number of farmers cannot afford to do.

Now, it would appear to be the deliberate policy of this government to destroy the hog industry in Canada. This appears clearly enough if the support prices which are offered for hogs are compared with the support prices offered for cattle. As of January 1 the support price for each will be $23 per hundred weight, but in the case of hogs this $23 will be for 100 pounds of warm dressed meat. In the case of cattle it is $23 per 100 pounds, live weight. If you work out the support price for cattle on the same basis as for hogs, that is on a dressed weight basis, it gives you $41 per hundred. Dressed weight is, on the average, 55 per cent of the live weight. You have a differential in the support prices—$23 for hogs as against $41 for cattle.

Now, that is clearly a case of gross discrimination against the hog producer—a deliberate attempt, I would say, to drive the hog producers out of the market. It appears particularly so when you look at the long-term average of the price of hogs as compared with the price of cattle. In this booklet, livestock and meat trade report, put out by the Department of Agriculture, we see the relationship between livestock prices—basis Toronto; Cattle-hogs—long-term average 75·7 per cent. The period is 1914 to 1941. During that time cattle were three-quarters the price of hogs. At the present time, November 29, 1952, the ratio is 121·9 per cent. In other words, cattle are now worth 21·9 per cent more than hogs whereas they used to be worth only 75 per cent as much. That I think makes it abundantly clear that the government is attempting to destroy the hog industry.

Now, the reason that they are doing this is not very difficult to guess. For a long time the market for our surplus hogs has been in Great Britain. The hog industry of this country was deliberately built up over many years by means of dominion government subsidies, by importing certain types of boars and by various devices, in order to meet the requirements of this British market. The market has been lost as a result of the policies pursued by this government, and in order to avoid the consequent problems the government is destroying the hog industry without any consideration for the people who have earned their livelihood from it and who are going to suffer serious losses as a result of government policy.

However, more important than the losses suffered by individuals at the present time is the long-term effect of this policy. It will be very serious. In the first place, destruction of the hog industry in this country is going to remove the principal market for coarse grains and low-grade wheat. We come right back to the point with which I started: the large surplus of low-grade wheat which is cluttering up our elevators and our distribution system at the present time. The eventual result, of course, will be the extreme scarcity of hogs, and consequently the consumer will be paying a much higher price than he would otherwise be required to pay.

Another branch of agriculture which is important in Alberta, and upon which I should like to touch very briefly, is the sugar beet industry. The policy which has been followed by the government in regard to this crop is placing it in a precarious situation. Sugar beets are the basis of successful irrigation farming in southern Alberta. The building of the St. Mary dam and the canals leading from it to distribute the water so stored, a project about which we have talked frequently in this house over the past several years, is now more or less completed. In order to make the large expenditure on this project worth while, it is essential to keep the sugar beet industry in a healthy state. The irrigated lands in southern Alberta have been responsible for a very large increase in population. There will be a further increase as a result of this new dry land being brought under irrigation.

An hon. Member: By what government?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: A gentleman asks "by what government?" It has been brought into operation by the joint efforts of the dominion government and the Alberta government.

Mr. Murphy: Under pressure from the Tories.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, and as a result of a great deal of pressure from bodies of all kinds. Really, I suppose this matter comes under immigration, but the only way in which the farm lands of Alberta can absorb a considerable number of immigrants is by irrigation. In order to keep the irrigated farms going, as I say, sugar beet is an essential crop.

In the event of a war, the importance of a domestic supply of sugar is quite apparent. We all know that rationing of sugar took place during both wars, and actually an assured supply of sugar is just as important a defence requirement as any other, because our outside sources of supply may be cut off. This industry is being threatened by what I believe was a mistake made by the government. I was going to say "a pure mistake", but there cannot be such a thing as a pure mistake. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), through an understandable desire to increase our external trade, and one with which I thoroughly agree, made an arrangement with Cuba by which it was hoped a certain amount of Canadian goods, particularly dried codfish and potatoes, would be shipped to Cuba in exchange for 75,000 tons of raw sugar per year. I have no objection to that arrangement. The only trouble is that no means was provided to prevent an unrestricted flow of Cuban refined sugar into Canada.

Cuba now has a large surplus of sugar which she is extremely anxious to dispose of. All the sugar beet industry is asking for is that a quota of some sort be imposed on the importation of refined sugar. They are not asking for a tariff or anything of that sort. All they want is an assurance that the Canadian market is not flooded with this great surplus of Cuban sugar, resulting in the destruction of their industry. This industry might be destroyed in the course of a year or two, by which time the surplus sugar would be gone. A short crop in the cane producing areas might leave the world position such that the price would go to great heights. It seems to me reasonable that these people should be given some consideration in this matter. As someone said to me, it is very desirable to increase our foreign trade with Cuba and other countries, but it seems stupid to buy a Cadillac in order to sell a bag of potatoes, and that is essentially what this sort of deal means.

In the few minutes I have left, I should like to turn to defence matters. Evidently defence is a very touchy subject with the Liberal members, because during the course of this debate so many of them have attempted to explain away the instances of extravagance and waste which have been brought to the attention of the house. In his speech on this matter the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) attempted to use some remark that I made in 1949 as an endorsation of the course which the government has been following. It is extremely flattering that the minister should spend so much time in looking up what one said back in 1949, particularly since the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that the Minister of National Defence was so busy he did not have time to scrutinize defence contracts. In view of what the minister said about ghost writers, no one would for a moment suggest that he had not looked up these references himself and prepared his speech himself. From his own words, we can only take it that is the situation. It is rather surprising to me that he should have spent so much time looking over these old Hansards to find instances of this sort.

The main thing is, however, that the statement ascribed to me—which of course I made—is not really applicable to what the minister has been doing and what has been done generally by the Department of Defence Production. The quotation the minister used is found on page 135 of Hansard for November 27, and was a reference to what I had said in regard to the difficulty of equipping troops in 1939. I went on to say that there should not be any repetition of that; there is no need for it, particularly with the large amount spent for defence purposes at the present time. I interjected that there was no need to go to extremes, either, and the minister said:

> I am glad to see that the hon. member is here and he will no doubt support what he said in 1949.

Certainly I support it, Mr. Speaker, and I support it one hundred per cent. As I say, however, it is not applicable to what the government has been doing so far as our so-called rearmament program is concerned. To begin with, of course, there has to be reason in all things. The provision of a proper quantity of mobilization stores of any sort does not mean the provision of many times the amount that is likely to be required. No one in Canada argues that we should not have adequate supplies of mobilization stores. Actually what has been done has been the buying of large quantities of things which are not essential for mobilization, and at the same time the failure to provide things which are essential for mobilization. Great quantities of neckties, carpets, teapots, furniture, boudoir lamps and so forth have been secured, but at the same time stocks of rifles, machine guns and artillery pieces have actually been depleted. In other words, during the past two years of heavy expenditures for rearmament the essential mobilization stores have not been stockpiled, and stockpiling is given by the government as the reason expenditures have had to be so great.

For example, we have sent to European countries the arms and equipment for three infantry divisions, plus field pieces for at least one regiment, and I believe practically all the self-propelled anti-tank guns we had. One may well ask the question, then, what has been secured to replace them? Well, if we look at the information supplied to the defence expenditures committee last year, particularly in an exhibit having to do with Canadian defence orders, April 1950 to January 1952, we see at page 16 that we have secured 138 105-millimeter howitzers. These are field pieces to replace the 25-pounder gun-howitzers which were sent to Europe. The number sent to Europe would be 240 25-pounders. Therefore the number we have secured subtracted from that number leaves us with a deficiency of 102 field guns. We are that many field guns worse off than we were before rearmament started.

When we come to rifles I think it is perhaps conservative to say that the equipment for the three divisions included at least 30,000 rifles. To replace them we have ordered, as shown on page 11 of the same exhibit, 12,250 rifles and 7,481 carbines, which apparently take the place of rifles, as it was explained to us. That is 19,000 odd, just under two-thirds as many as were disposed of.

The same story runs through a good deal of the actual fighting equipment which we had at the end of the war and which we have been supposedly ordering since. Some of it we have not only not stockpiled, but we have depleted the stockpiles we had at the end of the war. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the excitement that has been engendered by the disclosure of the large number of non-essential items which were secured, the serious deficiencies in essential items of fighting equipment have been lost sight of by the general public, or perhaps have never made a real impact on the consciousness of the country as a whole.

There is, of course, a good reason why this should be so, and that is the fact that security is always invoked as a reason for not giving information as to many of our arms purchases. For example, on page 10 of this exhibit having to do with defence orders there is one item which reads: "87A, various suppliers; aircraft; date of orders, various; number of units; classified"; in other words, secret; "estimated value of contracts; $668,962,840." In other words, Mr. Speaker, in that one item you have an amount equal to one-third of all the defence expenditures of this year.

In connection with that item we were not allowed to ask one single question. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production made a great play in his speech about members not having read the minutes of evidence given before the committee. Well, if you will look at page 412 of these minutes of evidence you will see that I attempted to ask questions in regard to this item, and in each instance the answers were that this information was all secret, that nothing could be told us about it whatever. We could not even be told the amounts which went to different companies such as Canadair, A. V. Roe, and so forth. We could get no information on that at all. I would strongly suspect, Mr. Speaker, that the waste of money which has been shown in some of these smaller items of carpets and so forth would pale into insignificance if one were able to go completely into that one item of $668 million odd.

There have been delays in delivery of F-86E Sabres and the CF-100 jet planes, though the announcements made by the ministers concerned would lead us to believe that the Canadian air force would be equipped with the CF-100 before this. They have not got them. By this time they may have three or four sample copies, but that is all. These delays, together with the change in management which took place at the factory making the CF-100, show only too clearly that the program in connection with this airplane production did not go according to plan.

How many planes have actually been delivered? How many have been secured or are to be secured for this very large sum I do not know, and of course we will not be told. But one thing I am absolutely sure of, and that is this. The number is considerably fewer than 600; and if it were 600, the cost would be well over $1 million each. We were told by the minister, as I remember it, that the cost of one of these F-86E's was to be in the neighbourhood of $300,000 to $350,000.

The general position of course in regard to all these defence contracts is that everyone in Canada knows what a necktie or a carpet is, and when a person learns that a certain number have been bought he is able, from his own experience, to form a judgment as to whether the number ordered was excessive, or if there was likely to be extravagance and waste. However, the number of people in Canada who can form a judgment as to waste or extravagance in connection with a thing like a modern naval vessel, a jet plane or one of the modern artillery pieces, is extremely limited even if the information was given, which it is not. The natural result is that attention has been directed to the smaller non-essential items, and in regard to the important items of rearmament we just do not know what the situation is. What we do know, however, has given rise to very considerable feelings of unease.

The defence expenditures committee is to be set up again this year. A motion providing for it is on the order paper. I would hope that it would be carried on in a very different way from last year. Speaking by and large, last year we were smothered with a great mass of small details, in many cases unessential matters, and as a result we sort of waded around the way a man would in a six-foot snowstorm, and we were not able to see very much light.

I did move on one or two occasions last year to investigate a specific matter, and pointed out that the only way in which we would make progress in the committee was to take some specific matter and investigate it thoroughly.

In his speech the other day the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) proposed that this year the committee should investigate construction matters at two stations. That is the sort of thing I think the committee should do. Certainly this sort of wandering around with a terrific mass of paper is not going to get us anywhere. I would hope that the efforts of the defence expenditure committee might be directed at this year's sittings particularly to this matter of arms and armament, really essential items so far as rearmament in this country is concerned.

Mr. Darroch: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) in his very interesting speech, but I am wondering if he would permit a question.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Darroch: Would he tell the house what price farmers could expect for hogs if we were shipping them to the British market today?

Mr. Harkness: I have no idea what the answer to that would be. But certainly the question is irrelevant, because we have no market there.

(Translation):

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks, I wish to conform to a custom of this house and to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I extend my most sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, more particularly, on the substance and form of his speech.

I, myself, had the opportunity of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne soon after my arrival in this house. I therefore understand the difficulties which any new member must face in so doing and I am sure that all my colleagues will agree with me that the member for Brome-Missisquoi has discharged with honour the task which had been entrusted to him.

(Text):

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) upon the very able manner in which he seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. His speech shows the great ability he has brought to the house, and has given assurance to hon. members of that which they already anticipated, that he will make a useful contribution to the debates.

I should like, too, to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) upon their elevation to the cabinet. They are both hard-working members of the house. They have contributed usefully to its work and its debates in the past, and they both fully deserve the honours granted them. I may say I am looking forward particularly to working with the Minister of Fisheries in the interests of the Magdalen islands, which I have the honour to represent and which, as every member in the house knows by now, I presume, are very much interested in fisheries.

As one who has often advocated the installation of a loud-speaker system in the house, I wish to congratulate those who were responsible for it. It is a great success, and is giving unqualified satisfaction to all of us.

As this is probably the last session before an election, I have been expecting members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and members of the other opposition groups, to bring forth their best ammunition; but I have been somewhat disappointed in the result. I find that, in taking part in the debate, to a very great extent the opposition members have indulged in generalizations and platitudes. As an example of the generalizations I shall refer to the observation of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), who preceded me in the debate this afternoon. Referring to the market for hogs, he made the unqualified statement that the British market had been lost as a result of the policy of this government.

Well, everyone knows that is not true. It is not half true; it is not even a quarter true. There are very many other factors which have to be considered when one is giving a reason for the loss of the hog market. One of the most important, and one which the hon. member did not mention but which comes immediately to my mind—and I am far from being an expert in the matter—is that unfortunately the British have not the dollars with which to buy our hogs.

Mr. Harkness: Would the hon. member tell me what the hog situation is in Quebec city?

Mr. Cannon: You are the expert on that. In reading the speeches made by members of the opposition groups I have paid particular attention to the one made by my good friend the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who usually brings some solid contribution to the debate. In his speech, however, I am sorry to say I found one of the best examples of generalizations and platitudes such as I have just mentioned. For instance, at page 111 of Hansard, no doubt after having given great thought to the matter and after having given it deep consideration, the hon. member is reported to have said this:

> These past three and a half years will go down in history as the wasted years. And now we are told that this government is to ask for another chance. In the face of a record like that, of wasted years and lost opportunities, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the people of this country will think very carefully before giving another chance—

And so on.

Mr. Fleming: Finish the sentence.

Mr. Cannon: What impressed me there was the hon. member's reference to the wasted years. I will ask my hon. friend, who has attended sessions of this parliament assiduously from the beginning, whether he considers the legislation passed in 1949 amending the British North America Act and enabling the federal government to amend the constitution of our country in federal matters, the amendment to the Supreme Court Act to make it the last court of appeal for Canada, the trans-Canada highway agreement, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act of 1949—I would ask him whether these were "wasted years and lost opportunities".

Mr. Fleming: Do you want an answer?

Mr. Cannon: You can give an answer later on, when your time comes.

Mr. Fleming: I would be glad to do it now.

Mr. Cannon: I will ask whether he thinks that at the session in 1950 it was an instance of "wasted years and lost opportunities" when we passed the legislation dealing with the NATO organization, when we decided to send our troops to Korea to support the armed action being undertaken there by the United Nations, when we amended the Old Age Pensions Act, when we passed the Old Age Security Act, when we held our special session to settle the railway strike. I am asking whether the hon. member considers that that legislation was "wasted years and lost opportunities."

Mr. Fleming: Do you want an answer now?

Mr. Cannon: You may give your answer when your time comes to speak. If you answered all those items I would have no time to speak. The hon. member can read them in Hansard, and if he wishes he may discuss them later in the debate.

Mr. Knowles: You have the old age legislation in the wrong year.

Mr. Cannon: No, I beg your pardon; it is in the right year, I checked it.

Mr. Knowles: It was passed in 1951.

Mr. Cannon: But it was originated in 1950, and was in the speech from the throne in that year.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no, it was not. If that is all you know about it—

Mr. Cannon: Let us not argue about details like that. The important thing is not the year, but rather the fact that the legislation was passed, and that the hon. member for Eglinton has referred to the work of this parliament as "wasted years".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why not let the hon. member make his speech without interruption? I would like to hear it.

Mr. Knowles: I would like him to make it correctly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You can speak in Three Rivers next week.

Mr. Cannon: In 1951 we passed legislation to improve the lot of the veterans by extending their benefits through increased pensions. We passed legislation to send troops to Europe under NATO. We passed the St. Lawrence seaway authority legislation, and legislation dealing with the development of the St. Lawrence power. Were those lost opportunities? Were those wasted years?

(Translation):

I ask the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), is that not so?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, of course, always yes.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Cannon: Your reply indicates that you do not attach very much importance to the debates of the house.

Mr. Fleming: I shall reply to that later; you would not allow me to do so now.

(Text):

Mr. Cannon: In 1952 we passed legislation ratifying the Japanese peace treaty. We implemented the Colombo plan and entered into tax agreements with nine of the provinces. We amended the British North America Act with regard to the rules of representation; this was the first time it was amended in Canada. We passed important legislation concerning the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. These are just some of the highlights of what we did in those years. Again I repeat this question to my hon. friend: Were those wasted years? Were those lost opportunities?

Mr. Fleming: When are you going to give me a chance to answer these rhetorical questions?

(Translation):

Mr. Boisvert: Support prices.

Mr. Chevrier: He will answer later.

Mr. Fleming: He would not allow me to do so now.

(Text):

Mr. Cannon: The opposition have been repeating old accusations, have been hurling old charges which have been answered time and again. We heard them referring time after time to waste and extravagance in the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production. Those accusations were brought before the committee that was set up last year and satisfactory evidence was given. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) for the speech he made the other day on this subject. He showed that most of these accusations had been answered. He showed that information had been given by officers of the department at the hearings of the committee, and he underlined the fact that I am underlining again, that the opposition were just repeating the same old accusations which had been answered. They seem to have heard and believed in the old saying of Voltaire: mentez, mentez, il en restera toujours quelque chose. They seem to think that if you repeat the same accusation often enough, people will remember only the accusation and forget the answer.

That is not a fair way to deal with the public of Canada. It is not a fair way to deal with the electors of this country. We all know that there are not so many people who read the reports of the committees. Nearly everyone reads what goes on in the house because it appears in the newspapers but only a comparative few read what goes on in the committees, so you have accusations being made in the house in a general way and then answered in detail in the committee. If those accusations are repeated often enough there is no doubt that they will be noticed more by the public and will eventually carry more weight than any answers that are given. I do not think that is a fair way to deal with this subject.

On this matter of so-called waste and extravagance, I was amazed to see that the items to which the opposition attached the most importance were things like neckties and shoes. I think we can consider we are lucky in this country when we realize that the government is spending $2,000 million on procurement, on armaments and things required for national defence, and the only criticism by the opposition has been in connection with things like neckties and shoes. We should consider ourselves lucky when we realize the enormous amounts that are spent on other items which are much more expensive and take up much more of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Fleming: On which the government refuses information.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member knows that is not true.

Mr. Cannon: There is another generalization, there is another general statement such as those which are made without any support whatever. When my hon. friend speaks in the house I would like him to support that, to show the house that he was not able to get the information he asked for. I know for a fact that all the information that could be given to members of the opposition in keeping with national security was given.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently my hon. friend has not read the proceedings of the committee on defence expenditures.

Mr. Cannon: I am not on the committee.

Mr. Fleming: You have not read the proceedings, either. That is obvious.

Mr. Cannon: One of the accusations levelled most often at the government by the opposition is that the federal government is taking too much of the total tax money in Canada, in other words is taking too large a bite of the tax money available. In his speech at the beginning of the session the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said that in 1939 the federal government was taking 51 per cent of the tax dollar, the provincial governments 19 per cent, and the municipal governments 30 per cent. He went on to say that in 1951 the federal government was taking 77 per cent, the provincial governments 12 per cent, and the municipal governments 11 per cent. He apparently concluded that the federal government were encroaching on fields of taxation exploited by the other two bodies, that they were taking so much of the tax money that there was nothing left for the others. But if you consider these percentages carefully you must come to a different conclusion.

Let us consider what are the federal expenditures that have been responsible for the increase in the percentage from 51 per cent in 1939 to 77 per cent in 1951.

Mr. Lesage: The figures are not correct.

Mr. Cannon: My friend says that the figures are not correct, but I am giving the Leader of the Opposition the benefit of the doubt and assuming that they are correct. In examining them I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the two items responsible for this increase in percentage are national defence and social security.

No one has ever suggested that national defence should be handled by either the provincial or municipal authorities. The federal government must take care of national defence whether it wants to or not. It is forced to raise money for national defence by taxation because of the force of circumstances. It has no choice in the matter.

About $1,000 million a year is being spent on social security by the federal government, for family allowances, for old age pensions and things like that. The money paid for old age pensions and pensions for the blind is paid by the federal government as a result of agreements with the provinces. I do not think any agreement was made in connection with family allowances; the federal government just went ahead and granted family allowances and no objection was raised by the provinces except by Ontario, of which province the Leader of the Opposition was then the premier. He declared himself very much against family allowances because he thought they would benefit my province too much at the expense of Ontario. I know my hon. friends do not like to have that brought to the attention of the house or the country. Unfortunately they will probably hear of it several times before the next election comes along.

Mr. Fleming: That is not what he said.

Mr. Cannon: No one wants family allowances administered by the provinces. If my hon. friends wish that, let them say so. I do not think it would be very popular because it might mean different rates of family allowances in the different provinces and different manners of administration. I am convinced that the people of Canada do not want family allowances administered by the provinces.

The point I am making is that whether it wants to or not the federal government must raise $3,000 million more today than it had to raise in 1939, $2,000 million for national defence, and $1,000 million for social security. If we work on the figures given by the opposition, which the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) says are not correct, but giving the benefit of the doubt—

Mr. Fleming: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Cannon: —they show that 77 per cent—

Mr. Fleming: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Cannon: Not now.

Mr. Fleming: You only ask them; you do not answer them.

Mr. Cannon: It is my turn to talk. I am making the speech and it is a little different. Does the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) not realize that there is some difference between a question being asked by the member who has the floor and a question being asked by another member who has not the floor? It seems to me it is elementary.

Mr. Fleming: Has the hon. gentleman overlooked the fact there were defence expenditures in 1939? He has left those out entirely.

Mr. Cannon: This hurts, but I will ask my hon. friend to keep quiet and listen for a while.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Curb the urge to speak.

Mr. Cannon: If we take the figures advanced by the opposition, namely that 77 per cent of the revenue went to the federal government, 12 per cent to the provinces and 11 per cent to the municipalities, and work back from the figure of 77 per cent based on a total federal budget of approximately $4 billion, we find that the total taxes raised by the three taxing powers were about $5,200 million. Taking these figures, the federal government collected $4 billion, the provinces $626 million and the municipalities $574 million. If you deduct the $2 billion that the federal government had to spend for national defence willy-nilly, as I said, then you bring down the total to $3,200 million. Keeping the same amounts for the provinces and the municipalities, we find that the federal government is left with $2 billion, the provincial governments with $626 million and the municipal governments with $574 million.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Let us look at the percentages now. They come down to 62 per cent for the federal government, 19·5 per cent for the provincial governments and 18·5 per cent for the municipal governments. Already we are getting closer to the figures of 1939. If we deduct the $1 billion that the federal government had to spend on social security—

Mr. Fleming: Was there no expenditure on national defence in 1939?

An hon. Member: Practically nil.

Mr. Cannon: Very small.

Mr. Fleming: You treat it as if there were none.

Mr. Cannon: I am surprised that the hon. member for Eglinton, who knows the rules of the house, did not ask my permission to ask a question.

Mr. Fleming: I would not get it. You have made that clear.

Mr. Cannon: If we take off the amount of $1 billion for social security that brings the total taxes down to $2,200 million. It brings the federal government's share down to $1 billion and the other two shares remain as they were at $626 million for the provinces and $574 million for the municipalities. What are the percentages now? The percentages are 45 per cent for the federal government, 29 per cent for provincial governments and 26 per cent for municipal governments compared with 51 per cent for the federal government, 19 per cent for provincial governments and 30 per cent for municipal governments in 1939.

Therefore if you take into account the fact that the federal government had to necessarily assume—it had no choice in the matter—expenditures of $2 billion for national defence and $1 billion for social security, the part of the taxes that it raised and spent was less percentagewise in 1951 than it was in 1939, 45 per cent as against 51 per cent.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cannon: I do not think so because my time is pretty short. I will listen to my hon. friend's answer later.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He is nervous today.

Mr. Cannon: If I allowed my hon. friend to ask all the questions he wants to ask he would be talking all the time and I would not be talking at all.

Mr. Chevrier: He does not like the speech.

Mr. Cannon: I say that the federal government has been forced into its present position of taking such a large slice of the tax dollar by circumstances so far as national defence is concerned and by the will of the people so far as social security is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: It certainly was not the will of the Liberal party.

Mr. Cannon: If the provinces and the municipalities took over any great part of the revenues devoted to social security they would have to provide the pensions and allowances, so they would not be any better off. They would take the money and pay it out to the people, and would not be any better off than they are now. I recognize that it is a very difficult problem. I am not trying to belittle it. I am only pointing out that the federal government is not to blame for the situation as it exists and that the accusation of the opposition is not one that holds water.

I find in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition made on November 24 and recorded at page 25 of Hansard, the following reference to the conference of prime ministers which was then about to take place in London:

> There have been repeated reports also that Canada is going to insist upon Britain taking certain steps to improve their position before Canada can make any effective arrangements with them.

Farther down he said:

> I am sure that Canadians would be indignant, and I cannot imagine anyone would be more indignant than members of this government, if anyone in Britain presumed to tell the Canadian government how it should mend its ways before they could do business with us. Before we presume to tell the government of Britain how it should conduct its affairs, it would seem appropriate that our own position should be examined.

I was very much interested to find in the Montreal Star of November 27 an extract from the good old London Times, which for once does not agree with the Leader of the Opposition. The article reads as follows:

> The Times came out today with an analysis of the commonwealth economic conference that seems in complete accord with the Canadian viewpoint. In its leading editorial, the independent newspaper says the commonwealth ministers must have two main problems to consider: self-help within the sterling area and the fundamental problem of United States predominance.
> The danger, says the Times, is that the second problem may be used by the sterling area as an excuse for not putting their own house in order. "Because of the persistent American surplus . . . it is contended that the action now demanded to make the economies of the commonwealth countries shipshape . . . is beside the mark", the newspaper adds. "In fact, the truth is precisely the opposite."
> "The greater the difficulty of making both ends meet in world markets, the greater the need to leave nothing undone to make the most in competitive terms of commonwealth resources. Self-help is the first and last item on the agenda." The Times says it is clear, "as it has been all the time to the Canadians at their special vantage point in North America", that there is no solution in perpetual restriction.
> Only after the problems of sterling area "good housekeeping" had been solved—by such measures as more scrupulous investment—could the ministers "usefully ask whether the wider goal of convertible currencies and the free flow of goods and investments in transactions with the dollar world can be brought within reach."

In other words, the London Times is precisely of the same opinion as indicated in the reports cited by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech, namely that Canada was going to insist that Britain take certain steps to improve its own position before Canada could make any effective arrangements with her.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that just one year ago now, in December 1951, we were all very much worried about the increase in the cost of living. Members of the opposition were all insisting that it was absolutely necessary, if we were going to avoid disastrous inflation and preserve the economy of our country, that controls be reimposed. The government held firm. Don't shake your head. The hon. member may not have advocated it, but there were members of the opposition who did. I remember very well. The government decided that it would not interfere directly with the liberties of the citizen and it would not impose controls, as it considered they were not necessary at the time. It decided to take indirect methods to control inflation. I am very gratified to say, Mr. Speaker, and I draw it to the attention of the opposition if they have not already noticed it, that the cost of living according to the old index has dropped from 191 in January of this year to 185 when last reported. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the whole cabinet deserve the congratulations of this house and of all fair-minded Canadians for their very wise attitude which has produced these results.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cannon: On that score and on that subject I wish to draw the attention of Her Majesty's opposition, because I always wish them to be well informed, to an editorial appearing in the New York Times of November 5, 1952, concerning the way Canada has coped with the danger of inflation and has succeeded in bringing down the cost of living. I will spare you the first paragraph because it just repeats figures I have already given. The second paragraph reads:

> What makes the Canadian record the more impressive by contrast with the floundering of our own administration in this area is the manner in which it was achieved. The government's policy, in the words of Finance Minister Abbott, was "designed to guide the economy in the right direction without dictating the details of economic activity". In other words, the nation steered clear completely of price-wage controls, and all direct interference with the individual's affairs, relying upon increased taxes (direct and indirect), the stern regulation of consumer credit, a voluntary credit restriction plan, and an anti-inflationary policy of debt management.

The strictly economic approach to the inflation problem by Canada is typically exemplified in its policy in the field of taxation. In contrast with our own government, it has sought to maintain a good balance between taxes on earnings and taxes on spending.

I think this editorial from the New York Times, a newspaper that is well known and well respected, pays a well deserved tribute to the government of the country which we have today, and which we will continue to have after the next election notwithstanding the prophecies of the hon. gentlemen of the opposition that we will not be given another chance. I think it is not just coincidence that two highly respected newspapers, the London Times and the New York Times, should both, at approximately the same time, find it opportune to praise the Canadian government.

The next item I have on my agenda concerns the speech of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). In Hansard of December 2, page 273, he said:

(Translation):

This is in French, Mr. Speaker, so I will revert to that language. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) is reported on page 273 of Hansard as having said:

During the war Ottawa got into the habit—

He quotes Le Devoir.

—of taxing as much as it could and it never lost this habit altogether after 1945. It has used the moneys thus collected to set up social services which are within the fields of the provinces.

What I am underlining is: "within the fields of the provinces". Speaking of social services I am reminded of the remarks made recently by the hon. premier of Quebec while receiving a delegation which had, I believe, come to request assistance for home construction in the cities or something like that. He spoke out against what, I believe, he called "state paternalism". I would very much like to know what he means by "state paternalism".

Does the hon. member for Three Rivers approve of the opposition of the hon. premier of Quebec to "state paternalism"? I would like to ask the hon. member for Three Rivers to ask the other member for Three Rivers, the one who sits in Quebec city, if this "state paternalism" includes family allowances, allowances for the blind, pensions for incapacitated or aged people, that is, if by this "state paternalism" he means social security? I would also like him to tell me if when speaking out against state paternalism as practised by the federal government he means that he is opposed to family allowances, old age pensions or pensions for the blind. That must be his meaning because I cannot see how his expression could be otherwise interpreted and should we decide to follow the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Three Rivers, we would entrust the provinces with the administration of those social services which are, at present, the federal government's responsibility. But, in that case, these social services might very well be reduced, if not be completely done away with, since the premier of the province of Quebec would include all these benefits under the general heading of "state paternalism" and throw them overboard. That is a consideration to bear in mind when one blames the federal government for administering social security.

I believe—as I said in English a few moments ago—that the people of Canada are satisfied with federal administration of social security and that every Canadian should be on the same footing. For in my province, favoritism has certainly occupied a place of honour in the administration of certain social measures, when the provincial government was responsible for them.

(Text):

Before I finish the first part of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say I am convinced the time has come for this government to reduce taxes.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no. Surely not.

Mr. Cannon: People realize that taxes are necessary under the circumstances but the people who are willing to pay high taxes are not willing to pay taxes if they have any suspicion that those taxes are too high or that they might be lowered. We have had large surpluses in the last two years and those surpluses have been satisfactorily explained, as far as I am concerned, by the fact that the national product of Canada has increased considerably in both those years beyond the point it was thought it would reach when the calculations were made by the experts who decided what the taxes should be. The very fact that the national income and the national product has increased, while it explains the surpluses, also justifies a reduction in taxation at the present time.

As one of the hon. members of the house said before in this debate, and I am tempted to use a comparison which is often used in the legislative assembly of Quebec, the Minister of Finance is the best minister of finance since confederation. Being the best minister of finance since confederation he will realize that the time has come to reduce taxes, and that the burden now being borne by the Canadian people should be alleviated in so far as this is possible consistent with the obligations the federal government has to meet.

Now I wish to revert, Mr. Speaker, to the Magdalen islands, my home constituency, and to devote the rest of my speech to their requirements. My county is not very large, but it has more fishermen in it than any other county in the province of Quebec. As such it is certainly deserving of the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). He is not in the house now, but I will not fail to remind him of what I have just said.

I have always taken a particular interest in the fishermen's problems because of the fact that there are so many in my constituency, and I have always attempted to help them as much as possible. I have asked for help for the fishermen, both directly and indirectly. Under the first heading I shall put my request for a change in the regulations governing subsidies for the building of large fishing boats, in order to reduce to 45 feet the minimum length required to qualify for the subsidy. In that request I was successful, and I want to thank the federal government for having passed the necessary order in council.

There were other requests which I made to help the fishermen directly, and in which I was not so successful. I believe it is my duty to bring them again to the attention of the house. Two of these requests concerned help for the fishermen through the fisheries prices support board and unemployment insurance. These two requests come under the heading of direct help. In connection with the request for help under the price support program, I wish to quote to the house from a speech I made in 1951, as found at page 2363 of Hansard.

I have just been handed a note from Mr. Speaker informing me that my time has expired. I shall, therefore, have to cut short my remarks concerning the fishermen's situation. I shall take another opportunity of presenting their requests to the house. Before sitting down I wish to say that I shall look forward to hearing the speech by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), when he will have the opportunity of asking me all the questions he wanted to ask this afternoon. The fact that I have had to curtail my remarks shows, I believe, that I was right in not allowing him to ask the questions.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, with the house in the happy mood in which it is at the present moment, I am sure you and the house will not be disappointed if I make a speech on the subject of gold and the convertibility of currency. This matter is, and continues to be, one of the most important matters facing all the democratic countries. It is a subject which is under intense and vital discussion at the prime ministers' conference in London at the present time, so I feel that certain things should be said here concerning the problem.

I want to deal briefly with the new emergency gold mining regulations which were announced at the beginning of the session. The new formula continues the old type of assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Although it does increase slightly the payments to be made by the government, actually the new formula, like its predecessors, is of little real help. Many mines have worked out what this assistance will mean, and one of them—Bralorne in British Columbia—has estimated that it will mean rather less than 50 cents an ounce. Actually I think it would be safe to say that the increase will not equal the increased cost of steel which has taken place in the past year. Certainly it will not equal the increase in the cost of steel and chemicals at any mine so far as I am aware. Nothing is done, of course, to overcome the problem of the wide labour differential between gold mines and the base metal mines which is causing so much trouble. I have heard it said that the increase will not compensate for the added cost of grinding balls and grinding rods in the grinding circuits of most mines.

I want to put the situation on this act as clearly as I can. The gold mines did not ask for a bonus. I have consistently said in this house that it was not right to ask the Canadian taxpayer to bonus any industry. Gold, like any other metal, should be sold for the price it can command, and any mine which cannot operate at that price should not be in operation. That price, however—this is the important factor—should be the free price and not the present broker-controlled price. There should be no restrictions on owning, storing, selling or exporting gold in any form. Only in this manner can we arrive at a true price. The $14 million we are currently asking from the taxpayer is an unnecessary burden. Furthermore, it is doing the mines no real good. Unfortunately the industry has now come to depend on this assistance, and it will probably be impossible to cut it off until the free market is well established. In the meantime the assistance may cost between $20 million and $25 million a year.

Let us look at this business of the free market. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has repeatedly stated in this house that the United States controls the price of gold. Actually, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. The United States, because of the restrictions it imposes on the ownership of gold and which are similar to ours, can under no circumstances be considered as being on the gold standard. Unless the treasury or the central bank will sell gold freely to its citizens and give gold in exchange for currency to any citizen requiring it, a country cannot be said to have a fully exchangeable gold standard. As I say, today the United States does not control the price of gold. If the United States stopped buying gold altogether it would not injure the Canadian gold mining industry. Actually, I believe it would help it.

As evidence of this fact, Mr. Speaker, I want to put on record the amount of gold which was purchased by the various central banks and by various governments during the past year. The figures are in millions of dollars, and I shall only quote the larger ones.

Country	Millions of Dollars
Argentine	52
Belgium	48
Australia	24
Cuba	40
Egypt	78
France	24
Indonesia	71
Italy	77
Peru	15
Portugal	72
Sweden	62
United States	53
Canada	262

This gives the national treasury of Canada the largest increase in gold in the past year, something like five times the amount that was added to the United States hoard. I call it "hoard"; they call it reserve. Can any member in this house say that when this country purchases five times the amount of gold the United States purchased last year, the United States controls the price of gold? I think not. The most important thing, however, is this, that of the amount of gold which was sold that year not less than $694 million went into private hands. Can any member of this house say that the private market, or the free market, is not large enough or not competent to absorb any gold that we may be able to produce? To say so, Mr. Speaker, is to make a statement which I think is untenable. These figures are published by the international monetary fund, and while in the past I have disagreed with the international monetary fund, and still disagree as to their policies, nevertheless we must believe that their statistics are correct.

We now come to the point that gold is what used to be called in my school days the X factor in the simultaneous equation; in other words, that gold is the common denominator upon which all currencies are equated. We have today the principal problem of trade between the commonwealth and the sterling area and ourselves in the dollar bloc. There is the fiction that there is a shortage of dollars. The United Kingdom continues to talk about a shortage of dollars; all the sterling bloc talks about a shortage of dollars. What they mean is that they have a shortage of goods to sell for gold. How are you going to get those United States dollars if the United States will only accept dollars or gold?

The way to do that is to bring gold out in the open so that the owners of any currencies, the owners of any goods, may be paid for in the open in terms of gold, which has a purchasing power all over the world. I do not say this will cure the difficulty, but it is one of the steps which should be taken so that the impasse between the sterling bloc and the dollar bloc can be broken down and have a common denominator in the market places of the world in terms of the one thing that all currencies are equated in, namely gold. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that we have lost the opportunity of our young nationhood in not having gone ahead with this market long before this.

I come now to the United Kingdom problems. Twice in my lifetime has the freedom of the world been saved by the heroic actions of the citizens of that small island. It may well be that the wise counsel prevailing in London will be able to bridge the impasse that now exists in the United Nations. No man who is free today can ever pay his debt to the United Kingdom. But, Mr. Speaker, so long as wrong economics guide the policies, there is nothing very much that can be done. So long as currency control, embargoes and restrictions are imposed by any country, that country cannot go ahead and prosper the way it should, irrespective of the efforts of its people, great as they are.

There is of course the question in this case of the sterling balances to Egypt and the sterling balances to India. I feel that just as the war debts were found impossible of payment after the first world war, so the sterling debts which the United Kingdom accepted so readily to preserve the very freedom of both India and Egypt, and many other countries, should be treated very largely in the same way as the debts to the United States of the first world war. To pay them is like borrowing a man's garden hose to put out a fire in his house, and then having him charge you for the water you used to put out the fire.

That, however, is a problem which overhangs the whole question of convertibility, and I shall not go into details in a speech in this house. Convertibility is one thing. Convertibility can be assisted by a free market in the common denominator of all currencies, namely gold. But besides convertibility we must have trade. As a matter of fact the two go hand in hand. Today there is fortunately a very distinct change coming over United States thinking in this regard.

I should like to mention the opinions of Dr. Benjamin Beckhart, who is the economic consultant of the Chase national bank. He is also professor of banking of the Columbia graduate school of business. Dr. Beckhart is an economist of note. But it is not because of his ability as an economist that I am quoting his opinions at the moment. It is because what he says is significant of the new trend in American thought. Dr. Beckhart said that in order to overcome this question of convertibility and trade, certain things had to be done. He suggested that the United States should lend assistance to Great Britain and other European countries who were trying to return to currency convertibility to take steps so that raids on their currencies would be prevented. He suggested that the international monetary fund should grant stand-by drawing accounts.

Another very important proposal was that there should be repeal of the buy-American acts, an extension of the reciprocal trade agreement acts, an effort to delete the peril point clause and the escape clauses. He said also that there should be a rewriting of the customs law so that it might be greatly simplified.

This gentleman is representative of the very highest type of modern American business. He is, if I may say so, representative of the sort of thought that is going into the future Republican administration in the United States. I believe it shows a very significant and hopeful change in the American attitude when we see men of Dr. Beckhart's calibre making these suggestions.

I now come to the subject of inflation. It is still with us; and because in the last year we had a slight falling-off in the cost of living we would be foolish to believe that there has been a reversal of the trend. As a matter of fact if one plots the curve of the cost of living, and other indices such as that of wholesale prices, he will find that the 1951 figure was what is known as a high erratic, in that it was well above the general curve of inflation which has been going on since 1935.

I think it might be desirable to put a list of figures on the record. I have taken wholesale prices as being the index least subject to government control. All indices are of course to some degree subject to government control; but wholesale prices have a very general application and offer the index which probably represents the most sensitive indication of the nation's economy. These figures are from the dominion bureau of statistics, and are set out in the September issue of the bureau publication. They are as follows:

1936	96·8
1937	101·2
1938	102·0
1939	99·2
1940	108·0
1941	116·4
1942	123·0
1943	127·9
1944	130·6
1945	132·1
1946	138·9
1947	163·3
1948	193·4
1949	198·3

In 1952 the index figure dropped back to 232; but the 1952 figure, as of December, was up again to 241·7. Now, what does this all mean? It means that each year the prices of wholesale goods have increased, and they have increased in those 17 years about 135 points or an annual increment of about 8 points. Or, if we take the year 1938 as 100, it represents an annual increase of about 8 per cent. That trend is continuing. Another interesting thing is that this curve is similar to all other indices in Canada, including those of building materials and wage rates. As I have said, the cost of living has certain generalizations in it which dampen it down somewhat, but there again the similarity is striking.

What happens if this goes on? It simply means that the value of the dollar decreases just that much every year. If this trend goes on it means that in respect of things such as old age pensions, a man now in his fifties who is paying for an old age pension will, at the age of seventy, draw in terms of today's dollar, a sum equal to about $19. A man with life insurance who expects to retire with a capital of, let us say, $10,000 will have to save $20,000 in order to have $10,000 in purchasing power 20 years from now. A man with government bonds paying him 3 per cent, in the face of this constant inflation will stand a net loss of about 4½ to 5 per cent in terms of purchasing power every year he holds that bond.

This must be stopped; because if it is not stopped we will destroy the very security we are trying to protect. Someone may say that it is all very well, that a man can invest in common stock equities, that a man can invest in prime real estate or buy a farm or take his money out of the country. That is all very well for the wealthy. But today in Montreal and Toronto only 6 per cent of all wage earners earn more than $4,000 a year. Recent surveys show that 94 per cent of all the wage earners in Montreal and Toronto receive $4,000 a year or less and must depend upon such things as life insurance, government bonds and bank savings accounts. It is their security that we are destroying by this constant inflation.

From time to time I have suggested that the only way to attack inflation, the only way to stop this rot in the currency, is by returning to a fixed gold standard. That is some distance in the future; it is not practical immediately because we do not know what the price of gold is going to be. We do not know where it will stabilize itself. But we do see the rot, we do see this thing going on and we are as yet powerless to stop it.

Because there has been a decrease in the cost of living during the last six or eight months can we say that is the trend, especially with an increased cost for basic steel, and increased cost for coal and undoubtedly an added cost for freight because of higher wage rates for the railway workers? To do so I think would be unwise and wrong in every possible way. We say that we are having a boom. Our trade is at record levels. We are spending $500 million at Kitimat; we are building the St. Lawrence power project and waterway by ourselves. Our dollar is at a premium. Our budget is in balance, with a huge surplus. Those are fine things, of which every Canadian should be proud; but what good are they if the security of the people we are trying to protect is destroyed? This is not happening quickly as was the case with inflation in Germany, but there is a continual eating away of the purchasing power of our currency, and with it goes the savings of our people.

To say that the trend is downward and inflation beaten because a few indices have turned downward, is it not rather like saying that highway fatalities have stopped, that we have cured the highway traffic accident problem because there has been a week end without fatality or a Christmas season practically free from accidents? I think both arguments would be completely fallacious.

I should like to say one word about the price of gold. It is not the function of any government to set the price of gold. Gold is not the plaything of any political party. Gold is the people's security against all political parties. Until the people are allowed to have gold, that security is taken away from them by this inflation I have been talking about.

I do not know what it will be set at. I have no idea where it will adjust itself. But if it follows the general line and if the price before the war was adequate, we must think of gold in terms of the indices which I have quoted and expect a price at least double, or probably more, the pre-war price before it can properly fulfil its function. To place gold at any price and not let it go free would be just as dangerous and wrong as to maintain it at its present price and thus destroy the mining industry. The prime function of gold is to act as a monetary value. To sterilize it even at any price and not allow it to fulfil its historical function of being the safeguard of the savings of the people is wrong and dangerous. Furthermore it is the road to revolution.

Mr. Speaker, I have about five minutes more and there is one further item I should like to deal with. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was trying to make one point, namely that no government has the right or prerogative to say what the price of gold shall be unless that government is prepared to exchange the national currency into gold at that rate without restrictions of any sort whatsoever. I think the incoming administration at Washington understands that. Gold is the citizen's supreme safeguard against dishonest government.

I want to refer briefly now to the possible —I do not say "proposed" although it is proposed—diversion of water from the Atlin lakes in British Columbia and the Yukon and also from lake Laberge over the pass down to Skagway, Alaska, for the development of a very large amount of hydroelectric energy and the creation of an aluminum smelter. There are certain factors to be considered. The Yukon needs power to develop her natural resources and the promise of this abundant electric power is certainly very tempting. However, the water belongs to the province of British Columbia which under the British North America Act is the owner of her own natural resources, and her interests must certainly be considered. If I were a British Columbian, particularly one from the northern part of the province, I would give the matter most serious thought before I approved of the removal from the province of so much essential primary power.

The next point is that the future of the Yukon lies in the development of her mineral resources. There are two essential requirements involved. One is power and the other is water as distinct from power. The new discoveries of potentially great mineral resources that have been indicated by companies such as Hudson Bay, Ventures and others will certainly require power, but they will also require water. They will require water for their milling and mining and for the use of the communities that may grow up around these developments if they take place. The potential of the Yukon is just being remotely scratched at the present time. In the last few months the indications have been that there is a storehouse of minerals there equal to or greater than that of old Ontario and Quebec. We speak of "old Ontario" now as being the Timmins and Kirkland Lake area and of "old Quebec" as being the Noranda and Bourlamaque belt.

If the storehouse of the Yukon is to be developed we will require power; but we will also require water, and if the Yukon river is diverted to such a degree that this essential water is taken from us it may seriously hinder the development of these new mining properties. I realize it is more efficient from the point of view of per cubic foot of water to turn it over the pass and get a thousand foot head instead of taking it down the Yukon river. Infinitely more power can be developed in this way than at such sites as Miles canyon and others on the river; but the essential thing is that we must take great care not to lose the water without adequate safeguard.

The question of navigation also is important. The Yukon river is shallow, and the removal of a large percentage of the flow of water from the lakes and headwaters feeding the Yukon river will make navigation that much more difficult. There is some coal development at Carmacks but it is not of a very high quality and the obtaining of power therefrom is certainly a doubtful economic factor. The Yukon river freezes five or six feet deep, but there is still water flowing underneath it at Dawson. If the flow is considerably decreased it is conceivable that the Yukon may freeze solid, as do such rivers as the Hay, and become useless in wintertime as a source of water.

I realize that so far as the development at Keno Hill and other places is concerned there is a supply of water available all through the year from deep lakes. These developments of course are not on the Yukon but on a tributary of the river. I mention this matter not for the purpose of saying that the proposal should be damned out of hand but to indicate that most careful consideration should be given before a natural resource is diverted from the Canadian watershed over the international border and the resulting power and water thus pass out of our hands. There may be an agreement, or an agreement may be worked out between the Aluminum Company of America and the other governments—the Yukon government, the government of British Columbia, the federal government and the government of Alaska; nevertheless at the moment I would certainly be opposed to this development until I could be absolutely satisfied that no harm would result to the over-all economy of the Yukon. At present, Mr. Speaker, I consider that the danger of doing irreparable damage to the whole life of the Yukon is too great to proceed without the most careful consideration of this matter.

(Translation):

Mr. P. H. Spence (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks, it would be very ungracious on my part if I did not offer my warm congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It gives me even greater pleasure to do so since I was elected on the same day as those two members. Yet, in spite of all my sympathy for them I must say that I do not share their views.

The electors of Roberval county have entrusted me with a few messages for the government and it gives me great pleasure to speak on their behalf.

The constituency I represent is located some 200 miles north of Quebec city, on the south and west shores of lake St. John. I wish to make its position known because my electors are under the impression that their constituency has been forgotten in the past. I hope that the circumstances surrounding my election have contributed to put it on the map once again.

I will not pretend that my constituency has been totally and completely ignored in the past, because one of my predecessors was named, some years ago, to the board of transport commissioners and my immediate predecessor, your assistant in this house, occupied the chair in which you are now sitting, Mr. Speaker. I must pay a tribute to my immediate predecessor, His Honour Mr. Justice J. Alfred Dion, who owes to his personal qualities his nomination as judge of the superior court.

If my constituency has reason to be proud of its representatives, unfortunately it has no reason to be satisfied with the treatment meted out to it as far as its particular needs are concerned. No doubt, this is one of the reasons why my constituents have decided to withdraw, once and for all, their confidence in the Liberal party—

Mr. Dupuis: For the last time.

Mr. Spence: You said it. We will see about it later. Our district, which includes the constituencies of Chicoutimi, Lapointe, Lake St. John and Roberval, is served by the Canadian National Railways. I belong to a family several members of which have been employees of this railroad at one time. As a matter of fact I myself worked for the Canadian National Railways for a couple of years. I even have a relative who lost his life in an accident.

I moreover belong to one of the pioneer families of that district known for the tastiness and abundance of its blueberries. I heard from my forebears the story of the various changes which have taken place in the structure and the names of the companies which preceded the Canadian National Railways and which eventually led to the government assuming control of them.

Our first railway was built approximately 70 years ago in answer to the needs of the early colonization period. Since its construction, there have been absolutely no changes in its route. As for the road itself it has been improved very slowly, and generally after disastrous derailments or collisions due to the poor organization of the system.

And, Mr. Speaker, you may be sure that these accidents were by no means due to excessive speeds since even today—I mention the fact just for the sake of comparison—the trip from Quebec city to Dolbeau, a distance of 233·4 miles, takes 10 hours and 35 minutes, the average speed being 22 miles per hour. On the other hand, modern trackage and straight lines between the larger urban centres make it possible, for instance, to cover in six hours the 289·5 miles separating Ottawa from Quebec city.

I recognize the fact that passenger service may not be a source of large revenue in our region. I know, however, that express and freight services make that section of the Canadian National system one of the most profitable to operate. A great many freight trains run on that line each day, carrying farm produce and the output of our six pulp and paper mills, of our two aluminum plants and of our numerous lumber mills.

They also carry all the goods required to satisfy the needs of our industries and our population. The latest census, that of 1951, shows that our district, which is served by one railway only, the Lake St. John railway operated by the Canadian National, has a population of 197,910; that is more than twice the population of Prince Edward Island and 55 per cent of the population of the province of Newfoundland.

For years now we have been asking for the rebuilding of this line or the construction of a new line suited to our needs, but always to no avail. The Canadian National Railways should get such a project under way without delay and should also undertake the building of a railway to serve our Chibougamau mining area where, according to authoritative sources, the capital which is continually being spent will be useless as long as there is no railroad into that district. However I shall have other opportunities of discussing this matter during the present session. Yet, I would like to draw, for the benefit of the house, a comparison between our railways and our highway system. By railroad, the distance between Quebec and Chicoutimi is 227·4 miles and by automobile the distance is only 132 miles or less than two-thirds the distance covered by the railroad. It is easily done in three hours while it takes ten hours to do it by train.

The progress of our highway system has followed and sometimes preceded agricultural, industrial and commercial development in our district, while our railway system has undergone no change whatsoever since the days when our district was first opened to colonization. As a matter of record, I must say that our highway system has been improved through the generosity of the present premier of Quebec and through the untiring efforts and undisputed ability of the member for Chicoutimi in the provincial legislature, the Hon. Antonio Talbot, minister of highways.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that if you had the opportunity to travel by railroad in my constituency, you would be perfectly convinced that we are not the ones who, in order to improve our railroad, have stolen rails from the Petawawa military camp.

In the course of recent debates, I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) say, and I quote from page 157 of Hansard:

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to go over what I feel is discrimination in the collection of income taxes from farmers in various parts of Canada. I was going to refer, as I have on previous occasions, to the fact that while approximately $6,725,000 was collected in 1949 from farmers in Saskatchewan, for example, in the same year only $51,000 was collected from all the farmers in Quebec. I had hoped to answer some of the statements made towards the end of the last session by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I can remember him saying that it was difficult to collect farm income taxes in Quebec, but even so in that province the government had only 22 income tax inspectors, whereas in Saskatchewan where according to the minister it was a simple matter to collect income tax from the farmers, he had 60 income tax inspectors.

(Translation):

The authorities in the Department of National Revenue, in my opinion, surely know where to find the money, and if the department keeps 60 inspectors in Saskatchewan and only 22 in the province of Quebec, it may be that more supervision is required in the province of the hon. member. In any event, it is certainly because there are a great deal more income taxes to collect from Saskatchewan farmers than from those of the province of Quebec.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the hon. member for Assiniboia is misleading and cannot but prejudice the reputation for honesty of the most deserving and respectable social group of the province which I represent.

I do not wish to make an extended eulogy of the farmers of Quebec, but I would like it to be remembered that they are the pioneers in this country and that, if only for that reason, they should have a right to expect to be spared some misleading insinuations.

Nobody should be surprised if the farmers of Quebec do not pay as much taxes as the western farmers. There is no comparison at all between the two types of farming nor between the revenues involved, especially. True they do have a guaranteed support price for their product, but such a support price does not even allow them to break even. In spite of such support prices indeed they are, at present, obliged to sell their products below the supposedly guaranteed level. In most cases their income tax forms show a net loss.

The first time I spoke to this house, on June 26 last, I said, as reported on page 3801 of the English Hansard for that date:

As a result of production costs today and of the closing of foreign markets, our farmers are suffering serious losses in the marketing of their products, ranging from 10 to 25 per cent.

And again, on the same occasion, I said:

—the farmers in my province are under the impression that the Minister of Agriculture denies them the same measure of protection he extends to farmers in other parts of the country. They are not opposed, it is to be noted, to the assistance provided to the wheat producers of our western provinces. They only wish to receive the same consideration from government authorities.

It is my impression that if the farmers of Quebec were better treated, they might also be in a position to pay income tax.

Referring again to the question of farmers' income tax, I should like to point out to the hon. members here present that the professional farm organizations of the province of Quebec provide their members with competent officers to advise them on their income tax problems.

They are advised to file returns, even if they have no profits to show. They are advised to make out returns because they are thus obliged to keep books, which enables them to find out what part of their production is unprofitable. On that score, I do not think it can be said that there is a lack of good faith on the part of anyone.

I also want to point out a downright anomaly in the Income Tax Act as far as our family farming is concerned. Unfortunately, our legislation makes no allowance for this.

Farming, in the province of Quebec, is a family affair, with every member of the family doing his share of the work on the farm. The children start helping as soon as they reach their tenth or twelfth year. Even the young girls at certain times of the year do their good share of the work, and often the mother must divide her time between housekeeping and farm work. It is the mother, for instance, who looks after the truck garden, and in many parts of our province when the head of the family must go away to the lumber camps in winter in order to be able to go on working his land during the summer, it is the mother who looks after the livestock.

I quote the text relating to the matter of family help, in our Income Tax Act, according to the "Farmers and Fishermen Guide" 1951 edition, as reproduced in the Action Catholique of Nov. 27:

' Salaries earned by children are deductible only inasmuch as:

(a) those salaries have been paid in cash during the year;

(b) the services were rendered with a view to producing the income;

(c) the services would otherwise have required the hiring of help and

(d) the amount is reasonable, taking into account the child's age and the wages which would otherwise be paid to an outside worker to perform the same task.

One cannot claim as expenses the value of the upkeep of dependent children.

The Action Catholique from which the quotation is drawn goes on saying:

Let us assume that a farmer has three sons and that the work they do on the land is not paid for, for this land will one day be theirs and they shall profit by the improvements to it. Now if, in this case, the father does not pay his children any wages, all the income from the soil will be considered from the point of view of income tax, as having been earned by only one man, that is by the head of the family. This situation is unfair and contrary to common sense, but it nevertheless exists under our present Income Tax Act.

Our legislation only provides for cases where wages were paid during the current year; consequently, wages paid in former years may not be considered in the event of the father's death, for instance, and are only deductible if used to pay for services rendered in order to produce revenue, for which services the farmer would otherwise have been obliged to hire labour.

In practice, this is equivalent to saying that the farmer, who is paying wages to the members of his family, may not put these wages down as expenses, for, in a number of cases, he would not have hired any labour for this work.

I believe that a revision of our Income Tax Act by the Department of National Revenue is urgently needed, in order to correct this anomaly.

[Mr. Spence.]

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that this government should not yet have found markets for our farm products. In the meantime, our farmers see their products piling up in an alarming way in warehouses. All cold storage plants of the country are being filled to capacity with farm products for which we cannot find markets.

In spite of support prices, our farmers are compelled to sell their pork and beef for the low prices that are offered them on account of the glutting of the market. Floor prices being already too low, since they are 15 or 20 per cent lower than they were six years ago—when bacon hogs were selling at 32 cents—and the cost of feed and labour having increased, our livestock breeders are having unjustified deficits this year.

It should be recalled that during the last world war our dairy farmers and other agricultural producers made heavy sacrifices in order to help the cause of free nations. Owing to their generous contribution, they were promised at that time that once the war was over and business got going again in a normal way, they would have markets readily available for their products. Unfortunately those who believed in those promises are now greatly disappointed. For some time following the end of the war, they were able to get fair prices. Then, they incurred considerable expenses in order to improve their production and modernize their farms. And now, year after year since 1946, while the cost of living index, for them as well as for the other social groups, went up from 143 to nearly 185, the marketing possibilities have been dwindling, bringing about a considerable drop in the prices of agricultural products. Our farmers will be struggling against a hopeless situation, unless there is immediate action on the part of the Department of Agriculture.

I would like to deal briefly with the most pressing problems we are facing today, i.e., federal-provincial relations.

The province of Quebec is anxious to see the question of taxation powers as far as direct taxes are concerned—which belong to the provinces but have been taken away from them by the central government—settled once and for all and in a way acceptable to all. This view is shared by other provinces also, and some have already shown how dissatisfied they are with the agreements now in force.

But if there is a general impression abroad that only Quebec is not satisfied, that is because the prime minister of that province has steadfastly refused the federal proposals and shown an unshakable resolve that the provinces will retain the rights which were assured to them when first they united to form the Canadian confederation.

When the central government enters the provincial fields, the constitution is being violated. The federal government is not a superior body which has delegated certain powers to secondary or district administrations and which is in a position to do away with such powers of its own volition, according to the whim and fancy of those who direct it. No, Canada is a union of autonomous provincial states, independent from one another and independent from the central authority in those fields which are their own.

It is quite possible, of course, that our federal system, now 75 years old, may need some readjustment. I am not competent enough in the legal field to answer yes or no. Nevertheless if there were some readjustments involved, it should never be carried out without the unanimous consent of all the contracting parties.

Mr. Dupuis: This has been done.

Mr. Spence: But as soon as one of the contracting parties impinges upon the jurisdiction of his neighbour, we fall into abuse of power, into disunity. There is also the danger of falling into duplication of services working in the same spheres, thus doubling the charges to be borne by the taxpayers.

To our regret, the speech from the throne makes no mention of the federal government's intention of entering into discussions with the provinces in order to settle this question once and for all.

As long as the present situation exists, conflicts will multiply between the provinces and the federal government, and our municipalities and school boards will have to be content with grossly inadequate budgets. Even if our municipal councils and school boards make every effort and exhaust themselves in their attempts to find solutions to their problems, their efforts will remain futile, because the taxpayers are already substantially overtaxed. It is only by a new redistribution of taxation fields that it will be possible for them to obtain new sources of income.

And such redistribution will only be made possible when taxation rights monopolized by the central government have been returned to the provinces. Arrangements between the municipalities and the provinces will then be possible and advantageous.

I wish to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on the stand he took in this connection. It met with general approval in Quebec and throughout the country. The press was unanimous in commending his stand.

Le Devoir of November 29, in an editorial entitled: "Power to starve" and signed by its managing editor, Mr. Gerard Filion, stated:

> The leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Drew, has set out more strongly than ever the stand of his party on the question of the distribution of taxing powers. He came out flatly against the existing federal-provincial agreements and for an agreement between Ottawa and the provinces that would allow each government to retain the taxation fields necessary for the discharge of its responsibilities.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear!

Mr. Spence: To go on with the quotation:

> Mr. Drew reminded us of the temporary character of these agreements and he chided the federal government for their obvious unfairness; have they not, indeed, extended to peace time, agreements which should have applied only to war years? Mr. Drew has called attention to the recent objections of the premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Macdonald, as well as to the displeasure expressed by the premier of Ontario, Mr. Frost, at the time the agreement was signed between Ottawa and Toronto. He charged the Liberal government with the responsibility of a policy conducive to the gradual ruin of the provinces, which tend to fall under the financial domination of the central government.
> All well considered, Mr. Drew seems to have definitely joined the ranks of those who support fiscal decentralization. He is for the respect, in every detail of the letter, of the confederation pact, which grants to the provinces priority in the field of direct taxation for provincial purposes, as well as the spirit of confederation which gives autonomous powers to Ottawa and to the provinces within the limits of their respective jurisdictions.

I am convinced that the province of Quebec would support any reasonable formula which would safeguard its rights. Mr. Duplessis, the avowed champion of provincial rights in the province of Quebec, has proved with sufficient clarity that his intentions are sincere, for he told the delegates he recently met—and I quote Le Devoir of November 27:

> If I knew that my withdrawal could definitely settle the constitutional problem, I would abandon politics because the life of a man is unimportant when the survival of a people is at stake.

Mr. Speaker, if I were a government supporter—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is very candid.

Mr. Spence: —I think that I would take note of that statement by the premier of the province of Quebec—

Mr. Dupuis: Don't worry, he will not go.

Mr. Spence: —because that statement should bring the federal government to undertake immediate negotiations with the provinces.

I also regret that the government makes no mention in the speech from the throne of its intention of putting an end to the wastage of public funds, of which examples have been given in this house by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

As my time is limited, I will not deal at any length with the purchase of boots, shoes, ties, teapots, rugs and carpets. Neither will I speak of the raincoat purchases.

However, I wish to point out that in the county of Roberval, which I have the great honour of representing in this house, I know of very few heads of families with enough money to buy for their children and for themselves $15 shoes at the rate of 10 pairs a year, clothing at the rate of $1,400 every second year per person, raincoats at the rate of 16 per person per year, and ties by the dozen—

Mr. Dupuis: During the depression, they didn't have $10 either.

Mr. Spence: You came into my district and nobody would listen to you!

On the other hand, I know of a great many heads of families, whose earnings, acquired by them through their own labour, under difficult conditions, are largely funnelled away, through direct and indirect taxation, to the federal treasury, from where they emerge once more to be squandered with no regard to even the most elementary principles of economy. And yet these men would really need to retain a greater part of their earnings in order that their children may be assured of the benefits of the education to which they are entitled.

The financial advisers of the Department of Finance would be well advised to mingle with the people. They would then be in a position to see how the burden of taxation is giving rise everywhere to discontent. On their return they might well give some judicious advice to their superiors.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): There is Mr. Duplessis' sales tax too.

Mr. Spence: There is no Mr. Duplessis here.

Mr. Fleming: High taxes will make you lose the next election.

Mr. Spence: We are in urgent need of housing in Roberval county. We are facing a situation which is getting worse every day, and in an alarming way.

Young people who are founding new homes have no place to live in, unless they are satisfied with one or two rooms, and heads of families with children must rely on the law to keep the accommodations they have. Such a situation cannot last indefinitely. When rent control is abolished by the Quebec government—and that is bound to happen sooner or later—homeless families will be numerous.

Mr. Boisvert: That is again a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Spence: Never mind, you will have your turn also.

The high cost of living, the cost of building materials, the cost of labour are all factors which make it impossible, in practice, to build a house for a family of average income, in the present circumstances. And I suppose that when all these things go down, there will be no more money left for building purposes.

Here and there commendable efforts are attempted to overcome the difficulty. Housing co-operatives may be credited with real achievements but they are not able to fulfil all the demands, owing to the lack of interest for that kind of loan on the part of lending institutions in general or to the fact that the initial amount to be supplied by the would-be owner is too high, or again because our municipalities are not able to service the land for those who want to build, as for instance in my own town of Mistassini.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Duplessis is against it.

Mr. Spence: We started fifteen years ago at Dolbeau—the most prosperous and interesting industrial centre of my county—a housing co-operative, and it was only after many years of work and research, of studies, of canvassing loan companies, and of devotion on the part of the officers of our co-operative, whose services were—I take pleasure in saying so—voluntary, that it became possible to undertake the building of a score of houses.

May I briefly emphasize that the cost of these housing units is most advantageous, and that the plans used by the co-operatives have enabled them to build very nice homes. Nevertheless, the project could not have been carried out, if the Société des Artisans Canadiens-Français had not agreed to grant the necessary loans. It gives me pleasure to pay tribute to this society for its great understanding of social problems and for having, more particularly, made the Dolbeau project possible.

It is urgent that this government bring about the necessary changes in the housing act, so that prospective owners can make use of it.

There is everywhere a serious housing problem, in our small industrial towns, in our rural parishes, as well as in our great urban centres.

The housing co-operatives are the most appropriate organizations to undertake such projects. And the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) would certainly be well-advised to get in touch with those co-operatives and ask for their suggestions with a view to launching a really practical and economical program.

They have had practical experience and their advice could only be quite sound.

Since reference was made recently in this house to the Roberval election, you will allow me, in closing my remarks, to address a message to the member who raised that question.

Following a by-election in which a Bloc Populaire candidate had been elected to the house, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) made the following declaration, which can be found in Hansard, page 128, volume I, session of 1944:

I note with satisfaction that the Liberal members seem to have fully recuperated from the fatigue of their pilgrimage to Stanstead.

Mr. Speaker, I have personally noticed, since my arrival here, that the 15 or 16 Liberal members, including a minister and a parliamentary assistant, who went to Roberval to launch a crusade last May, have not yet recovered from their disappointment.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You have not recovered from your own surprise.

Mr. Brisson: It is hard to do so.

Mr. Spence: That was, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier: Now is the time for applause!

Mr. Spence: That was, Mr. Speaker, a real crusade. The people of Roberval were more than a little surprised to see among the Liberal members who came to pay them a visit on that occasion the former organizer for the Bloc Populaire Canadien, the member for Portneuf, and the former Conservative party organizer in Quebec, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault).

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You will agree too that that is the only time you ever won an election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must point out that his time was up at eight fifty-three. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the house to go on?

Some hon. Members: Let him go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well, the hon. member has unanimous consent.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Speaker, I only have three lines more to say. The hon. member for Portneuf spoke of neckties in his speech. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say that that must certainly remind him of a certain story about pants which, some years ago, precipitated quite a sweep in a provincial legislature to which he belonged. Possibly he is afraid that this story of ties may bring about the same consequences next year for the party to which he belongs.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member spoke of my work in his county as organizer for the Bloc Populaire during the provincial campaign of 1944, but he forgot to mention that he was one of our supporters and that I went to his place—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order!

Mr. Spence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! The hon. member for Portneuf rose on a question of privilege, but I must inform him that the matter he has raised does not justify his speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was his privilege and mine.

(Text):

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I regret having to prevent the taking of a vote at this time, but I wanted to say something directly on the subamendment. Before doing so, may I say that this alignment of gadgets hanging from the ceiling of this chamber has in my opinion given it the appearance of a coal mine washhouse. In a mine washhouse there are a number of ropes hanging down from the ceiling, each with a little basket in which the miner places his clothes when he has changed. My first reaction on looking at the chamber with its present arrangement was that we had turned the House of Commons into a mine washhouse. It may have improved the facilities in the galleries; visitors may be able to hear better up there, but I do not think it has done much for the chamber itself.

Mr. McIvor: It sure does.

Mr. Gillis: In my opinion all it does is give our voices a kind of harsh, rasping sound. It does not improve the acoustics in the chamber very much. In fact when Mr. Speaker is deciding a point of order, as you did a few minutes ago during the donnybrook, it is quite hard to hear. I could not hear you, as your voice was muffled and not clear at all. All I got was a sort of hollow sound and your instructions or orders were not very clear. If at times we do not seem to be obeying the rules strictly it will be due to this gadget arrangement. I think it needs looking over, because it is not very effective.

There is another thing I should like to mention before I take up my main topic. I have had one pleasant experience since the house recessed. As the older members of the house will recall, for approximately ten years I was on my feet quite often asking for the construction of a permanent crossing of the strait or Canso. Many sceptics told me that this was simply a political issue, it was just a dream and nothing would ever come of it. However, I never lost faith because I knew that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), who had a lot to do with the project, had as much faith in this undertaking as I had.

Ultimately the government made the necessary appropriations and a couple of months ago I had the pleasure of going up to the strait of Canso on the invitation of the construction company handling that contract. The project is well under way at the present time, in fact they are working around the clock and doing an excellent job. It was my pleasure—and I can say most sincerely it was a pleasure—to stand there one very cold and dreary afternoon and watch the Minister of Transport push the lever that fired the first blast knocking a huge portion of cape Porcupine into the strait of Canso. An old gentleman was standing close to me who was about 80 years of age, and who evidently had been a Liberal for at least sixty years. He did not know me at all, but he tapped me on the shoulder and said, "My boy, that is the kind of minister to have. When a mountain gets in his way he blows it up." So it was a very pleasant experience, and because I have been a carping critic for many years it gives me great pleasure to say now what I have said. My faith was justified, and by and large in this world if you have not faith you have not much left.

I should also like to say a few words about a problem that is not Canada's alone but is world-wide. When I sit in the house and listen to members arguing over small political issues, members demanding more social security, less taxation and so on, it is an indication to me that democracy is at work. But the thing we have to keep in mind is that we must be very careful not to select people and give them power merely for the purpose of holding power. Most of our internal problems today are affected by external problems, by affairs outside of Canada that have the whole world tied into an economic knot, and these matters must be given a great deal of attention.

Yesterday I listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We are all very proud that he has been elevated to the position he holds today. Regardless of where he sits in this house he is still a Canadian, and to be selected for an international post such as he holds indicates that he is a man of some considerable stature. As I listened to him yesterday afternoon I recalled listening to the same man three or four years ago, and I thought he was not the honest Mike Pearson that he was then. I am not saying that he was not honest, but in his short statement yesterday afternoon he appeared to me to be hesitant, doubtful, uncertain and fearful. These are complexes that are not peculiar today to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They affect practically everybody in the country, and any member of the house who travels throughout the country, meets audiences of people and talks to them finds exactly the same complexes in every section of our society—uncertainty, doubt and fear.

In my opinion it adds up to the fact that nobody has measured up to the responsibility of giving leadership fearlessly without regard to politics, religion or anything else. I have read a little bit about the problem. As most of you know I am not an expert. I am just a coal miner, but I try to sift the facts of the problem as it exists. We must stop and think for one moment about what is taking place outside of Canada which has a terrific impact on our internal problems. We must remember that since the major shooting stopped in 1945—because the war has never ended—we have entered into a new war, the cold war, the war of ideas. I believe that in 1945 the countries that now form NATO took a fair and reasonable position. Their intention was to bring about recovery. They intended to devote the economies of the countries that were productive to the rehabilitation of the countries that had been devastated by war. We began immediately to disarm and scrap our merchant service, and the whole emphasis so far as North America and Great Britain were concerned was on recovery. A terrific drain was placed on the economies of Great Britain, Canada and particularly the United States.

Our main emphasis was on recovery; but the other fellows, the Soviet union, who threaten the peace of the world today, took the reverse position. Instead of adhering to the policy of no territorial ambitions which they had followed throughout the years and following up the idea that they were just our allies in a great crusade against fascism, they immediately began a program of imperialist expansion and the utilization of satellite countries in order to further their own ends. That forced our countries into the position we have taken. We had to form the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and there were other measures such as UNRRA, Marshall aid and so on.

In order to prevent war we are forced into a position today where we must drain our economies. We must spend billions of dollars on military equipment for necessary defence purposes in the cold war. We are up against Korea. We are up against all kinds of problems, and as a result the economies of the free nations are being drained in two directions. First of all we are trying to rehabilitate the devastation of war and help backward countries through our production year after year, and on top of that we have to rearm to defend ourselves in the cold war going on at the present time.

The people who have forced us into this type of action are sitting back. They are military countries. They do not have to sell their people the idea of a defence program and taxation. They order it, while we have to sell these things to our people. The whole totalitarian set-up is based on force and action. They have their objective and they are sitting back within their own borders, not using their manpower, conserving their resources and using the manpower, economies and everything else of the satellite countries all around them. That is the problem with which we are faced, and it is one that is not being made clear to the people of Canada.

I do not find many people taking the platform today and selling our people the idea that if we are to preserve the civilization of the world and prevent disaster it is necessary to build up our security, to arm so that we may defend ourselves if and when we are attacked, while at the same time making available to our people what social security we can. I say the press of this country is not doing a good job in that direction. Pick up practically any newspaper from one end of this country to the other and take a look at the editorial pages where the brains of the press are supposed to be spelling out the problems that confront this country. Instead, you will find them quibbling with a lot of nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: Many of the editorials do not mean a thing. I think each newspaper should allocate one man to make a study of this whole international situation, this cold war and defence in the cold war. That is necessary to inform our people and give them an objective to aim at, particularly a time period when this might be over. Someone should be doing that kind of thing. I mention it this evening because, as I go through this country, I am frightened when I meet people who are confused and fearful and who have no idea where they are going.

I hear people screaming about taxes. All right; the most popular fellow in the world would be one who would stand up and say: I am against taxes completely, and nobody should pay taxes. Well, that would be fine; but at the moment I am not going to be dishonest enough to advocate that to the group of men on the other side of the house. I would take the same attitude if it were the Conservatives over there, and I would take the same attitude if it were the Social Crediters over there.

An hon. Member: What about the C.C.F.?

Mr. Gillis: If the C.C.F. were over there I would still take the same attitude. You cannot go out and sell the people the idea of spending $5 billion on arms unless they know it is necessary. About 51·6 per cent of the tax dollar goes for national defence. Approximately 11 per cent goes for social security, and the rest goes toward the administration of government, veterans' allowances and all that sort of thing. If I were going to say that I did not want to pay any more taxes I would have to be honest enough to tell the other fellows that they would have to cut out something, and there is nothing I can see today that you can cut out.

Now I would just like to say a few words on this amendment to the amendment. If the amendment to the amendment is carried, as I expect it will be—

Mr. Coldwell: Faith again. Great faith.

Mr. Gillis: —it means more expenditure. The amendment to the amendment is very simple. It does not demand anything and does not tell the government that it has to do anything. It is very simple, and I am going to put it on the record again because anything that is worth while is worth repeating. It says:

> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration;
> (b) To implement their proposals to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945.

There is no regimentation there. That does not take away any provincial jurisdiction. It advocates co-operation with the provinces. It is not unreasonable to ask the government to implement or try to put through proposals they have already made. In 1945 they made these proposals.

Now let us have a look at this business of a national health program. Some people here say it is state medicine. Well, nobody has defined state medicine. What is state medicine? I would call it co-operative medicine. I would say it is on all fours with old age security. Nobody objects to the government paying old age pensions. The scheme is on a contributory basis. The taxpayers pay 2 per cent on their taxes. They pay for it and they get it, and there is no stigma attached to it.

Let me give an example of what national health insurance would look like. I have two very good examples. With the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) I was in France in 1944. We visited a big German air force hospital there that was then in allied hands. During our visit I had a talk with a medical doctor, a very competent man who comes from Vancouver; I do not want to name him. We had seen him perform operations, and he was just about as fast and as competent as any doctor I have ever seen. We spent 24 hours or so with him and before we left he said: How are you getting along with national health insurance in Canada? I told him that we were still talking about it, that there was not very much being done about it, and that the government was still very reluctant. I told him I thought we were making progress and that we were selling it to the people of Canada at least. Ultimately, I said, when you make a demand popular, enough politicians looking for votes will generally give the people whatever they demand. If there is pressure enough they will. Well, he said, I am very much concerned about it. He told me that prior to the war he was a young struggling doctor. He said that he was fairly good, and that he specialized in surgery in Vancouver. He said he had a little office with a miracle bottle on one shelf and another miracle bottle on another shelf. He said he was not in a hospital, not on a hospital board, but he was a general practitioner. He told me that when people came to see him he had a fairly good idea of what they required, but they could not afford to pay him and he could not afford to treat them. He said: "I gave them a little shot out of the miracle bottle. It did not do them any harm, but it did not do them very much good; so we were both happy, and it did not cost either of us very much".

Then the war broke out and he got a call from the government. They wanted him in the service. He said he was firmly opposed to national health insurance at that time. He was not opposed to it because of what he knew about it; he was opposed to it because of what somebody had told him about it. When he came into the service he got a uniform, a good salary, his wife and two children got an allowance and he had economic security. He said he found himself in a hospital with nurses, a laboratory, technicians and equipment that he had never dreamed about before. With all the economic insecurity removed he went to work as a doctor, with others, and they began to develop new techniques. All of a sudden he realized that this was socialized medicine. He said: "I am concerned now about when I leave the service, and take off the uniform. Do I go back to the miracle bottle? What happens to all this equipment—nurses, technicians and all that kind of thing?" I told him that I did not know but that we were doing our best to popularize the idea against the time when those who were looking for votes would have to give it to the people of Canada in order to secure their votes.

That was one example. The second example is more recent. I had occasion just a month ago to visit Camp Hill hospital in Halifax, Nova Scotia. I want to tell the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg), and although he is not here it will be on the record, that in that hospital we have one of the most excellent institutions in North America. I spent two days there and I want to pay tribute to the doctors, nurses, orderlies, and the people whom I met there. I think they are as highly trained, as skilful and as conscientious as any people you will find in that profession in North America. The equipment in these veterans' hospitals—I presume it is the same right across this country—cannot be duplicated in 99 per cent of your private hospitals. They have not the funds.

During the time I was there I talked to one or two doctors on this very subject. In private discussion they were afraid of it, the same as the chap I met in France, because of the things people had said about it. It would mean regimentation and all that sort of thing. I asked one fellow this question. Do you believe you are any more efficient in this institution, working on a salary and with the equipment, the laboratories and technicians that you have here, than you would be back in a rural office somewhere with about 40 per cent of your patients unable to pay you? These veterans' hospitals constitute government health insurance for the veterans of this country. The medical care is provided on a non-contributory basis. We pay for it out of taxation, and the cost is spread over the nation as a whole. This scheme provides national health insurance in so far as the veteran population is concerned. We pay the veterans while they are taking treatment.

In 99 per cent of the hospitals across this country you have not the equipment or the personnel that you find in veterans' hospitals. In my opinion these institutions are second to none in North America. If we can do that for the veteran population of this country on the basis upon which we are doing it, and pay for it out of taxation without any financial contribution by the recipient, why can we not do that for everyone in this country on a contributory basis? It could be paid for through the income tax, just as we did for the old age security pension, by adding another 2 per cent to the tax or whatever percentage the actuaries worked out. It is not a vision or a dream any longer, and it is needed.

Some persons tell me we are not ready for it. When are we going to be ready for it? Let us make the facilities we have today available to all the people of this country. Anyone who listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) present his last budget must have realized that half the people of this country cannot pay for medical services at all. Half the salary and wage earners of this country are earning amounts below the income tax level. How can anyone with an income of under $2,000 a year if he is married, or $1,000 a year if he is single, pay hospital or doctors' bills with the present cost of medical services? The result is that these people do not get treatment at all. There is neglect and a lot of casualties because of that neglect. All this is due to the fact that the people cannot afford any more medical attention. We need more hospitals, more doctors, more trained personnel and all that kind of thing. Let us make what we have available to all our people; because there are thousands who cannot afford any medical attention at all.

Let us put the two plans side by side and look at them, the private plan and the national plan. Evidence before the president's commission on health in the United States showed that some private plans take out as much as 94 cents on the dollar, and give only 6 cents in service. Even in Canada, Associated Medical Services takes off 25 cents on the dollar and Blue Cross takes about 18 per cent, 9 per cent for expenses and 9 per cent for reserves. Physicians' plans take 10 to 15 per cent in administrative costs.

On the other hand the province-wide hospital plan in Saskatchewan takes out only 4·6 per cent for expenses, while the Swift Current health plan, a compulsory medical plan, takes out only 5·6 per cent. The facts prove that government plans are cheaper to operate and give you more value for your health dollar. Private plans mean rationing by the purse. They charge the same to the rich and the poor alike. On the other hand, a national health plan would graduate the payments so that low income groups would pay less than the high income groups getting the same service. The private plans reach only a fraction of the population at best. Today not more than half our population is covered by hospital plans, even if you include the government plans in Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and not more than 25 per cent have some kind of medical plan.

A national health program would cover everybody from Vancouver to Newfoundland. The protection afforded by a private plan is limited by all kinds of restrictions about coverage and payments; with a national plan there are very few or no restrictions. It provides all the protection you really need. Private plans cover people far more in urban areas than in rural areas, and the need is greater in rural areas. A national plan would cover rural areas as well as urban areas. Private plans do nothing to provide more doctors, dentists and nurses. A national plan would provide for the training of more professional personnel and build more hospitals; it is all part of the national plan. Private plans are voluntary, which means in effect they do not cover people who are not in a position to subscribe because they cost too much, who do not belong to groups or who just plain forget. Those who do subscribe voluntarily do not always get what they think they paid for. On the other hand a national plan is compulsory, which means in effect that everybody gets covered.

When the government introduces a plan in a democratic way, everyone pays a fair share through general taxation and a graduated social security contribution. Today, under private plans, Canadians are already spending about $450 million on hospitals, medical and other sickness needs. On top of this our governments are spending another $150 million to $200 million, a total of over $600 million. Under a national health plan, in the long run, we would probably spend no more money than we are spending now, but we would spend it more wisely. We would divert our present expenditures into the national plan and get more service for our money.

I see you smiling at me, Mr. Speaker, which indicates that my time has nearly expired. I wanted to make these few remarks about national health insurance tonight, and I think this analysis I have put on the record clearly indicates that national health insurance is no longer a political matter. These statements about regimentation, and all that kind of stuff, are so much nonsense. They should have no place on platforms or in the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada.

National health insurance is a must. It is one of the things, in my opinion, that are absolutely essential. I come from a mining district. We have a fairly reasonable medical plan there. Our doctors are paid on a panel. We built our own hospitals. Half our own men are on the boards. We regulate it in that way. In my opinion it is much better than that which is to be found in most parts of the country; but it is far from adequate. In the last ten years all we have done is step the rate up and up, and the hospital is going into debt all the time.

Half the people in the community require specialist service. We have the sad experience every week of the committee going from house to house in the community taking up a collection to send somebody to Montreal or to Halifax to have a major operation, because the local hospitals have not the facilities to do brain surgery and that kind of thing; and the need is becoming greater every day. The local hospitals are no longer able to carry the burden. The costs have become exorbitant. The services are not there. It is impossible to provide the equipment.

I should like to tell the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), or anyone in this house who takes the view that state medicine is regimentation, to visit some of the veterans' hospitals and take a look at them, take a look at the facilities, and see how simple it is for the doctors to do their work because of the nurses, technicians and so forth that are at their disposal.

I am going to conclude my remarks by saying that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made an excellent speech this afternoon. I am sure the applause that greeted him on rising in the house indicated that we were all very glad to see him back on his feet and in here pitching again, doing the kind of job he has been doing for the last 25 years. He mentioned the means test in the war veterans' allowance, and suggested that we take the means test out of the blind pension. I am not going to elaborate on these things. I have spoken on them before. I merely want to say that I associate myself with him in all the demands he made for improvements in legislation that already exists. I trust that the amendment to the amendment that is now before the house will be carried unanimously.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am going to deal with the amendment to the amendment because I wish to place on record the position we take in connection with it before the vote is taken. Before I do so, however, I propose to deal with certain points that have been raised since I spoke early in this debate, and particularly with some statements that were made after I had spoken, and to which I could not reply until the opportunity arose to speak again, as I now do.

I wish to speak about television, and the statement made yesterday by the minister responsible for that to this house. It was an interesting thing that the minister should choose to make a second statement of policy prior to the time that we actually have before us the legislation which will carry that policy into effect. Probably we shall have another statement of policy before long, because the one we received yesterday was not complete. It did not deal with the question of licence fees, a subject which the members of this house know is a matter of interest to hon. members on the other side as well as on this. I do not think it will be desirable to wait until we get the next statement of policy before dealing with that subject.

At this time I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that it would be desirable that we have an understanding in regard to these speeches which are made by ministers before the orders of the day, as was done by two ministers yesterday. It would help to facilitate the business of this house if we came to a clear understanding in regard to this subject.

I rose yesterday, immediately after the minister had made his statement, and made certain comments. At the time I made those comments it was indicated by some hon. members that they felt that I was out of order in doing so. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that there is no rule which permits a statement by a minister such as that which was made yesterday, and such as those which it is becoming customary to receive in that way. I do suggest that it should become an accepted practice that if ministers are to make statements in regard to policy, not simply answering questions which have already been asked or are asked in the ordinary manner before the orders of the day, there should be an opportunity to comment on that statement immediately; otherwise it would become necessary to insist upon the rules being observed, and to follow the practice which is adopted so frequently at Westminster, namely to precede a statement of policy of that kind by the introduction of a motion.

I feel sure many hon. members will believe that the business of the house can be facilitated and carried on satisfactorily by permitting a procedure of this kind to be followed; but I would point out that if it is to be followed, then also it should be understood that there will be an opportunity to reply, and that those who have accorded to the minister the courtesy of permitting the statement to be made by consent should not then be denied the opportunity to make a subsequent statement. I take this occasion to make these remarks because the opportunity did not present itself to do so yesterday at the time the statement was made.

Now, to deal with the statement in regard to television: I believe it is appropriate to deal with this subject at this time, while the statement of the minister is still fresh in the minds of hon. members, and while there is still time for the government to reconsider its position before it places legislation before us, and then seeks the support of the members of the party to which the government belongs for the adoption of the legislation that will be introduced.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) made a statement yesterday which informed us that certain steps are being taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with the concurrence of the government, and that hon. members will be called upon to approve further loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of extending their facilities.

One of the great difficulties that all members of the house, outside of the government, must have experienced from time to time, is that, when it is convenient for the government to deny responsibility for the actions of the C.B.C., it does so, and when it is convenient to accept responsibility it also does so. Yesterday we were informed that it was the decision of the government that there should be an extension of publicly-owned television broadcasting to certain areas of Canada. The minister said, as reported at page 409 of yesterday's proceedings:

> For some time the government has been giving careful consideration to the development of television broadcasting in Canada. In its consideration it has had in mind the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters, and sciences. The commission recommended that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with the production of television programs and with plans for national coverage. It spoke of extension of national coverage both through publicly and privately-owned stations. It said that no private station should be licensed until the C.B.C. had available national television programs and that all private stations established should be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

It will be seen that the government purports to rely upon the recommendation of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences; and it is stated that it is following the recommendation that no private station should be licensed until the C.B.C. had available national television programs—> —and that all private stations established should be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

We heard a statement on government policy in regard to broadcasting. At the end of his remarks yesterday in which he dealt with broadcasting the minister said, in response to a question of mine about a program which had been put out over the C.B.C. television station in Toronto, that it was not the responsibility of the government to supervise broadcasts of this kind. These were his words:

> Under the Canadian Broadcasting Act, the C.B.C. itself has the full responsibility for all programming matters.

Either the government must accept responsibility or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation must accept responsibility, one or the other. The statement I have just quoted related to an abominable television broadcast over the C.B.C. station at Toronto, about which I have received numerous complaints from parents of children who saw it. We are told that this is the responsibility of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and not the responsibility of the government.

At the very time this statement is made, the government is accepting full responsibility for the policy that is to be followed, and of necessity for all the results from that policy. I wonder if the minister believes that a program such as the one entitled "Hilda Morgan", to which he referred in his remarks yesterday, is the kind of thing that was contemplated by the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, when it recommended that these media for the communication of ideas, of education and of culture should maintain the highest possible standards.

I hope the minister responsible will show a greater interest in the program than he has yet done, and will outline to the house the details of that program in regard to which he expresses no concern. I would hope the minister would be prepared to do that, because he has taken the responsibility for leaving this matter with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, leaving the inference that it is a matter about which members need not be concerned.

I mention this again because a very real problem is going to be raised in regard to these broadcasts of television programs. One of the things which presents itself even now for consideration by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and by members of the House of Commons, is the extent of supervision which should be exercised in regard to programs. A question has already arisen as to whether programs which are based upon moving picture films would be subject to the same provincial supervision as moving pictures now are. This is not something that can be dismissed with the statement that it has already been found that radio broadcasting is under national jurisdiction. A new element arises in connection with television.

Surely it would be a strange thing if a provincial government agency set up for the purpose of examining the films to be shown in moving picture theatres should have the right to say that a film should not be shown in a theatre, but that it could then be taken across the street to a television station and shown in the homes of all those having television sets, without supervision of any kind.

That would indeed produce an astonishing situation. It would mean that in the case of moving picture theatres, where there is at least some restraint in certain circumstances as to the way in which those theatres can be used, a film that might not be shown to persons of all ages in such theatres could, however, be shown right in the homes where children of any age might be looking at television broadcasts.

I do not need to extend the argument on that point. It is obvious that this presents a great difficulty. Unless there is likely to be an immediate demand for very rigid supervision of television broadcasting, then it would seem that a very high measure of responsibility must be accepted by the C.B.C. for the type of television programs it projects into the homes of the people of this country.

Let me come now to the statement of policy enunciated yesterday in regard to these new stations. The minister said, and I quote from page 409 of Hansard of December 8:

> A television station can serve only a comparatively small area. Canada is very large and it will require a good many stations before television can be brought to the people in most parts of our country.

Those are the minister's words. I think everyone will agree that that is a statement which must be borne in mind when considering what is likely to happen in this country in connection with television broadcasting. Having pointed out that television stations can serve only comparatively small areas and that in a large country like this it will require a great many stations to serve the public, the minister then went on to say that as a matter of policy the government had decided that out of the taxpayers' money television would be provided in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax.

The C.B.C. is to exercise its monopoly control to take over the areas where private investment would have most quickly provided television programs without expense to those receiving the programs and without expense to the taxpayers of Canada. Instead of doing that the government says it has decided that the C.B.C. will occupy these fields, that its monopoly will be absolute for the time being and that no private station will be given a licence in those areas to compete with the C.B.C. stations. In this statement of policy for which the government accepts full responsibility—and must accept full responsibility since it was announced as a statement of policy by the government—there is not one word to suggest why television broadcasting should be on an entirely different basis from radio broadcasting.

Why is it that in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Halifax and Ottawa several radio stations compete with each other, private stations competing with publicly-owned stations and vice versa, yet when we come to television there is to be no competition? The fact is that this is the very field in which there should be competition. Here is the very field where competition is the only thing that will assure a standard of programs such as will attract our people to this new means of communicating ideas, news, entertainment and cultural programs of different kinds.

There is another important factor. The minister informed this house yesterday that because television stations cover such small areas as compared with the enormous areas covered by the powerful radio stations it will require, to use his words, a good many stations before television can be brought to the people in most parts of our country. The policy of the government, as announced to the house yesterday, is that the government has decided —not the C.B.C.—that it is going to occupy the areas where the financial returns would have made it possible to obtain programs from private stations without cost to the public and leave to private investment those distant areas where the financial returns will make it most difficult to establish stations.

As I pointed out yesterday, the basic concept of a publicly-owned system of broadcasting was to make it possible to carry to the people in every part of Canada radio broadcast programs. That was the main reason for exercising certain controls and providing facilities for programs at distant points in Canada. The government is now stating that it accepts the responsibility for denying to the people in distant points the opportunity to obtain programs from the organization maintained by the taxpayers' money. If the government stands by the policy announced yesterday it means that the taxpayer along the British Columbia coast, throughout northern Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, along the Atlantic coast—yes, in fact in most parts of Canada, because there is a very limited area within which these six stations mentioned can broadcast programs—is going to be paying out of his tax money for something that gives him no advantage, and is going to be called upon to provide the money which makes it possible for the people in the Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver areas to receive this advantage.

Surely that is wholly inconsistent with every basic concept of this publicly-owned system which was set up some years ago by a Conservative government here in this parliament.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL; KOREAN RESOLUTIONS; RESOLUTIONS ON RACE CONFLICT IN SOUTH AFRICA

December 5, 1952

Sir,

The general assembly of the United Nations, at its 399th plenary meeting on December 3, 1952, adopted a resolution under item 16 (a) of its agenda—Korea: Reports of the United Nations commission for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea. Under the terms of that resolution, originally sponsored by the government of India, the president of the general assembly is requested "to communicate the following proposals to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement so that an immediate cease-fire would result and be effected; to invite their acceptance of these proposals and to make a report to the general assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate". In discharge of the duty placed upon me by the terms of that resolution, I have the honour to transmit to you the text of the resolution and to invite your acceptance of the proposals contained therein.

2. I send this message to you against the background of the casualties, the sufferings, and the destruction in Korea which are the inevitable consequence of war, and I add my personal appeal that you should give it your most thoughtful and sympathetic consideration. When the first committee of the general assembly, by an unanimous decision, agreed to treat the Korean question as a matter of urgency, its decision reflected the concern of all members of the United Nations, a concern which I am sure is shared by the peoples of the world, over the tragedy of war and devastation in Korea, and their deep desire to bring this war to an end on terms acceptable to both sides. To this end negotiations have been proceeding for some sixteen months at Panmunjom, in the course of which a wide measure of agreement on the terms of an armistice has been reached. The sole remaining issue which has not been settled in the course of these armistice negotiations concerns the principles and procedures by which the repatriation of prisoners of war can be effected.

3. In itself, the prisoners of war issue is a challenge to the fundamental humanitarian instincts which are shared by all mankind and urgently calls for solution. In camps on both sides, human beings have been kept for long months under military detention while the lengthy negotiations concerning their fate have been continuing. There is an inescapable moral obligation on both sides in the Korean conflict to make every possible effort to ensure that these prisoners of war shall be free to return to their homelands, and their speedy return facilitated.

4. The discussion of this matter in the first committee of this assembly has made clear the general agreement in the United Nations that this problem should be dealt with and the repatriation of prisoners of war should be effected under the terms of the Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war of August 12, 1949, under the well-established principles and practice of international law, and under the relevant provisions of the draft armistice agreement. It was also generally agreed that prisoners of war should be released from the custody of the detaining powers to a repatriation commission so that they can be free to exercise their undoubted right with respect to repatriation, and that it was inconsistent with common humanitarian principles that a detaining power should offer any hindrance to the return to their homelands of any prisoners of war. Finally, there was general agreement that the Geneva convention cannot be construed as authorizing a detaining power to employ force to effect the return of individual prisoners of war to their homelands.

5. The general assembly resolution clearly states the above principles with respect to the solution of the prisoner of war issue, and, in addition, makes concrete proposals with regard to the machinery of repatriation. It represents ideas put forward by many governments represented in the general assembly whose unanimous desire is to bring peace to Korea. The resolution can make this desire effective because its acceptance will make it possible to achieve an armistice and a complete and immediate cessation of hostilities.

6. The resolution, in addition, makes reference to the desire of the general assembly to expedite and facilitate, once an armistice is effective, the convening of a political conference provided for in article 60 of the draft armistice agreement already accepted by the military negotiators at Panmunjom.

7. It is my earnest hope that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China will accept these proposals of the general assembly as a basis for the solution of the one remaining issue which has prevented the conclusion of an armistice during the negotiations at Panmunjom. Once this issue is solved, it will become possible to bring the fighting to an end and complete the program for a peaceful settlement in Korea leading, we must hope, towards a more general settlement which would contribute to peace in Asia and in the world.

8. The United Nations is determined to do everything possible to bring the fighting to an end in Korea. This is also the declared aim of the Central People's Government. This common aim can be achieved if the proposals which are now submitted for your consideration are, as I earnestly hope will be the case, accepted in the spirit in which they are put forward. In this hope, as president of the seventh session of the general assembly of the United Nations, I appeal to you to accept these proposals of the United Nations as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement which will serve to bring about a constructive and durable peace in Korea.

9. I shall look forward to receiving as soon as possible your reply to this communication, which I shall report to the general assembly when it is received.

10. In accordance with the decision of the general assembly, the text of the resolution has also been communicated to the North Korean authorities, to whom I am sending a similar message.

11. Please acccept, sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

LESTER B. PEARSON
President,
General Assembly.

His Excellency,
Mr. Chou En-lai,
Minister for Foreign Affairs,
Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, PEKING, China.

KOREA

21-POWER RESOLUTION

(This resolution did not come to the vote)

Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Honduras, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Nicaragua, New Zealand, Norway, Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay: Draft resolution on Korea

United Nations

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY,

1. HAVING RECEIVED the special report of the Unified Command of 18 October 1952 on the status of military action and the armistice negotiations in Korea,

2. NOTING with approval the efforts of the United Nations negotiators to achieve a just and honourable armistice to bring an end to the fighting in Korea in accordance with United Nations principles,

3. NOTING FURTHER that disagreement on one remaining issue has prevented the achievement of such an armistice,

4. REAFFIRMS the earnest intention of the United Nations to reach a just and honourable settlement of the Korean conflict;

5. NOTES WITH APPROVAL the tentative agreements which the United Nations Command has reached on behalf of the United Nations;

6. NOTES WITH APPROVAL the principle followed by the United Nations Command with regard to the question of repatriation of prisoners of war, and the numerous proposals which the United Nations Command has made to solve the questions in accordance with this humanitarian principle;

7. NOTES FURTHER that other suggestions consistent with the basic humanitarian position of the United Nations Command have been made by various Members of the United Nations;

8. CALLS UPON the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and upon the North Korean authorities to avert further bloodshed by having their negotiators agree to an armistice which recognizes the rights of all prisoners of war to an unrestricted opportunity to be repatriated and avoids the use of force in their repatriation;

9. REQUESTS the President of the General Assembly to transmit this resolution to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities, and to make a report to the General Assembly as soon as he deems appropriate during the present session on the result of his action.

Mexico: draft resolution

The General Assembly,

WHEREAS it is the purpose of the United Nations to restore peace and, therefore, to achieve the cessation of hostilities in Korea through the conclusion of a just and honourable armistice;

United Nations

WHEREAS from official reports at the disposal of the General Assembly it follows that the only obstacle to the conclusion of the armistice lies in the fact that it has not been possible to reach an agreement in regard to the exchange of prisoners of war;

WHEREAS the United Nations must safeguard the application of the humanitarian principles that underlie the international instruments in force relating to prisoners of war;

A

REQUESTS the President of the General Assembly to invite, through the channels that he may deem appropriate, the Military Commanders of the North Korean and Chinese forces in Korea to consider the following general bases for the exchange of prisoners of war, with a view to facilitate the early conclusion of the armistice:

1. Prisoners of war held by either of the parties, who have voluntarily expressed their desire to return to the country of their origin, will be repatriated without delay upon the conclusion of the armistice.

2. Other prisoners of war held by either of the parties, desirous of establishing temporary residence in other States, would not return to the country of their origin until the coming into force of the decisions that, in order to achieve a peaceful settlement of the Korean question, might be adopted in the Political Conference that will take place after the armistice, in conformity with the agreement reached by the Military Commanders, on point 5 of the Armistice agenda.

3. Pending the entry into force of the abovementioned decisions, the situation of the prisoners of war referred to in paragraph 2 shall be governed by the following rules:

(a) The General Assembly, acting in the manner and through the channel it may deem appropriate, will negotiate with each State agreeing to participate in the plan envisaged in this Resolution, on the number of prisoners which such a State may be prepared to receive in its territory, as well as on the conditions inherent to their admission.

(b) Once in the country of temporary residence, the authorities of that country shall grant them a migratory status which would enable them to work in order to provide for their needs.

4. When the situation foreseen for their repatriation arises as described in paragraph 2 above, the authorities of the countries of origin would grant facilities for the return of of the ex-prisoners of war and would furnish guarantees for the subsequent protection of their freedom and their lives.

5. In the case of those ex-prisoners of war, who, by virtue of the present Resolution, would be provisionally residing in another country and would express their will to return to their country of origin before the situation foreseen for their repatriation in the terms of paragraph 2 has arisen, the United Nations would provide the means to carry their wishes into effect.

B

REQUESTS the President of the General Assembly to report to the Assembly in due course concerning the result of the steps which he is asked to take by this Resolution.

Peru: draft resolution

The General Assembly,

Expressing the desire of mankind for an immediate, just and honourable peace, and considering that the only issue which has prevented the conclusion of the armistice is that relating to the repatriation of prisoners of war,

Decides:

1. To set up a five-member Commission on which each of the parties to the conflict shall be represented by one delegate. The General Assembly, for its part, shall appoint two delegates and invite the collaboration of a neutral state, not a Member of the United Nations, to be a member of the Commission and to serve as its Chairman.

2. The Commission appointed as aforesaid shall immediately take steps to co-operate in the repatriation of prisoners in accordance with their freely expressed wishes.

3. Prisoners not wishing to be repatriated shall remain under the protection of the Commission in a neutralized zone so long as no provision has been made for their future.

4. The said Commission shall propose to the United Nations at the earliest possible moment the most suitable measures for the final decision as to the future of the prisoners remaining under its protection, one of the measures to be considered being their transfer to the territory of such Powers as may be prepared to receive them, or their settlement in Trust Territories in agreement with the Administering Power concerned. Prisoners shall, in any event, be free to make a decision later concerning their return to their place of origin.

5. In the performance of its functions, the Commission shall be guided by the principles of the United Nations Charter and by the Declaration of Human Rights.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: revised draft resolution

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea,

Considers it necessary:

To establish a Commission for the peaceful setttlement of the Korean question with provision for the participation of the parties directly concerned and of other States, including States which have not taken part in the Korean war. The Commission shall consist of the following members: United States of America, United Kingdom, France, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, People's Republic of China, India, Burma, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, People's Democratic Republic of Korea and South Korea.

To instruct the said Commission to take immediate steps for the settlement of the Korean question on the basis of the unification of Korea—to be effected by the Koreans themselves under the supervision of the above-mentioned Commission, such steps to include comprehensive action to promote the repatriation of all prisoners of war by both sides.

REVISION OF SOVIET RESOLUTION ON KOREA

The Soviet delegation on November 23 submitted the following addendum to be inserted as the first paragraph of the revised Soviet resolution:

> "To recommend to the belligerents in Korea an immediate and complete ceasefire, i.e. the cessation of military operations by both sides on land, by sea and in the air, on the basis of the draft armistice agreement already approved by the belligerents, the question of the complete repatriation of prisoners of war to be referred for its solution to the commission for the peaceful settlement of the Korean question provided for in the U.S.S.R. draft resolution, in which commission questions shall be decided by two-thirds majority vote of its members".

United Nations

TEXT OF RESOLUTION ON KOREA

ADOPTED BY UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY ON DECEMBER 3, 1952

(This resolution is based upon and consists principally of a resolution introduced by the Delegation of India)

"THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

HAVING RECEIVED the Special Report of the United Nations Command of the 18 October 1952 on "the present status of military action and armistice negotiations in Korea" and other relevant reports relating to Korea;

NOTING WITH APPROVAL the considerable progress towards an armistice made by negotiation at Panmunjom and the tentative agreements to end the fighting in Korea and to reach a settlement of the Korean question;

NOTING FURTHER that disagreement between the parties on one remaining issue, alone, prevents the conclusion of an armistice and that a considerable measure of agreement already exists on the principles on which this remaining issue can be resolved;

MINDFUL of the continuing and vast loss of life, devastation and suffering resulting from and accompanying the continuance of the fighting;

DEEPLY CONSCIOUS of the need to bring hostilities to a speedy end and of the need for a peaceful settlement of the Korean question;

ANXIOUS TO EXPEDITE AND FACILITATE the convening of the political conference as provided in Article 60 of the Draft Armistice Agreement;

AFFIRMS that the release and repatriation of Prisoners of War shall be effected in accordance with the "Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of Prisoners of War", dated 12 August 1949, the well-established principles and practice of International Law and the relevant provision of the Draft Armistice Agreement;

AFFIRMS that force shall not be used against Prisoners of War to prevent or effect their return to their homelands, and that they shall at all time be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of the Convention;

ACCORDINGLY REQUESTS the President of the General Assembly to communicate the following proposals to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean Authorities as forming a just and reasonable basis for agreement so that an immediate cease fire would result and be effected; to invite their acceptance of these proposals and to make a report to the General Assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate:

PROPOSALS

1. In order to facilitate the return to their homelands of all Prisoners of War, there shall be established a Repatriation Commission consisting of representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland, that is, the four States agreed to for the constitution of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and referred to in paragraph 37 of the Draft Armistice Agreement, or constituted, alternatively, of representatives of four States not participating in hostilities, two nominated by each side, but excluding representatives of States that are permanent members of the Security Council.

2. The release and repatriation of Prisoners of War shall be effected in accordance with the "Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of Prisoners of War", dated 12 August 1949, the well-established principles and practice of International Law and the relevant provisions of the Draft Armistice Agreement.

3. Force shall not be used against the Prisoners of War to prevent or effect their return to their homelands and no violence to their persons or affront to their dignity or self-respect shall be permitted in any manner or for any purpose whatsoever. This duty is enjoined on and entrusted to the Repatriation Commission and each of its members. Prisoners of War shall at all times be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of that Convention.

4. All Prisoners of War shall be released to the Repatriation Commission from military control and from the custody of the detaining side in agreed numbers and at agreed exchange points in agreed demilitarized zones.

5. Classification of Prisoners of War according to nationality and domicile as proposed in the letter of 16 October from General Kim Il Sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army, and General Peng Teh-Huai, Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, to General Mark W. Clark, Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, shall then be carried out immediately.

6. After classification, Prisoners of War shall be free to return to their homelands, forthwith, and their speedy return shall be facilitated by all parties concerned.

7. In accordance with arrangements prescribed for the purpose by the Repatriation Commission, each party to the conflict shall have freedom and facilities to explain to the Prisoners of War "depending upon them" their rights and to inform the Prisoners of War on any matter relating to their return to their homelands and particularly their full freedom to return.

8. Red Cross teams of both sides shall assist the Repatriation Commission in its work and shall have access, in accordance with the terms of the Draft Armistice Agreement, to Prisoners of War while they are under the temporary jurisdiction of the Repatriation Commission.

9. Prisoners of War shall have freedom and facilities to make representations and communications to the Repatriation Commission and to bodies and agencies working under the Repatriation Commission, and to inform any or all such bodies of their desires on any matter concerning themselves, in accordance with arrangements made for the purpose by the Commission.

10. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 3 above nothing in this Repatriation Agreement shall be construed as derogating from the authority of the Repatriation Commission (or its authorized representatives) to exercise its legitimate functions and responsibilities for the control of the prisoners under its temporary jurisdiction.

11. The terms of this Repatriation Agreement and the arrangements arising therefrom shall be made known to all Prisoners of War.

12. The Repatriation Commission is entitled to call upon parties to the conflict, its own member governments, or the Member States of the United Nations for such legitimate assistance as it may require in the carrying out of its duties and tasks and in accordance with the decisions of the Commission in this respect.

13. When the two sides have made an agreement for repatriation based on these proposals, the interpretation of that agreement shall rest with the Repatriation Commission. In the event of disagreement in the Commission, majority decision shall prevail. When no majority decision is possible, an umpire agreed upon in accordance with the succeeding paragraph and with Article 132 of the Geneva Convention of 1949 shall have the deciding vote.

14. The Repatriation Commission shall at its first meeting and prior to an armistice proceed to agree upon and appoint the umpire who shall at all times be available to the Commission and shall act as its Chairman unless otherwise agreed. If agreement on the appointment of the umpire cannot be reached by the Commission within the period of three weeks after the date of the first meeting this matter should be referred to the General Assembly.

15. The Repatriation Commission shall also arrange after the armistice for officials to function as umpires with inspecting teams or other bodies to which functions are delegated or assigned by the Commission or under the provisions of the Draft Armistice Agreement, so that the completion of the return of Prisoners of War to their homelands shall be expedited.

16. When the Repatriation Agreement is acceded to by the parties concerned and when an umpire has been appointed under paragraph 14 above, the Draft Armistice Agreement, unless otherwise altered by agreement between the parties, shall be deemed to have been accepted by them. The provisions of the Draft Armistice Agreement shall apply except in so far as they are modified by the Repatriation Agreement. Arrangements for repatriation under this agreement will begin when the armistice agreement is thus concluded.

17. At the end of ninety days, after the Armistice Agreement has been signed, the disposition of any Prisoners of War whose return to their homelands may not have been effected in accordance with the procedure set out in these proposals or as otherwise agreed, shall be referred with recommendations for their disposal, including a target date for the termination of their detention to the political conference to be called as provided under Article 60 of the Draft Armistice Agreement. If at the end of a further thirty days there are any Prisoners of War whose return to their homelands has not been effected under the above procedures or whose future has not been provided for by the political conference, the responsibility for their care and maintenance and for their subsequent disposition shall be transferred to the United Nations, which in all matters relating to them shall act strictly in accordance with international law."

TEXT OF 18-POWER RESOLUTION

PASSED BY THE AD HOC POLITICAL COMMITTEE ON NOVEMBER 20, 1952

The General Assembly,

Having taken note of the communication dated 12 September 1952, addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations by the Delegations of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Iran, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Yemen, regarding the question of race conflict in South Africa resulting from the policies of apartheid of the Government of the Union of South Africa.

Considering that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedom for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recalling that the General Assembly declared in its resolution 103 (I) that it is in the higher interests of humanity to put an end to religious and so-called racial persecution and called upon all Governments to conform both to the letter and to the spirit of the Charter and to take the most prompt and energetic steps to that end,

Considering that the General Assembly has held in its resolutions 395 (V) and 511 (VI) that a policy of "racial segregation" (apartheid) is necessarily based on doctrines of racial discrimination,

1. Establishes a commission consisting of ——, to study the racial situation in the Union of South Africa in the light of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter, with due regard to the provision of Article 2, paragraph 7, as well as the provisions of Article 1, paragraph 2 and paragraph 3, Article 13, paragraph 1 (b), Article 55 (c) and Article 56 of the Charter, and the resolutions of the United Nations on racial persecution and discrimination and to report its conclusions to the General Assembly at its eighth session;

2. Invites the Government of the Union of South Africa to extend its full co-operation to the Commission;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Commission with the necessary staff and facilities:

4. Decides to retain the question on the agenda of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

TEXT OF SCANDINAVIAN RESOLUTION

PASSED BY THE AD HOC POLITICAL COMMITTEE ON NOVEMBER 20, 1952

The General Assembly,

Having taken note of the communication dated 12 September 1952, addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations by the Delegations of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Iran, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Yemen, regarding the question of race conflict in South Africa resulting from the policies of apartheid of the Government of the Union of South Africa,

Considering that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedom for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recalling that the General Assembly declared in its resolution 103 (I) that it is in the higher interests of humanity to put an end to religious and so-called racial persecution and called upon all Governments to conform both to the letter and to the spirit of the Charter and to take the most prompt and energetic steps to that end,

1. Declares that in a multi-racial society harmony and respect for human rights and freedoms and the peaceful development of a unified community are best assured when patterns of legislation and practice are directed towards ensuring equality before the law of all persons regardless of race, creed or color, and when economic, social, cultural and political participation of all racial groups is on a basis of equality.

2. Affirms that governmental policies of Member States which are not directed towards these goals, but which are designed to perpetuate or increase discrimination, are inconsistent with the pledges of the Members under Article 56 of the Charter;

3. Solemnly calls upon all Member States to bring their policies into conformity with their obligation under the Charter to promote the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Text of South African Resolution Defeated in Ad Hoc Political Committee, November 20, 1952

Having regard to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter of the United Nations,

The Ad Hoc Political Committee finds that it has no competence to consider the item entitled "The Question of Race Conflict in South Africa Resulting from the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Union of South Africa".

Text of South African Resolution Defeated in Plenary Session of the General Assembly, December 6, 1952

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, Finds that it is unable to adopt the proposals on the item entitled "The Question of Race Conflict in South Africa Resulting from the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Union of South Africa" contained in the Rapporteur's Report of the Ad Hoc Political Committee, dated December 2, 1952.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 10, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

AIRCRAFT CARRIER "BONAVENTURE"

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Royal Canadian Navy on having attributed the name Bonaventure to the new aircraft carrier to replace the Magnificent as the kingpin of Canada's fleet.

The morning press reports that there is a lonely island off the Gaspe coast bearing that name.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It was named after that island.

Mr. Arsenault: I am certain it will not now be overlooked that there is a village and a county in the province of Quebec by the name of Bonaventure, the village in which I was born and the county I represent in the House of Commons. Indeed, sir, even the name Bona is merely an abbreviation of the word Bonaventure.

Therefore it is with great pride that the electors of Bonaventure county welcome this decision.

Mr. Graydon: Greetings, admiral!

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I beg leave to lay on the table the following:

The joint report of the international boundary commission dated November 26, 1951, concerning the survey and demarcation of the boundary between Canada and the United States from Tongass Passage to Mount St. Elias, together with a copy of the accompanying atlas.

And while I am on my feet I beg leave also to lay on the table certain diplomatic instruments, in English and French. The first group is one of multilateral agreements, and is as follows:

Final act of the second United Nations technical assistance conference, signed at Paris February 7, 1952.

Agreement for the settlement of disputes arising under article 15 (a) of the treaty of peace with Japan, signed at Washington June 13, 1952.

Protocol extending the period of the agreement on North Atlantic ocean weather stations of 12 May 1949, signed at Montreal 19 June, 1952.

And, in addition, may I lay on the table copies of the following group of bilateral agreements:

Exchange of notes reviving the application of the convention between His Majesty and the federal president of the Republic of Austria regarding legal proceedings in civil and commercial matters, signed at London March 31, 1931, signed at Vienna January 18, 1952;

Exchange of letters between Canada and The Netherlands constituting an agreement to safeguard the rights of bona fide holders of bonds of Canada that were looted from their Netherlands owners during world war II, signed at Ottawa, April 10, 1952;

Exchange of notes between Canada and New Zealand constituting an agreement modifying the agreement of August 16, 1950, between the two countries relating to air transport, signed at Wellington September 29, 1952;

Exchange of notes between Canada and Spain constituting an agreement on the settlement of commercial debts, signed at Madrid January 29, 1952;

Exchange of notes between Canada and the United Kingdom extending the double taxation agreement of June 5, 1946, with respect to income tax to the governments of British Guiana and St. Lucia, signed at Ottawa, May 9 and 22, 1952;

Exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America constituting an agreement for the establishment of a gunnery range on Lake Erie, signed at Ottawa April 26, October 22 and November 15, 1951; and finally, Exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America regarding RCAF-USAF re supply of joint Arctic weather stations, signed at Ottawa October 9 and December 12, 1951, and February 7, 1952.

Questions

QUESTIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—GAS FREE EXAMINATIONS

Mr. Balcom:

1. Have the operators doing gas free examinations for the Royal Canadian Navy, certificates from the American bureau of shipping or an equivalent certifying body?
2. What are the qualifications of those presently doing this work?

Mr. Dickey:

1. No.

2. Certification that tanks and compartments of R.C.N. ships are free from explosive or toxic gases is the responsibility of the naval research establishment. R.C.N. ships are exempt from the authority of the American bureau of shipping or equivalent certifying bodies. Nevertheless, employees of the naval research establishment who carry out gas free examinations at Halifax and Esquimalt are fully qualified individuals with science degrees. The employee at Halifax was given a special course at the Milton Hersey Company, analytical chemists, to qualify him to issue gas free certificates.

ALLEGED DUMPING OF WOMEN'S WEAR—GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. Blair:

1. Has any action been taken by the government, since January 1 this year, to investigate charge of dumping of women's wear made in the United States on the Canadian market?
2. If so, what action, if any, has been taken by the government to remedy the reported situation?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. The department has investigated cases of alleged dumping, through investigations at the offices of exporters and through correspondence. In cases of undervaluation, amendment of entries has been required, with the collection of special or dumping duty where applicable.

CURED FISH IMPORTS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Has any frozen, canned or otherwise cured fish been imported into Canada from Japan, during 1951-52?
2. If so, of what species and type, and in what quantities?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2.

NATIONAL DEFENCE HEADQUARTERS—STAFF CARS—EQUIPMENT

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many staff cars are assigned to National Defence headquarters at Ottawa?
2. How many of these, if any, have been equipped with radio receivers, and what was the total cost of same, including transmitting equipment?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 29.

2. (a) 14. (b) Total cost, including master transmitting station, $10,661.10.

WAR CRIMINALS—CONVICTIONS AND APPEALS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many war criminals were convicted and held in Canada's name since the end of the last war?

[Mr. Lesage.]

2. How many of the above have had their sentence altered by authority of the Canadian government, and what was the change made in each case?
3. Are any appeals pending for any other prisoners? If so, how many?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Seven.

2. One: original sentence of fifteen years imprisonment; released by order in council in 1951 after serving six years.

3. No.

PRODUCTION OF HARVARD TRAINER PLANES

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many Harvard trainer planes were produced at the Canadian Car plant at Fort William Ontario, since July 1, 1951 to date?
2. How many of these planes were (a) assembled from war surplus or shelf components; (b) assembled from new production?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 219 Harvard aircraft produced by Canadian Car and Foundry to date. Most of the work on the first 40 was done at Canadian Car's St. Laurent plant but the balance of the aircraft were produced entirely at Fort William.

2. (a) Surplus or shelf components were used in diminishing quantities after the first 20 aircraft were produced. The following percentages indicate the approximate amount of surplus used:

(b) 159 aircraft produced from new production.

CIVIL DEFENCE—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Coyle:

What federal government assistance has been given to municipalities in Canada towards the cost of building up civil defence against air raids, in the form of (a) cash contributions; (b) equipment?

Mr. McCusker: The federal government has, since the re-activation of the civil defence organization in 1948, supplied a great deal of assistance to provincial and municipal civil defence organizations in the form of (a) training programs for key civil defence personnel; (b) consultation and help in organizing for civil defence on a local level; and (c) equipment. At the beginning of the current fiscal year, the federal government extended this aid to include financial assistance to support approved provincial and local civil defence projects on a matching basis with the provinces. For this purpose the sum of $1,400,000 is included in the estimates for the current fiscal year. In accordance with long established practice, the federal government does not, of course, deal directly with the municipalities, but with the provinces, and one of the requirements of the grant-in-aid program is that any municipal project receiving federal financial aid must be matched by provincial funds in an amount equal to the federal contribution. Any municipal civil defence project recommended by the province and approved by the federal authorities can qualify for financial aid, either in part or wholly, on the basis of equal contributions from provincial and federal governments. Up to the present time, every project submitted by a provincial civil defence authority under the grant-in-aid program has received federal approval, with the exception of one project which is currently under consideration.

(a) 1,776 provincial and municipal civil defence workers—the great majority of whom are municipal—have to date been trained entirely at federal expense in federally sponsored and financed training courses.

(b) The services of federal consultants in the various branches of civil defence activity are at all times available to assist municipal civil defence authorities, although it is ordinarily expected that requests for such help be channelled through the appropriate civil defence authorities.

(c) Civil defence equipment and supplies distributed by the federal civil defence authorities to the provinces for use by provincial and municipal civil defence organizations total to date approximately $999,000 in value. This includes a wide variety of training equipment and some operational equipment. The great bulk of it is intended for use in municipal civil defence programs. Included in the above-mentioned total are such items as:

(1) air raid sirens for installation in municipal target areas, $112,000; (2) respirators, $444,000; (3) steel helmets, $133,000; (4) coveralls, $65,000; (5) triangular bandages, $42,000.

(d) Under the grant-in-aid program, three provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—have to date submitted 15 projects totalling in amount $318,274. These totals include both provincial and municipal civil defence projects. Federal approval has been given to all but one of these projects, and the total federal financial commitment in respect of these projects amounts to $159,137. The project which has not yet been approved is currently under consideration.

Federal financial assistance is available for the support of provincial and municipal civil defence undertakings in the other provinces on the same basis as in the three above-mentioned: and it is anticipated that other provinces will shortly be taking advantage of this arrangement.

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS AND WIDOWS—PENSIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the following brackets: (a) less than $20 per month; (b) $20 to $29.99 per month; (c) $30 to $39.99 per month; (d) $40 to $49.99 per month; (e) $50 to $59.99 per month; (f) $60 to $69.99 per month; (g) $70 to $79.99 per month; (h) $80 to $89.99 per month; (i) $90 to $99.99 per month; (j) $100 per month or over?

2. How many widows of retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

Questions

3. What is the number of retired federal civil servants and also the number of widows of retired federal civil servants presently residing in each province?

Mr. Garson (for Mr. Abbott):

1. Retired civil servants, (a) 312; (b) 482; (c) 674; (d) 763; (e) 750; (f) 827; (g) 828; (h) 896; (i) 807; (j) 4,233; total, 10,572.

2. Widows, (a) 942; (b) 970; (c) 854; (d) 742; (e) 575; (f) 328; (g) 233; (h) 158; (i) 109; (j) 212; total, 5,123.

NATO MUTUAL AID—SHIPMENTS OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT, ETC.

Mr. Tustin:

1. What is the total value, to date, of military stores, ammunition or armaments shipped to any country from Canada, under the mutual aid provision of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization?

2. What amount to each country, and on what dates were shipments made?

Mr. Dickey:

2. For the period of the present agreement commencing on April 1, 1952 to September 30, 1952, date of last traffic returns:

(a) (i) 3,969 tons; (a) (ii) 3,690 tons; (b) (i) 1,403 passengers; (b) (ii) 1,122 passengers.

Questions

ENGLISH AND CITIZENSHIP CLASSES—FEDERAL COSTS

Mr. Coyle:

What was the percentage of total costs, for English and citizenship classes for new Canadians in Canada, paid by the federal government in 1951?

Mr. Harris: This information is not available, as provincial governments have jurisdiction over education.

ELECTRICAL POWER—IMPORT AND EXPORT, UNITED STATES-CANADA

Mr. Laing:

1. In the past year, what was the value of the export of electrical power to the United States?
2. Was there any import of electrical power from the United States of America during the same period? If so, what was the value of same?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Canadian exports to United States, calendar year 1951, $7,938,218.

2. Canadian imports from United States, calendar year 1951, $155,815.

BRANDON INDIAN SCHOOL—CONSTRUCTION OF BARN

Mr. Dinsdale:

When will work commence on the new barn for the Brandon Indian school, as provided for in the estimates at the last session of parliament?

Mr. Harris: Before the end of the present fiscal year.

SHIPMENTS OF CUBAN REFINED SUGAR

Mr. Blackmore:

1. How much Cuban refined sugar has been unloaded in Canadian ports since September 1, 1952?
2. How much Cuban refined sugar is at present in Canadian ports in process of being unloaded, or waiting to be unloaded?
3. Is any Cuban refined sugar reported to be in process of being loaded in Cuba in preparation for shipment to Canadian ports before April 1, 1953?
4. If so, how much?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Information not available.

Imports of refined sugar from Cuba entered for consumption: September, 1952, 24,850 cwt.; October, 1952, 90,000 cwt. (preliminary).

2. Information not available.

3. Information not available.

4. Answered by No. 3.

CAR ACCIDENTS—FATALITIES AND CONVICTIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many fatalities resulting from car accident or collisions have taken place, province by province, since the 1st of January, 1952?
2. How many persons, by provinces, since said date, have been convicted of (a) motor manslaughter; (b) driving when intoxicated; (c) driving when impaired; (d) driving recklessly or dangerously?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Fatalities resulting from motor vehicle accidents:

	January 1 to June 30 1952
Newfoundland	1	(1)
Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	45
New Brunswick	43
Quebec		(2)
Ontario	377
Manitoba	33
Saskatchewan	36
Alberta	54
British Columbia	62
Yukon and Northwest Territories	1
Total	655

(1) City of St. John's only. Reports for rest of province not available.

(2) Not yet available.

2. The number of prosecutions, by provinces, of persons charged with indictable offences is reported on the basis of "date of trial". Therefore, information for 1952 is not yet available.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—EXPENDITURES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How much money has been expended on the Saskatchewan river power and irrigation scheme, month by month, since the 1st of June, 1952?

Mr. McCubbin:

June $39,563.48; July $51,152.21; August $33,273.30; September $39,355.86; October $37,151.02.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE COMPENSATION—DECLARATION AS INCOME

Mr. Diefenbaker:

Has consideration been given by the government to relieving the farmers in Saskatchewan from having to include, as current income, any payment received from the Department of Agriculture in connection with cattle destroyed in the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. McCann: The government has not given consideration to relieving farmers from including as income payments received from the Department of Agriculture in connection with the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease in cattle where such payments properly constitute taxable receipts under the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

CHINESE ENTERING CANADA—PAYMENT OF HEAD TAX

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Are Chinese immigrants charged a head tax upon entering Canada? If so, how much?

2. Are Canadian-born Chinese, and Chinese who have become Canadian citizens, charged a head tax on returning to Canada after visiting China?

3. Is a woman, born in China, who marries a Canadian citizen of Chinese origin, entitled to enter Canada without paying head tax?

Mr. Harris:

1. No.

2. No.

3. A woman of Chinese origin, married to a Canadian citizen, is admissible subject to the provisions of the immigration act and regulations. See also answer to No. 1.

H.M.C.S. "ST. STEPHEN"

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Was H.M.C.S. St. Stephen transferred to the Department of Transport? If so, when?

2. Has H.M.C.S. St. Stephen been converted to a weather ship?

3. If not, when is it expected that she will be ready to assume duties as a weather ship in the Pacific ocean?

4. When did H.M.C.S. St. Stephen reach Esquimalt, British Columbia?

5. What is the strength of her present crew?

6. When is it expected that the full crew will be taken on?

7. Does the present crew of H.M.C.S. St. Stephen receive superannuation and sick benefits of a similar nature to those granted the crews of other weather ships?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The H.M.C.S. St. Stephen is on loan to the Department of Transport since August 16, 1950.

2. H.M.C.S. St. Stephen operated on the Atlantic as a weather ship.

3. This vessel is only retained on loan during the pleasure of the navy. The ship has a considerable amount of weather observation equipment fitted on board and it was felt desirable to retain her in her present condition rather than convert her for use as a naval ship in order that the department would have another ship to fall back on in the event of accident to one of the operating vessels.

4. The St. Stephen reached Esquimalt on the morning of August 15, 1950.

5. No crew has ever been established for this vessel, but 9 persons are engaged in watching services.

6. The department does not plan to operate this vessel.

7. The people employed on the St. Stephen at the present time are temporary prevailing rate employees and come under the regulations for such labour. They do not receive superannuation nor sick mariners' benefits.

SAGUENAY RIVER—BUOYS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Who is in charge of placing and removing of buoys in the Saguenay river?

2. What amount is paid for this work, and what is the term of the contract?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Mr. G. H. Lavoie.

2. $2,100 per annum; 3 years from July 2, 1950.

BEEF AND OTHER MEAT PRODUCTS—PURCHASES, SALES, ETC.

Mr. Wright:

1. How much (a) beef; (b) other meat products, has the Canadian government purchased from New Zealand during 1952?

2. What amounts of these beef or other meat products have been delivered to date?

3. What amounts are now in storage in the United States of America?

4. What amounts have been disposed of in the United States market?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. The government of Canada has not purchased beef or other meat products from New Zealand. Under the arrangements announced by the Minister of Agriculture in the House of Commons on May 9 surplus beef in Canada has been purchased by the agricultural prices support board and shipped to the United Kingdom ministry of food. The United Kingdom ministry of food have diverted an equivalent amount of beef purchased in New Zealand for sale in the United States in exchange for the beef shipped to the United Kingdom.

2. As at November 20, 59,537,760 pounds.

3. As at November 20, 53,621,003 pounds.

4. As at November 20, 5,916,757 pounds.

ELEMENTAL SULPHUR—IMPORTS AND PRODUCTION CAPACITY

Mr. Laing:

1. What was the tonnage and value of Canadian imports from the United States of elemental sulphur, in each of the years 1945 to 1951?

2. What is the capacity in tons of Canadian construction already completed or announced for the production of elemental sulphur?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Imports of sulphur from the United States:

	Tons	Value
1945	248,846	4,063,215
1946	273,493	4,269,864
1947	361,424	5,466,201
1948	354,622	5,528,740
1949	280,557	5,213,921
1950	390,333	7,730,126
1951	393,172	8,696,233

2. The plants now in operation in Alberta have a combined annual capacity of 20,000 tons. A recent announcement indicates that a plant to be built at Welland, Ontario, will recover about 9,000 tons per year initially, with possible expansion to 20,000 tons.

Questions

INDUSTRIAL AND OFFICE WORKERS—
WEEKLY WORK PERIODS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government any statistics, later than those given in Hansard of December 3, 1951, as to the number of (a) industrial workers; (b) office workers, now on (i) a five-day week; (ii) a five and a half-day week; (iii) a six-day week?

2. If so, what are the numbers of each of the above groups of workers who are working for each of the periods indicated above?

3. Do the figures given in answer to question 2 include bank employees and any others recently placed on the five-day week?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. Yes.

2.

Distribution of plant and office employees working a five-day and more than five-day week based on 1951 Department of Labour Survey

Industries	Plant Workers		Office Workers		Total Covered by Dept. of Labour Survey	Total Paid Workers in These Industries (Labour Force Survey, November 1951)
	5-day Week	Week of more than 5 days	5-day Week	Week of more than 5 days
Forestry (logging)	10,000	77,000	.....	.....	87,000	93,000
Mining	33,000	48,000	3,000	5,000	89,000	(a) 96,000
Manufacturing	537,000	233,000	119,000	38,000	927,000	1,256,000
Transportation, storage and communication. (b)	44,000	52,000	12,000	8,000	116,000	175,000
Public utilities	21,000	8,000	11,000	2,000	42,000	58,000
Trade	47,000	95,000	28,000	31,000	201,000	595,000
Services	17,000	67,000	5,000	6,000	95,000	814,000
Total	709,000	580,000	178,000	90,000	1,557,000	3,087,000

(a) Employment and payroll statistics.
(b) Does NOT include steam railways.

NOTE: The Department of Labour survey is based on returns made by app oximately 16,000 establishments having 15 or more employees each.

The extent to which the five-day week applies to workers in the above industries not covered by this survey is not known.

Of the industries not included in the above table, the larger are: agriculture, finance and insurance, and steam railway transportation. They comprise 2,243,000 paid workers. The labour force in November, 1951, included a total of 3,800,000 paid workers and a grand total of 5,110,000 "paid" and "own account" workers.

The number of paid workers in agriculture varies between seasons and regions but few are on a five-day week. In November, 1951, there were 90,000 paid workers in a total of 875,000 in the industry.

In building construction, the five-day week is common among organized workers. Of 107 collective agreements covering the building trades examined recently in the larger cities, about 80 per cent provided for a five-day week.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

No information is available concerning other types of construction. There are 299,000 paid workers in the industry and 367,000 altogether.

In finance and insurance, there were in November, 1951, 147,000 paid workers and 158,000 altogether.

Of the 190,000 employees of the steam railways, 143,000 non-operating employees are on the five-day week.

3. No.

HAITI RAW SUGAR IMPORTS—REBATES

Mr. Murphy:

What was the total amount rebated by the Canadian government to Canadian refiners on imports of Haiti raw sugar brought into Canada under the Haiti-Canada agreement, and the poundage involved in such rebates, in (a) 1951; (b) 1952?

Mr. McCann:

(a) 1951, nil; (b) 1952, nil.

MANITOBA FARMERS UNION RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did the Minister of Agriculture receive a copy of the resolutions submitted from the annual meeting of the Manitoba farmers union during December, 1951?

2. If so, did the minister acknowledge receipt of these resolutions?

3. What action, if any, has been taken in reference to the resolution submitted?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. There is no record of any resolutions passed by the annual meeting of the Manitoba farmers union during December, 1951, being received in the office of the Minister of Agriculture.

2 and 3. See answer to question No. 1.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

Mr. Blair:

1. Is the Ming Sung Industrial Company in default on any Canadian government-backed loans to any Canadian bank, and if so, for what amounts and from what date?

2. If in default, how much has the Canadian government had to pay to date?

3. What is the total amount of the loan, if any, guaranteed by the Canadian government?

Mr. Garson:

1. Yes, on amounts of principal and interest falling due on and after June 30, 1951, totalling $2,962,977.30.

2. $2,962,977.30.

3. The total outstanding principal amount of the loan guaranteed by the Canadian government is $10,200,000.

CUBAN RAW SUGAR IMPORTS—REBATES

Mr. Murphy:

What was the total amount rebated by the Canadian government to Canadian refiners on imports of Cuban raw sugar brought into Canada under the Canada-Cuba agreement, and the poundage involved in such rebates, in (a) 1951; (b) 1952?

Mr. McCann:

(a) 1951: Total amount, nil; poundage, nil. (b) 1952: Total amount, $53,265.83; poundage, 28,445,776.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC RAW SUGAR IMPORTS—REBATES

Mr. Murphy:

What was the total amount rebated by the Canadian government to Canadian refiners on imports of Dominican Republic raw sugar brought into Canada under the Dominican Republic-Canada agreement, and the poundage involved in such rebates, in (a) 1951; (b) 1952?

Mr. McCann:

(a) 1951, nil; (b) 1952, nil.

AWARDS OF BATTLE HONOURS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What engagements during world war II are to be designated as battle honours?

2. When will the award of battle honours be made to regiments in the Canadian army?

3. How many honours will each regiment be allowed?

Mr. Dickey:

1, 2 and 3.

The problem of which engagements during world war II are to be designated as battle honours is now being studied by the British Commonwealth "Battles Nomenclature Committee". The director of the army historical section is the Canadian representative. A final decision is not expected before late 1953 or early 1954.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT—DUTIES OF EMPLOYEES, ETC.

Mr. Thatcher:

1. How many employees are there across Canada hired under the National Physical Fitness Act?

2. What are the duties of each?

3. What specific work is each of these employees presently engaged at?

Mr. McCusker:

1. The 1952-53 estimates (see page 346) provide for eleven employees whose duties relate to the administration of the National Physical Fitness Act. Of these eleven positions, two are actually vacant now.

The seven provinces with which agreements are in effect under the National Physical Fitness Act employ their own staff in carrying out the physical fitness program within their respective provinces.

2 and 3. The duties of the eleven employees referred to above are as follows:

1 National director, vacant
1 Assistant director, (administrative officer grade 3)
1 Technical officer grade 3
1 Reference assistant, vacant
1 Principal clerk
1 Stenographer grade 3
1 Stenographer grade 2B
1 Typist grade 2B
1 Typist grade 2A
1 Typist grade 1
1 Clerk grade 2B

The assistant director is responsible for the administration of the division of physical fitness, acts as consultant in physical education and recreation and, in addition, serves as executive secretary of the national council on physical fitness. The technical officer Grade 3 is a specialist in the field of recreational drama who serves in a consultant capacity to the provinces in this specialized recreational field. The other staff members of the division carry the usual office clerical and stenographic duties.

STATISTICS—BREAK-DOWN OF CERTAIN CATEGORIES

Mr. Knowles:

With reference to the dominion bureau of statistics publication of 1952 entitled "National Accounts Income and Expenditure 1926-1950", what is the break-down of the twelve categories of expenditure listed under group VII on page 123, and referred to in items 23, 24, 25 and 26 in table 36 on pages 74 and 75 of the said publication?

Mr. McIlraith: The estimates of individual items in group VII, personal and medical care and death expenses, are not available at the fine level of detail mentioned at page 123 of national accounts, income and expenditure, 1926-1950. The reason for this is that the various groupings are projected from information gathered during the 1931 and 1941 census, and certain other basic information. The 1951 population census and the 1951 census of distribution will provide further information which will be incorporated when detailed tabulations are completed. In the meantime, the level of detail at which reliable estimates can be provided within the category "personal and medical care and death expenses" is that which is shown at page 74 of the above publication.

TORBAY-GANDER FLIGHT OF R.C.A.F. AIRCRAFT—MR. BROUN-WOGAN

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has the bill for the amount of $233.85, sent to the provincial treasurer of the province of Newfoundland on January 9, 1952, to cover the cost of a flight of a Royal Canadian Air Force Canso aircraft dispatched from Torbay airport, Newfoundland, to Gander airport on the night of November 22, 1951, and which carried a German national employed by the Department of Economic Development of Newfoundland named Broun-Wogan, been paid?

2. If so, was the bill paid by the Newfoundland government?

3 If not, has any effort been made to obtain payment since the bill was submitted on January 9, 1952?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Not applicable.

CUSTOMS BUILDINGS, ST. LEONARD AND CLAIR, N.B.

Mr. Dube:

When will the work be started on the new customs buildings at St. Leonard, New Brunswick and Clair, New Brunswick, referred to in the estimates submitted at the last session of parliament?

[Mr. McCusker.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is expected that construction will commence on the new customs buildings at St. Leonard and Clair, N.B., during the summer of 1953.

RAILWAY STATION, JACQUET RIVER, N.B.

Mr. Dube:

1. To what company was the contract awarded for the railway station at Jacquet River, New Brunswick?

2. What is the area of the station?

3. What will be the total cost of the station?

4. Were tenders called?

5. How many submitted tenders, and what are the amounts thereof?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Mr. Louis Ouellon, Campbellton, N.B.

2. 79 feet by 26 feet 8 inches.

3. It is not the policy of the company to make public the amounts tendered for work undertaken as the result of calling for tenders.

4. Yes. By public announcement in papers at Moncton, Saint John and Campbellton, N.B.

5. (a) Two; (b) See answer to No. 3.

FIVE-DAY WEEK—WINNIPEG

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the source and date of information received by the treasury board with respect to the extent of the five-day week among private employers and employees in Winnipeg?

2. To what extent is the five-day week in effect in Winnipeg according to such information?

3. Is later information being sought?

4. To what extent does the treasury board contend the five-day week must be in effect among private employers and employees in any city before the year-round five-day week can be extended to the federal civil service in that city?

5. Is the situation in Winnipeg being reconsidered?

6. Is the situation in other cities being reconsidered? If so, what cities?

Mr. Garson (for Mr. Abbott):

1. (a) "The normal work week in 29 Canadian cities, October, 1951". (Source—The Labour Gazette, September, 1952.)

(b) Information from the local offices of the unemployment insurance commission through the civil service commission, September, 1952.

2. (a) As per source indicated in 1 (a) 43·1 per cent of the total office employees reported and 64·5 per cent of the total plant employees reported were working a five-day week.

(b) As per source indicated in 1 (b) 50·8 per cent of office employees.

(This information has been supplemented and supported by information acquired in Winnipeg by treasury board staff.)

3. Yes. (By the civil service commission).

4. It is not expected that a rigid standard would be applied. Generally speaking, if it is clear that the preponderant local practice among business and industrial firms is to work a five-day week, then consideration would be given to allowing departments of government to put the five-day week into effect if no additional staff or funds were required and no reduction were made in service to the public. However, the decision with respect to any locality might also be influenced by other factors, such as difficulties encountered by the civil service commission in recruiting in that area.

5. Yes. (By the civil service commission).

6. Yes. The civil service commission in response to various requests and proposals has the following locations under consideration:

Ontario, Peterborough; Oshawa; Niagara Falls; St. Catharines-Welland; Hamilton; Brantford; Kitchener-Waterloo; Galt-Preston; London; Windsor; Sarnia; Sudbury; Sault Ste. Marie; Fort William-Port Arthur.

Saskatchewan, Regina.

Alberta, Edmonton.

Quebec, Quebec city.

Nova Scotia, Halifax; Sydney.

New Brunswick, Saint John; Moncton.

British Columbia, Vancouver; Victoria.

The complete answer to this question has been supplied by the civil service commission because the civil service commission receives requests for application of the five-day week from departments and submits them, after consideration, to the treasury board. The treasury board has before it for consideration when it has received a reply from the national joint council to the letter from the Minister of Finance, tabled in the House of Commons on November 28, 1952, the following cases only: Belleville; Brantford; Fort William-Port Arthur; Hamilton; Kitchener; London; Port Colborne; St. Catharines; Welland; Windsor.

R. S. PITT—TRANSFER

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. (a) How long was R. S. Pitt, former manager of the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg, in the service of the Canadian National Railway hotel system; (b) What had been his experience in hotel management before he was appointed to the Fort Garry hotel; (c) How long had he been at the Fort Garry hotel; (d) Had there been any complaint regarding his work there?

2. (a) What was his salary as manager of the Fort Garry hotel; (b) Was there any reduction made in his salary when he was sent to the Prince Edward hotel in Brandon; (c) What was the salary of the former manager of the Prince Edward hotel?

3. Was any complaint, verbal or written, regarding any incident at the Fort Garry hotel during the Prime Minister's visit on September 10 last, made to the railway or hotel management or to the Department of Transport, or to any representative of any of the foregoing by or on behalf of the Prime Minister or of any one of those who were accompanying him at Winnipeg on September 10 last?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) Since May 22, 1928.

(b) He was manager of the Nova Scotian at Halifax from December 8, 1931 to November 1, 1941. After returning from military service he was appointed manager of the Bessborough at Saskatoon on August 15, 1946.

(c) Since July 12, 1951.

(d) Yes.

2. (a) The management of the Canadian National Railways has always taken the position that it would not be in the interest of the company or its personnel to make public information pertaining to the salary arrangements or remuneration paid to officers.

(b) No.

(c) See answer to No. 2 (a).

3. No.

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

3. No.

ARMED FORCES—PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICERS

Mr. Thatcher:

How many public relations officers are at present members of, or attached to the (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air force?

Mr. Dickey:

	Canada (Commands and Headquarters)	Korea	Europe and United Kingdom	Totals
Navy	8 (including ships at sea)	1	0	9
Army	9	3	4	16
Air force	10	0	2	12
				37

URANIUM—EXPORT, DELIVERIES, ETC.

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Has the government of Canada or any department thereof been asked to permit the exportation to the United States of any uranium ore or concentrates?

2. If so, by whom?

3. Has uranium ore from the area in or around the county of Haliburton in Ontario been delivered to any department of the dominion government in Ottawa for research and assay?

4. If so, by whom was such uranium ore delivered?

Questions

5. What was the result of the researches made or assays taken, and was any report made to the party or parties making such ore deliveries?
6. If not, for what reason?

Mr. Howe: It is not in the public interest to answer this question as deliveries of uranium are top secret information of a type that cannot be given out.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT—EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS

Mr. McLure:

1. What is the length of the runways at Charlottetown airport?
2. Has the Minister of Transport received any representations from (a) the city of Charlottetown; (b) the government of Prince Edward Island, asking that these runways be extended to accommodate larger airplanes?
3. What action, if any, will be taken in reference to extending the accommodation at this airport?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. East-west (09-27), 2,993 feet long; South-east-northwest (14-32), 2,496 feet long; North-south (18-36), 2,705 feet long.

2. (a) Yes. (b) Yes.

3. The inclusion of an item for the first stage development of a new runway 7,000 feet long is being considered for the departmental 1953-54 estimates.

WESTERN CANADIAN GREYHOUND LINES, LTD.—MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. Fulton:

1. How much is Canadian Greyhound (Western) Limited to receive for the carriage of mails to the main post offices from Ashcroft north on the Cariboo highway?
2. What mails does this contract cover?
3. When was the contract let?
4. Were tenders called for?
5. If so, from whom were bids received, and what was the amount of each bid?
6. If tenders were not called, what was the reason?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. $3,776 per annum.

2. Letter mails only, to and from the post offices at Clinton, 70 Mile House, 100 Mile House, Lac La Hache, 150 Mile House, Williams Lake (at bus depot) and Quesnel (at bus depot).

3. Authorized 8th July, 1952. Effective 15th September, 1952.

4. No.

5. See answer to No. 4.

6. The offer of Western Canadian Greyhound Lines, Ltd., to perform the service at the rate of $3,776 per annum, equivalent to 2·77 cents per travelled mile, was most reasonable and possible only because of the scheduled bus operations of the company. Moreover, the company is known to be reliable and a dependable mail contractor. In the circumstances, it was considered that no purpose would be served by calling for public tenders and a contract was authorized in accordance with provisions of section 29 of the Post Office Act.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, NFLD.—CONVERSION TO BROAD GAUGE

Mr. Higgins:

What is the estimated cost of converting the Canadian National Railways services in Newfoundland to broad gauge?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

No detailed estimate has been made. A rough estimate, including the cost of new equipment, modification of facilities, etc., would be not less than $100,000,000.

IRON ORE AND STEEL—PRODUCTION, EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. Higgins:

1. What is the total amount of iron ore mined in Canada in 1951, specifying the tonnage by provinces?
2. What is the total amount of steel produced in Canada in 1951, specifying tonnage by provinces?
3. What tonnage of iron ore was shipped from Canada to other countries in 1951, and what tonnage to each?
4. How much steel was imported into Canada in 1951, and from what countries?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Production (mine shipments) of iron ore 1951

	Short tons
Newfoundland	1,724,991
Ontario	2,841,984
British Columbia	113,535

Sweden	3,000
Other Countries	4,000
	2,204,000

* Tonnage of bars, rods, structural and other primary shapes converted to approximate equivalent tonnage in ingot form.

PORT AUX BASQUES AND NORTH SYDNEY—FERRY AND TERMINAL FACILITIES

Mr. Higgins:

1. When will the new ferry between Port aux Basques and North Sydney be put into operation?
2. When will the terminal facilities at North Sydney and Port aux Basques be completed?

Mr. Benidickson:

1 and 2. In the summer of 1954.

SHIRLEY AND SOUTHLAND CIGARETTES

Mr. Murray (Oxford):

1. Who was or is the importer of the Shirley and the Southland brands of American cigarettes?
2. What is the source or origin of these brands of cigarettes?
3. Are these cigarettes recognized as standard brands in the United States?
4. Are these cigarettes being distributed or retailed in all provinces of Canada?
5. What is the computed value of tobacco in a package of (a) Shirley cigarettes; (b) Southland cigarettes?

Mr. McCann:

1 and 2. It is contrary to the practice of this department to furnish information which would disclose the private transactions of importers or exporters at customs.

3, 4 and 5. No information available.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—RETIREMENT PROGRAMS—EMPLOYMENT PERIODS

Mr. Tustin:

1. How many persons employed by the government of Canada, as of February 1, 1952, were included under the Civil Service Superannuation Act and were making contributions to the superannuation account of the consolidated revenue fund?
2. How many persons, as of February 1, 1952, were employed by the government of Canada and were making contributions to the retirement fund for temporary employees, but were not entitled to benefits under the Civil Service Superannuation Act?
3. How many persons employed by the government of Canada, as of February 1, 1952, were not under any government employees retirement program?
4. Of the above number of persons not included under any retirement program, how many have been steadily employed for periods of (a) one to three years; (b) three to five years; (c) five to ten years; (d) ten years or over?

PURCHASES OF BONELESS CANNED BEEF

Mr. Wright:

1. Has the government entered into any agreement or arrangement to purchase boneless canned beef from Canadian packers?
2. If so, what are the terms and amounts covered by any such agreement?

FEDERAL CONTRACTS ON COST PLUS BASIS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Since January 1, 1951, have any construction contracts (in excess of $100,000) been let by the Department of Defence Production or any other government department on a cost plus basis?
2. If so, what was the nature of each such contract, and the amount of money involved?

LEGAL SERVICES TO GOVERNMENT—CHICOUTIMI

Mr. Gagnon:

1. What are the names of the lawyers and notaries residing in the county of Chicoutimi who have acted as agents for the different departments or boards of the federal government, during the years 1948, to date?
2. What amount of fees has been paid to each of them, and in what case?

CHICOUTIMI RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Mr. Gagnon:

1. How many rural mail services are there in operation in the county of Chicoutimi, and how many contractors carry the mail from the point of arrival to the various post offices?
2. What is the name of each one of them?
3. What is his salary?
4. What distance must he cover to perform his work?
5. When does his contract expire?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Since last June, has the government made any attempt to decrease the volume of pamphlets, periodicals, bulletins, or similar publications, published by the Queen's Printer?
2. If so, what results have been attained?
3. Since last June, what pamphlets, periodicals, bulletins, etc., if any, formerly put out by some government department have been discontinued?
4. Has the government considered the recommendation of the Senate standing committee on finance made last June 23, that a fair charge should be made for necessary government publications, such as geological surveys, maps, scientific publications, etc?
5. If so, have any specific steps been taken to implement the recommendation?

Orders for Returns

LEGAL SERVICES TO GOVERNMENT—RESTIGOUCHE-MADAWASKA

Mr. Dube:

1. What are the names of the lawyers and notaries residing in the county of Restigouche-Madawaska who have acted as agent for the different departments or boards of the federal government from 1949 to 1952?
2. What amount of fees has been paid to each of them and in connection with what services?

AGRICULTURAL AND GOLD MINING INDUSTRIES—SUBSIDIES AND OTHER AID

Mr. Fair:

1. During the past 13 years, what subsidies and other aid have been paid to farmers?
2. On what particular products were the subsidies paid and what amount on each, each year?
3. During the same period, what subsidies and other aids were paid to the gold mining industry?

GANDER, TORBAY, GOOSE BAY, HARMON AND DORVAL AIRPORTS

Mr. Higgins:

1. What is the cost of maintenance of (a) Gander airport; (b) Torbay airport; (c) Goose Bay airport?
2. What is the cash return from each such airport?
3. What is the average daily number of landings at (a) Gander; (b) Goose Bay; (c) Harmon; (d) Dorval, by commercial aircraft?
4. What is the cost of operation of Dorval airport?
5. What is the cash return from Dorval?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CRIMINAL CODE—CHANGES OR ALTERATIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between departments of the attorneys general of the provinces and/or law societies, and the Department of Justice, in which recommendations have been made for changes or alterations in the draft Criminal Code since the 1st of July, 1952.

ROBERT PITT—TRANSFER

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters received by the Department of Transport in connection with the transfer of Robert Pitt from the Fort Garry hotel, Winnipeg, since the first day of September, 1952.

Mr. Benidickson: I now table this return.

BEEF—GOVERNMENT INSTRUCTIONS REGARDING FLOOR PRICE

Mr. Wright:

For a copy of all orders in council, regulations, and any directives, instructions or circulars issued by the government dealing with the floor price of beef, dated since January 1, 1952.

PURCHASES OF CUBAN RAW SUGAR

Mr. Murphy:

For a copy of the Canada-Cuba agreement, announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce May 8, 1951, whereby Canada agreed to buy 75,000 tons of raw sugar in each of the years 1951-2-3.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Howe: I have been looking into this question and I may tell the hon. member that there are no formal agreements. There was an exchange of letters which we will be glad to table if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, according to the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister.

POST OFFICE

DEPARTMENTAL ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to answer a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) regarding post office Christmas advertising in weekly newspapers. This question will be found on page 457 of Hansard of December 9 and reads:

> Is the special pre-Christmas advertising of the Postmaster General's department going to all of the weekly newspapers across Canada? If not, what policy is followed in this respect?
> If the Postmaster General answers this question perhaps he might include in his answer what policy is being followed with regard to year-round advertising of the same department.

My answer to the first part of his question, asking if the Post Office Department's pre-Christmas advertising is going to all the weekly newspapers across Canada, is no. The policy followed is that the department in its Christmas advertising uses daily newspapers in all centres which are served by letter carrier delivery, but if there is no daily newspaper then any available weekly newspapers published in the same centre are used. In addition, because of the need for maximum advertising impact in the Toronto and Montreal areas, some weeklies are used as well as dailies.

As to the last part of the question inquiring as to the department's year-round advertising policy, Your Honour will recall having ruled that it was not in order at the time. However, I am prepared to give the answer now if Your Honour will permit me to do so.

Mr. Speaker: With the approval of the house.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I presume that the hon. member refers to the department's year-round advertising policy with respect to weekly newspapers. The department's policy with respect to the weeklies in its year-round advertising is the same as that followed at Christmas with the exception that the weeklies of Montreal and Toronto, as previously referred to, are not used. All told, about 140 Canadian weekly newspapers regularly publish the advertisements of the department.

UNSEALED CHRISTMAS CARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I am sorry that I did not give him notice, but he might take it as such. Considering that there are only two weeks until Christmas and that a large volume of Christmas card mail is going out, will the government give consideration to a reduction of the postage rate for unsealed Christmas cards until after Christmas?

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): I doubt very much if that can be done but I will be pleased to inquire into the matter and answer accordingly.

LEGISLATION

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ACTS OF QUEBEC LEGISLATURE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister advised the government to refer certain acts of the Quebec legislature to the Supreme Court of Canada, and particularly an act authorizing the seizure of vehicles transporting certain products, with a view to obtaining an opinion as to their constitutionality having regard to implications, among other matters, concerning interprovincial trade? If not, will he do so?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): This question, of which I must thank my hon. friend for having given me notice, raises a question as to the advice which the law officers of the crown may have given to the government. I think it is a settled rule of the house that advice of that sort has always been treated as confidential. May, fourteenth edition, page 337, says:

> A question cannot be asked "seeking . . . advice given to the crown by law officers".

Bourinot, page 250, says:

> As a rule the opinions of the law officers of the crown are held to be "private communications" when given for the guidance of ministers and may be properly refused by the government.

May, page 256, says:

> The opinions of the law officers of the crown given for the guidance of ministers in any question of diplomacy or stated policy being included in the class of confidential documents, have generally been withheld from parliament.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a question of privilege. I did not ask what advice the law officers of the crown gave. I asked what advice the minister was giving on this matter, which I think is an entirely different question.

Mr. Garson: No, with great deference, Mr. Speaker. If my hon. friend will examine the wording of his question he will see that it reads as follows:

> Has the Minister of Justice advised the government to refer certain acts of the Quebec legislature to the Supreme Court of Canada . . .

That would be a piece of legal advice given which would have to be based upon an opinion to the effect that the Quebec legislation was properly referable in that a question arose as to its constitutionality.

CIVIL SERVICE

WINNIPEG—PETITION FOR FIVE-DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to th Minister of Justice. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have sent to the minister the resolution on which my question is based. It was passed the night before last by the federal civil servants of Winnipeg, petitioning the government to include Winnipeg's federal civil servants in the five-day week. Will this petition be considered? Will the minister accept the invitation suggested in the resolution to attend a mass meeting of federal civil servants in Winnipeg to discuss this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I know my hon. friend has not had an opportunity to examine the answer to question 71 on today's order paper which I tabled this afternoon. Item 5 of that question is in the following terms: "Is the situation in Winnipeg being reconsidered?" The answer to item 5 in the return to question 71 is: "Yes, by the civil service commission". I think that answers the first part of my hon. friend's question. As to the second part having to do with the invitation, if my hon. friend will examine the resolution he will see that it indicates that a mass meeting will be called in the event of the matter not being reconsidered and something being done. As I certainly have not received any such invitation, the question is purely hypothetical and I will be glad to answer it when it becomes an actual one.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L.

Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the short time I had been speaking before the house rose last night I had been discussing the subject of television which had been introduced the day before by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) who is the minister responsible for that subject. I had expressed the hope that the minister would see fit to indicate to the house something of the nature of a program about which he had been questioned earlier and with regard to which he seemed to feel so little concern. Since the minister has not seen fit to place this subject before the house, I believe it is appropriate to indicate the nature of programs that are going over Canadian television stations and that are being permitted with the knowledge of the government at a time that the government is accepting full responsibility for the policy of expansion of television in this country.

May I repeat that the government has removed any uncertainty as to where the responsibility lies. The day before yesterday the Minister of National Revenue stated that after due consideration the government has decided as a matter of policy the course that is to be followed with respect to the extension of television broadcasting in Canada. I have indicated that the program in question is one of a particularly offensive nature. I am not suggesting for one moment that this is the only offensive program; on the contrary, there have been others. But I return again to a discussion of this program today because it has been referred to in the press, and a very condensed statement as to the nature of the program was carried in the newspapers across Canada which are subscribers to the Canadian Press service. This program, which was broadcast by the C.B.C. on November 29 for a period of an hour and a half, I am informed, was under the title of "Hilda Morgan". In last night's Ottawa Citizen there is a Canadian Press dispatch which contains the following statement, and I quote from that dispatch:

> The play "Hilda Morgan", carried by the C.B.C. November 29 dealt with the problem of a Toronto school teacher who becomes pregnant and whose fiancé is killed before the scheduled wedding day. She decides to have the baby and face whatever gossip and loss of reputation her action may bring.

Since this has gone across the country in the form of a Canadian Press dispatch I do not feel the same reluctance in bringing this matter up in the house and I think it should be further considered. According to the information I have received, the television broadcast was based on the broad general plan outlined in the Canadian Press dispatch but it went much further. It described the predicament of this unfortunate girl in the play who was being seen by the people who were tuned in on this television broadcast. There was a discussion in which her mother urged her to follow a course that might be very seriously open to objection by many people in this country, and by many parents who would be greatly concerned about the nature of a broadcast of this kind.

This girl, according to the play, then decided to discuss the matter with the man who had become her fiancé and the discussion centred around an illegal operation, the cost of the operation, where the medical services could be obtained, how much the services would cost and what the additional expense would be. Following the tragic death of her fiancé, in this play, the girl then goes through very natural mental debates with herself as to the course she should follow and that course was as outlined in the Canadian Press dispatch.

Mr. Speaker, this is different from ordinary radio broadcasting. Every human being who can see is more attracted by a picture of any kind than by words. There is an old Chinese maxim that one picture is worth 10,000 words. In its impact upon the mind of a young person this is particularly true. Young children might pay very little attention to words of that nature coming over the radio unaccompanied by any picture. Given dramatic emphasis by a picture on a screen, something of this kind becomes intensely real to anyone who sees it—particularly to young and imaginative minds.

This was the program to which I drew the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) on the very day that the government had stated that the expansion of television is a government policy, not a C.B.C. policy, and that the government is deciding where and how it is to be done. On that same day the minister indicated his lack of concern by leaving the impression that the report he had received indicated no cause for concern.

Mr. Speaker, I know what my feeling would be if I came into a room in my own house and found my twelve-year-old daughter looking at a picture of that kind. I know perfectly well what the feeling of any parent would be who found his daughter or his son of that age, or an older age, looking at a picture of this kind.

Mr. Drew: I will pay no attention to the interjection because I am sure that there are not more than one or two in this house who would treat a subject of this kind lightly. I can imagine that there would be parents who would like to get their hands on the person responsible for projecting a broadcast of that kind into their own homes. I should think that most people would agree that it is a despicable thing to introduce a program of that nature into homes where the parents may have no opportunity to exercise supervision over what their children may be seeing at a particular time. At least they can exercise some discipline over their children as to whether they do or do not go to moving picture houses. Also we should recall that the moving pictures in every province are subject to censorship by some provincial agency.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the lack of concern expressed by the minister on this occasion I can only hope, if the dominion government, which now accepts full responsibility for the policy of the C.B.C., is unwilling to take any action in regard to matters of this kind, that the provincial governments right across Canada will take action to prevent filth of that kind going out over the television stations of this country.

Mr. McCann: You did not ask me my opinion.

Mr. Drew: If we cannot look for some standards of decency being imposed by the government, which now accepts responsibility, then I hope those governments which are responsible for property, civil rights, and the general welfare of people in their community, will seek a way to control things of this kind.

Now I wish to refer to certain of the technical aspects of television broadcasting. When this subject was under consideration the day before yesterday I referred to the fact that arrangements were being made to pipe in programs from the United States through a Buffalo outlet. I was referring to the microwave relay communication with Buffalo, and the minister interjected "C.B.C. has no relay". Now, Mr. Speaker, the C.B.C. has made arrangements for a relay.

Mr. McCann: You are dealing with two different things.

Mr. Drew: I am not.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege—the other day the hon. gentleman indicated in his remarks that the C.B.C. was building a relay system. They are not. It is being built by the Bell Telephone Company and the C.B.C. in all likelihood will make arrangements with them to use it on a rental basis.

An hon. Member: That is one way of dodging it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the minister is dodging it right now. This microwave relay was built with the absolute understanding with the government, or rather with the C.B.C., which of course would have to obtain permission from the government which accepts full responsibility for policy, that the government would pay an annual rental which was estimated in the press to be $235,000 a year. I will go no farther than to say that I would be very surprised, in view of the information I have received, if the minister would challenge the statement that there is an arrangement for rental to be paid to the Bell Telephone Company for the use of that microwave relay from Buffalo for the purpose of piping into the Canadian system these very American programs which we were told we were going to be protected against. Why this evasion, I do not know. This was built with the knowledge that it was going to be used. There was never any doubt about it. The fact is, there is no secrecy about it. It has been publicly discussed in the press, and great concern has been expressed by those associated with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation because they have not been able to arrange to bring in those programs which the C.B.C. was going to protect us against. When I say "protect us against", that is what they said. The C.B.C., of course, is now very anxious to bring in these programs.

Obviously, some of the people who produce these programs on the other side are not prepared to let them come in at bargain rates. So far as I know, the only one that has reached the point of causing any uncertainty, because of a decision being before the C.B.C., is the question as to whether the program by Bishop Sheen, which has wide acceptance in the United States, is to be permitted to be televised here in Canada. I certainly believe that it would be a very strange thing if a religious program were to be denied when programs such as that to which I have referred are going to be freely permitted and allowed to be broadcast into the homes.

There is a microwave relay. As a matter of fact, anyone driving between here and Toronto has seen the towers; or at least some of the towers are the C.B.C. microwave relay.

Mr. McCann: It is the Bell Telephone relay system.

Mr. Drew: It is a microwave relay constructed by the Bell Telephone on the understanding that it is to be used by the C.B.C., on the assurance that commercial producers were being sought by the C.B.C. who would broadcast over these microwave relay stations. In fact, a contract would not be obtained unless they did give that assurance.

Let me come now to the broad question of policy stated by the government. The government has taken the position that it is going to preempt the large and most populous centres where it would have been easy to have obtained television broadcasting without any expenditure to the receiving public or to the taxpayer. They have preempted that, and they are leaving it to the private investor to go out to the distant points and give that service. As a result of this iron curtain which the government—and I underline the government—has placed upon television, it is a very interesting thing to note that almost anyone in the United States will be able to watch the coronation proceedings on television within twenty-four hours, while only a handful of Canadians who are fortunate enough to be able to receive the United States broadcasts will be able to have the same facilities. This is the result of the restrictive policy adopted by this government for the sake of preserving the holy cow, the C.B.C., which the government has set up as some sort of supermonster that is to be subjected to no restraint of any kind and is to compete on no ordinary terms of competition.

This is the government that describes itself as the liberal free enterprise government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: It is not even prepared to stand by public ownership. It is only prepared to stand by public ownership in television where the very easy pickings lie; but as for the areas in which difficulty presents itself—and these are the areas the C.B.C. was set up to reach—it is going to be left to the private investor to give service to the public. This is indeed a complete reversal of the policy that was laid down.

Now, there is going to be a further barrier. The impression had been left that once the holy cow was established, then it might be possible for some other less important member of the same breed to invade the same area. Now, they have decided against that. As a matter of fact, they have found how tough free enterprise competition is, and they are not going to permit it. They have found, for instance, in the Toronto area, in which there is competition between the free enterprise station at Buffalo and the C.B.C., only a small percentage of the audience looks at the C.B.C. presentations. Perhaps that is the one saving grace in connection with the filthy program that was broadcast by the C.B.C.; probably there were not enough people attracted to the program and it did not do as much harm as otherwise would have been the case. Now, confronted with all kinds of competition, they are not going to permit it. They are going to obtain an absolute monopoly. Then, when the Grey Cup football game goes off the air for one-third of the game and people's blood pressure rises as they wonder what is happening in the interim period, there is going to be no competition to show up this protected monopoly which the government, by its policy, is establishing.

There is another very interesting development in this connection and which is pointed out by something that appeared today in the Montreal Gazette. It is entitled "On and off the record". The article reads:

> Shape of TV pattern: When Burlington, Vermont, gets a television station, probably next October, watch for a repetition of the situation presently existing in Buffalo, New York, where liberal chunks of program time are taken by advertisers directing their message to Canadians in the Niagara-Hamilton-Toronto area, rather than to residents of the United States. As a result of this situation, TV station WBEN in Buffalo has just received permission to increase its power to 50,000 watts, and increase the height of its masts to 1,100 feet, the second tallest in North America. These improvements will enable it to give virtually local-station reception and clarity as far away as Toronto. Backers of the proposed station at Burlington anticipate the same situation as with the New York outlet. With 80 per cent of the available Canadian TV sets tuned to WBEN, it is expected the percentage will not differ radically here.

When I was out in Vancouver not long ago, I read that an application was to be made for a television broadcasting station just south of the United States border for the one purpose of broadcasting commercial television programs to Canada. The Canadian service is to be limited to this one monopoly station in Vancouver. What this means is simply this. Some Canadians who live near the border are going to be able to hear the free voice from beyond the iron curtain. They are actually going to be able to hear broadcasts that are being prepared by those whose competition forces them to establish some standards of attractiveness in order to gain the commercial time on those stations.

By all means let the government recognize that there is a place for publicly-owned television. Since this was only a preliminary announcement, or rather a second stage announcement of government policy, I would hope we would have a third stage announcement of government policy before the legislation is introduced. This announcement would inform us that the government has discovered that they went at this thing backwards; that they have decided that the stations in the large centres will be private stations; that they will carry out the original intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and that they will provide the television stations in those distant areas which cannot possibly be served by the ordinary private investment because of the sparse population in those areas. That was the reason for the existence of publicly-owned broadcasting and would appear to be the reason for its continuity with a publicly-owned television system.

To remove any suggestion that criticism of this restrictive attitude toward television is in any way a partisan approach to this subject, may I read from a paper that has been a consistent supporter of this government, namely the Vancouver Sun. The heading is "Ingrained Despotism", and the article reads as follows:

> Canada's broadcasting industry is sick . . .
> Refusal of the right to compete keeps private radio puny and makes C.B.C. sluggish. The condition will be even worse with the advent of television . . . C.B.C. is to hold TV monopoly in the large and lucrative cities. Private TV is confined to smaller centres which C.B.C. doesn't want.
> Obviously private TV is bound to do a poor job because it won't be able to afford to pay for good programs. And C.B.C. won't need to bother about trying to please the big city public because its viewers can't dial to another local station.
> This scheme doesn't make sense. It would be completely reversed if C.B.C.'s only aim is to give the people the best possible TV.

Mr. Speaker, the last words that I read describe exactly the proposition I have been putting before the house. I repeat them:

> This scheme doesn't make sense. It would be completely reversed if C.B.C.'s only aim is to give the people the best possible TV.

Mr. Speaker, it is useless for the government to suggest that it has at no time recognized this policy. It recognizes this policy in connection with telephone communications. For instance, just a few days ago in this house a question was addressed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), when he asked what the situation was with regard to certain government-owned telephone lines in the province of British Columbia.

In British Columbia—and I am offering this only as an example—the government has recognized the fact that there are occasions when it is necessary for the government to step in and to provide facilities which ordinary private investment is not likely to be able to provide. Therefore the government of Canada did step in and provide government telephone communications with distant points in British Columbia. In fact, we had that subject up for discussion on another occasion, in the consideration of certain news that had been restrained in Vancouver island; and we found that the dominion government is actively interested in the operation of telephone lines. So that at distant points where private investment, in the normal course of events, would not be able to provide these facilities, government financing will step in.

Since that procedure has been accepted as a policy in connection with telephones, and since it was the policy which was the basis of the whole concept of the C.B.C., in order not to leave these remarks as offering criticism only, in all earnestness I urge the government to reconsider its stated policy before it presents the legislation and to remember that the basic concept of the C.B.C. was to provide facilities in those distant areas where, in the ordinary course of events, private investment could not be expected to offer facilities. May I also, in all earnestness, ask the government to reconsider its rather casual approach to some of these broadcasts which are now being permitted to go out over the stations for which it accepts full policy responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to something that was said just after I spoke and which has been said on different occasions since that time during the debate that has been proceeding. On various occasions it has been suggested that the opportunity to examine national defence expenditures was fully covered by the committee on defence expenditures set up last year. I have no intention of extending discussion here, but I just want to point out one or two salient facts which I hope will be borne in mind by some of those who have been misled by a completely unfounded explanation which was given to this house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and by others with regard to some of the fantastic orders which have been placed for military non-essentials.

It was shown yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) that when the largest item of defence expenditures came before the committee last year, namely an item of $668,962,842 which is simply a bulk figure in the statement, it was pointed out that any inquiry into the details of the items which made up that huge total would not be permitted on this farcical ground of national security. What a farce it is to suggest that national security should deny to us an opportunity to find out how a figure of that kind is made up! After all, I think most sensible people recognize that on this continent the core of our defence rests in the armed forces of the United States. I propose to wait, Mr. Speaker, until the second debate has concluded.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that in the United States every one of the items of this kind has been before committees of congress and that it has been possible to examine them there. Yet here, in cases where we are frequently making precisely the same type of equipment, we are told that we must not have the details in this country. I mention that point particularly for this reason. When other items were mentioned, some emphasis was placed on the fact that a million and a half pair of boots, over a million ties, 29,000 teapots and a number of things of that type were simply stockpiling for a possible emergency. May I say that there is not a single member of this house who does not know that if there is to be stockpiling, that stockpiling must be related to some over-all figure. If this were, in fact, stockpiling it would be for a force of something in the nature of 500,000 instead of a force which is, in fact, at the moment more of the nature of 50,000. As was pointed out yesterday, there is no stockpiling for a large force of that kind. There are no guns, tanks, machine guns and other weapons being stockpiled for any large force of that nature.

Mr. Ferguson: They will throw teapots at them.

Mr. Drew: Yes; that would appear to be the concept of defence presented by the explanation that these are for stockpiling. In other words, I have no doubt that if we got into an emergency and someone asked where the weapons were for the force which would be raised to meet that emergency, the answer of the government would be, "Oh, don't worry; all is well. We have not the guns or the tanks, but we have plenty of ties and teapots."

That is the measure of the real sincerity of the answer given in regard to these huge orders which were placed before the house.

Mr. Mutch: And it is not a bad measure of the criticism, either.

Mr. Rowe: There is a pretty remark!

Mr. Drew: Yes, I should think that that remark measures in most exact terms the seriousness of the approach by members on the other side of the house to this extremely serious problem.

I wish now to deal with a subject brought before the house yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—and that brings me to the subamendment moved to the motion now before the house.

Mr. Dickey: At last.

Mr. Drew: I know I share the feeling of all members in the house when I express my pleasure that, once again, we have heard the hon. member for Vancouver East speaking with his customary vigour and in a resonant voice. I am inclined to think that most hon. members who consider these subjects seriously would agree with most of the statements made yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver East when he was referring to the need for something being done to meet this situation. As to the way in which it is to be done there is disagreement—very sincere disagreement. There is disagreement as to the method which would best produce results.

It was pointed out yesterday that it has been emphasized over and over again that, living as we do in this very prosperous land, we are a fortunate people.

Mr. Dupuis: Good government.

Mr. Drew: And the remarks to which I have referred called to the attention of the house the fact that there are people throughout Canada who are in great need of assistance and support at this time. The need for some system that will assure to every Canadian adequate, prompt and efficient diagnostic, preventive, surgical and medical treatment should be the desire of every member in the house; and I hope it is. There are many people in this country today who are not getting early diagnosis of serious diseases, because of the fear of the expense of the services which might be needed in the event of an unfavourable diagnosis. That fear should be removed; and that fear is something that is in the minds of those who are really concerned about this subject—

Mr. Dupuis: Like you.

Mr. Drew: —even if it is not in the mind of the hon. member who keeps interrupting. Perhaps, with the sound system we now have in the house, those interruptions will not be on the record.

Mr. Dupuis: I said, "Like you".

Mr. Drew: Oh, there need be no attention paid to that comment. I suggest that most hon. members are interested in this subject; and even if one or two members do show a lack of concern for the needy people who are requiring medical treatment and assistance of this kind, that should not divert the attention of the remaining members in the house from the subject we have under consideration.

Mr. McIlraith: No one made any such interjection.

Mr. Mutch: You are getting some support, and you did not expect it.

Mr. Dupuis: I approve.

Mr. Drew: The subject is one which has been under consideration for a considerable number of years. I can certainly understand the exasperation expressed by some members who say that the time is long overdue for some effective method of dealing with this problem. The time is long overdue; and the full responsibility for that fact rests with this government.

This matter was brought forward for consideration at a dominion-provincial conference in August of 1945. Certain proposals were placed before the representatives of the dominion and provincial governments of that time. All governments agreed—I say all governments agreed—that a great deal of additional information was necessary in order to tackle this problem of health insurance. But, Mr. Speaker, every government there—and I repeat, "every government there"—approved of the principle of health insurance. There was never any doubt on that score. What the governments sought was an opportunity to lay the foundation for a plan which would work, with this essential, that the various governments as well as the health authorities might all be able to co-operate in some integrated program which would work effectively in tackling this great problem.

The hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out that he and other members of his party would support anything that would bring this matter to a head, and lay the foundation for some effective plan being put into effect. That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly the purpose of the amendment now before the house. We all know that in these amendments we cannot spell out in exact detail any program of this kind. Attention is drawn to it by suggesting the need for dealing with the subject under broad and general terms.

I hope therefore that the members of the party to which the hon. member for Vancouver East belongs will support our amendment when it comes to a vote. The hon. member went further and said that the situation is perfectly clear, and that he hopes legislation will be introduced at this session. He said—and I believe I am repeating his words correctly—that legislation of this kind is legislation by consent.

Mr. Speaker, if legislation of this kind is to be effective, the consent and agreement must be obtained in advance. If legislation of this kind is to do the job that we all want it to do, then it must be known in advance that the provincial governments and the municipalities will be able to carry it out.

There are a number of considerations which must be fully examined before it is possible to lay down any rigid form in a legislative measure that would carry out the wishes of those who do want health insurance put into effect. A few days ago the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McCusker) tabled copies of further reports which had been presented by the provinces. I do not intend to comment upon his wholly unnecessary remark about the fact that if I had had more time to read these I would not have made the remarks I did. I recognize that it is quite in the order of debates of this nature that there should be facetious and unconsidered remarks.

I know that the hon. member has reason to be aware that I was associated rather closely with some of these activities at the time that the preliminary discussions took place as to the way in which these reports would be prepared. I know what the reports contain. In fact I would even raise the question as to whether I might not know more about some of them than the parliamentary assistant to the minister. But the fact remains that there are some reports there which it would be well for hon. members to consider.

For instance, I have before me one of the volumes of the report made by the Ontario government on their health survey. There are equally interesting reports by nine of the ten provincial governments of this country dealing with a similar subject. With the reports that were tabled a few days ago from the provinces of Quebec, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba we now have reports from nine provinces. The province which has not tabled a report is the province of Newfoundland. I am sure that in the case of that province it is due to the fact that they have not been as long associated with the statistical services that have been established on an increasingly uniform basis by the different provinces, but I do feel sure that steps will be taken there to complete their report.

I would point out that on page 9 of chapter 3 of the third volume of the Ontario report on health there is reference to the various types of plans which are in effect for the purpose of providing some type of health insurance. Some extremely interesting figures are given which go to point out how far many people in this country are covered already by insurance of one kind or another. Just to show the complexity of this problem, may I point out the findings in this report in so far as Ontario is concerned. The people in the province of Ontario now have protection of one kind and another in regard to hospital and medical services under the following plans:

Blue Cross plan for hospital care
Co-operative medical plans
Physicians' Services, Inc.
Associated Medical Services, Inc.
Windsor Medical Services Inc.
Hollinger employees medical services
Porcupine employees medical services
Ross & Young-Davidson Mines
Fraternal and mutual benefit associations
Accident and sickness insurance companies
Group contracts from life insurance companies
Workmen's compensation board
Industrial camps
Ontario department of welfare recipients

Under these combined forms of coverage there are 4,325,000 estimated coverages. Obviously there are duplications because the total population of Ontario is something like 4,700,000. I should like to read a paragraph at the top of page 5 of volume 3 which reads as follows:

> Nearly half (approximately 46 per cent) of this total comprised participants in nonprofit plans; another 21 per cent was made up of insurance with commercial companies; and the remainder was eligible for some form of provincial government assistance in the event of medical need. On the strength of these estimates, and making some allowance for duplication, one authority has hazarded that close to two-thirds of the total population of Ontario have some measure of protection against the financial loss attendant upon illness or accidental injury. It was, however, impossible to support this or any other guess with the facts available at the time of this survey.

May I repeat the last words:

> It was, however, impossible to support this or any other guess with the facts available at the time of this survey.

If hon. members will examine the reports which have been submitted by nine of the ten provinces they will find that although there is reference to different plans of this nature, as yet there is nothing but a guess as to the exact coverage of the various plans. Yet that is the key to the solution of this extremely difficult problem. Unless we are to embark on a plan of state insurance in which the whole medical service is taken over by the state under some uniform plan of coverage, that is the only alternative.

I do not think it should be necessary to emphasize the fact that nearly every member of this house has had occasion to be associated with hospital and medical services in one way or another. Most members, either as members of this house, as members of provincial legislatures, as members of municipal councils, as members of hospital boards or in some other capacity, have had contacts of this kind and know the mental agony of people who find themselves suddenly confronted with the possibility of serious and dangerous illness without knowing where to turn for the financial resources with which to meet the heavy expenses of the services required.

Fortunately the doctors and medical services of this country have gone a long way toward meeting this need. In fact I doubt if there is a single case that has been brought to the attention of doctors or nurses where treatment has not been given. In many cases the real trouble has been that people have been fearful of going to doctors or to hospitals because of their knowledge of the expense that might be incurred. Our objective therefore should be to find as soon as possible a plan which will ensure that in this most fortunate land of ours with its very great wealth there will not be a single Canadian who will be deprived of proper diagnostic, preventive, medical or surgical care which will meet their personal needs and at the same time maintain that person as a healthy member of our society. However we achieve that objective, I feel sure there can be agreement on that common purpose. I do not question the sincerity of those who seek to attain this objective by different methods. I do not question the sincerity of those who say: "Let us go ahead, never mind about technicalities, let us have legislation."

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there are constitutional requirements, and this present government is of course fully conscious of that fact, because they asserted the constitutional position in upsetting a number of social services provided by the Conservative government before the Liberals came into power in 1935. That of course was their right, and it is also one reason why they should respect the views of those who have some concern about the very constitution that they put forward as a reason for not carrying forward social services introduced by the Conservative government of those days.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Of course the kind of laughter that I hear on the other side bespeaks an empty mind.

Mr. Graydon: You may benefit by health insurance over there.

Mr. Drew: Those members who have followed the history of this parliament are well aware of the facts to which I am referring. I repeat that it was certainly the right of this government to carry constitutional appeals against those social services which sometime later they did introduce. It was their right. What I am pointing out is that, in view of the fact that this government has asserted the importance of the constitution, we should not get into a snarl by going ahead without full regard to the position this government is likely to take at any time if it suits their convenience. So far as this situation is concerned, there is another reason why the constitutional position should not be disregarded. The provinces of this country under our—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I hear "Oh, oh" from the same intelligent source. I hear "Oh, oh" from a member who obviously does not think that the provinces should have any rights at all. As a matter of fact the "Oh, oh" that was interjected from across the aisle represents the attitude of the government toward the authority of our provinces under the constitution. Let no one be in any doubt about that fact.

An hon. Member: Very comical.

Mr. Howe: Get on with the speech.

Mr. Drew: There has been no uncertainty at any time in the determination of the government to grab power by concentrating the tax resources more and more in their hands.

An hon. Member: You are just wasting time.

Mr. Dickey: The branch offices.

Mr. Hodgson: They will say "Oh, oh" after the next election.

Mr. Howe: You are entering on the third hour now.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The branch offices.

Mr. Drew: The interjections being made at this time are interjections which I hope will thoroughly impress, upon those who still believe that this is a federal system and that the federal system should be respected, the very noticeable fact that the government is impatient even with the discussion of provincial rights under the constitution which should guide the combined governmental activities of this country.

Mr. Howe: We have accepted the first two hours. The third hour is more difficult.

Mr. Drew: If anyone were to pay attention to the amount of time that the minister who has just interjected spends in announcing government policies outside the house, then no speech ever made here could possibly be regarded as a long speech. The fact is that the minister in question does not even believe in parliament, let alone the constitution. He believes in announcing government policy in New York, in Detroit, in any place except here in parliament.

Mr. Hodgson: And "Howe"!

An hon. Member: Don't lose your temper.

Mr. Dickey: Don't lose your place.

Mr. Drew: This subject is one which has been under consideration for some considerable time, and the very fact that it has is a reason why we should now be perfectly sure where we are headed in dealing with this most important question. It was fully under discussion at the time that the dominion and provincial governments met in 1945. It will be remembered by those who attended that conference that the dominion government put forward certain health proposals, but they proposed a special tax for those measures and so far we have not yet had any clear statement of the alternative. I can remember what I said on behalf of the province of Ontario as recorded in the record of the discussions at page 236. I said:

> The dominion government proposes that the provinces finance their share of the cost of health insurance by "a registration fee to be paid by or on behalf of every person who has attained his sixteenth birthday and whose normal place of residence is in the province or area where benefits are provided . . . " But anyone who has had experience with the collection of a poll tax will understand the difficulty of collecting a registration fee which is not related to earning capacity, or whether the registrant is employed, an old age pensioner, or a student without personal earning power.
> The dominion minister of health and welfare, as well as certain dominion officials, have also stated that the dominion government intends to finance its share of the cost of health insurance or old age pensions by a social security tax levied on all incomes, without exemption. While the amount to be levied in this way was not definitely stated, nor was this special tax in fact mentioned in the printed "Proposals", the figure which has been mentioned in discussion is 5 per cent. This would be in addition to present income taxes and the registration fee or poll tax to be levied by the provinces. This would mean that if the provinces relinquished their personal income and corporation taxes and succession duties, the tax field left to them would be further crowded and confused by the dominion government introducing its special income levy.

That point was made at that time, and ever since has been before the members who attended that conference. Therefore I would recall this to those who now say, "Let us go ahead with the 1945 proposals". Before we go ahead with the 1945 proposals, we must know how they will operate. We must know how they are to be financed and we must know whether the provinces and the municipalities are able to carry out their share. At the moment that information is simply not available.

So far as the subject of health insurance is concerned, there were statements over and over again that there was agreement in principle and that the necessary course was to find out the way that it was to be done. The whole problem is one which necessarily brings the municipalities, hospital boards and provincial governments into the question. I should like to read the closing paragraphs of a very thoughtful and thought-provoking article in the October issue of the McGill Medical Journal by Dr. R. P. Vivian, Strathcona professor and chairman of the department of health and social medicine at McGill university. After examining this whole question of the problem of the costs of medical care and the various ways in which this service can be assured to everyone, Dr. Vivian closes his article with these words:

> There can be no real solution to the complex problem of costs of medical care until the matter is approached jointly by representatives with authority from the professions, hospital boards and governments. Compulsory health insurance does not provide the solution to the matters represented here. The amount of money required would raise the present level of taxes significantly with no assurance of adequate control or acceptable service. It is doubted if the public would appreciate another increase in the tax load.
> It would seem that the responsibility for initiating a full exploration of the problem lies with the dominion government. To achieve an improvement in the method of meeting costs of medical care it will require the full co-operation of the professions and the hospitals and the general public. It is hoped that this may occur in the reasonably near future so that the problem may be simplified if not solved.

Mr. Speaker, that statement by an eminent doctor, whose services have been sought by the governments of a number of other countries to consider this very subject, puts its finger right on the problem before us, as do the medical reports which were tabled in the house by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Those reports make it perfectly clear that it is not yet possible for any arbitrary plan to be laid down and that it would, in fact, set back the whole course of improved medical service in this country if a rigid pattern were established by legislation before there was agreement about how provincial authorities, municipal councils, boards of health and other official organizations would play their part in carrying it into effect.

I can understand the sense of urgency in the minds of those who call for action of some kind no matter what the constitutional provisions may be. I can understand the sense of urgency with which that demand is made by those who have themselves felt the full impact of the present cost of treatment of this kind. I think every hon. member in this house shares the desire to provide a system which will assure every Canadian of the very highest level of diagnostic, preventative, medical and surgical treatment, as well as hospital and other curative treatment that may go with it.

Mr. Speaker, let us not, however, disregard the position of the provinces. Let us not for a moment disregard the fact that it would be impossible to carry this plan out until there is an over-all agreement on the financial position of the provinces. One province as yet has not signed an agreement in regard to taxation. That province has a perfect right to take the position it has taken. The province of Quebec, in its judgment, has decided that it will not sign the agreement that has been offered. How can any plan be put forward while that situation exists? But, Mr. Speaker, I hope no hon. member will suggest that it is the province of Quebec which is preventing this being carried out. No other province can carry it out under the agreement which now exists. It is not the province of Quebec that is holding this up in any way, and do not let anyone suggest it.

The provinces that have signed have made agreements which provide them with certain financial resources to meet present demands. At the time Ontario recently signed an agreement, the prime minister of Ontario made it perfectly clear that this was only a stopgap arrangement and that it did not meet their present requirements. The premier of Nova Scotia has made the same statement, and so have the premiers of other provinces.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the provinces are not in a position to carry out their part in any plan of this kind which might be imposed upon them by legislation. Also it is perfectly clear, and it was made abundantly clear by the mayors who met here in Ottawa last week, that the municipalities cannot carry any added burden. In fact they find it difficult to carry their present burdens without some arrangements being made so they will have still further resources. It is the municipalities that must accept the major share of responsibility for administration in any plan of this kind. You cannot ask them to accept that responsibility under existing arrangements.

It was for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that we introduced the amendment we did, expressing our regret that the government has failed—

> (d) To conduct inquiries in consultation with the provincial governments, so that necessary information may be available for the dominion and provincial governments to consider jointly a national health insurance program.

For the very reasons I have pointed out—the statements that have been made in reports of the provincial governments, the statements that have been made by the dominion government itself at the time these subjects were under consideration—I submit that the first requirement is discussion between the dominion and provincial governments in consultation with the municipal councils and the recognized representatives of the medical profession and the hospital boards across this country.

To those who express urgency in meeting this need may I say that we have reiterated over and over again our request that this government act to initiate steps that will bring into effect a health insurance program that will fully recognize the various services that are now available in various forms across this country. That has been our request and it is our request now. We present that request with the utmost urgency. We do so, however, with emphasis on the fact that any short cuts, any by-passing of the constitution, will only confuse the whole issue and further delay the time when Canadians who need assistance of this nature will get the assistance to which they are entitled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, and because the amendment to the amendment seeks to convey the impression that this government can act without consultation of this nature, without in any way questioning the sincerity of their motive or the objective which they seek to attain it is not our purpose to support the subamendment. May I express the hope, in view of the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) yesterday, that when the main amendment comes up they will support it as an expression to this government, which has been holding up these dominion-provincial conferences, that we do want action; that we do want a health insurance program that will be worked out with the provinces and that will give the people of this country who need health services of this kind the very kind of services that a country of this kind should offer.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Before the vote on the subamendment is taken I too wish to say a few words regarding health insurance. However, I have one or two other things which I first wish to put before the house.

I noticed that when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was speaking in the house the other day, particularly in reply to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), he laid great stress on the progress which has been made in Canada during the last number of years. He pointed out that the prosperity of Canada had reached an all-time height; that the national product of this country had reached something like $22 billion; but at the same time, and this was somewhat significant, 10 per cent of our national product had to go for defence. Let me state immediately that Social Credit policy has never been niggardly in respect to the money which was required for national defence. If you go back even to 1935, when we first came into this house, I believe the record will show that we have been among those who were always advocating that there was nothing too good for our servicemen, particularly those men who were facing the enemy over in Korea or anywhere else. We believed that they should have the best of equipment, the best of clothing and the best of everything it was possible to give them.

We join with others in that regard; and we want to indicate also that we are proud of the fact that Canada has prospered as it has. We must not be confused, however; and this is the point that was raised by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) the other day, when he stated that this prosperity was in great part the result of the efforts of the federal government. Of course I dealt with that once before in this house, and I do not intend to reiterate what I said on that occasion. I was impressed with a magazine which I received yesterday, and which is published in Alberta. It is entitled Within our Borders. I should like to give a quotation from the issue of December 1, 1952, as an indication of the progress that has been made through other efforts than those of the federal government. The heading on this article is "Alberta industrial employment doubles in 13 years". It reads:

> Alberta's manufacturing industry is estimated to have a gross value of production of $510 million this year. This compares to a gross production value of $87 million in 1939.

You will note that it was in the fall of 1935 that the Social Credit government took over the reins in Alberta. You will notice also the tremendous results since then.

> Between 1939 and 1952, employment in Alberta's manufacturing industry has increased from 13,000 to 29,000 while the number of establishments has grown from 1,000 to 1,900. More than 11 per cent of Alberta's labour force is employed in the manufacturing industry while 25 per cent are employed in other industries. Agriculture absorbs 38 per cent of the working force and other primary industries 9 per cent.
> New investment in Alberta's manufacturing industries has soared since 1947. In this year, new investment amounted to $10,700,000; in 1950, $16 million; in 1951, $24,400,000 and 1952 will see an estimated $77,400,000 invested in industry. Investment in manufacturing has increased 623 per cent from 1947 to 1952 or 390 per cent when allowances are made to offset inflationary values. Profits of Alberta companies increased slightly more than 100 per cent between 1946 and 1950.

That will give hon. members some indication of the progress that can be made in this country under proper provincial supervision.

The big trouble is that at the same time there has been an increase in municipal debt. Let me give you an example. The mayor of Calgary, one of those municipalities that has gone head over heels in debt, was the Liberal candidate in the last federal election. There you have a good example of the policy of Liberal administration. If you want to correct these evils, and correct them quickly, the only answer is to get rid of those Liberals and get a Social Credit regime. Then you will find, as I have indicated, that you will have prosperity.

A moment ago I mentioned that the Prime Minister had indicated that 10 per cent of our national product had to go for defence. In other words, the budget amounted to something over $4 billion and about half of that goes to national defence. This gives us the basis for the belief that it is the national defence spending which is maintaining prosperity in Canada today. It gives a stimulus to business which would not otherwise be there. It is a sad state of affairs, Mr. Speaker, when the prosperity of our country must be dependent upon preparation for war. If you removed that factor from our economy today you would find we would be facing another depression.

One of the signs which indicate that times are not as good as they might be, when you consider our national product is as high as it is—and this was indicated the other day by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch)—is the fact that so many people in Canada are now forced to buy on credit. It is quite evident that if the people of this country had sufficient purchasing power they would not be using their credit to buy these things which are necessary. You only have to pick up a newspaper to see that refrigerators and washing machines are advertised at greatly reduced prices. If you go to a store to buy a washing machine they will give you $75 or $100 for your old machine without even looking at it. They are trying to force people who have not the money to buy these things into credit buying. Conditions would be a great deal worse if it were not for the fact that we are spending $2 billion and more each year for war production, and this money is spread out among the people so they have that amount available as purchasing power to buy consumer goods. Otherwise we would be in a very poor position.

It is tragic when one realizes that we have to depend on this type of an economy in order to maintain any sign of prosperity. This morning I was in the railway committee room and heard Mr. Dymond speak at the meeting of the advisory council on labour. He made some outstanding statements about the subject I was discussing. Mr. Dymond told us, and I took a note of it, that defence is the underlying support of our economy. It struck me as rather important, because that was the thing I intended to deal with this afternoon. This statement was made by one of the government officials in the Department of Labour, that the underlying support of our economy is our defence effort.

What would happen if our war effort were to fold up? What would happen if peace were declared in this world? I am not suggesting for a moment that everyone would not be very happy to have that happen, but what would be the disastrous results to our economy? Mr. Dymond went on to point out that one of the reasons for fuller employment was that the war industries had now reached the point where they were going into quantity production. Even despite that fact, in the figures which were tabled at that meeting this morning it was pointed out that although we have what is generally called a period of high employment, nevertheless there are over 100,000 employable unemployed who cannot find jobs. That is the situation in a period of our peak prosperity.

Those are some of the warnings, Mr. Speaker, which we must take into consideration. There are, as well, other warnings to show that in our economy all is not quite as well as it could be. The other day I was looking through some of the clippings I had in my desk, and I found one from the Calgary Herald of Thursday, October 9, 1952. It is entitled "Production up During July". It is a reprint from Ottawa, Canadian Press, and reads as follows:

> The pace of production and business quickened during July, spurred by higher wholesale and retail sales and by heavier output of some metals, electric power, newsprint and automobiles.
> As a result, the industrial production index, based on 1935-39 equals 100, increased to 210·8 in July over 208·0 a year ago, the bureau of statistics reported Tuesday. However, for the first seven months this year, production was down about 1·6 per cent from output in the same period in 1951.
> The pace of the decline was cut from 2·8 per cent in the first quarter to 9·7 per cent in the second. A drop in manufacturing was the main cause of the slip.
> During July, however, gold production increased to 375,000 fine ounces from 344,000 in July, last year; steel climbed to 293,000 tons from 275,000; newsprint, 486,000 tons from 452,000.

The point I should like you to note, Mr. Speaker, is this. Had it not been for the increase in the production of gold, steel and newsprint, that index would have fallen to a greater extent than it did; and the place where the greatest downward trend was shown was in the manufacturing industry. That fact shows quite clearly that our manufacturing industries are not in what one would call a healthy condition; and when you find that we have something like 100,000 employable unemployed, then the situation needs some looking into.

In this house on many occasions we have heard from members who have indicated a falling off in the production of industries within their constituencies. The one who comes to my mind at the moment is the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) who this year was talking about the way the production of the woollen mills in his constituency had fallen off. These are some of the things we must keep in mind. There are as well other indications that we must watch if we are to have a prosperous Canada. Agriculture is one industry which is in need of some attention. In Canada agriculture has been the basic industry ever since the country first came into existence.

An hon. Member: It always will be.

Mr. Johnston: Today we find that those engaged in agriculture are becoming greatly concerned as to how they are going to be able to market their products and yet be able to show a decent profit. It is true that last year the agricultural industry had a fairly good crop but it was of poor grade. Low grades and damp grain made marketing difficult. The wheat board did an excellent job in that respect. This year—that is 1952—we have had another good crop, but we have also had difficulties in marketing it. Some of the farmers are finding themselves in need of cash because the delivery quotas are so low.

Agriculture is one industry which must have the greatest amount of attention paid to it lest it too begin to slip back as it did during the hungry thirties. The farmers are conscious of this fact. When they find that the support price of hogs will drop from 26 cents to 23 cents, it causes them a great deal of concern. When they find that their markets for beef have been lost, that fact also gives them a great deal of concern. It is true that the foot-and-mouth disease had something to do with that situation. However, that embargo will be lifted on March 1 and it is to be hoped there will be some relief in that regard. Nevertheless we will still find difficulty in marketing our beef products.

The farmer also finds that he is suffering a loss on the sale of eggs. The same thing is true with regard to dairy products. We cannot have a healthy agricultural industry if we are going to allow prices to drop to the point where farmers cannot make a profit on the things they produce. Particularly is that true, Mr. Speaker, when we understand that the things which the farmers have to buy are continually rising in price. Even the interest rates are going up on the money which they must borrow in order to carry on their seasonal operations. The price of farm machinery is soaring ever upward. The industries which produce the secondary goods are in such a position that they can control their production in order to maintain prices. But as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) pointed out the other day, what position would this country be in and what position would the world be in if the farmers throughout the nations decided to curtail production in order to maintain prices?

There is throughout Canada a good deal of concern over this problem. Some of the leading papers are taking note of it. The other day I cut out an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, December 4. It is an editorial which is headed "The Farmers' Case" and it reads as follows:

> Forecasts read at the dominion-provincial agricultural conference in Ottawa indicated that the Canadian farmer faces the 1953 prospect of reduced returns for his products with an increase in the cost of services and supplies he has to buy.
> This should extinguish for good the suggestion that all farmers are making easy fortunes, although it may be true that the prairie wheat growers, with a record crop and solid prices, have an unusual degree of prosperity.
> Delegates who heard the forecasts prepared by government economists make it plain they considered them over-optimistic. The root of the problem they face is found in uncertainty about markets, the United States' embargoes or quotas on dairy imports, and the United Kingdom inability to maintain her traditional purchases of such items as Canadian cheese being two important factors.
> In this situation the farmer must look to the dominion government, the central authority in a position to assist in negotiating better trade arrangements and fighting currency difficulties which hamper exports of surpluses.
> The farmer with surpluses piling on his farm at a time when millions need more food will feel betrayed if Ottawa fails in the vigorous and effective action they have the right to expect.

When you have a forecast of lower agricultural prices and loss of markets coming from government authorities, Mr. Speaker, it is even more significant that it otherwise would be. In the Ottawa Journal of Monday, December 1, while the dominion-provincial conference was sitting here in Ottawa, there appeared an article headed "Farm Incomes Likely Down Next Year. Federal-Provincial Conference Looks to '53 Program", which reads in part as follows:

> Dominion government economists today told the dominion-provincial agricultural conference that farm incomes probably will be somewhat lower in 1953 although the demand for food products will continue high.

Then Mr. C. V. Parker director of the agricultural division, dominion bureau of statistics, said:

> Present prospects gave little indication of a major change in 1953 from the generally prosperous conditions of 1952 in the domestic field.
> Export prospects were more uncertain. Due largely to exchange difficulties, sales to some overseas countries were not likely to be maintained at the high levels of 1952.

The exchange difficulties are something for which the federal government is directly responsible. Then Mr. Parker goes on in this way:

> Farm net income in 1953 also was expected to be somewhat lower, being calculated by adding income in kind to cash income, deducting farm expenses and depreciation, and adding or subtracting the value of changes in physical inventories of livestock and grains held on farms at the end of the year.
> There appeared little prospect of any significant change in total farm operating expenses in 1953, while taxes and interest rates might average higher.

The indication is clear that unless we have some change in the agricultural policy of this country we will be heading for difficulty, bearing in mind always that the greatest factor bolstering our so-called present prosperity is our defence effort. Each one of us hopes, of course, that the defence effort soon will not be needed. But in what condition will our economy be when that comes about?

The government has some responsibility in the matter. It is about to negotiate a new international wheat agreement. The farm unions in the three prairie provinces are asking that a change be made in the price. In some instances they are asking a ceiling of $2.35 with a floor of $1.85. Some organizations in the United States are asking for a price of $2.50. I am not going to suggest what the price should be, but I will say without hesitation that the price set in the international wheat agreement should be considerably higher than it is today. I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will be the one responsible for negotiating the agreement. He has said on other occasions that he will be a little tough to deal with; I hope that is true. He is a tough trader, and it is hoped that when the government negotiates the new agreement there will be a considerable increase in price, both in the ceiling and in the floor.

One factor which has been of great benefit to agriculture in the last few years is the fact that we have had a wheat board. But the wheat board is being attacked from every angle. I am sure I speak for the farmers of western Canada when I say that they do not want to do away with the board. They want to have orderly marketing of the products they have to offer. We know only too well, through past experience, that the farmers of western Canada particularly have had to sell their grain when prices were at the lowest. That was entirely due to the fact that they were at the mercy of the grain exchange. All the notes the farmer had given during the year to finance his operations became due immediately after threshing. That was usually the period when prices were low. The grain exchange was able to buy that grain at greatly reduced prices, and made a handsome profit on it. So those people who are lamenting over their loss of revenue because the grain exchange has, to a great extent, been put out of operation, are doing everything within their power to see that the grain exchange comes back into force, and that the wheat board is done away with.

I was interested the other day in reading an article in the Manitoba Co-operator which, it seemed to me, summed up the situation pretty well. Under the heading "Averages", it states:

> Stanley Jones, president of the Winnipeg grain exchange, says that the final wheat board payment averaging about 25 cents a bushel on deliveries from the 1951 crop was below the market average. That payment brought the price of wheat to $1.83⅓ basis No. 1 Northern at the terminal.
> Mr. Jones had the same remark to make about wheat board payment on barley.
>
> The vice-president of the grain exchange said the same thing about the wheat board payment on oats.
> The monotony of this performance might be relieved if a little variety was interjected therein. A well-trained parrot could do the job that is being done equally as well.
> Mr. Jones never stops to explain that the average prices he quotes do not take into account storage charges, costs of conditioning tough and damp grain, interest on borrowed money and other expenses.
> He does not calculate deliveries on prices prevalent during heavy delivery periods, thus presenting a true picture.
> All his efforts are directed to discrediting the wheat board which, as every farmer knows, made a real achievement in marketing the badly damaged 1951 crop.
> A comparison might be made with the performance of the open market when it was operating freely in the 1930's. In the six years from 1930 to 1935 inclusive the average price of wheat at the terminal under an unrestricted open market was 69 cents a bushel.
> In 1932 Alberta farmers marketed a big crop of good quality and obtained therefrom the average price of 32 cents a bushel. They lost money on every bushel they produced.

I think that article sums up the situation so far as the grain exchange is concerned. I need not add anything further. But let no one think that the farmers of western Canada want to do away with the wheat board.

I should like to say a few words about old age pensions, and pensions for incurables. These are classes of people who require our attention. There can be no doubt in my mind that almost every member in the house —and I use the word "almost" advisedly— would be in favour of increasing old age pensions, if it were put to an open and free vote in the house. I think the basis for determining an increased pension should not necessarily be, "Have we the money to increase the pension?" but rather, "Can we produce it? Have we the goods and services to provide increased pensions, without interfering in any way with the prosperity and progress of the country?"

I am sure the answer is that we can well afford to increase pensions. When we consider that our national product is in the neighbourhood of $22 billion, when we sit here and listen to the Prime Minister speak about the prosperity of Canada, and when we listen to hon. members speak about the great future of Canada, we should not hesitate to give increased pensions to those in need. Not only have we the actual production, but we have a great potential production.

This past season we had the largest crop of the very finest wheat in the history of Canada. Who will dare say that under those circumstances we cannot give our old age pensioners another loaf of bread? Who will dare say that with proper marketing conditions and proper inducements to agriculture we cannot give our old age pensioners or our incurables another pound of bacon, another dozen of eggs or another pound of butter? Surely there is no one in his right senses who will say that we cannot afford to raise old age pensions. Yet the lamentable fact is that the pensions are not being raised.

I know it will be said they were raised to $40 a month without the means test, which is something worth while, but it must be understood that today people cannot live on $40 a month any better than during the period of the depression they could live on $20 a month. You will therefore see the need of some further increases.

I received a letter from an old age pensioners' association which I think I should place on Hansard. It is from the Alberta old age pensioners' society, Calgary branch, and is addressed to me as the member of parliament for the constituency of Bow River, and I want to recognize this letter. This letter reads:

Dear Mr. Johnston:

May we draw your kind attention to the following points and requests?

In 1940 when this branch was first formed our older citizens of seventy were endeavouring to "exist" on twenty dollars basic pension monthly. Since then we have repeatedly appealed to parliament to raise this pension to fifty dollars. This amount perhaps in the past might have been enough to "exist" on. In the past twelve years the basic pension has been raised step by step to forty dollars so that we have not even yet reached our past requested goal of fifty. With the present high cost of living, especially rentals, the present amount of forty dollars is only in the same proportion as the first twenty in 1940.

Knowing that our "really needy" citizens (those with no other assets) are still only "existing" on the present forty dollars and so still in a state of "semi-starvation," we wish to urgently request our representatives in parliament to seriously consider an "adequate" basic pension so that our "really needy" can, in the evening of their lives, have at least something more than the present "semi-starvation". Living conditions of these older citizens have never actually been improved, and they being the builders of this wonderful country should have first and the most serious consideration.

We also request a lowering of the age to sixty to cover those who, for many reasons, cannot earn their own living. Our "really needy" should have first consideration and an "adequate" pension to live on.

May we here state, that we were disappointed when a ceiling of sixty dollars was placed on all applicants over seventy for pension, or a two per cent on the income up to three thousand dollars, and so only penalizing the moderate or lower income earner. We, therefore, request that a sliding schedule of income tax on all incomes be given your immediate attention for obvious reasons. We respectfully submit that our citizens in more fortunate circumstances should be taxed more than those with moderate income, if there is to be any tax whatever.

May we ask if we could have your personal views on this serious state of affairs, and which we hope will be favourable and thank you in anticipation of your kind help.

An hon. Member: Why do you not give them the basic dividend?

Mr. Johnston: They are asking for it in British Columbia and the people are paying some attention to that. The health services which are given to old age pensioners in Alberta over and above what is provided by the federal government are becoming most attractive to people not only in British Columbia but in other parts of the world.

This brings me to the last point I want to speak about, a national health service. The subamendment deals with that. My leader has already stated in the house that the Social Credit movement in Canada favours the earliest possible introduction of a national health insurance program, and he set out in some detail the kind of program we favour. I shall not repeat what he said on Monday, November 24, but those who wish to find out what that policy is may turn to Hansard of that date.

On behalf of the Social Credit group here I want to say that we do not favour a socialistic type of state medicine as advocated by some socialists. However, the C.C.F. amendment as worded does not call for state medicine, nor indeed for a socialistic type of national health insurance. Therefore we find that our kind of national health insurance can come within the terms of the sub-amendment as worded, and consequently we shall vote for it.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, this debate has become so dead that I do not suppose I can make it any more so. In any event, I should like to speak for about ten minutes on one specific subject, the level of taxation in Canada. I am going to contend today, as I have over the past year, that federal taxes are now at the danger point. I believe that the national interest requires a sharp reduction, and I should like to make such a proposal to parliament at this time.

As hon. members know, our expenditures in 1952 are going to exceed $4,500 million, which is about ten times what they were in 1939. I would remind hon. members that even in the crucial years of world war II, in 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943, when we were fighting for our very life as a nation, our budgets did not exceed the figure of the current budget. On only one occasion since confederation have federal taxes been so high. Most Canadians are paying more money out in taxes today, than for food. To my mind that is a dangerous situation.

It is small wonder that a great many citizens are becoming increasingly restive under the high level of taxation. Like other Canadians I am not going to take exception to taxes raised, first, for essential government expenditures; second, for social welfare programs which are provided by this parliament, or, third, for national defence. But like most Canadians I am becoming thoroughly fed up with the government policy of overtaxation, on the one hand, and its failure to eliminate waste and extravagance, on the other.

During the debate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) told us that in his opinion there had not been much overtaxation. What are the facts? The first fiscal year under the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) commenced on April 1, 1947. The period from that date to October 31 of this year represents 2,131 days. During that time the Liberal government has taken from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer $2,150 million more than they have been able to spend. In other words, since the present Minister of Finance took office there has been overtaxation each and every day, including Sundays and holidays, of more than $1 million. Yet the Prime Minister blandly tells us that in his opinion there has not been overtaxation. I suggest that the figures speak for themselves.

It is rather interesting to note that during the same period United States investments in Canada in our iron ore, our oil, our aluminum and other fields have been roughly $2,000 million. I think it is reasonable to suggest that if the Canadian tax rate had not been so harsh, Canadians might have financed a greater share of our post-war investment program.

The huge surpluses we have had in recent years have not been effected by economy; rather they have been accomplished despite a substantial amount of extravagance in government spending. Several years ago the Minister of Finance, his parliamentary assistant at that time, and others gave us the assurance that non-defence expenditures were going to be curtailed and rigidly restricted. As a matter of fact I think some minister said some would be deferred in the interests of the defence effort. Apparently that promise has been forgotten, because Canada's non-defence expenditures this year are almost triple what they were at the end of the war. Spending is going on unabated, and the expenditures of almost every non-defence department are up substantially.

I have here a summary of departmental expenditures for the first seven months of the current fiscal year compared with the same period in 1951. From April 1 to October 31 of this year every single department of government but one has had substantially increased expenditures. The only one which has not is the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Of course the reason for that apparent exception is that there was a census last year conducted by the bureau of statistics, and there is no expenditure for a census this year. In the seven months period I have mentioned, non-defence expenditures have gone up, compared with the same seven months last year, by $231 million. If there is any evidence of economy there I wish someone would tell me where it is.

I am going to say that the so-called economy drive announced by the minister several years ago is a complete failure. I think it was a political farce from the beginning. The Minister of Finance has discounted and disparaged suggestions that have been made for economies. He does not seem to be very much interested in the subject. I can tell him and parliament that the people of the country generally are bewildered and concerned over the attitude the Minister of Finance is taking in this regard. Since I came here I have tried to figure out why the government does not seem to be particularly interested in savings. Some hon. members may laugh, but I think one of the reasons is that there are not enough businessmen here in Ottawa.

Parliament is running a $4½ billion business, the biggest business anywhere in the nation, yet we are following practices and methods that would cause any corporation to go bankrupt if it were to do likewise. Take, for example, the fantastic duplication of effort right in this very building. We have two post offices, two or three police forces, two messenger staffs, two journals branches, two stenographic staffs, two treasury offices and so on all down the line. What business corporation in Canada would not remedy such a situation, particularly if the duplication were pointed out to it?

The taxpayer of Canada is the man who today is being taxed for waste of that kind. I think the composition of the cabinet is rather interesting. I looked through the Canadian Parliamentary Guide the other day and I find that of the twenty cabinet members, fourteen are lawyers, three are engineers, one is classed as a farmer, one is a doctor and one is a businessman. I think the professions represented are all excellent, but I cannot help wondering whether, if we had a few more businessmen and perhaps a coal miner and a few farmers thrown in here and there, we would not start to get the kind of government which would be interested in economy in order to bring down the tax rate. I think such a reform should be considered by the Prime Minister the next time he shuffles the membership of his cabinet.

I say that high taxes are lowering our standard of living and discouraging initiative generally. The amazing feature of the present situation is that the Minister of Finance quite nonchalantly and quite freely admits that taxes are too high. He made a series of tours during the past summer during which he spoke on taxation. I am only going to quote a sentence from one speech he made. On that occasion he was speaking in London, and the Canadian Press quotes him as follows:

> I agree with almost everybody that tax rates are uncomfortably high and that we ought to follow tax policies which will lead towards lower rates.

That statement is very clear. The minister acknowledges that taxes are too high; yet, despite repeated representations by individuals and business concerns, despite unprecedented surpluses, the minister has done nothing so far to reduce taxation. Why? We can only assume because he is waiting for an election year. The Minister of Finance has told Canadians up and down the country that they can expect tax relief if and when they increase production and efficiency. I want to tell the minister and this parliament that high taxes in Canada today are doing more than any other single thing to lower production and efficiency. Because of high taxes there is a tendency in Canada today for individuals and corporations to become tax conscious rather than efficiency conscious.

I know of married women working at part-time employment who have quit their jobs when their income reached a certain point, because they did not want to be in a higher income tax category. There are many working people who are not interested in overtime work because so much of the additional pay goes to the tax collector. Every hon. member, those from western Canada at least, knows of farmers who have gone out of the production of hogs or livestock or poultry. Why? Because, as they put it, why should they work fourteen hours a day for Mr. Abbott? There are in Canada today business firms, corporations, which seek methods of spending profits on unnecessary advertising, donations, extra equipment or repairs, rather than be bled white by the Department of National Revenue.

I say that today there is growing hesitancy on the part of business firms to expand. If the new project is successful, the Minister of Finance takes most of the profits; but if, on the other hand, the project is a failure then the financial stability of the whole organization is jeopardized.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you expanded at all in the last five years?

Mr. Thatcher: I will come to you in a moment.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you expanded at all in the last five years?

Mr. Thatcher: If I have, it has been despite the tax policies of the Liberal government, not on account of them.

Mr. Sinclair: But have you?

Mr. Thatcher: In other words, Canada today is rapidly approaching the point where it is dumb to be thrifty. In a country where it takes about $6,000 in capital investment to create every new job, I think that is a dangerous point at which to arrive. I agree with the Minister of Finance when he says that increased production is needed in the country. It is needed to sustain our defence effort, it is needed to expand our program of social welfare, but I would tell him that there is nothing which is impeding greater production in Canada so much as his own policy of excessive taxation.

I believe that federal expenditures can and must be cut. I think one of the first steps needed to achieve this purpose is for the house to provide members with a greater opportunity to scrutinize proposed expenditures. Toward that end, I think that in the first place the estimates should be brought down at the beginning of the session and not half way through. The estimates having been brought down, I think they should not be referred to the committee of the whole because hon. members of the House of Commons, sitting as a large, unwieldy, and hurried committee, cannot obtain satisfaction in a committee of that kind. If the estimates were referred to special estimates committees, where responsible officials and departmental heads could be questioned orally, I think a good deal more satisfaction could be obtained. I believe members would then have a better chance to discover examples of extravagance than they have at the present time.

I should like to suggest several tax cuts to the Minister of Finance for his next budget. In the first place, there should be a 2 per cent cut in the general sales tax. This is the simplest and most effective way of relieving persons with low incomes. I think such a cut would reduce his revenue in the coming year by approximately $140 million. In the second place I think there should be a reduction in personal income tax of at least 10 per cent, and the greatest share of the relief should go to those in the lower income groups. I believe such a tax cut would reduce revenue by about $130 million. In the third place I believe the government should thoroughly review the level of corporation taxes. I remind the house that much of the revenue needed to finance social service programs must come from Canadian industry. It is essential that the rates of taxation should not be so high as to impede industrial expansion.

I think that in the next budget the minister should decrease over-all taxes by at least $375 million. Such cuts are feasible and sensible; because the tax experts tell us that in 1953 our national product will increase by at least 4 per cent. If that is so, the extra tax revenue should be at least $250 million, on top of the current surplus.

I say the Canadian people are becoming tired and very impatient over unnecessary high taxation. If the Liberal government fails to bring them tax relief—particularly those in the lower income brackets—it will be swept out of office at the next election just as decisively as were the Democrats in the United States.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to reply in a few words to this ten-minute speech on the subject of taxation, not that I am any longer connected with the finance department but merely to answer the remarks made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). Many hon. members will remember that most of what he said was incorporated in his now famous taxation speech of a year ago.

I would like particularly to comment on the figures he gave when speaking about the federal budget, and to show exactly where costs were increased. He pointed out, initially, that the federal budget today is roughly ten times what it was in 1939. However the whole pattern of the federal budget has changed very much since then. Out of this $4½ billion budget, approximately half goes for defence spending as a result of Korea and communist aggression around the world. He did point out in this speech that he was not criticizing the defence spending, necessary as it is, so we can get on from this item.

The next great expenditure—very briefly and without breaking it down into departments—is $1 billion for federal social security measures under four main categories: old age pensions; family allowances; veterans' pensions and allowances; and the government's contribution to unemployment insurance. This $1 billion is not government spending in the sense that economists refer to government spending. The government does not spend this money by hiring people or buying material. This is money taken out of the taxation stream and paid as cash to various groups in Canada, for instance to the aged, as far as old age pensions are concerned, and as family allowances to the mothers of Canada. In this field I have never heard his group suggest that we should economize by cutting down spending on old age pensions. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will agree with that. As far as the cost of family allowances is concerned, again if we are going to save taxes there we would have to cut back on family allowances. The hon. member for Moose Jaw may have his own opinions but I know the opinion of his party is that we should not economize in that way. Similar arguments prevail as far as unemployment insurance is concerned and as far as veterans' pensions and allowances are concerned. The only way to reduce the taxes necessary to pay for these measures is to reduce these benefits and pensions.

That $1 billion is entirely transfer payments. It is not spending by the government. It is taken in taxes from those who have done very well in this country, from those who are in the high income brackets. Taxation takes 52 per cent of the profits from every successful business corporation in this country as a share for all of Canada in that prosperity, and that pattern has been approved by this parliament. These social security payments were initiated by the Liberal party and approved by this house. Never on the hustings, other than in the city of Moose Jaw, have I heard criticism of those payments, by the party to which he belongs, so taxes can not be cut on this billion dollars.

That takes care of $2¼ billion for defence and $1 billion for social security, expenditures of which his party has no criticism. The next item is caused by the fact that we did fight a war to save our freedom, the most expensive war in all history. We financed that war, because of the courageous financial action taken by Mr. Ilsley, better than any other country in the world as far as paying a greater percentage of the cost of the war out of current taxation is concerned. Nevertheless we did have to borrow as well. This time we did not borrow abroad. We did not borrow as we did in the first war, under Conservative management, at 5½ per cent income tax free. We borrowed from the Canadian people at 3 per cent, subject to income tax. These war loans are an obligation to the Canadian people and each year our estimates show—last year speaking from memory it was $425 million—an item to meet interest payments on our national debt. Nine-tenths of the national debt today was incurred as a consequence of the war.

When my hon. friend says we have racked up surpluses, of course we have. That policy was announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in 1945 in his famous white paper on post-war policy —that in good years we would have surpluses and reduce debt, the policy followed by all good businesses. That is the only way we can ever reduce that large fixed charge for interest payments on our national debt. The $425 million in our budget each year is again not being spent by the Canadian government to employ men or buy materials. It is a transfer of money raised in taxes as interest payments to those Canadians who loaned us money during the war to prosecute the war.

There are two ways in which we can cut down in our debt. One is what the Social Credit government did in 1935, to repudiate our loans. We will never do that. The only other way we can do it is to reduce the principal of the loan and so save interest payments. We are reducing our national debt each year. It is to the great credit of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that in his period of office each year has been distinguished by a surplus. He has reduced our national debt by over $2 billion—almost 20 per cent—and no other country in the world can say that.

If my hon. friend suggests that we could have invested this money in Ungava or Kitimat or other places, he does not realize, or he chooses not to realize, that it is principally because we have such a sound financial administration here in Canada that we have attracted money from every part of the world for investment in Canada. The great criticism of Americans who come up here to invest is that in their own country they have this deficit spending. The United States government spend each year more than they raise in taxation, deficits which add to their tax burden.

My hon. friend was careful not to mention another new item in our federal budget—the tax rental agreements now signed by nine out of ten provinces. I spoke on them last summer, after the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had spoken roundly condemning them, and I expressed the hope at that time that the good judgment of Premier Frost would soon lead him to enter into such an agreement. I am very happy to say that he has seen the value of these tax rental agreements which help to equalize opportunity in all provinces. These agreements also return to the provinces much more than they were ever able to collect themselves. We are today collecting on behalf of the provinces $300 million in round figures from income taxes, corporation taxes, and succession duties which we pay back to them. We do not spend it. We do not spend it on materials and labour. It is again a straight transfer of cash back to the provinces. The provinces are very heartily in accord with it and why should they not be? The federal government gets all the criticism for high taxes, and passes on the money. They get the money but no criticism. The hon. member's own province, Saskatchewan, was never able to collect one-quarter as much in those fields as they get today from the federal government by renting them to us. All this results in another $300 million to be collected by the Minister of Finance. The hon. member will not want to cut taxes by reducing the payments to his province.

Taking those new fields, defence expenditures and cash transfers to the Canadian people and provinces off the total expenditure of the federal budget, in round figures we are left with about $700 million for all other expenditures—the normal expenditures to provide all the services of government in Canada. That is only about twice the figure for similar expenditures in 1939. When one considers the change in the purchasing value of the dollar and the expansion of the country since that time which has demanded increased government services, we see that real spending for government services has not changed much since 1939. We are actually criticized for not having expanded many essential services more.

The hon. gentleman talks of taxation and uses this old canard, used generally by ignorant people on the hustings, to the effect that people won't work overtime because they will get in the next tax bracket and so lose money. It is impossible under our graduated tax system to earn more money and yet have less after taxation. Anyone who studies the tax tables knows that. You do not suddenly jump, for example, from the 17 per cent bracket to 19 per cent on your whole income. You have the 17 per cent tax to the end of the first thousand of taxable income above the basic exemptions, and then the next thousand is at 19 per cent, leaving 81 cents of income out of every extra dollar earned. This was a very popular rumour in the shipyards in my own riding during wartime, that if you worked extra hours you were going to lose money. Nobody in Canada, by working extra hours, can lose money. Most of the extra earnings is left to him, that is unless he is one of these very successful business operators who has so greatly expanded his business in the post-war years that he is now in the high income tax brackets. Then, you do pay a larger part in taxes, but some of the extra earnings still remain with even the millionaire.

The hon. member used this phrase—it sort of surprised me to hear a socialist member using it—that business is being bled white in this country and hesitated to expand because of too heavy taxation. Those were his words. What is the story in this country? Never in history has there been such a tremendous business expansion in every part of the country as in the last seven years, with no sign of hesitancy. In past debates my hon. friend has always been quite ready to use personal examples. I would suggest that the sort of expansion he has seen in his own business in the last seven years gives the lie to this statement about business being bled white, and that business hesitates to expand. He has become in these years, instead of a one-man hardware merchant, a tycoon running a chain of stores in Saskatchewan.

The hon. member is smiling happily now at the very thought that this Liberal administration should have offered that great opportunity. We have brought that opportunity to him, and seen to it that the people of Canada are getting their share of his increased prosperity out of the 52 per cent corporation tax which we assess on his business.

In closing—I wanted to speak immediately after the hon. gentleman because these stories go abroad if the charges are not refuted—I want to say that the hon. member spoke in very understandable language so far as the electorate are concerned. He did not concern himself too much with facts or figures. I want to recapitulate again what the actual position is respecting the federal budget. So far as government spending of the type we had in 1939 is concerned, today's budget is about double what it was in dollar terms and about the same in real value. Today half of our budget is for defence, which we didn't have in 1939. There is an extra billion dollars of transfer payments for social security, which we didn't have in 1939—which every party in this house endorsed. There is the necessity of honouring our obligation to pay interest on this money which we borrowed from the Canadian people in time of war, $423 million which we didn't have in 1939. Then we have tried to equalize the standards across this country in a manner that would not leave rich provinces and poor provinces. The poor provinces—and Saskatchewan was one of them before the war—were having great difficulty in maintaining even a minimum standard.

These post-war tax agreements have resulted in a raising of the level of opportunity across the country, and have meant that the federal government has had to raise $300 million more in taxation, which was not done in 1939. The federal government does not spend this money but turns over that cash to the provinces. Finally we get down to this residue of about $700 million for actually government spending for all the services the Canadian people over the years have requested from the federal government—public works, transport, police, post office and all the rest. I should not close with a question—I am sorry the leader of the C.C.F. is not in his seat, but I see the senior member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—but I want to ask, and I am sure this house would like to know, whether this is a new statement of C.C.F. policy, the assertion by the hon. member for Moose Jaw that corporation taxes are much too high and should be reduced. I am sure the house would welcome a statement on that point.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder if the minister would permit a question? He suggested that in our budget at the present time there are fixed expenditures to the extent, I think, of about $3·7 billion. He indicated they were for social welfare, interest on debt, payments to the provinces and so on. Is he, on behalf of the government, taking the attitude today that it is not possible to have economies in these expenditures? That is the impression he gave me.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, as you will recall I at no time suggested any such thing. I would go further and point out that nowhere in his speech did the hon. member suggest specific economies. That is the great difference—

Mr. Thatcher: I certainly did. On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggested that there are a lot of places for economy right in this house.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member went back to one or two of the illustrations he used in his speech before. You will recall that in his speech last session he suggested economies in family allowances and old age pension payments, but those were immediately repudiated by his party. The only thing he has suggested so far in today's version of last session's speech is economies so far as the House of Commons post office and the Senate post office are concerned. The hon. member has been here seven years, and he should know that the management of the House of Commons and the management of the Senate is not the responsibility of the government but is the responsibility of the House and the Senate.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to know if the Minister of Fisheries, since he became minister, has taken any steps in his own department to try to bring about economies. This little pamphlet shows that fisheries expenditures are up 35 per cent in the first seven months of this year. The first day of last week I received from his department a bulletin—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask a question, but he must not make another speech.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the minister think these eight booklets on how to make salads, delicious recipes for tuna, Canadian fish recipes, are of any particular advantage?

Some hon. Members: Sure they are.

Mr. Sinclair: When I heard that the hon. member was going to speak about economies, it was suggested that he was going to speak about these fish booklets which our department turns out. I am answering the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, and not making a separate speech. I was delighted when I heard this, and it is for that reason I have this material on my desk. He is the first C.C.F. member since Harry Archibald left here in 1949 who has shown any interest in fisheries, even such negative interest as this. One of the most important jobs which the fishing industry and fishermen ask us to do is to increase the sale of fish here in Canada. It was for that reason they asked us to prepare these excellent booklets which have had a very wide reception in women's clubs and organizations across the country and have helped to increase fish sales. The total cost of issue amounts to $24,000, and that amounts to ·012 of one per cent of the annual value of the fishing industry in Canada.

I have this to suggest to the hon. member. He does not know much about fishing and I do not know much about the hardware business, but if all he spent on advertising his business since 1945 had been ·012 of one per cent of his sales, he would not have a chain of hardware stores now but would be behind the counter selling nails for somebody else.

Mr. Cruickshank: Any more questions?

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch):

That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(f) To bring before this house, for adoption, a realistic financial and economic policy that will ensure the orderly development of Canada's resources, guarantee adequate markets at remunerative prices to producers, and provide to every Canadian his just share of the wealth our resources can be made to yield."

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

About seven years ago this December this house was engaged in a stern struggle over the Bretton Woods agreement. Hon. members who were present on that occasion will recall that the only ones in the house who opposed the acceptance of the Bretton Woods agreement and pointed to the dangers and deficiencies in that agreement were the Social Crediters. We now find that the Bretton Woods agreement has failed dismally to accomplish those things which all other members of the house were so certain it would accomplish.

Meanwhile conditions in the world have deteriorated. If we had been wise enough in 1945 to discern that the Bretton Woods agreement had not any possibility of solving the problems threatening the world we would have had seven years to spend in trying actively to determine what would solve the problems of the world. Seven years have passed in rapid deterioration in world relations and, shall I say, in the morale of the world; and conditions are far worse than they were in 1945.

I should like to read excerpts from four speeches by men whom I think the house will respect, which excerpts indicate the truth of what I have just said. The executive directors of the international monetary fund in their 1952 annual report stated:

> It is a melancholy fact that seven years after the end of the war the fund has to report that the international payments are still far from having attained a state of balance and that exchange difficulties and exchange restrictions are again, over large parts of the trading world, the order of the day.

Horacio Lafer, chairman of the board of governors of the international bank in his address on September 3, 1952 stated:

> The third serious problem we have to face is the widespread balance of payments disequilibrium affecting many countries. While there is surplus production in many areas and acute needs in others, trade cannot flow because of the lack of needed currency.

Here is another one from "Trade Winds" from Babson's "Washington Forecast", September 22, 1952:

> U.S. exports and imports are still dropping. While we still maintain a favourable balance of trade, storm warnings are up around the world. In spite of all our economic aid and overseas procurement, the big bugaboo is the off-shore dollar shortage. Dollars were more plentiful abroad after our post-Korea spending spree. That was followed by a strong foreign market for our products. Now, the dollars are running out. As a result, our exports have dropped an average of almost 10 per cent per month since early spring.

One more from "A World Economic Crisis" in Whaley-Eaton Service, September 6, 1952:

A world economic crisis is in the making, as indicated in the report of the International Monetary Fund to the effect that financial conditions have worsened. There has been a backslide towards a tangle of restrictive money and trade controls. Solutions are yet to be forthcoming. The British are expected to have a major program ready for presentation to the next American president soon after the election. As reported last week, this will probably call for removal of trade barriers to a degree heretofore not contemplated.

To all those who have been giving careful thought to international affairs, who have studied with some understanding causes of world war II and world war I and the cause of the great depression which led to world war II, may I suggest that the statements contained in those comments carry the gravest import. Those quotations indicate strongly that our main problem in the world is a monetary problem. We in this group have been contending in season and out of season ever since we came here in 1936 that our problem is a monetary problem. We must not expect to find a solution in any other direction.

Let us then give the minutest attention to our monetary system. Thus far our pleadings, shall I say, have largely fallen on deaf ears. Members of the Conservative party, members of the C.C.F. party and some Liberals have begun to wonder how in the world it was that the Social Crediters were right on Bretton Woods while they were all wrong, but it has not dawned on them that Social Crediters knew some great fundamental facts about trade and money matters in this world which unfortunately these gentlemen either had not learned or had not learned their significance. Once more I call the attention of the house and the country, and our neighbouring countries if they will listen, to the fact that our problem is a monetary problem especially if war preparation ceases in the world.

Money is a remarkable mechanism. There is nothing mysterious about it. There is nothing sacred about money. Money is created by man to meet man's convenience and to help man solve his problems of production and distribution. Money ought to be the servant of man, but up to the present time in the history of the world money has been the master of man and has caused man some of the most grievous torture that he has experienced on this planet. On the face of the earth there is not one dollar, one pound, one mark, one franc, one lira, yen or ruble that human agencies have not brought into being.

Why do men dread money? Why do they fear the proposal that a government should create money, when the constitutions of the United States and Canada specifically give the central government the authority and the responsibility to create money and do not say that they should put that responsibility on the shoulders of bankers? The kings of Great Britain created the nation's money, and the money was the king's money for centuries. In those days the country was happier, considering the progress of economic affairs, than it has ever been since the bankers began to create money.

The result of the whole thing is that we have had plenty of trouble. What is the reason that men fear money? Everybody in the house and in the country knows that too much money in the economy tends to cause inflation or a rise of prices through having too few goods in relation to the money in circulation. In other words there would be too many dollars chasing too few goods, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) put it so well one time, causing a scarcity of goods and a rise in their price. Too little money in an economy tends to cause deflation or a fall in prices and employment, through having too many goods in relation to the money in circulation or, in other words, too few dollars chasing too many goods.

Certainly it ought to occur to everybody that one of the main things mankind should aim at, in this day and age particularly, is a device whereby the amount of money can be kept in constant relation to the amount of goods so there would be at all times the right amount of money chasing the right amount of goods. It should not be impossible for an age that has created radar, guided missiles, the jet plane, the atom bomb, the hydrogen bomb, that has contemplated flights into space, to create a device which would guarantee that regular relation between money in circulation and goods available for purchase. Why is it that apparently nobody, except Social Crediters, has given any attention to this matter? It strikes me as astounding.

Usually there have been present complicating factors, which is one reason it has been hard to tie down any particular aspect of inflation or deflation. The result of it all has been that monetary science is as yet utterly inadequate and its conclusions bitterly contentious. An example of that is to be found in our own day and generation. An increase in prices in the United States and Canada has been deliberately manipulated by crudely and sordidly selfish men, and now practically all statesmen are endeavouring to show that that increase in prices was the result of too much money, which is a preposterous falsehood.

In Canada the increase in prices commenced in 1946, as I have pointed out to the house time and again, with the increase of $5 a ton in steel. From there it spread until it affected the whole Canadian price structure and put that structure on the skids. For any person in his right senses to try to blame that rise in prices on too much money is for him to be either fantastically and naïvely uninformed and unenlightened or deliberately hypocritical, one of the two. I imagine that the period from 1946 to 1951 will go down in history as one of the evidences of the bad results of having too much money in circulation! It is merely a complicating factor which makes it so difficult for men to come to understand the true facts about money. I should like to read one short quotation before I ask to adjourn the debate, because I think it is better that it should be included in today's Hansard. Sir Basil Blackett had these words to say in 1931:

> In view of what we have done with currency and currency with us in the last twenty years, we are all of us fit for the lunatic asylum. If many currency experts go mad, it is the natural result of their coming face to face with the insanity of the monetary system with which man has tortured himself ever since he passed from barter to money.

Twenty-one years have passed since the writing of those words, and they are probably doubly true today. Still the horrible insanity goes on.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 11, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

TEMPORARY STOPPAGE OF CLOCKS

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members probably will have noticed that the clocks do not indicate the correct time and it may appear that we are starting our proceedings today ahead of time. I should like to inform the house that of the 160 clocks in the building, 40 are out of order, but it is expected they will be put in working condition during the afternoon.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just like the opposition.

NEWFOUNDLAND

TERMINAL FACILITIES BETWEEN BELL ISLAND AND MAINLAND—PETITION

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, today marks the fourth anniversary of the signing of the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland. In spite of the somewhat shotgun character of the marriage, may I say that the union has been pretty happy. My main purpose in rising at this time is not to comment on that fact but to present a petition from Newfoundland, the first unadulterated petition that has been presented from that province. It comes from the principal constituency in Newfoundland. In accordance with the rules of the house I understand that I cannot say very much at this time about the petition, but it comes from Bell island and asks for the consideration of the house to provide terminal facilities between Bell island and the mainland of Newfoundland.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

RECOMMENDATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to direct to the Acting Prime Minister a question based specifically on representations made by the Canadian Arts Council. I have sent the minister a copy of their letter. In view of the recommendation in the report of the Massey commission on the arts and sciences, is it the intention of the government to set up at an early date a Canada council for the encouragement of cultural activities as visualized in that report?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): The subject matter of the question is being discussed by the government at the present time and as soon as a decision is arrived at an announcement will be made in the house.

MANPOWER

RESIGNATIONS FROM NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour if there have been any resignations from the national advisory council on manpower. If so, what members have resigned, and will a statement be made in regard thereto?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. Two resignations have been received by the council, one from one of the two lady members representing the women of Canada, Mrs. de la Durantaye. She has been replaced by Mrs. Flore Jutras, Montreal. The other resignation was received from Mr. Rhys M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company, one of the representatives of employers. I am not aware that he has been replaced yet.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN ARSENALS LIMITED—EMPLOYMENT AGE LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production, now the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of an advertisement in the Toronto Telegram by Canadian Arsenals Limited, a copy of which I have sent to the minister. Will the minister, in the light of the Department of Labour's request to private enterprise to hire people over 45, explain why Canadian Arsenals Limited, a crown company, is setting an age limit of 35 years for new employees?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I must say that when I read the advertisement I was as shocked as was my hon. friend. I have made inquiries. No good reason has been advanced for specifying an age limit except that the aptitude of people under 35 for this particular kind of work seems to be better than that of people over that age. I have given instructions that employment shall be given on the basis of adaptability without discrimination as to age.

POST OFFICE

UNSEALED CHRISTMAS CARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I wish to answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) which is reported at page 521 of Hansard, concerning the possibility of reducing the postage rate for unsealed Christmas cards until Christmas. The answer is no.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE SOLEIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, during these last few days I had to absent myself from the house to go back home to Riviere du Loup. On arriving here I hasten to make a rectification about a correction which appeared in Le Soleil of December 4, page 3, at the place where the article, about which I had complained the day before, had been published. In view of the good faith shown by Le Soleil, I wish to do it justice.

Le Soleil has asked me to give certain facts. In a note by the editor, it is said that there is no cafeteria in the building occupied by Le Soleil; and then, that the article I have referred to in the house was written by the parliamentary correspondent of this newspaper and sent from Ottawa to Quebec.

Le Soleil has asked me to make these corrections and it is with pleasure that I do so, because, between gentlemen, it is easy to get along.

BEEF

SALE OF NEW ZEALAND PRODUCT STORED IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question based on the answer given to a question yesterday. Which of the four governments concerned, that of the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Canada or the United States, is responsible for the sale of the 53½ million pounds of frozen New Zealand beef in storage in the United States on November 20?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The practice followed under the arrangement is that the British arrange to have the beef which they have bought from New Zealand transferred to the United States, and we in Canada are responsible for sales that are made in the United States to the extent that any government outside the United States is responsible.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, last evening before the house adjourned I began speaking in support of the Social Credit amendment regretting the failure of the government to bring before the house for adoption a realistic financial system, which kind of financial system might be defined as one capable of making that which is physically possible in a nation financially possible. Of course our present system cannot possibly do that. I quoted, from eminent present-day official authorities, statements that indicate clearly that a world economic crisis is in the making. They indicate also that our main problem in the world is a monetary problem.

I deplored the fact that mankind appeared so fearful of doing anything real to reform our present monetary system, so unwilling even to discuss intelligently what Sir Basil Blackett characterized in 1931 as "the insanity of the monetary system with which man has tortured himself ever since he passed from barter to money."

For an example of the insanity and the torture, take the great depression in the United States. Between the years 1929 and 1934 money in circulation in that nation decreased in quantity from $23 billion to $15 billion. That amount of money, $8 billion, was actually withdrawn from circulation in that country. The great depression accompanied that $8 billion withdrawal with all its concomitant loss, unemployment and suffering.

As another example, take Canada. Between the years 1929 and 1934 $932 million were withdrawn in our nation—and the great depression was on us! I should like to ask whoever consider themselves to be the wisest two men in the Conservative party, so far as money is concerned, to tell me whether they have any idea what the Conservatives would do if a similar state of affairs were to begin to arise in Canada today, and they were in power. I should like the two wisest men in the Liberal party to tell us what they would do.

An hon. Member: We have not got time.

Mr. Blackmore: You have got no time to look into the future at all! That is why you are so stupid and say such foolish things.

Mr. Goode: On a point of order, I do not think a senior member of the type now speaking should call anybody stupid. We sit here and listen to him and we think the same thing of him as he has just now indicated he thinks of us.

Mr. Blackmore: But the senior member now speaking has got better sense than to talk about not having time to consider one of the world's major problems. There is exactly where the trouble lies. There are too many people in the country today who will hastily characterize as stupid anyone who tries to find a solution. They proceed blandly along supposing that these terrible problems will solve themselves. There is where the trouble lies, and in this respect the Liberals and the Conservatives are equally to be condemned. I should also like to call on the two wisest men in the C.C.F. party to tell us, when they have the opportunity, what they would do if they were in power in case of such an emergency. Any two of them will do just as well as any other two.

Now, what finally got Canada out of the depression?

Mr. Dickey: The Liberal party.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, that is really good! First I am going to ask this question: What really got Canada into the depression?

Mr. McCann: The Tories.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: The Liberal party; and the Liberal party leader was clever enough to sneak out of it and leave the whole thing for the Conservatives to carry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: That is actually what happened. He knew that the depression was coming on.

An hon. Member: He started it.

Mr. Blackmore: He immediately started to lay the blame for the whole thing on the Conservative party when actually there was just as big a depression in the United States, and I suppose that R. B. Bennett and the Conservative party caused that too! That just shows how much intelligence the Liberal leaders have brought to bear on these great problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the first thing which began to bring Canada out of the depression was the signing of the Ottawa agreements in 1932. The next thing was preparation for world-wide war. Along about 1933 Hitler began to alarm people and, while the Liberals were claiming the credit for the improvement in Canada after 1935, they did not know there was a similar improvement going on in far-off Chile. Just how they managed to affect Chile that way they have not taken time to explain. They never take the trouble to explain problems like that. The third thing which brought Canada out of the depression and brought the United States out of the depression too was world war II. If we had not had preparation for a war and the fighting of war we would have been languishing in that depression at the present time, Liberals or no Liberals.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: It was the policy which men followed which caused the difficulty. Until you learn these facts you do not begin to know what it is all about—any of you. What hon. members need to do is to go and inform themselves.

An hon. Member: What book is that now?

Mr. Blackmore: I can get you many of them.

Why did the war eliminate the depression? Well, in the first place, it limited the production of consumer goods. We were told all through the depression that we had overproduction. All hon. members of the house will recall that statement. It was not underconsumption they thought, it was overproduction. Well, that sounds foolish now, doesn't it? It did not seem to sound foolish to some, however, for they went serenely on deluding themselves and all who listened to them; but the war limited production of consumer goods and concentrated the nation's efforts towards producing war materials. At the same time we distributed throughout the nation the money spent for producing war materials, and that money was used to buy the consumer goods which were not previously going into circulation. That began to improve conditions from the standpoint of prosperity.

The war provided employment for the unemployed—both in the armed forces and in war production. There is no one, even in the Liberal party, who will question that.

We distributed great quantities of money out among the people by means of various payments that were made in the carrying on of the war. Those are the things that brought Canada out of the depression, and when any one of our good Liberal friends thinks he can refute those statements he can take a full period and I will listen to him with great pleasure. I know that he cannot do it.

How could that withdrawal of $8 billion from circulation in the United States have been prevented? How could it have been overcome? I will let any man here ask himself that. I know that the members of this house are all honourable members and good men, but—

An hon. Member: Thank you.

Mr. Blackmore: Let every member here ask himself pointedly what he would have done if he had been the president of the United States in 1930 and had seen that withdrawal taking place. What would he have done to remedy it if he had been the president of the United States with full power in 1935? What would he have done to overcome the difficulty, to bring back into circulation that $8 billion? When he can answer that question he is ready to begin to get wisdom concerning these matters.

Meanwhile, notice that the depression in both Canada and the United States was a monetary problem. When the money went out of circulation unemployment developed. People were not able to buy goods. The price of goods went down—mainly on primary production—and all those other terrible things occurred which characterized that depression.

I will ask that same question of hon. members again. I indicated that I would not single out any particular member as it might embarrass him, but I will ask anybody in the house to answer the question: How would you have put that money back into circulation in Canada? How would you have prevented it from going out of circulation?

Why did it go out of circulation? Because the bankers, who are the only ones who lend money, lost confidence and began to withdraw their loans, and refused to advance further loans. How would you have stopped that? How—with your present outmoded and ineffective monetary system, which as I said a moment ago may be characterized as insane?

May we go back in history and take the United States in 1918? This incident is one of the main causes of the problems with which we find ourselves confronted in the world today. Before 1914 the United States was a debtor country. She was worrying almost as much as we now are about how her trade balance could be kept favourable. After 1918 she was very greatly industrialized because the United States had been called upon to be the workshop of the allied world to produce supplies for the fighting forces. She had tremendously developed her productive capacity, and when the war was over she did not know where in the world she could sell the surplus goods that she was able to produce. That was the beginning of the troubles which are torturing us today.

If you had been the president of the United States in those days what would you have done? The United States found that she had $60 billion worth of goods in the country and only $45 billion worth of money placed into circulation with which to buy those goods. Now, what would you have done if you had been president with full power? When you can answer that you are in a position to begin to discuss intelligently modern economic problems.

The United States actually did two things. First of all, she began a system of lending abroad. She lent money in Europe and in other countries so that they might buy her surplus goods. As long as she was able to keep that money going over there into those countries they would buy her surplus and she was able to keep the wheels of her industry running and her people employed. Just as soon as she discovered that she was no longer able to afford those loans abroad—in 1928 and in 1929—trouble immediately began to fall upon her. With the rest of the world she took us down into a depression.

There are a good many members honouring me with careful attention. In order to justify what I say I will suggest that they read the book "The United States in the World Economy", which explains all this very simply and does not involve Liberals, Conservatives or any others. It just tells what happened.

Then the United States, in 1922, instituted the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. By this she put the nations into an economic strait-jacket which helped to bring on the depression. No one can understand the conditions that we are living in today unless he understands that.

An hon. Member: You tell them.

Mr. Blackmore: I would be glad to tell them. In fact, I gave several speeches last session on this very subject.

What would you have done, I ask again, if you had been president of the United States? Would you have done as the United States did or would you have tried a financial system whereby you could have put purchasing power into the hands of people and enabled them to buy your surplus goods?

The United States could not do that with the unsound system she had then and has now because all the money she gets into circulation has to be borrowed. She cannot get money into circulation until someone will lend it. There is the trouble with our present system.

Socialism would say "Well, we would redistribute." I ask the socialists and all the rest who are listening: How in the world could you redistribute $45 billion of money to make it buy $60 billion of goods? I just ask the question to show the absolute absurdity of a proposal of redistributing wealth to solve this problem.

Then, there are those who will say "Trade". Anyone who says that the United States was not doing everything possible to trade, just does not know much about the subject. She was doing everything in her power, "blasting her way into the world's markets" in a manner far superior to anything R. B. Bennett ever tried. She was constantly in danger of an adverse trade balance even when she did try to trade.

What did the United States actually do? I have indicated that she used two devices. She started foreign lending which she obviously could not keep up as long as she was lending debt money; and instituted the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in 1922. The fundamental principle which underlies the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause is the principle of non-discrimination, of which our leaders in this country apparently have now become utterly and fanatically enamoured.

This is where modern talk of the principle of non-discrimination began. Actually it means the very worst kind of discrimination, especially against the weaker economies. Ultimately this policy caused other nations to resort to exchange controls, quotas, high tariffs, attempts to barter and attempts to set up reciprocal tariff arrangements, all of which the United States ignorantly termed economic aggression. The United States designed the Bretton Woods agreement to prevent "economic aggression," as she called it, but did not do one single thing about adjusting this disequilibrium that had grown up, illustrated by the figures of that $60 billion of goods in her possession with only $45 billion of money in circulation to buy the goods.

This whole set-up ultimately precipitated a war. I say once more to the people in the country who will read my remarks, whether anyone in this house will listen, and I am not saying they are not doing it: unless we understand these facts we are not beginning to have the wisdom to understand those quotations which I put on the record last night.

The question will be asked, what would Social Credit have done? Social Credit is eager to tell. People who do not know "shucks" about it are ready to tell all about it. People who do not understand these great fundamental problems are quick to say that Social Credit will not work. That is utter nonsense. Men become blind leaders of the blind when they carry on as some members have done here, particularly some of the members from British Columbia.

Social Credit would, first of all, introduce a realistic financial system, one which would make what is physically possible financially possible. Now, on the face of it, is that not exactly what you would want? If, in the United States, there were $60 billion worth of goods and only $45 billion worth of money, the first thing was to make financially possible the purchase of those goods which it was physically possible to produce. The government of the United States did not do that; and that is what caused all the trouble.

Social Credit would introduce a monetary system employing money based upon goods and services and not upon gold, either directly or indirectly. I believe that practically every member in this house would agree with that if he were free to talk about the matter. Social Credit would set up a monetary commission, the business of which would be to see that money came into circulation directly in accordance with the needs of business, both for producing and for distributing goods and services. One of the difficulties with all the orthodox thinking men is that they are ready to issue money in accordance with the needs of business for producing, but not for consuming, for distributing. Distributing in this case means the effecting of exchanges of goods and services to the extent necessary to enable all of the people to enjoy the products of the nation's resources to the optimum desirable degree of production. There is nothing wrong with that on the face of it, is there?

This monetary commission would take counsel with the banks and other lending institutions in the nation and, where necessary, would aid them, to the end that every deserving prospective producer of desired goods and services be afforded financial credit to enable him to produce adequately. There is no one who will object to that, but they do not know how to do it under the present system.

Moreover, this monetary commission would create dollars and issue them debt-free in such ways, and to such people, and in such amounts, as to enable people to consume the otherwise not consumable portion of the nation's production, or such goods as the appropriate portion of that production might be traded abroad for. I do not think anyone will question the advisability of that, but they do not know how to do it. It cannot be done without debt-free money.

Social Credit would adopt measures adequate for the establishment and maintenance of a just price to producers, comprising the cost of production plus a fair profit. I think no one will object to that. The question is, how to do it. It cannot be done without debt-free money.

Social Credit would, through the monetary commission, issue to consumers consumer purchasing power in such forms and in such amounts as might be found needful to equate consumption with production in the nation's economy. That sounds sensible, does it not? It cannot be done without debt-free money. Such issues of consumer purchasing power might fittingly be called national dividends.

Now, the financial system—

Mr. Cruickshank: It would be $25 a month?

Mr. Blackmore: That is right, the $25 a month. The people who laugh at $25 a month now will be ridiculous in the eyes of their grandchildren.

The financial system I have outlined would render what is physically possible in the nation's economy financially possible. Any financial system not comprising the principles and the techniques I have outlined cannot possibly render financially possible what is physically possible.

The question everyone asks is, would such dollars, created by the commission and issued debt-free, be sound? We hear a lot of silly talk about "rubber" dollars and "funny" money. These statements are based on lack of knowledge and understanding, that is all. That is the kindest thing I can say.

Could the principle of issuing such money be sound? There is one statement on this matter by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, in his report appearing in the Times, of January 30, 1936. His statement reads:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.
> We learnt that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.
> For money to be truly "sound" there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely impossible to provide that extra money about which the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna talked, except through the creation and employment of debt-free money. It is unquestionable that the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna had in mind creating money not based on gold.

Now, what about the Bradbury experiment in Great Britain during world war I?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Now, what would you do about—

Mr. Blackmore: I shall answer all your questions later. This whole experiment is well described in "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges" by Dr. William A. Shaw, published in 1926.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): What about the gold mines in British Columbia?

Mr. Blackmore: Dr. Shaw is the editor of the Calendar of Treasury Records at Her Majesty's public records office. I discussed this whole matter on June 7, 1951.

Dr. William A. Shaw in 1930 published a book entitled "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking". At page 50 of this book he discusses the Bradbury experiment with great admiration. At page 51 he uses the following words:

> After ten years of illuminating experience this perfect, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable automatic currency system was thrown over, the automatic principle was surrendered, and our currency, although declared by law to be inconvertible paper, was placed (or was supposed to be placed) under the control of the Bank of England, and became once again sensitive (or was supposed to be made sensitive) to the vagaries of a fluctuating gold cover fund.
> Why was this retrograde step taken, and why did England thus throw over the pure theory of currency issue, which she had accidentally discovered and so wonderfully exemplified to the world?

All those who wish to call Social Credit proposals "funny money" had better consider the opinions of Dr. William A. Shaw, one of the world's greatest authorities. There is no sufficient reason why state money like the Bradbury could not be issued and "spent" into circulation, debt-free.

How much money can be safely created and issued debt-free? The amount depends exactly upon the unpurchased surplus of goods in the nation's economy, and unused productive capacity as regards consumers' goods. That is the answer the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) wanted a few days ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I venture to divert the attention of the house this afternoon to another subject which I hope hon. members will find as important and perhaps, in some respects, as interesting, as some of the other subjects which have been discussed during this debate. I take part in this debate largely because this fall I was again privileged to be a part of the Canadian delegation to the seventh general assembly of the United Nations. As the minister has given a somewhat comprehensive review of some of the matters which were dealt with at that general assembly, I thought I should say a word about the gathering, viewing it from the position of a parliamentary observer.

We were meeting this fall in new headquarters which were both ornate and highly modern in their appointments. They had a somewhat peaceful setting. I only wish that peaceful setting in greater measure reflected world conditions as we found them represented by the various nations there.

As one goes into the new structure, one finds the seven Canadian doors, made of Canadian nickel, through which the public passes into the United Nations meeting place, and which were the gift of the people of Canada. In the plenary session of the general assembly and in its committee formations one finds many of our Canadians operating there. One finds there, for the first time as the president of this world organization, our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and with him, as chairman of the delegation, one finds the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and also the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. McLean), the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), who is in the house this afternoon, and Senator Isnor from the other place. When one finds there those Canadians, together with others who are taking part in the delegation work, both as staff, advisers and in other capacities, one feels very much at home at the United Nations these days.

While I was there I was interested in reminiscing on the changes which have taken place since the San Francisco conference. As a matter of fact I think there were there on this occasion at the first part of this general assembly only two of us who represented Canada at the San Francisco conference some seven years ago. In other words, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself were what might be described as originals so far as that earlier conference was concerned.

It was an interesting experience to see the changes that have taken place. Out of the 550 delegates who are there and the alternates at this general assembly, there are less than a score who represented their respective countries seven years ago at the San Francisco conference. This fact indicates the changes that take place both in governments and in personalities the world over. You would be interested, as I was, in comparing the relative numbers of women delegates present with the number who were at San Francisco. At San Francisco we had a lady delegate on our delegation, but few other nations had one representing them. This time there are some 22 lady delegates from all over the world. Of one thing I am quite sure and it is this. While they are conspicuous by the smallness of their numbers, many of them are conspicuous for the contributions that they make to world peace. I have been thinking, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the whole world misses a good bet in that it does not have a far larger percentage of the womenfolk of the world at the general assembly of the United Nations trying to save the peace of mankind. No section of the world's people have a greater human stake in the preservation of peace than have the womenfolk of the world. Among the personalities who are represented there one finds women like Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Emmett of the United Kingdom, Madam Pandit of India, Senora Figueroa of Chile, and of course the deputy foreign minister of Czechoslovakia, who is a communist, and two other communist representatives on the other two Soviet delegations. But I want to say that I am afraid our womenfolk would not gain too favourable an impression from these three women from behind the iron curtain.

I want to make reference, if I may, to our Canadian delegate, Madame Berger, of Quebec city, and executive secretary of the Quebec Cancer Society. I wish to say that Canada, and this house, can be very proud of the lady that leads the women of this country as a delegate at the United Nations. She will stand up with any of those who represent other countries, in charm, in capability and in industrious application to the work of the preservation of peace.

As a background to our meeting were the United States elections. The decision as to who would be the leader of the leading world power naturally absorbed the attention of many people from all countries while we were there. It would not be fair for me to say that everything about the United States elections, in so far as their conduct was concerned, suited me; perhaps a lot of people down there would not think much of some things that happen in our elections over here. It was as fine and as healthy a display of good democracy as I have seen in many a day. The enthusiasm and the interest—true, there was the carnival and the serious aspect to it—were amazing. Everybody seemed to know the issues; everybody was interested in the issues; everybody was discussing the issues. In addition, they took the election in dead earnest.

I went to a meeting of General Eisenhower in Hackensack, New Jersey. Beside me in the great crowd was a grandmother who asked me to help her lift her grandson up to see the great general. As we lifted the grandson up, a little boy eight years of age, she said: "Take a good look, sonny, your daddy went over with him." I said to her: "Did the daddy come back?" She said: "No, the daddy did not come back", and tears were in her eyes. Judging by the attitude of the gathering on that occasion one got the impression that they regarded General Eisenhower as they might a royal visitor, who had come on that occasion to see them, so great was the ovation that had been given.

The largest meeting that I had the opportunity of going to during one noon hour was that of the other candidate, Adlai Stevenson. It was a gathering of between 75,000 and 100,000 garment workers in New York. There they were jammed in, all interested, everybody keenly interested in what was being said, and in the election in general. Beside me in the crush was a young garment worker. This was indicative to me of how the people felt. The young garment worker was reading a book, and in the crowd I looked over his shoulder to see what he was reading. He was reading a book called "The Constitution of the United States". That indicates to me that we should be very thankful that next door to us is that great republic, which is practising democracy. We may well say that these people are pretty good friends for us to have at this or at any other time, and regardless of how they may conduct the elections, or whom they may elect, the people of this nation and of other nations will have great confidence in the American people, their present government and in the president-elect who will take his place at the head of that nation.

There are only two nations at the general assembly which have multiple-party delegations; that is, the opposition parties being represented. Canada has made a good job of the multiple-party delegation system. At the beginning of this world assembly, Senator Wiley of the Republican party in the United States and myself were the only representatives of the opposition from any part of the world, so we had quite a job to perform, although we were not attempting to represent the opposition behind the iron curtain if, indeed, there is any left there to represent.

I was interested to see that the new secretary of state of the United States, Mr. Dulles, has called for a multiple-party delegation so far as further United Nations representatives from the United States are concerned. I am glad to learn too that Henry Cabot Lodge, who sat with us in the 1950 general assembly as a representative on the United States delegation, is now to head the United States permanent United Nations group in New York.

I suppose it can almost be said that I have grown up under the multiple-party system of United Nations representation. It is a good system that we employ in Canada, because, after all, the government does not expect the opposition to take responsibility for foreign policy, as it does not expect the opposition to take responsibility for other kinds of policy. On the other hand, the opposition is not bound by the decisions of the government. It does sit in, and it sees the background for these policies from time to time that form around the delegation table. It provides for a continuity of policy and a measure of responsibility in House of Commons debates, and goes as far as is humanly possible, and as far as party differences will permit, to bring about some semblance of a common voice in the councils of the world.

Those of us who believe in trying for such an approach, of course, would like some clarification of some aspects of the government's foreign policy. I speak entirely for the purpose of getting clarification on this point, because it is an important one, and one which has confused me very greatly. I should like some clarification on the emphasis and the importance that we are to give to a cabinet minister who is not the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when that minister is speaking on questions, giving his views on foreign affairs himself as a member of the cabinet on the important question of Canada taking steps, for instance, to establish a north Atlantic political union, or to remove progressively trade barriers between the fourteen NATO nations and the forging of a new political instrument to which all NATO nations shall subscribe. A member of the cabinet has been expressing his views quite freely, and you can readily understand, Mr. Speaker, why I would ask for some clarification with respect to government policies.

From the context of his speeches one would gather that he was speaking on his own personal behalf, but I would like to know if a member of the cabinet, such as the Hon. Wishart Robertson, to whom I refer, can speak personally on such matters without committing his government to the line of policy he advocates. That would seem to flow normally from the principle of cabinet solidarity.

I have no intention of discussing the merits of what he said. It would be improper for me to do so because his statements were made in a debate in another place. Moreover, I have no desire to reflect unfavourably upon the hon. gentleman, whose high standing in parliament is recognized by all, and I want to make that very clear. It is the principle involved which I desire to have clarified, particularly in view of the fact that no cabinet minister in the Commons, so far as I know, has made or endorsed proposals which the hon. gentleman has put forward in the other place as a cabinet minister. We should like to know also whether we can take his statements as representative of government policy, because I think we ought to be very careful not to have one set of foreign policies in the Commons and another set of foreign policies in the Senate.

I want to come back to the United Nations itself for a moment. Those of us who were at the birth of the United Nations at San Francisco are not going to be very ready converts, I fancy, to those forces who would attempt to disband the United Nations Organization. One hears a great deal of talk, perhaps not in this country but in some others, that perhaps the usefulness of the United Nations has come to an end. I have never been a convert to that belief because, as I heard it explained on one occasion, when the world is sick you do not shoot the doctor. It may be that the doctor is not getting his patient back to normal health quickly and successfully, but I think there is something still to be said in favour of the only organization on a global basis that provides a common table under which the nations of the world can put their feet and talk things over rather than go to war with rifles on their shoulders to fight it out. If for nothing else I think that demands that the Canadian people support this organization.

I would point out to those who from time to time attack this organization, and perhaps I could find many scores of reasons for its being attacked, that on balance we must be cautious and careful in expressing explosive opinions with respect to an organization which may yet be the foundation of a just and lasting peace. There are 60 nations in it and none of them has offered to withdraw from the organization as it stands. Fourteen others are clamouring to get in. That would seem to me to be an indication that the results of the United Nations have not been as bad as some people have said.

Of course, the United Nations, like a parliament or any other organization, simply reflects and represents the kind of world in which we live, a world that is cut down the middle. That is reflected in the United Nations.

May I say that one of the frustrating experiences with respect to the United Nations is that it has never reached the position we expected it would in San Francisco, that is that there would be a real meeting of minds. When you sit in the United Nations gatherings you wonder if perhaps the publicity that is given to everything that is said, not only in the newspapers but over the radio and television, does not tend to divide rather than bring together. This sort of thing frequently does open up old sores and creates delicate situations.

I am one who believes that as far as the United Nations is concerned we must give it the support it deserves. In dealing with this matter not long ago The Economist of London said:

> The danger is rather of the U.N. being quietly embalmed in honeyed words, to remain indefinitely as an unburied corpse above ground.

I do not think we quite appreciate the great service the United Nations is doing. There are many things that ought to be changed and perhaps there are many criticisms that could be made. One gets terribly bored at the routine day by day dull proceedings which sometimes seem to be only remotely connected with the keeping of peace. I was one of those who felt that the United Nations headquarters should be in the United States. When we were in London in 1945 I was one of those who thought that that was a good idea. I did not have much support from the Canadian delegation, but I made that proposal. I am not so sure I was right. But there is one thing sure in connection with the Soviet union. With the United Nations headquarters being at the very centre of the free press, the free radio and the free television of this world, it has been used by them as a glorified press conference which they could not get at any other time or any other place in the world. I think, more than that, it has been to some extent a provocation to the United States people who are highly sensitive with respect to fifth columns of communist extraction. I think that these are matters which should normally be mentioned.

When you see day after day the obstruction, the discordant notes, the disharmony and the obstacles placed in the way of a proper approach to peace by those who come from behind the iron curtain, it is no wonder that some like myself view with some alarm the coming into the United Nations of nations like red China who would add another discordant note. I say that because I think we must be careful with the present state of the United Nations that we do not admit a lot of other states of communist extraction and communist leanings who would simply join the great bloc and use this organization as a glorified press conference, the proceedings of which could be beamed to every country of the world. I simply express that personal view because of the experience I have had.

Before I leave the United Nations itself I should like to say that you cannot expect perfect action from the United Nations when it is at war in Korea and yet has not the support of five rather major powers within the organization itself. That creates a confused and conflicting situation but I have no doubt that as time goes on that situation may be clarified.

I should like to mention also a shift in emphasis which is most noticeable in the United Nations. When the United Nations was first set up, emphasis was laid upon the great powers. They had control of the security council; they had the veto. The general assembly was left to the big powers, of course, but the little powers represented a great majority there and it was a majority matter. But as time moved on and the security council became paralysed to a large extent and there was a necessity to by-pass the security council and give the general assembly more extensive powers, as the United States and other free powers attempted to do a couple of years ago when dealing with Korea, new emphasis was placed on the general assembly. I think that emphasis is reflected in the actions of the Arab and Asian blocs as well as some of the Latin Americans. A third force is thus developing in connection with the United Nations general assembly.

In that third force, in which the Arabs and Asians are moving quickly, the Canadian delegation finds itself in a most difficult position. The Canadian delegation has perhaps been faced with no more difficult situation than when they had to deal with the matter of colonial powers and those who have not yet received their independence. Only yesterday in one of the committees of the United Nations Canada was forced to take a position against her old ally France in connection with whether or not the United Nations general assembly was competent to deal with Tunisian and Moroccan disputes.

Do not make any mistake, the soviets are attempting by the new policy which was adopted last summer to drive a wedge between the free powers. Very often they raise colonial and other disputes in order to do that. It is interesting to note that when we were at San Francisco one of every twelve of the world's people had a communist government. This fall at the general assembly we found that one out of every three of the world's people had a communist government. On the other hand, one realized that while that was happening no less than 624,000,000 people have since the end of the last war obtained national independence by democratic processes. So it is not wholly a despairing report. But nevertheless I want to point out that Korea is by far the central feature of the seventh general assembly. The minister very properly dealt with that as his key subject the other day. As I sat and listened to the speeches of Vishinsky, Lloyd, Acheson, our own Paul Martin and others at the assembly I realized that while bloodshed was going on in Korea the soviets were obstructing in New York. The rock upon which the truce has foundered is of course the question of prisoners of war.

I am not going into that matter in any great detail except to say that many problems were settled at the Panmunjom conference, so many that we are down now to the question of the repatriation of prisoners of war. There are varying estimates as to how many prisoners of war, after screening, actually want to stay on this side of the bamboo curtain. The estimates vary from 38,000 upwards. Of course the soviets have said from time to time that the prisoners of war were not properly screened and that there have been machinations on the part of the capitalist powers who want them to stay where they are. I listened with great interest to the Hon. Selwyn Lloyd, minister of state in the Churchill government, and, incidentally, I do not think I have seen at any United Nations gathering which I have attended better representation of the United Kingdom than that being given by the same Selwyn Lloyd. He made a great impression upon me and I think upon the delegates generally. The following is a summary of what he said in answer to Mr. Vishinsky:

> In June, 1952, he himself had visited Korea and had been an eye witness of the conditions prevailing in a camp of 10,000 North Koreans who did not wish to be repatriated . . . He had been convinced by his conversations with many of these prisoners, chosen at random, with no witnesses other than the interpreter, that they had all taken considered decisions. They had lived under a totalitarian regime and felt that, if they were to return to their countries, certainly their freedom, and probably even their lives, would be endangered. Some of them might still be persuaded to return; and it was to be hoped that that was so since no one could desire the existence of a large number of political refugees in the world. It was questionable, however, whether it was just or humane to place those men at the mercy of governments which they detested and to push them forcibly across the frontier. If attempts were made to do that, there would probably be escapes, suicides and other distressing incidents. That would constitute a crime against humanity.

I think that best describes from an eye-witness point of view the position that is found there. The soviets of course take the stand that under the Geneva convention of 1949 they have the right to compel these prisoners to go back, but the Geneva convention of 1949 did not say quite what Mr. Vishinsky says it said. More than that, after Mr. Vishinsky's long argument in favour of forcible repatriation of prisoners, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) and myself heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), having obtained a copy of Mr. Vishinsky's book on the law of the soviet state, read to Mr. Vishinsky from his own book a complete reversal of what he was advocating before the first committee of the general assembly.

Actually the 1949 convention requires that any transfer of prisoners should be effected humanely and that the interests of the prisoners themselves should be taken into consideration. It provides, like the Indian proposal, for release before repatriation. In other words, we are not only in the right on the technical provisions of the convention but beyond any question, I submit, we are in the right so far as the human factors are concerned. It gets down to this: Can we, in all humanity, force these men to go back at the point of a bayonet to face torture or death at the hands of ruthless terrorists? I do not mind saying to the house that I think the conscience of the Dominion of Canada would be outraged if this country did not take the position we are now taking with respect to the repatriation of prisoners of war in Korea.

The Indian resolution of course attempted to find a middle course through the intervention of disinterested states, but like other suggestions it met with the same provocative and hostile blasts from the soviets although fifty-one nations supported and only five opposed it. The soviets were not even polite to the Indians, and anybody who cannot be polite to the Indians cannot be polite to anyone because no one deserves greater politeness or consideration than the delegation from that very great nation.

The minister said that we face three alternatives if the reply from red China with respect to the Indian resolution is a definite no. We of course have always faced those alternatives. There is nothing new in them. The first one is withdrawal from Korea, which of course would be impossible, impractical and unthinkable. After all, we went there for a principle and we are not going to back away from that principle now. If there is any one thing that the United Nations has done so far as restoring peace to the world is concerned it has been to meet aggression where it found it and not dilly-dally and fool with it as happened on previous occasions in the world's history. Therefore that is out.

So far as the question of holding the present line or stepping up the tempo of the offensive in Korea is concerned, the minister was careful not to press his opinion too far in that respect. Both courses have the seeds of danger in them. Korea itself has the seeds of danger within it. One of the things we must watch for, however, is to see that none of us in the free world attempts to become a bull in a china shop with respect to Korea or any other inflammatory trouble spot. If there ever was an occasion for caution, care, perseverance, determination and steadfast resolution it is now, because we cannot afford to make a single mistake if we are going to play our proper part in bringing about peace. It is a delicate situation.

Mr. Stick: But no appeasement.

Mr. Graydon: No, no appeasement. I may say to my hon. friend that when the question of appeasement arose I thought it was most indicative that one of those with whom I have always agreed—and I am sure my hon. friend will agree as I do—said that in his opinion appeasement in its real form is simply surrender by the instalment plan. That is not what we want and this country will not stand for any such course in the days that lie ahead.

A few moments ago I expressed great confidence in President-elect Eisenhower. We look forward to great things under his leadership so far as that great eastern zone of concern and trouble is concerned. We look forward to what will come out of the forthcoming conference to be held between himself and General MacArthur in the next few days. It seems too bad that a gap which does not seem so great in a sense, the gap involved in the question of repatriation of prisoners, cannot be bridged. It makes one sad to think that, having got so close together, this gap still exists between peace and war.

I want to proffer my own lay views with respect to why the soviets are holding out so strongly. All my views are lay views because I do not profess to be an expert on foreign affairs, although when I attend the meetings of the United Nations I find I am not completely out of place because I have the company of many people from all over the world who do not hold themselves out to be experts, either. Nevertheless, and I want to say this as a layman viewing the situation, it seems to me that the real crux of the situation as far as the soviets are concerned is that they dare not allow prisoners of war in this case to make their own decision about where they will go after the war is over. Those who cannot trust the loyalty of their own forces in the field naturally take the position very seriously; because one can realize what would happen with the Ukraine, with Czechoslovakia, with Poland, and with any of those iron curtain forces that might meet democratic forces should this principle be established. I fancy, Mr. Speaker, that the answer is all too well known to us, as it is all too well known to them.

The fact that the soviets have taken the strong and unchangeable position they have is a very great black eye to the whole soviet system. It indicates that they cannot trust the forces who are under their command. I say to you that I think, on the principle which we have taken there, we ought to have the endorsement of all people with conscience from one end of the world to the other.

I have to depend on my own watch here, Mr. Speaker, but I have some time left—

An hon. Member: You have two minutes.

Mr. Graydon: I would like to have more than that.

When Premier Menzies of Australia was here last spring he made a rather interesting statement at the Canadian Club, where I heard him. I thought it summed up things pretty well. He said in effect: We are living in strange circumstances. We have never been in the midst of such prosperity and we have never been in the midst of such trouble. We have a peace that is not a peace and we have a war that is not a war.

That, I suppose, calls for a type of diplomacy and a type of approach by this country and others that we have never been called upon to make at any time before. I suppose we could say that today we are in a peace of nerves instead of a war of nerves; and perhaps the best set of nerves will be a great factor in the triumph which comes to one side or the other.

The more I see of international gatherings, the more firmly I am convinced that the real strength and influence which a country has at those meetings depends on the strength it has at home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Graydon: How important it is for us to keep our political, our military, our economic, our social and spiritual houses in order right here in Canada. Today if you are going to be strong away from home you have got to be strong at home. That, I think, must ever be Canada's determination and Canada's resolve in these very, very difficult days.

Like individuals, of course, in a cruel competitive world, nations cannot do their best alone. The world is such a shrunken ball now that everybody is next-door neighbour to everybody else. We are on everybody else's doorstep and they are on our doorstep. The result is that the business of "going it alone" belongs, for any nation, to yesteryear and not to today. With the iron curtain countries assessing national prestige and influence only by military might, the sooner that other powers can reach some equivalent to their dominant military superiority the sooner we can get these agitators for world revolution around a conference table to iron out and settle somehow the differences that divide the world today.

I know that kind of peace is not the kind of peace Canadians want. It is not the kind of peace that the free-powers people want. But you cannot always get the kind of peace you want. Perhaps we are going to have to take a second rate peace, a peace based on force, a kind of peace that is perhaps foreign to our way of thinking. Nevertheless, whatever that peace may be, let us make one solemn resolve: that within limits of honour and decency, and the safety of our people, we will strive for some kind of peace that will assure that we do not have the next generation of our people absorbed in bloodshed such as were those in the two armed holocausts before. That, of course, is NATO's aim. NATO's aim is to get and to force those behind the iron curtain around the conference table in a serious and resolute bid for peace. Peace is the world's sole chance of survival. I want to emphasize those words. I believe in them and I think the House of Commons believes in them. Peace is the sole chance of survival for us all. NATO is our best guarantee for safety in a troubled world. This nation, and this parliament I suggest, must bend every effort towards playing our full part in this practical planning for peace. As a nation we cannot afford to flag or fail while the present challenge stares us in the face.

Now, if I may just have a short time longer, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Graydon: In view of the expressed policy of the soviets of splitting the free-powers bloc, I want to say that words or actions of ours should not assist or promote those soviet designs. The application of the policy of the soviets can be seen in their every action in the United Nations today. It is a delicate situation. For instance, right at the beginning of the assembly the problem of Tunisia and Morocco came up. The question was where these issues would appear on the agenda—whether first, second, third or fourth. That decision was a matter which caused grave international complications. The United States voted, on that particular occasion, to move the problem of Tunisia and Morocco to a higher priority than the French government thought it should have. The serious political repercussions in France over that single vote pleased and gladdened the hearts of soviets everywhere.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say that we must be extremely careful in our language within our great alliance. I am amazed to hear in the House of Commons in Britain, and on the platform there, one of their so-called leaders from time to time making statements which do untold damage to the free world. I give him credit for doing it unintentionally but nevertheless I think that these days our language must be measured and sane. I think it must be language that is well considered in the circumstances because every chink in the free world's armour is being exploited in the cold war—to divide us. The only way we can survive is to close our ranks and persevere, and with resolute determination see it through.

Sitting in the midst of the chaos and the division between the democracies and the communists, between the Occident and the Orient, between the haves and the have-nots, between the colonial powers and the colonies, is that indescribably significant family of nations called the British commonwealth and empire. I think there are more people in this house now than I have ever seen in seventeen years who find great pride and great pleasure in standing up and saying a good word for the British commonwealth. Perhaps yesteryear they did not feel so prone to do that. I am glad they feel that way. When our monarch is crowned in June, we will see this great commonwealth and empire stretching around the entire world, bound with nothing but family ties and without a written constitution or anything in centralized form.

This commonwealth is perhaps the only one of its kind in the history of the world. The vast preponderance of the population of the commonwealth and empire are Asiatic with only one out of six being white, and this gives one some idea, in these days when the Occident and the Orient are drifting farther apart, that we might be in a position to be a voluntary link between all the continents of the world. We may be the link between the varied races, creeds and colours. If my prophecy stands, we shall live to see the day when the British commonwealth and empire will yet be the greatest long-range influence for peace in this troubled world.

I recall so well, as many other hon. members recall, the time in 1943 when the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, then foreign secretary, stood at the head of that table and said that in the great world peace conference which was to be held he would make one suggestion only, and that was that in cutting the pattern of peace we should not forget that perhaps the greatest pattern of world peace was that provided by the great British commonwealth and empire. I want to say this, too, and it is a matter which has been brought to the house on so many occasions by the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that it need not be repeated. It concerns our position with respect to the Pacific. It is easy for us in the central part of Canada or on the east coast to overlook the fact that Canada is a Pacific as well as an Atlantic power. I want to say one sentence, and that is that in our closer tie-in with the various developments towards peace in the Pacific it is not enough to have the United States-Japanese alliance, the United States, New Zealand and Australian alliance or other alliances which are collateral to them. Last session I thought the Secretary of State for External Affairs was coming to the point where he was about to change his mind on this subject, and perhaps he has that in mind now. I believed that we in the British commonwealth ought to have some place in an over-all Pacific pact. After all, Canada and the United Kingdom are two countries that have a vital, continuing and consuming interest in peace in the Pacific area.

I want to close, if I may, with one observation. One cannot sit in the general assembly, Mr. Speaker, without seeing the less developed countries on the march for better things. Not long ago I heard it said in New York that on this continent we have two-thirds of the wealth and productive capacity of the whole world, and that we have only one out of every fifteen of the world's population. I believe that in itself tells a story. It is perhaps more convincing than any comment that could be made in this house or in the United Nations itself. Perhaps at one time responsibility did not hang so heavily on those who had wealth and productive capacity, but today there is a different standard abroad. It is indicated by the revolution in Egypt under Naguib, where, I am told, one of the main troubles was the fact that there were a few people with all of the money and a great many people without enough, and where there was no proper feeling of responsibility on the part of people who had money for those who had not.

If that applies in individual nations, it applies here in our own country; it applies in our own community. We have a quickening conscience with respect to the responsibility of the haves for the have-nots, not only in the legislation passed by this house but in the United Nations itself. I want to say that anyone on this North American continent who disregards or treats lightly in the years that lie ahead this responsibility, with two-thirds of the wealth and production held by one-fifteenth of the world's population, is headed for a rude awakening. I leave that to the House of Commons as at least one illustration of the problems that lie ahead in this and other countries of the world.

I am one of those who believe that military needs with respect to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and our own defence call for first priority on this government and this parliament. Let us not make any mistake about that. I want to make this other collateral observation also and that is that in the long, hard pull towards permanent peace our responsibility towards our fellowmen throughout the free world will have to be recognized and will have to be discharged as well if the clouds on that far-away horizon of honourable and lasting peace are to be dissipated and the sun of harmony and justice is to shine again.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure previous speakers will forgive me if I do not follow them in the speeches that they have made. I might hope, as I begin what I have to say, that if it is necessary the house will be as indulgent to me in the matter of time as it has been to my immediate predecessor. However, I shall strive to keep within the compass of the forty minutes.

I rise at this first opportunity to reply to the personal attack made on me on November 25 by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). At that time he used language which you, Mr. Speaker, advised him to discontinue. I shall not reply in similar terms. I was prepared at that time to answer and to prove that what I said in British Columbia was both true and provable. I shall do that today.

The hon. member quoted a newspaper report as my having said:

> The Social Credit movement through its leader, Solon Low, has displayed anti-semitism and racial discrimination.

May I put on the record what I actually did say, since these are abbreviated reports and it would be well to keep the record straight. I warned my listeners that the Social Credit movement was steeped in racial prejudice and throughout its existence had shown both anti-democratic and dictatorial tendencies. I did not refer to the British Columbia government as such or, personally, to Mr. Manning, although since they promote the Social Credit movement and are leaders of it, they cannot escape some responsibility unless they are prepared to publicly repudiate the Social Credit movement. I did not mention them in the connections charged by the hon. member for Peace River, although I mentioned them both in another connection later. I then supported my statement by quotations from two documents which I shall quote from today.

First, I shall proceed to show that my reference was not to infrequent or isolated statements by the hon. member for Peace River or by promoters of Social Credit generally, but a part of their general propaganda.

The originator of Social Credit was the late Major Douglas. I am quite familiar with his writings, having, I rather expect, given the first outline of his theory and criticized it when his first six articles appeared in an English paper known as "The New Age", in 1919 or 1920. Major Douglas was a voluminous writer but he summed up his theory and the reasons for it in a volume known as "The Brief for the Prosecution", which was extensively quoted in this house on occasion, by at least one member of the Social Credit party and would, as I shall show, indicate the real background of both the quotation I made in British Columbia from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and some of his speeches in this house.

First, then, the background of the movement. An examination of one of the later efforts of Major Douglas will suffice. In his book "The Brief for the Prosecution" the author of Social Credit uses exactly the same tactics as my hon. friend has used both over the radio and in speeches in this house from which I intend to quote.

Condemnation of ideas, policies, or movements which they dislike are followed by the naming of Jewish persons and most frequently only Jewish persons having any real or supposed connection with such movements or ideas. Not only that but if time permits I shall show that these tactics are invariably followed by Social Credit writers and pamphleteers, published and circulated officially or unofficially by the Social Credit movement in Canada, the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

One thing can be said for Major Douglas and indeed for the late Social Credit member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) that they were brutally frank in expressing their anti-semitism—at least they did not damn by association or convict by innuendo.

At page 162 of Major Douglas' book containing innumerable attacks on Jewish persons we find the following paragraph:

> In 1290 Edward I expelled the Jews from England, and twenty years afterwards suppressed the Knights Templars, the direct ancestors of Freemasonry. It is significant that the laws of England which are regarded as 'good law' to the present day unless specifically abrogated, date from Edward I.

His reference to the non-political British masonic order, of which princes of our royal family have been members and indeed filled its highest office from time to time, can be noted too at page 163:

> Seven hundred years is but a moment in the life of a race, and the inspection of documents relating to the management of either England or Scotland in the time of Edward I will convince anyone that we have perhaps not learnt so much of real consequence as we have forgotten. But it is certain that we are faced with a situation which was threatening England with disaster then, and it ought to be obvious that the first step to take is to restrict drastically alien immigration, and to make naturalization a rare and exceptional concession.

When on the program "Press Conference" broadcast over the C.B.C. on November 19, 1951, Mr. Robert McKeown questioned the hon. member for Peace River concerning the fact—> —that Mr. Douglas, the originator of Social Credit, placed emphasis on anti-semitism and things of that kind—the hon. gentleman replied:

> I think you are misinterpreting what the Major said.

He added:

> Let me point out that you are classing as anti-semitism expressions that might not reveal anti-semitic feeling. (C.B.C. transcript).

At page 4660 of Hansard, July 12, 1943, after some vicious anti-semitic attacks which many hon. members will remember, there was placed on record an editorial comment from the Winnipeg Free Press as follows:

> There should be no mystery about where Mr. Jaques got his ideas. He is a student of Major C. H. Douglas, the originator of Social Credit theory, and Major Douglas provided the lead his students and followers require in Jew-baiting. Major Douglas wrote his main work "Social Credit" in 1924, about the same time as Adolf Hitler was completing "Mein Kampf", and by curious coincidence, both these works bore the influence of an earlier work called "The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion."

On the following page of our official record will be found Mr. Jaques' declaration:

> Here and now I say on behalf of Social Crediters the world over that we utterly repudiate and denounce the policies contained in the "Protocols of Zion".

That is, Social Crediters oppose the policies falsely alleged by the protocols to have been adopted by the elders of Zion—"But", said Mr. Jaques, "when you come to read them, how can any reasonable man deny the truth of what is contained in them?" This was said in this house and no Social Crediter rose to say that the speaker was not speaking for "Social Crediters the world over".

Indeed, when Major Douglas died recently, the acting premier of British Columbia, Mr. Eric Martin, said:

> Speaking on behalf of Premier Bennett and the Social Credit government, I would say that his death (Major Douglas) is a tremendous loss to the Social Credit movement throughout the world. All those who embrace Social Credit philosophy look upon Major Douglas as a financial genius and subscribe wholeheartedly to his monetary reform proposals.
> (Ottawa Citizen, Canadian Press dispatch from Victoria, September 30/52)

It may be argued that there is a difference in supporting Major Douglas' general views and those relating to his economic views, but even a casual acquaintance with his writings and those of his associates will indicate that his views are interrelated—a complete whole of the same pattern.

Now with his background established I wish to turn to some statements of my friend the hon. member for Peace River: The hon. gentleman entered this House of Commons in 1945. We met after the election in September. On October 18, 1945, the hon. gentleman purported to examine the United Nations agreement. I quote from page 1259 of Hansard:

> I recall that this idea—
> The formation of a world federation of nations.
> —was put forward in a book bearing the appealing title "Peace in our Time". Its author was James P. Warburg, son of Paul Warburg, the German international financier who played a leading role with Jacob Schiff in the centralization of the money power in the United States, and its consolidation with the highly-centralized money power of Germany. That particular group of international bankers are predominantly German in origin, stemming from the house of Rothschild in Frankfurt-on-Main. They have become the most powerful financial group in all the world, and they have consistently pursued a policy of centralization of control with the single objective of complete world domination.
> It is from that group that the idea of a world federation of nations emanated. However, it was not James Warburg's book which was used as the chief instrument for putting over the idea. It was another book under the title of "Union Now", by Clarence Kirshman Streit which elaborated in great detail on world federation union, with centralized control of finance, international trade and armed forces. The mechanism was ingeniously designed to impose a virtual world dictatorship, under the guise of democracy; which dictatorship, by its very nature, would lead step by step to an absolute world totalitarian tyranny.

It is significant that the hon. member for Peace River singles out Jewish persons only for condemnation for promoting ideas of world federation to which he is opposed. It is just as significant that he does not mention one single non-Jewish person—with the exception of Clarence Streit—in professing to examine the various steps that were taken towards the setting up of the United Nations. I say, with the exception of Clarence Streit, a person who is not Jewish but whom the Social Crediters have, apparently, on many occasions in the past mistaken for a Jew.

It is significant that someone among the Social Crediters discovered that Mr. Streit's middle name was Kirshman. Here was a golden opportunity. With a name like that it was deduced that Mr. Streit must be a Jew. So whenever his books were criticized in Social Credit papers the complete name was invariably given—Clarence Kirshman Streit—to impress upon readers that here was another Jewish person entertaining ideas of international government—another piece in the "sinister international Jewish plot for world power"—"The Protocols of Zion". The interesting point as I have said is that Mr. Streit is not Jewish.

On September 1, 1950, page 126 of Hansard, the Social Credit leader purported to examine whereby "Russia has become so powerful and so belligerent between 1917 and the present time". He asks:

> Was Russia's rise to the position of being the foremost belligerent in the world the result of accidental growth or was it the result of a definite policy on the part of powerful interests inside as well as outside Russia.

Then he goes on to say that perhaps the facts that he has to present to the house may help to clarify the whole question and provide some answer to it. What are some of these "facts".

He refers to a group of Wall Street bankers as financing Lenin and Trotsky as far back as 1907. Again, he selects Jewish persons. The Dresdner bank, Jacob Schiff and Paul Warburg come in for attack. The firm of Kuhn, Loeb and Company, of Wall street, is alleged to have fomented and financed the Russian revolution. The Krupps, the Hugo Stinnes are also mentioned in this connection, although, of course, they are not Jewish.

In the same debate Mr. Low had this to say, as reported at page 128 and 129 of September 1, 1950:

> A close study of Russo-American history, I am sure, would reveal the true enemies of civilization, and I think we should be getting after them.

These are an example of the kind of sly insinuations which the hon. member frequently indulges in.

Now I come to the quotation I used in British Columbia, to support my assertion regarding the hon. gentleman. On December 18, 1946, speaking over the C.B.C. program "The Nation's Business" the hon. member said this:

> Do you know that the same group of international gangsters who are today scheming for world revolution are the same people who promoted the world war? Do you know that these same men promoted and financed the Russian revolution? Are you aware that these arch-criminals were responsible for the economic chaos and suffering of the hungry thirties, for financing Hitler to power, for promoting world war II with its tragic carnage? Do you know that there is a close tie-up between international communism, international finance and international political zionism?

This passage is revealing for its confusion and demagogy. The same group is made responsible for exactly opposite things; the Russian revolution and financing Hitler; world communism, international finance, and political zionism. It cannot have been intended as a serious historical statement, since it is so patently absurd. Recent events in Czechoslovakia confirm its absurdity.

On December 13, 1951, as reported on page 1875 of Hansard, the hon. member for Peace River, referring to the criticism the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) had made on a previous occasion in connection with this statement alleging a tie-up between international communism, international finance, and international political zionism, had this to say:

> The point I was making in that broadcast from which the member for Winnipeg North quoted this excerpt was that I believed fully and deeply that there was a tie-up, and had been for many years, between three international policies: international communism, international finance, and international political zionism. I am not going to debate that proposition today, because this is not the proper place. I say now that I am prepared to debate it with the hon. member for Winnipeg North or anyone else, because I have the information upon which to base my beliefs, and evidence to support my claim.

Well, the hon. gentleman has provoked a debate with me. Let him produce the evidence, if he can do so.

Now let me repeat if anyone will take the trouble to examine "The Brief for the Prosecution", written by the founder of the Social Credit movement, Major C. H. Douglas, he will find exactly the same tactics used there: namely, the condemnation of movements and ideas not generally popular, followed by the naming of Jewish persons in connection with such movements and ideas. These tactics are invariably used by the pamphleteers and the writers of Social Credit, whether it be in this country, in Britain, or elsewhere. Now far be it from me to defend international finance or its bankers. I have often been very critical of them. That I am doing. I am pointing out that while many of the powerful international banks and bankers are British, American, French and Dutch, my hon. friends name only those with Jewish names.

I wish to examine briefly the 1946 annual report of the Social Credit board—an official body of the Alberta legislature. This was presented to the legislative assembly in the province of Alberta at its ordinary session 1947—to show that the same tactics of innuendo and insinuation invariably crop up in a wide range of Social Credit statements. I might add that this report was presented by A.B. Bourcier, chairman, N.B. James, secretary, William Tomyn, and F.M. Baker, all at that time Social Credit members of the Alberta legislature and none of them expelled or suspended because they had anything to do with this report. Reference in this report is made to the so-called world plotters, those who are allegedly out to establish an absolute dictatorship on a universal scale—again the protocols of the elders of Zion.

Who are these alleged world plotters? Again, Jewish persons are singled out under the subheading of "More Evidence" on page 5 of this report which I have before me. Eugene Meyer is mentioned as follows:

> Early this year, Eugene Meyer was requested by President Truman to accept the presidency of the new World Bank . . . It is controlled by individuals who are not responsible to national or international governments.

Listen to this, and I quote from page 6 of the report:

> In March of this year, Bernard M. Baruch was appointed by President Truman, as the United States representative on the United Nations atomic energy commission. Mr. Baruch announced his team of 'alternates and co-workers', to consist of: John Hancock, Wall Street banker; Ferdinand Eberstadt, New York investment banker; Herbert Bayard Swope, publicist and journalist; Fred Searls, New York mining engineer.

On page 7 the report singles out Lord Rothschild and I quote:

> Lord Rothschild, who is one of the wealthiest men in the world, and who occupies a prominent place in the inner circle of international high finance, leads the socialist group in the British House of Lords.

Lord Rothschild never was leader of the socialists in the House of Lords or anywhere else. And on the same page the late Professor Harold Laski is mentioned as an important influence in the British parliament. All this is followed by this paragraph on page 7 and I quote:

> The events of the past year offer further proof of the existence of a deliberately planned scheme which will impose the tyranny of a world slave state on the people of all nations. The foregoing facts are only a fraction of the evidence which may be added to that given in previous board reports, revealing the close kinship which exists between the leading figures in the socialist ranks and those of international finance. It also becomes more evident as their plans develop that the forces of socialism and finance are both working with all their might to reach the same objective,—the establishment of the totalitarian world state.

Obviously the circulation of the spurious protocols of the elders of Zion had found their way via Social Credit into the Alberta legislature.

The report in another revealing section condemns majority rule, the secret ballot and the organization of political parties. It suggests the ballot should be signed by the voter before he deposits it in the ballot box.

During the 1947 session of the legislature Premier Manning, under pressure from the opposition parties and Alberta newspapers, made a statement with respect to this report. While he did not repudiate it, he said he wished to disassociate himself "from anything which could be construed as undemocratic."

To show that the Alberta Social Credit board report of 1946 was not an isolated report, let me quote briefly from a similar board report as reprinted in the official paper of the Alberta Social Credit league, "Today and Tomorrow", dated May 4, 1944. This is the 1943 board report and was submitted to the legislative assembly in 1944. Note the heading.

Part VII

PLOT FOR WORLD WAR

The two most accepted text books on the subjects of international government. international police forces, international currency, etc. are "Union Now" —by Clarence Kirshman Streit. "Peace in our Time"—by James Paul Warburg.

Clarence Kirshman Streit was for many years the international correspondent of a large New York newspaper owned by the strongest international bank of that city.

James Paul Warburg is a son of Paul Warburg, founder of the American Federal Reserve System, a director of the same international bank, and a power in international financial circles.

The hon. member for Peace River was, I believe, a member of the legislature at that time, as was Premier Manning—they accepted the obvious innuendo without protest.

Now I wish to refer to the type of publication officially circulated by the Alberta Social Credit league for several years and to literature distributed at Social Credit conventions —national and local. This was referred to in the C.B.C. press conference broadcast in November last year.

Mr. O'Leary asked why poisonous anti-semitic literature had been distributed at Social Credit conventions. Mr. Low said that as soon as this was discovered it was stopped. Mr. O'Leary commented that it was not stopped by the Social Credit organization but because he himself had called it to the attention of the attorney general of Ontario when it was circulated in Toronto, because there was a law against racial discrimination in that province, passed that very year.

As hon. members can see I have a stack of photostatic copies of the publication "Today and Tomorrow" which was the official organ of the Social Credit league of Alberta until it was incorporated in their official national publication—"The Canadian Social Crediter". I can only quote a few examples which display the same innuendoes and sly insinuations designed to foment racial suspicion and hatred. Here is one:

March 30, 1944

OH! OH!

WASHINGTON—President Roosevelt announced Tuesday that Judge Samuel I. Rosenman was resigning from the New York state supreme court to become his special counsel. (Edmonton Journal, September 15th).

We do not suppose that Felix Frankfurter, Benjamin Cohen, Bernard Baruch and the President's other advisers raised any serious objections.

June 3, 1943.

MAIN STREET

By N. B. James, M.L.A.

And now these same people are suggesting, in a subtle and roundabout way, that we no longer need our King and Queen, our crown, our constitution and the British empire, and that we should transfer our loyalty to a mysterious nondescript international power, composed of some off-colour individuals of no particular country, and who are incapable of loyalty except to gold or its equivalent.

Remember this was before the establishment of the state of Israel and before any difficulties arose regarding its establishment and when a Jewish force was fighting side by side with our allied forces. I now come to October 12, 1944 and quote from their official national publication, The Canadian Social Crediter.

There are three spheres of activity which, beyond question, are dominated by Judaeo-Free Masonry. They are gold standard finance, international cartelism, and international socialism, the latter masquerading under such local names as the C.C.F., etc.

And, from the same paper dated September 9, 1944, "The organized Jewish race, as it were, the general staff of materialism militant". Or see what prejudice they tried to raise against one of our most brilliant public servants in their French language publication "Vers Demain" and repeated and reprinted in their English language paper, "Today and Tomorrow", on August 31, 1944, as follows:

TARRED WITH THE SAME BRUSH

Who is the right-hand man of Graham Towers (Governor of the Bank of Canada) and the inspirer of Ottawa financial policy? Louis Rasminsky, grandson of a Jewish refugee, and trained at the London School of Economics.

And so I could continue with literally dozens of such quotations to indicate that the Social Credit movement has been steeped in anti-semitism.

The hon. gentleman will probably say that he dissociated himself and his party from the French-speaking section. Again "Press Conference" has a revealing question and answer about this, as follows:

Mr. Blakely: What are your ties at the present time with the Quebec organization known as L'Union des Electeurs?

Mr. Low: That is a good question. We have no ties whatever. L'Union des Electeurs disassociated themselves from us about three and a half years ago and there has never been any tie-up since.

Note the words "they disassociated themselves from us." When asked the reason, the hon. member for Peace River had criticized them because:

We felt that they were paying too much attention altogether to such things as you have just mentioned a few minutes ago, that is the question of zionism. We have felt that the emphasis on that was too great.

It should be noted it was not because it was false, but presumably it was too great to meet the political needs of my hon. friend and his friends. Of the French campaign the Canadian Register, which is the paper of the English-speaking Roman Catholic population —this was placed on the record of the house on May 16, 1947, to be found on page 3162 of Hansard of that day—had this to say:

It is therefore with feelings of shame and horror that we have noted the publication in Vers Demain, organ of the Social Credit party in this province, of that spurious calumny of the Jews known as the "protocols of Zion." This fantastic forgery, long known to all serious students as false, contains all sorts of nonsensical "revelations" of non-existent "plots". It is a vulgar and crude libel of our Jewish brethren which is capable of causing great harm among prejudiced or uncritical readers.

The protocols of Zion have been circulated by Social Crediters across western Canada, and are among the many books recommended by Major Douglas for reading by Social Crediters in Britain and I presume across the world.

I come now to an official reprint of an article in the Canadian Social Crediter entitled "Intrigue in High Places. An Honest Appraisal of the U.N.O." by E. G. Hansell, M.P. I quote a few paragraphs to illustrate the usual tactics of singling out Jewish people for special condemnation, although be it said it casts grave imputations against other prominent persons of international repute. This reads:

Some of Hiss' advisers were men who were already powerful figures in world finance. Among them was Henry Morgenthau, Jr. whose plan to restrict and demoralize the German economy for the benefit of American financiers has back-fired.

There was also James P. Warburg who is an ardent advocate of world government. His friend, Eugene Meyer, another powerful banker, became the first head of the International Bank. His successor was John J. McCloy, who sat under the teaching of the marxist Felix Frankfurter of Harvard law school. Frankfurter was exalted to position and power by President Roosevelt and is today a close friend and associate of secretary Dean Acheson, who was largely responsible for the reversal of American foreign policy in China.

May I just comment that no more conservative justice occupies a seat on the supreme court of the United States than Mr. Justice Frankfurter, but because he had a Jewish name the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) brands him as a Marxist in order to condemn him in the eyes of those who will read the article. Talk about cesspool politics. This article by the hon. member for Macleod is just one long deliberate attack on Jewish persons. In the same article he implies that President Roosevelt met a strange death. He says:

Roosevelt died a mysterious death. No one was permitted to see his body.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) had something to say at Trail which in the opinion of the Trail Times of April 17, 1952 and of Mr. Elmore Philpott in the Vancouver Sun carried an implication of the sort I have been discussing. The Trail Times reports the hon. member as saying:

Lester B. Pearson, Canadian Minister of External Affairs, was a protégé of a man known as the "Emperor of Canada", probably the richest man in the country.

The Trail Times says that he implied that the unnamed rich man was responsible for Mr. Pearson's support of the new state of Israel. Mr. Philpott observed that it implied the old line of anti-semitism. I say to the hon. member for Lethbridge that he owes it to the country and to the house to name this so-called emperor of Canada, whose protégé is alleged to be the minister of external affairs and the present president of the United Nations.

I have dealt only with the recorded or official statements of the party to sustain my statement in British Columbia, a statement which I repeat, that the Social Credit movement has been steeped in racialism since its inception and has shown dictatorial and anti-democratic tendencies. I have no time to refer to the vicious articles which have appeared in the unofficial publication "Social Credit" in this province or to other publications circulated by my hon. friends. I have stacks of photostats here. I have not referred to how Social Credit candidates were finally chosen in 1935 for Alberta and in 1938 for my own province of Saskatchewan by the late William Aberhart and two advisers in Edmonton. They took unto themselves the official choosing of candidates for the Social Credit party in 1935 for Alberta and in 1938 for Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hansell: That is not right.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member says that that is not right. Let me tell you how I know. My name was sent up to Aberhart against my express wishes, but I am happy to say that Mr. Aberhart listened to what I had to say and did not endorse me. Had he done so I would have repudiated it.

I have not had time to refer to the legislation passed by the Social Credit legislature in Alberta to control the press and so on. The legislation other than that referring to proposed financial policies in Alberta was disallowed because it was properly regarded as an infringement of federal powers and of fundamental democratic rights.

I am confident that I have sustained my assertion. I object to statements which are true in substance and fact being termed by my hon. friends as cesspool politics. Last week in Edmonton the leader of the Social Credit group said that Ontario wanted to get back to old-fashioned righteousness. This is in line with the holier-than-thou attitude which my hon. friend assumes here. But in Victoria he gave an example of his campaign style which is reported in the Vancouver Province of September 27, 1952, and I quote:

> In B.C., he said, there have been men who "bought their way into office and kept themselves there by continual blackmail."
> "All they thought they had to do to stay there was to buy nylons for the ladies and whisky for the men", he said.

The hon. gentleman can prove that statement when he speaks, and he is on the list to speak as next but one after me. Let him prove that there were nylons for the ladies and whisky for the men and blackmail by my hon. friends of the Conservative party and Liberal party whose friends were in power in coalition in that province.

His deskmate says that Mr. Pearson is the protégé of an unnamed rich man known as the emperor of Canada. Let him prove that. The hon. member for Macleod, in his vicious attack from which I have quoted, implied that some unnamed miscreant—this is from the article he wrote—may have murdered the late president of the United States.

Yes, Mr. Premier of Alberta, we do need a back to the Bible campaign, but religion, like charity, should begin at home. Therefore I suggest that he direct his attention to at least three of his Social Credit followers in the federal house and direct them to the gospel according to St. Luke, chapter 18, verses 10 to 13. Hon. members recall the story of the two men who went into the temple to pray, one a pharisee and the other a publican. The pharisee walked up to the front and said, "Thank God I am not as other men, particularly not like this publican". The publican stood at the back of the temple, and lifting up his eyes he said, "God be merciful to me a sinner". So far as this holier-than-thou attitude is concerned, the reading of that parable would be a very good thing. Then he might turn the attention of the authors of the speeches I have quoted to the 20th chapter of Exodus wherein are written the commandments, and draw their attention to that which says "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour".

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, in my first remarks this afternoon I should like to associate myself with the speech made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). As he mentioned, I had the honour of attending the general assembly of the United Nations for something over a month. In addition to what he has said, may I say that to sit in the great hall of the general assembly at its plenary session when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was elected to the presidency gave me a feeling of great pride, not because he was a member of my party but because he was a Canadian representing a great nation. I further wish to say that from my experiences there, in company with the political delegates from Canada, the representatives chosen from other walks of life and members of the civil service, I obtained a greater appreciation of the worth, value and hard work that it is the custom of our civil servants to perform. I was greatly impressed by their activities and, contrary to the opinion of some, I should like to say that every statement made by a delegate was given careful consideration in committee and in caucus before being finally decided upon. No irrational statements were made at any time.

As a British Columbian I wish to associate myself with others who have complimented the two new ministers from British Columbia, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney), and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). I am sure that it bodes great things for British Columbia. I feel that Mr. Mayhew's appointment as ambassador to Japan was an excellent choice. He has been in public life for many years and is well acquainted with affairs in the Far East. I am sure he will discharge his new duties in an exemplary manner just as he did in the past in the House of Commons.

So far as the official opposition is concerned, I have very little to say. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) did not make a very impressive presentation of his amendment, certainly not such as would lead me to support it. While CF-100's cost close to three-quarters of a million dollars, he talked of neckties. While Centurion tanks cost many thousands of dollars, he talked of teapots. After the Leader of the Opposition had completed his speech the observation occurred to me that he had indulged in his usual pastime of raising a tempest in a teapot.

With respect to my own riding of Kootenay East, I believe that this region has been more or less left out of the picture so far as the development of natural gas in western Canada is concerned. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will see to it, as I believe it is within his power to do, that before any natural gas is exported to the United States the east and west Kootenay area will be assured of a reasonable supply. Kootenay East and Kootenay West combined will consume as much natural gas as the entire greater Vancouver area. Therefore it is an important section so far as gas consumption is concerned, and we must have the assurance that a supply will be available.

No doubt the coal miners of the Crowsnest pass region will be in the position of losing some of their markets when gas reaches the Pacific northwest and the Vancouver area. Having lost those markets, it would be tragic if there were not a compensating benefit through natural gas being made available to that region so that new and greater developments might take place.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to give earnest consideration to the extension of the P.F.R.A. to British Columbia. It would seem from the weather conditions of the last six months that we are possibly facing a drought period. These cycles do come, and when they do we often have four or five years of dry weather.

The Camp Lister area of my riding is at the present time supplying a large portion of the hay for the dairy industry in the Trail and Kimberley regions. It would be disastrous if the producers of hay should find themselves in a position where they were not able to keep the dairy industry supplied, because as a consequence the whole population would suffer through a milk shortage. If it is not possible to extend the P.F.R.A. to British Columbia, if the minister does not consider British Columbia a prairie area within the Palliser triangle, then legislation should be introduced whereby the people who reside in the drier parts of British Columbia may be given similar assistance, and also in those places where drainage is necessary.

Mr. Speaker, there is another very important question which affects a large section of the people in my area. It is the present situation with respect to railway negotiations. I note that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) has indicated that he intends to bring in a resolution which I shall read so that it may appear on the record with what I have to say:

> Resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, in view of the emergency now existing and the urgency of a program of war preparedness, the government should take into early consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to make strikes illegal for a period of two years, providing, at the same time, for the settlement of labour disputes by arbitration between labour and management.

Mr. Speaker, first I wish to ask the hon. member, personally, not to put forward such a resolution under the Liberal name.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: It would be contrary to Liberal principles, and it certainly is not in the best interests of the Canadian people generally. Further than that, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see why the railway employees should be singled out for special consideration. Undoubtedly there is an emergency, as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) pointed out this afternoon, but there is also an emergency in the kitchens of many Canadian railway employees.

I have figures here, taken from union agreements, which show quite conclusively that railway employees, generally speaking, are not as well paid as those in other organized industries. The railway industry is the most important in Canada. Without railways we can have no other industry. It is a common fallacy throughout Canada to think that railway employees are very highly paid, the aristocracy of labour. That is a complete fallacy, because I am sure that few of the aristocracy work the hours that are necessary for a railway trainman to make $4,000 a year or even $3,000 a year. To make $3,000 a year a railway employee in the running trades must work longer than those in most other organized industries. He would necessarily have to work 300 shifts. In other industries if a man worked 300 shifts he would make considerably more than $3,000. I have known a man to work over 400 shifts in a year on the railway and yet make only $4,000. A worker in industry where union agreements which call for overtime are in effect would have made in the neighbourhood of $6,000 or $6,500.

It is not my intention to spend a great deal of time on the question, and I do not feel it is my duty to act here on behalf of any organized labour group; but I say we must understand that the railways are working under a certain amount of government control. It is a restricted organization. The railways are not free to bargain and give wage increases without having to make compensating increases in rates. Such increases, of course, do have political repercussions. I feel that railways are sufficiently important that the attention of this house should be drawn to the matter at this time; and I think I can do so most aptly by reading an excerpt from a recent speech made by the president of the C.N.R. to the Canadian Club. I do not intend to discuss freight rates, but I do think people should begin to think about this whole question. He said:

> Canadian railways now are without the reserve rolling stock and facilities they used to accommodate an enormous expansion of traffic on the outbreak of war in 1939.

He further said:

> . . . realistic planning must recognize rail transport as the backbone of a Canadian defence effort and this recognition must express itself in a willingness to give railways at least as much encouragement and assistance as is given defence industry generally.
> To deny the railways the right to earn a subsistence level of revenue would be foolish at any time; to do so in this uncertain state of world affairs could be tragic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another part of my address, perhaps not so important to some but not unimportant to me. For the past half century Canada has looked toward and enjoyed greater unity of racial and religious groups. Religious controversies and criticisms of religious matters are almost strictly taboo except, of course, in the case of some religious fanatics. No responsible religious group will publicly criticize another for its beliefs or sacred rights. In the interests of Canadian unity, so important to our cultural and economic development, this principle should be inviolate. It is because of this, Mr. Speaker, that I view with a great deal of alarm the fact that one Canadian political party seems to be taking advantage of this general immunity. Seeking refuge under the cloak of religion they hope to avoid any criticism while realizing their political ambitions to become a Canadian political power.

You may ask what basis I have for making such a statement. I have here in my hand a clipping from the Windsor Star of December 6, datelined Kingsville:

> Socred Chief Sees need for Religious Revival
> [Mr. Byrne.]

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was, I believe, speaking before a church group in that town, and I quote:

> Throughout his talk, Mr. Low quoted passages from the bible which indicated that Social Credit, besides being another political party, is seeking to bring the divine law which God gave to Moses as the foundation for government policy.

This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) quoted a passage from one of the Victoria papers which I had hoped to obtain. Lacking that, I intended to paraphrase what I thought the leader of the Social Credit party stated while in Victoria. It is in the record now, so I need not repeat it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar quoted a very apt biblical phrase, and certainly the reference to the commandments was very effective.

I do not like to mention my own party alone as one which I believe is based on religious principles, but I should like to quote from a resolution which was adopted by the 1948 and 1952 conventions of the national Liberal party. It reads:

> Liberalism has three key words: Unity, security, freedom. Liberal policies are those which protect, sustain and enlarge the freedom of the individual. The Liberal believes no man is fit to exercise irresponsible power over others. He believes in freedom because he believes the resources of human personality and endeavour to be rich and varied beyond calculation or prediction. He believes in freedom because he believes the community of individuals associated in family, church and diverse free associations to be broader in extent and richer in experience than the state.

These various principles have been extended into Liberal legislation such as the family allowances. Would the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) say that is unchristian? The legislation in connection with old age pensions is Liberal legislation. Would the hon. member say that is unchristian? I do not say that the opposition members did not favour this legislation, but in addition to favouring the legislation the Liberals had the courage to introduce it and raise the money to pay for it. This has been Liberal policy, and it has been followed by Liberal governments. Without quoting further there are many such Christian principles embodied in legislation introduced and presented by Liberal governments.

What does the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) have to say when questioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning Social Credit policy with regard to social legislation? This quotation is found at page 236 of Hansard for December 1, 1952, and reads as follows:

> Mr. Knowles: Would you do away with welfare legislation?—

Mr. Hansell: I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I may. It has always been found that you cannot readily retract or undo something the country has already done—

What was the necessity, Mr. Speaker, of making that statement if it was not the intention to attempt to undo that legislation?

—but I would say that the greatest welfare that can come to the people is to leave with them their absolute freedom to act according to their own conscience—

We could very easily have done that and not introduced the social legislation that we have introduced. I have some more excerpts from the speech by the hon. member for Peace River. I cannot believe that these statements are intellectually completely honest. I refer again to the article in the Windsor Star of December 6, which reads:

Citing examples of hidden taxes which consumers shoulder, Mr. Low said that 84 per cent of the consumer cost of a quart of lubricating oil is made up of taxes—

Mr. Low: Which is right.

Mr. Byrne: If that is so, then it is made up of royalties going to the royalty-hungry Alberta government.

Mr. Wylie: What about the federal government? Tell us about that?

Mr. Byrne: I shall tell you about the federal government. The federal sales tax on oil amounts to 10 per cent. I do not know the exact figures, but I presume a quart of oil at the manufacturers' level would cost about 25 or 30 cents. Regardless of that fact, the tax is 10 per cent, and the other 74 per cent apparently goes in royalties to the Alberta government.

There is something significant about this, Mr. Speaker, in that in Ottawa gasoline costs 43·5 cents per gallon, including provincial and federal taxes. The federal tax amounts to 3 cents, while the provincial tax is 11 cents. In Kimberley, the largest city in my riding, gasoline sells at 45 to 47 cents per gallon, and that is almost at the wellhead. There is something significant about that fact when you consider that gasoline consumed in Ontario comes from as far south as Texas.

Continuing to quote from the same newspaper article, the hon. member said:

. . . a $4.95 pair of overalls contains taxes to the tune of 75 per cent of the purchase price.

Mr. Low: That is right.

Mr. Byrne: Perhaps it is right. I suggest that some of the taxes have gone to swell the coffers of the Alberta government in the form of various payments by the federal government to the provincial authorities.

Now, as further proof of their highly religious attitude, I should like to draw to the attention of the house an item which appeared in the Victoria Colonist, dated November 29. It is written by staff writer T. A. Myers, who evidently attended the Social Credit convention in Vancouver.

Mr. Wylie: It kind of worries you.

An hon. Member: We are worried about you.

Mr. Wylie: Don't worry about me.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why should anybody?

Mr. Byrne: At this convention it was brought to the attention of the gathering that one of their members was about to die. The British Columbia legislature is going to be the first legislature to have the honour of seating a Speaker who had been shot at by a Liberal. The convention was informed that the life of one Thomas Irwin, M.L.A. for Delta, was in danger. The congregation was called upon to pray for the hon. member's welfare. That, Mr. Speaker, was an extremely honourable thing to do if the member's life was in danger. However, at the same meeting—I do not presume to say at the same moment—health minister Eric Martin arrived on the platform, and had something to say, speaking of Mr. Philpott. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to him earlier. I want to say that I met Mr. Philpott in the Columbia riding and heard him speak; and I know that what he had to say was anything but complimentary to the Social Credit party. In fact, Mr. Speaker, to those who heard him he exposed the fallacy of Social Credit doctrine.

Mr. Blackmore: No; he did not. He could not do it.

Mr. Byrne: The article reads as follows:

Health Minister Eric Martin made no secret Friday of his bitterness over Vancouver Sun columnist Elmore Philpott's opposition to Social Credit in the recent by-elections.

Describing himself as a former gravedigger, Martin said he proposed to raise two headstones to the C.C.F. They would bear the simple inscriptions "Similkameen" and "Columbia".

"Beside these would be two smaller graves," the health minister told the Socred convention. "On one would be Harold Winch. And we would have the decency to put R.I.P. under his name.

"The other grave would be for Elmore Philpott. But we wouldn't put R.I.P. under his name.

"We would put R.I.H.," said Martin with emphasis.

Mr. Coldwell: How Christian!

Mr. Byrne: And I do not believe he meant heaven.

Mr. Wylie: Tell us what happened at the by-elections.

Mr. Byrne: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Martin was condemning Mr. Philpott to eternal hell fire. I believe that is what he meant, perhaps jokingly. However, that is what he said at the same time as, or perhaps a few minutes after, they had prayed for one of their members.

An hon. Member: Squirrel-cage stuff.

Mr. Byrne: What inconsistency! Another columnist of the Vancouver Sun, Mr. Barry Mather, was led to comment a day or so later in "Open Letter", the title of his column, addressed to "Health minister Hon. Eric Martin":

> Well, I see you consigned Elmore Philpott "to H . . . ". How Christian can you Socreds get?

Mr. Wylie: What was in the dashes? You seem to know everything else.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I learned my Christianity and my faith at my mother's knee and the usual places from which such information is disseminated. I do not propose to be converted by a politician in the guise of a prophet. I am sure the Liberal party has no objection whatever to more religion in politics, and that it will gladly accept it. But what I object to is too much politics in religion.

Mr. Wylie: What are you reading from now?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member asks what I am reading from. That has been one of several of his interjections. I am just reminded that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), on rising to speak the other evening, took serious objection to interjections from this side of the house while he was speaking or while Social Credit members were speaking. I took the trouble to investigate with respect to the speech that was made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham); and I found that while he was speaking there were some 30 interjections, 23 of them from the Social Credit party. While the hon. member for Acadia was speaking there were two interjections, and both of them were from the Social Credit party.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Speaker, may I just point out to the hon. member that I did not object to interjections. I merely mentioned the fact that interjections on the part of the British Columbia members displayed an interest in the Social Credit movement. I was not objecting at all.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member indicated that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) were behind the times in their ridings and, if I recall the matter correctly, that they should catch up. Let me tell the hon. member that the organization from which I came into this house was not particularly known for its reactionary tendencies.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention to use my time today for the purpose of replying to the speech made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) last Thursday evening; but inasmuch as the C.C.F. leader has injected himself into this debate at this time—

Mr. Coldwell: Injected himself? I think you interjected with your scurrilous attack.

Mr. Low: I am content to leave that word "injected" stand, Mr. Speaker. As the leader of the C.C.F. has injected himself into the debate at this time, I feel it is necessary for me to say something in connection with what he brought forward today. The case that I have to present in connection with the speech of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys I will reserve for another day or two until the opportunity arrives, but it is coming forward just the same.

The leader of the C.C.F. had taken two weeks to prepare a case, and he read it so fast and so completely without stopping to tell us where his quotations started and where they ended—

Mr. Coldwell: No, Mr. Speaker; I gave every quotation and every reference. If the hon. member cannot be fair, let him try to be truthful.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, no matter what I thought about what the leader of the C.C.F. said while he was speaking, I did him the courtesy of listening to him and of keeping my mouth shut, as did everybody else. In all fairness I ask the leader of the C.C.F. to do the same thing.

Mr. Coldwell: I will do that.

Mr. Low: He has the chance to get back on his feet if he wants to, and say anything he desires to say with respect to what I am going to say. But he has never in his life been courteous enough to do that as I have suggested, and I say it is high time that he learned something about courtesy.

Mr. Cruickshank: He will never learn from you.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, may I just say that the croaking we hear from the direction of Fraser Valley simply indicates how this person is so dissatisfied that he feels like jumping off the lily pad into the pond and drowning himself. I think that is perhaps what he should do.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is high-class stuff.

Mr. Low: We over here listen to that croaking fairly often and it has not much sense to it.

Mr. Knowles: This is old-fashioned righteousness.

Mr. Low: The leader of the C.C.F. has had more than two weeks to prepare his case and, as I said, he read it so rapidly that it was impossible for anybody to tell where his quotations ended and where other quotations began. Therefore, until such time as I have had an opportunity to see the actual record, it is impossible for me to take up and deal with every single thing he said. I think even he would grant that that statement is correct. However, I do want to deal with some of the things I was able to catch as he went along. I will say now, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the C.C.F. has shown himself, in addition to being a master of the smear technique out on the hustings, to be a master of evasion in the house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, are these words "master of smear technique and master of evasion" parliamentary?

Mr. Cruickshank: A new religion.

Mr. Coldwell: A new religion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the question of privilege raised by the leader of the C.C.F. is well taken. I do not think the hon. member for Peace River should accuse any other hon. member of being a master of evasion. I think he should withdraw these words.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Crucify him.

Mr. Low: I certainly want to keep within the rules of order, Mr. Speaker, and I will not use any language at all that is offensive. However, I want to be as strong as I possibly can within the rules, in condemning a practice which I think certainly has no place in our Canadian life.

Mr. Coldwell: Whisky, nylons and silk stockings.

Mr. Low: I will answer the hon. member when I come to that. When any charge is being heard in a court the two important duties which devolve upon the court are: One, to test or to judge the credibility of the witness or witnesses; and two, to weigh the evidence that is presented in relation to the charge or charges that have been made and to reach a decision as to the guilt or innocence of the accused on the basis of those facts. That being the case, then certainly we can proceed to examine for just a moment the credibility of the witnesses heard today.

In the first place, the statements that I complained of on the second day of this session were made when the leader of the C.C.F. party was out in British Columbia fighting an election campaign against the British Columbia government, not against me. I remind hon. members that that was so. He was not fighting me, nor was he fighting my movement. At that time he was fighting the British Columbia government. At least he did not start fighting me until he was challenged by Premier Bennett of British Columbia, and then he adopted the tactic of shifting his charges to me and to Mr. Manning.

In order to give evidence of what I just said I should like to read into the record some of the reports of his meetings to indicate what took place. I bring as witnesses newspapers of British Columbia. I shall quote briefly first from the Vancouver Province report of November 8, 1952, an article headed: "Coldwell Scolds C.C.F.'ers." The article goes on to say:

> C.C.F.'ers who heard their national leader speak at Pender auditorium Friday night will not likely give a second choice vote to Social Credit candidates in future elections.
> M. J. Coldwell branded the new provincial government as one steeped in "racial prejudices" and "dangerous to freedom and social progress".

That was what he had to say on that night as reported by the Province of November 8.

Mr. Coldwell: I said precisely what I said today.

Mr. Low: As I said, I am bringing my witnesses. You have had your chance to bring yours. Two days later the premier of British Columbia took issue with the leader of the C.C.F. party, as reported in the Victoria Times of November 10. An article in that paper had this to say:

> Premier W. A. C. Bennett today hotly demanded that C.C.F. national leader M. J. Coldwell name the cabinet ministers he claims are "steeped in racial prejudice", or apologize publicly to the people of British Columbia.

It goes on to say something further about what Mr. Bennett thought, and near the end of this same article in the Victoria Times we find this:

> After branding the Social Credit government as one steeped in racial prejudice and "dangerous to freedom and social progress," Mr. Coldwell, in his Vancouver address, scolded his party for electing five Social Credit candidates on their second choices.

That is essentially what was contained in the statement of the Vancouver Province of November 8.

Mr. Coldwell: The same reporter.

Mr. Low: No, not the same reporter. One paper was the Victoria Times and the other was the Vancouver Province. My third witness is the Vancouver Sun of Sunday, November 10, which had this to say under the heading "Coldwell Panicking, Declares Bennett."

Coldwell fired his broadside during a meeting in Vancouver Friday night.

Premier Bennett denied flatly that his government is "steeped in racial prejudice."

"This statement is not true," he said.

The Colonist, which is another Victoria paper, on November 11, under an article headed "Bennett Fails To Get Apology", had this to say:

Premier W. A. C. Bennett failed to receive last night the public apology he has demanded from M. J. Coldwell, national C.C.F. leader, for a reported statement that B.C.'s new government was "steeped in racial prejudice."

In fact last night's Courtenay, V.I., speech by Mr. Coldwell, may have given the premier more incentive for demanding apologies.

The C.C.F. Leader told an audience in the Native Sons hall he had no intention of apologizing to Premier Bennett "or anyone else" for anything he might have said on his western speaking tour.

"I did not call the Social Credit party fascists," Mr. Coldwell said, "But I did say the Social Credit party, throughout its history, has dictatorial attributes, shown undemocratic tendencies, and through its leader, has displayed anti-semitism and racial discrimination."

"I can tell you also that Sir Oswald Mosley's group and the British Social Credit party have the same address in London," he said.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Low: "Same address in London." We will go on to the next clipping, which is taken from the Victoria Times of Tuesday, November 12. It had this to say under an article headed "Coldwell Charges Repeated Here."

C.C.F. Leader Refuses Apology to Bennett; Says Socreds Preach "Racial Antagonism".

Speaking to a capacity audience of 600 at the Crystal Garden Tuesday night, C.C.F. leader M. J. Coldwell repeated his refusal to offer any apology to Premier W. A. C. Bennett for his reported remarks that the B.C. government is "steeped in racial prejudice."

Mr. Coldwell said he was misquoted.

"My remarks," he said, "were made not with regard to Premier Bennett's cabinet but to his party." He said that the Social Credit party has preached racial antagonism and racial hatred both in B.C. and elsewhere.

Mr. Coldwell quoted from a copy of a broadcast made by Social Credit leader Solon Low over the C.B.C. in December 1946. Mr. Low, he charged, said: "Do you know that the same group of international gangsters is responsible for the hungry thirties, the financing of Hitler, the promotion of world war II . . . they are international communists, international financiers and international zionism . . . blame it on the Jews".

[Mr. Low.]

That is an absolute distortion of the thing which I did say, as I shall show a little later on. I shall read into the record exactly what I said.

Mr. Coldwell: I gave the reporter the document from which I read. I said: "There it is".

Mr. Fair: Is that type of thing permitted in the house?

Mr. Low: The report of the statement made by the leader of the C.C.F. shows a distortion of what I did say. I shall read into the record later from the speech which I made on December 28, 1946. Under date of November 12 the Vancouver Sun reports:

Coldwell Hit Again By Bennett

The running battle between Premier W. A. C. Bennett and national C.C.F. leader M. J. Coldwell continued today when the premier charged Coldwell was "dodging the issue" by refusing to apologize and evading his own previous statements.

Coldwell was quoted as saying in Vancouver last week that the new provincial government is "steeped in racial prejudices" and "dangerous to social progress".

Premier Bennett called immediately for an apology.

Coldwell speaking subsequently in Courtenay and Victoria flatly refused to make an apology.

Then it goes on to state some of the things that have been stated which I shall not bother the house with right now. Then the article continues:

Evades Issue

"While differing with his political views, I had always looked on Mr. Coldwell as a fair-minded man and I'm at a loss to understand why, when called upon either to explain his statement or apologize, he completely evades the issue and his own previous statement, and instead makes reference to the Social Credit movement elsewhere," he said.

Premier Bennett said he was confident that Premier Manning and other Social Crediters named by Coldwell "are well able to answer for themselves".

"I call again on Mr. Coldwell, before he leaves our province, either to name the members of my cabinet to which he refers or to apologize to the people of British Columbia," said the premier.

There were no apologies whatever. The thing went on for several days. I should like to mention that that is one thing that should be considered when we are facing this whole issue. This is one of the things by which we will have to judge his credibility.

In the second place, he was angry when he said these things. He scolded the C.C.F. in British Columbia for casting some second choice votes for Social Credit, just as if it was not their right to do so. They had the right to vote as they pleased. He was also bad tempered about the whole thing, particularly over the failure of the C.C.F. to win the government. It was only natural that he would vent that bad temper on the people who stood in the way of the final realization of his dream.

There was anger and disappointment at the fact that the people of British Columbia had indicated that they did not want socialism. That is to be understood. The third thing which should be considered in judging the credibility of the witness, and I think this casts serious doubt upon his credibility, is that he and his colleagues have continued as long as I can remember the C.C.F., ever since they came into existence in Canada, to stir up class hatred and to blame private enterprise and capitalists and capitalism for everything that goes wrong. That in itself is one thing that casts doubt upon his credibility. I think impartial judges will be hesitant to attach much credibility to a person who would make the kind of strong and unqualified charges which the leader of the C.C.F. made on such flimsy and distorted evidence.

I say to hon. members of this house that he must think the people of the country are very gullible if he thinks they are ready to accept as proof the far-fetched stuff he had with him on his election journey into British Columbia, or even what he has presented here today.

The question we have to face at the moment is this. What were the charges he made and which I complained of two weeks ago in this house? He said that the British Columbia Social Credit group was steeped in racial prejudice. His second complaint was that Solon Low, the leader of the Social Credit party, had displayed and preached anti-semitism and racial discrimination. Third, that Premier Ernest Manning of Alberta had attacked the worth of the secret ballot. Fourth, that the Social Credit movement itself is steeped in racial prejudice, anti-semitism and racialism of all kinds.

As I said on the day I raised this matter in the house, these are serious charges and should not be taken lightly. If the C.C.F. leader sought to gain sympathy in the house this afternoon by stating that I attacked him, let the house be aware of the fact that an attack came from him in a place where I could not answer it. That is the fact of the matter. I am sure that the people, knowing that, will not extend too much sympathy to the hon. member when he claims he was attacked.

I say further, as I said at the time, that the charges just simply do not make sense in the light of the way in which we Social Crediters have conducted ourselves over the years, in the way we have lived and in the way we have treated people in the process of living. The leader of the C.C.F. can look through the files of Hansard or newpaper reports or anything else and he will not find that on any more than one or two occasions have any more than one or two of our members ever so much as mentioned the name of a Jew, and it was not for the purpose of holding him up to derision in any respect.

An hon. Member: As Jews.

Mr. Low: As Jews, certainly not. We have tried to live in harmony with our fellow men and to deal constantly, as the record will bear out, with the great issues that face the Canadian people and the people of the world generally. Therefore it seems a pity that the leader of the C.C.F. should spend his time in vicious attack or whipping up hysteria with fabricated and false charges rather than trying to show the Canadian people what solutions he has to offer for the terrible problems that face them and for the terrible afflictions under which they now suffer.

The kind of gossip, and that is about all you can call it, in which the leader of the C.C.F. indulges out on the hustings is something that you would scold a child for, particularly if it was indulged in by a public school child. But it becomes contemptible when it is indulged in by what are supposed to be grown-up men.

When we consider the evidence we must ask: What is anti-semitism? I think hon. members of the house ought to give some thought to that question. The leader of the C.C.F. did not define the term at all because what he wants the people of this country to believe is that anti-semitism means simply being against the Jews, holding them up to contempt or ridicule, whipping up a pogrom against them or something of the kind. Actually, anti-semitism means being opposed to any or all of those people who are descendants of Shem. That would include the British people, the United States people, the Jewish people, the Arabs and perhaps others.

An hon. Member: And Canadians.

Mr. Low: Yes, it would include Canadians. Actually anti-semitism as it has come to be applied to things of this world means just exactly that.

An hon. Member: Don't apologize.

Mr. Low: I am not.

An hon. Member: You are apologizing now.

Mr. Low: Will the hon. member for—

An hon. Member: What about Freemasons?

Mr. Low: I do not know anything about Freemasons.

An hon. Member: I do not think you would.

Mr. Low: I have never said anything against them.

An hon. Member: If you knew anything about them you would not even mention them.

Mr. Low: I think what the leader of the C.C.F. and his colleagues have in mind when they charge anti-semitism is that we are attempting, with intent to do harm, to hold up the Jewish race to ridicule or perhaps incite acts of persecution against them. If that is not right then I wish the leader of the C.C.F. would put me right.

Mr. Coldwell: If the hon. member wishes me to do that I would say that I think that the statements made from the records I quoted here speak for themselves.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Speaker, having given the definition of anti-semitism let us proceed. Let us look at one other point. It is one thing to mention a person by name. For instance, I have heard people right in this house mention one of our colleagues who sat to our left some years ago as "Fred Rose, the communist", but it just happened that Fred Rose was a Jew. If someone in the house or outside of it should say, "Well, Fred Rose got what was coming to him. He was a communist. He should have got fourteen years", or something of that kind, I ask the question: On that evidence would you be prepared to condemn the speaker as anti-semitic? Just stop and think about it for a moment. What was the intent? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that is something you have to keep in mind as you look at this whole question. What is the intent?

I say that the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) has not proved one single thing about intent, not one thing, and on that basis I say to you his whole case is null and void. If one is to be proved guilty of anti-semitism in the sense in which I have just defined it—and I think there is no other definition that can be justly used—or of racialism, then in the sense the C.C.F. use the term it must be necessary to prove that the intention is to stir up hatred against a particular race or to incite overt acts of hostility. The flimsy evidence submitted by the C.C.F. leader does not begin to establish anything of that kind whatsoever. I know in my own case that if I have ever mentioned the name of a Jew, a Frenchman, a Scotsman, a Chinese or any other individual the intent certainly was not to stir up hatred against his race, and I reserve the right at any time to mention the name of any man of any race if I feel there is something to be said against or about his actions.

The leader of the C.C.F., because in the house two weeks ago I raised the question of what he had been saying on the hustings, would have just as much reason to call me a religious bigot for attacking someone who belongs, let us say, to the Anglican faith as he would have to claim that we are anti-semitic simply from the fact that some members of our group have mentioned the names of Jews. If childish charges of the kind made by the C.C.F. leader can be established as easily as he thinks they can, then he himself might well be charged with religious bigotry and persecution on the ground of his personal attacks on me. I do not look upon what he has said in that way at all, because I would not stoop to that sort of pre-adolescent behaviour for any political advantage that could come to me.

Mr. Coldwell: Holier than thou.

Mr. Low: The technique used today by the C.C.F. leader, by which he strained to prove guilty me and the Social Credit movement, which I have the honour to lead, was first of all to try to prove guilty some of the people who were formerly associated with us. I wonder what the C.C.F. leader would say if we tried to brand his whole party with being unpatriotic pikers on the sole ground that in 1939 the founder of his movement, Mr. Woodsworth, said these words, as recorded in Hansard of September 8, 1939, page 47:

> We laud the courage of those boys who go to the front; yes, I have boys of my own, and I hope they are not cowards, but if any of those boys, not from cowardice but really through belief, is willing to take his stand on this matter and, if necessary, to face a concentration camp or a firing squad, I shall be more proud of that boy than if he enlisted for the war.

I merely ask the question. I am not going to attack Mr. Woodsworth for one second. I am not going to attack those who follow him here today as being unpatriotic pikers simply because their leader at that time said that sort of thing. But that is exactly the kind of charge the C.C.F. leader makes against us when he quotes Major C. H. Douglas, the founder of the Social Credit movement, and says that because he has said something about Jews therefore it must brand our whole movement as anti-semitic. I think that is childish.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not what I said.

Mr. Low: That is exactly what you said, and I will say something further. I wonder if he would be prepared to accept for his whole party the implications of what Mr. Rodney Young, one of his party members, said in the debate on the North Atlantic treaty in the house on April 29, 1949. I should like to ask him about that. If there was ever a communist speech made in this house that was it. It is to be found at page 2795 of Hansard for April 29, 1949. Is he prepared to accept for his whole group the implications of that speech?

Mr. Coldwell: No, I do not. I used your own speech.

Mr. Low: Certainly not. Therefore you have no right to use similar tactics.

Mr. Coldwell: I used your own speech.

Mr. Low: I will deal with that.

Mr. Coldwell: Your own speech.

Mr. Low: I will deal with that. I will come to my own speech eventually, but let me make my case.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Low: You see, Mr. Speaker, when things begin to hurt these people will not give you a chance.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh yes, we will.

Mr. Low: I also wonder whether the leader of the C.C.F. party and his colleagues in the house are prepared to accept for the whole C.C.F. movement the implications of what was said in Calgary back in 1943 by one Harold Winch, for whom the leader of the C.C.F. was campaigning in British Columbia, when he said the things he did about me and the Social Credit movement in order to try to elect the said Winch as premier of British Columbia. Let me ask him if he is prepared to accept the implications of these interesting words—and I quote from the Calgary Herald of November 11, 1943:

> Use of force is advocated by C.C.F. coast leader. Harold Winch, C.C.F. leader in the British Columbia legislature, made another speech in this city on Tuesday evening, and his remarks on this occasion synchronized with many of his previous utterances. Mr. Winch steps boldly on ground where Mr. J. H. Coldwell—

I think the initials are wrong but that is the way it reads.

> —his national party leader, treads gingerly. The latter is trying to be all things to all men until he gets into power. Mr. Winch blurts the truth out. He declares that force, and lots of it, will be used to apply a socialist regime in this country once his party is elected to power at Ottawa. He likes the word "revolution". It rolls off his tongue with great frequency and it does not mean "evolution".
> In speaking on "The Shape of Things to Come", this third party leader from the coast left no one under a false impression as to his ideas and what he favours. He is not a pussy-footer but a zealot after the pattern of Herr Hitler. It is evident that he has studied how the Fuehrer beat down all opposition on his way to supreme power. Ruthlessness and impatience with opposition stand out in all the Winch utterances.
> Once in power, he told his Calgary audience, the C.C.F. government would get action at any cost, even at the cost of overthrowing free institutions. As for the B.N.A. Act, which embodies the Canadian constitution, he told a questioner that he would scrap it and mould it nearer to the C.C.F. heart's desires. Hitler made similar threats away back in 1933 and later.

This is the part I want to emphasize.

> Mr. Winch declared that if and when his party assumes power at Ottawa it will institute socialism immediately and use the country's police and military forces to enforce its will against all who opposed the law.

Then there is another article concerning the same gentleman in the Calgary Herald of the same date. The heading is, "Time for Revolt says C.C.F. Leader." The article reads as follows:

> Harold Winch tells audience here change is coming in Canada "peacefully or not"
> Politically and economically, a change is coming in Canada and it is coming "peacefully or not". Harold Winch, C.C.F. member of the British Columbia legislature for Vancouver, barked out this threat last night in answer to a question asked by a member of his audience in Memorial Hall where he made a speech on "the shape of things to come".

Now, I just ask you, Mr. Speaker, will the C.C.F. allow us or anyone else, without very serious complaint and without fighting back, to brand their whole movement as fascist or communist simply because a member, an unthinking and runaway member of their group, made a statement like that back in 1943?

Mr. Coldwell: In your own speeches.

An hon. Member: It is a long time.

Mr. Low: I would like to know if the C.C.F. are prepared to accept this for their whole party:

> People shout at us that this is socialism, bolshevism. Maybe it is. What of it?

That is a statement made by their own founder and leader as reported in the Border Cities Star on December 12, 1932. Are they prepared now to accept the implications of that for the whole party?

Well, I think perhaps it might be wise to bring them down just a little closer to the present time. I heard an interesting speech in this house yesterday, I think, by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) and I am going to ask the C.C.F. leader if his group is prepared to accept the implications of what the hon. member said when he referred to corporation and business taxation. Does that reflect the policy of the C.C.F.?

Mr. Coldwell: You have asked the question and I will answer it. Certainly it does not reflect the views of our party.

Mr. Low: All right.

Mr. Coldwell: I say no at this time.

Mr. Low: Ninety-nine and nine-tenths per cent of what the leader of the C.C.F. had to say was based on evidence of that kind.

Mr. Coldwell: No, it was not.

Mr. Low: It was. I know that the leader of the C.C.F. would not allow me to place those implications on his party without protest. I know that he would brand us as distortionists if we tried to make that type of accusation on evidence which I say is just as flimsy and no more relevant than when they try to brand me and the whole movement as anti-semitic because he finds that someone at some time associated with us said something about a Jew. That, of course, is utterly childish, and it is beyond belief that a grown man would allow himself to be activated by such a thing.

There were one or two other things, Mr. Speaker, which the hon. gentleman said to which I would like to refer. I cannot reply to all of them because sufficient time is not mine at the moment; but I will have time, as this is only a beginning. I will take time and, if the house wants some entertainment, we will have it. Before calling it six o'clock, I would say this. The leader of the C.C.F. referred to a broadcast which I made on December 18, 1946, and that is the only evidence he had upon which to accuse me of being anti-semitic.

Mr. Coldwell: And your speeches in the house.

Mr. Low: This was a radio broadcast given over the C.B.C. network on the evening of December 18, 1946, and is what I had to say in summing up the whole situation that obtained in Canada at the time of the espionage trials and the revelations that were made in this house regarding espionage. I quoted a number of very interesting things that had been going on, saying that it placed Canada and the commonwealth, including Great Britain, in grave danger. I am not going to take just a little piece out of the context, as the leader of the C.C.F. is so fond of doing and trying to make it appear something that it is not, so I will read you the context of what I said at the end:

> Now, fellow Canadians, how could such a state of affairs have developed in Canada unless men in high places were favourable to this treason-mongering? Why is it that the publications of the commission's findings have been practically ignored?
> Why is it that Zaroubin, the Soviet ambassador, who by his conduct violated the recognized code of diplomatic relations, was withdrawn from Canada, promoted and appointed as ambassador to Great Britain by his Soviet masters; and—this is the incredible part of it—accepted by the British government without any protest being voiced by the Canadian government? Does that not indicate to you that there are very powerful forces at work?

[Mr. Low.]

I suppose my hon. friend will try to make it appear, when I mentioned Zaroubin, that I thought he was a Jew.

> Do you know that the same group of international gangsters who are today scheming for world revolution are the same people who promoted the world war? Do you know that these same men promoted and financed the Russian revolution? Are you aware that these arch-criminals were responsible for the economic chaos and suffering of the hungry thirties, for financing Hitler to power, for promoting world war II with its tragic carnage? Do you know that there is a close tie-up between international communism, international finance, and international political zionism?

There ends the quotation, Mr. Speaker, and there is not one word about Jews.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Speaker, how long has it been since the people of Canada cannot discuss a policy without having minds try to distort it into meaning that they are whipping up hatred against a race?

International communism is a policy, a movement; international finance is a policy, a movement; international political zionism is a policy, a movement; and I was opposed to all three at that time. I linked them together because there was plenty of evidence—and I have that evidence and can produce it at the proper time—

Mr. Coldwell: The time is now.

Mr. Low: These three great movements had deliberately plotted to destroy Britain's attempts to exercise the mandate in Israel as she was supposed to. They had made it impossible for her to go on, and were determined to destroy Britain's strength and to achieve their aims by revolutionary methods, by what I believed and still believe to be methods which would place this world in jeopardy of war. That is why I denounced them. I did not have any intention whatever of branding Jews.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will grant me this one privilege. Surely it is evident to anybody who has done any studying or thinking at all that when a person mentions international political zionism it includes far more adherents than Jews. International political zionism has adherents and has had adherents all over the world—many of them Scotsmen, many of them Englishmen, many of them Americans—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: Certainly, and I can name some of them right in this country.

Some hon. Members: Name them.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow this up and complete my case at another time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when one intervenes for the second time in a debate I feel that perhaps a word of explanation or even apology is necessary. My apology is that I wish to refer to an incident which, though it concerns one individual primarily, I think concerns us all because I firmly believe it is a matter where gross injustice has been done through political interference. I refer to the case of Robert Pitt of the Fort Garry hotel, Winnipeg. I shall try now to satisfy the house that what I have said is true, and that no reasonable man can come to any other conclusion on an examination of the facts.

Mr. Pitt himself has kept silent; therefore I am confined entirely to and I rely entirely on what has appeared in the press. I believe everything I shall quote from the press is from the Winnipeg Tribune. I believe there are a lot of people in this house who are in a position to say—though the Tribune does not need any endorsement of this kind—of their own knowledge that what the Tribune says is true.

On September 10 last the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and a party visited the Fort Garry hotel. Approximately two months later the manager of the hotel, an old and valued servant of the Canadian National hotel system, was sent from the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg to the Prince Edward hotel in Brandon. Now, it is interesting that the report which appeared in the Tribune was brought to that newspaper through the instrumentality of the hotel workers. The phrase used by the Tribune is that a spokesman for the Fort Garry hotel employees gave them the information which they set out. I think that has special significance. I shall have other things to say to indicate the quality of Mr. Pitt, but I think it is of some significance that the men who had worked under him—incidentally it is pointed out that he had substantially reduced the staff of the hotel, so it looks as if he had perhaps not always done things that the union wanted him to do—give this account which is produced by the Tribune.

I should add that this was not a formal statement on behalf of the union. Lest I forget later, I might read here what the union said on that point. Officials of the union denied that their organization charged that there was political interference in Mr. Pitt's demotion. This is what they say:

> Although staff members intended protesting the C.N.R. decision, even though it is a managerial problem, they now feel the airing of the situation in the Tribune makes this move unnecessary.

I read from a report in the Tribune, which is dated November 13:

> But hotel employees today listed two specific incidents for which they allege Mr. Pitt was called on the carpet.

The first is "that the Prime Minister and his party were not properly received at the hotel rotunda". This newspaper explains the scene exactly as it happened, and I think it is very easy for us to picture that. I quote again from the newspaper:

> At the time the party entered the hotel, Mr. St. Laurent was surrounded by a group of young Liberals who had met him at the C.N.R. station at 11 a.m. They headed directly for the elevator through the crowded lobby, making it difficult for Mr. Pitt, who was standing in the lobby, to approach and welcome the Prime Minister.

Now then, the second complaint is "that there were no rooms immediately available for all the members of the party". Reservations had been requested the previous day.

I do not know which of these two complaints is the most trivial and childish. I think we can picture the scene; the Prime Minister entering the hotel and being surrounded by his supporters, of which he has no doubt a considerable number in Winnipeg. They surrounded him and were with him until he took the elevator to go to his quarters.

The only possible way one could imagine any failure on Mr. Pitt's part, the only thing I can suggest is in itself a nonsensical thing. The complaint apparently might be that Mr. Pitt did not force his way through the group in order to present himself to the Prime Minister; a sort of bucking the line technique.

The second complaint is perhaps of a slightly stronger character. It was that there were no rooms immediately available for all members of the party. Here perhaps we find something which we can understand better. Here we may find some very important personages, at least in their own minds, who take themselves very seriously and who may have fancied that they had not been treated with all the deference to which they considered themselves entitled. The report makes it clear that the reservations had been requested only the day before. In a busy hotel like this, we all know you cannot always count on getting your reservations on such short notice. I can only imagine some of these people, as I say, were aggrieved. It is stated, as I shall point out later, that the complaints which these people made did not come from the Prime Minister. I should think this sort of thing would interest him less than most people, but the complaints came from people on his staff.

Shakespeare has words for it:

> But man, proud man,
> Drest in a little brief authority,
> Most ignorant of what he's most assured, . . .
> Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
> As make the angels weep.

There you have this picture in Winnipeg on September 10. Two months later comes the word to Mr. Pitt that he is to go to the Prince Edward hotel in Brandon.

I now want to draw your attention for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to this man's career in the hotel business, in the employment of the Canadian National hotels. He was the manager of the Nova Scotian at Halifax from December 8, 1931 to November 1, 1941, practically ten years. I am reading now from the answer I received from the Department of Transport. Then he went into the army and was in the army for several years, in the armoured corps—losing his eye, incidentally, during the war—but came back, was able to resume his duties and was manager of the Bessborough at Saskatoon from August 15, 1946 to July 12, 1951 when he was transferred to the Fort Garry. Does anyone imagine that a man who had served for that length of time in that capacity would not know how to treat a Prime Minister or would not know how to treat appropriately the other people who were with the Prime Minister? Of all the requirements that a hotel manager must meet, I suggest that probably that the proper treatment of his guests stands out above all the rest.

Are we to assume that this man, with this experience, who is taken back after his army service and who goes from one large hotel to another; are we to believe for one moment that these childish suggestions could apply to him? I cannot believe that. I do not think anyone in this house can believe it. Nevertheless according to this record which, as I say, came from the labour people, he was demoted for that reason. I regret to say that the president of the Canadian National Railways gave a different reason. I regret that Mr. Gordon, for whom I have immense respect, gave this reason because I cannot accept it and I do not believe anyone in this house can accept it. What he says is this:

> Changes in management affecting several hotels follow normal reviews of hotel operations that are carried out by the general manager of hotels.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

In other words we are apparently asked to believe that this man who had been manager of the Nova Scotian hotel, with 150 rooms, for 10 years—

Mr. Howe: He was never manager of the Nova Scotian hotel.*

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am reading now from the answer I received from the Department of Transport, which one likes to assume is correct.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Or partially correct, anyway.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I read:

> He was manager of the Nova Scotian at Halifax from December 8, 1931 to November 1, 1941.

If that is wrong I wish the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) would tell the Department of Transport that it is wrong.

Mr. Howe: I will speak about this matter a little bit later.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All right. He was manager of the Nova Scotian, according to the Department of Transport, for 10 years, leaving it to go into the army. He then went to the Bessborough hotel, a hotel with 260 rooms; and according to the Department of Transport—which apparently may be wrong—he was appointed on August 15, 1946, and there is nothing to indicate that there was any gap there. From this I assume that, when he went, on July 12, 1951, to the Fort Garry, he went from the Bessborough.

An hon. Member: How many rooms has the Bessborough?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The Bessborough has 260 rooms; and he is now sent from a hotel with 260 rooms to a hotel with 80 rooms. Yet we are asked to believe that this is normal procedure. If it is normal procedure, all I can suggest is that the Canadian National Railways business is carried on in an abnormal way, something which I do not believe. It is no wonder that the Winnipeg Tribune reports as follows:

> Of those contacted by the Tribune today—

That was November 14.

> —none accepted C.N.R. president Donald Gordon's explanation of Mr. Pitt's transfer to a lesser post, which was announced on Wednesday.

I do not wonder that nobody accepted it, because no reasonable men would accept it.

I wish now to refer briefly to the answers I received from the Department of Transport to the questions which I asked. The first one to which I wish to refer is this. I am not reading all the answers because some of them are just references to the facts of his service with the railway company. However, I asked this question:

Had there been any complaint regarding his work there?

That was at the Fort Garry hotel. The answer is "Yes". I believe that is an unworthy answer, because there is a great deal of evidence—and I shall read some of it in a moment—to show that he was a highly efficient man. The fact that he held these various appointments showed that during all those years the railway certainly thought that he was efficient. I believe this answer is either inaccurate or that it refers to some very trivial matter. Of course it is conceivable that it refers to the complaint to which I am taking objection. It is conceivable that it refers to this complaint which was made following September 10. But on that matter I think we are certainly entitled to know more. I do not believe any complaint worthy of the name was made with regard to him. As I say, the evidence of his record in the hotels is all against it.

The second question I asked was whether his salary had been reduced when he was sent to a smaller hotel, and the answer was no. I also asked what had been the salary of the previous manager and that information was refused. That is an interesting question because if, in fact, the Canadian National Railways business is carried on in such a way that the manager of a rather small hotel with 80 rooms gets the same salary as does the manager of one of the company's largest hotels in a western metropolis, with about three times as many rooms, then all I can say is that it is a curious way to carry on business; and I shall be greatly surprised if that is indeed the way business is carried on. I should be interested to know the answer—for I did not get an answer to this question as to what the previous manager's salary was—and whether it would not have shown that it was lower.

That thought raises in my mind this question, and it must raise it in the mind of every man in the house. If it is a fact—which I surmise, from just looking at the situation—that he was sent to a smaller hotel with the same salary which he would not ordinarily have got, then it looks to me as though there may have been a twinge of conscience and that after treating him in this disgraceful manner, in order to alleviate the matter a bit he was left on the same salary. That is surmised; nevertheless I think any reasonable man would make that surmise on the facts as I have brought them forward.

The other question I asked and that I wish to refer to was this:

Was any complaint, verbal or written, regarding any incident at the Fort Garry hotel during the Prime Minister's visit on September 10 last, made to the railway or hotel management or to the Department of Transport, or to any representative of any of the foregoing by or on behalf of the Prime Minister or of any one of those who were accompanying him at Winnipeg on September 10 last?

The answer to that question appeared in rather a curious form. When I first received it, I took from it a meaning that, on further study, I think perhaps was not intended. I have read the question to you. It was not split up in any way. It was one question, just numbered "3". The answer goes like this:

3. No.

Then below that is written:

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

And below that again is written:

3. No.

When I got that first I thought what it meant was that the Department of Transport was answering only for itself, and it was giving no answer as regards the railway company. But it has been suggested to me—and I think it accords with what Mr. Gordon himself has said, and I shall refer to that later—that that first "no" was intended to be a general "no" affecting my whole question. At any rate the matter is not of very great importance because Mr. Gordon has given a separate answer in which he says:

No complaint has been made either by the Prime Minister or on his behalf in respect to his recent visit at the Fort Garry.

These are Mr. Gordon's own words. If this matter is to be left here I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it leaves us all in a very unfortunate position. I believe that these answers have been given without a full knowledge of the facts. I do not believe it is possible to survey what has happened and to believe that what happened on November 12 or thereabouts had nothing to do with what happened on September 10, and I hope no one will try to say that was the case.

Some ingenious person makes a point regarding Mr. Gordon's statement which I have just read, and here I quote again from the Tribune. After saying that the hotel staff members emphasized that the complaints were not laid by Mr. St. Laurent, but by one or more members of his party, it goes on to say:

Gordon did not mention complaints by other members of the Prime Minister's party, which were reported by Tribune local and Ottawa sources.

In other words, the suggestion is that Mr. Gordon's denial covered only the Prime Minister, but made no denial in so far as the members of the party were concerned. I will read it again:

> No complaint has been made either by the Prime Minister or on his behalf in respect to his recent visit at the Fort Garry.

I think this was intended to cover the members of the party. Where does that leave us, Mr. Speaker? I suggest that no sane man will doubt that these two incidents were connected. To assume the opposite is to assume that the management of the Canadian National hotels are taking leave of their senses. It is to assume that an unworthy man, a man who did not know how to greet the Prime Minister, a man who did not know how to show proper consideration for the people who were travelling with the Prime Minister, was kept in the service of the company all these years and promoted from time to time.

I want to point out that the suggestion that he was in any way inefficient is contradicted in the strongest manner by the guests in the hotel themselves. I read again from the Tribune:

> Permanent guests contacted today said they had no complaints about service which would reflect on Mr. Pitt's management.
> All praised him as a valuable asset to the hotel. Said one guest: "I have been here 12 years. I have never met a finer man. He is the essence of refinement and does his best for everyone, always. We feel very badly about the situation."

As I say, to assume that these two events are not connected is just to assume that we are living in a world of unreason where two and two do not make four. It is no wonder that the Tribune asks the following question in an editorial on November 13:

> The Tribune's report of the dismissal of Robert S. Pitt from his position as manager of the Fort Garry hotel, and his subsequent transfer to Brandon, is chiefly important because of the one big question it raises in the public mind: Is there political interference in the management of the C.N.R. or its hotel system on the part of government functionaries close to the Prime Minister?

Then later:

> Was Mr. Pitt given any kind of a fair trial? Were the complaints against him and his hotel investigated? There is no evidence that we have been able to uncover that the answer is in the affirmative to either of these questions. Rather, the answer seems to be that the hotel manager was removed from his job without proper investigation because someone in the government or close to the government had thundered. It will be a bad state of affairs for the Canadian National Railways if it is saddled with government interference in management.

I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, how this kind of thing can happen. We are not that kind of people. In this house we differ on many things, but I would say that this house has a sense of fairness, and I believe that if all members were free to express their opinion they would agree with me that this is an obvious case of outrageous injustice. It is not possible to reach any other conclusion but that directly or indirectly there was pressure. That is what the Tribune says, and that is what I believe. We are not that kind of people. How does this kind of thing arise? I think it is clear that is arises when people have too much power for too long. They just begin to take themselves too seriously; they begin to throw their weight around. This is a lamentable situation, a distortion of the ordinary sense of fairness of the ordinary Canadian, just because he has got to the state where he is, I believe, throwing his weight about and taking himself too seriously.

This whole matter is far bigger than the Fort Garry hotel and Mr. Pitt. It raises the whole question not only of the Canadian National but of the use of power. I hope there will be such widespread indignation arise out of this that it will not be able to be hushed up, that it will be dealt with and that justice will be done. I hope the Legion will come to the rescue of this excellent officer. I hope the union, which has already earned our gratitude by bringing this matter out into the public, will press it; and I hope every fair-minded man will press it to the point that reparation is made, and made now, not months from now, when it is slithered into and nobody is looking, and there is no real reparation of the injustice because the man is still left under a cloud.

And finally, I put it up to the Prime Minister who was there. He, I believe, would have no patience with this kind of thing. I put it up to the Prime Minister that here is a case of injustice that should be remedied, not at some time remote from now, but now; and not in any hole in the corner fashion but in the open, so that everybody knows what has been done.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I had not intended to take part in this debate. I do so only because of the speech that has just been made, and for an important reason. For a great many years—for many more years than I have been in the House of Commons—it has been the accepted principle in this chamber that there shall be no interference with the internal management of the Canadian National Railways. I think anyone who has been here as long as I have will say that never in his experience in this House of Commons has there been such a speech made about a man not a public servant but a servant of the Canadian National Railways. However, that has been done by the last speaker, and my hon. friend must take the responsibility.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will take it.

Mr. Howe: Let us see what facts he bases it on. He does not know anything about the case—he admits that—except what he reads in the press.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do know it.

Mr. Howe: What is your authority?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I said deliberately that I was not repeating conversations; that I was confining myself to what was in the press. I am quite content to rest on what is in the press and leave it there.

Mr. Howe: All he knows is what he reads in the paper. That is a well-known background.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You do not even know what is in the papers.

Mr. Howe: I must correct what I said in the heat of the moment. I had forgotten that Mr. Pitt was the manager of the Nova Scotian hotel. I had forgotten that; I would like to correct my interjection immediately.

I do not know anything about Mr. Pitt's ability. I have been in hotels that he has managed; I have never met him at the Fort Garry, and I had not expected to meet him, except by chance. I have been there two or three times since he was manager there. The Prime Minister said exactly what I am saying. When this first became a public issue he said: "I did not meet Mr. Pitt. I did not expect to meet, and did not meet him."

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is not the Prime Minister.

Mr. Howe: The Prime Minister was not with the party that arrived the day before. I understand there was some unpleasantness associated with the group that arrived earlier.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why do you believe it if you don't know it?

Mr. Howe: I was told—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why do you believe it?

Mr. Howe: You made your speech, and a very bad speech indeed.

An hon. Member: It was not as bad as yours.

An hon. Member: It was a lot better speech than the one we are listening to.

Mr. Howe: The question that was asked here was answered by the Department of Transport to the extent that these questions are always answered, on the basis of the information available in the Department of Transport.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister contradict anything that was in the Tribune?

Mr. Howe: I have not tried to contradict a newspaper. The answer was given as the information in the department would permit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You answer what I said.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend does not need to get hysterical. He has committed a very bad blunder and he had just better let it go at that and let me make my few brief remarks. If we accept the principle that has been laid down here tonight—this is the reason I am challenging his position—the movement of any superintendent from one place to another can be debated in this house, and the movement of any hotel manager either up or down can be debated in this house. If anyone thinks the Canadian National Railways can be operated on that principle, I am not one of them. Having said that, that is the only point I wish to make.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Not a very good one.

Mr. Howe: I know nothing for or against Mr. Pitt, but I can say that I know enough about the management of every large corporation to know that the remarks made by my hon. friend are not going to help Mr. Pitt very much in the service in which he is employed, which is not the service of the Canadian government.

An hon. Member: We expected that from you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that a threat?

Mr. Howe: I have no part in or authority over the management of the Canadian National.

An hon. Member: That is the big stick.

An hon. Member: We thought you would do it.

Mr. Howe: Even the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) has intelligence enough to know the fact about which I have commented.

An hon. Member: That is going some. Thank you very much.

Mr. Howe: That is the highest compliment I could ever pay him; he has just about that intelligence. The point I am making is that we have had tonight a deliberate attempt to interfere with the internal management of the Canadian National Railways under the guise of doing some good to someone. My hon. friend admits that he knows nothing except what he has read in the papers. I am willing to accept his statement in that behalf, that he is talking about something of which he has no firsthand knowledge and of which I have no firsthand knowledge. Any insinuation that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or anyone on his behalf made any representations for or against Mr. Pitt I deny on the authority of the Prime Minister, who told me that that is the fact.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, in entering the debate at this time it is not with any intention of making a detailed report on the defence production program. It is both more convenient and more proper that such details be made available to hon. members through the report of the Department of Defence Production for the current fiscal year, through the special committee on defence expenditures, or when the estimates of the department are being considered by the house. On the other hand, it is approximately six months since the right hon. Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) spoke last in this house regarding this program and there have been significant developments since that time. These have occurred both in the field of raw materials and in our actual production and procurement programs.

Most hon. members will be aware that in recent months there has been a distinct improvement in the world supply of raw materials. Evidence of this is the fact that in the last six months the international materials conference has felt that the situation permitted them to disband the committees on pulp and paper, on wool, on cotton and on cotton linters. Furthermore they have decided that it will no longer be necessary to recommend the allocation of cobalt, tungsten and zinc.

Here in Canada we have continued our policy of releasing controls just as quickly as possible. On May 26 control orders on lead, zinc and cadmium were lifted. On September 9 the minister announced the sale of the Emerald tungsten mine to Canadian Explorations Limited. During the past year explorations by this company on its own mining claims established substantial additional quantities of tungsten ore, with the result that the Canadian position has eased.

On September 17 the minister also announced that control orders covering copper wire and rods, rod copper and copper alloys and aluminum had been lifted, making it no longer necessary for industry to submit their orders to the department for approval.

Order in council P. C. 4212, dated October 9, 1952, removed pulpwood and newsprint from the list of materials declared essential under the Defence Production Act. Those commodities had been declared essential, not for domestic reasons but in order to permit the government to implement allocations recommended by the international materials conference. When the pulp and paper committee of the international materials conference indicated that the necessity of allocating pulp and paper for strategic purposes no longer existed, the government removed those commodities from the essential list.

By order in council P. C. 4551, dated November 28, most of the chemicals which had been declared essential under the Defence Production Act were removed from that category. This again was initiated because increased production had brought the supply of these materials into balance with demand.

On November 17 the control order on sulphur was revoked. This has been made possible in part by the fact that in recent months the supply of sulphur in the United States has been slightly greater than demand, thus enabling authorities in that country to revoke their control order, and also due to the fact that sulphur-producing facilities recently established in Canada were getting into production.

These decontrol orders have, of course, been announced by the minister as quickly as decisions have been taken. However, I have reviewed them this evening in order to emphasize that the government is in fact implementing its avowed policy to keep the control machinery of this country to the absolute minimum consistent with the requirements of our defence effort. On the other hand, as the world's foremost exporter of many of these materials, we have a serious responsibility to our allies to make the greatest possible contribution to their essential requirements. Consequently we must keep the supply of these strategic materials under constant review, and this will be done.

We shall continue also to encourage increased Canadian production. All that need be said in this connection is that expansion programs undertaken by our major primary producers are progressing satisfactorily.

One of the essential materials over which we have had to exercise control has been steel, but there are now indications of improvement in the steel supply. Our Canadian industry has been producing steadily at high levels, and steel production in the United States has recovered quickly from last summer's work stoppage.

Last month a new steel finishing mill came into production at Sault Ste. Marie which will give us an additional 250,000 tons of rolled steel products annually. In addition new facilities came into production this week at Hamilton which will add 650,000 tons of steel ingots a year to our present production. However, in spite of this increase in Canadian production the demand for steel is growing steadily, so we expect to maintain our level of imports from the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries.

It has been the policy during the past two years to control production and distribution of steel in order to make sure that direct defence needs were met first, but always with minimum disruption of normal commercial practices. With the prospect of improved supplies in 1953 the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) now feels justified in revoking, effective December 31 of this year, order SD-2 which prohibits less essential construction. Inventory limitations contained in order SD-1 will also be rescinded effective on the same date.

However, it will still be necessary to exercise control over steel distribution in order to ensure that defence requirements are met. Although we can look forward to continued improvement in general steel supplies during the coming months, it must be emphasized that some specific forms and types of steel probably will be in relatively short supply for some time to come, particularly steel plate and structural steel. Therefore the easing of steel restrictions in accordance with these announcements does not mean that ample supplies will be available immediately for all uses.

May I now turn to the production side of our defence program. As you know, Mr. Speaker, in this period of uncertainty our aim has been threefold; first, to produce the equipment needed to meet our international commitments and to defend our own country; second, to provide the productive facilities required to enable this country to swing into full-scale production should the need arise; and third, to build a strong economy that can supply the raw materials, the plant and equipment needed to sustain the Canadian economy in the event of an all-out war.

In addressing the house last spring the minister pointed out that, in the production of military equipment, the first year of the defence program was a period of preparation and organization, and that in the second year we would see actual deliveries and completed facilities. Although there are still another four months to go in this fiscal year, production has definitely started to roll in all phases of the program. In some parts of the program most of the deliveries have been made. In others volume production is just getting under way. Where items are procured from regular commercial production it is comparatively easy to fill the requirements of the Department of National Defence. Where complicated military weapons of new design are produced, the story naturally is different.

A critical examination of the defence production program indicates that neither government nor industry fully appreciated the complexity of the job of producing to the exacting requirements of modern warfare, requirements which are not less difficult as specifications are constantly varied to take advantage of the newest technological advances. It is now necessary to guard against obsolescence even before production is under way. Canada has no monopoly on these problems. We know that they are showing up in the United States and the United Kingdom. They are no doubt harassing other countries including, we hope, the U.S.S.R.

Part of the problem is that we are working in entirely new fields and often with new materials. The use of jet propulsion in aircraft is something we had never tackled before. Here we have to produce an engine weighing over a ton that is capable of 8,000 revolutions per minute. In shipbuilding more aluminum is being used in place of wood and steel, and this requires the development of new skills and techniques. High stress factors in modern aircraft have necessitated the use of forged components in place of fabricated parts. High tensile castings introduce new and exacting metallurgical requirements. On the precision side we find that whereas during the last war we spoke of tolerances of a thousandth of an inch, today we talk of a ten-thousandth of an inch.

Despite these problems we are making good progress. We have already delivered intricate equipment in some volume to the three armed services. Before the end of this fiscal year there will be a sharp rise in deliveries. It is important to note that much of this production will be flowing from Canadian facilities that did not exist eighteen months ago. All hon. members are aware of the tremendous strides made by Canadian industry during the last war and of the capital expansion that has taken place since that time. This broadening and diversification of our industrial base was invaluable when we started the present defence program. However, because of recent developments in modern armament design, and because we wanted to make more parts and components in this country, we found that we needed new facilities and new skills to carry out this job. In some cases industry has been able to do this without government assistance. In other cases accelerated depreciation has been granted to take care of some of the risk involved, or we have stepped in and supplied, on the basis of government ownership, the plant or machine tools required.

The establishment of these facilities is a major part of our defence production program. There has been careful examination of the fields in which, for economic or strategic reasons, production in Canada was warranted, and we have then taken steps to ensure that facilities were established not only to meet current requirements but also to take care of accelerated production in an all-out effort.

This evening I want to mention some of these new facilities that are actually in production. The major part of this development has been in the aircraft industry. Two years ago the government purchased a site at Malton and entered into a contract with A. V. Roe for the design and construction of a crown-owned jet engine plant. This plant has now been built. The tools and equipment were obtained partly from the original A. V. Roe plant where the first Orendas were made, but mainly from a variety of sources in stiff competition with aircraft manufacturers of other countries. Much of the equipment had to be specially designed to meet new manufacturing techniques. Not only will this plant meet our immediate requirements, but it is capable of making a valuable contribution to meet expanded production needs. Orenda engines in substantial numbers are now coming off the production line, not only to power the CF-100 but also for the F-86 Sabre, which will greatly improve the performance of that aircraft.

We are now making more of the parts and components for airframes and aero engines than at any time in our history. We have set up a plant that is producing fuel systems for the Orenda, while another is making combustion chambers. We now have plants that are manufacturing blades for jet engines. These blades, which are like small wings, must be forged, machined and finally ground to a tolerance of two-thousandths of an inch. A new Canadian plant is now producing, from a special heat-resisting alloy, castings and rings to be used in the hot end of a jet engine where temperatures reach 1,300 degrees fahrenheit. There were some people who thought we would be unable to produce in Canada the magnesium casting needed for the jet program. These castings are now being turned out in quantity.

The high speeds attainable in jet aircraft have increased the stresses on the airframe and this, together with greater military loads, has increased the weight. To get the highest possible efficiency we have had to go to great lengths to produce refined structures. In the F-86 Sabre the main wing skin is formed from a sheet three-eighths of an inch thick, and we now have equipment in Canada which can machine this sheet in such a way that it tapers in thickness from five-sixteenths to one-sixteenth of an inch over the fifteen feet of its length. This operation is controlled to within three-thousandths of an inch.

We now have other plants that are producing undercarriage components, gear boxes, radomes, propellers, flexible hose assemblies, and filters. All this adds up to a much greater degree of self-sufficiency in our Canadian aircraft industry.

In the shipbuilding field, facilities have been set up to produce gears and naval auxiliary equipment. A new naval turbine plant, as modern as any of its type in the world, is now making complete sets of propulsion machinery for our escort vessels.

In guns and ammunition, most of the developments have been within the various divisions of Canadian Arsenals Limited. As most hon. members know, most of these divisions were kept in a stand-by condition after the second world war. In reactivating these plants we rehabilitated some of the machinery in storage and augmented this with new machine tools where necessary.

Our capacity to produce explosives has been steadily expanding. The de Salaberry plant at Valleyfield has been completely rehabilitated and put into operation by Defence Industries (1951) Limited, a subsidiary of Canadian Industries Limited. About two months ago, as was announced by the minister, Canadian Arsenals took over that plant as a producing unit.

These are some of the new facilities that have been created in the last two years. In some instances it has meant breaking sod and building and equipping new plants. In other cases it has meant the installation of additional machine tools in plants already in production. Since the department was set up in April, 1951, the department has ordered some 4,000 machine tools valued at approximately $35 million. Despite the long lead time on deliveries, over 2,700 of these machines had been installed in Canadian plants by October of this year. This was in addition to the rehabilitated crown-owned tools held in storage since the last war and now allocated to defence industries.

These facilities, now in production, are not only the basis of our preparedness effort but they also form the nucleus of an all-out effort if war is forced upon us. Of equal importance, those facilities will, if international conditions permit, make an important contribution to our over-all economy.

I have been speaking of two aspects of the defence program—the production of weapons and equipment to meet our current needs and the building up of facilities as insurance against an all-out emergency. To keep the over-all program in perspective, I would like to deal briefly with a third part of the program which I mentioned earlier—the importance of a strong economy and a broad industrial base as a defence against possible aggression in the future.

In the last few years we have achieved record levels of production, income and employment. What is particularly significant from a defence standpoint is the economic expansion that has taken place in those segments of the Canadian economy that would bear the brunt of full mobilization. Over-all capital investment has been maintained at a very high rate in very recent years but, since Korea, there has been a definite change in its composition. To meet the demands of defence, we have seen a marked increase in the expansion of basic industrial capacity and a corresponding shift away from investment in consumer goods and services. This means that we are now able to manufacture more iron and steel products; to make more electrical apparatus; and to produce a wider variety of chemical products than we ever could before. We have, at the same time, been building up our power potential and expanding along other lines that would provide the necessary base for large-scale military production.

In the field of international co-operation there has been continued progress in strengthening the defences of the free world. In our relationship with the United States a number of steps have been taken to enable our two countries to co-operate more fully in our joint defence effort. Last February we signed an agreement which simplifies and co-ordinates procedures on defence contracts, and provides a more satisfactory basis on which our two governments can do business. Another agreement on security makes it possible for Canada and the United States to exchange information pertaining to defence production with a minimum of delay and red tape.

The most effective use of the resources of both Canada and the United States is essential to the success of the defence effort. Several months ago, when Canadian orders in the United States were about twice as high as those placed in this country, the minister pointed out that there would be an increase in United States orders and a levelling off in Canadian purchases. This is now taking place. There has been a very marked increase in United States contracts placed in this country. In the 1951-52 United States fiscal year, they totalled more than $325 million. During the same period, Canadian orders amounted to about $279 million. As our own facilities have come into production it has been possible to ease up on the heavy initial purchases that had to be made in the United States to get our defence program under way.

On the other hand, our defence purchases in the United Kingdom are increasing. In the fiscal year 1950-51, Canadian government defence orders placed in the United Kingdom amounted to $8 million. In the fiscal year 1951-52 they were about $38 million. In the first seven months of this fiscal year, orders placed are worth about $55 million.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prolong this statement. Summarizing briefly, the strategic materials situation is improving and we are taking advantage of this circumstance to relax controls as quickly as the requirements of the defence effort permit. Significant quantities of complicated equipment are now being made available to the armed services, and deliveries will increase sharply before the end of the fiscal year. An impressive framework of new facilities has been established in the last two years and forms the real basis of our defence effort. Finally, the Canadian economy is being maintained at a record level, providing us not only with a strong bulwark against communism but also providing our fellow Canadians with the highest standard of living in our history.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, when speaking in this house on November 24 last the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said he did not believe that the people of Canada had been overtaxed. Now I want to say to the Prime Minister, on behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent, that they believe that they have been overtaxed, very materially and for quite a long time.

They know that ever since the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) took office in December, 1946, the government has taken from the Canadian people more than a million dollars a day in excess of what was needed to meet all government expenses. This means that during the past six years the average Canadian family of five has been overtaxed by more than $750.

The heads of families in my riding feel that $750 is a lot of money, and they can think of a great many ways they would have sooner spent that $750 than handing it over to the government. They particularly resent handing over that $750 because they know it was not needed to pay for any expenses the government—

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to answer the hon. member's question after I finish speaking. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the people in my riding particularly resent having to hand over that $750 because they know it was not needed to pay for any expenses the government was called upon to meet. They can see no reason for having to hand it over to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

During wartime, one of the greatest dangers we have to fear is sabotage. During peacetime, it seems that one of the greatest dangers we have to fear is "Abbottage".

Mr. Howe: Is that supposed to be funny?

Mr. Hees: I should like, Mr. Speaker, to speak for a few moments about the forced retirement of Brigadier A. B. Connelly, the brilliant young officer who was fired to make a scapegoat for this government's fiasco in dealing with the Koje island incident. I happened to be a classmate of Brigadier Connelly's for four years at the Royal Military College, between 1927 and 1931. During four years such as that, you get to know a great deal about a man's character and ability. I believe that all those who were associated with Brigadier Connelly at that time were convinced that he was one of the brightest, cleverest, ablest cadets that ever came out of that institution. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) pointed out the other day, since his graduation his whole career has been one of rapid promotion to some of the highest jobs in the army.

I have known very well a great many of the men who, right up until the time he was fired, were associated with Brigadier Connelly in his work. I also know a great many of the men who have worked for him. They are all of the opinion that he would have risen to the very top of the tree.

What was the great mistake that Brigadier Connelly is supposed to have made? It is simply that he reported as a routine matter, instead of by high priority cable, the fact that one company of infantry from our 25th brigade was under consideration for guard duty on Koje island. I believe that any soldier would have acted in exactly the same manner as Brigadier Connelly acted, because to soldiers the use of one company for temporary guard duty is a routine matter, and not a matter requiring high government decision.

If all our senior officers are going to have to know how to solve the eccentricities of the Liberal political mind in the future, there is no doubt about it that they are all going to require a very special course in this very inexact subject. I believe it is putting far too heavy a responsibility on men whose job it is to direct our fighting forces in the field.

I want now to deal very briefly with another matter that the hon. member for Nanaimo brought up when speaking in this house on December 1. He referred to the fact that in future the time spent at educational institutions would be considered as service time when working out pensions for commissioned officers in our armed forces. As he pointed out, that is a very just and desirable provision. I believe it is also necessary that officers who have already been commissioned should also be able to count the time spent at educational institutions as service time when computing the pension which they will receive. I believe this is a very necessary provision which the government should consider. I sincerely hope that in the near future the government will extend the present regulation to make that possible.

(Translation):

Mr. J. E. Lefrançois (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, although I came to the house in the fall of 1949, I am speaking for the first time tonight. The task entrusted to me by my electors is crystal clear: they have sent me here to support the government. I might add that the decision of the electors of Laurier was practically unanimous, because the Progressive Conservative party, aware of the people's wishes, did not contest the riding. The C.C.F. party followed suit. My only opponent was a member of the Labour-Progressive party who polled only a few hundred votes and he succeeded in doing so only by omitting, as much as possible, to mention the name of his party in the constituency.

I am confident of having fulfilled my mandate without having to interfere with the government's policy, the trend of which has not changed since 1949.

In 1949, the electors of the constituency of Laurier, like those in all parts of Canada, expressed their confidence in the Liberal party because it has worked towards a united, a sovereign and prosperous Canada, whose citizens were already enjoying a high degree of security.

In 1949—need I recall an event so vividly remembered by our people, so burning a memory for our opponents—Canadians from coast to coast chose the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent as head of the nation.

This choice was not to be regretted. Under the Liberal regime, Canada has constantly strengthened her unity, her sovereignty, her prosperity and the security of her people. Incidentally, the Conservatives, who, since the last election in the United States, take pleasure in identifying themselves with the Republicans—thus labouring under quite a delusion—should remember that all the largest magazines and newspapers in that country who supported the Republican party have, especially during the past year, praised the financial and economic development of Canada as well as her increasing prosperity. Several of them have even expressed the wish that their country be governed by men like those who make up the present government.

During the electoral campaign of 1949 our opponents, indulging in some wishful thinking, had predicted that the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent would resign immediately following the election.

To the satisfaction of my constituents, as well as of the whole country, and to their good fortune, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent is still the leader of the Liberal party and of the government. For all, he remains the man of the whole nation. It is not mere gallantry to point out too that the first lady of this country is still today Mrs. Louis St. Laurent.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to my predecessor, the Hon. Ernest Bertrand who, for fourteen years, so fittingly represented the constituency of Montreal Laurier. His constituents were honoured with his cabinet appointment, he having been originally Minister of Fisheries and latterly Postmaster General. The electors of Montreal Laurier think of him with gratitude and their admiration for his career remains undimmed in spite of his present removal from the public scene due to his appointment to the bench.

The support given to the government by my constituency is as assured today as it was in 1949; and it is equally strong in all parishes. Hence I did not have to voice any protest when it was substantially modified during the last redistribution.

I have but one regret, and it is to be deprived of a considerable portion of the people who placed confidence in me on my first election, as well as of organizers and devoted friends who never spared me their support. In losing these, however, I have the good fortune of acquiring new friends for the limits of my constituency will henceforward include a great part of St. Jean Baptiste parish where I have always been warmly welcomed.

With the general elections coming, our opponents fill the air with their election-inspired statements. Hence, so much talk about health insurance.

It is not surprising that our socialists are sponsoring a new social security program; they would like it so very much if all our citizens were to depend on a state which they expect to run some day. Yet if they succeeded in nationalizing everything, in accordance with their policy, the plight of this country would be such that each citizen would have to rely on the state for his daily bread.

However, when we see the Tories, who, as a matter of principle, have always opposed social security measures, we must come to the conclusion that they are tired of being in opposition and that they have decided to abandon their principles and forget their past in an effort to assume power.

In requesting the implementation of a health insurance scheme, our opponents are merely showing their approval for legislation which the Liberal government will bring down in due course.

On the other hand it is noteworthy that any sound proposals which could be found in our opponents' platforms at any given time have sooner or later been put into effect by the Liberals.

In my opinion, before embarking on a health insurance scheme, we must first expand and increase our hospital facilities, sanatoriums and other medical institutions.

Before permitting a larger number of people to enter those institutions, we must provide the required accommodation and increase the necessary facilities.

Before calling the ambulance, one must ascertain that a bed is available in the hospital.

Therefore, it is a sound policy of the government to implement its health plan step by step.

Besides the sick there are the disabled. A sick man might be deprived for a few days, a few weeks or a few months of the income necessary to support himself and the members of his family. The disabled, on the contrary, might be deprived of these means for the rest of their lives. The sick person has to face considerable expenses for various lengths of time. The crippled would probably have to incur during their lifetime expenses resulting from their infirmities.

Remarkable work is now being done in Canada towards the rehabilitation of the disabled, especially among the veterans. Amazing results are being achieved.

However a large proportion of crippled people will never be in a position to rehabilitate themselves. A few years ago the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) suggested the implementation of a special allowance plan in their favour. While congratulating him for having thus focused the government's attention on their plight, may I, in turn, express the wish that, when the time has come to set up a national health insurance plan, some consideration will also be given to invalids.

We already have pensions for the blind. Still there are any number of other ailments which beset a large number of our citizens. Crippled in body, they barely manage to exist while their dependents remain in miserable circumstances.

If there is one case where private charity is unequal to the task, that is it. I am convinced that the whole nation would enthusiastically approve of the adoption of a plan calling for allowances for crippled persons.

I am also satisfied that my party, which has so rapidly brought up the standard of living of the people of this country, will see to it that our crippled citizens are assured of that measure of comfort and security to which everyone is entitled in a truly civilized country.

Before closing these remarks, I should like to congratulate both the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have expressed the opinion and feelings of the great majority of Canadians.

It is with great pleasure that I listened to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, whom I learned to know and appreciate during the course of his electoral campaign. The house has had occasion to realize the fluency with which he can express himself in both languages.

In closing my remarks, I should like to express the hope that the government, after having gratified us with such a perfect loudspeaker system, will favour us with a system of simultaneous translation which would allow everyone to hear all the speeches in his own language, regardless of the one used by the speaker. I am convinced that such an innovation would make for better understanding between all members of the house.

[Mr. Lefrançois.]

(Text):

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on this amendment to the amendment I wish to say a few words—and I assure the house that I will not detain it long—to explain why the C.C.F. group can and will vote for this subamendment. I wish to read the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) yesterday afternoon. It reads:

That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(f) To bring before this house for adoption, a realistic financial and economic policy that will ensure the orderly development of Canada's resources, guarantee adequate markets at remunerative prices to producers, and provide to every Canadian his just share of the wealth our resources can be made to yield."

If I could have had the time to do so, Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to read part of the speech made by the hon. member for Lethbridge this afternoon. That speech was full of meat so far as I was concerned, but I am afraid not for the reasons that the hon. member for Lethbridge would think. In regard to the hon. member himself, we have been neighbours here for quite a long time, and he is a good neighbour; but I wish he could do what the poet Burns suggested would be a good thing for people to do, that is: "O wad some power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us!" I think it would do him good, because if I know anyone who can make himself ridiculous in this house, it is the hon. member for Lethbridge. I am sorry the hon. member is not here now, but when he gets on his favourite subject he does not seem to have any sense of proportion and he does not give the rest of us credit for having any sense at all.

I may be just as stupid as he says I am—and really I am not worrying about it very much; I am getting too old for that—but if I were as much at sea on economic matters as the hon. member for Lethbridge is, I certainly would worry.

I said that the C.C.F. would vote for this subamendment and why. As a matter of fact, I believe we are the only party in this house that can logically and conscientiously vote for this subamendment. I do not believe that even the Social Credit members can vote logically or conscientiously for it because if they vote for it they must repudiate entirely what was said by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) only two or three days ago. Let me read what he said. I read it on Tuesday when I spoke in this debate, and I shall read it again. It is found at page 236 of Hansard. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked this question:

> Mr. Knowles: Would you do away with welfare legislation? . . .
> Mr. Hansell: I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I may. It has always been found that you cannot readily retract or undo something the country has already done.

What does that mean? It means that he would like to do away, as quickly as it possibly can be done, with our social legislation. He would like to remove from the statute books of Canada all the social legislation that is on them. I continue with the quotation:

> —but I would say that the greatest welfare that can come to the people is to leave with them their absolute freedom to act according to their own conscience and will.

Well, if you are going to leave them to their absolute freedom to act according to their own consciences, why bring in a financial and economic policy that will ensure the orderly development of Canada's resources? Why bring in a financial and economic policy that will guarantee adequate markets at remunerative prices to producers, and why bring in a financial and economic policy that will provide to every Canadian his just share of the wealth our resources can be made to yield? All the things they are asking for in this subamendment require planning, planning on a large scale. Who is to say what each individual's just share is? Is that to be left to a matter of chance? And if it is left to a matter of chance, what chance has the weak to get his share in competition with the strong? Did anyone ever hear of anything quite so fantastic or statements so much at variance with each other as the statement made by the hon. member for Macleod on December 1 and the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge on December 10?

You know, these Social Credit people are getting away with an awful lot. On the one hand they claim that they are for free enterprise and that nobody else is. In British Columbia they are the only free enterprise party. The Liberals are socialists with the C.C.F. I do not know what the Conservatives are, or what is left of them that have not gone into the Social Credit party.

Mr. Sinclair: Very few of them.

Mr. MacInnis: But they are not free enterprisers anyway. The Social Crediters are the only free enterprisers. According to the hon. member for Macleod their policy is to furnish the money, as much as everybody needs, and God will look after the rest.

Mr. Laing: And all will be well.

Mr. MacInnis: It is no wonder they start meetings with "Oh God, our help in ages past," because we should certainly need His help in years to come if that kind of policy were to be followed.

I have made a study of social credit, at least what goes for social credit. I do not believe there is any such thing—and that is not adopting the attitude of the person who saw the giraffe for the first time. I actually do not believe there is any such thing.

Mr. Shaw: Do you believe it?

Mr. MacInnis: No, I do not.

Mr. Shaw: Why did you second the motion in 1935 calling for its use in 1935?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not believe there is any such thing.

Mr. Shaw: I put it on the record three years ago.

Mr. MacInnis: That is all right. You can put it on the record again, if you like. Even if I did that in 1935, I would not take the same position as my hon. friends have taken, that they have not learned anything since 1935. As I said, I have read everything in book form that Major Douglas ever wrote. I have read not only that, but I have read what a great many other economists wrote, and I have come to my own conclusions in regard to the impasse that our economic system comes to every once in a while. I am quite satisfied that our economic dislocations are not because there is not sufficient money to distribute the goods produced. I have said time and time again in this house, and I will say it again tonight, that the reason is that although there is sufficient money, some have more money than they can spend and others have not the money to spend that they need. Because of that goods accumulate and cannot be sold. I do not expect everyone to believe that. Even if you do not, I do not believe that you are quite stupid.

The purpose of the present economic system is not to produce goods and services to meet social needs. The purpose of the present economic system is to produce goods and services to make a profit for the owners of the capital involved, and if it serves social needs in doing that it is only incidental. Profit is the purpose, and all else is incidental. I will say this: Until my friends, my neighbours to my left, can learn that they will not understand the economic system.

Mr. Low: You cannot learn something that is untrue.

Mr. MacInnis: You have learned an awful lot that is untrue. An editorial appeared in the Ottawa Journal of December 4, commenting on President-elect Eisenhower's business cabinet. It is headed: "Challenge to Business".

> Business leaders have long argued that what government needed was more business know-how, meaning more businessmen. They must be delighted with General Eisenhower's appointments to his cabinet and other high posts. Not for a generation or more has an American administration contained so many men of business fame.
> Thus the head of General Motors becomes secretary of defence, a key figure in the coal and steel industry becomes secretary of the treasury, a leader in the competitive field of automotive sales becomes postmaster-general, the head of the second biggest American bank goes to Britain as ambassador, and so on down the line.
> The sun of the "economists", of the doctrinaire theorists, and even of the "practical" politicians, seems to have set.

I will be more certain that it has set when we have peace in Korea, when the cold war comes to an end, provided always that a shooting war has not begun. If Eisenhower can do better than Hoover and Coolidge, I shall eat my shirt. Perhaps I should not say "my shirt," because I recently got a plate and it would be pretty hard chewing, but I will be ready to eat something pretty tough. The Journal goes on:

> For business, a stern challenge. The challenge of proving that business today is more than organized selfishness—

Which means that business yesterday or in Hoover's time was organized selfishness.

As a matter of fact, if business is not organized selfishness today, that is not due to business; it is due to the trade unions and the socialist movement. They have civilized business. The editorial continues:

> —that free capitalism is more than freedom to exploit—

That means that free capitalism was merely freedom to exploit.

> —that business leaders now are a far cry from their "the-public-be-damned" predecessors, the "robber barons" who amassed vast fortunes through anti-social deeds and then added to their scandal by exhibitions of vulgar wealth.

There you have the picture of the businessman as he was before he was civilized by present-day events and trends. They would be no better today and they would not be any better tomorrow if these checks were removed because, as I said before, their purpose is not to provide goods and services, to feed, clothe and shelter the people, to provide those other things which are necessary for the human family. Their purpose is to make profits by the exploitation of our means of production. That cannot be remedied by the appointment of a monetary commission, although it might be a help.

I want to draw attention to the fact that the hon. member for Lethbridge said that they would appoint a monetary commission. What would be the purpose of that monetary commission. I remember when they—I was going to say "raised hell" but that would not be parliamentary—raised Cain with this group for advocating the appointment of a planning commission. What is the difference between a monetary commission and a planning commission? I do not know.

Let us see what this monetary commission is going to do. It is going to plan the introduction and operation of a financial and economic policy that will ensure the orderly development of Canada's resources. Quite a job. It is going to plan a financial and economic policy that will guarantee adequate markets at remunerative prices to producers. It is going to plan financial and economic policies that will provide to every Canadian his just share of the wealth our resources can be made to yield.

There is a free enterprise party for you. I am not so sure that when big business learn what they actually are they will be as flush with their money for campaign funds as they are at the present time and have been in the recent past.

The hon. member for Lethbridge referred today to a "just" price. As I mentioned the other day, I have been trying to get an answer to what is a just price for a long time. I have wanted to have that from any Social Credit member who wished to give it to me, but as yet none has done it. Perhaps the hon. member for Lethbridge has come nearer to it than anyone else.

This monetary commission is going to set the price on everything. Hon. members know what is meant by "everything". That will be your shirt, your hat, your coat, your shoes, the cabbage, liver and other things you eat, the mousetraps and all the things you buy. A just price is going to be set on each item. If there is no just price there will be profiteering with an unjust price.

Some years ago I raised this matter with the hon. member for Lethbridge. He spoke on June 21, 1948. The speeches he made yesterday and today were simply repetitions of the speech he has made in this house a dozen times. There may be a few new things in it, but I know it pretty nearly by heart. I know that Bradburys are going to be mentioned, and I know just where Sir Basil Blackett is going to come in, and all the rest of it.

It reminds me of the time I worked for a farmer. There used to be family worship in the mornings. While the farmer was reading the Bible and making his prayer I had to watch that the cows did not get into the clover. At about the same place in the middle of the prayer each morning he would look out the window and say, "Angus, go and turn them cows." I could repeat that prayer by heart just as I can repeat the speech of the hon. member for Lethbridge. During the course of his speech on June 21, 1948, the hon. member for Lethbridge said, as reported on page 5605 of Hansard:

> I prefer to say "individual enterprise" rather than "free enterprise"—

I heard a Social Credit speaker in Vancouver say they had "individual enterprise" in Alberta. Yes, individual enterprise a la Imperial Oil. The hon. member continued:

> —because free enterprise suggests that enterprise is free to do whatever it likes, create monopolies and charge what it likes. Social Credit does not favour that sort of thing at all. Social Credit says that if you take individual enterprise, with the wonderful motivation that is in it naturally, set it to work producing goods, and regulate that enterprise by the social credit just price system, which allows for a fair profit, allows enterprise to recover its costs plus a fair profit, you will have a powerful engine, harnessed and controlled as a powerful horse might be, so that it can go ahead and produce abundantly without being able to destroy itself or others. There you have the concept of Social Credit.

Page H. R. MacMillan. As I said, I really would like to have had the time to read the rest of what the hon. member for Lethbridge said today.

Mr. Low: I thought you said you knew it by heart.

Mr. MacInnis: I know it by heart; but just like Mr. Speaker when he gets a copy of the speech from the throne so he will make no mistakes, I should like to have a copy of the hon. member's speech so I will make no mistakes and will not be called to order for putting an "and" or a "the" in the wrong place.

We can support this amendment, but I am surprised that the Social Credit party not only introduced it but will vote for it, because it is certainly not the policy they are preaching in British Columbia.

(Translation):

Mr. J. H. Rousseau (Rimouski): When I made my maiden speech last year, I spoke in French and I gave my reason for doing so: namely that I was availing myself of the privilege of every new member to make his maiden speech in his mother tongue.

I shall speak in French again this year and here is the reason why. My native parish, where I have lived for the past 75 years, has been for 20 years, I may say without boasting, a small Canada and I could add: the capital, the seat, the centre of good will. I therefore deem it my duty to speak in French, a language that most hon. members of this house, although of other nationalities, understand and wish to speak. Indeed, whenever I meet some of my English-speaking colleagues, in the halls or elsewhere, they always ask me with their best smile: How are you, Mr. Rousseau? We're having a nice day today; the snow is all gone."

And members of this house are not the only ones who wish to speak French. Everyone knows that our distinguished former governor general, Lord Alexander, took French lessons, several times a week, from a French nun on Sussex street. When he read the French version of the speech from the throne, his pronunciation was nearly perfect, I would say. Before boarding his ship for England, at Halifax, where he made his farewell speech to the people with whose activities he had made a point to acquaint himself during his frequent trips throughout the country, people he loved so much, naturally he first spoke in his mother tongue but the part of his speech delivered in French showed in the tone of his voice his esteem for the French-Canadian people, and this was noted by all of his French-speaking listeners.

We are greatly honoured, as you all know, in having a Canadian-born governor general. This remarkable achievement, unique in our history, is to the credit of the party which is leading our country so well and adds a glorious page to the golden book of Canada.

Like his distinguished predecessor, His Excellency the Governor General, Mr. Vincent Massey, to get acquainted with the hon. members of the Senate and the House of Commons, invited them in small groups to his residence for an informal chat.

During that visit, as I shook hands with him, I said: "Your Honour, am I going to speak French or English with you?" I beg you to note his answer: "As you wish." And during at least ten minutes, he spoke to me in French, asking me about my constituency, its people, its industries, and he even wanted to know why the town of Trois Pistoles bears that name. Naturally he asked me to explain some things about this summer school which seemed to produce such good results from the point of view of "bonne entente". His interest was all the greater since the school had been founded by one of his best friends, Dr. Sherwood Fox, former president of the University of Western Ontario, at London, Ontario. This school is a dream come true for this great Canadian who, since his younger days, had wished for the unity of the two great races in this country and who had come to the conclusion that to understand each other and get along together they first had to learn to talk to each other.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that last summer among the pupils was a judge from the supreme court of Ontario, Hon. Mr. Justice Kelly, as well as the present president of the University of Western Ontario, Dr. Hall. I might add that the school is still ably conducted by Mr. H. E. Jenkin of London, who still discharges his duties in the fine spirit in which the establishment was founded, that is understanding and unity between the two great races who live in this country.

I should like also to mention the visit paid to that school, in August last, by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He spoke to the pupils for 45 minutes, with his intelligence, but especially with his heart, as a real father would do. While I was thanking him, the school director asked him if he would like to pick a song in the album of French songs, which he would have the pupils sing for him and he picked out "En roulant ma boule"; when he left the school, he said: I was much impressed, for this song was the one my mother used to sing to put me to sleep when I was a child. Wonderful reflection of a great man who, having attained the summit of honour, still recalled with emotion the days of his youth.

I also wish to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to offer you my sincere congratulations for the improvement in your French pronunciation, which is particularly noticeable when you say the opening prayers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I tell you why I shall vote enthusiastically for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I should like to follow the path of all the gentlemen who have spoken in this house after the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address.

Making a half-turn to the right, I find myself facing two gentlemen who, at the very start, have been outstanding and who deserve the admiration of their constituents. I am very happy to join in the sincere congratulations which have been extended to them by all those who have taken part in this debate. I appreciate particularly the high praise paid to them by the Prime Minister, who is an expert appraiser of solid speeches, as well as of men and things.

I also take great pleasure in concurring in the congratulations extended to the new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney), this being a public confirmation of the congratulations I deemed it my duty to express to each of them in a personal letter.

Before proceeding any further, I would like, Mr. Speaker, to send cordial greetings to the photographers of the house; I mean by that expression the members of the press gallery. They photograph our ideas, our feelings, our speeches; they know how to condense a flow of words into its essentials, they know how to extract the salient facts from our speeches and how to express them in a pleasing manner for their readers; their task is very tiresome and requires a remarkable degree of observation. They deserve our congratulations and our thanks.

The clergy of Canada, and more particularly of the province of Quebec, rejoices on the occasion of the promotion of Archbishop Léger of Montreal to the rank of cardinal, with residence in the city of his metropolitan see.

For the first time in the history of our country, the city founded by Maisonneuve will have her own cardinal. The late Cardinal Villeneuve also came from Montreal, but when he received that high honour he was Archbishop of Quebec.

We offer our sincere congratulations to our colleagues from the city and diocese of Montreal on this great honour which has been reflected upon them. They have reason to be proud of having among them such an illustrious ecclesiastical figure. Everyone, irrespective of creed or nationality, respects and admires his saintliness, his unsurpassed oratory, his wise diplomacy and his great devotion to every noble and worthy cause.

For two years already I have had the honour of representing the interesting constituency of Rimouski.

In order to answer and meet the requests which have been addressed to me, I had the pleasure of visiting several departments and you may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that I have always received, from the hon. ministers, their parliamentary assistants and their subordinates, the most sympathetic, the kindest and the most courteous attention. I may say that legitimate and reasonable requests which I submitted to them were met and when they were unable to grant what I was asking, the refusal was so polite, so gentlemanlike, that I had no reason to take offence; and so I make it a point to mention here all the kindness which has been bestowed on my electors.

In my maiden speech, last year, I expressed all the needs of my constituency, giving the location of every place in the county. Mont Joli, a pretty little town on the eastern boundary of my constituency, has had its viaduct slowly but surely improved.

Such an improvement had become necessary and imperative following the traffic increase in that district: the mining developments on the north shore and on the Gaspe peninsula have considerably increased the movement of passengers coming from the United States by plane and by rail, so that the airport there takes on new importance every day.

I know that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will turn a sympathetic ear to all fair and reasonable requests I will make to him in this regard. Mont Joli, being the terminus of the Matane railway, needs a larger and improved C.N.R. station. That need has been felt for a long time. The municipal council and the chamber of commerce have sent me resolutions asking for that improvement and I agree wholeheartedly with those resolutions.

Mont Joli also needs a customs office. At the present time, the reasons which militate in favour of the immediate opening of this office are most potent; I have enumerated and stressed them to the authorities concerned, and I am convinced that my request will be granted. It will be necessary also to open an unemployment insurance office at Trois Pistoles as well.

In each of the parishes along the river, important works were performed, and I wish to express my sincere thanks to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

The wharf at Pointe au Père is also in need of improvement called for by the navigators, the parish council and, more particularly, by the pilots' guild. In my humble opinion, these works are the responsibility of the Department of Public Works and of the Department of Transport. I am therefore convinced that the ministers at the head of those two important departments will co-operate and have performed as soon as possible the required works.

This year, Ste. Flavie and Ste. Luce were supposed to have retaining walls built, in order to stop the erosion caused by the spring tide; but the project has been postponed until next spring, the amount earmarked for the job having been used up.

At Rimouski, the burnt-down breakwater has been rebuilt; the supporting wall will be built as far as Cathedral street. A private company having decided to build a dry-dock opposite the town—it will be the only one east of Quebec city on the south shore—a breakwater will have to be erected to protect it. The plans have been prepared, at my request, by engineers from the Department of Public Works, and I firmly hope that it will soon be built.

My regretted and eminent predecessor had obtained the building of a post office at Rimouski. This beautiful building, one of the most remarkable and imposing east of Quebec city, was blessed and inaugurated in June last. I have now the pleasant task of thanking the Minister of Public Works for having given us this building. The Rimouski airport also needs improvements. I took great pleasure in escorting a large group of the town's leading citizens and in introducing them to the Minister of Transport who greeted us with his usual kindness and who promised to consider seriously their request.

I must also thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), his parliamentary assistant (Mr. Langlois) and certain employees of their department for having so kindly consented to improve our postal service in some places.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state clearly why I shall enthusiastically support the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In my humble opinion, the Liberal government is administering the affairs of the country in about the same way as directors of large companies, who can boast every year of substantial surpluses, to meet the interest on privileged shares, to redeem those shares when they mature, to pay reasonable dividends on common shares and still have an adequate reserve for contingencies.

To accumulate such surpluses, the government must resort to customs and excise duties, and to taxes.

It is not fair to find fault with the government for having large surpluses, when we know very well that those surpluses are used first to write off our national debt, which has already been decreased by several billions, then to pay the cost of old age pensions, pensions to the blind, family allowances and especially to meet the high cost of our defence production.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that it took the experience of two wars, which cost us so much in money and human lives, to awaken the allies to the necessity of preparing themselves.

During the 1914-18 war, no one was ready but Emperor Wilhelm; so much so that his troops, meeting no serious obstacles, overran, with little trouble, first Belgium, then part of France. They were steadily advancing on Paris when the battle of the Marne was fought and won by the allies through providential assistance; it is said that the German generals made unexplainable mistakes in command. Some say, moreover, that the German armies were then blinded by an apparition of the holy Virgin who wanted to protect the eldest daughter of the church: this miracle was only a repetition of what happened when the cross and the words In hoc signo vinces, by this sign thou shall conquer, appeared in the sky to Emperor Constantine and his troops, during their battle against the pagans.

Thanks to the victory of the Marne, the allies were able to stave off the German advance, to take refuge in trenches, and to get ready, while defending themselves. That war cost millions of dollars and hundreds of thousands of human lives.

Twenty years later, in 1939, Hitler launched world war II, with such thorough preparation that all hope seemed lost for the allies who, once again, were unprepared. It was the blitzkreig, with all its attendant horrors. Countries fell one after the other and everything seemed lost, especially after the Dunkirk disaster. Britain alone, disarmed but courageous, led by Churchill, decided to fight it out. At this critical period the United States had not yet joined in the fray, Italy had gone over to Hitler, while Russia had just signed a treaty with Germany.

It is well, then, that we pay tribute to Britain since, without this admirable decision on the part of Churchill and his people, the world would have been subject to the nefarious nazi regime. It was a regime of terror, a godless regime. You will remember that this evil genius, to ridicule the cross of Christ, had forcibly replaced it with the swastika.

We all know how this war cost billions of dollars, millions of human lives and left nearly half the world in misery and disorder.

Here again, a year before the end of the war, a celestial apparition took place at Fatima, when the Virgin and her Son, in the presence of nearly 100,000 people of all faiths and creeds, appeared in the heavens.

When the holy Virgin appeared to three young children, three young shepherds, she recommended prayer and penance. And, Mr. Speaker, all these extraordinary happenings are admitted the world over.

It is a mystery to no one that the dangers of war are still threatening, but this time, and due to the experience of the last two wars, the allies are preparing themselves, and it is this danger which has determined all free countries to prepare. Such preparation is costly but necessary, for you know this axiom or rather this great truth: Heaven helps those who help themselves.

On motion of Mr. Rousseau the debate was adjourned.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 12, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TAXATION

PRESS REFERENCE TO SPEECH OF MEMBER FOR MOOSE JAW

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege. In this morning's Montreal Gazette there is an editorial dealing with the speech made in this house two days ago by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. The editorial includes this sentence:

When he—

The reference is to the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

—recommended one tax cut, a fellow C.C.F. member exclaimed: "Over my dead body!"

I am sure all members of the house—

An hon. Member: You said that years ago.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members are confirming the point I wish to make as a question of privilege. My offer of my dead body was in opposition to the means test being applied either to the family allowance or to the old age pension. I may say, too, on my own behalf and on behalf of the members of this party, that we favour a reduction in the personal income tax, particularly for those in the lower income brackets—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —but we are opposed to any reduction in corporation taxes.

FARM PRODUCTS

LIVESTOCK, MEAT AND HAY—LIFTING OF UNITED STATES EMBARGO

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to make a brief statement with respect to the lifting of the United States embargo against our livestock, meat and hay. Most hon. members will have read in the press or heard on the radio yesterday's news report from Washington indicating the early lifting of the embargo in so far as hay from eastern provinces is concerned. It will be remembered that on November 28 a news report came from Washington which was interpreted to mean that the embargo against livestock, meat and other products affected, would be lifted on March 1, 1953. The announcement said: "If present favourable conditions continue Canada will be declared free of foot-and-mouth disease on March 1, 1953".

Since the statement did not actually say that the embargo would be lifted on March 1, and because we had maintained frequent contact with the United States authorities and had reason to expect that the embargo against some products at least might be lifted at an earlier date than March 1, we refrained from making any public comment pending further discussion with the United States authorities.

Shortly afterward I arranged to meet Secretary Brannan in Washington and actually did meet him on December 5. I can tell the house that the meeting was most favourable, that I was assured that the United States authorities regarded our measures for the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease as being wholly effective, and further that they are anxious to see normal trade in livestock, meat and other products affected, resumed as soon as possible.

After my visit to Washington, the acting secretary of agriculture published a notice in the federal register expressing the intention of the department to lift the embargo against Canadian livestock and meat and stating that representations on the proposal would be received from the public until January 16.

As I mentioned a moment ago, yesterday's news from Washington has been taken by some to mean that the embargo had actually been lifted in so far as hay originating in eastern Canadian provinces was concerned. According to information we have from Washington, that is not exactly the case. Yesterday the department of agriculture in Washington posted a public notice to the effect that hay for use as feed would be allowed to enter the United States from eastern Canada after the publication of the official notice in the federal register. We understand that the official notice may be published within a matter of a few days.

While no assurance whatever can be given as to what, if any, further action the United States authorities may take to advance the date of the lifting of the embargo, I think the house will agree that the steps already taken by the United States government are most welcome and support the view that further steps may be taken before March 1.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DEBATE IN REPLY TO SPEECH FROM THE THRONE —CHANGE IN HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Speaker: There is a motion under the name of the Prime Minister respecting the hours of sitting which can be proceeded with now or when government notices of motions are called.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, December 15, 1952, and every sitting day thereafter until the debate on the motion for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session has been disposed of, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock a.m., and shall continue to sit until eleven o'clock p.m.; and that in addition to the usual intermission from six to eight o'clock p.m. there shall also be an intermission from one to two-thirty o'clock p.m., and that the provisions of standing orders 2, 6 and 7 be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: I might just say a few words at this time. We have now had 106 speeches during this debate, which means that about 150 members, or perhaps more, will be entitled to speak. I do not think any of us wishes to curtail the debate in any way. To me it has been an excellent debate and I think any hon. member who wishes to speak should have an opportunity to do so. On the other hand, a great many members, particularly those who live some distance away, are anxious to make arrangements for returning to their homes before the holiday. I think I can say that if the debate should come to an end on Wednesday we will adjourn on Wednesday, and if it continues beyond that day we will adjourn on the day on which the debate ends.

The hours suggested from 11 o'clock to 11 o'clock are the old hours pertaining to morning sittings. I think it could be understood that if we had had a good day up until ten o'clock and if a speaker finishes on or after that time, a motion to adjourn would then be supported by the house. But I think it should be left to the house to decide how soon after ten o'clock the house will adjourn. In any event, the proposal of the motion is that the house shall adjourn at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Acting Prime Minister for meeting in part the point about which I was getting to my feet a moment ago. I am happy to support the motion in so far as it provides for morning sittings during the remainder of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I offer that support because I was a member of Your Honour's committee on procedure which wrestled with this question of hours and which made the recommendation that if the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne lasted more than a week we should establish morning sittings.

However, I am disturbed—although my concern has been lessened somewhat by what the Acting Prime Minister has said just now—by the fact that this motion calls for the house to sit until eleven o'clock in the evening. I think it should be put on the record that the recommendation made by the committee in this regard, to be found on page 602 of Votes and Proceedings for June 27, 1952, reads as follows:

Your committee also recommends that, without amending the standing orders, consideration should be given by the house at the beginning of next session to holding morning sittings during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, starting approximately a week after the opening of parliament, subject to the suspension of said morning sittings if the debate on the address is interrupted for other business.

I point out that when we made that recommendation there was no suggestion that the sitting hours should be extended beyond ten o'clock at night. I think it is fair to say that not only the committee but the house as a whole wrestled with this question of the proper hours of sitting for two full sessions and we are all quite satisfied with the hours that have been arrived at, namely, 2.30 to 10 o'clock with the usual intermission.

I think all of us, particularly those of us who have had years of experience with the eleven o'clock closing, find that the ten o'clock closing hour is much better all round. Accordingly it seems to me we should not try to carry this house past ten o'clock at night. I welcome the suggestion which the Acting Prime Minister has made that it might be that we will adjourn at ten o'clock every evening despite the terms of this motion. I hope that in future even the possibility of going on to eleven o'clock will not be included in the motion because it seems to me that it would meet with the spirit of the committee's recommendation and with the will of the house generally if it were established that ten o'clock at night is late enough, bearing in mind that for most of us our day starts at nine o'clock in the morning.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LOANS, SEIZURE OF GOODS, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the first reading of Bill No. 37 (from the Senate), to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SAINT JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION COMPANY

PROVISION FOR ACQUISITION BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 38 (from the Senate), respecting the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PAYMENT CERTIFICATES, ANNUAL BUDGET, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 39 (from the Senate), to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS FOR NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 40 (from the Senate), respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. J. N. Corry (for Mr. Bennett) moved the first reading of Bill No. 41 (from the Senate), respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REPARATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF JAPANESE AND GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the minister who is Acting Secretary of State. Will he inform the house as to what progress is being made in regard to the payment of Japanese and German reparations in pursuance of the report made to the government by Chief Justice Ilsley of the province of Nova Scotia.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I am sorry to say that neither the acting minister nor the minister is present today. If the question could be taken as notice an answer will be given on Monday.

FISHERIES

TRADE MISSION TO SOUTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries? In view of the impending trade mission to South America to be headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), can he state if any requests have been made by NAFEL, which is the single export agency in Newfoundland for salt codfish, to the Department of Fisheries for representation on this trade mission?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. No direct representations have been made recently to the department, but both the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Trade and Commerce have been working continuously over the last few years with NAFEL and with the codfish exporters of the maritime provinces in an effort to open the Brazilian market to Canadian codfish. The impending trade mission has been fully briefed on the problem and I am sure will make every endeavour to find a way out of the current difficulty.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRURO AND SYDNEY—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF DIESELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport a question which arises out of a telegram I received from the president of the miners union in Nova Scotia, a copy of which I sent to the minister. Can he inform the house if it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to place a number of diesel engines on the run between Truro, Nova Scotia, and Sydney? This information is rather important to the union as they are in the process of wage negotiations.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I received the notice which the hon. gentleman was good enough to send me just a short time before I came into the house. I attempted to get a reply, but I have not been successful. If he will allow the question to stand until Monday, I think by that time I can get a reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TELEVISION

PROGRAMS SPONSORED BY BREWING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Will the Minister of National Revenue inform the house whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has accepted or anticipates accepting the sponsorship of programs telecasting wrestling or boxing matches sponsored by a brewing company in Montreal?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his question. The answer is yes. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is prepared, in the province of Quebec, to telecast programs sponsored by brewing companies under conditions similar to those laid down in sound broadcasting regulations, which provide for such sponsorship in a province where beer and wine advertising is allowed. The regulations allow for identification of the sponsoring company only, and do not permit advertising of its product on the air.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the answer just given by the minister, may we take this as a statement of policy by the government, that provincial authorities have some control over television broadcasting?

Mr. McCann: I do not know that that bears any relationship to this specific question. I shall take it as notice of a question.

ARMED FORCES

PAYMENT OF SERVICEMEN'S TRAVELLING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence in a position to state whether any decision has been arrived at with respect to the payment of travelling expenses for servicemen travelling to their homes on leave?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of his question. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has also inquired in respect to the same matter.

The present position regarding transportation costs for men in the armed forces going on leave is, briefly, as follows: Personnel proceeding to, or returning from, service in the Far East or Europe are provided at public expense with free transportation, berth and meals to their stated home address; in other words, when they are on special embarkation, or disembarkation leave.

Personnel serving in Canada are entitled to one annual leave and are granted an allowance calculated at the rate of 1½ cents per mile for each mile of the complete journey in excess of 500 miles. The question of an increase in the mileage rate, and a reduction in the distance beyond which the mileage allowance is payable, are both at present under consideration. On leaves other than those referred to above, a member of the services bears his own expenses.

I might mention that in many cases where military transportation is following the route of a man who is going on leave, and room is available, he is given free transportation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMINISTRATION AT PETAWAWA CAMP—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence as well as the Acting Minister of National Defence, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Can he assure us that the report by Mr. George S. Currie will be presented to this house before we rise for the Christmas recess?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I have no information on that matter, Mr. Speaker. I shall take it as notice of a question.

Mr. Drew: In view of the assurances given last spring, may I ask that steps be taken towards ascertaining when this report will be ready?

Mr. Blanchette: As I recall, Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of National Defence left this question was asked, and he replied that the report would be given in the course of the next few days.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am directing—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Drew: I am directing my remarks to you in the form of a question. Last spring, on April 21, assurance was given to this house that a report was to be presented at the earliest possible date. This house acted upon that statement. In answer to several requests, we have been given no information, and I suggest that the department is in contempt of this house in the course it is following.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure there is nothing that I can do with respect to the matter.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

(Translation):

Mr J. H. Rousseau (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to sum up in a few sentences the remarks I made before the adjournment of the house last night. I gave, first of all, the reasons why I am speaking in French again this year. I then offered you my congratulations for the way in which you have improved your pronunciation, especially when you read the opening prayers in French. I then added my tribute to the congratulations already offered the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I then congratulated the members of the press gallery, whom I called the photographers of our ideas, of our feelings and of our speeches, which they have the art of condensing in such a way as to please their readers. I then mentioned extraordinary happenings and even heavenly interventions which contributed to the allied victory during the wars of 1914-1918 and 1939-45, wars for which the allies were not prepared. I also stated that those two wars were very costly in money and human lives, and had it not been for the courage and the indomitable energy of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, after the disaster at Dunkirk, the whole world would be today under the intolerable yoke of nazism. I have expressed my sincere thanks to the hon. ministers, to their parliamentary assistants and their subordinates for their liberality in meeting all just and reasonable requests from my electors. I stated that the Liberal government was managing the business of Canada in the interest of Canadians, in much the same way as directors of large corporations do, in the interest and for the benefit of their shareholders.

I now pursue my remarks. In my humble opinion, three factors may help us to prevent another war, which would be more terrible, more devastating than the wars of 1914-18 and 1939-45, because of the new weapons now in use. These three factors are:

First, the rosary crusades spreading the recitation of the rosary all over Canada. This is the answer of the faithful to the request they received from our Lady of Fatima.

Moral rearmament, that admirable movement which has produced such good results in the countries where it is known, which puts order into every class of society, from the point of view of spirituality and morality as well as from that of human endeavour, has made of all those men and women who have taken part in it citizens respectful of moral, religious and civil laws. I might add that it is this movement which communism fears above everything else.

And finally, this expensive but necessary preparation. Dollars, once lost, can be recovered, but not human lives.

I therefore believe that we must not criticize the government on account of the expenditure involved in this defence effort, especially since all the moneys spent have been honestly spent.

In spite of this enormous expenditure, the government have found a way to legislate for the Canadian people in a wise, farseeing fashion, to carry out those works necessary to a healthy national economy, from one ocean to the other, such as the Halifax-Dartmouth bridge or the Canso bridge in the east, the St. Lawrence seaway project in central Canada, the irrigation of 500,000 acres of land in Saskatchewan.

Among those wise legislative measures I shall mention but two: those concerning old age pensions and family allowances.

During my 50 years' experience as a country notary, I have been the confidant of many families who found themselves in sorrowful situations. Very often an old man or an old woman, after having given away all their earthly goods to their son, would come crying for an explanation of certain clauses of their act of donation, wondering whether they could be deprived of their annuity. This meant that the son wished to get rid of his aged parents to cease paying them an annuity. Today, thanks to that wise and provident piece of legislation, the children would like to see their aged parents, who are the protectors of our families, live as long as possible, because they will continue to receive monthly cheques of $40 as long as they live and share them with their children and grandchildren.

We are all Christians and we all know the great commandment, "honour thy father and mother". This act, therefore, helps children to put this commandment into practice; these young people thus ensure for themselves happy old age, because, as you well know,

Mr. Speaker, we reap as we sow. Therefore, honour is due to the Liberal government for having initiated this wonderful policy of old age pensions at 70. An old man has no longer the strength and courage to beg for himself; he now finds joy and happiness in his generosity to others.

Honour is also due to the Liberal government for their family allowances, which in the case of each child, from the day of his birth to the age of 16, amount to a total of $1,188. Since that act has been in operation, one can see convents and colleges full of pupils who would not be, without the allowances, in a position to attend these courses. Mr. Speaker, I have received hundreds of letters from mothers in my constituency, asking that the allowances be doubled, instead of spending money for war purposes.

To this I will give a frank and clear answer. Defence expenditures, as I have attempted to demonstrate, are absolutely necessary to the security of Canada and of its people. In fact, if the communists should ever take control of this country, liberty in all its forms would disappear; religious, civil and individual freedom. Everything would become the property of the state. That would, of course, be the knell of family allowances such as we know them now.

I am therefore convinced that everyone will readily admit that it is preferable to continue our defence effort so as to prevent this and keep family allowances at their present level.

I hasten to add though that, as soon as the danger of war has passed, as soon as defence expenditures cease, I will ask the government to increase, to double even, the family allowances which are such a boon to our large families.

I will also ask the government to assist those incapacitated persons who, while they are not old enough to receive the old age pension, and are not entitled either to the pension for the blind, are yet unable to earn their living and weigh heavily upon their families.

Mr. Speaker, should we set aside our present government which is a good government made up of honest, competent, conscientious and devoted ministers, for the sole reason that a change is in order? Do the shareholders of a company ever cast aside directors whose management has been wise and who show yearly surpluses? Of course the answer is no.

That is why we Liberals believe that the population of Canada will keep its trust in the Liberal party which gave the nation such good laws, which administers public affairs so honestly that bank deposits are larger than ever, and which allows all social classes more comfort and more pleasures than they have ever enjoyed since Canada came into existence.

The ship "Canada" is manned by a first-class crew. Her captain is prudent, enlightened, conscientious and thoroughly honest. Indeed our very distinguished Prime Minister has succeeded in surrounding himself with officers who are both qualified and hardworking in their own sphere. Then why should we change, since the consequences of such a move cannot be foreseen. In that respect, I beg leave to retell one of the witty stories which that great Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, told in 1908 at Murray Bay, in Charlevoix county, during a speech he made before a large gathering of people.

"My good friends," he said, "our opponents ask you to elect a new government. Would you be any better off if you did? I claim that you wouldn't. Let me tell you a story as old as the world but very true: The Lord had finished His wonderful creative work, the universe He had made so beautiful because He wanted the happiness of Adam and Eve to be as perfect as possible. These two human beings were perfectly happy in the garden of Eden, as they had been for a long time, when Satan, jealous at the sight of their happiness, came to Eve and asked her if she was happy. Eve answered that they were.

"And Satan said to her: 'You cannot be perfectly happy since you cannot eat those beautiful apples on that tree. I know that you have been forbidden to eat of that fruit but that is because the Lord does not want you to become His equals. Eat of that fruit and you shall be as gods.' And Eve went to Adam and was so successful in her pleading that both of them ate of the fruit. You know what happened afterwards to the human race, what we have had to pay for that grave error committed by our first parents."

To bring my speech to an end, I say: We have a good government, let us keep it.

(Text):

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in this marathon debate that we have been having. All hon. members can take part in it. They can all start at scratch and go to any limit they wish up to forty minutes, and then some. The debate has been on the consideration of the speech from the throne, as delivered by His Excellency to the Senate and the House of Commons. Our province was very pleased indeed to receive a visit last fall from His Excellency. We enjoyed his stay very much, and I think he did also, but it was very brief. We hope that when he comes to visit us on another occasion he will spend at least two or three days in our province, to see the best bit of red earth in the whole of Canada. I would also suggest to His Excellency that he take a tip from his predecessor, and come and have a couple of vacations in our province while he is holding the high office of governor general of Canada.

There are many things that one could discuss in this debate, but first of all, I suppose, according to custom, I must congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider). There are others who could be congratulated, and later on we shall have an opportunity to congratulate them also.

During the recess a vacancy occurred in the cabinet. A real fight took place to get that position. Dame rumour says that it was really a cat and dog fight and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had a difficult time to restore peace and harmony in his party. The only way in which he could do it was by appointing two men from one province, something that is seldom if ever done on a racial basis, but that is the way it was done on this occasion. In this connection I should like to refer to something I have mentioned before, namely, the Liberal party's neglect of a particular province. They always ignore the ninth province, the province of confederation, when appointments are made, and when an opportunity arises to make an appointment to the cabinet.

I was proud to listen to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) when he spoke on this question. He went on to say that in justice to the maritime provinces, and in particular to the province of Prince Edward Island, when the opportunity was there the parliamentary assistant to the former Minister of Fisheries should have been one of the men chosen and he should now be Minister of Fisheries. What the hon. member for Royal said on that occasion must have convinced many hon. members on both sides of the house that Prince Edward Island was ignored again when the last appointments were made to the cabinet.

Mr. Gibson: You have four Senators.

Mr. McLure: You are not one, anyway.

Mr. Gibson: I come from Vancouver island; we have not any and we have four times the population you have.

Mr. McLure: You had better stay there; you know where you are well off.

When the hon. member interrupted me I had just about finished dealing with the parliamentary assistant to the former minister of fisheries. According to an item which appeared in one of the Ottawa papers, there is still an opportunity for our province. The item says that there is still an opportunity to make way for the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) by making him the Solicitor General. We shall wait and see who's who and what's what when that appointment is made.

I was glad to note, when the different appointments were made, that a co-cabinet minister, you might say, was given to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). In my humble opinion the Minister of National Defence has had a job of work to do which it was impossible for any one man to do, particularly because of the difficult times through which we are going. Now he has an assistant and I hope that we shall be able to get more information. I am sure that all members will agree with me that the Minister of National Defence, who now has an assistant, has been doing more work than all the rest of the ministers of the cabinet put together. I hope he will be able to take his work a little easier from now on.

The Liberal party has never kept faith with our province. We always hope that they will mend their ways and give us some opportunity not only to be represented in the cabinet but to get what we really deserve in other ways.

Before proceeding with my general remarks I should like to mention something that has been mentioned before by other speakers. I refer to the adverse publicity that our province has received from a periodical known as Maclean's magazine. Considerable comment has been made on this adverse advertising. The junior member of the dual constituency of Queens (Mr. MacLean), when speaking on the tourist trade of our province, made some reference to this. Speaking of the periodical which contained these items he made this remark, as reported at page 362 of Hansard:

> I myself have eaten in most of the public eating places in Queens county.

Then he went on:

> Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me when I say that both the senior member for Queens and myself look reasonably well fed.

As one of the two living examples referred to in these remarks, I want to place credit where credit is due. For the last fifty years or over I have had the same culinary employee or, you might say, the same culinary expert in charge of my cuisine, and that expert is my wife. The junior member for Queens has just started out on that kind of campaign, as a first trial.

Let me say that I have received a great many letters with respect to the advertising

I have mentioned. Some of those letters I could not put on the record because I think their language would be considered unparliamentary. I might however refer to one item I have here, which is contained in a column headed "As The Journal Sees It", purporting to be written by one who describes himself as "J. J.". The Journal writer is giving his version—and this, may I add, is the Summerside Journal and The Pioneer published at Summerside, Prince Edward Island. This writer who signs himself "J.J." is quite distinguished in his field.

That portion of the column to which I make special reference is headed "By Gorsh!!", and begins with this little poem:

> Some photos—by Karsh!
> Can really be harsh;
> So say cattle owners
> Near Fullerton's marsh?

Then the writer goes on to say:

> This big-feeling foreigner, now Canadian, who visited Charlottetown this summer on his tour for Maclean's magazine, is quoted in the last issue of that publication as saying that the cuisine in Prince Edward Island was lamentable and the worst meal he's ever eaten in Canada was at the hotel where he stayed in Charlottetown. His worst experience at the island capital was when a dish alleged to be potato Florentine was set before him. "Karsh simply buried his face in his hands at the fearful sight," Maclean's tell us.
> This is terrible, indeed. A tremendous let-down from the savory dishes of Arabia, or what have you, to which he had been accustomed before coming to this unsophisticated land of Canada.

That is some tribute to the gentleman who came down there! He deserves it all; and I would add only this—not as "J.J." but as myself—that if and when this individual may, perchance, visit my province again, with Maclean's magazine in his teeth, he will be as welcome as a skunk in a nudist colony.

We have had in our province visits from some of the finest ladies and gentlemen, who have spent holidays there. Any province would have been proud to have them. We have visitors of different kinds coming in from time to time, and during the last season there was the usual number. In addition to the regular tourists we always had some political callers.

Perhaps I might mention one or two of these who visited us in the past season. One of them was the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). He called on me, and we had a friendly visit at my home. I was glad to have a call from this gentleman, because many of the politicians who come down from Ottawa give me the go-by.

Then, that stately gentleman, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), visited the province, and was good enough to phone me and express his regrets—and I believe sincerely—that he was unable to visit me. I was glad, though, even to have the telephone conversation with him. We were delighted to have these two gentlemen visit our province while they were on business. However, I think I deserve a call from even the best, as well as the worst of them.

I had a most enjoyable visitor at my home in the person of the jovial member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), too, paid me a visit at my own home. We leave our door open for any of these visitors who might wish to pay us a call during the holiday season.

If Maclean's magazine wanted to get some information about Prince Edward Island, why did they not get in touch with some of the people who have been coming for years to Prince Edward Island, rather than go to a foreigner—who is now a doubtful Canadian—looking for a report they might publish later as, in this instance, they have done.

I am sorry I have had to mention this occurrence today. However, I do so in order that hon. members on all sides of the house may know what has been said and done in discrimination against the best tourist ground to be found anywhere in Canada.

It was not my intention to say anything about transportation but, after what happened a few days ago, perhaps I should make reference to it. As hon. members know, I have always discussed the subject of transportation because it is the very lifeblood of Prince Edward Island. It would mean a great deal both to the buyers and to the marketing board if we could have what we should have, and that is far better transportation facilities than we have today.

Let us refer, for a moment, to what took place recently. On Tuesday, December 9, before the orders of the day were called, I asked a plain and wholesome question of the Minister of Transport.

This was my question:

> Has the Canadian maritime commission reported to the minister with reference to federal aid for improvements to the ferry service between Wood Island and Caribou, the connecting line between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia? If not, why not?

The answer I received to that was one big, plain, No. It would seem the answer to the first question was that there has been no report. I suggest however that an answer could have been given to the last part of my question in which I asked why no report had been made. As the representative of the people of the constituency of Queens and of Prince Edward Island in general I deserve a decent reply to that part of the question.

If he had desired to do so he could have said that he would go back to this buffer commission and ask them to make a report immediately. It is the same old deal so far as we are concerned. The Northumberland Ferries Limited has made representations to the government on several occasions but they have always approached the wrong body. They go to the Canadian maritime commission, and according to the terms of confederation of 1873 between the province of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion of Canada that commission has no authority whatsoever to deal with the question of transportation. The maritime commission is simply a buffer commission. I notice that my secretary put it as "bluffer" commission. It is only a buffer commission for the Minister of Transport and the government.

As I said a year ago, when the representatives of the Northumberland ferry company come here they should never have anything to do with this buffer commission. They should make their demands on the Minister of Transport and the government. They should place their arguments and claims before them and file their brief with them. Then they would not have to wait for days for the buffer commission to make up excuses for the government so that they can turn around and say, "According to the maritime commission we cannot do this" or "we cannot do that".

I said a moment ago that I was not going to say anything about this matter but now that I have entered upon it I will say a bit more. The brief that was presented to the Canadian maritime commission on behalf of the Northumberland Ferries Limited was an excellent one. It gave all the details, facts and figures and pictured the growth of this private enterprise ferry system from the time it started up until now. In the last two or three years the situation has become such that the ferry company cannot handle more than two-thirds of the freight, passengers, automobiles and trucks requiring transportation from Caribou on one side of the strait and Wood Island on the other. If you wish to cross the strait in the busy season you have to make application forty-eight hours before the boat sails for space for your car or truck unless you have a priority.

What we want there and what the Northumberland Ferries Limited is seeking is assistance. The company is not coming to the government asking for something for nothing. It is asking for assistance to obtain another ship or two, at least one large one, in order to take care of the traffic that has originated at these points ever since the service came into operation. It is the only link we have binding Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Members of the house may not know our troubles and the perplexities of our transportation system, but judging by what I have seen of other hon. members there is not one of them, in fact there is not a province in Canada, that would stand for the deal we are getting from the government with respect to transportation.

All hon. members know that it took about four years of harping at the government before we got the Abegweit for the run between Borden and Tormentine. We now have an excellent service there but it is not capable of handling all the freight that is offered. In the busy season we want extra transportation facilities. When we entered into confederation that was one promise that was made to us. That is in the agreement, and no Liberal government has ever tried to fulfil the terms of the agreement. We have a good ferry service between Borden and Tormentine but the thanks for that must go to the Borden administration. When Sir Robert Borden was campaigning in 1910 he said that this service would be provided and it was, but forty years after we entered confederation.

I repeat that there is not another province in Canada that would stand for even five years for not having the terms of its confederation agreement fulfilled. I often think there should be some way whereby when a province is unjustly treated by the dominion it could have the opportunity to take its case before the judges of the country and argue its claims. Not half of our terms of confederation have been fulfilled. A commission was appointed to look into the matter in 1926 under the chairmanship of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan. It was a wonderful commission. He went into a great many details and made recommendations but the Liberal government has not fulfilled one of them although they appointed the commission.

I must say, however, that in the short time the Conservative government was in power some of the recommendations of the commission were fulfilled, and I can assure the house that when a Conservative government takes office we will look to it for the proper fulfilment of the terms of confederation of 1873. The buffer maritime commission, which is now just dilly-dallying and which has the government and Department of Transport behind it, says, "Well, let it go; we will let you know later." The same thing happened last year, and what was the result? When the busy tourist season came along we could not handle half the tourists who came to Caribou wanting to cross over to Wood Island. Let me repeat that we are not begging from the government. All we are asking is that consideration and assistance be given so that we can get a larger boat or two and also a subsidy because the Borden-Tormentine ferry receives a subsidy.

There is a difference in the subsidies paid to the two ferries. The Northumberland Ferries Limited comes to the government each year and asks for a certain subsidy. If it is granted they know what it is. On the other hand, a subsidy is provided for the Borden-Tormentine ferry system but it is one that is dictated by the Canadian National Railways according to their bookkeeping system. They do not know at the start of the season what it is going to be and when they ask for it at the end of the season they are told what the subsidy will be according to their bookkeeping. That has to be paid to them by the government. The Northumberland Ferries Limited are not asking for that; they are asking only for assistance which will be known from the start for what it is.

I might say further that the people get disgusted with the way the government is using them in the way of transportation and they ask me what is going on. They say to me, "Is the government trying to sell us out to the Canadian National and do away with private interest?" That is what is going on. We hear it every day. They are afraid an attempt is being made to get rid of the competition by Northumberland Ferries Limited.

As everyone knows, the government owns the Borden-Tormentine ferry. Its operation is turned over to a subcontractor, the Canadian National Railways. I have nothing against the Canadian National Railways, but I do have something against the government. The running of this ferry was handed over to the Canadian National Railways who had not invested a dollar in it. Up until three years ago they had the power to charge whatever freight rates they liked.

When I came back here in 1945, I remember, trucks were just commencing to handle produce from Prince Edward Island. A loaded five-ton truck leaving Prince Edward Island for the mainland was forced to pay $60.65 for the return trip. They just could not make that much profit on their load. By continued fighting in the house it was finally got down to a reasonable rate, but the rate has not reached the point where it fulfils the terms of confederation. There should be a free ferry system to provide the fulfilment of the terms of confederation of 1873. There is a good deal more I could say about transportation but as the minister is conveniently absent I shall rest my case right there.

[Mr. McLure.]

I seemed to be unlucky on December 9 when I disturbed some ministers of the crown by asking a question which apparently made at least two of them somewhat disgruntled. The question I asked was about a dominion building and will be found on page 459 of Hansard of that day. I got what I thought was a snooty answer, something I did not expect to get. However, there always comes another time. I could not reply at the time I asked the genial minister what I thought was a civil question. My question was as follows:

> I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Are the plans and specifications for the oft-promised dominion building at Charlottetown being completed? If not, why?

A little while ago I referred to the answer I got as being snooty. I do not know whether that term is good enough or strong enough, but I did not expect the answer I got which was:

> I believe it deserves a special answer.

I got a special answer all right.

> It asks first: Are the plans and specifications for the oft-promised dominion building at Charlottetown completed? First of all, it is known that the hon. member has promised that building for a long time—

That is very true.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is a good answer.

Mr. McLure: The minister's answer continues:

> —and he is having trouble to implement that political promise.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. McLure: I do not know that I am having trouble, but there are likely to be others, besides myself, having trouble. The minister continued:

> Secondly, the plans are not completed. Then he asks: If not, why? Well, we are trying to make perfect plans for a perfect building at Charlottetown.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Don't you agree?

Mr. McLure: Then McLure got up and said:

> It is strange, is it not, that the plans are not completed, when—

Rightly so, the minister would not allow me to debate the subject there and then. However, I just want to put the minister right on this. He says that I have promised. Knowing him as I thought I knew him, naturally I believed what he told me. I went back to my people and told them. Furthermore, we know that all these things are on tap during an election and the people wanted to know about this dominion building. Just prior to the last election—this may have been good advertising for the Liberals—an artist's drawing of this huge building, which might be considered specifications of a kind, was published in all the papers in Prince Edward Island. I do not know whether such things are done without the Minister of Public Works knowing about them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They may be.

Mr. McLure: The minister should know more about his department before he makes the statement that I promised it. These things come out and naturally when he tells me that he has bought the property down there I believe him. The records show that a year ago he told me that all the properties had been paid for. I do not know, that may be true or it may not.

He told me also that they are running a rental system down there, that they have engaged a man who rents their properties, collects the rents, and keeps the properties in repair. But the minister does not know when this building is going to be built. I venture to say that there will be a promise just as soon as the next election—

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. McLure: I will not believe it anyway. According to what the minister said when answering my question and when he put the blame on me—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no.

Mr. McLure: I took the first part of—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a question of privilege, I did not blame the hon. gentleman. Many people in his province have promised that building. He is not the only one. A good many people are in the same boat.

An hon. Member: The boat is leaky.

Mr. McLure: The minister promised it too.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I may be in the same boat too.

Mr. McLure: Your boat is leaking. If you do not bail it out soon you will go down with it. I just wanted to refer to this reply that I got the other day. I was not satisfied with it. I might say also that I did not deserve it, because I have always tried to treat the ministers of the crown as they should be treated. At the same time, I want to say to him now that, as long as I am here representing the people of Queens county in particular and Prince Edward Island in general, I shall have my say and I will not be choked off by any minister under any consideration. If the minister did not know that before, I am telling him now firsthand and I mean it.

We come now to something a little more peaceful. I did want to make a few remarks about the highway, but I would not have time to thoroughly develop the subject before my time would expire. I might ask you, Mr. Speaker, how much more time I have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since the hon. member has been kind enough to ask me, I am pleased to inform him that his time has already expired.

Mr. McLure: I was going to say a few words—I think I have forgotten what the subject was. There is one subject that is always dear to my heart, and that is the fisheries of North Rustico, the place from which I come. I want to say something about that, but it will be more or less pleasant. Last year in North Rustico, one of the best fishing ports in the maritime provinces, they had a tremendous storm that carried away the breakwater. The fishermen were anxious to have this repaired, so representations were made to the department. I must say the department started the work immediately during the summer of 1952. The breakwater has been repaired, but there is a lot more work to be done.

On behalf of the contractor, I want to say that he did the very best job possible. I take the word of the fishermen for that, because they know whether or not it was a good job. However, when the contractor was making up his plans he did not understand how much underwater work there was to be done, and I am sure, therefore, that this contractor will lose money. I hope the government will give him something for the extras.

I was going to speak about this storm that occurred last year. First of all I might mention that lobster, mackerel and cod are caught off this port. Lobster fishing takes place early in the season. During the winter the fishermen prepare their own traps, and if even a small wage is charged for making these traps, the cost of rope, lumber and nails makes the trap worth about $3.25 before it goes into the water. Some 12,000 traps from this village of Rustico went into the water on the first of May. The lobster fishing season is short, but ten days after the traps were out this storm occurred and they lost over 50 per cent of the gear they had put out. Fishing had been good, but 50 per cent of the production was lost, and because the season is short a fisherman cannot rebuild or repair his gear.

In so far as the next season is concerned, the fisherman is still handicapped because he makes barely enough for a living. The next season he applies to the government to get some form of assistance, and I believe a scheme of insurance is now being worked out amongst the fishermen. They will contribute to it, as well as the government, and when such a loss occurs, as it does about every third or fourth year, then the fishermen will have a chance of recouping their losses.

I might say a great deal more about this subject, but I did want to mention the fact that during the last year the fisheries department have advertised that they are going to spend millions of dollars to send assistance to Ceylon. The department believes this is wonderful advertising. It is stated that the department is going to give them a million dollars or more, in addition to boats and sending good men to teach these people how to fish. In my opinion it would be far better for the government to buy the surplus fish in the warehouses in this country, and provide these people with plenty of fish to eat. It would take this surplus production off our market at the present time.

I know you are getting uneasy, Mr. Speaker, but in conclusion I want to say that there are other things that are quite dear to my heart about which I should like to have the time to speak. One of them is the rural mail couriers, who have never been properly treated. Then there are the people who are incapacitated. However, we shall deal with those subjects when the opportunity occurs later.

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): In rising to take part in this debate this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I am aware and fully appreciate that this order of business has been before the house for at least three weeks, and that any remarks or suggestions that I might make will be largely repetitious. It seems to me that I have been in this house for quite a number of sessions, probably too long, but I would say that in my opinion I have never made a partisan speech. I feel that there are enough politicians in the house without me. I was elected and chosen as a member whose duty it is to represent all the people and all the factions in the riding, to give consideration to suggestions that are made and, to the best of my ability, to keep the record straight while at the same time being true to myself.

I would crave the indulgence of this house this afternoon to divert from that record for a few moments. I wish to refer to some statements, and what I believe are unfair references, that have been made by members in neighbouring constituencies. I refer to the member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) who, in his remarks on November 25, 1952, as found at page 89 of Hansard, said:

> One thing I should like to mention particularly is the reference to mail courier contracts. The Conservative party has long pointed out that changes were due in our rural mail service. Last fall many of the Liberal members from western Ontario took part in the debate on the postal estimates, and all mentioned the rural mail service. It was quite obvious that they had been tipped off that changes were going to be made and therefore they had better get in on the ground floor.

To me that was an interesting statement for him to make. I should like to remind the hon. member for Middlesex East that rural mail delivery was established in this country over 45 years ago, and that the same method of awarding mail courier contracts —by calling for public tenders—as then initiated still prevails. According to the Post Office Act the contracts must be awarded to the lowest tenderer, if the party is reliable and provides good bondsmen.

I am sure that if he will look up Hansard of former years he will find that many hon. members spoke in this house on the evils of this system at least ten years before he came to this house, and not just on the eve of an election, as he states. I am sure that the party to which the hon. member adheres sat on the government benches for some time during that long period, and they did not change those regulations or even improve them. I am sure that some of the members in this house recall the period of 1930 to 1935. I believe the postmaster general at that time was Hon. Mr. Sauve. What did he do in 1933? For at least the greater part of that year all rural mail couriers whose contracts expired during that period were not given the privilege of renewing their contracts even at the previous tender price, but were ruthlessly told that they could only get a contract by slicing the cost. Some were offered a four-year contract with a ten per cent reduction, some even more than that. They could take it or leave it or it would go for public tender. Those were the so-called hungry thirties, and the couriers had no choice; they had to take what was offered and sign up for a four-year contract.

When I came to this house in 1935 I went to the post office officials and endeavoured to have those mail contracts restored to their former level but I was told by the officials that they could do nothing about it, that they had signed up for a four-year contract and there was no provision to raise their pay without the calling of public tenders. These mail couriers never obtained any relief until this government brought in an act called the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act in 1947. It was then extended to 1948 when all mail couriers received an adjustment in salaries at least to some standard of equal pay for their services. I am sure that the rural mail couriers throughout Canada—and I am speaking particularly of those in Ontario—will not be fooled by that story of the hon. member for Middlesex East, for they know what treatment they received during that regime.

There is an old adage to this effect; if you want to know what a man's future is, look into his past. I would say that adage applies to political parties as well; and to the hon. member for Middlesex East I would suggest that, before he makes any statement like the one to which I have referred, he had better review some of the past records of the Post Office Department and their operations during the last forty years.

At this time I should like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) the fact that the house has now been in session since November 20, that we are looking for that committee of the house to be set up to study and to make recommendations with regard to this problem and would like to have it set up as soon as possible after the Christmas recess.

I wish now to discuss a question that has had a great deal of publicity on the radio and in the press as well as in this house during the past two weeks. I refer to the sugar beet industry of Canada, particularly as it applies to Ontario and to my own riding of Lambton-Kent.

My colleague the hon. member for Kent, Ontario (Mr. Huffman) a few days ago gave an interesting résumé of the sugar beet industry in Ontario, especially as it applies to Chatham; and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) also gave us some interesting data on the sugar beet industry in Alberta. I wish to point out to this house that Wallaceburg this year is celebrating its 51st anniversary, with the distinctive record of having the oldest and the second largest sugar beet factory in Canada.

The operation of this plant alone is of vital importance to the livelihood of some 2,000 farmers, 500 factory workers and a countless number of field workers, merchants, truckers and many others of the community who are viewing with a great deal of concern the importation of Cuban refined sugar into our market here in western Ontario. Already the movement of Cuban refined sugar into Canada approaches in volume the annual production of our local plant in Wallaceburg. Some 12,000 acres of sugar beets have been grown in this vicinity to supply the Wallaceburg plant. The beets have recently been harvested. Last year the farmers, for a similar acreage, received approximately $2,200,000. Losing this important industry would undoubtedly depress the farm and urban economy of this whole community. So I will endeavour to put on the record some information with regard to the actual situation that has brought about this condition; and again I want to be fair in this analysis. If my figures are not correct, I am sorry. I may say that I obtained them from what I felt were quite authoritative sources.

As has been stated by previous speakers, we have in Canada seven sugar beet refineries situated in four provinces, and they have just concluded a season during which they have operated to almost full capacity. This year the beet sugar in Canada will meet about one-quarter of all our requirements here in Canada. We must remember that the actual refining operations last only about three months in the year or a little bit better, but it is a most important industry in our whole farming operations.

The hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), when speaking in this house on this question a few days ago, said that early in October a delegation had come to Ottawa to interview some government officials and that no newspaper reporter was present but that a statement was made to the press afterwards, perhaps as an alibi. I can readily understand why the hon. member for Lambton West would think this to be strange, because I feel sure that if he had been on that delegation everybody would have known about it.

This conference and the delegation were organized by the refineries and the growers from all four provinces and they were well represented. I was with them for two days and assisted them in every way I possibly could. Believe it or not, I have been closely associated with the beet growing industry and with the beet growers for the past 25 years, and I know something about their problems and about what the industry means to this country. Many a time I have come to Ottawa with various delegations. I see no useful purpose to be gained in calling in the press, for occasionally one can accomplish more without too much publicity. But on this occasion I am confident that no effort was made by anyone to exclude the press. I have never read an account of it anywhere in the press, and in any case I can see no importance or no significance attached to that statement.

The facts are that we cannot increase to any marked degree our sugar beet production in Canada unless we have more refineries. That being true, we must import from other countries 75 per cent or more of the sugar that we consume in Canada. It is difficult to obtain the actual per capita consumption of sugar but it is high, and will probably average between 95 and 100 pounds per capita per year, so that our actual requirements would be something over thirteen million hundredweight. In the past this has nearly all been imported as raw sugar. I am talking now about the importation of cane sugar. In the past twenty years very little refined sugar has been imported into Canada, but the bureau of statistics has not kept the records of imported and refined sugar separate until this year. I have received the following information from the bureau of statistics of the amount of raw sugar imported into Canada and the cost of same for the years 1950, 1951 and the first nine months of 1952, since that is the last record the bureau has. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will not read these all out, because I have them here on record and I have the data from the bureau of statistics. It would only take up the time of the house. If you want me to read them I can do so, but they are lengthy. They are as follows:

In 1950—12,655,393 hundredweight at invoice cost price of $76,409,211.

In 1951—10,664,393 hundredweight at invoice cost price of $73,395,230.

For first nine months, or up to Sept. 30, 1952:

7,660,361 hundredweight at an invoice cost price of $40,165,880.

That is based upon the f.o.b. shipping point in Cuba or West Indies, or wherever it was. Added to that of course is the duty, the freight and the cost and so on, so that the cost per hundredweight of this sugar in 1950 was approximately $6.04. In 1951 it was $7.07 per hundredweight. For the first nine months of 1952 it was $5.24 a hundredweight. Therefore I would gather that on a market that was rather weak the last three months would probably reduce the cost of sugar somewhat, so that the cost of raw sugar to the refineries in 1952 would be $1.83 less than the cost in 1951.

The price quoted by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) in January—and I quote from the speech that he made a few days ago—showed that the drop in the price in Montreal from January until the present time for refined sugar was from $10.20 to $8.60, which is a drop of around $1.60 a hundredweight. Therefore the drop in the price of raw sugar was actually greater than the drop in the price of refined sugar in this country.

I hold in my hand an editorial from the Ottawa Citizen of December 2. I am not going to read it, but I will give the gist of it. The editorial in the Citizen claims that the current sugar difficulties spring from a three-year trade agreement made with Cuba, whereby Canada accepts 75,000 tons of raw sugar a year for three years, 1951, 1952 and 1953, and concessions were obtained by Canada for wheat, fish and potatoes in return, and also some flour.

[Mr. MacKenzie.]

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the present difficulties we are in have no bearing on this trade treaty at all; that we had to import raw sugar from some place, and it made little difference where it came from. It might even have helped the situation to bring in this raw sugar from Cuba; otherwise if we had obtained all our raw sugar from empire or other sources, Cuba might easily have unloaded greater quantities of surplus refined sugar here.

This refined sugar from Cuba comes in under the general tariff or the most-favoured-nation treaty, which, in this case, is just the same. The duty on Cuban refined sugar is $1.89 a hundredweight, plus a maximum of 75 cents a hundredweight, if the anti-dumping regulations can be applied. Thus, if Cuba sells refined sugar in Canada at less than the fair market value at home, the sugar will be subject to $1.89 duty plus 75 cents dumping duty or $2.64 in all.

The Cuban raw sugar coming into Canada is subject to more duty than empire sugar, and the government has agreed to refund to the importers any difference so that the refineries cost will be no greater than for empire sugar. Whether this concession is of a great deal of value I am not in a position to say. I will say this, however, I am not an economist but it has increased the trade with Cuba, and as a matter of fact it costs nothing from the consolidated revenue fund, as it is a bookkeeping account. Again I quote from the speech made by the hon. member for Lambton West when he says, as reported at page 185 of Hansard:

Our imports from Cuba for the first six months of 1951, January to June, were $2,776,000. For the period from January to June, 1952, our imports were $10,200,000 odd. Our exports to Cuba in the period from January to June, 1951, were $9 million odd and in the same period in 1952 were $13 million odd. In other words, our imports from Cuba in 1952 were four times as much as they were in 1951 and our exports to Cuba were about 50 per cent more.

That is, of course, the hon. member is comparing the first six months of 1951 and the first six months of 1952. These figures probably suit his purpose best, but it is not a fair picture. Let me give you figures showing the total Canadian trade with Cuba, as supplied by the bureau of statistics from 1947 to and including the first nine months of 1952:

Canadian trade with Cuba

	Exports	Imports
	Millions of Dollars
1947	7·5	23·7
1948	11·0	22·6
1949	14·4	6·6
1950	18·0	4·1
1951	20·4	8·3
1951 (nine months)	15·3	3·8
1952 (nine months)	18·5	15·2

During the first nine months of the present year imports from Cuba showed a very large increase, from less than $4 million in 1951 to $15 million in 1952. The explanation is that in the present year Cuba has been shipping her 1952 quota of sugar as well as part of the 1951 quota which could not be delivered during the previous year. At the Torquay conference in 1950 the Cuban negotiators had this picture before them, and while Canada was selling larger and larger quantities of goods to Cuba, the Canadians were buying virtually nothing in return in 1949, 1950 and 1951, as this table will show, when it is reproduced in Hansard. The Cubans threatened to withdraw tariff concessions previously granted unless Canada undertook to buy more Cuban sugar and goods; and the last nine months of 1952 would indicate that our trade balance was getting much closer to an equal basis.

Of course seed potatoes were sold to Cuba, but very few edible potatoes were exported because the Canadian market was the best in the world during the last couple of years. Again, wheat flour was replaced largely by wheat, as Cuba had installed milling equipment and purchased during the last year over $3 million worth of wheat. Again, the hon. member for Lambton West refers to action taken by the Bennett government in 1930. Well, I remember that situation. I do not suppose the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) remembers it because he was only a boy then.

Mr. Sinclair: A big boy.

Mr. MacKenzie: I well remember that situation, and it was a serious crisis for the beet industry in this country; for at that time fully refined sugar was available in the West Indies and in Cuba for as low as $1.68 per hundredweight. So on January 27, 1932, the government passed an order, P.C. 181, and gave the then minister of national revenue the authority to fix the price of sugar for duty purposes. Three days later the price was fixed at $2.30. If it sold for less than that the dumping duty could be applied.

Contrary to general belief, that order, P.C. 181, still stands, although the fixed value has disappeared because the fixed price of $2.30 would be no use now in any case.

The importation of unlimited quantities of refined sugar from Cuba or anywhere else creates a very serious problem for the sugar beet industry. It has been stated repeatedly that approximately 30 million pounds of refined sugar from Cuba have been sold in Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton during the past few months. During the last month—and these are figures from the bureau of statistics—I find that another 5 million pounds have arrived or 35 million in all, which is slightly over 2 per cent of our sugar consumption. Ontario and Quebec have approximately eight and a half million people and that would be about 4 pounds each. Most of that sugar would be consumed in Ontario and Quebec.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in itself is not disastrous, but steps must be taken to see that this does not continue. Next spring when navigation again opens, Cuba could, if she wished, unload, out of her huge surplus into our domestic market, quantities of sugar that could put our beet growers out of business; and another danger is she could lower her domestic price to the point where we would not be justified in applying the anti-dumping provision; for after all, her domestic market does not mean 5 per cent of her total production.

I might state that this arrangement with Cuba for raw sugar has another year to run before expiration; but this does not change the general sugar tariff regulations between Canada and Cuba. That structure remains the same. The duty on Cuban raw sugar coming into Canada in the ordinary way is $1.29 a hundredweight and on refined sugar $1.89 a hundredweight, with a 75 cents per hundredweight safeguard against sugar dumping. This same tariff and same regulation have been in effect for many years.

The truth is that Cuba had a surplus of sugar and she was probing around for new markets. She tried a few boat loads of refined sugar in Canada, paid the general tariff rate and appeared to keep her skirts clear of the dumping clause, as our customs officers assure us.

Another factor, of course, was that the Canadian dollar was at a premium, and that helped to pay some of the duty.

So far as I can determine, those importations of Cuban raw sugar have not the slightest effect on the price of sugar in Canada or elsewhere. The importation of refined sugar does not seem in general to have displaced the production of Canadian refineries, for I notice in the first ten months of this year, Canadian refineries sold 16,000 tons more sugar than they did in the corresponding months of last year. However, in southwestern Ontario, where the sugar has been chiefly distributed, they have a very large stock at the present time.

If the information that I have placed on record is correct, the statement made in the December 1 issue of "Sugar Facts", published by the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, and headed "Beet Industry Sold Down the River", is just not right. There is no truth in that statement. Duty on refined sugar entering Canada has not changed in years, and, as I have said previously, the Cuban treaty for raw sugar has not affected the price here in any way.

We must bear in mind that the arrangement with Cuba for 75,000 tons of raw sugar for 1951, 1952 and 1953, was not a GATT agreement—one flowing from the general agreement on tariffs and trade. It was a separate arrangement, although I believe it was discussed at some length at Torquay.

It is suggested that refined sugar from Cuba comes into Canada cheaper because of a lower wage scale in Cuba. Of course that is true; but the labour picture in all these countries during the past few years has changed drastically. I have figures from a quite authoritative source showing some of the cheap labour groups in the sugar industry in Cuba. In 1941 the collectors of sugar samples were paid $1.20 a day; in 1944, $1.98 a day; and in 1950, $4.50 per day. Mechanics in general are paid $9.90 per day, and highly skilled men at a higher rate. Of course it is true that our standard of living and our rate of pay is still much higher than theirs. The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company have two of the most modern refining plants in the world, one at Chatham and one at Wallaceburg. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) will notice that I have used the expression "two of the most modern", because I realize that there are some good ones in Alberta.

They have made great changes in their plants during the past two years and have a huge investment—they have a most efficient staff of office workers, factory workers and field men. They have set up a superannuation plan for their permanent workers; they have also a health and hospital plan, which is a very good one. In the past few years they have constructed loading stations in many of the farming centres, erected at great cost, to facilitate the handling of beets to the railway cars. The growers themselves have made very large investments in sugar beet machinery that cannot be utilized for any other kind of farming operations.

This is no time to play politics. This problem is vitally important to the industry in southwestern Ontario, and other parts of Canada, affecting the very livelihood of many engaged in this industry.

Our sugar beet industry in Canada must be saved. It played a most important part in our economy during the last war. It has faced serious handicaps in the past and survived, and it will continue to survive. I am confident this or any other government would want to retain this industry; because if the industry were destroyed or liquidated we might well pay for it in increased prices later on, if our own industry was not available.

I am sure the government officials are well aware of the present situation and I would suggest two or three courses that might be adopted in order to protect—and I do not like the word "protect"—to safeguard our sugar beet industry from any unfair competition:

1. The government might review the Canadian tariff to see if it provides reasonable, but not too great, protection to Canadian refineries.

2. It may be that the Cuban refineries are able to buy raw sugar more cheaply than it is being sold on world markets, and thus are in a position to compete unfairly with our refineries. I hope the government is looking into this possibility, and is taking adequate steps to protect Canadian producers and manufacturers against any such practice.

3. Again implement P.C. 181 and set the price of refined sugar for duty purposes high enough to safeguard the beet sugar industry from any distress selling.

Finally, I must say I am confident that a satisfactory solution will be found to safeguard this most important sugar beet industry for Canada. Before I sit down I want to emphasize once more that it has been repeated and repeated all over the country that the agreement with Cuba, under which we take 75,000 tons of sugar per year, has caused all our trouble; but I think I have given evidence here—at least I hope I have—to show that the Cuban agreement did not affect our sugar prices in any way.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before I come to the subjects with which I want to deal in the main part of my remarks today—trade and high taxation—there are one or two issues I should like to mention briefly as they are of particular concern to my constituency. They are, I must admit, of concern elsewhere as well, but they are amongst those national issues which at the moment we share in a particular way with the rest of the country.

The first of these is a question of which mention was made in the speech from the throne, namely the possibility of an amendment to the National Housing Act. Anyone who remembers the promises made by the Liberals in the 1945 election, a house for every Canadian family, and then realizes how far short of their promises the housing program of the Liberal government has fallen, will perhaps feel that I have some justification when I say that there are grave doubts whether even the amendment to the National Housing Act which is now forecast will do what is necessary to meet the need.

I have no knowledge of the situation in any part of the country other than my own riding, but I do know that in the city of Kamloops and in other towns and cities throughout my constituency there is no single problem of what I might call a social nature facing the people which is half as acute as the problem of securing adequate housing accommodation. It would not be so bad if this were a problem which was only of short duration, one in which an emergency or shortage had arisen suddenly, so the people might hope it would be dealt with and that the problem would disappear as the result of aggressive action by the government. This is a problem that has continued and increased since 1945. The distress and the number of those requiring housing accommodation have both increased every year, and in my view there is nothing in the field of social legislation or social security generally which is half as important and urgent at the moment as the need of providing some means whereby the people of this country with smaller incomes can obtain adequate, decent, reasonable living accommodation at decent and reasonable rents or purchase payments.

I am certainly hopeful that the amendment to be introduced to the National Housing Act will make some start in dealing with this problem, and I can assure the minister that he will be open to even more severe criticism than he has been in the past if the forecast amendment turns out to be nothing more than another piece of election eyewash. I believe the minister to be sincere in his desire to see a solution of the housing problem realized. I can assure him we on this side of the house will gladly co-operate, and help him by way of suggestions and by way of support for any proper legislation; but I can assure him that we on this side of the house will let it be known in no uncertain terms what we think of the amendment if it should turn out to be one which is merely designed to fool the people into thinking that something will be done about housing whereas in fact, if it should be the case, the amendment falls short of what is necessary.

I should now like to turn to another subject that is of interest to the whole of the dominion. It affects different parts of the country in different ways, it is true, but for the ultimate future prosperity of the whole country I think it is probably one of the most important subjects which we can discuss. I refer to the matter of trade, and particularly to the question of trade within the commonwealth. This is a subject on which we should clarify our thinking at the outset. So often we have heard, in discussions in the house, needless denials of the accuracy of what members are saying and needless confusion created because when we on this side refer to the loss of commonwealth markets the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) makes contradictory statements, sometimes even statements which could be classified as rude, as to how wrong we are in saying Canada has lost those markets.

However, we have become accustomed to that sort of attitude from the minister. But the difficulty is that he refers to what he says is the expanding trade in industrial commodities or raw materials between Canada and the other commonwealth countries, while what we are referring to primarily in this connection is the trade which used to exist between Canada and Great Britain in agricultural commodities. When I speak of the loss of our commonwealth markets it is those primary commodities which I have in mind, such things as beef and other meat products, apples, lumber, fish and other primary products for which Canada's greatest and most stable market has always been in the United Kingdom.

In that connection I might say that, so far as concerns the two products here which are of the most interest in my constituency, apples and beef, during the current year not one cent's worth of either of these products has been sold directly to the United Kingdom. The trend over the last few years has been steadily downward, a shrinking market for these which used to be our staple exports to the United Kingdom until this year, when not one cent's worth of either of these products has been purchased directly from us by Great Britain.

It is in the light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, that the country as a whole is, I am sure, so delighted to see the optimistic communiques that have been issued over the course of the past ten days from the commonwealth economic conference now taking place in London. It is of course too early to say whether the final results of the recommendations made by that conference will justify the optimism, but it is certainly an encouraging thing, especially from the point of view of our primary producers, that these communiques should be issued. It is also an encouraging thing that at long last, after repeated urgings by the official opposition and other opposition parties, this conference should have been arranged. It was not arranged at the invitation of the Canadian government as we think should have been the case, but the conference was arranged and has been attended by very important representatives from Canada. Certainly it is encouraging to our producers of apples and meat in British Columbia.

I should say in passing that the so-called floor price policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to meet the emergency situation created by the loss of the United States market has been an unqualified flop. The floor price program has meant nothing to the producers of British Columbia. I know whereof I speak because I can illustrate the extent to which it was a farce by telling you, Mr. Speaker, that when the cattle producers of British Columbia on one occasion—this is just one example—were arranging for one of their public auctions they asked me to see if I could arrange to have the department send a representative to attend the sale because it was anticipated that a large volume of cattle would be offered and that prices might go well below the floor. They were drifting steadily lower and were just about at floor levels then. I wired asking that a representative of the department attend this sale for the purpose of supporting prices as outlined in the minister's statement of June 27. We received a telegram in reply to the effect that a representative would attend the sale as requested in my telegram.

It is true that a representative was there, but prices were not held at support levels. During the sale we spoke to this gentleman, who said it was true that he had been sent by the department. We asked him whether he was going to see that prices were held at support levels and if he was going to buy; and he said, "Oh, no, I have no authority to buy; I am here simply to observe."

That is typical of the way in which the support price program has been implemented—or not implemented—throughout British Columbia, and of the way in which the measures announced from time to time by the government have failed our primary producers.

The United States market, with all its uncertainties, affords no adequate compensation in this field for the loss of the British market. As I see it, there is only one main thing which will restore stability to agriculture and to our other primary producers in Canada; that is the restoration and the continuation of the former volume of trade between this country and the United Kingdom.

Having said that, I say again that we are delighted with the optimistic reports which have been published in connection with the progress of this conference in London. I want to make it clear that we are also very glad indeed that the two delegates representing Canada should be no lower in rank than our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I think that indicates the proper degree of importance to be attached to this conference.

Although I regret the previous attitude adopted by this government toward the question of a commonwealth economic conference, I would not for a moment suggest that the presence of the Canadian delegation, and the fact that that conference is being attended by our Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, has not contributed in a large measure to the success of the conference. I must say that the measure of our gratification at finding that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance were going was due in no small part to our previous uncertainty as to whether Canada would send anybody at all, because of the past attitude of this government toward the question of such an economic trade conference every time the matter has been raised in the house.

Perhaps I should pause here to observe that it was a week ago today that we had what I might call a little lecture from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on the subject of consistency. He undertook to administer a rebuke to the official opposition, the Conservative party, and suggested that we were not consistent in connection with the subject of trade within the commonwealth. I think we all know the old proverb: Consistency, thou art a jewel. If consistency is a jewel, the government's record in this regard I think can be said without exaggeration to be a fake stone.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member says, "Oh, oh". The hon. member is on the government side and he will remember that every year for the last three or four years we have pressed with every resource we could bring to bear in this house that Canada should take the lead in calling for a commonwealth economic conference. Every year the government rejected that proposal. By way of contrast with the government's previous attitude, a contrast which I think the country will be interested in having laid before it, I should like to read on the one hand some of the communiques which have been issued from the conference forecasting good results, and on the other some of the statements made in this house on previous occasions by ministers of the government who are most concerned with the question of an economic conference.

I have made a few extracts from headlines which have appeared in newspapers during the past week or so, over stories dealing with the progress of this conference. Starting with the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 3 I have a headline reading—

Commonwealth leaders to sit in with cabinet—

The cabinet referred to there is of course the British cabinet. The article then went on to describe the preliminary discussions which were taking place, and to report the optimistic hopes that were expressed for good results. Then the Montreal Gazette of Thursday, December 4, had this headline:

Good progress made in commonwealth talk

Then the Ottawa Journal of December 5 headed its article for the day with this headline:

Empire leaders make headway on expanding trade problems.

The detail of the article contains the following passage:

It is understood that the commonwealth goal remains the same—the creation of conditions favourable to convertibility.

The article goes on to say:

This is not expected to happen overnight.

And again:

The conference, now entering its seventh day, has definitely shown a desire to move away from restrictionism into a situation where the emphasis will be on expansion. A Canadian source said: "Very real headway" has been made.

Then going back to the Toronto Globe and Mail again of Saturday last it reports a decision for which we have also been pressing on this side of the house. The headline reads:

Commonwealth decision—ask U.S. raise gold price

Then in smaller print:

Boost would aid sterling, parley view.

Then the Montreal Gazette for yesterday, December 11, has an article bearing this headline:

Pound plan agreed to in London

Then the article goes on to report in detail the fact that the conference hoped to find a way to institute steps which will ultimately lead to a return of convertibility between the dollar and the pound. Then there is a final report in the Montreal Gazette of today headlined:

PMs outline new course in economics

As I say, it is much too early for anyone to say whether or not the results will justify the optimistic headlines, but as we look at the headlines and read the details of the reports we can see that the conference has made a real effort to grasp and to deal with the problems that stand in the way of commonwealth trade and prevent the restoration of convertibility. I think we can say without doubt that they have worked out proposals in that regard which if put into effect, and with the co-operation of the other great nation of the world vitally concerned, namely the United States, will represent a real beginning in the elimination of the roadblocks that stand on the highways of commonwealth trade.

When you consider these headlines, and take encouragement from these possibilities, I am sure you will be interested, as I was, in looking over some of the disparaging remarks about the possible outcome of this conference that were made here by ministers most responsible in this connection, namely, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

The record goes back for some time, but today I am only going to cite one or two of the more outstanding examples of the attitude of these gentlemen to the effect that such a conference could serve no useful purpose, and particularly that Canada should not take the initiative in calling such a conference. May I remind you, sir, that Canada has more to gain from the restoration of convertibility than any other country in the world. We moved a resolution in 1950 suggesting that Canada take the initiative "in convening at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth and the countries of the empire to devise policies to restore our lost markets and thereby provide jobs for our Canadian people". This motion was moved on February 28, 1950, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

After saying that he was always willing to go to conferences—if they were called by somebody else—the Minister of Finance said this, as reported at page 313 of Hansard for February 28, 1950:

While I have no doubt it will be found desirable to hold further conferences to discuss trade matters, I do not know that the holding of a full-fledged commonwealth or empire conference at this time would add very much to the knowledge of this or any other member of the commonwealth in reference to specific solutions which can be found for these trade difficulties.

I wonder if the minister will have the same statement to make about the results of this conference when he comes home. I have looked carefully, Mr. Speaker, but I notice that at no time did the Canadian delegation or any spokesman for Canada in any way dissociate himself from the communiques to which I have referred, which have been isued from the conference just concluded, so one wonders how the minister will reconcile the two statements.

It may be said, and I dare say the Minister of Finance will say, that the quotation just read was made in 1950, two years ago, and conditions were different. But what about June 2, 1952, just six months ago? We moved the same motion on that date. The amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on that occasion suggested that "the government should take steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth to seek means by which there may be convertibility of commonwealth currencies, and to explore all the possibilities for enlarging those traditional markets upon which our prosperity so largely depends". The Minister of Finance, speaking in this house just last June—here is consistency for you—used these words as found at page 2860 of Hansard for June 3, 1952:

> We are all anxious to explore—I am using the language of the amendment—all the possibilities for restoring and enlarging those traditional markets upon which our prosperity so largely depends. Like my colleague,—

The reference there is to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

> —if I thought that another conference would really advance either of those objectives I would heartily support the holding of such a conference.

But he went on to say:

> It is for that reason and on that aspect of the amendment that I feel it would be quite improper for us to make such a suggestion.

That is, that a conference be held.

Now what about the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose department is the one most concerned with Canadian trade? He also spoke on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, and after having said a lot of other things he was finally brought around, but only as the result of an interjection, to the question of the resolution that a conference be called, and then all he had to say last June, as recorded at page 2856 of Hansard, was this:

> I do not think the resolution is important. I do not think I will deal with it.

I have not heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggest that the conference just concluded is not important. I have not heard him suggest that the communiques, indicating that the conference was making good progress in solving the problems in relation to convertibility and the restoration of trade, are not important. Where is the consistency here? How are we to reconcile the fact that this government, thank the Lord, is finally attending such a conference, and the attitude of last June 3 as revealed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he said at page 2857 of Hansard for that date:

> I want to say that if I believed the amendment to this motion would bring about convertibility of currencies or would bring about a strengthening of our trade with the United Kingdom, I would be glad to vote for it. But as I believe that the amendment would bring about no worth-while result whatever, I cannot go quite that far.

The amendment, Mr. Speaker, asked the government to take steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth to seek means by which there might be convertibility of commonwealth currencies and restoration of trade. Last June the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he did not believe such a move would do anything to bring about convertibility of currencies or strengthen our trade. He did not believe it would bring about any worthwhile result whatever.

Consistency? Where is the consistency in this government? The tragedy is that this conference is taking place about three years too late. If the government had been willing to discharge its responsibilities, and if it had been willing to attach, as it should have done then, a proper importance and significance to Canada's place within the commonwealth and Canada's potential influence within the commonwealth, I suggest to you, sir, they would not have hesitated to take the lead in calling such a conference as we asked them to do, a conference which has just been proven to have such possibilities of benefit.

Then we had a further lecture on inconsistency from the gentleman to whom I referred earlier, with respect to suggestions as to how trade within the commonwealth might be restored. We were asked what our policies were. I think it is a well established principle that it is not for the opposition to suggest policy. Sometimes we are willing to accept that responsibility when, as so often happens, the government does not have a policy. But they are certainly not discharging their responsibility when the government ask us how we would solve these problems. It was suggested that one or two divergent views had been expressed on this side of the house concerning how this problem might be dealt with. There were criticisms of the statements which had been made by Conservative members in the house.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that occasionally members, speaking as members representing their constituencies, make statements which are different from those of others. But it is not the case in this party, as it is in the Liberal party so often, that those members are speaking for their party with respect to its policy when they make those statements. Our view is that a member's duty is to his constituency, and I would suggest that might be a view which it would be profitable for some hon. members opposite to have applied on one or two occasions instead of voting for government motions or against opposition motions when their vote was directly against the interests of their constituencies. I can understand the pressure that is brought to bear on them. It is ridiculous, and it is a measure of the weakness of the government's case, when criticisms are directed against this side or defences are given of the government's policy on the basis of the fact that occasionally a private member, speaking as the representative of his constituency and most obviously speaking in that capacity, makes a statement which in some particular way has an application which is a little different from the party's policy expressed on other occasions.

I would ask hon. members, and particularly the hon. gentleman who made the suggestion of inconsistency, although he is not in the house now, how this compares with the inconsistency which is evident when a member of the cabinet makes statements of policy completely at variance with the policy actually being pursued by the government, and makes those statements in a place where he represents the government? When the gentleman making them, in addition to being a member of the cabinet is the leader of the government in that place where he makes them? That has just recently happened, yet that contradiction, that variation in policy, goes virtually unnoticed and certainly not dealt with by the government.

It would be interesting to hear—and I hope we shall do so—from a member of the government, how they explain this division. I hope we shall hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whether the statement of policy made in the other chamber recently does in fact accurately state the position and the policy of the government. It would be interesting to know.

We remember the chastisement sought to be delivered to my friends of the C.C.F. last spring by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when they suggested that there was not sufficient civilian control of NATO. It would be interesting to know who now is the spokesman for the government, whether it is the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the leader of the government in the Senate who happens to be minister without portfolio, because that hon. gentleman says there is not sufficient civilian control of NATO. That hon. gentleman also says that in the whole of his recent pronouncement he is not going beyond the expressions of policy stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It would be interesting to know whether the government's policy really is economic union within NATO. It would be interesting to know whether the government believes in complete trading unity within the NATO countries within the next ten years. Is that government policy? Is that where we are heading? We should like to know; and, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this house and this country are entitled to know, because that has certainly never been suggested as government policy before. But it has been stated now beyond any question of doubt that that is government policy; and in making those suggestions, and that it should be the objective to be achieved in ten years, the hon. gentleman who made them said he was not going beyond the views and the policy of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I certainly express the hope that we shall hear from the government. In fact I should go further and say that there is an obligation on the part of the government and of the Prime Minister to state what is the position of the government in this respect, what is their policy, so the house and the country may know; and also so that, if it is not their policy, there might be the clearest statement of the fact and that the necessary steps might be taken to deal with it so the country will know just where we stand.

In this regard I should just like to place on Hansard one or two quotations from a constitutional authority. The first one is from Jennings on "Cabinet Government", at page 461:

> The proposals made by a minister, whether or not they have been approved by the cabinet, are the proposals of the government.

In that connection, in a rather less didactic way, Jennings has the following observations to make which, although expressed in less learned language, I think are just as pertinent. At page 258 he says:

> That puts the matter precisely; they must all tell the same story.

Then, after saying that the government must make up its mind and have one policy, that it cannot have four or five different ones, however much it would like to have them—although this government on occasion quite improperly tried to have some half dozen policies and even, on occasion, to pursue them all at the same time—at page 259 Mr. Jennings says:

> A government that cannot make up its mind on a fundamental issue ought not to be the government and will be so regarded in the constituencies. Its fall may be regarded as imminent.

However, to get away from this question of consistency itself, Mr. Speaker, and using it as a channel along which one may come back to this question of trade, let me say this. You will remember that it was suggested that what had been said on one or two occasions was not consistent with the policy of "trade, not aid" which—as we have said ourselves, and as we repeat—should govern our attitude on this question of trade within the commonwealth. We have always said that we must buy from the United Kingdom if we are to sell to them. That has been our position over the years. In fact we have suggested and we still suggest that it is up to Canada to buy, particularly in the defence field, those things which we do not ourselves produce and which the British are qualified and best equipped to produce. What has been the result of government policy in this regard? Hon. gentlemen opposite piously suggest that the government is consistent here. What has been the result of their policy? I point out that a report which was issued by the bureau of statistics shows this with respect to the last year:

On imports,—

I may say that I am reading from a Canadian Press dispatch summarizing the report.

—the U.S. supplied 74·8 per cent of Canada's needs, up from 70 per cent in the previous year, while the proportion from Britain dropped to 8·3 per cent from 10·7.

That is the government's record in that regard. Yet they piously say that the only solution is trade, not aid, and that we must buy from the United Kingdom. Then we see that in one year imports, already fairly slim, dropped from 10·7 per cent to 8·3 per cent, a drop of over 2 per cent.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the reference?

Mr. Fulton: That is a Canadian Press summary of a report which is issued by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. McIlraith: What date?

Mr. Fulton: This is taken from the Gazette of December 12; it is datelined "Ottawa, December 11" and reads as follows:

Expanding exports may make Canada this year the world's third largest trading power, government trade experts said today.

I apologize and I must make a correction. It is apparently not the bureau of statistics. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, it is; further down it says:

The possibility that Canada may overtake France was raised in the bureau of statistics 67-page review of foreign trade for the first half of 1952. The report showed these developments.

Then it went on to list the development in paragraphs numbered from 1 to 5; and it was paragraph 5 which I quoted and which described the drop of imports from the United Kingdom from 10·7 per cent to 8·3 per cent.

Not only have we emphasized the necessity of importing from the United Kingdom those things which we have to import, and said that we should concentrate on getting them from there, if possible; but in this regard we have made specific suggestions which have been, unfortunately, disregarded by the government to the detriment of this country and of our trade.

I will give just one example, Mr. Speaker. Two years ago we made a positive recommendation that Canada should buy or attempt to buy the British Centurion tank, rather than United States tanks; but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce both stated positively at that time that Canada would buy United States tanks. The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), as reported at page 912 of Hansard for 1951, said:

We will procure our tanks from the United States.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said on May 9, 1951, as reported at page 2872 of Hansard:

We have now the opportunity of buying from the United States the latest tanks, and they will be coming with the equipment for the two divisions we transferred to Europe.

We said that they should place orders for Centurion tanks. The ministers said they were going to buy in the United States. It has recently been announced that the decision has been made to buy Centurion tanks. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, just how much money has been wasted in the meantime on United States tanks. I do not want to be offensive, but it is safe to say the United States tanks are not the best tanks, and not as good as Centurions. How much money was wasted, and how much time was lost before they decided to make the change—a change which should have been made earlier both from a tactical point of view and from a trade and economic point of view—so that the dollars which would go to Britain for her tanks might have been used by her in return to buy from Canada?

I conclude by saying it is absolute nonsense for the government to suggest that we have not made concrete proposals. There are others which could be made, but I am not going to extend my remarks now to make them. I shall do so at a later date along with other suggestions along the same line. But I say that two of the reasons our agricultural producers find themselves without their traditional market in the United Kingdom for their products at the present time are, first, that the government has been so dilatory and shown such a lack of interest in the question of commonwealth economic conferences and trade; and, second, that they have overlooked opportunities of making purchases from Britain either directly or by taking out licences to manufacture British equipment in Canada, for both of which dollars would go overseas, thus directly increasing the flow of dollars which the United Kingdom would have had with which to buy from us, while at the same time serving our own defence purposes.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for giving me a couple of minutes so I can answer points which have been raised by the hon. member for Kamloops with regard to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who of course is still in London.

This quite extraordinary statement of the hon. member for Kamloops apparently is an attempt to anticipate, by reading newspaper headlines, what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself will report to this house when he returns here tomorrow. However, I want to make it quite clear now to all hon. members—I am sure it is already clear to all except the hon. member for Kamloops—that there is no roadblock to commonwealth trade as far as Canada is concerned. What are the roadblocks to commonwealth trade today? Import and export restrictions on goods; bans on goods; currency controls; bans on export of currency from the sterling bloc. Canada today has no export or import controls on any of her goods, other than the export of strategic materials to behind the iron curtain. Our currency is one of the two or three currencies in the world which is completely convertible to any other currency on open money markets. We have done the right thing. It was difficult in the post-war period to get to this free trading position, but we did it because of the courageous financial and economic measures of this government, and in particular those sponsored by the Minister of Finance.

We have heard this cry for convertibility of sterling from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on the hustings. Never has he got down to brass tacks on how it is to be done. The hon. member for Kamloops suggested that was not the job of the opposition. I place Colonel Drew's solution of convertibility of sterling on the same plane as General MacArthur's solution to end the war in Korea, which he apparently has kept for some time from the government.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Sinclair: I sat through your speech, so you can at least take these two minutes in reply.

But actually the press clippings to which he referred do indicate that the conference has realized that the only way to increase commonwealth trade and world trade is to take the course which Canada took: Not more restrictions; not more currency restrictions; not more import and export restrictions, but the other direction of getting away from both these quantitative and qualitative trade restrictions, and getting away from currency restrictions. The same press clippings, which I read, have also indicated that the majority of the commonwealth members agree that the way to expand trade is not by confining our trade to any one bloc of nations but to seek to expand trade to every country in the world as we and 34 other nations have done in the general agreements on tariffs and trade, which we signed at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay.

The hon. member mentioned, too, the difference in the Tory and Liberal attitudes toward trade. Every year since 1945 in this house we have heard the same calamity chorus from the Tories, about how our trade was falling off and we were facing ruin. Well, let me give you not the calamity chorus, but just the rough group of hard facts. In 1930, when R. B. Bennett came to power with the Tory policy that he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world, he had a commonwealth conference.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. gentleman of course does not afford me the courtesy that I have shown him, of listening to him. I am now speaking of facts from the record. He did call a commonwealth conference, yes. His solution at that conference to world stagnation of trade was to advocate raising the barriers higher against all countries outside the commonwealth, and a British minister at that time rightly called that Tory policy "humbug". It was humbug then and it is humbug today.

A Liberal government took over in 1935. Canada's total export and import trade that year was $1·3 billion. This year it is over $8 billion. That is the difference between Liberal policy and Tory policy as far as trade is concerned. And here in this house, despite—

Mr. Fulton: If there ever was humbug, that is humbug.

Mr. Sinclair: Here in this house this year, despite what we hear from the hon. member for Kamloops, we have heard Tory members plead for increases in the tariff on sugar, increases in the tariff on textiles, increases in the tariff on tobacco, all of which come from the sterling bloc; a return to this humbug policy of Bennett's.

Let me read you now not headlines from the Globe and Mail picked out of press conferences in London, or lack of press conferences in London. Let me read the whole editorial in the leading financial paper of Canada, the Financial Post, of this week. If my hon. friend reads beyond the headlines, he may have read this:

Gloomsters wrong again

Canada's gross national product—the total value of goods and services produced—is going through the roof again in 1952.

And well through it too. Estimates put it at over $23 billions—some 8 per cent above 1951's record of $21·2 billions.

Listen to this, and remember the remarks just made by the hon. member for Kamloops.

The Canadian family photograph should show most business and consumers smiling this year.

And well they are. I continue:

First-half woes in many lines of producing, manufacturing and selling, have given way to better days in the past six months.

Mr. Cardiff: What are you reading from?

Mr. Sinclair: The Financial Post. I would advise you to read it, too. The editorial continues:

Christmas trade, for instance, should break all records.

Important in 1952's figures is the fact that prices are only a few points above last year's averages. Hence, in real terms of goods and services, Canadians are producing and selling a lot more than they ever did before. And even after tax bites, they are left with more to spend or to save.

Looking ahead into 1953, the elements of growth will still be with us, heavy investment, strong consumer desires for more and better things. Of course, there are some soft spots—

And we admit it; trade in the world today is always difficult.

—shifts within the totals, some worries over export markets, plus man-made restrictions on immigration.

But if we can successfully counter those factors, there's the prospect for a broad basis of prosperity for 1953.

Once again, it would seem, the gloomsters—

This is a word the Financial Post has coined, but it is a word which certainly describes the Tory members in this house:

—will have to postpone the day for "tough times" to begin.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister two questions. First, do I take it that the hon. gentleman does feel that this conference will produce beneficial results in the restoration of convertibility and trade between the commonwealth nations?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, I for one am quite anxious to hear the Prime Minister since he attended the conference. I would say that if the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) had been reading beyond the headlines he would see that the conference has turned to what I would call the Canadian approach of increasing trade by removing tariff barriers, by getting away from currency restrictions. I again suggest to him that he wait until Monday, when the Prime Minister will be back. He will be able to give the hon. member facts, not headlines, and a direct answer to the question he is now asking.

Mr. Fulton: The second question is this: Since the hon. member agrees the conference was beneficial, does he not think it would have been a good thing to have had this favourable result three years ago, by taking the lead in calling a conference then, as we then urged in this House of Commons, to do the things this conference has been doing?

Mr. Sinclair: I again suggest, as I said at the beginning, that if the hon. member was really interested in knowing the results of the conference, then he should have contained himself until Monday, at which time the Prime Minister will be back. But, so far as that is concerned, I suggest that the commonwealth and other countries would have been far better off if they had practised more closely the policies we have pursued, by which we have raised our trade from $1·3 billion in Tory days to $8 billion today.

Mr. Fulton: The minister does not care to answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has not answered the question. He just spoke more humbug—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot speak twice. He may ask a question; but in the last instance the hon. member was not asking a question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He was making a second speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He was saying that the hon. member had not replied to his question, and that is tantamount to speaking twice. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may proceed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my re-entry into this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne arises from my concern over a ghost—a ghost of something that most of us had hoped was dead but which, for a great many people in my province at any rate, is very much alive. The agony being caused to these people is such that, with Christmas just around the corner, I feel the government should take action to end its existence for all time.

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Mr. Knowles: I gather that my hon. friend wants that observation to apply to the government. I do not mind that, but I was referring to the ghost of the means test under the former Old Age Pensions Act.

Hon. members in the house generally, even those who voted against the removal of the means test not many months ago, rejoice in the fact that it no longer applies to the old age pension so far as Canadians of 70 years of age and over are concerned. As one who for many years urged that the means test should be abolished I, too, was most happy to be here and to take part in enacting the legislation in which provision was made for a universal old age pension to all 70 years of age and over. But the fact is that in my province—it may be happening in others, but I shall confine my remarks to my own province, because I have evidence of what is happening there—Canadians 70 years of age and over, who are now drawing the new federal pension free of any means test, are in many cases being hounded for repayments arising from alleged overpayments during the years they were under the former old age pension legislation, to which was attached a means test.

Someone may say to me immediately that if this is happening primarily in Manitoba, then it must be something for the government of that province to deal with. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the letters, a number of which I have here and to which I shall later refer, which are being sent to old age pensioners in Manitoba making demand for repayment, are from officials of the old age pensions board in that province. I must point out, however, that in a number of these letters—and I shall offer quotations in support of what I say—it is being said to the people in Manitoba that the province is obligated to seek these recoveries by virtue of the terms of the federal legislation. Not only are Manitoba old age pensioners being told in these letters that the villain of the piece is the federal government, but it is also a matter of record that this question has been tossed back and forth for several months between Ottawa and the provinces. I have been in the midst of that tossing about, myself, as will be evident from some of the matters of record which I shall recall at this time.

On March 12 of last session, as reported at pages 356 and 357 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) if it was not time to advise the provinces that they did not need to continue any longer the practice of making recoveries from the estates of deceased pensioners, or the practice of making recoveries in cases of alleged overpayment. The minister told me on that occasion there was nothing he could do about it because it was a matter governed by the existing law.

Well, one could not do much through questions asked on the orders of the day, so at the first opportunity after that date I took part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which was then in progress, and drew the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the fact that on February 12, 1952, a statement concerning this matter had been made in the Manitoba legislature by the minister of health and public welfare in that province.

Despite the fact that in the Manitoba legislature they have no record equivalent to our Hansard, this statement was regarded as of sufficient importance to merit its being reported in the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly for February 12, 1952. I quote from page 2 the words of Hon. Mr. Schultz:

> In regard to the collection of claims against the estates of deceased pensioners in this group the legislation of the federal government and the obligations under the agreement submitted for signature by the federal government compels this province in accordance with similar agreements with every other province, to collect from the estates of deceased pensioners where the estate is over $2,000 net. Neither Manitoba nor any other province has any option in this matter at the present time.

When I drew this to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare during the course of my speech in that debate of the last session he chose to interrupt me at that point, as is recorded at page 545 of Hansard for March 18, 1952, by making this interesting interjection:

> Mr. Martin: Of course Mr. Schultz knows that is not a correct statement, as does my hon. friend.

Well, I made a reply to that at greater length than I would wish to quote in full at this time, the main point of which was that I hoped what the Minister of National Health and Welfare was then saying would set the matter right, and that the provinces would realize that they did not have to continue the policy of making recoveries, as was the case when we were under the former Old Age Pensions Act.

As a matter of fact the exchanges continued during the course of that speech until, I thought, the minister changed his ground a bit; but he still stuck to the position that this matter of making recoveries was entirely up to the provinces.

But at the end he said:

> This is a matter determined by existing law and on the basis of agreements between the federal and provincial governments; and until we know the attitude of all governments in respect to this matter we cannot take any action with regard to the existing law. Surely that is the situation, and I should think my hon. friend would be the first to agree that I have correctly stated it.

It seems to me that what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made clear by his interjections in my speech was that in the first place Mr. Schultz had no right to put the blame entirely on the federal government, which would seem to suggest that from the standpoint of the Minister of National Health and Welfare the blame goes back to Manitoba. But then he also suggested there is something the federal government can do about it, because he says it is covered by the existing law. The existing law is the Old Age Pensions Act of 1926 passed by the parliament of Canada which is still on the statute books, and under which the policy of recoveries is still being pursued.

I have asked repeatedly that this former act be rescinded or repealed, whichever is the correct term, so that the recovery policies required under it could be discontinued. There is a provision in the Old Age Security Act, chapter 18 of the statutes of 1951, second session, section 13, subsection 2, which reads as follows:

> The Old Age Pensions Act is repealed on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

It was on the basis of the authority vested in the governor in council to do away with the former Old Age Pensions Act that I asked again just a few days ago for the end of that act to be effected. Before I refer to the question I asked a few days ago, may I say that after getting from the Minister of National Health and Welfare last spring the view that Mr. Schultz was wrong, that Manitoba was not being compelled by federal legislation to continue this policy of making these recoveries I drew that information to the attention of the officials of the provincial old age pensions board in Manitoba. I found them quite interested. They referred to Hansard themselves and noted with interest, as I say, what the minister had said.

I expressed the hope to these officials that as the result of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare had said they would feel free to discontinue seeking to make recoveries out of estates of deceased pensioners, and to discontinue seeking to make recoveries from elderly people still alive for little overpayments that they are supposed to have had in 1951, 1950 or in earlier years. My discussion with these officials was for the most part verbal, but on one occasion we had an exchange of letters about a particular case. At that time I asked how things were going with regard to the policy of recovery and I had this reply from Mr. Locksley D. McNeill, chairman of what is now the old age assistance and blind persons allowances board of Manitoba. It is dated September 23, 1952. This is what he said in the last paragraph of his letter:

> The recovery policy appears to stand pretty much as it was earlier in the spring, that is, the dominion government has not specifically agreed that the provinces may feel free to discontinue their efforts to make recoveries against those estates which are in excess of $2,000.

So it goes, Mr. Speaker, back and forth. Manitoba says: We do this because we are compelled to do so by Ottawa, by the federal legislation, by the fact that the federal government has not released us from the necessity of doing it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare says that under federal legislation the provinces are not compelled to do it. The province comes back and says there has been no change, that they are still being forced to do it under the terms of federal legislation.

I pick up for a moment one of the many letters I have that have been written to old age pensioners in Manitoba seeking recoveries of overpayments. This one is dated August 1, 1952, and is likewise over the signature of Mr. McNeill, chairman of the board of that province. It was addressed to Mr. and Mrs. B, former residents of Winnipeg who are now residing in a town outside the city of Winnipeg. After having pressed the case for repayment—and I will come back to this case later—he says:

> You can see from this that the matter is one which is in a sense out of our hands. We carry out the procedure laid down by the dominion legislation.

The latest chapter in this story, so far as this parliament is concerned, took place this session on November 24 when I put a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I put it to him in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and it will be found at page 18 of Hansard for that date. My question reads as follows:

> Can the Prime Minister say when the former Old Age Pensions Act will be repealed so that provinces like Manitoba, which are pressing needy pensioners to make repayment and which are still making recoveries out of the estates of deceased pensioners, can discontinue this practice?

The Prime Minister referred the question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and this was his reply:

I want to thank the member for Winnipeg North Centre for giving notice of this question. A similar question was answered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on June 24, page 3610 of Hansard, and on June 27 last, page 3833 of Hansard. It is the intention of the government to proclaim the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act as soon as there is agreement from the provinces which co-sponsored this act that this should be done. Not all of the provinces have yet agreed on the desirability of repeal at this time, but it is hoped that agreement will be reached shortly so that the necessary proclamation can be made.

I recall very well, of course, the statements the Minister of National Health and Welfare made on this matter during the last session, and I confess I am disturbed at the suggestion that this federal law cannot be repealed, despite the fact that parliament has given the governor in council power to do so, until there is consent of all the provinces with respect to the matter. In the answer of the parliamentary assistant which I have just quoted he used the phrase, "the provinces which co-sponsored this act." May I remind him and the government of a bit of ancient history with respect to this matter which nevertheless is important because it bears upon this act. On April 15, 1926, when the Old Age Pensions Act was under discussion and was being put through the house for the first time—I should not say the first time because it was the second time; the first time it was put through it was killed in the other place—there was a request from the Conservative opposition of that day to have the old age pensions bill delayed. But Mr. King, who was then Prime Minister, replied in these terms, as recorded at pages 2501 and 2502 of Hansard for April 15, 1926:

The bill has been prepared with a view to avoiding delays and in order to enable any provincial government that may care to enact at once, with respect to old age pensions, legislation in conformity with the requirements of this measure to take advantage of the proposed scheme. If some provinces do not desire to pass such legislation, that determination will in no way affect the situation except in so far as they are concerned. But as a federal government we want to show our readiness at the earliest possible moment to assist any province as soon as it is prepared to enact legislation along the lines here laid down.

I read that quotation to remind hon. members of what they all know, namely that when the Old Age Pensions Act was first put upon the statute books it was made law in precisely those terms. It was enabling legislation which came into effect in the various provinces over a long period of time. I believe it was eight or nine years before all of the then nine provinces took advantage of the law, but the provinces that were ready to enter into such meagre generosity as that measure involved were not held back because some of the other provinces were not ready. In other words the original law was not a co-sponsored piece of legislation at all. It was an act of the federal parliament which was put upon the statute books in such a manner that the provinces could participate in it as they wished.

I think it is perfectly reasonable for me to ask that the same practice, the same spirit be followed now so far as ending the means test Old Age Pensions Act is concerned. If there are some provinces that insist on being permitted to continue to make these recoveries, perchance the federal government might feel that it has to yield to their desire, but if there are provinces which infer, as Mr. Schultz I take it has inferred—he is no longer the minister, but he was at that time—that but for the federal government standing in their way they would like to discontinue these recoveries, then I suggest that the federal government should indicate to these provinces that so far as it is concerned it will be all right for them to discontinue these recoveries.

I know of cases where attempts are being made to collect from the estates of deceased pensioners. It seems to me that is a most abhorrent practice which is completely in violation of the whole idea that this parliament finally arrived at, that the means test should be done away with. If the means test is dead, let it stay dead. What I suggest is even more abhorrent and more repugnant to our thinking today is the way in which old people who are still alive are being pressed for the repayment of amounts that they got in 1951 or 1950. It is coming close to Christmas. Cannot the government take action on this matter right away? It could be done under the section I read in the Old Age Security Act repealing the Old Age Pensions Act whenever the government so decides, and that would be the end of it.

If it cannot do it that way then it could write to a province like Manitoba, who say they are doing this because the federal government wants them to, and say that so far as Ottawa is concerned Manitoba does not need to press these old people any more. When the amounts are collected they are pitifully small, not to mention the administrative and collection costs. Those costs must represent a large percentage of the amount recovered. After an amount is recovered by a province like Manitoba it is permitted to retain only 25 per cent because that was the portion put in by the province to the former pension. The 75 per cent remitted to Ottawa is so small in terms of federal revenues and budgets that I am sure it is not for the purpose of getting in dollars that this policy of pressing for these repayments is still being pursued.

I said I would indicate to the house the nature of some of these cases and refer to some of the letters I have on my desk. So that hon. members may know that I am not just talking about something I have just heard about or one single case, may I say that this matter has been the subject of more correspondence than any other one subject since I came to this session in the middle of November.

The letters I have received from some of these old people who have only $40 per month and who think that money is theirs without any attachment are heart-rending indeed. They wonder how they are going to find the $5, the $10, the $100 or whatever it may be to meet the demand of the Manitoba government, which Manitoba says it is making because Ottawa requires it to do so.

Here is the case of Mr. and Mrs. D who live on Agnes street in my constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. I have here a letter over the signature of an official of the old age pensions board in Winnipeg telling them that the return from a little bit of property they had before they ever went on pension would have to be computed as so much income per year so long as that pension lasted. It so happened that these people, like a good many others in my city, made a little money during the flood year of 1950 when people were called upon to take all sorts of jobs. At any rate it added up that these people obtained $34.09 in 1950—mind you it was the two of them—more than the means test in that year allowed them to have. In 1951 the means test was still in effect but the authorities in Manitoba did not get around to deducting that alleged overpayment of $34.09 from these people. Instead they have now found by their own methods of computation that in 1951 the two of them had obtained $48.09 more than they were permitted to obtain in that year. Well along in 1952 these two old people who receive the present pension of $40 a month, which everyone from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) down receives, who think it is theirs because there is no means test, get these demanding letters requiring them to pay back the sum of those two amounts or $82.18.

That may not seem a large sum to certain people, but it is an awful lot of money to two old people who have only $40 a month each, or a total of $80 a month between them. In connection with this particular case I happen to know that while this correspondence has been going on the husband has passed away. What will happen by way of further pressure on the widow to pay both her husband's share and her own share of the back debt, coupled with the fact that her income is now reduced to $40 per month, is something for hon. members to contemplate.

I suggest that it is a reprehensible practice the Manitoba authorities are pursuing. If I could put the blame wholly on Manitoba I would not be making this speech today in the House of Commons. But they say they are doing it because of the federal legislation. They go further and say that even if the legislation has not been wiped out they are quite willing to discontinue this practice if Ottawa would release them from the necessity of collecting these overpayments, but that release has not yet been given.

Here is the case of Mr. and Mrs. S who live on Langside street in my constituency. Due to illness, one of them is living with one son and daughter-in-law and the other with another. In November of 1952 the board reviewed the files of these people and considered Mrs. S as receiving free board from the son and daughter-in-law with whom she is living on a farm just outside Winnipeg. They add it all up and they bill this old couple for overpayment in the amount of $5, and they ask each of them to please remit $2.50.

An hon. Member: A Liberal government.

Mr. Knowles: That amount may not seem great to many of us, but it is a tough amount for people to get together when their income is only $40 a month. What a disgrace for governments to put into operation all this administrative machinery and undergo this administrative cost in order to get $2.50 each out of these old people. I say to the federal government: Come on, it is Christmas. If you cannot do it for any other reason, because it is Christmas time repeal this old law and put an end to this policy of recovery.

Here is another case of Mr. S, who lives on Preston avenue in the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). The details of that case are rather involved. It dates back a number of years, and I would not be surprised to get word that this man has died since the last time I heard from him. Yet he is being pressed for a rather large sum dating back over a number of years, a sum which there is simply no possible way on earth for him to repay.

Here is the case of Mr. G, who lives on Cathedral avenue in Winnipeg. His case, like that of Mr. D, who lives on Craig street, arises from the fact that he went out and did a little work during the time of the flood we had in Manitoba in 1950. The result was that they had a little bit more money. It is not a great amount, something in the neighbourhood of $40 or $50 in each case, more than they should have had that year in view of the ceiling that then applied. Now they are being pressed for the repayment of those amounts. Bear in mind that again the board failed to make the adjustment in 1951 when the means test was still in effect. They are a year and a half late in doing it, but still this pressure is being applied. These Manitoba officials are saying: we have to do this; we are compelled to do it by the terms of the federal legislation.

I am not really sure that is the case, because I am told that in some of the provinces it is not being done. If some of the other provinces are not required by the federal legislation to do it, I am not sure that Manitoba can make that case stick. They are, however, taking that stand. So long as they do, I suggest it is the responsibility of this government at Ottawa to put an end to it by repealing that act.

Here is the case of Mrs. B, who lives on Ingersoll street. Again there are overpayments for two years, one of $60.04 in 1950 and another of $72.01 in 1951. No attempt was made to make an adjustment in 1951 for the alleged overpayment in 1950. Again, well along in 1952 after these people think the means test is dead, its ugly ghost rises up in the form of these letters saying the old age pensions authorities want them somehow, out of their $40 a month, to make repayment.

I refer also to the case of Mr. and Mrs. B, who were former residents of Winnipeg and who are now living in a town not far from the city. I find some very interesting language in the letters that have been written to this couple. By the way, this claim arises from receipt of unemployment insurance by one of the parties back in 1949. There was never any secret about it. It was reported to the old age pensions board. I believe these people had every right to feel that, with the abolition of the means test and the beginning of the new federal pension at the rate of $40 per month, they had nothing more to worry about. Lo and behold, when they have nothing else but their $40 a month they are called upon to make this repayment.

This particular couple wrote some letters of protest, and did their best to argue that they should not be required to make the required repayment. The chairman of the board in Manitoba, Mr. L. D. McNeill, wrote them on August 1, 1952, and said this, amongst other things:

> The situation appears to be that we have no alternative other than to ask for repayment of any overpayment of pension. If these payments are not refunded or arrangements are not made for the repayment of same, we are required to send this information to the director of old age assistance (formerly the director of old age pensions) in Ottawa. He passes it on to the treasury branch of the dominion government. It is then up to the officials of the treasury department to decide whether or not to hold back old age security payments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, imagine that threat being handed to senior citizens today, the threat that unless you somehow find it possible out of this $40 a month to pay back these moneys you are alleged to have received two or three years ago, this glorious, free federal pension of $40 per month will be interfered with. As a matter of fact, if you examine that language closely, it is quite significant. Even the chairman of the board in Manitoba does not assert that Ottawa will hold back the old age security payments. He merely says that it will be up to the federal treasury to decide whether or not they will do that.

I have had some correspondence with the deputy minister of welfare concerning that very point. From the correspondence I have had it is quite clear to me that, up to the present time at any rate, no decision has been made by the federal government to hold back any old age security cheque, even though it may be argued they have the right to do so—not under the terms of the Old Age Security Act but under the terms of the Financial Administration Act. I am quite satisfied that this government at Ottawa is not going to hold back any of those old age security cheques. I can think of one good reason why they will not do it, if there are not others. But the fear that it might be done is being held over some of these people in Manitoba by the board there, and it is being done by that board on the basis that they are required to do it by Ottawa. This letter from which I have just quoted goes on to say:

> You can see from this that the matter is one which is in a sense out of our hands. We carry out the procedure laid down by the dominion legislation.

I could cite other cases of these attempts that are being made to recover these alleged overpayments from the older people of Manitoba. I draw your attention to the fact that all of them are people who, by virtue of the fact they were on the old age pension when the means test was in existence, are people who needed it. They are people who now, whatever they may have had in the past, have nothing else but their $40 a month. For them to be hounded in this way by the provincial government with the apparent authority of the federal government is, I suggest, completely out of keeping with what this country has accepted, namely the idea and principle that so far as our older citizens 70 years of age and over are concerned the means test should be considered as completely dead.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will give more active consideration to this matter, and will find it possible within the next few days to take advantage of the provision of the Old Age Security Act which I read, and call a halt to this procedure by proclaiming as dead the former Old Age Pensions Act, with its means test and its recovery provisions. Let us call a halt to these practices right away. I have just a bit more to say, Mr. Speaker, but since I believe I have another five minutes perhaps I should reserve it for eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe there are about five minutes left of the time allotted to me. Hon. members will recall that during the 35 minutes in which I had the floor just prior to six o'clock, I devoted my time to the making of an appeal to the government to proclaim, within the next few days, the repeal of the former means-test Old Age Pensions Act so that the recoveries still being made under that act might cease. I will not take further time to speak on that phase of the matter now.

However, I do not want to conclude a speech on the subject of old age pensions without repeating my view, which I hold strongly, that there should now be an increase in the amount we are paying to our old age pensioners. Many figures are being suggested in editorials in many responsible newspapers and magazines in this country, and the surveys that are made by various bodies all make it clear that there simply is no sound reason at all for leaving the pension at the figure of $40 a month. I have said before that it should be a much higher figure, certainly not less than $60 a month. I hope we shall get action on this urgent matter without having to wait too long. I repeat likewise that, in my view, the means test should be removed at the age of 65.

Along with these improvements in our social welfare legislation I feel, as all of us in this group have stated, that the time has come for further improvements in the War Veterans Allowance Act, particularly as suggested by the Canadian Legion in their brief recently presented to the government.

There are other groups about which I have had something to say from time to time—indeed I have mentioned them at this session—such as the superannuated civil servants, our blind pensioners, and others, to whom we should be giving a much better break than is the case at the present time.

One of the reasons that I return to the attack, so far as the need for a wider measure of social security is concerned, including our program of health insurance, is because of some of the things the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) has said in the last two or three days. I believe it was in a speech on Wednesday of this week that he sought to pare down the federal government's budget to a mere $675 million. You see, Mr. Speaker, this is the way the government talks. Whenever we are asking for increased social security provisions, we are told by this government: "That costs money. It is a good idea but you cannot have it because it costs too much money." But when the government is under attack as to the size of its budget, spokesmen like the Minister of Fisheries stand up and say: "Look here, our budget really is not $4½ billion a year at all. Half of it is for defence. That is abnormal. Then $1 billion is for social welfare payments. Those are just transfer payments; they are not expenditures." Then the Minister of Fisheries goes on and takes out the interest paid on the national debt. So he boils it all down to a federal budget, so far as normal expenditures, as he defined them, are concerned, of merely $675 million.

I am not now quarrelling with that method of arguing first one way and then the other, but I emphasize the truth of what the Minister of Fisheries said the other day and what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) says when he speaks on this matter, namely that social security provisions, whether they be for old age security or for health or other items, are really just transfer payments, are really just a case of transferring or re-channelling a portion of the wealth produced by this country into the effort to provide health and security for our people. Far from anyone standing up in this house or anywhere else and saying that we cannot afford to have these things, I submit that Canada, with the huge wealth we are producing and with our claim to being a civilized nation, cannot afford not to have reasonable and adequate measures of social security.

This afternoon the Minister of Fisheries got into the debate again. He read with pride an editorial in the current issue of the Financial Post which pointed out that the gross national product for 1952 was likely to exceed $23 billion as compared with $21·2 billion for the year 1951. That represents an increase, of which he boasted, of more than $1,800 million in this one year. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when we are able to achieve an increase of that magnitude in the wealth we are producing, or an increase to that extent in our gross national product, there is no place for the fallacious argument that we cannot afford reasonable measures of health and social security for our people.

I thrill, as do all hon. members, to the reports we receive these days about the tremendous growth and expansion that is taking place in this country. It is good to learn of the great advances in production we may anticipate in the years that lie ahead. I join with other hon. members in hoping that the realization will be even greater than the anticipation. However, I plead for the common-sense, civilized approach that will take the stand that, with all this wealth we are creating, we are not going to leave some of our deserving Canadians out in the cold but rather that we are going to accept the principle of transfer payments and rechannel or redistribute some of that wealth in such a way as to make provision for adequate welfare and adequate social security for all our Canadian people.

Mr. Laing: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Laing: From his research has he available an estimate of the number of additional persons who would become eligible for the old age pension under a reduction of the age limit to 65?

Mr. Knowles: I have the figures as has the hon. member, because we were both members of the old age security committee of 1950.

Mr. Laing: Not up to date.

Mr. Knowles: I do not have them on my desk, but the point I have been making—

Mr. Hosking: Answer the question. Do not mislead the public.

Mr. Knowles: It is the hon. member's approach that misleads the public when he tries to argue that adequate social security cannot be afforded. The fact is that we can pay for the entire social security program that we in this party are arguing for out of one source, namely the increase in this one year in our gross national product.

Mr. A. C. Murray (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, a Scotsman was once asked to make a speech and the first thing he said was: "I would like to say a few things before I begin". So tonight I should like to say a few words before I begin. First of all I am sure I express the warmest greetings to a distinguished guest to the capital city today, one who I understand is being entertained this evening by the Speaker of the house. This is a distinguished man from the land of Scotland, James Miller, Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and Mrs. Ella J. Miller, Lady Provost of Edinburgh. I am sure that as one in whom Scottish blood runs strong I express the sentiments of all hon. members in extending the warmest greetings to this distinguished couple on this occasion. I am sure we are all mindful of the Scot today and of the part he is playing in the affairs of the world. With a shrewd, prudent and peaceful conscience in the discharge of duty to a degree above all others, being imbued with tremendous powers of concentration, the Scottish race has made an impression upon the world to which no other race can yet lay claim. So I repeat how proud we are to welcome to this parliament of Canada our distinguished guests on this great occasion.

Likewise I say to you tonight that I am sure that by whatever waters of Babylon our tents may be pitched, we are all proud to serve in this parliament of Canada and in particular to have a part in the building of this great nation. I say likewise how proud we are as Canadians and as members of the government today to have as the Prime Minister of this country and as the leader of our party one so distinguished in the past, one so notable in the present, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. I repeat what I have said elsewhere, that it is not wealth or riches that bring greatness to a country or to a party; it is the men who travel in its service treading like the stars to their selected place.

As we think of the part the Prime Minister is playing in the world of international affairs and in affairs that directly affect our country I am sure all government members will join me in saying that we yield to few in our admiration for one so devoted to his people and to the welfare of all mankind. As I think of the part the Prime Minister and members of this government are playing I am reminded of the lines:

> Give me men, to match my mountains,
> Give me men, to match my plains,
> Men of courage, men of action,
> Men with Canada in their brains.

So I say tonight, give me the men of this government of today, men imbued with the spirit of unity, with a common allegiance to democratic ideals and the welfare of all our people, and I will give you men who are making for Canada today its rightful place in the sun among the nations of the world.

It is a great land in which you and I are privileged to live, and it is playing its part among the nations of the world. To couch it in the language of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), there is one contribution which I feel in the long run may well be the most important contribution that our country can make to the world today. Our country is a unique example of international good will and co-operation which could be extended to all nations. Our country is a dominion which extends from sea to sea, an association of provinces which are bound together, not by any military strength, not by any charter, not by any covenant or by any legal instrument. That which binds Canada together today are the great and mighty intangibles of life. The basis of our relationship is friendship and a spirit of co-operation, an attitude of progress with a common allegiance to democratic ideals and fundamental moral principles. Those qualities which have shown themselves so capable of transcending and bridging great disparities of race and religion within our own country can, I feel, achieve a like purpose in the world.

As our own Prime Minister once said at a London conference of prime ministers, while it may be necessary for some considerable time for peace-loving countries to maintain military strength in order to resist or deter aggression, there can never be real peace or real security in the world until we can achieve something of that mutual co-operation and understanding among all nations which today we are striving to maintain within our own commonwealth. That I feel is the ultimate objective of the whole world, the ultimate goal at which peace and brotherhood will be the ideals of men and nations everywhere.

I say that this is a great country. I ask any member of this house: Do you know of any other country in the world, perhaps barring the United States of America, that enjoys a higher standard of living than we do here in Canada? Do you know of any other country whose currency is at a premium in the market places of the world? Do you know of any other country in the world where opportunity still knocks and where by simple fundamentals you can find it to the extent that you can in this land of Canada?

I am sure there must be thousands and thousands of people throughout the world tonight who would give everything they have if they could only come to this land of Canada to enjoy our privileges, to enjoy the prosperity that has been made possible through the policies promulgated by the Liberal government of today, policies that transcend the bickerings and lamentations that go out from this house, policies that have built and strengthened the pillars of unity, of security and of freedom for all our people.

Yet with all our policy, with all our prosperity, with all our technological progress, with all our material acquisitions, with all our natural resources, are we removing today some of the barnacles that still cling to the life of this country? I am reminded that hon. members who come from the sea may know something of the barnacle, that tiny animal that lives within the sea and clings to the passing hulls of vessels. It propagates with great rapidity and spreads a concrete-like substance across the hull of a ship which if neglected cuts down steerageway and the efficiency and effectiveness of the ship.

I appreciate that we have eliminated two of the barnacles that previously clung to this chamber, and which had been here long before I came to the house in 1949. One of the barnacles that has been removed is the lack of acoustics. Now with a man sitting at the console a member's voice is amplified through this new sound reinforcing system so his speech is brought to all parts of the Commons most distinctly, and likewise to the galleries. I say that a bouquet should go to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for his perseverance, his industry and his initiative in seeing that this barnacle of inefficient acoustics has been removed.

Then I should also like to present a bouquet to the Speaker of the House for seeing to it that the evening hours of sitting are regulated so we can now adjourn at ten o'clock. I am sure all members will agree that the former closing hour was a barnacle upon the life of this chamber. In these days of national crisis, these days of worry, stress and strain, we need to keep fit, we need desperately to keep our manhood and our womanhood of this and other democracies physically fit and mentally alert. I think some of us make a ghastly mistake when we do not see to it that we keep fit; for a man who may do one hour's less work per day, but save himself for the task that needs to be done for the national welfare, is far better alive with one hour less activity than dead, with his genius, his brains, his talents and his powers lost to his fellow man.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, there are barnacles elsewhere, everywhere. I was amazed the other day to read of the betting odds on successful marriages. I am amazed each year at the number of divorce cases that come before parliament, about which every member knows. It is unbelievable. Why? Barnacles, that is all; tiny, nonsensical things that somehow get a grip on married life, that cling with all the tenacity of a barnacle to the hull of a ship, and cause that glorious ship of matrimony to lose its course and go on the rocks; things that could be so easily forgotten, things that become pitched battles when, with a little understanding and a little smile, they could be avoided.

That is what happens. Oh, I appreciate that the barnacles of government are not centred here at Ottawa alone. They are centred in the minds of men and women who will not vote when an election comes. When a war is on they will fight, they will buy bonds, they will do this, that, and everything else to bring about peace; but when peace comes they will not bother to go to the polls to choose the best man or the best woman to represent them at the councils or in the parliament of our nation. They slip back into that luxurious and splendid slumber of the democratic citizen, who thinks only of his nation's safety when it is in danger.

There are barnacles everywhere. I suppose members of the opposition will say that taxation is a barnacle in the life of Canada today. But let me remind them that their demands for lower taxation are incompatible with demands for increased government services necessitating heavy expenditures. Here we have hon. members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition proposing savings that amount to $116 million a year, whereas new services requested by the Progressive Conservative party would add $600 million a year to the federal budget.

I say to hon. members of the opposition, as I have said elsewhere, that you cannot have your cake and eat it too. If we want to build our defences strong and maintain the attributes of decency throughout the world, and if we want social security for all our people, then let us do first things first. Let us build so those who follow after us may enjoy the shade. Let us realize that if we want all these things, then we must be prepared to pay for them.

I presume there are a few barnacles in every trade and in every profession. It seems to me that no man who does not understand the principles of a particular trade or profession has any right to criticize it. My purpose in rising at this time is not to criticize; rather, it is to suggest to myself, as well as to the members of the government and to all hon. members in the house, that sometimes it is best to take the hull of the ship of state onto a set of ways, clean off the barnacles and set it sailing again, shipshape and clean, and on a voyage toward a happy harbour.

I think, sir, of the Department of National Health and Welfare and its wonderful record of achievement. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is a barnacle on the record of that department. I wonder, sir, if we realize that as a result of the research that has been conducted by that department and by men of science, and as a result of the growth of medicine and pharmacy, all of us are living longer than was expected at our births. I recognize, of course, that today a woman lives possibly four and a half to five years longer than a man. We have heard the reason suggested: that we take such good care of them. Nevertheless we have added almost a score of years to our life expectancy in the last half century. This poses a terrific problem for those engaged in life insurance, and those concerned with annuity and pension schemes.

I suggest the growth of science has been an important factor. Believe me when I tell you that in New York state in 1928 nearly 2,000 people out of every 100,000 died as a result of appendicitis; by 1948 the number was brought down to 440 for every 100,000 of the population. In 1928 the figures show that 16,000 people out of every 100,000 of the population died of the pneumonias, while in 1948 only 5,132 died. In 1928 1,950 out of every 100,000 died of influenza, while in 1948 there were only 114. There is the answer. Here in Canada also, as a result of the new drugs, the new antibiotics, every one of us is living longer than was expected for us at our births.

I think of insulin, which was discovered by that great Canadian, Sir Frederick Banting. Formerly, when sugar was discovered in a child's urine it was a foregone conclusion that it would never reach the age of 21 years. As a result of that great discovery, thousands upon thousands of people can now live to a ripe and useful age. I think of penicillin, discovered by Sir Alexander Fleming, and what a great benefactor to mankind he has been. I think in the same way about streptomycin, aureomycin, terramycin. Mr. Speaker, I can vouch for the fact that there are hundreds of promising new drugs on the horizon, and the horizon is equally challenging and tremendous.

Every one of us has more years of life expectancy than was anticipated at our births. What are we going to do with them? All of us are working fewer hours than we used to, but what are we going to do with our added leisure? It lays a terrific obligation and responsibility upon the family and the school to teach people the joy of living well the leisure time, and giving them guidance in how to spend the coin of leisure wisely.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has played, and is playing, a significant role in the health and welfare of our citizens. It has carefully re-examined the way to human welfare and, as a result of its endeavours, we have gone forward steadily and in freedom toward a decent level of life. There is a strong tide flowing in the affairs of men; social injustices are being swept aside and human progress is at the flood. Yet, with this great record, there is a barnacle on the life of this department. The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) referred to it in his speech in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Other hon. members have referred to it again and again, and I refer to it today. I mean, of course, that the government should do something to remove the means test on pensions for the blind. Tonight I am mindful of the biblical injunction:

> And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them.

Surely we in this chamber cannot do less. It seems to me that the idea of the blindness allowance being a payment for their handicap has been lost sight of by the legislators. The means test and its regulations are so restrictive that they discourage blind persons from trying to better themselves. I am informed that since blind persons over 70 years of age have been transferred to the Old Age Security Act, under which they now benefit by the elimination of the means test, there are only about 4,000 of the 19,000 blind adults who do not receive the allowance. These are the ones whose income is above the allowable income in order to qualify for the allowance. These persons are blind, and need and would be encouraged by the allowance in coping with their handicap. Surely it would not place too great a burden on the various governments to agree to the elimination of this restrictive legislation.

Eighty per cent of all blindness occurs in adult life, and I need not say that the loss of sight in adult life has the effect of wrecking hopes and plans as well as the sense of security. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is not a member of this house who would not like to see this barnacle, this restrictive means test on the blind, removed. I know, sir, that today our troops are fighting in Korea, and none of us is unmindful of the terrific sacrifice that is being made. There is the sacrifice being made by those who cannot see. There is more to a fight than is seen in the game. There is the fight that enters not the limelight of publicity. There is the fight that some day we hope will bring about peace. But today it is the fight of every one of us in this chamber to give what we can to life, to serve not for ourselves but so that those in darkness can share and know the joy of living too.

So, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the blind in my home county of Oxford, who have appealed to me to speak for them and likewise for all Canadian blind persons, I want to say that although I may have been halting in my words I have been struck by the sincerity with which hon. gentlemen preceding me have spoken on this subject, and I earnestly hope and pray that the government will do its part to remove this barnacle that is upon it at the present time.

Then I should like to briefly commend the government and the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) in particular for the legislation envisaged in the speech from the throne whereby in all likelihood some compensation is to be given to the rural mail carriers for the extra cost entailed today in fulfilling their duties. These men and women travel in all kinds of weather to see that the mail goes through. I am sure all hon. members appreciate their reasonable request for further compensation and hope the government, having taken cognizance of this pressing problem, will see to it that equitable compensation is made feasible. May I say frankly that as the member for Oxford I look forward to that day when mail service will be made available directly to all rural mail patrons where roads are passable and kept open. To me, Mr. Speaker, it is a barnacle on this fine department that on account of regulations a great number of people living in our rural parts are penalized by reason of distance and other qualifying factors. I feel that some revision could be made in these outmoded laws whereby our rural people, who pay their taxes just the same as the rest of us, might enjoy the privilege of direct mail service to their gates which their neighbour may now be receiving.

I presume that taxation is in the minds of many of our citizens. It is one of the greatest barnacles in the road of progress today. I recall that when I spoke in last year's budget debate I credited our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) with being the architect of a fiscal policy that has made Canada the envy of the world. I said that as a result Canada's credit abroad was being strengthened, inflation was being controlled, capital for investment was being attracted and the Canadian dollar was at a premium in the market places of the world. At that time I made the suggestion that the weight on corporations was too heavy. Likewise today I reiterate that, national defence permitting, every effort should be made to reduce corporation and personal income taxes. I do not know that I can interpret with greater propriety what I should like to say than to quote the words of Mr. B. C. Gardner, president of the Bank of Montreal, when at a recent shareholders' annual meeting he said:

> On the domestic side, development of Canada's resources and the expansion of industrial capacity should not be stifled by heavy taxes on business. With capital requirements running ahead of the amount new savings can provide, development is dependent on what industry itself can plow back in the way of undistributed profits and depreciation reserves. While a corporate tax rate which takes more than half of every dollar of profit may be a convenient fiscal devise, such a burden of taxation directly upon enterprise has very dubious connotations from the standpoint of enhanced national well-being.

Expanding on the president's remarks, Gordon R. Ball, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, said:

> It is essential in a country like ours, requiring as it does large sums of risk and investment money, that the tax climate provide an inducement to this type of capital.

So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that, national defence costs permitting, the Minister of Finance should give his profound attention to this matter of easing the tax structure on all our citizens. Oh, I suppose, sir, there are barnacles in everyone's constituency. I know that for a long time there has been a barnacle existing in the town of Ingersoll in my constituency, a barnacle represented by the hazardous traffic tie-up that prevails where the C.N.R. tracks in that town cross highway No. 2. Since becoming a member of the house I have earnestly endeavoured to have it eliminated, and I am grateful to Mr. A. J. Lomas, vice-president of the C.N.R., for his co-operation in this direction. In his last letter to me under date of November 27, 1952, the vice-president informs me that he has included this item in their 1953 capital budget and is hopeful that the necessary approval will be obtained to carry out this work. While I realize that this is a matter of internal management, I can but emphasize again on behalf of the citizens of that fine community of Ingersoll the urgency and importance of seeing that the capital amount needed for this work be approved and that remedial action be facilitated as quickly as possible.

Then, Mr. Speaker, while I am thinking of the C.N.R. I think also of the fine C.N.R. station that the Speaker of this house has in his own city of Brantford. I mention it by way of contrast with the dingy and ancient C.N.R. station at Woodstock, Ontario, with its poor lighting, its dismal, unkempt, internal appearance which is not a credit to the C.N.R. or to the lovely city of Woodstock from which I come—Woodstock, Ontario, sir, which is noted for its beauty, for its key of freedom to visiting tourists, for its surrounding fertile fields and for its friendly people. I say, sir, that station is a barnacle in the life of my community, and likewise a barnacle on the main line of the Canadian National Railways. This, too, may be a matter for internal management, but in passing I make mention of it in order to emphasize that something should be done about it.

Well, sir, I am honest enough to say that I do not know all the problems of government, but I do know that my business as a pharmacist depends upon the good will of the public who patronize me; and any of us who carry on a business or a profession where we are dependent upon the good will of our customers or clients must make sure there are no barnacles on the mind, or on the institution of which we are a part. They get there, just as easily as barnacles get on the hull of a ship, for it is easy to say "That's a good idea, but let someone else try it." It is easy to persuade oneself that things that literally cry out for the doing do not need to be done. These become barnacles; and just as ships on historic voyages have met disaster upon the rocks, when the absence of barnacles might have meant the difference between life and death, success and failure, so too with a business; so too with government.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I do not know all the problems of government, but here are fundamentals about mankind that I have learned and that we all can learn if we read the pages of history. One of those fundamentals is that no matter how much there may be of animosity and difference of opinion, that which is best for the greatest number eventually must come to be. That which is fairest and most straightforward and truly honest, that which benefits most largely, must inevitably one day come to be.

To me, as a member of parliament, it seems life can be magnificent provided we are prepared to enjoy it to the full; and the way to enjoy it to the full is to periodically take the ship of state up on the sets of ways and there study it and clean off any barnacles that may cling upon it.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I have not rambled too much; I may have detoured some but I am coming back to the main track. In coming back to the main track I emphasize to you that being a member of parliament is not so important. What is important is to do the job while we are here. If we do that, if we remove the barnacles that are obvious about us, then life as a member will be a lot more pleasant and Canada itself will be a finer country in which to live.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on the amendment at this time because of remarks that have been made by one or two previous speakers, on which I think we need to throw some light. I believe that the things to which I wish to refer can be made to relate a little more to the facts. I hope and trust that the things to which I refer will not be regarded as trivial things; but since my name had been mentioned in connection with one or two of them, and since other statements by implication certainly involve the Social Credit movement, I would like to make a few corrections.

I believe those who made the remarks will be happy to have all the facts before them. In the first place I wish to refer to a remark that was made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). At page 435 of Hansard he referred to me as going into British Columbia during the election campaign. He said:

> Against the wishes of their own convention, that hon. gentleman from Macleod was brought into British Columbia. There is no doubt that he, of all people, laid down the law as far as Social Credit and the provincial party are concerned. I am not surprised that my hon. friends on the other side in the Social Credit party have said they do not agree with some of the views expressed in that election.

In the first place might I say that no individual who attempts to run a campaign can lay down the exact things every speaker in that campaign may say. No man who leads an election campaign necessarily determines the policy of the provincial section of his party. That policy had already been laid down before I was asked into British Columbia, and I never interfered with that policy. My business was not to determine policy. My business was to try to lead the province to a Social Credit victory. With respect to the hon. member's remarks—"against the wishes of their own convention, that hon. gentleman from Macleod was brought into British Columbia"—I will say that I know the hon. gentleman from Burnaby-Richmond is a very fine gentleman and well respected, but I feel that perhaps he has been misinformed. I was not "brought into British Columbia."

Mr. Goode: As the hon. member has referred to me may I say that I was not misinformed, but that if I was misinformed it was by members of his own party.

Mr. Hansell: I will tell the hon. member and the house exactly how I came to go into British Columbia. The convention decided on the person they would have to lead the election campaign. At the convention four were nominated as men who might be able to lead the campaign. Two were from British Columbia and two were from outside the province. I was one of the latter two.

I am quite free to say, and I have nothing to hold back, that there was some discussion in the convention about whether it was advisable to have anyone from outside. That was natural. There is nothing wrong with that. When the four were nominated for the position I was not looking forward to being selected. Let me say that I am not looking for a lot of hard work and trouble, and I am certainly not desirous of going anywhere I am not wanted, believe me. Well, I do not mind going places where I am not wanted by my Liberal friends. Of course, they will not want any of us. I am certainly not desirous of going anywhere where our Social Credit people do not want me.

As I say, four gentlemen were nominated and three of them declined, so I was the one left. I said that I would accept and do what I could. I want to tell my hon. friend—and I do not say it with any air of braggadocio or anything of that kind—that the huge convention of nearly 1,000 people stood and gave me a rousing ovation.

Mr. Laing: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hansell: Yes.

Mr. Laing: Is he aware that in that campaign there were subordinates working under him who came in from the United States and returned to the United States the day after the election?

Mr. Hansell: No, I am not aware of that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: If there was anyone, I have no hint as to what the member refers to.

Mr. Laing: I think it is contrary to the act, too.

Mr. Hansell: I have no hint as to what the hon. member now means.

Mr. Cruickshank: I thought you ran the campaign.

Mr. Johnston: You found out, didn't you?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, and the oil companies paid for it.

Mr. Hansell: If they did come in, then they came in without my knowledge.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Hansell: I did not invite them. My hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) can bellow out if he wishes. I am simply stating the facts. If somebody slipped in and gave some speeches that I did not know about, I am not responsible for that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Didn't you run the campaign?

Mr. Hansell: Yes, I did run the campaign. My hon. friend knows very well that I ran it, and he knows how well I ran it. That is the reason he is so upset about it.

Mr. Cruickshank: On imports from the United States.

Mr. Hansell: He knows, too, that I had a meeting in his constituency.

Mr. Cruickshank: You lived in there.

Mr. Hansell: I had a meeting in the city of Chilliwack, and he knows that.

Mr. Low: Oh, you frightened boys.

Mr. Hansell: He knows that about 1,700 people turned out, too, and that is what is bothering him.

Mr. Cruickshank: They will always go to a circus.

Mr. Hansell: I shall do my hon. friend this credit and this justice, and say that I never spoke one word against him.

Mr. Mott: You could not.

Mr. Cruickshank: In fairness, Mr. Speaker, may I say that is quite correct.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps I could not say anything, but if I could I would not. I shall say, further, that never in that campaign did I speak against any individual. I may have had a little fun at someone's expense. I may have referred, I think I did refer once or twice, to Mr. Anscomb and some statements that he made. If I was quoting a statement, I may have referred to the person who made it; but I may say that I never spoke one derogatory word against any individual in that campaign because that is not my style of operation.

Mr. Blackmore: Social Crediters do not need to say anything against anybody.

Mr. Hansell: I can assure my hon. friends that I never will. I claim that the people do not necessarily vote for men. In reality they vote for what they stand for, and it is what they stood for that I expounded or exposed.

Mr. Cruickshank: What do you stand for?

Mr. Johnston: You should begin to find out. It will pay you dividends.

Mr. Hansell: I thought perhaps the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) would like me to state that. I cannot help what some individual may have told him, but that is the fact and it will be shown in the minutes of that convention.

Mr. Goode: It is certainly not shown in the newspapers.

Mr. Low: What he said is true. I was there.

Mr. Hansell: As I say, it is a trivial thing. It is water under the bridge anyway, but I do not want any implication or statement to the effect that I pushed myself in where I was not wanted. I do not do that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who wanted you there?

Mr. Low: You will want him in less the next time.

Mr. Cruickshank: We never came into your province.

Mr. Blackmore: You would not get a hearing if you did.

Mr. Johnston: Where did Gerry McGeer come from?

Mr. Cruickshank: From British Columbia; and he won his own riding, too.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Fraser Valley said they do not come into our province. Perhaps they do not, but that is their own business. I will tell you what I will do. I will invite my hon. friend to come into my own constituency. Since I have been in his, I will invite him to come into mine.

Mr. Mott: If he comes in, you will never be elected if he tells the truth.

Mr. Hansell: That should not worry the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott). If that is so, why does he not send him in?

Mr. Mott: I will send him in. I will ask him to go in.

Mr. Hansell: You come along with him.

Mr. Mott: I will certainly come along with him.

Mr. Hansell: If you both come in, I will be able to sit down and be assured of my election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer also to a statement that was made the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in which he says that I used a phrase in answering a question which indicated that the Social Crediters believed in absolute licence for everyone to do whatever they wanted. I know what I said, and I know the phraseology I used. I was answering a question after I finished my speech concerning the welfare state. What did I say in answer to a question by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which appears at page 236 of Hansard for December 1? The hon. member asked me if I would do away with welfare legislation, and I answered:

> I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I may. It has always been found that you cannot readily retract or undo something the country has already done;

My hon. friend jumped up last night and inferred, therefore, that Social Crediters would do away with all social legislation. All I am saying is that if social legislation and socialism are brought in, and any other government supersedes it, it is sometimes hard to undo what has been done. That is all, and that has been proven in the United Kingdom in the last few months. It is always so. One government comes into power on the heels of another, and they have to work on the basis of legislation that has already been enacted or throw it out. Sometimes it is too late to throw it out, so one government builds upon another. I am sure the hon. member drew an inference there that was never intended. To read further from my answer:

> —but I would say that the greatest welfare that can come to the people is to leave with them their absolute freedom to act according to their own conscience and will, . . .

The hon. gentleman stopped there when he was quoting me, but that is not the end of my statement. There is only a comma there. This is where the commas come in again. It is true that I said that; but just because I said that people should be absolutely free to act according to their own conscience, surely he is not going to conclude that Social Crediters such as I or anyone else believe that men should be able to commit all sorts of crimes under the heading "absolute freedom". Surely he is not going to think we would advocate that a man should drive a car down the left hand side of the road at 100 miles an hour if he wished. Surely he is not going to say we believe that a man should have the freedom to run away with another man's wife. Surely he is not going to say that we are turning liberty into licence. Common sense tells him that is not so. Of course we believe in law and order. Of course we believe in regulation. Perhaps I should have used the term that is used in our manifesto. The term used in the preamble is that every individual should be given the "utmost" of personal freedom.

If the hon. member likes to play around with the exactitude of words, I am not going to be too much concerned about it. But suppose we should do the same thing with regard to some of his speeches. I have here a speech of his as reported in Hansard of March 11, 1947, in which he says at page 1264:

> I should like to point out now that the policy we believe in, that of social ownership of the means of life, is becoming increasingly accepted throughout the world, . . .

And so forth. Suppose I should take that phrase "social ownership of the means of life" and should say: "There you are. These folks believe in socializing the farms and they believe in socializing food." Perhaps I could do that. Perhaps that is what he meant. But I do not think that is what he meant. I think what he meant was that he believed in the socializing of factories and the wheels of industry. But if I wanted to play around with a phrase I could read all sorts of things into that one. In any event, this nation is not going to rise or fall on a phrase. Perhaps that is a trivial thing which I should not even have taken the time to mention. Social Crediters are not against orderly regulation. You have to have regulation. Of course we know that. It is one thing, however, to have regulation but it is another thing to lose your freedom under an ultimate socialist state. That is the thing we are against.

There is another point. Again I say these things are trivial; nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, they are harped on year in and year out. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) took a little sideswipe at Social Crediters. His punch did not land at all heavily; it just tickled the jaw a little bit. As reported at page 283 of Hansard, he was explaining Social Credit policies and said something to the effect that that which stood behind our Social Credit dollars would be 'gosh knows what'. That is, of course, a humorous little phrase. We have had that sort of thing poked at us for a good many years. I do not know whether or not my hon. friend's difficulty is in understanding Social Credit dollars, but let me tell him this. I know the matter will not rest here. I know someone will pop up in a few weeks and say the same thing. Let me say that there is no difference between Social Credit dollars and any other dollars.

An hon. Member: And he knows it.

Mr. Hansell: We use the same dollar, the same money. Our objection is to the present financial policy. It is not a matter of dollars or the backing of dollars at all. That is not the issue. There is no difference between our dollars and Mr. Abbott's dollars. The difference is in the policy and the method of issue. That is the difference. Since my friend does not know what is behind Social Credit dollars

—he says they are backed by gosh knows what—I am just going to ask him this question and I should like him to explain it. I should like him to tell us what is behind Mr. Abbott's dollars.

An hon. Member: A great deal of hard work.

Mr. Hansell: When the hon. member explains what is behind Mr. Abbott's dollars, we shall be able to tell him what is behind Social Credit dollars. Dollars are dollars. That is all there is to it. They are only figures. They are financial figures backed by law. That is all they are. It does not matter whether you call them Social Credit dollars or any other dollars.

Mr. Hosking: Social Credit dollars will not be any good if you pay your dividends.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member is now talking nonsense.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Abbott's dollars, in paying family allowances, evidently are all right.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; but they are worth only half what they were worth when the payments were started.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend says that they are worth only half what they were worth a few years ago. That is, of course, true. There used to be talk about Social Credit dollars being rubber dollars. I should like to know how far the housewife has to stretch the Abbott dollar today in order to make it buy what it used to buy. Talk about rubber. There is plenty of rubber in that dollar.

There is one other matter with which I should like to deal, Mr. Speaker, before I sit down. This was interjected by a number of speakers, including the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) the other night, when he stated that Social Crediters did not have a monopoly on Christianity. I want to deal with that matter a little bit more.

Mr. Cruickshank: We should like to hear it.

Mr. Hansell: That same type of phraseology and that same type of argument has been brought into this chamber this session more than in any other session I have ever attended. I wonder why.

An hon. Member: Hypocrisy.

Mr. Hansell: Yes. Somebody pops up there and says "Hypocrisy". What does it all mean? I should like to know what it all means. All I am saying is this. Social Crediters never said they had a monopoly on Christianity. Somebody referred to the fact that our meetings were opened—yes; again it was the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—by the singing of "O God, our Help in ages past". Well, what about it? Suppose we do open our meetings in that way. Why mention the matter now? We have done that for the last twenty years.

Mr. Blackmore: What better thing could we open with?

An hon. Member: "O Canada".

Mr. Hansell: We do.

Mr. Cruickshank: You do not.

An hon. Member: We do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. Hansell: If you can find anybody who is more loyal to Canada than are Social Crediters, tell us who they are. It is a wonder you do not say "Liberals".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, this is a lot of nonsense we are having.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Hansell: Everyone knows the origin of our movement. We know that Mr. Aberhart absorbed the Social Credit idea. He saw in it a solution for the problems of the day. He was a great Bible teacher who had a large radio audience and he began to talk about it over the air. Clubs were formed, meetings were held. In the Alberta election of 1935 we had as our theme song "O God, our Help in ages past".

An hon. Member: That is blasphemy.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is blasphemy against the United Church of Canada from Toronto to Montreal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I think all members enjoy spirited debate, but I must remind them that the hon. member who is speaking has the floor and should not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Blackmore: Spirited is good.

Mr. Low: Spirituous would be better.

Mr. Hansell: We always started with that hymn. What about it? Is there anything wrong with that? Surely a body of people who are interested in the country's welfare can sing a hymn of that kind. I hope we shall continue to do so. As far as I am concerned we will continue to do so. Let no one think he can scare us or humiliate us into any other position. I tell my hon. friend that I have come up against this thing all my life.

What do I care about that? During my early days I have stood on street corners and preached. Well, what about it. I will do it again. They have ridiculed me but what about it? Do I care?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Hansell: No, sir, I do not care. That is one of the freedoms I was talking about. Don't ever think they are going to scare us into backtracking on these things.

We believe that the Social Credit philosophy is basically Christian. Just because we go out and present that angle of our Social Credit thesis is no reason to pop up and say that we are trying to adopt a holier-than-thou attitude. We are very conscious of our failings many times. We do not go around talking about other people in that same way.

An hon. Member: You sure do.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to read the preamble to our manifesto. If anybody thinks he is going to have us cut out any part of this then he has another think coming. This is the preamble:

What is Social Credit?

Social Credit consists of three things: (a) A philosophy or set of beliefs: Social Crediters believe in the sanctity of human personality; that every person should enjoy freedom to develop his personality in accordance with his own desires, provided that he does not interfere with the similar rights of others; that the organizations of society should be subordinated to the end of insuring to every individual the utmost of personal freedom. Social Crediters believe that a genuine democracy must recognize the sovereignty of God from which springs the brotherhood of man. A Christian democracy so organized that the state and its institutions and functions are designed to serve the requirements of its individual citizens is the only social system that will ensure individual freedom. Social Crediters further believe that the people should be given every opportunity to obtain the results they want from the management of their affairs.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hansell: I do not think I want to hear your question. If my hon. friend had not interrupted so much, if he had got up and spoken decently and asked questions, I would not have minded answering them. This time my answer to him is "no". I do not want to hear any of his questions.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are afraid.

An hon. Member: Fraidy cat.

Mr. Hansell: This group has never been afraid for over 17 years to answer any question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why not answer this question, then?

Mr. Hansell: I do not believe it will be an intelligent one, and I have not the time to waste.

An hon. Member: How true.

Mr. Hansell: We are going out with that preamble and that manifesto; and if it emphasizes the sovereignty of God and our desire to have a Christian democracy, that is all right. We will go out and let the ridicule come. We are not afraid of that. Believe me, if anyone thinks we are going to back down on that issue they have another think coming. I am a preacher, and of course I occasionally—

An hon. Member: You just preach too much.

Mr. Hansell: That is the freedom we have in this country, and I will continue to preach a little more. If I go out and hold a political meeting and want to bring in a portion of the Bible, I am going to do it. It will not be the first time anyone has done that. The speaker who just preceded me closed his speech with a passage from the scriptures. What must we do? Must we say that he is mixing religion with politics?

An hon. Member: You certainly have.

An hon. Member: That is what the C.C.F. did yesterday.

Mr. Hansell: Let me say to the leader of the C.C.F. that I did not appreciate how he applied the passages of scripture yesterday when he spoke. I am certainly not going to apply it to him. I tell him and I tell anyone that I have the greatest respect for human individuals. I have gone out in this country and made public statements to thousands of people, lauding certain men with whom I disagree. It would not be the first time I have said that Mr. M. J. Coldwell is as good a living man as anyone in Canada.

An hon. Member: So he is.

Mr. Hansell: I have said that over and over again. People have asked me what I thought about the Prime Minister of Canada and I have said, "There is one thing, I believe he is an honest man."

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): And a Christian.

Mr. Hansell: I have said these things. I do not go around trying to deprecate individuals. I remember one time when I was in the office of the late prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King. He wanted to see me about something and I thought he might detain me for a minute or two, but strangely enough I was there for from twenty minutes to half an hour. I was talking to him along the same lines. At that time he was also secretary of state for external affairs and I mentioned to him that I believed that there were in the world great satanic forces which were out to destroy the human race. He said, "I believe that." I quoted a phrase of scripture to him as follows:

> For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

Mr. Mackenzie King said to me, "Mr. Hansell, I believe that; no man could be in my position today, with the responsibilities I have, without believing that." Well, is that saying that we are mixing religion with politics? All I say is this: You may make that charge if you like; but one thing I certainly will not backtrack on is in my belief that Almighty God has something to do with the destinies of nations.

An hon. Member: Do we deny that?

Mr. Hansell: No, I do not believe my hon. friend would. I do not believe there are many who would. But when somebody goes out and attempts to correlate that very principle with world movements or national movements, then right away he is branded as somebody who wants to bring religion into politics.

Well, that is part of my business. Once again I say we are not going to backtrack on it. My time is well-nigh gone, and I shall not take up more of it. But once again I say it is a surprising thing to me that all this seems to be happening now, when we have sat here for the last 17 years, doing the same thing throughout this country for the entire 17 years. Why should all this resentment come now?

I leave that for you, Mr. Speaker, and for the people to decide. I thank you.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Hansell: Yes, if my hon. friend wishes to ask one.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think he will admit I have been fair. I just want to ask him if he does not think that we on this side of the house believe in that part of his manifesto dealing with Christianity.

Mr. Hansell: Well, I will say yes, I believe they do. But we do not go out saying, "Now, you must not talk that way." That is what I am trying to bring out. But why all this hullabaloo about religion in politics, when we go out to expound it?

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not ask for another speech. I just asked a question.

Mr. Hansell: And I answered the question, and gave a little bonus with the answer.

Mr. Mott: I am going to tell the hon. member who just spoke that I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I do not believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, with the speech of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) in the background I am sure the next twenty minutes will be quiet and peaceful. Anyway, I have not been going out to win elections.

We modest backbenchers who really live in the oblivion of Hansard welcome the speech from the throne, as it gives us an opportunity to express our opinions and offer suggestions —yes, even solutions—for taking the world out of the mess it is in today.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I consider it very largely through your efforts that the public address system became a reality in the chamber. The improvement is already quite obvious, and I am sure most hon. members will agree with what I say in this connection. We were pleased to note that you and your committee saw fit to have a Halifax electronics firm make the installation. That, in itself, is worth something.

I wish to extend my congratulations, also, on the excellent choice made in the recent appointments of the two ministers. The choice of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) as Solicitor General is an excellent one. With his wide experience in many fields, and the co-operative spirit that he not only shows but possesses, I am sure that his work will be well carried out.

The new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who represents the constituency of Coast-Capilano, has already shown us his capabilities, and I know that his appointment as Minister of Fisheries has been welcomed by fishermen generally and by the industry as a whole.

In the last few years there has been an upsurge of interest in research, both scientific and in the social sciences. The government has played a constructive and important role in the development of facilities and training of personnel. In fact, so important is the role the government has played as employer and as a source of funds that it raises serious problems. All of us are painfully aware of the increase in the scope of government activity. The times in which we live have created new demands which can only be met by government action. But there is very real danger that this expansionist trend will go too far. Overzealous public servants may undertake functions which are better performed elsewhere.

I suggest that there is much research that could be done by our universities, through foundations, rather than by government sources or agencies. For the more we throw under the control of government, the nearer we approach the socialist form of control. Today we live in a world divided only by ideas. Certainly space does not divide us any longer. In our world, Canada in particular, our most cherished idea is liberty, the kind of liberty that recognizes the importance of the individual. On this we develop the concept that not only is there an equality of the individual, but also of the provinces. A wonderful idea; but things do not always turn out that way. Where there are instances of inequality I like to think that it is more of a sin of omission than one of design.

Since the last session there have been several matters that have given me some concern. The first, perhaps, was the matter of redistribution; and in that connection possibly this is the right time to consider future policy in the redistribution of seats for representation in the House of Commons. Now that the heat of controversy has died down, and before new pressures arise, it is most opportune to examine the principles. In the redistribution of seats in the last session Nova Scotia lost one seat, because our population had not grown as rapidly as other parts of Canada. A new approach is most necessary in view of the uneven distribution of economic power among the different provinces.

We are still painfully aware of the centralizing forces in our industrial life. The government, in recognition of this, has adopted measures aimed at steadying the tide of such forces. Whether or not it has been done has been hotly debated. It is desirable in any case to assure to the outlying provinces a voice in the policies of this country. Adequate political representation may help restore balance in economic power. This nation was founded on the principle of unity with diversity. If we are to continue to reap the full benefit of diversity, and to fight effectively the mass mind so common in other countries, we must make it possible for the less wealthy provinces to develop. One way to assure that is to provide a real voice in the affairs of state. I suggest that we are going at it in a poor fashion when in 1953, with a population of something over 700,000 people in Nova Scotia, we will find ourselves with 12 members whereas in 1867, with half the number of people, we had 21 members.

[Mr. Balcom.]

Much has been said during this time of uncertainty of the need for every citizen to carry his or her responsibilities. In the field of material production the government has given active encouragement for full use of all who are able and willing to work. Employers and employees alike have been asked to work longer and harder. The government has gone further and urged upon industry the advantages of employing older workers. Employers have also been asked not to make retirement automatic at 65 but to employ and retire workers not on the basis of chronological age and to consider each individual case on its merits. Yet at the same time the age limit as set out by the civil service commission for employment in the government service is from 21 to 40. If this is to be the considered policy of the government, can one expect industry to take seriously the exhortations to employ older workers and to think twice before retiring employees automatically at 65?

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) deserves our thanks for the broad view he takes of this question. He suggested a short time ago that automatic compulsory retirement at a specified age is not only unkind and wasteful but cruel. We all know that there are myriads of men and women in this country able and eager to keep on working after 65. I realize that the civil service commission must have well recognized principles to guide them in their actions, but I suggest that too much emphasis is put on age instead of ability and individuality. The work of this agency has been lauded on many sides and the standard of our public service is a credit to Canada, but I am bound to say that certain weaknesses are apparent.

Presumably a policy is laid down and regulations are made for its application. With very many employees the result has been rigidity and inflexibility, frustration on the part of employees who feel that individual initiative and ability are only secondary. Let us recognize that the government must stand for not only the basis of high level policies but also an administration at the grass roots level. Somehow we have to get a better balance in administration between local responsibility and bureaucratic control from Ottawa. I am not suggesting for one moment that the civil service commission has not done good work, but I am suggesting that in the various departments there is room for a lot of improvement. I must say it is very frustrating to hear all the beefs and at the same time have little opportunity to effect improvements.

Speaking of public services, it is most gratfiying that there are prospects of the return of two mail deliveries a day. Persistent representation helped to convince me that the reduction in service was working a real hardship on business establishments and individuals. For postal service the public pays and pays well. People felt they were getting less for their money with the passage of time. Further, it seems pointless to rush a letter across a continent in a few hours only to have it languish in the local post office for as many more for lack of delivery service. Surely this service can be restored without hardship to the postal staff. There is good reason why postal employees should have the benefit of a half day on Saturday or its equivalent or, what is better, why post office employees should have the same privileges as business and industry today, the people whom they serve. They should have the five-day week.

We in Nova Scotia were gravely concerned about the distribution of money voted by parliament for assistance to universities as recommended by the Massey commission. Indeed, an examination of the system adopted leads to the conclusion that it has the effect of giving the least to those who are doing the most. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) announced more than a year ago the government's decision to carry out the commission's recommendations concerning federal aid to universities, he gave it as his opinion that it was in the national interest to do so because the universities perform functions which are quite essential to the country and, indeed, to the proper administration of the government of the country. With that view I am sure every member of course agrees.

In recognizing the national importance of Canadian universities, the Prime Minister took the same view as the Massey commission which termed the universities "local centres for education at large", which serve the national cause in so many ways, direct and indirect, "that theirs must be regarded as the finest of contributions to national strength and unity". In view of this national importance which can be so easily recognized, it is a pity that the grants for the first year should have been allocated on a basis so unfavourable to the universities of Nova Scotia, none of which are wealthy. The Prime Minister, it will be recalled, made it plain that the system of allocation of the $7,100,000 which parliament voted was purely provisional. He pointed out that the government was not "in a position to ask parliament to accept any permanent scheme" of allocation.

The unhappy effect of this provisional scheme becomes so apparent when one examines it that in all fairness it merits careful review and revision before any permanent scheme is adopted. The people of Nova Scotia and their friends are especially concerned since the method adopted for the distribution of the 1951-52 grants resulted in Nova Scotia universities receiving the lowest amount per student of any province in Canada; and the discrepancy, as I shall submit, is by no means trifling. Members of the house will recall that the money voted by parliament was distributed according to provincial populations at the rate of 50 cents a head, without regard to the proportion of eligible students in each province. Speaking of 50 cents a head, it reminds me that it is said that away back in 1867 Nova Scotia was sold for the price of a sheepskin, 80 cents. That has no relation to these remarks on universities.

The method of distributing the grants, based on provincial populations, seems to be at variance with the accepted view that universities are of national importance. Nova Scotia universities, without question, are performing a national service inasmuch as many of their graduates enter business, the professions or public life in other parts of Canada. I need not endeavour to prove such a statement as that. I should like to put before the house the picture of how federal aid per student by provinces works out on the basis of the 1951-52 figures. I will mention Nova Scotia first, and I should like hon. members to keep the figure for that province in their minds. Here is the result:

Province	Amount Per Student
Nova Scotia	$ 92.45
New Brunswick	136.19
Prince Edward Island	184.27
Newfoundland	483.16
Quebec	105.21
Ontario	126.28
Manitoba	98.74
Saskatchewan	108.73
Alberta	162.88
British Columbia	102.86

You can see from these figures that many universities received double what those of Nova Scotia received. That indicates how great a disparity results from the method employed. Yet surely it is unfair to penalize Nova Scotia, for that is the effect, simply because we have a high proportion of eligible students. It should not be too difficult to set up standards for all Canada and define exactly what is meant by "university" and what is meant by "eligible student", so that a system can be devised which will be fair to all, giving a uniform rate per student irrespective of location. Indeed there is no real difficulty which was not fully met and surmounted in the system used for the Department of Veterans Affairs grants, a system which had the merits of fair play and of simplicity of administration. Simplicity of administration should recommend it.

Surely it is fair to say that one of the objectives of these federal grants to universities is to encourage these universities to educate students for the benefit of the nation. But a system which penalizes the province that has the greatest proportion of eligible students hinders rather than helps the pursuit of that objective. The case, I believe, is sound. Our universities ask for no more than a system which will be fair to all. We are not asking that anything be taken away from anyone; we are merely asking that such a system be adopted without delay so it will govern the distribution of the grants for 1952-53.

Speaking in the debate a few days ago the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) gave us something to think about. His constituency is contiguous to the United States, and the facts and figures he quoted must be particularly galling to Canadian citizens in the border areas. There was, said the hon. member for Charlotte, a great deal of criticism with regard to the subsidization of farm and fishery products, but he submitted the most glaring example of subsidization was that represented by the difference in prices of many manufactured products here and in the United States.

Differences in cost between certain specified items in the United States and Canada were quoted. The accuracy of these comparisons may be challenged, but there can be no challenging the fact that prices in Canada are much higher in many lines than in the United States. Of course, the hon. member blames the tariff and the tendency to take advantage of the tariff as the cause of the difference.

I am sure that with these instances before us more and more Canadians are wondering if the price of Canadian economic independence is not coming too high. Canada, as everyone knows, has a very great stake in the removal of trade restrictions and in broadening the market for our exports. Yet we must recognize that protection of one kind or another is part and parcel of the commercial policy of all countries including our biggest markets, the United States and the United Kingdom. In our own country, many industries have grown up behind protective tariffs, industries which have added greatly to our wealth and development. We are reminded from time to time that this has been done at a price, which is paid by the general public in the consumption of goods.

I believe that it would be foolish to suggest the removal of all such restrictions. We are forced to restrain to some extent the purely economic factors. The efforts to encourage the further fabrication of pulp and lumber products within our own country are well justified. The processing of industrial materials, such as iron, steel and aluminum, rather than exporting them raw, is desirable. Our very strong position with respect to certain of these very important commodities should determine our public policy. But that does not mean the same degree of protection should be accorded to each and every manufacturing project which seeks it.

It is a truism that the less well-organized groups in our society tend to be neglected. I am afraid that John Q. Public, as the consumer who does the purchasing, is in this category. Why, for example, should the purchaser of a television set pay a certain price in Canada when the identical set can be purchased across the border for not much more than half? Is there any major part of the public interest advanced by the artificial development of this particular industry in Canada? Certainly, due to our concentration of industry in Quebec and Ontario, the maritimes are suffering in paying a high price for everything they buy.

We have today a very special interest in television. When the field of television is broadened and extended to the areas of Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax, I believe everyone within the range of these stations should be entitled to buy a television set at the lowest cost possible. There should be a television set in every home, not just the wealthy homes, so the people as a whole may receive the benefit of the instructive and educational features so broadcast.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, may I respectfully suggest that the government take under consideration for this item, television sets, a lowering of the protective tariffs and excise taxes so the service rendered by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this field may be enjoyed by the largest number of people possible. As it is at present, the whole of Canada is paying for the protection of the few.

Before leaving this question of protection, may I draw the attention of the house to a very serious matter that reflects on the income of our national harbours, our railroads, and the stevedores connected with any ports of exit, such as Halifax and Saint John. It is the matter of the export of Canadian automobiles and parts through United States ports. Automobile companies receive practically all the protection they require, but they in turn are not playing the game with the people of Canada as a whole, nor with the seaports of Canada which are equipped and capable of handling our export trade. We deplore the fact that these companies are not playing their full part as they should in shipping through Canadian ports. I think it is poor gratitude, and certainly not patriotic, for these companies to export their products through United States ports after receiving concessions from the people of Canada, including the stevedores and the railway workers who are dependent upon the movement of export traffic for their livelihood.

I would like to quote a few statistics concerning these exports. In 1948 Canadian automobile manufacturers exported through United States ports 26,082 automobiles while through Canadian ports went 22,087. At the same time automobile parts to the value of $4,454,050 were exported through United States ports, and $9,091,853 through Canadian ports. Now we come to 1951 and we find almost a complete reversal. Exports through United States ports were 50,465 cars as against 10,011 through Canadian ports. In 1951 parts went through United States ports to the value of $8,435,467; through Canadian ports just about one-half that amount, $4,534,140.

I submit, sir, the manufacturers have a poor sense of gratitude, but I wish to go further. The Matheson submission last September to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) on the non-absorption by the railways of the national harbours board top wharfage surcharges contains a statement showing country of destination, dollar value and shipping weight in tons of export traffic originating in Canada and routed via the port of New York during the month of February, 1952. The figures I am giving you now are based on the United States department of census returns. The dollar value of these February exports through New York was $31,287,998, which means 68,126 shipping weight tons, all lost to our Canadian ports and our national revenue. Automobiles, trucks, buses, trailers and parts shipped amounted in value to $15,835,869 and in tonnage to over 53 million pounds. The automobile people are not the only offenders, because Canadian goods generally have been flowing out of United States ports instead of Canadian ports. During 1951 the value of these goods amounted to $257 million, which was about 16 per cent of Canada's total exports to overseas countries.

These figures are disturbing, and should be to every member of this house, because the tendency to ship through United States ports is increasing. In 1949 less than 11 per cent of Canada's overseas exports went out of United States ports. In dollars this meant about $155 million, and as I have told you this amount has grown to over $257 million.

I listened with considerable interest to the several speeches on behalf of the sugar beet industry, which has been affected by the importation of Cuban cane sugar. While I have every sympathy with the speakers, I cannot go along with them in their suggested remedy, namely more protection. It seems natural, I suppose, for an industry to seek government aid when that industry appears threatened. But if my information is correct, sugar is already receiving protection to the extent of $1.89 per hundred pound bag.

In considering the suggestion for increased protection, we must remember that other commodities in addition to sugar enter into the picture. In 1951, when the Cuban agreement was made, concessions were obtained for several other items of food, one of which was an important maritime product, salt codfish. Last year Canada exported salt codfish amounting in value to $2,412,000. Then, in addition to our salt codfish, potatoes were exported from the maritimes in huge quantities. Let us not do anything to protect one product that would jeopardize the trade the maritimes are enjoying with Cuba. In other words, why rob Peter to pay Paul? Personally I think Paul is doing very well now.

Later on in the session, Mr. Speaker, I intend to have something to say about health insurance. Since this is a project so extensive and involving so many services that we have not now available, I think I can well wait until a later time to speak on it. There is a subject, however, very much alive today on which I should like to touch, namely increases in the pensions of worthy indigent parents of deceased soldiers. We all know of numbers of parents who gave everything they had in order to educate their sons only to have them, on the completion of their education, enlist in the armed services. Some of these boys were killed. Many of them were married and left families, but automatically the wife and family are provided for while the indigent mothers and fathers are left without support.

This government has been most reasonable, may I say even generous in their treatment of the returned soldier and the pensioner. The Silver Cross Women of Canada, to whom I pay sincere homage, have made what seems to me a timely and urgent appeal on behalf of these people who gave so much, in many cases all they had. I would ask that the same treatment with regard to pensions be accorded to these indigent parents whose sons were killed in the defence of this country, and that the awards be made along the lines suggested by the Silver Cross Women of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Higgins the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

producers, whether agricultural or otherwise, will wish to have some indication, before they are called upon to plan for their production during the coming year, as to whether or not some solution has been found of this very great difficulty being encountered by our agricultural and other producers across Canada today.

I would recall that on other occasions great hopes have been built up by generalities, and then no positive results have followed which supported those generalities. Quite apart from what may have been accomplished for the general purpose of laying the foundation for wider plans in the future, there is the question in the minds of all of us, and particularly the agricultural population of Canada: what has been done to find markets for our agricultural surpluses? To that question I feel sure our agricultural population, and also the other Canadians who produce foods which are normally exported in large quantities to the United Kingdom, will wish an answer at the earliest possible date.

To close these comments at this point, I would further emphasize the fact that there is uncertainty about this statement which was indicated by Mr. Matthew Halton yesterday in a broadcast from London when he said, and I quote his words:

> There are two answers to the problem of Britain and the sterling area.

He is referring to the statement which emerges, and he makes his own comments as to its inadequacy. He said:

> One is simply harder work and better planning; the other is American help. These two facts emerge clearly throughout the verbosity of the conference communique.

Since that statement was conveyed to Canadians generally throughout Canada yesterday by the C.B.C., and also the other comments which leave the impression that the people over there were in almost as much of a fog in regard to this communique as they had been in a physical fog for a few days prior to its publication, I would hope that at the earliest possible date we may have some explanation and clarification, so that, in the words of the Prime Minister, we may consider this communique with something approaching the same measure of care, and I would hope understanding, as was devoted to it by those who drafted it in London.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): We are not going to say anything at this time about the communique, which I should like to have a chance to study more carefully and, as the Prime Minister said, to weigh its words before making any comment.

With respect to the Currie report, I shall withhold any comment until I have had a chance to digest its contents most carefully. But we do want the Prime Minister to know that we join with other members in the house in welcoming his report of the audience he had with Her Majesty the Queen, and we deeply appreciate the message Her Majesty has sent to us.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 42, to incorporate Peace River Transmission Company Limited.—Mr. Murray (Cariboo).

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF COASTAL FISHERIES

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved the first reading of Bill No. 44 (from the Senate), to protect the coastal fisheries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

LIMITATION TO COMPANIES WITH OUTSTANDING BOND ISSUES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 45 (from the Senate), to amend the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

REVISION OF RATES OF COMPENSATION TO DISABLED SEAMEN

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Labour) moved the first reading of Bill No. 46 (from the Senate), to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

ADMINISTRATION OF PLACER AND QUARTZ MINING OPERATIONS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the first reading of Bill No. 47 (from the Senate), to amend the Territorial Lands Act and to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PACIFIC DEFENCE

POSITION OF CANADA IN PACIFIC DEFENCE AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. A news dispatch over the week end indicates that the United Kingdom is now being given a voice in Pacific defence, presumably by becoming a party to the Australian-New Zealand-United States treaty. What steps, if any, has the Canadian government taken to gain the same position for Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I did not have an opportunity to discuss the Pacific pact, in any way, with anyone whatsoever, while I was away.

LEVEL CROSSINGS

INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY PRECAUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have given notice, and have sent him newspaper clippings in connection therewith. My question is prompted by a level crossing accident at the intersection of Lawrence avenue and the Canadian National Railways line in Weston last Friday night, in which two Brampton residents lost their lives.

My question is contained in a long sentence, but I believe it is as concise as I can make it and, at the same time, have it in proper form. In a case where there is a double railway track and a train is standing on one of such tracks near an unprotected level crossing or sufficiently close to a protected level crossing to make the wigwag or flashing lights operate, is there any railway regulation which calls for one of the crew of that standing train to proceed to the intersection and to warn the highway traffic of trains approaching on the other track which may be hidden from view because of the standing train?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to my hon. friend's question is as follows:

At a protected crossing such as the one in Weston, which the hon. member has in mind, the operating rules as approved by the board of transport commissioners do not call for flag protection by a member of the crew of the standing train, since the operation of the wigwag or flashing lights is considered as sufficient protection.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Graydon: In view of the number of accidents of this kind that have occurred in the past, would the minister review the situation?

Mr. Chevrier: I should add that the board of transport commissioners have these regulations constantly under review. I am sure that, because of this terrible tragedy, they will take the matter under consideration. In any event I can assure my hon. friend that we in the government are considering the question of further protection at crossings, and I would hope at some future date to bring something more concrete to the house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND DEFENCE PROJECT—MAINTENANCE OF ROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. Will the minister say, in view of the contents of the telegram from the city clerk of the municipality of St. John's, Newfoundland, a copy of which I have sent him, that immediate measures will be taken to ensure that the south side road in the town of St. John's from Job's bridge to Fort Amherst will be put and maintained in a safe condition during the period it is being used for national defence projects?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Acting Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. Unfortunately, not through his fault, I received it only as I came into the house. It deals with a detailed matter in St. John's with which I am not cognizant. I do not know whether the department has any responsibility in the matter, but I shall make inquiry.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRURO-SYDNEY—USE OF DIESELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): On Friday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked whether there was any truth in a rumour that Canadian National Railways were to put diesel engines in operation on the road from Sydney to Truro. In reply may I say that in 1953 the Canadian National Railways plan to assign ten 1,600 horsepower road diesel units to handle freight between Moncton and Mulgrave. The Canadian National Railways do not contemplate assigning any diesels to Cape Breton island during 1953, other than one diesel switcher to the yard at Sydney.

FISHERIES

BAIT DEPOTS—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Could the Minister of Fisheries add anything to a statement which appeared in the press about financial assistance to be given in Newfoundland for the construction of bait depots?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I cannot add anything today.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PURCHASES OF CUBAN RAW SUGAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce could tell the house when the letters will be tabled which were referred to in the motion for papers agreed to on December 10 and having to do with purchases of Cuban raw sugar?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall make inquiries. I believe they have gone to the office of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) and it should be only a matter of a day or two.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Earlier this session he indicated to the house that the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project would be tabled at an early date. May we expect it before the Christmas holidays?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have an inquiry made. When I informed the house to that effect I had been told by the secretary that under the instructions of the commission he was having it printed and that it would be made available just as soon as it was printed. It is intended that it be made available to the house as soon as it is printed, so I will make inquiry about what advance has been made in the printing.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DAMAGE AT CHALK RIVER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) inform the house about the present situation at the atomic energy plant at Chalk River, including the extent of damage to the plant?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have been away over the week end, and, since my return, I have not been able to get an authoritative report. Dr. Mackenzie is now on his way from Chalk River to Ottawa.

I think I may say that, as far as money is concerned, the damage was negligible. There was apparently a certain amount of contamination but I am not sure of the cause. Precautionary measures necessitated shutting down of the area but that contamination has been cleared up and work has now been resumed. I will be glad to give a more complete report tomorrow.

ESTABLISHING OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In reply to an earlier question by my hon. friend, asking if the government would give consideration to establishing a committee on atomic energy, I am able to tell him today that a committee will be established.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, December 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply, and to compliment them for their excellent speeches. I may say that I had hoped that one of our Newfoundland members would have had that honour but now, I suppose, we will have to wait until the next parliament when a Newfoundland member of the Conservative party will have the privilege. I would also like to join with my own leader and the leaders of other parties in saying to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) how glad we are to see him back and to see how well he looks.

At the outset may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I intend dealing chiefly with Newfoundland provincial matters because they are very important. I do not expect any great differences of opinion even from our own Newfoundland members now that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) is absent.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Higgins: Well, I do not know actually where the Secretary of State is. He is supposed to be in Newfoundland but the city clerk of the municipality of St. John's today sent a telegram to him here in Ottawa. He is not here and he is not in Newfoundland so I do not really know where he is actually. I do not know whether any of the other ministers know either.

As I said, I intend dealing chiefly with Newfoundland matters because they are non-controversial. I won't deal with anything controversial since the rum in Ontario is of very poor quality indeed. What brings that up? Well, a column by the Junior Chamber of Commerce in the St. John's Telegram of December 6 contains this paragraph:

> Plain speech is a lost art in these parts. The modern Newfoundlander needs three tots of strong rum before he clears his throat, and a good look under the sofa and behind the door before he ventures an opinion on any controversial subject.

As I say, Ontario rum is not very good and, consequently, I am not going to deal with any controversial matters. My statement is no reflection on hon. members from Newfoundland, because I do not know any one of them who partakes of such a libation—other than myself.

The first matter I wish to deal with, Mr. Speaker, is Bell island and the petition presented the other day. It is not a new subject by any means, because I note in sessional paper 149J of June 29, 1951, that I first brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) on November 19, 1949, and I did so continuously from that time until March 19, 1952. That has been a long period of time and during it I have stressed to the minister the importance of the terminal facilities between Bell island and Portugal Cove being attended to. Let me tell you that Bell island at present has the largest iron ore mine in the British empire. It has been producing constantly for some fifty-eight years and from a question answered, as it appears in Hansard of December 10, 1952, more than half of the iron ore produced in Canada in 1951 came from Bell island. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the community of Bell island has a population of more than 10,000 persons. It is a major industrial area in the province, 2,000 workmen being engaged in the mining industry. It has annual earnings of more than $6 million and the money spent, including earnings from secondary industries in the island, is very great indeed. A considerable portion of the tax on these sales, naturally, is paid to the federal government in the form of income and corporation taxes, sales tax, licence fees and royalties. The community of Bell island is a very important factor in providing the United Nations with raw materials on which the defence of the western world lies.

We all agree that the mining industry is a hazardous one and the extension of a proper ferry service to the mainland of Newfoundland is most important, especially in view of the fact that the island is without proper hospital facilities. Last year the ferry service transported at least 100,000 passengers and 15,000 motor vehicles, together with goods and supplies of all kinds which are used by this thriving and prosperous community. Bell island required speedy dispatch of mails and freight but such service is not presently being provided. The residents of Bell island ask for a proper terminal dock to be provided at Bell island and at Portugal Cove.

The position, as the minister has told me from time to time, is that they are ferry wharves and, consequently, are not maintained by the federal government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have to take issue with the minister there because I notice that in an advertisement in the Canada Gazette of October 4, 1952, at page 2726, there is an advertisement for the construction of ferry landings, Howe island—Pickett's ferry—Ontario. That advertisement is signed by the acting secretary of the Department of Public Works, Mr. Robert Fortier. That is a provincial ferry and the wharves are being maintained by the federal government. Moreover, term of union No. 33 provides that all Newfoundland public wharves shall be the property of the federal government. No notice was ever given to the province, nor was it ever discussed at any time until this application was made, suggesting that this ferry wharf would not be maintained by the federal government. Therefore, I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is fair and reasonable to say that, as we were not given proper notice, this wharf should be considered as a public wharf and maintained accordingly. The terminals were constructed and are maintained, I am told, by the federal government for the ferry running from Amherst island to Milhaven in Prince Edward, a distance of two miles, a ferry which carries twelve cars.

Now, Bell island has been the scene of very great activity. The Portugal Cove wharf has had the honour of being the point of embarkation of the late King George VI during his tour in 1939, and of our present Queen Elizabeth when she left Canada to return to the United Kingdom after her tour last year. I must say that it was a great disgrace to see the type of wharf from which our Princess, and now our Queen, had to embark on the little ferry in order to board her ship. It reflected no credit on the minister to say that this was a ferry wharf and he could not put it in shape.

The other day when I commented on the fact that on Thursday last we were celebrating the fourth anniversary of the signing of the terms of union, hon. members were good enough to indicate that they approved and hoped the union would be a happy one. Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the offspring, if I may use the term, of this union is this wharf, and I am quite certain in my own mind that it is the obligation of the Minister of Public Works. I want to know what he is going to do about our Bell, meaning Bell island. So far as I am concerned the matter will not be permitted to drift any longer.

I refer you to Hansard, page 4475, of June 21, 1951. At that time, I drew attention to the great difference in the moneys being allotted for public works between the districts in Newfoundland represented by hon. members on the other side of the house and hon. members on this side of the house. On page 4474 of Hansard for that day, I said this to the minister:

> From April 1, 1949, the district of St. John's East had spent in it $38,108.56 . . .
> In the district of Bonavista-Twillingate represented by the Secretary of State, the amount was $267,095.21.

On the same page of Hansard I said:

> In this year (meaning 1951) the work called for in St. John's East amounts to $69,803; in Bonavista-Twillingate, the constituency of the Secretary of State, $1,332,575.

In the current estimates, for the same type of work, construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of harbours in Newfoundland, the Secretary of State has a total amount of $862,000 allocated to various wharf improvements in his riding, and the district of St. John's East has not got one red cent allotted to it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Higgins: I am not referring to other Liberal hon. members from Newfoundland, but they have their share. All you have to do is look up that page in the estimates for this year, and you will see a very large figure representing the amounts they are receiving for wharves and other items of this nature. There is not one wharf in the province of Newfoundland that is as important as the wharf in Portugal cove and the wharf in Bell island. I say that without fear of contradiction, successful or otherwise, by any member. I want to find out what is happening.

I have a letter from the chairman of the citizens committee, and I am going to read brief extracts from it. The chairman is Mr. Addison Bown, who I might add was a cabinet minister in the first Smallwood administration, so I suppose he can be considered unbiased. The letter is dated December 7, Bell island, and reads:

> I might say that the transportation problem here is steadily growing worse, especially since winter conditions have set in. The Maneco suffered damage to her engines recently in a fire, and as soon as the Kipawo returns to the service she will have to be taken off for overhaul and repair. This means that we will be left with only one boat for some time longer.
> The freight situation is about as unsatisfactory as it is possible to have it. . .
>
> I am sure you realize the desperate need for action in the matter . . .

In the Daily News of November 3, there appeared this item:

> The committee has learned with grave concern of the accident at Portugal Cove on Thursday when a loaded truck owned by Chester Dawe Limited fell into the landwash as a result of the collapse of part of the roadbed approaching the wharf.

On October 31, this item appeared:

> The storm has again proved up the need for a better ferry service. There have been two stormy days now and all day yesterday, Bell Island was marooned from outside contacts.
> The ferry had made only one trip the day before and sources on Bell Island stated it certainly shows the need for a better ferry terminal at Bell Island and also at Portugal Cove.

This morning I received a telegram from the general superintendent of the Dominion Wabana Ore Company, the operating company on Bell island. In part, he says:

> Present condition unbelievable unless seen and has making of terrible accident.

So far as I understand this ferry question, Mr. Speaker, and I have obtained this information from a top official of the minister's office, "where the need is established and the province is either unwilling or unable to provide proper facilities for ferries and ferry terminals, then even though the ferry is operating wholly within a province, suitable ferries and terminal facilities have been provided by the federal government, either on a contributory or on an outright basis, with the federal government paying the entire cost." I do not know why the provincial government is taking no action in this matter. If it is, I have not seen any appeal, as I have said before, for assistance. I am informed indirectly that the federal government have made an offer to the provincial government of Newfoundland of a contribution of 50 per cent of the cost of providing proper terminals and proper ferry services. I believe that offer was made some four months ago, but I have heard nothing officially from the department at all. As a representative of this district, I think it most unfair that I am not told exactly what is happening. If the provincial government has the money, I should like to know what is being done towards providing proper facilities, but if they have not got the money then I think it is time the minister stepped in and provided these facilities anyway.

The next matter that I wish to deal with is the question of the federal public building at St. John's. I recently asked the Minister of Public Works what plans he had in sight for the erection of that building. I sent him a communication from the chairman of the St. John's town planning commission, Sir Brian Dunfield; and in view of that communication, I asked him what comment he was prepared to make as to the building. I believe the answer he gave me was that when he was in doubt he did nothing. I do not know whether the minister is still in doubt. I should like to have from him a straight answer as to whether or not he is going to erect this building in the government house paddock. He has had this protest, and his deputy minister had a letter as far back as April 18, 1952 from Sir Brian Dunfield, chairman of the town planning commission of St. John's. The first paragraph of that letter reads as follows:

> I am chairman of the St. John's town planning commission, a statutory body; and also chairman of the St. John's city planning committee, a larger voluntary non-statutory body lately appointed by the city council to help them in certain directions. The two are distinct but work together.

Another paragraph reads as follows:

> I exchanged a letter with your minister, Mr. Fournier, on this subject in October last, and he kindly promised to keep us in touch with the matter, and to have a senior official see us before anything was decided; but we have not heard anything since, and we know that measuring and estimating is still going on.

In that long letter to the deputy minister he set forth various sites where the building could be erected, but he finally winds up by saying:

> We trust that your department will not come to any final conclusion in the matter of this site without consulting us. The city will naturally expect to be consulted; and my committees, as arms of the city, would be considerably affronted if they learned at any time that a scheme had been adopted without local consultation.
> We hear that engineers have been seen measuring on the government house paddock. You know, I take it, that the town planning commission will object strongly to any such use of this important open space in the midst of a high-class residential area? We have said so before.

I last discussed this matter with the minister in 1951, as set forth at page 4477 of Hansard of that year. Without going into all the details of the discussion at that time, it is clear that the minister said that they had picked a site. He said that the site was at, as he describes it, Circle road and Bannerman avenue. What he really meant to say was Circular road and Bannerman road.

[Mr. Higgins.]

That is the particular site that I am speaking about today. That is the site that the objection is taken to, and it is against the use of that site that I am again protesting.

The minister at that time in 1951 said that all that remained to be settled was the question of price; that he had been negotiating with the premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Smallwood; that Mr. Smallwood had agreed to give him that land but had not put any price on it as yet; and that was all that was holding the matter up.

The last time any land was taken from government house property was when it was taken by the present Secretary of State, (Mr. Bradley) and it was taken by him when he was solicitor general in Sir Richard Squires' administration, I believe. I again protest against any selling by the Smallwood administration of this site to the federal government for use in the erection of a public building. I have already told the minister of the strong protests that appeared in Newfoundland newspapers and that have come from various public bodies such as the municipal council and the board of trade. I trust that he will not only remain in doubt about the matter, but will definitely make up his mind to do nothing further about erecting a building on that site. He has had suitable sites given him by the chairman of the town planning commission, and I recommend to the minister that he follow the commission's request.

The next matter that I wish to deal with is the question of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland. On several occasions during the last session and previously I asked the minister in charge of this particular project whether there had been any agreement to relax the standards of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland; and on all such occasions he said that no such agreement had been made. The last time a formal question appeared on the order paper—it is question No. 20, but unfortunately I have not the date; it was some time during last session—it was as follows:

> Is the completed highway in Newfoundland to be of the same standard as that of the other provinces?

The answer he gave was:

> The government of Newfoundland signed the same agreement as the other seven signing provincial governments. The agreement provides for variations and specifications to meet local conditions but in general the same standards apply for all provinces.

I take it that those specifications the minister refers to are minor indeed. What do we find? Somebody is fooling somebody. I do not accuse the minister, but certainly somebody is doing that because here is a statement by the minister of public works of Newfoundland dated July 17, 1952, as published in the Evening Telegram of that date. It is headed, "Discuss Trans-Canada Highway Work in Newfoundland", and reads in part as follows:

> . . . federal provincial cooperation in the building of trans-Canada highway links in Newfoundland . . .
> Trans-Canada standards demand that muskeg be excavated or blasted to a depth of ten feet and replaced by stone or gravel fill. The custom in Newfoundland has been to build roads across muskeg with a brush mat or corduroy foundation.
>
> While the Newfoundland method has been perfectly satisfactory for light-traffic roads with a gravel surface, it will not work for a paved highway, Mr. Spencer said, since the roadbed tends to settle, and the rigid surface of the road to become broken.
> "We have been in the habit of excavating marsh only to the depth of about two feet," Mr. Spencer continued, "and we are not yet sure whether we will attempt to meet the full standards of the trans-Canada highway locally."

That is an extremely serious matter. If the trans-Canada highway is to be built in Newfoundland—and I believe a considerable portion of the road has been built, and I also believe the money has been paid over by the federal government for the amount that has been built—if it has not been built according to standards, we should like to know about it, and we should like to know what the difference or variation from the standard is, and who made the agreement to relax the standards. I would ask the minister, when he has the opportunity to reply, to let us know a little bit more about it. Obviously he and the minister of public works of Newfoundland cannot both be right. If they are speaking about different matters, that is something else again.

I should like to continue on the subject of roads. It strikes me that the speed of motor cars is a pertinent question and should be discussed here. I hope I am not being offensive in regard to this matter; I shall try not to be anyway. As hon. members know, I was incapacitated for a time, and as a result of that I did pay much more attention to motor accidents as reported in the papers than I normally would. From reading the notices in the papers it appeared to me that by far the greatest cause of these accidents was speed. I noticed that the answer given to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), which appears on page 512 of Hansard, shows that from January 1 to June 30 of this year 655 Canadians lost their lives as a result of highway fatalities. This figure does not include the number in Quebec. In Ontario 377 people were killed. I assume it is safe to say that about the same number were killed in Quebec. In other words, we can take it that the approximate number killed in that time would be nearly 1,000. That is a serious matter, and particularly in view of the finding of Professor Oscar Martin as set forth on page 21 of the Ottawa Citizen of December 2. It is headed: "Find Ontario roads risky over fifty miles an hour." The report says:

> Ontario motorists who drive more than fifty miles an hour take a dangerous chance on most provincial highways, a Queen's university highway expert said Monday. Professor Oscar Martin, who studied highways in several European countries including Russia, before coming here recently, said Ontario roads, except the four-lane highways, are engineered for top speeds of fifty miles an hour. The four-lane roads were safe at sixty to sixty-five miles an hour. If you drive beyond the engineered speed of the road you obviously are in danger."

He talks about driving 15,000 miles during the past summer over Ontario roads, and he says:

> A car travelling at sixty needs four times as long to stop as a car going thirty.

I would remark, quoting from memory in this case—you, Mr. Speaker, can probably check me on this—that a car going twenty miles an hour requires forty feet in which to stop. I think that is correct.

An hon. Member: On the level.

Mr. Higgins: Yes, with a dry surface. When you think of that you begin to see the danger inherent in the motor car of today. We all know that motor cars are being stepped up every year to a faster speed. The new models coming out next year will have a very much higher horsepower than the ones of last year. We ask ourselves the question: Why all this speed? Where are we trying to get? Why are we travelling so fast? If we save ten minutes, is it worth it, and do we enjoy going as fast as that? I must confess that I also drive pretty fast, or rather I used to drive pretty fast. I have not been driving very fast recently. I submit it is time that legislation was passed controlling the speed of motor cars to a safe limit. How we are to do that I do not pretend to suggest. Whether a governor should be put on the motor or not, I do not know. However, there would be nothing to ensure that it would not be removed. If we are to do anything about this we shall have to demand that motor cars be geared down to a speed which will not exceed sixty miles an hour at the very most.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Higgins: Do you agree with that? Why anybody in this day and age wants to travel at seventy-five or eighty-five miles an hour, I do not know. If they wish to travel that fast, why do they not buy an aeroplane or rent an aeroplane, because by the time you are going eighty-five or ninety miles an hour you are ready to take off anyway.

Mr. Prudham: Less Newfoundland rum might help.

Mr. Higgins: We do not care where we go then.

There is another matter to which I take exception. It is an item that appeared in the Peterborough Examiner not very long ago. I would not have minded, Mr. Speaker, if this item had appeared in the paper published by that blatherskite Bertie McCormick, but when it appeared in a reputable paper like the Peterborough Examiner then I must take note of it. I am sorry but I cannot find the clipping; however, it complained of the expense to Canada of keeping the province of Newfoundland. All I want to say to that, Mr. Speaker, is this: Whatever Newfoundland is getting from the federal government by way of family allowances, old age pensions, and the other social services, the federal government is taking away as much if not more than that amount from Newfoundland; and I do not want the Peterborough Examiner or any other paper in this dominion, or any hon. member of this house, to think that we in Newfoundland are not paying our way. I am not going to say any more on that because I have not much time left, and I have still a few matters to deal with.

Another newspaper, the Globe and Mail, a paper which I believe is not unfriendly to the party of which I have the honour to be a member, makes the comment that the first generation of Newfoundlanders to be educated will be those after confederation. Well, what a lot of trash and nonsense! I pass this along without meaning any disrespect to hon. members. Yesterday I spoke to a Newfoundland senator who was prominently connected with education before becoming a member of the Senate. I asked him what he thought of it. He said: "Canadians did not know how ignorant they were until they joined Newfoundland." I did not say that. That statement was given to me by an hon. senator, but I certainly do object very forcibly to any suggestion that we did not have education in Newfoundland before confederation. We may not have had degree-granting universities to the extent that you have up here, but many a person with B.A. after his name may be regarded as a B.A., but not a bachelor of arts. I am not saying any more on that subject.

Another matter that I should like to deal with is the question of statement of policy issued by the mayor, H. G. R. Mews, and the city council of St. John's on December 1, 1952, as it appeared in the Daily News of that date. It says this:

> When in Ottawa early this year I called on the Minister of Defence and presented him with a copy of the report.

He is describing the report on water services of the city of St. John's. It continued:

> I called his attention to the fact that the city of St. John's had to provide water services for the various defence bases and barracks in and near St. John's. The fact was also stressed that a second source of supply in time of emergency was essential, and that the federal government might properly assist in view of the heavy demand for water on the part of all defence forces. In the absence from Ottawa of the minister of civil defence I discussed the matter with his deputy. In neither instance could I report more than mild interest and great sympathy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I am sorry, but I must point out that the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in the debate will be brief. It is prompted by some of the remarks made by hon. members concerning the Department of Transport. I am hopeful that, if I am not able to deal with all the remarks about the department, hon. members will not think that because of that I do not consider the matters they raised to be important. I hope, too, that the hon. member who has just taken his seat will excuse me if I do not follow him in the remarks he has made.

There are four matters I wish to discuss at this time, and they are as follows:

First, they have to do with comments made by the senior member for Queens (Mr. McLure) last Friday evening. The hon. member seemed to be dissatisfied with a reply I made to a question he asked. I am sorry if he was dissatisfied, but there was no other answer I could give to the question as it was put. It happens very often—and I am sure the hon. member will not take this as a reproach on my part—that some of the questions he asks should be put on the order paper. It is my opinion that this was one of them.

However, I gave him the only reply that could be given at the time, namely that, on the subject of whether or not the maritime commission had considered an application made by Northumberland Ferries Limited, my only reply to that question was no. Perhaps I might add a word now. The hon. member was complaining, too, about the treatment received by Prince Edward Island at the hands of a Liberal government. Well, I disagree most heartily with him on that statement, because I do not think it is factual. On the contrary I suggest that, since it has been in office, this government has considered all legitimate claims of the Islanders, and has dealt with them accordingly and granted many of them.

The hon. member said in his speech that——when a Conservative government takes office we will look to it for the proper fulfilment of the terms of confederation of 1873.

Well, with respect, may I remind him that Conservative administrations have been in office three, if not four, times since 1873. Surely my hon. friend, and others who have represented his constituency, have had the opportunity of bringing to the attention of those administrations the agreement of 1873. Yet, little or nothing was done by Conservative regimes in that time. I think therefore that the hon. member's point is badly taken.

Then, he seems to be under the impression that he is the only one interested in the welfare of the Islanders. I can tell him that that is not so. There are many of us on this side of the house, including myself, who have given the affairs of Prince Edward Island very careful consideration. I should like to tell my hon. friend—perhaps he is not aware of this—that I saw a delegation representing Northumberland Ferries Limited in my office early last week. That delegation was brought to me by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, and he was accompanied by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Kickham), as well as by two hon. members from the other place, and a minister from the provincial government. They came to see me about the very matter with which I am concerned at the moment, namely the application by Northumberland Ferries Limited for a new vessel.

I listened to their representations, and suggested a course of action, which they followed, namely that they make their application to the maritime commission, the body charged with the responsibility of recommending whether or not an increase in subsidy should be granted.

The hon. member has referred to the commission as a buffer commission. Well, let me say to him that that buffer commission has been very generous, or at least very fair, to Northumberland Ferries Limited. The company began its operations in 1941, at which time it received a subsidy of $34,000. That subsidy was increased from $34,000 to $158,000, thanks to the consideration given to the problem by the maritime commission. While it is true that the commission did not consider the inauguration of the service, it must be kept in mind that the service began in 1941, and that when the subsidy of $34,000 was paid there was only one ship in operation. Today there are two, and that has meant an increase in the subsidy.

All in all, since the service has been in existence—that is, between 1941 and 1952—a subsidy somewhat in excess of $1,030,000 has been paid to Northumberland Ferries Limited —and much of it on the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission, which my hon. friend calls a buffer commission.

The hon. member seemed to feel that very little attention was paid to the just and rightful claims of the Islanders. Well, I can assure my hon. friend that I do not cast aside any of their claims; I give them the best possible consideration of which I am capable, as indeed the commission is doing with the present application.

The application was made to the maritime commission. In effect, it seeks a new ship. In other words, Northumberland Ferries Limited seeks the approval of the commission for the construction of a new ship. That is a pretty serious matter, and for that reason the commission must study it carefully. It has asked the company for additional information, and that information is not yet forthcoming. When it is received the commission will deal with it carefully and will report to me, at which time I will be in a position to tell my hon. friend, and all other hon. members, what the recommendation of the commission is.

Then, if I may pass from that matter to a second one, I would turn to a complaint made by the new member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) in which he expressed criticism concerning the construction of the ferry vessel between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor. This criticism came somewhat as a surprise to me, because when the announcement was made by the government that there would be a new ferry in that part of the country it was well received by the house. My recollection is that all hon. members, even those from New Brunswick, were clearly of the opinion that it was a good thing to add a new ship to this very vital service between a state in the United States and the province of Nova Scotia.

This is why I should like to take a moment to review the position, in so far as the decision concerning this ferry is concerned.

The house will recall that in 1949 Eastern Steamship Lines, a United States firm which was operating a passenger service between Boston and Yarmouth, served notice of its intention to discontinue that service entirely. The first step which the government took was to seek out some other contractor who might be willing to give consideration to carrying on the service. The government got in touch with a number of operators, but only one offer was received. That offer could not be accepted for two reasons. First, it called for the payment of a subsidy of $300,000 per annum for ten years and over and above that a guaranteeing of a $500,000 bond issue on behalf of the applicant. The second reason why we could not accept the application was that the applicant proposed to purchase and operate the S.S. Yarmouth, the ship then being used by Eastern Steamship Lines on the service. Our investigations indicated that that ship, which was 21 years old, was definitely unsuitable for the modern type of traffic.

This inability to find a contractor who would operate the service led us to establish a committee composed of representatives of the province of Nova Scotia, of the Department of Transport and of the Canadian National Railways. The committee made an exhaustive study of the economic and operative features associated with a service between Yarmouth and Boston and after giving the whole matter careful consideration came to these conclusions. First, there should be constructed a vessel suitable for a daily round trip service and designed especially to transport a large number of refrigerated trucks and tourist automobiles. Second, Bar Harbor should be selected as the New England terminus because that point was sufficiently close to permit a daily round trip.

The hon. member made two criticisms. First, he suggested that the new vessel should operate on a triangular run and take in Saint John, New Brunswick. I should like to point out that a vessel operating on such a run would require accommodation for overnight traffic. The vessel we are building for the Bar Harbor-Yarmouth service is to provide a daily round trip service. If we were to include Saint John we certainly could not operate on the basis on which we are operating now. It would not be profitable to operate on that basis and we simply could not do it. The report of the committee to which I referred a moment ago shows conclusively that we could not economically justify the construction of a vessel of that type, namely, one with cabin accommodation, dining room lounges and necessarily a larger crew.

The other suggestion was that the former Saint John-Boston service be resumed. If we could not find an operator to run the service between Yarmouth and Boston I am extremely doubtful whether we could find one who could operate profitably between Saint John and Boston. It is most doubtful that such a venture would be profitable under any circumstances in view of the increased cost of operation and present-day trend toward travel by motor car. I think that that suggestion answers itself.

Based upon studies which the committee to which I have referred made and based on a study which we made ourselves, it is our opinion that there will be no detrimental effect upon the tourist traffic to New Brunswick because of the operation of this new ferry between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor. On the contrary, it is our view and our anticipation that this service will encourage larger traffic inasmuch as United States tourists will find it possible to make a circular trip, either entering through New Brunswick and departing from Nova Scotia or vice versa.

May I pass to the third matter that I rose to discuss, the Vancouver airport. In making his statement, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) was critical of the government because it did not purchase the airport. He seemed to be under the impression that because there had been an offer of a little more than $1 million by the municipality and a counter proposal of a little less than $1 million by the government we should move in and either split the difference or take over the airport on a more generous basis. I can assure the hon. member immediately that there has been no offer on behalf of the government of $900,000.

Perhaps I could review the proposition as I recall it. Representatives of the municipality of Vancouver approached the government in connection with the purchase of the airport. Immediately on receiving that request we reached the conclusion which I think any reasonable person would under the circumstances, that is that an independent appraisal should be made of the airport buildings, facilities and real estate.

That independent appraisal was made and it indicated that the airport was valued at $1·5 million. We took exception to certain small payments as having been made by the federal government, and if those were deducted from the appraisal it was reduced to $1·25 million. After consideration of the matter an offer of from $400,000 to $500,000 was made to the committee acting on behalf of the municipality. That offer was based on the city's interest in buildings and equipment and on the assumption that the municipality should provide the land. That is the basis on which we proceed in the department, as my hon. friend knows, that the municipality should provide the land or the largest portion of the land.

Mr. Green: Was that the case with Dorval?

Mr. Chevrier: No, that was not the case at Dorval; but I have indicated to my hon. friend on several occasions that that is the policy of the government. There are only two exceptions to that policy. In the case of Dorval an exception was made because that was built during wartime when an emergency existed and it was necessary to move quickly. It was used for war purposes at the outset and for that reason we moved in and took over the land. Apart from that, you will find that there is only one other exception additional to Dorval. The general policy is that the municipality provide the land or the greater part.

Mr. Green: Which is the other exception?

Mr. Chevrier: Uplands. An offer of $400,000 was made and the city replied that it felt it should receive $1,287,000. Then during a discussion with the municipal officers, or those appointed by the municipality, in my office I suggested that I would not be averse to recommending to my colleagues an amount in the neighbourhood of $900,000, but it was clearly said to them that that was not an offer in any sense. The suggestion was made provided they were willing to accept it. But they still wanted $1,287,000. I did not blame them and I commend them for the decision to operate the airport.

We are happy with the manner in which the city of Vancouver is operating that airport. It is a great international airport and I think the city can operate it profitably. It has done an excellent job, it has done a thorough job, and I am hopeful it will carry on. As a matter of fact, we are entering into an agreement with them for the purpose of leasing the airport and its facilities to the municipality for a further term.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CURRIE REPORT—REPORTED CHANGES IN PRINTED COPIES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege relates to a question I put to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning on the orders of the day. I feel that I am obligated, in the light of that question, to ask him to press the inquiry I directed to him on the basis of a further comment I should like to make. I asked whether there was any other printed copy of the Currie report.

I have since had an opportunity, which I had not had at the time I asked my question this morning, to compare some of the pages in the printed report which was tabled this morning with the same pages in another printed copy of the report which has been in our possession for a few days. I find, Mr. Speaker, having thus far been able to read thirty-eight pages—I have not been able to go through the whole report—that there are some seven pages on which changes appear to have been made. Some of those changes, I must say, are purely editorial, but there are at least three pages—page 7, page 13 and page 17—where the changes seem to be quite substantial.

On page 7 a paragraph has been left out and the page has been reprinted with triple spacing instead of double spacing. On page 13 the number of rules broken, referred to in that particular section, has been reduced from 34 to 33—one has been left out. On page 17 where the sentence formerly read:

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes at or near the top.

—the phrasing of the latter part of that sentence has been changed to read:

> . . . it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up.

My point in raising this at the present time is to press the question I put this morning; and I hope that the Prime Minister will find out all there is to be found out about the two printings of the report—in particular that he will get a full explanation why these, and any other changes there may be, were made. Who made the changes? Did Mr. Currie make them? Did he make them on the orders of the chief of the general staff? Did he make them on the orders of someone else or on the suggestion of any of these people?

Mr. Speaker, I fully accept the statement the Prime Minister made this morning, and he has made it to me personally since, that he had no knowledge of any previous printing of this report other than the one tabled this morning. But in view of this evidence which I have communicated to the house, I feel that this matter should be gone into very thoroughly.

While I am on my feet I should like to say that if it had not been for the illness today of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), he would have raised this question. It was he who received this copy of the earlier printing and because of his illness he gave it to me, asking me to raise it in the house today.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I must confess that I am taken entirely by surprise by the suggestion that there has been another printing of the report made available to anyone at all before the signed report was delivered to the Department of National Defence on the late afternoon or evening of December 8. I will certainly endeavour to have a full inquiry made, and that inquiry will also cover the aspect of there having been copies of a report to the minister distributed before it was sent to the minister.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I raise one other question which presents itself in view of this extremely surprising information which has been placed before the house by a very responsible member. We may not always agree with the views he expresses but I do not think that anyone at any time has challenged his sense of responsibility to this house. I do point out that a question does arise as to how this copy came to be delivered to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: This is the first I have heard of the existence of any other report. The fact that there are two copies and that there is a difference is in itself very important, but there is also the question of how this other distribution took place—a distribution of which I certainly was wholly unaware.

Mr. Mutch: I think you can count on it that it will be investigated.

Mr. Howe: The $64 question.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when I rose earlier I indicated to the house that there were four matters on which I wished to speak during the course of this debate. I have spoken on three of those now and I come to the fourth, namely the matter which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) dealt with during the course of the latter part of last week.

Before I begin any remarks I have to make in this connection, I should like to extend to the hon. member for Greenwood my congratulations upon his having attained another milestone in life. This is his birthday anniversary and I wish him the very best for himself, personally; and for himself, politically, I hope that he will continue to sit in the cool shades of the opposition.

Mr. Fulton: Don't make it too hot for him.

Mr. Chevrier: I do hope that the hon. member will not be offended by anything I have to say in connection with his remarks. I do not intend anything I have to say in any offensive way, and I hesitate to be critical of him on this particular day.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Help yourself.

Mr. Chevrier: But I must be critical of the speech which he made. To my mind it was one of his weaker efforts in the House of Commons. On many occasions he has risen in this house and has made substantial contributions during his addresses on the budgets; but this one, I am sorry to say, was not only a weak speech from the point of view of its logic and its legality, but it was also weak from the point of view of its politics.

The hon. member began his remarks by charging the government with a transfer of a manager from one hotel to another—from the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg to the Prince Edward hotel in Brandon. He charged the government with outrageous injustice in that transfer; with gross injustice on another occasion; and with political indignation and political interference. All of those charges were based not on facts but on surmise. All of those charges were based not on evidence that he had himself, not on knowledge that he possessed himself, but on knowledge which he obtained from other sources. In other words, the evidence which he obtained, or at least the information which he obtained, was obtained from a newspaper report. The newspaper in turn obtained it from its reporter who, in turn, got it from an employee or a group of employees of one of the hotels involved. This important charge, this serious charge of gross injustice and outrageous injustice, is based not on facts but on hearsay of the worst possible kind. If my hon. friend were defending an individual, a group, or a corporation charged in the manner in which he has charged the government, the department, or the railway, all he would have to do would be to move for non-suit and I am sure that the judge would not only accept his motion for non-suit but would refuse to accept this evidence, which is hearsay evidence of the worst kind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to ask one question. Does the minister challenge any of the facts related by the Winnipeg Tribune upon which I based my case?

Mr. Chevrier: I would ask my hon. friend to sit in quietness and listen to what I have to say. If he has any questions to ask after I am through, I shall do my best to reply to them. I think the charge was based on surmise of the worst possible kind; that is what I was saying.

The next point I wish to make is that my hon. friend's remarks were wholly contradictory. In the first place he begins by saying: We shall keep the Prime Minister out of this; he has absolutely nothing to do with it. But in the greater part of his speech, by inference, he proceeds to bring him in. I hope the hon. gentleman does not want to ask me to quote citations because there are at least five different references in his speech to the part played by the Prime Minister. I am sure that the hon. member did not intend them as such, and I am sure that he is satisfied in his own mind that the Prime Minister had absolutely nothing to do with this incident. But whether he is or whether he is not, the fact is that in his statement he proceeds to make assertions that do, in fact, implicate the Prime Minister.

Another point I wish to make is that while these statements are based on surmise and on newspaper reports on the one hand, on the other hand he quotes the president of the Canadian National Railways who denies them all. You have a newspaper report on the one hand and you have the statement of the man who knows or should know on the other hand, but the hon. member proceeds to say, "Oh no, I do not believe that; that cannot be true. I do not believe the statement of the president."

There was another point which my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made very forcibly the other evening. It is this, that the person involved is not an employee of the government. If he were, it may be that my friend would be in a stronger position than he is now. This person is not an employee of the government, he is an employee of the Canadian National Railways, a body set up by this parliament with a board of directors to deal with the affairs of the Canadian National Railways.

Then, the hon. member seemed to think there was something mysterious about the manner in which those questions he put to the department were answered. There is nothing mysterious about it at all. If he will only read the questions, he will find they are perfectly in order, and he will find also that they are answered in the same manner as all questions having to do with the Canadian National Railways are answered. The answer begins:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

Then there is the answer to 1(a) and (b); 2(a), 3(a) and so forth. Any question that has to do with Canadian National Railways is answered in that manner. In answer to question 3 the Canadian National Railways advised that there was no complaint made to them or to the hotel management or to the railways on behalf of the Prime Minister or anyone associated with him. In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned, since the hon. member coupled the two groups in that question, the department answers no. It is for that reason there are two no answers to that part of the question, simply because my hon. friend lumped the two of them in his question. The answer is quite clear, and I do not think there is anything mysterious about the manner in which it was answered.

Dealing with question 1(d), whether there had been any complaint regarding his work there, the hon. member said that was an unworthy answer. Well, I do not think the answer is unworthy. The Canadian National Railways, through its management, makes that answer. I do not think the answer is any more unworthy than the speech which my hon. friend has made. I repeat that I do not think he intended to implicate the Prime Minister in the manner in which he did. But whether he did or whether he did not intend it, he certainly has done so in the record. My hon. friend has a clear denial from the president of Canadian National Railways to his third question which reads as follows:

Was any complaint, verbal or written, regarding any incident at the Fort Garry hotel during the Prime Minister's visit on September 10 last made to the railway or hotel management or to the Department of Transport, or to any representative of any of the foregoing by or on behalf of the Prime Minister or of any one of those who were accompanying him at Winnipeg on September 10 last?

The answer is:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows: No.

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned: No.

So that my friend has his answer there, and I ask him to accept that answer. Now, then, if he does not accept the answer let me make a suggestion to him, and it is this. There is a committee appointed by this house to deal with the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. He is a member of that committee or at least he was a member during the last session of parliament. He may appear before the committee and inquire himself from the officers of the Canadian National Railways what the facts are surrounding this case, and that is really the place where he should get his information, not in this house. It is the policy of this house, established by this house and followed by governments of the faith to which my hon. friend belongs, for many many years, namely that in matters concerning the internal management of the Canadian National Railways, there should be no interference. If there is any question that comes up, it can be asked or dealt with in the committee on railways and shipping.

The hon. member says this is a case of political interference. Let me put this to him, that what he is doing at the moment is political interference in the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. While this matter may appear large to him, in fact, in the affairs of government, in the affairs of parliament, in the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, he will I am sure agree it is a small matter. I am surprised that my hon. friend should feel he had to make the lengthy speech which he made on Thursday of last week.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think justice is a small matter.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member thinks that justice is not a small matter and he wants to obtain justice, let him bring the matter forward in the usual and appropriate manner, and that is before the committee on railways and shipping.

There are one or two points I should like to make before I resume my seat. First, the Canadian National Railways hotel system is under the management of a board of directors of the Canadian National Railways and should be, in my estimation and in my humble opinion, left to them. If that were not the case, then we would be inquiring in this house continually, and it would be my business to inquire into every transfer, demotion and promotion of a superintendent of the Canadian National Railways. There would be no end to that. Parliament has decided that is not the way it should be done, but it should be done by the management themselves.

The next point is that it is the long-established policy of the government not to interfere in the management function of the railway. I have tried not to interfere throughout the years, and I hope I shall continue to follow that policy. Then, the employee in question is an employee of the Canadian National Railways and is responsible, not to the Department of Transport or to the government, but to the management of that company. He is not a government employee; and, as I indicated earlier, his position is not in any way subject to political interference or control. In the case before us here, in the words of the question, there has been no such interference.

The answer made by the railways denies that any complaints were made to it by or on behalf of the Prime Minister or anyone of those accompanying him at Winnipeg on September 10 last. The same answer has been made with reference to the Department of Transport. The accusations made by the hon. member for Greenwood are founded on newspaper reports based on alleged statements of unnamed hotel employees and of other unnamed persons contacted by the newspaper in question.

I repeat what I said earlier, namely that this is hearsay of the worst possible character. The only political interference in this case is that of the hon. member for Greenwood who made the former manager of the Fort Garry hotel the subject of parliamentary debate to no useful purpose. The policy of the management of the Canadian National Railways is to operate its transportation system, including its hotels, efficiently and in the best interests of the country. To do this it must have a free hand to deal effectively with its employees.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I now repeat the question I asked before of the minister? Does the minister deny any of the facts as set out in the report of the Tribune on which I based my remarks?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I say that the report in the Tribune is based on hearsay; and I am not prepared to accept hearsay evidence.

Mr. Drew: He does not deny it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know just what the minister means by hearsay; but I point out that he has not attempted—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would speak only once in this debate. However, I wish to bring to the attention of the house this afternoon a matter to which I think hon. members should give some consideration. I have on my desk a file of newspaper clippings that are startling in this day and age.

An hon. Member: Is that hearsay evidence?

Mr. Gillis: For example, this clipping from the Citizen is headed "Riots at Louiseville". This one has big black letters and reads "Quebec Police Fire, Dozen Strikers Hurt" and mentions the fact that tear gas was used. These are merely two examples, and I have a large file of them.

My reason for rising this afternoon is to focus attention on the particular subject of that strike at Louiseville and the attitude of the provincial government with regard to labour relations in that province. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), if he were in his place, or his parliamentary assistant might say: "Yes, but labour relations in the province of Quebec are a matter of provincial responsibility." That is quite true, but in this strike there are federal implications. In addition to the police entering and taking over that town, because of the reading of the Riot Act that town is placed in the hands of the police exclusively. While the provinces enforce the Criminal Code—and the Riot Act is read under the Criminal Code—nevertheless we here enact these laws and are responsible for the implications in connection with their enforcement in the provinces.

For the benefit of the parliamentary assistant to the minister I should like to stress the fact that once that Riot Act is read and that town is placed under the jurisdiction of the provincial police—as this town in Quebec is at this time—there are certain penalties which apply in a situation of that kind. For example, once the Riot Act is read and the town is taken over by the police, as a result of a small gathering or of any infraction of the law or of the curfew that is imposed under the Riot Act, a man can be placed in jail, with a maximum sentence of life for any violation of that particular law. As we make those laws, I say that we should give some consideration to them when these amendments to the Criminal Code are being brought about.

There are two parties to this dispute as there are to any dispute. On the one hand, you have approximately 1,000 textile workers at that plant which is that of Associated Textiles of Canada, Limited. These textile workers are citizens of Quebec and of Canada; they are taxpayers. In the great majority of cases the wages of workers in that industry, in that province particularly, are not too high.

This strike took place last March. The interval between then and now is a long time for a dispute like that to drag along. It is reminiscent of what happened a short time ago in the asbestos industry in the same province when the police used tear gas and batons. That asbestos strike at the Johns-Manville Company should have taught the government of Quebec, and maybe the union also, that the way to settle wage negotiations today is not on the street with batons and with the use of police. But apparently nothing was learned from the strike in the asbestos industry, and now we have this mess in Louiseville. As I stated a moment ago, on the one hand you have 1,000 workers in the textile industry—and they are Canadians with families—who are low paid and who have legitimate grievances. The union involved is the Catholic syndicates. Then on the other hand, you have the industry itself.

Let us have a look at it for a minute. I have here just a brief synopsis of it. It is the Associated Textiles of Canada, Limited. This is a wholly-owned subsidiary of United Merchants and Manufacturers, Incorporated, an American firm with head offices in Delaware, U.S.A. The parent company is a holding company owning a number of textile plants—mills, finishing plants, converters, factory facilities and merchandising outlets—in the U.S.A., Argentina, Canada and several other countries. No separate figures for the profits of the Canadian subsidiary, Associated Textiles of Canada, Limited, are available. Its net assets, as at June 30, 1951, however, were $4,610,688. Net profits of the consolidated companies, however—including Canadian and other subsidiaries—were as follows: Total net profit, 1950, $10,805,290; in 1951, $16,158,186; or an increase of 49 per cent over 1950. The source of this information is Moody's Industrials, 1952, so it is right up to date. As I pointed out a moment ago, you have that large group of workers and you have this huge corporation. The dispute is over wages. From the figures that I have set out here, it can be seen that in the years 1950 and 1951 the company was not in a bad position. They have substantial profits. They had an increase in their profits of 49 per cent in 1951 over 1950. The workers at that plant, in their wage demands, are not looking for a 49 per cent increase, although they would be justified if they were doing so.

In reference to the dispute itself, and in the matter of money, all of the arguments are on the side of the wage earners who are attempting to settle their grievance in the only way that befits this day and age, namely, around the conference table. The action taken in that province with respect to this dispute indicates very clearly that labour laws and conciliation in the province of Quebec must be at least thirty years outdated, because that kind of thing did happen in my own province thirty years ago. Both government and industry have discovered in that province that there is no solution in that kind of action, because nothing like that has happened in the last thirty years. Conciliation machinery prevents it.

In the last year the steel workers' union in my own province went through negotiations lasting for five months. They extended their contract. They had conciliation board after conciliation board. Nevertheless they finished up with a good agreement, which indicates that patience and some understanding are necessary on both sides in order to work out the problems that confront the workers.

The time is past, Mr. Speaker, when the federal government should give consideration to the enacting of a basic labour relations act in order at least to fix the basic legislation so that the provinces could pass the necessary enabling legislation to prevent this kind of thing. No one can justify what is going on today in that strike in that textile plant in Quebec. I am suggesting that the labour department should at least conduct an investigation into what is taking place there, in the interest of peace, order and good government. I am sure the parliamentary assistant to the minister will agree with me that what is happening in Quebec today is certainly giving a lot of aid and comfort to the elements within the organized labour movement whose job it is to foment trouble. Mr. Duplessis and his policies are certainly doing a first-class job for them, and I think it is the responsibility of the federal Department of Labour to check up on the matter on the grounds of peace, order and good government.

In addition to that, during the consolidation of the Criminal Code that will take place within the next year, consideration should be given to some modification or changes in the section of the code that permits of police action, the reading of the Riot Act, curfew, and the taking over of a town, with the drastic penalties that are involved once that action is taken. Today that town is in this position. If a small group of men gather they can be arrested; they can be charged with violations under that section of the code, and the maximum penalty is life imprisonment. Judging by the lack of understanding that is shown in that particular field at the present time, it would not surprise me if some judge in Quebec would hand out that maximum sentence.

I rose in my place this afternoon because I think that the headlines we are getting in relation to that strike in Quebec indicate that some action on the part of the federal government is necessary to straighten out the matter, and that some over-all labour relations act should be enacted, which would lay down the basic legislation that would at least prevent this kind of thing taking place.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, before participating in the present debate, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the manner in which they performed the very arduous task, and for the credit they brought upon themselves and the ridings they represent in the House of Commons.

(Translation):

I wish to tell the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that his eloquent speech and the invaluable information he has communicated to us on the electoral district he represents here have evoked the greatest admiration among all his colleagues.

(Text):

The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) no less commends himself to our attention for the most interesting speech he has delivered, and I am sure that his constituents will never regret having elected him as their representative.

To the hon. members for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney), I wish to extend my most sincere congratulations upon their recent promotions to cabinet posts.

May I note also the visit of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to the conference recently held in Great Britain. Their wonderful participation, their most helpful suggestions, and the way in which they dealt with difficult problems commend them to our very great admiration.

The brilliant exposé delivered in this house a few days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and his election as president of the United Nations assembly; his capable way of dealing with most delicate questions; his outstanding attitude of gentleman at the council table have undoubtedly put him to the fore and wholly justified the esteem we all hold for him.

In a world already torn by false ideologies, already deprived of peace of mind and soul, where harmony, good will and understanding are lacking, where cold wars are in fashion, let us hope that the unceasing good will of representatives from democratic countries will find a solution to the war in Korea. The battle is still raging with as much intensity as before the cease-fire negotiations which are now in their second year, a fact which likely has no precedent in history; and yet it seems that it is still impossible to get a glimpse of peace or bonne entente on the horizon. Valiant men are called upon to make great sacrifices, and a good many of them have already given their lives so others may continue to live in order to uphold the principles of freedom in the world; purges are going on behind the iron curtain and many democracies have been brutally silenced at the crack of the Russian knout.

Once again, those of our generation are facing the invader. True, he does not bear the same name but is always in search of domination, instilled by tendencies of imperialism, and most eager to impose his will on other nations who fall under his heel; to have them adopt his mode of living, his ideologies and his firm belief in materialism; communism bred in the twisted brain of an unbalanced professor, Karl Marx, applied by Lenin, and imposed on a good many countries of the world by ruthless methods, is accompanied by a repetition of violations of the frontiers of once free countries.

Yesterday we had to fight Prussian imperialism and more recently the nazism of a mad painter. The free countries of the world have always presented a united front, which enables them to erase these awful nightmares which have haunted the world. On the morrow of the awful ordeal these very same free nations met at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the United Nations. Canada was co-signatory to the clauses of this charter where it was stated that, should a signatory country be attacked by another power, these countries pledged their help, and offered to come to the rescue.

On June 25, 1950, the United Nations commission in South Korea informed Trygve Lie, then secretary general of the United Nations, that the North Korean troops had crossed the 38th parallel, and were invading from east to west. Canada, as co-signatory to the charter of the United Nations, had commitments and, like other countries of the world, we were involved in military activities in that corner of Asia.

Our contributions through manpower and defence purposes have entailed a severe drain on our national budget. A discussion of the budget in its various provisions and implications might well be regarded as a general survey of the national economy, and an examination of the state of the country. Speeches delivered so far by some opposition members reveal the definite pattern taking the form of a concerted attack on taxation. Some criticism has been notable for its lack of constructive suggestions, and a dispassionate onlooker would gather the impression that the main purpose of the criticism is to tear down the budgetary structure, rather than consolidate its foundations.

Parliament, composed as it is of representatives of all parties, both government and opposition members, is presumed to be the mirror of the nation. Keeping this thought in mind, one may well inquire at this stage, what substantial segment of the country do the criticisms voiced so far represent. Some suggestions have been made as to high taxation, or some taxation measures that should be discarded, and the fiscal policies that should be made effective to provide the necessary revenue for the management of the country's affairs.

Canada's taxation structure is, at best, a delicate fabric. It must be designed to establish the proper balance between the national economy and the economy of the ten provinces constituting the dominion. No government, federal or provincial, relishes the task of increasing the burden of taxation; but there are times when a state of national or near-national emergency leaves no other course open to the government.

National necessity imposes sometimes on the government unprecedented duties such as the levying of taxes to provide revenues for the purchase of death-dealing armaments and the waging of war against the forces whose sole aim is the destruction of our civilization and all that it implies in the realm of human rights and fundamental liberties. The action which the government has taken on behalf of the people of Canada is actuated by but one desire, the determination to prevent occurrences such as the rape of Korea and the further enslavement of the free peoples of the world.

A nation is no stronger than the sum total of its individual strength. In this time of crisis, the people living in the 262 ridings that make up the dominion must integrate their efforts so as to give the fullest support to the government in the pursuit of its main policy, that of strengthening the country from within and helping friendly and still free nations to meet the threat of the common enemy.

True, anybody in this house would welcome a considerable reduction in taxation, but nobody would want to do so at the price of a democratic form of government.

A man of outstanding sagacity has set forth the axiom of the art of governing with a precision that has never erred. Junius, the great legislator, said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty"; and, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I will add: "The cabinet form of government lends itself marvellously to this necessary vigilance: on one side of the house, those who govern and, on the other, those who watch." However, I am sure that our legislators, bearing in mind that their first care is the security of our land, the welfare of our fighting men, and the well-being of the nation at large, will, when possible, alleviate the burden of taxation. Millions of dollars have gone into social security measures such as family allowances, unemployment insurance, old age security, veterans allowances, invalidity allowances in some provinces; and let us hope that before too long we shall be in a position to implement a program of health insurance assistance for our Canadian people. Such a plan, drawn in close co-operation with the provinces, would surely be a wonderful achievement on the part of this government.

Our defence program alone has drained our national budget of considerable sums of money. Nobody here will advocate drastic tax reductions at the sacrifice of defence preparedness. My constituency is in the happy position to make a not inconsequential contribution to this national effort. During the second world war, my riding, where topography of the land is admirably suited for aviation purposes, had the benefit of two airfields—one at Pendleton, and the other at St. Eugene. These two airfields, which played an important part in the expansion and full development of the eminently successful commonwealth air training plan, have been virtually unused since 1945 or 1946. A moderate outlay would be sufficient to ensure their rehabilitation and utilization. Hawkesbury has a flying club which has been in existence for several years now. The unflagging enthusiasm of its members has ensured its successful operation in spite of many handicaps, among others, the lack of finances. The preliminary training of fliers, under the direction of flying clubs like the one operated in the outskirts of Hawkesbury, is directly associated with the broad pattern of national defence. The theoretical and practical knowledge of flying acquired by these groups constitutes an important preliminary step in any national air training plan. Bearing in mind the overall cost of training each flier, the national budget is relieved of a portion of the financial burden which the complete air training course entails.

I should like to stress another factor that ties in closely with the national defence program. I have in mind the decentralization of industry. Economic and strategic reasons make such a decentralization increasingly imperative. Decentralization relieves transport congestion in heavily populated areas and facilitates the quick movement of traffic, in times both of peace and of war. New methods of warfare centred around the use of the atomic bomb and its more lethal companion, the hydrogen bomb, are undoubtedly the most compelling reasons for the decentralization of industry. Prescott county, situated as it is midway between Ottawa and Montreal, can ideally meet the needs of decentralization. There is ample power for the operation of almost any type of industry, and the county is well endowed with rail and highway transportation facilities. The full development of Canada's agricultural possibilities is another paramount consideration. This constituency is most fortunate in that there is a fairly happy balance between its agriculture and its industry. We are all well aware of the outstanding part that Canada's agriculture played in the successful prosecution of two world wars.

On the basis of its farming population Prescott county ranks as the largest cheese-producing area in the British commonwealth with a yearly output of over 5,872,198 pounds of cheese from the 43 cheese factories in operation, which represents a value of no less than $2,024,521. My constituency relies upon the manufacture of this commodity for an income which is a very important factor in its economy and to that end I strongly urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to do his utmost to see that the support price is maintained at a level of not less than 30 cents to 32 cents for cheddar cheese. I hope that this spring we will not see a recurrence of a drop in the price of cheese with which the farming element in my constituency had to cope last spring. In the same way our agricultural class is at present also concerned over the prices of beef and pork.

Some amendments to the National Housing Act are to come before this house. Canadians throughout the country are in dire need of living accommodation at low cost as those with small incomes are unable to pay high rents for inadequate quarters. With our present world in turmoil and unrest one of the greatest stabilizing factors we could have would be homes owned by Canadian citizens and not have our people living in rented abodes where they are nothing but tourists under a two-year lease, where they live in tenements from which they can be evicted on the expiration of their contract.

We have just gone through a second world war after which many young couples have attempted to settle under circumstances of prosperity. Many of our young men are fortunate enough to be drawing large salaries and have decided to purchase homes, but after a while they may find this investment to be beyond their means. The strength of a nation depends a good deal upon the security of its inhabitants. Home owners are a great asset to any government because they enjoy a form of security for the preservation of which they are willing to undergo great sacrifice. Furthermore, a national housing policy would be beneficial, not only to individuals but to the nation at large, because it would be one of the best weapons with which to combat communism.

We all want to see new homes sprouting throughout Canada and I hope methods will be devised by which prospective owners will find themselves in a position where they can build new homes. But we shall have to make sure that the initial payment, which becomes a condition of ownership, is not too high for the average income earner.

Canada is going ahead with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. This project will considerably improve water communication between the head waters of the great lakes and the ocean, thus giving a tremendous impetus to shipping and improving industry and agriculture in both eastern and western Canada. Moreover, I believe it will prove in the not distant future to be of immense advantage from a military and strategic point of view.

I have the honour to represent in this house people of different nationalities and religious denominations who live together in harmony and bonne entente. There is never any friction or conflict between the different segments of our population. On the contrary, there exist the most cordial and sympathetic relations. We understand each other and in our courteous relations with each other we never stop to consider that one is Irish, Scotch, English or French. We think of ourselves only as Canadians having the same interests, the same aspirations and the same love for our country.

How much closer these ties and bonds of harmony and unity would be if we all lived under the same symbol, a truly Canadian flag to which we could look, a flag behind which we could all rally, could revere and love, a flag for which we could fight and die. Our country now ranks among the great nations of the world and I believe sincerely that we legislators owe it to our people to give them a true symbol of Canadianism. It is true that our boys are fighting and dying in Korea but they are doing so under the flag of the United Nations for the sake of humanity. This is idealistic enough, but would they not feel that they were fighting for a cause much dearer to them if they could only see their own Canadian flag streaming beside that of the United Nations. I hope sincerely that before not too long a measure will be brought into the house to give our people a Canadian flag which they can consider their own and love as their own.

As I have mentioned previously, Canada is now considered among the great nations of the world and I think it would be most beneficial if we had our representatives in the city of the seven hills, where most countries today have their ambassadors who are able to exchange views and bring back to their own governments information necessary in the management of their own affairs in regard to international relations.

With the presentation of the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, we should now strive toward giving our young people a real opportunity to prove their ability and put their talents to good use. At the present time many of these people find it impossible to do this because of a lack of money. I suggest that there should be some form of youth department which certainly would not overlap provincial departments but which would rather constitute a vocational guidance school for our young people and which would, on a national scale, guide them in the liberal arts and sciences, in different fields of knowledge and agriculture and enable us to develop right here at home better trained citizens and not have to import skilled or specialized labour from abroad. This division, administered by a federal commission, would enable young men to attend schools, universities, industrial or experimental stations of their own choosing located in their own regions, where they could take their training in the language most familiar to them and in an environment most suitable to the development of their own talents.

In conclusion, sir, I will say that it is quite comforting for us legislators in this House of Commons to be able to stand up and debate, as free men, upon a legislative program prepared with a view to achieving security, prosperity and well-being for the people by whom we were entrusted with a mandate and, in this way, co-operate also towards bringing freedom and liberty of expression to other people living in countries where democracy no longer exists.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, coming into the debate after the weeks which have elapsed, it is perhaps more or less formal to commend the mover and seconder for the work which they did on that occasion. But any one of us who has had the responsibility or privilege of moving or seconding an address, in this chamber or in other chambers, realizes the responsibility and difficult nature of the task which confronts a new member on such an occasion. We certainly can congratulate both those gentlemen on the excellence of their efforts.

I do not, of course, propose to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Prescott

(Mr. Bruneau) who has immediately preceded me, but there is one subject on which he touched indirectly that I will refer to in a few moments.

Before going on, I should like to congratulate, as have so many members, the two new ministers who have been sitting on the government benches since we last met. Whatever we may think of the political policies which they enunciate, we appreciate their personal qualities. We recognize the tribute which has been paid to them by their appointment and we wish them success personally, sir. We know that, with those peculiar qualities they possess, should they survive the next election they will undoubtedly adorn the benches of the opposition and develop still further there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: This is perhaps a unique occasion today as there is recorded in Hansard the proclamation read by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning—an historic document in which we find the new title of Her Majesty set forth as a preliminary to the coronation. I am sure his speech this day, and the records attached thereto, will be of historic significance for years to come—marking the evolution which takes place in this house and in this commonwealth as time goes on. It has been said by many others but I say, simply in passing, that we are all happy and all thrilled at the prospect of the coronation which will shortly take place. Those of us who are privileged to sit in this house are pleased that we should be here in the year immediately preceding the coronation.

The other night the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) gave a speech here which I thought was of some special significance. It was of particular significance to me, sir, because some of the matters on which I intended to speak at some length are adequately covered there; so I will speak but briefly on one or two of the points he mentioned.

One matter with which he dealt was the problem confronting the universities in Canada and university grants—particularly universities in Nova Scotia. Without repeating matters which he gave in some detail, I simply say that on page 635 of Hansard one finds recorded the average amounts of money paid to the various universities in the various provinces of Canada. One finds that the universities of Nova Scotia are at the bottom of the list receiving only $92.45 per student, while the figure ranges up to $483.16. Perhaps the latter is an unusual figure because it applies to the province of Newfoundland where there are not so many universities, but there is a wide discrepancy in the amounts paid to the various universities within the various provinces. Nor is that all, sir; there is a marked discrepancy in the amounts paid to the different universities within the same province. I think the member for Halifax was right in urging that some special attention should be paid to the problem—not on a per capita basis of 50 cents per head for each province but on the basis of availability of students within each province.

In Nova Scotia we find a peculiar problem because of the fact that we have located in Halifax Dalhousie university with the professional schools—the medical school serving the maritimes and beyond, the pharmacy school, the school of dentistry and, sir, I am sure I will not be accused of undue modesty if I mention the school of law which is undoubtedly a very eminent school of law. Therefore, we have students from Ontario, the western provinces and the other provinces of Canada attending that law school. That influx of students coming to the professional schools at Dalhousie draws upon the per capita grant which is made to the province and, as a result, other universities serving that province draw far less. Those schools serving the humanities, undergraduate work, arts and sciences, receive as little as $50 per student. Those universities are serving a very useful purpose and, without boasting again, one might suggest that they are making a real contribution to Canada. One thing in which we have an advantage is that today instead of our graduates going to the United States to earn their living they are coming up here to Ontario, to Quebec, to Alberta and British Columbia, to develop the natural resources of those provinces. One only has to mention Borden of Brazilian Traction or Godsoe of British American, or Perry of Consolidated Mining and Smelting, to realize something of the contributions which those small universities are making to the development of the wealth of other provinces in Canada.

Without labouring the matter at length, sir, I can say that this is a matter which has caused the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) some concern. It is a matter which I have discussed with him and I do not think he is entirely satisfied with the arrangement that has been made. I do say, sir, that it is not a proper one; it is not a right one; and something should be done about it. The professors labouring in those colleges, teaching there, are performing a real national service but, because of economic circumstances, they are living on salaries which are not commensurate in any shape or form with those paid in other parts of Canada or with the service which they are rendering. I do urge upon this government that steps be taken to reconsider this matter of university grants, and even a maritime unit might be feasible. After all, Dalhousie serves all of the maritime provinces and that way one would get more equitable distribution than one gets today when you have these watertight divisions or compartments between provinces.

One does not suggest that this government is responsible for education in Canada; but this government has accepted a responsibility towards the universities as recommended in the Massey report. This government did a remarkable job in assisting the universities.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question? I am interested in what he is saying about grants to universities. Do I understand him to suggest that the basis of the grant to Dalhousie should be changed so that there would be a grouping of the maritime provinces and then a division of the grant?

Mr. Nowlan: As I understand it, the basis of the grant is 50 cents per head of population in the province. Nova Scotia, with a population of 750,000 or 800,000, draws 50 cents per head of population. As the professional schools are serving a wider area, with students coming from New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the other provinces of Canada, they are actually chargeable against the amount we receive in Nova Scotia on a per capita basis.

Mr. McIlraith: What was the suggested remedy? Was it to take the population for the whole of the maritimes?

Mr. Nowlan: I said that would be an improvement. The same situation is true for Acadia, St. Francis Xavier and Mount Allison. They are serving the maritimes although perhaps not to the same extent as the professional schools. I do think it would be a help if the basis of the maritime unit were enlarged. I think we should go further and consider some direct assistance per student, on the same basis as was done during the war when this government did a remarkable job in connection with the rehabilitation of returned men. The government paid so much to each university for each student in attendance. I am not trying to give a concrete solution of the problem, Mr. Speaker. I quite appreciate the question my hon. friend put, but I do say that it is a problem with which we are confronted and a problem which must be solved if the eastern universities are going to function properly.

Another matter to which the hon. member for Halifax referred, and about which I intended to speak at some length, is the matter of the use of the ports in the maritime provinces, particularly Halifax. I shall not say much about it now. The other day I noticed in the newspaper that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), the minister from Nova Scotia, spoke in Halifax—I have forgotten whether it was before a board of trade or some other organization—and dealt with the problem to some extent. On Friday night the member for Halifax put on the record some most alarming figures, showing that there had been a substantial decrease in the export of Canadian products through eastern Canadian ports, and a tremendous increase in the export of those products from United States ports. I shall not bother to put those figures on Hansard again, and I shall not weary the house by repeating them. Hon. members will find those figures in that speech, and they do indicate a trend. Unfortunately, a change has taken place during the last three years.

When the minister was speaking the other night, I believe he asked what one could do about it. I would suggest that there are two things which should be done. In the first place, we have in Canada these industrial fairs and exhibitions of various kinds which have been held in Toronto. We know that merchants, manufacturers and businessmen, not only from this country but all the countries of the world, come to these industrial exhibitions. I am informed by those who are close to the situation—I have not personal knowledge of these matters—that at all of these industrial fairs one finds public relations officers from the port authority of New York, the port of Boston, of Baltimore and all the eastern United States cities. Apparently these men occupy mammoth suites and have unlimited expense accounts. I am not suggesting for a moment that the mere fact the gentlemen are there with large suites and expense accounts necessarily influences the business to any extent; nevertheless the fact remains that these ports apparently find it a good investment to do that. I wonder how many public relations officers, how many representatives of our ports, are present at industrial fairs or exhibitions of that kind. I am told that there are none, although of course there are official representatives of the Department of Transport and of the port authorities.

However, there needs to be a more aggressive selling campaign put on, and to some extent much could be accomplished by seeing that our ports were properly represented at all fairs and meetings of businessmen. In a return tabled the other day I noticed that our army in western Europe, which I understand is substantially a brigade, has four public relations officers attached to it. If we have four public relations officers for that, then I suggest we should have at least one public relations officer doing a task for Canadian ports, and particularly the eastern Canadian ports.

Again, the member for Halifax said that there were many industries which were benefiting by national policy. He singled out the automobile industry and said that since they were benefiting from national policy it should be the duty of the government—at least this is the implication but it is not exactly what he said although I believe it is a fair inference from what he said—to see that those who benefit from national policy carry out their responsibilities toward the nation. Accordingly, the automobile industry should use Canadian ports for the shipment of products which they manufacture pursuant to that policy. I believe there is an argument in that connection.

In any event, sir, today business and government are so closely associated through matters of taxation, priorities, allocations and in dozens of other ways directly and indirectly, that it would be an easy thing for the government to at least urge, to advise and to encourage the export of Canadian goods through these Canadian ports. It is certainly a necessary thing, because they are a national need. They perform a national function in time of war. This nation cannot exist without them. There seems to be something radically wrong when we hear the boasting about the increase of our gross national product, and yet we find that the share of it which is going through these Canadian ports is getting less and less instead of more and more.

I recall once attending a film sponsored by the minister of finance. I am sure he regretted it because he came from Nova Scotia. I happened to be in the theatre one night when a new bond sale was being inaugurated under his auspices. Some firm had been retained to prepare the film and they showed Canada as stretching from the Pacific to the St. Lawrence, where it stopped. I am sure it was rather embarrassing to the minister. The other night I saw another powerful film prepared for "The March of Time". I saw a preview of it, and it was encouraging to Canadians. The only reference to Canadian ports and the only scene of them showed a group of immigrants going through the sheds at Halifax. It was stated that they were on their way to the possibilities which awaited them in Canada. This attitude is not too well appreciated in the east. I think the time is coming when something should be done about it.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Speaking about transportation, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to deal with a local matter. I want to say again what I have said in this house on other occasions, and that is that one of the transportation problems in the east which I think needs attention is the bringing into Nova Scotia of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Saint John to Digby and then up the valley to Halifax. In days gone by the principle underlying national policy dictated that our access to central Canadian markets should be by a long, tortuous route going up around the baie de Chaleur, up the Matapedia valley, and finally down the St. Lawrence. At that time policy dictated that we should be kept as far as possible away from the United States border, because it was assumed that at some time the United States would invade the provinces of Upper Canada and the Nova Scotians would have to come up here to protect them.

Now, policy dictates that we should be closely associated with the United States. We have markets there and we need accessibility to those markets. We, however, have to follow this long, tortuous route or else we have to ship l.c.l. across the bay of Fundy and then reload afterwards. Some construction work seems necessary both at Saint John and at Digby, and I hope that at some time in the not too distant future this matter can be rectified.

I am reminded of what the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bruneau) said a few moments ago about a national flag. I am not going to venture to discuss that matter at the moment. However, since the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is here, and since I believe this house and this building comes under the jurisdiction of his department, I want to refer to a matter which I think is of great importance. About the middle of last July, sir, I happened to come back to Ottawa. I came up to these parliament buildings here, the centre and capital of Canada. I found the place swarming, to use a slang expression, with tourists, both from the United States and Canada; there were thousands of them. I found that we had R.C.M.P. constables, wearing their red coats, patrolling up and down in front of this building. I even found an R.C.M.P. constable wearing a red coat and mounted on horseback patrolling in front of the building in order to give us a little national flavour. Then I found this graceful tower out here adorned with a flagpole reaching up to the heavens like a gnarled finger, without anything on it.

I think it is a disgrace to this country that in this capital of Canada, when tourists come here—whether they are Americans, Canadians or whoever they are—to these parliament buildings the only flag they find visible from the parliament building is the flag of Norway flying over the Norwegian consulate down here on Sparks street. I realize the difficulty with respect to a national flag. I appreciate the fact that it should be settled and determined. I know there are difficulties which may delay that outcome. But, Mr. Speaker, what I say is this. A flag which is good enough to fly over this building now to advise the people of Ottawa—or alarm them—that their members happen to be sitting here, which flies here every day we sit, which flies at half-mast when any member of this house or of the other place dies, and which flies over our embassies abroad, is a flag that is good enough to be flying over this building every day of the year. In order to develop a national sentiment it would be much better to have a national flag upon which everyone can agree. But I suggest to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bruneau) or to any other hon. member that certainly anything is better than this barren flagpole which sticks up here like a sore thumb every day during the time the house is not in session.

A moment ago I mentioned the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), but I notice that he has left the chamber. There were some things I wanted to say about his department. I am not going to speak at any great length now because, from the order paper and from references in the press to what is going on in another place, I learn that before too long we shall have legislation here dealing with the fisheries problems of Canada, and perhaps particularly those of the eastern seaboard. I think it is desirable, Mr. Speaker, that the new minister give special attention to those problems. His predecessor worked hard and undoubtedly made a contribution to the department which he administered. The new minister, with imagination and with drive, can perhaps accomplish even more.

One of those problems with which we shall be confronted before this house rises is, I believe, that concerning coastal waters. I believe that matter is now being debated elsewhere. I have heard there is an interdepartmental committee already appointed and dealing with that matter at the moment. I hope that committee deals with it seriously. I hope that the chairman stays here in Ottawa and gives some time to looking after it. I think Canada should take the lead in dealing with this matter of coastal waters. The whole conception of it is changing, as we know. European countries have altered their concept with respect to it. With its thousands and tens of thousands of miles of coast line, headlands, harbours and bays, I think Canada more than almost any other country in the world should be paying special attention to that problem; and when the time comes we shall discuss that matter at length. I want to impress upon the minister now, or when he reads Hansard, at any rate, that so far as the bay of Fundy is concerned there is a real problem which is interesting historically and which is open to solution today. If he goes back in history I think he will find that in the Rush-Bagot conversations of many years ago, or in the convention, the British who were then in charge of Canadian negotiations emphasized the fact that the bay of Fundy was a coastal water. The Americans said it was not a coastal water but that it was part of the high seas. No agreement was reached; they agreed to disagree, and the matter was left open. Now that this whole matter is to be reviewed, I think something concrete should be done in the near future.

Referring to the Minister of Fisheries, I should like to digress for a moment or two. I was intrigued by a statement he made here on Friday afternoon. The minister is always a most ebullient speaker, one who likes to rush in and charge at windmills and make political speeches which are sometimes scintillating and witty but perhaps not entirely authentic. I think he gave a brilliant example of that on Friday afternoon because, in referring to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), my deskmate, or in replying to him, as reported at page 616 of Hansard, you will find that he was deploring the Tory trade principles of the Bennett depression days and said: "Look what we, the Liberals, have done with our magnificent trade policies as compared with those repressive, unfortunate and stupid Tory policies of Bennett."

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". Let him wait until I finish and see whether he says "hear, hear" then. He took the figures, as they are set out here; you will find them at page 616 of Hansard. He said that under the beneficent and brilliant leadership given by this government, the trade of Canada which under the policies of Tory Bennett was only $1·9 billion had now reached $8 billion, a little bit more than a 400 per cent increase. I was rather intrigued with these figures. I was impressed because it was one of the first things I had seen which had impressed me with the policy of this government, and I thought perhaps one should check on the figures a little bit. So I obtained the figures for the United States, and wondered what a dismal failure they had made and how they would compare with the scintillating leadership which had been given to Canada by this Liberal government. I found that in the same period trade had gone from $3·7 billion to $25·99 billion or in other words had increased seven times as compared with the increase in Canada. Whether that is a coincidence I do not know. I say I am not entirely impressed with the logic of the minister's argument; nevertheless that was his argument. If it was logical and sound, then I think this comparison should be put into effect, and one might deplore the fact that we did not have the Democrats or the Tories of Bennett or somebody else rather than these Liberals whose policies did not give us so much. I would also point out to the minister what happened to the government which increased the trade of its country by seven times while his government was increasing trade in this country by only four times. Three or four weeks ago the people, having become tired of it, kicked it out. That was not an entirely happy illustration for the minister to use.

Then he also rang the changes on the Tory gloomsters. I do not think I am divulging any secret when I say that the Tories are not the gloomy ones, but that there are others around here who are much gloomier than they are. If he wants to know who the gloomsters are in Canada, I can tell him who they are, or at least some of them; I could not take time to tell of them all because my time would run out. They are the fruit growers of British Columbia and of Nova Scotia, the fishermen and the lumbermen who have lost the British markets. They are some of the gloomsters. Then there are the cheese manufacturers who are prohibited from selling their cheese in the United States; and the tobacco growers who find that because of the crazy taxation policies of this government their industry is threatened with extinction. Then there is agriculture in general, because according to figures shown the other day in the columns of Chester Bloom, which were taken from the bureau of statistics, the various costs of agricultural production have increased at an alarming rate whereas the prices received by agriculture have decreased in a corresponding way.

One could go on and enumerate others in this country who are gloomsters. I would suggest that they have some cause for gloom. I do not think they are going to be particularly encouraged by the rather derisive laughter with which the Minister of Fisheries dealt with them. I would also remind the Minister of Fisheries that there was a gentleman by the name of Stevenson who in embarking upon a campaign not long ago said he was not going to run his election campaign against Herbert Hoover; but before he got through he found he was running against Herbert Hoover. We know what happened. I suggest that when my hon. friends opposite start campaigning against R. B. Bennett in the days of the depression, and when they try to resurrect other speeches which men made in the past, then the political poverty of that party is certainly greater than we realize and its desperation is even greater than we had anticipated.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that this making of speeches seems to be a disease of the junior ministers from British Columbia. We have noticed in the press reports of speeches by ministers from that province. I am not sure what is the exact status of one of the ministers from British Columbia. He is something like Lucifer, suspended halfway between heaven and hell. Although he is still Solicitor General, he is taking over the Department of National Defence, or part of it, when the necessary legislation goes through. One of the functions of the Solicitor General is to recommend clemency and exercise mercy. That may be one of the reasons that incumbent is being brought into the Department of National Defence. I do want to tell him that the Department of National Defence is more suspect, under greater criticism and more discussed by the people of Canada generally than is any other department of this government, and that is saying quite a great deal. And if this minister expects to restore the confidence of the people of Canada in that department he should avoid going on political junkets and making cheap political speeches, because if there is any record that needs to be changed it is the record of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fleming: That will keep him busy, too.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not sure how much time I have left. I want to refer to a matter which came to my attention the other day. I found that a paper published in Toronto, which is generally considered to have some access to information from the government, and which is certainly not hostile to it, stated that tax reductions will come in July so the taxpayers in Canada will get the benefit of them before the election in October. The article states that this information is derived from an informed source, whatever that may be. It is one of the anonymous informed sources we hear of around here. I notice that it is datelined Ottawa, December 8.

I was rather intrigued by this suggestion of tax reductions, which have been asked for so often by the opposition, and I wondered if by any chance they would be brought in again on the eve of the election. I checked back to some other tax reductions and some records to see what took place during the last few elections. I find, for instance, that prior to the 1945 election the excise tax of 25 per cent on refrigerators was repealed by order in council 28 days before the election. It was reimposed afterward, and it was substantially reduced again before the 1949 election. I found that the tax of 25 per cent on electrical appliances was reduced by order in council 28 days before the election. After the 1945 election was won the tax went back on, and then it was reduced again before the 1949 election and reimposed at 15 per cent in the budget of 1951. One could go on. There was a tax on stoves, cameras and soft drinks. The 25 per cent was repealed in the 1949 budget and reimposed at 30 per cent in September, 1950. On candy and confectionery the 30 per cent tax was repealed in the 1949 budget and reimposed in 1950. The radio tax of 25 per cent was reduced to 10 per cent by order in council just before the 1945 election, and reimposed by radio again. Thus began radio ukase in Canada by the Liberal government in 1947. It was reduced to 10 per cent just before the 1949 election, and was increased again in the following budget after the 1949 election. One could go on, Mr. Speaker, giving example after example of those tax reductions; and the pattern has emerged of reducing before the 1945 election, increasing after the 1945 election, reducing before the 1949 election and increasing after the 1949 election, reducing now before the 1953 election and if this government by any misfortune happens to come back to power undoubtedly increasing again in the following budget.

We have heard a great deal of cyclical budgeting. That was the way it was described at one time, but we all know the term the press gallery coined for it and which is much more descriptive, namely cynical budgeting. And if we get a tax reduction on the eve of this election it would be the most barefaced, the most glaring example of cynical budgeting this country has ever known.

Mr. Graydon: Beware the Greeks bearing gifts.

Mr. Nowlan: This morning the Prime Minister gave us a brief résumé or review of what happened recently in London. I know of no matter of a positive nature which is of more importance to Canadians generally than is the problem of sterling and of accessibility to the British markets. Certainly, sir, there is no problem of such paramount importance in eastern Canada; and when we have had a further report on it and have received greater details, we shall then discuss that matter on the budget or on some other occasion. We do hope and trust that as a result of the varied belated efforts which this government has put into the matter of dealing with the problem of sterling at the conference of commonwealth ministers some concrete good will emerge for the primary producers who are dependent upon that market.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is usual in taking part in these debates to say a word of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am very happy to do that, and since I am frequently accused of or being told that I am quite an ardent Liberal, I am particularly happy to do it because of the fact that these two hon. members confirm the belief I have always had in this House of Commons as the effective method of governing not only in this country but in the world today. I am a profound believer in the Canadian system of government and in the part the House of Commons plays in it. During my experience as a member of this house for some twelve years and the opportunities that are provided for contact with members of other government bodies in other countries I am only strengthened in my view on that subject. The whole history of each of these hon. members about whom I am speaking confirms me in that belief.

I should like to say a word about the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and particularly about one point he raised. He spoke about the difficulties certain of our universities in the area with which he is naturally most closely concerned have in financing their efforts. That undoubtedly is a very real problem, and I am glad to hear him raise it in this debate and say a word about it. It is an embarrassing and difficult problem, because the history of this country makes it impossible and undesirable for the federal government to interfere in the field of education. Yet while we recognize that fact, there is also no doubt that the universities and some of the other educational institutions are having some difficulty in carrying on their efforts, and need some further help.

I was glad to hear his acknowledgment of the good work done in the post-war period with veterans in the field of education, and to hear his reference to the federal grants to universities. There is one other phase of the subject he might have touched on that has been a very real help to some of the universities, namely national research council grants and scholarships. They are a very positive help to the science faculties, at least.

I am sorry the senior hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) is not in his seat. I propose to say something about his remarks of Friday last. Those remarks I found most upsetting and disturbing, and I am quite sure most hon. members feel that way about them. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) is naturally very proud of his constituency and his province, and I think quite justifiably. I have nothing but commendation for him for that. I have no doubt the constituency is a very fine one. Each of us, of course, thinks his constituency is the finest and his province the best. The province from which the hon. member comes is indeed a fine province, one that has come to be known not by its name but rather as "The Island". We know the affection with which other Canadians use that term when they are referring to Prince Edward Island.

However, the hon. member did say some things that I think must not be permitted to go unanswered. He was dealing with some unfortunate or bad publicity the province had received through an article appearing in a Canadian publication. In dealing with the article the hon. member made reference to a photographer from the constituency I have the honour to represent. In dealing with that photographer he quoted from a newspaper, the Summerside Journal and The Pioneer. Referring to this portrait photographer the newspaper article, in its first sentence, contains these words:

> This big-feeling foreigner, now Canadian, who visited Charlottetown this summer on his tour for Maclean's magazine—

And so on. Apparently the hon. member quoted that with approval; and in his own comments, as they are reported at page 600 of Hansard, he said:

> If Maclean's magazine wanted to get some information about Prince Edward Island, why did they not get in touch with some of the people who have been coming for years to Prince Edward Island, rather than go to a foreigner—who is now a doubtful Canadian—looking for a report they might publish later as, in this instance, they have done.

Well, it is the implication in those remarks with which I wish to concern myself, the reference to a fellow Canadian of long standing as a foreigner and, not only that, the implication that a foreigner is in some way a person to be held in less esteem, or despised. This fellow Canadian about whom the hon. member was speaking is a man who came to this country as a boy, about 1924, from a country in which there were great political upsets and disturbances. I suppose had he come in more modern times the term "refugee" would have been used. He was then 16 years of age, and settled in the Sherbrooke area of the province of Quebec. In 1933, one of the years when things in this country were not very good from a business standpoint—and at a time when the then leader of the party to which the hon. member for Queens belongs was prime minister of this country—this young man, who had become a naturalized Canadian as soon as the necessary time elapsed after his entry into this country, started to carry on business here in Ottawa.

At first he was working for another man. In a very few months, when the older man went out of business, the person in question continued the business himself. He built up that business, and has become not only a portrait photographer of great reputation in the constituency I have the honour to represent, but a portrait photographer of great reputation throughout the whole of this country, of great reputation throughout the United States, the United Kingdom and indeed the whole world. Probably he is the best portrait photographer in the world; certainly he is one of the greatest.

I make nothing of the point as to his degree of greatness, but certainly it can be said that he is a very great portrait photographer. I do not know if other hon. members have shared my experience when visiting other countries, of being asked if I know this Canadian photographer, who took certain very famous pictures of persons known throughout the world. While this great Canadian photographer may be a small man physically, he is a man of very real stature, and I am sure the attack made against him and the references to him will not concern him personally to any great extent. Figuratively speaking his shoulders are very broad and he can bear attacks of this kind, and many more like them, without any damage whatever. But the implications of the attack are of real consequence, because this country is built up of persons coming from many different lands. Our racial origins are diversified. Some 48 per cent, by racial origin, came from the British Isles. The next largest racial group are of French origin, and the remaining racial groups come from some thirty or forty other countries, in varying percentages.

Great numbers of our population came here, by choice, as immigrants. In most cases they came because they felt there was a good opportunity here to develop their human personalities, earn their living, and provide opportunity for their children. Having come here they brought with them from their homelands skills and cultural attributes. Those skills and cultural attributes have done much to develop this country. They have been a great factor in our present development. Not only are we fortunate in Canada in having been blessed with great natural resources, but also by the fact that our population comes from a diversity of origins, each contributing its own cultural background and acquired skills. These have been blended to make our Canadian nationality something of which each one of us can justly be proud.

This portrait photographer from Ottawa, this "foreigner", this "doubtful Canadian"—and I use the language of the hon. member for Queens—was chosen to be the representative of Ontario at a very impressive ceremony in this country when the new citizenship act came into force early in 1947. A most impressive ceremony was held in the Supreme Court of Canada on that occasion, when the Chief Justice of Canada presented citizenship certificates to representative Canadians. The man chosen from Ontario on that occasion was this portrait photographer who carries on business in the constituency of Ottawa West.

Surely if we are to continue to develop this country, we must continue to have immigration into it. That immigration must include people who come here feeling they can become full Canadians, if they meet the requirements, after the necessary lapse of time. They must never be made to feel that they will be second-class Canadians, third-class Canadians or fourth-class Canadians. They must have the right to feel that they and their children, provided they have met the conditions and have acted properly, are full Canadians the same as any others. The term "national unity" must in fact be something real, not just a phrase used in speeches. I do not want to say anything more personally about Mr. Yousuf Karsh, but I do want to say something in protest on behalf of those millions of Canadians who are in the same position, who have come here of choice, who have become full citizens and who want to carry on as full citizens, who want their children to carry on as full citizens.

Mr. Brooks: Does not the hon. member agree that he is making a mountain out of a molehill?

Mr. McIlraith: No, sir. I am glad that question has been raised. I consider that this goes to the very root of our national unity. Not only that, it involves a deep-rooted principle. When I started to practise my profession in Ottawa about the same time as this man was starting up in a little shop, I took a great interest in politics. I worked in some of the branches of the national young Liberal organizations. There was one thing that impressed me, not so quickly at first but gradually, and that was this question of national unity. Our former prime minister used that phrase a great deal and was ridiculed for doing so. In that work I found that when we were considering current matters we were always coming up against the consideration of that principle. You began to realize that it applied not only geographically to this strip of country along—

Mr. Brooks: I would consider this to be a matter between the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) and Mr. Karsh.

Mr. McIlraith: This matter was raised by an hon. member in this house, and judging by the calls I have had about it I consider it to be a most important matter of principle. If I may just finish my remarks, we had to consider national unity, not only from its broad aspect geographically and from the other variations by reason of great distances, but also as it affected persons because of different racial and language backgrounds. In the last number of years when I have dealt with representatives of governments of other countries, an opportunity for which I am most grateful, I have noticed that the one thing that seems to bear in on their minds is the fact that this country is one where there is more practical application of this idea of national unity and more hope for our people because of it than in any other country.

Mr. Kickham: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he consider that Mr. Karsh made a truthful statement in his reference to the food served in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. McIlraith: I consider that the hon. member for Queens was quite right in raising the question as to the food served in the hotel. There is no question that the hon. member was quite right in raising that matter and defending it to the limit. But that does not permit him to attack and cast aspersions upon a fellow Canadian citizen on the ground that he came originally from another country.

Mr. Kickham: If the hon. member made such a statement in Armenia he would be kicked out of the country.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I will give the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) a good deal more if he wants me to. I would like him to discuss principles in this house instead of having his leader saying that he must not discuss their policies as he is the Leader of the Opposition. Any time the hon. member wants to discuss questions of Liberal principle I shall be glad to oblige him.

As I was saying, when I was working in those days with the Liberal party the question of national unity came up quite often, and it impressed me. I think one of the reasons I am as ardent a Liberal as I am today is that I felt the basis upon which we must operate in this country was a strong recognition of national unity in all our policies. Any time the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) wants to discuss this matter further I am ready to discuss it with him and I will give him book, chapter and verse.

Mr. Hodgson: I would like to invite the hon. member to Victoria to discuss it any time he wishes. He can set the date and place.

Mr. Sinclair: Is the hon. member tongue-tied here?

An hon. Member: Do you have to be home to talk?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. McIlraith: If the hon. member for Royal considers that this matter involves no question of principle, let me tell him the Liberal party has been discussing this type of question as a matter of principle for a number of years, and as far as I am concerned we are going to continue to discuss it for years.

Mr. Brooks: On a question of privilege, I did not say it did not involve a question of principle. I said it was principally a matter between the hon. member for Queens and Mr. Karsh, and the hon. member was simply trying to make a mountain out of a molehill. That is what I said. An apology as between these two men would be very much in keeping. It does not involve the whole principle of two parties in this country.

Mr. McIlraith: It involves the principle of first, second and third-class citizenship in this country. As far as I am concerned, it is going to be discussed and treated as a matter of principle because you cannot have a country with first, second and third-class citizenship.

Mr. Fulton: You should know.

Mr. McIlraith: I notice the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) seems to be agitated, but he will have to save his remarks for another time.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the hon. member if he spoke to similar effect to his British Columbia colleagues when the question of the treatment of Japanese Canadians was before the house?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I did. Not only that, I am on record as speaking at a meeting not many blocks from this chamber during the election campaign. I told them at that meeting that they were seeking to raise racial prejudice but that we were Canadians one and all. A questioner in the audience, planted there by friends of the hon. member's party, questioned that policy. Furthermore I told him that as soon as I finished with that meeting I was going to meet a group of Canadians of Syrian extraction in the west end of the city, and when I got there I proposed to tell them the same thing. I asked this questioner if he wanted me to take a message from that meeting, which was being held at the corner of Queen and Metcalfe streets, to the effect that there were different classes of Canadians among our citizens.

Mr. Fleming: Then you did not support the government's policy.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want to get diverted too far by the hon. member for Eglinton, but I can tell him about a meeting in his own constituency where he was the speaker. One of his friends who was a member of his audience walked out and has never voted Conservative since.

An hon. Member: Good sense.

Mr. McIlraith: I can give him the street address if he wants it.

Mr. Fleming: I can bring you a hundred of the other kind.

Mr. McIlraith: That may be, but I just wanted to point out the technique that has been used. As I said, we talked about national unity and so on. So that I cannot be accused of drumming up something and making it into a question of principle I should like to go back to the record. You know, we Liberals are not ashamed to go back and read from the previous speeches of our leaders. We are not afraid to have them quoted. The hon. member for Eglinton is justifiably upset.

Just let me read to you the remarks made by the former prime minister of Canada when he was retiring as leader of this party at the great Liberal convention held in August, 1948. There was a phonographic recording made of his words and I would commend it to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and to any other of his colleagues if they are interested. I will just put on record two or three sentences. Here is what he said:

> It is a basic principle of Liberalism that all its policies should make for the maintenance and strengthening of national unity. If a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand. We should strive for that which will help to give to all our people a united faith in the future of this great country. Our policies should be framed to serve the general interest and not the interests of any one section, class or group. Our outlook should not be local, or provincial. It should be a national outlook.

Our country is a federal state, occupying half a continent. We must seek our unity in diversity, not in unformity. Canada was created from diverse elements, each with proud and noble traditions and customs. It is composed of several provinces, each with its own history, and each with constitutional responsibilities which must be respected and safeguarded. Every one of us, if we are to be true Liberals, will endeavour to understand the background, the feelings and the outlook of other Canadians.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that he waited until he retired to say that.

Mr. McIlraith: That interjection is a reflection on the member who made it.

Mr. Fulton: Inhuman policy is the word for it.

Mr. Sinclair: He retired voluntarily; he was not turfed out of his own party.

Mr. McIlraith: That speech was made to his own followers, and that is the doctrine of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fleming: Those are the words of the Liberal party—not its actions.

Mr. Cruickshank: Another Rhodes scholar?

An hon. Member: You have him worried.

Mr. McIlraith: I have just finished reading a book.

Mrs. Fairclough: Your first one?

Mr. McIlraith: The bright remark by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is probably warranted and I take it in quite good part. It is Mr. Creighton's first volume on the life of the first Canadian prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald. One cannot read that book and not be impressed by the recognition by the first Canadian prime minister of the problem of national unity, and the struggles to recognize the diverse backgrounds of the different parts of what became Canada. You cannot help but be impressed by his appreciation of his problem. I can only regret that his followers today have not the good judgment to read and study some of his views on that matter and apply them to themselves and to their policies. I make no apology whatever for making reference to that fact.

An hon. Member: That is only your judgment.

Mr. McIlraith: That is my judgment of the first Canadian prime minister and his appreciation of the problem. It is a matter of tragedy that in this country today the party that is called, and properly called, the official opposition, which in our system of government implies the status of being an alternative government—

An hon. Member: The next government.

Mr. McIlraith: —has not seen fit to recognize what their first great national leader saw fit to recognize, a broader policy—

Mr. Fleming: Just absurd.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not reply to the hon. member for Eglinton in kind because he used the word "stupid" on one occasion and then objected when I used it in reply. I refrain from using the word "absurd" either in reply to his interjection or in any way connected with it. The hon. member for Eglinton is quite agitated, and well he might be because I propose to speak for a few moments about trade in this country.

Mr. Fleming: Why not about redistribution?

Mr. McIlraith: There has never been such a satisfactory job of redistribution done since confederation.

Mr. Fleming: You mean such a butchery of riding boundaries to serve the government's interests.

Mr. McIlraith: I may tell my hon. friend that one of his colleagues, a member of his own party, did not come into the house when he was raising all the disturbance about redistribution. That member was too disgusted with the fuss raised by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: That is utterly untrue.

Mr. Sinclair: Don't be childish.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member has just made a statement, Mr. Speaker, which I do not think should be allowed to pass without being controverted. He has stated that certain members of the Progressive Conservative party in this house stayed out for a particular reason.

Mr. Rowe: There are some out from over there.

Mr. Fleming: The statement that some of our members stayed out of the house for the reason he has given has not one shred or tittle of truth in it. If the hon. member does not know that it is high time he did.

Mr. McIlraith: If I have in any way offended the hon. gentleman's sensibilities—

Mr. Fleming: You do not offend my sensibilities, you only offend the truth.

Mr. McIlraith: As to why the hon. member was out of the house, I withdraw my remark completely; but I mention the fact that an hon. member on the committee from his own party was out of the house throughout the time he was debating redistribution.

On the question of national trade, which the hon. member for Eglinton does not want discussed, and which he is seeking to prevent being discussed—

Mr. Fleming: That is equally untrue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): I must remind hon. members that the hon. gentleman who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Fleming: I am rising on a question of privilege. The hon. member has said that I am trying to prevent him discussing trade. That is quite untrue. I would be glad to hear all he has to say about trade.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the hon. gentleman for that courtesy, and I will be very glad to continue my remarks.

For the first ten months of this year trade figures in total or in gross are pleasing to all Canadians. There is no doubt about that. Our exports are up rather substantially. With the United Kingdom they are up 23 per cent and with all countries they are up about 10 per cent. There are some tables here and, if the house wishes them put on record, I will be glad to do so. One table gives the exports for 1935, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1950, 1951, and the first ten months of 1951 and of 1952. The figures are broken down by countries: United States, United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries. The same breakdown is given for imports. I would be glad to put the figures on record in that form:

Canadian External Trade
($000,000)

Exports (excluding re-exports)

	Total	U.S.A.	United Kingdom	Other Commonwealth	Other Countries
1935	729	266	304	74	86
1937	997	360	402	104	131
1938	838	270	340	103	125
1939	924	380	328	103	113
1950	3,118	2,021	470	185	442
1951	3,914	2,298	631	241	744
1951 (10 months)	3,156	1,899	510	195	552
1952 (10 months)	3,512	1,977	625	223	787

Imports

	Total	U.S.A.	United Kingdom	Other Commonwealth	Other Countries
1935	550	312	117	57	64
1937	809	491	147	89	82
1938	677	425	119	67	66
1939	751	497	114	75	65
1950	3,174	2,130	404	241	399
1951	4,085	2,813	421	306	545
1951 (10 months)	3,486	2,385	369	274	458
1952 (10 months)	3,324	2,449	296	160	419

Those figures show a sharp increase in general trade. Much has been said in this house about particular products, and I have no quarrel with that. But it is always difficult, when a nation trades to the extent this country does, to deal with all particular products all the time. It is interesting to note that Canadian exports of agricultural and vegetable products are running like this:

Canadian Exports of Agricultural and Vegetable Products

1938	$191,000,000
1950	637,000,000
1951 (year)	894,000,000
1951 (10 months)	677,543,000
1952 (10 months)	918,324,000

The table for animals and animal products is as follows:

Canadian Exports of Animals and Animal Products

1938	$118,000,000
1950	366,000,000
1951 (year)	348,000,000
1951 (10 months)	294,000,000
1952 (10 months)	192,000,000

It will be seen, therefore, that the reduction in exports of animals and animal products for the first ten months of this year is considerably less than the loss of exports of those products which were cut off by reason of the embargo resulting from foot-and-mouth disease. It will also be seen that animals and animal products, and agricultural and vegetable products exported from this country during the first ten months of this year are sharply up. When the problems of individual products are discussed it is quite wrong to say that markets for agricultural products have been lost and that farmers generally are in a bad situation.

A great deal is said about exports to the United Kingdom. Here are some of the main items in which there have been sharp increases in those exports. Let us just look at them for a minute. My time will not permit me to give the figures, though I have the figures for each item if the house wants them. There is an increase in the export of barley, of wheat and tobacco—quite a sharp increase in the export of tobacco to the United Kingdom—of pit props; softwood lumber; woodpulp, sulphate, unbleached; newsprint; ferro silicon; aluminum; zinc spelter; asbestos milled fibre. I have the figures if the house is interested in them. You will notice that the first items, barley, wheat, tobacco and pit props, are all items produced by farmers. Although pit props might not be ordinarily classed as a farm product, anyone knowing the maritimes and the method of operation in New Brunswick would certainly consider them as farm products. If I have the consent of the house, I will put the table on the record.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: The table is as follows:

Some representative Canadian products whose exports to the United Kingdom have increased

		Nine Months 1950	Nine Months 1951	Nine Months 1952
Barley	bush	—	536,664	1,032,067
Wheat	bush	65,934,335	62,730,157	82,646,080
Tobacco, bright cured	lb	13,714,922	18,441,788	28,471,854
Pit props	cord	12,798	40,325	248,030
Softwood lumber	m. ft.	177,930	668,128	741,653
Woodpulp, sulphate, unbleached	cwt.	49,534	382,748	593,868
Newsprint	cwt.	155,282	1,056,126	1,769,966
Ferro silicon	ton	32,346	32,927	41,530
Aluminum	cwt.	1,647,473	2,831,745	3,909,259
Zinc spelter	cwt.	556,301	746,469	1,373,671
Asbestos milled fibre	cwt.	21,666	21,315	25,754

Something was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) about British Columbia apples. He regretted the loss of the United Kingdom market for them. Something like one month before the hon. member made his speech in this house all the apples in British Columbia had been sold, and I am happy to say sold at a very good price. I have not had the opportunity of examining the question of price in detail, but I am told that it is certainly higher than anything in the last ten years. I have not, as I say, checked the precise figures, but in any event the price was high.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think your information is accurate.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know where the information came from about there being a problem in the marketing of British Columbia apples.

Then one other aspect of the subject of marketing was mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I could quite sympathize with the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) when he said he did not want us to refer back to his leader's previous speeches. His leader said that 80 per cent of our exports went to the United States. I cannot find anything to support that figure, even for one month. In 1950 the figure was 65 per cent; in 1951, it was 59 per cent, and the current figure this year is 53 per cent of our exports go to the United States. As a matter of fact, at no point have I ever found any item that would support his statement that 80 per cent of our exports went to the United States. If he has authority for it, it is not to be found in the trade figures available.

I wanted to deal with another statement; that is that these trade figures do not affect the real standard of living. They very much affect the real standard of living in this country. I shall have to abbreviate my remarks, but I might point out that consumer spending is up a great deal in Canada, something of the order of 6 per cent higher than in 1951. The current rate of retail sales is about 6½ per cent higher in value than in 1951, and at least 3½ per cent greater in volume. As an example of that, at the last session we heard a great deal of talk from the opposition about particular sections of business or industry being injured or damaged. Let me point out that retail sales of automobiles, for instance, in September 1952, were up 12 per cent over the previous September, while radios and electric appliances were up some 43 per cent.

Perhaps it is not a good thing to isolate particular products like that; perhaps we would do better to take food purchases. Food purchases were 7½ per cent higher in value and 7 per cent higher in volume in the first nine months of 1952 than in the first nine months of 1951. Now, in dealing with that figure, you must remember that there are many new consumers in 1952, about 400,000 more than in 1951. After you allow for that, there is still a very substantial increase in the consumption of food by Canadians. I do not know of any index that is a better indication of the material well-being of Canadian citizens. Any of the other indices you take, of course, indicates the same thing.

In another speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition just last week end, which is reported in the Globe and Mail of Monday, December 8, he talks about the trading policy of this Liberal government. He went on to say that he would not be content to sit back in palsied impotence—that is the phrase he used. He referred to the government's trade policy as palsied impotence. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is there to indicate palsied impotence in a policy that has resulted in our trade increasing to something over $8 billion last year? It will be slightly higher this year. The whole trade policy of the government has been anything but palsied impotence as indicated by the Leader of the Opposition. The whole policy has been to continue to expand and increase trade on a multilateral basis. The fact has been stated and restated here to the point where I am sure it must have aggravated many listeners.

This policy has been exemplified by these facts in the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce. During the war years we had to close some 12 foreign trade offices. Since the war we have reopened 10 of those and in addition opened another 17 foreign trade offices. We have set up a commodities branch. We have set up an agriculture and fisheries branch. The United Kingdom and Canada have a continuing committee on trade and economic affairs which sits at irregular intervals during each year. The policy has been one of continuous and aggressive effort to seek to increase trade.

During a bit of crossfire the other night reference was made by one of the members of the opposition groups—I am sorry I have not the precise reference—to the period 1935-39. I just want to remind hon. members that with a very short bit of work I have been able to turn up some eleven or twelve trade treaties executed by this same Liberal party during those years. I ask hon. members if that is a policy of palsied impotence. I suggest that the palsied impotence is in the inability of the opposition to develop its policy with respect to trade and expound it.

Mr. Fleming: Even your colleagues are laughing.

Mr. McIlraith: I am very happy that they are pleased with my remarks. I appreciate that.

Mr. Fleming: Palsied laughter.

Mr. McIlraith: I see that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) still wishes to interrupt. He is not able to possess his soul in patience; but whether that is a chronic condition with him or is caused by my remarks, I do not know.

It will be noticed that the trade with Latin America is tremendously increased. Not only that, but we have had one trade mission there since the end of the war headed by the then minister of trade and commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and we have another one going there, headed by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). In my opinion that is a substantial indication of the Liberal policy, and is a thoroughly good one.

I had intended to make some reference to industrial raw materials in relation to trade, but I fear my time is extremely short. I shall try to condense those remarks greatly. I just want to remind hon. members who are discussing this question of export of industrial raw materials of one or two basic facts. They are that last year our industry required to import something of the order of three times as much industrial raw materials as Canada exported. This is a hard fact. Now we are becoming less dependent on industrial raw material imports. I cannot perhaps elaborate, in the time I have at my disposal, on the development of Canadian industry in processing Canadian raw materials; but it is interesting that of industrial materials the main exports are pulpwood, nickel, asbestos, zinc, iron ore and copper. Our imports are crude petroleum, coal, raw cotton, crude rubber, raw wool, iron ore and vegetable fibres. In addition to that, we must import all the bauxite for the aluminum industry, all the cryolite for the aluminum industry and of course sulphur for the newsprint industry whose product is of tremendous export value.

On this question of iron ore, the situation today is that Canada must import more iron ore than she exports. We import iron ore to the extent of about $23 million in value, and we export iron ore to the extent of $19 million in value. Hence, when I read speeches by some hon. members and others decrying the fact that we export iron ore, I would just remind them that our steel mills could not carry on if we did not import more iron ore than we are at present exporting. There is a reason for that, having to do with the quality of the ore and so on, and the need for mixing different ores.

The exports of industrial raw materials in 1939 were some $56 million and our imports in that year of industrial raw materials were $142 million. In 1951 the exports of industrial raw materials were $251·6 million and the imports were $724·1 million. In 1952, for the first eight months—those are the latest figures I was able to obtain—the exports of industrial raw materials were $184·2 million and the imports were $376·8 million.

The exports of foodstuffs—on the export of which our country is dependent to a great extent—in 1951 were some $905 million. I ask hon. members to consider well just what would happen to our exports of food materials if we stopped the export of industrial raw materials.

Then the exports of partially manufactured materials in 1951 were some $1,259·8 million. The exports of fully or chiefly manufactured articles were some $1,497·3 million. That gives total exports for 1951 of $3,914·5 million. In other words out of a total export of $3,914·5 million in 1951, the industrial raw materials exported were $251·6 million. I have here the precise table worked out for 1939, 1951 and the first eight months of 1952, except that I was not able to get the breakdown between partially manufactured goods and fully or chiefly manufactured goods for the first eight months of 1952. If hon. members wish that it be placed on the record, I should be glad to do so.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: The table is as follows:

TABLE 2.—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF INDUSTRIAL RAW MATERIALS, CANADA, 1939, 1951 AND 1952.

I realize that I have had the indulgence of the house in being allowed to go slightly beyond the full extent of my time. I therefore want to thank the house for the courtesy.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my address I should like to join the many hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) who respectively proposed and seconded the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, on the brilliant way in which they acquitted themselves in their task.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully cognizant of the honour and privilege that is given to any Canadian who is called upon to represent his fellow countrymen in this house. I am fully cognizant, too, of the responsibility that rests upon anyone who speaks here on behalf of his constituents. I do not take that responsibility lightly.

In Canada today we are on the very threshold of our greatest national development. We who are assembled here are well aware of the great developments that have taken place during the past two decades. We are aware of the vast industrial progress that has been made, of the great improvements in our standard of living, and of the new spirit of Canadianism and Canadian unity that is creating here a country of unequalled opportunity.

We must also be aware, as we listen to the addresses by hon. members from the other side of the house, that we in Canada must always guard against those divisive influences, those sectional and regional appeals which in other countries have led only to confusion and despair. Canada is not a totalitarian country. It believes in giving voice to every brand of opinion that is within the bounds of decency and does not involve treason or sedition. It believes in preserving all the rights and privileges of those in opposition so they may serve, and they are intended to serve, as constant, alert and vigilant critics of government measures.

All this is designed for the protection of the public. It is the very basis of our political system, but it should not degenerate into criticism for criticism's sake, nor should it become a long series of attacks and innuendoes bringing into disrepute the honourable actions of those who are responsible for administering the nation.

I must, however, state here that I do not approve of the smearing campaign carried on by many members of opposing political parties. By insinuations and by indirect accusations they hint at corrupt and improper practices. If they have any accusations to make against the government in power why do they not come out openly and make those accusations? Of the billions of dollars collected in taxes and spent for the benefit of the country, not one charge of graft or scandal has been made against one member of the Liberal administration. From the taxes collected in the last few years over $2 billion of the national debt has been paid off, and this by the Liberal regime.

Mr. Fleming: By the taxpayers.

Mr. Bourque: Certainly. We hear constantly from the members of the opposite side of the house what seems to be their theme song, "It is time for a change". Time for a change, when our money is at a premium on the United States money market; time for a change, when we have almost full employment in Canada; time for a change, when our industries are busier and our payrolls higher than ever before in the history of Canada; time for a change, when the take-home pay of the average Canadian worker is higher than it has ever been; time for a change, when each and every Canadian citizen has more things than he ever had before, such as an automobile, an electric refrigerator, an electric stove, a radio, a home, and many other things he never owned before; time for a change, when every class and group of citizen is enjoying new prosperity; time for a change, when Canada holds the respect of most of the other countries of the world and when millions of people are clamoring to come here to make their homes; time for a change when Canada is at the threshold of its greatest era of prosperity, guided and helped by the able leader of this government and his ministers.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record what two leaders of finance in Canada had to say about the affairs of this country. I will not read the whole advertisement of the Dominion Bank but only the part that applies to my subject. Mr. Robert Rae, president of that bank, in an advertisement published in a Montreal newspaper on Thursday, December 11, 1952, had this to say:

> Canada's population may be 30 million by 1975. Future depends on investment of savings, says Dominion Bank president.
> Canada's national income has again achieved a new peak. The physical volume of production has also broken all records. The 1952 crop of wheat and coarse grains has surpassed that of any previous year. Export trade has been greater than ever before, both in dollar value and in physical volume. Capital investment in new plant and equipment has established a new record. Retail sales have been buoyant. The cost of living is much the same as it was a year ago. This means that the Canadian people are now living more comfortably than ever before.
> The current rate of population growth is striking evidence of the faith which native-born Canadians and new Canadians coming from abroad have in this country's future. During the past twelve months the number of persons in Canada increased by no less than three per cent—a high rate of growth. If this rate of population increase is maintained Canada will have nearly 30 million people by 1975—twice as many as at present.
> During the past four years, while Canadians were saving 8½ cents out of every dollar of personal income, the people of Britain—faced with unprecedented need for the rebuilding and modernization of plant, equipment and housing—could only save one cent out of each dollar, due to the character and burden of taxation. Practically all of British investment during the post-war period has come from government funds and from corporate savings. In these fields also the rate of savings in the United Kingdom has been somewhat less than in Canada.

We Canadians may learn much from the present plight of Britain. The load of taxes which burdens us is less heavy than the load burdening the British people. The fiscal system here is less harmful toward enterprise than the fiscal system in Britain. Canada is rich in resources. The long-term prospects are bright. Developments now under way will increase greatly the range and volume of materials which the world needs and must have, and which Canada will be able to supply at fair and competitive prices. If risk-taking and enterprise are encouraged, if Canadians are given an incentive to save and invest, Canada will continue to move forward to greater achievements.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record what Mr. Gordon R. Ball, president of the Bank of Montreal, had to say in an advertisement published in an Ottawa paper on Friday, December 12, 1952:

Canada today . . .
Who has the lion's share?

It is not surprising that Canada should be viewed as a fertile field for the investment of money from abroad and still less surprising that, under existing circumstances, the lion's share of these funds should come from the United States. In the development of the resources of this continent, the international boundary line is becoming of less significance.

In point of fact, however, the relative role played by external capital in Canadian development has not been as large as is popularly supposed. For example, in the three years 1949-51 inclusive, the book value of non-resident investment in Canada increased by about $1,900 million, of which $1,700 million represented an increase in United States investment in this country.

While these figures in themselves appear large, they must be viewed in conjunction with the fact that in the corresponding period something like $12,000 million was spent in Canada for new capital development of all kinds.

In other words, then Canadians themselves provided, in this period, about $84 out of every $100 of new capital expenditures in this country, with foreign investors providing the remaining $16. It is also a fact that at the end of 1951 the proportion of Canadian industry controlled outside of Canada was somewhat smaller than in 1939.

If there are any Canadians who are inclined to view with alarm the extent of foreign participation in Canadian industry, the facts I have just recited should certainly tend to allay their fears.

I believe the citizens of Canada today are enjoying the most wonderful way of life it is possible to enjoy, and I feel sure that very few Canadians would want to go back to the days gone by. We hear complaints from many people, but is it not human for intelligent people to complain? We have not reached a Utopia; nobody ever will. No matter how high the standard of living there will always be those who will wish it were higher. Does the workingman want a full breadbasket with employment at high wages, with taxes at a high level, or does he want to go back to the uncertainty that existed in the days of the depression, when taxes were low and the breadline was long? Does the workingman earning approximately $75 per week, and paying approximately $10 per week for income tax, want to go back to the days of not so long ago when he earned an average of $25 per week, if lucky enough to be employed, but paid no income tax. Personally I do not think so. He is better off today financially, socially and economically than he ever was before.

Does the workingman want to go back to the days previous to the last war, when labour had almost reached the starvation point? Do the people want to go back to the days of not so long ago when our foreign trade was almost at a standstill? Do the people want to go back to the days when our farmers and our factories could find no market for their goods at home or abroad? Do the Canadian people want to go back to the days when our Canadian money was at a discount of 20 to 25 per cent on the United States market?

Nowhere else in the world outside of the United States can you find as high a standard of living as we now enjoy in Canada. The Liberal government provides the family allowances—a measure which was greatly derided by many members of the opposition, and christened by them the baby bonus—the old age pensions and pensions for the blind. These are some of the fruits of a taxation policy which is designed to create for Canadians a better and happier way of life. The Liberal government has given to all workers the protection of a sound unemployment insurance program which has eliminated for all time the need of a dole. The Canadian worker does not want charity, and the government recognizes and appreciates his position by providing a protection in which he can participate with dignity and with full respect for his position, as one who contributes to the development of our national wealth.

While each of us in this house represents a different constituency in Canada, a constituency with its own individual problems and its own individual claims for special attention and consideration, we realize that together we represent a great and growing nation. We do not seek uniformity of opinions or ideas, any more than we seek to destroy the individuality of each of our Canadian people. We welcome in Canada a diversity of races; we cherish the contributions to our Canadian civilization made by the English, the French, the Jews, the Italians, the Germans, the Scandinavian people and the people from many other lands who have come here to make their homes in our country. Each of these peoples has a vital contribution to make to our way of life, and each of them should feel that he is represented in this free and democratic parliament. We want no repetition here of the hatreds which in Europe today are again producing the wave of anti-semitism which once characterized nazi Germany.

In this House of Commons we have a duty to perform to the people of Canada, a duty which goes far beyond the mere passage of bills and resolutions, a duty which involves providing leadership to the rest of Canada. No other deliberations in Canada receive the attention in the press and on the radio that is given to the deliberations in this house. Here, during the session, Canadians look for that inspiration and leadership which will symbolize their own faith in their country. Here, in our words and in our actions, they look for the expression of true Canadianism which will provide them with the courage and the enthusiasm to help them carry on their own individual tasks. It is our responsibility to see that we provide that leadership and that example which they are seeking.

The government of Canada, through the program it has carried out during the past 15 years, under the leadership of the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and under the present able leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) through the program which was outlined in the speech from the throne, has endeavoured, and I believe has succeeded, in providing that leadership. Nothing has ever entered into this continuing program which has favoured one section, one group of interests, or one class of individuals over another. Legislation has been introduced and enacted in the best interests of the country as a whole. Mistakes, when they have been made—and who is so perfect in this world that he never makes mistakes—have been recognized and rectified. The affairs of the nation have been conducted with one over-all purpose in view, to give to Canada and the Canadian government the greatest possible measure of good government, administered by able ministers and, above all, by honest men.

Criticism of the methods which have been followed, of the legislation which has been enacted, of the measures which will be introduced—this is the legitimate function of hon. members in the opposition. Such criticism creates no personal animosity and is accepted in good faith as a contribution to our national welfare. It is entirely different from that type of criticism which sees nothing but evil in everything the government undertakes, which throws suspicion at each and all of those who are responsible for the administration of the government, or which seeks to divide one section of our population against another. The constituency which I have the honour to represent is also literally a cross-section of Canada. Its population includes many races and several creeds. We have a variety of national backgrounds and a diversity of interests, but we are all united in believing first of all in our own constituency, and secondly in the nation of which we form a part. We would not welcome in Outremont-St. Jean any forces which sought to divide us one against the other, and we do not like that kind of force to be operating in our country. We believe that here in Canada there is room and opportunity for all, and we believe in seeing that all those who live and work among us are given an equal chance.

As a new member of this house I have much to learn, and I appreciate the many kindnesses and attentions which have already been shown to me, not only by the members of my own party but by the members of the parties in opposition. It gives me pleasure to think that I am received here not as an unreasoning partisan but as a loyal Canadian who is eager in this chamber to make some contribution to the welfare of his country. I believe in the government program which, over the past 17 years, has helped to produce such great prosperity in Canada. I believe in the many measures which have contributed so much to the welfare and happiness of all our people. I believe in the spirit which is evident throughout all the national legislation which over the years this government has introduced and implemented by efficient action. And I believe, too, in the right of all those opposed to the government to state their objections, and to have them seriously and thoughtfully considered by the hon. members in this chamber.

It is the privilege and the duty of the opposition to present counter-measures; it is their responsibility to offer at all times an alternative program to that of the government in power. I cannot believe, however, that the good of Canada is well served by criticism, real or implied, based not upon facts but purely upon political considerations. And I am sure my friends on the opposite side of the house will agree that our first obligation is to the people of Canada, and that only those things which add to the stature of parliament and contribute to the welfare of the country should be introduced into our proceedings.

No Canadians have ever had a greater opportunity than we to add to the glory and the prestige of Canada. Let us not throw away that opportunity, but let us be united in purpose and love of country whatever our personal or political opinions may be.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). So as to avoid any possible misunderstanding about my position, I wish to give a few words of explanation.

I am not in favour of Social Credit and I am not associated with what is known in Quebec as the "Union des Électeurs".

I am voting in favour of the amendment not so much to show my approval of a principle of Social Credit, but rather because I hope, in doing so, to focus attention on a suggestion I want to put forward.

For the past few days, we have witnessed in this house rather acrimonious debates between members of the Social Credit party and members of other groups. I believe that the quality and tone of those debates will not serve to enhance the prestige of those groups among the public at large.

But that is not the matter I wish to raise. Since I came to this house in 1949, I have been astonished on several occasions to note the indifference with which the Social Credit doctrine has been received in this house, when it has not been ridiculed. For my part, this theory interests me, like any number of others, in so far as I can understand it. It seems to me that it might be interesting to know this theory, especially since its advocates boast of being able to cure the numerous evils which our present financial policies have not always managed to deal with successfully.

I have no intention of being a prophet of doom but, Mr. Speaker, what would happen here, in Canada, if the large international or supranational organizations, which influence our national policy to an ever-increasing degree, suddenly should decide to declare peace? That is bound to happen some day.

Our country, no more than any other, in fact, is quite unable to support, indefinitely, a war economy such as the one we have to cope with these days. Otherwise we should have to neglect that great principle which states that in order to defend itself a country must first of all ensure its own means of livelihood. Should we go on at this rate for too long, our very existence might be threatened whenever the time comes to transform a wartime economy into a peacetime one.

The apostles of the Social Credit faith claim that they are capable of lessening these economic catastrophes, even of preventing them. Would it not be worth-while to give these gentlemen a chance to express their theories freely, here or elsewhere, to serious-minded, unprejudiced people, who would listen to them attentively and intelligently?

There is no getting away from it; either this theory is absurd, unattainable and consequently dangerous; or else it is practical, attainable and consequently deserves consideration.

As regards the first alternative, we would be already far behind, for the harm would now be very much widespread and the old political parties—no disparaging sense being attached to the term "old"—know it by experience, because in at least two of the Canadian provinces, they are being soundly trounced by the apostles of the new creed.

As for the second alternative, there are some who would be only too happy to prove intelligently rather than by means of stupid denegations or inappropriate interruptions, the insanity and economic danger of this doctrine.

For my part, I refuse to believe that everything is basically wrong in the social credit doctrine, as long, at least, as the contrary has not been proved. I also refuse to believe that a considerable and ever-increasing part of the Canadian electorate is totally mistaken as to its value and that of its supporters.

There must be something to this, just as there must be something to the theories expounded by socialists, Liberals, Conservatives and, if I may be permitted to add this, independents. Otherwise our democratic system would be a complete failure.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat that in voting in favour of the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge, I mainly desire to stress the fact that more attention should be paid to the monetary theories of the Social Credit party. Should they be dangerous, we would then be in a position to strike back at them more effectively. On the other hand, should they contain practical elements, capable of application, we would be able to make the most out of them.

(Text):

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal with the pressing and vital question of Canadian airports, the place of airports in the life of this fast-growing nation, the function of airports in our economic future, the importance of airports to the defence of the free world.

Most of us have a proud awareness of the present travel facilities provided by Trans-Canada, Canadian Pacific and other Canadian air lines. We agree with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) "that aviation is growing faster than Canada," but how many of us get the full significance of such a statement as Ronald Keith, editor of Canadian Aviation, made the other day. He said:

> It is hard to realize that as recently as 1937—fifteen years ago—Canada was six days wide and relatively few Canadians had ever flown. Today, our country is only twenty hours from coast to coast, and last year nearly a million passengers flew on T.C.A. alone!

But those are only a few more facts and figures. If you want to get the full impact of what they mean may I suggest that the next time you have occasion to be at an airport anywhere in Canada, look at it closely, critically, watch the coming and going of planes, trucks, cars and people. Mostly watch the people. If you are in doubt about anything, ask the first twelve-year-old boy you come across. He can tell you better than I can ever hope to just what it means to live in a country only twenty hours wide, because you will find his main hope is that by the time he is a man, Canada will be only ten hours wide. And no doubt it will, if science has its way and provided we in this house see to it that Canadian airport facilities are adequate to meet the needs, not only of the growing travelling public but of this nation's booming commerce and industry as well.

I have suggested that you look critically at our airports, but I do not suggest that you seek only to find fault. In fact I am sure you will agree that, despite many obvious shortcomings, the picture of Canada's airport facilities is so good that we can afford to indulge in a little self-criticism. And that is not just my opinion, it is also the opinion of the world's top air travel technicians. We have come a long way from the cow pastures of not so many years ago to the 415 licensed airports of today. We have certainly progressed from the time, just after the first world war, when our investment in airport facilities was almost zero, to our present investment in airports of well over half a billion dollars.

You may say, and rightly, that much of this growth was forced upon us by circumstance. I say it is to the lasting credit of the ministry of transport that through the years it has known what it was doing, has fostered and nurtured Canadian aviation, and channelled its development along the lines of undeniable common sense, so that today we have a solid foundation upon which to build for the future, as build we must if we are to keep pace with our natural growth and with the new demands which technical aviation advances impose upon us. Jet planes are almost here, remember.

How did we make the transition from cow pasture to modern airstrip, you will ask. The answer is that the real history of civil aviation in Canada started just after the first world war, when we found ourselves with a large supply of competent pilots and engineers, a few aircraft and airports, a little know-how, and a lot of enthusiasm. In June of 1919 the Air Board Act was passed in this house. This act, now known as the Aeronautics Act, together with the air regulations, which were first passed in 1920, are the basis for the air law of Canada. On New Year's day, 1923, control of civil aviation was placed in the newly created Department of National Defence. Progress, though steady, was unspectacular. A few ex-war pilots flew the north country airways. A few small companies were organized for photographic and charter flights. Then in 1936 we formed the Department of Transport, and under Right Hon. C. D. Howe civil aviation was moved from the Department of National Defence to this new department, to be combined with the meteorological division and the radio—now the telecommunications—division to form the air services branch.

Between the two wars a start was made on the development of an air mail service to the prairies. Small emergency fields and aids to navigation at intermediate fields were established by the federal government. Larger centres such as Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton provided their own airports, primitive affairs by present standards. In 1937 the coming of Trans-Canada Air Lines made it imperative that these fields be improved, and the federal government undertook to grant assistance in those cases where the municipalities would and could carry out the required improvements. Where the community was too small to make any major contribution, or where for other reasons it was felt the community could not be expected to take the initiative, the federal government built the necessary airports and services so as to ensure a continuous chain of ground facilities.

The demands of the second world war caused still further improvements to be made. Municipal airports were taken over on lease and developed as combined civil and military bases. A great number of entirely new airports were built to meet defence needs. Where possible, these were so placed as to be usable for civilian needs when the R.C.A.F. was finished with them.

By 1946 the picture of our airports had changed beyond all recognition. The cow pastures had become large, expensive and complex plants requiring closely co-ordinated effort by many specialized services. It became increasingly evident that airport activities must be considered in two lights: one, the operation and maintenance of runways, hangars and workshops, administration buildings, and so on; and, two, the activities revolving around the aids to navigation such as radio ranges and beacons, communications, instrument landing system or ground controlled approach, air traffic control—both airport and airway control—and meteorological services which can only operate by virtue of a vast and complex system of communications covering the entire country and dependent on an even vaster system covering the whole continent. No municipality could hope to bear the cost of such a tremendous, complex system.

On the subject of costs, it takes anywhere from five to ten million dollars to build a major airport providing the services I have just described. It costs as much more if you include all the buildings and services constructed by and for the R.C.A.F. at such airports.

From the very beginning it was agreed that these aids to navigation are a federal government responsibility, partly because they are part of a larger co-ordinated system and partly because the costs were away beyond the ability of individual municipalities to pay. Where the municipalities felt unable to take on the maintenance of their airports, it has been necessary for the federal government to bear the entire cost of construction, operation and maintenance.

To get the full magnitude of the picture, you must remember that in 1939 Canada had 65 land airports. Our airways extended over about three thousand miles. Something like $5 million would cover the estimate of total airport and airway facilities of 1939. Today Canada has 143 hard-surfaced airports. Air routes and airways cover more than 14,000 miles. Four hundred and fifteen airport licences are in force. The total capital value of this tremendous airport and airway plant is something like $550 million, or 110 times more than 13 years ago.

So far as the financing of our major airports is concerned, you must keep in mind that all of them have some defence value, either immediate or potential. The question is, how can these airports be made to pay. Certainly, so far as is possible, each airport should be self-supporting.

Airport activity should be divided into two parts, for accounting purposes. Part one is directly concerned with the landing, taking off and manoeuvring of aircraft. Revenue from airport landing fees at major airports, by the way, is said to be sufficiently high to cover maintenance and operating costs that can be directly assessed to aircraft activities. Part two covers the non-flying facilities such as hangars and workshops, administration buildings, equipment, garages, offices, restaurants and so on. To these a percentage of the cost of operating utilities must be charged. The problem is to increase revenue to cover the cost of facilities which cannot be assessed directly to aircraft activities.

With the exception of Ottawa and Montreal, every community of sufficient size to be expected to make any contribution toward an airport has made it. And for the record it is interesting to note that Montreal is said to derive a revenue benefit of no less than $3 million a year just because ICAO keeps its offices there. But apart from these two cities, most communities have bought the land on which their airport is now located. In western Canada, in some cases, the communities themselves have made considerable strides in airport development. So far as Ottawa is concerned, it is argued that Canada's capital city's airport should be a charge on Canada as a whole. Perhaps so, since because of its location, near defence headquarters and numerous scientific and research bodies, Ottawa airport runways are now being extended and facilities installed to make it one of the largest in the world, much larger than is necessary simply to serve the needs of a city the size of Ottawa, and at a cost far beyond the means of any one community.

Montreal's present airport, at Dorval, was developed largely to facilitate movement of aircraft to the United Kingdom during the war. Dorval, among other things, is one of the reasons why today Montreal is the aviation capital of the world, why the international civil aviation organization has its headquarters there, as has the equally important international air transport association, the agency which co-ordinates the activities of all the world's airline operators.

The picture I have painted so far has been rosy, so rosy that, as I said earlier, a little self-criticism cannot hurt us or detract from the splendid achievement of the Department of Transport through the years. But, for one thing, our very prosperity in aviation, the giant progress we have made, has flowed over us before we were really prepared for it. Although technically our airports are among the world's best, most up-to-date and safest, and although our engineers and technicians are well in the lead in keeping them abreast of latest developments, the impression the travelling public—you and I—get in going through our air terminals is inclined to be depressingly grey. It is not a bit unusual to find a large crowd of people jammed together, milling around in a waiting room far too small to accommodate them. If they go outside to get a breath of air—that is, if customs and immigration will let them outside—the prospect is anything but pleasing. In winter you face snowdrifts and icy blasts; in summer, a monotonous sun-baked landscape. Back inside, out of the cold or dusty heat, you can squeeze in for a just-adequate meal at some of the larger airports, or drop a coin in the coke-vending machine or automatic shoe-shiner at the small places. So far as the delayed passenger is concerned, he just sits and fumes. Sometimes he cannot even sit.

But let us leave for the moment the matter of the inadequacy of our airports in the way they try to cater to public needs. Although the deficiencies are annoying enough, they do nothing to detract from the progress made. Meantime let us consider seriously the importance of air travel and transport to this country. Just a month ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) pointed out that he expects total revenues from our commercial air carriers this year to exceed $80 million. That is five times as much as it was in 1946. In fact revenues have been increasing at a rate of between 17 and 20 per cent for the last few years, and show every indication of continuing to do so. Mr. J. R. Baldwin, chairman of the air transport board, has pointed out:

> If rates of growth which have existed over the past three years in Canada and the United States continue—and this appears to be the case—then the faster rate of growth in Canada may mean that in virtually all fields of aviation, with the possible exception of cargo, Canada will not only be in an equal relative position but may pull ahead of the United States.

So far as future growth is concerned, it will be obvious that with our air lines and airports handling passengers at the annual rate of one for every fourteen Canadians—a million a year, that is—with half a billion dollars invested in airports, and hundreds of millions in planes and personnel and equipment in general, aviation is not just growing at the same tempo as the Canadian economy. It is, in Mr. Baldwin's words, "taking over new and additional fields of activity and has by no means reached the maximum degree of penetration of new markets."

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

In the air coach and air cargo markets there are tremendous new sources of traffic to be tapped. I hope you will not think it trite if I remind you that as our north country continues to pour forth its riches, so must our north-south feeder lines, and our east-west trunk lines, carry more and more air passengers and air cargo. In fact, without the planes you could not open up the country, and without the planes you certainly could not maintain contact once you had opened it up. So the future of a vast segment of the Canadian economy obviously depends on what can be carried through the air; where it can be set down, and in what quantities.

Consequently, traffic is increasing faster than facilities to handle it on the ground are being provided. The Toronto terminal at Malton is just managing to keep abreast of its traffic. The Vancouver terminal, also, can just barely keep up. The present Calgary terminal was converted to its present use at government expense. The federal government owns the building, which has tarpaper outside and a softwood floor inside. At the moment new terminals are being erected at Lakehead and Moncton which should be adequate for some years. At other points in the east and west, in smaller cities, the situation is not acute, even if the facilities are not completely modern and efficient and comfortable.

The main problem, of course, is how to make terminal facilities pay for themselves, especially since customs, immigration, health and the post office all take up a lot of space and do not pay for it. Also, a good deal of space must be allocated to public needs. The air services people themselves have to have space to accommodate the airport manager and his staff, air traffic control services, radio services and meteorological services. At Dorval, for example, the amount of space used by each of these government and air services adds up to 29·7 per cent. Another 25·7 per cent is unrentable, and 31·9 per cent only can be rented. The remaining 11·7 per cent is basement, which is vacant and presumably unusable. Obviously the ratio of non-revenue space to revenue space is quite high, and it seems to the experts, so far as I can gather, that as long as this ratio remains the way it is no terminal building is likely to pay for itself. Air operations pay for themselves already, as I have pointed out. In order to make a terminal pay, then, it has got to be big enough and must include enough sound commercial enterprises of a nature sufficiently attractive to induce passengers and visitors alike to patronize them.

As a matter of fact it has been proved over and over again that airport terminals can be made to pay, aside from regular air traffic revenues. On this continent the most experienced voice is that of the port of New York authority, which over the years has had to solve the financing problems involved in the provision of what are known as "domestic" and "international" air services. As you are aware, New York airports must handle traffic not only American in origin but also between all parts of this continent and from Europe. If the port of New York authority were dealing with, say, the problem of Dorval in Montreal, which is in a measure comparable to New York airports so far as domestic and international traffic is concerned, you can be sure the first consideration would be to make a capital outlay sufficient to provide all the basic facilities essential to the operation of an efficient airport. This capital cost would then be supported by the general revenue of all the air lines using the airport, as well as by the development of concessions.

A comprehensive airport plan envisages construction of hangars, shops, offices, air freight terminals and other operating facilities. The construction budget for these amenities, according to the New Yorkers, would be supported by air line and other leases so that these amenities would immediately be placed on a self-supporting basis. So far, so good. But the New York port authority's fundamental concept does not stop there. It believes that airport development, to be successful, requires the judicial exploitation of all revenue and concession areas in each air terminal. This means the encouragement, by concession, of restaurants, shopping areas, facilities for recreation and amusement, spectators' promenade, and any other development which might contribute to the support of the project and to the obtaining of net revenues.

Many of the hon. members of this house have travelled, as I have done, extensively in the United States and Europe, so I am sure they will be disposed to agree that the port of New York authority's idea of how to make an air terminal pay is not too far-fetched for Canadians to grasp. In fact, those of you who have travelled in Europe will remember that the above-mentioned concessions were extended to include such items as a newsreel cinema, cafes, restaurants, cocktail bars, conference rooms for rushing businessmen, a nursery for harassed mothers, souvenir shops, dress shops, handicraft shops—all kinds of shops—exhibitions, tourist bureaux, observation decks, and even first-class hotels. I might say that today there is room for a 200-bed hotel at the Dorval airport. The present hotel of 80 beds is totally inadequate to meet the situation.

In addition, really modern airports have such things as spur lines for the fast and efficient handling of rail freight; fully developed fringe areas owned or leased by the airport and containing busy warehouses and even factories; well landscaped surroundings, and whole communities which live by and with the coming and going of air passengers, air cargo and, almost as important, sightseeing throngs.

Yes, I said sightseers. I mean the kind of people who, a couple of generations ago, always met the afternoon train at the depot; the friendly Canadians whose instinct is to give silent welcome to the newcomer, and kind farewell to the voyageur. All they have done is transfer their affection from the railway station or the jetty to the world's modern equivalent. And then, of course, we have the youngsters. Most of them are still old-fashioned enough to be thrilled by the roar and throb of obsolescent airscrews, but lots of them have lost their hearts to the blow-torch swoosh and keening whine of the mid-century jet job and are already searching with their young minds the quiet chill spaces of the outer universe. Yes, these are the sightseers. That is one of the things I meant when, in my introduction, I suggested you look mostly at the people you will find around Canada's airports. If you think there are not enough of them to warrant attention from concessionaires consider that, during the summer months and well into the colder times, thousands of regular Sunday visitors throng Dorval, which is not easy to come by, being eleven miles from the heart of Montreal and situated in a pretty bleak setting. They come by bus, by car, by bicycle and on foot. If there were rapid transit they would come by that, too. Their object, as stated to me by my own constituents of Mount Royal, who live practically next door to Dorval, is to see the "biggest free show in town"; to see the more than one thousand passengers arrive daily, on 70 domestic flights and 14 or 15 transatlantic jumps. I can assure you, as will any of the oldtimers at Dorval, that just a little landscaping, just a little in the way of creature comfort and amusement, would bring many thousands more to this latter-day caravanserai, not only during the hours of sunshine but also during the spectacular airport night with its multi-coloured lighting effects and its thrilling rushing sounds.

Let us consider Dorval. It is an international airport in the true sense of the word. It is the European's and the American's first ground contact with Canada and Canadian ways. But instead of the voyageur peering into the showcase of this nation—which Dorval should be—his first encounter is with jammed waiting rooms, milling with crowds; cramped quarters for health, immigration and customs, making efficient handling almost impossible whilst waiting for transfer from international to domestic flights. Although Dorval is so close to Canada's first city—a bilingual city at that—and although frequently flying schedules allow transient visitors three or four hours between flights, you have to be a real adventurer to take a chance on a run into Montreal in search of the normal amenities of civilization which are somehow denied you at Dorval. Montreal is known for good shops, good hotels, good food and drink and entertainment. Why then should a traveller have to come so near to remain so far away?

Why cannot Dorval be so reconstructed and conducted that it will do a public relations job for the nation in the short time it takes the worldly-wise traveller from Antwerp or Abadan or Los Angeles to change planes? And just as much as we want to give the non-Canadian what he wants, we must be prepared to cater to the people of our own country; and airports, we must remember, have become in these times social and cultural rendezvous of the first magnitude, the meeting place for those who travel in the modern style as well as for those who think modern thoughts. There are millions such today. Just look at our air travel figures alone. These millions could turn your air terminal into the "coin box" of your airport. Let us start with Dorval, to design our air terminals so they will present the best shop window for Canada, not only to visitors from abroad but to our own people too.

All this foregoing is not just eyewash. It is good commercial horse sense, that is all. Other countries have made it pay off. So can we, once we, as Canadians, get used to the fact that you do not have to subject yourself to the discomfort of a log cabin at this stage in Canada's development, even though log cabins were good enough for grandpa and are even good enough for a whole lot of people who are currently engaged in pushing our mining frontiers northward to the Arctic. We are an air-minded country now. Let us realize it. As my good friend Leslie Roberts says in his splendid new book "Canada: The Golden Hinge", "there are too few Canadians and we tend to live in clumps, too widely separated for our own good. The growth of population and the development of rapid internal communications is correcting this basic problem, but we still have a long way to go." But I might remind you, it is not so far for your constituents and mine to go to the local airport, and if we make it attractive enough for them they will soon make it the social and cultural bazaar it could and should be.

So much for the business of encouraging the public to support your airport. There are other sources of revenue, to be sure. There are air freight, air express, air coach service, to name a few. Most of you know that Canadian charter carriers have always carried substantial quantities of air freight into outlying areas and that air express and some air cargo has been carried in space available on main-line scheduled passenger flights. However, two recent developments are not so widely known.

First, new and larger types of aircraft, such as the Bristol freighter and Curtiss C-46 are now being employed on charter freight operations in northern Canada which, because of their greater load capacity and lower unit costs, are opening new aviation fields in these areas. Such aircraft make it possible to transport far greater volumes of traffic and provide a new flexibility to operations leading to the development of our northern regions.

Even more significant to the development of air cargo is the fact that we stand on the threshold of the introduction on a substantial basis of all-cargo scheduled main-line operations. A substantial volume of traffic has already been developed on such services in the United States. Canada, hampered by a shortage of suitable aircraft equipment up to this time, will soon be moving in the same direction. Several specific proposals for the introduction of all-cargo operations are now before the air transport board. Some idea of the general trend of development which may be expected can be obtained from the experience in the United States, where the growth of air cargo has been rapid following the expansion of all-cargo operations.

The principal advantage offered to the shipper by air freight is, of course, speed. There are, however, numerous ancillary advantages. Among the savings to the shipper are frequently reduced inventory requirements; savings on packaging; increase of sales of style merchandise which must be available for temporary spurts in sales; increase of sales of current interest merchandise such as newsreels, periodicals, etc.; savings through speedy shipment of parts which avoid production delays.

The increases in cargo traffic which undoubtedly lie ahead in the fairly near future will necessitate substantial improvement in the cargo-handling facilities not only of the air lines but also of the airports where both materials-handling equipment and warehousing facilities will require expansion.

Another substantial development which lies in the future for Canadian aviation and will also lead to a marked expansion of traffic is provision of higher-density seating for air coach service. By the introduction of higher-density seating and possibly elimination of free meal services it may be possible to provide a reduction in passenger fares and as a consequence marked increases in traffic. Trans-Canada Air Lines and other trans-atlantic carriers introduced tourist fares on the Atlantic in May of this year and some similar trend may be expected in domestic services in due course. As a matter of fact, based on United States experience, a 25 per cent reduction in fares has been shown to produce as much as a 40 per cent increase in passenger volume. It is worth thinking about, and Canada's air line companies are doing lots of thinking in that direction these days.

It is these air coach and air cargo prospects and the steady growth of their present regular passenger, express and mail operations which have justified the orders for new Lockheed super Constellation and Vickers Viscount turbine aircraft which have been placed by T.C.A.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the place and function of airports in our national and economic life. I had given a short résumé of how the Department of Transport, with a long-range plan in mind, had carefully and wisely developed a chain of efficient airports across the country. I was attempting to point out the next necessary stage of development, namely the need for better terminal facilities, in particular at Dorval airport in Montreal. And it was not just a question of local pride. It is bigger than that. My purpose was to show that a heaven-sent opportunity exists to do a public relations job for Canada with the travelling public; furthermore, that it would pay for itself; and that even if it did not the government still has a social job to do in that regard. I was attempting to indicate new sources of revenue and I had pointed out that air cargo and air coach services were already knocking on the door.

You are all familiar with the important work being done by the helicopter on military operations in Korea. It is also doing valuable work in Canada, performing such functions as depositing freight on mountain sides in British Columbia for the aluminum project, doing geophysical surveying in northern Canada, carrying mail in Newfoundland to outpost stations. However, the helicopter cannot come fully into its own until an economic passenger-carrying helicopter is available. The day when such a helicopter will become available in large numbers is not too far away, and there is every prospect that in less than ten years there will be regular helicopter services between some of our major cities. Such new services will present a host of new technical and economic problems ranging all the way from consideration of appropriate flight techniques over crowded cities to the building of helicopter alighting areas on the tops of railroad stations. There is no likelihood that the helicopter will replace the long-distance aircraft. It will be for transportation purposes, the short-haul adjunct to it, whose combination of slower speed and ability to land closer to the city centre will create new short-haul traffic.

The advent of the jet age will undoubtedly mean a revolution in landing strip design, for a variety of technical reasons; but the best authorities are of the opinion that it is no problem to plan and build advanced airport buildings right now. Just because a super-jet take-off strip may look like a toboggan slide does not affect the service in an airport restaurant or an airport hotel. And we had better start planning now, or the jet age will be upon us before we know it. I notice that the air line run by the C.P.R., that same company which, 64 years ago, saw the last spike—a gold one at that—driven into a railroad tie high in a Rocky mountain pass, the company which helped so much to give Canada confederation, are now saying to the world:

> Across the Pacific, Comet jetliners, vibrationless, silent, smooth . . .

It shakes you a little. It makes you remember how, when you were younger, people used to say: "Canada has got responsible government, the world's finest bridge-building company, the world's greatest travel system and world's greatest future."

Yes, as an anonymous editor wrote on the dust-cover of Leslie Roberts' vital, significant "The Golden Hinge":

> In the opening years of the second half of the twentieth century, Canada possesses a treasure trove of wealth which cannot be matched in the western world. That wealth lies in the seas off Nova Scotia; in the forests of the north; in the giant timber of the Pacific coast and its offshore islands. You'll find it in the mines of seven provinces; in the great Alberta oil pools; in the soil of the great plains. You'll find it in the orchards of Niagara and in the valleys of the Rockies; in the waters off the western coast; in the humming factories of the heartland, from Windsor eastward to Quebec. You'll find it, too, in the Canadian people and the qualities they possess.

Yes, the Canadian people; it is they whom you should watch when you pass through your next airport. Watch them, milling, patient, curious, interested in this modern wonder, trying to be a part of it. And as you watch them, agree with me that they deserve better than they have been given by us and agree, too, that if we give them better airports we will once again prove the truth of the adage that "it pays to be modern"; pays not only in extra revenues but in an extra line of defence against those who would destroy our freedom.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I add my congratulations to those of others who have spoken in this debate, to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have certainly served this house with distinction, and have brought credit upon their constituencies, and I might say also to the whole of Canada, in the attitude they have assumed in the conduct of the affairs of parliament.

I want to say a word about the licensing of radio-television sets. On another occasion I have spoken in this house with respect to radio licences, and I will not repeat what I had to say on that occasion. Suffice it to say that I am opposed to a radio licence because of the fact that such a licence is not collectable; and if it is not collectable and is paid by only a part of the population who are in possession of radio sets, I am opposed to it.

A report has appeared in the newspapers—and I do not vouch for its authenticity—that there is to be a radio-television licence fee of $15 imposed upon each radio television receiving set. In the constituency which I represent, Essex West, we have the United States on three sides of us. By reason of the geography of that part of the country we are south of the United States. Within a radius of a hundred miles there is a population of about three million people, which means that there are about three million people who would be in a position, as radio television set owners, to obtain broadcasts in the Windsor area. At the present time we have three channels of television, each emanating of course from Detroit. We have excellent reception; we have no complaints whatsoever, television reception there is probably much better than in most places in the city of Detroit itself.

Anything that I have to say, Mr. Speaker, is not in condemnation of the C.B.C. or to be considered as such, because we are well served with radio broadcasting in that area. CKLW, which is a 50,000-watt broadcasting station, serves and has served that area very well for many years. We were opposed to the licensing of radio receiving sets until such time as the C.B.C. established what is now known as radio station CBE, and my praise for that station cannot be expressed in words. It is making friends not only for C.B.C. but for all Canada. Among the three million people who are potential listeners I know there are many thousands, and the record would so verify what I am saying, who listen to nothing but that particular radio station.

According to C.B.C. policy, as announced, I understand that in addition to the radio-television stations situated at Toronto and at Montreal, there are going to be other stations at Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver. This does not include a radio-television broadcasting station in the Windsor area, where we have three million potential listeners and viewers. For that reason we feel there should be no taxation without a corresponding benefit to the area.

I am not alone in that thought. I am supported by several resolutions I have received. I am not going to read those resolutions in full, but shall make reference only to that from the city of Windsor received on October 17, 1951, which indicates that it opposes any system of television licence fees that may affect local set owners until such time as those owners will get the direct benefit of Canadian-owned stations. This resolution is supported by resolutions from the town of Riverside, the town of Kingsville, the town of Sandwich East, the town of Harrow, the township of Mersea, the township of Gosfield North, the township of Sandwich West, and others.

So my first point is that I do not think there should be taxation unless we are to have the benefit of C.B.C. radio-television broadcasting.

Then the report states that the licence fee will be $15. Even in these modern days I believe such a fee is somewhat oppressive. It is too high. I would recommend that, if at some later time a fee is to be set, it should be nominal.

Finally I believe there should be no tax until some means is found whereby there will be full coverage; that is to say, a time when everyone in possession of a radio-television receiving set would be paying a licence fee. Until that time I do not think there should be any fee whatsoever.

In my view the government should be commended for adopting a careful attitude and for making a cautious approach to the subject, because I think much can be learned from mistakes made in other countries which will make it possible for us to develop this vital means of communication so that it may be used for the full benefit and advantage of the people of Canada.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is of interest to all to note such concern paid to the speech from the throne. The debate has proceeded for several days, and much has been said by hon. members on both sides of the house.

I should like to join those who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) on the splendid speeches they made in moving and seconding the address in reply. They are new members. I wish for them many years of happiness and satisfaction in the service of their respective districts. It was to be expected that, as new members, they would in faithful admiration compliment the government upon what it has done, and say little about what it has not done.

I believe this debate has brought to the attention of the house and the taxpayers the signs of the times. It has given an indication of what the government has been doing, whether it is smugly satisfied with what it has done or whether it has any ideas for the future. As hon. members will agree, the speech from the throne is in the nature of a pattern or a plan for the year's business. It is not given in as much detail as one might wish, or as we may expect to see later in the budget and in legislation to be brought down.

Some say that we will see a strange type of budget. This, of course, will depend upon what those who sit to the right of Mr. Speaker intend to do in the next twelve months. We must decide for ourselves, when we have heard what might be called boasting about our greatness, our great natural resources and the prosperity we have enjoyed, whether these conditions are basically sound, or whether they are the result of a post-war development, or the result of preparations for another war.

In any event there is no one in the house, and few in the country, who would view without a keen sense of pride the fact that Canada, a country offering the greatest opportunities of any country in the world, has made great progress. While the United States of America may have increased its trade sevenfold in the last few years, Canada has increased hers fourfold. No similar number of people in the world enjoy the advantages of greater resources than we do.

However, I sometimes wonder if it is not important, either in one's private business transactions or in the transaction of public business, to stop, look and listen, even when things are going well. There never has been a time in the last several years when it was more necessary to stop and consider the basis of the prosperity we are now enjoying. In other words, I say this would be the proper time for stocktaking in this country. There is a feeling of uncertainty among business people. There is excitement among labour; there is unrest in agriculture; there is concern among military people. All across Canada people are asking themselves: What about tomorrow? I often wonder if we are not prone to become hypnotized with the type of prosperity brought about either by the war through which we have passed or in preparation against another war. I think of the millions and millions spent on the war that is past, and the millions being spent to prevent another one, and sometimes I wonder if we should not ask ourselves what will happen in the days ahead.

We have heard many rumours about state planning, but there seems to be very little preparation made for days of peace. I have always felt that we should put first things first. While I have been in the House of Commons a considerable number of years, I do not think I could be called a reactionary, because I have suffered reverses in politics for being too much the other way.

No one has greater sympathy than I have for the man who needs assistance. I could not have remained as long as I have in public life had I not recognized that need. But, in all sincerity, I say we should stop and be prepared to put first things first; because no matter how anxious we may be for social security, our first need is national security, and that national security depends upon financing, development and expansion. National security depends upon economic soundness in this country. I say again that it does not matter whether the Liberal party sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, is in power, or whether the reins of office are held by the party to your left; the fact remains that national security is of first importance.

I do urge that we work for a common purpose in this house. No matter how bitterly hon. members from the other side castigate the leader of our party, no matter how bitterly they castigate some of the things of years ago, we have many things in common. I say it is with common pride that we think of the great resources of Canada. It is with common interest that we speak about the great advances we have made. It is with a common thought that we talk about our magnificent future and our great resources. But I often think it is not always with common tactics that we try to approach these things.

After all, a popular political appeal is not always sound statesmanship, any more than popular learning is sound logic. There are all too many who seem afraid to face the future. There are all too few who seem brave enough to say what they think should be done. I sometimes become alarmed when I think that we are building up prosperity on war preparations. I see dangerous trends, and I know every hon. member of this house also sees them. Signals are being disregarded, storm warnings are ridiculed.

We must realize that this country is being overtaxed. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said it was only pretended overtaxation, pretended by the opposition. But I believe in the same speech he said that in one or two instances they might save only $3 million anyway, and he said that if it was all added together they would not save any more than $100 million. This indicates the trend of the times. It shows that a government in power is disregarding some of these fundamentals.

I ask hon. members to realize that today we are paying in taxation $320 per person or $1,600 for every average family of five. Realize what that means to the average home. We are paying in taxation today to this government twice as much as we pay to feed the whole population of Canada, and an amount almost equal to what we pay for food, clothing and housing.

I know that progress knows no retreat. I know that we have made no more advance along certain lines than they have made in the United States of America. I know that following the first great war there was tremendous advance until 1929 and 1930. It was to be expected that following this last world war there would be a great improvement in our prosperity. We are blessed with rich resources in the form of gold, silver, nickel, copper, asbestos, every form of base metal you can think of, plus iron ore and oil. In addition we have our great agricultural wealth, our forest wealth that exports more than all our base metals and wheat combined. These things are great blessings.. We could not help being prosperous in times like this, no matter what party was in power. When I hear hon. members tell of some panacea they have which has made this country prosperous in the last few years I am absolutely amused at their nonsense. Even with the folly of our friends down in the far corner we would have had great prosperity in the last few years anyway. You could not have avoided it. The world was at our feet; great resources were at our hands. The Lord never gave so few people so much. You could not help but have prosperity.

What has the government done to bring about this prosperity? They have increased taxes and practised extravagance such as we have never known. I am not going to relate them now, but surely in the face of what we have heard in the last few months no one can say that the government are the great apostles of economy. You do not buy half a dozen raincoats for each girl in the service if you are trying to economize. You do not even buy them for your own girls.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Rowe: You do not buy a million and a half pairs of shoes for 100,000 men in active service if you are trying to economize. You do not pay wages to horses up in Petawawa if you are trying to economize, such as we see reported in the evening paper. In fact, I have a lot of horses and I think they would earn more for me up there than any place else.

An hon. Member: Your horses never pay off.

An hon. Member: Not when I bet them.

Mr. Rowe: I am not endeavouring to ridicule this government, not for a moment. If I were I would speak much more vigorously. In all seriousness I urge all sides of this house to figure what is happening and to pay some attention to the warnings being given. They are the signs of the times. If the government in all its smug complacency has not seen these signs, I ask them to talk to the apple growers of the east, to the grain and fruit producers of the west, to the lumbermen on the coast, to the cheese makers of Ontario, to the cheese producers of Quebec, to the poultry producers of Ontario, to the dairy farmer in Ontario, to the beef cattle people in Ontario.

An hon. Member: Nothing wrong with the beef farmer.

Mr. Rowe: That shows that you do not know anything about the beef industry. For the benefit of my hon. friend who was not here at the time I should like to quote what happened on October 21, 1949. I know he will be glad to hear it. I quote from page 1023 of Hansard of that date, where I am reported as follows:

> In order to assist the government to try and open up greater opportunities in this country, to try to broaden the basis of taxation and to try to have our great resources flourish and expand so that the people can get the most out of them and this country reach her destiny, in order to assist the government in that and in safeguarding our economic security and progress generally, I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris):

That was seconded by the late Mr. Joseph Harris, who I regret is not here today. My amendment was as follows:

That all the words of the resolution after the first word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to prevent the present decline in our trade with the sterling area and is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of inviting the nations of the commonwealth to a conference in the immediate future for the purpose of working out arrangements to preserve and enlarge those traditional markets on which jobs and opportunities for Canadians very largely depend."

That was in 1949. At every session since some hon. member of this party, and on two occasions our leader, has urged the government to initiate a British commonwealth conference. It is now history that it was with reluctance that Canada joined the conference which was initiated by the old land and Australia and New Zealand. At one time we of the opposition were not sure, because we were not told whether the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would attend. When the Minister of Finance comes back optimistically impressed we are very glad because, as an hon. member said the other day—I believe it was the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton)—this conference is now three years late. What has happened in the interval? Why, Mr. Speaker, we have lost our markets in that land for almost every commodity I have mentioned. We have lost that market for apples and we are selling that market less cheese than we have ever sold in half a century.

An hon. Member: No cheese at all.

Mr. Rowe: No bacon, no cheese, no beef. We are just written out of that market for about the first time since before 1900. Remember, Mr. Speaker, we sold Britain 110 million pounds of cheese in 1900.

Mr. Gibson: Why did we not throw you in as a bonus?

Mr. Rowe: Well, they might have been glad to have me, but I do not think that they would have paid much for you.

I am not going to be interrupted on something as important as this is by any remarks that are more noisy than relevant. I do say, Mr. Speaker, that it is time we took stock. I am not going to try to say that, if times should continue as they are, this government could not sit smugly by and do as they are doing. The western farmers have suffered to the extent of $750 million through the folly of your socialistic experiments in marketing wheat. You have oleomargarined the dairy industry until you threaten to shatter the very cornerstone of agriculture. You have been stocking pork so fast in the last few months that I do not know whether you have packed 65 million or 90 million pounds of bacon. I know you have lost $5 million of the money of the general taxpayers of this country already.

In spite of all this, Mr. Speaker, what has the government done? What is the state of planning for agriculture? What has this price support plan of the government, this socialistic approach to the great agricultural industry, meant to this country? Somebody says it has not hurt beef at all. Well, I am still in the beef cattle business and I know very well the price dropped $2 to $3 per hundred over the week end, and that certain classes of cattle dropped 50 per cent in the past year. The very best steers have dropped 35 to 40 per cent. Can any of you men in industry or interested in industry tell me what you would have done if the price of your product had dropped 35 to 50 per cent in the last twelve months, if you had to meet union labour negotiations? What would you do? The farmer in the beef business has seen his returns drop by from 35 to 50 per cent.

You may say he does not have to meet union labour demands. No; he says to his wife: I am sorry, darling; you will just have to take the hired man's place. We will have to take Sally out of school and Johnny out of university, and we will probably have to work more hours per day. Despite these facts, you may say; what can you do about it?

Well, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the fact that we are selling no beef, we brought into this country 13,752,000 pounds in the first eight months of 1952. When we are packing bacon at the taxpayers' expense why did we bring in 7,435,000 pounds in the last eight months? When we are selling only 1,214,000 pounds of cheese, the least we have sold in almost 70 years, why did we import 9,716,000 pounds while the cheese factories from coast to coast are closed up?

So, Mr. Speaker, if I have been cruel in saying this government has done nothing to plan for the peace, I pray to God that they have done more to prepare against a war which God forbid should come. Perhaps they have been too busy. Perhaps the leader of our party was right the other day when he said you could have done this or that; perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was right when he said that if his ministers and deputy ministers had had time to look things over they might have saved some money. If the cabinet ministers and their assistants had taken the warnings seriously they might have said: Maybe we are not right all the time. Perhaps we had better look at what the opposition says. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was right when he said we were going to lose our markets overseas. They came to scorn but remain to adore—

An hon. Member: Who adores George Drew?

Mr. Rowe: I will tell you that after the next election there will be more who adore him than will adore your leader. Mr. Speaker, I do not mind telling you that you cannot carry on that personality business of who adores whom. The taxpayers of this country —the farmers, the cheese producers, the apple producers—will say: Here, independent of what these fellows say about personalities when they have nothing else to talk about, what is the policy? They will say: Who is the man who first said we should have had a British commonwealth conference? Who is the man who said that we should lower taxes?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the farmer of Canada is rapidly becoming the victim or the guinea pig of these novel socialistic experiments. It is all very well, Mr. Speaker; unless you watch the markets in advance one fails to see just how fast they are lost.

Mr. Decore: What do you want? Protection for Ontario?

Mr. Rowe: No, I want to protect you, because nobody needs protection more than you do. We have heard from both sides of this house for many years that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. Despite the uncertain future for the farmers—and there are less people engaged in agriculture now than at any time in the last quarter of a century—despite the fact that the warehouses are filled with bonus bacon, the government now fixes a price that threatens temporary bankruptcy for the whole hog industry in Canada.

The other day I asked an old farmer who is in the hog business very extensively what he was going to do. He said: "I am going to sell my brood sows and vote Conservative." I said I could not blame him, because there is no profit left. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) laughs but he was a hog producer at one time, and I must give him credit for knowing something about feeding hogs.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not selling mine.

Mr. Rowe: No, but I expect yours are sold in advance.

Mr. Gardiner: No, they are not.

Mr. Rowe: I know and he knows that the price he has fixed for hogs leaves the farmer, if he keeps books, perhaps $1.20 but—

Mr. Gardiner: We have not fixed a price for hogs. We have fixed a floor.

Mr. Rowe: Nobody has meddled more with the farmer's business since confederation than the present government.

An hon. Member: Thank God for that.

Mr. Rowe: We now have a situation that is beginning to reflect its effects all down the line. Why were 2,500 men recently let out of the farm implement industry? Why are there so many unemployed in your textile industry in Quebec and in other places, too? Mr. Speaker, it is just as sure as it has always been, that if you threaten the stability of the great agricultural industry of Canada you endanger other industries that are very important. You cannot continue to haphazardly tax people as you are doing and pay as little attention as you have to long-term marketing.

I do not believe anyone worthy of calling himself a Canadian is going to worry about the taxes he is paying to prepare for defence. God forbid that we should have a war, and I would co-operate with the government in every way I could to see that we were prepared to avoid a war. I think that is sound. I think it cuts right across race, creed and politics in this dominion. We cannot afford to go into that destructive enterprise again if it can possibly be avoided. If it can be avoided, I do not believe there is any reason why we should expect a period of depression, merely because the danger of war is over. That is no reason.

Following the last great war, Mr. Speaker, we had a similar period of good times from 1918 on. There was a slight depression in 1921 and 1922, just as there was a little bit of a fall in 1946-47, but it bounced right back. We have had a great post-war shortage of civilian goods, and then the requirements for preparation to avoid a war. This year we are spending $4,800 million. While we are doing that, we should not forget some of these fundamentals.

The leader of our party has shown you the signals on scores of occasions. He has issued the warnings as solemnly as any man could issue them to you. He has told you of the hopes and chances of converting exchange. This was laughed at by hon. members across the line. Since that time I find that at the recent conference in England the leaders of the commonwealth are saying now that convertibility of exchange is fundamental. I see now that in the United States the new president has made the statement that convertibility of exchange looks as though it is the answer. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) comes back filled with optimism, I hope he remembers that the commonwealth conference was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. I hope he remembers that convertibility of exchange was suggested here by our leader and ridiculed by those who sit opposite.

Mr. Sinclair: How?

Mr. Rowe: Because you laughed it off. The only time you will take it seriously is when we see someone else saying the same thing overseas. Nothing has been done by you to bring about convertibility of exchange or encourage a conference. All you have now is the generalities of a conference. I notice that at the conference it has been stated that we must restore confidence in the competitive system. This is most encouraging, Mr. Speaker, to see economists and politicians in the world veering again a little to the right. It is most encouraging now that these signals are on the horizon to illustrate that, after all, the people realize that we have a system that has maintained this prosperity and has seen us through two wars. Do not let us get away from the fact that even now the burden of defence preparation must be carried by the industrial and business life of this country to a great extent.

If we are going to have immigration, as we should have; if we are going to have the 75 million people that we will have if we maintain our present rate of increase for 25 years, then we must have something for them to do. You cannot find work for men to do if you cannot find money to risk in industry. There is no panacea yet. We have seen countries follow socialism and socialistic trends. We have seen them take all the tax money until there was only one cent out of the dollar left. We have seen those countries collapse. Canada now takes from corporations in taxes two dollars for every dollar that is left for the shareholders. Only eight cents is left now out of every dollar of income for new investment in Canada. We wish to have people come to Canada, and this country should have 75 million people. The late Sir John A. Macdonald, who was quoted this afternoon, and the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier—I understand from people who knew them personally—both privately believed that we would have 75 million people in Canada before 1960.

We have not done very well. The Lord has been good to us. We have been given bountiful resources. If we had not had them we could not have withstood the type of government we have had in the last 25 years. A lot more could be done, but it cannot be done unless we sit around a table in a business-like way. I am not saying, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to have a depression. I am only saying that this government has done nothing by way of economy, nothing by way of long-range policy for marketing our production; nothing by way of encouraging free enterprise in order to help stabilize a sound, normal prosperity in times of peace. The Liberals have talked about being the free enterprise party. As I said before, they have almost socialized the greatest industry in Canada, the wheat industry. They have state control of the gold industry. The government has asked the weekly wage earner to help pay the farmers for the losses they have incurred as a result of the government bacon policy which lost the British markets.

I have been in the house for some time, Mr. Speaker. It sounds to me very much like the same old story that I recall back in 1927 and 1928. You will find in Hansard for 1928 where I urged upon the government that they were losing the British market. In 1921 we were selling Britain 255 million pounds of bacon; but in 1930, when the party that sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, went out of power, we were selling Britain none.

Mr. Robertson: What did you do about that?

Mr. Rowe: We were selling many millions of dollars worth.

Mr. Robertson: Hogs were $3 a hundredweight.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend was not here in those years, and I am not sure he would have understood if he had been. We lost our British markets for cheese and bacon.

Mr. Robertson: And you lost it for wheat.

Mr. Rowe: You lost the wheat market before our party came into power. That is the oldest-fashioned political dogma that has been preached in this country for a quarter of a century. It has been worn very thin. There is no one who knows what happened who does not know that every elevator in Canada was filled to capacity with unsold wheat and our markets in Britain were lost before the Bennett government came into power. Ask the bacon producer today; ask the dairy man today if there was anything during that five-year period that did as much to bring back our markets as the imperial conference of 1932. Those conferences, Mr. Speaker, were not encouraged by Australia or New Zealand; they were encouraged by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. The opposition on the other side—

Mr. Gardiner: That is why they are not selling any apples in Britain now.

Mr. Rowe: Your predecessor, Hon. Mr. Motherwell, was the only one of your party who supported it. Mr. Speaker, he restored the markets that were lost. George Drew, if elected—as I believe he will be—will restore the markets you have lost.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: He laughs best who laughs last. I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that this country knows that for three-quarters of a century the best market for agriculture, both east and west, has been in the old land. We know that we have often been cut off from the United States market. They are great friends and great markets when the market is high. You know what happened. The Minister of Agriculture knows—if some of the younger members have forgotten or never knew—that we were cut off overnight in 1921 and 1922 by the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Nobody knows that better than the Minister of Agriculture. We were cut off overnight in 1929 by the Hawley-Smoot tariff; and you are cut off now, and you may often be cut off, from a country which produces the same type of products we produce, whenever they have a surplus on their own markets.

But we should never have lost the British market. It is all very well to say they have not money enough. We must have policies that will find ways to convert this currency. Our leader, George Drew, has been mentioning them for two or three years.

An hon. Member: What are they?

Mr. Rowe: He has told you but you would not listen.

Mr. Speaker, I believe my time is up.

Mr. Graydon: You've got them going; keep on. Even fisherman Sinclair is going.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about my time.

An hon. Member: You have plenty more.

Mr. Graydon: Tell them a few more things.

Mr. Speaker: I may inform the hon. member that I believe he has four minutes left.

Mr. Rowe: Within those four minutes, Mr. Speaker, I hope I can still amuse those who can only be amused, and can interest those who are concerned. I am convinced that these issues are important. There is no man worthy of a place in this house who cannot see the signs and signals after they have been pointed out so often. I can only say if my experience in this house or any place else is of any use, if this country is going to be sound in itself and to restore those fundamental strengths that are necessary, we first must economize and cut out this ruthless extravagance. In the second place we must reduce taxation wherever it can be reduced, if we are going to have investment capital and what is necessary to create employment in this great country.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the government must hand this country back to the people rather than try to get control of everything. May I urge upon the government that their recent steps in government control or state management in television be reconsidered. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is neither public ownership nor private ownership. It is a mongrel concoction that is not worthy of either.

Mr. Harkness: It is a mess.

Mr. Rowe: It is public ownership where you can make money and private ownership where you cannot make money. It is public ownership where the people do not need television and private ownership for the poor person on the back concessions who cannot get it. Mr. Speaker, I was never much of an apostle for public ownership, even in the party to which I belong—and they have done something in the way of public ownership in Ontario and other places—but I would be ashamed of a policy that was neither one nor the other. I would be ashamed of a policy that mocked one, imitated the other and was worse than either.

In the interests of free enterprise and in the interests of individual initiative and all that is concerned in the traditional principles of our development, I would urge the government to have another cabinet meeting. If they have not time to count the millions they have lost or spent, then I would urge them to have another cabinet meeting, revamp their television policy and make it look like Canada; make it look like the free-enterprise policy which Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier initiated and which has been scuffed around since then until it cannot be recognized even by them.

I would urge the Minister of Agriculture—and he is not all to blame; in fact I think he is about the best, if that is any compliment to him—and the balance of the members of this government to take their hands off the farmers' business. Let me urge them to take their hands off this international trading and give the country back to the people. Take your hands off private enterprise. Give the people an opportunity. If you give the people of this country opportunity, you will find that you will not need to give so much relief.

You will find that if you pursue policies which give assurance of employment, you will not have to give so much insurance against unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the hon. member that his time has now expired.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate and I would not have done so had it not been for certain incidents which happened earlier in the day and which I feel call for an immediate reply.

During the morning sitting we had tabled in the house the report of an investigation which had been carried out with regard to certain losses and thefts which occurred at Petawawa military camp. It will be recalled that earlier in the year the government had decided to appoint a commission headed by a well-known accountant from Montreal who was also thoroughly conversant with the administration and organization of the Department of National Defence because at one time, I understand, he had been a deputy minister of that department.

This report was submitted after a long and thorough investigation. It was early in the year that Mr. Currie was asked to carry out his investigation; and in his report he tabled the telegram which was sent confirming a previous telephone communication in which he was asked to investigate not only Petawawa but other military establishments where already there had been indications of loss and theft. That was many months ago, and it was only after continual insistence by the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition that this report was finally tabled.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on December 1, the leader of this party rose and asked if a report had been received or if Mr. Currie had submitted any report, and that an answer was given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I am sorry that it is impossible for the minister to be here today. He is out of the country on important government business. The minister gave an answer which is to be found at page 203 of Hansard and which is as follows:

> I have not been in touch with Mr. Currie myself for some time but I am informed by the deputy minister that he has been in touch with members of Mr. Currie's staff, and that it is expected that the report will be available within the next week or two.

Then the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said this:

> Mr. Drew: As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government has received an interim report?
> Mr. Claxton: No.

Again on December 4 the Leader of the Opposition renewed his request, asking for information as to when this report would be tabled, and he used these words, as recorded at page 321 of Hansard:

> I ask whether, since Mr. Currie's appointment was announced on April 21, 1952, he has received any positive recommendations from Mr. Currie in regard to the subject matter of his inquiry, in writing or orally, and if so is the minister prepared to convey to the house some information as to the nature of the recommendations which have been made?
> Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Currie's appointment I have seen him about this matter on one occasion only. That was when he was in national defence headquarters carrying on his inquiry. I asked him to see me and he did. I then asked him if he was getting all the information that he wanted and he said he was. I told him that if at any time he wanted further powers or more information such would be made available to him.
> I have had no other communication of whatever kind with him.

These were the words used by the Minister of National Defence. Subsequent questions were asked on December 8 of the associate minister, and later of the parliamentary assistant. You will notice that a flat denial was given by the Minister of National Defence that there had been any interim report; that he had had no further communication other than that brief conversation, which is reported, with Mr. Currie. One cannot help expressing amazement, when one reads the first page of the report which was tabled today. At the bottom of that page appears these words:

> It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigation have been already seized on, and important reforms are already being carried out.

Mr. Dickey: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: We are glad these reforms are being carried out, but how does that fit in with the statement of the minister who says that he has had no reports, who says that neither written nor orally had there been any recommendations made by Mr. Currie?

Mr. Dickey: He did not say that.

Mr. Pearkes: I have just read that. You must have been asleep. You look up the page.

Mr. Dickey: Read it again.

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. member will look up the page he will see that I quoted exactly the words which were given by the Minister of National Defence. We are getting rather tired of these noes. Earlier this session I had occasion to call attention to another question, when I raised the point regarding certain censorship which was being carried out at an airport on the west coast. I was told no, there was no censorship, nothing of the kind, nothing whatever, no form of censorship; yet the next day it appeared there was a censorship of a type. True it was not initiated from the minister's office, but one of the officers of his department did impose a censorship. It is too easy; they are too quick to say no. We are being told no all the time without any attempt to find out what is the correct information.

I said on that previous occasion that the minister obviously did not have the full information. I do not think the minister did have the full information at that time. This report is signed on the 26th day of November. The references I have mentioned start on the 1st day of December; and we are told no, there have been no recommendations. Yet in this report, which is signed on the 26th day of November, Mr. Currie calls attention to the fact that his interim suggestions have been seized upon, and that improvements have been already introduced.

All this is following just the same pattern which occurred when the Mainguy report was brought in. The Mainguy report was delayed for a long time; then the Minister of National Defence rose in his place and said he was pleased to be able to inform the house that the majority of the recommendations contained in the Mainguy report had already been implemented. I suppose somebody on the other side will rise in his place and say that the majority of the recommendations of the Currie report—and there are a great many recommendations in this volume—have already been implemented.

No doubt the lapse of time since the 26th day of November, and the lapse of time between these interim reports or the interim suggestions which obviously were submitted, and when this report was tabled gave plenty of opportunity to implement many of the recommendations which were made at that time.

The report goes on—and I am delighted as an old soldier to see that—in glowing terms to give credit to the rank and file of the army. Soldiers are not criminals. Soldiers do not thieve and pilfer naturally. Here and there there may be a case, as apparently there were a few limited cases at Petawawa. The door has been thrown wide open by this government by reducing the standard of education of the personnel who are enlisting so that it is below the standard which existed during world war II, a standard in which the educational requirements of officers are only those of junior matriculation. That is no standard to be required for an officer to hold the Queen's commission. It is a very definite lowering; and when you get that standard of education lowered, when you throw the doors wide open it is inevitable that here and there you will find somebody not worthy of wearing the Queen's uniform will be enlisted. The general run of the men in the army today are just exactly the same as they have always been, good, honest, straightforward fellows; and you will find that in this report Mr. Currie emphasizes that. While he finds it necessary to call attention to lax controls, poor discipline and dishonest persons, he goes on to say that the opportunities existed in other places than at Petawawa, but they were not taken advantage of. These are his words, and I want to repeat them. I want to place them on Hansard because I think it pays a glowing tribute to the rank and file in the army.

> It is mentioned in this context chiefly for the purpose of praising the personnel at other depots for not walking through the door which a fundamentally loose situation had opened before them.

There were the opportunities, owing to this fundamentally loose situation, owing to the lax system; owing to the faulty organization the door was wide open, but the soldiers in the majority of cases did not take advantage of that loose situation.

Then one is surprised to find that it was not at the request of the Department of National Defence that these investigations were carried out or, I should say, that these facts were first brought to the attention of the government. Although there was supposed to be an organization of supervision, of inspection and of general security in these camps, the first information, or the information which prompted action—and I correct that word because I will come to the matter in a moment—the information which prompted action was in an anonymous letter sent to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Then it is very interesting to note on the next page that, after Mr. Currie has quoted that letter, he goes on to say that internal warnings have not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. Surely the administration of the defence forces, surely the deputy minister, surely the minister himself must have seen the reports of the chief auditor, who reported that conditions were unsatisfactory.

Then he goes on to refer to appendix B, a truly frightening document which gives a list of the numerous headings, setting out points which the chief auditor of the department has had to call to the department's attention, and pointing out instances not only at Petawawa but all across the board, in all the different camps where irregularities had occurred. Then Mr. Currie goes on with these words:

> Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported, and in some cases worse. The process is then again repeated.

There has been no proper supervision—not supervision from the junior officers, because the junior officers do not see the chief auditor's report, but supervision from the government, supervision from the Department of National Defence, supervision from its headquarters right here in Ottawa.

An hon. Member: What about the general staff; what do they do?

Mr. Pearkes: I am not the least bit concerned as to what branch of headquarters is responsible for checking the chief auditor's report. I should think the heads of all branches would be very much concerned with that. And the heads of those branches would undoubtedly have reported to the deputy and to the minister.

Then it goes on to describe some of the losses and thefts which occurred. I am not going to read all these various items which were removed from Petawawa camp. It is an amazing list. One is amazed, simply amazed, that it was not possible to have checked up on the removal of some of these articles. Metal, for instance. It consists of serviceable materials such as kitchen ranges, cannon heaters, shower stalls, sinks and the like. Some of that material was recovered; most of it was recovered. Then the report gives one striking example—and one cannot help noticing this—of a large quantity of rails belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway being removed. And, Mr. Speaker, this is not rumour; this is the report of Mr. Currie. A large quantity of rails of the Canadian Pacific Railway was removed. When this loss was noted by the C.P.R., and questions raised, a spur line of the Canadian National Railways running into the ordnance depot was taken up and the rails used to replace the missing C.P.R. tracks. Well, if it was not so serious, one could not help laughing at the thought of individuals going out and stealing the rails of one company and then, because questions were asked by this private company, saying, "Oh, it is quite easy to take the Canadian National siding, and put them back"—so that, no doubt, the C.P.R. then might be satisfied.

Mr. Rowe: They thought the government would not notice it.

Mr. Pearkes: They thought the government would not notice it. Quite obviously the C.P.R. did notice it, because they started asking questions. One might assume that there was better supervision by the C.P.R. over its equipment than there was by the government railway over the equipment belonging to it.

Then we go on to the item which states that horses were hired by army personnel and placed on the payroll under the names of non-existent labourers. Well, I have heard labourers called some names, but I have never heard them called horses before.

Mr. Graydon: Did the horses file income tax returns?

Mr. Pearkes: Then it goes on to refer to various other articles which were removed, and it says that their final destination cannot now be accurately traced. It then goes on to point out other irregularities, how various equipment was made for army personnel, including boats, desks, chests of drawers, coffee tables and, in one instance, a child's rocking horse, all of which were used for private purposes.

Then it points out that expenditures were made for the damming of Tucker creek, for which no authorization was provided. Another example is given in the unabridged edition of this report, but the paragraph has been removed from the revised edition which has been issued. Private and improper sales of gravel are pointed out, and a large number of other things such as contracts for laying sewer pipe, and so on.

It sums up the losses in this way:

> These, then, represent the ascertained cases of irregularity at Petawawa. How many more there may have been will never be known. It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting records were in a chaotic condition and would be of little use in determining the nature and extent of irregularities. It is impractical, and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent on examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies.

I do not think one could possibly find a report which could be more—well, I was going to use the word "damning", but that is not parliamentary—which could be more critical of the system of accounting and supervision than this report has been.

Again, he says:

> No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared.

It does say that it is contemplated that the total was not a tremendous amount, but Mr. Currie says:

> My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty.

There again is a most critical sentence. It may be that there has been great loss through theft and pilfering, but the loss which arises through waste and inefficiency is far greater than that caused by actual dishonesty. Yet we have been told over and over again by members on the other side of the house that there is no waste, that there is no extravagance, that there is no duplication. Here we have independent criticism. Here we have a report by a man who is recognized as having the highest possible character, which points out that the loss caused through inefficiency and waste may be far greater than the actual stealing which took place.

It is not entirely the fault of the regulations. On page 12 Mr. Currie says that the system, had it been enforced, was a satisfactory and good one. But it had not been enforced. Who is responsible for seeing that the regulations which are laid down are enforced? Surely it is the personnel who are at the top, at the head of this Department of National Defence. They are responsible for seeing that the orders they issue are properly enforced.

Then we come to a list of some 33 headings under which irregularities have been noted. I shall not read this long list, but I will make the observation that in the abridged edition of this report no mention is made of overexpenditure.

Then we find that there has been a failure in security. Certainly security is the duty of the general staff. The general staff are responsible for security. The report states that in addition to the serious collapse in security there was little to prevent or to detect organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale, though apparently comparatively little of it took place. Then Mr. Currie goes on to say that he takes a serious view of this breakdown, that is the breakdown in security. Then these words are used by Mr. Currie:

> If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment.

What is the use of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on civil defence if right in our own military organization there is a breakdown of security which would permit or allow the sabotage of military equipment?

Then Mr. Currie goes on to try to explain some of the reasons which may have led to this breakdown of administration, this breakdown of accounting, this breakdown of supervision, this breakdown of security. He attributes it to the tremendous and sudden expansion of the Department of National Defence and the army works services, and its activities brought about by the Korean war and by the large-scale defence program involved in carrying out our NATO activity.

Time and time again I stood up in this house during the years from 1946 to 1949 and warned this government that they were reducing their military organization far below any standard which offered a reasonable degree of security or a reasonable degree of protection against the possibility of another war breaking out. I warned over and over again that there was a too-hasty demobilization of government stores, a too-hasty demobilization of key personnel, a too-hasty handing over to a new generation of soldiers who had had no experience in administration.

We demobilized our stores, we demobilized our key men, we got rid of our equipment so that when the threat of Korea came and it was necessary for us to expand our forces to meet our NATO obligations we had this unseemly rush, this frantic organization to find new camps, to build up equipment which had been sold for a song, to provide stockpiles of that sort of thing. What was the result? The inevitable result was the breakdown in the administration of our forces.

As one goes on through the following pages he notes that Mr. Currie refers to the sudden rearmament and the lack of an attempt to reorganize for the tremendous expansion. The need for the tremendous expansion was brought about because in those days we had so hastily got rid of our essential services, our essential personnel and our essential equipment. On page 17 of the report we find a criticism which strikes right at the root of our defence organization. These are the words that Mr. Currie used; they are not mine:

> The situation was complicated by still another factor. The Department of National Defence including the army works services was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime. Its establishment and administrative practices reflected more clearly the urgent needs and exigencies of war, when speed is everything and costs count not at all. The carry-forward of this war psychology must be coupled with inadequate training and resultant ignorance on the part of personnel of their administrative duties and responsibilities. There was, in addition, indifference and reluctance on the part of military personnel to concentrate on administration to the degree required. It was not perhaps unnatural that these latter needs were largely forgotten or deliberately overlooked as soldiers gazed forward into the unknown consequences of the Korean outbreak, and foresaw still greater wars not very far away. But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up.

I understand that the unabridged edition of the report said at the top or thereabouts, or words to that effect.

Mr. Knowles: "At or near the top".

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. The unabridged edition said "at or near the top". The top is the Minister of National Defence, and the responsibility rests with this government. It does not rest with the soldier. The slackness or inefficiency started at the top—inability of people at the top to realize their responsibilities to this nation in safeguarding and checking extravagant expenditures. They still had the war complex where money counted for nothing; where there was no need to check on expenditures.

To continue with Mr. Currie's report, he says:

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army it is more difficult to condone the same attitude at or near the top. There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not present in the degree required.

Time and time again we on this side of the house have been urging the government to check these extravagant expenditures. We have been told time and time again that there is no extravagance, that there is no waste, that there is no duplication.

I commend the reading of this report to every member of this house. I have not the time at my disposal to go through all the other paragraphs. There are many, many recommendations some of which, because of these interim reports, have no doubt already been put into effect or are being put into effect at the present time. But there are still lots and lots of recommendations in this report which should receive, and I imagine will now receive, the serious attention of the heads of the Department of National Defence.

However, I do not think that is enough. It has been clearly demonstrated in this report that the heads, the higher-ups, have not shown that essential grasp of the need for administration, the need for putting into effect a proper organization which is capable of working smoothly both in peace and in war. If there has been such laxity in administration here, then one cannot help but think that if a similar examination were made of the other branches of the army you might find that there is the same lack of proper appreciation of what is required here in peacetime for the defence of Canada at this time, for our obligations as far as NATO commitments are concerned, and for our obligations as far as our Korean activities are concerned.

If one studies military history you will find that all through the course of the history of the United Kingdom armies, the history of the United States armies, and even the history of the Canadian army, there have been crises arise which have shaken those countries to the core—and they have realized that there has been gross inefficiency in the administration of their armed services. To give an example, one recalls the terrible waste and dishonesty which existed at the time of the Crimean war, when supplies were sent out to the Crimea. The hay was rotten, the boots were all for right feet or all for left feet, and there was hopeless administrative inefficiency. The same sort of complaints were made after the South African war. It was realized shortly before the first great war that the armed forces of the United Kingdom were not ready and prepared to wage a European war. What happened then? Under those circumstances an independent commission was appointed to investigate all branches of the armed forces. As a result of those great investigations which were carried out by Lord Esher and by Lord Haldane, a complete reorganization of the armed forces took place.

A few years ago I suggested in this house that a commission somewhat similar to the Esher commission or the Haldane commission should be appointed to see whether our armed forces were organized in the right way to meet commitments which might be expected. I repeat that request now, and I say that this report underwrites everything I said at that time. This report demands, not in the words of the report but in the sense of the report, that a thorough investigation be carried out; that an independent commission be set up for a full investigation into the organization and the entire administration—both as to types of units and equipment that we have, and the whole organization and administration of our army—to see whether it is organized on lines which will enable it to defend this country and meet this country's obligations.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to associate myself with my colleagues in congratulating the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The year 1952 is coming to an end. Canadian taxpayers will have to inform Caesar of the income they have received during the past twelve months. Before proceeding with the main part of my speech, I would like to make a suggestion to the government in that connection. Although it is not a new one, it is of great interest to the electors of any constituency and to those of Canada at large, I am sure.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) might well consider, I think, granting a statutory exemption of 10 per cent in connection with charitable donations. At present, in order to benefit from the exemption granted under the act, the taxpayer must file receipts obtained from religious authorities, charitable societies or other such organizations recognized by the minister. It is quite a tedious procedure for everyone concerned. As a result, our parish priests lose precious time and are sometimes placed in an embarrassing situation which is very easy to understand. On the other hand, an individual who, having made charitable donations without asking for receipts, is forced to ask his parish priest for a receipt covering charitable donations which, having been made elsewhere, have not profited his parish church in the least; that individual is thus quite embarrassed when the time comes to present himself at the rectory.

Why should one ask religious authorities in particular to act as benevolent agents for the government? Why ask them to work without pay for the income tax collectors and impose upon them irritating and unpleasant tasks?

Things have reached the point where sworn certificates are being asked from those who submit, for income tax purposes, vouchers signed by priests. I say that it is going too far and that the zeal of certain members on the staff of the Department of National Revenue could be tempered without prejudice to anyone. It is already painful enough to pay this annual tribute to the central power, without adding the injury of having the members of the clergy share our financial troubles.

I am, moreover, of the opinion that statutory exemption should also be granted in the case of medical expenses.

The government would be wise to show more confidence in the population and spare them, as far as possible, the necessity of going through all that red tape. The unreasonable demands of a burdensome bureaucracy are not readily satisfied and I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to think it over while preparing the next budget.

I wish now to be allowed to offer a few remarks with respect to a political event which has taken place since the last session.

The federal government, acting in that spirit of centralization which moves all its present leaders, has, after a great deal of effort, managed to sign taxation agreements with all provinces save one. The policy of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and of his colleagues has finally achieved its end. The province of Quebec is now alone and French Canadians form, more than ever before, a separate section in our Canadian confederation.

The line of cleavage drawn between the two great races of this country now appears in all its depth. On the one hand we have the English-speaking provinces in coalition with the central authorities and, on the other, the old province of Lower Canada once more facing the advocates of union. But no one can blame the authorities of my home province for this unfortunate situation. The aggressor here is not Quebec, it is Ottawa. It is Ottawa which has violated the spirit of the confederative pact by resorting to overbidding and blackmail to lay its hands on those rights given the provinces by the constitution.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Can you prove that? Can you? Go ahead and prove what you are saying.

Mr. Gagnon:

Quebec's isolation is not of its own making—

—writes Mr. Charles Pelletier in L'Action Catholique.

In his last press conference, Premier Duplessis commented briefly, but categorically, on the new situation created in the field of federal-provincial relations as a result of Ontario having concluded in its turn a fiscal agreement with the Ottawa government. "We shall never sign the death warrant of the province of Quebec", he stated.

. . .This attitude is much too identical with the principles we have always defended here for us to fail to applaud it.

. . . That others may be inclined to see in the relations between the central government and the provinces a matter of dollars, solely, is more or less understandable; but the province of Quebec has the right and the duty to consider much more important factors. Freedom cannot be counted in dollars. . .

. . .Let us not say, above all, that in refusing to sign a separate agreement, Quebec is isolating itself from the rest of confederation. Such isolation is not of our making. We accept it through our abiding to the federative régime, to Canadian democracy. Quebec does not envy anybody's rights. It merely asks for the return of those sources of revenue which were granted to it by the constitution.

Of course, one should not consider Ottawa as a hostile government; but as far as fiscal matters are concerned, one must admit that the aggressor is Ottawa and not the province of Quebec.

Under the title "A Separating Policy" one can read in the Montreal Gazette of September 8 last, the following:

(Text):

Only one province now remains out of this type of negotiation. In his press conference last Friday, Premier Maurice Duplessis reaffirmed his declaration to preserve Quebec's independence, even at the cost of the money that must be declined and the hostages that he may be delivering into the hands of his political enemies. Quebec, of all provinces, can the least afford to sell or "rent" any part of its autonomy for the temptations of money. And the historic and present fact is that Quebec is just not one province in ten. It represents one of the two main races. The co-operation of these two races has been fundamental to the existence of the dominion. But that co-operation must rest, above all, upon the recognition that no part of Quebec's guarantees can be worn away with the years. It was obvious from the start that the federal method of separate negotiations with the provinces, using the pressure of temptation, must in the end leave Quebec alone. A higher statesmanship in Ottawa would have avoided any policy that was bound to have such an ending. For Quebec can never be tempted out of things it must cherish for its survival, and because it cannot be tempted, it must stand alone, until the day comes when the tax policies of Ottawa cease to be separate bargains under specially contrived pressures, and assume the status of an honourable nationality and a truly federal spirit.

(Translation):

Finally in an editorial published by the daily newspaper Le Devoir, on September 9 last, Mr. Andre Laurendeau says, among other things:

Even if we are alone, we shall not yield. Whatever else people may think of it, one can but approve the statement made by Mr. Duplessis last Friday to the press, and which appeared in next day's papers.

The prime minister did not refer to the fiscal agreements between the provinces and Ottawa. But everyone knows what he was talking about when he said: "Under the Union Nationale, the government will never sign the death warrant of the province".

. . .Ottawa has therefore succeeded in isolating Quebec. Mr. Abbott is happy about it and takes a patronizing attitude with the provincial government.

But his government has just won a dangerous victory.

For by isolating Quebec, he forces us to admit that it is the French Canadians who are alone.

A federal-provincial fight, in which Ottawa opposed an alliance between Ontario and Quebec, was primarily a political fight.

When the opposition concentrates upon Quebec, the national problem appears in all its magnitude. It may one day break out in all its violence.

Speaking of these agreements, the Montreal Gazette went on to say:

(Text):

Most of these deals have been signed by the provinces under constitutional protests. Alberta said that it was gun-at-the-head negotiation. Manitoba has said that it would be far better if only the province could have some fields it could call its own. Nova Scotia declared the deal would mean that "provincial governments would become annuitants of Ottawa and provincial public life would become debased and degraded". Even Ontario, the last province to sign such an agreement, describes it as unsatisfactory and as settling nothing.

(Translation):

On the other hand, the association of rural municipalities of New Brunswick had complained about not receiving an adequate portion of the federal subsidies collected by the provincial treasury, as compensation for the sources of revenue handed over to the dominion; at a convention held this year in Saint John, this association strongly protested against the present state of affairs.

From these contentions and these claims regarding the distribution of federal grants, one can gather what intricacies and what hagglings inevitably arise from a system where one government collects taxes, while another spends the money which has thus been raised.

This is then no longer democracy but sheer dictatorship.

For what is the true spirit of dictatorship but the strengthening of unity, a propensity towards centralization carried to totalitarianism, the ruthless quelling of all the tendencies which break loose from unification? Again, it is the progressive quashing of all diversities and all yearnings, the monopolizing of all the branches of power.

Interest, individual or party interest, is the motive that prompts our centralizers.

As far as we French Canadians are concerned, our patriotic duty is related, first and foremost, to our nationality; our country comes next.

The constitution does not assign all the powers to the federal government, but only a part of them. The other part is allotted directly to the provinces.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): A real Duplessis speech.

Mr. Gagnon: The hon. member for Gaspe does not understand anything about that. He would have to be much more intelligent and know what I am talking about.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): These are Duplessis' sallies.

Mr. Gagnon: Maybe they are sallies to you; but they are not to those French Canadians who think of the future.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): In Duplessis' own style.

Mr. Gagnon: I was saying that the constitution does not assign all the powers to the federal government but only part of them. The other part has been granted directly to the provinces. Economic unitarianism is opposed to democratic ideals. Sooner or later, both the spiritual and cultural values are influenced by the economy. The financial aid offered to the universities is proof of this. One can afford to shower gifts and presents with money which has been taken away from the provinces. An implacable solidarity unites the different levels of human activity, so that when freedom is lost at one level, be it the lowest, coercions are soon felt on the others.

It seems that the authors of the Rowell-Sirois report in which our present Prime Minister took a close interest had foreseen this possibility when, in order to avoid overlappings, duplications of work and expenses, they suggested, for instance, that the federal government and the provinces be authorized to delegate their powers to each other. But such delegation of powers would be unilateral since the powers held by the federal government with regard to international and interprovincial matters cannot be transferred to a province.

The many millions of dollars which are being held out to us by the federal government are but a piece of bluff, a booby trap. They want in fact to take over our rights and privileges; they seek to decrease our powers and our sovereignty; they wish to see us in tutelage, in poverty and in bondage.

Mr. Boisvert: Let the hon. member mention one single piece of legislation passed by this government which could deprive us of any of the rights we enjoy in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Gagnon: Again those are things unknown to my hon. friend. There are none so deaf as those who don't want to hear, like the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska.

The province of Quebec is still too young and her future too promising for her to be superannuated by the Ottawa government.

Had French Canadians refused to play their part in bringing about confederation, there would be no confederation. It is because those of my race were guaranteed by the fathers of confederation that their rights would never be violated that they did cooperate with them.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is still the case.

Mr. Gagnon: It is because they believed that the terms of the contract would be respected that our fathers signed this contract. We demand absolute respect for the 1867 agreement; nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): But that is the case.

Mr. Gagnon: That may be the case for the member for Gaspe, but not for true French Canadians.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I am not afraid to compare my patriotism to yours.

Mr. Gagnon: As long as my province is headed by men who really care for its future, for its past and future greatness, its autonomy will be defended with might and main.

Provincial autonomy, for the hon. member for Gaspe, as well as for all French Canadians, is a matter of life and death.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): But not the Union Nationale's autonomy.

Mr. Gagnon: All the prime ministers of Quebec province, save one perhaps, have understood that. Every one, Liberals, Conservatives, Unionists, has refused to alienate the unimpeachable rights which were granted to us in 1867.

We do not want to see the same dishonest manoeuvre as in 1840. We find legislative union revolting, assimilation repulsive and encircling smothers us. We are only asking to remain as we are, to retain our rights, our prerogatives and our money.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Nobody is taking them away from us.

Mr. Gagnon: I shall not repeat the arguments I stated previously in this house to defend provincial autonomy.

Let me say that the editor of La Terre de chez-nous gives me food for thought when he writes, in an article entitled: "An Invitation to Separatism", that we might consider abandoning the policy that has brought us only disappointments, afflictions, injustice and ordeals in every province of Canada.

The latest example is what is currently happening at Maillardville in British Columbia. In his editorial Mr. Maurice Berube writes as follows:

> "Ottawa's tactics, which consist in lowering the resistance of the provinces by picking at them one by one, are undoubtedly more successful than dealing with all of them at the same time on matters they must decide by common agreement. The government at Ottawa has deemed it more expedient to bargain and negotiate separately with each of them."
>
> Some might say that it is a smart policy. It seems to us that this policy is much closer to the dictatorial ways which we have fought and are still fighting than to the ways of democracy, which we claim to defend as far as the China seas. It is, in short, the already very ancient policy of "dividing to rule". It was known in the days of the Romans.
> Such procedure is highly unfair for those who refuse to be absorbed, just as it was at the time of the Romans or, not so long ago, at the time of the nazis and the soviets.

The chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec has submitted, in a remarkable brief to the provincial authorities, its views on federal-provincial relations in matters of taxation.

The chamber of commerce is not a political body. It cannot be accused of favouring one party to the detriment of another.

Representing the chambers of commerce of the various districts of the province of Quebec, its views are those of the best elements of the population, and its views are expressed in the best interests of the fatherland. Its denunciation of the centralizing procedure and the relentless efforts of the central power to take over provincial sources of revenue is a warning that must not go unheeded.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gagnon: When I am through.

Mr. Lesage: It is only because—

Mr. Gagnon: No, when I am through. When it is stated that "never in the history of confederation has provincial autonomy been so imperilled" we should really lend a careful ear to such statements.

The government that spends—

This is in the official report of the house.

—must, as much as possible, be the government that taxes. Otherwise, since it does not bear the odium of taxation in the eyes of the electorate, it may be tempted to indulge in extravagance, if not in sheer waste.

This argument, as old as confederation itself, can only gain in validity with an increase in the amount of subsidies.

The fundamental objection to the present projected agreements nevertheless resides in its underlying philosophy. By centralizing control of the great modern forms of taxation, the agreements would seriously upset the balance which must be preserved in federal-provincial relations. They give to the federal government a great advantage which will inevitably lower the prestige and actual authority of the provinces, the importance of which for the French-Canadian group is beyond question.

If confederation is to survive, the pact, the sacred pact as Cartier liked to call it, the sacred agreement signed in 1867 between the two great races of this country, will have to be respected, not only as far as the letter of the pact is concerned, but also the spirit which inspired it.

In defending their rights and their inheritance, French Canadians are working to protect the best interests of Canada at large. When the present premier of Quebec fights for provincial autonomy, he is defending his people and expressing the views of the majority of the citizens of our province. Federal authorities might do well to remember that fact once in a while.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member for Chicoutimi permit a question? May I ask him if he has ever read section 91 of the British North America Act?

Mr. Gagnon: I will say to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) that moreover I understood it very clearly.

Mr. Lesage: Just for the benefit of my hon. friend, paragraph—

Mr. Gagnon: I took lessons similar to those the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet wants to teach me when I attended primary school and I learned them all.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member did not understand this section. Otherwise, he would not have spoken as he did a moment ago. Under section 91 of the British North America Act the federal parliament is empowered to collect revenue for federal purposes through any method or system of taxation. And, Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty—

Mr. Fleming: Where is the question?

Mr. Lesage: I would like to say to the hon. member for Chicoutimi—

Mr. Fleming: Is it a question or a speech?

Mr. Lesage: Could you tell me what are the sources of revenue—

Mr. Fleming: Is it a question?

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to speak in this house. I have not yet spoken on this amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have asked repeatedly this question and I never got an answer: Which fields of taxation were ever taken away from the province of Quebec by the federal government? Nobody has ever named even one.

(Text):

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the situation that has developed from the presentation of the Currie report has naturally aroused apprehension in all circles with regard to the general matter of the administration of the Department of National Defence. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has rightly pointed out that if there has been faulty administration in one area, perhaps other matters should be investigated.

The Department of National Defence is, as we all realize, one of the most important departments of government, and has at its disposal a great deal of the money which is provided annually for general purposes. When we pay half of our collection of taxes into defence preparation, naturally we are interested in knowing whether we are getting value for our money. From time to time we have had instances where we have wondered whether we were getting full value, and this report which has come before us naturally makes one wonder whether the investigations should not be carried further.

How far does this extend? Is it restricted only to this one small works engineering department within the Department of National Defence, or are other things also worthy of investigation?

We had a suggestion made to the house some time ago that a joint committee of the two houses of parliament might very well be set up to conduct an objective and impartial investigation that would satisfy not only parliament itself but the people of Canada. We have perhaps reached the stage where that suggestion should be given very careful consideration.

I spoke in the house some time ago about matters of defence in relation to our men serving overseas; and it seems to me that the presentation of this report makes even more urgent some of the matters I dealt with on that occasion. After all, we are engaged in what we are pleased to call a cold war. We have troops across both oceans. Unfortunately, in some circles we have been calling the war in Korea a police action, and it may be that we are taking rather too complacently the world responsibilities that we have naturally assumed as a member of the United Nations.

I have been reading the accounts of the recent visit to Korea of the president-elect of the United States and the comments various military commentators have made with regard to the situation there; and I wondered whether we should not seriously be considering some of those points and investigating to see whether our efforts here in Canada are directed along the right lines with regard to that conflict in Korea. President-elect Eisenhower is quoted in the Gazette of December 15 as saying:

> Finally, we must all recognize—in all our thinking and our planning—that the Korean war is but the most dramatic and most painful phase, for us at this moment, in our world-wide struggle against communist aggression.

I was endeavouring to find out, Mr. Speaker, whether reports from Korea were accurate concerning ammunition supplies for our forces there, whether we were not overlooking the serious situation that prevailed with regard to casualties. The Minister of National Defence made a statement on December 5 in reply to some of the remarks I had made. I might point out to the house that he shifted his position with respect to the question of casualties, and has made it appear that they are not as heavy or as serious as I was endeavouring to point out.

In commenting upon Dieppe, which caught the eye of those who were reporting the proceedings of the house, I had pointed out that the force engaged at Dieppe was stripped down of all non-fighting personnel, and had engaged in that struggle only those who were equipped and trained to enter into combat with the enemy. I pointed out that if we examined our forces in Korea and determined only those who were equipped to enter into combat with the enemy, we had, as far as infantry were concerned, only about 600 men per battalion or 1,800 per brigade; and drawing the parallel with Dieppe, I showed that had there been no replacement or reinforcement for the forces in Korea the rate of casualties suffered was similar to that at Dieppe. Obviously if you at Dieppe had been able to rotate the battalions every two hours, why, in the course of the eight-hour conflict, totalling up all the numbers, the casualty rate would have been much less than it was. That was the whole purpose in that comparison, but I notice that the minister in his reply to me has suggested that the casualty rate in Korea was only 16 per cent. I quote from page 365 of Hansard, where the minister said:

> In Korea the 25th Canadian infantry brigade have been there a total of 7,900 man years. The total number of casualties suffered numbers 1,248 or 16 per cent as opposed to the 68 per cent in eight hours at Dieppe.

This is a new way to estimate casualties in action. I was careful to suggest that the only reasonable way to estimate casualties was to take the fighting strength of a brigade and see what the casualties were in relation to that fighting strength. General Eisenhower, in his book "Crusade in Europe", mentions that 80 per cent of the casualties of an army in the field are borne by 20 per cent of the men, the 20 per cent who are actually in contact with the enemy. I think a mistake has been made in Canada in overlooking the fact that the casualties occur in that small percentage of the total force.

It is no reflection upon those who served elsewhere in an army that they are not called upon to engage actively with the enemy. You must have a certain percentage of men behind the fighting fringe in order to keep the fighting fringe operative. It is quite obvious that you must have lorry drivers; you must have mechanics to keep vehicles in repair; you must have men to supply food, ammunition, petrol and things of that nature. In actual practice it takes four or five men working behind the line to keep one man actively in the line with his rifle, mortar, machine gun or whatever it may be. The men who serve in the rear areas suffer from the long hours of hardship and endurance they must go through to keep in shape the vehicles, weapons and equipment used by the men actually in the line. In my experience I have seen men, in the second world war, working from daylight until midnight, unceasingly, day after day including Sundays, throughout an entire month. Their contribution was essential and effective.

Nevertheless, they suffered no casualties. If you are going to consider casualties at all, then you must look at the portion of your troops in action, and estimate the casualties on that basis. With our brigade in Korea we maintain in the front line approximately 1,800 infantrymen. On them falls the brunt of the action. They suffer the casualties. And when we have suffered, as the figures now indicate, something like 1,250 casualties, it is clear that those casualties have fallen mostly upon the 1,800 who occupy the positions against the enemy. Of course if you rotate the battalions several times in the course of two years, and then estimate the percentage on the basis of the total number engaged, it becomes very small. It would be just as reasonable—and just as useless for the purpose, in my estimation—to take the total number of men in uniform in Korea, in Europe and in Canada and say, "Well, our casualties are 1,250, and our total number in uniform is 100,000; therefore our casualty rate is only 1·25 per cent". That does not give the true picture at all.

Consequently I think it is time we in this country learned the lesson of estimating our casualties properly, having regard to the number of men actually engaged in action. That was my reason for drawing the parallel when I spoke the other day with regard to that particular situation, and mentioned not only Dieppe but also the first world war.

The minister replied, as reported at page 365 of Hansard:

> It must be remembered and emphasized that the 25th Canadian infantry brigade is practically all in the active theatre of operations in front of brigade headquarters.

That may indicate to some people that the entire brigade is in constant danger. I think it is unwise to suggest to the relatives of people in the brigade that everybody in it is in constant danger. That is not normally the situation, and people's minds should be set at rest on that point. Not every man who serves overseas in an army is in constant danger. Often he is in no danger at all, and relatives should realize that fact. I think it is not advisable to make statements to the effect that the infantry brigade is practically all in the active theatre of operations in front of brigade headquarters. Normally, when in action, brigade headquarters is split into two parts, tactical headquarters being forward—well forward—and rear headquarters, which is well back. And it should be well back, because the people who are there are those who are concerned with the supply services of the brigade, and it is not wise to endanger their lives.

But I would say this, that the serving soldier in the line, if asked whether he would like to go back to tactical brigade headquarters, would welcome the opportunity. To him it would be about the same as returning to Canada; he would feel he was just about as safe. I have been in too many brigade headquarters not to realize that that is the situation, although they are in exposed positions.

So I do not think for one moment that the 25th brigade is all in front of brigade headquarters, unless the minister means the rear headquarters of the brigade. And of course the same is true of the smaller formations. Regimental headquarters, to a man who actually has to move right up to the enemy's lines, seems to be a relatively safe position. Those who have served overseas will realize that.

Perhaps I was more interested in the question of ammunition than in any other aspect of the situation in Korea. My question was: Is there a shortage of ammunition in Korea? Again, as reported at page 365 of Hansard, the minister gave this assurance:

> So far as ammunition is concerned, the position in Korea is precisely as I outlined it the other day. Canadian troops have never been subjected to unnecessary casualties by any shortage of ammunition, nor are they in the least likely to be exposed in such a manner. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of ammunition used in Korea far exceeds that ever used before in any campaign in the history of mankind for any force of a comparable size.

I had hoped that the minister would bring forward facts and figures as evidence upon which that statement was founded. I think the statement that more ammunition has been used in Korea than in any other campaign in the history of mankind, without any evidence as to the actual number of shells expended and small arms ammunition fired, is rather open to question. If it has been used in such great quantities there is surely no reason why we cannot be informed about it. However, my question concerned our own 25th Canadian infantry brigade, and not the total amount of ammunition expended by the United Nations forces in Korea, which perhaps would include the number of bombs dropped and rockets fired by our aircraft.

The situation as I see it is simply this, that we are suffering heavy casualties in Korea. We have had disturbing reports from other sections of the Korean front with regard to restrictions on the use of ammunition; and our own Canadian forces, through the press, have reported to us that there is a restriction on their use of ammunition. I wonder why there should be a restriction. One of my reasons for wondering is found in the report in the Gazette of December 15, which makes reference to General Eisenhower's visit to Korea. Quoting from that paper I find he said that he had three definite observations to make concerning his trip, the second of which is as follows:

Second—In the strictly military sphere, certain problems of supply have reached serious proportions and require early correction.

To those who are familiar with military matters in the field, that is a very serious statement. It will be noted that he says certain problems of supply have reached serious proportions, and that they require early correction. He restricts it to the strictly military sphere. Does that mean that we are short of clothing for the troops, or food or gasoline? Are we short of lorries? Are we short of ammunition? When it comes down to the point of saying that it has reached serious proportions which require early correction, and you tie that in with these other reports about the restrictions on the use of ammunition, I cannot help but wonder whether it is not ammunition that is included in that particular statement.

Then a question that arises in my mind is this. Is the government of Canada as fully informed with regard to these matters as the president-elect of the United States? Is the government aware that the problem of supply in Korea has reached serious proportions and requires early correction? If the government is aware of that, what is being done about it? Are the lives of our troops in danger?

That is the type of information I think we should have in view of the situation there. That is the type of information I had hoped would be provided by the minister in his reply the other day. But that is not the type of information we received. We received some general statements reassuring us. But we want more than reassurance by way of general statements. We want reassurance with regard to our troops. We want reassurance with regard to the conduct of the entire war in Korea.

As I said earlier, all this seems to tie in with the reports that we are now receiving with regard to the situation in the Department of National Defence. Has an attempt been made to look into all these matters? Have the minister and his officials had the opportunity to keep in close touch with the situation in Korea?

Similarly one would like to ask questions about the 27th brigade over in Europe. What is the state of its supplies with regard to arms and ammunition? Are there ammunition dumps available? In case of sudden attack or the need of using that brigade in Europe have they the necessary means to carry on? Has there been anything lacking in the supply line or in the manufacture of munitions of war?

[Mr. Churchill.]

These are all most serious problems, and they become more serious when you consider the mounting toll of casualties in Korea. A report in the papers today coming from United Nations sources indicates that in the last three months, that is September, October and November, Canadian casualties were 300, or at the rate of 100 per month. That is much higher than they were in the earlier part of this year and in 1951.

I have been looking into all the reports I could find in magazines and newspapers with regard to Korea, and I have become very much disturbed. We are assured that this is static warfare as in the first world war. For some reason it seems advisable to the higher command to send out active patrols all the time to patrol the enemy's lines. Casualties are suffered in these active patrols. I wonder about the usefulness of this patrolling action on the Korean front.

This was tried out in the first world war. It is supposed to maintain the morale of the troops, to make them fighting fit and to keep them alert and active. As some of these reports from Korea say, it is supposed also to keep the enemy constantly alarmed and disturbed and shifting from one position to another. I wonder whether it is worth while conducting that type of patrol action at the cost of precious lives.

What is accomplished? Is our intelligence service such that we have to obtain prisoners in order to find out what forces are fighting against us. I notice that the intelligence arrangements of the enemy were so good that when the first battalion of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry arrived at the front they were greeted by a placard exhibited by the Chinese extending a welcome to them. They had that information without sending patrols into our lines to seize prisoners.

I believe that the proper procedure to adopt in Korea at this stage would be to remain on the defensive, which is the recommendation of General Van Fleet himself. When you are on the defensive surely you do not have to be sacrificing lives every day with these patrol actions. If you are going to launch an offensive these patrol actions might be necessary, but I do not think they are when you are on the defensive. Many men who served in both world wars were never in a patrol action. Many of them were most effective in destroying the enemy without leaving their positions. A comrade of mine in the first great war virtually annihilated a German battalion with one machine gun, and he was never on a patrol action in his life. The German defenders of Dieppe had no necessity to go on patrol action in order to fire effectively from their strongholds against our forces on the beachhead. I question very much that method of conducting war in Korea.

I was saying that I have been reading all the reports I could find in magazines and newspapers concerning this war. I wonder, as I wondered the other day, to what extent Canadian military experience is playing a part at the higher levels. What are we going to do? The suggestion is made that the war cannot be ended except by attempting to destroy the Chinese army and the North Koreans. That would cost the lives of a great many of our soldiers and of the United Nations forces. It would require reinforcements, because the Chinese army is much larger than the United Nations forces. If it were driven back or partially destroyed there are reinforcements across the Yalu river who could come forward.

Another suggestion is that there should be a withdrawal in Korea. That suggestion is rejected because the conflict is one of principle, trying to stem the attack of an aggressor against a peaceful and virtually, in 1950, defenceless country.

The suggestion is made by some commentators that the United Nations forces should be withdrawn gradually and replaced by South Koreans. That seems to make a great deal of sense. There are now five South Korean divisions actively engaged against the army, with five divisions in reserve. They are holding approximately 60 per cent of the front and in the course of time could take over a larger proportion. But to train and equip more South Koreans would take time. It would mean the provision of ammunition and arms from the North American continent. Are we prepared in this country to assist in that way? Are we producing munitions of war in sufficient quantities to assist in building up the South Korean army, thereby releasing Canadian forces?

Another proposal is that we simply go on the defensive—this is the one that makes the greatest appeal to me—and become strongly entrenched, holding the line for years if necessary. What difference does it make? We are engaged in a world-wide struggle against the imperialistic ambitions of Russia. It happens, as General Eisenhower pointed out, that the most dramatic phase is Korea, but the same type of thing is going on in Indo-China and Malaya; and we have had to build up defensive forces in Europe against any surprise attack. There is no immediate hope of release from that obligation.

I suggest that we must take the long-distance view and be prepared to remain on the defensive in Korea for a number of years if necessary. To end the war quickly and withdraw from Korea can only be done at a very great cost of life, and even if we did end the war there and withdrew from Korea we would not be at all sure that the same method might not be followed a year or two later and we would again find ourselves engaged in that country. In any case, if we do end the war in Korea, what about the situation in Indo-China and in Malaya, and in other parts where the communist powers might strike? The realistic approach seems to be to take the long-distance view; to decide that we are engaged in a cold war that is going to last for years; to make adequate preparation to meet any surprise attack, doing that by effectively providing the arms and munitions. That would be precisely the investigation that I for one would like to have conducted here in Canada, to see that we are providing arms and munitions against these possibilities. If we are not doing so, then surely we are failing to maintain our strength as a country. Are we right in simply laying the foundation for a general mobilization? Maybe that is not what is required. Perhaps a general war is not in the immediate future, and let us hope it is not.

If it is not necessary to provide for general mobilization in the course of a few weeks or months, is it not better then to take the long-term view of providing effective fighting forces and of providing munitions for our allies so that throughout the world we can make an effective stand against the communist aggressors? I think that could be done, and lives could be saved by providing the munitions of war and not sacrificing infantry forces as it seems to me we are sacrificing them unnecessarily in Korea now. I believe that expenditure of ammunition in unlimited quantities, rather than these probing attacks by infantry forces, is the answer to that situation. Therefore I hope we may be able to discover that in this country we are well prepared to provide the required munitions in unlimited quantities.

I mentioned General Eisenhower's report a little while ago and his statement that certain problems of supply have reached serious proportions and require correction. I hope that does not apply to munitions; and if it does apply to munitions, something should be done about them at least.

All this ties in with the world picture as we see it; a world struggle against Russian imperialism, or communism if you like to use the term. We have to resign ourselves to a rather long struggle, but it is better to spend money and effort on arms, armour and ammunition than to simply raise infantry forces and pit them against shells, mortar and machine gun bullets fired by the Chinese.

That is the situation as I see it, and I hope the investigation of our defence requirements in this country, and the general interest of parliament and the people in our defence matters, will bring to us before very long all the information we need with regard to the defence situation in our country and the contributions we are making with our allies elsewhere in the world to build up this bulwark against communism. Only by facing these facts and not glossing over them can we expect to get an effective contribution from our Canadian people. That is why I object to calling a war, which is resulting in heavy casualties to our troops in Korea, a police action. That is why I object to our failure to recognize the problem as it exists in Europe. Our failure there, as I have pointed out in this house on other occasions, is to provide armoured forces so that our men will be protected. It has been proven in both wars that armour, the use of tanks and armoured vehicles, saves lives. If we place emphasis on these matters then perhaps we will not only be doing our duty to our own country and performing our part in the affairs of the United Nations, but we will also be protecting the lives of those men who so willingly volunteered for service overseas.

(Translation):

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I extend my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Every speaker who has preceded me has had nothing but praise for them and I wish to add my congratulations to theirs.

I do not wish to delay the house unduly by making a long speech, but I really think I should take a few minutes to deal with some matters of interest, not only to my constituents but indeed to the citizens of this country as a whole.

First comes to mind the matter of income tax. Would it not be possible for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), while preparing the budget for the fiscal year 1953-1954, to take into account economic expansion and the considerable increase in revenue which it would be possible to obtain through such a policy, while putting off heavy expenditures until such time as economic conditions in this country would become more strained than at present?

Indeed there may well be more difficulties in the way of our foreign trade, sooner or later, as can be seen at this time, by reason of the lack of purchasing power of certain other countries compelled to make their payments in dollars. These capital expenditures could then be directed in such a way as to prevent a relaxation in the business of the country. It seems to me to be the government's policy.

In this connection, I am inclined to believe that a cut in the income tax would be in order and welcomed by the taxpayer. It is true that national defence expenditures are considerable, but they may be measured, I think, with the economy of the country, since the intensive production which takes place will bring about in the course of this year, or of the next, a surplus of goods which we shall have to store away.

That is the reason which brings us to consider, together with this reduction in expenditures, a fairly noticeable reduction in the income tax.

In acting thus, the government will satisfy the taxpayer and will be thus encouraged to pursue its defence preparations and fulfil the nation's commitments as party to the North Atlantic treaty which will inevitably assure us peace remote though it may be.

Another question of interest which has given rise to a few speeches in this house last year is that of immigration.

Far be it from me to oppose the coming of immigrants to Canada for immigration lessens the burden of less fortunate countries while Canada profits by it in that she gets people qualified in various fields of activity who contribute to increase her revenues.

The government endeavours to accept only the immigrants that can increase the skilled labour force so necessary to our economy.

I congratulate the government for keeping to that policy which will gain us appreciable advantages. I feel however that the immigration department should keep on working closely with the Department of Labour in order to protect the interests of our working class so as not to deprive our own people of their daily livelihood.

I wanted to bring to the attention of this house these two questions about which the taxpayers are worried. If a little relief can be given as far as taxes are concerned—I agree that those taxes are necessary on account of our defence preparations and the assistance we have to provide to the weak —it will be a wise administrative move which will be generally appreciated.

Tax reductions would not only give confidence to the public and free it from that terrible feeling of discouragement but would create, in the taxpayer, the will to pursue his effort to the utmost.

During the last war, the taxpayer realized that he had to do his utmost; that is why he was willing to make sacrifices. Today, however, while understanding what is expected of him, the taxpayer cannot submit as freely to the sacrifices he made during the war period of 1939 to 1944.

As far as health insurance is concerned, a matter which is very much discussed and highly controversial when it comes to the ways and means of applying it, there is no doubt that one group of society, the white-collar workers and small owners, find themselves in an unfortunate situation when visited by sickness; they have to do without required care or to run into debt to such an extent as to pledge their salary for a long period. In the near future, some means of assistance should be found to provide all the necessary and urgent care to that group.

The infirm, who are quite a burden for some families, also present quite a problem.

We will have to help them soon, but the time to do so will be when the taxpayer has been reasonably freed from the fiscal burden which has been thrust upon his shoulders in these confused and difficult days.

The last time I spoke in this house, in 1951, I dealt with the problem of inflation and controls. I gave my opinion on both subjects. I am now pleased to observe that the measures advocated, which were adopted by the government in order to curb inflation, have had the expected results and that we are recovering in an appreciable manner.

Now about controls. Many learned economists have recognized the fact that the government has been well advised not to resort to them and to rely instead on the law of supply and demand.

During the past few years, Canadian trade and the gigantic development which we have witnessed have made our economy the most solid in the world and brought about a commercial expansion previously unheard of in our country.

One has but to read an article published in the November 5 issue of the New York Times to realize this. Several American magazines have only praise for the wise and enlightened administration of the government of this country. Our hon. friends opposite would do likewise if they would only say the truth and forget their thirst for power. That would be asking too much of them. But the people, who are the judge, will soon make their decision and grant the government of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent a well-deserved renewal of its mandate.

For some time much has been said about taxation powers to give the impression that the government at Ottawa is taking over all taxation fields, to the detriment of the provinces and municipalities.

Let us examine together the situation of the provinces as well as of the municipalities. In a speech he made in the house last week, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) dealt with this matter in a masterly way. He stated that the government at Ottawa was not taking anything away from the provinces. Now, the province of Quebec, which ten years ago had a revenue of approximately $58 million, and, seven years ago, of $96 million, had last year a revenue of $275 million. Can we say that her taxing power has been curtailed? Is it not true that the province of Quebec has authorized certain municipalities, and even certain school boards, to levy sales taxes? Is it not true that the province of Quebec has, in certain cases, levied a sales tax of 5 per cent? Is it not true that the province of Quebec taxes fuel oil and coal used for heating houses? Is it not true that the province of Quebec levies a tax on the electricity used for lighting purposes? Is it not true that a meal tax is in force in the province of Quebec, a tax which does not exist in Ontario or elsewhere? Is it not true that there is a tax on cigarettes? Is not the cost of driving licences higher in Quebec than in Ontario? Is not gasoline taxed also?

Now, the revenue of the province of Quebec is five times what it was ten years ago and three times what it was seven years ago. Is the province of Quebec feeling guilty for these higher taxes? Contracts are awarded without tenders. Does that not indicate that there is money aplenty in the province of Quebec?

Now, as far as the federal government is concerned, it is one of the few governments who, in the past few years, have actually reduced taxes.

In 1945 the Canadian government collected, in revenue, $2,687 million; in 1946, $3,013 million; in 1947, $3,007 million; in 1948, $2,871 million; in 1949, $2,771 million and, in 1950, $2,580 million.

If the government was forced to increase taxes, it is because of the defence effort we have had to accept for the security of our country and for the repression of aggression. The government is always willing to decrease taxes when there is no necessity for the country to have as much money as is now the case.

Where do these amounts which we are now spending go to?—that is these $4 billion and more. For each dollar the breakdown is as follows: 3 cents to the provinces, 14·5 cents for social security, 5·5 cents for the various veterans allowances, 13·5 cents for interest charges and 6 cents for debt reduction, that is the surplus that can be applied to tax reduction.

Have the municipalities lost their means of taxation? In my own community in 1944, revenues were $800,000 and we were enabled to reduce taxes. In 1952 this figure had gone up to $1,800,000, that is $1 million more in a period of some six years. Can it be inferred from that that the taxation powers of the municipalities have diminished? I could point out the case of several other municipalities of the province of Quebec which are in the same position.

When a municipality imposes a tax in order to meet the cost of certain municipal services, does it eliminate such tax, once the debt has been paid off? Quite the contrary; it keeps on using this means of taxation and even tries to find others in order to raise taxes even more. It is the sense of thrift that has vanished; our provincial and municipal leaders everywhere have lost all sense of thrift.

Is it possible that the increase in salaries and cost of materials might absorb these increases of revenue?

Mr. Speaker, I gave you a moment ago an idea of certain newspaper articles which lauded the administration of the Ottawa government. In this regard, may I quote an article by Robertson & Morgan, Montreal brokers, which reads as follows:

(Text):

Why Canada Freed Its Dollar.

The reason why all dollar-barriers have been swept away and the movement of Canada's trade set completely free for the first time since the country went to war in 1939, is the Canadian government's realization that the nation's economy has attained a strength and stability which make it unassailable. There is, in fact, no stronger economy in the world . . .

Canada is the only major nation of the western world which writes its budgets in black ink (It could, for example, pay for completion of the St. Lawrence seaway's navigation facilities out of the current fiscal year's surplus). Canada was the only member of the Grand Alliance of world war II which refused to accept lend-lease. In addition to paying all its own bills, it actually gave away more ordnance and food, in dollar terms per capita, than the United States did. It is now the only member of NATO which is paying cash on the barrelhead for its military purchases in the United States, and in addition. is sending equipment overseas to its allies as gifts . . .

Because of its abundance of natural resources in timber, minerals, fish, farm products and cheap hydro-electric power to drive its greatly expanding industry, the Canadian economy in 1952 is the healthiest in the world. That its industrial life proceeds in a climate of stable labour-management relations is not without important bearing on the state of the national health.

The jettisoning of its exchange restrictions has been made possible by the strength of the Canadian dollar, which in turn reflects the health of the national economy. . .

Mr. Speaker, I have other things to say. Therefore, if you do not mind, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Leduc the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REPORT BY MR. G. S. CURRIE.

REPORT ON THE CANADIAN ARMY WORKS SERVICES WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE IRREGULARITIES UNCOVERED AT CAMP PETAWAWA

November 26, 1952

The Honourable Brooke Claxton, D.C.M., Q.C., M.P.,

Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Sir,

In accordance with your request of April 21, 1952, I have conducted an investigation into the deficiencies and other irregularities of the engineering detachment of the army works services at Petawawa and elsewhere. My terms of reference were contained in your telegram of that date as follows:

> Confirming telephone please undertake immediate investigation and report earliest possible date into deficiencies and other irregularities engineering detachment at Petawawa and related matters there, or elsewhere both to determine cause and make recommendations regarding security and accounting for stores equipment and services so as to prevent recurrence with any additional powers or terms of reference which are necessary to make complete and thorough investigation and report.

I accepted this task. May I express my thanks to you and to all departments of government, including of course the Department of National Defence, for the ready and full co-operation afforded me. I found the terms of reference suggested by you ample and complete for the purposes of the inquiry. It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigations have been already seized on, and important reforms are already being carried out.

My investigations have taken me not only to Petawawa, but also to Toronto, London, Borden, Barriefield, Vancouver, Regina, Quebec and Halifax. At all these points comprehensive general examinations were made of works companies and detachments.

PART I—THE IRREGULARITIES AT PETAWAWA AND THEIR CAUSES

The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place. The contents of this chapter are chiefly based upon my studies there, because of the existence there of a combination of factors: lax control, poor discipline and the presence of dishonest personnel. The combination proved disastrous.

It is mentioned in this context chiefly for the purpose of praising the personnel at other depots for not walking through the door which a fundamentally loose situation had opened before them. It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks.

The Discovery of the Irregularities and their Nature

At Petawawa, however, the crooks were present and took advantage of the situation, and it is an unhappy circumstance that the beginning of this investigation lies not inside the Department of National Defence and its full complement of regulations and supervising personnel, but with the receipt of an anonymous letter couched in the following terms:

> The Commissioner,
> Royal Canadian Mounted Police,
> Ottawa, Ont.
>
> Dear Sir,
>
> There is reason to believe that an illegal transaction of army goods has taken place between army personnel of No. 3 works coy., R.C.E., and .....company within the past few days.
>
> This transaction involves the selling of several railway car loads of cook stoves and heaters without proper army authority. The C.P.R. station agent at Petawawa village could give you the destination of these cars.
> No signature can be attached to this letter, but a good number of taxpayers have seen this deal and think that something should be done about it. If it is not an illegal deal, no harm will be done if enquiries are made, but yet if it is an illegal deal a number of other such transactions might be revealed.

Before reciting the irregularities and their circumstances uncovered by the R.C.M.P.—with the assistance later of the provincial police and the army provost corps—it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from Appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

The actual irregularities uncovered at Petawawa are difficult to deal with in this report. The reasons for this, and for my dependence in large measure on police reports, are set forth later. The difficulties are enhanced by the fact that in various instances court proceedings have been instituted or are under contemplation. It is important, at this time, not to jeopardize these proceedings either from the point of view of the crown or of the accused. At the same time, it seems to me the public interest demands that this report should include a more or less detailed description of the nature of the irregularities which took place. I have therefore attempted to summarize them.

You will remember that, in each case, army personnel were involved; and that, in most cases, whether proceedings are taken or not, or whether these issue successfully for the crown, army goods have been recovered by the police which is fairly successful proof that army goods were widely spread in places where, under the regulations, they had no business to be. In a substantial number of cases, army personnel have signed statements admitting the correctness of the facts stated.

A series of transactions concerned the disposal of scrap metal. In one case, a proper contract was let for the disposal of 30 tons, in another, of 15 tons. It seems that some 550 tons were shipped out of the camp area, and that the proceeds from the bulk of the sale were pocketed by army personnel. Some of the metal thus shipped was not scrap at all. It consisted of serviceable material such as kitchen ranges, cannon heaters, shower-stalls, sinks and the like. Most of this material was recovered. In one striking instance, a large quantity of rails belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway was removed. When this loss was noted by the C.P.R. and questions raised, a spur line of the Canadian National running into the ordnance depot was taken up and the rails used to replace the missing C.P.R. track. Another case involved the collection of lead from rifle butts and its private sale.

A contract was awarded for the clearing of the camp "X" area. It covered the clearing of 206 acres, though only 166 acres were cleared and that not satisfactorily. In this, as in the scrap metal cases cited and, indeed, in others, army equipment was used although the contract called for the company to use its own equipment. During the clearing of this area horses were hired by army personnel and placed on the payroll under the names of non-existent labourers. In another instance, a civilian employee of the detachment got a contract for cutting and hauling cedar poles. Permission was given to use an army bulldozer and other equipment on the job. Lumber was apparently cut from the area to be trucked to Camp Petawawa. Its final destination cannot now be accurately traced.

An electric refrigerator was obtained from a local hardware store, and billed to the works department as other material. When electric refrigerators became available, the steel ice-boxes previously used were not returned to stores but turned into a hardware store and traded for other merchandise chosen by army personnel. A boat and several washing machines were obtained by putting through a false order for 1,000 bags of cement. The boat has been traced at Petawawa and one of the washing machines was located in the men's quarters. Rolls of linoleum were stolen, some of which was recovered later. Two freight carloads of pulpwood appear to have been stolen during the cutting of a power line.

In various instances it has been ascertained that army personnel were employed to construct such articles as boats, desks, beds, chests of drawers, coffee tables, chairs and, in one instance, a child's rocking horse, all for private use and not for government service. The material used was army material, and though some of it, the latter at least, was subsequently paid for by the personnel concerned, the wages of the workmen employed were not.

A dam was built on Tucker creek at a cost estimated at some $3,000 or $4,000. Its utility is not clear to me, and it was, in any event, not authorized by army headquarters.

In certain cases, persons buying army material were asked not to make cheques in payment (in whole or in part) to the receiver general but to individual army personnel. The amounts thus paid did not reach the public treasury.

In another case, a member of the detachment was hired by a private company and paid for 13 weeks at the rate of $100 a week. The company claimed its temporary employee told it that accumulated leave would permit him to fulfil his obligations which involved the setting out and detailing of houses in the camp townsite. The man in question denies this, stating he performed these private duties in his spare time. He also denies that there was any secret and improper element in the transaction which was, nevertheless, clearly improper under the regulations.

Private and improper sales of gravel were made by responsible personnel in charge of a gravel pit leased under strict terms by the Department of National Defence.

It was the practice at Petawawa to lend cement and other materials from army stores to private contractors in the district. No record was kept of these loans, and the materials were usually not returned until the army asked for them. The explanation given was that the private work being done was of an urgent nature, that materials were scarce, and that only the government had the priorities with which to obtain them. It was also stated that personnel were not available to keep the proper records.

A contractor received payment in full on a $32,000 contract for laying sewer pipe and manholes, although some $4,000 of the work had been completed by the army before the private contractor began work. The explanation in this case was that a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation inspector erroneously accepted verbal progress reports from an assistant. The company also claims that the payment asked for was the result of an office employee being unfamiliar with procedures in such cases.

The Attempts to Estimate Losses

These, then, represent the ascertained cases of irregularity at Petawawa. How many more there may have been will never be known. It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting records were in a chaotic condition and would be of little use in determining the nature and extent of irregularities. It is impractical, and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent on examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies.

This conclusion is based upon the results of a single, determined effort to ascertain by accounting methods the extent of the shortage existing in the case of a single item of stores. Cement was chosen as a test case, largely because the number of suppliers of that commodity were few in number and easy to find. Six weeks were spent in the effort. The suppliers produced their record of cement supplied to Petawawa. All army records were examined and audited. The contractors in the area to whom supplies of cement might have been given, sold or loaned, readily opened their books. As a result of the inquiry, it appeared that one loan of 3,400 bags of cement had not been returned. The over-all shortage appeared to be some 18,000 bags, much of which may have gone into unauthorized projects of one kind or another, or wasted or pilfered in small quantities. It was impossible to ascertain exactly what had happened. But my test cement investigation convinced me that to attempt a similar study of all the 5,000 items of stores held would be endless and probably fruitless.

In such circumstances, when rigid accounting methods fail, police examination is the only available recourse left. This has been carried out with painstaking thoroughness, and leads me to the belief that most, if not all, the important irregularities have been uncovered. The police too, have been able to recover by far the greater quantity of the missing goods, and these have been returned to stores.

No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared. It does, however, appear probable that the total loss resulting from misappropriations and irregularities by military personnel at Petawawa was not large. The advantages gained by civilians dealing with corrupt military personnel are not clearly ascertainable. My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty. The evidence examined does not disclose irregularities involving relatively large sums of money, but, rather, an impressive array of petty irregularities on an extensive scale.

Breakdown of the Accounting System

The fault did not lie in the accounting system, which was a good one had it been operated properly. It was a new system, based on American and British as well as Canadian experience, and embodied features which, theoretically, would have quickly checked irregularities as they appeared. Under the regulations, had they been enforced, it would have been possible to determine from the perpetual inventory records the quantities and values of engineers' stores which should have been on hand at any given time. Then, by means of a comparison with a physical count of stores, the shortages could have been ascertained. The regulations of the army works services require that a 10% inventory of stores be made every month. The accounting system, however, was not properly operated, nor were the regulation inventories methodically carried out.

My investigations show that at least 33 regulations have been in the past honoured more in the breach than in the observance with the result that many of the control features of the accounting system were rendered ineffective. They had to do with:

(1) Authorization of projects.
(2) Approval of works orders.
(3) Presentation of work orders as the only basis for issuance of stores.
(4) Preparation of accounting cost estimates.
(5) Follow-up by works company officers on efficient use of labour and material.
(6) Return of excess materials issued to jobs.
(7) Excess materials from one job being used on another.
(8) Unauthorized projects and services.
(9) Wasteful expenditures.
(10) Segregation of stores and warehousing generally.
(11) Physical inventory counts.
(12) Disposal of stores.
(13) Loans to individuals.
(14) Splitting of projects to come within local authority.
(15) Accounting for forms CAB's 83 and 83A by serial numbers.
(16) Unauthorized forms.
(17) Distribution of work orders.
(18) Cross-charging practices.
(19) Payments to military personnel rather than to the receiver general.
(20) Padding payrolls.
(21) Obtaining materials and commencing work prior to authorization of projects.
(22) Unauthorized accumulation of materials from completed works and a failure to take on charge surplus materials.
(23) Failure to record non-expendable stores issued to buildings.
(24) Failure to record the change in location of installed equipment.
(25) Errors in recording values on stock record cards.
(26) Adjustment of discrepancies revealed at stock taking without reference to higher authority.
(27) Irregular delegation of authority to sign work orders.
(28) Estimated costs being exceeded by substantial amounts without reference to higher authority.
(29) Labour and materials charged to approved works but delivered to other jobs.
(30) Condition of real property records.
(31) Inaccurate distribution in cost records.
(32) Certain removable equipment was not listed accurately in property records and stores.
(33) Improper loans of materials and rental of equipment to civilian contractors.

Failure in Security

There was in addition a serious collapse in security. There was little to prevent or to detect the organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale, though apparently comparatively little of it took place. If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this breakdown. If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment. My recommendations in this respect are fully outlined later.

Strains of the Korean War

My investigations of the problems, difficulties and shortcomings of the army works services outlined above suggest that they have been caused for the most part—but by no means altogether—by the tremendous and sudden expansion of its activities brought about by the Korean war and by the large-scale defence program involved in carrying out our NATO activities.

The establishment approved for the army works services after the second world war did not envisage the sudden expansion which was to take place in 1950. It was designed to carry out a purely peacetime role of planning, development and construction on an annual expenditure of approximately $20,000,000. This establishment became quickly burdened under the impact of the big-scale rearmament. In September, 1950, the program was increased to about $80,000,000. In the following April, it was increased to about $200,000,000. The program envisaged in the 1952-53 fiscal year aggregates about $250,000,000. The magnitude of this responsibility is reflected in an investment in plant and buildings which now amounts to $750,000,000 and is still rising.

During the 1952-53 period, the Petawawa detachment will expend something in excess of $1,000,000 on its own account, as well as having administrative responsibility for supervising some $20,000,000 of new construction performed by outside parties. It will readily be seen that the detachment's job is by no means a small one, but comparable perhaps to a medium-sized commercial construction company.

In the circumstances of sudden re-armament, the army works services of necessity was not permitted time to re-organize itself for this tremendous expansion, particularly since, it will be recalled, no one knew then whether the communist aggression in Korea was not the beginning of concerted Sino-Russian attacks in all available theatres of war. Many sections of the services became completely overwhelmed with work.

The situation was complicated by still another factor. The Department of National Defence (including the army works services) was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime. Its establishment and administrative practices reflected more clearly the urgent needs and exigencies of war, when speed is everything and costs count not at all. The carry-forward of this war psychology must be coupled with inadequate training and resultant ignorance on the part of personnel of their administrative duties and responsibilities. There was, in addition, indifference and reluctance on the part of military personnel to concentrate on administration to the degree required. It was not perhaps unnatural that these latter needs were largely forgotten or deliberately overlooked as soldiers gazed forward into the unknown consequences of the Korean outbreak, and foresaw still greater wars not very far away. But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up. There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not always present in the degree required.

PART II—PROPOSED REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY WORKS SERVICES

Role of the Army Works Services

The army works services is not necessarily a distinct and separate unit within an army. It is, in Canada, an ad hoc organization, drawn from various units and groupings, chiefly the Royal Canadian Engineers, and including a number of civilians. Its function is to provide and care for accommodation of all kinds for the maintenance of the active and reserve forces of the Canadian army in Canada, and to provide land and structures, and care for them, in order to permit these forces to carry out their tasks. Thus it provides for defence and special works, provides and distributes engineer stores, creates fire fighting services and plans accommodation and other works requirements for mobilization and war.

It is included in the composition of the army for the sole purpose of providing necessary facilities for the rest of the army. It maintains the most direct contact with the civil engineering profession in Canada and its military components are thus kept abreast of current engineering practice in all phases of civil and related engineering.

Handling of Expenditures

Expenditures of the army works services are estimated each year in advance, screened carefully at all levels by the service, the staff and finally by the general officers commanding and the chief of the general staff. These are presented to the minister. The usual annual program of the army works services comprises the following main tasks:

(1) The requisite maintenance program—a fixed commitment.

(2) That proportion of the planned new construction program approved by the government for the year.

(3) The planning of further new construction and maintenance requirements.

The voting of funds in bulk allotments by parliament represents the direct control exercised by the people of Canada on the country's military activity. Funds so voted are controlled to varying degrees depending on the amount and nature of the expenditure. In all cases, the treasury officer, who is appointed by the Department of Finance to work within the Department of National Defence, must certify that the necessary money is available and that the expenditure is in fact in accordance with the purpose for which the funds were voted.

In addition, an "administrative" approval of the expenditure is necessary to ensure that the expenditure is in accordance with current government and National Defence policies, is economical, and is made in accordance with sound and fair business practices. With the department, such approvals can only be given by the minister and by the deputy and his staff, together with senior army officers who have been specifically delegated by the minister. The expenditure of public funds for construction purposes is further controlled by regulations requiring that large projects be screened by the Department of Defence Production and the treasury board to ascertain their effect on the current labour and material situation in the locality in Canada in which they are required. This special review is intended to prevent avoidable interference with the general economy of the country.

It is the policy at all levels to avoid using "direct to trade" purchasing powers, except where essential, to maintain the excellent relations which have been established with the Department of Defence Production and to use that agency as the normal purchasing channel. It is a further policy to use the contract method for construction and maintenance wherever possible and consistent with true economy and efficiency. In the normal course of events, all major new construction projects are let by contract. Exceptions are made to the policy only in particular circumstances such as exist in northern Canada where it is desired to make use of the training value of large day-labour projects.

Limiting Factors

The capacity of the army works services to perform its tasks is hampered by—

(1) Inability to obtain staff (civilian as well as military).

(2) Delays in obtaining approval and in the release of funds.

(3) Effect of government restriction in the use of day-labour and other restrictions in the method of purchasing and letting of contracts.

The administrative procedures involved in the above, to a varying degree, of necessity effect a reduction in the efficiency and the capacity of the army works services.

Objective

What is needed now is the creation of a system designed to fit the economic and efficient administration of a large and long-sustained preparedness program inside a national economy operating at full blast. This involves the abandonment, by all administrators of the program, of the war psychology with its emphasis on speed with resultant wastefulness and extravagance, and the substitution of an alert, economic and efficient operation, flexibly designed, to be sure, to meet emergencies, but designed also to become a more or less permanent part of Canadian life and government.

Need for Managerial Skills

The foregoing study and analysis of the situation at Petawawa have led me to certain general and specific conclusions regarding the future of the army works services, and the problems which confront it. These involve the recruitment and training of personnel on a basis quite different from that of the past. Changes in administrative methods and responsibilities are also needed. These involve organization and control.

Certain principles may be stated in this connection. The first of these is to have good men about. This is complicated in the army works services because:

1. At army headquarters level it is basically a military organization and it is not free to pay the prices necessary to acquire top-flight administrators in key posts.
2. Personnel in the R.C.E. and the army generally are sometimes promoted for reasons other than administrative ability, e.g., in the army works services, engineering ability. Accordingly, an officer may find in his rise up the ladder that he is faced with successively greater administrative jobs for which he is ill-suited.

This situation has a parallel in civilian life in that the most important ablity of the head of a small business is technical ability. As the size of the business increases, the importance of managerial ability increases and that of technical ability declines. In medium-sized businesses, the two tend to be of equal importance. The most important quality in the heads of a large organization is managerial ability, and, the larger the concern, the more important this becomes.

Need for Reorganization

The emphasis in the army works services organization at one time was quite properly placed on technical skills, but, in its present size, emphasis should be shifted to managerial and administrative ability in key posts. The drive in civilian life is for efficiency and control, and these are major requrements of the army works services in its present state of expansion. Any deficiency in filling these posts will result in overloading the next in charge, and will throw the organization out of balance. Thus, a major problem confronts the army works services in filling its establishment at defence headquarters.

A problem of the army works services relates to organization since—

(1) Its organization has been neither good nor adequate at all levels,

(2) Organization changes which have been made are a result of some segment being overwhelmed.

(3) Reorganizations approved by the civil service commission and establishment committees have not been realistic and reflect a lack of understanding of army works services problems.

To make an organization effective it is important to develop personnel. Plans in this respect normally include:

1. Selection of candidates for training.
2. Training to meet job requirements.
3. Systematic and gradual development through selected positions of responsibility.
4. Control over appointments to key positions.
5. Clear-cut assignment of responsibility for carrying out the program.

The army works services appear to have fallen down badly in this respect. Certain key positions have not been provided for. Key positions have not been adequately filled, and training and control over promotion of personnel have not been conducive to maximum efficiency.

A well managed organization requires a fair wage structure properly administered. This requires a suitable agency sometimes referred to as a personnel manager. At present in the army works services this factor is not co-ordinated and well planned and has contributed in a serious degree to personnel problems in respect of civilians employed by the service. Changes usually occur on a piece-meal basis and normally involve fruitless disputes with the civil service commission and establishment committees. In many cases, unsatisfactory arrangements result. The functions of a personnel manager normally involve—

1. Assisting in job analyses.
2. Assessing relative job values.
3. Comparisons with outside rates.
4. Maintenance of records to show—
   (a) How wage rates compare with outside scales;
   (b) Recommended changes to maintain wage policies.
5. Reviewing changes in job classifications and rates.
6. In general to co-ordinate and initiate steps necessary to create and maintain a sound and fair wage structure.

Difficulties have arisen in the army works services organization arising from the employment of civilian personnel working alongside enlisted men in the same organization. It has been difficult to attract suitable and competent civilians to work for the army works services due to—lack of career possibilities—inadequate salaries—insecurity of employment.

In any reorganization, the establishment need not necessarily have the proposed military element, and, because of the relatively frequent changes in postings of military personnel, it might perhaps be better organized with more permanent civilians. This problem has, in all probability, appeared in other lands. In both the United Kingdom and the United States, civilians are used in the army works services in relatively larger numbers than in Canada. This has resulted in a marked saving in military manpower, and may also have the advantage of placing civilian-trained, rather than military-trained, men in many posts which are, after all, essentially civilian in character.

The Proposed Reorganization

I have drawn up four alternative plans for the needed reorganization.

Alternative No. 1

The first is to improve and further develop the existing organization by—

1. Reorganizing the service at A.H.Q. and other levels so that it is more appropriate for its vast managerial responsibilities.
2. Improving the calibre of civilian personnel (at least in key positions) by revising salary scales and more efficient selection methods.
3. Creating suitable training courses in administration.
4. Creating a suitable inspection and service division to keep top personnel fully informed on conditions and to act as an instrument to clear bottlenecks and train personnel on the job.
5. Placing proper emphasis on administrative efficiency.
6. Freeing top personnel from detailed administrative duties to enable them to make uninhibited inspections down the line so that they can initiate remedial action through the machinery created in 4 above.
7. Generally implementing the various measures suggested by this report.

Alternative No. 2

The second alternative is to create a civilian organization running parallel to a military organization up through commands to army headquarters. This alternative would—

1. Relieve military personnel of most of the administrative function and enable them to concentrate on planning and on executive direction of works.
2. Open up career possibilities to civilians and thus attract high calibre permanent personnel and provide stability to administration now difficult to achieve.

The advantage of this course of action would appear to be the combining of greater administrative stability and efficiency with a valuable training element for R.C.E. personnel.

Alternative No. 3

The third alternative envisages the creation of a completely civilian army works services under the Q.M.G. but operating outside command channels and tied in directly to army headquarters. Such an organization as this would avoid considerable duplication in administrative work and delay in getting things done which are involved in the operation of the army works services through command channels. That is, something along the lines of a holding company with operating subsidiaries. Liaison at various levels whereby requests for work would flow into the service would necessitate certain military personnel attached to the organization. Also the broad planning function would continue under the chief of the general staff. Execution of such plans would then flow through the quartermaster general to the army works services.

The main advantages here would appear to be savings in administrative and technical manpower, and those generally applicable to, say, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The objections are that the army works services would, for the most part, cease to be a training ground for military engineers.

Alternative No. 4

The fourth alternative is that the Department of Public Works take over army works services. This might effect a certain saving in technical manpower not attained by the first and second alternatives but perhaps accomplished to a degree by the third alternative.

The objections are:

1. A department which becomes too big tends to become unwieldy and inefficient.
2. Non-utilization of R.C.E. engineers who do compensate to a degree for the shortage of civilian engineers.
3. Too slow and cumbersome to meet army needs.

In assessing the possibilities of these various alternatives, short-term considerations and long-term considerations play a part. Precedent exists for alternative number 2 in the United Kingdom and the United States where army works services are largely civilian in structure. Alternatives 3 and 4 represent radically different structures and their introduction at this stage of expansion might create harmful confusion. It would, therefore, appear advisable to adopt alternative No. 1 at the moment and gradually develop the organization along lines suggested under alternative No. 2. The introduction of civilian administrative and technical stores officers, chief foremen of works and estimators would constitute a major step in this direction. Once this has been accomplished further development along the lines suggested by alternative No. 3 would be relatively easy. As long as the army works services exists in its present size, alternative No. 4 would appear to be unwise.

PART III—PROBLEMS IN REGARD TO REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY WORKS SERVICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR THEIR SOLUTION

The six major problems of the army works services appear to be:

1. Organization
2. Personnel
3. Control
4. Accounting
5. Stores
6. Security

ORGANIZATION

During the fiscal periods following the Korean crisis the Department of National Defence has been physically unable to carry out its budgeted program of expenditures. In the case of the army works services the major obstacles have been poor organization, lack of control and of sufficient technical personnel.

Army Headquarters

For example, at army headquarters some fourteen different functions were the direct responsibility of one man. These functions were represented by the following:

1. Finance
2. Stores
3. Real property
4. Administration (H.Q.)
5. Publication
6. Inspection
7. Fire marshal
8. Design
9. Construction
10. Maintenance
11. Construction inspection
12. Accommodation planning
13. Accommodation standards
14. Architect standards

The control of these functions involving expenditure of $20,000,000 was a big job. A program of $250,000,000 has made the task impossible. To correct this situation the department has recently developed a new organization for the army works services at army headquarters.

Under this new organization, the post of deputy quartermaster general (works) has been created. Directly responsible to him are two directors, namely, works and quartering, and responsibility is broken down under these two directors in a clear-cut manner.

Good organization in a large undertaking requires that not more than seven and preferably five functions report directly to one man. The following summary shows how this has been taken into consideration—

	Number of Persons Reporting Direct
Deputy quartermaster general (works) ...	2
(a) Director of works	4
(i) Assistant director works procurement	5
Officer in charge finance division	3
Officer in charge stores division..	4
Officer in charge real property division	3
Officer in charge publication division	—
Officer in charge inspection division	—
(ii) Assistant director works engineering	4
Officer in charge design division	8
Officer in charge construction division	5
Officer in charge maintenance division	5
Officer in charge construction inspection	—
(iii) Officer in charge administration division	2
(iv) Fire marshal and assistant	3
(b) Director of quartering	3
Accommodation planning division ..	—
Accommodation standards division	—
Architect standards division	—

Works Companies

Turning now to the question of organization of works companies and detachments, I feel the officer commanding works company, if properly trained, can control his company's operations and personnel most effectively by adherence to certain principles of management well recognized in civilian corporations:

1. He must have personnel qualified to do the job. His key personnel are essential to him.
2. He must delegate effectively. It must be clear-cut. Each man must know his own duties, must have precisely defined authority, must know to whom he is responsible and his correct relations with those on his own level. When he delegates, he must back up, interfering only to avert catastrophe. He should teach by guiding them to know and follow his policy and thoughts, not by interference.
3. His contacts with personnel, for the purpose of information, should be uninhibited, but he should remember the clear lines of authority and give no orders during his explorations.
4. The different sections of the company should be as autonomous as the capacities of those in charge of them permit. No decision should ever go above the level at which there is a competent man to settle it.
5. Line and staff functions must be separate and clear-cut.
6. His office should be simple, containing no function which should be placed elsewhere. He must have enough freedom from detail, thus leaving him free to concentrate on important matters. He should spend a minimum amount of time in his office and be out effecting over-all supervision of company activities.
7. He must realize that officer personnel are subjected to spotlight analysis by other ranks, who do not miss much. Any softness in enforcing regulations, looseness such as pilfering stores, misappropriations or misuse of funds is quickly noted, and destroys discipline.

On September 15, 1952, a revised and improved establishment for Petawawa was approved. An organization chart is attached as Appendix "A". It will be noted that personnel considered to be "key" employees have been indicated. Its organization includes the following key positions not provided for under the old establishment:

1. Administration officer (civ.) (administration section)
2. Military foreman of works warrant officer I (works section)
3. Engineer accountant warrant officer II (finance section)
4. Technical officer (civ.) (stores section).

A fault of the new establishment is that it does not include a skilled estimator, which I consider vital to the efficient operation of a company.

The key personnel here noted, if of the right calibre and suitably trained, will largely stabilize the administration and operation of works companies, and should compensate to some extent for the rather chaotic conditions which flow from the relatively frequent posting of military personnel.

Up to now the absence of an administration officer, a technical stores officer and a 2nd in command has resulted in the works lieutenant supervising these functions to the detriment of his proper function. The function of the military foreman of works is being carried out by a W.O. II, who, in addition to his normal responsibilities, has been preparing plans, specifications and estimates as well as supervising projects and jobs. This has created a bottleneck.

The following division of duties and functions appears to be appropriate:

Works Section

The works lieutenant should be responsible for the plans, designs and over-all supervision of works. The military foreman should be charged with the direct conduct of the work and administration inherent therein. An estimator should be provided to prepare and control all estimating and be responsible for the accuracy of same thus providing an element of internal check on performance by the foreman of works. Following an analysis of completed work orders and on the site observations and inspection, the works lieutenant can then compare actual costs with estimated costs and place responsibility for variance where it belongs.

A monthly summary of these records covering the projects and jobs which have been completed during the period will afford to the commanding officer information which will enable him to appraise and control the efficiency of the works company. He must, however, have the benefit of skilled estimating and accurately prepared work orders to provide him with suitable standards of performance.

Administration Section

The O.C. works company can control the administrative efficiency of the unit through his administration officer. He must have sufficient administrative training himself to know what he is trying to control and have a good working knowledge of administrative matters. The administration officer, in turn, must have the key personnel as shown under him suitably trained and effective in order to carry out his responsibilities properly. The technical stores officer and the two accountants for finance and costs are most important personnel to him.

Transport Section

The transport personnel appear to form a fairly comprehensive group and accordingly require someone delegated to take charge with appropriate rank.

Fire Section

The functions of this section require careful supervision and attention. Many of the buildings are reaching an age when they present extreme fire hazards and unless constant vigilance is maintained the possibility exists of rather serious destruction of property by fire. The person directly responsible for this function must not only know how to combat fire but the measures necessary to avoid fires. Any slackness in this respect will sooner or later lead to unfortunate results.

Miscellaneous Subsections

"Projects" and "Permanent married quarters" are suitably taken care of in the new establishment. Major maintenance tasks such as house painting which are required periodically should continue to be done by the maintenance section thus utilizing manpower effectively.

To make an organization effective, it is important to develop personnel, and I turn now to point No. 2 of the army works services major problems.

PERSONNEL

In regard to calibre of personnel, it seems appropriate to point out that in work of this nature good men can save their salaries many times Poor calibre personnel in key posts burden others in the organization and generally unbalance its operation, lead to waste of time, bottlenecks and so forth.

Contributing Factors

The acquisition of suitable personnel has been hampered by slowness on the part of establishment committees in revising establishments, and the slowness on the part of the civil service commission in supplying personnel. Usually this latter delay is aggravated by unrealistic salary scales.

The lack of preparatory training of personnel has contributed to the conditions found at Petawawa and elsewhere. In the works companies and detachments investigated it was apparent that the key personnel had not received adequate preliminary instruction through having taken suitable training courses before posting. Training courses now operating should be re-examined to ensure that adequate courses are provided to cover the duties of all key personnel in the army works services.

Pilot Plant

In view of the urgent need to apply immediate remedial measures, it is suggested that consideration be given to the setting-up of one of the army works companies as an example of the ideal to be attained. In choosing this special company, care should be taken to select one in a suitable area and with as nearly a perfect layout, equipment and facilities as is possible. The administrative arrangements, as well as the operational organization, should be most carefully set up to provide a model company. Such a company would be in the nature of a "pilot plant" to which officers and other ranks from other companies could be temporarily posted to obtain rapid and concentrated instruction as to how a works company should be organized and operated.

Manuals of Organization and Operation

As referred to previously the O.C. works company must delegate effectively, and to do this his organization must be well defined. For this purpose, manuals of organization and operation are essential. Each of the main sections of the works company should have its own special manual outlining in clear, concise and readable form the organization and operation of the section. Sufficient copies should be available to enable personnel to become familiar with their responsibilities. The context, form and presentation of these manuals must be such as to impress personnel with the importance of the instruction contained therein and with the necessity of following them meticulously.

It is suggested that manuals be in loose-leaf form and that amendments be made by way of reprinted pages. One of the duties of the chief auditor and the administrative service team of the inspection division should be to inspect these manuals and report as to whether they are being kept up-to-date. All regulations affecting the organization and the operation of these works companies should be contained in the manuals. There should not be several sources of authority.

A manual should be prepared for the O.C. works company which, with those for each section of the company, would form the master manual for the company. The appropriate additions should be added for each level of command up to army headquarters. Such manuals would be invaluable to the O.C. works company in training his staff and also at engineer schools in training the specialists required by army works service.

Conferences

Periodic meetings of officers commanding army works companies and detachments within commands should be held so that they can discuss and help each other with the solution of problems and difficulties. Such an exchange of ideas can sometimes be most fruitful, and lead in many cases to sound suggestions for improvement of the whole system. These meetings could be instigated and controlled at the command level with an army headquarters representative to co-ordinate the results.

Conclusions with respect to training are that the training programs in effect have been inadequate and that a considerable improvement is possible and advisable. The suggestions made above have been tried and proven in civilian organizations and considerable benefit should result from their adoption by army works services.

CONTROL

The third major problem of the army works services relates to control. Apart from controls regarding calibre, acquisition and training of personnel, what is covered here is control over—

1. Policies
2. Organization
3. Costs
4. Methods and manpower
5. Expenditures
6. Demands upon time of senior officers and executive
7. Over-all performance.

This problem goes to the heart of the matter. The conditions examined reveal a substantial loss of control. Army files which have been examined reveal in many instances unsatisfactory conditions existing over a period of years and little if any effective action taken. The causes seem to have been a combination of the following:

1. Obsolete organization
2. Administrative laxity
3. Inability on the part of senior officers to cope with the situation due to lack of knowledge and experience
4. Lack of effective control agencies.

Control over Policies

Policies must be clearly defined so that personnel will understand under what conditions and to what extent they apply. It is apparent that personnel have not been imbued with the letter and spirit of army works services regulations. They are not in a form which can be readily applied.

Control over Organization

The maintenance of an effective organization requires continuous study, development, adjustment and review to ensure that the plan is working effectively. This is normally done through—

Organization planning;
Organization charts;
Job specifications;
Control specifications;
Organization manual;
Initiation and approval of organization changes;
Review of organization practice.

At present this task is the job of the deputy assistant director of works. It is to his credit that, without staff, he has been able to accomplish the progress that has been made. However, the function is simply too great for one man.

Control over Costs

Control over costs is a most important factor in the army works services since there is not the same direct pressure for economy in its operations as exists in a commercial enterprise. Systems of cost accounting have been designed to control costs. Such systems normally disclose extravagance, waste and unreasonable expense trends. The army works services has a cost system and, if operated efficiently it would accomplish the purpose for which it was designed. However, it has not been operated properly nor have the results been analysed and made use of by army headquarters. The supervision and control of the cost system should be delegated to a staff officer at army headquarters.

Control over Quality of Key Personnel

A co-ordinating authority at army headquarters in the nature of a personnel manager should head up the control over the selection of key personnel through the army works services.

Control over Expenditures

Control over expenditures in the army works services is exercised through the enforcement of a series of regulations. The regulations are adequate but adherence to them leaves a great deal to be desired as is shown elsewhere in this report.

Control over Demands upon Time of Senior Officers and Executives

The most economic and effective employment of the time of senior officers and executives must also be organized and controlled. To do this, careful planning should be undertaken along the following lines:

1. Use of time studies of each executive's working day to guide assignment of duties.
2. Use of high calibre personal assistants to handle much of the detail.
3. Effective use of a capable staff organization to analyse and digest information and make recommendations.
4. Limitation of the number of persons reporting directly to senior personnel.
5. Separation of the offices of senior officers from subordinates and restriction of contacts to those made by appointment.
6. Insistence that all but emergency matters be submitted in writing.
7. Realistic allotment of duties so that senior officers may have adequate and appropriate time to attend to personal inspection in the field, constructive thinking and administrative routine.
8. Reduction of time and attention of senior officers by eliminating the deluge of literature, correspondence, requests for information, surveys and similar demands originating from higher commands.

Control of Over-all Performance

One of the principal reasons for freeing senior personnel of detail is to permit them to concentrate on the performance of the organization as a whole. Investigation reveals that this has been lacking in the army works services. The fundamental reasons have been outlined above. The auditor general, the treasury board, the chief auditor of the department and the inspectorate of quartermaster services all assist in providing information useful for control. At first glance it might seem an impressive array of auditors and inspectors. However, their efforts are to a great extent diluted by responsibilities in other services and departments. It is for this reason that a staff control agency is suggested and also a full development of the inspection division.

Staff Control Agency

Such specific factors of control in the army works services require the use of a staff agency specially designed for the purpose. Since the directorate of works is by far the larger, and directly concerned in this respect, it is suggested that such an agency be headed by an assistant director of management services located at the same level as the assistant director works procurement and the assistant director works engineering. It is conceivable that all "Q" services could do with this sort of control agency.

Administrative Service Teams

The inspection division which will be controlled by the "Staff Control Agency" should include administrative service teams whose functions would be:

1. To inspect the administration of works companies and detachments at least semi-annually.
2. To determine causes of administrative failures.
3. To assist works companies and detachments in correcting such failures.
4. To provide information to enable the staff control agency to formulate improvements in administration.

Such teams would be made available to general officers commanding to assist them in correcting conditions which demand remedy.

ACCOUNTING

The fourth major problem of the army works services has to do with the operation of the accounting system and related regulations.

Operation of the System

The system was installed in 1949 and was still not working satisfactorily in the early part of 1952. Examinations made show that there is still a great deal to be desired but that personnel are gradually overcoming the chaotic situation previously in existence.

Appendix "B" classifies the various accounting irregularities found by the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence. Examination of the accounts at Petawawa and elsewhere confirmed these findings. It is obvious from this appendix that the system has not been effective and that conditions existing prior to 1949 were still in existence.

The following general comments are made with respect to the present operation of the system—

Real Property Records

These are not up to date at Petawawa nor generally across Canada. Since the army works services is concerned with an investment of some $750,000,000 in buildings and plant, the task is a large one. It is fundamental to the proper functioning of the system that no time should be lost in bringing these records to a satisfactory state.

Works Procedure

The regulations in this respect appear to be sound. Estimating, however, is not efficient. Again, this is a fundamental factor in the system. The cure would seem to be to have a qualified estimator in each works company or major detachment. At present foremen of works are doing estimating which does not leave them free to properly supervise works. The works officer through his chief foremen of works and chief estimator should be able to co-ordinate the activities of each and bring into existence a valuable element of internal check. This factor is his "administrative key" to efficiency in his unit. If he becomes unduly involved in either supervision of works or estimating, over-all efficiency, his prime responsibility, suffers. Therefore he must have adequate assistants in these posts.

There is a general complaint that the rush of work makes accurate estimating and follow-up difficult to achieve. It would seem that estimates on projects in the first instance should be approximate until the project or job is approved in principle. Then if so approved, it should be re-submitted together with a detailed and carefully prepared estimate for final approval. It is important that for each approved project there be a reliable estimate of cost before a work order is issued. If this is not done a great deal of the value of the system is lost. This is not an unreasonable requirement—the success of civilian construction companies depends on efficient estimating.

Another important point relates to the work order which in effect constitutes an order from the officer commanding works company, based on an approval from higher authority, to his assistant to proceed with the job. This constitutes an authority for the foreman to draw a specified amount in value and the quantity of materials and stores to complete a specified job or project. As mentioned above, any carelessness in the preparation of the order leaves a wide open opportunity to foremen. Accordingly, the following recommendations are made with respect to work orders:

A. They should be made out in such a manner that they cannot be easily altered without detection.

B. Where the officer commanding delegates the signature of work orders, the storekeeper should be advised in writing of the names of the designated signing officers.

C. Work orders should be made out in quadruplicate and distributed as follows—
   (i) One copy retained in engineer's office.
   (ii) Two copies to be issued to foreman of works.
   (iii) One copy to be sent direct to stores to advise them of pending issue.

D. Work order forms should be issued in pre-numbered pads and their consumption controlled as with CAB's 83 and 83A. They are virtually blank cheques on stores and they must be controlled to forestall irregularities.

E. The predetermined material requirements should be entered on the form, signed by the works company officer and cross-referenced to the work order so as to prevent substitutions.

F. No stores should be issued by the storekeeper unless a proper work order is presented.

G. No over-issues to be permitted on work orders unless written authorization given by the officer commanding works company who should be restricted to a specified variance from the original estimate. Otherwise the matter must be referred to higher command for appropriate approval.

H. All materials to be passed through stores records and charges "direct to works" to be completely eliminated.

I. Cross-charging practices to be absolutely forbidden.

J. On completion of the project or job and the turning in of completed work orders, these should be compared in works company office with originals and any unusual variances investigated immediately by the works company officer. By inspection on site the officer commanding works company must check to ensure that excess materials are being returned to stores and taken on charge.

The recent army order with respect to approval for work has been reviewed. It would seem that maintenance scales are reasonable. However, in the case of new projects, the regulations require a project no matter how small—for example, $10—to pass through normal channels right up to army headquarters. This involves administrative work on the part of many persons and is of doubtful value. It would seem more reasonable at present to delegate such approvals to more appropriate levels and, if necessary, set aside special funds at these various levels to restrict the total amount of such projects. For example, in respect of a specific project the following delegation of authority might be appropriate—

G.O.C. Command ..	$2,000
Area commander ..	300
O.C. works company	150

However, in respect of delegation of authority and discretion generally, this should await a proven responsibility on the part of officers together with a general stepping-up of inspection and auditing, combined with a clear-cut policy of sanctions in the case of irresponsibility.

Cost Accounting

The operation of the cost accounting system cannot be considered satisfactory until irregularities such as those outlined in Appendix "B" are stopped. We are informed that cost reports are now being received from all works companies and detachments. Needless to say, this is an initial step but until the quality of cost reports is improved results are of restricted value.

The cost accounting system is sound and workable and will if properly used assist in increasing the pressure for efficiency such as is normally experienced in civilian establishments by financial factors.

STORES

The fifth major problem concerns the physical handling and accounting for stores.

A recent examination of the physical handling of engineer stores at Petawawa revealed a relatively favourable situation. Specifically speaking, satisfactory attention was being paid to the following factors:

1. Maximum utilization of existing space by way of warehousing layout.
2. Arrangement of stores in a manner permitting conservation of time and manpower.
3. Conservation of supplies by avoiding re-order of material in stock when it cannot be located when required.
4. Segregation of surplus and "stockpiled" stores into separate warehouses thereby simplifying stores arrangement and speeding up of supply operations.

As a result of a physical inventory taken during the spring, stock record cards were brought into agreement with a physical stocktaking. The surpluses and deficiencies revealed were as follows:

	Surpluses	Deficiencies
Electrical	$11,511.74	$5,624.75
Hardware	4,505.65	3,523.61
Plumbing galvanized	892.33	351.77
Plumbing black	330.75	510.85
Plumbing drainage	547.61	1,127.73
Plumbing parts	4,602.62	1,678.92
Stove and stove parts	658.54	1,496.69
Kitchen equipment	1,191.96	624.00
Lumber	3,150.95	5,218.75
Paints	2,036.78	1,717.88
Building material	6,038.12	1,037.69
Miscellaneous	1,511.02	28,195.33
	$36,978.07	$51,107.97

The largest deficiency related to the miscellaneous classification. A subsequent investigation revealed the cause to be a deficiency of some 377 circular floor tents. As a result of a special stocktaking these tents were located in ordnance for which they had been purchased.

A clear understanding of how surpluses and deficiencies arise is essential. A considerable number of surpluses and offsetting deficiencies arise out of misidentification of stores, that is to say, where two similar types of stores are on charge, one type is issued but the other is written off charge in the stock record cards. This type of error can be eliminated to a great extent by giving each type of store an item number corresponding to a similar item number on the stock record card.

Uniform Stores Catalogue

I recommend the compilation of a uniform stores catalogue and the handling of stores in accordance with it as the remedy for this situation. This will alleviate complications now being encountered by stores personnel in attempting to handle stores in accordance with trade names which in many cases vary according to the supplier.

It must not be assumed that irregularities are measured by the difference between the amount of surpluses and the amount of deficiencies. Such a conclusion would only be valid if the accounting system had been operated in a satisfactory manner.

Also, deficiencies can arise by straight pilfering of stores and no corresponding adjustment in stock record cards. Surpluses can arise through materials being returned to stores and, for one reason or another, not being taken on charge. Such stores might represent excessive issues on a given project or materials salvaged from demolitions.

Inventory Counts

Regulations of the army works services require that monthly inventory counts be made in such a manner as to ensure a complete check of stores annually. This has not been done in the past. The importance of adherence to regulations in this respect cannot be stressed too greatly. The reasons are, first, that it will bring to light many irregularities if such are being committed; and, second, periodic stocktaking and analysis of differences arising out of them should result in more accurate accounting for stores and a general speed-up in their handling.

There is one valuable element of internal check not being fully utilized. This is general ledger control over stores. It is recommended that the stores control account in the general ledger be broken down into the several sections corresponding to stores segregation. Then, as a physical count of stores is taken and quantities so obtained priced, the total value of a section of stores can be compared with the total of stock card balances relating to this section. Both amounts can then be compared with the amount reflected by the general ledger control account. Aside from revealing any dabbling with stock record cards, this measure would act as an over-all check on arithmetical accuracy which has been found in a number of locations to be lacking. In this respect the employment of a comptometer operator in large camps would greatly facilitate such operations and lessen the work-load on clerical personnel. Adjustment would have to be made in respect of receipts of stores for which there were no corresponding invoices, due to a time lag occasioned by suppliers. The handling of receipt and issue vouchers in stores would also have to be slightly different; receipts or issues involving stores from several sections would require separate vouchers for each section. These, however, are minor matters and no particular difficulty should be experienced in this respect.

Stock Control and Surplus Stores

The regulations governing stock control and the handling of surplus stores are well designed and suitable if followed meticulously. To be operated satisfactorily the services of a skilled and experienced technical stores officer are necessary. Lack of adherence to the regulations in regard to surplus stores contributed in large measure to excess inventories and duplications. This aggravated the problems of stocktaking and contributed to wasteful purchasing.

Army works companies do not possess the facilities to "stockpile" stores and equipment. Policy in this respect should be carefully reviewed in order to determine whether or not a more suitable alternative exists. In any event it would certainly seem preferable if such surpluses as already exist were segregated in centralized depots, and work companies thus relieved of this problem.

It is now necessary to refer to the physical handling of stores as distinct from accounting for them. The facilities provided and the methods followed in the handling of stores vary greatly in different companies and localities. Uniform standards for the warehousing of stores, as laid down in the regulations, have not been enforced and applied but this has been due largely, first, to the lack of suitable buildings and the necessary layouts; and, second, to unsuitable and/or untrained personnel.

Inventory teams have been organized within each command to tidy up the conditions of the inventories and the accounting thereof. Their work has been progressing rapidly.

SECURITY

As mentioned earlier, I consider the security measures in force at Petawawa and elsewhere inadequate. It represents the sixth and last of the army works services' major problems. The situation was such that personnel could with relative ease move stores out of camps. The accounting system designed to control stores was not, as I have outlined, operating in such a way as to ensure the detection of resulting shortages. Accordingly, the opportunity was great to steal, or to misuse military stores and equipment. Had security measures been adequate, the problem would have been confined to those of misuse, inefficiency and waste. A special investigation staff scrutinizing the various areas would have stopped a good deal of misuse and perhaps of waste also. This fact, together with various other findings uncovered during my investigation has led me to a thorough study of security needs at Petawawa and, indeed, at other similar camps throughout Canada.

Provost Personnel

The functions of the provost corps in central command have been as follows:

1. Apprehension of absentees and deserters
2. Train patrols
3. Investigation of break-ins and thefts
4. Traffic control and escorts for distinguished visitors, parades, etc.
5. Discipline of troops when away from units
6. Security checks and patrols on camps and in buildings

The lack of men and the wide area to be covered from Ottawa to Windsor and from Toronto to Sault Ste. Marie has made it impossible to carry out all their duties satisfactorily. Provost corps personnel for the most part have been employed on 1, 2, 4 and 5 above and accordingly 3 and 6 have been neglected. The numbers of personnel now available for duty are entirely inadequate and even if the present establishment were filled it would not provide sufficient supervision.

In January of 1951 the establishment of central command provost company was 38 all ranks. Two officers and 31 men were posted to the company at that time. These were distributed as follows:

Camp Borden	1 Officer	16 men
London		3 men
Toronto		4 men
Kingston	1 Officer	3 men
Petawawa		5 men

In May of 1951 a new establishment was approved authorizing a strength of 4 officers and 79 men. The breakdown of this establishment within the command was as follows:

	Establishment	Posted Strength
Camp Borden	1 officer 13 men	1 officer 9 men
London	1 " 12 "	1 " 10 "
Toronto	17 "	13 "
Kingston	1 " 14 "	1 " 5 "
Ottawa	8 "	6 "
Petawawa	13 "	5 "
Coy H.Q. Toronto	1 " 2 "	1 man
	4 officers 79 men	3 officers 49 men

The uneven distribution of personnel to detachments was due in part to the present policy of posting men returning from Korea to the detachment nearest their homes.

Since the Korean situation arose a new problem has been presented, namely providing security for the vast quantities of valuable and attractive stores which have been accumulated.

After consultation, a proposal for another new establishment was drawn up by the provost corps and submitted to the secretary of the war establishment committee of central command, dated August 14, 1952. A summary of this proposed new establishment is attached as Appendix "C".

Camp Patrols

All provost personnel posted to a camp or area are available to assist the commanding officer in the exercise of his responsibility for the security of that camp or area. A most effective way of improving camp security would be to provide sufficient provost personnel to enable mobile patrols to operate through a camp on a 24-hour basis. They should be thoroughly conversant with camp activities.

Gate Guards

The employment of commissionaires serves a useful purpose in replacing trained military personnel. In camps, corps of commissionaires personnel are often employed at the camp barriers. These men can be quite effective if they are carefully supervised and if a proper checking procedure is set up for them to use at the barrier.

The Guarding of Back Roads in Camps

Camp security cannot be complete as long as back exits remain open without guards or barriers. In large camps such as Petawawa and Borden it is not possible to fence the entire area but much can be done by building suitable gates on back roads and erecting wire or other obstacles to prevent vehicles leaving the roads in the vicinity of the gates. These gates or barriers should also be guarded by the corps of commissionaires.

Relationship of Townsites and Camps

Security can be improved by segregating townsites from the camps proper. At present at Petawawa there is no restriction to the movement of personnel in and out of the camp from the townsite. Fences should be constructed segregating the townsite from camps. Visitors, taxis, tradesmen and so forth entering the townsite would not then have to pass through military gates. Otherwise an easy means of access to camps is available and this should not be so.

Use of R.C.M.P. Personnel

It is recommended that a constable of the R.C.M.P be posted for duty in each major camp to represent the civilian authority. In almost every camp there are large numbers of civilians employed and these are in addition to those living in married quarters. It has not been found acceptable or satisfactory for members of the provost corps to take care of situations involving civilians. It is of great importance, however, that there be a clear definition and understanding of the authority of the provost corps, the R.C.M.P. and the provincial and municipal police.

Special Investigation Staff

It is recommended that a special investigation unit be organized as part of the Canadian provost corps for employment in checking up on security measures generally and, in particular, to be available at short notice to carry out special investigations when situations arise such as did at Petawawa. The members of this unit should be trained as experts in making this type of enquiry and in collecting evidence.

It is important that the provost corps be brought in at the early stages of known irregularities or major losses. There has been evidence that this has not been done in all cases.

Burglar Alarm Systems

Burglar alarm systems would not appear appropriate for the engineer compound at Petawawa but there are other locations in the camp where they would be useful, e.g. ordnance stores. Also, medical stores at certain locations would appear to warrant installation of such systems.

Gate Passes

All military stores and equipment being moved out of the camp area should be accompanied by a document of identification authorizing the removal thereof. This document will be collected by the guard at the gate for subsequent scrutiny by the provost corps.

Provision should be made for the examination of all civilian vehicles leaving the camp to ensure that government property is not being removed.

Use of Police Radio Equipment

Modern two-way police radio equipment has been in operation in the Toronto detachment of central command provost company for a number of months. This equipment has proved very useful and has done much to overcome the shortage of personnel. Similar equipment should be made available to all the larger provost detachments. In most cases it is preferable for equipment to be tied in on the civil police net.

The present practice of posting provost personnel to units would appear to be inadvisable since supervision and control over such personnel by provost corps is to a large extent lost. In view of the difficulties in acquiring sufficient personnel for the functions outlined above, it would appear more appropriate to use these personnel to fill the establishment.

PART IV—CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

My report, I fully recognize, contains many discouraging features. The over-all situation is, however, by no means discouraging because of the fact that the cure for what has gone wrong in the past can be and, in fact, is being applied.

As an example of what can be and actually has been done to remedy conditions quickly, it is interesting to follow the action which was taken at Halifax immediately following my inspection early in September. I reported verbally to national defence headquarters that conditions at Halifax were not satisfactory. As had been found at other establishments, stores, accounting and administrative procedures had broken down seriously. Senior officers were immediately dispatched from Ottawa to look into the situation. They took remedial action at once. Certain key personnel were replaced; others were put on notice; temporary stores and clerical staff together with a labour force were engaged to clean up the situation and bring the accounting records up-to-date.

In November, I was invited to return to Halifax to examine the results of the vigorous action which had been taken. I found that remarkable changes had been made. The company had been completely re-organized. The stores had been re-catalogued and re-arranged. Accounting records and stores procedure had been revised and corrected. As a result of what had been done the unit had been placed in a position to function properly and to carry on with normal efficiency.

In conclusion, I am giving you hereunder my recommendations covering the operations of the army works services. Some of these have been already explained; others of a more technical character will be self-explanatory.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Organization and Control

1. The new organization set up for the service at army headquarters should be filled as quickly as possible and selection of personnel for key posts should reflect the paramount importance of its managerial function.

2. Creation of a staff agency is needed at army headquarters to supervise the enforcement of established policies; to control organization; costs; methods and man-power and over-all performance. Publication and inspection divisions of the organization should be under its direct control.

3. Creation of administration service teams in the inspection division is required.

4. Effective action on the reports of the chief auditor is essential.

5. More frequent inspections and audits are necessary.

6. Evidence of wasteful and unauthorized expenditures should be promptly and thoroughly investigated and sanctions applied against offending personnel as warranted.

7. Top personnel must free themselves of as much detail as possible to supervise more effectively the enforcement of established policies. They should lay greater stress on their administrative functions and ensure by personal visits to lower echelons that prompt action is taken to rectify unsatisfactory conditions.

8. Periodic meetings of officers commanding works companies and detachments should be held at command headquarters.

9. Basic principles of management must be adhered to by all officers commanding works companies and detachments.

10. Each works company or large detachment requires the following key civilian personnel:

(a) An administrative officer
(b) A chief foreman of works
(c) A technical stores officer
(d) A skilled chief estimator.

Personnel

11. The establishments and wage scales of the army works services have been neither realistic nor adequate, and need revision.

12. Manuals of organization and operation should be revised and co-ordinated with training programs.

13. Selection and development of one company along the lines of a "pilot plant" is desirable. Officers and other ranks could be temporarily posted to it for training.

14. Posting of military personnel for longer periods is needed so that they will have sufficient time to attain efficiency in their jobs.

15. The circumstances under which military personnel may accept outside temporary employment require precise definition.

16. All payments owing to the crown must be made to the receiver general. All ranks should be prohibited from accepting either cash or cheques or money orders made payable to themselves or to their office.

Accounting

17. The quality of cost estimating needs improvement to make the system effective.

18. Emphasis is required on the need for accurate distribution of costs. Otherwise data become meaningless and control over unauthorized expenditures difficult.

19. Work order forms and related procedures require revision.

20. A system of work approvals incorporating tentative or preliminary estimates should be installed.

21. Rigid enforcement of the procedures covering approval of projects is needed. Disciplinary action should follow where deliberate intent to circumvent regulations is evident.

22. The existing regulations relating to the approval of projects require modification to provide more delegation of authority with respect to minor new construction projects.

23. Rental of equipment to civilians requires control, and rates and procedure defined.

24. Real property records must be brought up-to-date as quickly as possible as these records are fundamental to the effective use of the accounting system.

Stores

25. A uniform stores catalogue is highly desirable.

26. Monthly inventory counts, as required by regulations, must not be neglected.

27. Suitable stores controlling accounts should be incorporated into the general ledger.

28. Stockpiled and surplus stores should be taken away from work companies and detachments and administered separately.

29. Rigid control, in accordance with regulations, is required of all loans of stores to military personnel and employed civilians.

30. Prohibition of loans of materials, stores and equipment to civilain contractors is desirable.

31. Orders with respect to the return of materials to stores require clarification. The importance of these must be emphasized to personnel.

32. Strict control of the handling of scrap is needed.

33. Materials of necessity left in the open should be protected and secured.

Security

34. Added strength of provost establishments is required.

35. Increased camp patrols are desirable.

36. The corps of commissionaires should continue to be employed on gate duties but with more adequate supervision.

37. Barriers or gates on back roads in camps are needed.

38. Townsites should be segregated from camps proper.

39. An R.C.M.P. constable should be stationed in camps.

40. A special investigation staff working under the provost marshal (army) is required.

41. Burglar alarm systems should be installed in larger warehouses where valuable and attractive stores are kept.

42. Suitable forms of gate passes deserve study.

43. Modern radio equipment would help the provost corps.

44. The provost corps should be brought in at the early stages of investigation into irregularities or major losses so that complete evidence will be obtained for the purposes of courts of enquiry and prosecution.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

(Signed) G. S. Currie.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—FORM OF ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa, December 12, 1952

The prime ministers and other representatives of commonwealth countries assembled in London for the commonwealth economic conference have considered the form of the royal titles.

They recognized that the present titles are not in accord with current constitutional relations within the commonwealth, and that there is need for a new form of title which will, in particular, reflect the special position of the sovereign as head of the commonwealth. They concluded, after full consideration, that in the present stage of development of the commonwealth relationship, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position that each member country should use for its own purposes a form of title which suits its own particular circumstances but retains a substantial element which is common to all. They agreed that the various forms of the titles should, in addition to an appropriate territorial designation, have as their common element the description of the sovereign as queen of her other realms and territories and head of the commonwealth.

The representatives of all the commonwealth countries concerned have agreed to take, at the earliest convenient opportunity, such action as is necessary in each country to secure the appropriate constitutional approval for the changes now envisaged. Her Majesty will then be advised to exercise her prerogative power by the issue of proclamations giving effect to such changes in the title as may be recommended. It is contemplated that the proclamations will be issued simultaneously in all the countries concerned.

The form of titles that will be recommended for use in Canada is:

"Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith."

The titles to be recommended in the various countries of the commonwealth are as follows:

United Kingdom—Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.

Canada—Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.

Australia—Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom, Australia and her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.

New Zealand—Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom, New Zealand and her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.

South Africa—Elizabeth the Second, Queen of South Africa and of her other realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth.

Pakistan—Elizabeth the Second, Queen of the United Kingdom and of her other realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth.

Ceylon—Elizabeth the Second, Queen of Ceylon and of her other realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth.

APPENDIX III

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—OFFICIAL COMMUNIQUE

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa, December 15, 1952

Following is the text of the communique issued at the end of the commonwealth economic conference:

The commonwealth economic conference which ended today was convened with the aim of concerting measures for increasing the economic strength of the commonwealth countries, including the colonial territories and creating conditions in which their peoples can play their part in securing prosperity and contentment for themselves and for the world.

2. In recent years the sterling area has been faced with recurrent economic crises which have forced its members to take emergency measures of trade and exchange restriction. These measures were necessary but they have inevitably tended to frustrate the long-term economic expansion on which our hopes and opportunities for the future are founded. This was recognized at the January meeting of commonwealth finance ministers. The measures taken in accordance with the conclusions of that meeting have, however, enabled the present conference to decide that a more positive policy can now be adopted both by the commonwealth countries themselves, and in concert with other friendly countries, to promote the expansion of world production and trade.

3. The conference agreed that commonwealth countries would work together to achieve certain broad common objectives. They have no intention of seeking the creation of a discriminatory economic bloc rather their object is by strengthening themselves to benefit the world economy generally. Accordingly, the following principles were agreed upon as governing the approach to the whole range of subjects under discussion:

(a) internal economic policies designed to curb inflation and rises in the cost of living should be steadily followed;

(b) sound economic development should be encouraged with the object of increasing productive strength and competitive power, providing employment and raising the standards of life;

(c) a multilateral trade and payment system should be extended over the widest possible area.

4. The application of these principles will require individual action by commonwealth governments, co-operation among them and international action with other trading nations and existing international organizations.

INTERNAL MEASURES

5. All commonwealth governments have agreed to persevere in their efforts to curb inflation. Inflationary conditions frustrate the progress of sound development both by increasing its cost and by destroying the savings necessary to finance it; moreover they damage the external balance by stimulating excessive imports and by diverting to internal use goods which would otherwise be available for export.

6. An adequate and stable external balance must be a first objective for all governments. Failure to achieve this means repeated crises, a continuously rising cost of living, a constant threat to employment and failure to develop resources effectively. The conference welcomed the improvement which had taken place in the balance of payments, both of the individual sterling area countries and of the sterling area as a whole, following upon the conclusions reached by commonwealth finance ministers at their meeting in January 1952. It noted with satisfaction that the sterling area would achieve balance with the rest of the world in the second half of this year. It was agreed, however, that this achievement, while reassuring, was only the first step towards a stable balance for the sterling area. Policies were agreed upon for 1953 which, it is hoped, will lead to further improvement in the reserves during that year. Nevertheless, while there has been steady improvement, the level of the reserves is as yet too low to warrant any substantial relaxation of the restrictions on imports from outside the sterling area.

7. The conference considered the extensive restrictions which some countries of the sterling commonwealth have needed to impose upon imports from the United Kingdom and other commonwealth sources. There was agreement that restrictions imposed because of balance of payments problems should be relaxed as the external financial position of countries improved. In considering the whole problem the governments concerned would have clearly in mind the difficulties which the restrictions have raised for the export industries affected.

8. The economic and social objectives of the commonwealth countries, individually and in association, depend upon their ability to produce and supply under competitive conditions an expanding flow of exports. There was, therefore, general agreement in the conference on the vital need to expand the earning power of all sterling countries.

DEVELOPMENT POLICY

9. Throughout the commonwealth there is wide scope for expanding the production of the essential supplies which the whole world needs—food and agricultural products, minerals and engineering products, and improving the means for transporting them. This development of the basic essentials has on occasion been impeded by other development of a less sound and permanent kind which has overtaxed the countries' resources and has failed to contribute to the building of economic strength. The conference agreed that, in sterling area countries, development should be concentrated on projects which directly or indirectly contribute to the improvement of the areas' balance of payments with the rest of the world. Such projects should strengthen the economy of the countries concerned and increase their competitive power in world markets and so, by improving their balance of payments, bring increasing prosperity to their peoples. In some countries of the area, however, development plans have been, or are being, made to provide for some basic improvement in the standards of living which is a necessary foundation for further economic development. Some social investment is also urgently needed in the more developed countries certain of which have rapidly increasing populations. The conference recognized the need in such cases for these types of investment.

10. To enable development to go forward a sufficient flow of savings must be provided in the countries undertaking the development and also in other countries which are ready to invest their savings there. The amount of savings which will be available from external sources will, at best, be small in relation to the size of the development programs of countries of the sterling commonwealth and it is therefore essential that these countries should, themselves, adopt policies which increase the flow of savings. Although this is inevitably a slow process for countries with low incomes and little margin above the basic needs for existence, the process of development will, itself, increase income and increase the flow of savings.

11. The United Kingdom is the traditional source of external capital for commonwealth investment and has special responsibilities in the colonial territories. The United Kingdom government are determined that the flow of capital from London for sound development throughout the commonwealth shall be maintained and increased. This will only be possible if the United Kingdom can sustain the necessary level of internal savings and can achieve a surplus on overseas account additional to that required to meet its heavy existing commitments.

12. The United Kingdom government have, however, undertaken to make a special effort to provide additional capital for commonwealth development by facilitating the financing of schemes in other commonwealth countries which will contribute to the improvement of the sterling areas' balance payments. The conference took note that the United Kingdom government would wish, before making any of this additional finance available for commonwealth development, to be sure that the country concerned was, itself, devoting an adequate part of its resources to investment designed to improve the sterling areas' balance of payments and was ready to make a sufficient contribution towards the particular scheme in question to ensure that both countries had an interest in seeing that it was carried through as efficiently and economically as possible.

13. The conference welcomed the proposal by a group of important financial, industrial and commercial concerns in the United Kingdom to form a company to further development in other countries of the commonwealth and the colonial empire. It was pleased to note that an announcement by this group is being issued today. The conference also welcome a statement by the United Kingdom representatives that the United Kingdom government intend to discuss with the international bank for reconstruction and development arrangements to give effect to their decision to make sterling available for lending by the bank for projects designed to improve the sterling area's balance of payments.

14. The conference recognized the important contribution which investors outside the sterling area, particularly in the United States, can make to economic development in the sterling area and agreed that every effort should be made to create conditions which would encourage such investment. It further agreed that all sterling area governments should strive to attain this by reducing such obstacles as controls over the movements of capital across the exchanges. The United Kingdom government have reviewed the right which is now enjoyed by residents outside the sterling area, who have invested capital in approved projects in the United Kingdom and colonial empire since 1st January, 1950, to transfer their capital across the exchanges. At present this right only extends to the sterling equivalent of the initial investment. The United Kingdom government informed the conference that they have decided that, henceforth, it shall extend also to capital profits.

COMMODITY POLICY

15. The conference recognized that there was no one universal remedy for the problem of instability of prices for primary commodities. Each commodity must be considered on its merits in the light of the conditions prevailing at the time and the circumstances must determine what form of arrangements would be appropriate. The conference agreed that violent fluctuations and an uneconomic level of prices for primary commodities were against the interests of consumers as well as producers. All commonwealth governments are, therefore, ready to co-operate in considering commodity by commodity international schemes designed to ensure stability of demand and prices at an economic level. They also recognize the need for an agreed procedure for calling together the governments concerned to consider emergency action in the event of rapidly developing conditions of surplus or shortage of commodities entering into international trade.

IMPERIAL PREFERENCE

16. There was general recognition at the conference of the value of existing preferences. On the initiative of the United Kingdom a discussion took place on a proposal that all commonwealth countries should join in seeking release from the "no new preference" rule in the general agreement on tariffs and trade (GATT) and this United Kingdom proposal was supported by the representatives of some countries. The representatives of other countries felt that such an approach would not advance the agreed objective of restoring multilateral world trade and the conference was, therefore, unable to support it. All commonwealth governments agreed, however, to co-operate with the United Kingdom government in an approach to the other contracting parties to the GATT to meet particular difficulties arising on the United Kingdom tariff. The object would be to enable the United Kingdom, consistently with the basic provisions of the GATT, to continue the duty free entry of commonwealth goods notwithstanding any increases that might from time to time become necessary in duties designed to protect domestic industry and agriculture in the United Kingdom. The commonwealth governments also agreed to consider sympathetically certain special tariff problems affecting the colonies.

68108—47½

INTERNATIONAL ACTION

17. Resolute action, in accordance with the conclusions recorded above will, in itself, do much to strengthen the economies of the sterling commonwealth countries but this is not enough. Action in a wider sphere is also necessary. The conference therefore agreed to seek the co-operation of other countries in a plan to create the conditions for expanding world production and trade. The aim is to secure international agreement on the adoption of policies by creditor and debtor countries which will restore balance in the world economy on the lines of "trade not aid" and will, by progressive stages and within reasonable time, create and effective multilateral trade and payments system covering the widest possible area.

TRADE

18. The plan envisages positive international action for the progressive removal, as circumstances permit, of import restrictions imposed for the purpose of bringing a country's external accounts into balance. Action will be required by both creditor and debtor countries. The rate of progress in removing discrimination will depend upon the advance towards equilibrium between the United States and the rest of the world.

19. The sterling commonwealth countries will not all be able to remove restrictions at the same time. In particular, the representatives of some countries have emphasized that they must continue to use their exchange resources in the manner which enables them to carry out their planned development programs most effectively and that they are likely to continue to need import restrictions for this purpose.

FINANCE

20. The conference agreed that it is important, not only for the United Kingdom and the sterling area but also for the world, that sterling should resume its full role as a medium of world trade and exchange. An integral part of any effective multilateral system is the restoration of the convertibility of sterling but it can only be reached by progressive stages. The achievement of convertibility will depend fundamentally upon three conditions:

(a) the continuing success of the action by sterling commonwealth countries themselves as outlined above;

(b) the prospect that trading nations will adopt trade policies which are conducive to the expansion of world trade;

(c) the availability of adequate financial support through the international monetary fund or otherwise.

Commonwealth Conference

PROCEDURE

21. It is proposed to seek acceptance of this plan by the governments of the United States and of European countries whose co-operation is essential and to work, as far as possible, through existing international institutions dealing with finance and trade.

22. The timing of the successive stages of this plan cannot be decided at present. This can only be judged as the necessary conditions are satisfactorily fulfilled.

CONCLUSION

23. The conference is happy to be able to present this account of the confident understanding which exists between members of the commonwealth and the wide measure of agreement which they have been able to achieve over the whole range of economic policy. The aims of their co-operation are entirely consistent with their close ties with the United States and the members of the organization for European economic co-operation. The commonwealth countries look outward to similar co-operation with other countries, not inward to a closed association. It is their common purpose, by their own efforts and together with others, to increase world trade for the mutual benefit of all peoples.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 16, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

GOOSE BAY STATION—LEASE OF LAND TO UNITED STATES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I beg leave to table copies of notes exchanged by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and the United States ambassador on December 5. The notes constitute a lease to the United States of certain parcels of land within the Royal Canadian Air Force station at Goose Bay in the province of Newfoundland. The lease, which is to enable the United States air force to replace wartime construction and to construct some additional facilities, involves approximately 7,000 acres of land which is less than ten per cent of the area of the base. The field will continue to be under the over-all command of the R.C.A.F.

Goose Bay airport was built by Canada in 1942—before Newfoundland entered confederation—as a stepping-stone along the North Atlantic and Arctic airways. During the war thousands of aircraft put down there on ferry flights from the United States and Canada to Europe. Since the war Goose Bay has been used by the R.C.A.F. and the United States air force to support certain northern weather stations, and it has served also as a centre for search and rescue operations in the area.

In view of the increased international tension during the last three years, the R.C.A.F. and United States air force facilities at Goose Bay have been considerably expanded. The base is, in effect, a joint defence installation, and is being used by both air forces for the co-operative defence of North America. Its use by both countries is essential for the fulfilment of their responsibilities under the North Atlantic treaty.

The lease is for a period of 20 years, with the proviso that any United States request for an extension will be considered by Canada in the light of the common defence interests of Canada and the United States.

When the lease has expired, all buildings on the leased area will become the property of Canada, but removable improvements may be taken away by the United States air force.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 43, respecting Beaver Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Rooney.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the first reading of Bill No. 48 (from the Senate), respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CURRIE REPORT—TABLING OF LETTER FROM CHIEF OF GENERAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, if he will table the letter or a copy of the letter to which he referred yesterday from the chief of the general staff, in view of the fact that it has been made a part of the general material in connection with Mr. Currie's report. Would he table also any other correspondence relating to the letter from the chief of the general staff?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to table it, and thought it was being tabled yesterday, but the Clerk pointed out to me that under what had been said it did not become a part of the records of the house, but would be printed, as had been suggested, with the report of Mr. Currie. But if it is desired to have it laid on the table as a part of the official records of the house, I shall be glad to have that done. I thought it had been done, but it was pointed out by the Clerk that, under what had been said, it had not been a part of the records of the house. I take it that it is desired that it become a part of the records of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then I will see that it is done. I will make sure whether or not there is any other correspondence. There is none to my knowledge, but I will make inquiry in that regard.

Mr. Drew: So that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, may I say that what I had in mind was that perhaps there was, from either the minister or someone in the department, a letter which indicated how the copy of the report came into the hands of the chief of the general staff, and whatever correspondence there was that prompted the reply from the chief of the general staff. That is particularly what I have in mind.

Mr. St. Laurent: My information is that there is no correspondence and that the copy of the report came into the hands of the chief of the general staff in the manner mentioned by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) yesterday; that is to say that on his instructions, when two copies were sent overseas, one for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and one for me, a copy was handed to the chief of the general staff.

[Later:]

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, if I may have the consent of hon. members, I would ask you to revert to motions so that I might lay on the table a copy of a letter from the chief of the general staff requested this morning by the Leader of the Opposition. I read it yesterday, and I now beg leave to table copies of that letter.

The Leader of the Opposition asked:

> Would he table also any other correspondence relating to the letter from the chief of the general staff?

Then later he said:

> So that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, may I say that what I had in mind was that perhaps there was, from either the minister or someone in the department, a letter which indicated how the copy of the report came into the hands of the chief of the general staff, and whatever correspondence there was that prompted the reply from the chief of the general staff.

I have made diligent inquiries and there is no such correspondence.

REPARATIONS

PAYMENT OF JAPANESE AND GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), I should like to answer the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on Friday, December 12. The question was as follows:

> Will he inform the house as to what progress is being made in regard to the payment of Japanese and German reparations in pursuance of the report made to the government by Chief Justice Ilsley of the province of Nova Scotia?

The answer is as follows:

The payment of compensation to Canadians in respect of war claims:

Up to and including December 12, 1952, 1,210 cheques totalling $1,635,265 have been issued and send out to former prisoners of war of the Japanese. One cheque totalling $1,085 has been issued and sent to a former civilian internee of the Japanese.

Under the war claims interim compensation rules four cheques totalling $7,000 have been sent to civilian claimants in respect of death or personal injuries, three claims arising out of the sinking of the S.S. Athenia and one claim against the Japanese.

ATOMIC ENERGY

DAMAGE AT CHALK RIVER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked me whether I could inform the house as to the incident which occurred at Chalk River on Friday last. I can now report as follows:

About 3.15 on Friday afternoon, December 12, a burst occurred in uranium rods during a normal operation. The release of radioactive gases and dust from the rods was carried as usual by the ventilating system up the tall stack from which it would normally be widely dispersed. Owing to the atmospheric conditions at the time and the severity of the discharge, the area of the plant became contaminated causing the alarms to go off and the "stay-in" signals were at once given. The activity at the remote buildings died off in a matter of some minutes but the health surveyors found activity remaining in the laboratories nearer the pile building and to avoid the spread of contamination which would affect the research instruments and laboratories by people walking around, it was decided to evacuate all personnel who were not essential to operation. The evacuation siren was sounded and all employees, except the scientists and engineers attending the reactor, and all senior officers, left the plant in a very orderly fashion, without panic and according to the procedures set down for such emergencies. No one was hurt or injured by contamination, though the clothes of a few men in the pile building were removed as a precautionary measure until the short-lived activity on them died down. I am informed, however, that it will take several days to clear all the laboratories of contamination which, although well below the level standard for human tolerance, does seriously interfere with scientific instruments and experiments.

Bursts of rods have occurred before at Chalk River but this one was more severe and atmospheric conditions were such as to reduce the dispersion. Bursts have occurred at other atomic energy plants, and must be expected when scientists are dealing with such a powerful source of energy of a new type and have still much to learn about the behaviour of materials under high irradiation. The metallurgical changes which may be produced by such powerful neutron bombardment is one problem on which scientists are still working.

The reactor is now being cooled off to permit the engineers and scientists to undertake a complete examination, discover the real trouble and make any necessary repairs. In the meantime, however, all scientific, maintenance and operating personnel are now back to work and fully occupied.

It should be remembered that NRX is an experimental plant designed during the war when there was little if any operating experience and, as in all novel development work, it is from the troubles met in experimental establishments that enough experience is gained to design large-scale industrial plants.

Mr. Green: Will the reactor be out of operation for some time?

Mr. Howe: Until it can be cooled off it is impossible to decontaminate the reactor. Time has to elapse to allow the contamination to disappear, naturally. Until it can be decontaminated and the plant examined, it will be out of action. How long that will take, I could not tell you.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to question No. 7 standing in my name on today's order paper. I would say that, with the exception of one day, this question has been on the order paper since July 2, and I would hope for an early answer.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

(Translation):

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday so that I might finish this morning what I had to say on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I referred yesterday to the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) who dealt in this house, on December 2 last, with the question of taxation rates and who also stated that the federal government did not take anything away from the provinces. I am of the same opinion.

The federal parliament has the exclusive power to raise funds by any method or system of taxation, either through direct or indirect taxes, whereas the provinces can levy direct taxes for provincial purposes only. These powers are conferred by sections 91 and 92 of the B.N.A. Act of 1867.

Has anyone replied to the speech made by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet on that subject? Not at all. It is merely insinuated that the poor province of Quebec is being ill-treated.

The Ottawa government must discharge its obligations to the whole of Canada. In order to do so they must collect sufficient revenue through the methods of taxation at their disposal.

If, as was stated yesterday by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), the chamber of commerce approves the obstinate refusal by the premier of the province of Quebec to accept federal subsidies, it nevertheless recognizes the beneficial administration of the federal government. So true is this, in fact, that we can read the following in an article entitled "The Chamber of Commerce: Facts and Trends," and dated March 19, 1952:

> It is a fact that Canada's prestige in the community of nations is increasingly greater. Even the Americans recognize in this country one of the world's most progressive nations.
> Immigration to Canada adds 150,000 new consumers each year to our population; a formidable figure. For industrialists and businessmen, these figures have far-reaching economic consequences.
> In 1939, the gross value of Canadian production amounted to approximately 5 billion and a half; today, the gross value of this production amounts to 17 billion dollars.
> Canada has been lucky enough to achieve a better balanced economy, which has made her more impervious to fluctuations on the markets of the world. In 10 years, iron and steel production has increased threefold; production of electric power has done even better and the volume of aluminum production has multiplied five times. In a single year, 1950, Canada manufactured more refrigerators than in 1938 and 1939 together.

Eastern Canada draws a large part of its oil supply from the Alberta oil fields. Canadian oil fields compare favourably with the continent's most important fields. We have reserves for many centuries to come.

In a few years from now, i.e. in 1955, the works undertaken in Ungava will already have made possible the development of the amazing mineral deposits in that district. An output of 20 million tons a year is anticipated, once the St. Lawrence waterways project is completed.

Every year Canada receives foreign capital that helps her develop her natural resources. At the same time Canada is becoming more and more a creditor nation as far as the other countries of the world are concerned.

All these figures and statistics have but one aim: to give the assurance to the Canadian people that their country has boundless possibilities. We are a privileged people and we need but show initiative to provide for ourselves an enviable future.

If Canada has succeeded in gaining the attention of people of other countries, all the more reason for her own people to have confidence in her. We must not lose our optimism.

In view of that article and the few others I quoted last night, praising the Canadian government's administration, I believe we should all unite in a common effort as is suggested in the article entitled "Facts and Trends" published by the chamber of commerce.

(Text):

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some remarks in connection with the Currie report which was tabled in the house yesterday. I have had the report in my possession only for a very short time, and therefore I have not had an opportunity to read it and digest it thoroughly; but even on a first reading of it one is immediately struck by certain statements, some of which were pointed out to the house yesterday by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), and which are extremely disturbing.

It would help our understanding of the whole situation to go back and take up something in connection with the history back of this report. The first mention of it was in the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on April 21 of this year, to be found at page 1424 of Hansard of that date. I quote from the speech:

Mr. Speaker, following the discovery and investigation of grave irregularities in the engineer detachment at Petawawa camp, charges have been laid.

And so on. Then further down in the same remarks we find the following:

The irregularities first came to the attention of the department several months ago and arose out of the disposal of scrap under contracts made by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the sale of thirty tons in 1950 and fifteen tons in 1951.

[Mr. Leduc.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date was it first ascertained that there was any trouble?

Mr. Claxton: In October, 1951.

According to this statement of the minister, the department knew, and he knew, that there was trouble there in October 1951, many months before the Petawawa irregularities were disclosed to the general public by the R.C.M.P. investigation. The question then immediately arises: if the department knew of these irregularities, why was nothing done about it? To begin with the minister says "following the discovery and investigation of grave irregularities in the engineering detachment"; in other words, the impression is given that the discovery of these irregularities was made only as a result of the R.C.M.P. investigation. By his own statement it will be seen that these irregularities were known for many months before that, back in October. As a matter of fact, if we refer to the report at page 4, and also appendix B, we see the same thing borne out. On page 4 Mr. Currie says:

It must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions.

And so forth. That is clear from appendix B. If you refer to appendix B you find, as a matter of fact, that the chief auditor reported on different dates twenty different types of irregularities. If you count them you will find that the number of these irregularities—I made a rapid count—are 159 altogether. These were not all at Petawawa; these were at different camps; but irregularities to the number of 159 had been reported in the years 1950, 1951 and 1952. In other words, the auditors were reporting irregularities at least as far back as 1950.

If we move from that to the reports of the defence expenditures committee of last year we find that reports quite evidently containing irregularities were made as far back as 1949. In the committee we had been talking about these auditors sent out by the auditor general of the department. Then at the close of the day I said, as reported at page 161 of the committee report:

Q. I have one more question. On page 16, it reads:

"At the close of an audit all matters requiring attention are discussed with the commanding officer and other officers concerned. A written report is forwarded to the assistant deputy minister covering each inspection, and he forwards it to the chief of staff concerned with his comments".

Now, I do not suppose you can answer these questions now, but you can bring them in next week.

The questions were:

When was the last inspection of this type made in Petawawa, and, secondly, when was the second last inspection at Petawawa of this kind made, and thirdly, what was disclosed in regard to theft or material missing in each of these reports.

Well, the answers to these questions were brought in at the next meeting of the committee on May 8, and at page 172 the discussion is found. The point is that the only thing that was brought in was the dates, and after a long discussion any information as to what was concerned in those reports was denied, with various members on the government side of the house making specious arguments that it was not in the public interest to disclose what was in those auditors' reports. It was quite evident that the only reason that the auditors' reports were not disclosed to the committee was that they contained reports of irregularities which the government at that time was anxious not to have made public. The dates on which these audits were made are rather significant. At page 173 a list of them is given. We find that audits of various units at Petawawa were made on June 18, 1951, June 5, 1951, May 12, 1950, another one on May 12, 1950, for another unit, May 6, 1950, May 23, 1949, May 6, 1950, May 1, 1949, and so on. Then, there were two more of them in 1949.

It is quite clear from this that these reports of irregularities had been coming in over a period of years to the Department of National Defence. Under the procedure they came to the assistant deputy minister or the deputy minister, and I am sure were referred to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). In spite of all these reports, apparently nothing was done to correct the situation, as appears in Mr. Currie's report, until after the matter became public as the result of the investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Now, if we refer back to the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence on April 21 last we find he said this:

> The investigation—

That is, the one at Petawawa.

> —has disclosed no foundation for the reports alleging irregularities and deficiencies in the construction of buildings in the twenty-two major construction projects under way at Petawawa.

If one refers to the report, however, he finds at pages 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of that report various irregularities, so far as construction is concerned. For instance, we find at page 8 that in certain cases—> —persons buying army material were asked not to make cheques in payment (in whole or in part) to the receiver general but to individual army personnel. The amounts thus paid did not reach the public treasury.

Then a dam was built at Tucker creek at a cost estimated at some $3,000 or $4,000, and the report states:

> Its utility is not clear to me, and it was, in any event, not authorized by army headquarters.

And so on. Therefore, in these cases we see irregularities, so far as construction matters are concerned. It is possible that none of these irregularities in construction was in the major projects which the minister mentioned specifically; but certainly it would be at least misleading to the house to say that no irregularities had been found in construction, and to attempt to say, as he did, that nothing irregular was found in connection with the twenty-two major construction projects.

As a matter of fact we find in four pages of this report various instances of irregularities, so far as construction is concerned. Then, if we turn to appendix B—and I am not going to deal with it in detail—we find that, so far as Petawawa is concerned, a considerable number of irregularities which occurred were regarding construction matters. They were in the nature of illegal work orders, and things of that kind.

Another matter to which the report refers is the lack of administrative and managerial ability, poor accounting, and things of that sort, so far as the army works people are concerned, and the finding that the same thing applies throughout. At page 17 of the report we find this statement in that connection:

> The situation was complicated by still another factor. The Department of National Defence (including the army works services) was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime. Its establishment and administrative practices reflected more clearly the urgent needs and exigencies of war, when speed is everything and costs count not at all. The carry-forward of this war psychology must be coupled with inadequate training and resultant ignorance on the part of personnel of their administrative duties and responsibilities.

That is the very thing about which those of us on this side of the house have complained on several occasions here, in the past. I am not going back to quote from Hansard, and to set out the particular instances of it. However, a good deal of the difficulty in the Department of National Defence was because comparatively inexperienced men, so far as important administrative jobs were concerned, were in charge.

Once again, that is entirely the responsibility of the government. And it arose in this way, that following the war the government pursued the policy of dismissing practically all the men who had any considerable amount of experience before the war in what one might call general administrative work of the army. As a result they left in the army only those men who had gained their experience during the war and who, as a result of that, did not have the experience to carry on the more general administrative duties required during a period of peace.

The policy followed was to retire a considerable number of senior officers many years before the normal retirement age. This was not confined to officers, because many others including warrant officers, staff sergeants and the like, were retired years before their period of useful service was up. They were the very men who in the years before the war had been trained in accounting methods, administrative procedure and the like, required to run an army in peacetime. The result of the government's policy of discharging what one might call the older and experienced men in the service, and in many cases discharging them long before their time was up, was that they were left with an army run by men who had gained their experience during the war when, as the report points out, a war psychology prevailed and speed was everything. Ideas about economy and things of that nature just did not exist.

The next point I should like to discuss has to do with the changes which were made in the report, as indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I interrupt the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member has a question, I shall be pleased to answer it; but I do not want him to make a speech.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On a point of order, the point is this—

Mr. Fleming: Question.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member has no question, then I am going to carry on.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may rise to a point of order.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): My point is this, that I think the discussion of this matter is totally out of order until hon. members have copies of Hansard on their desks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): —so that we can be informed about the matter under discussion.

An hon. Member: It was tabled.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is not available, and private members in the house are not informed as to the material under discussion. And until they are, this discussion should be postponed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should be allowed to state his point of order. However, my ruling would have to be that the report was tabled yesterday and it is therefore, in accordance with our rules, debatable today.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McIvor: On a point of order; I think it would be better cricket on the part of the opposition to wait till the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is present to discuss the Currie report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harkness: I would say, as an aside, that the attempt being made at the present time to prevent my saying anything about the Currie report is indicative of the attitude taken last year in the defence expenditures committee, at which time constant efforts were made to block the securing of information in regard to this and other matters which government members thought would be embarrassing to the government.

Mr. Stick: I do not rise in this house very often but a charge has been made against members of that committee, that we were trying to block information. I deny that charge and the hon. member knows that what I am saying is true.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I trust that these interruptions will not be counted as part of my time for speaking.

In regard to what the hon. member from Newfoundland has just said, all he has to do is to refer to pages 172, 173, 174, 175 and so on of the report of the committee proceedings, and he will see how the information contained in the auditor's report was denied.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Read them.

Mr. Harkness: I am not going to take time to read a thing like that but there were a number of instances where information was denied. The hon. member's denial of what I have just said indicates his lack of knowledge of what went on in the committee.

Mr. Stick: Not a bit of it.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Let us hear from the brass hats.

Mr. Harkness: To continue, the changes which have been made in this report are particularly significant, and particularly damaging to the government. I think that the people of this country expect that when a man is appointed to conduct an inquiry into a particular matter the report which he turns in will be the report tabled in this house and given to the people. They do not expect, and they will resent very strongly—as I am sure most members of this house will resent—any tampering with the report submitted.

From what has been presented to us by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre it is quite clear that considerable tampering with the report has taken place. I would refer to page 17, particularly, where it is stated—and I have just read the preceding part in regard to the spirit which permeated the army, carelessness and so forth—

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up.

In the original report it said:

> It is more difficult to condone the same attitudes at or near the top.

Now, where does "at the top" mean? "At the top" means the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and nobody else.

The report goes on:

> There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not always present in the degree required.

That is what this copy says, but the copy which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has says:

> There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not present in the degree required.

The "always" was not there and there is a material difference in the sentence. The substitution of "always" gives the impression that the requirements were only occasionally not there. When the "always" is taken out it means that they were just not there throughout.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these various changes which have been made are, I think, indicative of the attitude on defence matters which we have experienced in this house for some years. We have complained about this attitude very frequently. We have stated that we did not get full and frank statements in regard to what the defence situation was. The statements made in this house have been ones which served to conceal what the truth was—rather than making it known to this house and to the country as a whole.

I have had several exchanges with the Minister of National Defence in connection with the number of guns which we have had in this country. Those exchanges can be found in past Hansards. I always received evasive answers. The business of changing this report is, as I say, just indicative of a continuation of that same process and that same spirit which has been observed here over several years. There has been a constant effort to prevent the true facts as far as defence is concerned being given to this house and to the country. Once more, I protest very strongly against it.

Along the same lines, the Minister of National Defence has always insisted that everything was perfect as far as the defence department was concerned. According to his story any criticism, even of a minor nature, was not justified. It did not matter what the situation was at any particular time. According to him we always had just the right number of men; we had all that we needed; we had the right complement of arms, and so on. As the situation changed it became evident that the armament we had at one time was perhaps sufficient but it was not sufficient later when the Korean war developed and when a general war became imminent. Nevertheless, according to the minister everything was perfect.

That general attitude on the part of the minister naturally had a very bad effect as far as personnel of the services were concerned. Its natural effect was to induce in the officers and men of all services a certain feeling of perhaps smugness and carelessness. It would be very much the same thing in a commercial enterprise if the boss of that enterprise let it be known that he did not care whether his employees came to work late. It would not be very many days before everybody would be coming to work late. It was the same sort of thing as far as the Department of National Defence was concerned. The minister always insisted that everything was perfect. The natural reaction on the part of officers and men was not to improve things and not to make sure that irregularities did not occur—but they felt satisfied with the situation the way it was and they just let things run.

From that point of view, I think the government and the minister have been very much to blame and are responsible for the situation that has developed and that is indicated in this Currie report. This report, of course, deals only with one small branch of the army—the army works services—and more particularly what happened in that branch at one particular camp, at Petawawa, although a number of other places were investigated. The question naturally arises as to what the report would be if a similar investigation were made in other branches of the armed services. If a situation of this sort was revealed in one small branch it would seem to indicate a very strong necessity for a similar type of investigation and report on other branches of the service—as a matter of fact on the service as a whole.

The hon. member for Nanaimo last night pointed to and argued for the necessity of a commission to investigate defence matters generally. I think there is no doubt but that there is a strong necessity for something along that line.

This report contains a large number of important suggestions for improvement. There is one in particular to which I would just like to pay a small amount of attention. The suggestion is for the establishment of what is called a pilot plant. This suggestion is found on page 40 of the report:

> Pilot Plant
> In view of the urgent need to apply immediate remedial measures, it is suggested that consideration be given to the setting-up of one of the army works companies as an example of the ideal to be attained. In choosing this special company, care should be taken to select one in a suitable area and with as nearly a perfect layout, equipment and facilities as is possible. The administrative arrangements, as well as the operational organization, should be most carefully set up to provide a model company. Such a company would be in the nature of a "pilot plant" to which officers and other ranks from other companies could be temporarily posted to obtain rapid and concentrated instruction as to how a works company should be organized and operated.

I think that is something that should be done not only so far as works companies are concerned but also throughout the services generally. For instance, it was one of the regular recognized procedures in the German army to have what were known as training battalions. It was by means of these training battalions that the German army was able to build itself up as rapidly as it did prior to the last war and to replace its losses as quickly as it did through recruits from training battalions. That is one suggestion that I should particularly like to see adopted, and it should not be confined to works companies but should be general in its application.

I have attempted to show, Mr. Speaker, that first of all the losses at Petawawa had been going on for a considerable period of time. That is evidenced by the fact that the auditor's reports going back to 1949 were not produced. It is quite evident that those reports contained references to irregularities that were occurring at that time. As the report makes clear, during all this time nothing was done to correct the irregularities and to improve the general administrative services of the army. It is quite clear that the situation which prevailed was known by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and as far as we can ascertain he took no action to correct it.

The responsibility for the situation indicated by the report, which situation would make one very much afraid that the same poor administrative and accounting practices might be found throughout the services, rests squarely on the Minister of National Defence and on the government. When the hon. member for Nanaimo was speaking yesterday there was a lot of comment from interrupters immediately to my right. They kept on muttering, "the general staff, the general staff."

An hon. Member: The brass hats.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, apparently it was their idea to try to make the general staff the scapegoats in this matter. I do not maintain for one moment that no responsibility for these irregularities rests on the general staff. There is no question that they must bear a share of the responsibility.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Oh, no!

Mr. Harkness: However, any attempt to make the general staff the goat for this situation will not go down so far as the country is concerned. The government and the Liberal party are very fond of making people scapegoats. They made a scapegoat out of Fred McGregor over the combines situation. They got into difficulties there and they kicked him out. They used him as a scapegoat. They made a scapegoat out of Brigadier Connelly with respect to certain international difficulties. They made a scapegoat out of Mr. Pitt because they were apparently put out over something. In other words, their general policy seems to be to make scapegoats out of people. In this particular case I do not think they are going to be able to get away with it. The only goat in this whole matter is the great big nannygoat from which the Liberal members all receive their milk, the government. It will be quite plain to the people of the country that it is the government which is the goat.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The brass hats will get theirs before this is over.

Mr. Harkness: That remark is exactly indicative and symptomatic of the comments that came from the same quarter yesterday. They are going to blame it on the brass hats. They say: "The brass hats are the only people who are to blame. We will kick them in the pants. The public will soon forget and everyone will be happy." I am quite sure that is not going to be the situation. The so-called brass hats are not going to be made the goats in this affair. All the responsibility is not going to be placed on them.

Mr. Larson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: I should like to finish what I am saying. I will answer questions afterwards.

Mr. Larson: You can't take it, eh?

Mr. Harkness: There is no question that the responsibility for the situation rests squarely on the government. As I have indicated, the government knew what was going on and they took no action. Under British practice, when a minister's department is shown to be so poorly administered and when it is clear that he had knowledge of the situation and took no action, there is no question that it is the accepted thing for the minister to submit his resignation. I think that the normal British practice should be followed and that the Minister of National Defence, as a result of what I can only call his dereliction of duty with respect to this whole matter, should submit his resignation.

Mr. Larson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Who runs an army camp? Is it the Minister of National Defence and his staff or is it the commanding officer of the camp?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Do you know about government responsibility?

Mr. Harkness: That is exactly the point I am making. The commanding officer of a camp is responsible; there is no question about that. But the head of the Department of National Defence is responsible for irregularities that arise as the result of lax administration and failure to do anything to improve the administration. The report makes it abundantly clear that there was such failure. Any attempt on the part of the government to say that it is not their responsibility is shown to be completely wrong by the facts. As a matter of fact, if the hon. member who asked the question, and who has a farm in Saskatchewan, had a few people training in the vicinity of his farm who popped a shell into his barn and killed a couple of his prize cows I do not think he would hold responsible the man who pulled the trigger, the man who loaded the shell, the man who laid the gun or the officer in charge of the particular detachment. He would hold the government responsible, and when he instituted suit to recover damages for the monetary loss he had suffered he would not sue the individual gunner. He would sue the government.

Mr. Larson: If the hon. member were the commanding officer of an army camp would he welcome government officials running around his camp inspecting things that were going on and more or less casting doubt on his authority as the commanding officer of that camp?

Mr. Harkness: If the Minister of National Defence sent an auditor or an inspection team to inspect my particular camp I would do everything I could to make their stay as pleasant as possible and to show them everything that was there. That is the only thing I could do.

Mr. McCusker: Did I understand correctly the hon. member who has just spoken when he insinuated that Liberal members were living off graft from the government? Would he clarify that point?

Mr. Harkness: I never mentioned the word "graft".

Mr. McCusker: I did not say the hon. member mentioned it. I said "insinuated".

Mr. Hees: If the cap fits, wear it.

Mr. Rowe: We never thought of it until the hon. member mentioned it.

Mr. Harkness: The fact that the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) has mentioned the word "graft" would seem to indicate that there must be some uneasy consciences.

Mr. McCusker: I assure the hon. member that my conscience is just as easy as his so far as receiving anything from the government is concerned or from the point of view of service to my country. Just like the hon. member, who called me gutless last year because I did not answer questions when I was making a speech, I have a right to speak and I have not spoken—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCusker: But I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. McCusker: My question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary East has explained what he said previously. If the hon. member wants to make a speech, he is allowed to do so but he will have to wait until his turn comes. I understand that the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Robertson) is now ready to take the floor.

Mr. Harkness: In regard to the question of privilege, I would like to say that I accept fully the member's statement that his conscience is perfectly clear, and that his service to his country is beyond reproach. I accept that very gladly.

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Northumberland, Ont.): In joining in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my personal congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both of these gentlemen who were afforded this high honour discharged their responsibility in an admirable way and are deserving of the tributes which have been paid to them in the course of this debate.

As hon. members of this house know, I have the honour of representing one of the finest agricultural ridings in Canada, the county of Northumberland, Ontario. It is a justly deserving tribute that the first world's plowing match will be held in Northumberland county next October on the occasion of the Ontario plowmen's association annual international plowing match. This world's championship plowing match, as I have said, will be held in Canada for the first time. It has been indicated already that some ten countries will send contestants to this international match. I believe that Great Britain, southern Ireland, Finland, West Germany, Norway, Sweden and Canada have indicated that they will take part in this match. I am informed also that France, Belgium and the United States are likely to send contestants.

Each country will be represented by a three-man team consisting of a horse plowman, a tractor plowman and a coach. This world's championship plowing match will be held under rules and regulations which have been adopted by an international conference which was held in Falkirk, Scotland, just recently. This speaks well for the co-operation of these countries, because there must have been a willingness on the part of these different countries to forgo certain regulations common to their plowing at home in order to adopt regulations which are peculiar to other countries. I am informed that the nations will demonstrate some of their own plowing techniques, and that an international board of judges will pass on the competition. You will see that there will be a cosmopolitan flair to this great gathering.

Canada is honoured in being selected as the site for this first world's plowing match. It is to be an annual affair, and I understand that it will be held in southern Ireland in 1954; in Sweden in 1955; and in Great Britain in 1956. In addition to the world's championship match, next year's gathering at Cobourg will continue to display all the features which have made the international plowing match one of the outstanding events in agricultural circles. I wish to congratulate all the officials of the international plowmen's association on the wonderful event they promote each year; on their hard work and endeavours which make this annual match an outstanding success. I should like to congratulate also those citizens of Northumberland and Durham who have made possible the holding of this match in our area. I commend them for their unselfish public service. I know that the citizens of our area will do everything possible to discharge their responsibility as hosts to this event. I am sure that this event at Cobourg will be one of the most outstanding ever held. I wish to extend an invitation to all hon. members of this house to come to Cobourg for this great match next year. I am sure you will be most welcome and you will have an interesting and profitable time.

In previous speeches in this house I have expressed my interest in and concern for the welfare of agriculture in this country. I regret to see the decline in prices in certain agricultural products, and I am sure that such decline must be looked upon with real concern by all of us. We know that the prices of some agricultural products, particularly apples, vegetables, whole milk and potatoes, are about as high as they have been in our history. The prices for butter, eggs and cheese are fairly satisfactory. It is for the prices of beef and pork products that we have the greatest concern. These prices were quite satisfactory until the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada with the resultant closing of the United States border. I should like to congratulate the government upon the good work that was done in the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease from this country. I think there is no doubt that this matter was handled in a most efficient way. Never in the history of this disease has it been wiped out within such a short time.

A few days ago we listened to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) on the subject of farm prices in Canada, particularly the prices of pork. He made what I would consider to be a wholly political, prejudicial speech. He did not take into consideration the various difficulties which confront the government in dealing with this matter. He accused the government of having a deliberate policy of destroying the hog industry in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robertson: Can you imagine anything more untrue than that? This government has done much to aid the Canadian hog industry. They have set floor prices and they are buying hogs and canning them. It is true this is done at a loss, but nevertheless it is a great aid to the hog industry. I believe that the farm prices support legislation has been a great aid to the hog and beef producers of this country. Had we not had this legislation, the prices for hog products and beef products would have fallen drastically and the producers of these items would have suffered severe losses.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) has placed on the record, during the course of this debate, a comparison of farm prices in Canada and farm prices in other parts of the world. Almost without exception the prices in Canada are higher than in any other country. I believe that the support legislation this government has introduced is largely responsible for that fact. All the people in Canada have enjoyed great prosperity for the past number of years. I believe that most of us would welcome a reduction in the prices of various goods. We do know that the prices of agricultural products have declined more than the prices of other goods, but I think it has always been an economic fact that farm prices fall before the prices of other goods. I believe that the farmers of this country have a right to expect that the prices of the items they buy should, in a short time, follow suit. If that does not happen, then a large part of the purchasing power of our farm group will gradually dwindle and the people in other occupations in Canada, in other industries, will suffer. Most of these people will then be earning less than they do today.

In recent years farming has changed a great deal. It was not long ago that a man could start farming with a small investment. Today he requires a large investment. He must show considerable skill and experience in developing his farm operations. I believe, therefore, that people in all occupations in Canada must realize that the farmer cannot and will not return to the low prices which prevailed during 1930 and 1939. During the war the federal government exercised certain controls over agricultural products. The courts have ruled that in peacetime this is the responsibility of the provincial governments. The provincial governments or at least some of them recognize this responsibility and particularly in Ontario they have set up marketing boards whose function it is to look after the sale of farm products in Ontario. I think that these marketing boards are doing a wonderful job and certainly should receive the co-operation of farmers in Ontario.

I mention these facts not to shift responsibility from the federal government to the provincial governments but simply to tell you that, in my opinion, all problems which face agriculture can be met by the co-operative efforts of the federal government, the provincial governments and the farm organizations themselves. We have seen an example of this in the handling of the cheese situation not many months ago. Through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments a fairly satisfactory arrangement was worked out in the cheese industry in Ontario.

I also believe that farm organizations have a real responsibility in the handling of farm marketing. I say that because I believe that farm organizations should be kept informed of the trend in agricultural marketing and should be able to advise their members when it is wise to increase or to decrease production.

We have heard much about trade with Britain with regard to agricultural products. Members of the opposition have indicated that the Canadian government has attempted to stand in the way of trade with Britain. Nothing can be farther from the truth. We have no trade restrictions. Our dollar is freely convertible in all the currencies of the world. Canada has always indicated a willingness to join with other members of the commonwealth in holding conferences. Our various ministers have attended many such conferences from year to year. I maintain that it was not Canada's prerogative to ask for an imperial conference previous to the present time because it is not our custom to tell other countries in the commonwealth what they should do.

We have indicated a willingness to co-operate with other members of the commonwealth whenever they feel that it is in the interests of the commonwealth generally to do so. That is the spirit in which our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) went to this conference; and I am sure that all members of this house hope that something may come of that conference to stimulate greater trade not only within the commonwealth but with all countries of the world.

I will always support legislation which I believe, over the long period, is in the best interests of agriculture in this country. By so doing, I believe I am supporting what is good for Canada and what is good for all Canadians.

Yesterday we had presented to parliament the Currie report dealing with investigations by Mr. Currie into the shortages at the Petawawa army camp and other related matters. I regret that private members have not yet had an opportunity of studying this report. What information I have comes from what I have heard in this house and what I have read in the newspapers. I am sure that all hon. members were disappointed to learn of the inefficiency and actual dishonesty which took place in the works services department at the Petawawa camp. The conduct of some of the personnel in this department is disgraceful and they should be ruthlessly punished for their shortcomings.

However, after listening to the speeches of the opposition, I am not sure whether they are more disappointed by the revelations of wrongdoing on the part of a minute fraction of the army personnel or more elated by the possibility of embarrassing the government at this time. They seem to forget that it was the government who authorized Mr. Currie to make this investigation; that he was afforded every co-operation by the government to determine the true facts; that the government has already brought many of the guilty parties to justice for their crimes and that they have indicated that all responsible for this state of affairs will be severely dealt with.

Furthermore, the report states that it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities took place. The camps at Toronto, London, Barriefield, Vancouver, Regina, Quebec and Halifax were investigated, with little ground for criticism being found. This is reassuring to all members of the house and to the people of Canada. It indicates that the vast majority of the army personnel are honest and are doing their duty in the discharge of their responsibilities. The government will, I know, take a serious view of this report and will make the necessary changes which will restore public confidence in the armed services to that degree which is deserved by the over-all performance record of our defence forces.

There is another matter which I should like to bring to the attention of this house. It is one which I should like to have dealt with some time ago, but these charges were made when I was in New York attending a meeting of the economic and social council of the United Nations. These are charges which were made by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) on June 24 last, when he was speaking of a new ordnance depot which is being constructed in my home town of Cobourg. As reported at pages 3629 and 3630 of Hansard, the hon. member for Peterborough West asks the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) the following question:

> Why did the minister's engineers select the grounds they did in Cobourg for the ordnance building there? It is swamp land. According to a return tabled in my name, I understand that it will cost $407,250 for drainage plus $70,000 for concrete slabs to be built underneath the concrete tile. That is practically half a million dollars.

I should like to tell the hon. member for Peterborough West that the ordnance depot is not being built on swamp land.

Mr. Fraser: Your mayor said it was.

Mr. Robertson: Just you be quiet and I will tell you. I am sure the mayor never made such a statement.

Mr. Fraser: It was reported in the press.

An hon. Member: Do you believe everything in the press?

Mr. Robertson: Further, I should like to tell the hon. member that the land which has been purchased for this ordnance depot consists of several parcels of land. The initial parcel of land is land which had been held by the town of Cobourg for many years, reserving it for industrial use. Would a town reserve property for industrial use if it were swamp land?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robertson: Further than that, other parcels of land are being used for various types of farming, some of them for highly specialized types of farming such as fruit growing and the like. Does the hon. member grow specialized fruit on swamp land?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robertson: I have never seen it done.

Mr. Fraser: Nevertheless, it is swamp land.

Mr. Robertson: As regards the figure of $407,250 for draining, I must admit in all honesty that the hon. member for Peterborough West might have been misled by what I consider was an inadequate answer by the Department of Defence Production in reply to a series of questions concerning the ordnance depot, and which had been placed on the order paper by the hon. member. After asking in previous questions what tenders had been called for this project, what the amounts of such tenders were, he asked in question No. 8:

> What is the estimated cost of draining same and who pays for it?

The Department of Defence Production answered: $407,250, paid for by the Department of National Defence, is the estimated cost of both drainage and sewage. This answer gives a false impression of what this amount of money was for. This amount covers only the sewage disposal system and the storm sewer system to carry off surplus water. In the construction of this type of buildings with all the grounds around it hard-surfaced, you can well imagine the great flow of water which must be taken away during a heavy storm. That is what this money was spent for. It would have to be done on any project of this kind, no matter where built. Not one cent of this contract is for land drainage, as was suggested by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: You evidently have not been up to see the property.

Mr. Robertson: I was there only a week ago. I might tell the hon. member that I am informed by the engineers in charge that this site is quite satisfactory in every way.

Mr. Fraser: It will be now, after half a million dollars has been spent on drainage.

Mr. Robertson: Let me give you another indication of the inaccuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for Peterborough West. I quote again from Hansard at page 3630:

> I understand that they have 80-foot piling in the building in this case but in the Royal York hotel, the tallest building in the empire, they used only 38-foot piling.

Here again the hon. member for Peterborough West is entirely ignorant of the facts. The longest pile in the Cobourg ordnance depot is 22 feet in length, with the average being 19 feet. To further refute his charge that the ordnance depot is being built on swamp land, I should like to inform him and this house that the test on the piles now in place at the ordnance depot, as carried out by the engineers of the inspection staff, show that these piles carry far in excess of twice their designed load. May I quote from the national building code to give you some idea of how such piles are tested:

> In testing a pile in place it shall be loaded to twice its proposed working load by additions at not less than four-hour intervals of loads of not more than five tons. Measurement of settlement shall be made and recorded immediately before and after the addition of each load. Such measurement shall be adjusted to compensate for the elastic compression of the pile. The pile shall be considered adequate to support the proposed working load if the total settlement so measured does not exceed one-half inch and if no further settlement occurs after the lapse of forty-eight hours.

I am informed by the engineers that after 48 hours of a load of 100 tons, the total settlement was only three-sixteenths of an inch, which is not one-half of the one-half inch allowed. These piles were designed to carry fifty tons, and I am informed that they actually can carry some three or four times that weight.

We have a very competent staff of engineers in charge of this depot, and as I told the hon. member a few minutes ago, they are satisfied in every way with the site as being suitable for a project of this kind. In addition, we have a firm of outstanding architects, E. C. Parker and Company, who are in charge of the architectural construction of this building. They too have indicated that we have a suitable site. Surely, no further evidence is needed of the ill-advised and totally unfounded charge of the hon. member for Peterborough West. I am letting the cat out of the bag now when I say that the hon. member visited Northumberland county at the annual meeting of the Conservative party a few weeks before, and was content to take common gossip at that meeting as sufficient evidence for his charges.

Mr. Fraser: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is entirely wrong. I visited that site and checked on it personally.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Robertson: I noticed that the hon. member did not deny that he had been at the annual meeting of the Conservative party.

Mr. Fraser: Why should I? You attended the Grit meeting in Peterborough last Thursday and there were only 150 people there.

Mr. Robertson: It is a coincidence that this hon. member should make a speech after visiting the Northumberland Conservative party annual meeting. He also made reference to the fact that I had been in Peterborough some time ago. In fact I was there, and I do not believe that the hon. member for Peterborough West is too happy about the choice of the Liberal party in Peterborough. We have selected a man who, without doubt, will carry that seat for the government in the next election.

Mr. Fraser: I am very happy because he is a personal friend of mine.

Mr. Ferguson: "Carry it without a doubt" —doubt is going to be there, all right.

Mr. Robertson: I cannot understand why an hon. member in an adjoining riding would deprecate at such an early stage the construction of the depot in Cobourg. One would have thought that he would be glad to see some development in that part of Canada in which he appears to be so interested.

Mr. Fraser: I was glad, but I do not see why they should build it on a swamp.

Mr. Robertson: Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my opinion on national health insurance. I believe that national health insurance must eventually be instituted in Canada. Ours is a rich country, and we have developed one of the finest social security programs in any country of the world. To my mind the development of such programs as old age security, family allowances, pensions for the blind and our national health plan are but means of allowing all the people of the country, particularly those who cannot do so for themselves, to share in the prosperity and development of our country. That has always been one of the principles of Liberalism, and the social security program is one of the main planks in the Liberal party's platform.

I am sure that as conditions allow we shall continue to expand that policy. As a member of the medical profession I look forward to the day when we shall have national health insurance in Canada. I cannot support any form of state medicine in Canada because I believe it would be a backward step in our civilization should we undertake state medicine. I think it is most important that we continue the personal relationship which exists between patient and doctor in Canada today, because if we do not the type of service the patient will receive will be not nearly as good or as satisfactory as it is today. I do not think we want any production line type of medical service in Canada today.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, health is under the jurisdictional authority of the provinces. The government could not and would not at this time undertake any system of national health insurance unless it had the co-operation of the majority of the provinces of this country. It has been indicated to us that only one or two of the provinces are interested in going ahead with national health insurance at this time. We in the Liberal party have always been zealous of provincial rights, and we shall never do anything at any time to interfere with the rights which our constitution gives to the provinces.

Our national health plan has done much to lay the foundation for a national health insurance program. We have provided many thousands of beds; we have trained medical, nursing and technical people to undertake this program, although there is no doubt that we have not yet sufficient of these trained personnel to undertake any form of national health insurance in Canada. Therefore, I say that until we have the facilities which can be built up within the next few years—it possibly will require additional financial assistance from this government in order to expand these facilities—I think we would be most unwise to undertake any form of national health insurance at this time. The cost of such a program would be very, very high, running into many hundreds of thousands of dollars. We are now spending some two billions on defence, and I do not believe the taxpayers of this country can possibly be asked to pay this money at the present time. I think we should continue to study this problem, that we should work in co-operation with the provinces so that, when we do arrive at that stage where we can initiate a national health insurance policy, we can be sure that it will work.

There could be nothing more fatal to national health insurance than for us to start a program before we are prepared, and before we are willing to do for the people of Canada what we say we intend to do. I believe that in due time the Liberal party will initiate national health insurance; and when they do, the people of Canada can look forward to a satisfactory health program.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to explain why I shall not support the subamendment now before us, and also to deal with certain other matters now before the house. I think it is appropriate that an explanation should appear on the record as to why we propose to vote against the subamendment which, in itself, does not seem to raise any very serious questions, so far as the actual wording is concerned.

The subamendment reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:
> "(f) To bring before this house for adoption, a realistic financial and economic policy that will ensure the orderly development of Canada's resources, guarantee adequate markets at remunerative prices to producers, and provide to every Canadian his just share of the wealth our resources can be made to yield."

Those words, standing by themselves, might appear to be acceptable to most members in the house. I would point out, however, that in the very nature of any amendment or subamendment we must have regard to the interpretation placed upon those words by those who put them before the house for consideration.

There are many statements with which we would not disagree, in their general purport. For instance, there might be difficulty in understanding why anyone would vote against an amendment which expresses regret that the government has failed to introduce a plan for making every Canadian happy under every conceivable situation. But we would, of course, be bound to inquire into the kind of procedure that was contemplated to bring about happiness of that kind.

In this particular case, when we are attempting to decide whether that is the kind of financial and economic policy that we are prepared to support, we must find the interpretation of a realistic financial and economic policy from the explanations made by those who have put forward this subamendment. In the remarks that have been made in support of the subamendment we have been left in no doubt as to the kind of financial and economic policy that is referred to in the subamendment. That kind of policy, in the opinion of those who have put forward the subamendment for consideration, is a financial and economic policy in accord with their conception of social credit doctrine.

I use the words "their conception" advisedly, because I realize that there is a tremendous distinction between the social credit doctrines enunciated by Major Douglas and the social credit doctrines that emerged in this country from sources which have never been fully disclosed.

In so far as the economic policy of the social credit party is concerned I feel sure, from the statements that have been made in the house in support of the subamendment, that no question will be raised, and it would be appropriate to take their own statement of policy in that respect. Therefore I think it proper to read the statement of policy adopted by the Social Credit Association of Canada in 1944 which, I understand, has been followed since that time. It states:

> The Social Credit Association of Canada reaffirms the three simple demands of Social Credit, namely:
> (i) To establish a national accounting system whereby we will know at stated intervals the net increase in our real wealth for which additional purchasing power must be created, free of debt and interest, and distributed to every man, woman and child in two ways—
> (ii) A dividend, paid at regular intervals, increasing as the national wealth increases; and > (iii) A subsidy, or adjusted price on all wanted goods for sale by retailers;
> And that the proportion of new purchasing power to be allotted to (ii) and (iii) be determined democratically by our representatives in parliament.

Mr. Speaker, if that is the idea of a realistic financial and economic policy which is to be interpreted by a resolution such as that now before us, then most certainly under no circumstances could I support this subamendment. Because what does not seem to be fully accepted by those who express their belief in this policy, with what I am sure is deep conviction, is the fact that the proposal they are making calls for an ironclad system of controls, without which no such system as this could possibly work. Nothing else would make a strange device of this kind possible.

The fact is that there has been very little evidence of the adoption of policies of this kind by a Social Credit government that has been in power for some years in the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Do you know why they are not in existence there?

Mr. Drew: The hon. member suggests I should know about it. I should think they are not in effect in the province of Alberta for the very obvious reason that they cannot be put into effect under our constitution, and it may well be that those who drafted these resolutions in the first place were well aware of that fact. I hope they were, and that they were not so utterly without knowledge of the constitution of this country as to think really that they could put some of those ideas into effect in the provincial legislatures of this country.

We, however, are now dealing with this subject on a national level, where it could be put into effect; and I, for one, most certainly have no thought of subscribing to a doctrine of this kind which could be put into effect by the parliament of Canada. The reason the Social Credit government in Alberta has met with such continuing support as it has received is due to the fact that this doctrine never has been in effect in that province.

It is for these reasons that I certainly have no thought of supporting the subamendment. And may I say only this, with the utmost personal respect for some of the individuals who put these views before the house, that some of the statements made during this session in regard to financial policy for Canada read like statements out of "Alice in Wonderland". Far from being realistic, they are utterly unrealistic. They completely ignore any of the economic facts of life, and any government which attempted to run this country under a plan of that kind would rapidly encounter the most disastrous consequences.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with another subject that has come before us. It was raised in this house yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) in a manner which calls for comment on my part. I am referring to the statements that were made by the senior member for Queens (Mr. McLure) about Mr. Yousuf Karsh. In the statement of one of the most respected members of this house, and a man who has given inestimable service to the province from which he comes, he did in his anger, in relation to certain remarks that had been made, use a term which was taken out of an article appearing in a newspaper and which many hon. members of this house thought was only used in the context of the editorial. Hansard does disclose that the word was used in a way that might be open to misinterpretation.

I think that hon. members of this house, who know the intense pride of the people of that beautiful island province in their own island, are well aware of the way in which they naturally regard anything that appears to be a criticism of the province of which they are so intensely proud. I have known Mr. Yousuf Karsh for many years. I think it was unfortunate that he made the statements which he did about meals in Prince Edward Island. I must confess that my only complaint about meals in Prince Edward Island is that they are too good. When I have been there I have found that my great difficulty was to restrain my perpetual appetite for good food; and I do, in all seriousness, hope that I may have the opportunity some time of taking Mr. Yousuf Karsh to many places in Prince Edward Island where I have eaten food as good as I have eaten at any time or at any place I have been.

I think that perhaps from long acquaintance with Prince Edward Island, and from intimate association with the people of that island going back for many years, I can understand something of the anger that would be aroused by the suggestion that their meals were not in keeping with the great traditions of that province. As a matter of fact, any such suggestion is denied by people who go to Prince Edward Island as visitors. All one needs to do is to look at the list of visitors at any of the hotels in Prince Edward Island and he will find that people who can travel anywhere go there because of the accommodation and good meals.

I might point out that one most respected man who has lived in this country for many years, Field Marshal Alexander, while governor general, chose Prince Edward Island as a place to take his family when they were on their holidays. I think that in itself should remove any doubt about the quality of the meals of that island.

I do think that it was unfortunate that any such comment was made and I can understand something of the resentment it would arouse.

Then, of course, there is something else. Those of us who know Prince Edward Island also recall what should be borne in mind in considering those words. I know that, in Prince Edward Island, most of us who have not the privilege of having been born or brought up there are described as foreigners. That practice goes back to the early days when their pride in their own provnice, while it still remained out of confederation, made them somewhat critical of those less fortunate who lived in other parts of what is now Canada. That has carried forward and to many the term is well known in Prince Edward Island as one which is not used in the same way that we use it. Nevertheless, I do know that the word as used and as reported in Hansard is open to misinterpretation. It is for that reason that I am dealing with the matter today because I would not want to leave on the record an implication such as was placed there yesterday in the remarks of one of the hon. members on the other side of the house. The word has been interpreted as applying to all those who were not born in Canada and who have chosen this country as their home.

Perhaps I should express resentment myself if that were to be the interpretation; because, if people are to be called foreigners under that formula, then, of course, my own wife would be described as a foreigner. I feel perfectly sure that no such interpretation was to be placed on the word but I do wish to make it perfectly clear that on all occasions when this subject has been under discussion, long before I had the privilege of entering the House of Commons, I have been emphatic in my statements that those who have chosen Canada as their homeland are Canadians—no matter where they were born or from what national stock they come. We welcome them to our country. We are welcoming many of them today. We wish to leave no thoughts in the mind of any one of them that there is in this country any distinction between one Canadian and another so long as that individual is a Canadian either by birth or by choice.

This country has built its strength by the blending together of people of different races and of different blood. The day is long past when we can regard the population of this country merely as a partnership between the two great races which joined hands many years ago to lay the foundation of this nation. In this country today we have large numbers of people whose blood stock stems back to many of the great nations of Europe and of other parts of the world.

I wish to make quite clear that when I refer to my own position in this house I am stating the position of our party, repeated and emphasized many times, that there are no foreigners in Canada except those who are simply visiting Canada from some foreign land, and that every person who has chosen Canada as his or her home is a Canadian and we regard them as good Canadians unless their conduct in any way challenges that position. May I say that Mr. Yousuf Karsh is a distinguished Canadian and has been a distinguished Canadian for many years. He is a Canadian who has brought honour to this country by great attainment in what is today one of the most important arts. Not only is he a great Canadian but he has resisted many inducements, which must have been very appealing, to go elsewhere.

Having known him personally for many years, I am aware that from many of the great cities of the United States offers have come to him which from a financial viewpoint were most attractive. I know that the reason he has stayed here is that he cherishes his Canadian citizenship, and for that very reason he has demonstrated that he is a Canadian citizen who is prepared to maintain that citizenship by choice and by preference. Again may I say that this is something that need not have been discussed at this length were it not for the manner in which it was introduced into the house yesterday afternoon. I very much regret the fact that the hon. member for Ottawa West sought to imply that a comment by the senior member for Queens (Mr. McLure) that had been made in the context to which I have referred was an interpretation of the attitude of the Conservative party.

At the same time he made a political speech about the record of the Liberal party which was strangely out of place for an hon. member who has sat in this house during this session and has applauded the continuing appeals to prejudice which have been made by different members since the session began. I would also point out that it is hardly appropriate for the hon. member for Ottawa West to speak about this subject in terms of such self-righteousness at the very time that the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Kickham) was interjecting into the discussion these words: "If the hon. member made such a statement in Armenia he would be kicked out of the country".

I merely point out that the statement that was being referred to was the same statement by Mr. Karsh. Let us not for one moment pretend that careless comments or words which were not intended in the manner in which they appear in the context are the fault of any single member of the house. I certainly would be the last to pretend that there are not many words I have spoken that could be taken out of their context and meaning and so interpreted. I suspect that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would not suggest that there were not words of his that from time to time might have been open to similar misinterpretation. I suspect that there is hardly a single member of the house who can say in complete sincerity, as he looks back over the many things that have been said, that there is nothing that could be taken out of its general context and interpreted in a manner which was never intended.

Therefore I leave this subject simply with the expressed hope that a statement provoked by a criticism of something that is associated with a proud province, a province which has great justification for its pride, will not in any way be taken as interpreting either the general sentiments of the member who expressed his dislike of the criticism in the first place or of any of the members of the party to which he belongs. Having regard to other statements and interjections that have been made in this debate, I would hope that the matter would end there—

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no.

Mr. Dupuis: Guilty conscience.

Mr. Drew: —and I am sure it will end there in the mind of every sincere member of the house who is not himself trying to appeal to prejudice.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Drew: I wish to deal now, Mr. Speaker, with certain aspects of the Currie report, and the implications of that report in relation to the wider problems of national defence. In considering the importance of any aspect of this problem, it is essential that we bear in mind that the whole question is one which is primarily connected with national survival. We are not discussing the ordinary administration of any department. We are discussing the effectiveness of that department upon whose activities our contribution to the common defences of freedom is going to depend in very large measure. Therefore, we must examine any information we receive in regard to the effectiveness of that department with due consideration as to its possible bearing upon the whole question of defence, an extremely important question in relation to whether the enormous sums being spent on defence are being spent in the most efficient manner.

Before I proceed to deal with that part of the discussion, I wish to return to certain questions and answers which are recorded in Hansard of this session. First, I wish to read from Hansard of December 1, 1952, page 203. Before the orders of the day, I asked the following question:

> I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he inform us when he will receive the report which we were assured was being prepared some time ago by Mr. Currie with respect to the administration of the Department of National Defence so far as it affects Petawawa camp?

The answer of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was as follows:

> I have not been in touch with Mr. Currie myself for some time but I am informed by the deputy minister that he has been in touch with members of Mr. Currie's staff, and that it is expected that the report will be available within the next week or two. It has not been made yet.

Then I asked a supplementary question as follows:

> As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government has received an interim report?

The Minister of National Defence replied, no.

Then on December 4, as recorded in Hansard at page 321, there are the following questions and answers:

Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, in view of the fact that it has been announced that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) will be leaving tomorrow, I wish to direct a question to him. I ask whether, since Mr. Currie's appointment was announced on April 21, 1952, he has received any positive recommendations from Mr. Currie in regard to the subject matter of his inquiry, in writing or orally, and if so is the minister prepared to convey to the house some information as to the nature of the recommendations which have been made.

To this the Minister of National Defence replied:

Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Currie's appointment I have seen him about this matter on one occasion only. That was when he was in national defence headquarters carrying on his inquiry. I asked him to see me and he did. I then asked him if he was getting all the information that he wanted and he said he was. I told him that if at any time he wanted further powers or more information such would be made available to him.

I have had no other communication of whatever kind with him.

Then I asked the following question:

Mr. Speaker, I would ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister read to us a letter from Mr. Currie, assuring us at the time of his appointment that he would proceed with the utmost speed to make inquiry into this matter and communicate his views to the minister, may I ask if the minister has pointed that out to him and has he not indicated that it is very desirable that we have the report at the earliest possible date.

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I have not interfered with Mr. Currie's investigation in any way whatever. He knows as well as the Leader of the Opposition that it is desirable that a report should be made at the earliest possible date.

I then said:

Mr. Speaker, I ask one further supplementary question. To the knowledge of the minister, has Mr. Currie seen the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to this matter within recent weeks?

The minister answered:

I have no information bearing on that at all. Had Mr. Currie seen the Prime Minister I am sure the Prime Minister would have spoken to me about it. Since he has not done so I assume that Mr. Currie has not seen him.

Then I said:

There seems a strange lack of interest in such an important matter.

May I just repeat the words in this question and answer. I asked, and I am quoting:

. . . whether, since Mr. Currie's appointment was announced on April 21, 1952, he has received any positive recommendations from Mr. Currie in regard to the subject matter of his inquiry, in writing or orally, and if so is the minister prepared to convey to the house some information as to the nature of the recommendations which have been made.

To that the reply was that there was no information available. Then on December 8, as recorded at page 415 of Hansard, I said:

I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. Is he in a position yet to inform us definitely when we may receive a copy of the report by Mr. Currie which was promised us last spring?

The reply was:

No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say because I have not received the report yet myself.

I then said as follows:

Will the acting minister take steps to find out from Mr. Currie when the report will be available?

The reply was:

From the remarks which the minister made in the house a few days ago I understood that Mr. Currie had indicated that the report would be forthcoming within a week or ten days. I presume that estimate was made with knowledge of what was possible on his part. I do not mind making inquiry if it is desired.

I then said:

I would point out that the minister made a general statement with regard to that before he made the statement in the house that he had not been in touch with Mr. Currie. It is for that reason I ask the direct question: Will the acting minister find out from Mr. Currie when the report will be ready?

Then on December 12, in the absence of the minister and the acting minister, I directed a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence as follows:

In the absence of the Minister of National Defence as well as the Acting Minister of National Defence, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Can he assure us that the report by Mr. George S. Currie will be presented to this house before we rise for the Christmas recess?

The parliamentary assistant replied as follows:

I have no information on that matter, Mr. Speaker. I shall take it as notice of a question.

I then said:

In view of the assurances given last spring, may I ask that steps be taken towards ascertaining when this report will be ready?

The parliamentary assistant replied:

As I recall, Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of National Defence left this question was asked, and he replied that the report would be given in the course of the next few days.

I then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am directing my remarks to you in the form of a question. Last spring, on April 21, assurance was given to this house that a report was to be presented at the earliest possible date. This house acted upon that statement. In answer to several requests we have been given no information, and I suggest that the department is in contempt of this house in the course it is following.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that those questions and answers are extremely important and that the implications of them go far beyond any question of the accuracy or otherwise of statements that have been made or of the nature of the report now before us. We had the positive statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), or certainly a clear impression was conveyed, that neither in writing nor orally had he received any positive suggestions from Mr. Currie. Mr. Speaker, the whole effect of the answers given to the questions that I have read is that the minister, the acting minister and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence knew nothing about this report and that they were simply awaiting the natural processes of the original instructions which had been given. In the light of that impression and of the statements which I have read, I find it difficult indeed to see how anything but the most serious impression can be left by the words of Mr. Currie in presenting this report to the Minister of National Defence. I would point out that it is dated November 26. It is a report by a man who has been recognized on both sides of this house as one of great competence, integrity and business experience. I think we still require some explanation as to what happened between November 26 and December 8. I should particularly like to point out these words in the letter from Mr. Currie to the minister which began the report. On the very first page I find these words addressed to the minister:

> It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigations have already been seized on and important reforms are already being carried out.

Mr. Speaker, is it possible for any hon. member of this house to be in any doubt that those suggestions were made to the Minister of National Defence? Is it possible for any hon. member of this house to doubt that in any event those suggestions were brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence? Let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Currie has said "important reforms are already being carried out". I hope that no one is going to suggest that important reforms have been carried out without the minister's knowing anything about them. I must confess that it would almost seem that this might have been a happy accident, but surely that cannot be the case. Surely any inefficiency that existed cannot have reached the point that reforms in the Department of National Defence have been carried out without the minister's knowing about them or knowing the basis upon which those reforms have been introduced. I leave the matter there, but I ask every hon. member of this house to go back over those questions and answers, to read those words of Mr. Currie, and to consider in all earnestness whether any hon. member of this house in future has any right to accept any assurance of the present Minister of National Defence with regard to any aspect of the administration of his department.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not know whether you heard the words that have just been enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). If you did, I would ask you to act upon them.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the Leader of the Opposition to say that no hon. member of the house could accept the word of the present Minister of National Defence. I also heard him previously suggest that no hon. member could doubt that the Minister of National Defence knew that suggestions had been made and had stated in this house that he did not know they had been made.

It is not in accordance with our parliamentary rules to question the honesty of any hon. member; and that includes, of course, members of the government. I included the words "members of the government" to emphasize the fact that it makes no difference whether the word of a member of the government is being questioned or that of any other member of the house. The Leader of the Opposition must withdraw his statement.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I would point out that I asked the question whether hon. members could in future accept assurances from the minister in the light of these remarks. Does Your Honour state that that is unparliamentary?

Mr. Speaker: I think the Leader of the Opposition went further than that, and in doing so I would say that that also is unparliamentary. It definitely implies that in this instance the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has knowingly said what is untrue.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, do I take it that your ruling is that the question in the form I have asked it is not parliamentary?

Mr. Speaker: On account of the implication involved I say that the question is not parliamentary.

Mr. Drew: I naturally accept your ruling. The words stand as a matter of record, and I ask the government to consider the effect of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. When the words are withdrawn they do not stand as a matter of record; otherwise there would be no purpose in having a withdrawal. If the words still stand as a matter of record—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, we are talking about different words. I say that the words in the questions and answers that I have read stand as a matter of record and I hope that the government will examine them very carefully and the import of those words.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the Leader of the Opposition has withdrawn the question which he put with respect to accepting the word of the Minister of National Defence in the future. We should clear it up. I understand the Leader of the Opposition has withdrawn.

Mr. Drew: I said that I accepted your ruling and acted accordingly, and I did. I am proceeding to deal with the report and I assure you that any attempts that may be made to hedge this report about with any technical restrictions will not impress the public of Canada, in view of the disclosures that are in it.

I have pointed out that on page 1 of this report Mr. Currie has pointed out in clear and implicit words that he made recommendations by way of interim suggestions, and that some of these had been acted upon. Then, on page 3, I come to the disclosure of what happened at Petawawa, and in reading these words I wish to deal with the very obvious attempt that has been made, and what would appear to be part of a concerted plan, to lay the blame for what has happened upon members of the army.

Under our parliamentary system of responsible government, it is the goverment that is responsible if anything has gone wrong. It is not only the Department of National Defence that is responsible; it is the government, under our system of joint responsibility, and that seems to be completely disregarded by this government in so many instances.

I wish to point out that at page 3 of the report Mr. Currie refers to the Department of National Defence. He is not referring to the army, to the brass hats, as we heard from some of the hon. members this morning on the other side. I quote his words which appear at page 3:

> . . . it is an unhappy circumstance that the beginning of this investigation lies not inside the Department of National Defence and its full complement of regulations and supervising personnel, but with the receipt of an anonymous letter couched in the following terms:
>
> "The Commissioner, Royal Canadian Mounted Police,
>
> Ottawa, Ont.
>
> Dear Sir,
>
> There is reason to believe that an illegal transaction of army goods has taken place between army personnel of No. 3 works coy., R.C.E., and . . . company within the past few days.
> This transaction involves the selling of several railway carloads of cook stoves and heaters without proper army authority."

Then the letter goes on to suggest places where this may be followed up. On the page following we find again that it is not the army, it is not the general staff, it is not the engineering services that are mentioned; it is the Department of National Defence. I quote the words of Mr. Currie:

> It must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions.

In the words of Mr. Currie, the auditor of the Department of National Defence had reported to the Department of National Defence unsatisfactory conditions, and, according to Mr. Currie, had performed his functions conscientiously.

After having described various things that had happened and losses that had taken place Mr. Currie said at the bottom of page 9 of the report:

> How many more there may have been will never be known.

And then he went on, on page 11, after having recounted some of the detail:

> My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty.

Then on page 15 of the report we come to the statement which is perhaps the most important one in the whole report. When we recognize the fact that this department is spending approximately half of all the moneys collected by taxes from the people of Canada at this time, these words should be read with that in mind:

> If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this break-down. If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Where did you get your copy?

Mr. Croll: He ought to know; a copy got away from him awfully quickly.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, if any hon. member is anxious to direct a question or make a statement in intelligible terms I shall welcome it at this point and deal with it, but I must confess that neither from the right rear nor from the front am I able to understand the nature of the interjections that have been made.

An hon. Member: It was pretty clear.

Mr. Drew: Then we have the statement that has already been referred to on different occasions, and which appears on page 17 of the report:

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up. There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not always present in the degree required.

When the other statements are recalled, Mr. Speaker, and it is remembered that they refer to the Department of National Defence, there is not much doubt about who the higher up authorities are, even if we do not yet know whether the unrevised report which has been mentioned in the house is the correct one, instead of the one now before us. It will be recalled that it has been stated in this house by an hon. member of the house who, of necessity, accepted responsibility for that statement, that these words are substituted for the words "at or near the top". Now, the top, or near the top, in this context, obviously refers to the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: The general staff.

Mr. Drew: Once again I hear the remark, or the blur of words, "the general staff".

Mr. Ferrie: Whom are you trying to protect in the general staff?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I hope that interjection is duly recorded in Hansard. The statement I heard clearly was, "Whom are you trying to protect in the general staff?". Mr. Speaker,—and I hear another "Who" from another Liberal member. Mr. Speaker, let us hope that we are not going to have a repetition of some of the extremely unfair practices which have already cast serious reflections upon the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Ferrie: You are doing it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the persistence of those who are seeking to divert attention from the fact that the Department of National Defence should be responsible for national defence, if it is not, is merely evidence, as I pointed out before, of what appears to be a concerted attempt to create the impression that these members of the armed forces, and not the general staff—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hope Hansard got that.

Mr. Drew: —and not the Department of National Defence, are responsible.

An hon. Member: You were right the first time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the obvious delight of anyone who seems to see the possibility of reflection on the general staff, which has been displayed here so frequently by some hon. members opposite, indicates exactly how much respect those members have for the army, in spite of all the pretence that they have made.

Mr. Speaker, this report is one which brings us again to certain questions which have been unanswered. In the first place, I had expected and had hoped that we would hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning some explanation in regard to the report we now have before us. It is his responsibility as a member of the House of Commons.

One hon. member has stated that there were changes in the text. That still remains to be disposed of. That must be disposed of, and I trust will be disposed of without any details left unanswered before this house rises. There is a great deal to explain about this report. It is dated November 26, and we received it here in the House of Commons on December 15.

An hon. Member: You have not received it yet.

Mr. Drew: The fact is, of course, that most members do not yet know the full details of this report.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is in Hansard; everything is in Hansard.

Mr. Drew: The desire displayed by so many members on the other side of the house to place responsibility on the general staff would suggest that all members on the other side of the house, including members of the government, are most anxious to throw responsibility for this on the general staff.

An hon. Member: Where should it be?

Mr. Drew: Yes, I hear from one of the ministers, "Where should it be?"

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Casselman: There is a running comment all the time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this is strangely reminiscent of the Connelly incident, about which as yet we have no information. There we had a scapegoat; and I do not think there is any responsible person in this country who yet believes that we have heard the real story about Brigadier Connelly.

Mr. Ferrie: You would drop it if you heard it now.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the interpolation by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) is simply indicative of the lack of appreciation by some members in this house of the real seriousness of the report, and its import in regard to the direction of national defence in this country.

Brigadier Connelly was a scapegoat. Brigadier Connelly was sent to Korea with the acclaim of this government. Brigadier Connelly went to Korea—

An hon. Member: Went to Japan.

Mr. Drew: Yes, and he went to Korea, too.

An hon. Member: To Japan.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Brigadier Connelly went to Korea with the assurance that he was a highly efficient officer.

An hon. Member: Who told you that?

Mr. Drew: He performed his services there, and in Japan, with an efficiency which called for the approval of the senior officers under whom he served. No explanation has been given for his dismissal—and it was nothing else. There was only one of those statements, from an informed source, which left a very serious reflection upon Brigadier Connelly. This reflection was cast upon him without even offering him a chance of challenging any individual. That cowardly procedure should stop now, and never be repeated. It is bad enough when reports that are afterwards denied by the departments which issue them in this way deal merely with ordinary problems of administration. But, dealing with an officer and his reputation, I can think of nothing more unfair than to cast aspersions upon that officer by a carefully planted statement from what is described as a well informed source, without the name appearing. Having regard to what was done in this case, I suggest, for the consideration of the news agencies of this country, the advisability of a decision that reports of this nature shall not be issued unless the individual has the courage and decency to permit his name to be appended thereto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): You scored at last.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this is the first glimmer of hope that discussion in this parliament is actually producing results. We have at least accomplished one reform this afternoon in this respect.

Now, the report that we have before us does not by any manner of means refer to only the army or to the army works services. May I just read these words from page 17 to indicate how directly this report is related to the very point, to the Department of National Defence, and I quote:

> The Department of National Defence (including the army works services) was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime.

That is the end of the quotation and the author was dealing with the Department of National Defence, pointing out that steps had not yet been taken to bring the whole organization into line with the requirements of peace. It is the Department of National Defence. And, Mr. Speaker, I hope that no attempt will be made to find scapegoats either in the general staff or in the ranks of the army for a department which must, under our responsible system, accept full responsibility for what has happened.

This is not by any means the first time that this subject has been before the house. The subject has been under discussion over and over again and the need for a full examination of the whole military set-up, and its place in relation to the Department of National Defence, has been emphasized again and again for the last three years. I shall quote from words that I addressed to this house on November 3, 1949. I am quoting from page 1405 of Hansard for that date:

> This is not a new subject. Over and over again in the past the same arguments have been made, and the advances that have taken place throughout the years have been as a result of the appointment of committees of some kind which could inquire into the real requirements of our defence forces, and their efficient organization for the tasks they might be called upon to undertake. The modern army system in Great Britain, which we in Canada have followed to a considerable extent, came about as a result of the findings of the famous Esher committee of 1904. Demands have been made since the time of the South African war for an inquiry into the organization of the forces, the suitability of training, and their ability to undertake any tasks they might be called upon to perform in the future. It was not until that committee was appointed that the errors that had been so apparent in the South African war were overcome, and an effective reorganization took place under the modern general staff system. Other famous and important inquiries followed at different times. After the first world war General Otter made his famous findings known as the Otter report. In it was laid down the appropriate organization of the land defence forces of Canada, and the way in which they should be trained for the tasks they might be called upon to undertake.
> It was not for some years that effective steps were taken to bring about the necessary reorganization, and in the meantime much had happened.

In 1933 and 1934 extensive inquiries were conducted by the conference of defence associations, a body which embraced both permanent and non-permanent officers of the defence services of Canada. It was as a result of their recommendations that the reorganization took place which made it possible for Canada to mobilize its forces effectively at the outbreak of the last war.

Another war has passed. Four years have elapsed since it ended. The evidence is now clear on all sides that it is essential that there be an examination of the over-all plan of national defence, the suitability of the organization of our forces for that plan, the effectiveness of the training that is undertaken, and the proper expenditure of the money devoted to this purpose. There is no occasion to go into the past. We are confronted today with the necessity of spending enormous sums of money, approximately $400 million. Only a few days ago it was indicated to us that a bill would be presented for the unification of the defence forces of Canada. Unification undoubtedly is highly desirable, but unification will not be very effective unless the forces which are unified have themselves been placed in proper relationship to other forces, having regard to what is conceived to be Canada's particular place in the general over-all picture today.

It is only by the assessment of our requirements that we can know whether our money is being properly spent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I was there referring to $400 million which we then regarded as an enormous sum. Now it is more than $2 billion, and by just that extent the importance of knowing where the money is going has increased.

I want to read these words from the reply of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) which indicate, as clearly as words can indicate, what the attitude has been at any time we have sought to emphasize the need for an inquiry of this nature. I read from Hansard of November 3, 1949, page 1415, these words by the Minister of National Defence:

With regard to organization, I believe I can say without fear of successful contradiction that in the work of unification, co-ordination and the streamlining of our forces, navy, army and air forces, the Department of National Defence of Canada has made more progress than any other country in the world.

That, Mr. Speaker, has been the whole attitude of the department when any suggestion has been made that there could be improvements. The answer has been: No, we are better than anybody else in the world—and no recommendations were given serious consideration.

We have before us now, Mr. Speaker, recommendations which cannot possibly be disregarded. That pompous facade, which has been presented over and over by this government, has been torn apart and torn apart permanently by this present report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: No more can these arrogant assurances that the Department of National Defence is above any suggestion of improvement possibly have the slightest sound of reality, in view of the disclosures of this report. It is the Department of National Defence that is condemned by this report; and the Department of National Defence must accept responsibility. It is the Department of National Defence that is challenged by every report now before us.

We want no scapegoats for the minister and those within his department who should be called upon by this department to accept the full responsibility. May I add something more. It is not only the responsibility of the department, it is the responsibility of the whole government until it acts in some way to deal effectively with this situation. The attitude of the members of the government in this respect was disclosed in a very remarkable way by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on December 8. I would point out that it is very significant that it was December 8, because we are informed that was the day this report was delivered. On that day the Secretary of State for External Affairs interpolated into his speech on foreign affairs the following words, as found at page 418 of Hansard:

By way of interpolation, and to dispel any remaining suspicion which may linger in his mind in regard to the relationship of myself and my department to that matter, I would merely say at this time—to clear the matter up, and I hope that it will as far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned—that neither I nor my department made any representations, oral or written, formal or informal, to the Department of National Defence about Brigadier Connelly and the Koje incident at any time. Neither I nor my department have had anything whatever to do with his retirement. That, Mr. Speaker, is by way of an aside which I consider in the circumstances to be necessary, as I did not have the privilege of attending the session of the house when this matter came up.

Let me emphasize these words: "Neither I nor my department have had anything whatever to do with his retirement." Under our system of collective responsibility, Mr. Speaker, every member of the government is responsible for every act of the government. As a member of the government the Secretary of State for External Affairs is responsible for what has happened to Brigadier Connelly. Did I hear a member of the government say "no"?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are hearing voices. Nobody said anything.

Mr. Drew: No, I am not hearing voices. Someone on the opposite side did say "no". I repeat that under our system of collective responsibility every member of the government is collectively responsible for the acts of the government, and it is the responsibility of the government to deal with matters of this kind with a recognition of that collective responsibility. Neither the Secretary of State for External Affairs nor any other member of the government can escape responsibility for the retirement of Brigadier Connelly, call it what you will. Neither can they escape responsibility for the remarks in this report with respect to a department of the government. Nor will they escape responsibility if any attempt is made to divert attention from those who should accept responsibility by seeking to find scapegoats in uniform instead of accepting the criticism in the quarter where it should be accepted.

The report is before us. It deals only with a limited part of the whole question of national defence. No hon. member of the house who has an opportunity to read it will question the sincerity, integrity or earnestness of Mr. Currie in the task that he has performed. We have had assurances from the government of their confidence in Mr. Currie. We have expressed our confidence. I hope that confidence has been re-emphasized by this report. It certainly has been re-emphasized so far as I am concerned and I am sure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, as Hansard does not record laughter I would point out for the record that laughter greeted the remark that this report reinforces confidence in Mr. Currie. It certainly does reinforce confidence in Mr. Currie because he has dealt frankly with the problem before him and has placed the responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the Department of National Defence and in turn the government. This report deals only with the part of the responsibility of the Department of National Defence with which Mr. Currie was directed to deal. Already the suggestion has been made that further inquiries are necessary. I should think that the very wording of the report and its findings make it clear that further inquiries are necessary at the very earliest date. Moreover, it is clear that further independent inquiries, of the same kind as those which took place and which have led to this very important report, are necessary.

Therefore I make the suggestion to the government in all earnestness, and with the proof before them of the effectiveness of the procedure, that they reappoint Mr. Currie to conduct an inquiry into every aspect of the organization and accounting methods of the Department of National Defence. Here we have a report dealing with one part of the activities of the department. Here we have a report that I feel sure will stand the test of challenge. Here we have a report that has expressed impartial findings. If the government wishes to deal effectively with the problem now before us, I urge them to reappoint Mr. Currie without delay, to give him the widest authority and to permit him to inquire into every aspect of the organization, accounting methods and other related duties of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, one thing that has alarmed me in listening to this debate so far has been the attitude taken by some members on the government side of the house who, through their interjections, have indicated that the main people to be condemned as a result of the report which was tabled yesterday are the members of the general staff. We have a democratic government in Canada, and this year we are spending some $2,100 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money to build up the armed forces of the country in order to protect us. If the interjections are indications of the attitude of the government toward their general staff, who are responsible for the building of this security, then I am afraid we are not getting very much for our money. It seems to me if we are to have security there must be co-operation and confidence between the government and the general staff, not bickering, as would appear from the interjections that have been made so far in this debate.

I should like to deal with the manner in which the report was tabled. When tabling the report yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) also tabled a letter from General Simonds. The government appointed Mr. Currie to make an investigation into certain things which were taking place in our armed forces. A report was made by Mr. Currie and was presented to the government, but instead of presenting the report to parliament by itself as it stood a letter from General Simonds, the head of the army, was tabled with it. I should like an explanation from the Prime Minister as to why that procedure was followed.

Mr. St. Laurent: Does the hon. member wish me to give the explanation now?

Mr. Wright: I think the Prime Minister will be replying later.

Mr. St. Laurent: Not necessarily. I take it then that the hon. member does not want the explanation.

Mr. Wright: The Prime Minister may explain.

Mr. St. Laurent: The explanation was that General Simonds requested that it be done; he suggested that if it were not done it might appear that the government was accepting this report—because it might be so construed—as a reflection on the general staff, himself and his officers for whom he was responsible; that it was a report susceptible of another construction because it was supposed to deal with only one branch. But if it were generalized and, if this paragraph from which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) read extracts, were taken to be a general statement about the set-up of the army, it would reflect upon those whose reputation it was his duty to protect. It was only because I was convinced by the representations made, that he would feel it was unfair to him if his memorandum were not made public at the same time, that it was included with the production of the report.

Mr. Wright: That is exactly what I feared. The government apparently was more interested in protecting the people whom they were investigating than in protecting the money of the people of this country.

The Prime Minister indicated that he hoped we would not take pieces of this report out of their context, and use them. I was surprised that the Prime Minister should be the first to do that. As a matter of fact, he used one sentence, and this is the sentence:

> It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks.

Now, let me read what went before that to see whether it was taken in its context. Before that, Mr. Currie said:

> The contents of this chapter are chiefly based upon my studies there—

That is at Petawawa.

> —because of the existence there of a combination of factors; lax control, poor discipline and the presence of dishonest personnel. The combination proved disastrous.
> It is mentioned in this context chiefly for the purpose of praising the personnel at other depots for not walking through the door which a fundamentally loose situation had opened before them.

In other words, the Department of National Defence has left doors open, and the commissioner commends the armed forces for not doing more pilfering. Time and again in the report it is indicated that it is the Department of National Defence that is responsible for this situation. It is indicated that the auditor general of the Department of National Defence made reports to the government pointing out irregularities that were taking place, yet no action was taken as a result of those reports. Time and again that took place. What possible excuse can the government have when they were notified that these irregularities were taking place and yet failed to take any action to prevent them?

I am sure that if any hon. member of this house were a member of a town council or a city council and he dismissed the police force and took no adequate measures to protect the people in his community, he would be severely criticized. Yet here we find that the Department of National Defence, after repeated notices, has failed to take the necessary measures to protect the people of this country from pilfering and irregularities. The ministry and the individual members of the government have tried repeatedly in this house to indicate that this was just petty pilfering; that it did not amount to very much. Well, that is not what Mr. Currie says in his report. He has indicated that it is a serious matter. It is a very serious matter for instance when a dam is built in a certain creek at a cost estimated from $3,000 to $4,000, and Mr. Currie says:

> Its utility is not clear to me, and it was, in any event, not authorized by army headquarters.

Up in that area that dam is known by a certain name, and certain officers go up there to fish in the pool which just happened to be created.

Mr. Larson: Did the Minister of National Defence build it?

Mr. Wright: He certainly knew it was built. I am not so sure he may not have fished there at some time.

Mr. Larson: Did he?

Mr. Dickey: You are certainly fishing now.

Mr. Fleming: Look out that he does not catch you.

Mr. Wright: I suppose it is only petty pilfering when someone walks away with 18,000 bags of cement, 18 car loads that is, practically a trainload; or when someone walks away with a baby tank or a whole railroad siding, that is petty pilfering.

The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver), in a speech delivered earlier this session, tried to indicate to the house that this did not amount to very much and that adequate measures were being taken to correct anything that might have been wrong. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) indicated that it was quite possible there was something seriously wrong at Penhold in Alberta with regard to the construction of housing. What indication has the government given that they have taken any notice of his speech? What investigations are they carrying out to see that this is not general across the country and not just in the particular department that has been investigated?

I want to say this, that this government have deliberately, through their policies, encouraged this sort of thing. Last year in this house we voted approximately $2,100 million for defence purposes, while the year before we voted $1,725 million, when the government knew that there were not the facilities in this country to produce the goods and services that amount of money represented. Here is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in this house on April 8, 1952, as recorded at page 1247 of Hansard:

> Last year we planned, and parliament authorized, defence expenditures in the total amount of $1,725 million. Actually we have spent about $1,441 million, or a shortfall of $284 million. How could this come about? Let me give an example. We had planned and expected to spend about $210 million on major defence construction projects; but because of difficulties of design and construction, and shortages of labour and materials, we have found it possible to spend only about $165 million on these projects before the end of the year. The acquisition of machine tools and of military equipment and its components in the United States poses exceptionally difficult problems of estimation as to final cost, delivery dates and dates of payment. In the year just ended the story has been one of unavoidable delays and postponements.

In other words, we voted the money and this government should have known, through its economic experts, how much military equipment this country could produce in any given year to take up that amount of money. When you vote a department more money than they could possibly spend, more money than the facilities of this country are capable of producing goods to take up, then it seems to me you are asking for trouble. You are giving people money in huge amounts when there are no physical goods upon which they can spend it. As a result, you get the sort of spending that is indicated in the Currie report. Surely, if this government wants to use the people's money in an economic way to create the security and the armed forces that are necessary for this country, they should use some reasonable methods of control.

We are not getting the security we should have in this country. If someone can walk into a camp like Petawawa and walk off with a railroad siding or walk off with 18 carloads of cement, there could be sabotage in such a camp. There is no system of checks set up by our Department of National Defence. This makes it possible for people to walk into camps across this country and walk away with goods to the extent that has been indicated.

Mr. Larson: What was the equipment officer doing all this time while this siding was being torn up?

Mr. Wright: The hon. member asks what the equipment officer was doing. Who is responsible for the equipment officer? It is the Department of National Defence. Why does not the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) ask the Minister of National Defence some of these questions that he is asking me? He is the man who must give to this House of Commons answers to these questions, not the hon. member for Kindersley. The minister has consistently made little of these things; he has told this house that there is nothing much the matter, just a little bit of pilfering which may take place around any army camp. That is not what this report indicates. This report indicates on the part of the Department of National Defence neglect to use the proper supervisory methods that are necessary when any department is spending the sums of money that this department is spending. When this government imposes on the people of this country taxes for the purpose of procuring security for the country, they have a right to see that that money is spent in a manner which will obtain that security and to see that it is not frittered away as is indicated in this report.

I will be interested to hear what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has to say with regard to this matter, and I will be interested to hear what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has to say. It seems passing strange that, after two days of debate, no member of the government has yet seen fit to take part in this debate. It seems to me that they are a long time in reaching some decision with regard to the matter. This is not something new. This report is something that was asked for by the government. Mr. Currie was appointed to make this report. That fact indicates that the government knew that certain things were taking place or they would not have called on Mr. Currie to make this report. Yet now, when the report is tabled here, it seems to come as so much of a surprise to the government that nobody seems to be able to rise and say anything about it.

Mr. Fraser: They are speechless.

Mr. Wright: I have been in this house for a considerable number of years and I think this is an occasion. I have never before seen the government sit quiet for so long.

Mr. Mutch: We might as well hear the charge.

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister is circulating around.

Mr. Wright: Someone says that the Prime Minister is circulating around. Perhaps he will collect ideas. I hope that before long we shall get his ideas in this debate.

Mr. Mutch: He is in the right place to get them.

Mr. Wright: The point is this, Mr. Speaker. A serious condition has existed for a considerable length of time but as yet we have had from the government no indication as to what remedies they are going to apply. The sooner we get that indication from the government the better satisfied will be the people of Canada, because the people of Canada have indicated their willingness to see that sufficient money is made available for the security of this country but they want one thing. They want that money spent in a way that will bring security, not in a way that leaves the back door open in every camp in this country so that someone can walk in and take what he likes. That is the situation that is indicated at Petawawa in this report, where the front door was locked but the back door was open.

I am not going to deal with the matter of the two reports; it can be dealt with later. From this report it is perfectly evident that the tendency on the part of the government has been to blame the fellow down below. This report shifts the whole emphasis of responsibility—the unabridged report, as it has been called by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), shifted it even more—to the higher echelons. I hope this government will not try to absolve itself by blaming either the top brass or the small man in the army, because the matter goes farther than that. The pilfering and the misspending that took place were the result of lack of proper supervision, and that proper supervision could be given only by the Department of National Defence. It is the Department of National Defence which must answer to parliament and to the people of Canada for the disclosures that are made in this report.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak again in this debate, but the report tabled in this house yesterday made it necessary. At the outset I want to commend Mr. Currie on the fearless and complete report that he apparently drew up. I am going to qualify that statement just slightly because I am not quite satisfied that the report that was tabled in the house is the same as the original report given out by Mr. Currie. I was amazed to find that there is apparently another report in circulation somewhere. How our friends of the C.C.F. got hold of it, I do not know; and I imagine there are many other members in the house who are more interested in that fact than I am.

From some of the conversations I have heard, I would gather that many of the members of this house seem to think it a crime that the C.C.F. were able to get hold of the original copy of this report. I do not think the crime is in their getting hold of it or in the fact that it did get loose. I think the crime in the whole matter, Mr. Speaker, is that the original report was not given to this house in the first place.

From Mr. Currie's report it is quite apparent that the original complaint came not from the Department of National Defence but from an anonymous letter which was quoted earlier by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew); and as it appears in this report, there is no date on it nor is there any indication as to when that letter was received by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to know—as, I am sure, would other hon. members of the house—just when that letter was placed in the hands of the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. That information might be quite interesting, because we should like to know just how long it was prior to this request for an investigation that this letter was received.

From the report it is quite apparent that the accounting system, as laid down by the government, is good but that the execution and enforcement of it is poor. Last year when the committee sat we were quite well informed as to the organization and the accounting system, and I must say that I was greatly impressed. But during the committee sittings last year we were unable to dig into the enforcement angle of the regulations. I had hoped at that time that we should be able to do so, and I still hope that we shall be able to dig in and get much more information when the committee is set up this session.

I was quite amazed, as apparently was the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), that the taking of 18,000 bags of cement is termed "petty pilfering". I can agree with the hon. member for Melfort when he says that that amount represents 18 box cars full. I telephoned the Canadian National Railways freight department today and found out that it would take just exactly that number of box cars to hold that many bags of cement. As the report indicates, the cement was only a test case. There were over 5,000 other items which could have been delved into, but which he thought would not be necessary. It would be interesting to know just how far things have gone as far as these other 5,000 items are concerned.

As far as the petty pilfering of a complete C.P.R. spur line is concerned, I just wonder how many men it would take to raise those tracks, and then when fear of detection came along they lifted the C.N.R. track to replace the C.P.R. or, I wonder, as one gentleman said, is that the job that the horses did. While we are on the subject of horses, I would suggest that the government might dig into some of the other departments of government and find out whether any of these horses are married and are drawing family allowances, or are they on old age pension.

Mr. Nickle: Are they on the voters' list?

Mr. Thomas: You would wonder sometimes, would you not?

Apparently the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) wants the sole responsibility to lie in the hands of the lower departments of the army. It is quite apparent from this report that the blame cannot be placed there. As reported on page 3, a part of which was quoted by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) today, the fault lies entirely within the Department of National Defence, or partially so. Originally, the fault may have been in the army, because undoubtedly that is where the pilfering came from. But the continuation of that pilfering is directly the responsibility of the Department of National Defence and nobody else. I shall repeat what the Leader of the Opposition read, because I think it could bear repeating. This is what appears on page 4 of the report:

> . . . it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix B which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, after a second auditor's report it was the responsibility of the deputy minister of national defence to insist on some sort of investigation. It is quite true that frequently you find incompetency, laxity, and sometimes dishonesty among army personnel and among the officers; but the department must have known that this was going on, because the auditor of the Department of National Defence had brought it to the attention of the deputy minister on many occasions. Therefore the responsibility rests entirely on the shoulders of that department and upon the government and on no one else.

I noticed one thing on looking into this report, and possibly it is outside the realm of investigation. I should like to know a little bit more about the construction programs that are going on, the awarding of contracts, and I should also like to know whether mention of those contracts, and so on, were in the original copy, as the hon. member says, the unabridged copy, of this report.

Mr. Currie says that these things went on chiefly in Petawawa. Probably they were not carried on to such a great extent in the other centres throughout Canada, but there is no doubt in my mind that the same thing is going on in many places, although perhaps on a smaller scale.

As I travel around through various parts of the country I hear men, army personnel, officers, complain and say: "For goodness' sake, is there not something we can do to get rid of this waste, not only of material but of time?" As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, at one army centre—and this is directly hearsay; I am not going to vouch for the authenticity of it—I was talking to one of the employees and he was telling of a truckload of cedar shingles that disappeared. Apparently the truck driver drove out of the camp with these shingles, and sometime later the truck came back empty. When he was asked by one of the other employees where the shingles had gone he replied—to use his own words—"None of your damn business."

The fact that the other camps are not as badly off as Petawawa shows that army personnel and the civilians working for the Department of National Defence in those various centres are fundamentally honest. But it is no credit whatsoever to the government, or to government policy, that every other camp in this country is not in the same condition as Petawawa. As a matter of fact, I would say that instead of saying, as a result of government policy these camps are not so bad, we should say: in spite of government policy these men were able to remain honest and to look after their jobs in a conscientious sort of way.

As I said before, I do not think there is any doubt in the world that this demonstrates an absolute failure of the government, not of the army, to enforce regulations. If it were a matter of poor regulations or a poor set-up, there might be some excuse for it, because they had not found the right way of doing it. But in view of the fact that Mr. Currie says the regulations are adequate if they are enforced, it leads me to say that it is not a matter of policy but one of enforcement, and the government is at fault. Let the government either correct these faults or face the consequences.

Just to go one little bit further, this involves more than the Department of National Defence, because on page 19 of this report Mr. Currie says:

> In all cases, the treasury officer, who is appointed by the Department of Finance to work within the Department of National Defence, must certify that the necessary money is available and that the expenditure is in fact in accordance with the purpose for which the funds were voted.

In other words, not only the Department of National Defence but also the Department of Finance is equally at fault. Probably the Department of Defence Production, because they have a finger in it, may also be at fault. In all probability they are involved as well as the armed forces. I would be one of the first to say that it is only a small portion of the armed forces, only a small group, that is at fault. We have three distinct departments of government involved, and unless some drastic step is taken I am afraid that the government is going to find itself in a pretty unenviable position, and it is a position of its own making, and I cannot say that I feel too sorry for it.

(Translation):

Mr. Joseph Langlois (Berthier-Maskinonge): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days much has been said in the newspapers and over the radio about the recent happenings at Louiseville which have brought about the proclamation of the Riot Act. To understand the situation fully, it must be recalled that the strike at Louiseville, which has been going on for more than nine months, was called as a result of a labour dispute between the national syndicate of textile workers at Louiseville and the Associated Textiles of Canada Limited. The said strike constitutes a record in the history of labour relations in Canada.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened at Louiseville since the beginning of that strike will not bring unfavourable publicity to the town of Louiseville and will not be detrimental to its economic welfare nor to its excellent reputation.

Louiseville is a small industrial centre located between Montreal and Three Rivers. Its inhabitants are and have always been naturally peaceful in their behaviour. All classes of society live in perfect harmony and everybody has at heart the progress and the development of the town. The workers also enjoy an enviable reputation.

I take this opportunity to tell the working classes and the whole population that I sympathize with them. These people are now going through a very painful experience. Business is on the decline and I do hope that a solution will be found before it is too late.

I also take this opportunity to offer my congratulations to the whole population of Louiseville who, since the beginning of the strike that threatens to paralyse the whole economic structure of this locality, have displayed an extraordinary degree of courage and patience.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred yesterday to what happened at Louiseville. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not share the opinions expressed by the hon. member, who asked the Minister of Labour to launch an investigation into what has been going on at Louiseville for nearly a year. The strike at Louiseville is, indeed, a labour dispute over which the province has exclusive jurisdiction and no one, as far as I know, has challenged this jurisdiction. The parties themselves have never complained about it. Since the beginning, I have followed every phase of the dispute very closely and I would have intervened myself long ago, had I deemed it advisable to do so. Knowing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) as I do, I am convinced that had this question been under federal jurisdiction, it would have been possible to arrive at a solution satisfactory to both management and workers.

Now, the Riot Act has been read. I am still convinced that this business is no concern of the Department of Labour. The Riot Act is a part of the Criminal Code which, under the constitution, is administered by the provinces. And so federal intervention in this connection, if only for purposes of inquiry, would be considered as a violation of provincial rights in the field of labour relations.

Even in so far as the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is concerned, I hold that the federal Department of Labour can only intervene at the request of the provincial department and after an agreement has been concluded between the provincial and federal governments.

Mr. Speaker, my remarks today are directed especially to the Minister of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission. I wish to bring to their attention the difficulties the Louiseville strikers find themselves in from the point of view of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Under section 39 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, all strikers are deprived of their right to unemployment benefits as long as work stoppage lasts. Since, in this case, such stoppage has lasted for more than nine months, these workers have not been able to pay any unemployment insurance contributions since March 10 last, the date on which the strike was declared. I suggest that the Louiseville strikers no longer comply with the statutory conditions required by section 28 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and that they cannot claim the right to draw unemployment insurance benefits. If, Mr. Speaker, this strike should be settled tomorrow, and if, after a few days, the employer should be forced, due to highly important considerations, to lay off some of his employees for lack of work, there is no doubt that all these unemployed workers would be deprived of their right to benefits, on account of their having failed to pay the contributions required within the period of time laid down by section 28.

I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Labour and the unemployment insurance commissioners should examine the urgency of amending, during this session, paragraph 3 of section 28 of the act, so as to grant benefits for prolonged periods of unemployment resulting from a labour dispute.

I would be inclined, Mr. Speaker, to go further and even to go beyond the framework of this act. I would also like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the advisability of studying the possibility of granting unemployment benefits to the Louiseville strikers, since they have been out of work for several months. I understand that it would create a precedent. However, I believe it would be a humanitarian gesture that would alleviate the sufferings of these people and bring a little sunshine and happiness to the families of Louiseville, where women and children are the innocent victims of that painful experience. As the Christmas season is approaching, it is the nicest gift we could make to the families of the Louiseville workers.

Several strikers also find themselves in an abnormal situation, because at the beginning of the strike they found work elsewhere, worked for several days or even a few months, but are now again unemployed. When they apply for unemployment insurance, they are told that they are not entitled to any benefits because they have not resumed their work. That decision is based on section 39 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It is an unfortunate situation, because these people have made sacrifices, they have left their home town to take work elsewhere, they have done everything they could to provide for their families, but today they are unable to find work anywhere. They are practically reduced to begging. The situation warrants careful and immediate attention. Knowing the concern of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) for the workers, I am confident that he will take my remarks into serious consideration and I hope that he will find a way of helping those people.

[Mr. Langlois (Berthier-Maskinonge).]

(Text):

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words following the remarks of the previous speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would like, first, to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge (Mr. Langlois) for the interest he has always taken in the situation, particularly with regard to the painful conditions which have been prevailing in the lovely town of Louiseville for almost nine months.

I am personally aware of the interest shown by the hon. member, who, on several occasions during this long period of time, has sought my advice with a view to finding a solution to the difficult problems which most of those who are affected by this strike must face, or even a remedy to their sufferings. Since the federal government has no jurisdiction in the matter, we have studied together various provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act that might concern these workers. Most of them, as a matter of fact, have been contributing for many years to the unemployment insurance fund and sincerely believe they have claims to assert under this act, since they have been deprived of their livelihood. Unfortunately, as my hon. friend stated, under section 39 of the Unemployment Insurance Act the payment of benefits to any insured person taking part in or directly affected by a strike or a lock-out is prohibited. The only way to remedy the situation is to introduce an amendment to that effect by an act of parliament.

For my part, I doubt whether it would be wise to recommend payment of unemployment benefits to workers on strike. In doing so, parliament would take sides in a dispute between workers and employers and its action, through its payment of unemployment benefits, would likely help prolong a situation which it is in the interest of all to settle as soon as possible.

As to amending the act by adding to section 28, subparagraph 3, a provision which would take no account of the period of time spent by the striker away from his work, as soon as he has resumed his employment, for the purpose of calculating the 188 contributions which he is supposed to have paid during the two years preceding an eventual application for benefits, I may say to the hon. member, knowing the spirit in which he makes this suggestion and his earnest desire to help solve some of the problems that might arise, that I am quite willing to give his request most sympathetic attention.

I am not sure how the unemployment insurance commission's advisory committee could see its way clear to accept this request since its granting would inevitably affect the unemployment insurance fund. As it happens this amendment would delay the payment of benefits beyond the limits provided by legislation at this time.

I can assure the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge that I will personally bring to the notice of the unemployment insurance commission, and through the commissioners, to the notice of the advisory committee, the advisability of exempting an unemployed worker, under the provisions of section 28 of the act, should he have been out on strike in the two years preceding an application for payment of such benefits. This would more particularly apply to the workers at Louiseville, who against their will have been unemployed for the past nine months.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have just said. However, through you, I wish to assure the working population of Louiseville of the interest shown by their representative in this work stoppage which has affected them for so long, and of the interest which the Minister of Labour and myself, as parliamentary assistant, have been continuously taking in the matter for the past nine months. Should the opportunity arise to put an end to the difficulties of the working population of Louiseville, we will gladly avail ourselves of that opportunity and co-operate with the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge.

I most sincerely want this situation to come to an end as soon as possible.

I hope that Christmas will not go by without my hon. friend—should he be unable to obtain for them unemployment insurance benefits—having at least the pleasure of seeing all his constituents resume work under fair and equitable conditions in the best interest of the working population of Louiseville.

(Text):

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): I wish first to extend my congratulations to the newly-appointed Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. Knowing the minister's exceptional qualifications, I am sure the Department of Fisheries will not be lacking vigorous leadership.

Our second largest industry is our fishing and, while some progressive methods have been evolved in later years, I am confident that under the new minister's direction we will experience a revivication, and a complete and thorough study of what the industry has accomplished in the past and what is possible to attain in the future. I now invite the minister to come to the province of Prince Edward Island at the beginning of fishing operations in the coming season to obtain firsthand knowledge of our industry. I will take him to the first fresh filleting and fish meal processing plant in our province, located at Souris in my riding. The minister will there have an opportunity to meet the personnel management of the island fisheries, and other progressive citizens engaged in the processing and packing industry, and to discuss with them processing methods, markets and common problems. The company referred to have the quick-freezing facilities necessary in the marketing of fresh frozen fillets processed from many species of fish.

Our provincial department of industry and natural resources, in conjunction with the federal department, has carried on scientific research work which has proved of great value to the provincial industry. Under the direction of the minister, Hon. Eugene Cullen, and his deputies, this department has surely proven its worth by the results it has already attained in promotional work and advancement for the industry.

I am pleased to note that the speech from the throne indicates that legislation will be implemented to provide some measure of assistance for the rural mail couriers in this country. Provision was made in the session of 1951 for increases to couriers receiving less than $1,000 per annum, and the increases granted to those couriers on application have been generally satisfactory. Now I am confident that the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) will provide, through the coming legislation, liberal increases for those couriers presently underpaid.

To the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) I would suggest that the eligible age for blind pensions be reduced from the present age of 21 years to 16 years, so the blind child may receive assistance from the termination of the family allowance. There is every justification for this because the parents of blind children are subjected to greater costs for education, to make them useful citizens, than in the case with non-defective children. It is my opinion that the means test should be dispensed with for blind people, and I would like to see the minister remove this impediment to full pensions for the blind.

From listening to the remarks of the hon. junior member for Queens in this house, I am sure his words were not calculated to further advance himself politically in Queens because the Liberal government's public works in that riding are too obvious. The hon. junior member for Queens, for example, cannot place the Charlottetown C.N.R. hotel under his hat; and if he takes himself down to the shore he will see a newly-constructed railway wharf. This work was completed by the Canadian Dredge and Dock Company of Toronto last spring. When he takes a look at the large, commodious frost-proof potato warehouse recently renovated and resting on that spacious wharf, he will see that he cannot put that under his umbrella. All these were constructed by Liberal governments. Further, I understand that the enlargement of the Charlottetown airways in Queens will be proceeded with, and I am sure that if the late J. L. Douglas had lived Charlottetown would now have a spacious public building, provided the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) could release the steel and other materials required for such a building. I can, however, give the junior member for Queens the assurance that it will be built by the Liberals just as soon as supplies are made available and with the backing of the next two Liberal members for Queens, Messrs. Miller and Matheson.

It is my pleasure now to express my thanks to the efficient and friendly Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) on behalf of the people of my constituency and myself for his response to my many requests for construction work on wharves, breakwaters, frost-proof potato warehouses and extensions, and the dredging of channels, harbours and rivers to provide more adequate facilities for ocean-going vessels which carry our produce to foreign ports, thus bringing about cheaper freight rates and competition with the government-owned railway. The provisions to assist fishermen at the many fishing points have been of great assistance. There still remains much to be done. We need a new protection work constructed at Murray Harbour north for the protection of fishermen's boats and equipment. At this point boats and valuable equipment are subject to the crippling lashes of the sea. I am confident that an adequate amount will be included in this session's estimates for this very necessary work.

We also need a complete reconstruction job on the government-owned railway wharf at Georgetown. In its present condition the wharf cannot provide safe accommodation for large boats tying up alongside the frost-proof potato warehouse, and does not provide the proper facilities for loading pulp and pit prop boats. A dredging job is necessary in the inner part of the harbour. An extension to the protection work at Basin Head harbour is also awaiting attention. So far as the public building at Montague is concerned, the necessary building sites have been purchased and are now vested in the crown. An estimate for this building has been passed by the house, and the Department of Public Works will in all probability proceed with the construction in the near future.

Before concluding my remarks on public works, I wish to extend my thanks to the deputy minister and the engineers at Ottawa and Charlottetown. They have at all times extended to me the greatest measure of assistance and co-operation.

With respect to the ferry service to and from our province, it is most imperative that additional services be provided from Wood islands to Caribou and from Borden to Tormentine. I do know that an additional boat for the Wood islands service is being given much consideration by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) inasmuch as I attended a meeting with the minister in that connection last week. So far as the Cape Tormentine-Borden service is concerned, I suggest that if we had a boat to carry passenger and railway freight cars in the summer months this would permit the space now taken up by those cars to be used by automobiles and trucks.

I am confident that if the government realized that new ferry boats were an urgent need at both Wood islands and Borden financial provision would be made at this session for their immediate construction. If the amounts necessary were voted at this session I expect that it would be all of two years before the boats would be ready for service. We are entitled to adequate ferry service under the terms of confederation, and I am sure the people of Canada would not wish to have the smallest province restricted in any way. They want to see our province enjoy the same transportation facilities as are enjoyed by them. We wish to develop and exploit to the fullest measure the tourist industry in order to help to finance the province's road and electricity programs. We need the additional ferries to move our fish and farm produce to export markets. Can one picture the provinces of Quebec and Ontario in our position, not having adequate transportation facilities available to transport tourists and exportable products?

I said in the beginning I was confident that if the government fully realized the situation that now exists it would arouse their gravest concern, with the result that additional transportation facilities would be immediately provided. If the Canadian economy can afford to contribute millions of dollars each year to the Asiatic countries under the Colombo plan, if we can lend and donate millions to Great Britain, surely we can find sufficient funds to provide essential transportation services for Canadians.

The co-operative movement in our province and in the maritimes generally met with a severe loss in the passing of Dr. A. B. MacDonald, one of its pioneers. I knew Dr. MacDonald personally, having met him on numerous occasions in our province during the fourteen years he was associated with Dr. M. M. Coady in the work of St. Francis Xavier university extension department. His boundless energy and devotion to the work of organizing adult study club groups, co-operative producer and consumer groups, credit unions, etc., led him to larger fields of endeavour, and in 1944 co-operative leaders saw the need of a larger and more active national co-operative organization.

Those leaders, knowing of Dr. MacDonald's unsurpassed ability in the field of organization, selected him for the task. Having formed the larger organization, he served as national secretary of the Co-operative Union of Canada until his death on September 13 last at the comparatively early age of 59 years. Dr. MacDonald was a great maritimer. He was a great Canadian. The work he accomplished in teaching the labouring man, the fisherman and the farmer a way to more general prosperity, thus raising his standard of living and giving him greater economic freedom, will ever remain a tribute to his memory.

In closing my remarks I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we had a visitor to our fair isle and he was harsh, by Karsh!

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the Currie report is undoubtedly one of the most important documents to come before the Canadian parliament in recent history. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that the arrival of the Currie report in the House of Commons yesterday operated like a bombshell so far as the government and its forces were concerned. Is it not proof abundant, Mr. Speaker, of the decline of a sense of parliamentary responsibility, alike on the part of the government and those who follow it in this house, that the discussion of this matter of such vital importance has followed the course we have seen today? This report has been dealt with in masterly style by some of the leading figures of the house, by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) last evening, by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) this morning and by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) this afternoon. But we have yet to hear one word, except by way of raucous interruptions, from a member supporting the government, let alone one of Her Majesty's ministers.

Mr. Pearkes: Where are they?

Mr. Fleming: Where are they? There is in the house at this moment one member of the government, just one, and I think there are approximately eighteen Liberal members present in the house. Is this an example of the way in which the government addresses itself to public business of the highest importance?

Mr. Studer: Where are all the members of your party?

Mr. Fleming: They are here at the present moment in greater numbers than the 185 Liberal members of the house. If you cannot see that, your counting must be about as bad as the government counting as indicated in this report.

This situation is by no means new. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has a paramount responsibility in this matter, particularly in view of the absence overseas of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). The Prime Minister has chosen to grace the house, during the debate on this matter of high importance, for a matter of about forty minutes or three-quarters of an hour this afternoon during the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. Having done so he took his departure, after some scurrying about the house and whispered conversations with ministers. If any further evidence is required of the decline of the sense of parliamentary responsibility during the lifetime of the present government, alike on its part and on the part of those who follow it in the house, you have seen it in abundance this day.

I think it may be said, Mr. Speaker, by way of fair warning to this government that if they think that by being parties to some conspiracy of silence they are going to discourage the discussion of this very vital and important report, then they are very much mistaken. This report has arrived in the House of Commons where it ought to be fully discussed, and where it is going to be discussed, whether the government likes it or not.

I should like to observe at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Currie has rendered a national service in writing this report. I can well imagine, indeed I think we were so informed by the Minister of National Defence at the time, that Mr. Currie assumed this duty with some reluctance. Apparently he realized it was going to be a formidable undertaking. I believe the public of Canada may well thank Mr. Currie for assuming this responsibility and staying with this task until its completion, for in this report it seems to me we have a public service of the highest quality.

I am interested, of course, in this matter of a second edition of the report. The Prime Minister said yesterday when this question of an unexpurgated edition of the report was raised, that he would give orders to get to the bottom of the matter. He has had more than twenty-four hours to get to the bottom of the matter, but still his silence continues. Has efficiency within the government service dropped to the point where the Prime Minister cannot get information about this other edition of this report within the time that has now passed, or has the Prime Minister decided he has had enough embarrassment over this report, and is not going to take the house into his confidence about it? I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), the leader of the house; perhaps he can enlighten us on this matter. No; only silence comes from the Minister of Public Works.

Again I might say to the government that if they think that by ignoring this important question they are going to escape discussion of it or going to escape a demand by this house for an accounting in regard to the unexpurgated edition of the report, then I may tell them they are completely mistaken.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are putting up a straw man.

Mr. Fleming: I am surprised indeed to hear the Minister of Public Works refer to himself as a straw man, because he is the man I am putting up at the moment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You do not understand English.

Mr. Fleming: You understand most things around here, except the necessity for preserving parliamentary institutions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I need your help for that.

Mr. Fleming: I turn to this report in the light of what I think is the responsibility of the members of this house to relate this question fairly to the matter of the government's responsibility. The first thing that strikes anyone reading this report is the statement on page 1, where Mr. Currie says:

> It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigation have been already seized on, and important reforms are already being carried out.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Sir, let us lay that statement alongside the statement made in this house in recent days by the Minister of National Defence. Let us remember that the Minister of National Defence, when questioned about the receipt of interim reports, said in this house that he had no communication from Mr. Currie or had no discussion with him. Lay these statements side by side. They cannot be reconciled. Either Mr. Currie is wrong or the Minister of National Defence is wrong. There is just one possibility of an out for the minister, and that is that suggestions of importance—because these are obviously important suggestions—came to the Department of National Defence from this important inquiry, and things are so organized in the Department of National Defence today that the minister of that department does not know when important recommendations come into the department or are apparently put into effect with salutary results. Have things come to this pretty pass, that the Minister of National Defence is so utterly unaware of what is going on in his department that when recommendations come from Mr. Currie on matters of leading importance they escape his notice? Well, hon. members opposite can take their choice. Either the Minister of National Defence has been unaware of what any minister of defence ought to be aware of within his department, or Mr. Currie and the Minister of National Defence are in pointblank contradiction. I leave the matter there. The rules of the house compel me to do so.

Again thinking of this in terms of the responsibility of the government, hon. members opposite are trying to find some comfort in the fact that they say, "Oh well, whatever happens in the department is not the responsibility of the government." It is a curious statement which I hope to have the opportunity of examining shortly.

Mr. Croll: Who said that?

Mr. Fleming: It has been said several times during the course of these raucous interruptions. There is no member opposite who has had the courage to stand up on his two feet and say so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should say of any other hon. member that he has not the courage to stand up and say something. The hon. member has just referred to hon. members on this side, saying that they did not have the courage to stand up and say so. When the hon. member debates a question, I do not think he should accuse others of not having courage; that is the expression to which I take objection. I believe the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) will understand what I mean.

Mr. Fleming: I do not recall that I have reflected in any unparliamentary sense. In that regard, I draw attention to the fact, for I think it is a matter worthy of comment, that not one member on the government side of the house has risen here today to offer a word on what is the most important subject that has come before the house during our time. I think I am entitled to draw an inference.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is quite right in pointing out that no hon. member has tried to rise or has risen on a certain question. The expression which I think is objectionable is to say of an hon. member, even if he is not referred to by name, that he "has not the courage to stand up". It should not be suggested of any hon. member that he did not have the courage to do what he is supposed to do in this house.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I now turn again to this question of governmental responsibility. I am glad to hear an admission at last from an hon. member opposite—and I take it that it came from the hon. member for Spadina—that apparently the government is responsible for what happened in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member was saying that the government were attempting to lay the responsibility on the general staff. What I said was "Who said that?" He has no right to draw any other inference from that. He said "hon. members in this house" and he did not name anyone. He had no right to draw any other inference.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, that is an example of how hopelessly inaccurate a view of this matter is taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. I did not use the words "general staff" at all. I did not refer to them. I was referring to the subject of the government's responsibility for what happened in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Ferguson: The hon. member is saying what the people are thinking.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Let us deal with this question. I said that hon. members opposite are apparently trying to take some comfort from the fact that, as they say, the Department of National Defence was not aware of what was going on. Were they not aware of it? If they did not have any responsibility at the time these things were going on, did they not acquire some responsibility when they learned or ought to have learned that these things were going on and were there to be seen?

The fact of the matter is, as Mr. Currie has pointed out here, that reports were made. I think attention should be drawn again to the service rendered this morning by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) who called attention to the fact that before the committee on defence expenditure last year it was brought out that reports had been made to the Department of National Defence concerning irregularities at Petawawa, and they were reports that had gone back indeed as far as May, 1949. The committee was not permitted to know the contents of those reports, but the fact was that reports disclosing irregularities going back that far were made to the Department of National Defence. That much the committee was permitted to know.

What became of those reports? Were they shelved? Is the Minister of National Defence not going to assume any responsibility for reports coming into his department? Does he not know what is going on? Does he not assume any responsibility for knowing what is going on in his department? If he knew of these reports, why did he not take action? Is not the responsibility on him and, through him, on the shoulders of the government, for taking no action? If he did not know, why did he not know? Why did he not read those reports?

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but in this report by Mr. Currie we are told at page 4 of the report as follows:

> . . . internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions.

Mr. Speaker, what became of those reports? What did the Minister of National Defence know of those reports? If he knew about them, what action did he take? If he did not know about them, why did he not know? Every member of the government shares that responsibility with the Minister of National Defence, the silent Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) included.

An hon. Member: Where were you?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know.

Mr. Fleming: Last April we obtained some information from the minister. On April 21, as reported at page 1424 of Hansard, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) questioned the Minister of National Defence as to when trouble was first discovered at Petawawa. The answer given by the minister was "in October, 1951". The government took action to appoint Mr. Currie in April, 1952, six months after the discovery of irregularities at Petawawa, according to the minister's statement. Of course in this statement of April 21, the minister made no reference to all those reports from the chief auditor of the department that we read about, nor has he referred to those reports going back to May, 1949. He overlooks all those reports in this answer of April 21 but he says "We learned about it in October, 1951", six months before the date on which he was speaking.

What did he do in those six months? Apparently the same thing he had done for more than two years before that, in the face of similar reports, namely, nothing. Is the government going to deny responsibility in the face of the facts? Here is a government that either knew, through the minister, of the existence of these irregularities, and calmly did nothing about them or apparently the minister did not know anything about them, in which case he was guilty of the grossest possible dereliction of duty as minister and head of that department.

The matter of government responsibility is one that does not even admit a difference of opinion in this house. I am just waiting, Mr. Speaker, to hear any member of the government courageously or otherwise, if you please, rise to his feet and say that the government denies responsibility; because if the government does, it has shed any semblance of responsibility to this house and has literally destroyed the whole basis of parliamentary institutions according to our system of government. It is a plain and elementary fact that the government, and every member of the government alike, must accept responsibility for whatever happens in these government departments. What could be a plainer case of responsibility than one in which a situation was disclosed by reports to the department running back for more than three years? Here we are three and a half years after the first of these reports of which we know. Whether there were other reports we are left only to surmise. However, we know that reports were coming in more than three and a half years ago. What greater proof of dereliction of duty on the part of a smug and complacent government do we need than this?

And to think that this should happen in the Department of National Defence gives one pause! This is the minister, Mr. Speaker—and you will not have forgotten this fact—who, alike when he was minister of national health and welfare and since he became Minister of National Defence, has been the opponent of the appointment of standing committees of this house on the theory, which he declared on all those occasions, that such appointments cut across or cut at the root of our whole system of responsible government. He said, "We do not want anything savouring of the American system. Oh, no; we want to maintain the closest possible relationship between the cabinet and the House of Commons, because the cabinet is responsible to the House of Commons." He even used this analogy and said, "Why do we need another committee of the house because, after all, the cabinet is but a committee of the house. Therefore we must not have any more committees of the house because the government takes all responsibility and is fully accountable to the house." Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is in the department of this same minister that this scandalous and shocking situation is found to exist.

Yes, it was not necessary, although it is indeed striking, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Currie in this report puts the responsibility—more clearly, it is true, in the unexpurgated edition but nevertheless he does so in both editions—squarely where the responsibility properly lies, not only in fact, but also according to the elementary practice of the British system of responsible government and parliamentary institutions.

Speaking of this spirit within the department itself where, by reason of the fact that experienced officers and experienced personnel of the department had been let out, in the face of warnings in bygone years from the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and others, now we find a new situation, in which the whole idea is that speed is everything and cost means nothing—in the face of this spirit within the department, Mr. Currie says:

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes at or near the top.

Those are the words of the unexpurgated edition. In the expurgated edition the words are "the same attitudes higher up." Mr. Speaker, those words were not necessary to fix responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the minister, but they are there.

Here is an inquiry conducted by a man appointed by the government. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when they are so busy finding scapegoats, the government are not going to turn around now and try to make a scapegoat of Mr. Currie. It would be in keeping with the way they have been picking scapegoats indiscriminately in all directions for many days.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Who picked Mr. Currie?

Mr. Fleming: The government picked him, and they picked a good man. I gather from the strange silence that prevails over the government benches today that they are not too happy about the whole situation. Let the government get up and say whether they accept the report of Mr. Currie. If they do not accept it, let them give good reasons why they do not. I can tell them that if they are going to try to make a scapegoat out of Mr. Currie, they are biting off a great deal more than they are going to be able to masticate, even this government, with all its appetite.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): You are putting up a straw man.

Mr. Fleming: Well, you see it is inevitable, in the light of experience this house has had, to which the hon. member has apparently closed his eyes and ears, that we would think it very natural that the government would look around for a scapegoat. They always do look around for a scapegoat, because the one impelling obsession of this government is that they must not lose political face. It does not matter whose business career is sacrificed or whose army career is sacrificed as long as the government does not lose political face. That is the only thing that matters. The hon. member opposite is quite prepared to give political allegiance to a government so lacking in standards and principles as is this government.

Now, sir, what of the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister apparently was anticipating trouble in the Department of National Defence, because on November 24 he was at pains to say, as we find at page 39 of Hansard, that what was happening in the way of disclosures of the most astounding and shocking extravagance and waste in that department and what had happened at Petawawa were regrettable and deplorable. He said: We in the government have not done this ourselves. You should not hold us responsible. He said: When people steal money from the Bank of Nova Scotia nobody holds the directors of the bank responsible. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is all the Prime Minister has learned about the essence of responsible government then it is high time he made way for somebody who does understand those elementary principles.

Mr. Bennett: Whom do you suggest?

Mr. Fleming: You know very well whom.

Mr. Riley: We know whom you want to replace him.

Mr. Fleming: There is the hollow voice of Saint John. We will not be too concerned about the voice of the lesser Saint John.

Mr. Riley: I thought it was Mr. Drew whom you wanted to replace him.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I am very happy to say for the edification of the hon. member for Saint John, or Saint John the lesser, that I look forward with confidence to the day in 1953 when Mr. George Drew will assume the office and role of prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: I may tell hon. members that it is going to take a good deal more than the calculated and contemptible campaign of personal abuse they are directing at the Leader of the Opposition to prevent him from becoming prime minister. If they have any more to say on this subject I should be interested to hear them.

Now, sir, the Prime Minister, as I have indicated, sought in advance to wash his hands in public of any responsibility for what happened at Petawawa. Well, the Prime Minister cannot wash his hands, nor the hands of any member of the government, of responsibility for what is disclosed in this report.

Mr. Hetland: He did not say that.

Mr. Fleming: Well, he said about as near to it as it was possible for him to go at that stage without disclosing what we find now in the report. That is precisely the idea that he was trying to convey. He said in effect, we have had some prosecutions, and what more could we do? We are not responsible; we did not do it ourselves; we did not carry off the rails. That is the gist of the Prime Minister's argument, and it just will not hold water.

Mr. Hetland: That is your argument.

Mr. Fleming: No, it is the Prime Minister's argument. If the hon. member has not grasped the fact, then I can only invite him to go back and read page 39 of Hansard, because apparently he did not pay any attention to the Prime Minister when he was speaking.

I wish to say this also to the Prime Minister: If this happened at Westminster, if in the mother of parliaments it was disclosed in a report made by an official appointed by the government to conduct an inquiry that the things had been going on within a government department which are disclosed in this Currie report, the minister at the head of the department would have resigned at once, Mr. Speaker. He would not have had to wait for the Prime Minister to call upon him to tender his resignation; he would have resigned at once. And the fact that, far from the minister resigning, or far from our seeing the Prime Minister call for his resignation in this case, far from there even being a statement from the government on this question, the government have remained silent on this question proves abundantly that they have lost all sense of responsibility to this House of Commons.

I will tell hon. members opposite why the government have lost that sense of responsibility. It is not alone their own arrogance; it is not alone their own smugness; it is not alone their own indifference; it is the fact that a majority of the members of this house calling themselves Liberals have condoned that arrogance and that smugness on the part of this government. Is there any wonder that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said in this house a year and a half ago: "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" Well, the fact of the matter is that the official opposition, by reason of their numbers not being great, can only make a fight. On a vote they cannot overcome the government, but the hon. members of this house who do form the majority could have stopped the government from getting away with these things, and because they have remained supine—

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Fleming: Because they remained supine in the face of this situation, and have sat silent here now in the face of this disclosure of the scandals that are revealed in this report shows abundantly, Mr. Speaker, just why the Minister of Trade and Commerce could ask a question like that in this house, why he could insult this house by saying: "If we wanted to get away with it, there is nobody here to stop us." It was because the opposition was not numerous enough, and the government supporters in the house who are numerous enough did not have the will and the sense of responsibility to stop this government when it was trying to get away with such things. How otherwise, Mr. Speaker, could these things have gone on? With reports coming before the government for a period of three and a half years, how could these things go on in an intelligent country like this, if it were not for the fact that hon. members opposite, constituting a majority in this house, have simply sat there and acquiesced in and condoned what the government has been allowing to happen. Yes, it will be interesting to see—

An hon. Member: Keep your temper.

Mr. Fleming: My temper is completely under control.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It does not show it.

Mr. Fleming: And it is at all times. Well, the Minister of Public Works is about as far at sea in that respect as he is on what constitutes propriety in the conduct of the affairs of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You must be good in all things.

Mr. Lesage: What do you know about the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. Fleming: I think he is a very jovial and amiable colleague in the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Thank you.

Mr. Riley: So are you.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you.

Mr. Lesage: At times.

Mr. Fleming: This whole subject has to be considered in relation to the background. I have said something about the background, the fact of reports coming in over this long period, the fact of the minister apparently either not knowing what was going on in his department or closing his eyes to what has been happening there, but there is something else about the background that should be considered in relation to the astounding disclosures in this report. It has to do with the sacrifices of the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are not a martial people. They have shown that when war is forced upon them they are prepared to meet it, and meet it with courage unsurpassed. But we are not a martial people. We do not as a people like to keep standing armies; we do not flaunt any military spirit before the world. It was with a measure of acknowledged reluctance that the Canadian people faced up to what was put before them as the stern necessity for rearmament. They accepted the burdens courageously, but regretfully. And I think, Mr. Speaker, it is only right and proper to say that when they were called upon to face these heavy exactions they expected all their elected representatives in this House of Commons, and all members of the government opposite, would see that every dollar that was taken from the pockets of the people for the purpose of rearmament would be spent carefully for that purpose.

Never has a higher obligation rested upon a parliament, or upon a government, to make sure that every dollar expended for this purpose was carefully and prudently expended, than has rested upon this government and this parliament in connection with this rearmament program.

It was something of the spirit of a crusade that prompted the Canadian people to support Canadian participation in the efforts of the United Nations to withstand aggression in Korea and in the garrisoning of Germany to withstand any possible aggression by the Kremlin in central Europe. Mr. Speaker, what a betrayal of the confidence of the Canadian people that, in the face of that crusading spirit and in the face of acceptance by the Canadian people of these heavy burdens and exactions for the purpose of providing needed rearmament for this country, the Canadian government has failed so lamentably to see that this money has been carefully and wisely expended!

Mr. Speaker, you will remember that Mr. Currie says in this report that, far more serious than the actual defalcations, and far more serious than the actual amount of materials and goods which have been stolen, is what has been lost to the Canadian people in the proven waste and inefficiency which has been exposed. In the face of the colossal expenditures by this department it was the duty, not simply of the minister of the department but, to a superlative degree, the duty of every minister in the government to see to it that there was efficiency in that department, to see to it that there was strict honesty in all the procedures of that department, to see to it that the dollars that were hard-earned by the Canadian people, from whom they were taken, were carefully expended.

And what do the Canadian people find? Well, we have had exposures in recent months of colossal waste and extravagance; and now in this report, to cap it all, we find proof of shocking irregularities and of what is, in effect, a whole break-down of the system of supervising expenditure.

No government in office at a time like this, in the face of proven facts like these, can escape its responsibility for these facts. It cannot escape its responsibility, in the light of parliamentary practice. And above all, Mr. Speaker, it cannot escape its responsibility to the supreme Canadian people.

We in the official opposition have fought, and fought uphill, in the face of overwhelming numbers of government supporters in this present House of Commons, for the direct maintenance of parliamentary control over expenditures. We have had to fight uphill because the government opposite would not listen to anything from us. They would not listen to the wise warnings given to them in these recent years by experienced members like the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) and many others who are quite competent to give the government sound advice on these questions. No; their ears were stopped to any words of warning from this side of the house. In their smugness and self-satisfaction, what they knew was enough; and all they had to tell us was that, so long as they were in office, everything was all right. Well, the Canadian people well know now that while this government has been in office everything has not been all right.

In the face of Mr. Currie's report it would be much more accurate to say that, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, everything has been all wrong. Mr. Speaker, we of the official opposition can point to those many occasions when, in this House of Commons, we have fought as hard as we could fight for the maintenance of that sound principle of parliamentary control over public expenditures. And here, because this government has defeated sound, sincere and earnest attempts on the part of the opposition to maintain effective parliamentary control over expenditures, when they have used their overwhelming numbers both in the House of Commons and in the defence expenditure committee of last session to prevent any attempts to get to the bottom of these expenditures, or even to elicit the essential facts for the elected representatives of the people to put them into the position of judging the spending of these colossal sums of money, we now see in these painful events of the past two days a complete vindication of that sound principle of parliamentary control. A very serious mistake has been made by the Liberal majority, which must assume the full responsibility for the mistake it has made in departing from the precious principle of parliamentary control over the government's purse strings.

We are tired of the smugness of this government. We are tired of their official utterances put out through anonymous sources. We are tired of their lofty and haughty attitude in this house. It is a pity that another Gilbert and Sullivan could not arise now. What an opportunity they would have in dealing with a situation such as we are confronted with in this parliament today. There would be another H.M.S. Pinafore, I am sure. I shall mention only one passage from that operetta which you, Mr. Speaker, with your profound classical learning, will recall at once. You will remember those words which Sir Joseph Porter addressed to Captain Corcoran in H.M.S. Pinafore: "Captain Corcoran, it is one of the happiest characteristics of this glorious country that official utterances are invariably regarded as unanswerable."

Mr. Speaker, we are tired of that kind of attitude on the part of this government, the assumption that because they are in office everything is all right. That is the kind of answer they have given; and we of the official opposition join our voices now in saying that there has been enough exposed in this Currie report, dealing with one small segment of the operations of this one department, to make it essential and imperative now that the inquiry be reopened, and that it be extended into all the other recesses of that department. Enough has been found here to put every hon. member of this House of Commons on his guard, and on notice. That responsibility now rests with every member of this House of Commons.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we have been dealing in the last few hours with what may be called an error of omission on the part of the government due to negligence which has been shown in the Department of National Defence. I wish now to come to an error of commission due to unwarrantable government interference. I wish to return to the matter I brought up last Thursday in connection with the Fort Garry hotel and Mr. Pitt. I do this because the matter has been answered not only briefly by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last Thursday but at greater length by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) yesterday.

I brought the question up originally because I believed that a great injustice had been done as the result of unwarrantable government interference. I believe that much more strongly now than I did last week, because to me the defence that has been made is utterly unconvincing. I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has anything to do with this matter, but I had hopes last week when I made an appeal to him in his absence to have some justice done. The only answer we have got so far in my opinion is a cover-up, coupled with the suggestion of a threat which I found very unpleasant. For that reason I come back to it.

I have tried in this house to speak with a certain sense of responsibility, and I never had a greater sense of responsibility than I have now. Yesterday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), to my regret, referred to this as a small matter. I said to him then, and I repeat to him now, that I do not regard justice as a small matter. I regret that it would appear that the attitude of the government—because there has been no other attitude expressed—is that it is a small matter. I still hope this attitude may be changed. I shall try to satisfy the house that the answer that has been given is no answer. If the house should accept that, then I still hope something may be done.

The Minister of Transport spoke more in sorrow than in anger, and wanted to treat me as some kind of erring child. He pointed out to me that I had made a terrible mistake in relying on hearsay. I suppose, in a sense, whatever is in a newspaper is, in the technical, legal sense, for all I know hearsay. After all, the people who are reported in the newspaper do not speak with their own voices. They are reported in the newspaper, and to that extent, in the narrow sense, the minister may be right. However, I do not think we should be bamboozled by the legal jargon, and I suggest that is all the minister was doing. When I asked the minister if he impugned any of the facts on which I based my speech, and which were reported in the Winnipeg Tribune, a responsible newspaper, all the minister said was that it was hearsay and therefore he would pay no attention to it. In my opinion the important thing is whether these facts were true as they were related in the newspaper. I believe they are true. Neither of the ministers appeared to say they were not true; therefore I am entitled to believe that, like me, they believe they are true.

Mr. Chevrier: Then why don't you bring them to the proper forum?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I consider that this is the proper forum. I understand that this House of Commons is the place where grievances can be brought and where they may be redressed. I believe this is a grievance against the government directly, and that is why I bring it here.

Mr. Chevrier: I disagree with you fully on a C.N.R. matter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well now, I think I understand what the minister is saying, but I disagree with him wholly. I regret that it seems to me—I was trying to press this point further—that this is one of the things which we on this side so often, and sometimes it seems so unavailingly, press in this house; that is, that the long tenure of power has really made the government believe it is almost an impertinence to come into this house to criticize them. They have got into that state of mind; therefore I think the view of the Minister of Transport, who would ordinarily be a very fair-minded man, in a matter of this kind is just perverse. He is beaten before he starts.

I base my argument on what I believe to be the facts, facts which have not been controverted. There has been an attempt to impugn them, to smear them by saying they are hearsay. If they are facts, then we in this house are entitled to look at them and consider what is the result. I said last Thursday, and I repeat it and feel much more strongly now, that no sane man could look at the two events, the event of September 10 when the Prime Minister was in Winnipeg and the demotion of Mr. Pitt two months later, without coming to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) referred to "unpleasantness". I shall come back to that because I thought perhaps the minister made a larger contribution to the debate than he intended. He revealed to us that he had known about some unpleasantness. I am going to ask later on if he will tell us how that word "unpleasantness" came down here, because in the report we get from the Department of Transport there is no suggestion of unpleasantness. Apparently everything in the garden is lovely. There is no grievance of any kind.

I gave two reasons—there are many but I gave two—for believing that these two events were connected. In the first place I said, how can any sane person believe that the management of the Canadian National Railways could so far forget their common sense as to demote a man who had been in their service ten years in the management of the Nova Scotian hotel, a large hotel with 150 rooms; five years in the management of the Bessborough hotel, with 260 rooms; over a year in the management of the Fort Garry hotel, with 260 rooms. I said it was not possible to believe that the management of the hotels would treat a man in that way, of their own motion, but only if they were impelled to do so by somebody else. Secondly, I gave as an even stronger reason the impossibility of any sensible person accepting the explanation of the president of the Canadian National Railways. I regret more than I can say that a man whom I have always respected should have given such a reason. The reason given was that this demotion of this trusted man, after nearly twenty years of service, was occasioned by "changes in the management affecting every hotel following the normal review of hotel operation that is carried out by the general manager of hotels". I submit that no man who looks at the facts and is familiar with the ordinary relations between man and man could accept that.

I say, therefore, that it is only to be expected that what the Winnipeg Tribune records would be the fact. In its issue of November 14, I believe it is, the Winnipeg Tribune says "of those contacted by the Tribune today, none accepted C.N.R. president Donald Gordon's explanation of Mr. Pitt's transfer which was announced on Wednesday". I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that no one could accept these reasons. The very fact that the president of the railway would put out a reason which cannot be accepted by any sensible man as a reason for doing this shows what a jam they were in, and forces us to look elsewhere.

Let me go back for a moment to the speech delivered by the Minister of Transport. His two complaints against me were apparently that I relied on hearsay. I have dealt with that. I would say that some things are self-evident, and that the connection between these two events is self-evident. We do not need to rely on the technical rules of law. These events carry conviction to any sensible man who will look at the facts. I come back to the other matter. The minister said I had not been very consistent, and that although I had made the statement I believed the Prime Minister had nothing to do with this, as I do believe—I cannot believe the Prime Minister had any truck or trade with small stuff of this kind—

Mr. Howe: Why keep mentioning his name every few minutes?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall tell you why in one second. The reason I am mentioning him is to answer something the Minister of Transport said. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will think that is a sufficient reason. The Minister of Transport said that although I had said the Prime Minister had nothing to do with it, nevertheless I was inconsistent because, as I understood him, I had several times implied that he was responsible.

Mr. Chevrier: You most certainly did.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member has mentioned the Prime Minister about fourteen times since he started this debate.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce through?

Mr. Howe: You have mentioned the Prime Minister at least twelve times since you have been on this subject.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps the minister is being as accurate as he was the other night when he contradicted me by saying that Mr. Pitt had not been manager of the Nova Scotian hotel, and had to admit later that he was wrong. I come back to the Minister of Transport for a moment. I want to say this. If by any implication I suggested that I was not sincere or that I was qualifying what I said about the Prime Minister having nothing to do with this, I did not intend to do so and my statement was intended to be taken at its face value.

I come back to this suggestion of unpleasantness which we got from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That, of course, seems to tie in some of the things that are said by the Winnipeg Tribune. It does not seem to tie in too tightly with the explanation or the denial that has been given in the answer by the Department of Transport and in what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) himself said yesterday. It may be that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will wish to say something more about this unpleasantness.

Mr. Howe: I will indeed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There may be an aroma of unpleasantness down here, after all. Is it a fact that these things were being bandied about? Is it a fact that these things were being discussed in the department? Is it a fact that there may have been more to it than the answer of the Department of Transport suggested? Perhaps the minister will explain.

I now return to the charge made by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night that I am interfering with the management of the railway. I am interfering. I am trying to discharge the duty of a member of parliament by protesting against government interference. After all, the government is responsible to this house, although they seem often to forget it; and we as members of this house are surely entitled to come here and complain about it if we believe, as I do, that the government is interfering. I am interfering to that extent. I know they are in danger of forgetting that fact. I suppose if I were in power for 17 years I might be in danger of forgetting it too, but it is a fact. The attitude on that side of the house has come to be: we get away with everything we can and we ignore complaints because we have the voting power. When other arguments run out, or when there are not any arguments, we are accustomed to hear this one: "Have we not got the votes?". They have the votes, Mr. Speaker. The only question is how long they will have them.

Mr. Cruickshank: For a long time yet.

Mr. Graydon: Don't be too sure.

Mr. Fleming: Time is running out.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have explained why I interfered. I believe the government or someone purporting to speak for the government has played a part in this matter. The reference of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to unpleasantness seems to tie in with that explanation. I believed and still believe that a gross injustice was being done, and I have found a great many people—some inside this house and some outside of it—who agree with me. I believe there was government interference, and I am not the only person who believes that.

I should like to read from a paper which I imagine usually supports the government. It has already been quoted in this house, but I should like to put it on the record again. I should like to read what the Saskatoon paper—I think the Star-Phoenix is the name of it—has to say. They are fairly plain. They say:

> We suspect that some member of the Prime Minister's group, possibly some officious party slavey who might have regarded the railway system as strictly Liberal party property, in a fit of pique registered a complaint, and that this brought disaster to a lifetime of service. It is too bad it seems to us that the Prime Minister's name should have been linked with such a business.

Let me say that this is not any reference to what I said about the Prime Minister. This is their own reference. To continue:

> This newspaper, which in this matter presumes to speak for the owners of the C.N.R. who happen to live in this city and who have had the privilege of having Mr. Pitt serve them, would like a fuller explanation from the hotel management and from the Prime Minister's office which, whether properly or not, is involved in the matter.

I should like to read again a sentence I read from the Winnipeg Tribune the other evening:

> Was Mr. Pitt given any kind of fair trial? Were the complaints against him and his hotel investigated? There is no evidence that we have been able to uncover that the answer is in the affirmative to either of these questions. Rather, the answer seems to be that the hotel manager was removed from his job without proper investigation because someone in the government or close to the government had thundered. It will be a bad state of affairs for the Canadian National Railways if it is saddled with government interference in management.

I believed and still believe that this house exists for the ventilation and the redress of grievances, and to prevent the exercise of arbitrary power by the executive. That is why I spoke. I repeat that the minister has made no answer to what I said, except the denial and the harping on the word "hearsay" as though it were a kind of spell or incantation. I have said that the facts I have quoted have not been denied in any way. Therefore all we have is this spell or incantation and the taking of refuge behind a denial of his own department and the railway.

My answer is that, however sincere the minister and the president of the railway may be in their denials, I believe that somewhere, somehow, someone has forgotten, or that perhaps the word "complaint"—and the word "complaint" was the one I used in my question—may have been construed in some narrow technical way so that an artificial denial could be given. In other words, I suggest that it is a denial of convenience.

As I said the other night, I still hope that in spite of everything that has happened the Prime Minister may take steps to see that this injustice is redressed as a kind of Christmas present to the gods of justice.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should say a further word on this matter. Just let us review the great injustice that has been perpetrated. A hotel manager has been moved, for reasons that I do not know, from Winnipeg to Brandon. Apparently my hon. friend claims that is a fate worse than death. I never knew that Brandon was as bad a place as that. I thought Brandon was a rather pleasant city. I have stopped at the hotel there, and I found it to be very comfortable. I just mention that aspect when we seek to measure the terrific injustice that has been perpetrated against Mr. Pitt.

My hon. friend gave me information which I did not have, namely that Mr. Pitt has been transferred to Brandon at the same salary he was getting at the Fort Garry hotel. My hon. friend goes into the reasons and he speaks of facts. It is a fact that the Prime Minister visited Winnipeg. He did not stop at the Fort Garry hotel, but he had occasion to go there in order to attend a meeting. I suppose he was in the hotel all of two hours during his visit. He went to the hotel. He was greeted by the committee in charge of the function he was attending. He was greeted in the lobby. He went to the function and made his address. He was escorted to the door by the committee and he departed. That is what the Prime Minister tells me his visit to the Fort Garry hotel amounted to. The Prime Minister said he shook hands with everybody in the group that greeted him in the lobby. He does not know whether he greeted the manager of the hotel or whether he did not. But if he did not, he did not know it, and certainly he made no complaint about it. I hope my hon. friend will accept that explanation. Having mentioned the Prime Minister in every sentence or two since he started to talk on this subject, I hope that he will in future omit the Prime Minister's name in this regard.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I said that before you did, and you know it.

Mr. Howe: Then why mention the Prime Minister's name? If the Prime Minister cannot go to Winnipeg, walk into a hotel and address a meeting and then walk out of the hotel without having his name bandied about from coast to coast and bandied about in this house on that account, it is just too bad, in my opinion. My hon. friend is certainly guilty—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Tell us about the unpleasantness.

Mr. Howe: All right, I will. I asked about that. I asked in the only quarters in which I am entitled to ask. I did not ask in railway circles, because it is none of my business what the railway does about its internal management; but I did ask two or three members of the party who registered at the Fort Garry on the previous day what had happened. Well, a wire was sent from the plane when it was found that it would be necessary to stop in Winnipeg on account of weather. Reservations were requested and were confirmed back to the plane. The party arrived there and the rooms were not assigned for about an hour and twenty minutes, I believe, after they arrived.

Well, that was all right, but naturally it was unpleasant for the party. I have had the same thing happen to me, and I have been annoyed about it, but I have not complained to the railway management about it. I have not complained to the manager about it. I have groused a little to the desk clerk, perhaps. I daresay something of that kind happened; but every member of the party assures me that they entered no complaint to the management, and I believe it. Why should I not? Not only that, but the president of the railway says that no complaint was entered to the management against what had happened. Because the newspapers have chosen to associate that event with the transfer of the manager my hon. friend believes it, and there is no evidence. What evidence is there?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On the information of labour people.

Mr. Howe: Of labour? How would labour know what happened?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They were in the hotel. They saw the unpleasantness, no doubt.

Mr. Howe: They saw the unpleasantness in a party that included a minister of the crown, but not the Prime Minister? A minister of the crown was in the hotel lobby sitting on his bags. Since it was a considerable party it would be noticed, I presume.

An hon. Member: Who did?

Mr. Howe: Well, I say those who saw the thing—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister says the Prime Minister's party was there. He has got the wrong end of the story.

Mr. Howe: I said nothing of the Prime Minister. I said a minister of the crown was there. I said the Prime Minister was in the hotel next day for about two hours attending a meeting. I do not know whether it was a luncheon meeting, but it was a meeting in the middle of the day. The Prime Minister did not register at the hotel; he had other sleeping arrangements, and therefore he is not involved in any delay at the hotel. There was a party, we will say, of five or six people who had had their reservations confirmed. They are delayed in being assigned rooms. That happens in hotels. It has happened to me and has happened to my hon. friend, and we both get a bit annoyed about it. These people were annoyed about it, but there is no evidence whatever—in fact I have the assurance of the men themselves that they made no complaint to the railway management. We have the assurance of the president of the railway that they did not complain, that no complaint was entered. My hon. friend thinks there is something behind this. Well, he is not flattering Donald Gordon. To believe that a complaint that someone was kept waiting in the hotel lobby for an hour and twenty minutes would be considered so serious that he would immediately transfer the manager is ridiculous. If Donald Gordon did that he is not fit to hold the job of president and I am perfectly certain that he did not do it.

If my hon. friend wants to know why this man was transferred, he has the privilege of taking up his complaint in the committee on railways and shipping, and if he does not follow up in the committee I will be there to remind him to do so. It is his duty to find out. He can demand the facts; he can demand the files on the man; he can demand the operating records of the hotel. He can go to the bottom of this matter, and certainly it is his duty to this parliament to do so.

He says it is his right to redress a grievance. Well, there are grievances all the way from the trackmen up through the list of foremen, superintendents, managers who are retired, and so forth. I have had them all come to me—not all of them, but I have had a few of them come to me, and I have said: I am sorry, it has nothing to do with me. It is a matter for the railroad; and such is the situation as far as Mr. Pitt is concerned.

I do not know that I need say any more. I do say that not a fact has been presented by the hon. member. My hon. friend has before him the official return from Mr. Gordon, the official return from the Department of Transport. He can accept my statement made after questioning two or three members of the first party and of talking with the Prime Minister. He can accept my facts as correct or not, as he likes, but he has not presented one single fact to substantiate his position that the government was involved in the matter, or that it is a matter which he is entitled to take up on the floor of parliament.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Who were in this other party?

Mr. Howe: I do not remember all of them, but Mr. Robert Mayhew was the minister involved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Which of them did you question?

Mr. Howe: I questioned Mr. Mayhew. He was in Canada at the time. He is not in Canada now; and I questioned one or two of the others. I do not remember who they were, but I questioned enough people to know—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Who were the others?

Mr. Howe: Well, I do not remember.

Mr. Casselman: Pickersgill?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Who made the requests for the reservations?

Mr. Howe: It was made from the plane in flight; I imagine it was made by the pilot.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I rise to make a few observations on the Currie report, and a few other observations on the report of a royal commission that we are hoping to receive at an early date. Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, along with other members who have spoken in this debate I was amazed at the contents of the Currie report. I think members of parliament generally will regret exceedingly that thefts have prevailed at the Petawawa camp to the extent disclosed by the report, and that there has been such a terrific waste of public funds. The types of thefts are now well known to members of the house. For instance, we hear of such things as the loss of 18,000 bags of cement and 550 tons of so-called scrap iron, part of which turned out to be not scrap at all but kitchen ranges, cannon heaters, shower stalls and sinks. This is something that all of us must regret exceedingly.

Reading through the report I was amazed to learn that there had been the loss of C.P.R. rails, and that immediately this loss was brought to the attention of persons at the camp they proceeded to tear up and steal the rails from the C.N.R. spur line, to replace the C.P.R. rails that had been taken.

It seems to me clear from the report that the responsibility is very definitely that of the Department of National Defence. If the department had been doing its job these thefts would not have taken place. In Mr. Currie's report, as it appears in Hansard at page 712, he says:

> At Petawawa, however, the crooks were present and took advantage of the situation, and it is an unhappy circumstance that the beginning of this investigation lies not inside the Department of National Defence and its full complement of regulations and supervising personnel, but with the receipt of an anonymous letter.

The Department of National Defence, with its full complement of officers and personnel, was either unwilling or unable to discover that thefts were taking place. Placing the responsibility squarely on the laxity of the Department of National Defence, Mr. Currie goes to say:

> It must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions . . . The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

As I have said, the responsibility lies with the government, with the Department of National Defence. Under our system of responsible government, in my opinion the government is unable to make a scapegoat of anyone; because even though it may take action against the wrongdoers, nevertheless in the light of this report it is definitely responsible for having neglected to provide against such a possibility, even after having been warned periodically by the auditor.

This report is dated November 26. As one of the press representatives has said—I believe it was Mr. Blakely in this morning's Gazette—this is the date of the official version. And the date of the authorized version, the other edition, is exactly the same. We have had therefore two versions of this report.

Well, this is not the only report of a government commission of which we may have two versions. Members from Saskatchewan, in particular, have been hoping that the report of a royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river development project would be made public at an early date. We know, from the reply of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to a question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on Friday, November 21, that the report was ready as early as November 19, except for printing, and that according to a letter received by the Prime Minister from the secretary of the commission it was expected that the printing and publication would take place by December 15.

We are now waiting for the Prime Minister to table that report in the house, so that we may see what is in it. I think we have an inkling already of what it may contain, because Mr. V. J. Mackie, a very responsible member of the press gallery, in an article appearing in the Regina Leader-Post of November 22 had this to say:

> The royal commission does not recommend that the proposed irrigation and power project be proceeded with, on the grounds that it would be too costly to undertake at present.
> The report will suggest an alternative, but much less ambitious, development of the Saskatchewan river, it was learned.

Well, apparently the experience we have had in regard to the Currie report is being repeated at least to some extent in connection with the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan dam, because as long ago as November 22 this press representative makes a categorical statement as to the main findings of the commission. I think it is the duty of the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to produce the report of that royal commission to this house before the Christmas recess. I can tell the Prime Minister that if the royal commission recommends against the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam members of parliament from western Canada, at least members of this group, will have something to say about it. We will condemn the abandonment of that project, whether or not the royal commission is in fact recommending against it.

I should like to know if the contents of this article sum up the report of that royal commission. If the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan dam is adverse, then in the light of Liberal promises made in every election since 1935, especially by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I believe it will be found that the Liberal party has lost the confidence of the people of Saskatchewan.

It seems clear to me that with the bringing to light of the Currie report, with its damning evidence against the Department of National Defence, the whole government now lacks the confidence of the Canadian people. I suggest to the government that in view of the Currie report, and particularly if the royal commission should make an adverse recommendation as to the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam, the best thing it can do is go to the people of Canada in a general election at a date as early as is practicable having in view road and weather conditions.

I turn now to a matter of local interest which I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I refer to the request that has been made for the erection of a federal building in the town of Assiniboia. The population of that town is around 2,400. It is a progressive and growing town; it is a town in which new places of business are opening every year, and it should have a federal building.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member has just mentioned that we have lost the confidence of the people. Does he think I would dare bring in an item for his post office?

Mr. Argue: If the estimates are brought down at this session I suggest in all seriousness to the Minister of Public Works that he include an item for a federal building in Assiniboia. I do not think the people of Canada, at any rate the people of Saskatchewan, are going to return many Liberals to parliament, but no matter; I do feel that the people of Assiniboia are deserving of such a building. The premises now being used for a post office are rented, and a new federal building could be used not only for the post office but for the local detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the federal officials working for the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I want to refer now to what I consider is the plight of agricultural producers, particularly the producers of livestock and dairy products. I followed with interest the proceedings of the recent dominion-provincial conference on agricultural matters, and I was concerned with the many reports released by officials of the federal government who were attending that conference. According to the Regina Leader-Post of October 24 the Minister of Agriculture stated at a public meeting:

"Our livestock difficulty is not there because of anyone's wish," he said, "but because of foot-and-mouth disease".

Then it continued:

"If we could keep our livestock on our farms and feed our surplus grain to it we would solve both problems.

I think there is an increasing indication that today livestock prices in Canada are not at a low figure because of foot-and-mouth disease or because of the loss of the United States livestock market. I should like to quote from a press release which was made at the dominion-provincial conference concerning statements made by officials of the federal Department of Agriculture. One statement referring to the United States was as follows:

The number of cattle slaughtered has begun to increase this year with a more rapid rise in prospect for 1953.

And again:

A further easing of prices received by farmers is suggested for 1953 whereas the index of prices paid by farmers will likely be slightly higher.

Referring to the United States market this official states that there is likely to be a further easing of United States cattle prices. Referring to Canada, this press release stated:

A decline in Canadian livestock prices in 1953 from corresponding levels a year ago will probably result from increased marketings and an anticipated further easing of United States prices. This decrease is likely to be more pronounced in cattle and calves than in hogs, with least change in prices of lamb and mutton.

There we have Department of Agriculture officials saying that 1953 will see a further lowering of cattle and livestock prices in Canada. There has been a terrific fall in livestock prices in Canada from the autumn of 1951 until the present time, and the best prospect officials of the minister's own department can hold out is that Canadian livestock prices will go down even further. Dealing with the farmer's general income position in relation to his 1952 income, the press release had this to say:

Although farm cash income from the sale of farm products and from participation payments may reach a new all-time high, it is estimated that a lower income in kind, reduced values of year-end inventory changes and higher operating costs will serve to provide a net farm income about 5 per cent below a year ago.

The forecast is that farm net income for 1952 will be 5 per cent below farm net income in 1951. It goes on to say that farm income is also expected to be somewhat lower in 1953. In other words the position of the farmer is worsening. Even though the United States market will be opened on March 1 the officials of the minister's department hold out no hope for an increase in livestock prices. In fact they say that there will be a further decrease in Canadian livestock prices. The Financial Post of December 13 contained an article on the front page entitled: "Cattle Prices May go Down, Won't Lift With U. S. Ban."

It says:

Thousands of Canadian farmers who are planning to withhold their cattle from the home market in anticipation of higher prices when the United States embargo comes off March 1 may be in for a rude shock. Unless there is a big change in the next two months, and top beef authorities in both countries cannot see it now, Canadian farmers will be forced to take sizable cuts in most cattle prices to get into the big United States market, cuts that could make today's domestic prices look pretty attractive. On the basis of today's prices, for instance, Canada could market only one class of beef cattle in the United States, choice steers. That class represents some 5 per cent to 10 per cent of total normal marketings in this country. None of the big volume cattle types could lay down competitively in the United States after freight, tariff, brokerage and exchange. Here is the current price differential.

Then follow figures with respect to the differential between Canadian and United States cattle prices. If the embargo were lifted now Canadian choice steers, red label beef steers, probably would go up by $1.30 a hundredweight. Good steers probably would go down by $4.30. Canadian commercial steers would drop $5.35 a hundredweight. Commercial cows, good, would drop $2.50 a hundredweight; utility cows would drop $1.80 a hundredweight and canner cows would drop $1.50 a hundredweight. The article to which I have referred shows that the opening of the United States market now to permit Canadian cattle to go into that country and United States cattle to come into Canada would have the effect of lowering Canadian beef prices instead of raising them.

Therefore before the Christmas recess begins I should like an explanation from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of his statement that the only trouble with the livestock industry today is the fact that the United States market has been closed. I should like an explanation of his statement that the thing for farmers to do to solve our surplus grain problem and our inadequate livestock market is to feed our livestock on the farms. If the farmers keep back, as they have been asked by the minister to do, increased numbers of livestock on the farms at the present time, the only effect that can possibly have is a further lowering of prices when these livestock are placed on the market some months from now. I have here a Canadian Press dispatch from Winnipeg dated December 11, which reads:

United States cattle prices are due for a 20 per cent slump in the next four years as beef on the hoof nears 100 million, highest production level in the country's history, Wayne Darrow, president of Farm Reports Incorporated, Washington, said today. In Winnipeg to address the Winnipeg stock exchange annual meeting, Mr. Darrow said in an interview the United States herds are reproducing so fast the American population gain can't keep up.

We have had a dominion-provincial conference on farm matters, and the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture's own officials are almost consistently gloomy. They are forecasting lower livestock prices and a lower net income for agricultural producers. In view of the difficulty we are having in finding adequate markets for beef, pork, cheese, eggs and poultry products, I think the Minister of Agriculture owes it to the house and to the country to make a statement in parliament outlining the position of the agricultural industry and advising our agricultural producers as to what they should do in order to receive the highest possible return in the coming year. I have in my hand the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin for Thursday, December 11. In it there is one paragraph headed, "Drop in Index Number of Farm Prices of Agricultural Products in October", which reads as follows:

Canada's index number of farm prices of agricultural products dropped in October to 243·5—

Mark this.

—the lowest monthly standing since April, 1948.

Farm product prices in October of this year were at their lowest point since April, 1948. While farm prices have been going down since April, 1948, farm costs have been increasing at an alarming rate. In 1949, for example, the index number of farm prices of agricultural products was 255·4 while the farmers' cost of production index was 204·1. In 1950 the agricultural prices index was 260·8 while the farm costs index was 210·4. In 1951 the index of prices of agricultural products for the whole year was 296·9 while the index of farm costs was 229·9. For October of this year the index number of farm prices of agricultural products was 243·5 while the index of farm costs was 243·4.

In other words, according to those figures of the dominion bureau of statistics Canadian agricultural producers on a relative basis are in exactly the same position now as they were in the base period of 1935-39. I say that when agriculture is now placed in the position in which it was from 1935 to 1939 it is becoming a depressed industry; and it is becoming a depressed industry because of the policies or lack of policies of this government. Of course members of the cabinet get up and brag about employment statistics, the high national income, the very large gross national product, and they say we have prosperity throughout Canada. There may be prosperity throughout Canada today, but we are rapidly approaching a situation where there may be general prosperity for all but the agriculture industry, which may face a depression.

When the agricultural index figures show that agricultural product prices for October of this year are no better than the prices of agricultural products based on costs of production in the period from 1935 to 1939, then agriculture in Canada is not in a very healthy position. On January 1 the Minister of Agriculture is going to drop the support price of hogs by $3 a hundredweight, from $26 to $23. The government are following a policy of cutting floor prices to the very bottom in the hope that they may prevent full production by the agricultural industry. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) tells us every time we ask for an increase in the old age pension or the family allowance, or every time anyone suggests that the government should reduce taxes, that the only hope of increased services or decreased taxes is through greater production in Canada, a real increase in the gross national product. While the Minister of Finance is telling Canadians that they must work harder and produce more the Minister of Agriculture is telling the farmers, by the actions he takes, that he is afraid of their production. He wants them to cut hog production, beef production, poultry production, right down the line.

There was one reference during the dominion-provincial agricultural conference that did not appear so bleak. At one point one of the economists said that the future may not be too bad for the Canadian turkey industry. He pointed out that turkey prices are away down this fall, and said that no doubt turkey producers are going to cut production to such an extent that those that stay in the business can expect higher prices next year. I believe that is a bankrupt policy if I ever heard one.

I do not commend a minister very often, but I want to commend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the government upon the fact that we have, and have had now for a number of years, a Canadian wheat board handling the marketing of all western grain. No party has more consistently supported the Canadian wheat board than the party to which I have the honour to belong. I want to say that I appreciate a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he spoke to the investment dealers' association of Canada in Toronto on October 28 of this year. I wish the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would study that address very carefully, and I wish he would apply to the rest of the agricultural industry the same type of provision that is now made for the grain producers of western Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> In a year like the present, when handling facilities are congested, you can well imagine what an advantage it is for one marketing agency to have full control over the main western grain crops, and to be able to sell them and move them to market as opportunity arises.

He went on to say that the wheat board had successfully marketed last year's crop much of which was of a very low grade, and that this was one of the most remarkable achievements in the history of the grain trade. At another point he said:

> —I believe that the wheat board has been able to handle the western crop, during the war and since the war, more successfully than it could have been handled by any other marketing method.

The minister pointed out that because of the way the wheat board is operated, all the producers in any given year get exactly the same price for a given grade of grain. I do not need to repeat that I support the Canadian wheat board and the wheat board system of marketing grain. I should like to see the Minister of Agriculture and this government set up a livestock board or agricultural products board along the lines of the Canadian wheat board, to assemble such agricultural products as beef, dairy and poultry products going into interprovincial and export trade, set a proper initial price and pay the farmers the same prices for the products after the year is completed and the final payment is made.

I see that my time is going, Mr. Speaker, and I have an amendment to move. In order to protect myself against loss of time I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following:
> "(f) To recommend legislation providing for the payment to producers, in respect of farm-stored grain, of an advance equal to 75 per cent of the initial price as established at August 1 in each crop year."

A few days ago I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would consider making such an advance payment. He said that such a payment was not needed this year because the farmers had marketed more grain this year than in the same period last year, and they were receiving total final payments amounting to $158 million. I want to point out to the minister and to the house just what this final payment means to the average wheat producer.

According to the 1951 census there were 248,716 occupied farms in the three prairie provinces. As reported in the last grain statistics weekly, the grain marketed up to November 27 of this crop year amounted—this is my estimate on the basis of initial prices—to $335 million. This works out to an average income for the western farmer from the sale of grain of $1,350. Participation payments for each farmer averaged $630. This meant that up until that time a farmer had received or was about to receive in payments on grain, both the initial payment and the final payment, something in the neighbourhood of $2,000 each. This is a small gross income, out of which the farmer has to pay his living expenses; his land taxes; pay for machinery; for petroleum products, and the other costs. Certainly this indicates that the average farmer needs some other provision, which I suggest should be an advance payment on farm-stored grain.

I have heard it said, Mr. Speaker, by various members over a cup of coffee that the western farmer is rolling in money; that the Saskatchewan farmer has never made more money in his history. I have heard it said that if you want to find the western farmers in the wintertime go to California, Florida or Texas; and if you cannot find them all there you may find a few of them in British Columbia. Apparently a lot of eastern people believe that the average farmer in Saskatchewan has three or four sections of land, has modern equipment, works a few months a year and spends the winters in the southern United States. I have the census figures which illustrate the size of farms in Saskatchewan. I find that of the various categories of farms by far the largest number were in the category between 240 and 399 acres. I find that 29,000 farmers in Saskatchewan out of 112,000 operated a farm equal to a half section of good land or three-quarters of a section, one-quarter of which was not entirely under cultivation. Farmers who owned more than five quarters of good arable land amounted to only 8 per cent of the total number of farmers. The farmers of western Canada are on the whole not large land owners but farmers with a half or three-quarters of a section, and it is in the interests of the vast majority of farmers that I am proposing this further subamendment.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that United States farmers are able to obtain a loan on farm-stored grain. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that the banks will lend the farmers money. I saw a statement in the Regina Leader-Post, I believe it was about November 30, in which the bank officials said they were prepared to lend money on farm-stored grain provided the grain was in good condition and the farmer was in a sound financial position. I am afraid not all those farmers about whom I have been talking, because 80 per cent or more are relatively small farmers, would be able to convince the banks that they were in a sound financial position.

In this proposal, I am not asking for any money from the federal treasury. I am asking for legislation to make provision for the advancing of money on farm-stored grain. I believe it is the best security in the world, and I believe the farmers would be prepared to pay a nominal rate of interest to cover all the costs involved.

Another reason I feel such a proposition should be implemented is the further fact that the farmer is perhaps not the person who suffers most when he cannot sell his grain. The person who suffers greatly, in my opinion, is the businessman in our small communities. A farmer may owe $1,000 or $2,000. A small businessman may have on his books $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000. He knows the accounts are good. The grain is in the bins. But the farmers are unable to sell their grain as rapidly as they would wish and for that reason are unable to speedily pay their accounts.

I moved a similar amendment last year. At that time the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) moved a subamendment. That subamendment wiped out almost all of my amendment, certainly that part of it in which I was interested. His amendment thanked the government for everything they had done for the farmer. That was fine. This amendment I am now moving is a subamendment and, as I understand the rules, we shall have an opportunity to vote on the subamendment. I ask the hon. members from western Canada, particularly those from Saskatchewan, no matter to which party they may belong, to consider this amendment carefully. I submit that they should vote for it on the basis of the advantage which will accrue to the people they represent.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity of saying a word about the Currie report, for two reasons. The first and most important one is that I had already exhausted the time I had under the subamendment which we had moved. I therefore could not speak again until now. The second is that I wanted to read the report most carefully and to weigh as calmly and as carefully as possible every word in it, in pursuance of the request made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday. I have now given it as much consideration as I can in the time I have had, and I should like just to sum up briefly the attitude I take toward it.

I think there are three things more particularly about which I find myself concerned, and I believe these will be the things that will concern the people of the country as well. The first is that the report is full of evidence that what we told the government two years ago was correct. On several occasions we warned the government that they would have to use vision and foresight, and that they would have to make careful provision against possible wrongdoing, graft and dishonesty because their defence effort was growing bigger every year and would therefore offer greater opportunity for these evils.

The people of the country are certainly going to be greatly alarmed over the evidence of lack of vision and foresight on the part of top or near-top officials of government, as revealed in the report. The government must have known that the bigger the defence effort, the greater would be the opportunity for waste, dishonesty and graft. To me it is surprising—and I suppose it will be surprising to everyone in the country who thinks about it—that, under the circumstances, the government did not see fit to place in responsible positions of authority first-class administrators with adequate training so they could administer the billions of dollars that are being spent and see to it that a system was provided that would prevent waste and graft. Civil administrators of top ability were not appointed and placed in proper positions, although adequate warning came from this side of the house on various occasions. The government therefore really has no excuse.

The second thing about which the people are going to be greatly concerned is this. There are plenty of indications that officials in responsible positions have winked at and continue to wink at evidence of wrongdoing; and they continue to do this until the accumulation of irregularities grows so big as to excite the public in the area in which they have occurred to make complaints and ask for an investigation. In the report of Mr. Currie there seems to be plenty of evidence that a breakdown of morality followed a breakdown of watchfulness and control in the Department of National Defence. If a blind eye continues to be turned toward the serious breaches of regulations, the question most of us ask is this: how long will it be until the whole administration is shot through with immorality? That is the big issue. The government should crack down hard on those who are guilty; and in doing so they must not overlook the people in top positions. They are guilty. There is no question about that.

The third thing I found that concerned me greatly was the situation with which we are confronted when anyone would attempt to tamper with royal commission reports, to change them in order to soften the impact of the findings on the people concerned. I think it is a shocking situation that has been laid bare here in these past two days, and the taxpayers of the country will not be insensible to the fantastic things that have been revealed. I cannot reach any other conclusion in connection with this matter than that the government must take the full responsibility. Inasmuch as that is so, it seems to me that I must add my voice to the voices of those who have already asserted that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) ought to resign.

Perhaps there are others who ought to resign along with him. It is that subject that I should like to talk about for the next few minutes. What I have to say now, Mr. Speaker, was occasioned by a speech made in this house on the evening of December 4, to which I have not yet had a chance to reply. I should like to refer in a general way to the speech that was made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) that evening. The case he made then was sound, wholly sound. I should like to emphasize the fact that his arguments appeared at that time to register with some of his frightened Liberal colleagues in this house, but they certainly fell flat in Alberta. The people out there are well enough informed that speeches like the one the minister made serve only to convince them that they have made a serious mistake in sending down to parliament a man who cannot do a better job than he did on that occasion.

To all of us who watched the minister as he delivered his speech it was quite evident that the arguments that were written into it did not appeal greatly even to him. He says he wrote it himself. He therefore will have to take full responsibility for it and for what I have to say. I think he might learn that ghost-writers can be a terrible handicap. The beggars are never around to take the rap when the rap comes. Perhaps we should not be too severe on the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys because giving that speech was likely one of the prices he had to pay to his party for the privilege of being Alberta's only cabinet minister.

These things seem to carry their price tags, especially in the Liberal party. This past summer I saw the minister's buddy doing some chore-boy footwork for the party around various communities in the Peace river country. That was likely to pay off his debt for the security he obtained. I am speaking now of the senator from Alberta. It must have seemed queer to the house to watch the spectacle of a minister of the crown in this parliament firing the first gun in the Peace River election campaign, a constituency that is over 300 miles from his own constituency of Edmonton West. Hon. members did not know that the minister had been laying the groundwork for that campaign for over a year.

This was not the first instance. I want to give the background to measure what he had to say, because one has to have it. Early this year the minister went to the radio bureau in Ottawa requesting the right to participate in the free time reports from parliament hill over the radio station in the Peace river country, and he based his demand on the argument that there were certain people in a remote part of his constituency of West Edmonton who could not be reached over the two Edmonton stations, although no part of his riding is more than a few miles from those stations while the station in Grande Prairie is 340 miles from the farthest elector in the West Edmonton constituency. Well, he got the time over the air, and he has been sharing that free time with me over station CFGP in Grande Prairie. Therefore it was not surprising, sir, that the minister carried his Peace River campaign into this house. But what is surprising and almost beyond belief is that a responsible minister of the federal government, the only one Alberta has down here, would rise in his place in this house and make such utterly irresponsible statements as he did a week ago last Thursday night.

People have a right to the truth, particularly from men in the responsible position of ministers of the crown.

Mr. Prudham: That is what they got from me.

Mr. Low: I will examine that in minute detail, and we shall let the people judge for themselves on the basis of the facts and the evidence, not just hearsay, or what some ghost-writer puts in.

The minister showed himself to be more irresponsible than any other minister in my experience, Mr. Speaker, and I have seen a lot of them come and go. I am going to say that his speech was full of half-truths and misrepresentations. There were at least two distortions, out of all semblance to their real selves; and there was one statement—well, I do not say it was a complete distortion, Mr. Speaker, it was totally wrong. The minister must have had his green spectacles on when he read what I heard him say here on the 25th day of November, because he did not seem to know that I did not say that his trip to the Peace river was a casual one. I never made any such statement at any time. I did say that he had gone up there to attend a nominating convention, and at that nominating convention made certain statements and cast some rather serious personal aspersions, one of which was that I was not sincere. Well, I was answering that, and the speech he gave the other night in the house was an answer to what I said. I will not take much time to deal with the minister's transparent effort—and it was a transparent effort —to belittle me and hold me up to ridicule.

I am of course grateful to the minister for revealing this far ahead what kind of personal attack he and his Liberal party will launch against me in the federal election campaign next year. You know, it is a good thing to know ahead, because good strategy says: find out what your enemy wants you to do and just do not do it. I thank him for letting me know of it. The only thing he and his party can find to criticize in the eight years I have represented the Peace River constituency is that I do not live there.

The minister says the people of that district are becoming very much aware of the fact that they should have a member of their own community representing them. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals up in Peace River and the minister over the radio are doing their level best to whip up that kind of sentiment by every means, fair or foul, they can think of. Let me make it clear that I have never at any time felt that the people of the Peace river country could not find plenty of individuals amongst themselves who are perfectly capable of representing them in this house; but I did not seek the nomination, and I would like the minister to know that. I did not seek the nomination in Peace River; I was invited, and I was strongly pressed and urged by the people up there to let my name stand for nomination both in 1945 and in 1949. And I will just tell the minister something else that he seems to forget. In 1945 when the people of the Peace river country held their Social Credit nominating convention I was not even there. I was nominated in absentia, and was notified by telegram that that had been done.

In the intervening years I believe that I have served the people of the constituency well. Most electors up there admit that every section and every corner of the vast constituency, one of the biggest in Canada if not the biggest, have seen me, their Social Credit member, more often and more regularly than they have ever seen their other representatives, including the Liberal ones they have had. I have made a sustained and conscious effort to do my duty to those I represent, and from the evidence I found on my most recent journey through that great constituency the vast majority of the people up there have appreciated the efforts I have made and the service I have earnestly tried to give them.

It is true that I live in Ottawa, but so does every other party leader; but of course the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys did not want to be fair about that and grant me the same privilege he grants to his own party leader and to other party leaders as well. He claims, of course, that he lives in Edmonton. The fact is that he lives in Ottawa and continues to own a home in south Edmonton. Let me make it abundantly clear that I do not begrudge him owning that home. If he owned three I would say we ought to be glad we live in a country where people can own three homes if they want to. I say that is his own right, and he does live in Ottawa to carry on his work; but not many of us, sir, can afford two homes. Most of us have a hard enough time to carry the expenses of one home; but those of us who are called to party leadership find that we must live in Ottawa to be able to faithfully and efficiently do the work that devolves upon us. Of course it would hardly be expected that the minister would be moved by any feelings of justice and fairness in such matters, inasmuch as some political advantage might be lost if he did so.

I should like to turn for just a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to some of the particulars of the speech the minister gave, because I want to substantiate what I said at the beginning that his speech was full of half-truths, told as if they were whole truths, misrepresentations and distortions; and if I cannot do this then I shall proceed in the minister's presence to eat this whole Hansard.

Mr. Riley: Will you eat the Alberta story too?

Mr. Low: In the first place I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the minister seemed to be very concerned about the Peace river country, and he spoke very well about it. I was glad to hear him say the wonderful things he did, because it is a great country. But I am interested in this particular thing. They say that in 1492 Columbus discovered America; in 1952 it appears that the Liberals have discovered the Peace river. That is most interesting to me. He told some very interesting things about the Peace river country. I do not know why, but he got it mixed up with British Columbia building a little connecting highway from very near the Alberta border to Prince George. At any rate, he said the people of the Peace river district looked forward to the day when they could have rail transportation to the Pacific coast. Well, I say, "Yes", just as I did when the minister was speaking. They certainly do look forward to that. Let me point out just a few things that perhaps the minister has not reviewed.

In the election campaign of 1925 the prime minister and leader of the Liberal party promised an Edmonton audience that the Liberal party would make the Peace River country the spearhead of that party's program. That was in 1925. Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King assured a lot of Peace River people that that would be done. There were a lot of Peace River people at the Edmonton meeting and the Liberals wanted a Liberal member up there, you see. In the 1926 campaign this same Liberal leader told a similar audience in Edmonton that he would build a coast outlet to the Peace river country as soon as it was humanly possible—to get votes, of course. Then when the 1930 election campaign got under way Mr. Mackenzie King told another Edmonton political gathering that he would support the construction of a railway from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast within one year, if the railway companies failed to build a coast outlet within the year. At about the same time Sir Henry Thornton, then president of the Canadian National Railways, said that when grain shipments from the Peace river country reached 10 million bushels per year, the railway from the Peace river to the coast would be built.

Well, this is the final month of 1952, and that great country of the mighty Peace is in much the same position with regard to rail transportation as it was in 1925, except that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) has again said that the Peace river country ought to have a railway to the coast.

Twenty-seven years of promises, broken Liberal promises, are all the people of my constituency have had, and no rail outlet westward is in sight even yet, despite the fact that the total yearly grain production has reached almost four times the 10 million bushels that were held by the president of the C.N.R. to be necessary before his company would begin building that railroad.

My constituency of Peace River does, indeed, need a rail outlet to the coast. The vast majority of the people out there have no confidence whatever in Liberal promises. So they are prepared to support a movement that has demonstrated that it just does not go around at election time making idle promises. They know that a Social Credit government at Ottawa would have that railway between Hines Creek and Dawson Creek extended to Prince Rupert and/or Vancouver in its first term of office.

The Peace river country is even now one of the greatest food producing, timber producing and mineral producing areas in America; and the 65,000 people up there are entitled to better treatment than they have had at the hands of a Liberal government here in Ottawa. They are carrying a transportation burden away beyond their ability to bear, and certainly away beyond what they should bear.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys made a statement in connection with conservation in Alberta. He claimed there was no conservation being carried on, and then he said:

> One place in Alberta where conservation is being practised is on the important eastern slopes of the Rockies where under a federal-provincial arrangement a splendid timber and water conservation program is being carried out. In this case, under the joint agreement, the federal government is contributing the major share of the required funds, close to $4 million to date.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I admit that there is a very, very wonderful joint conservation program going on. I admit openly, and have done for many years, right before this House of Commons, that the eastern slope of the Rockies agreement is a splendid agreement. But what the minister does not tell the people, when he makes reference to this matter, is that for a good many years Alberta carried the total cost of preserving the watershed on the eastern slope of the Rockies, which gives rise to interprovincial waters and therefore becomes essentially a federal matter.

Mr. Prudham: How much did they spend on it?

Mr. Low: We spent a good many hundred thousand dollars before we even got the federal government to come in. As far back as 1937 and 1938 I recall making visits to Ottawa as one of the ministers of the crown of Alberta. I was accompanied by Hon. Mr. Tanner, and we pleaded with the federal government to take action and help us preserve the eastern slope of the Rockies. It took them a good long time to make up their minds that it was at least partially a federal responsibility.

I do not mind admitting that the federal government are now doing a good job, and the provincial government are doing a good job along with them. But what I do mind is efforts on the part of the minister to make it appear that the federal government proceeded alone to do this whole thing.

Mr. Prudham: I did not say that. I said it was a joint effort.

Mr. Low: The minister made the statement, only a half-truth, that the federal government has already done the lion's share. Let me say this, that at the time the negotiations were under way for legislation making provision for a commission to deal with the eastern slope of the Rockies, a former minister of mines and resources, Mr. Glen, had this to say on February 28, 1947, as reported at page 889 of Hansard:

> May I add a word of appreciation of the wholehearted co-operation extended by Premier Manning and the Hon. Mr. Tanner in working out the details of the arrangement. In our discussions at no time did they forget the wider interests involved.

Now, if the minister would indicate a similar attitude, I am certain he would feel the warmth of complete co-operation, too.

Then here is another half-truth: The minister referred to oil and gas development. He said it would not have been possible but for the federal geological surveys and studies, as well as the production of federal maps ever since 1873. Well, we recognize, and we always have recognized, the work of the federal department. But let me just point out that the Liberals sat on the oil in the province of Alberta for a long time without developing it. I say that it is providential for the people of this country that the discovery of oil came as it did come and when it did come, at a time when a government was in office in that province that would see to it that the development took place, and that such development was carried out in the interests of the people.

Mr. Prudham: Do you think Providence arranged it that way?

Mr. Low: If I had the time I could easily make some comparisons showing the development of resources in provinces that have been presided over for a long time by Liberal governments. The share of the resources recovered for the people in those provinces would bear a mighty puny relationship to what has been recovered out of the resources developed in Alberta. I might point out that in an article written recently by none other than the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) as reported in the Calgary Herald, he said:

> During the first six months of the current fiscal year, from April 1 to September 30, the Alberta government poured into its bulging treasury an estimated total of $31,338,000 setting a new record half-year "take" from the 132 million acres of crown petroleum and natural gas rights administered by that government on behalf of the joint owners, Alberta's 900,000 citizens.

And let me say just this to the minister, that when he talks about the great help the federal government has given to the oil industry, I wonder if he will claim credit for the crown reserves idea. Does he claim credit for the checkerboard idea? Does he claim credit for the idea of the lease, rental and royalty system? Those are the things that count, not just the fact that some maps and surveys were supplied although, as I say, we fully appreciate what the minister and his department have done over the years.

In the course of his speech the minister had something to say about coal. I should like to read his statement in this connection as it is reported at page 356 of Hansard:

> On the other hand, so far as the coal industry is concerned, in my opinion the Alberta government, though it has collected large sums in royalties, has done little to assist the industry in a practical way. Actually a total of over $6 million in royalties, fees, rentals and mineral taxes has been collected by the Social Credit government from coal mines in Alberta since it came into office. I want to make it quite clear, however, that the Alberta research council, within the scope of its limited facilities, has co-operated at all times with federal agencies. The relations between the scientists of the council and the scientists of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys have always been most cordial and mutually helpful.

Well, the implications of the last part of that statement are that relations between the minister's department and government departments in Alberta are not so good. That is the only implication I can take from it.

Mr. Prudham: Oh, no, I did not say that.

Mr. Low: I shall leave it to the people who read this to say if that is not so. I think it is quite understandable in the light of the speech made the other day by the minister. If he would not come down here and slander his own province in connection with what is going on there he would be able to expect a whole lot more co-operation than he seems to get.

While we are talking about coal, and in the light of the statement the minister made, I took the trouble to inquire of the department in Alberta that has to do with coal just what were the facts. I should like to place on the record what the minister of mines and minerals of Alberta, none other than Premier Manning, had to say. I quote:

> Alberta has consistently pressed for a national coal policy which the federal government to date has failed to establish. Nature of federal subventions discourages planning long term operations and substantial capital investments in operating equipment. Federal government has failed to prescribe and enforce proper standardization and classification of coal sold with resultant adverse effect on Alberta mines. Since nineteen thirty five four hundred and seven thousand dollars spent on coal research and eight hundred and sixty four thousand on mine safety.

I leave it to the people who read both those statements to decide whether the minister was telling the truth or whether he was telling just a very small fraction of the truth.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member has suggested that I was not telling the truth.

Mr. Low: I said that the people of the country, with those two statements before them, what the minister said and what I have put on the record as factual, would be able to determine whether the minister was telling the truth or a fraction of the truth.

Mr. Prudham: The statistics I quoted can be verified from the bureau of statistics figures. Any figure I gave can be verified from official sources. I resent very much the insinuation that I was not telling the truth.

Mr. Low: As I said, I shall let it rest and the people can see for themselves when the minister stands up with all the figures at his disposal and says, as reported on page 356 of Hansard:

> On the other hand, so far as the coal industry is concerned, in my opinion the Alberta government, though it has collected large sums in royalties, has done little to assist the industry in a practical way.

I have shown already how much money the Alberta government has spent in assisting the coal industry. That seems to me to speak for itself. Then the minister is reported on page 357 of Hansard as having said:

> In Edmonton a great monument has been built to the high priest of the Social Credit, the late William Aberhart. It is a beautiful, up-to-date and modern sanatorium. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare contributed $600,000 to the cost of that building, including furnishings and equipment. So far as I have been able to find out the provincial government has not at any time publicly acknowledged this assistance.

I am sure that subtle dig at the fact that Mr. Aberhart was a minister of the gospel will not be lost on the people of Alberta. I am certain that it will be noted and resented by a good many people in the minister's own constituency. But the point I want to get over is that in various places in his speech of December 4 the minister said that the province of Alberta had failed to acknowledge certain gifts by the federal government. In every single instance, including this item of $600,000 contributed by the federal government toward the construction of the Aberhart sanatorium in Edmonton, the money was earned by the province by living up to certain prerequisites laid down in statutes passed by this parliament. In other words, the things we have earned are statutory. I take it for granted that when we earn them by living up to certain regulations, it is just the same as subsidies and over the years it would become an old payment. If you earned it you would get it. There was not a single thing mentioned by the minister that does not come within that category. I do not suppose the minister meant that every time we earned one of these things we should put up a sign that the federal government in its beneficence has given us something.

The thing the minister does not say is that all the federal government is doing is paying back to Alberta some of what it has taken out of Alberta in the form of taxation. He has tried to get over to the people of my constituency and others that the federal government has been paying sums of money to the people of Alberta. The fact is, according to bureau of statistics figures which I have right here, that total expenditures in 1951 in Alberta by the federal government were not equal to the income tax alone taken out of that province. I shall be glad to furnish these figures to the minister so he can see for himself. Both statements are here. That is a point of fairness to be considered. The federal government are not giving the people of Alberta anything. They are simply giving back some of what they think the people of Alberta have not brains enough to administer for themselves. That is why they are centralizing financial authority in the federal government, something which we have fought against for many years.

Mr. Howe: Does Alberta want to look after its own defence?

Mr. Low: We are prepared to pay our share of the cost of defence. We have never complained about that, but we have never heard any complaints that we do not raise a flag or standard every time you spend a dollar on defence in Alberta.

Mr. Prudham: You even put the oil in the ground.

Mr. Low: Oh, now. Here is another misrepresentation, and I refer again to page 357 of Hansard where the minister is reported as follows:

> The matter of highway construction is yet another example of federal aid. The trans-Canada highway, which is being constructed in Alberta, is without question the best engineered and best constructed highway in the province. This has been done under supervision of the Department of Resources and Development. Approximately $10 million of federal money has been spent to date on this one highway. It is hoped that the provincial government will in future follow the same engineering practices that have been instituted on that project, and endeavour to bring the provincial highways up to a safe standard.

And again:

> It is my observation that the provincial highways in Alberta very closely resemble the Social Credit movement; they have a very expensive top but no solid foundation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: I am glad hon. members opposite applaud that remark, because it indicates that they join in what the minister has said and furthermore there is an implication that they approve. We will see what the facts are. That whole statement is couched in such a form as to suggest that federal government shares the cost not only of the trans-Canada highway but of other highways in the province. That is misleading.

Mr. Prudham: No, it does not.

Mr. Low: We will let that pass. I want to put on the record the facts about the trans-Canada highway. I took the trouble to refer what the minister had said to the proper officials in Alberta, and I am going to read into the record what they gave me from their own records. I quote:

> Prudham's highway statements ridiculous to a point that it makes it hard to believe they were made by responsible federal official. All main arterial highways including trans-Canada in Alberta being constructed—

Mr. Howe: Is it parliamentary to read a statement from another government into the record?

An hon. Member: Of course it is.

Mr. Low: Of course it is.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is difficult for you people to understand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister is asking if it is parliamentary to read—did he say the orders of another government?

Mr. Low: A statement.

Mr. Howe: To read a statement of another government into the record of this parliament.

Mr. Fulton: You knew it all the time.

Mr. Howe: Well, it is unparliamentary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In order to throw some light upon the point, perhaps the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) would tell the house what is the source of his information.

Mr. Low: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I referred the words of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) with respect to Alberta highways, contained in the speech which I just quoted, to the department of highways of the Alberta government and asked for the facts. I am now reading into the record the facts given me by the premier as he got them from the highways department.

Mr. Prudham: What did I say that was not a fact?

An hon. Member: Everything.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Really I do not think there is anything under our rules that prevents the reading of a document such as the one the hon. member for Peace River now has in his hands.

Mr. Howe: Just listen to the opening words.

Mr. Low: I would be glad to table this but my time is passing and I must hurry. I want to start from the first again. It reads:

> Prudham's highway statements ridiculous to a point that it makes it hard to believe they were made by responsible federal official. All main arterial highways including trans-Canada in Alberta being constructed to same specifications. Apart from trans-Canada highway there are several hundred miles of equally as well constructed roadway. Where warranted some stabilized gravel base courses being built thicker on provincial highways up to 14 inches in depth as compared to 9 on trans-Canada. No main highways in Alberta being built without proper subgrade. Prudham's statement that work done under supervision of Department of Resources and Development is absolutely ridiculous. Department of resources has one engineer in Alberta but all engineering of the trans-Canada is being done and has been done by provincial government engineers.

Mr. Prudham: Under his supervision.

Mr. Low: I continue:

> At a recent dominion-provincial conference of engineers called by Hon. Mr. Winters high praise was tendered to Alberta for their work including the origination of the stabilized gravel base shoulder. All expenditure on trans-Canada appropriated by Alberta legislature, and federal government reimburses Alberta up to 50 per cent. Whatever the federal government contribution the Alberta government contribution has been greater as we pay entire costs such factors as right of way and categories of fencing. Present specifications in trans-Canada and other Alberta highways devised by engineers of provincial governments and not federal government. Original draft of specifications used throughout western Canada prepared by—

Mr. Prudham: The standards were set by this government.

Mr. Low: I continue:

> —Alex Frame, deputy minister of highways for Alberta and Harry Anderson of British Columbia's highways department. Present four-year program of construction including subgrade, stabilized gravel base course, surface course and seal coat was wholly and completely policy of Alberta government. Soil testing laboratory in Alberta comparable any in Canada. Alberta likely will be first province to complete its trans-Canada highway commitment. In further reference Prudham claim that federal government—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Low: I continue:

> —has spent ten million on trans-Canada highway in Alberta—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I call your attention to citation 306 in Beauchesne's second edition, which reads as follows:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member—

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the point was raised a moment ago I had in mind citation 241 in Beauchesne's third edition, which is about the same as the one the minister has read from the second edition of Beauchesne. It reads as follows:

> A statement made by a member in his place is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

Then there is also citation 259, which reads as follows:

> It is a well known principle that a statement made in this house cannot be contradicted by a statement made by a person who is not a member of the house.

As I pointed out a moment ago, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose on the point of order I could not hear—and this is no reflection whatever upon the value of the new sound system now in operation—what the hon. member was saying in beginning to develop the particular point. However, as I now understand it he is trying to contradict a statement made by the minister in the house with certain evidence or statements given to him by somebody outside of the house. According to the citations I have just read it would appear that the point of order raised a moment ago is well taken.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the point of order is well taken—

An hon. Member: It is not well taken.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —I would suggest that Your Honour direct that the portion of the document that has been read into Hansard be expunged therefrom.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: You cannot do that.

Mr. Low: Wouldn't that be wonderful!

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When the hon. member began to read the document the point of order was raised but it was not decided, and I cannot think, Mr. Speaker, that you would allow to remain on the records of the house something which was absolutely out of order.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, you made a ruling and your ruling is in Hansard. That expunges it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a very elementary rule that when the Speaker rises hon. members must at least give him certain attention, and that applies to all hon. members. I do not think I have the authority to instruct that anything be expunged from Hansard. It may be that it has been done, but to my knowledge it has never been done since I entered the house. The ruling I have given on the point is in itself tantamount to expunging the record of what is there. It is the same as when certain offensive words are uttered and a member is called upon to withdraw. The offensive words remain in the record but the withdrawal which follows is an indication that the words should not have been said. The same thing is applicable in this case, unless the minister has a citation which is relevant.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Here is the position I would take. The Speaker has now ruled that the hon. member was out of order, and knowing that the hon. member would like to be in order I suggest that he should withdraw all that part of the document which he read.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Low: Speaking to the point of order, may I remind my friend the Minister of Public Works, the house leader, that if he were to ask all members of the house to do what he is asking me to do there would be only half a Hansard left.

An hon. Member: That would be good.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): All to the good, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Low: I will continue on my own responsibility, Mr. Speaker. I certainly will not read anything more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is unfortunate that some time has been taken up by the discussion of the point of order, but on the other hand the hon. member's time was due to expire at 9.25. In all fairness to the hon. member, I will let him conclude now if he wants to do so. Otherwise his time has expired.

Mr. Low: I will conclude what I wanted to say about highways. There is one point that I think should be cleared up with respect to this highway matter. It is a part of what I wanted to say in rebuttal to the minister's speech. He claimed that the federal government had spent $10 million. I want him to know—

Mr. Prudham: Approximately.

Mr. Low: You did not say "approximately". You said that the federal government had spent $10 million on the trans-Canada highway in Alberta. I have ascertained that the actual payments by the federal government received by the Alberta government on the trans-Canada highway account up to December 1 of this year total $1,321,000. That is just the kind of thing that I say is misrepresentation. Let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that the Alberta government is anxiously awaiting payment by the federal government of additional claims that have been made and which, for some reason, are being held up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since you have drawn my attention to the fact that my time is almost up I can let my case rest for the time being. There are quite a number of other things which will take more time to present later.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to clarify something that was said by the hon. gentleman with reference to the construction of a railway from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast. Is it not a fact that the provincial government has the right to construct a railway to the Pacific coast? Provincial governments have authority over property and civil rights. You have control of the governments of Alberta and British Columbia. Why would you postpone the building of the railway until you take over the House of Commons?

Mr. Low: Would the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) advocate, or is he advocating, that Alberta take over British Columbia?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is a fait accompli, as some people say. It has already been done. I want to say that the government of British Columbia—

Mr. Fulton: I should like to point out that the hon. gentleman speaks solely and exclusively for himself.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): —last year built 80 miles of railway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has had a reply to his question and should not now make a speech.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the hon. gentleman speaks solely and exclusively for himself. Both hon. gentlemen know that British Columbia stands on its own feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think an hon. member should rise on a so-called question of privilege; that does not help to keep decorum in this house. I do not think hon. members should stand up on the pretext of rising on a question of privilege in order to discuss a matter not concerning a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: Apply the rules to both hon. members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already told the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) that his question having been answered he should not make a speech.

Before we leave the matter which was raised a moment ago, may I say that the Clerk has just handed me a decision which was made by Mr. Speaker Black on April 10, 1933. It is reported on page 802 of Beauchesne's third edition. This judgment by Mr. Speaker Black does indicate that the house has the authority to have certain declarations expunged from the record. The Speaker, his ruling being subject to appeal to the house, is allowed to do it. I merely wanted to have this citation quoted so that it reads with my remarks concerning the point of order raised earlier.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I am not rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but to make a speech; and not about the Currie report.

Mr. Fleming: Pretty late in the day.

Mr. Garson: This matter will be fully dealt with by my colleague the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney).

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Garson: Tomorrow. However, there are one or two observations I should like to make in connection with that report, arising out of the prosecutions that have taken place. As hon. members know, commencing in May of this year, with the last case being disposed of early this month, eleven persons were convicted—

Mr. Ferguson: To which report are you referring?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the hon. member who has the floor does not resume his seat upon request for permission to ask a question, no question should be asked.

Mr. Garson: The records indicate, Mr. Speaker, that in those prosecutions some eleven persons were convicted and are now serving terms in the penitentiary, and three were acquitted. I am sure all the members of this house are familiar with the fact that engaged for the defence in many of those cases were some of the cream of the criminal law talent in the province of Ontario. I do not know of any more efficient way of testing facts that are facts than in a sternly contested prosecution with able counsel on both sides.

There is one thing in all these prosecutions that I believe is clear from the evidence which was adduced. That is, that whatever the merits or demerits of the accounting system that were in question in those prosecutions, the conditions which were revealed at Petawawa according to the evidence in those prosecutions were not attributable to the systems but to the human frailties of those who occupied senior positions in the works company at that camp. I am given to understand by those who prepared the cases for trial that it became quite apparent that those men who were convicted had determined that they would use their positions to further their personal ends, and that they were able to do so not so much because of the system being inadequate as because they had determined to circumvent the system, and to falsify the records in some cases.

Everyone knows that in any large undertaking where responsibility, as a matter of necessity, must be delegated to a great many persons, unless you can rely upon the honesty of those who are in the higher positions no system, however well it may be designed, will prevent misappropriations. It is to be noted in this connection that no shortages have occurred since these men have been removed. According to the Currie report itself, no shortages have occurred in other camps where honest men are in control, even under the same accounting system. I am sure, therefore, that where defaults have occurred through these human frailties of trusted employees it behooves all of us, in fairness to those who are naturally affected by the Currie report, to withhold judgment on whether the system was entirely bad until there has been an opportunity of having this matter brought before the committee on defence expenditures, and in this way hearing all the relevant facts concerning the whole matter.

My purpose in intervening in this debate, sir, is to examine and discuss certain statements made by a number of opposition speakers, particularly of the official opposition and notably the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), to the effect that this government has been imposing unduly high taxes upon the Canadian people. In the welter of broad statements and generalities, most of which do not even glitter, I suggest that the best way, and indeed the only accurate way, in which this question can be satisfactorily determined is to place upon the record the plain facts so the Canadian people may judge, from those facts, whether they have been called upon to carry a heavier load of taxation than that of citizens of comparable countries.

I should like to start out with those facts upon which, in my judgment, the government and the Conservative opposition at least—and perhaps the other opposition parties—seem to be in agreement. I think we agree that, by and large, government expenditures, no matter how wise and proper they are, must be paid for by taxation. Therefore the main factors in determining the amount of taxes which Canadians have to pay are Canadian policies which involve the expenditure of money. Are the government and the official opposition agreed upon those policies involving the expenditure of money? If we can take at their face value the statements made by the members of the official opposition, I think the answer to that question is yes.

Let me illustrate this point by quoting from the words of the Leader of the Opposition himself as set out in his interesting and useful speech at the beginning of this debate, which may be found at pages 20 and 21 of Hansard. To begin with he agreed—and I think this is true of every member of the opposition and of every member of all parties—with the wisdom of Canada's foreign policy and the need for military preparedness which is an integral part of that policy. The Leader of the Opposition made this abundantly clear in language which I think we would all endorse. I will not go into the details of everything he said, but he clinched the point when he said:

> Canadians are I am sure all ready to pay the taxes that are really necessary to defend our freedom.

There seems no doubt, therefore, that the opposition fully supports the military preparedness program of the government and any expenditures and taxes which are really necessary to carry it out.

Mr. Fleming: Not the Petawawa kind. Don't include them.

Mr. Garson: I can see that my hon. friend is getting impatient.

Mr. Fleming: What about horses?

Mr. Garson: I hasten to make it clear that it is not at all inconsistent with their position in this regard that they should be entitled to criticize the government in respect of what they may regard as carelessness and extravagance in the carrying out of that policy.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is mighty decent of the minister.

Mr. Garson: At another point in his remarks the Leader of the Opposition also made it quite clear that the opposition fully supports the entire social welfare program of the government. This is what he said as reported at page 21 of Hansard:

> No one is suggesting the cutting down of social services. They are part of the social development of this country. Every party has supported them.

Our military preparedness program and our social welfare program are two major items in our budget and account for no less than $3·1 billion out of a total budget of $4·3 billion. The balance of our budget is made up of two other major items, namely the carrying charges upon our public debt and the ordinary expenses of government, in the old sense, which in these modern days account for only about 15 per cent of the total budget. Hence, even if we were to cut the general expenses of government even to the point where we would seriously interfere with its administration, it would still represent but a small proportion of the total budget.

Let me clear up another point. The government does not admit that there has been large-scale carelessness and extravagance; but we entirely agree that the government's administration of all of the affairs of the country should at all times be carried on in an economical and prudent manner and that any carelessness and extravagance which is disclosed should be eliminated at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Fleming: Along with the government.

Mr. Garson: That is the policy the government has consistently tried to follow. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I think it is highly significant indeed that the opposition members, who have from time to time argued that large economies are possible and that they could be made in this country, have never once during any time I have been in this chamber moved to reduce a single item of the government's estimates.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, they have.

Mr. Garson: If such huge savings as they indicate were possible, it is hard to understand why it has not been possible for them to move a reduction of some small item in the total estimates.

Mr. Ross (Souris): They have moved a reduction.

Mr. Fleming: They certainly have, but apparently the minister was not here.

Mr. Garson: No. My hon. friend is quite wrong. They have not. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) has done so on two or three occasions; but none of the other members would take the responsibility—

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the minister is quite wrong. I made such a motion two years ago and the minister voted against it.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I can rise and bear the same witness. I made such a motion three years ago and the minister voted against it.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I accept my hon. friends' corrections and point out that it is two years since one moved such a motion and three years since the other moved one, and they have not moved any since then in spite of the fact that they are always arguing that there are millions of dollars to be saved.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A moment ago the minister said that nobody had made a motion to reduce an item in the estimates.

Mr. Fulton: The reason more such motions have not been made is that they are regarded as motions of non-confidence, and the minister and his party vote against them. So what is the use of making them?

Mr. Fleming: Majority rule.

Mr. Garson: Every reasonable member in this house knows that, at the best, the savings in respect of careful administration are small indeed in comparison with the savings that can be effected under the heading of the substantive policies. For example, if we were able to conclude an armistice in Korea, and if the situation in western Europe improved to a great extent and we were able to substantially cut our military preparedness program, everyone knows that that cut would result in much greater economies than all possible administrative savings that could be made. And if we were all willing—but we are not—to eliminate some of the present items in our social welfare program, that action would also represent a large saving. But it is significant that in these fields of policy where the large economies could be effected, I think it is safe to say that every opposition party is in complete agreement with the government. In the light of these facts it does seem inconsistent—and I shall not use any stronger word—that the Leader of the Opposition, in his speech in this debate, should argue that the government still continues not only to impose extremely heavy taxation but to overtax the people far above the amount actually authorized by parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: My friend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) says "hear, hear".

Mr. Ross (Souris): And others.

Mr. Fulton: $3,350 million last year.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, he says "Hear, hear" to a statement which is wrong on the face of it—

Mr. Fulton: $700 million last year.

Mr. Garson: —because he knows quite well that the taxes which are imposed in this country are all authorized by statutes passed by this parliament. It is true that the amount of business that is done, the volume of investment and the amount of economic activity may produce from given rates of taxation a better return than was anticipated. To distort that fact into the statement that that is unauthorized overtaxation is an interpretation which cannot be supported.

In this same connection, if we were to examine, in the same factious spirit, the record of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, when he was premier of Ontario, in respect of this same species of overtaxation that he is urging against this government, we would find—and for my own part I would say to his credit—that during that time he was able to show very substantial surpluses from year to year through the same type of overtaxation he is now attributing to another sound financier, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

This brings me to the second point of the official opposition, and really the central point to this whole question, namely whether the taxation which is imposed upon Canadians at the present time, measured by any fair standard of comparison, is an extremely heavy burden. In this connection, as I said at the outset of my remarks, in the consideration of a matter of this sort there is actually no substitute for facts and figures. Either these contentions of the opposition are true or they are not, and the only way to prove or disprove them is to bring forward the facts and figures. That is what I now propose to do.

First of all I should like to present certain comparative figures in relation to the tax burden of Canada and of certain other countries of the British commonwealth. I suggest that the countries which are most comparable to our own are the free English-speaking countries of the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. In order to avoid the charge that I am selecting from the whole body of taxation for comparison certain taxes which are not a fair sample of the whole picture, I should like to begin with to make the test, which I think is by far the fairest over-all test which can be made, by examining what percentage of the gross national product is taken by all the taxes of this country, federal, provincial and municipal, no matter what they may be, and comparing them with all of the taxes which are taken in these other countries from the taxpayers thereof.

Here are the results, based upon the figures for the year 1951. Taxes as a percentage of the gross national product: The United States, as one would expect from a more populous, economically mature and wealthy country, having a very large production and a large gross national product, is the lowest, 23·2. Canada, a much smaller, less populous and less developed country is just a fraction of 1 per cent more, 23·7; Australia is 25·8; New Zealand is 27·8 and the United Kingdom is 32·7. Canada has a substantially lower over-all tax burden, federal, provincial and municipal, as a percentage of the total gross national production than any of the other British countries I have named.

Next, I should like to compare the rates in these countries in respect of certain specific taxes, so that we shall examine how they apply to John Doe, the ordinary citizen. The example I have taken is that of a married man with no dependents. It is the fact that in Canada we have much more generous family allowances than in those other comparable countries. Therefore if one were to take the case of a man with dependents perhaps hon. members across the way who are now shaking their heads at the point I have not yet started to make would argue, "Oh, well, you have taken what is not a fair sample". I should like therefore to table five comparisons between these countries I have named. If hon. members are agreeable perhaps it would be a good idea to place them on Hansard. They show a comparison of the pre-war taxes on personal income; a comparison of the wartime peak taxes on personal income; a comparison of the post-war low, that is the lowest point which the taxes on personal incomes reached after the war; a comparison of the post-Korea high after Korea was invaded, that is the taxes that had to be imposed in all these free countries in order to meet the costs of this military preparedness program, at what was the highest point which these taxes reached in all these countries after the Korean aggression. Finally I think it would be most interesting to all of us to have a comparison of the present taxes on personal income in these countries.

Mr. Fulton: Where did the minister get these figures?

Mr. Garson: These figures were prepared by the tax branch of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fulton: Your new department?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did I understand that the tables are to appear in Hansard?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: No; read them.

Mr. Garson: I shall be making more allusions to them than perhaps my hon. friend would want to listen to.

Some hon. Members: Read them.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Very funny.

Mr. Garson: I understand, Mr. Speaker, the rule of the house is that one may not read from a document of this sort unless he tables it, and I am complying with the rules of the house.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, there is a contrary rule to be observed which is that an hon. member may not table such a document unless he reads it, unless he has the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Laing: Let us get unanimous consent.

Mr. Fulton: On the other hand, he cannot table it unless he reads it, and he cannot read it unless he tables it.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Very funny.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad the hon. member for Portneuf is amused.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why don't you sit down and let the minister carry on?

Mr. Speaker: Order. What I should like to know is this. Does the house wish that these tables should appear in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: My only point in rising was to point out that the minister could not table these except by unanimous consent; and although the hon. member for Portneuf is very interested in them, nevertheless I will not insist upon the minister reading them.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Very funny.

Mr. Speaker: I understand they are to appear in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: The tables are as follows:

Amounts in brackets for Canada and New Zealand are old age security taxes and social services taxes respectively, payable in addition to income taxes shown.

I should like to say in relation to these tables, in order to be fair with all members, that the changes in the exchange rates of the various currencies which are involved, all of which have been noted in the tables, make some comparisons difficult, and may sometimes unavoidably distort the true picture to some extent, but these distortions do not affect the validity of the use to which I propose to put these figures, nor the conclusions which I am going to ask hon. members to draw from them.

Mr. Speaker, what do these figures show? Well, the first point that stands out in all these tables is that personal exemptions in Canada are much higher than those in any of these other countries. This means that the great mass of Canadians in the low income brackets bear a much smaller rate of income tax than do the mass of citizens in any of the other countries named, and particularly those citizens in the low income brackets in countries like New Zealand and the United Kingdom, where Labour party social welfare and other policies have been the major factor in determining the tax patterns which the present governments of those countries have inherited from their Labour predecessors. Even Labour governments cannot solve the financial problem of paying for heavy welfare costs by soaking the rich. Unhappily, there are not enough rich to soak, to begin with; and when they are too heavily soaked they cease to be rich.

Next they show that during the wartime peak, Canadian taxes were the lowest of all these countries on incomes up to $2,000 a year. Above $2,000 a year Canada's income taxes were somewhat higher than those of the United States, but they were appreciably lower than those of the United Kingdom, Australia or New Zealand throughout the whole range of incomes.

Now, what about the post-war low, when the war was over and taxes went down or were reduced in all these countries? How does the Canadian post-war low compare? The Canadian post-war low tax upon a married taxpayer with no dependents was the lowest of all of these countries on incomes up to $5,000. On incomes above that level Canada's taxes were higher than those of the United States but considerably lower than those of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand.

Well then, after our taxes had been reduced in all these countries, and we were making a good recovery when the war was over, Korea occurred. Then all these countries had to impose taxation in order to defend freedom and to meet the threat of aggression. And at the high point of the post-Korea period, Canada's personal income taxes were the lowest of any of these countries on incomes up to $5,000. Above that level they were somewhat higher than those of the United States, but much lower than those of all the other countries named.

Now, most important of all, what about present taxes, the taxes which we are told by all members of the opposition are such an inordinate burden upon the Canadian people? At the present time, of all these countries I have named, Canada's taxes are lowest on all incomes up to $5,000. Above that level they are much lower than all the other countries except the United States. In other words, at all these periods the burden of Canadian taxes compares very favourably indeed with that of other comparable countries in the English-speaking world.

Inasmuch as the present taxes are those which are being particularly urged as excessive, I think perhaps some hon. members might find it instructive if I were to put on the record in some detail what they amount to. The exemptions and deductions for a single person in 1952 are as follows:

Canada	$1,000
The United States	600
The United Kingdom	330
Australia	224
New Zealand	574

Canada provides by far the largest exemption of all. This means that the great mass of the Canadian people, those in the low income brackets, are freer from the income tax burden than the people in these other countries. Then I shall give the exemptions for the married man with no dependents:

Canada	$2,000
The United States	1,200
New Zealand	861
United Kingdom	578
Australia	447

Canada again provides by far the largest exemption.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, but the United States exemption is divided; the wife gets $1,200 and the husband gets $1,200, making $2,400 in all.

Mr. Garson: I am coming to that.

Mr. Lesage: They get only $600 each.

Mr. Adamson: I know about this, because I have many friends in the United States.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are $1,200 out.

Mr. Garson: Then for a dependent child Canada allows $400—

Mr. Fulton: What about the family allowance?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member in giving these figures should be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. Adamson: I regret having made the interruption and I apologize through you, Mr. Speaker, for it.

Mr. Lesage: Especially since you were wrong.

Mr. Speaker: I was not referring particularly to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson).

Mr. Adamson: I try not to interrupt, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Garson: In relation to the point raised by the hon. member who has so graciously just taken his seat, I wish to enter a provision which has been specified by the tax experts, when they state that because of credits for earned income and minimum amounts subject to taxation in the United Kingdom, and a tax rebate in New Zealand, the effective exemptions in these two countries may be somewhat higher than the amounts I have indicated. But the difference is not sufficient to alter the comparison to any significant extent.

What is significant in this connection is that Canada's family allowance, itself, is substantially higher than that of any of the other countries. And of course in the United States they have no family allowances at all.

Mr. Adamson: No, but they have social security.

Mr. Sinclair: When they are 65.

Mr. Garson: But let us leave family allowances out of the picture, and compare the tax payable by a married taxpayer, with no dependents, on an income of $1,000. These are the figures:

Canada	No tax
The United States	No tax
The United Kingdom	$30
Australia	39
New Zealand	75

Then let us go the $2,000 level. These are the figures:

Canada	No tax
The United States	$133
The United Kingdom	264
Australia	206
New Zealand	287

I would ask my hon. friends of the C.C.F. particularly to look at these figures for the $2,000 level, where the tax in the United Kingdom is $264, in New Zealand $287, while in Canada there is no tax.

Mr. Knowles: Is there not a Conservative government in power over there now?

Mr. Garson: Yes, but this is part of its inheritance.

Mr. Bryce: These are the latest figures, I suppose.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Garson: Then to go rapidly over these figures—

Mr. Adamson: Oh, no; that would be a great mistake.

Mr. Garson: At the $3,000 income level the tax is as follows:

Canada	$185
The United States	333
The United Kingdom	621
Australia	464
New Zealand	571

Then these are the figures for the $5,000 level:

Canada	$ 626
The United States	733
The United Kingdom	1,360
Australia	1,213
New Zealand	1,305

Then when we get up to the $10,000 level in Canada, because we take the good advice lavished upon us by hon. members of the C.C.F., but which their own fellow socialists in other countries where they are in power do not take, for the first time our taxes begin to be higher than those of the United States. These are the figures:

Canada	$1,976
The United States	1,823
The United Kingdom	4,290
Australia	3,873
New Zealand	3,992

Perhaps I had better put all the figures on the record. The remainder are as follows, starting with the $20,000 level:

Canada	$6,461
United States	5,076
United Kingdom	11,728
Australia	10,823
New Zealand	11,279

And then for the $100,000 tax level:

Canada	$61,250
United States	56,182
United Kingdom	88,072
Australia	70,794
New Zealand	70,079

The figures given in the table indicate the income taxes plus social security taxes that are collected in New Zealand, Australia, Canada and the United Kingdom. In the case of the United Kingdom the figures are translated from pounds into dollars at the proper rate of $2.70 per pound, not at the old rate; in the case of Australia, at the rate of $2.15 per pound; and in the case of New Zealand, at the rate of $2.87 per pound. This sample shows that the income tax, one of the most typical taxes and the tax upon which hon. members of the official opposition have lavished their greatest criticism, is not only lower in Canada but in low income brackets is substantially lower than in the case of all these other countries.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad if my hon. friend will save it and I will answer his question when I am finished. It is rather hard to keep this material in consecutive order.

To add a little bit of perspective, a married man in Canada without dependents and with an income of $5,000 now pays in income tax only about half what he paid at the wartime peak in 1945. Do we hear hon. members of the loyal opposition tell us about that fact? Here is another important fact. What has happened to the disposable income of Canadians? By disposable income I mean the personal income after direct income taxes have been paid.

Mr. Fulton: What you mean is what Abbott leaves them.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wants to put it in that uncharitable way, all right. It is the same rose; no matter whether he adorns it with a thorn it still smells sweet. The per capita disposable income in Canada—I will not reply to my hon. friend in kind by referring to what it was in Mr. Bennett's time —for 1939 was $373; in 1951 it was $1,057. That is to say, in 1951 it was two and four-fifths times as great as it was in 1939.

Mr. Adamson: In 48-cent dollars as compared to 1939.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is very astute. He answers every point. As I move toward the beginning of the point he interrupts me.

Mr. Adamson: I know the figures.

Mr. Garson: Of course the increase in real income was not as striking because there were price increases during that period. But let my hon. friend listen to this. After allowing for those price increases, the average per capita income of a Canadian would purchase about 50 per cent more in goods and services in 1951 than in 1939. What is more significant about all this to those who make a fuss about our resale price maintenance legislation is that it is at least three per cent more in 1951 than in 1950.

Mr. Adamson: Bravo.

Mr. Fleming: Resale price maintenance has absolutely nothing to do with it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is entitled to his opinion for what it is worth, which in my view is not very much.

Mr. Fulton: How about loss leaders?

Mr. Garson: I would point out that this substantial rise in real income took place in a period when personal income taxes in this country had to be greatly expanded, through no choice of ours, in order to take care of defence costs. We absorbed all that, raised the real income and in addition greatly increased our social welfare services. This is clear proof that we have surmounted all the economic obstacles and have grappled with very seriously, if not overcome, most of the economic problems to accomplish these things, and all on the basis of a tax level that by fair standards of comparison with comparable countries is very favourable indeed.

Moreover there is every indication of a further substantial increase between 1951 and 1952. For example, the total wages and salaries, which is a large component of personal income comprising upon the average more than 60 per cent, was 12 per cent higher for the first eight months of 1952 than for the comparable period of 1951. During the first nine months of 1952 the total value of retail sales exceeded by 6·6 per cent the total of the comparable period in 1951.

Then in reply to the statement by the Leader of the Opposition that the vast tax burden of the government is impoverishing the Canadian people, let me give the house some figures which I received just a few days ago, as prepared by one of the most eminent Canadian economists.

Mr. Adamson: Gilbert Jackson. I know those figures.

Mr. Garson: I expect to get another loud cheer from my hon. friend when I say this is from the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Adamson: I know, published by Gilbert Jackson in the Globe and Mail. I worked on those figures.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend absorbs all these figures into his system but he will not take any cognizance of them when he comes to judge the record of the government.

Mr. Adamson: Oh, but I do. That is exactly what I do. I judge the government by the figures that have been quoted.

Mr. Garson: This article is headed:

Did you know Canadians in 1951 actually saved nearly 13 times as much as Britons did in relation to disposable income? Here's why.

The article continues:

It is not because Britons are any less able to save than Canadians if given the incentive and the opportunity to do so. Those tables show, however, that the previous government took in direct taxes and in direct social security taxes a far greater proportion than is deducted by governments in Canada. The disposable income in Britain leaves less than in Canada, therefore, to spend on goods and services and to save—

Is my hon. friend still cheering?

Mr. Adamson: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Life insurance in force per capita in Canada in 1939 was $625; in 1951 it was $1,279. Savings bank deposits per capita in 1939 were $150.79; in 1951, $327.85. I suggest that the only base upon which our hon. friends are able to argue—I must say that having a very poor case they make a good fist of it indeed—is that although we impose in this country rates of taxation which compare very favourably with other comparable countries, the economic results of government policies in Canada and of the great amount of effort put forward by the Canadian people are so favourable that these tax rates, applied to the national income of the country, produce the surpluses of which my hon. friends complain. They not only have done that but they have enabled Canadians in the period since the war to invest in this country about $16 billion of money in all sorts of additions to Canada's productive capacity. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that one of the main reasons these investments, to the extent of about 85 per cent I believe, are made by Canadians, and the balance by outsiders investing their money in Canada, are the very surpluses and reduction of debt concerning which certain opposition members are always complaining.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We only complain because you blunder into them.

Mr. Garson: Oh, you do not complain because they exist, but merely because we did not do it in the proper way?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Because you do not know anything about what you are doing.

Mr. Garson: Oh, I see. Of course Mr. Bennett knew what he was doing. He was blasting his way into the markets of the world.

An hon. Member: You bet he did.

Mr. Garson: Judging by results there is great advantage in knowing what you are doing.

Mr. McGregor: And he got results.

Mr. Fulton: As a matter of fact it is not the surpluses about which we complain; it is the high taxes.

An hon. Member: Now you are switching.

Mr. Garson: I have been attempting to show my hon. friend that the tax rate is not high judging by any fair standard.

Mr. Fulton: It is $700 million more than you need.

Mr. Garson: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the most important reason why the men who put these $16 billion of investments into Canada did so is that they had confidence, not necessarily in the government but in the steadiness and reliability of the Canadian people, because they had seen the Canadian people over quite a period of time now—too long, I know for our friends in the opposition—

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: —steadily support a courageous and honest government financial policy which, by keeping our budget in balance and reducing our national debt, thereby guaranteed the safety not only of this new $16 billion worth of investments but of all the existing investments and properties of the Canadian people as well. If we had not followed this policy, does any reasonable man suppose there would have been that confidence in this country, in our dollar, in our prospects and the like, that would have brought about this amount of investment? Perhaps some of these investments would have been made. But I suggest that the majority would not, for the simple reason that not one of us in this chamber would want to take his own money and invest it in a country in which even in good times the government was going perennially into debt year after year without making any attempt to properly balance its budget. These investments constitute by far the largest single increase in Canada's productive capacity that has ever taken place in our history.

Mr. Fulton: The government is floundering.

Mr. Garson: For that reason they are enormously important to every single Canadian. The hard fact is that all our wages, our pensions, our social welfare benefits, all the arms that protect our liberty and the whole of our standard of living come from one source only, the production of goods and services by Canadians. They come from that source not only for us but for our children and for our grandchildren. Therefore anything that, to the extent of $16 billion of investment, increases that production benefits every Canadian, the big shots and the little shots alike. Whatever my share of this total national production may be, I am bound to benefit if the national production is increased.

All this has been done, may I suggest to my hon. friends, especially to the official opposition and particularly to the financial critic of that party, at no real cost to our present standard of living. Let me quote a question which was asked in that great Conservative paper, the Winnipeg Tribune, by a highly intelligent correspondent who, as it happens, is a professor of economics at the University of Manitoba.

Mr. Fleming: What is his name?

Mr. Garson: Professor Barber. He said:

Would you agree that the $2 billion surplus which the dominion government has managed to build up over the past five years has not meant the loss of an equivalent amount of goods to the Canadian people? In fact, even if the dominion government had reduced taxes during this period by $2 billion and thus wiped out its surplus entirely, there would not have been one more car, house or suit of clothes available to the Canadian people.

Accordingly, if it is possible to reduce the national debt without in any way reducing the real income or real welfare of the Canadian people, why is this such an undesirable policy?

It is no wonder then, Mr. Speaker, that, except for a small minority of Canadians who hope to pick up a few votes by misrepresenting the achievements of their own country, there is a very clear understanding today amongst all competent judges throughout the whole world that the Canadian people since the war have done an absolutely magnificent job of handling their economy.

Mr. Fleming: The people, but not the government.

Mr. Garson: Obviously the greatest part of the credit for this achievement must go where it belongs, to the Canadian people and producers; but it is also a fact that none of the sophistries of my hon. friends can disprove that if government policies had not been as courageous and realistic—

Mr. Fleming: And extravagant.

Mr. Garson: —and aggressive and successful—

Mr. Hees: And wasteful.

Mr. Fraser: Wasteful and extravagant.

Mr. Garson: —we would have never had these results. To indicate that this is the view not of myself only, as a very interested person, I must confess—

Mr. Fulton: Of the people who wrote your speech.

Mr. Garson: —but is the opinion of highly competent and completely disinterested judges, I should like to quote from only two sources, one of which I think has been quoted before, but it cannot be quoted too often. The first one is taken from the Economist of July 5, 1952, certainly the greatest economic journal in the English language, and reads as follows:

No boom was ever painless, but the Canadian boom perhaps comes nearest to earning that distinction . . . It has found, in the short space of two or three years, a degree of self-confidence that is the proper mark of a country entering upon the early stages of economic maturity. Already occupied with a load of work that less vigorous countries might stretch over a generation, Canada has the faith, and professes to have the capacity, to proceed with the gigantic St. Lawrence seaway scheme and to disregard Washington's refusal to participate. It would certainly be unwise to reach the conclusion that too much is being attempted too quickly. It is true that the defence program has yet to make its full impact on the Canadian economy.

Mr. Fulton: It is making it on the Canadian political scene though.

Mr. Garson: I continue:

But the rise in both industrial and agricultural productivity since the war has been so astonishing that Canada may well be able to provide—

Listen to this from a responsible economic journal.

—guns, factories and butter all at the same time.

I have deliberately left out of that quotation the three most significant sentences in it which in my submission are the key to all of these results. These sentences are as follows:

Canada is not merely favoured with abundant material resources. It has had the good sense—or the good luck—to provide itself with good government.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah.

Mr. Fleming: It is obvious the writer does not live in this country.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend said it is obvious the writer does not live in this country. I suggest that as an authority upon Canadian economic matters the gentleman whom I have been quoting will compare very favourably with my hon. friend. I continue to quote:

Its economic affairs have been handled with a skill unexampled throughout the world.

Mr. Fleming: That shows how little he knows about Canada.

Mr. Garson: Let us look at another journal, a conservative journal—not spelled with a capital "C"—in the United States. The following appeared in the month of August, 1952.

Mr. Fleming: What paper is this?

Mr. Garson: It is from Fortune, and the quotation is as follows:

Canada's progress during the past dozen years is one of the economic marvels of the age. Thanks to an extraordinarily high and well distributed volume of investment, public and private, she has undergone an all-around development not matched even by that of the United States.

Now, sir, the policies of this government, as these quotations indicate—there are many more of them, as I am sure even my hon. friends of the opposition know and I think in private conversation at any rate would be prepared to admit—are admired by responsible economists and journalists in other countries, because I believe they realize that the implementation of these policies has required political courage, honesty and true devotion to the long-run interests of Canada and of the free world. Since the war—and this is the central theme of my remarks—Canada's great national achievements and defence have been financed by tax rates upon the Canadian people which do compare very favourably indeed with those of other comparable English-speaking countries.

Mr. Graydon: I did not want to interrupt the minister while he was speaking, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to ask him one question. Is the speech which he has just delivered on finance meant to hail some major change in government portfolios in the near future?

Mr. Adamson: There is only one observation I wish to make, and that is that he neglected the sales tax—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Adamson: —and the income tax.

Mr. Fleming: The minister was good enough to say he would answer questions, Mr. Speaker, when he had finished his speech. I put this to him seriously. Did he consult the Minister of Finance before he made this speech tonight in which he has entered such a strong defence of the government's policy of extortionate overtaxation and opposing any tax reductions in the next budget?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is such an amiable gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that I always like to accommodate him with an answer if I can. Much of the material that I have used tonight was supplied by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) before he had to leave for the economic conference. I am only sorry that I have not done it as great justice as the Minister of Finance would have done if he had been here.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Actually, Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate again, but in view of some of the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) I felt compelled to make some reply. This is especially so, because of the references he made to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). I do this with regret, because I think hon. members in this house are getting fed up with listening, day in and day out, to the type of propaganda that has been dished out by the Social Credit group in dealing with provincial matters. They have even gone so far as to obtain statements from the premier of Alberta to refute a statement made in this house by a cabinet minister.

[Mr. Garson.]

I am sorry the hon. member for Peace River is not in his seat tonight. Among the phrases that have been used with reference to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, as I have them noted, was one to the effect that the people of Alberta made a mistake in sending a man like that to Ottawa. I think Alberta is fortunate in having here a man of the calibre of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and we respect him for his honesty and his sincerity. The hon. member referred to the minister's statements as being utterly irresponsible; half truths; misrepresentations and distortions, and so on. One could add to those some of the statements the hon. member made in this house quite recently, such as master of smear technique; master of evasion; questionable methods, bandit leaders; stinkers in high places. These are the type of phrases used by a gentleman who is not only the leader of a political party, but who aspires to become the prime minister of Canada.

I notice that some of you are smiling, and some of you are laughing. You may think this is funny, but the leader of the Social Credit party doesn't think so. Let me quote a press report appearing in the Edmonton Journal of November 27, 1952. The headline is "Solon Low sees possibility of federal control by Social Credit." The article reads in part:

> Solon E. Low, national leader of the Social Credit party, said Wednesday he would not be surprised if his party controls the Commons at Ottawa after the next federal election.

Farther down the article reads:

> "I do not mean to boast that we will become the government, but I am not ruling out anything", he said. "It is possible".

Then the hon. member goes on to give three reasons why he thinks this party will control the House of Commons or form the government. One of the reasons he cited was the result of the British Columbia election. The second reason was the result of the Alberta election. As to his third reason, I quote from the article:

> "On top of that, Premier Manning made a triumphant tour of eastern Canada—not for political purposes but to do a job in religion". He added: "It has its political implications. It will hold implications for us (the party), I am sure".
> He said political writers read into the premier's trip political significance, which was not designed.
> "It will have that effect, but that is not what he went east for", he reiterated. "But if a man does a good thing, and it rebounds to the good of the political movement he leads, I am not going to deny it".

The hon. gentleman feels he is probably coming to Ottawa to form the next government. He has made a reference to highways, and has introduced a statement by Premier Manning of Alberta. Let me read to you,

Mr. Speaker, an editorial appearing in the Calgary Herald of April 17, 1952. I believe nobody would accuse the Calgary Herald of being a Liberal paper. The heading of this editorial is "Millions of dollars for potholes". I shall read the editorial:

> The province of Alberta intends to spend $24,400,000 for highways this year but if the examples of past highway construction are to be the criterion of future development, the money is just being wasted.

You heard what was quoted tonight in the letter from Premier Manning of Alberta. To continue:

> There may be 1,200 miles of paved road in Alberta today, but great chunks of it are no better than plowed fields right now because of the spring thaws. It was only four years ago or so that the new direct route to Cochrane was built. Now there is a section on that main highway which looks like one of the so-called streets in southwest Calgary, a morass of muddy ruts, fit for a tank training ground.
>
> The other entrance highways into Calgary from the south and the north are in terrible shape also. Reports from all over the province indicate severe upheavals on the paved roads, as well as the usual quagmires on the gravelled secondary highways. One expects mud, ruts, bogs and natural corruption on Alberta's unpaved roads during the spring break-up. It is traditional and the province wouldn't be the same without it. But why should the citizens have to put up with these hazards and discomforts on the allegedly "surfaced" roads of this province?

Mr. Johnston: That is a lot of baloney.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Decore: It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Johnston: When people say things like that they should make sure they are true. Anyone who has driven on those roads knows it is a lot of baloney.

Mr. Decore: I am sorry—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I could not hear what the hon. member was saying.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, according to the opinion you expressed a while ago with regard to truthful statements, an hon. member should be sure that the things he is quoting are true. That is only a newspaper report. Anybody who knows the Calgary Herald knows they have stretched the truth once in a while, and that is one case.

Mr. Decore: When the hon. member is speaking about truth it reminds me of a line in one of Lord Bacon's essays in which he says "What is truth, said jesting Pilate, and would not wait for an answer."

Mr. Johnston: Maybe the hon. member would not know.

Mr. Decore: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am reading from the editorial as it appears in the Calgary Herald.

Mr. Johnston: It is not too reliable.

Mr. Decore: I wish I had with me other editorials which have appeared in the Edmonton Journal from which the hon. member has read, and other papers in the province, dealing with our roads in Alberta. I regret that I have to deal with provincial matters because this is not the place to deal with them.

Mr. Johnston: Then why are you doing it?

Mr. Decore: When the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) brings in a statement which he reads into the record, signed by the premier of Alberta, then I think I should read these editorials.

Mr. Quelch: The hon. member should give the date of the editorial.

Mr. Decore: Yes. One is under date of April 17, 1952. I have quoted from that one. There is another one to which I am going to refer and it is under the date of June 27, 1952.

Mr. Johnston: That was just political propaganda.

Mr. Decore: To continue further with this editorial:

> One would have thought that, after years of experience with climatic conditions here and the experiments on soil which have been carried on at the university of Alberta, the highways department would have learned a few lessons in the art of road building. It surely should have realized, as even Alberta cities are beginning to realize, that you can't just roll a bit of pavement on the prairie and expect it to last. It must know that if roads are to last they have to have bases several feet, not several inches, thick.

Hence when the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys made the statement that the roads in Alberta are just like the Social Credit party, with a fine surface and very little foundation, this editorial bears him out. It continues:

> It should experiment on materials to find the best ones to combat Alberta's continual freezing and thawing weather. It should learn to build wide, solid highways, not long, narrow collapsible ones.
>
> But then, we suppose, the highways department isn't allowed to be interested in building roads, but must make sure that it builds votes instead. It must allocate its expenditures (and therefore establish its specifications) to construct the mostest with the least. It must see that some pavement gets into the good Social Credit constituencies, even if it means skimping elsewhere. Thus the province can expand its mileage while retaining low grade standards.
> That sum of $24,400,000 is an awful lot of money to sink in the paved mudholes Alberta is getting. When will the government begin to use these moneys properly and efficiently?

I am also going to quote from another editorial in the same paper. The date of this one is June 27, 1952. The heading is "Is This All We Get for Our Oil Money?" I am not going to take the time of the house to read all of it, but will content myself with reading the part which is as follows:

As we have said before, we do not think the government is building its major highways to the proper specifications for this country and climate. We only have the word of private road contractors on that, but surely the condition of the roads this spring should be evidence enough.

Then it goes on further to say:

The people of this province are getting pretty fed up with excuses for provincial road-building. Millions for back-fill and nothing for surfacing is no answer to the motorist's prayer. This government is raking in oil revenues at a wonderful rate, but if the debilitated pavement outside Calgary, the washboard surfacing around Waterton and the bogs near Jasper are the best examples of long-term capital expenditures for the future of this province, we'll eat Mr. Taylor's speech.

Mr. Johnston: The Liberals were elected on that kind of material, both of them.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Speaker, as I say it is with considerable regret that I rise and deal with these matters on the floor of this house. I would not mind listening to a lot of this propaganda coming from the Social Credit group if only they were consistent. Referring again to the hon. member for Peace River, may I say that he was one of the first members of the Social Credit group in 1935. That was the time William Aberhart put over one of the biggest frauds ever perpetrated on the people of Alberta when he promised them the sum of $25 a month; that is, he promised that to every citizen in Alberta, whether he worked or not, and he did not have to pay it back, either. That promise was made to the people of the province of Alberta in 1935. The leader of the Social Credit party in this house was one of the instigators of that plan at the time, and the people of the province of Alberta fell for it. Those were depression years. Economic conditions were terrible out west, and many of the people said: We will vote Social Credit regardless, as things couldn't be worse. Eventually, as we have found, they changed their tune. They have changed their tactics. There was no dividend and no payment.

Mr. Quelch: The people have not changed. They still vote Social Credit.

Mr. Decore: Because the people of Alberta thought they were getting a good conservative government. I want to say this. I do not want to compare Conservatives and Social Crediters. I do not want to be disrespectful to the Conservatives because I have a great deal of respect for them, although I disagree with some of their policies. As I say, the Conservative party is one that has had the confidence of the people throughout our history in Canada, and I hope they continue to have the confidence of the people in the future.

Mr. Quelch: As we have in Alberta.

Mr. Decore: Just the other day the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) made this statement.

An hon. Member: Where is it to be found?

Mr. Decore: It is reported in Hansard. He made a great many statements, but here is one he made as reported at page 550 of Hansard of December 11:

Social Credit would, through the monetary commission, issue to consumers consumer purchasing power in such forms and in such amounts as might be found needful to equate consumption with production in the nation's economy. That sounds sensible, does it not?

I wonder. To continue:

It cannot be done without debt-free money. Such issues of consumer purchasing power might fittingly be called national dividends.

In other words we are again going back to that same theory that was propagated in the province of Alberta in 1935. I might point out that since that time some financial experts have come into Alberta. One of them was Mr. Powell. I believe he was sent down by Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Manning was there, too. After he spent some time in Alberta he had to spend the rest of the time in the Alberta jail. After he spent the time in jail he was deported to the old country where he came from. There was still another financial expert who came into Alberta from the old country, Mr. Byrne; and he was fired. The only financial expert I know of right now is the hon. member for Lethbridge. I do not know what will happen to him.

Mr. Blackmore: That is about all you need.

Mr. Decore: I agree with the hon. member. There have been some other new theories developed in Social Credit. The hon. member for Peace River was talking about oil. He said it was fortunate that oil came into the province of Alberta at the time it did. I wonder if he knows how oil did come into the province of Alberta.

Mr. Johnston: Did the Liberals bring it in?

Mr. Decore: I am sorry I have not the date of this newspaper clipping, but the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) will recall the date. It was when he spoke at the Calgary Social Credit constituency association, at the bible institute, and this is what he had to say:

Mr. Hansell concluded wtih a reference to the Alberta government's financial position, saying other parties claimed that the province was prosperous because of oil having been discovered.

But, said Mr. Hansell, oil was always there. It was discovered under Social Credit and there might be a reason for that. "Perhaps," he said, "even Providence might have said, 'we are not going to place this wealth into the hands of just anybody'."

References have been made to the Social Credit claiming a monopoly on religion. That is not only a monopoly on religion, but the above statement claims a monopoly on the favours which Providence bestows on a government. We have listened to the hon. member for Lethbridge and the hon. member for Peace River telling us what Social Credit is. I say that if you took all these words used by the hon. member for Peace River such as bandit leader, stinkers in high places, cesspool methods, gutter politics, master of smear technique, master of evasion, tommyrot, and put them together, then, Mr. Speaker, you have Social Credit.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, since we have had quite a long and hectic day, may I be permitted to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Roberge the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister what we shall do tomorrow after this debate is finished.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are in the hands of the opposition.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 17, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. POWER—FELICITATIONS ON ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every hon. member of this house would be appreciative if you would allow us to take a few moments at this time to pay a tribute of felicitations and good wishes to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). Though to look at him it might be difficult to believe it, it is a fact that today he is starting the 36th year of continuous membership in this house. It is not only because of the length of his membership in the house but much more because of the manner in which he has discharged his responsibilities and duties here that we are all so happy to acclaim him as the dean of this chamber in years and in experience. In paying honour to him, Mr. Speaker, I think that we are honouring ourselves by manifesting our admiration for the manner in which he acts as a member of parliament. We shall also continue to honour ourselves if we walk in his footsteps.

I am not going to attempt this morning even to summarize the hon. gentleman's career, but I wish to say that during the whole decade that preceded his first election to this house on December 17, 1917, he had already won much public acclaim. He was one of that brilliant quartet of Power brothers who spread the fame of the real amateur athletes of Quebec throughout the country by their achievements in the hockey arenas of that time and by their valiant efforts to bring to Quebec as often as possible the great Stanley cup.

We of Quebec were thrilled at his gallant conduct in the armed forces during the first great war and certainly were distressed when we heard that he was wounded overseas twice, once so grievously that he had to be invalided back home. But the admiration in which he was held by his fellow citizens of Quebec soon had an opportunity to manifest itself, because in 1917 there came into being in Quebec city the new constituency of Quebec South of which he has been the distinguished representative here ever since its creation.

There is no doubt, of course, that at that first election he was aided in his campaign by the high esteem in which his family had been held for many years by the people of the city of Quebec; but it was not long before his own personality affirmed itself not only among his constituents and among his fellow members of parliament but throughout the whole Canadian nation; and it has constantly grown as the years of his service to the Canadian public added themselves to each other.

Among the many great services he has rendered to the Canadian nation, perhaps none has been more important or more permanent in its effect upon the Canadian people than the fact that the Irish Chubby Power became the idol of the French-speaking electors of the constituency he has represented in this house. I will not advert to his other great public services; but in his person and in his career is found a demonstration that good men and good women of good will, whatever be their origin or their mother tongue, can work together harmoniously in the great task of building a united new nation on this North American continent. That is something towards which the efforts of our distinguished colleague have been highly effective and will prove of long permanent service to this young nation. I was unfortunately prevented, by circumstances over which I could have no control, from attending the dinner that was tendered to him in our home city last Saturday evening. I understand that on that occasion he said that the first political speech St. Laurent had ever made was for a Power and that the last political speech that Chubby is likely to make would be a speech for St. Laurent. We have long been friends, but my years are somewhat longer than his, and though I trust that as long as it is my good fortune to take any part in public affairs my conduct will be such that Chubby Power will be able to carry out that promise, I do hope for him and for the benefit of his fellow citizens that he may be making political speeches long after it has ceased to be possible for me to take part in public affairs.

(Translation):

While not wanting to repeat what I have already said, I nevertheless wish to say, in the other language used in the election campaigns participated in by my friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) that I believe I am echoing the thoughts of all those who live in that particular constituency, whatever their political faith, when I say that we have the very greatest esteem and affection for him.

(Text):

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the Prime Minister not only in extending the warmest good wishes which can be expressed to the hon. member whose name is before us today, but also in stating that we do honour ourselves in recognizing public service which is marked by an anniversary of this nature.

To hold the continued support, respect and affection of those who have sent him here for half man's allotted span, according to biblical terms, is in itself a very great achievement, and something that should warm the heart and be a source of permanent satisfaction to any human being. I feel sure that today the warmest recollection in the mind of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) is the friendly personal support of those who have said "well done" to the man they chose to represent them for all these years.

As has been said, he is one of those members who came to this house with a family tradition, which undoubtedly was a help to him in placing himself before the people of that constituency; but also undoubtedly it helped him in another way, because it is obvious that from his youth he had been imbued with traditions of public service and of the place of parliament in our free way of life as constantly expressed in what he said in this house in the years that have followed.

It must be a great source of satisfaction to him to know that he holds not only the respect of all hon. members, but also their genuine affection. In the sometimes arduous and sometimes very vigorous exchange of differing opinions as to the way that public affairs can best be conducted, it is significant that the hon. member for Quebec South has been known at all times to those in different parts of the house, whether they shared his political views or not, as Chubby Power, and as a man whom they respected at all times, whether they shared his own particular political interpretation of the best way the country could be served at any time.

This country will always be deeply indebted to Chubby Power for the service he gave as minister of national defence for air during war. Whatever other accomplishments may be recorded beside his name, it will never be forgotten that Canada was in large measure the training pool from which there went out to different parts of the world young men of different nationalities who took their places in what has become the most critical aspect of military activity in these modern days. His name will always be associated with that great training program under which young men from the whole commonwealth came here to the wide spaces of Canada, trained for battle, and went out and served the common cause of freedom under that imaginative and successful program.

He established his own reputation for service in the field of battle in the first world war, and was decorated with the Military Cross for valour, serving with that branch of the service which has not at all times expressed its utmost respect for that branch of the service to which I have the privilege to belong. But whether the infantry always shared the opinion of the artillery that members of the artillery always noticeably expressed themselves, the fact remains that members of the artillery, of the engineers, of the air force, of the navy or of any other branch of the service always did recognize that the infantry is the queen of battles, and that when a man rises to the command of a company, and acting command of a battalion, and is decorated with the Military Cross, as Chubby Power was during world war I, that indeed is something that commands the respect of every one of us.

He will be remembered in another way. Some members leave an imprint in this and in other parliaments because of an interest in a particular field of public activity. In addition to his administrative responsibility, may I say with the deepest sincerity that, so far as I have been able to ascertain from my own reading, no member in this house has more clearly stated the fundamental principles of parliament than has the hon. member for Quebec South on many occasions. I hope that he may follow a course which can be extremely useful to others and that, in book form, he will accumulate many of his own statements in regard to the traditions of this great institution, and add of course those other comments that he could make with the long knowledge he has gained over these past thirty-five years.

I could not help appreciating the sentiment with which the Prime Minister referred to the words of the hon. member for Quebec South when he spoke of his first speech, and of his last, prospective, political speech. I have not heard it suggested that this indicated any possibility of a translation to a higher realm, but I would hope that, in whatever capacity his future speeches may be made, all of us may have the pleasure of continuing association with him, whatever field of public service he continues to occupy.

To him, as the dean of the house, young in vigour, young in spirit and with a great accumulated knowledge, we pay our respects. And I know that at the same time he would wish us all to join in our thoughts on this historic occasion the great service of his wife to the common cause in which they have engaged. I am sure that all of us would wish him to convey to his very charming wife, who has been so closely associated with him in all these activities, our best wishes for her happiness in continuing association with a great member of this parliament.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I associate myself and those in this group not only with the words but also with the spirit of what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

This is indeed a great occasion. I would say that, so far as the membership of this House of Commons is concerned, it is unique; because it is not given to very many of us who come here to represent continuously a constituency that has sent a member here for over a third of a century.

The Leader of the Opposition has referred to the service the hon. member for Quebec South rendered to this country when he was minister of defence for air. As one who was a member of the house at that time, and as one who met so many of the men who were in the Canadian air force in those days, I can say that I, too, believe that perhaps that was one of the greatest services he has rendered the people of this country. His presence as minister was surely a comfort to many of the young men who joined the R.C.A.F. I can attest to that from what has been said to me not only by men in the air force but by others who had occasion to know what was being done at that time.

But, after all, I do not believe the character of a man or his work can be measured in terms of the heights he has reached or the posts he has held. The true character of a man is that, after having reached these heights, he is ready to give up everything he has gained, if he finds that there are conditions that he cannot go along with. The hon. member for Quebec South demonstrated that he was able to do that. Whether or not we agree with his reasons for doing it, we must honour the man for what he did.

Again I say it is with the greatest of pleasure that I associate myself with the words and the spirit of what has been said by the two hon. gentlemen who have already spoken.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, thirty-five years of continuous service in the House of Commons is indeed a remarkable parliamentary record. To hold the respect and the support of constituents for so long a period of time is a real achievement, especially when, as in this instance, it has had to be done in the thick of political rivalry.

I have tried, since this little ceremony of tributes began this morning, to think of some parallel. The only one that comes to mind is not in the human realm at all. It so happens that I am a great lover of wildlife, particularly birds. Canada geese have always excited my admiration—and I hope the hon. member about whom we are speaking will not think that I am calling him a wild goose. However, there are some characteristics I should like to have in common with the one about which I am going to speak.

Not long ago I visited the Jack Miner foundation at Kingsville, and while I was there those in charge netted about 700 geese, and proceeded to band those that had not been banded. Amongst them they discovered one old fellow they had banded in 1931. It was evident that for twenty-one continuous years that old fellow had flown, perhaps from Louisiana, to the bird sanctuary at Kingsville, and then from there to the James bay area and back again, a distance of perhaps six thousand miles each year. He had been able to avoid accidents and to survive, and to continue to lead the V-shaped formation unerringly to the sanctuary.

That is no mean record; it is a real achievement. It took wisdom, adaptability and a whole lot of common sense to do it. I am quite sure that, in paying respect to the hon. member this morning, no better parallel could be drawn than this, and the statement that he has achieved an even better record than the old goose in the sanctuary who was able to fly so long back and forth across the country, and still remain alive—especially with people shooting at him and trying to destroy him.

All joking aside, I wish to join with all others in honouring the hon. member on this day, and to assure him that he has the undivided good will and sincere wishes, for a long and happy future, of all those for whom I speak in the House of Commons.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, after the gracious speeches delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other groups, will you please listen to the voice of the rank and file.

Felicitations to Mr. Power

I am happy to join the countless friends of Chubby Power in extending to him, to Mrs. Power and their children our warmest congratulations and best wishes on the occasion of this anniversary. I know Chubby Power as a glamorous figure in politics, because he was endowed—and he still is—with a gift that could never be defined by the civil service commission, a pleasing personality. The hon. member has been well known for his good sportsmanship, his humour and his wit. His success in politics may be due to his good judgment, but I think it is mostly due to his remarkable "flair".

All speakers have referred to his brilliant war record and the fact that he was minister of national defence for air for many years. It is to his credit that he has never been considered to be a brass hat.

Thirty-five years in politics is a long time. I remember when the late Ernest Lapointe celebrated a similar anniversary. During these thirty-five years the hon. gentleman has represented in this house the heart of the capital city of the province of Quebec, the part within the old fortifications. This includes the court house and there have been many judges who voted for Chubby. The basilica was in his riding and Chubby has represented three cardinals and two archbishops. The legislative buildings are outside the walls of Quebec city, but he has represented countless lieutenant governors and four premiers of Quebec. Not only that, he represents Laval university with I do not know how many rectors and professors. On an occasion like this would he not be deserving of an honorary degree from Laval university?

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, as an associate of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) during many struggles for the cause of Liberalism in the province of Quebec, I want to join with others, especially with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), in what was said about the hon. member. They have put before us so truly his qualities and outstanding personality. I wish Mrs. Power and him many years together, warmed by the esteem of all the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of being in the house during the time when the hon. member who is now being honoured was carrying the exceedingly heavy portfolio which he carried through the war and to which reference has been made. I think there is one thing that should be recorded. When the hon. member was putting his estimates through the house he was always cheerful and jovial. I think he was the most cheerful and happy member of the cabinet I ever saw in my life when putting through his estimates. He never had any trouble getting his estimates past the house. I am quoting from memory, but there was an item one time about which some hon. members were concerned and they began to probe in an effort to get some information, and the hon. member I believe said, "I don't know a darn thing about it at all." The item passed right there.

There is one other thing that I believe all hon. members would desire to know. This is something which I am sure the children and descendants to the latest generation of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) will be glad to know. I had the fortune and misfortune of having a son in the air force. I was fortunate because of his service and sacrifice for this great nation and empire which we all love. I had the misfortune because of the sorrow caused by his loss.

We lost track of our boy after he got to England and no effort that we could put forward could locate his address. I finally decided that I would ask Chubby Power if he could do anything for me. You can imagine a man as busy as he was—building the commonwealth air training plan and taking care of the thousand and one details that needed to be looked after—being asked by an ordinary member of parliament to locate his son. He said to me, "I will send a signal off at once and locate him right away." Inside of an hour my office was called and the address of my boy was given to me. I was also assured that he was well, sound, and serving in England.

That indicates just one of the qualities of the hon. member for which he was loved by our people. I know that in our home one of the comforting thoughts we have when our minds go back to the terrible loss that we sustained in the death of that boy is the fact that the minister of national defence for air was interested enough in him and his welfare and in us and our welfare to take time from an exceedingly busy life to find out where that boy was located and give us his address.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Quebec South speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, in the thirty-five years that it has been my privilege to take part in debates and to close one or two, I cannot recall one where the words used by the speakers who went before me were so uniformly kind, tolerant, generous and magnanimous. Even my hon. friend who compared me to a wild goose was probably unaware of the fact that there are few greater legendary heroes in the history of Ireland than the wild geese who were obliged to flee their country in order to remain faithful to their faith and to their king.

I have other friends outside the house who, having considered the events of the past few days as they concerned me, were somewhat perturbed lest the laudatory remarks and even the adulation which has been showered upon me, as they said, on account of a sort of careless promenade on the fringes of Canadian history during the past third of a century, might affect my better judgment, and they have furnished me with certain quotations which I hope are not too irrelevant but which may perhaps be considered to be salutary. One is from the Hansard of the British House of Commons of March 7, 1945, Mr. Winston Churchill speaking:

> I have only two more minutes to speak, and I will devote them to my noble friend, the father of the house. He is a comparatively young father of the house; he has many years of useful life before him. We still hope they may be years of useful life in this house, but unless in the future his sagacity and knowledge of the house are found to be markedly superior to what he has exhibited today, I must warn him that he will run a very grave risk of falling into senility before he is overtaken by old age.

It is perhaps well that I should take note of this warning and that I do not indulge in semi-senile maunderings about the good old days. Perhaps I might quote another little piece, I hope not quite so relevant but still salutary. It is an epitaph on the politician:

> Here, richly, with ridiculous display,
> The politician's corpse was laid away,
> While all of his acquaintances sneered and slanged,
> I wept: for I had longed to see him hanged.

These lines are from the writings of Hilaire Belloc who, strangely enough, was a member of parliament in the British House of Commons. I rather suspect that he must have been for long years a member of the opposition faced with a vociferous, turbulent and arrogant majority. I too in the course of my career have been twice on the opposite side. I have had the privilege of sitting in two parliaments as a member of the opposition and can well remember the irritation and the anger which were occasioned by what I then considered to be the arbitrary and dictatorial acts of the members of the government. I am quite sure that my good friend, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), when he sat in the house as one of the heroes of the Liberal filibuster against the naval bill in 1912—as a humble camp follower I had the privilege of sitting in the gallery at that time —must have had his moments of blind rage when first closure was introduced into this house and his beloved and idolized leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had to submit to the gag.

But as the years went by those of us who changed our positions in the house were able to look at similar proceedings with a certain degree of calmness and perhaps satisfactory equanimity. Therefore I suppose the strength of one's emotions and one's feelings is largely to be gauged by the lapse of time and the geographical situation in which we find ourselves. Nevertheless there does develop over the years a feeling of kindly tolerance which grows into comradeship and finally develops into true and strong friendship as between members of this great institution, the House of Commons. Even Belloc himself, whom I have already quoted, must have come to that conclusion, because in his later years he had this to say:

> From quiet homes and first beginning
> Out to the undiscovered ends,
> There's nothing worth the wear of winning
> But laughter and the love of friends.

As for me, to paraphrase the poet, all I can say is:

> My thanks, my friends,
> My thanks, my foes;
> My love to these,
> My peace with those.

QUESTIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—GROUND-AIR RATIO OF PERSONNEL

Mr. Balcom:

What is the ground-air ratio of officers and men in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. Blanchette: The ratio of qualified aircrew and aircrew under training to non-flying list personnel is 1 to 6·2.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING PROPERTY

Mr. Lennard:

1. What was the price paid for the land upon which the head office building of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is being erected?
2. What is the size of the property?
3. What acreage will be covered by the building?
4. What will be the completed cost of the building?
5. What will the auditorium cost?
6. What will the dance floor in the auditorium cost?
7. What will be the completed cost of landscaping the grounds surrounding the building?
8. What was the complete cost of the house erected for the former owner of the property?

Mr. Winters: Yesterday the hon. member for Wentworth stated on the orders of the day that, with the exception of one day, this question had been on the order paper since July 2, and expressed the hope that he would get an early answer. Since the hon. member's remarks might give the impression that there had been many previous occasions to answer this question, perhaps I should say that it appeared first in Votes and Proceedings on Wednesday, July 2, 1952 and in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day on Friday, July 4. It will be recalled that the house adjourned on the same day and that there was no opportunity then to answer the question.

The question reappeared on the order paper on Friday, November 21. Since that time hon. members have been debating the speech from the throne, and there was only one occasion on which questions were answered. That was Wednesday, December 10. On that particular day I was unable to be here because of a business engagement elsewhere, and this, therefore, is the first opportunity I have had to answer the question. The answer is as follows:

1. An average of $824.30 per acre.

2. 281·5 acres.

3. The building and its grounds cover 21·3 acres.

4. The construction contract is not yet closed. Estimated completed cost $2 million.

5. The auditorium is part of the general contract and is estimated to cost approximately $40,000.

[Mr. Power.]

6. The recreation floor is part of the general contract and the central section which is a spring floor is estimated to have cost about an additional $2,500 more than standard floor construction.

7. The landscaping is incomplete. The estimated completed cost, $35,000.

8. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation did not erect a house for the former owner nor have they any knowledge of the cost of the house erected by him.

GOVERNMENT-RENTED STORAGE SPACE

Mr. Fraser:

1. Except for grain, does any department or agency of the government rent storage space in (a) buildings; (b) not under cover?
2. If so, in each case (a) where are the storage spaces located; (b) of what type are they; (c) what is the size of the space; (d) what is the rental cost?

GOVERNMENT-OWNED STORAGE SPACE

Mr. Fraser:

1. Except for grain, does any department or agency of the government own storage space in (a) buildings; (b) not under cover?
2. If so, in each case (a) where are the storage spaces located; (b) of what type are they; (c) what is the size of this space?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to couple these two questions which are asked by the same hon. member. They concern space in public or rented buildings occupied by departments of the government. The first question is easy to answer because the answer is yes. Nearly every department occupies space in publicly owned or rented buildings. Where the trouble starts is that the gentleman wishes to know in each building the number of square feet occupied by each department and the nature of the space. I understand that there is not one building which we occupy, owned or leased, in which there is not some space for storage. Even in this building I would have to find out where we put away cleaning material and what space it occupies in the building.

Mr. Fraser: That is not what I am asking for.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he drop these questions but that he can discuss the matter with me or some of the officials and we can give him the information he desires. The way the question is drafted now, even if I took all my Christmas holidays I would not be able to produce the information.

Mr. Speaker: Questions Nos. 8 and 29 will be dropped.

[Later:]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in regard to questions Nos. 8 and 29, the understanding was that the information concerned space that was rented or owned—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Fraser: —only for one purpose—for storage; and that is the answer I want.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Every department has some storage space. While you are speaking on the matter, a year ago I was visiting the justice building and I found the corridors on floors 6, 7 and 8, serving as a storage space for their filing cabinets. I would have trouble giving you exactly the space occupied by each department in each building.

Mr. Speaker: I think it would be better if the question were dropped. The hon. gentlemen can discuss the matter and either have the questions replaced on the order paper or reworded.

Mr. Fraser: Could they not stay on and then I could speak to the minister too?

Mr. Speaker: It was agreed that they should be dropped and probably the agreement might be carried out.

WHEAT IN STORAGE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How much of the 1951 wheat crop is still in storage at (a) terminals; (b) local line elevators?

Mr. McIlraith: Statistics of stocks of grain in storage, as compiled by the board of grain commissioners for Canada, do not differentiate between grain of various crops.

This also applies in respect to grain received by elevator companies for the account of the Canadian wheat board and, neither in the receiving of grain from producers, the storing of grain in country elevators, nor in the shipping of grain from country elevators is the year of production recorded. As agents of the Canadian wheat board, elevator companies must account to the board for the quantity of grain which they receive from producers in each crop year and for which they issue producers certificates but the year of production is not recorded.

CUBAN REFINED SUGAR IMPORTS

Mr. Coyle:

1. How many tons of Cuban refined sugar have been imported, during the years 1950, 1951 and 1952, to date?
2. Is there any duty on this sugar? If so, how much per ton?
3. What was the laid-down price of this sugar in each year?
4. Has Canada an agreement with Cuba to take this sugar?
5. If so, what are terms of the agreement?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Refined sugar first classified for statistical purposes January 1, 1952. Therefore, imports for 1950 and 1951 are not available. Imports January 1 to September 30, 1952—9,900 tons.

2. Yes. Cuban refined sugar is subject to duty under tariff item 134 at the rate of $1.89 per one hundred pounds or $37.80 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

3. Information not available.

4. No, the agreement with Cuba covers raw sugar only.

5. Answered by No. 4.

CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. Lennard:

1. Who is clerk of the privy council?
2. When was he appointed?
3. What is his salary?
4. What are the duties of his office?
5. What previous positions has he held in the service of the government of Canada, and during what period of time was each such position held?
6. Since his appointment as clerk of the privy council, what trips has he made out of Ottawa on government business, setting forth places visited, the duration of each such visit and the purpose in detail of each visit?
7. On any such visits, did he accompany any minister of the crown, and if so what, in detail, were the services performed by him on each such visit for such minister of the crown?
8. What, in detail, was the purpose of any visits made by any such minister of the crown in which he or they were accompanied by the clerk of the privy council?
9. What travelling or other expenses were incurred on his behalf on any such visits and to what account were such expenses charged?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Mr. J. W. Pickersgill.

2. June 1, 1952.

3. $15,000 per annum.

4. The duties were defined in the order in council appointing the clerk of the privy council and secretary to cabinet on March 25, 1940 (P.C. 1121 of 1940).

5. Mr. Pickersgill was appointed a third secretary in the Department of External Affairs after a competitive examination on October 14, 1937, and was seconded for duty in the office of the Prime Minister in December, 1937. On April 1, 1942, he was appointed private secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On June 9, 1945, he was given leave of absence from the Department of External Affairs and appointed special assistant to the Prime Minister and head of the office of the Prime Minister, which position he occupied until May 31, 1952.

6. On July 26, the clerk of the privy council, in his capacity as secretary to the cabinet, visited the Prime Minister at his summer home to discuss a number of matters of official business under consideration by the cabinet, upon which his colleagues wished to obtain the Prime Minister's views.

On August 16, he travelled to Arvida to meet the Prime Minister and spent three days accompanying the Prime Minister on a visit to the Lake St. John district, and one day at the Prime Minister's summer home at St. Patrick, Quebec. The purpose of the visit was to take up a number of matters of official business with the Prime Minister and to be available to keep in touch with the Prime Minister's colleagues in Ottawa to deal with any urgent matters of public business which might arise during this period.

On August 30, he left Ottawa to join the Prime Minister in Calgary to accompany him during a part of the Prime Minister's visit to British Columbia in order to be available, whenever required, to keep in touch with the Prime Minister's colleagues in Ottawa on various matters of public business. He left the Prime Minister at Edmonton on September 8, and met him in Winnipeg on September 10, and returned to Ottawa on September 11. During this trip, the secretary to the cabinet had frequent occasion to be in touch with the cabinet secretariat and certain of the Prime Minister's colleagues in Ottawa regarding a number of matters of public business then pending, including particularly the preparations for the commonwealth economic conference.

On November 25, he accompanied the Prime Minister to London, England, for the commonwealth economic conference, and returned to Ottawa with him on December 12. During this visit the secretary to the cabinet, who has a relationship to the Prime Minister similar to that of a deputy minister to his minister, acted as an adviser to the Prime Minister in connection with matters before that conference.

7. Answered by No. 6.

8. The visit of the Prime Minister to the Lake St. John district was made for the purpose of seeing at first hand the great industrial development of that region.

The visit of the Prime Minister to British Columbia was originally planned for the purpose of attending the Canadian Bar Association convention, officiating at the opening of the law faculty building of the University of British Columbia and at the official opening of the new post office at Victoria, B.C. The Prime Minister took advantage of the visit to see something of the development of other parts of the province of British Columbia which he had not previously had an opportunity of visiting. On his return he stopped at Edmonton to see some of the new industrial developments in that area; and in Winnipeg to address the Canadian Club.

The Prime Minister's visit to London was for the purpose of attending the commonwealth economic conference.

9. Expenses incurred were as follows:

Visit to St. Patrick, nil;

Visit to Lake St. John district, $29.10; visit to British Columbia, $30.35.

(Items above charged to privy council vote).

Visit to United Kingdom (£14·7·6) $39.39 (charged to External Affairs vote).

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

CIGARETTES—SALES, REVENUE, ETC.

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many cigarettes were manufactured in Canada, during the last year for which total figures are available?

2. What was the total amount in dollars of sales of these cigarettes?

3. What was the total amount of revenue collected from the sales of these cigarettes by way of (a) excise tax; (b) sales tax?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. For calendar year 1951, 15,878,521,805.

2. Estimated retail value of cigarettes manufactured in Canada and released for consumption in 1951, $315,000,000.

3. (a) Excise tax $79,812,174.65; excise duty $94,193,806.96.

(b) No separate compilation of sales tax on any commodity.

REPLACEMENT WHEELS FOR TANKS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Were tenders called for in the case of replacement wheels for the tank used as a Canadian army training vehicle, as contract No. E. 20-LVIA-129?

2. If so, in what month of the year 1952 were such tenders called for?

3. What individuals or firms submitted tenders, and what was the amount of each tender submitted?

4. To whom was the contract awarded, and in what amount?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. July.

3. It has been the established policy of this department to disclose only the details of the successful tender.

4. Levy Auto Parts Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ontario, for items 1, 3 and 4 of the contract for a total amount of $112,099.50, sales tax included f.o.b. Montreal.

Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. of Canada, Ltd., Hamilton, Ontario, for item 2 of the contract for a total amount of $3,327, sales tax included f.o.b. Montreal.

ARMED FORCES MEDICAL OFFICERS— POST-GRADUATE STUDIES ABROAD

Mr. Fraser:

1. Have any medical officers in (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air services, been sent to the United States or any other country to take post-graduate study?

Questions

2. If so, are such officers drawing (a) full pay while away from the service; (b) travelling expenses; (c) living allowances; (d) allowances for wife and family?

3. Are tuition fees also paid by the government?

4. If so, what is the amount in each case?

5. How many months are they out of the Canadian service?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Yes; (b) Yes, to and from the course only; (c) Yes; (d) Yes, where applicable.

3. Yes, where required.

4. Field of study	Place	Tuition Fee
Internal medicine	University of London	£ 190
Internal medicine	University of Pennsylvania	$ 960.00
Cardiology	Royal Medical College, London	$ 75.00
Hospital administration	Columbia university	$1,050.00
Psychiatry	University of Pennsylvania	$ 960.00
Public health	Edinburgh university	$ 214.00

5. To increase their usefulness to the service, medical officers are normally allowed, in accordance with terms of service, one year post-graduate training after each five year period of active duty. Since all courses of study cannot be embraced within a twelve-month period, officers are often permitted to extend their period of study beyond twelve months. In such cases, the additional time is deducted from any future periods of time for post-graduate study which the officer may accumulate.

LETHBRIDGE GRAIN ELEVATOR

Mr. Harkness:

1. What is the capacity of the dominion government grain elevator at Lethbridge?

2. What is the total volume of grain, by years, which has been handled by this elevator in the years 1941-1951 inclusive?

3. What amounts of grain were held in this elevator at the end of March, June, September and December, for the past two years?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. 1,250,000 bushels.

2.

Fiscal Years	Net Bushels
1941-42	285,889
1942-43	25,632
1943-44	73,192
1944-45	13,352
1945-46	6,244
1946-47	1,203
1947-48	139,436
1948-49	63,046
1949-50	12,581
1950-51	30,904
1951-52	1,008,961

3. 1951—March, 5,040 bus.; June, 21 bus.; September, 410 bus.; December, 75,513 bus.

1952—March, 364,422 bus.; June, 66,810 bus.; September, 149,693 bus.; November, 457,161 bus.

GANDER AND TORBAY AIRPORTS —RUNWAY EXTENSIONS

Mr. Higgins:

What runway extensions, if any, are planned for Gander and Torbay airports?

Mr. Chevrier: For Gander airport, additional facilities are under consideration and when approved will be made known. For Torbay airport, no extension is planned by the department during the next fiscal year.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, NFLD.

Mr. Higgins:

1. How many miles of trans-Canada highway have been completed in Newfoundland?

2. How many miles have still to be completed?

3. What was the average cost per mile of the highway in Newfoundland?

4. What was the average cost per mile of the highway in each of the other provinces?

5. Has an agreement been reached between the government of Newfoundland and the federal government whereby the standards of the highway in Newfoundland will be relaxed?

6. Is so, what changes in the standards of the highway have been agreed to, and when was such agreement made?

Mr. Winters:

1. No mileage has been fully completed.

2. 610 miles.

3. See answer to No. 1. Records of cost of completed construction are therefore not available.

Questions

4. Relatively few miles have been fully completed and sufficient information is therefore not yet available to determine accurately the average cost per mile of the completed highway in the other provinces.

5 and 6. No. Section 2 (c) of the agreement empowers the minister to authorize deviations from the specifications in certain instances where adherence to it would entail excessive expenditure, provided the deviations do not prejudice the construction of a highway of high standard. Deviations have been so authorized for Newfoundland as they have been in other provinces.

NEWFOUNDLAND COD FISHING—VESSELS AND EQUIPMENT

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What vessels have been employed by the federal government during 1952, in Newfoundland waters, in experimental methods of catching codfish?
2. What has been the cost of operation in each case?
3. What earnings, if any, have been produced in each case?
4. Where have such vessels been conducting their experiments?
5. If vessels are hired, what has been the cost of hire?
6. If vessels are owned by the federal government what were costs of vessels and equipment?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. (a) Edward Humby; (b) Atlantic Rover; (c) Marjory Beryl; (d) Pat and Judy; (e) Gertrude and Ronald.

2. (a) Included in charter; (b) $600.85 (to Nov. 15); (c) $202.67 (to Nov. 15); (d) $709.46 (to Nov. 15); (e) $352.31 (to Nov. 15).

3. (a) Under charter catch retained by owner; (b) $1,721.39; (c) $1,757.62; (d) $1,316.84; (e) $1,444.21.

4. (a) Winter fishing on southwest coast; (b) to (e) northeast coast from Bonavista bay to the strait of Belle Isle.

5. (a) $5,568.15; (b) $12,650.89; (c) $12,240.80; (d) $11,999.73; (e) $10,699.51.

6. All vessels were or are chartered.

DAMAGE TO VESSEL "MISS OSBORNE"

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Was any investigation made into the explosion, which took place in Newfoundland waters, on the experimental boat Miss Osborne, in August, 1951?
2. If so, what was the result?
3. What was the extent of the damage?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. Yes.

2. The explosion resulted from the accidental ignition of gasoline fumes which developed during refuelling.

[Mr. Winters.]

3. The vessel was totally destroyed. However, under the terms of charter the crown was not liable in any manner for loss or damage to the vessel. The incident automatically terminated the charter agreement.

FORD MOTOR COMPANY, WINDSOR—PURCHASING TERMS FOR WORKERS' HOMES

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Has the government received any requests that workers, employed by the Ford Motor Company at Windsor, be permitted to buy homes in Oakville, on the same terms as defence workers?
2. If so, what consideration has the government given to these requests?

Mr. Winters:

1 and 2. No. The arrangement for defence workers housing is part of the government's effort to encourage defence workers to build houses in those areas where they are needed for Canada's defence production program. The arrangement involves a 10 per cent down payment and is available only to defence workers employed in plants certified by the Minister of Defence Production as defence production plants. I am informed that the Ford Motor Company has not been so certified.

IMPORTS OF TRACTORS

Mr. Murphy:

1. How many tractors, farm and garden type, were imported by Canada from the United States in 1951 and 1952?
2. What was the dollar value?

Mr. McIlraith:

1 and 2. Farm and garden type tractors are not separately recorded in trade statistics. The imports of all types of tractors from the United States were as follows:

	No.	Value
Calendar year 1951 ...	52,571	$83,375,106
January 1 to September 30, 1952.	38,245	63,815,533

IRON ORE

Mr. Laing:

1. In the last year for which figures are available, what was the tonnage and value of Canadian iron ores used in Canadian steel mills?
2. In the same period, what was the tonnage and value of Canadian iron ores exported?
3. In the same year, what was the tonnage and value of iron ores imported for use in Canadian mills, from (a) the United States (b) all other countries?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Canadian iron ores used in Canadian steel mills, calendar year 1951, quantity 1,476,440 short tons; value (cost at consuming plant) $10,497,268.

2. Canadian iron ores exported calendar year 1951, quantity 3,225,767 short tons; value $18,596,137.

3. Iron ores imported for use in Canadian mills, calendar year 1951, from (a) the United States, quantity 3,690,269 short tons; value $21,329,066.

(b) Other countries, quantity 141,149 short tons; value $1,342,199.

FILMS FOR TELEVISION PROGRAMS

Mr. Balcer:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation awarded a contract to the Famous Players Company of Canada, for the lease or purchase of films for television programs?
2. If so, when was such contract awarded, for how many films and what was the total amount of the contract?

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

TELEVISION PROGRAM "HILDA MORGAN"

Mr. Balcer:

1. Who is responsible for the choice of the "Hilda Morgan" program recently telecast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
2. By whom was it written?
3. What amount was paid to the author?
4. By whom was it censored?
5. Is it intended to play the said program in the province of Quebec?

Mr. McCann:

1. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a whole is responsible for the choice and content of its programs.

2. Lister Sinclair.

3. It has not been considered in the interest of the corporation or in the public interest to make known amounts paid by the corporation to individuals in business transactions.

4. See answer to No. 1.

5. This matter has not been considered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ORGANIZATION AND METHODS SERVICE—ASSISTANCE TO GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Hodgson:

What branches or agencies of government have requested and received the assistance of the organization and methods service of the civil service commission?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Return tabled.

SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION 2

Mr. Thatcher:

What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to implement recommendation 2 of the Senate standing committee on finance, made last June 23?

SABRE JETS—EMPENNAGES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Was a contract let to Enamel and Heating Products Limited, Sackville, New Brunswick, for production of empennages for F86E Sabre jets?
2. If so, (a) when was the contract let; (b) for how many units; (c) what was the total contract price?
3. Have any empennages been produced under this contract?
4. Is the contract still in effect?
5. If so, when is delivery expected to start?
6. How much money has been paid under or by reason of the contract to date?

SABRE JETS—MAIN WING PANELS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Was a contract let to the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Windsor, Ontario, for production of main wing panels for F86E Sabre jets?
2. If so, (a) when was the contract let; (b) for how many units; (c) what was the total contract price?
3. Have any main wing panels been produced under this contract?
4. Is the contract still in effect?
5. If so, when is delivery expected to start?
6. If not, when was it cancelled?
7. How much money has been paid under or by reason of the contract to date?
8. Has the contract been let to any other person or corporation for production of main wing panels for Sabre jets?
9. If so, to whom?

ROWELL-SIROIS AND MASSEY COMMISSIONS—FEES, ETC.,

Mr. Low:

1. What amounts of fees, gratuities, allowances and expense moneys were paid by the government of Canada to each member of the Rowell-Sirois royal commission?
2. What amounts of fees, gratuities, allowances and expense moneys were received from the government of Canada by each member of the Massey royal commission on arts and sciences?

ADVERTISING FIRMS ENGAGED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Murphy:

1. What advertising firms or agencies were engaged by any and all departments of government for the year 1952?
2. What amounts were paid to each firm?

BUCTOUCHE, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. Robichaud:

1. In what year was the Buctouche, New Brunswick, post office building erected?
2. What was the cost of this building?
3. What have been the annual revenues of the Buctouche, New Brunswick, post office during the years (a) 1945; (b) 1946; (c) 1947; (d) 1948; (e) 1949; (f) 1950; (g) 1951?

ROGERSVILLE, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. Robichaud:

1. In what year was the post office building erected at Rogersville, New Brunswick?
2. What was the cost of this building?

3. What have been the annual revenues of the Rogersville, New Brunswick, post office during the years (a) 1945; (b) 1946; (c) 1947; (d) 1948; (e) 1949; (f) 1950; (g) 1951?

REXTON, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. Robichaud:

1. In what year was the post office building erected at Rexton, New Brunswick?
2. What was the cost of this building?
3. What have been the annual revenues of the Rexton, New Brunswick, post office during the years (a) 1945; (b) 1946; (c) 1947; (d) 1948; (e) 1949; (f) 1950; (g) 1951?

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS—PERMISSION TO PLEAD IN CANADIAN COURTS

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many times during the last five years have attorneys at law from the United States or any other country been permitted to plead or advocate cases in Canadian courts?
2. What are the names of those permitted, and in what cases did they act?

Mr. Garson: In relation to this matter, I suggest we might bring down in the form of an order for return the information my hon. friend wishes in relation to federal courts. As far as provincial courts are concerned the administration of justice in them comes under the provinces themselves and the information sought would have to be supplied by them.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MILITARY TRAINING AREA, N.B.—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Brooks:

For a copy of all correspondence from January 1, 1951, to date, exchanged between the federal government or any department thereof and the government of the province of New Brunswick or any department thereof, relative to the taking over of an area in Queens and Sunbury counties, New Brunswick, as a military training area.

Mr. Blanchette: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and he has kindly agreed to have this motion stand for the time being.

MILITARY TRAINING AREA, N.B.—REPORTS

Mr. Brooks:

For a copy of all reports from January 1, 1951, to date, received by the Department of National Defence, respecting surveys and inspections made by officials of the department and others on Utopia area and the Queens-Sunbury area, in New Brunswick, relative to proposed military training area.

YUKON RIVER PROJECT—REPORTS BY COMMITTEES

Mr. Adamson:

For a copy of any reports submitted by: (a) the international co-ordinating committee on the Yukon river power and storage project, set up in 1950; (b) the joint economic committee under the chairmanship of C. H. Herbert; (c) progress reports of the Canadian section of the above international committees.

Mr. Winters: With respect to this order, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the fall of 1949 the government of the United States approached the government of Canada with reference to a project intended to develop hydroelectric power in Taiya valley, Alaska, by damming the Yukon river above Whitehorse and diverting the headwaters of the Yukon river into the Taiya river by way of two tunnels through the coast range. In the spring of 1950, the government of Canada agreed that it would co-operate with the United States government by looking into the implications and feasibility of this project in so far as Canada was concerned; and two officials of the Department of Resources and Development were designated to conduct liaison with officials of the United States government. Although no committee was formally constituted, this is doubtless what is referred to in the order as the international co-ordinating committee on the Yukon river power and storage project.

Preliminary surveys and studies on the Canadian side of the border made it progressively clear that these waters can be used in such a way domestically as to be of outstanding value in Canada's economy.

In March, 1951, therefore, the government of Canada informed the government of the United States that it was not prepared to continue with the joint investigation. The liaison arrangement to which I have referred was therefore discontinued and the only report prepared was by officials of the Department of Resources and Development to their superiors. Hon. members will, of course, appreciate that reports of this nature are not produceable.

Under the circumstances, perhaps the hon. member would agree to have the motion dropped.

Mr. Adamson: While the reports in question are no doubt privileged under our rules, nevertheless diversion of the Yukon river over the international boundary is of great importance to the whole economy of the Yukon and for that matter to a large section of British Columbia and Alaska. As it involves four governments, I should like assurance—and I think the minister has given me that assurance—that no commitment will be made to any of the other governments to divert the headwaters of the Yukon at any time, and that no agreement with the Aluminum Company of America will be made unless the fullest discussion is permitted here and in some committee of this house. From what the minister has said, I think he is agreeable to that.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should say that to date no commitment has been given. It is most unlikely that any commitment of that nature would be given. I would not care to commit the government beyond that at this time, but I can assure the hon. member that no commitment has been given.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

PURCHASE OF NECKTIES

Mr. Hees:

For a copy of all contracts or agreements to purchase neckties, entered into by any department or branch of the federal government since January 1, 1951.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CURRIE REPORT—DRAFT COPY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall how surprised I was on the afternoon of December 15 at the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In the morning, with respect to the Currie report, I had stated, as reported at page 642 of Hansard:

My information is that there was no printed or typewritten copy of the report communicated to anyone in the department before this one. Whether or not drafts were made in Mr. Currie's office before he submitted the report, I do not know, but there was nothing communicated to the department until this report was received. Five copies of it were sent by Mr. Currie in the form in which it is now on the late afternoon of December 8.

That is the information I had at that time. It was information given to me by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) who is the only person with whom I have communicated, or it was the only communication—with the exception of overseas communications with the minister himself—that I have had with anyone connected with the Department of National Defence. That was the information that the acting minister himself had at that time. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made in the house the announcement that he had in his possession a copy of a draft that had been produced by the same process—he called it a printed copy—which was used for producing the signed report and asked me to make inquiries about it, I hastened to give him the assurance that I would make the fullest possible inquiry, and expressed considerable surprise at the fact that any copy of a draft had found its way into anybody else's hands before the report had been submitted to the department. I have ascertained that the proper designation for the process by which this report has been produced is that of offset reproduction. I had inquiries made, and those inquiries disclosed that during the whole course of the investigation Mr. Currie and his representatives had been in communication with officers of the Department of National Defence, and especially the deputy minister, and were concerned as to the means of presenting a description of these irregularities at Petawawa in such a way as not to prejudice the rights of individuals in the judicial proceedings under way or intended in relation to the criminal acts at Petawawa. The inquiries also disclosed that Mr. Currie and his representatives discussed this matter with the deputy minister and that the suggestion was made that the deputy minister might go over the draft, when it was ready, and point out any inaccuracies in the facts reported which had been obtained from the department itself. The deputy minister mentioned this suggestion to the minister and the minister authorized him to go over this draft but told him to be extremely careful to make no comment about anything but the facts that had been obtained from the department.

On November 27—Thursday afternoon, I think it was—a representative of Mr. Currie brought a draft produced by this offset reproduction process, had some conversation with the deputy minister about it, and left it with him so that he might go over it and check the reporting of facts that had been obtained through information supplied by the department. After that—I do not know just at what date—the deputy minister mentioned to the minister that he had it and asked him if he wished to see it. The minister said no, that he wished to see nothing except the report when it was signed and produced. The deputy minister went over it during the week end and saw representatives of Mr. Currie on Monday, December 1. It will be remembered that that was the date on which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), as reported at page 203 of Hansard, made in the house the following inquiry of the minister:

I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he inform us when he will receive the report which we were assured was being prepared some time ago by Mr. Currie with respect to the administration of the Department of National Defence so far as it affects Petawawa camp?

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) replied as follows:

I have not been in touch with Mr. Currie myself for some time but I am informed by the deputy minister that he has been in touch with members of Mr. Currie's staff, and that it is expected that the report will be available within the next week or two. It has not been made yet.

Mr. Drew: As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government has received an interim report?

Mr. Claxton: No.

That was the situation. The minister knew that there was a draft that had been communicated to the deputy minister and expected that it would be a report within the next week or two, and he gave that information to the house. The deputy minister informs me, through the acting minister, that on December 1 he made to representatives of Mr. Currie representations as to what appeared to be some errors in fact in that document as follows:

(a) At page 4—The tense used in describing the actions of the chief auditor and the quartermaster general was almost throughout the present tense. It was pointed out that this paragraph apparently had reference to the state of affairs at the time of the irregularities and that the use of the present tense would be wrong. This observation was apparently accepted in the final report as signed and produced.

(b) At page 7—There was a paragraph stating that an army corporal had had a cottage built valued at $1,700 out of army materials and army labour for which no reimbursement had been received, or words to that effect. It was pointed out to Mr. Currie's representatives that this corporal had been prosecuted in the criminal courts in respect of this incident and had been acquitted. No request was made but this fact was brought to the attention of Mr. Currie's representatives. In the report that was finally signed and produced there is no such paragraph.

At page 7 it is pointed out that the child's rocking horse to which reference was made had been constructed not at Petawawa but elsewhere and that this perhaps did not belong in the recital of irregularities at Petawawa. Mr. Currie's representatives replied that the man who received this rocking horse had been stationed at Petawawa, and that it had been mentioned in the trials. No action was taken on that representation. Then on page 8 in reference to Tucker creek, the investigators were asked whether they had received the official explanation of the army of the purpose of this dam, which they said was for fire fighting purposes. They replied that they had received that explanation but apparently it did not impress them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: I want to disclose everything I have been able to ascertain, and I am doing so conscientiously and to the best of my ability.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

On page 10 there is reference to an overall shortage of 18,000 bags of cement. It was pointed out by the deputy minister to Mr. Currie's representatives that during the investigation they had mentioned to a number of persons in the department that that investigation had reduced this unexplained disappearance to something like 2,000 to 3,000 bags, which they had stated should not be regarded as unusual. They replied that they had rechecked and that they persisted in their view that there was an unexplained shortage of 18,000 bags, and I think that still remains in the report.

The deputy minister pointed out that on page 13, in listing the unobserved regulations there were two, No. 10 and No. 28, which appeared to be the same thing mentioned twice in somewhat different terms. They took note of that, and in the result there is only the original No. 28 which remains; No. 10 was eliminated.

Mr. Knowles: Has the Prime Minister these items, and can he put them on the record at this time so that the house will know the terms of the two items to which he makes reference?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am making a statement which will be reproduced in Hansard, and that I think is a sufficient record of what I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. Knowles: I merely meant, did the Prime Minister have the former No. 10 and the former No. 28?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I have not; because the draft that had been shown to the deputy minister—and there was only one copy of that draft, to the best of the knowledge of the deputy minister, that went to anyone in the Department of National Defence—remained in the possession of the deputy minister only up to the time that he handed it back when he got the signed report. The information he has given me is information from his recollection of what took place, because he did not have the first draft before him when that information was given for me to the Acting Minister of National Defence. But I understand that the hon. gentleman has the original draft, and he can see just how No. 10 and No. 28 were phrased in the original draft.

Mr. Knowles: I will place it on the record later.

Mr. St. Laurent: On page 16, in reference to the engineering effort, the draft indicated that expenditures in 1952-53 would aggregate $250 million for construction. The deputy minister pointed out that such an expenditure in 1952-53 was larger than that contemplated for all three services, army, navy and air force combined, and that these figures had reference to the construction plan approved in 1952-53 that would take several years to complete. There was some change in the language referring to page 16, but, as I read it, it still gives the impression that $250 million was in the program to be carried out in 1952-53.

On the same page it was pointed out that the departmental estimates of the investment in plant and buildings of the army would more closely approximate $750 million than $950 million, and apparently in the final report as signed it is the figure of $750 million which appears.

The best information the deputy minister has is that there was only one copy of this draft delivered to anyone in the Department of National Defence, and that copy was returned to Mr. Currie's representatives when they delivered the signed report, and had remained in the possession of the deputy minister in the meantime. That would seem to indicate that the copy which is in the possession of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could not have come from the Department of National Defence.

In order that no suspicion may rest of anything underhanded about this having been possible, perhaps the hon. member would enlighten the house as to when and how this copy came into his possession. I can assure him that inquiries are still being made on our behalf, but perhaps the hon. gentleman would have no objection to putting an end to these inquiries by himself giving to the house information in that regard.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With regard to the request the Prime Minister made at the conclusion of his remarks, may I say that I will consult the leader of this group, who received this document, and if he authorizes me to say anything further in regard to how it came into his possession, I will do so at the first opportunity. But may I now direct two questions to the Prime Minister, arising out of the statement that he has made? Can he say whether the deputy minister showed the draft report to the chief of the general staff or to anyone else in the department or in the service before making these comments to Mr. Currie's representatives? Also, can he say whether there was any discussion of the wording on page 17 of the report?

Mr. St. Laurent: My information is there was no discussion on the wording of page 17 of the report, and my information is that the deputy minister did discuss one aspect—I do not know whether he showed him the draft or not—with the adjutant general, having to do with his impression at that time that investigations had been started by the adjutant general's department into these irregularities before the receipt of this anonymous letter. The information I got was that the representatives of Mr. Currie were asked to see the adjutant general to ascertain whether or not an investigation by the department had been started before the receipt of the anonymous letter. Whether the draft was discussed with the chief of the general staff or not I am not in a position to say. I can make the inquiry and find out. The hon. member knows that all this difficulty at Petawawa had to do with a period antedating the appointment of the present chief of general staff to that position. It had occurred at a time when General Foulkes was the chief of general staff. I am not suggesting that there should be any responsibility for that situation resting on General Foulkes. I know that since the outbreak of the Korean war, and the coming into force of the North Atlantic treaty, General Foulkes had been obliged to be out of the country conferring with our allies for a large part of the time, and that practically his whole attention had to be given to the making up of the Korean contingents, and to the negotiation with our North Atlantic treaty allies. And it was for that reason that some months ago—and I will find out what date it was—the chief of general staff was appointed who would have more time to devote to the matters that had to be dealt with here at home.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Prime Minister permit me one other question? Is it a general practice to refer reports which are made on a particular administration to the heads of that administration before the report is presented?
