House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable W. Ross Macdonald

Thursday, November 20, 1952

SEVENTH SESSION—TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued earlier this day met again at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Romuald Bourque, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Outremont-St. Jean, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, and Hon. Alphonse Fournier.

Lucien Cardin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Richelieu-Vercheres, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. Alcide Cote.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

You resume your labours on behalf of the Canadian people at a time of continuing international tension. Nevertheless, because of the steadfast resistance of our Canadian forces and their comrades in arms to aggression in Korea and because of the increasing strength of the forces of freedom in Europe, there are signs of a lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale.

My ministers are convinced that a lasting peace can be assured only so long as the combined strength of the free world continues to be built up and maintained.

The sacrifices of those directly involved in the United Nations police action in Korea and the anxieties of their families are an inevitable and most regrettable part of the price we are paying to prevent another world war.

To meet our nation's international responsibilities certain of my ministers are attending the seventh session of the general assembly of the United Nations.

Because of the continued international tension you will be asked to approve legislation providing for the continuation of the Emergency Powers Act and you will also be asked to provide for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence.

My Prime Minister and my Minister of Finance will attend a meeting of the prime ministers of the commonwealth to open in London later this month to consider important economic and monetary problems.

Her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to set June the second next as the date of her coronation.

Arrangements will be made for Canadian representation at the ceremonies and plans are being formulated for the celebration in Canada of this historic event.

Canada has been blessed this year with a record grain crop.

Our economic conditions remain favourable and the level of external trade is high. While the dangers of inflation have not disappeared, pressures have eased and it has been possible to suspend the operation of some of the anti-inflationary measures.

Under an amendment to the income tax regulations the provisions for deferred depreciation which have been in effect since April 11, 1951, will not apply to property acquired after December 31, 1952, nor to taxation years commencing after that date.

Early in 1953 negotiations will be carried on in Washington for a new international wheat agreement to replace the existing agreement which expires on July 31, next. You will be asked to consider amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

The international joint commission has issued an order of approval for the development of hydro-electric power in the international section of the St. Lawrence river.

Because of this latest step the Canadian government has informed the government of the United States it considers that the agreement made in 1941 in respect of the St. Lawrence seaway has been superseded.

Pending the establishment of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, an engineering planning staff has been set up in Montreal to begin work on detailed plans for the seaway, and the Gut dam in the river near Iroquois is now being removed.

You will be asked to make financial provision for certain improvements to Vancouver harbour and for engineering studies of that harbour and of other possible improvements to navigation on the Pacific coast. You will also be asked to make further provision for the Canso causeway, the ferry service from North Sydney to Port aux Basques and the terminal facilities at Port aux Basques, and the new ferry service between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Bar Harbor, Maine.

You will be invited to consider a measure to provide for federal co-operation with the provincial governments in the conservation of the water resources of Canada.

To give effect to recommendations made by the standing committee on banking and commerce at the last session of parliament and to extend its scope your approval will be sought for an amendment to the National Housing Act.

Provision has been made for the insertion in all federal government contracts of clauses prohibiting discrimination on the part of the contractor against any person in regard to employment because of that person's race, national origin, colour or religion.

You will be asked to consider a bill to make similar provisions in respect of employment upon or in connection with any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

A bill designed to provide greater educational opportunities for children whose fathers died as a result of war service will be placed before you.

You will also be asked to approve a bill to authorize the continuance of the Veterans Benefit Act.

Much has been accomplished since the inauguration in 1948 of the five-year national health grants program to strengthen and improve, in co-operation with the provincial governments, the health and hospital facilities available to our people. To ensure the continued expansion of this important work, my government proposes to ask you to give consideration to the extension, with certain changes, of this program of co-operation with the provincial governments.

You will have learned with regret that the library of parliament has been damaged by fire. The building must soon be vacated, and extensive reconstruction carried out, in order to guard against a repetition of this disaster. These circumstances have made the need for a national library more immediate and more pressing. My ministers have therefore taken steps to bring the library into existence with the least possible delay. A site for the building has been chosen, and you will be asked to make provision for the necessary planning and preliminary work.

At the time television broadcasting was started in Toronto and Montreal in September, the Prime Minister announced that parliament would be asked to provide for the establishment of three additional public television stations, one in the maritimes, one on the prairies and one on the Pacific coast and that active consideration was being given to the role of private enterprise in television broadcasting.

You will accordingly be asked to make provision to enable the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to establish television stations in the Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver areas. My ministers have indicated to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they are now prepared to consider applications for licences for private television broadcasting stations which may be recommended by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to serve areas which could not be served at this time by public stations, with the objective of making television as widely available throughout the country as may be feasible through appropriate co-operation between the corporation and private agencies.

A measure will be submitted designed to place the crown in substantially the same position as a private person with respect to liability for acts committed by its servants, for breach of duty arising out of the ownership or occupation of property, and for salvage claims, and also to confer upon provincial courts jurisdiction concurrent with that of the Exchequer Court of Canada to entertain certain classes of claims.

Measures respecting the payment of rural mail carriers will be submitted for your consideration.

To meet conditions resulting from the entry of the province of Newfoundland into confederation and the introduction of new methods of fishing off the Atlantic coast, a bill to revise the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act will be placed before you. You will also be asked to consider legislation to implement the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean.

A bill will be introduced to place the historic sites and monuments board of Canada on a statutory basis.

The measure to revise and consolidate the Criminal Code will be re-introduced at this session.

You will be asked to consider legislation to amend the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act to authorize companies incorporated thereunder to invest in bonds issued by the international bank for reconstruction and development.

You will also be asked to consider legislation to provide for the incorporation by parliament and for federal supervision of co-operative credit societies desiring to operate in more than one province under such legislation.

You will be asked to consider revisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act; the Food and Drugs Act; the Yukon Act; and the legislation respecting trade marks.

Other measures to be introduced will include amendments to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, the Canadian Citizenship Act, the Statistics Act, the Indian Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act, the Canada Evidence Act, the Judges Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Civil Service Insurance Act, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act and to the Territorial Lands Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for all essential services, and for national defence and the meeting of our obligations under the United Nations charter and the North Atlantic treaty, during the next fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence bless your deliberations.

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business unless and until otherwise ordered except introduction of bills and government notices of motions, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the joint librarians of parliament. —Mr. Speaker.

Report of the chief electoral officer on by-elections held on May 26 and October 6, 1952.—Mr. Speaker.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Fournier (Hull), Harris, Casselman, Knowles and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Hon. Alphonse Fournier, Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Douglas Abbott, Minister of Finance, the Hon. J. J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, and the Hon. F. G. Bradley, Secretary of State of Canada, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That William Alfred Robinson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Simcoe East, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the house having ordered that the consideration of His Excellency's speech addressed to both houses of parliament do not start until tomorrow afternoon, I move that this house do now adjourn until tomorrow at half past two, in accordance with the amendment to the standing order adopted just prior to the adjournment of the last session.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 21, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REPORTS RESPECTING ALLEGED COMBINES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report of the combines investigation commissioner in connection with an alleged combine in the distribution and the sale of bread and other bakery products in the Winnipeg area, and also the report of the combines investigation commissioner into an alleged combine in the manufacture, distribution and sale of fine papers.

(For complete list of departmental and other reports tabled, see Votes and Proceedings, No. 2, of November 21, 1952.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RETURN OF MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel it would be appropriate at this time for me to mention the fact that a member whose very grave injuries made it seem unlikely that he would return to the house is back with us this afternoon. I am sure that in this case I can speak for all members when I say that we all cherish the friendship of one of the most lovable and amiable men whom any of us know. I am sure the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) holds the affection and admiration of all members. I am certain that everyone here is very glad that he has recovered from injuries that at one time seemed extremely grave, and I am sure we are all overjoyed to see him looking as well as he does.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say that I am sure we all join with the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming back our colleague from St. John's East.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect the final report of the commission inquiring into the South Saskatchewan river scheme.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been quite as concerned about that as my hon. friend. I received from the secretary of the commission a letter dated the 19th of November, 1952, which will perhaps constitute the best answer I can give to the question the hon. member has asked me. The letter is addressed to the Prime Minister and reads as follows:

> The commissioners instructed me some time ago to make arrangements for the printing of the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project in advance of presentation of it to the government. There has been some delay in printing which is not surprising in view of the commission's decision to include considerable pertinent material in its report. A number of rather lengthy submissions to the commission are being included as an appendix to the report. This will include the submissions of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.
> I have been in touch with the department of public printing today, and although much work has already been done I am informed that completion of printing, of preparation of the necessary maps and of bookbinding cannot be counted upon until the middle of December or later. As we have noticed in the press that you are planning to attend the commonwealth conference in London, we are planning to present the report to you as soon as possible after your return.

I had been asked if I wished the government to have the report before it was made available to the public and I said that I thought not. I thought there were so many interested in this report that it would be desirable to have it ready for distribution to the public as soon as it was finally presented as the commission's report to the government.

Mr. Coldwell: Then we may expect it before the house adjourns for Christmas?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would be quite as disappointed as my hon. friend if we did not get it before Christmas because we have constantly impressed upon the commission that we are anxious to have it with the greatest possible dispatch.

TAXATION

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister advise the house if the government intends to bring in a new budget before the end of the present calendar year in order to reduce taxation to a reasonable level?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer is very simple. The government has no such intention.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

HOTEL MANAGEMENT—DEMOTION OF ROBERT PITT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received any complaints with regard to the demotion of Robert Pitt, manager of the Canadian National's Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg? Has he asked for any investigation? Have the causes of the demotion been investigated by him in any way?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have received no complaints. Having made that answer, I presume it disposes of the other two questions; but if my hon. friend presses the matter I can inquire from the officers of the Canadian National Railways—and I will—to ascertain what the position is.

PROVISION OF REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister provide sufficient reefer cars for the farmers of Prince Edward Island to transport their bumper crop of potatoes to a good market with bumper prices? We are short of reefer cars.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I think that question deserves an answer and I have come prepared to make one. Perhaps the house will bear with me while I make it. The potato crop of Prince Edward Island this year, I understand, is the best in volume for some time and the prices offered for potatoes are extremely attractive to the growers. I am very glad indeed that Prince Edward Island is in a position to benefit from these favourable circumstances.

Naturally the heavy concentrated movement of traffic from the island to the mainland creates a problem for the transportation facilities available. Canadian National Railways is faced with a very heavy requirement of refrigerator cars to handle this potato crop and, naturally, it is practically impossible for the railway management to meet all the requirements at the same time.

In co-operation with the management of Canadian National Railways it has been possible thus far to divert at least 50 refrigerator cars from Montreal to the maritime provinces every day to take care of this movement. The latest figures which I have before me indicate that, since September 1 of this year, nearly 1,500 cars of potatoes have been shipped from Prince Edward Island as against 386 in 1951. This by itself is quite an accomplishment and I feel confident that the Canadian National Railways will be able to take care of all the requirements of the potato growers during the next few months.

It must be realized, of course, that refrigerator cars are at a premium during the winter months, and as most shipments of potatoes from Prince Edward Island are destined to United States points, the problem is aggravated by the fact that many of the cars do not return to Canada as quickly as we would like them to.

I might add that the management of the Canadian National Railways has begun to receive delivery of some 15 cars per day of an order of 500 refrigerator cars.

REVISED STATUTES

INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF NEW EDITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is in a position to tell the house when the new Revised Statutes of Canada will be available.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I have nothing to add to the statement I made before the adjournment of the last session of parliament in which I stated I expected they would be available some time in the month of January or February of 1953.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. J. L. DESLIERES AND SECONDED BY MR. N. C. SCHNEIDER

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

(Translation):

Mr. J. L. Deslieres (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, it is not without some apprehension that I rise to speak in this house where so many of our great political leaders have spoken since confederation; yet, the generous sympathy shown by my colleagues gives me confidence.

May I first be permitted to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the signal honour he bestows today upon me by asking me to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the seventh session of the twenty-first parliament.

I think I can also express the gratefulness and thankfulness of all Canadians for his continuous and untiring efforts to ensure the good administration of the country.

He has not spared himself and, in the past few months, has continued to show his interest in the progress of our industrial districts. Last August, for instance, he travelled through the Saguenay-Lake St. John district and last September he visited British Columbia.

It is not surprising that, thanks to these numerous contacts with our Canadian way of life, in all its various aspects, the leader of our government should show himself to be so perfectly aware of all our problems, whenever these are brought to his attention.

Through its activity and its competence, our government has succeeded in maintaining in this country economic circumstances so favourable as to have evoked the greatest praise from the other countries of the free world. Not only do these countries think highly of Canada and of its administration, but they send their representatives to this country so that through a study of our methods they may find a solution to their own problems.

The member for Brome-Missisquoi, who has been honoured with the task of moving this address, knows that this honour is more properly borne by the people of his constituency. That is why I feel today a legitimate pride in addressing you on behalf of my constituents.

My constituency is, in a way, a reduced-scale model of Canada, in that it includes all the ethnical and economic elements which, from sea to sea, go to make up our beautiful country.

In the first place, one may find there, as everywhere else in Canada, the descendants of the two great races which have, side by side—and at times in spite of differences of views and opinion—helped build, in this land of America, a nation and civilization which it would be impossible today to confuse with any other, either in Europe or America. We owe this distinction to the mutual and constant co-operation which these two races have shown in order to create a very distinct entity called the Canadian nation.

From an economic viewpoint, one may also find in Brome-Missisquoi, on a reduced scale, all the elements of our economic life, from the different types of agriculture to the development of our natural resources and the manufacturing of finished products.

We do not claim to be able to reach the production records set in some other parts of the country, in one or the other of the different branches of economic activities. However, by virtue of that synthesis, from an economic as well as an ethnical point of view, I get the impression, when setting forth the feelings and the aspirations of the citizens of my riding, that I am speaking for all Canadians regardless of their tongue, their belief or their economic status.

(Text):

It is with great pride, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Brome-Missisquoi share with the rest of Canada the enviable position of having side by side the two great races which have been so instrumental in the tremendous progress experienced by our country since confederation.

This fact in itself is a clear indication of the good will and mutual trust existing in that part of the country which is commonly called the eastern townships. That community has always been a living example of the mutual understanding which must exist between the two great races—an example of the effort to which Canada owes its present high standing in every field of human endeavour and achievement.

Before going further with my remarks, may I extend my respects to you, Mr. Speaker, and assure you of my complete co-operation with you in the high office which you have always filled with dignity and impartiality.

(Translation):

May I now recall two losses which have affected the parliamentary world.

First, I would like to recall the memory of my predecessor whom we mourn: Henri Gosselin. His premature death is for us a deep sorrow.

Mr. Gosselin gave all his time to the welfare of his district, of his province and of his country; he remained for us a model of devotion to public service, ready to sacrifice his time and even his very health.

The House of Commons mourns also the loss of one of its oldest as well as one of its most congenial members, Joseph Henry Harris, who passed away last month. He represented the Danforth constituency in the house since 1921; all those who have had occasion, in the course of his active career, to come in contact with him have keenly felt his death, no matter what their political affiliation may be.

Since the last session, Mr. Speaker, many events have taken place on the Canadian political stage; I shall mention only the most significant ones in the national and international field.

We have been informed to our great pleasure of the appointment of the Hon. R. W. Mayhew to the post of first Canadian ambassador to Japan. The Hon. Mr. Mayhew had been Minister of Fisheries since June 11, 1948; he took part in the peace conference with Japan and twice returned to that country as the official representative of Canada. He also contributed to the drawing up of the Colombo plan. Because of his great knowledge of Asia and Asiatic affairs, as well as of the active part he generally took in the nation's business, he is particularly qualified to occupy this important post.

It gives me pleasure to congratulate the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), who was recently appointed a member of Her Majesty's privy council and Minister of Fisheries. Since 1940, the new Minister of Fisheries has contributed in more ways than one to the good administration of this country, both through his contribution to the debates of the house and in his capacity as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

I also would like to extend my congratulations to the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) who has been made a member of Her Majesty's privy council and appointed Solicitor General of Canada.

Though he is rather a newcomer on the political scene, he brings to his new duties a long experience of public life gained both through the exercise of his profession and as secretary to the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and the Hon. James Malcolm. He also distinguished himself as chairman of the national harbours board and as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence.

I refer with great pleasure to the presence in the house of the newly-elected members for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque), and Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). Both have gained an enviable reputation and will I am sure be a credit to their constituents.

Together with the other nations of the free world, all Canadians must be proud of our soldiers who are fighting so valiantly in Korea, for they stand guard and fight on the United Nations' first line of defence, not only for the immediate protection of the South Koreans, but also for the preservation of our own freedom which is under the constant threat of communist aggression.

People generally do not realize to what extent Canada's armed forces have been increased in my province.

In recent years, the Valcartier camp has become a vast and permanent area for military training.

There are already in Quebec a number of major defence establishments such as the vast stores depot at Longue Pointe, the naval supply depot at Ville La Salle, the fighter bases at Bagotville and St. Hubert, not to mention the great many radar stations, etc.

The admission centre for airmen and airwomen from all parts of Canada has been established in St. Johns.

In Quebec city, our navy has established the Montcalm school where recruits of French descent study together under French-speaking officers and instructors. The number of applicants has exceeded the school's capacity.

We have also witnessed the steady improvement of the Quebec citadel. Repairs were made with imagination and logic, so as to bring out the original characteristics of these ancient structures.

On this splendid historic site we find not only the governor general's residence, but also a whole series of military structures, so that the citadel is second to none among comparable establishments; it is the ideal headquarters, the ideal home of one of the most glorious regiments, the Royal 22nd.

Finally, last week, His Excellency the Governor General officially opened a new college, the St. Johns Royal Military College. Young Canadians from all over Canada are following its courses. A good majority of the students are French-speaking. This is the first really bilingual establishment of the kind on this side of the ocean. One may see in this gesture the acknowledgment of the importance of the French-speaking element in our confederation. This is a step forward in the field of military training in Canada. It is the recognition of the essential unity of our country.

For that initiative and the spirit which inspired their achievement, we must—and the whole province is of that opinion—congratulate very warmly the government and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton).

The people of Quebec have followed with legitimate pride the feats of arms of the Royal 22nd Regiment in Korea. These achievements and others that I could mention have given us very great satisfaction.

In the international sphere, I must draw attention to the various international conferences held in Canada, the Commonwealth Forestry Association's conference, that of the International Red Cross, held in Toronto and, finally, the conference held by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, in which we are specially interested.

It is interesting to note that nearly one hundred delegates, representing forty-eight sections of the association, accepted the invitation of the Canadian section to attend that parliamentary conference. It is also interesting to note that representatives of the United States of America and of the republic of Ireland took part in some of the debates, during that conference.

During their stay in Canada, the delegates of the commonwealth nations had the privilege of visiting Canada from coast to coast and of familiarizing themselves with our Canadian institutions.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you in your capacity as joint chairman of the Canadian section, along with all those who co-operated with you in making this meeting and this journey such outstanding successes.

There is yet another example of the high regard in which the nations of the world hold Canada and its representatives, and that is the election of Mr. Pearson as president of the general assembly of the United Nations Organization.

It might be well to recall that the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will attend at the end of this month, in London, a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers which has been called to discuss ways and means of solving the monetary troubles of Great Britain.

From a national point of view, Mr. Speaker, it is only fair to mention the numerous advantages which accrue every day to every Canadian through the health assistance plan put into effect by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Recognizing the value of our human resources, the Canadian government has promoted the extension of health and hospital facilities, the multiplication of the number of hospital beds, by providing the provinces with considerable sums for this very purpose, these grants running into several million dollars.

It has given this help, not by substituting itself for the provinces, but on the contrary, with their co-operation, by acting jointly with them in the implementation of this great undertaking.

In announcing some of the bills to be brought down, the governor general has proved beyond doubt the great concern shown by the government for the preservation of the high standard of living enjoyed by our people, as well as for the consideration which should be given to all classes of our people. Incidentally, the government's intention of improving the rural mail carrier's lot should receive the unanimous support of all members of this house.

In pursuance of the Massey commission's report, and following the assistance given to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the universities approved by the provinces, the act respecting the establishment of a national library will receive without any doubt the support of all Canadians, who see in the implementation of such a project a measure which meets the intellectual and cultural needs of our nation.

In this connection, may I mention the justified tribute which was rendered, last September, by the academic world of Canada to Quebec's Laval university, on the occasion of its centenary, thus recognizing this university's contribution to the intellectual development of our country.

The bill concerning the St. Lawrence seaway bears witness to the industrial and economic expansion of our country. This vast project, which will make the very centre of the North American continent accessible from every ocean, will tighten the geographic links which exist with the other free countries, whose peoples are already morally won over to the Canadian ideal.

Because of all this, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, C.H., Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Text):

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to express my appreciation and thanks to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for his kindness in giving to me the honour and distinction of seconding the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The senior honour of moving the address in reply quite properly goes to my friend the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres). I have been a Canadian for the past one hundred and seven years; my hon. friend has been a Canadian for the past three hundred years or more. I wish to extend to him my compliments on his excellent speech and to express my admiration for his fluency in both French and English. My hon. friend is the mayor of Sutton, Quebec; he is a wonderful example of a good Canadian, and I envy him his proficiency in both languages.

In my province of Ontario there is definitely a new and better understanding of our fellow Canadians in Quebec and other French-speaking areas. A good part of this improved bon accord is due to our love and respect for our Prime Minister. I have not heard one word of criticism of our Prime Minister; on the contrary, I hear many words of praise for his abilities as a leader and as a promoter of national unity.

I wish to express the thanks of our people of Waterloo North for the honour bestowed upon us in the selection of our former representative in this house for the office of lieutenant governor of Ontario. Hon. Louis O. Breithaupt will justify this selection and his name will be added to the list of native sons who have brought honour to our riding, including our late prime minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The William Lyon Mackenzie King memorial home "Woodside" on Spring street in Kitchener has been completely rebuilt and furnished with many of the original pieces from the King home. The boyhood home of one of our greatest Canadians is now preserved as a national memorial and is open to visitors.

The county of Waterloo was settled by the Pennsylvania Dutch in the year 1799, almost two hundred years after Champlain founded the city of Quebec. Our people by their industry, thrift and integrity have built an agricultural and industrial community second to none in Canada. This year the county of Waterloo held a centennial celebration of the founding of the county with an excellent pageant in our beautiful Waterloo city park, showing the coming of the Dutch to the northern part of the county and of the Scottish to the southern part, followed by the English, Irish and Germans. Whatever they may have been at one time, they are now Canadians all. The war loan drives and dominion savings bonds drives have demonstrated their thrift in the following results: The grand total of victory loan bonds sold in Waterloo North was $256,729,000; for Canada savings bonds the total was $12,923,000. May I tell the house that we are the kind of people who do not worry about a surplus but who would worry ourselves sick about a deficit.

While it is true that our citizens of the Mennonite and Amish religions claim exemption from military service, they bought their share of war bonds amounting to a half million dollars with the stipulation that they would accept no interest whatever. Another half million dollars was subscribed in bonds bearing the Red Cross stamp which indicated that the money was to be used for humanitarian purposes. It is also significant that the national revenue department has recently opened a new district income tax office in Kitchener.

Recruiting for active service in Waterloo North has always been excellent and, in spite of poor quarters, our four militia units carry on an active training program. Our largest and oldest unit is the 54th light anti-aircraft battery, formerly the Scots Fusiliers of Canada. Their barracks is the sixth floor of an office building and they are working under difficulties. The 24th field ambulance is quartered in an old abandoned post office, while the 48th field squadron of engineers and the No. 3 transport company of the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps are quartered in a drill hall and other temporary wooden structures at Knollwood Park, which were used for army training in the last war. A navy unit is being organized by a group of naval veterans and a proper armoury is really needed for these five services. The enthusiasm and loyalty of these experienced officers and men should be encouraged. With the present substantial and necessary defence expenditure, we are at present not pressing with the department our claim for an armoury. We have been assured that when the present emergency passes, consideration will be given to providing a suitable armoury for Waterloo North, but I do suggest that there will be a real advantage to the government in increased defence activity as soon as the armoury is built.

Our young men are also air-minded and the Waterloo-Wellington airport is the home of the Waterloo-Wellington flying club with 250 members and an active unit of the Royal Canadian Air Force Association. Air cadets and air force association members from Kitchener, Waterloo, Guelph, Galt, Preston and Hespeler also use this airport, and we are grateful for the government assistance which made this airport possible.

A river conservation and flood control program is proceeding in the valley of the Grand river. A small control dam has been built in the Luther marsh and a large dam has been built above the town of Fergus. Preliminary surveys and tests have been made for an additional conservation dam on the Conestogo river in Waterloo North at Glenallan. This will complete this phase of the Grand river plan. We note that the government proposes to place assistance for projects of this kind on a more permanent basis.

Our people in Waterloo North have struck a happy balance between agriculture and industry. A tour through the riding with its well cultivated rolling farm lands and the good appearance of its large barns and neatly kept homes gives evidence of the fertility of the soil, the steady-going industry and thrift of the farmers, and the care and good management by their ladies. Two large meat packing houses and several smaller plants provide a good domestic and export market for the large production of livestock. Mixed farming is the rule, and we never have a general crop failure. Manufacturing is highly diversified in the cities of Kitchener and Waterloo and the town of Elmira. Kitchener has 158 industries employing 16,000 people and producing rubber goods, leather, food products, furniture, shoes, felt, textiles, twine and machinery to the value of $138¼ million in 1951. Waterloo is recognized as a great insurance and manufacturing centre, and Elmira has taken a leading place in the production of clothing, machinery and chemicals.

Our people engaged in agriculture take this opportunity to express their thanks to the Department of Agriculture under the leadership of Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner and to his capable and hard-working staff. When the hoof-and-mouth epidemic struck and all export trade was stopped by embargoes a very serious situation arose in the problem of the disposal of the large surplus of meats. The placing of floor prices under livestock products definitely saved that industry from certain ruin. The total cost of the foot-and-mouth epidemic to the country has been unofficially estimated at $30 million. Without the floor prices and the government support buying, livestock prices could have dropped to 15 cents or even 10 cents instead of holding at 25 cents and 26 cents. This could have resulted in a loss of up to $200 million to the producers. After observing the prolonged difficulties of other countries with foot-and-mouth disease, in some cases for four or five years, we are indeed fortunate in having it cleaned up so quickly.

The interests of the people of Waterloo North are not confined entirely to trade and commerce. For the past twenty years the city of Waterloo has held an annual band festival which has steadily developed in size and popularity under the leadership of Professor Charles F. Thiele, Waterloo bandmaster, recently retired. This June we had sixty-nine bands in attendance from all parts of Canada. The audience varies from twenty to twenty-five thousand each year. This year three additional musical productions were presented in the beautiful new memorial auditorium in Kitchener. The Salvation Army presented a mass band concert by nineteen bands to a full house. An audience of 6,000 attended a mass male choir concert by 500 singers in nineteen choirs from Canada and the United States. The interest of the youth of Kitchener was demonstrated last week when a small club in the Y.M.C.A. organized and produced a concert presenting the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and three world-famed artists to an audience of 7,000 people.

I wish to express my thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for the public address system installed in this chamber during the summer recess. As a backbencher, seated in a corner where it has been exceptionally hard to hear, my deskmate and I have been very discouraged at times. It was a surprising but common occurrence to have to learn from Hansard of an important statement made in the house while we were present. We are very grateful and hope the public address system is a success in every way. As a new and inexperienced member, may I be permitted to express the hope that this system may never be called upon to transmit anything but constructive and helpful speech. With the reduced hours announced by the special committee on house procedure we should, as members, make every effort to expedite the work of the house by avoiding unnecessary wear and tear on this equipment.

In the speech from the throne we are reminded that there is a continuing international tension, but because of the increasing strength of the forces of freedom in Europe there are signs of lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale. This optimistic outlook is very good, but I am sure most Canadians are in agreement with the policy of the government in proposing legislation providing for continuation of the Emergency Powers Act. I believe most Canadians have now recognized the regrettable fact that the only safeguard we have against a possible third world war is military preparedness.

While I am on the subject I would like to say a few words to our rocking chair critics of defence spending. I spent some time in military service. It was under the Conservative government in the first great war. In contrast with my business training I was shocked at the wastage of food and the poor management of what I would call the business of the army. I am not criticizing the Conservative government particularly for the wastage I saw. Soldiers are trained to destroy the enemy. That is their main interest and purpose. Parliament agrees that a strong military force is our only salvation.

Recently a few newspapers have been using figures on the purchase of stores and clothing for our armed forces in a way which misrepresents the facts. They try to suggest excessive purchases of clothing, by the device of dividing quantities purchased by the number of personnel in the active forces.

To start with, as those who use these figures know or should know, clothing is also provided for the reserve forces and cadets whose numbers are more than equal to those of the active force. Moreover, they know or should know that certain items are being stockpiled against a possible emergency. They know or should know that in calculating requirements of clothing or barrack stores there are additional factors to be taken into account such as sizing, distribution, lead time, and so forth. All these facts and factors were put before the defence expenditure committee, yet the campaign of misrepresentation goes on. They also fail to recognize the scale on which purchases must be made to provide for a defence program as large as ours, coupled sometimes with a reluctance to see our servicemen provided with the kind of amenities available to the average Canadian.

As a businessman I feel that defence expenditures should be no higher than is necessary for any emergency which might arise and I have full confidence in the army and the Department of National Defence. We have not forgotten the serious shortages of practically everything when we entered the second world war.

I feel that the following sentence in the opening remarks of the speech from the throne should be emphasized and brought home to every Canadian:

> The sacrifices of those directly involved in the United Nations police action in Korea and the anxieties of their families are an inevitable and most regrettable part of the price we are paying to prevent another world war.

[Mr. Schneider.]

The termination of deferred depreciation on December 31 of this year will be a welcome step toward the relief of hard-pressed business in these times of excessive high operating costs. In operation since April 11, 1951, it has been an anti-inflationary measure and has effected its purpose. As a businessman I hope that this is the first of many such concessions toward an easier burden on business and taxpayers generally.

The insertion of a clause to prohibit discrimination against any person in regard to employment on any federal contract will be welcomed by all true Canadians. Discrimination regarding race, national origin, colour or religion must never be tolerated in Canada. This can happen in Canada, as was proved in my riding in the first world war where many new Canadians were denied their vote even though they had lived most of their lives here and had sons in the Canadian army in the trenches in France.

Regarding consideration of the extension of the program of co-operation with the provincial governments in health and hospital facilities, evidently the intention is to carry on and complete the program outlined by our former prime minister, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, in his speech on May 14, 1948. What further facilities are to be considered I do not know, but let us keep in mind that the Liberal government has already invested over $150 million of federal funds in hospitals and health measures in the provincial field, and Liberal governments have a good record for finishing anything they start.

One matter regarding health services I feel I must speak on is the means test at present imposed on the $40 per month pension paid to our blind under the present act. The blind are less able to supplement their pensions than persons over 70 years of age, who are not subject to the means test. The act at present stipulates that the pensioner's total income must not exceed $840 per year for a single person or $1,320 for a married person. These figures are considerably less than our Income Tax Act expects normal people to live on, namely $2,000 per year for a married couple and $1,000 for a single person. Application of the means test to blind persons as at present merely discourages them from helping themselves. They cannot participate in normal recreation or labour. Many who have found congenial occupation would rather work full time than be bored doing nothing. After studying this matter fully I hope the house will agree that the means test as applied to the blind is outdated and unfair.

The proposal to extend television by establishing additional broadcasting stations at Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver is according to plan, and we are glad to note that applications for private licences may be considered when recommended by the C.B.C. to serve areas which cannot be served by public stations. Observing the mistakes which have been made in other countries, Canadians are anxious that this service be held under full control. It is my conviction that with 90 per cent of the people of Canada using radio receiving sets, it is now reasonable that we should discontinue the $2.50 licence fee per home and put the costs in the general tax.

It has not been my privilege to be in the house for any length of time—only a matter of a few weeks—and I hope that what I have said, or what I am about to say, will not be misconstrued, coming as it does from one who is not yet familiar with procedure in the house. As a businessman accustomed to quick decision and action I have been disappointed in the amount of time spent on debate on matters that could surely be settled much quicker without risk of making a mistake. The right to express our opinions is the assured privilege of everyone in the house, but I feel that we should also consider the serious loss of time to all members when we are forced to listen to endless repetition and quotations.

We are a growing country and parliament will have to grow with it in such a manner that we can dispose of the increased business smoothly and efficiently. This is a shortcoming of parliament; but I think in fairness to the Canadian people I ought to conclude by referring to the steadily growing pride among our people in the clean, honest government we have enjoyed in Canada. Much has been said about this but I think the Ottawa Journal of August 27, 1952, put it in a few words when they said on this point:

> To the eternal credit of our public men no man in this country today dares to rise and say, or can say with truth, that a single cent of the billions spent was diverted to a private pocket from its proper channel.
> For our democracy, whatever its shortcomings, that is a glory.

Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in seconding the motion by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres).

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 24, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE MINISTRY

APPOINTMENT OF ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table order in council P.C. 4553 passed this day, which reads as follows:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence and under and by virtue of the powers conferred by section 5 of the National Defence Act, is pleased to designate and doth hereby designate the Solicitor General of Canada as a person who, in addition to the Minister of National Defence, may exercise any power or perform any duty or function that is vested in or that may be exercised or performed by the Minister of National Defence under the National Defence Act, provided that such exercise of power or performance of duty or function shall not depart from the manner in which the Minister of National Defence may have previously determined that such power should be exercised or such duty or function should be performed.

Hon. members will have noticed that legislation was forecast in the speech from the throne to provide for an Associate Minister of National Defence. Provision is made in existing legislation for associate ministers in time of war, but no provision now exists for an appointment in peacetime. The government might of course have made such provision under the Emergency Powers Act, but it was felt preferable to ask parliament to make the provision in regular statute form, and if that is done it is my intention, which I have already communicated to the Governor General, to submit to him a formal recommendation for the appointment to this post of the present Solicitor General. Meanwhile it was felt desirable to use the power vested in the governor in council by parliament under section 5 of the National Defence Act to empower the Solicitor General to perform the function, which would, in due course, be attributed to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

The Solicitor General was, until he became a member of the ministry, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, and there is a real need not only for continuity but for the assumption of an increased share of responsibility for the heavy burden of that department. This is particularly desirable at this time as it is going to be necessary during the course of this session for the Minister of National Defence to attend a meeting of the North Atlantic council in Paris, and while he is absent the Solicitor General will be Acting Minister of National Defence, and it is important that he should have adequate background in the meantime.

As hon. members know, a number of countries at the present time have, in addition to an over-all minister of defence, a minister for each of the three services. That is the situation in the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Australia. We have, however, considered it preferable in Canada to stress the unification of the services for purposes of administration under the control of a single minister, a single deputy minister and a single department. We believe that our system has demonstrable advantages and that the appointment of separate service ministers at this time would be a retrograde step.

As the defence program developed, it might have been expected that the volume of work required of the minister would have become lighter. That has not been the case. Unfortunately the prolonging of the conflict in Korea, the build-up of our forces in Europe, and our relations with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, as well as greatly increasing the responsibilities of administering the department, have also made it necessary for the minister to be absent from the country from time to time.

That is why the Minister of National Defence and I have, for some time, been considering the possibility of making some division of the work of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the developments I have mentioned, we came to the conclusion that it is desirable here, for the time being at least, to have an associate minister as a full member of the cabinet who would participate, with ministerial authority and responsibility, in the supervision of the more immediate matters of administration which would leave the Minister of National Defence with more time for matters of general policy consideration of defence planning and relations with the defence forces of other countries.

No attempt has been made in the order in council I have read to delimit precisely the functions of the two ministers, and it is probable that no attempt will be made to do so in the legislation to be submitted later in the session. Obviously, a relationship of this sort can only be successful if there is the completest mutual confidence and co-operation between the ministers, and there is every advantage in having the arrangement as flexible as possible.

It is intended that the present arrangement under section 5 of the National Defence Act will be continued until such time as the house has had an opportunity to consider the legislation to be introduced to provide for an Associate Minister of National Defence, under that designation.

COINAGE

ORDER IN COUNCIL GOVERNING MINTING OF FIVE-CENT PIECE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table two copies of order in council P.C. 4525 dated November 19, 1952, revoking the amendment passed under the Emergency Powers Act authorizing the minting of the five-cent coin of steel. Perhaps I might add that that order is being passed concurrently with the orders under the new Currency Act which provide for minting new coins with the effigy of our new sovereign, Queen Elizabeth II. Proclamations to that effect are today or tomorrow being issued concurrently in London, Ottawa, and other capitals of the commonwealth.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

FORMULA FOR CALCULATION OF ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS DURING 1953

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since I do not expect to be in the house for some little time after today I should like to make a statement regarding the proposed amendment to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Hon. members will recall that during the last session legislation was approved extending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to cover the calendar years 1952 and 1953. This legislation was brought forward by the government because of the continuing special difficulties of the industry as a result of rising costs and a fixed price for the industry's product.

During 1952 the industry's costs have continued to rise. At the same time the appreciation in the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has meant that for most of the year the mines have received a steadily decreasing return from their sales. A number of mines have been forced to close and others are being placed in a position where they might soon be compelled to take this step. During the last month the government has received representations from both the gold producers and the municipal authorities of the principal communities affected setting forth the special difficulties which face the industry at this time. The government has now decided that, in order to prevent the further closing of mines and the consequent hardship which this would cause to communities largely or wholly dependent on them, adjustments should be made to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act with a view to assisting the industry in meeting the special difficulties with which it is confronted.

In view of the desirability of giving advance notice of the conditions upon which gold mining assistance will be paid during 1953 in order that the industry may be able to plan its operations for the new year, I desire to announce that the government has now decided to introduce legislation amending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act effective as from January 1 next. The proposed amendment will broaden the formula for the calculation of assistance payments during the calendar year 1953 by changing the method of calculating the rate of assistance element in the formula. The act in its present form defines the rate of assistance as one-half of the excess of the cost of production per ounce over $22, with a maximum of $11.50. The proposed amendment will change the definition of the rate of assistance to one-half the excess of the cost of production per ounce over $18, with a maximum of $13.50. No change will be made in the other component of the formula; the new rate of assistance will be applicable to the number of ounces of gold produced by a mine in 1953 in excess of one-half of base year production, or one-half of 1953 production, whichever is the larger.

All I need add at this moment is that this modification in our gold assistance formula has been discussed with the international monetary fund, which has raised no objection. In conclusion, may I express the belief that this proposal will be of further assistance to the industry generally in meeting its special difficulties, and will enable the continued operation of many mines in communities which are dependent upon them.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Finance to clarify one or two points in connection with his statement. First, is it clear there is no provision for the industry in 1952?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: Has any progress been made toward raising the prices at which gold may be sold to the United States or other world buyers?

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend is aware, that is a matter which really does not depend on the policy of the government.

Mr. Graydon: Could you not make it apply this year?

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-1948—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

PROVISION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, CREED OR COLOUR

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to promote fair employment practices in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WHEAT

QUOTAS FOR DELIVERIES—PROSPECTS FOR MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with increasing the quotas for wheat deliveries in the prairie provinces. I should like to ask him, too, what the prospects are for the marketing of the wheat that was in storage, not only in the line elevators but also the terminal elevators, so as to make room for wheat that is lying out in the fields.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was kind enough to give me notice of his question.

Hon. members are aware of the very real storage and transportation problems which have been created by the size of this year's crops. The latest estimate by the dominion bureau of statistics indicates that 664 million bushels of wheat alone will be harvested in western Canada. The ten-year average 1940-50 western wheat crop was 350 million, so really we have almost two crops in one. It must be remembered, also, that perhaps 285 million bushels of grain were harvested this spring from last year's crop.

In spite of the scope of the problem, however, I am pleased to be able to advise the house that substantial progress is being made. The Canadian wheat board started out the crop year with a delivery quota for new crop wheat of 5 bushels per acre, and announced that this quota would be increased as circumstances permitted. Today there are only 264 delivery points still on the 5 bushel quota; 913 points are on an 8 bushel quota; 377 on a 10 bushel quota; 178 on a 12 bushel quota; and 349 on a 15 bushel quota.

As is customary at this time of the year, the Canadian wheat board has been concentrating on a short-haul program to move the greatest possible quantity of grain to the lakehead before the close of navigation. This has tended to favour Manitoba and certain Saskatchewan points. After December 1, however, the board and the railways will be able to concentrate on the points which have the lowest delivery quotas and a policy of "equalization" will be followed. In view of the comparatively small number of points still on a five-bushel quota, it will not take a great number of cars to relieve the situation at those points and I am confident that the month of December will see a still further reduction, and I think a substantial one, in the number of points still on the lowest quota.

Producers' marketings to date of all grains total 310 million bushels as compared with 265 million last year. The board advises me that there are good prospects that a total of 400 million will be achieved by the end of December. That will represent, I think, very substantial progress even considering the quantities still to come.

Shipments from country points to date total 245 million bushels as compared with 210 million for the period last year, and a heavy movement continues. It is expected that approximately 40 million bushels space will be available at the lakehead at the close of navigation. In general, once that space is filled, and once storage becomes congested, further deliveries depend on sales. In this respect I am pleased to be able to advise the house that the volume of sales of wheat, oats and barley by the Canadian wheat board to date has been gratifying. The board has made very heavy sales commitments, which in turn will be reflected in heavy internal movement. Exports to date are well ahead of last year when, hon. members will remember, a new record was set.

Answering the latter part of the question by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I would say that a steady movement of grain from the farm to elevators will be continued, but the physical size of the problem must be kept in mind at all times. The board has announced, however, that for the winter period at least the policy will be not to raise quotas over 15 bushels at any delivery point. In that way, every opportunity will be given to raise the points with lower quotas until they all reach that figure, which must be regarded as the maximum for the time being.

LOSS TO PRODUCERS FROM INCREASED VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): In view of the statement which the Minister of Finance has just made concerning the gold mining industry, I would ask the minister if he would give the same consideration to the wheat producers that he has indicated will be given to the gold mining industry, owing to the loss which wheat producers are suffering as a result of the increased value of the Canadian dollar.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The minister gives similar consideration to all groups of Canadians.

Mr. Fleming: And does very little for them.

QUESTION AS TO EXTENSION OF STORAGE FACILITIES AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question of which I have sent him notice. In view of the increasing difficulties of storing and transportation of grain in western Canada already indicated in a former question, is it the intention of the government to make immediate provision preparatory to the extension of storage space at the port of Churchill?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps that question should be directed to the Minister of Transport.

[Mr. Howe.]

However, I may say that the government is aware of the desirability of additional storage at the port of Churchill. Consideration will be given to the problem at such time as building conditions at that port return to normal.

HOGS

QUESTION AS TO FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Can the Minister of Agriculture say whether the $23 floor price for hogs, as announced on September 30 last, will be put into effect as of January 1, 1953?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the intention.

FIRE

DAMAGE TO TOFINO AIR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Can the minister give the house any information concerning the fire at the R.C.A.F. station at Tofino last week, and the reason for the censorship and monitoring of conversations over the government telephones which followed that occurrence?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): A fire occurred at the mobile equipment building at Tofino, Mr. Speaker, on the morning of November 22. The cause of the fire is still unknown, but is being investigated. There was no censorship of any kind.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

QUESTION AS TO REPEAL OF FORMER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? I am addressing it to him in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the Prime Minister say when the former Old Age Pensions Act will be repealed so that provinces like Manitoba, which are pressing needy pensioners to make repayment and which are still making recoveries out of the estates of deceased pensioners, can discontinue this practice?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not want to be unduly critical, Mr. Speaker, but during the last session I understood your ruling had been that questions should not be put to convey information, as seems to be the case here. The matter of repealing the Old Age Pensions Act is one about which there is correspondence between this government and the provincial governments. As that correspondence is being conducted on our behalf by the Department of National Health and Welfare, perhaps the parliamentary assistant would be able to tell the hon. gentleman just what stage it has reached at this time.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I want to thank the member for Winnipeg North Centre for giving notice of this question. A similar question was answered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on June 24, page 3610 of Hansard, and on June 27 last, page 3833 of Hansard. It is the intention of the government to proclaim the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act as soon as there is agreement from the provinces which co-sponsored this act that this should be done. Not all of the provinces have yet agreed on the desirability of repeal at this time, but it is hoped that agreement will be reached shortly so that the necessary proclamation can be made.

Mr. Knowles: Would the parliamentary assistant permit a supplementary question? Can he say which of the provinces have not yet agreed to that repeal?

Mr. McCusker: No, I do not propose to say.

PRISONERS OF WAR

MALTREATMENT AWARDS TO THOSE IN GERMAN CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Prime Minister say whether consideration is being given to the granting of maltreatment awards to Canadians who endured undue suffering in German prisoner-of-war camps, similar to the awards being made to those who were in Japanese hands during world war II?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There was a statement handed to the press on October 10 to the effect that the government is anxious that there be no delay in the payment of what may be described as automatic awards. Those arise out of the recommendations of the Ilsley report covering Canadians who were held in Japanese-operated internment or prison camps or in the hands of certain German organizations such as the gestapo and declared by the Nuremberg tribunal to be criminal organizations.

If the hon. gentleman wishes to have a copy of the order in council on which this statement was based, I will see that one is sent to him.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that the members of this house will all warmly welcome the reference in the speech from the throne to the coronation of Her Majesty the Queen on June 2 next. At a time of great uncertainty and rapidly changing conditions throughout the world, this historic event will symbolize, not only for us but for all mankind, the long continuity of this particular form of democracy which is the cherished possession of Canadians and all the nations of the commonwealth. For us and for others the crown is a symbol of stability in this very unstable world.

We all remember as well the charm, spirit and vigour with which our new queen carried out her many duties during the time that she visited Canada only a few months ago with her gallant husband. The tragic death of her father, who sacrificed his life in the service of his people, brings to the throne a young woman, trained for her great responsibilities, and expressing both in her private and her public life those traditions of decency and human understanding which have preserved our monarchy through all the storms of recent years. As we look forward to the reign of the second Elizabeth, which will likely extend well beyond the lives of most of us here today, I feel sure that there is in the heart and mind of every one of us the earnest hope that the spirit of adventure and great achievement which distinguished the reign of the first Elizabeth may be renewed and may bring glory and renown to this new Elizabethan era.

In the speech from the throne there are several statements which will meet with general approval. I would particularly mention the announcement that it is the intention of the government to insert in all government contracts a provision that there must be no discrimination in employment because of race, national origin, colour or religion. I also welcome the announcement that legislation dealing with this subject will be introduced and that it will deal with all employment under the authority of the dominion government.

I am glad that the government has seen fit to act upon the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), when she introduced a bill calling for legislative action of this kind. I must say that it is a hopeful sign that the government has acted upon this important suggestion coming from a member of the opposition.

We all recognize that the speech from the throne is in fact prepared by the government. For that reason, every statement it contains is open to question and should be questioned if its intention is not clear.

We are told that "there are signs of a lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale". I believe that the government will be performing its duty to this house and to the people of Canada by giving us the facts upon which such a statement is based. I believe that the government is in fact under an obligation to the members of this house and to the people of Canada to give us those facts. The need for this information is emphasized by the fact that it was only last Friday when the distinguished secretary of state for the United States made a speech in Ottawa, in which he appeared to say the very opposite. He was, of course, speaking for his own country when he said that there was great danger in the fact that people were being lulled into a false sense of security. Of necessity, however, his remarks apply with equal force to Canada. Every Canadian, and particularly those who have husbands, sons, brothers, relatives or close friends serving in Korea or elsewhere outside of Canada, would welcome this assurance if it is well founded, and all Canadians would be glad to know that such a statement is justified.

Because it has already been so freely interpreted in the press and elsewhere as an indication that there may be reason for lessening our defence efforts, I believe it is of supreme importance that the government leave no doubt about the facts on which this statement is based and also clearly indicate the inference that is to be drawn from this statement. I say that because every hon. member of this house will have read interpretations of that statement in the speech from the throne which convey the impression that it is a preliminary to an announcement that it would be possible to diminish our defence preparation. I recognize that the government is not responsible for such interpretations as may be placed upon any statement by the press of this country; but nevertheless I suggest that, since responsible newspapers have placed this interpretation upon it, it will be helpful if we are given further information.

We meet, in fact, at a time of increasing international tension. The decision to protect Southern Korea from communist aggression was a great milestone in the long struggle to preserve peace and freedom by collective action. Heavy though the sacrifices have been, those who look to the free nations for protection have had their hopes and confidence sustained. It is likely that the firm stand of the western nations in Korea has removed doubts which otherwise might have led the men in the Kremlin to engage in dangerous adventures which could only result in a general war.

While Korea has drawn unexpectedly large forces from different parts of the world, and mainly from the United States, to hold a line which approximates the division which existed since the second world war between North and South Korea, the entry of China into that struggle has also engaged the activity of most of their well-trained troops who might otherwise have been embarking on further acts of aggression elsewhere.

A great principle has been upheld. The moral convictions of the western nations have been demonstrated. The communists have been left in no doubt as to the superior quality of the weapons and the military equipment produced by the western nations. On the other hand, this has been both a training ground and a testing ground for both Russia and China. Without sacrificing any of their own men in a war for which they are responsible, the rulers of Russia have gained useful information with regard to the fighting equipment with which they have supplied the Chinese and have been improving their own armament production as a result of that experience.

This has resulted in the re-equipment of the Russian divisions in Germany and eastern Europe with more modern weapons and machines of war so that the Russian divisions, which present a constant threat to western Europe, are much more powerful from a military point of view than they were at the outbreak of the war in Korea.

Thus the danger is greater if for any reason Russia should decide to embark on a war of aggression. It would be dangerous for anyone to assume, and it would be very wrong for anyone with direct knowledge of the situation to convey the impression, that the land forces of the Atlantic pact community have yet reached the point where they would have any chance at this time of withstanding a major offensive by the immense Russian forces and satellite divisions now deployed throughout eastern Europe.

While the danger has increased, the hope of peace has also increased. That may seem like an anomaly but I suggest that the two go hand in hand. That hope could always be shattered at any moment by any rash decision, such as that which was made by Hitler in 1939. There are, however, two reasons of great importance why Stalin may not follow the same course, particularly when he remembers what happened to the man whose friendship he embraced in 1939 when he signed an agreement in terms of blood with Hitler in August of that year.

First is the fact that Stalin and the Russian leaders know that every city in Russia is within bombing range of bombs far more deadly and destructive than those which terminated the war with Japan in a matter of days. Russian armies might move forward, but their bases of supply would be destroyed and armies would become mere masses of hungry, fighting men, forced to prey upon the countryside. It would be a terrible prospect for the countries invaded by Russian armies, but it would be an equally terrible prospect for the people of Russia, and above all for the communist leaders, whose survival depends upon their ability to maintain organized military power.

The Russians suffered terrible losses in men and material against an enemy which possessed neither the aircraft nor the bombs to inflict even one-thousandth of the destruction which would now desolate the whole of Russia if they should be so unwise as to precipitate a holocaust of that kind. It would be a terrible war for the West, but it would be more terrible for the East. As long as Stalin and his associates retain any measure of sanity, the dreadful consequences of aggression may stay their hand.

The other reason that there is hope lies in the fact that Russia has achieved so much without war that she may still hope to achieve the objective of world domination, and the objective is nothing less, by the breaking apart of the nations of the free world. Unfortunately, there are unhappy indications that they are not without some reason to hope that this may happen at some time.

On either of these grounds there is hope for peace if the strength of the free nations is built up so rapidly and so effectively that even without the atom bomb, or any other bomb, Russia would not dare aggression. The hope of peace, however, is not based upon any lessening danger, but rather upon the increased danger of prospects so terrifying that the Russians themselves would not be prepared to accept the consequences of starting such a war.

Canadians are I am sure all ready to pay the taxes that are really necessary to defend our freedom. In spite of every argument that has been placed before the government, in this house and outside, the government still continues, however, not only to impose extremely heavy taxation, but also to overtax the people far above the amount actually authorized by parliament. Only last Friday it was announced that with certain reductions the surplus to the end of the last month amounted to $287,932,000. This amounts to nearly $20 in overtaxation for every man, woman and child in Canada. It means $100 for the head of a family of five in overtaxation, over and above the heavy taxes our people are already called upon to pay.

The government continues to refer to this surplus as though it were something in the nature of a surplus earned by a business of some kind and did in fact reflect some measure of business efficiency. A surplus earned by a producer is indeed a sign of good business. But this surplus does not come from production of that kind. It comes from the pockets of the taxpayers and from no other source. Every cent of that means overtaxation above and beyond taxes which the people already find far too heavy. It is no answer to say that surpluses of that kind are used to reduce debt. Certainly, if the government decides that it is a good thing to reduce debt, let them say so, and let them place before this house their estimate of the debts they propose to reduce; but if it is not the intention of the government to do this, then the government has no right to deliberately overtax for the purpose of finding money to reduce taxation if that in fact is their intention.

Apart from overtaxation, there is the heavy weight of taxation which many Canadians do not believe to be necessary for the real business of the country. The moment this statement is made there are those who immediately say "Well, do you want to cut down defence spending, or are you suggesting that you curtail social services?" That is a tawdry and time-worn attempt to divert attention from the real suggestion that has been made in this house over and over again. No one is suggesting the cutting down of social services. They are part of the social development of this country. Every party has supported them. To suggest that they are peculiarly the product of one party is an insult to the parliament of Canada and to the provincial parliaments within whose field of jurisdiction most of these subjects lie, and is also a cynical misrepresentation of the facts. In the 85 years since Canada became a nation the two major parties which have shared the responsibility of government for almost exactly the same number of years have each in turn interpreted the changing trend of social development and with the support of parliament have given effect to the will of the people. No responsible individual has suggested that we turn the clock back on the social development which has taken place in all democratic countries in closely related periods of advancement.

There is not a member of this house, however, who is not well aware of a number of places where savings could be made without reducing a single social service, or any other essential service of the dominion government.

One argument that is put forward is that the extent of our fixed obligations limits the possibility of economies. That, however, completely ignores the fact that there may be duplicating activity or costly overlapping between the dominion and provincial governments which afford the possibility of very great saving in the handling of those services without any reduction in the services themselves. We must always remember that the estimates of the cost of services include the very large sums which are required for the handling of the payments and that the amounts paid, either in the way of interest payments on debts or payments by way of social services, are far below the total figures given. It is within that field of administrative costs that great savings can be made by adjustment of responsibilities between the dominion and provincial governments and by a reorganization on a businesslike basis, which will expedite the business of the country and produce great savings.

It will be recalled that on numerous occasions we have presented a motion calling for an inquiry into the organization of the departments of government by a commission or committee made up of experts, including the highly competent civil servants who would be available for that task. It has been pointed out that a similar commission in the United States, under ex-president Hoover, made recommendations which it was estimated would have resulted in the saving of $5 billion a year. That was not related to waste or extravagance. It was related to the efficient and businesslike organization of government. It has been pointed out that on a proportionate basis if similar recommendations were made here it would result in a saving of anywhere up to $500 million a year. I know that this figure has been challenged, and it has been suggested that no such figure could be saved at any time. But even if $200 million or even $100 million could be saved, that in itself would be a tremendous saving, and it would also give evidence that the government was really trying to do the business of the country on a sound basis; and that would have a great effect on the attitude of our people to such taxation as may be necessary for defence and other purposes. In voting against that proposal the government has been voting against the kind of examination which every large business would insist upon having from time to time, if it expected to remain solvent.

When it comes to waste and extravagance I find statements made from time to time that every example of waste and extravagance is immediately dealt with. I think it would be well for us just to look at some typical examples furnished by the Department of National Defence. Since that department is now spending nearly half of the total budget approved by this parliament, it is the department of government which must be most critically examined to determine the extent to which any real attempt is being made to establish businesslike methods and prevent extravagance and waste.

Some very revealing figures have been published recently which indicated how little real effort has been made to bring defence expenditures under any clearly planned supervision. In the last few weeks articles have been appearing throughout Canada in some of the most responsible of Canadian newspapers, analysing facts and figures in regard to defence purchases, which are a challenge to every member of the house. They are the result of an examination of the reports of the government in regard to defence purchases. They are written by reporters whose high reputation is known to every member of parliament. Just let me refer to a few of the examples given.

Since these have appeared throughout the whole of Canada, they are the kind of examples which it would seem necessary for us to examine. During a single ten-month period orders for boots and shoes for the armed forces totalled $15,292,241. Even at the very high estimate of $15 a pair, which would indeed be a high cost for service footwear, this would mean more than one million pair of shoes for 100,000 members of the armed forces. The suggestion that orders of this kind are necessary for the reserves simply does not hold water, because plenty of shoes have been available for the reserve army for some years. Orders are still being placed, and are now well above 1,300,000.

During the last session it was found that orders have been placed for 1,150,000 neckties. Not satisfied with this incredible accumulation of neckwear, orders are still being placed for more neckties. One might well wonder what particular military service these additional ties are supposed to perform.

Then there was the remarkable order for 62,000 large serving forks, three for every five men in uniform. As a result of the publicity directed toward this remarkable piece of extravagance, it was finally scaled down by different stages to 14,500, which some people would think would be a fairly adequate supply of service forks of that kind, particularly when one remembers that these figures include a great many people who were having their meals in their own establishments.

Then there was the very interesting order for 29,630 large aluminum teapots. These are one-and-one-half imperial quart aluminum teapots, which are bought in bulk at $2.97 each. One cannot help wondering if the habits of the Canadian armed forces have changed in recent years.

Since November 20, 1950, it is stated that clothing orders alone have amounted to some $142,150,000. The total strength of the three armed services just exceeds 100,000, which works out to approximately $1,400 for every member of the three services. That is not, of course, the amount which has been spent to provide uniforms for each of the members, because the department did estimate that the average cost of the kit of a soldier, sailor or airman is about $390. That seems high enough in itself, but the figures also show that orders are out of all relation to the number of those now in the services, or for the target figure of 115,000 which has been set for 1954.

As an example of how some of these orders are made up there is the fact that 15,000 raincoats have been ordered for the Canadian Women's Army Corps. We are told that there are six C.W.A.C. officers on full-time duty. Then, of course, it was explained to us the other day that the reserve is being kept in mind in the placing of these orders. Even if in this instance it was the reserve they had in mind, there are just over 900 officers and other ranks in the reserve. This does seem a fairly generous supply of raincoats.

Orders for rugs seem to be on a similarly free and easy basis. In less than two years the Department of National Defence has ordered $839,903 of rugs and carpets, which would provide approximately one square yard of rug or carpet for every two members of the active service.

We are still waiting to hear the details about the disappearance of the railway siding at Petawawa, as well as the theft of carload lots of refrigerators, stoves and other equipment. We are still waiting to hear details of the thefts which occurred in camps right across Canada during the past year.

Now, I do not know that it has any relationship to these disappearances, but there is one interesting item, a single entry, in one list under the heading "packaging of plumbing fixtures" at a cost of $147,232.

These are only a few of the figures which demonstrate the kind of extravagance which has been unchecked by any action of this government. When I say "unchecked", let it be remembered that, although the evidence that was made available to the committee which sat last spring was fairly limited, it was pointed out that this order for teapots was out of all reason; but by the time it was discovered the order had already been filled. These items are small, perhaps, in themselves, or from the standpoint of over-all expenditure; but they demonstrate beyond question that any system of supervision which permits this sort of thing is a system under which many millions of dollars can be wasted.

The suggestion that these matters were dealt with by the report of the special committee on defence expenditure is hardly worthy of any member of this house. The fact is that the opportunities for examination by that committee were severely limited. An opportunity to examine into the thefts at Petawawa was rigidly denied. But what is more important is the fact, which every member of this house knows but the public perhaps does not generally know, that the only report which can be presented is the majority report; and it should be remembered that the minority even brought in its report and excluded its members from any whitewash in regard to these inquiries which had been conducted.

This government has largely destroyed the effectiveness of the committee system established by this parliament for the examination of government expenditure, by permitting and in fact encouraging the use of a majority of government supporters on those committees to deny any real opportunity to conduct effective inquiries.

There should be an inquiry and it should be started immediately—not some time several months from now, but within the next few days, or certainly within the next two weeks. But this house has learned that there can be no assurance of a real inquiry under a committee of the house appointed by the present government. If the government really want an inquiry, then let them appoint a committee with powers similar to those of the special committee appointed last year, and make it a joint Senate and House committee. If they will do that and appoint Senator Crerar as the chairman of that committee, or some other senator who has demonstrated the kind of impartiality that he demonstrated, then the report of such a committee would enable the broadest information such as would be extremely valuable to the house, to parliament and to the people of Canada.

Nor is it in defence expenditures alone that it is possible to effect economies. The standing committee on finance of the Senate of Canada presented a report on June 23 last in which there are positive recommendations for a reduction in expenditure. And before we are told again that there is no evidence that any saving can be effected, may I suggest that any member who has that thought in mind might re-read the report of the standing committee on finance of the Senate of Canada, and see what is contained in that report.

As this report is available to the members of the House of Commons, I shall do no more than to refer to the fact that the committee made a positive finding that the practices in regard to the handling of public expenditure for buildings, rental and similar requirements of the different departments of government could "have no other effect than duplication and overlapping and the inevitable general increasing in costs that is bound to result from this practice". At a time when such enormous sums are being spent for such vital purposes, there is the double need of a measure of supervision of both defence and non-defence expenditures for which there is no provision at this time. It is because of the impartiality of the Senate committee's report, to which I have referred, that I have suggested the name of Senator Crerar.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the names of members of the other place should be brought into debate in this house.

Mr. Knowles: Let them rest in peace.

Mr. Drew: I now refer to the statement in the speech from the throne with respect to television.

Mr. Pouliot: Why not suggest Arthur Meighen?

Mr. Drew: I cannot imagine a better appointee, and I think it would be an excellent demonstration of the impartiality of the government if it were to follow the same course as did the government of the United States and appoint the leader of another party, who has served in the highest office on another occasion, to this very high task.

Mr. Cruickshank: We will give you a job some day.

Mr. Drew: I now wish to speak about television, which is mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Cruickshank: You do well there.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Fleming: Here comes the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann).

Mr. Drew: The subject is one which it will be possible to discuss in detail when the bill comes before the house to interpret in statutory form the statement in the speech from the throne. However, I think it is appropriate at this point to mention two aspects of the announcement. On different occasions, when it has been urged that the government should take action with regard to some aspects of broadcasting or television, we have been told that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was an independent commission and that the government would not think of deciding how it should conduct its affairs. Nevertheless the speech from the throne explains that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did indicate on an earlier occasion in Montreal that there were to be new television outlets and that it is as a result of that statement that we are now to be presented with legislation to carry forward that announcement. That does raise a question in our minds because, if the statement in the speech from the throne is correct, the answer that has been given on earlier occasions hardly seems to be consistent with the relationship expressed on this occasion.

The other point I would mention is that we now have an announcement that television stations are to be established in Winnipeg, Vancouver and Halifax. That still leaves a very large part of Canada without the opportunity for television and in somewhat vague terms it is stated that the applications of private television stations will be considered in those areas. The words used in the speech from the throne seem to leave no other interpretation than that there are to be no licences granted for private television stations in those cities which now have C.B.C. stations or those which are to have them. That means that we are to be denied the advantages of competitive stations which would greatly improve television broadcasting in this country, and it also suggests that the C.B.C. proposes to retain a monopoly in television in those areas which they regard as the most advantageous from the commercial point of view.

This is strangely inconsistent with the decision made just two weeks ago by the government of the United Kingdom which still retains a monopoly over broadcasting such as we have never had in Canada but which has decided that there is a difference between ordinary broadcasting and television and as a result is going to permit competitive private television stations to operate in the British Isles. I wish to recall to hon. members the explanation given just before we adjourned in the early summer as to why this government was resisting private television broadcasting. It was explained that we did not want the kind of television broadcasts they have in the United States and that the purpose of the system envisaged for Canada was to protect our people from that kind of television broadcasting.

For that reason I was surprised to learn a little later that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had established a very expensive microwave relay system to Buffalo so that it could pipe in the very United States television broadcasts against which we were told they were going to protect us. Actually we are not getting those broadcasts because the United States producers refuse to give bargain rates to the C.B.C. for their television broadcasts. Consequently the source of great Canadian programs in Buffalo is still dry and the microwave relay is not operating although it has been erected at considerable expense.

The restrictive practices of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with regard to television, Mr. Speaker, have denied to most of the people of Canada the opportunity to see television for some years to come. We still have the extraordinary situation that taxpayers in distant parts of Canada are being called upon to pay taxes so that the people of Toronto and Montreal can enjoy television, if they in fact do. Moreover, there is also the fact that even with the new places where television will be broadcast it will leave fairly limited fields covered by the publicly-owned system, and again we will find that the distant taxpayers will be paying their money to provide television for five large cities in Canada.

If private television operators had been permitted to proceed through the experimental stages these places would all have been receiving television by now without a single cent of expense on the part of Canadian taxpayers. I submit that this is a good time for the government to review its course since it has indicated the close relationship that exists between the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on this subject.

In answer to the claim that there is great need for reduced taxation, particularly with respect to income taxes on small income—and this relates to television as to all other public expenditures—we are told that never was the average of wages so high as it is today in Canada. That may be true, but it is what the government leaves in the hands of the wage earner in the form of savings that counts and not merely the figure of total earnings. The present level of taxation, direct and indirect, is creating widespread hardship and discouraging initiative and thrift in a great many cases in Canada today.

I now wish to refer to the conference which is to take place in London later this month. I hope that members of the house will be given some information as to the intentions of the government with respect to that conference. It may well be that it will be one of the most important meetings of its kind that has ever taken place. From statements that have been made in Canada as well as in the capitals of the other nations of the commonwealth it is clear that trade and the possibility of expanding commonwealth trade is to be one of the subjects for discussion. The speech from the throne gives no indication of the course which the government proposes to follow. I agree, without any hesitation, that it might well be argued by the government that except for the definite statement that it is the intention of the government to do everything possible to revive and expand trade within the commonwealth, there could be reasons for not making any definite statement at this time in anticipation of the conference itself. I think that argument might well appeal under ordinary circumstances. The fact remains, however, that definite statements have been made by members of the government and also by anonymous spokesmen, and those statements have been fully reported in the press.

Canada's negative intentions at the coming conference have been stated on numerous occasions. They were stated by a member of the government recently in a speech in New York. The spokesman for the government on that occasion, announcing policy in the United States, did not however indicate what the Canadian government intends to do. He informed the people of the United States, and through the press the people of Canada, that the government was not going to do certain definite things. There have been repeated reports also that Canada is going to insist upon Britain taking certain steps to improve their position before Canada can make any effective arrangements with them. In fact, statements have appeared in the press within the last few days which indicate an attitude which hardly seems appropriate at this time when we are seeking arrangements which will make it possible to sell our agricultural and other food surpluses in Britain. This is not just a case of Britain finding out how to buy; it is a case of our finding out how to sell; and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has been very careful to emphasize that on different occasions recently.

I am sure that Canadians would be indignant, and I cannot imagine anyone would be more indignant than members of this government, if anyone in Britain presumed to tell the Canadian government how it should mend its ways before they could do business with us.

Before we presume to tell the government of Britain how it should conduct its affairs, it would seem appropriate that our own position should be examined. Undoubtedly there are things to be done in Britain, and from what I have seen they do not hesitate to admit it. They know, as we know, that it is essential that they speed up the date of delivery of heavy machinery, that they live up to their commitments for delivery dates, that they maintain a larger supply of essential spare parts here in Canada than has been the practice in the past, and that other problems which have interfered with sales should be carefully examined and solved. In large measure those difficulties have been due to the reconstruction of damaged buildings and machinery in Britain, along with the necessity of transforming their industrial production, which has been almost entirely devoted to the needs of war, back to the requirements of peace. Sometimes there are those who seem to forget that no nation engaged in the last war had so completely transformed its industrial production to war purposes as Great Britain, and that does not except Germany. They had a tremendous task of transformation and then, before that transformation was completed, the armament brought about by events in Korea and elsewhere imposed further strains upon their system. There is evidence, and convincing evidence, that they are getting over the hump and that they will be able to tackle these problems satisfactorily.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, before we adopt any such holier-than-thou attitude, such as has been expressed in some statements recently appearing in the press, we should examine our own position. Let us remember that every cent of overtaxation or unnecessary taxation is added to the cost of the things that we produce or sell at home or abroad. Let us remember also that to the extent that there has been inflation in this country that inflation has affected the cost of our production in terms of the money with which it must be bought abroad. Let us also recognize that every cent of waste and extravagance is also added to the cost of our products. Thus, high taxation, extravagance, waste and inflation are not only a serious burden upon our own people, but they very greatly affect our ability to sell some of the things which we need to sell to maintain the prosperity of our farmers and some of our other basic producers.

We are told of our mounting exports in terms of dollars. At a time when the United States, Britain and other countries need so much of our raw material for defence requirements, there has been no difficulty in selling those raw materials abroad. That is particularly true in the case of the United States, which has nearly exhausted many of its own supplies of raw material and must look abroad for the basic requirements of its industrial production in many cases.

Because of their stockpiling and other requirements, Britain has been buying increasing quantities in dollar value, but at the same time it has been necessary for them to stop buying food products for which they have been our stable market for generations.

In every part of Canada farmers are feeling the direct effect of the loss of our British market for bacon and other pork products. In every part of Canada our farmers are feeling the effect of the loss of our markets for beef products abroad. For the first time in considerably over 100 years we are selling no cheese to Britain, with serious consequence for our cheese industry in Canada. We are selling practically no poultry products, no milk products and no apples. We are, in fact, selling little of our surplus farm production to Britain except wheat and flour.

For some time we have been urging this government to take the initiative in calling a commonwealth conference to discuss this aspect of our trade. On occasion after occasion we have presented motions calling for the government to take the initiative in bringing together such a conference. The government has flatly refused to consider that suggestion. Now at this late date, when farmers all over Canada are feeling the impact of this loss of agricultural markets, representatives of the government are attending a conference not called at the initiative of Canada but called together by the government of Great Britain. That conference is going to be of vital importance to every Canadian but it is going to be of the utmost importance to the farmers and other food producers of this country.

Nor is it only the farmers who are concerned. For the first time in generations not a tin of Canadian salmon is being sold in Britain. Demands for our lumber are falling off. No matter what raw materials we may sell for defence or other requirements, that is not going to put money into the pockets of the Canadian farmer or other basic producer at this time who is feeling the pinch because of the loss of those markets.

Not long ago I went into a shop in London to buy a tin of salmon. The tin bore the name "Socra", which naturally immediately brought to one's mind the name "Sockeye", which is a great commercial salmon on the Pacific coast. That tin bearing the name

"Socra" came from Russia. It is a rather interesting thing that "Socra" spelled backwards is "Arcos". Arcos is the name of a trading organization which was expelled from Britain just before the war for its treacherous activities. It may be just an accident, but it would indeed be a remarkable thing if the letters transposed in that way had such an interesting similarity to the name of a company with a background of that kind.

In saying this, may I emphasize the fact that the people of Britain do not welcome this substitution of Russian products for our own. There are many people in Britain who are refusing to buy any of these Russian products although they may be the only products of the kind available in many cases. Our problem, as I have pointed out before, is to find a way to sell just as their problem is to find how they can buy.

Even in the face of this situation in regard to food products, and particularly the tremendous production of grain to which reference has already been made this afternoon, the government speaks with different voices at different times. Confronted with the largest wheat crop and the largest carry-over for many years, the attitude of some members of the government seems to be one of light optimism—not shared by the Minister of Agriculture, who is very directly associated with this problem.

As recently as October 27, the Minister of Agriculture had this to say about the situation, and I quote the words attributed to him by the Canadian Press:

> In this country we now have 900 million bushels of wheat. At the outside, the whole world takes 900 million bushels in one year in international trade. There is also a considerable carry-over in the United States. Long before the crop is marketed our people will be wishing we had another four-year contract with Britain to take 400 million bushels of our wheat.

In the centre of the great wheat-growing area of Canada, the Minister of Agriculture did not minimize the danger of our position unless we are able to re-open our markets for wheat as well as for other food products.

While I am speaking of the position created by the enormous carry-over of wheat this year, there is one point which should be mentioned, and which undoubtedly is affected by statements made this afternoon. Farmers are finding it impossible in many cases to deliver their grain to the market, we are informed, no matter what steps are being taken. The whole system of handling and distribution has broken down. The government, no matter what its explanation may be, has failed to take effective steps to provide for the handling of grain, in spite of the knowledge many months ago, and the warnings many months ago, that this situation was going to arise. In western Canada today there are many farmers, with huge quantities of wheat and other grains worth considerable sums of money, who are unable to get money at this time to cover their harvesting and living expenses because of their inability to deliver that grain to market.

This is a situation with which the government should deal immediately. It is urgent and calls for attention without delay. It must be remembered, however, that this is an incident of the whole situation which has arisen as a result of the failure of the government to take steps in time to assure markets for our surplus food products, of which the government was amply warned. It was asked to take the initiative in finding ways to sell these products, but it turned down our proposals every time they were presented.

I have been discussing this subject on different occasions, and I have left no doubt that I hope that every possible step will be taken at this conference to re-open and expand our trade with Britain, the commonwealth and the sterling areas. I have used the expression that the government of Canada should do all within its power to remove the roadblock which is preventing the normal movement of trade between Canada, Great Britain, the other nations of the commonwealth and the sterling area generally. I have stated in this house on earlier occasions that our objective must be a free interchangeability of currencies, which will make it possible to carry out trading arrangements in the way in which we always did in the past.

I could not help noticing the light, flippant way in which that suggestion was dealt with by certain members of the government. The other day in the press I saw, emanating from those anonymous but well informed sources, indications that the representatives of the government are going to seek that measure of interchangeability when they arrive at London. We do not know, of course, because names are never attached to these statements made on behalf of the government, such as that to which I referred.

I have read statements by the members of the government brushing this suggestion aside, and seeking to convey the impression that I was urging restrictive practices. There is no truth whatever in that suggestion. I am sure that those who have made it are fully aware of that fact. I have been urging the freeing of trade from the restrictions imposed by our inability to deal in the ordinary way with the currencies of the commonwealth and the sterling area generally.

I have been careful to point out that there is no easy answer. But I would further point out that what I have said has also been said by the governor of the Bank of England, and that there is now a very strong movement on the part of those associated with the international monetary fund to find some way of dealing freely with the currencies which must be used if we are to get back to normal trading.

In emphasizing the vital importance of the British and commonwealth markets for food and other basic products, I am resting my arguments entirely upon the legitimate self-interest of Canadians. I rest my case in no way upon sentimental grounds. In normal times the United States produces most of the things that we produce in the way of food and other products which we have been selling for so long to the United Kingdom. They grow the same things, and usually have a surplus for export themselves, just as the Minister of Agriculture has indicated they have a surplus of wheat this year. That means that our agricultural prosperity rests upon overseas markets, and the main market abroad is Great Britain. Their position as consumers of agricultural products is unique. Fifty million people live in a country which is only able to produce half of its food requirements at the same standard of living as we are accustomed to here. I make that reservation because they are producing more than 50 per cent of their food requirements on the present restricted level. That means that there are 25 million people to be fed by imported foods. Situated as we are on the shortest route across the north Atlantic, we have an unchallenged advantage in dealing with Britain so long as we do not overload our producers with taxes, extravagance and inflation.

There is another reason why we should do all within our power to revive and expand not only the British commonwealth markets but also the large sterling markets throughout the world. Because of the tremendous quantity of raw materials that we are shipping to the United States, we are now exporting in dollar value approximately 80 per cent of all our exports to one country. We have put nearly all our eggs in one basket. In a large measure we have placed ourselves in a position of economic dependence upon the United States which is not healthy either for us or for them.

Our real sovereignty and full authority over our own affairs as a nation will depend in very large measure on the extent to which the Canadian government succeeds in re-opening the commonwealth and sterling markets so that our trade is better balanced, and we have some freedom of action in the event of economic storms in the United States or action at any time by their government which might interrupt the flow of our exports. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate any intention on the part of the government to take appropriate action in pursuance of this great need. Perhaps we will hear this afternoon of some information in regard to this, and I am sure that most hon. members would welcome that information.

May I say also one word in connection with our trade with Britain which I cannot refrain from saying in view of some of the statements I have seen in publications in the United States, and sometimes in this country as well. I see gloomy predictions that Britain cannot surmount these present difficulties. I even see statements that Britain is through as a great world power. I see statements that the British are slow and stodgy, without imagination. I cannot help recalling that just a few weeks ago I saw some of the fastest aircraft in the world flying over the skies of Britain in simulated air attacks and air defence of the British Isles, which were reminiscent of the days of the battle of Britain. I cannot help remembering that a Canberra jet made in Britain crossed the Atlantic in three hours and twenty minutes, nor can I forget that not very long ago a very gallant gentleman sped across a Scottish lake in a British-made motorboat at more than 200 miles an hour. The same gentleman had also driven a British-made automobile at well over 400 miles an hour, which is still the world's record for speed on land. These are not just accidents; these are not just stunts. They are the product of industrial genius, technical skill, great imagination and individual vigour. I can only say to those who make gloomy predictions, such as some of those I have seen, that this is no time to sell Great Britain short.

There is also nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate any intention on the part of the dominion government to take appropriate action in pursuance of its frequently repeated promises to prepare for a national health insurance program.

In its submission to the dominion-provincial conference which met in Ottawa in August 1945, the dominion government emphasized the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over hospitalization, except military hospitalization, and placed tentative proposals before the provincial governments for their consideration.

Neither then, nor at any time since then, has the dominion government made any serious attempt to carry forward the discussions and inquiries which are absolutely necessary before any plan could be agreed upon between the dominion and provincial governments.

It would be most improper for the dominion government to leave the impression that it could proceed with any national health insurance program without the most extensive inquiry to ascertain the basic facts upon which any sound approach to this problem must depend.

The problem of meeting the cost of medical care is now one of the most serious problems confronting individuals, as well as provincial and municipal authorities who must accept responsibility in many cases where the patients are unable to pay the cost of hospitalization and medical treatment.

Since the dominion government submitted its proposals to the provinces in 1945 the situation has changed very greatly. Hospital and other medical costs have risen by leaps and bounds. If it were not for the unselfish service of Canadian doctors in every community many patients simply would not get medical treatment at all at this time. Let it be said to the everlasting credit of the doctors of this country that there are few cases on record where any patient has failed to receive medical attention because of his inability to pay for the services of a doctor. But the present situation is imposing a tremendous burden upon the doctors, upon the provincial authorities and particularly upon the municipal authorities.

There can be no satisfactory solution of this complex problem until there is a thorough examination of the costs of medical care, hospitalization and other aspects of diagnostic, preventive, surgical and medical care. In 1945 the representatives of this government left no doubt that in their opinion extensive inquiries were necessary before this subject could be tackled. If such an inquiry was necessary then, it is far more necessary today, with the increasing complexity of this problem. It has become doubly necessary because of the increasing invasion of the provincial and municipal tax fields by the dominion government. For that reason there should be general agreement that the first and necessary step in dealing with this subject is to institute an inquiry which would be conducted by representatives of the medical profession, the hospital boards, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments. It is not sufficient to get recommendations from those governments that care to forward them. This is a subject in which all the cost must be considered jointly. The sooner such an inquiry is started the sooner it will be possible to discuss this problem with some knowledge of the essential facts. Without such an inquiry this problem cannot be tackled in a satisfactory manner. There would be no satisfactory basis for agreement between the dominion, provincial and municipal authorities, and agreement in that respect is absolutely necessary.

The dominion government is long in default in proceeding with such an inquiry. I hope there will be no suggestion that this subject could be dealt with without an inquiry of that kind in view of the earlier insistence by this government that such an inquiry was necessary and that it was because of the need of that inquiry that they could not proceed at that time to discuss some aspects of their proposals. Whatever method is to be adopted, one thing is certain. Some method must be found to assure proper diagnostic, surgical and medical treatment in every case which requires it.

On one point let us be very definite. We want no state medicine in Canada. The free relationship of the doctor to the patient must be preserved. In this, as in other matters, we must make a definite decision. Either we believe in freedom or we believe in supreme state authority. There is state medicine in Russia. There is state medicine in every communist country. State medicine has also been adopted by some countries which are far from communist. Most of them, however, have learned by sad experience that it is an unsatisfactory system both for the doctors and for the patients. As we believe in freedom, let us preserve the freedom of our doctors and the freedom of our patients under a system which will meet the cost of medical care in a free society which is really free.

Now I wish to deal with a subject which is directly related to what I have been saying about medical care. Perhaps the most important question for Canadians to decide in the field of domestic affairs is the constitutional relationship between the dominion, provincial and municipal governments and the way in which they are going to be able to carry out their responsibilities under the Canadian constitution. I mention the municipalities for this reason. Although it is true that the municipalities are legally emanations of the provincial legislatures, the fact remains that because of the serious plight in which many municipalities now find themselves, these municipalities are seeking direct assistance of different kinds from the dominion government, as the collector of most of our taxes and the place where so much revenue has been accumulated that it is not available in the ordinary way in the required quantities by the other levels of government.

This parliament and Canadians generally must give immediate consideration to the question as to whether this country is to continue as a federal state, or whether it is to become a unitary state with one central government. I hope no one in this House of Commons will brush aside a statement of that kind because in this case I am simply quoting a statement made by a man who served in this government on an earlier occasion and who I know commands the respect and admiration of many members of this government. That warning that I have just given, namely, that we must decide whether we are going to continue as a federal state or as a unitary state, was placed before a gathering of lawyers at Dalhousie university law school a month ago by the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia. I mention his words particularly, because they came from the head of a provincial government who once served as a member of the present dominion government. In a careful legal analysis of the trends towards centralization, he made it clear that the issue now before us is not the adequacy of any contributions by the dominion government in lieu of taxes, but that the real and the inescapable issue is whether, in fact, our federal system is to survive. He pointed out that this is a subject which was under consideration at an earlier date. There were those who thought that Canada should become a unitary state in 1867. The decision reached at that time was that Canadian unity demanded a federal system with its division of authority and the existence of local governments which would have jurisdiction over those matters of traditional local concern which meant so much to the people of the different provinces who were then seeking to find common ground for national unity.

There is no reason why anyone who believes in a unitary state should not argue in support of that contention today, if that is the belief of any Canadian. There are those of us who believe that neither our historic background nor the area of this country makes a unitary state suitable for Canada. On the other hand, those who believe in that system have every right to assert it. They should assert it openly, however, and not seek to change our federal system by stealth. Let no one be uncertain about the fact that this question is now squarely before us. I again repeat the words of Mr. Macdonald, not only because he has served both with this government and with a provincial government, but also because it cannot be charged that his views are based on political opposition to this government. He has stated the case in these simple words:

> A fundamental question now arises—it is this: do we wish to continue as a federal state?

[Mr. Drew.]

This warning comes from a man who knows the minds of many of the members of this government from long daily contact with them. It is with that knowledge and with that experience that he poses a question that he says must now be answered by all Canadians, unless continuing centralization is to produce a unitary state in Canada, no matter what it may be called.

There has been some tendency on the part of members of this government to leave the impression that the signing of temporary agreements with provincial governments, under which their most important tax fields are given up in return for annual payments, in some way disposes of this question. It does nothing of the kind.

Whe the Ontario government recently signed an agreement, which it was emphasized was a temporary agreement, the premier of that province made it clear that this did nothing to solve the fundamental question which has now been under discussion for ten years. He made it clear that the agreement was merely a stopgap and that it is the duty of the dominion government to take the steps that are necessary to re-allocate sources of revenue so that the provincial governments and the municipalities will be able to meet their increasing obligations from financial resources under their own control. The government of Nova Scotia has also signed an agreement. The premier of that province, however, leaves no doubt that in his opinion that does not dispose of the basic issue which must be dealt with right away. Other provincial premiers have taken the same position, although their governments have also signed temporary agreements.

As we consider this subject, which is of such vital importance to the future of Canada, it is therefore necessary for us to bear in mind that when the government of Quebec is so insistent in its demand that the federal system be respected, the government of Quebec is not alone in that demand, nor is it alone in the opinion that our federal system is in jeopardy, unless we reverse the present trend toward centralization.

There is no reference in the speech from the throne to any suggested meeting between the dominion and the provincial governments to discuss this subject. I am directing my arguments, therefore, to the proposition that it is essential for the dominion government to take immediate steps to review this situation, if it does in fact believe in the federal system and is not deliberately seeking to replace that system by a unitary state, in fact if not in name.

This is far from being the first occasion when this subject has been under discussion, and I have no doubt that there may be some impatience in the minds of some members of the government to hear it raised again. The possibility that the wartime agreements under which the dominion government took over taxing powers in return for payments to the provinces might weaken our federal system was raised when the dominion government first proposed those agreements in 1942. It happened that I took part in some of those discussions so far as they affected the province of Ontario and I know that there never would have been any agreement with the Ontario government if there had not been a firm and unqualified promise by the dominion government at that time that these were only temporary agreements for the duration of the war and that within one year after the termination of hostilities the revenue position of the provinces would be restored and their taxing powers returned undiminished to them.

The question before this house is, therefore, not merely the survival of our federal system, but the extent to which the government is prepared to honour an undertaking which it has never denied, and in fact which it admitted when we met in conference some years ago.

It is worthy of comment at this point that in Australia, where similar agreements were made between the federal and state governments at about the same time with the same promise, the taxing powers of the six states in Australia were fully restored this year. The government of Australia did not treat their promise as a mere scrap of paper.

When the dominion-provincial conference met in 1945, on the first day of that conference this subject came up for discussion and I propose to quote from what I said on August 6, 1945, to indicate that the arguments I put forward then are the arguments that I am prepared to repeat on behalf of the party which I have the honour to lead. I quote what was said at that time:

> Not only because of the very practical considerations in our own country which are as real today as they were in 1867, but also because of sound arguments which can be advanced in support of decentralization of authority, the strength of the provincial legislatures and their governments within their own clearly defined jurisdiction should be maintained.
> If we accept the proposition that the provincial legislatures are to continue to exist as responsible bodies with full legislative powers over their own defined fields of legislation, then those legislatures must have real and not merely nominal powers. The power to legislate and to govern rests upon the power to raise funds by taxation.
> Any arrangement which provided for a centralized collection of the greater part of the tax requirements of provincial governments and made them mere annuitants of the central government would place the provincial governments under the control of the central government to an extent that meetings of the members of the legislature would become almost meaningless because of the limitations within which they would be called upon to legislate. If the provincial legislatures are to continue as free and responsible legislative bodies within the conception of the British North America Act, then it would seem clear that the provincial governments must have authority over their own taxation within clearly defined fields.

That was the position I took in 1945, speaking as the head of the government of the province of Ontario. It was the position I had taken earlier in 1942 as leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature when I was consulted by the then premier of Ontario, and it is the position I take today on behalf of the party that I lead.

At a later meeting of the dominion-provincial conference on January 8, 1946, I said this:

> If the provincial governments, and in turn the provincial legislatures, were to abandon their most important sources of direct taxation in return for an annual payment on a fixed basis, they would place themselves in a legislative straitjacket from which they could only escape by abandoning still further powers in return for added payments at some date in the future.
> If the provincial governments placed themselves in such a position that they were only able to expand their activity with the approval of the dominion government, they would become little more than local administrative commissions of the dominion government, and the provincial legislatures would cease to possess anything but the form of administrative responsibility.

Today that situation has in very large measure already arisen. In many cases the provincial governments have quite frankly stated to the municipalities, which are exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, that under the fixed arrangements which now exist they are unable to assist them. For that reason municipalities have turned to the dominion government and are seeking grants of one kind and another, which should be available to them either from their own revenues or from the provincial governments. Nothing could more effectively destroy the whole structure of our federal system than that the municipalities which are incorporated and receive all their authority from the provincial legislatures should become dependent upon the dominion government and in doing so be under the direction and control of the dominion government. That would, in fact, be the last nail in the coffin of our federal system.

No matter what arguments might be put forward in any other country in support of a unitary system, and it perhaps should be noted that there is no country even half the size of Canada anywhere else in the world which does operate under a unitary system, the fact remains that in this country there are special reasons why we must respect, in all its integrity, the federal system which was defined for this country by the British North America Act in 1867. Surely no one will argue today that the unity of this country within the boundary of one nation would ever have occurred if it had not been that there was the absolute assurance of the preservation of the local rights and customs in the different provinces of Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec.

Again I emphasize that none of these views is being expressed for the first time today. The fact that they have been repeated so often, however, merely emphasizes the need for immediate action by this government to carry out the promise it made in 1942. Ten years have passed since that unqualified promise was given. This is what I said as the premier of Ontario, speaking to the elected representatives of the people of Ontario in the legislature of that province on April 1, 1947, as reported in the Hansard records of that day:

> There are good reasons why the province of Quebec attaches special importance to the provisions of the British North America Act and is less likely to accept substantial changes which are made without the consent of that province and without adequate compensating protection, if any of their established rights are to be diminished. With good reason Quebec looks to the British North America Act as their guarantee of their own civil law, of their customs, of their language and religion . . .

I would recall that those are words spoken in the Ontario legislature considerably over five years ago.

May I point out that the premier of Quebec is not alone in expressing his concern about centralized power in Canada. The premier of Nova Scotia, the premier of Ontario and premiers of other provinces have also warned that, unless we change our course, we are in danger of drifting into a unitary state.

I hope I need not emphasize that this is no mere academic discussion of our constitution. The rapidly increasing trend toward centralization of taxing powers has greatly weakened the position of the provincial and municipal governments. In 1939 from every tax dollar, collected at all levels of government, the dominion government took 51 per cent, the provincial governments 19 per cent and the municipal governments 30 per cent. But last year the dominion government took 77 per cent, leaving for the provincial governments 12 per cent and the municipal governments 11 per cent.

It will be seen that while in 1939 municipal governments collected 30 per cent as compared with 19 per cent collected by provincial governments, they are now able to collect only 11 per cent as compared with 12 per cent by provincial governments.

It is a recognized fact that there is some point beyond which no taxing authority can go, no matter what the demands for services may be. When the dominion government arbitrarily invades the field of over-all taxation to the extent of 77 per cent, leaving only 23 per cent to be divided between the provincial and municipal governments, then those governments are not in a position to act independently and to carry out their increasing responsibilities. That is particularly true today of the municipal governments.

Above every other obligation, that applies to education and health services. Most municipalities are today in a very critical financial position because of the rapidly increasing demand for educational and health services, which are the most important requirements of our society.

It can be properly said that municipal government is the very bedrock of our democracy. Nevertheless, the position of our municipalities seems to be receiving little consideration from the dominion government at this time, in some surprising respects.

Not only are the municipal governments deprived of revenues adequate for their responsibilities because of the encroachment of the dominion government in all fields of taxation, but they are also being penalized in other ways which add greatly to their burdens. Just as an example, may I remind the members of this house that the municipalities must pay the dominion sales tax on all the equipment they purchase, although the provincial governments do not pay this tax. I must say I find it difficult to see where the distinction lies. What is even more significant, however, is that in the case of civil defence, which many of us believe is the responsibility of the dominion government in any event, municipal governments, which have been called upon to buy special equipment for civil defence, such as fire equipment, hose couplings, stirrup pumps, and things of that kind, not only pay for something that is part of our general defence program, but they must also pay a dominion sales tax on those purchases.

For the reasons I have presented I do believe there is nothing more urgently demanding action by this government than the re-allocation of clearly defined sources of revenue for the provincial and municipal governments, which will restore the real authority of the provincial governments and enable the municipalities to meet their increasing obligations without imposing crippling taxes on those whom they service.

That is what this government promised without any qualification ten years ago. That is what is needed to preserve and strengthen our federal system. That will be the most effective check on extravagance by this government, because the centralization of taxation encourages extravagance by the very fact that it takes away from local governments those checks which are much more in evidence in governments closer to the people. And may I add that, above all, this is the course of reason and of honour.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That the following be added to the address:

"We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(a) To relieve Canadian taxpayers from the burden of excessive and unjust taxation;

(b) To eliminate waste and extravagance and thereby reduce taxes and the cost of living;

(c) To take any effective steps to regain the commonwealth markets for food and other products upon which the prosperity of our farmers and other basic producers so directly depends;

(d) To conduct inquiries in consultation with the provincial governments, so that necessary information may be available for the dominion and provincial governments to consider jointly a national health insurance program;

(e) To reach agreement with the provincial governments in regard to a clearly defined re-allocation of taxing powers so that the provincial governments and municipal councils may have adequate financial resources to carry out their rapidly increasing responsibilities."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before attempting to deal with the various matters discussed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in the interesting speech to which we have just listened, I should like to take a moment to extend congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in response to the speech from the throne. I think a special word of congratulation is due the hon. members for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) because, as newly elected members, they delivered on Friday last their maiden speeches in the house.

When one has to rise for the first time in the House of Commons he is apt to feel that it is something of a trying ordeal; and perhaps when this event takes place so soon after arrival in the house, and with the knowledge that other members have spoken here in previous sessions, an hon. member so placed is apt to feel that the difficulty may be still more forbidding. But I believe we can all say to our new colleagues that we are proud of the manner in which they acquitted themselves, and that they did credit to themselves, and to their constituents. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) spoke in the two languages.

We were happy to notice how easily he expressed himself in both our official languages, French and English. He gave us the opportunity of listening to a most interesting speech indeed, as regards both its contents and the eloquence which he displayed in expressing his ideas.

(Text):

This hon. member's election to the House of Commons was not by any means the first time he had been elected to public office. I understand that for nine successive years he was a member of the council of Sutton and then for eight years mayor of that municipality. It is quite evident that he acquired in the municipal field experience and knowledge which, added to by his success in his business career and by his experience as governor of the Brome-Missisquoi-Perkins hospital, will be factors in his success in this place, and which I am sure will be put to good account both in the discussion and solution of such problems as we have to deal with here. I believe the citizens of Brome-Missisquoi can be proud of the member they have chosen.

I think that is equally true of the citizens of Waterloo North. Before coming here the hon. member for that constituency had also been active in community affairs. He is a successful businessman. He was chairman of the Kitchener-Waterloo airport commission for many years and is now chairman of the Waterloo-Wellington airport commission. He is a past president of the Kitchener Chamber of Commerce and of the Kitchener-Waterloo Rotary club. He is a member of the Canadian Legion, of the advisory committee for the new St. Jerome's college, is a director of the Waterloo township plowmen's association, of the Kitchener Red Cross Society and the Kitchener-Waterloo federated charities.

The hon. member made a speech to which I feel sure we all listened with interest and, I may add, a speech which is highly gratifying in its demonstration of the ability he has brought to parliament. I think we can all feel that it is fortunate for the people of the whole of Canada that their representatives in parliament continue to be men and women who not only have a wide grasp of public affairs but are men and women of vision who are confident as to the future of their country and who make sacrifices by coming here to do their part in assuring the future of their country.

To come now to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), I am sure we all agree most wholeheartedly with his opening remarks with respect to the pleasure we will all take in joining in the ceremonies and festivities which will accompany Her Majesty's coronation next June. I think we were all gratified to see to what an extent we are of one mind, as was demonstrated on the occasion of Her Majesty's visit as Princess Elizabeth about a year ago. The enthusiasm with which she and her distinguished consort were greeted on the occasion of their visits to so many parts of Canada is, I think, a very satisfactory demonstration of the attachment of all our people to the kind of institutions under which our country has grown and under which I hope it will continue for very many generations to administer and take care of its public affairs.

Because that is our system, because we feel it is a good system for the administration of our public affairs, I extend congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition for the very frank and, perhaps some of us may sometimes think, severe criticism of the actions of the government. It is a part of our democratic institutions that there should be someone recognized in our official organizations whose duty it is to watch and criticize what is being done by the advisers of the crown, and I think it is helpful that that should be so. For three and a half years now the government has been attempting to discharge the mandate entrusted to it in 1949. It has not had too much time available to answer criticism, but it has always given close attention to criticism and has always been as attentive as it could be to remedy such weaknesses as the criticism revealed.

But it is also a part of our constitution and traditions that within a certain number of months now, possibly a year but not more than two in any event, the people of Canada will be called upon to pass judgment on the conduct of the government and on the criticism levelled against the government. I think it is proper that at that time the public should have before it all the information that could have a bearing upon the determination of its verdict when it is called upon to arrive at one.

The last item dealt with by the hon. gentleman was that of dominion-provincial, and now municipal, constitutional relations. He repeated a warning that has been current at almost all times during the whole period since the coming into force of confederation itself, namely that there was a formidable question that had to be determined, the continued existence of a federal system or the establishment of a unitary system. That is a problem that has been constant in our history ever since 1867. There have been periods when to some of us it appeared that the pendulum was swinging too far one way and to others it appeared that it was swinging too far the other way. At other times not too distant it has appeared to the same gentleman that there were excesses in different directions. I have here an extract from a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 4, 1937. It is attributed to "Colonel Drew" and as I would not want to be mistaken about the office the hon. gentleman occupied at that time I will merely refer to the note as I have it here:

> Extract from Colonel Drew's speech, February 3, 1937. "Today politics mean more than they ever did before in the history of Canada", Colonel Drew said, in pointing out that Canada was far too overgoverned. "We must start all over again from Confederation, if we are to have one country instead of nine", he said.
> Bit by bit the provinces have assumed powers acquired through court decisions that were meant for the federal government, Colonel Drew declared. Holding up the example of Great Britain where, he said, twenty cabinet ministers govern millions of people, Colonel Drew contended that in Canada it took between 100 and 110 ministers to govern eleven million people. "Our country is overgoverned, in some ways the worst governed country in the world," he said. "We must get back to one strong government."

I do not agree, and I do not think the hon. gentleman now agrees with the hon. gentleman of 1937.

Mr. Drew: Yes, I do; but that was not the end of the quotation.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the end of the extract I have here. I am glad that the hon. gentleman does not agree with the hon. gentleman of 1937.

Mr. Drew: I do, entirely.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not envisage the situation as being as terrifying as he has portrayed it to us today. Here he is suggesting that there should be a conference to reallocate fields of taxation so that the municipalities and provinces would have ample room to impose and collect themselves everything they might feel they required for the discharge of their growing responsibilities.

With respect to the allocation of taxation fields, I think that was perhaps more pertinent to the problem that existed in 1945 than it is to the situation that exists at the present time. Since 1945 the federal government has withdrawn from several fields of taxation that it had been necessary for the federal government to occupy in order to raise the sums required to assure the security of this country during the second world war. For instance, the government retired from the field of taxation on amusements, parimutuel betting, sales of electricity, gasoline, railway transportation and telecommunications and exchange tax. The only fields in which the federal government is at the present time are those of customs and excise, including sales taxes; personal and corporate income taxes; and succession duties. I think there is a small excise tax on the transfer of bonds and other evidences of indebtedness or security.

There is a constitutional responsibility in this country which, in the language of the hon. gentleman, is very serious at this time —the responsibility for taking all measures required for the continued existence and freedom of this country. That constitutional responsibility was clearly envisaged by those who drafted the British North America Act which came into force in 1867. It was that defence, national security, would be the responsibility of the federal government and that the federal government would have by constitutional declaration the right to resort to any and every form of taxation of the Canadian people. Now, no responsible Canadian government can ever give up the right to resort to any and every form of taxation when that may be required for the discharge of its responsibility to assure the security and freedom of the country at large. There can be no permanent allocation of those fields of taxation in which we are now raising the considerable sums that are required to meet the obligations of the federal government.

Unlike customs and excise, personal or corporate income taxes were sources of income that were not used prior to the first world war, although I believe they were used to a certain extent in the province of British Columbia and there was also some slight form of corporation tax; but they have become the very foundation stones of fiscal policies not only of this nation but of all nations in the world. There can be no undertaking by any responsible government not to resort to the levying of customs, excise and sales taxes, succession duties, personal income and corporate income taxes.

With respect to succession duties that were imposed during the war, after the war this parliament on the recommendation of the government withdrew to the extent of estates of a value of not more than $50,000, and nothing has ever been done to prevent any provincial government from levying succession duties. On estates valued up to $50,000 only the provincial governments levy succession duties. Beyond that figure, except for provinces having made temporary tax rental agreements for a period of years with the federal government, the provinces continue to levy succession duties. A credit is given by the federal government to the debtor of the succession duty of as much as half the federal duty, if he has paid that much to the government of the province in which he resides.

With respect to corporation taxes there is nothing in our legislation, nothing except the tax rental agreements that have been signed by some of the provinces, to prevent the provincial governments or provincial legislatures from levying corporation taxes to any extent they see fit. As a matter of fact, Quebec and Ontario have levied corporation profits taxes to the extent of 7 per cent although only 5 per cent was recognized by the federal taxing authorities as an expense of carrying on business. To the extent of 2 per cent there was double taxation there. That was because both governments wanted the amount of income produced by that tax rate. I do not know what special corporation taxes there are in the province of Ontario, but I know that in addition to the 7 per cent profits tax there are several corporation taxes existing and collected in my province of Quebec. There is nothing to prevent the legislature from fixing at any figure it may see fit the tax rate it imposes on these corporations except the very serious reason mentioned by the hon. leader of the opposition—that is to say, the unwisdom of trying to take too much from an individual taxpayer. The provincial legislatures, like the federal government, have to exercise such wisdom as they have in determining the rates that it is possible to impose on individual taxpayers without undue interference with the economic activity of such taxpayers.

With respect to the personal income tax the legal situation is exactly the same. In addition to that, at all times since the expiry of the first tax rental agreement there has been a provision in the federal income tax act that a taxpayer who had to pay an income tax to his provincial government would get credit up to 5 per cent of the amount of his federal tax, if he paid that amount to his provincial government. Neither the government of Ontario nor the government of Quebec, during the period in which they did not see fit to have tax agreements with the federal government, ever attempted to impose that amount of personal income tax on their people. It would have meant no increase in what the individual would have paid, but would have meant simply that the provincial governments would have the inconvenient responsibility, if it is an inconvenient responsibility, of having imposed a personal income tax and having collected it.

The hon. gentleman says there was an undertaking in 1942 to restore the taxing powers that had been rented to the federal government during the war period. There was, and at the expiry of those agreements there was no obligation upon any province to renew them. There was an undertaking that if the agreements were not renewed there would be a reduction, I think of 10 per cent, in the corporation tax. Though there may have been no undertaking concerning the personal income tax, because there had been practically no resort by provincial authorities to the personal income tax, reductions were made in the rate of income tax levied under federal laws for federal purposes.

Proposals were made to the provinces that if instead of levying their own taxes they wished to renew agreements, these were the kind of agreements we were prepared to make with them. At that time there were nine provinces, and seven of them chose to make those agreements. The two larger provinces chose not to make the agreements. They were just as free to impose and collect any and every kind of taxation from the moment the war tax agreements expired as they had been before the war tax agreements were made. Those two provinces remained in that position up to the time the province of Ontario chose to enter into a tax agreement for a five-year period, from 1952 to 1957.

For seven years there was no tax agreement with the province of Ontario. There is no tax agreement now with the province of Quebec. Quite frankly, I do not think there could be or that there should be or that anyone would wish that there be, any permanent arrangement which would restrict the constitutional rights of the central government to have recourse, in times of need, to any and every kind of taxation that the parliament of the people of Canada might feel was required in order to meet emergent conditions that they might then have to face. There could be temporary arrangements, however. If those that were suggested had not been accepted, they could have been discussed. Other forms could have come up for consideration. As a matter of fact that was done with, and in respect of, the provinces that have made those agreements. The agreement made by the province of Ontario this year is not exactly the kind of agreement that was proposed in 1945, and the form it has taken in 1952 has been the result of consultation and negotiation between the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the premier of Ontario, who happened to be at the same time his own minister of finance.

There were provisions in the agreements made immediately after the war, as well as those made in 1951, which differed from the original agreements and which were the result of representations made by, and negotiations had with, the premier of Nova Scotia. It has always been a condition of each and every one of those agreements that no more favourable terms would be given to one provincial government than to the others, and that such terms as were arrived at with one would be available to every one of the others. I have no doubt that there will be further discussion of this problem. These agreements that have been made are for a temporary period, and it may be that when that period ends the provincial governments, or some of them, will wish to have consideration given to modifications of those terms. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman, if he had the responsibilities which are mine at this time, could take the responsibility of recommending that there be any permanent abandonment of any of the constitutional taxing rights that belong to the federal government. There might be different temporary arrangements made, but I think—at least I would hope—the hon. gentleman would not take the responsibility of any permanent abandonment of any constitutional taxing rights which the fathers of confederation felt would be necessary for the security of this country, and which on two occasions it has been found were absolutely necessary for the security of this country.

The other matters dealt with by the hon. gentleman are not, I take it, criticisms of the ordinary civilian activities of the government, nor criticisms of the defence effort of the government, but rather criticisms of the so-called extravagances and inefficiency of the country's war effort and criticism of the high level of taxation. I believe, of course, that the implication was that when the moment arrives for the people of Canada to pass judgment upon the conduct of this government, they will come to the conclusion that it is time for a change, and that the change should be a change to the hon. gentleman and his friends as the advisers of the crown for the future period.

I think these are matters that are of great public interest and that deserve to be considered seriously. It seems to me there is no discussion and no controversy over the fact that the need for a great defence effort was demonstrated by the aggression which broke out in Korea in 1950. I think that practically the whole of the Canadian public was satisfied that the government should have acted promptly and is satisfied with the part the Canadian forces have taken in the joint effort of the United Nations to resist aggression in Korea. That effort has consisted of the continued action of three Canadian destroyers in Korean waters, on a rotation basis. It has consisted of the activities of the 25th infantry brigade which constitutes, and which from the time of its formation has constituted, one-third of the fighting strength of the commonwealth division in that war theatre.

I think we also have reason to be satisfied with the part the R.C.A.F. played through 426 squadron in the transportation activities since July 1950. The planes of that squadron have made 434 round trips; have travelled over five million air miles, have carried over 5,250,000 pounds of cargo and mail and more than 10,000 passengers, including the members of the forces. They have been assisted by planes chartered from Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which performed 350 return trips. Those planes chartered from C.P.A. were passenger planes and carried no cargo, but they travelled something over 3,500,000 air miles and carried upwards of 17,000 passengers. Most of that was done by a plane about which there was much criticism some years ago, namely the North Star. We were all happy that these almost 9,000,000 miles of air travel were accomplished by those Canadian planes without any untoward incident whatsoever.

Of course it is true that we all feel and greatly deplore the price, in lives and in anxieties borne by their families, that is being paid by the presence of these men of ours on the fighting front in Korea in the part they are taking in preventing war. But that is an inevitable part of the price that has to be paid by free people who wish to remain free and who take pride and comfort in the fact that their young people appreciate the freedom under which they live to the degree that it makes them volunteer to run the risks they are obliged to run when, to uphold the institutions of this country, they go and take their chances for survival in foreign lands.

This aggression in Korea made it more necessary than we have perhaps realized to proceed as rapidly as possible with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I think we take some satisfaction in the fact that there are now six Sabre jet R.C.A.F. squadrons in England and Europe; that steady progress is being made to reach the final commitment of an air division of twelve squadrons; and that our 27th brigade group has now taken its place with NATO ground forces on the European continent. I think we have reason to be satisfied as well with the progress that is being made by our Royal Canadian Navy in co-ordinating its efforts with those of the United States Navy and the Royal Navy for the safety of the Atlantic should another war occur.

This defence effort of ours includes, as one of its parts, our mutual aid program. Hon. members know that Canada appropriated $670 million as a share of this co-operative effort and that, out of that appropriation, armaments have already been provided for three divisions of our NATO allies, one in The Netherlands, one in Belgium and one in Italy. We have also provided aircraft and aircraft engines for members of the NATO organization, and air training for NATO crews in our own country.

When it is said that we have nothing to show for the sums that parliament has appropriated, we should not forget that the regular personnel of our services before Korea was 47,185 and that it has recently reached over 100,000. This is the largest number ever maintained, outside of war periods, by this young nation.

Our defence effort has also included our defence production; and altogether for the last two years the appropriations made by this parliament for the defence effort have been practically one-tenth of the gross national product of the whole Canadian people, that is to say one-tenth of the volume in dollar value of all the goods and services produced in Canada by the whole Canadian people. One-tenth of the gross national product has been channelled through the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production. Of course, every member of the government is responsible for what is being done by the defence departments but the principal burden of administering this one-tenth of the whole national production of the country has fallen upon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). When one realizes that fact, one is perhaps not surprised that they should not take too much time off to reply, or have too much time for replying to criticism.

The general effect of this defence effort has been perhaps more apparent to outsiders that it has been to some of our friends on the other side of this house. I should just like to refer to a few examples of the appreciation of this defence effort shown outside of this house and sometimes outside of this country. For instance, the London Times of August 28 had an article dealing with the commonwealth division and headed "Success of a Unique Military Endeavour". I will not take time to read the whole article, but will content myself with reading just a few short lines.

Security forbids mention of the detailed composition of these brigades, but it is known that the Canadians are represented by the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Royal 22nd Regiment (known as the "Vandooz" because of their French-Canadian composition), and Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, supported by gunners of the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery and tanks of Lord Strathcona's Horse. These Canadians have seen plenty of action, and their performance has been unsurpassed.

Still dealing with Korea, the Montreal Star of September 17, 1952, reports:

United Nations commander attends club opening in Tokyo.

The United Nations commander in chief, General Mark W. Clark said today: "The Canadian soldiers in Korea have made a magnificent contribution." Clark formally opened the Canadian Maple Leaf Club, a recreational centre in downtown Tokyo, which is to be used by all allied enlisted men. "I wish to pay respects to the Canadian forces and their magnificent contributions to the United Nations forces in Korea," Clark said.

Vice-Admiral William Andrewes in Vancouver at the end of August paid tribute to the great and growing tradition of the Royal Canadian Navy:

I saw the Canadian tradition build in nine or ten months in Korea. A bit of it is ours, and that is good. Much of it is yours, and that is good, for every navy must build a tradition. Yet each soon came to be a separate entity. You knew each ship was different. But all three were splendid; all were first-class.

With respect to what has been going on in Europe, the NATO organizations, I find this in the Montreal Gazette of November 15:

Sixty miles from the East German frontier, the 27th Canadian infantry brigade is now completely operational, ready to move and fight within hours.

The commanding officer behind this achievement is Brigadier Geoffrey Walsh, C.B.E., D.S.O. of St. Catharines, Ontario. Within a year, a green army has been transformed into an operational fighting force.

Then he goes on to speak of the system of rotation which is applied and said:

"We have been praised so often it is becoming embarrassing." Brigadier Walsh denied that there was undue trouble with brigade discipline. "Of course, there were disturbances, but these have been exaggerated by certain sections of the press for political purposes," he said. "If the brigade were in Canada there would be just as much, if not more, trouble. The outbreaks at Edmonton and Kingston involving civilians and soldiers were larger than here, I am sure."

Hon. gentlemen probably saw in the Globe and Mail of November 10, an article by Benjamin Welles, New York Times service, dealing with the very efficient and exemplary way in which the R.C.A.F. have been able to settle down, co-operate with the local authorities and get their fields established.

Grostenquin, France, November 9. Quietly and efficiently the Canadians have developed the jet fighter base here in the past four months that will equal—in speed of construction, operational efficiency and living conditions for officers and men—any of the twenty-one other North Atlantic Treaty Organization air bases already built in France. This is the home of the alliance's first F-86-E Sabre jet fighter wing on the European continent, and all sixty of the Sabres here are Canadian built.

The progress being made here would be outstanding by any test.

The article goes on to describe how the personnel of the R.C.A.F., because of its ability to speak the language of the local communities and its ability to adapt itself to local conditions, had succeeded in having all this done without any friction whatsoever. The article also goes on to point out that it might be well for the others interested there to take as an example the manner in which affairs had been conducted by the Canadian troops.

This I think is a tribute from one whom we know, whom we respect and who we know does not say what he does not believe to be absolutely correct. It is a report in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 12, 1952, entitled: "Tribute to Canada" and was written in the London Observer by Mr. Chester Wilmot, perhaps the most famous historian of world war II. He has this to say about the Canadian troops in Germany:

Lord Alexander told me last week that he regards the Rhine army "as the finest army Britain has ever had in peacetime" and he spoke with the same enthusiasm of the R.A.F. squadrons which provide the main strength of the second allied tactical air force. The most encouraging development of this year has been not the expansion of British strength—though this has been considerable, especially in the case of the R.A.F.—but its reinforcement by Belgian, Canadian, and Dutch contingents. The Canadian brigade group, though formed only last year, has no superior in the Rhine army.

I have here a report from the Ottawa Journal of November 8, 1952, of statements attributed to Air Marshal Curtis. He said:

"R.C.A.F. F-86 Sabres now are the only match for Soviet Mig-15s, although the United States air force will send Sabre squadrons in the near future. The R.C.A.F. is not just a token force, but is a major contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization far out of proportion to the men involved."

And these are not just words. Hon. gentlemen will remember this release that was made simultaneously in London, Washington and Canada on Sunday, November 2, about the arrangements that have been made for the NATO forces to have built in these Canadian shops the frames for from 300 to 400 of these F-86's. A lot of the engines will be provided by the United States government, but some of the electronics and engine parts as well as the airframes will be provided by Canada. R.A.F. airmen are receiving training under our Canadian scheme for use by the NATO forces in building up its strength. That is, we think, the indispensable bulwark against the outbreak of another world war.

These are achievements of substantial importance. It is not surprising, in view of the extent of the activities of the defence department and the Department of Defence Production, that ministers should have devoted more attention to attaining these achievements than to the minute details of administration. No one has suggested there has been anything wrong in the general program. Much is made of the few regrettable incidents having to do with thefts which have occurred in camps, having to do with fires which have broken out in camps, and incidents of that nature. These are deplorable; but has anyone tried to hold the presidents of the banks responsible because the Boyd gang broke into and robbed the banks? Has anyone attempted to hold a high official of the Bank of Nova Scotia responsible because there is a report that that bank was successfully defrauded of the sum of $250,000 recently? These are things that, when they happen, have to be followed up diligently. Those who are guilty of misconduct have to be prosecuted and made to realize that such will not be tolerated. And that has been done.

The hon. gentleman says he has not heard anything about what has been done in connection with the thefts at the Petawawa camp. Well, he has not been reading the newspapers, because I have read about several convictions obtained against those who were guilty of these incidents at Petawawa. And I am under the impression that the prosecutions have been conducted with vigour and to a successful conclusion, and that that will continue to be the case. What is important however is the wrongdoing, when it does occur, should be followed up vigorously, so that those who are guilty of wrongdoing may be prosecuted.

Another matter about which much is being made is that of alleged extravagance in the amount of mobilization stores that have been purchased. They are considerable. I am not going to attempt to defend or even to deal with the individual items mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). It may very well be that it was, as was recognized, a mistake to order 64,000 serving forks. But that was brought to light; and when it was brought to light immediate action was taken in connection with the matter. I am very sure that had that been one of the things that had come across the minister's desk personally, the requisition for 64,000 serving forks would never have been approved.

Then the hon. member referred to boots. Well, I was concerned about boots. I made inquiries and was informed that it was necessary to have that quantity of boots available for the proper functioning of the commissariat of the army and of the reserve forces. I was shown the amount expended for clothing and stores in the defence department as a part of what was spent since 1949 for the maintenance of personnel in the forces, and I find it is just slightly over 5·2 per cent.

Well, out of curiosity I looked at the statistics issued by the dominion bureau of statistics and by the Bank of Canada, in which were set out the cost of living index and the consumer price index. I find both of those were made up on the assumption, in the case of the cost of living index, that 12 per cent of the expenditures of a family go toward clothing, while in the consumer price index 11 per cent has been taken as ample for clothing. Well, in the instance brought to our attention 5·2 per cent represents the total cost of clothing, and that kind of equipment, purchased for the armed forces.

It runs into large figures, of course. I do not know why over a million neckties were required. It may very well be that that was a mistake. But in 1950, when the Korean incident broke out, there were acute fears of a possible outbreak of war on a wider scale than persists today. The leader of the opposition says that the situation is just as tense, that international tension is just as great today; but he also says there is greater hope than there was before that there will not be a world war. That of course is true. We all remember, however, that at the time of the last world war there was great criticism levelled against the defence department because they did not have the stores required to properly clothe the men as rapidly as they were being enlisted under the conditions of emergency that then arose. It may well be that the officers in the requisitioning departments, having that in mind, did order more than the minister would have sanctioned, had it come to his attention, or that the deputy minister would have sanctioned had it come to his attention.

I think we are all not only happy but fortunate that a newspaper which is not usually oversympathetic toward the government should have found it proper to publish on August 27 this short article to which reference was made by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) in his speech on Friday. Under the heading "Of This We Are Free" the Ottawa Journal of that date contains the following:

> Speaking in New York before 36,000 members of the American Legion, General Eisenhower drew his biggest applause with this:
> "Let us bend ourselves to end corruption in public office at every level of government. The United States is no better than its public officials. Pre-occupation with their own profit . . . undermines America's strength."

The writer in the Journal then goes on to say:

> In a nation, as in an individual, the temper of the Pharisee is a poor thing. Yet, in thankful truth we here in Canada can say that no public man in this country needs to stand on a platform and say about our government, our officials, of any of our public men, what General Eisenhower felt need of saying to the people of his country.

We Canadians have our failures in government and in other things. Yet when the last word of censure is spoken, when the litany of error is called, it still remains true, and the most cynical cannot deny, that corruption in our government is unknown. Within a generation we have fought two world wars, have expended billions, often with desperate haste. To the eternal credit of our public men no man in this country today dares to rise and say, or can say with truth, that a single cent of the billions spent was diverted to a private pocket from its proper channel.

For our democracy, whatever its shortcomings, that is a glory.

Whatever its shortcomings, that is a glory; and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition agrees that we must be very cautious to seek out, to condemn and to eradicate any and every mistake that is exemplified by extravagance or waste. But let us together glory in the fact that, on the whole, our defence effort has been an effort worthy of the Canadian people, and one of which we can be justly proud.

Much of the criticism has been directed against the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I was pleased to read in the Montreal Gazette of November 17, in an article which was intended to be critical of something the minister had done recently in reply to charges of poor morale in the Canadian forces overseas, statements such as this:

The direction and management of the Department of National Defence are bound to come under criticism. This is by no means to condemn Mr. Claxton's many valuable efforts and services. Canada has few public servants who devote themselves to their duties with greater vigour or constancy. The difficulty lies in a certain tendency on Mr. Claxton's part to uphold the defence department as something beyond censure or reproach.

They go on to say:

No doubt these inclinations on the part of the Minister of National Defence are largely unintentional and even unconscious. He himself is probably unaware either of these inclinations or of their consequences. And they are no less unfortunate because they tend to diminish public appreciation of his unquestioned achievements as a devoted and able administrator.

It may be that my colleague is sometimes oversensitive with respect to the criticism that is levelled against some of the activities of those who are in his department and for whom he has constitutional responsibility to this house. But I think on the whole we are happy that the situation in that department is such that the head of the department would be sensitive about any criticism levelled against it. That does not mean we should not pay attention to the criticism, that we should not do our best to see that what is underneath it disappears and in that way do away with the occasion for criticism.

That is why we want the defence expenditures committee set up. Hon. members will have found a notice in my name on today's order paper which will be called in due course. We want it set up. We are all anxious, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) possibly more so than any of the rest of us, to be sure that there is no waste because the Minister of National Defence, together with his colleague the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), carries a tremendous responsibility with respect to the proper channelling of one-tenth of the total production of the Canadian nation in the course of a year. That is a tremendous responsibility and one with respect to which I am sure the Minister of National Defence wishes to see continued such tributes as I find in this critical article in the Montreal Gazette of November 17 last.

So far as defence production is concerned, I do not think I need to say very much. I was one of those who attended the launching of two ships and the handing over of three guns at Sorel to the United States and Canadian forces on the 14th of June last. I was much impressed by what I saw there on that occasion. I was also much impressed by the comments I heard from the United States procurement and naval officers who were present, who saw what was being done and how it was being done in that particular munitions plant. Quite frankly, we all would be happier if it was not necessary for mutual aid to be extended to our associates in the NATO organization, but since it has to be extended I think there is some occasion for us to be proud that it is here in our Canadian shops that the NATO organization wishes to have the F-86 fighter planes produced for the principal fighting element of that organization now being built up in Europe.

In numerous other fields there are frequent striking examples of the importance being attached by our allies in NATO to the part this young nation is able to play in building up this joint strength. The hon. gentleman said there was a reference in the speech from the throne to a lessening somewhat of the dangers of war on a world-wide scale. He added that several newspapers had made comments about that statement in the speech from the throne which he felt it might be wise to correct. His speech implied, and I agree with him, that we should not be complacent about the present situation, but I do not think there is anything in the language used which would induce anyone to be complacent. Here is what was said:

You resume your labours on behalf of the Canadian people at a time of continuing international tension. Nevertheless, because of the steadfast resistance of our Canadian forces and their comrades in arms to aggression in Korea and because of the increasing strength of the forces of freedom in Europe, there are signs of a lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale. My ministers are convinced that a lasting peace can be assured only so long as the combined strength of the free world continues to be built up and maintained.

It never was intended to imply that it was possible to lessen our efforts to build up and maintain the combined forces of the free nations in Europe. I do not want to pose as a military expert, but as a Canadian citizen I do not feel that there are sufficient allied forces on the continent of Europe at this time to resist aggression from the Soviet forces. I feel quite convinced that that strength has to continue to be built up and will then have to be maintained as an insurance premium against the possible outbreak of war in that important section of the free world.

Another matter with which the hon. gentleman dealt, and which I feel I must discuss at some length, is the pretended overtaxation. I noted one expression he used which I am sure is not exactly what he had in mind. He said that the people were being overtaxed far above the amount authorized by parliament. The hon. gentleman knows, as we all do, that parliament does not authorize any amount of taxation. Parliament authorizes certain amounts of expenditure and then parliament authorizes certain rates of taxation. Those rates of taxation apply to the basis that is forecast. When they have been authorized, if the economic activity of the nation is greater than had been estimated those rates produce an amount larger than they had been intended to produce when the lesser estimate of the economic activity was made. The converse is also true, as has been frequently pointed out by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I remember one occasion when the hon. member had misgivings about the prospects. He was glad to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was so optimistic, but he was not satisfied that his optimism was quite justified and was much concerned about what would happen if instead of there being an increase in the gross national product there was a slight recession.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That was a good many years ago.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, that was only in 1950 and there was much of the same feeling in 1951. I was quite impressed by the warning from the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) because it is not only the gentlemen on his side who feel that he is experienced and is very sincere and objective in the examination he tries to make of our financial situation from time to time. In that year the rates of taxation were designed on a gross national product of $20 billion to produce about $3⅜ billion. Although that was looked upon as an optimistic forecast it turned out that the gross national product was $21¼ billion, and the result was that there was about $300 million in additional revenue for that year produced by the same rates of taxes.

The hon. gentleman says no express statement had been made that we were raising taxes for the purpose of paying off our debt. No, there was not; but there are lots of people in Canada who, when they find that in a given year they are more prosperous than they expected to be, if they have any mortgage or other debt, think it is a pretty good year to make a payment on it. Parliament had felt that if the gross national product was $20 billion it would be proper to take off about 18½ per cent for the current expenditures of the country and that would not be intolerable to the Canadian public. When it happened that the Canadian public achieved a gross national product of $1¼ billion more than had been anticipated it was no hardship on the individual Canadian public that 18½ per cent out of that additional gross national product should go to retire some of the debt that had been inevitably piled up under the stress of war and wartime conditions. That was repeated in the following year.

The hon. gentleman fears, and I think that is perhaps not too strong a word, that it will be repeated this year. Well, I hope it will, but I do not dare to expect it. I sincerely hope that it will be repeated. I have been told a good many times that I do not know very much about politics, that I do not seem to be very much worried about party politics but that I seem to be considerably worried about doing my part to keep the right kind of country for my grandchildren to grow up in. Well, I think the more we have of these fortuitous possibilities of paying up some of the debts we are going to leave to the generations ahead of us the better this country will be for anybody's grandchildren to grow up in.

I do not think the Minister of Finance has been such a bad guesser, and I do not think the general public feel that way about it. Although perhaps it may be said that they are not Canadian taxpayers, there are a great many who look with envy upon the financial record of this country during the last few years. I would just like to refer briefly again to something published in the Montreal Gazette on November 4, 1952. It was not from one of its own leader writers, but it passed the city editor and it got into the paper. It was entitled "Canadian Economy praised by Federal Reserve Bank":

Confidence in Canadian economy has been greatly strengthened by the general success of the dominion government's fiscal and monetary policies according to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Commenting on the Canadian scene in its monthly review, issued today, the bank notes that the economy's balance has been maintained despite the strong expansion pressures generated by the Korean war, the Canadian defence program and the swift pace of economic development.

They go on:

Canada's tax program, the bank points out, was designed not merely to keep the over-all budget in surplus, but also to provide additional revenue in a manner specifically calculated to dampen inflation . . .

"Government policies have fostered rapid economic development in Canada," the bank concludes. "During the past two years, of course, when defence requirements and inflationary pressures have placed critical strains upon the economy, official policies have attempted to channel the continuing expansion in industry and primary production into 'more essential' lines. But many factors suggest that Canada may be moving toward new horizons in a general economic atmosphere conducive to enterprise and individual initiative."

On the following day, inspired probably by this statement of the Federal Reserve Bank, we find in the New York Times:

A Lesson from Canada

Like most other countries, Canada experienced an inflationary expansion following the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. In consequence, wholesale prices rose from 206·6 per cent of the 1935-39 average to 242·3, or by about 17 per cent, while the cost of living climbed from 164·5 to 190·9, or only 16 per cent. But the upswing of wholesale prices was halted in the second quarter of 1951 and the rise in living costs had reached its peak by the fourth quarter of last year.

They go on and give certain details.

What makes the Canadian record the more impressive . . . is the manner in which it was achieved. The government's policy, in the words of Finance Minister Abbott, was "designed to guide the economy in the right direction without dictating the details of economic activity." In other words, the nation steered clear completely of price-wage controls, and all direct interference with the individual's affairs, relying upon increased taxes (direct and indirect), the stern regulation of consumer credit, a voluntary credit restriction plan, and an anti-inflationary policy of debt management.

The strictly economic approach to the inflation problem by Canada is typically exemplified in its policy in the field of taxation . . . it has sought to maintain a good balance between taxes on earnings and taxes on spending . . . Canada has also had the wisdom to see that, except in time of war, any value that an excessive profits tax might represent is——destroyed by the effect it has on incentive.

I do not think that there has been any mismanagement of the Canadian economy, and I do not think there has been any overtaxation as the hon. gentleman seemed to imply in his remarks this afternoon.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

For comparison, I had looked up the budgets presented by the hon. gentleman when he was leader of the government of Ontario. I find that, in a comparable period, the amount realized from his taxation policies was something over 15 per cent above the expected, while the amounts realized by the dominion government, over and above those expected, have been something of the order of 11 per cent. I am not bringing this out as a reproach. I am just pointing out that where the same constitutional system prevails the legislatures determine, on the forecasts submitted to them, the rates required to raise the sums they have appropriated and authorized to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. Fortunately for the hon. gentleman while he was premier of Ontario, and fortunately for us, the optimism—even the optimism that has been sometimes looked upon by the more prudent as excessive—turns out frequently to be more than justified by the buoyancy and resiliency of our Canadian economy. Certainly that is nothing for which we have any reason to apologize or to be sorry.

It must, of course, make us more careful, especially when we realize that there must be elections from time to time. No government likes to impose more taxes than are required. That is something about which we are concerned, not because we are power hungry or anxious to remain in office—I might as well be frank and confess it—but because we have sufficient conceit that we believe we are able to give better government than the alternative would give. I shall not apologize for that conceit because I am quite convinced that my hon. friend has the reverse conceit quite as firmly as we have ours. That being so, we are always concerned with keeping taxation at the lowest level that is possible in view of the services which have to be provided.

I made a note of the hon. gentleman's statement. No one in this country seriously contends that any of these services that have been instituted over the last few years should be eliminated. On the contrary, there are many who contend we have not gone far enough and that we should increase taxation on the Canadian people to be in a position to render further social services that have not yet been undertaken. I am sorry I am taking so much of the time of the house, but I had prepared some notes on the kind of budget that we would naturally expect from the hon. gentleman if, in the near future, he had the responsibility of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

There are some items that have been severely criticized, but they do not amount to very substantial sums. We have heard a lot about possible savings that might be made in the administration of these social services. I was glad to see that the hon. gentleman himself was shying away from the $500 million that had been mentioned as a possible saving resulting from a commission such as the Hoover commission being set up in Canada. The whole amount to which such a commission of inquiry would apply is something of the order of $621 million. It would be rather difficult, therefore, to squeeze $500 million out of that. I submit it would be difficult to squeeze $100 million out of it, unless some of these services were going to be eliminated. One thing that has been severely criticized by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) is the film board. Even if you cut that out altogether, all you would save would be $3 million.

Mr. Fraser: I never said to cut it out.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is just the point; when you get down to something specific you would be glad if it did not cost so much but you would not cut it out.

Mr. Fraser: I said to just clean it up.

Mr. St. Laurent: Even if you did, all you would save would be $3 million. A lot of criticism has been levelled against the government because of the tremendous extravagance in travelling expenses. Well, they are large and amount, I think, to about $46·5 million. You could not cut that out without leaving in Korea the troops we have there, without doing away with the rotation system; and I am sure no hon. gentleman would want to do away with the rotation system for the men who have served and who are serving in Korea. If travelling expenses were eliminated you would have to keep the members of parliament here all the time. No one would want to do that. You would have to eliminate everything that is expended on foreign representation abroad. I believe the international situation is such that no one would want to do that. They want it done properly, but they want it done with due regard to proper economy. They do not want to cut it out.

Even if we cut it out, even if we cut out all the expenditures incurred for the so-called publicity, we would hardly arrive at $100 million. On the other hand, if you took into account only some of the things that the hon. gentleman has seriously recommended should be done—I have them here and I shall give the details following the dinner recess—they amount to something over $600 million. I believe the hon. gentleman would have rather serious qualms about balancing the ones against the others.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess for dinner I was endeavouring to give some sympathetic consideration to the difficulties which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) might have to face if, in the near future, he had to present the budget to this house. I had first of all tried to find what items of expenditure it might be possible for him to compress. I had been guided in that search by the amount of criticism that had been directed against certain of the activities this government has carried on while in office. There has been much criticism of the film board; but even the elimination of everything connected with the film board could account for only $3 million. Then I had also mentioned criticism of the cost of travelling, removal expenses and so forth, which amount to $46,500,000 but which, of course, could not be entirely eliminated because it would be impossible for the administration to function at all if a substantial portion of these expenditures were not continued in effect.

Another chapter of our activity that has come under fairly severe criticism from time to time is the C.B.C. But even if all government activities in connection with the C.B.C. were eliminated, all that could account for in reduction of expenditure would be $8,250,000. Another item that I had set down was the elimination, for instance, of 10 per cent of the civil servants, mainly in the Ottawa area. That would be a considerable slice of the administrative work which it is suggested is not carried on with sufficient regard to proper economy. That might make an item of $41,500,000.

Another item which has been frequently criticized as being nothing but government propaganda is the expenditure incurred in respect of publicity, personal relations advertising, amounting to $17,500,000.

Altogether these items would make a total of $116,750,000. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not find it possible to eliminate all of these items. I think he would have considerable embarrassment in making any substantial reduction in them. For instance, the elimination of government activities in radio broadcasting would be a reversal of what has been the policy of his party from the start for, as Mr. Bennett said here when he was dealing with this matter, if there were not public control of radio broadcasting it would mean that there would be no Canadian radio activities at all; and that would mean that quite a large number of our artists would have to find employment in other countries or turn to other fields of activity.

But be that as it may, anything that the hon. gentleman might find it possible to squeeze out of these items would be many times offset by the additions that he would have to consider making in the expenditures of government if we are to take seriously the policies that have been propounded, both outside of this house and inside it, by the members of his party. For instance, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), in the foreign policy debate last March, was desirous that there be at least $25 million added to the appropriation for the Colombo plan. That is something which I am sure he would press fairly strongly upon his colleagues.

Mr. Graydon: Might I ask the Prime Minister to read what I said on that occasion? There was more to it than that.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member will find it in Hansard of March 21, 1952, at page 677.

Mr. Graydon: I can find it. I would ask the Prime Minister to read it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is suggested that it might be arrived at by economies in other items of expenditure.

Mr. Graydon: That is exactly what I have said.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have endeavoured to deal with the other items of expenditure where economies might be made, and I have allowed not only what might be a reasonable proportion of them but rather the items entirely. The hon. member said, as reported at page 677 of Hansard of March 21, 1952:

> I have no doubt that if the minister were to go through the various departments and comb out all unnecessary expenditures, we could give another $25 million to India without scarcely requiring even another vote by parliament.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: The next item to which I wish to refer is the $200 million which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is reported in the Globe and Mail of March 28 as having urged in cash and food for Britain. I will admit that the hon. gentleman might not have to include that item in his budget because I understand that, since that time, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has realized—

Mr. Drew: I would ask the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Even though this material may be prepared by someone else, I would ask the Prime Minister to stick to the facts. He knows perfectly well that never at any time have I advocated any different course than that which I advocate at present.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is there a change of leaders again?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think I suggested that the Leader of the Opposition would take any different course. I understood that the hon. gentleman was still, and had been even on March 28, the leader of the opposition, and that he was not the hon. member for Lake Centre. I was pointing out that the hon. member for Lake Centre had recommended this course. I was saying that perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) would not find that he had to implement that recommendation, because I have since read in the papers that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had said that what was wished for in the United Kingdom, and what should be recommended, was not aid but trade.

Mr. Drew: Quite.

Mr. St. Laurent: However, this was the recommendation of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is a prominent member of the official opposition.

Mr. Hees: You are now getting Pickersgill, chapter II, page 1.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall have an opportunity of dealing with the hon. member who has just interrupted, if he will wait until I get to him, in the usual order in which we deal with these hon. members.

Another matter the hon. gentlemen would have to consider is the recommendation which was made by the Montreal district annual meeting of Progressive Conservatives the other day in Montreal.

Mr. Graydon: Pickersgill could not have been there, sir.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know why it is that the name of Mr. Pickersgill is recurring so often in the interruptions that come from the other side. I have received very valuable assistance from Mr. Pickersgill—

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: —since I have been in office. It is quite apparent from the mood of the hon. gentlemen that they resent the fact that I got valuable aid from any source whatsoever.

Mr. Hees: Very necessary.

Mr. St. Laurent: Because it seems to be an obsession with them that Mr. Pickersgill was my assistant and did act as such until such time as he became the clerk of the privy council.

Mr. Drew: Still is.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have no regrets whatsoever as to the assistance I had from him during that period. I think quite frankly that it has been of value not only to me but to all those to whom I had responsibility in the discharge of the duties which had been placed upon my shoulders. I am now going to use assistance that has been supplied to me by the Montreal Gazette. That may be a source less susceptible to suspicion by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. Graydon: Stick close to them and you will be all right.

Mr. Croll: They have not done you any good.

Mr. Graydon: Don't blame the Gazette for that.

Mr. St. Laurent: The Gazette reported the resolutions adopted by this annual meeting of the Montreal district Progressive Conservatives. Among them was a resolution favouring the extension of family allowances to school children up to the age of 18. On the assumption that Canadian children up to that age would be eligible, this would involve an expenditure of $63 million a year—quite a substantial item, and one that I think the hon. gentleman would feel that he would be required to consider.

Another item which I think has been given approval by the official opposition in its attitudes and votes in this house is the deduction from income for taxation purposes of all medical expenses. This would mean an item of some $48 million.

Mr. Knowles: Everybody voted for that the first time.

Mr. St. Laurent: If everybody voted for it, the hon. gentleman would perhaps find that an additional reason for including such a provision in the budget that he would be responsible for recommending; but it would be nevertheless an item of $48 million.

Mr. Fleming: That would be reduction of taxation, not increased expenditure.

Mr. St. Laurent: It would be a reduction in income tax received, but the effect on the consolidated revenue would be just the same. It would be $48 million that would have to be found in some other way to take care of the requirements.

Another item recommended by the hon. member for Lake Centre which has perhaps not received such unanimous approval yet, but which has been commented upon with favour by several of his colleagues, is federal aid to education. No specific figure was placed upon that, but on the assumption that there might be a grant of even $5 per man, woman and child, that would run into an amount of about some $70 million. Whether or not that would be considered by the hon. gentleman, I do not know. Whether or not it would be recommended, I do not know; but it is an item of some substance.

Another item recommended by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) in a speech in this house is assistance for disabled workers. I am sure he would press that very strongly for consideration by a minister of finance of his party. On the basis of $40 a month for approximately 150,000 it would amount to a sum of $72 million. That, I am sure, is an item that he would want to have considered seriously as an additional service for the Canadian public. No one disputes that it would be desirable, if it is a thing that the taxpayers want to pay for. But they cannot have it both ways. It cannot be allocated and remitted to the disabled persons unless it is raised from the taxpayers of the whole community.

Another item on which the leader of the opposition has taken a positive stand in this house is the reduction in the age at which the old age pension would be paid from 70 to 65. I have the reference here, but I think we all remember that that was the attitude taken by the hon. gentleman and many of his followers both in this house and outside. Well, that would mean an increase of $194 million in the amounts required for old age pensions.

Mr. Drew: From where do these figures come?

Mr. St. Laurent: From the statistical information we have of the age groups of the Canadian people, because the hon. gentleman was specific in saying that he wished that reduction to be made in the non-means-test old age pensioners.

Mr. Drew: Is that the total figure?

Mr. St. Laurent: The figure is $194 million for the age group between 65 and 70.

Mr. Drew: Is that the total figure?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hees: I wonder whether I could make a correction in the figure that was given?

Mr. St. Laurent: If I gave a wrong figure—

Mr. Speaker: With the consent of the Prime Minister, the hon. member may ask a question, but it can be only a question.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: I would like to ask the Prime Minister where he got the figure of $72 million as the cost of pensions to those who would be completely disabled. The figure I have is—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: Answering the question, it is by the multiplication of the number of months in the year by the factor of forty dollars.

Mr. Drew: We want to know if it is statistics or figures.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, I can assure the hon. member that I am making the speech—not Mr. Pickersgill—and I am making it, without reading it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: —from notes I prepared on material that was available to the whole public.

An hon. Member: Give it to him again.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not suggesting that all these items would be included in the expenditures that the hon. member would recommend, but these are some of the items to which considerable importance has been attached by members of the hon. gentleman's party; and there are others.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has made recommendations in the house for further benefits to veterans, benefits that would be very desirable but which would involve additional expenditures to which I am sure the minister of finance in his party would be giving careful consideration. But, in the result, I am sure the hon. member would find it very difficult, with the experience and sterling business integrity for which he is known, to recommend any diminution in the level of taxation unless he were prepared to recommend that deficits be incurred at this juncture in our economic affairs.

I do not think he would wish to recommend deficits; and, if he did not, I fail to see how he would avoid many increases in the expenditures already listed, unless he were to disregard entirely recommendations that have been made over the years by members of his party when expressing dissatisfaction with policies of this government.

And that would not be surprising. I stated this afternoon that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had had some experience in the effect of greater economic activity than had been foreseen, and that during the years in which he was premier of Ontario the revenues derived from the rates of taxation that had been recommended by him had produced somewhat more than 15 per cent over the amount for which he had budgeted in his annual statements.

On the expenditures side the same thing has happened. I am not stating this as a reproach to the hon. member. The tempo of our economic affairs and, necessarily, the part the government plays in the economic life of the country, made that necessary. Nevertheless it is a fact that in the full year before the hon. member took office the expenditures in his province were $92 million for current expenditures, and $100 million for total expenditures. While he was in office those figures increased to $166 million for current expenditures and over $201 million for total expenditures. That is an increase of 80 per cent in annual current expenditures and over 100 per cent in total annual expenditures. During that same period the percentage of increase in the expenditures of this government, aside from the cost of the defence forces, was very, very much lower than that.

This is not because the hon. member was not careful and attentive to the affairs of the province; it is because circumstances brought about those changes. Perhaps he might say he would not have the same responsibility for what in the federal field he calls overtaxation, because perhaps the effect of the policies of the Ontario government on the economic activities of the whole country were not as direct as the effect of federal government policies on the economic development of the country, and that he had no responsibility for the increase in gross national production. But, again, that is something which did happen, and something which made it possible for future ministers of finance to provide from now on for some $62 million less in interest charges on the national debt.

The next matter with which I wish to deal, and quite briefly, is that of trade. Right here I say that one of the sources upon which I am going to rely is not Mr. Pickersgill but rather Mr. Anthony Eden. The opposition charge that the Liberals have been destroying trade and losing the markets. Now, what are the facts? Here I have a statistical report which shows that the export trade of Canada is higher than it ever was before. For instance, the total exports in 1951 were valued at $3,914 million, or at the rate of $326 million a month. That is the average rate over the year.

I have the figures for 1952 which show that in the first seven months our export trade amounted to $2,460 million, or at a rate of $351 million a month over the seven-month period, or $25 million a month more than in 1951 which, up to that time, was the record year.

That is not only true for the over-all export trade of Canada. It is equally true for exports to the United Kingdom market. In 1951 those exports were valued at $631,500,000, or a monthly average rate of $52·6 million. For the first seven months of 1952 they amounted to $462·8 million, or at a rate of $66·1 million on an average for those seven months.

Of course there are things in addition to those we have been exporting to the market of the United Kingdom which we would be most anxious to sell to them and which they, I understand, would be anxious to take from us. That is known to them just as it is to us. I should like to read just a few lines from the public speech made by Mr. Eden here in Ottawa before the Canadian Club, as reported in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of November 17. This is what he said:

> We know that Canada has a vital interest in the strength of sterling and that is why you are so closely concerned in these efforts which we are making . . .
> As to trade between our two countries, I know that we at home are not taking all that you would wish to sell. Nor are we taking all that we would wish to buy. But it is all that we can afford today. And what we do buy is no mean total for a country of 50 million people. In 1951, we took from Canada $631 million worth of goods—34 per cent more than the year before. But we only sold some $400 million worth to Canada.

Of course, if $400 million is no mean total for a country of 50 million, then $631 million is no mean total for a country of 14 million. He went on:

> To buy more Canadian goods, therefore, we must earn more from our exports to you. Increasing those exports is our responsibility. We must find out what you need. And we know that our prices and deliveries must be competitive. You will, I think, agree that we have made real progress in these respects since 1947 and this despite the grievous burden which rearmament has imposed upon our engineering industry.

The total market has not been lost, as $631 million for 1951 is 34 per cent greater than were our exports to them in 1950. I have not figured the percentage but there is an increase in these figures of about $14½ million a month in the first seven months of 1952 so far as exports to them are concerned. But there are restrictions on their imports from this country, restrictions which prevent us from selling them apples, cheese and other dairy products, poultry, canned salmon and other food products, because they say that they cannot afford to pay for them and that they have to use the Canadian or American dollars they are able to acquire by their exports to different countries for things which they consider of greater value to them than are these products which we would like to sell to them.

The hon. gentleman has said that he hopes we are not going there with any idea of telling them how they should run their own affairs, and that if the situation were reversed and they were to attempt to tell us how to run our affairs we might resent it. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we fully appreciate their situation. We do not forget that in 1947 we found ourselves in a position where we had to impose restrictions on the importation of a lot of things that many of us wished to have but which were less essential than other imports for which we were using our United States dollars. I know that when we approached the election of 1949 we were told in many quarters that we were going to find a housewife or kitchen revolt against the fact that they had been deprived during 1947 and onward, for a period of time, of lettuce and other green vegetables which had come to be looked upon as indispensable articles of the Canadian diet.

We appreciate the situation and we are not going to attempt to tell them how they should go about using such Canadian or United States dollars as they do acquire by their exports; but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and myself are leaving tomorrow to go over there to endeavour to work with them in trying to find ways which will enable them to remove the restrictions they have found it necessary, because of their dwindling reserves, to impose upon the importation of some of the things we would be very desirous of seeing them buy and which they apparently would be very desirous of having. I am sure it is only under what they consider the sternest kind of necessity that they are providing Russian canned salmon for their people instead of the canned salmon of, I am sure, such satisfactory quality that they used to get from our canners of the Pacific coast.

As hon. members know, the invitation to attend this prime ministers' conference was received here on the 25th of June last, just after the decision had been announced to call our parliament into session on the 20th of November. In spite of the fact that parliament met last week, the government felt that the Canadian people would expect the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to go to this conference and do what they could, through discussion with the members of the sterling area, to seek and to find a reliable way to remove these restrictions on their trade. This government recognizes and has always recognized—and I am sure every member who sits in this house also does—the desirability of obtaining a restoration of the economy of the United Kingdom as something not only due to them in consequence of their great sacrifices during the last war but as something of immediate economic interest to this country.

I think parliament and the Canadian people have given tangible proof of their desire to be as helpful as they could be. There is no doubt that the greater the British market and the greater the commonwealth markets open to us, the better it will be for our Canadian producers. I regret that the conference coincides with the beginning of this session of parliament. I think hon. members know that I do not like to be away from Ottawa when parliament is in session. I know that the Minister of Finance would prefer to be here to deal himself with matters for which he is responsible to parliament and to the people represented in parliament, and which are apt to be under discussion in the debates in the house.

I regret also for another reason that the conference is being held while parliament is in session. The Minister of Finance and I would have liked very much to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) accompany us on this occasion, as he himself would have liked to do; but he customarily acts for me when I have to be away and, rightly or wrongly, we felt it would not be showing proper respect to parliament if we were both away at the same time. There is also the consideration that in the course of these discussions it may, and I hope it will, become necessary for us to communicate with our colleagues at home. I hope such progress can be made that there will be things that will have to have the approval of our colleagues at home. My colleagues felt that if such an occasion should arise they would be glad to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce here, because of his experience in such matters, to assist them in dealing with such questions as we may have to refer to the Canadian government. After all, this is a conference, not a legislative body of any description. What recommendations are arrived at will be recommendations to the respective governments of the countries represented at the conference, and I hope we may have recommendations that will require immediate decisions. I cannot say how long the conference may be expected to last, but I can assure hon. members that I shall lose no time in returning to my place in parliament just as soon as it is over.

The Minister of Finance and I are going to London with the hope that some progress can be made in the direction of widening opportunities for trade both within the commonwealth and between commonwealth countries and other nations. But I think it would be wrong to give the impression that a conference of commonwealth representatives, however valuable it may be as a preliminary —and it will be valuable—can by itself solve the problem of making sterling convertible or, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has put it, of removing the roadblocks in the way of trade. That is not only my personal view. If I may refer again for a moment to Mr. Eden's speech here in Ottawa I find that he had this to say:

> We realize of course that there is no final solution to some of these problems which we shall have to discuss in London, except on a world basis. Yet by our joint efforts we believe we can inspire the message and expand the contribution which the commonwealth can make to the economic life of the free world.

I am sure we all join in that view and that hope. I also feel sure that we join in the confidence in the future of Britain expressed by Mr. Eden in that same speech:

> I know there are some who believe that the contribution we can make to the modern world is a declining one. I do not accept that for one instant. On the contrary, I am convinced that the leadership and experience we have to give can be as decisive in shaping world events as at any time in our long history.

I am sure it is with that hope and that confidence that we are going to join them in the search for ways to remove the roadblock which prevents the resumption of world trade, because I think we share the views and hopes that it may not be too optimistic to feel that the western world will so rearrange trading that the great nations of the east will feel that it is to their advantage to remain with us and help us maintain the standards of freedom for mankind throughout the whole world.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the hope that we may make every preparation for Her Majesty's coronation and that her reign thereafter will be a very long and happy one.

I also want to join the Prime Minister in expressing pleasure at seeing the new members in the house and to say to them that I hope their time in parliament will be useful and enjoyable and that we shall have very pleasant relations with them.

One other thing I would like to do—because sometimes I have found it necessary to criticize the policies of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson)—is to express on behalf of the C.C.F. group in the house and myself our congratulations to him upon having been elevated to the very high office of president of the United Nations assembly. I feel that is not only a recognition of the service he has rendered to the assembly in the past but is a recognition too of the place Canada holds in the assembly of the United Nations. I only wish that the United Nations could look forward in the next few weeks to settling this very grave problem of Korea.

I had hoped that over the week end agreement would have been reached, at least among the democratic nations, for support of the Indian resolution, but that apparently has not been possible. The United States apparently would not agree to it, and I was very sorry to hear over the radio tonight that the Russian delegation had denounced the proposal also. Consequently it is very difficult to see how those of us who are between those two great giants can exercise that influence which is so necessary in order to bring about an end of the war in Korea, since the United Nations has achieved the end it originally had in view—namely driving the aggressors back where they came from—and is now endeavouring to settle by cease fire an armistice and, we hope, the peace. It is very, very difficult to see tonight what the next step will be. I think we must all hope and pray that a speedy end will be brought to this conflict in the Far East and that the war will not spread any farther.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) leave tomorrow for the commonwealth economic conference in London. I am sure everyone in this house hopes that the results of that conference will be beneficial not only to the commonwealth nations, not only to Canada, but indeed to the world at large; because upon the prosperity of the commonwealth depends very largely the prosperity of the democratic world, and certainly the prosperity of our own country.

Watching the statements that have been made from time to time from Ottawa I have been rather alarmed at the attitude the newspapers convey to us that the government might adopt. I was very glad to hear the statement the Prime Minister made tonight in that regard. After all, we in Canada have a somewhat special responsibility in this conference because we happen to be the only so-called dollar country to be present. We hear a great deal about the necessity for convertibility of the dollar; but the point about which I sometimes think we are under many illusions, when we talk about the convertibility of the dollar, is that it is not a question so much of exchange of money as of exchange of commodities. It is really not a money problem at all; it is a commodity problem at its base. The sterling area has been spending, and must continue to spend because of necessity, far more in the dollar countries than they have been able to earn. I think that is the crux of the problem; and this lack of balance in expenditures and receipts has precipitated a very serious disruption affecting nations carrying on about half the trade of the world. I refer of course to the sterling area and our own country.

As was earlier pointed out very briefly, this has been very largely aggravated by the loss of sterling assets during the war. The sterling area, and particularly the United Kingdom, disposed of its overseas assets during the war, turning them into cash that they could use for the common war effort. The result is that today Britain no longer is able to use those great inflows from overseas to balance her accounts with the rest of the world and particularly with the United States and Canada.

There has been, according to press reports from the United States and also in this country, some disposition to criticize the domestic policies of the United Kingdom and other sterling countries. I think that rather we should indulge at the moment in some self-examination of our own trading policies and economic policies in North America. Indeed it seems to me that even cursory examination of the trading positions of our nations will to some extent give us an answer to this problem.

Incidentally, over the years we have tried to draw attention to the matter. Sometimes, when the Labour government was in power, I know there were those who thought we were prompted by some ideological friendship with that government. I may say that we have been equally insistent since there was a change of government in the United Kingdom. We believe that, regardless of whatever view the government in power in the United Kingdom may have ideologically, that does not alter the true economic effects of the situation which is faced by the sterling countries and ourselves. So we have been none the less outspoken on these matters since there was a change of government in the United Kingdom.

As I said a moment ago, this lack of balance in our dollar-sterling trade relationships which would have to be discussed at the conference is not just a question of the welfare of the sterling area. It is a question, indeed, of our own continued Canadian prosperity. If we look for a moment to see what has happened since the war to some of our trading relationships with the United Kingdom—the largest sterling country—we find that we have indeed, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) pointed out, tried to increase our trade with her, but always we have exported to her far more than we have been willing or able to import from her. In 1946, for example, our exports to Britain were nearly three times as great as our imports. In 1947 our exports were nearly four times as great as our imports; in 1948, they were over twice as much and in 1949 about twice as much. In 1950 we came the nearest to striking a balance, largely because of the curtailment of dollar purchases by the United Kingdom. In 1951 that curtailment by Great Britain continued but our imports from the United States increased, again to Britain's export disadvantage. In other words there was a substantial increase.

Now, it is argued that this trading position had been normal throughout the years. To some extent that is true. Before the war, with the assets I have already mentioned, Great Britain was able to buy from us, we shall say, twice as much as she sold to us, and we were able to buy from the United States twice as much as we sold to that country. Thus the balance was made up because of the overseas assets and the inflow to Great Britain from those assets. But the post-war change in the assets of the United Kingdom and the other sterling countries—I am including Holland and other countries which had a somewhat similar experience and either lost assets or overseas areas which they formerly controlled—changed the picture almost completely.

I should like to say that in our opinion, both at the commonwealth conference and generally in our trade relations, we can only regard trade as a matter for great co-operative effort. In other words, we sell in order to buy, and nations must buy where they sell. There is a danger, of course, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) pointed out in his speech that was quoted by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, that our mounting surplus of some commodities, particularly wheat, and the curtailment of the export of some other commodities which the Prime Minister mentioned a few moments ago, will gravely affect Canada in the long run. As to the present outlook for wheat, we all know that the world needs every kernel of it. The difficulty is, how is the world going to pay for it? I think the answer to that question is that the world can only pay for it by our taking goods or by our making loans or by our accepting sterling and making investments in the sterling area.

It is said, of course, that in order to replace these normal markets, as I call them, that we had in the past, we have been able to find new markets in the United States. It is true that before the war, as I have already pointed out, we traded very largely with the United Kingdom and the United States. Since the war a great deal of our trade has been diverted, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will probably say of necessity, to the United States. In other words, whether or not we have had to, we have placed more and more of our trading eggs in the one basket.

For a moment I want to look at the figures from the United States, and these are from the official reports just as the Prime Minister's figures were this evening. Recent figures from the United States for 1950 show that United States imports into Canada were five times as great as those from the United Kingdom. In 1951 they were at a still greater ratio, of six to one. Our exports, taken over the long-term picture, showed a somewhat similar change. In 1950 we exported four times as much to the United States as we did to the United Kingdom, and the 1951 figures show over three times as much.

It may be said that this rather discounts my argument, but if we look at the picture still more closely we realize that in the past our economic health did not depend on exports to the United States but rather on those to the United Kingdom. We believe that if we are to maintain a healthy economic life in this country in the future, then we must not place so much reliance on trade with the United States as we have been doing in the immediate past. The reason, of course, is very simple. As was pointed out this afternoon, the United States is so largely competitive with Canada in her production. She produces the same commodities that we produce, particularly in agriculture, although more and more as the days go by Canadian industry is so greatly expanding its production that we are competitive industrially as well in many respects. Indeed, many of the corporations that are operating as Canadian companies in Canada are in reality United States companies who, from time to time, seek tariff protection from the parent organizations in the United States.

I was interested a few days ago to read a statement in the Montreal Gazette by the president of one of our Canadian chartered banks. I am not going to quote the statement because it is somewhat lengthy. I am going to summarize it, and I think I am doing so quite correctly. Mr. H. A. Stevenson of the Canadian Barclays Bank noted that in this year, that is 1952 to date, that is to last week, our imports from the United States had increased from 69 per cent last year to 74·5 per cent, while our exports to the United States had dropped from 62 per cent to 53 per cent. In other words, what this showed was that we were buying more from the United States and now we are selling less to her while from the overseas countries we are buying less and selling more proportionately. This could, of course, lead to a decline in our total trade if it were accompanied by a lessening of defence buying, and that in turn could cause a serious disruption or even a recession in the Canadian economy.

May I add that this danger might become still more apparent if the new administration in the United States should revert to the type of policies the Republican administration adopted in the years before the 1930's. Looking over the cabinet appointments that have been announced, it seems certain that there will be at least a more conservative —spelled with a small "c"—business-dominated cabinet responsible for the economic and social policies of our great neighbour to the south than we have had for some years. Even under the much more liberal—again spelled with a small "l"—administration of Mr. Truman, we have been reminded of the dangers of depending on the United States markets. Indeed, in direct contravention of the general agreement on tariffs and trade made at Geneva, which we both signed and which we carried out to the letter, I believe, the United States restricted imports of fats, oils and dairy products, particularly cheese, coming from this and some other countries. We protested against what was done, but our protest did not meet with any significant results. Thus we have been warned that our future is in danger if we place too much reliance upon the unpredictable United States market. Hence I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance that we should re-examine our trade policies with the overseas countries at this conference in London and try to regain what in the past have been our stable markets.

I think this means something else. I think this means that Canada must do something. This means that our trade and tariff policies must be designed to assist non-dollar countries to export more goods in order to earn more dollars to pay for their purchases here. Let me say, as I said at the very outset, that I believe this is the crux of the dollar-sterling convertibility problem. There is no other solution of a permanent nature although, as I have already suggested, there may be some temporary expedients. We may make loans and we may make investments in the sterling areas, but I would regard those as only temporary expedients and would say that the only way to solve the problem is to increase our exchange of goods with those countries.

It is perfectly obvious that when we use exclusively monetary terms, as we so often do, we obscure the real facts; because the real facts today necessitate an exchange of goods in order to bring about convertibility. It would indeed be unfortunate if in any way, at the conference in London next week, Canada adopted either a negative position or merely the position of an interested observer. From what the Prime Minister said I do not think that will be done, and I sincerely hope not.

I was going to say more about this matter, but I think tonight I should like to deal more particularly with another matter which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in his amendment, namely a proposed national health plan. I think the reference in the speech from the throne will have caused considerable disappointment to a large number of Canadians who hoped that at long last we would get, at this session, legislation that would bring to the Canadian people a national health plan. I noted that the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, I think unfairly, made the statement that the countries with socialized medicine were communist countries. I do not know. I have never been in a communist country. I have read that they have—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct that statement immediately. I said they had state medicine in Russia, that they had state medicine in communist countries and that they also had state medicine in some countries that were strongly opposed to communism.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is right in correcting me in that respect. I recall now that that is exactly what he did say. But the emphasis was on the fact that the communist countries had this state medicine while the democratic countries also had it; but to my mind at least it seemed to convey the impression that they came afterwards and not before. As a matter of fact, in the democratic area there are many countries which have had national health plans for a great number of years. There are Norway, Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, and of course more recently the United Kingdom. Indeed, there are only three of what I might call the major democratic countries which are without some national health plan. Those three are the United States, Canada and Australia; and even in the Commonwealth of Australia there is a hospitalization plan and certain prescriptions are provided for the population.

It was also stated that a good many people regretted that the United Kingdom had put a national health plan into effect in that country. That is not what I learned. I had the privilege, for a couple or three weeks, of travelling with a group of parliamentarians from all over the commonwealth. Many things were discussed. One of them which I made it my business to discuss was the success or failure of national health plans, because I was greatly interested in them. I found that it did not matter with whom I talked, or with what political party from the United Kingdom I talked, there was general agreement that while there might have been some defects in the plan when originally introduced, it was today not only the most popular piece of legislation in the British Isles, but was the most beneficial one. I remember distinctly that a unionist member travelling with us made the statement that it was having a profound effect on the people of southern Ireland because of the great benefits that family allowances and the national health plan were bringing to the people of northern Ireland. In spite of all the criticism that has been made of the plan in the United Kingdom, it is noteworthy that no political party and no members of parliament are prepared in any way to overthrow the national health plan even though they are prepared to abolish some of the other plans and legislation which the Labour government put into effect when it was in office in Great Britain.

Mr. Fleming: Does the hon. member consider it to be state medicine?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; I consider it to be the kind of national health program that we would have in the future. I will develop the idea of a national health plan a little more fully in a few moments, and I think that will answer the question that has been asked.

In our own country for many years organizations have been asking for this plan. Indeed, the party now in power in this parliament, namely the Liberal party, was pledged to introduce a national health plan as long ago as 1919. That is 33 years ago. Today it was said that we should have another investigation. If we brought into the house all the volumes dealing with investigations and reports that have been made in this country into this problem of health in the last 33 years, I would not be able to see over my desk if I were sitting down. I am sure the volumes would be more than three to four feet high. Indeed, in my office at the present time I have enough that, if I piled them up here, they would be between two and three feet high. I refer to reports of surveys, reports of committees, reports of inquiries and reports of investigations in this country into a national health plan. Indeed, if we look at the record even in 1945, the proposals of the government of Canada submitted to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction in August, 1945, at page 29 we find this:

> In both federal and provincial circles, health insurance has been under active consideration since the last war.

I continue:

> In 1941, the Minister of Pensions and National Health called a meeting of the dominion council of health and other interested agencies to study the question. In 1942 the government appointed an advisory committee on health insurance. In 1943 the House of Commons appointed a committee on social security. To this committee, the advisory committee on health insurance made a report on the 16th of March, 1943. Widespread discussion occurred on the part of interested organizations and individuals. The Canadian Public Health Association in June, 1942, the general council of the Canadian Medical Association in January, 1943, and numerous farm, labour and other organizations passed resolutions approving in principle of health insurance.

I am not saying that they approved the national health plan, but they approved in principle of health insurance. The report continues:

> Included in the report of the advisory committee was a draft bill providing for health insurance on a nation-wide basis. This was to be administered by a commission to be established under provincial legislation to be enacted by each province.

May I add that a bill was printed by the king's printer, I think improperly under the circumstances, for it was never introduced in the house. It was circulated, though, among candidates of the Liberal party in some parts of this country in 1945, and was shown to audiences as the bill which the government was prepared to enact if it were re-elected. Well, that was the last we saw of that printed bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It did its work.

Mr. Coldwell: It did its work, yes. Of course, it has done its work on a number of occasions, both before and since. May I say to the hon. member for Greenwood that probably it did the same kind of work that the clause in the amendment of the loyal opposition is supposed to do on this occasion, exactly the same.

If we go back a little further we find that a committee of the House of Commons was instructed in 1928 to investigate and report on the subject of health insurance for Canada. As I have already indicated, this was indeed the first of a long line of committees. What did it do? It recommended that a survey be made. And surveys have been made, I might add, almost continuously ever since.

In 1942, as I have indicated, the federal government set up an advisory committee on health insurance to make another study. That was stated in the proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. A year later that committee issued a report. It was 500 pages long. It dealt with every aspect of health insurance and, as I said, actually drafted a bill.

Further studies have been made almost continuously ever since. In fact on December 29, 1945, the government organized a special directorate of the department of health called the directorate of health insurance studies. This directorate has been functioning continuously ever since that time, a matter of seven years. Among other things, its function has been to study and analyse the health insurance legislation of other countries and the planning of legislation for our own country. In order to show that this has been an earnest effort on the part of this departmental organization, I find that the government has spent over a quarter of a million dollars on this directorate since it was set up seven years ago. In addition, the federal government has authorized the spending of approximately $650,000 in grants for other surveys. In its proposals to the federal-provincial conference of 1945 the federal government estimated the cost of a comprehensive plan at that time at $250 million a year.

This of course was on the basis of prices as they were at that time and with the population as it was in 1941, about 11½ millions. If we want to be fair about it, we have to increase that $250 million in conformity with the increases in the cost of everything else in the country, and with the increase in the population. If we take the 1952 estimated population of Canada at 14,600,000 and the cost of living in 1943 as 118·4—it is now 185—we can calculate that on that basis the $250 million a year would have to be increased to about $492 million a year. In a recent broadcast I said $470 million, because I was using rather a smaller population figure than the one which I think is more accurate and which I have just seen.

When we think of the various organizations that over the last several years have asked for a national health insurance plan for this country we find that it makes a very impressive list. We have several representative organizations such as the following: The federation of agriculture and other farm organizations; both the national labour congresses; the American Federation of Labor groups and the Canadian Congress of Labour groups and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour; the railway transportation brotherhoods; the Canadian Legion; the board of evangelism of the United Church of Canada and numerous other organizations. All have asked for a national health plan.

Quite recently a Gallup poll was taken in this country; Gallup polls have a habit of showing at least pretty closely the state of public opinion. That poll indicated that eight out of every ten Canadians wanted a national health plan on a contributory basis. That is what we suggest. I quote the words of the question:

> . . . . under which they would be assured of complete medical and hospital care by the federal government.

We find more and more that the leading men in the medical profession are coming around to the need for such a plan. I noted around the middle of September that Dr. J. B. Jobin, chairman of the Canadian association of French-speaking physicians, had spoken at Laval university, and in the course of his remarks he said this—of course I am using the translation—"Socialized medicine is a must if modern medical services are to be accessible to everyone". I regarded that as a very important statement by a medical man who is so representative of some of our French-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec.

Where we have anything in the nature of a widespread health plan we find ample support for it. I expect that some hon. gentlemen read the very interesting article in Maclean's magazine of a month or six weeks ago, which dealt with the high cost of hospitalization and the high cost of health generally in Canada. If so, they would have noticed the report that in various parts of Canada demand for a health plan was taking shape. The writer outlined what had been done, for example, in my own province of Saskatchewan, in the Swift Current area. In that district they have established a health region which takes in Swift Current and I believe something like a hundred towns, villages and municipalities comprising practically the whole of the Swift Current area. There, for several years, not only has there been in effect a hospitalization plan which gives everyone in the province coverage, but also a plan whereby medical aid is provided to the residents of that area, without individual obligation. The health of the community as well as the care of the teeth of the school children are looked after in this unit, under this plan.

I also noticed a few days ago that, again in my own province of Saskatchewan—and this indicates the demand in a province where a considerable amount of work has been done in this regard—a vote was held in the rural area around Regina; and there again the people voted themselves into a health unit. This is not the kind of health unit that is in effect in Swift Current, where the services are available as I have indicated, but more particularly one in which sanitation and preventive methods may be used to combat the spread of disease, and the like.

Today more than half a million people, or over two-thirds of the population of Saskatchewan, are included in some health region or some health unit. The success of the hospitalization plan is so well known that when, for example, in the recent general election in the province the Liberal opposition sought power it made the claim that it could improve the hospitalization plan. They did not suggest that they would do away with it or eliminate it, but rather that they would improve it. We know they did not get the opportunity to carry out their plan; but their attitude indicates that the plan has the support of all parties in Saskatchewan, because the people of that province are familiar with its benefits.

Various excuses have been given as to why this could not be proceeded with. The principal excuse is that there are not enough hospitals in Canada. As hon. members from Saskatchewan are aware, when the hospital plan was put into effect in that province there were not enough hospitals to take care of the people who wanted hospitalization, because so many people had deferred operations and other medical care. Then, suddenly, they found they were able to go to the hospitals because they were not then placed under a heavy financial burden in doing so. At that time there were less than four hospital beds per thousand of population. Because of the Saskatchewan government's building program, and then through federal aid which came two years later, we have now something like eight beds per thousand of population. I suggest therefore that these excuses will not hold water.

In order to place our views before the house, and to test the feeling of the house I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the following as an amendment to the amendment:

That the amendment be amended by deleting paragraphs (d) and (e) and by substituting therefor the following:

"We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration;

(b) To implement their proposals to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945."

[Mr. Coldwell.]

There are several points that I suggest must be kept in mind in connection with any plan. First of all, we think that the plan must be contributory, and that these contributions should be based upon ability to pay. This is somewhat different from the old-age security program, where some today are required to pay no more than $30 this year and $60 next year and thereafter.

Secondly, we believe that the plan should be so arranged—it can be, and indeed has been so arranged in other countries—that every individual shall have the right, as of right, to the very best of medical care and attention that can be provided. We believe, too, that every individual should have the right to choose his doctor, and that every doctor should have the right to refuse to take a patient if he does not wish to take that patient. In other words there should be no demand to regiment either the individual or the doctor, as is so often suggested. I am convinced that whether or not we get this now, we are going to get it. The whole civilized world is demanding that suffering shall not be allowed to continue, but that relief is the duty of the community.

In other words it is the application of what sometimes we describe as the Christian principle, though it has a much wider application than the Christian principle alone; that is that we are told to bear one another's burdens. I know of no better way of endeavouring to bear one another's burdens than by relieving this terrible amount of sickness that goes uncared for in so many parts of the world.

Putting it on a much lower level, may I say that last June, I believe it was, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) told the house that losses on account of illness and disability, through accidents and for other reasons, cost the country about a quarter of a billion dollars, and that the loss in days last year amounted to something like 137 million man hours. Those are economic losses. But when we consider the great losses through suffering, the anguish of people who are not able to get all the treatment they need when they need it, I think we must see immediately how important is this piece of legislation to the national well-being of the Canadian people.

I had intended to discuss cost. However, all I am going to say about cost is that I believe the cost to the people of Canada collectively would be less than the amount we now spend for the very inadequate services we get. It is estimated that individuals spend about $500 million a year, and that the dominion and the provinces spend $175 million, making a total of $675 million.

On the basis of the estimated cost of a national health plan made by the advisory committee which reported in 1943, the cost of a health program would now come to approximately $492 million. This of course takes into consideration the increase in population and the increase in the cost of living since that estimate was made. In the Saskatchewan health survey report, tabled in this house, the amount estimated for a nation-wide health plan was $450 million. It is obviously difficult to estimate exactly what a health program would cost at this point. But even if a national health plan cost $600 million, as some have suggested, there would be a saving in money, in suffering, in anguish and in early death for many Canadians that would more than compensate for any expenditure we might make.

My time has expired. I would press the amendment which I have had the privilege of moving.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to concur in what was said this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) about that part of His Excellency's address which announces that the coronation of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth is to take place next June. We wish at this time to reaffirm our loyalty and devotion to the crown and all for which the crown stands in the British commonwealth and concept of living. I should also like to agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in all that he had to say about the quality of the fighting forces of Canada. They are doing a wonderful job and are discharging their responsibility well. The only tragic part of the whole situation in which these boys are placed is that they have to continue to fight a limited war for an unlimited period of time. We sincerely hope that some way will be found to bring this terrible Korean situation to an early end. Our prayers will be devoted to that end.

I should also like to commend the efforts of the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They performed their duties capably. In fact they were very persuasive. They made what is virtually a bag of dry bones look like grain-fed western red brand beef, and that is pretty good.

I should like to say a word or two about the proposal contained in the amendments moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) with respect to a national health plan. In our view there is no greater asset to any nation than the health of the people. Consequently every effort should be made by the people individually, and collectively through their governments, to achieve a high national standard of health and well-being. A mistake which the socialists often make is in thinking that a worthy objective of that kind can be reached through government action alone. Nothing could be farther from the truth. There simply could not be any high standard of health, even with everything an all-powerful government could do, if the individuals of the nation were not prepared to learn how to look after themselves, how to exercise restraint and use wisdom in their manner of living, and do all in their power to produce and make available health-giving foods in sufficient quantity to fill the nation's needs.

Another mistake socialists everywhere have made in the past is that, although they have laid great stress on careful planning, they have been overeager to catapult the nation or state into comprehensive health or hospitalization schemes before the means were available or the facilities were ready for them. We believe that they ought to have learned something as a result of the tragic errors that have been made in this and other countries in that respect. Social Credit Alberta launched out sixteen years ago on the beginning of a health improvement and insurance program. That program has seen continual expansion and development along very sound lines until today Albertans enjoy a very substantial measure of health services, without doubt the best to be found in Canada.

The provincial government is determined to develop that scheme as fast as it can. We believe that a national health program, built on the model of the Alberta one, is desirable and possible. Its objective should be to make it possible for every Canadian, irrespective of means, to obtain hospitalization, medical, dental and optical services and along with them a sound health education with emphasis on preventive or what are known as prophylactic measures—all of these of course to the fullest extent of need. But, sir, if such a national plan or program is to endure and succeed in its aims it must develop more or less gradually and not be imposed upon the nation in one fell swoop by an overanxious power-hungry junta of centralizers. The kind of national health program we propose would develop as rapidly as production expansion and resources development would make it possible without creating an avalanche of tax increases and without plaguing the nation with the sort of embarrassment that has almost universally followed the imposition of socialist programs wherein serious shortages of trained personnel and hospital and clinical facilities have very soon become apparent.

The Social Credit kind of national health program would ensure that sufficient doctors, dentists, nurses, technicians, clinics and hospital beds would be made available first to take on the work as the scheme is extended. Moreover, as the program develops care would be taken to preserve, amongst those already mentioned, these fundamental principles, and I name five of them. The first is a fair measure of individual responsibility. Let us not kid ourselves that we can give everything free to individuals and not in some way damage the nation or its morale. It just is not possible.

Second, patients must continue to have their choice of doctors and the program must guarantee that there will be no regimentation of patients, doctors, nurses or hospitals. The third important principle is that emphasis must be placed on preventive medicine, keeping people well. In this connection an intensive campaign of education should be launched to teach the people what they can and should do for themselves to keep well. Amongst other things they will have to be taught the facts about food substitutes and how the people are being gypped by millers and bakers today—not all, but by some of them—who try to make the people believe that when they buy certain kinds of bread they are getting whole wheat bread. This just is not so, and the people should know it because a certain amount of unbleached, unadulterated whole wheat products is essential to good health.

The fourth important principle is that the program must be devised by joint co-operative action of municipal, provincial and federal governments, and be administered by the first two. Fifth, there will have to be provincial and federal subsidies to keep costs down. I think a fair start has already been made in Canada, and it should be aggressively expanded and extended as rapidly as resources can be made available, consistent with sound development practices. That is the way we view this whole matter of health insurance.

I should like to say a few words in connection with the whole matter of trade and the commonwealth. The boys are leaving on a trip to London tomorrow—I wish I were going with them—and they have their work cut out for them. They have been receiving a lot of advice tonight and I suppose it would not hurt if I gave them a little more. At least I am glad I can talk to the genial Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) before he goes because I have always said that I like him. I like to see him get along well—

Mr. Abbott: Look out.

Mr. Low: —and that is the reason I like to give him some advice. At any rate, within a few days the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance will be sitting down in London with representatives from other parts of the commonwealth to discuss and consider the whole field of commonwealth trade and finance, and perhaps other relations. We sincerely hope that the government will exhibit at that conference a considerably changed attitude toward commonwealth relations and commonwealth trade from what we think they have been exhibiting most of the time since the war ended. The Liberal government has been altogether too tough in the matter of convertibility, and they have taken a line which has gradually diminished what our trade with the other parts of the commonwealth could have been if they had used more vision and determination to strengthen commonwealth trade rather than merely to follow the line of least resistance and the lead of the United States of America.

To be completely fair about the situation, it is true that during the war the pattern of trade had to change to some degree because at that time Britain could not supply Canada's needs, in the traditional manner, of the things we had to import. However, that is no excuse for letting the pattern continue as it has during the seven years since the war ended in 1945.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberals are just now beginning to wake up to the fact that they have hitched themselves to the most uncertain market in the world, the most uncertain market for Canada—that is the market in the United States; and for all too long they have neglected to do what ought to have been done to restore Canada to the best market she ever had and the market which she ought to continue to hold if she can in the years to come. I am speaking now, Mr. Speaker, entirely from the point of view of the good of Canada when I say we should serve the best interests of our own country and the commonwealth as a whole. I think the government should hang its head in shame over the fact that Britain has had to go behind the iron curtain, to Russia, to the enemy of the free world for a number of things she has had to get such as coarse grain, lumber, and things like that which Canada could very well have supplied.

An hon. Member: That is hindsight.

Mr. Low: You can talk about hindsight but there ought to be just a little bit of vision and foresight as well.

I quite realize that since the war ended in 1945 Canada had advanced a grand total of $1,763,900,000 in financial assistance to other countries up to March 31 of this year. Of that figure $1,185 million represent loans to Great Britain, all of which will be recoverable in the future. In addition there were certain direct credits that were made available to some of the European countries. I will not detail those at the moment. In addition to those credits made available to certain European countries, contributions sent to the United Nations agencies have totalled $203,100,000, which includes $154 million advanced to UNRRA, $12 million to post-UNRRA relief, $15 million for the Colombo plan assistance to India, $10 million for assistance to Pakistan, and just over $1 million contributed by Canada to the technical co-operation payments plan for India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and Greece. Some $325 million has been contributed by Canada for military aid to NATO countries. That was very largely a transfer of existing stocks of armaments and equipment which the Canadian army had been keeping as a mobilization reserve. Actually every Canadian has contributed $46.40 in these forms of aid to other countries, which is not recoverable.

Now, sir, Britain has been the biggest beneficiary of the Canadian assistance I have outlined, and I am not pleading that we continue to help Britain in the ways I have cited and which have been the pattern since 1945. I think we must consider much greater aid to the underprivileged countries under the Colombo plan and the technical co-operation arrangements. I much prefer to see us drop sacks of wheat and food materials into these underprivileged countries to help them live in some measure of happiness and contentment, than to be draining off our production in the form of arms and shells to destroy our fellow men in warfare. In my judgment food can be made a far more effective weapon than atom bombs; and using that weapon, peace could be brought to this world much more quickly than by all the military campaigns that could ever be fought.

We think there are very worth while, physically and financially possible measures that can be taken by Canada to help these countries that are in need and to help Britain and other parts of the commonwealth get on their feet, particularly Britain. We have believed and asserted over the past seventeen years—and by "we" I mean the Social Credit group—that the British commonwealth of nations offers the only assurance of bringing balance once more into a world of trade that has become seriously out of balance. What the government seems to have forgotten is that our great neighbour to the south, the United States of America, has within her borders as much as 50 per cent of the world's total industrial capacity. This makes her a colossus both in the industrial world and in the world of trade.

Ever since the United States became the industrial giant she is, she has had a tendency to hog the channels of trade and has consistently refused to balance her trade with the rest of the world. This has brought about a condition under which the other countries of the world have not been able to secure enough American dollars to be able to buy from the United States the things they needed. As a consequence the streams of trade have to quite a large degree been dried up; and perforce, the United States has had to resort to Marshall plans and gifts of great quantities of goods to other countries to make up for what normal trade ought to be doing.

If the British commonwealth of nations with its widely scattered territories, its tremendous production, and its very large population will revitalize their sinews into strong unity it can become the one factor which is capable of bringing order and balance into an unbalanced world of trade. Canada should be taking the lead in this revitalization. Thus far since the war the Liberal government of Canada has been very diffident in its approach to commonwealth matters and has been an abject follower, instead of the bold and courageous leader that everyone had the right to think it should be.

When the Canadian representatives sit down at the London conference they ought to be guided by the determination to restore our traditional trade patterns, and not worry their heads off about this business of convertibility of currencies. We in this group feel that every effort should be made by Britain and by us to help Britain once more get investments in other parts of the commonwealth. Britain should even now be doing something about investments in Canada. There is still ground floor space in such things as the petroleum industry where, specifically, I will name the Athabasca tar sands. If Britain will make a supreme effort she can get hold of a block of those sands and set out, like some of the other countries, to perfect methods of separation so that eventually she will contribute to her own and the world's supply of petroleum products. As I say, other countries are getting into it, and I think Canada should be doing everything possible to help Britain to get into the oil development in this country. In due time the investment will pay off handsomely. The thing is physically possible, and we Social Crediters have always claimed that what is physically possible can be made financially possible. In the years ahead Britain will have to have returns in the form of investment income if she is to maintain her place in the world of commerce.

In the second place, Canada must be prepared to send to Britain the food materials and a good many other raw materials which Britain needs and which we can supply, not in the form of gifts or loans but on a straight deal. The Prime Minister used some words this afternoon and this evening which I thought were not very logical. He reminded us that Britain in the past year had bought something like $631 million worth of goods from us and that Canada, a nation of 14 million, had bought something over $400 million from Britain. There was a $200 million disparity. Britain cannot afford to buy $600 million worth of goods from Canada if we only buy $400 million from her. It is just impossible. Somehow the disparity has to be made up.

The Social Credit group in this house for a good many years has advocated that Canada should be prepared to accept from Britain in payment for these goods the only thing Britain has to pay with at the present time, namely her own currency, sterling. There is no doubt in my mind that Canada can trade about amongst the countries of the sterling area to obtain with the sterling the things which Canada needs. It may take a little time, but if in accepting sterling we help Britain to get on her feet, and at the same time sell to advantage the products which we have to export, it will be worth taking the time. And while we are trading around in the sterling area there is no question in my mind about the ability to finance the whole deal within Canada, just as in 1917 we financed the advance of wheat to Great Britain by an issue which was arranged by the minister of finance.

Canada should also show her good faith in this whole matter of the revitalization of the commonwealth by encouraging the import into this country of those things which Britain can supply. There are encouraging reports now coming out of Britain which indicate that since the socialist government was defeated production has gone ahead by leaps and bounds. Canada is going to need quantities of television material. I am convinced that the British product is the best in the world. There is no reason why Britain should not supply Canada's needs in this respect just as fast as Canada expands her television program.

That is not all. In the field of the development of the St. Lawrence system Britain could supply us with great quantities of steel headgates and materials that will be used to develop this waterway. We should be prepared to buy them from Britain. In my judgment there is no reason why those things should not be done. In addition to that, we should encourage imports of other things that Britain could supply, including automobiles. I believe we should be ashamed of the fact that in Canada we hear a lot of criticism about the antiquated production methods of Britain, and charges that the cost of British goods has been made inordinately high as a consequence of the British social security system, while at the same time we put every obstacle in the way of marketing their automobiles in Canada. I say we ought to be ashamed of ourselves. We Canadians declare to the world that we believe in competition, yet we do everything we can to prevent competition. At least certain entrenched interests in this country do so, and they do it with the sanction and assistance of this government; at least that is the way it appears to me.

The situation is pretty well summed up, Mr. Speaker, in this editorial which was published not so long ago in the Calgary Herald. I am just going to quote briefly from it.

> When the two big winter automobile shows are held next February, in Toronto and Montreal, the first major shows since the war, there will be no British cars on view before the Canadian public. They have been black-balled by the Canadian automobile industry.
> When British motor manufacturers and traders revealed what was going on, and protested, the National Automobile Shows Inc. at first maintained utter silence, and then its general manager, J. L. Stewart, came up with the explanation that the exclusion of British cars was not a question of patriotism or of international economics, but was a simple matter of everyday business. Canadian firms, he said, had invested several million dollars in facilities and advertising, and they did not propose to invite companies outside the association to share the benefits of their advertising benefits.
> He did not explain how it is that a number of United States firms which have not kicked in to the association since 1927 will be showing their cars.
> He might also explain how it is that at the world-famous Earl's Court motor show in London, an immeasurably fancier and more expensive show than any Canadian association is apt to venture into, there is a distinct section set aside for the display of Canadian-made cars.

That is good sportsmanship, and I think we ought to be exhibiting the same kind of sportsmanship in this country. If we expect Britain to buy from us, we have to be prepared to buy from her and to do so on a competitive basis, not some arbitrary basis that some of these people like to think up.

I need not point out at any length, Mr. Speaker, that we have hitched ourselves to a very uncertain market, that is the one in the United States. Events of the past ten months should have served to convince a lot of foolish people that the United States of America does not need too many of the products which Canada produces. Whenever it suits her purpose to do so, without any warning whatever, the United States is apt to throw up embargoes or tariffs to keep out Canadian production. The foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan gave her a perfect excuse for excluding Canadian meat products. There is no good reason in this world, except of course for the fact she does not need to import those products to Canada, why the embargo should have continued as long as it has. Our cheese was excluded from the United States last summer, and the consequences nearly ruined the cheese industry of central Canada. The United States seems to consider she is not bound by the Geneva trade agreement, although she would yell to high heaven if Canada were to exhibit such ideas and tendencies.

The Liberal government was very foolish and shortsighted to allow Canada to become dependent on these uncertain United States markets. As I said, I am not speaking from sentiment at all in this regard but from the necessity of restoring our traditional markets. It is largely from the sense of good business for Canada and Canadians, as well as from a well-founded belief that the British commonwealth, if it strengthens its ties and comes to a unity of purpose, will go far towards restoring balance and Christian decency in world trade. For seventeen years we Social Crediters have taken essentially this same position which, Mr. Speaker, gives the absolute lie to the statement that was made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) in my own constituency not so long ago when he attended a Liberal convention there. I wish he were in his seat right now, because I should like to talk to him pretty straight.

This is the same minister who, at the Liberal convention in Calgary, made the statement that if the government does not win the next election it will be because the government has been doing too good a job of statesmanship and not enough of playing politics. At the nominating convention in my constituency this self-styled statesman told the people that he believed Mr. Low's talk about empire ties and preferential tariffs for commonwealth countries was catering to British sentiment in Ontario. He said, "I don't think he is sincere."

Mr. McIlraith: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: I hear "hear, hear" from the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). I am sure, of course, that the people of this country, of the Peace river country and of Alberta, cannot lose sight of the fact that in making that claim the minister from Edmonton, who claimed that I am not sincere—this goes for the member for Ottawa West as well if that is what he meant by his "hear, hear"—was definitely getting off the path of statesmanship and down into the gutter of very questionable politics. Now, I ask who are they—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: I ask, who are they to deny anybody's sincerity?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps out of fairness to the hon. member I ought to say that I understood that in making the reference he did to the improvement in empire trade he was seeking to appeal to the British sentiment in Ontario; that was what I understood the quotation to be, and when he read the quotation I added the "hear, hear" because I agree.

Mr. Low: I wonder how long a man does have to keep pressing for the strengthening of the commonwealth and the restoration of our traditional market, that is the market the Liberals have thrown out the window, before he can convince the minister from Edmonton—there may be some others—that he is sincere. Certainly seventeen years ought to be sufficient. For seventeen years, Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit movement has been preaching the same doctrine, and it has not been for the mere purpose of catching votes in Ontario. We have taken that position because we sincerely believe it is the best way to build for peace and decency. It is also the best business for Canada.

It is now ten o'clock, sir, and I do not know what your desires are with respect to adjournment. I do have some time left, but if it is your desire I shall leave it until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 25, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FIRE

DAMAGE TO TOFINO AIR BASE—PRIVILEGE, MR. PEARKES

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) a question regarding the fire at Tofino and censorship—monitoring over government telephone lines—of information coming out of that village. In reply he said there was no censorship of any kind.

I have received information today by wire from Vancouver island which states: "Censorship by R.C.A.F. on west coast became worse today instead of better." Contrary to denials and apologies "a tight veil of secrecy is still maintained". Airmen are confined to barracks, I am informed, and civilians are forbidden to approach the area of the fire. Civilians of Tofino have been instructed by the R.C.A.F. to give out no information and to maintain a strict silence.

The government telephone operator is reported as claiming that she had been instructed that she was to allow no information about the fire to pass through her office at Tofino. However, the divisional superintendent at Vancouver did apologize, I am informed, for the monitoring and said that "he was sorry it had happened". In view of the above it would seem that the minister was not fully informed of all circumstances when he made his answer yesterday that there was no censorship of any kind. I would request that the matter be further investigated so that this house may be fully informed.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if a question of personal privilege was involved in the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), but in any event if he will table his message I will ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to inquire into the matter—of course with the signature of the sender.

Mr. Drew: That was an unnecessary comment.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pearkes: Before the orders of the day are called, may I have permission to table the telegram I have received from Mr. Seth Halton of Victoria, and requested by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe). I ask the leave of the house for it to be reprinted in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the telegram was read by the hon. member for Nanaimo?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow the telegram to be tabled. I do not think it is a public document. It is not customary to table telegrams.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Acting Prime Minister has asked that it be tabled. In conformity with that request it is now submitted, and it is therefore appropriate that the telegram be placed on record in the way suggested.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) was reading from a document. I think it is customary when reading from a document in the house that the document be tabled. I hope that will be permitted, but I know of no reason whatever why the telegram should be reprinted in Hansard.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Is that contention of the minister's correct? My understanding is that only when a document has been read by a minister must it be tabled. For example, I do not necessarily have to table a document if I read it.

Mr. Drew: Might I make a suggestion? That problem could be solved by the Acting Prime Minister reading the telegram.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the member for Nanaimo, if he would like the Acting Prime Minister to read the telegram, could send the telegram to him. Would that be satisfactory?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: I only read some short extracts from the telegram which I thought were pertinent to the case. There is a lot of information in it which the Acting Prime Minister is welcome to read, and which would probably cause some amusement in the house.

Tofino air base

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo is sending the telegram to the Acting Prime Minister. There is no provision for having the telegram appear in Hansard at this stage.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo asked me a question, and I could not be in the house when some reference was made to it today. I now have an interim report, but in view of the fact the hon. member seems to have other information I would be glad to get it from the Acting Prime Minister and will make an appropriate reply.

I should, however, supplement what I said yesterday by saying that at present Tofino is little more than a construction camp. Work there has been carried out by a nucleus of R.C.A.F. personnel from No. 2 construction and maintenance unit, Calgary. The rest of the personnel is civilian casual labour raised on the west coast. The R.C.A.F. detachment at Tofino is headed by a junior officer, a flying officer, who is directly responsible to the CMU organization in Calgary.

It is common practice for information in connection with any of the CMU projects to be given out by the parent unit in Calgary. Accordingly, when the fire occurred at Tofino, personnel there were told that information concerning the fire would be released by the responsible persons at the CMU in Calgary. I understand that the Calgary Herald and a press agency were given all available information.

There is one telephone into the construction camp at Tofino, and as far as the responsible R.C.A.F. personnel are concerned there has been no effort to monitor this telephone, nor has there been any monitoring of the telephone set up at the Calgary unit. Owing to the conditions in the Tofino area the telephone service has been very poor. This is the hon. member's constituency—

Mr. Gibson: No, it is mine.

Mr. Claxton: No doubt he knows more about the telephone service in this area than I do.

Mr. Pearkes: Those are government telephones, are they not?

Mr. Claxton: I do not know. At any rate, we have not been able to reach the station by long distance telephone during the last two days to obtain additional information.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT FOR FARM STORAGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935 (payment for farm storage).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is to change the Canadian Wheat Board Act to make it certain that producers in the designated area will be paid the regular storage charge for grain stored on the farm. The determination of the date from which payment is to commence is left to the Canadian wheat board, but the payment of such storage charges to producers is by this new subsection made compulsory.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS OR OFFICERS OF CORPORATIONS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act (liability of directors).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE

PAYMENT OF RURAL MAIL CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is it the intention of the government to refer the legislation respecting payment of rural mail carriers mentioned in the speech from the throne to the special committee which the Postmaster General indicated on June 9 would be set up this session?

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): This question is under consideration, and a decision will be made as to the appropriate manner of carrying out the project mentioned in the speech from the throne.

POSTAL SERVICE

SATURDAY AFTERNOON CLOSING—MEDICINE HAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I am sorry that I did not send him notice of it, but I imagine that he will be able to answer it. In view of the fact that the post office in the city of Medicine Hat is closed on Saturday afternoons, will he give serious consideration to keeping it open on those afternoons? It is a big handicap to the people to have to come in to the city on Saturdays.

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): I will take the question as notice and see what can be done about it.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENTS ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce give consideration to making an advance to producers, either through the wheat board or some other agency, for farm-stored grain that the producer is unable to market?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of no necessity for an advance on farm-stored grain in 1952. The wheat board is in process of distributing $158 million of final payments for the 1951 crop at the present time. Marketings of the 1952 crop are in larger volume than marketings of the 1951 crop were at this time last year. The present crop is of high grade, and therefore the payments to the producer are higher than last year. If additional funds are required, surely the grain stored on the farm or stored elsewhere is security for a loan from the bank, should that be necessary. I should think that this year, of all years, there is small requirement for a payment on farm-stored grain.

RADIO BROADCASTING

QUESTION AS TO ABOLITION OF LICENCE FEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue? When does he expect the government will be in a position to announce the abolition of the radio licence fee?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): That question is a matter of government policy, and an announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. Graydon: But it will be abolished.

KOREA

RATIONING OF AMMUNITION—QUESTION AS TO TANK REPLACEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of National Defence of which I have given him notice. First, are tanks used by Canadian forces in Korea so short of ammunition that they are permitted to fire only two shells per tank per day? Second, are Centurion tanks being obtained to replace the present equipment of the Lord Strathcona's Horse in Korea?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question I can say that during relatively static periods on any battlefront ammunition is rationed in the sense that guns of all types are allowed a certain number of rounds per day. That is so that they can build up stocks either to meet an attack or, as in this case, to meet the possible contingency of an ultimate armistice. We certainly are not going to give the number of rounds per day that are to be fired by any Canadian artillery until they have been fired. The hon. member knows very well indeed that it would be highly improper to do so even if it referred only to the Canadian forces. But in this case our ammunition is supplied from United States sources. We are on the United States supply line and get precisely the same treatment as the Americans get. I am sure that the American military authorities in the United Nations would be the first to refuse this information.

With regard to the second question, may I say that we are always considering possible developments in matters of equipment. The question of possible change from the Sherman tank which we are using in Korea is continuing to receive consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

HOTEL MANAGEMENT—DEMOTION OF ROBERT PITT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday of last week I was asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) whether I had received any complaint in connection with the transfer of the manager of the Fort Garry hotel to the Canadian National Railway hotel in Brandon. I replied that I had received no complaint. I was also asked whether an investigation had been made. I should now like to reply to that question.

I have not asked for any investigation about the recent transfer of Robert Pitt from the post of manager of the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg since this involves a matter of internal management of the railway. Such changes in official staff frequently arise in the course of managerial decision and are necessary to ensure the maintenance of a high standard of service and efficiency. The president of the railway informs me that recent changes in managers at the Fort Garry, Prince Edward and Prince Arthur hotels were made as a result of recommendations from the general manager of hotels of the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. Graydon: Is there not something more to the story than that?

[Later:]

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the Minister of Transport a supplemental question relating to the matter he has just raised in the house. May I ask him if he is satisfied in his own mind with the answer that was given by the Canadian National Railways and that it is just a routine matter so far as the movement of that manager is concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly satisfied that that is a proper explanation. Otherwise I would not have given the answer I gave a moment ago.

Mr. Graydon: Does the minister think that is the whole story?

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is easily satisfied.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, November 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, while I was speaking last evening an exchange occurred between me and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) in which it appeared that we misunderstood each other. The hon. member for Ottawa West was good enough to come up to my office to explain the situation; and although I was not there at the time—and I apologize for that fact—I learned his reasons and I now see that what I said certainly did not apply to him. I apologize to him for any injustice that may have been done him from what I said.

Not many months will pass until, no doubt, Canada is again locked in the struggle of a general election campaign. It is that fact which prompts me to make a few comments about certain questionable practices that appear to be taking root in the political campaigning in this country. What I have to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker, depends to quite a large degree upon the accuracy of reports that I have seen. If those reports are not true, I will certainly stand corrected because it is not my desire to hurt any person or to heap any injustice upon him.

During the week of November 11 in the by-elections in British Columbia, the leader of the C.C.F. sank into what I think is a vile type of campaigning which people generally despise and which they sincerely hope will not become a common practice in this country. He introduced what to my mind was a type of politics which might be acceptable in some countries that have got right down into the gutter, but that type certainly should have no further place than it has had in Canada.

The C.C.F. leader is reported to have declared from a public platform that the new British Columbia cabinet was "steeped in racial prejudice". Reports of his meeting quote him as further saying:

> . . . the social credit movement through its leader, Solon Low, has displayed anti-semitism and racial discrimination.

When British Columbia's Premier Bennett called upon Mr. Coldwell either to prove his charge against the British Columbia cabinet or to withdraw it, the C.C.F. leader not only refused to prove or to withdraw but replied with more of the same kind of thing.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege? First of all, I referred to the Social Credit movement, not to the British Columbia government. In the second place, I produced the proof of the statements that I then made.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, that of course puts an entirely different complexion upon what I have to say.

At Courtenay, following the first time that the charges were made, the leader of the C.C.F. repeated the same charges with some additions. Amongst these latter—that is, the additions—were two which concern me greatly, namely:

1. That he could prove that Low had preached racialism and anti-semitism; and

2. That Premier Ernest Manning of Alberta "had attacked the worth of the secret ballot".

It is most offensive and repulsive for me to have even to take notice of this depraved kind of politics.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman invited me to correct any misstatements. I am going to correct that misstatement that is made right now.

Mr. Low: If the hon. member will give me time to finish the statement, I will issue a challenge to him and give him plenty of opportunity.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor; and I may say that my time is limited.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to abide by the rules of the house. The challenge issued to me would not give me the opportunity of replying on privilege. I want to reply, on a question of privilege, to a misstatement which is made.

Mr. Low: I hold that there is no question of privilege until I have made my statement.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member has now made it.

Mr. Low: I have made only one part of it and I wish to continue. I say that it is most offensive and repulsive for me to have to take notice of this—and I repeat it—depraved kind of politics, because I like to occupy my mind with higher and better things. But if we did not take notice, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman might be encouraged to go about the country using the same cesspool methods and claiming that because we did not reply to him we are guilty. By sinking into this type of campaigning the C.C.F. leader was acknowledging the utter inability to answer real social credit claims and policies. He recognized thereby and admitted the inferiority of the C.C.F. More than that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is using quite strong language when he uses the words "cesspool methods". There is no objection from the house, but I think it would be better probably if language not so strong were used in the debate.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is the kind he uses all the time.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly withdraw anything that is objectionable to this house. I do not wish in any way to offend, but I want to be just as strong about this matter as the law will allow because, Mr. Speaker, it is most offensive. I will withdraw the word "cesspool". I will say this. In doing the thing that he did in that campaign the leader of the C.C.F. party displayed that the spirit which activates at least a portion of the C.C.F. is the evil and destructive spirit of communism. I deny—

Mr. Coldwell: I object to that statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Low: I deny most vehemently that I have ever preached, reflected or displayed in the actions of my life either racial discrimination or anti-semitism.

Mr. Coldwell: I have the proof here.

Mr. Low: I deny that the British Columbia Social Credit cabinet is steeped in racial prejudice. I deny that Premier Ernest Manning ever at any time attacked the worth of the secret ballot, and I challenge the C.C.F. leader to take the opportunity right here in this house to establish the truth of those charges.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Low: He cannot establish the truth of those charges.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared immediately to accept that challenge.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The rules of the house do not provide an opportunity at this time for the hon. member to meet the challenge.

Mr. Low: I finish by declaring that he cannot establish those charges because they are falsehoods, every one of them.

Mr. Coldwell: I hold the proof in my hand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps on another occasion the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will be given an opportunity to answer the charges. As I have previously said, the rules of the house do not provide for an answer to be given at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: May I do it on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It is not a question of privilege within the rules of the house.

Mr. Coldwell: I will do it on a future occasion.

Mr. Low: That will be wonderful, sir, and we shall be prepared to meet him head on.

Mr. Coldwell: "Head on," my foot.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, in his lengthy speech yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated considerable comfort in what he and quite a number of witnesses he produced thought was the solid strength and vitality of Canada. I believe that the Prime Minister was sincere in what he said. I would not accuse him of insincerity, and I would not want to take away from him, nor try to minimize, any credit that is coming to him for what part he and his government may have played in bringing Canada to the position of one of the leading countries of the world. But while I grant his sincerity, I cannot agree with him in all that he said, that all is as well as he implied. There are a good many things that appear to have escaped the Prime Minister's attention.

In the first place, the present prosperity is underwritten by billions being spent for armaments. David Lawrence, in the U.S. News and World Report, said recently:

> It makes one shudder to think what the sudden outbreak of peace might mean to the American economy.

Well, I fervently hope, for the sake of the fathers and mothers and families of our gallant boys in Korea and in our armed services in Europe and in other places, that an armistice will be signed very soon so that they can come back into civilian life. Yet, it makes me shudder to think what the sudden outbreak of peace might mean to the Canadian economy. The question naturally arises in my mind: Are we ready for peace? That is a question which the Prime Minister did not deal with in his speech.

Although Canada appears to be enjoying unparalleled prosperity and high prestige throughout the world, the Canadian people are in a state of revolt against the governmental futility in the face of national and world problems which the old parties do not know how to solve. An ever-increasing number of the human race are feeling the pinch of a strange economic era. Ours is indeed a weird civilization, floundering in a sea of paradox.

There is widespread poverty, insecurity and ignorance in the world today, in the midst of potential world abundance. Half of the human race are always hungry. In the face of this tragic fact, Canadians are not producing anything like the quantities of foodstuffs and other materials that they could produce. Two main reasons for this situation are these: The failure of the government to hold out proper incentive by adopting stabilized prices and less discouraging taxes; and the fact that the Liberal party would not know what to do with the production if it were brought into existence. They have not yet begun to solve the problem of distribution either nationally or internationally. Maldistribution remains humanity's worst disease. It dogs every country and every people, not because there is no solution, but because political parties in power are unwilling to adopt the only measures that can cure the disease.

Consequently, there is in Canada a deep discontent with political parties that fail to get things done. That discontent is directed particularly against the Liberal party because in 17 years in office it has done little towards curing the disease of maldistribution. No matter how joyously a political party sweeps into power, nor with how great a majority it takes over the reins of government, it must deliver the goods if it is going to stay there. This Liberal government has not delivered the goods. Consequently, there is a deep and widespread feeling of futility and I maintain, sir, that that feeling of futility will sweep the Liberals out of office because they have not learned the lessons of the great depression and of their own election experiences of the past.

Maldistribution is still a great and disturbing problem even today in Canada, and although our self-styled, or some of our self-styled Liberal statesmen congratulate themselves on what they have done, the people know that underneath all the froth and the frills we are very little nearer a cure for the maldistribution disease than we were fifteen years ago. I am going to produce a few evidences to support that claim.

The first one is this: After a good many years of nagging we got this government last year to bring in Bill No. 181, which provided a somewhat better deal for our disabled war veterans. The maximum amount of the allowance was increased up to $90 a month for a married veteran, but serious injustice was done when the means test was inserted into the act that put an unfair ceiling on the income that one of those disabled heroes could earn in a year. That was measly and stingy treatment of the men who served this country as well as these old sweats did. But every red-blooded Canadian was outraged when the government's new regulations under the act were issued late in the summer. The net effect of these parsimonious regulations is that one of these veterans may work for 20 eight-hour days in a month, and yet increase his total allowable income by only $8, which is actually 5 cents an hour for the time worked. I ask, sir, if that is fair and just distribution of the abundance that Canadians can produce. We will let the people of this country decide.

We in this corner of the house press strongly for a standing committee on veterans affairs, and for the immediate removal of the means test from war veterans allowances. There is no good physical reason why these married disabled veterans should not be receiving $120 a month instead of $90, without the means test. I claim there is a potential market, right there, among these old soldiers and their families, for Canadian production that has not been exploited as it should have been. I speak of the market there available. We should hang our heads in shame for the treatment we have meted out to these old fellows.

Then, secondly, the government takes credit for vast improvement in the lot of Canada's aged citizens as a consequence of the recent Old Age Assistance Act and the universal pensions for those over 70. But everybody knows that the maximum pension of $40 today will buy only about the amount of food, clothing and shelter that $20 would buy fifteen years ago. So our aged citizens are not much, if any, better off than they were back in 1938 or 1939. And right there, again, is a vast market for any surpluses that appear in Canada, a market among our senior citizens, if we have gumption enough to supply them with the purchasing power.

Then, third, let us take the case of the many thousands of crippled unemployables or crippled folk who are willing to work, but who are not able to earn a living because so many sensitive souls do not like to see them working where they are visible. What has the government done for them? Nothing—and there are many thousands of them. These folk met with tragedy, or were not endowed by nature successfully to earn a decent living in competition with physically well workers. They are our brethren in the big human family which acknowledges God as father. It is our duty, and it should be our pleasure to help the members of our family to enjoy a decent living. Right there, again, is a potential market for much of what we can produce. Social justice demands action to distribute to these needy people what they need for some sort of joyful living.

Then, the fourth point is this: I would remind the government that during the war the farmers of Canada were promised stabilized prices on a long-term basis in return for an agreement to furnish wheat to Britain and to Canadian millers at a price considerably lower than what could be realized in the world markets. The farmers kept their part of the bargain, but the government did not. As a consequence last year, for example, the farmers of Canada, who number about twenty per cent of our total population, received less than ten per cent of the national income.

There is a glaring example of maldistribution. Farm prices have been going down, but machinery, repair and supplies prices have been going up, thus ever widening the gap between what the farmers receive for their efforts and what they have to pay for the things they have to buy. The futility among the farmers engendered by this situation has been very materially increased by the government's farmer income tax policy, and the fact that federal support on beef played very largely into the hands of the packers, not the farmers, and gave our cattle producers little or no relief at all from a situation arising out of our loss of the United States market last spring. The feelings of farmers today toward the Liberal party are not the kind of feelings, I can assure you, that put political parties back into power.

Finally, mismanagement by the Liberal government of those things which have caused the serious decline in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar has put many thousands of retired and superannuated Canadians, and others who have to live on fixed incomes, in a very serious position. Their effective incomes have become just half what they were in 1945. Real suffering and deprivation exist with many of them. Here again the maldistribution disease has struck with evil consequence both to the individual in the fixed income class and to the nation as a whole. I could go on to cite other instances, but I see my time has expired.

Let me say this in conclusion. Surely it is important, if we are going to get things done, not to be swept aside from our asserted purpose into paths of expediency, as we so often are. That expediency has been the cause of much of the futility that exists among the Canadian people.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, hon. members and cabinet ministers, it is a great thrill to an Irishman to see a good battle, even though it has not gone farther than a verbal contest. I congratulate both leaders of the groups in the corner of the chamber on the fight they are putting up. I almost thought I was in British Columbia.

May I extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I thought they did a good job, and noted that they did not forget their own constituencies.

I do not know whom to thank for the honour of being permitted to sit beside a wearer of the Victoria Cross, but I esteem it a high honour indeed. As I think of these two members who wear the Victoria Cross, I pause to wonder at our good fortune that they have been spared to come to us on this side of the river Jordan.

I make this special reference because I wish particularly to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), as well as his deputy minister, Dr. Arthur MacNamara, upon the work they did recently. It will be recalled that Dr. MacNamara was appointed conciliator in a serious strike at the lakehead, one which affected not only the workers and the elevator owners but also the farmers of western Canada. He did an outstanding job for both sides, and there was no strike. That is the kind of work we like our government departments to do.

This brings me to the statement of my belief, that the time is due when strikes should be obliterated. But they will not be wiped out until something better is put in their place. We should be able to suggest what it should be. My suggestion would be that industry and business concerns should give their workers fair salaries and a share of the profits. Where this has been tried it has worked effectively, not only to the advantage of the workers but also to the advantage of the government in the receipt of greater taxes, and to that of the industries concerned through higher income.

I have here a letter which deals with the Lincoln Electric Company of Cleveland, Ohio, showing that in that organization the salaries of the workers almost doubled, and that at the same time the company's income doubled, with a resulting increased taxation to the government.

This is the cure for strikes; and when we have men in business, as we have today in Fort William, who are prepared to give this scheme a try, there is hope that strikes will be a thing of the past.

Strikes are like wars in that they are a form of coercion. A strike or a shut-down is simply a use of force, and does not result in good relations between workers and management. Directors of companies would be well advised to consider a situation in which workers and management would share in the profits.

Turning to the speech from the throne, let me say I was one of those who stood in the Senate chamber behind Mr. Speaker for about forty-five minutes when the speech from the throne was delivered in that chamber. Is there any cure? I suggest that the cure would be to have the speech delivered in one language only. I do not think a speech from the throne is any more important than our time of worship in this house. His Excellency the Governor General through the speech from the throne delivers a message from the government to the Senate and to hon. members of this house while our Speaker addresses the King of Kings. If our prayers are delivered in just the one language, why could not the speech from the throne be delivered in English one year and in French the next.

I should like to say a word about the government. I realize that I sit on this side of the house and if I did not agree with the government I would have no business being here. This government has done an outstanding job by having been in power since 1935, during the course of one war and the preparations for another, without there being one accusation of graft in the speeches yesterday. I think the President of the United States should be sending scouts to this country to find out how this government has been able to do this. I think this is a marvellous performance considering all the contracts that have been let and the amount of money that has been spent.

There are three things in the speech from the throne with which I am greatly pleased. The first is the consideration that is being given to war veterans. I am going to suggest one thing in this connection, that a war veteran in receipt of a pension—the pension is never large—should be allowed to keep a roomer or boarder in his home. This would not hurt the government in any way; it would not take a dollar from the government, in fact it would help the government. I know that some hon. members have read in the Legion's magazine that this practice is denied to certain veterans and they are not permitted to keep boarders or roomers. If they were their small incomes would be supplemented.

I was pleased to see that retired civil servants are going to receive some consideration. I hope that consideration will also be given to the widows of civil servants and that their pensions will be increased.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, the government in carrying out public works is going to employ anybody. I suppose this means that red, white or yellow will be employed provided they do a decent day's work. They will then get a decent day's pay and be employed.

We had a serious accident at the lakehead this fall in the form of a terrible elevator explosion. With your permission I should like to read an article by T. E. Irons of 404 Kingsway, Fort William, Ontario. This man is an elevator worker with considerable experience over many years and he knows elevator work from the inside. I think this article will be a revelation to you as it was to me. It reads:

> Way back in 1930 in Port Colborne, Ontario, a grain elevator owned and operated by the Canadian government exploded. The building was badly damaged and there were some workers killed. Not a great deal of significance was placed on the disaster and it was soon forgotten, at least outside of Port Colborne.
> In 1944, the Aberdeen elevator at Tiffin, Ontario, exploded, causing great damage and killing six employees. Almost a thousand miles to the west, at the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William, this second explosion caused little stir, despite the fact that these two cities had the greatest concentration of grain elevators on the continent. Such disasters could not happen here. The eastern atmosphere conditions were different and the fact that corn was being handled at the time the explosions occurred was generally accepted as the cause; therefore no undue alarm was in evidence at the lakehead.
> A little more than a year passed, then on August 7, 1945 the thing that couldn't happen, did happen. Saskatchewan pool elevator No. 5 in Port Arthur exploded. The giant building was all but demolished and twenty-three men lost their lives. When the blast occurred, refuse screenings were being loaded into a lake vessel.

This catastrophe created a tremendous stir among elevator men all over the country, and it was unanimously agreed that something must be done to prevent another such disaster. The elevator was rebuilt, hundreds of thousands of dollars spent on the installation of the finest dust-collecting machinery that could be obtained, and the best engineering skill employed in an effort to eliminate the danger. They knew the culprit that had caused the destruction and loss of life. It was dust!

For the next seven years it seemed as though they had the problem licked. Then, on September the 24th of this year, without any warning disaster struck again. A few minutes after the noon check-off for lunch, Saskatchewan pool elevator No. 4A exploded.

Six men died, one of them a member of the crew of the S.S. Bayton which was being loaded at the time with refuse screenings. The building was extensively damaged by the blast and the S.S. Bayton sustained heavy damage from the hundreds of tons of concrete that crashed on her deck. That only one man was killed aboard the boat was a miracle. Had the blast occurred just a few minutes earlier scores of men who had checked out would still have been in the building and the death toll would have been appallingly higher.

Experts from all parts will try to ferret out what caused the fatal blast, but whatever it was that set it off, the culprit is the same as in all previous cases, dust. The best of dust collecting machinery, and the skilful engineering that went into its installation, had failed! What next can be done?

It will be noted that in both of these Port Arthur elevators the explosions occurred during the shipping of refuse screenings. These screenings are just about what the name implies, refuse, and by Canadian government statute the processing of them is forbidden in Canada.

The main content of this refuse screenings is noxious weeds, dust, chaff, and straw knuckles. The danger of noxious weeds finding their way back to the farm in the processed animal feeds is the main reason for the ban, which has been clamped tightly for many decades.

Fortunately for the elevator companies the United States government has no such qualms and American processors buy up all the screenings our elevators produce. Our Canadian government experts are also concerned about the wild mustard seed content in refuse screenings, and frown upon the damage that might be done to the stomachs of livestock after eating the processed article. Livestock in the United States has been fed on it for many years without ill effect, otherwise its use would long since have been banned there also.

Proper and efficient grinding of noxious weeds destroys any tendency to germinate and, if the wild mustard content is too high, this can be reduced by blending with other components that go into the finished product.

We have men in Canada with the knowledge and skill needed to process these screenings into cattle feed and in the light of what has happened to life and property it is time for a drastic change in the present set-up.

First, the government should repeal any and all laws that forbid the processing of refuse screenings in Canada. Not next year, but now. With the green light giving the go-ahead, enough capital would soon be forthcoming to build an up-to-date processing plant at the lakehead. The cost of the two explosions that have already struck would build such a factory many times over.

Let us now look at what this would mean. Under present conditions grain elevators have to store refuse screenings until a vast quantity accumulates, before a vessel docks to load it. These large quantities take many hours to elevate to the shipping bins, and only those who have worked at shipping refuse screenings can know how much dust they create. The longer it takes for a shipment to be completed, the heavier the dust suspension becomes, until apparently the dust collectors cannot cope with the overload. Under normal conditions the handling of grain does not produce anything like the dust suspension that refuse screenings do, and the danger point is not even approached. Evidently, during a shipment of screenings, a danger point is reached—not always, but all too often—and a spark is all that is needed to cause an explosion.

Many things may cause such a spark. Pool 4A had magnets that picked up any stray nail or piece of metal that is often found in grain entering an elevator. Unfortunately, stones are sometimes found in the grain and a magnet would not attract these. A stone striking a steel bucket could cause a spark. Static electricity is also suspected, and the experts may come up with something on this. Grain elevating machinery travels at high speed and a steel bucket may become loosened, they sometimes do, and strike the steel casing through which it runs and cause a spark. There is also the careless smoker. And I hope that these disasters never take place through his cigarette causing a spark.

With a processing plant at the head of the lakes, no such protracted shipping would be necessary. One small bin would be all that was needed, and when enough was accumulated, it could be loaded into a box car and switched to the processing plant. This would mean that at no time would the screenings be in process of transfer for more than half an hour or thereabouts, and no great dust suspension would occur in that time.

To prevent the ordinary work of the day being delayed, the screenings could be loaded at night when no other grain is being handled and the amount of dust is at a minimum. If it should appear that the dust suspension was getting too great for safety, the screenings could be shut off and time given for the dust to clear before resuming the shipment. This shutting-down procedure would not work during the loading of a large amount into a boat because the delays would disrupt the whole day's work.

The scheme as outlined in the foregoing is a drastic departure from present methods but no change would be too drastic if it would put an end to these death-dealing explosions.

As long as we have grain elevators, we will have refuse screenings, and looking back at the havoc wrought by it, some other method of handling it safely is imperative. Elevators can be rebuilt, but lives lost cannot be replaced. Whether the suggestions contained herein are acted upon or not depends upon the government.

Mr. Speaker, men lose their lives in these explosions. No amount of dust screenings of wheat will compare with the life of an individual. Therefore, I ask for two things. I ask that these screenings be placed in a separate bin from the elevator. I ask that something be done for the men, that a commission be set up, and that this thing should be thoroughly investigated by the government in an attempt to eliminate the possibility of this ever happening again. Then we ask that the ban on screenings in Canada be lifted and that we be allowed to have a processing plant at the lakehead. This explosion created a terrific effect in Fort William and some people are inclined to blame the government. However, you will find that the smaller elevators, especially the elevators near where I live in West Fort William, have had no explosions because they do not allow their screenings to become piled up. It was only when they were piled up in this big elevator of the Saskatchewan pool that the least little thing would cause an explosion and away she would go. So much for the explosion.

There are those in this house who are interested in health insurance, Mr. Speaker. For two years I sat on a committee and we heard experts from all over the world—England, Sweden, New Zealand. A bill was drawn up, and I thought it was a good bill, whereby there would be a contributory pension and an individual could choose his own doctor—the Christian Scientists choosing their own practitioner. Why was it not put in force by the dominion government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIvor: The reason was, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) would agree, that the provinces would not co-operate and the dominion government had no right to put this scheme across over the heads of the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: It was never submitted to the provinces.

Mr. McIvor: We have some things at the lakehead of which we are very proud. We have several bands and the chamber of commerce thought it wise to send our girls' pipe band—a very large number of girls are in the band and they would be a credit to any city—to Las Vegas, Nevada, for the sixteenth annual convention of the Variety Clubs International. These are the findings of those who were there: Mr. Jacob Kozloff, general chairman of Variety Clubs International: "The girls did a magnificent job—they were so co-operative and pleasant to work with—and we feel that your government should be proud indeed to have such outstanding representatives. The girls' pipe band certainly did more than their share to make our convention a successful one—and we hope we may again have the pleasure of seeing and hearing them in the not too distant future."

Mr. J. J. Chisholm, international delegate and past chief barker of the Variety Club, Toronto, comments: "The girls 'stole the show'. Everybody was extremely interested in the band and their performance could not be excelled. It made the Canadian delegation feel mighty proud to be Canadians when they saw that splendid band perform. I would definitely go on record to say that they did an outstanding public relations job for Canada and the Canadian government could well afford to subsidize this band and send them on a tour of the United States to help in bringing tourists to Canada. You people at the head of the lakes are to be congratulated on supporting this group of lovely and talented girls..."

The girls are not only fine to look at but they are born musicians. They are a credit to Canada and I hope the government will do something to help them make a tour of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention one or two things Fort William needs. We need two deliveries of mail a day by our post office.

Mrs. Fairclough: Who doesn't?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIvor: I am one of those who, when the one-a-day delivery was inaugurated, did not get their mail until the afternoon. For one who is not at home in the afternoon it is just like having the mail a day later. I think the time has come when the post office should go back to the two-a-day delivery. Surely the dominion government is not broke. The post office will pay for itself and we should have two-a-day deliveries.

We have difficulties with our Trans-Canada Air Lines service. When you find a double load lining up for the trip east or the trip west then it is time we should have a double line. This is a resolution sponsored by the Fort William city council:

> That overtures be made to Trans-Canada Air Lines for an additional daily flight to the lakehead in order to relieve the present passenger space shortage experienced locally for eastbound flights to Toronto and westbound flights to the lakehead from Toronto;

We hope that the management of Trans-Canada Air Lines will take this into consideration.

We have been trying for about seventeen years to get a breakwater in front of island No. 2 and we think it is nearer now than it ever was. I could have had delegations down here to meet the minister concerned but I have not called them as yet. We think the breakwater is absolutely necessary for the protection of logs for our pulp, paper, saw mills and industrial development.

Another need is to have the Pigeon River customs office open the year round for the many people going into the lakehead. An outstanding need which I reported to the board of transport commissioners is the need for a railway crossing at Raith, on both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railway. In the winter the children will stand there shivering while a freight train is there, or they will crawl through the cars at the risk of their lives. We believe that this is an absolute necessity, in view of the fact that on the other side of the tracks there is a vast tourist area ready to be opened up.

Of course, we need a federal building in Fort William, but I shall not say much about that now. I wish to congratulate the ministers of the government on the splendid work they have been doing. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) were in the house I would tell him that he and his department have done a good job in cleaning up the foot-and-mouth disease, notwithstanding the fact that some people thought they were slow. This job has been accomplished with more speed than in any other country afflicted with this disease.

I could speak of the work of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the work he has done in extending hospital facilities. I could speak of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and how he is looking after these big combines and bringing them to book. I could speak of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the wonderful work he has been doing.

I should like to say a word about the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He has been receiving outstanding honours. He has been placed in positions in which no one else has been placed up to the present time. I should like to tell the minister that a great honour awaits him on Saturday when he will be appointed by that group of athletes looking after the rugby union of Canada to give the first kick to the ball that will set the game in motion. I congratulate him on this outstanding honour.

I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) upon the great honour bestowed on him, and upon Canada, when he was chosen as president of the United Nations. We admire the minister's ability, his courtesy and his straightforward way in presenting facts. We also admire him for his personal life, clean and manly.

This brings me to something I thought I should have said last year. No one, Mr. Speaker, will accuse me of being a pious sissy, because there is no other man in the house who has had the opportunity of sobering up more intoxicated men than I have had. In fact, I once brought home the principal of a school to spend a week end. Our little girl came trotting in and out and then said, "I wonder why Dad brought that man home, he is not drunk." I will say this. It has been reported to me that before our men go into our international committee meetings they have three or four drinks of something better than ginger ale. I feel that this thing should be cleaned up. Our magistrate will fine a man if he is driving an automobile or a truck after consuming one or two beers. Compare the driving of a truck with driving the machinery of the nation.

It is well known that when some men take three or four drinks they become very happy. They will agree with everything in order to have a good time. Other men who drink believe that they can fight their weight in wildcats. There are still other men who, when they have a few drinks, become temporarily very tragic. They will agree with no one. I do not wonder why the Russians do not agree with anything at the United Nations. If a man wants to drink, let him drink on his own time and at his own expense. Let him go into the committees with a clear brain, his trust in God, and let him do his duty in a way that will be a credit to the nation.

I have one other word of commendation for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The cobalt bomb at London, Saskatoon and other places is doing marvellous work. At the lakehead not long ago there was a young lady who worked for the federal resources department. She was stricken with cancer, and just before she died she requested that a cobalt bomb should come to the lakehead. Through the generosity of someone I cannot name, we expect, before the year passes, that we shall have a cobalt bomb at the lakehead.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having been so patient with me and not calling me to order. I feel it a great honour to represent Fort William, which we think is progressive and clean, and one of the finest cities in Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, may I, at the very beginning of my remarks, pay tribute to the memory of one who shed such lustre on politics in French Canada and who represented the constituency of Labelle in this house for a very great number of years. I refer to Henri Bourassa.

Naturally I was not privileged, as were some of those who sit here tonight, to witness the political struggle he led in the federal as well as in the provincial fields. Nevertheless I have the very great honour of being one of his successors as a representative of the constituency of Labelle in the House of Commons.

I take pride moreover in the fact that, in the last few years of his life, he was so kind as to honour me with his friendship; I was so fortunate as to receive from him, not only some discreet advice, but words of kindness and encouragement which I shall never forget.

A long time before his death, Mr. Henri Bourassa belonged to history. He was a great speaker, an outstanding scholar as well as an exemplary Christian and sincere patriot. I do not intend to give an account of his career at this time. On his death, the newspapers recalled the memorable events of his extremely fruitful life.

Mr. Henri Bourassa did have adversaries and even today one may question many of the stands he took. However, in my opinion, he was above all an awakener, and even now the mere fact of recalling his memory sometimes re-awakens a patriotism which tends to slumber. He was an awakener for the French-Canadians and also for all Canadians without any hyphen. Many were those who did not understand him, who thought he was a mere anti-imperialist and anti-conscriptionist. They judged him too fast and it was comforting indeed, the very day after his death, to see two of the most important newspapers in this country, the Winnipeg Free Press and the Windsor Daily Star, following the example of many others, do justice to his memory in these terms:

His speeches against the sending of Canadian troops to the Boer war were regarded as infamous by many Canadians, and even now he has a black mark from many historians. Yet, read now, years after the fire has cooled, these utterances do not sound so mischievous or narrowly isolationist. In fact, they bear a very close resemblance, in spirit, if not in tone, to what Liberals like John Morley and Lloyd George were saying at the time about the unjust and unnecessary Boer war.

The Windsor Daily Star of September 3, 1952, wrote as follows:

Mr. Henri Bourassa . . . may be only a name to the younger generation of Canadians. Yet the constitutional situation under which we live owes much to his influence. Mr. Bourassa fought ardently, forgoing prospects of power and position, for what most Canadians now accept as natural and normal . . .

. . . Mr. Bourassa was an anti-imperialist. But his anti-imperialism wasn't so much anti-British as pro-Canadian. And most every Canadian today would be opposed to the imperialism of another era against which Mr. Bourassa railed.

Mr. Bourassa's voice has been still in recent years, perhaps partially due to advancing years. Primarily, however, it was because the fight was won. Most of his constitutional ambitions, except, perhaps, a distinctive national flag and national anthem, have been realized.

Indeed, was it not he who, speaking before the Canadian Club of Toronto, said:

There is a patriotism for Ontario, a patriotism for Quebec and a patriotism for western Canada, each of them based on the hope that they may be able to engulf the others, but there is no Canadian patriotism, and there can be no Canadian nation as long as there is no Canadian patriotism.

These words were uttered forty-five years ago. True, they may not be as topical today as they were then, but they remain, nevertheless, those of a real Canadian. They constitute an eloquent plea for properly conceived national unity.

For almost twenty years within the period stretching between 1896 and 1935, Mr. Henri Bourassa sat for the constituency of Labelle in the House of Commons. He has never had and indeed never will have a really worthy successor. Nevertheless, I knelt upon his grave and pledged myself to respect the memory of this great Canadian by attempting to profit from the lessons of dignity, courage, sincerity and patriotism which he taught this whole country.

I have already expressed my personal sympathy to the bereaved but I should like to repeat it publicly in this house, where the memory of this great figure will long endure.

The future editions of the Canada Year Book will no doubt include a chapter entitled "History and Chronology", and among the events of 1952, there will be a note mentioning that it was on September 6 of that year that television made its debut in Canada on the occasion of the opening, in Montreal, of station CBFT.

I admit that September 6 will remain a memorable date in our history; however, it is a very sad one indeed, when we recall what happened on that day. We were glad that at last television had come to our homes, and we were able to enjoy every day different programs without having to bestir ourselves. But, while enjoying this pleasure, we could not but think that the government had just created a new state monopoly; that it had just strengthened bureaucracy by striking a terrible blow to free initiative and enterprise in Canada.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has indeed the monopoly in the field of television. That organization—which is a corporation of socialistic inspiration, in the words of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque)—already reigns supreme in the field of radio broadcasting but, as far as television is concerned, it is still worse. We have here a perfect state monopoly, a state monopoly of the most dangerous kind, which is incompatible with our democratic system.

In the case of radio, a control is imposed, a control which is unjust and iniquitous, but which remains only a control, whereas, with television, we have nothing short of state management. For the time being, at least, there is no question of control of television, but only of state television. We believe that in permitting the creation of such a trust the federal government has taken another step, a giant step this time, on the road to socialism. The Liberals, socialists who are not quite in such a great hurry as our C.C.F. friends, are getting to be just as much in a hurry as the C.C.F. Unfortunately, this haste is not confined only to the field of broadcasting and television; however, I shall only speak, today, of this one question, which is sufficient to show that the path followed at present by the Liberals is fraught with many dangers.

One cannot raise the question of television in Canada without including broadcasting, and this for two reasons. First, television is a technical improvement on broadcasting and secondly, as I said a few moments ago, in our country the body which controls broadcasting also reigns supreme over television.

Strange as it may seem to some people, in Canada we enjoyed radio programs even before the radio broadcasting corporation was born. Indeed, even if today control of production and distribution is too often in the hands of bureaucracy, the fact remains that prior to the creation of the numerous bodies set up by the government there existed many splendid and valuable things which we owed to free enterprise.

As far back as in 1919, we had radio stations in Canada. A few days ago, station CKAC, one of the most important in this country, celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of its foundation. This pioneer broadcasting station, after humble beginnings, soon progressed and developed.

Without asking the smallest fee from its audience and of course without deriving any of its revenues from taxes, but relying only on its own merits to produce revenues and balance its budget, station CKAC became a prosperous venture which gained public support, and I mean by that the support of both the élite and the common people. Station CKAC, like all other private radio stations, has had to withstand the unfair and unjust competition as well as the undue control of the C.B.C., but with the support of the public, it has overcome all obstacles.

Its history is somewhat the same as that of all private radio stations, the history of the triumph of individual efficiency over state inefficiency.

Radio was therefore established in Canada before the government decided to interfere with it. In 1929, a royal commission under the direction of Sir John Aird made an investigation into the field of radio and recommended nothing less than the socialization of radio broadcasting. At that time 62 private stations were already operating in Canada. A wave of strong protests swept the country and the government did not dare carry out the recommendations of the Aird commission. Three years later, though, parliament, basing itself, at least in part, on the Aird report, established the Canadian radio broadcasting commission and gave it regulating and controlling powers over radio broadcasting in Canada. Had we gone no further than to create that commission, it is likely that we would not have to complain today of state dictatorship over radio broadcasting. However, in 1936, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was established and given much wider powers than its predecessor, the Canadian radio broadcasting commission.

Let us say in the first place that there is nothing more erroneous, more dangerous nor more iniquitous than the way radio broadcasting is controlled by the C.B.C. There is no appeal from C.B.C. control, which means the exercise of a right of life or death over all stations. One perhaps could bear with that, were it not that the C.B.C. is itself engaged in broadcasting and operates a radio network which competes unfairly and intolerably with private stations.

The C.B.C. is not only the prosecutor, it is also the judge. The board of transport commissioners controls the railroads of the country, but operates none. The C.B.C. controls radio broadcasting and also owns broadcasting stations. If that is not socialism, I wonder what it is.

The C.B.C. can impose its own programs on private stations. Private stations are compelled to pay costly licence fees to the C.B.C. for each of their transmitters and the C.B.C. uses those revenues to build stations of its own that will compete with private enterprise. The C.B.C. does not have to worry about its finances: it can always dig into the federal coffers filled by the taxes we pay. The C.B.C. compels every owner of a receiving set to pay a licence fee of $2.50, whether or not he listens to C.B.C. programs. The whole of that amount goes to the C.B.C., the expenses entailed by the sale of licences being paid by the taxpayers. The C.B.C. controls every word that is broadcast over its stations. Anyone wanting to be heard throughout the country must necessarily go to the C.B.C. The C.B.C. is in a position to attract the largest advertisers, those who pay best since it is able to cut prices, not having to worry about deficits and being alone empowered to co-ordinate the broadcasting of programs over one or several networks.

Of course, the C.B.C. at the outset was to be satisfied with limited income from advertising.

In 1938, the Minister of Transport made the following statement in the house:

It is not the desire or intention of the corporation at any time to obtain a revenue of over $500,000 from commercial sources for reasons that are obvious.

But the nationalized broadcasting system has become more voracious. It is no more a lamb peacefully cropping the grass. It is a lion always claiming the biggest share, and even going so far as to claim everything.

I find in Relations of July 1947, at page 195, the following excerpt:

The C.B.C. has an increasing appetite, and this is threatening to overshadow its actual services for more widespread broadcasting and better quality radio programs. The private broadcasting organizations are, in this country, a safeguard for free speech. Public opinion must not spare them its support, even if it has to reprimand them severely, when they don't measure up to their standards and shirk their responsibilities. Public opinion must in particular assert its desire to see implemented in facts the recommendations contained in their brief.

The reference is to a brief submitted by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, which was neither the first nor the last of its kind.

Therefore, in 1938, it was agreed that the C.B.C. would limit itself to a revenue of $500,000 derived from commercial advertising and other sources.

In 1940, two short years later, the limit had already been exceeded by $273,521.89; that is to say that the C.B.C. had derived $773,521.89 from commercial advertising. In 1945, they reached $1,639,159.97, or more than three times the amount set as a maximum. At the end of March 1948, the amount had climbed to $1,842,558.29, and at the end of March 1949, it had reached $2,217,129.91. According to the last report submitted by the C.B.C., for the period from April 1, 1951 to March 31, 1952, revenues under "Commercial Broadcasting" amounted to $2,456,431.92. In other words, we are far from the half-million limit suggested at first and we are getting further away from it every day, just as we are getting further away from the original good will of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as the grievances voiced by the private stations seem to suggest. The C.B.C. is continuously increasing its dictatorship through a type of competition more unfair and a type of control more unjust than ever before.

It is therefore easy to imagine the spirit in which the C.B.C. received, in 1948, the first requests for the establishment of private television broadcasting stations. It was then evident that federal bureaucracy, that had not yet succeeded in nationalizing fully and completely radio broadcasting, was determined to set up a state monopoly in the field of television.

It was then learned that the C.B.C. would not permit private enterprise to establish television stations until it had done so itself and that it would then think about the matter. Several years ago, many private radio stations were ready to enter the field of television without asking one cent from Canadian taxpayers. But the C.B.C. flatly refused to let them do so. That is why we are enjoying television several years after our neighbours of the United States.

The royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences which proved to be so useful to the Liberals in allowing them to launch a new drive for centralization and commit further encroachments upon provincial autonomy has equally served to promote the establishment of a state monopoly or government dictatorship in the field of television.

At page 300 of their report they say:

We think the same principles of national control —those applying to radio broadcasting—should be applied to television broadcasting . . .

The commissioners make, among others, the following recommendations which may be found at page 303:

(a) That direction and control of television broadcasting in Canada continue to be vested in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

(b) That the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with plans for the production of television programs in French and English and for national coverage by kinescope recordings or by any other practical means.

(c) That no private television broadcasting stations be licensed until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has available national television programs and that all private stations be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that the government, even if it is to give us a so-called national television network, has no right to establish in the field of television such a monopoly as that enjoyed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is in the name of culture that efforts are now being made to change the various provinces into mere branches of the central power and it is in the name of patriotism that success is attained in creating a vicious state monopoly.

I pride myself on being as good a Canadian as any member of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and I take the liberty of saying that I am much more afraid of the atheistic propaganda of some of the lecturers who have been invited to speak over the network of the C.B.C. than of that so-called Americanism, against which, with all due deference to them, private television station owners would have protected us at least as well as the directors of the C.B.C.

Are they going to tell us now that patriotism is the exclusive possession of our higher bureaucracy? We take the liberty of thinking otherwise.

What is highly amusing to us is to hear members of the Massey commission, as well as a great number of our leaders, by the way, speaking of the necessity of keeping the C.B.C. free from political interference. Let us take a stroll through the studios of our official broadcasting service. Is it by mere accident that we never meet there with people whose anti-Liberal opinions are well-known, that we often find instead more or less official propaganda agents for Liberal policies?

Now, mind you, that is not particularly shocking. What is particularly galling to me is the fact that the directors of the C.B.C., however competent and honest they may be, are allowed to spend millions of dollars from the public treasury, millions put up by the taxpayers whose representatives are nevertheless deprived of an opportunity of exercising necessary measures of control.

Television will cost us millions of dollars taken from the small wage earner's pay envelope or even from the farmer. And yet private enterprise could have given us television more cheaply; you know that.

In the name of national culture, we prefer to establish a state monopoly, regardless of the price to be paid.

What is the use talking about freedom of information, if television—which is a medium of information—is controlled by the government or, which is worse still, by a government body.

Freedom of the press must not apply only to printed newspapers but also to the talking press, the televised press. Soon the problem of facsimile will arise; facsimile is a printed newspaper transmitted through the medium of improved radio devices. Will the C.B.C. authorize such transmission? Will the contents be censored? I am afraid that is the least worry of our state radio, for it knows it is always right and that we shall always bow to any of its decisions, however iniquitous and anti-democratic.

Television involves censorship, that is the intervention of the provinces to approve of or condemn the films or other shows shown on television screens. Would it be logical for a picture which has been banned on our cinema screens to be shown in our own homes? One may answer that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation watches over the moral aspect of its broadcasts, that it will see to it that no television broadcast offends our children or our adult population. These assurances are worthless, as evidenced by the past conduct of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Even if such assurances were to be taken seriously, the fact remains that under our constitution the censorship of films and shows rests with the province and not with the federal government or some federal organization.

The monopoly of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the field of television is not going to promote the development of television in this country. Nothing compares with competition as an incentive.

At its beginning, broadcasting in Canada greatly benefited from competition. The C.B.C. disposes of many millions, but it needs the incentive of competition, even of rivalry, in order to function with sufficient enthusiasm.

Let us suppose that Canada had today private television stations, controlled by some unbiased organization, which would not interfere with the running of television stations; if such were the case, not only would television progress more swiftly, but our artists would not be limited to the C.B.C. alone. Through our government's fault, Canadian musicians and actors have lost thousands and thousands of dollars, which they might otherwise have drawn from private television stations.

Last July, the Winnipeg Free Press published a series of articles which had to do with the recommendations of the Massey commission concerning radio and television. Those articles have been translated into French and published in pamphlet form. I shall now quote an excerpt from page 23:

"By its very nature, television makes you think immediately of another means to reach, to inform and to convince the public. The cost of "direct" television programs may induce operators—when and if there are any, of course—to make use of films most of the time. A link is thus immediately established between television and the national film board, a government institution. It is logical to believe that the national film board will supply most of the films shown to Canadians on C.B.C. television stations. It is expected that these bodies will be prompted by the best of intentions and will succeed in reaching an excellent standard of production. This, however, will only increase the possibilities of propaganda and strengthen the party in power.

"As soon as a government becomes active in the field of communications, it can remain in power indefinitely," warns Mr. Zechariah Chafee Jr., in his book "Governments and publicly owned communications". He goes on to say:

"Zealous administrators will always invent new ways to improve the press according to their own ideals".

Here, we must take the word "press" in its widest new meaning as it is used in the Hutchins report which we have quoted above; then the possibilities become alarming.

Neither do I hesitate to accept the conclusions of Basil Dean, whose texts published in the Calgary Herald have also been translated into French and published in pamphlet form under the title "Freedom of the airwaves". In so far as television is concerned, his conclusions are as follows:

Television in Canada, he writes, will have to be submitted to some sort of control—of course—but not to that of the C.B.C. It should be the same kind of control that is asked for radio—a purely technical control. That control should be exercised by an independent commission, similar to the board of transport commissioners; that commission should assign the radio frequencies and television wave-lengths. That is, after all, the only formal control that should exist.

"Public control must not mean state monopoly over radio and T.V. Canadians must be prudent, cautious, alert in the face of American influence but not to the point of agreeing to rigid state control as a remedy."

We read on the first pages of the report of the Massey commission a sort of dedication, in the form of a sentence quoted from St. Augustine's "The City of God":

A nation is an association of reasonable beings united in a peaceful sharing of the things they cherish; therefore, to determine the quality of a nation, you must consider what those things are.

Our people are fond of liberty. They ask that the fundamental principles of democracy be respected and they oppose all forms of totalitarianism or socialism or state monopoly, even for the sake of culture.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment to the amendment moved by our leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). This amendment is to be found on page 54 of Hansard of November 24, and reads:

We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration;

(b) To implement their proposals to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945.

I should like to call attention to the fact that that amendment to the amendment is exactly the same as the amendment which this group moved under similar circumstances on March 6, 1952, and which is recorded on page 181 of Hansard for that date. That amendment reads:

This house further regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to recommend the inauguration of a national health insurance program, with provision for provincial participation.

The only variation of the two amendments is to be found in the last two words. In this year's amendment the words "provincial administration" have been substituted for the words "provincial participation". I call attention to the similarity or the identity of these two amendments because, as recorded on pages 196 and 197 of Hansard of March 6, 1952, both the Conservatives and the Social Crediters voted for the amendment moved that year. I am sure that the substitution of the words "provincial administration" for the words "provincial participation" is not important enough to warrant the change which quite apparently has occurred this year in the attitude toward this amendment of both the Progressive Conservatives and the Social Crediters.

From the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and of the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) it becomes quite evident that they cannot support this amendment to the amendment as they did last year. One is forced to look for a reason and I think he is justified in asking whether the fact that we are one year nearer to a general election has any bearing on the changed attitude toward this amendment of the Progressive Conservatives and Social Crediters. Possibly on some future occasion they will inform us why they have changed their attitude toward the inauguration of a national health program.

An hon. Member: They have not.

Mr. Noseworthy: It becomes clear from the speech of the leader of the official opposition and the speech of the leader of the Social Credit party that today the C.C.F. is the only party in this house which is prepared at this session to support legislation for the inauguration of a national health insurance program. The position of the Liberal party is made quite clear in the speech from the throne which is recorded on page 2 of Hansard of November 20.

The paragraph beginning—

> Much has been accomplished since the inauguration in 1945 of the five-year national health grants program . . .

—contains the gist of the government's policy regarding a national health insurance program. It is quite clear from that paragraph that the government proposes to do nothing more than continue the expansion of the work of the health grants program which was instituted in 1948; and that there is no intention, certainly no intention this session, of inaugurating a national health program.

The Conservative position was made quite clear by the speech of the leader and by the substance of their amendment, which amendment is found on page 33 of Hansard for November 24, 1952. The fourth paragraph of that amendment would add to the address the following words:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (d) To conduct inquiries in consultation with the provincial governments, so that necessary information may be available for the dominion and provincial governments to consider jointly a national health insurance program;

There it is quite clear that all the Conservatives will support this session, as far as a national health program is concerned, is just another investigation, just another report; and my purpose in having these reports brought here this afternoon was that they might be of benefit to the leader of the official opposition. I presume that he probably is not fully aware of all the reports and of all the studies that have been made on this subject in recent years.

I have here on my desk no fewer than thirty reports and all of them with two exceptions have been made since 1945. I have here seven of those reports made by the research division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. There was a report in 1949 and another in 1950. The one in 1949 was a survey of physicians in Canada. In 1949 and 1950 there was a national health program study. In 1949 there was a survey of dentists in Canada. In 1950 there was a study of health insurance in New Zealand; in the same year a study of health insurance in Denmark; in 1950 a study of health insurance in Sweden; and in 1952 another study of health insurance in Denmark.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) emphasizes the fact that there has not been sufficient study in conjunction with the provincial governments. I have here no fewer than six reports or studies made by the provincial governments, and in addition to those there are three others, copies of which I have been unable to secure in our library. In 1949 there was a report on a survey of hospitals in Nova Scotia. In the same year there was a report on a survey of health facilities in Nova Scotia; in 1950 again, a survey of nursing facilities and nursing education needs in Nova Scotia; in 1950 a survey of Alberta's health by that provincial government. In 1951 the province of New Brunswick made a health survey. In 1951 the province of Ontario made a health survey in three volumes. In the same year Saskatchewan made a health survey report, and in 1952 a survey of hospitals, surgery, and a master plan. In 1952 Prince Edward Island made a health survey report. British Columbia, Manitoba and Quebec, along with these other provinces, have all within the last few years made surveys of the health facilities available and of the needs. Those studies have encompassed practically every possible field. They have gone into almost every possible angle of this whole question.

Then there were a series of reports presented to the House of Commons committee: a report in 1943 on social security for Canada prepared by Dr. Marsh; in the same year a health insurance report known as the Heagerty report, a voluminous book which I think runs to nearly 600 pages. In 1944 there was a report of the minutes and proceedings of evidence of the special committee on social security, together with its report to the house and a draft health insurance bill.

Then there were reports prepared for the commission on dominion-provincial relations which was appointed back in 1937, and a report in 1939 on public health. There are the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report in 1940. In addition I have a number of reports, six reports actually, that were submissions to the dominion-provincial conference, compiled in 1945 and 1946. There were proposals of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. There is a report entitled "Health, Welfare and Labour", a reference book for the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. There is another entitled "Dominion-Provincial Submissions at the Conference on Reconstruction". In 1945 there was a dominion-provincial co-operative arrangement, a reference for the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. In 1946 there was another reference book called "A Health Reference Book". In 1945 there was a report of the national health survey conducted by the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board. There were also others. There was a report by a committee of the House of Commons in 1928 and a report by the Alberta government's commission on health and medical services in 1929 and again in 1934. There is the British Columbia royal commission on state health insurance and maternity benefits back in 1932. There is one, the date of which I do not have, which is known as the Quebec social insurance commission report.

Now, in the face of nearly forty studies and reports which have been made on this subject, for the most part since 1945, the Leader of the Opposition tells us that his party is not prepared to support action for the inauguration of a health insurance program this session until we get some more reports. If I know anything, Mr. Speaker, of the attitude of the people of this country, what they want from this parliament at this session is not another report; what they want is action which will bring them a health insurance program that will enable them to call in a doctor when he is needed, without having to wait until a disease has run its course and they are forced to do so. The people of Canada want to be able to call in a doctor to prevent the disease from running its course, and to be able to call him without having to bankrupt themselves and their families. Today the people of Canada want the parties in this parliament to support the government in a national health program that will give the people in Canada what the Liberal party has been promising them since 1919.

The Social Crediters also want delay. They are not prepared to take action at this session, according to their leader's speech as recorded on page 56 of Hansard for November 24, 1952. He states:

> The Social Credit kind of national health program would ensure that sufficient doctors, dentists, nurses, technicians, clinics and hospital beds would be made available first to take on the work as the scheme is extended.

That is the argument, of course, the Liberals have been using since 1945; that is the excuse which they have given for not bringing in a national health insurance program. Countries which have introduced a national health insurance program have not waited until there were enough hospital beds, enough doctors, enough nurses and enough clinics to meet the needs of the people. They have seen the need, and they have set out to meet it. They have built their hospitals and provided their doctors, nurses and clinics as the need arose.

The government of Saskatchewan did not wait until they had enough hospital beds to accommodate all the sick of Saskatchewan.

The government of Great Britain did not wait until they had enough hospitals and hospital beds to accommodate all the sick of those islands before they instituted their national health insurance plan. Much as the leader of the opposition may deride national health insurance in Great Britain because it was introduced by a socialist government, the party in power today, which is similar to his own Conservative party, would not dare to withdraw those services from the people. As a matter of fact the Liberal party could introduce into their next election program no better plank, or one that would have more support across Canada, than that of national health insurance. The only drawback is that if they expect the people of Canada to believe them, to have faith in their promise, some definite action must be taken to show that they really mean business. If they simply give a promise at election time, as was done in 1945 and other years, that after the election such a program will be introduced, that will not be good enough.

Both the Social Crediters and the Conservatives were much concerned about the loss of freedom that may come about with the inauguration of a national health insurance program. Both the leaders dwelt at some length on that phase of the question. I want to ask, with whose freedom do they fear interference? Of what freedoms will the people of Canada be deprived by the introduction of such a scheme? We have made it quite clear, I am sure, that any national health insurance scheme introduced would leave both doctors and patients free in their choice. There would be no compulsion on a doctor to serve a patient against his wish, and no compulsion on a patient to choose a doctor against his wish. We have made it quite clear that we support such a policy; and I am sure the Liberals, if they introduced any policy of national health insurance, would inaugurate a policy that would safeguard those freedoms.

You know the freedoms we enjoy under our present medical system? Forty-one babies out of every thousand who were born in Canada in 1950 had the freedom to die because there was no national health insurance program to help save their lives. Those countries which, under socialist governments, have brought in socialized medicine stand away ahead of Canada in the matter of infant mortality rates. In 1950 the Canadian infant mortality rate was 41 deaths per thousand babies; Sweden, 20, or less than half; New Zealand, 23; Australia, 24; Netherlands, 25; United States, 29; United Kingdom, 31; Denmark, 31; Canada, 41. Seven of those countries which have a low infant mortality rate have national health insurance policies.

Australia has a hospital plan which also supplies drugs. The United States spends far more per capita on health, preventive and curative, than do we in Canada. It is time that Canada moved forward and came in step with the other progressive countries that have introduced legislation of this kind, instead of taking eighth place among the progressive and free nations of the world in this matter.

Without seeking in any way to minimize the good work which has been done by the national health grants program inaugurated in 1948, I want to call the attention of the Liberals to the fact that the introduction of that program in 1948 was intended to be the first stage in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan. Those were the words of the then prime minister, Mr. King, when he introduced that measure into the house, as recorded in Hansard of May 14, 1948. Apparently the Liberals are still in the first stages. Just how long we are to remain in those first stages, no one can tell. Certainly from the throne speech it is clear that there is no intention on the part of the government to move on to a second or a third stage at this session. For a party that has been promising national health insurance for 33 years, I suppose a mere four-year period spent on its first stage or its preparatory stage cannot be considered long. According to the Liberals I take it that 33 years, if not a thousand, is but a day.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was confronted with the question of introducing such legislation and with the fact that the Liberals had been promising health insurance for over 30 years, he had this to say, and I quote from page 3007 of Hansard for June 6, 1952:

> We have advocated health insurance in our platforms as an objective . . . But that does not mean to say that because a party has a plank in its platform, it has got to be done overnight.

Then at page 3009 the minister is reported to have said:

> You do not rush into a scheme of the immense proportions we have here without laying the foundation.

So there you have it. To the Minister of National Health and Welfare, 33 years is just overnight; a promise made 33 years ago cannot be put into effect overnight. That is a long, dark Liberal night and there is not any sign of dawn yet as far as this measure is concerned. The contrast between the minister's point of view last year and his point of view back in 1948, again just before an election, of course, is rather remarkable. In an interview which the minister gave to the Toronto Daily Star, as reported in that paper on March 9, 1948, he is reported as follows:

> I am hopeful that a national health scheme for Canadians will be announced sooner than most people anticipate.

That was in 1948. That was on the eve of another federal election, of course. The newspaper report continues:

> "The scheme will be fundamentally the same as was presented at the dominion-provincial conference in 1945," he added. Cost if all provinces adopt it will be $250,000,000, of which the dominion will pay 60 per cent or $150,000,000. The balance would be met from payments by provincial governments and individuals participating.

Then later on in the interview he went on as follows:

> "The dominion government," he continued, "will be prepared to conclude agreements on the health scheme with provinces independent of any other dominion-provincial financial arrangements." This means that despite the failure of Ontario and Quebec to complete over-all agreements with Ottawa since the 1945 conference, neither province would be barred from making a health plan deal if they so desired.

And still later:

> Administration of the health plan would be entirely in the hands of provinces. "There would be no attempt at centralization, as local problems and conditions vary across the country."

A later significant statement of the minister was this:

> "I believe," Mr. Martin stated, "that contributory social service measures is one of the effective answers to communism."

That was the minister's point of view in 1948. I presume his point of view is expressed in the throne speech this year in the paragraph which refers to national health insurance. There you have the Liberal policy: 29 years, from 1919 to 1948, just mulling over the idea of how they should lay the foundations for this great scheme and then four years, from 1948 to 1952, spent in laying foundations which, on their own admission, are not yet properly laid. The country must wait for that party to go on for a few more years laying those foundations.

The minister talked about rushing into such schemes in a hurry, and about not doing them overnight. As I pointed out, 33 years is a long night; and in the speech from the throne there is nothing to give any indication that the dawn is about to break. A whole generation of Canadians have died during those 33 years without benefit of a national health insurance scheme while the Liberal party or the Liberal government has been dilly-dallying with the idea.

I want to take a little bit of time, Mr. Speaker, to briefly review the nature of that dilly-dallying and to point out what has happened in the meantime. Britain adopted a national insurance act away back in 1911, and it provided coverage for all employed persons aged 16 to 65, except non-manual workers whose income exceeded £160. By the time of world war II some thirty or more countries in the world had provided for this need through social insurance methods.

In Canada, notwithstanding the 1919 promise, the government—that is the Liberal government—did not get around to any serious consideration of the idea until early in the 1940's. Then came some of the reports to which I have referred, namely the Rowell-Sirois report of 1940, the Marsh report of 1943, the House of Commons special committee on social security in 1944. As I have already shown, between 1919 and 1940 a great deal of study was given to the subject of health insurance in Canada by the provincial governments as well as by the federal government.

Since responsibility for health insurance rests upon the provinces, according to the British North America Act, the first active steps toward the implementation of any such scheme were taken by the provincial governments. In 1919 the province of British Columbia appointed a royal commission to investigate health insurance. Ten years later, in 1929, the government of that province appointed another royal commission. In 1936, when by the way the C.C.F. had emerged as a major threat to the old parties in that province, a health insurance act was passed. When other measures were found of keeping the C.C.F. out of office in that province, the act was dropped; it was not put into effect.

In Alberta, committee reports in 1928 and again in 1932 led to the passage of a health insurance bill in 1935 under the United Farmers' government of that province. That bill never became effective because the United Farmers' government lost out to the Social Credit party in that year.

Legislation was introduced in the province of Saskatchewan in 1919 and in the province of Manitoba in 1920, which introduced a municipal doctors' plan. Out of that record I think two facts emerge. The first is that it was in the western provinces where the C.C.F. had become a major threat to the old parties, or where the radical parties which federated to become the C.C.F. were becoming a threat, that provincial governments gave serious legislative consideration to the question of provincial health insurance. No such interest was shown by provincial governments in eastern Canada where the C.C.F. was not a threat in those early years.

The second fact which emerges, I think, is that while those measures may have been dropped in part because the governments concerned did not really believe in socialized health services, a contributing factor to their being dropped was the fact that the federal government did not indicate to the provinces what portion of the costs it was prepared to pay. Even after the 1945 conferences, the 1945 reports, the government has never gone to the provinces with a concrete proposal for the introduction of a national health insurance scheme.

What happened in the federal field? The Liberal party came into power in 1921. Health insurance remained where it started, buried in an omnibus resolution adopted by the national Liberal convention of 1919. Not until 1928 did the Liberal government take the most preliminary of all preliminary steps, namely the setting up of a parliamentary committee.

On May 1, 1929 the second report of this committee recommended that the department of pensions and national health be requested to initiate a comprehensive survey of the field of public health with special reference to a national health program. Three years later, in May, 1932, the dominion council of health was still urging the government to do something about that 1929 recommendation. Health insurance became a matter of some serious consideration to the Liberal government during world war II.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time with a great deal of pride and admiration to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish to state at the commencement that I am not going to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider). One reason for that is this. Approximately two years ago, although no signed documents were released, it was more or less universally agreed by the house that when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell), and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) had done that job, sufficient compliments had been paid. With respect to that I hold that I am justified when I make no reference whatsoever to anything other than the good work that was done by these men in moving and seconding the address. It is an anachronism that I believe we can very well do without. I think that is agreeable to hon. members.

First of all, since I come from British Columbia, I must of necessity, for the record and because of a sense of duty, congratulate the government on the appointment of their two new ministers, namely the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). These two dashing cavaliers from the west have earned their spurs in parliament, and I am quite sure that all hon. members will have the same opinion of them a year from now as they hold at the present time. If I may express my view, I believe they will prove to be two of the ablest men in the cabinet of the Dominion of Canada.

Further, I should like to say that it has been customary in royal circles when a king is dead to sing "Long live the King".

An hon. Member: The Queen.

Mr. MacDougall: Or the Queen for that matter, because there is a continuity there that is never broken. In British Columbia we have a king of the Liberal party in the person of the former Minister of Fisheries. But strangely enough we have now two kings in the Liberal party in the persons of the two gentlemen whom I have just congratulated, but the old king is not dead. The old king has now become Canada's ambassador to Japan. In that regard, I believe I should also pay tribute to the government for their selection, because Mr. Mayhew, or His Excellency I suppose is the better term to use now, will, in my opinion and in the opinion of a great number of people across Canada, do a magnificent job in his official capacity in Japan. In this connection there is a subject with which I have dealt many times in parliament. It will be noticed that the government did not select someone 28 to 30 years of age to go to Japan, but rather a man of 70 or 71 years. They recognized his ability, his experience and his good common sense as the requirements which would be sufficient to permit him to do a job for the people of Canada. I am sure Canadians, and the government by which he was appointed, will recognize in him an outstanding man capable of performing a first-class job.

I wish now to make special reference to the matter of age. There are in Canada thousands upon thousands of people who cannot be recognized by the government because they have reached the age of 45 years. Surely a man should not be considered to have reached the end of his real earning capacity when he has reached the age of 45. Under our present civil service system, however, he is debarred from serving in this capacity. That is something I suggest the government should consider seriously, with a view to making an appropriate amendment. Now that we are in an age of terrific scientific development I see no reason why those connected with government cannot find a way whereby they can use men and women of 40 or 45 years who are experienced, who have settled down to manhood and womanhood, who are capable of doing a good job for the country, but who are debarred by what I consider is a silly set-up in the rules and regulations governing the civil service. In my opinion the sooner that wrong is rectified, in respect of these men and women, the better it will be for the people of Canada and for the service they receive from their civil servants; the better, too, will it be for the government that makes the necessary corrections.

I shall now discuss the main subjects I had in mind when considering this speech; and shall discuss, too, that which in my opinion is the real function this parliament must perform before its termination. May I now touch upon something which affects our national pride. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) are not in their seats. However, I see in his seat the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mutch), and I hope he will take cognizance of the observations I am about to make.

In Canada, under the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, we have some of the finest hospitals to be found anywhere in the world. Also under government control we have some first-class sanatoria. The last time I was in Shaughnessy military hospital in Vancouver an amazing thing was drawn to my attention by one of the medical men in attendance. He said to me, "Jack, why do you not raise this question? I suggest that, next time you are in Shaughnessy hospital, you should turn to your right and to your left at the main entrance so you may see the plaques on each side of that entrance". Next time I went to Shaughnessy I took particular note of what was on those plaques. As I entered, I read on one side these words, "This hospital is approved by the American college of surgeons", while on the left side I read, "This hospital is approved by the American nursing association."

I realize that in the past there may have been some justification for the wording of those plaques in military hospitals of Canada, because inspection is a costly procedure. In addition, the royal college in Canada, of which individually and collectively we may be justly proud, is a younger organization than the American college across the border. It seems to me, however, that the time has now arrived when in our military hospitals, and, for that matter, in our civilian hospitals, as well as in the various sanatoria across Canada, we ought to be able to put up plaques which would be superimposed on those now in place, which would say, "This hospital is approved by the royal college" and "This hospital is approved by the Canadian nurses association."

I would commend heartily any steps taken by the government to rectify a situation that in my opinion is somewhat debasing to the natural and hereditary patriotism of Canadians, whether born as such or by adoption.

I wish now to deal briefly with the Canadian National Railways. While I do not speak by way of criticism, if there are some who would so describe what I have to say, then I trust they will accept it as constructive criticism. The Canadian National Railways ticket office in Vancouver is on Granville street, the main street in the heart of the downtown business area. As one walks into that office he is confronted naturally by those members of the personnel of the Canadian National Railways who are constantly meeting the public and selling them transportation to various parts of Canada and the world. A little farther down, and behind the same desk or bar, if one wishes to use that word, is another group of people who have no interest in making sales to the public. In the Vancouver office these persons perform functions of accounting and bookkeeping. I recall vividly that approximately a year ago in that office some new personnel were taken on, among whom was a young lady who in my opinion was both charming and attractive, and who did an excellent job in making ticket sales to the public. Inside the counter, back a distance of three or four desks, is this group of people concerned primarily with accountancy and bookkeeping. What happens is that when the office becomes crowded, customers naturally hold the view that the employees working at the far end of the room should also serve at the counter. When they do not render this service, what is the result? I have seen dozens of people walk out of the office expressing disgust at the fact that the employees at the end of the room were not in their opinion doing a proper job.

Of course that is a completely wrong interpretation to put on the situation. I suggest to the government that it might be well to draw to the attention of the managers of Canadian National Railways the advisability of having some form of partition between those serving the public and those doing accountancy or other types of work. It is not a good thing for the morale of the travelling public to have them think for one minute that personnel of the Canadian National Railways are not doing their jobs when actually they are doing the work they are called upon to do. I should like to see the government do something about that.

On top of that, there are many people who walk out of the Canadian National Railways office in Vancouver in the belief that their business is not wanted. Then they go down to the Great Northern, which company thus obtains revenue which should go to the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific.

As I sat here waiting on the leash for the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) to complete his remarks I heard him outline what he considered was the prime responsibility of this parliament. I am not going to say that I disagree with him, but I do want to indicate what I think is the prime responsibility of this parliament. I should like to quote from page 192 of the "Report on Foreign Affairs" for the months of April, May and June, 1952. Referring to General Eisenhower, it states:

> The military situation which he had found when taking command had been fraught with danger:
> "Just beyond the iron curtain in eastern Europe lay 30 divisions with their supporting squadrons of aircraft. These were only a fraction of available Soviet strength . . . they were still deployed and poised as for war."
> The total forces east of the iron curtain amounted to some 60 divisions of the satellite countries and 175 Soviet line divisions, one-third of which were either mechanized or armoured, and an air force of 20,000 aircraft. They were faced in western Europe by less than 15 NATO divisions adequately trained and equipped for war, and fewer than 1,000 operational aircraft, many of which were of an obsolescent type.

I think it is a generally recognized fact that what people do not understand, they oppose. This brings me to my main point in the reference I wish to make to NATO. I am not going into the various phases of NATO because all members know them, but I read that excerpt from that report to show the potential danger to our umbrella of freedom in Canada and throughout the free world.

Of all the things that agitate the minds of the people I think taxation is the main one. No one likes to pay taxes; but if people are not aware that 36½ cents of every tax dollar is being spent for national defence and the provision of an umbrella of freedom, in my opinion it is the duty of this parliament to explain that fact in understandable language to the people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

What is my suggestion as to the means of bringing about a greater understanding of that poignant fact? I suggest that leaders of all parties in this parliament, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Crediters (Mr. Low) get together and make a statement. I do not expect for one moment that they will agree on all details, but I expect and I believe the people of Canada feel that there should be a joint statement given as the voice of parliament with respect to NATO.

I am not suggesting that all the opposition leaders should agree with the government, but I do think there are fundamental facts in connection with the establishment of NATO upon which all parties and all leaders can agree. There is the question of paying for our national defence. If the leaders of the various parties in this house cannot make the necessary financial arrangements with their parties to cover the cost of a broadcast including a three or four minute statement by each I am quite prepared to pay, not with a rubber cheque but with a stamped cheque, whatever is required to permit the leaders of the various groups to make a statement of this kind to the Canadian people.

My friends, that to me is one of the prime necessities of the twenty-first parliament of Canada. In my opinion the sooner that is done the sooner the Canadian taxpayer will realize just exactly what is happening to 36 per cent of his taxation dollar. It would be foolish or even worse if I were to ask the leaders of the various groups in this house to agree on the best method of providing stability and striking power to the personnel of our army, navy and air force operating under NATO. They may disagree as to the modus operandi, but in the final analysis the goal is clear; and surely in three minutes they can indicate that they agree on the fundamentals. Then they can come to this house and disagree on how that objective is to be attained. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that across the length and breadth of Canada the great mass of Canadian people do not understand what our expenditures on NATO are doing for them.

I had a rather unique experience just a day or two before I left Vancouver with respect to that particular thing. I was buying myself a new hat and as I was about to walk out the door, having procured the same, one of the boys in the hat store said to me: I hope, when you go back to Ottawa, you will try to high heaven to have our tax bills cut. I said: Well, now, how are you proposing that these tax bills should be cut without in some measure jeopardizing the Canadian people's umbrella of freedom? I told him that out of every $100 of taxes $36 went for national defence. He said: Well, what about national health insurance? I told him that was something the government and the members of parliament in all probability would discuss at the present session but I warned him: All right, suppose you do have national health insurance—and I said I could not give the exact amount that he was going to pay for a national health insurance scheme —in round and approximate figures in my opinion the cost would be in the neighbourhood of $600 to $700 million. I said: You are asking me to cut taxes in one breath and in the same breath or a subsequent one you are asking for an additional expenditure of approximately three-quarters of a billion dollars. I said that the two things just did not add up and I also said: Remember this. Even if tomorrow a national health program is inaugurated in the Dominion of Canada and if your umbrella of freedom is shot, Uncle Joe will not pay one iota of respect to the amount of money that you, the taxpayer of Canada, have paid in order to bring about national health insurance because, I said, he will simply take over on his own terms—and how.

Before I left the store this chap said: I am glad that you gave me that explanation. He said he had no idea that, despite the heavy taxation he had complained about, the situation with respect to our umbrella of freedom would be jeopardized if we did not spend that amount of money in order to keep us free in a free world, without being taken over by the countries of the iron curtain and their satellites.

Before I sit down I want to reiterate the very necessary service that can be rendered by all political parties in Canada if they will follow the suggestion I have made—that is to agree on the fundamental details, the basic principles of NATO, and speak for the parliament of Canada; not for the government; not for the C.C.F.; not for the Social Crediters; not for the Progressive Conservatives; not for the Liberals, but on behalf of the parliament of Canada. If we can get the people of Canada to understand our great expenditures in order to keep the umbrella of freedom high, keep it virile and keep it intact, then I say to you, sir, and to my fellow members, that we in this parliament whether or not we come back will have rendered the Canadian people a terrific service. Then they will understand something about what this umbrella of freedom means to them individually and collectively from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is in the house at the present time because I want to speak about a matter which concerns his department very much indeed. I want to deal with a great injustice which exists under the Unemployment Insurance Act and which I believe is long overdue for correction. I am referring to the refusal of the government to pay unemployment insurance which a man or woman has standing to his or her credit when that person becomes incapacitated and is unable to continue to work.

When a man or woman becomes incapacitated, the unemployment insurance credit he or she has built up is immediately cut off. In doing this the government ignores three important factors. First, the unemployment insurance credit which a man or woman has built up exists solely because of the contributions which have been made by that person and his or her employer. The government has made no contribution except to administer the act, and the unemployment insurance which that man or woman has built up belongs to them by right. Second, the unemployment insurance credit which the employer and employee have built up exists for the sole purpose of maintaining that employee if he or she is unable to find work. Third, there is no time when a man or woman needs the unemployment insurance credit they have built up quite so much as when physical disability prevents that person from working. Not only do they have to maintain themselves and their families, but they have to pay doctor and hospital bills as well.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I drew the attention of the government to this matter when speaking in this house on June 10 last, when I cited an experience of one of my constituents in dealing with the unemployment insurance commission. After building up an unemployment insurance credit of more than $900, this man lost his sight. His unemployment insurance credit was denied to him, and the unemployment insurance commission washed their hands of him completely. He notified me of this fact, and I was able to help him receive payments from his unemployment insurance credit. The payments continued for some time, but while he still had more than $500 standing to his credit, the payments were once again cut off. It appears now that this $500 credit is lost to him for all time.

Mr. Speaker, what I want to know is what is going to happen to that $500 credit? Is it going to be paid out to some other person who did not contribute toward it, or is it to be retained in the possession of the government, who also did not contribute toward it? Another thing I want to know is, who is more entitled to that $500 credit than the man who created it by making contributions extending over several years? These are questions which the government makes no attempt to answer because there are no answers.

Mr. Applewhaite: Because you are wrong.

Mr. Hees: Now, at the meeting where my constituent was told that his unemployment insurance credit was being cut off, it was suggested that he should not bother his member of parliament because he is a very busy man. This is the kind of matter, Mr. Speaker, that all constituents should immediately bring to the attention of their members of parliament. The bureaucrats, however, realizing the injustice of their decision, did not want their actions brought to the attention of someone who might be more interested in human need and justice than the workings of the bureaucratic system. They had disposed of this man's file, and that was all they were concerned with.

After bringing this matter to the minister's attention last June 10, I recommended that the government should introduce an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act to right this obvious wrong. The minister appeared interested in the suggestion, but six months have passed and there is no mention of any proposed change in the Unemployment Insurance Act in the speech from the throne. It is now clear, I believe, that the government has no intention of correcting this very obvious injustice.

On November 4, in the United States, a government was thrown out of office after twenty years because it had lost touch with the people, and after seventeen years in office this government is suffering from exactly the same disease. There is a callous disregard for the needs and aspirations of the ordinary people; appeals for fair play and justice are treated with contempt. The government's attitude is that of a government which believes it rules by divine right.

Although an appeal for justice for working people will probably again fall on deaf ears, nevertheless I am going to make it. I urge the government very strongly indeed to introduce an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will permit men and women to receive the unemployment insurance credits which they have built up, if a serious physical disability makes it impossible for them to continue earning their own living.

Mr. Gregg: May I be permitted to make a correction? I am sure my hon. friend would not want it to go uncorrected. He made the statement that the only government payment in respect to the unemployment insurance fund was that of the administration cost. I would refer him to page 31 of the estimates for this current year which shows that, in addition to the administration costs, a total of $32 million will be payable towards such premiums this year by the dominion government.

Mr. Hees: I am grateful to the minister for his explanation, and I am glad to see he is interested. Does the minister believe that this relatively small contribution which the government does make—

An hon. Member: What is $32 million?

Mr. Hees: —justifies the government in not paying out, to a person who has contributed for a considerable time to the fund, the unemployment insurance credit he has built up, when physical incapacity makes it impossible for him to continue his work? Does the minister believe that is fair treatment of the working people of this country who contribute every day and every week to this unemployment insurance fund? Would he please answer that question?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think this is the time to answer questions. I was merely correcting a false premise to the hon. member's argument. I shall be glad to discuss the matter on my estimates.

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would he ask his fire insurance company to pay his damages if he had a motor car accident?

Mr. Hees: That is the kind of ridiculous statement that you would expect. Any person who is fortunate enough to go through his working life and not be incapacitated is not, so far as I know, expecting to be paid his unemployment insurance. I am speaking of people who, during their working life, become incapacitated, like the man I am speaking about who is lying blind in his home today and who is being paid absolutely nothing out of the more than $500 which is in his unemployment insurance fund, built up by him and his employers.

An hon. Member: And the government.

Mr. Hees: Does the parliamentary assistant who asked the question feel that man is getting a square deal?

Mr. Lesage: If he is blind, he is getting the blind pension which is being paid out of the taxes paid by the Canadian people.

Mr. Hees: This man is not getting the blind pension.

Mr. Lesage: It is paid out of the taxes which I am paying for blind people, in spite of the fact I do not believe I shall become blind during my life.

Mr. Hees: This man is not receiving the blind pension.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Arsenault: Mr. Speaker, would you call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish me to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, namely the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider). At the same time I wish to compliment our new colleagues, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) and the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). Their elections were well received and the majority which was given to them by their constituents is certainly significant.

Mr. Speaker, last fall parliament was in session, as we all recall too well, until December 29. Members of this house were then denied the privilege of being home with their families during the week between Christmas and the New Year. Others could not be home for either Christmas or the New Year, and for many it was a tragedy. We were compelled to remain here, day after day, sitting long hours, to witness the stubborn obstruction put up by the official opposition against a government measure to amend the Combines Investigation Act, legislation which was introduced in this house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as a contribution towards the reduction of the high cost of living. Time has passed. Almost eleven months have elapsed since those high-blood-pressure days, and ever since facts have proved beyond any doubt that the government was right in bringing forward such a measure which has been a tangible and decisive contribution towards bringing down the cost of living in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Arsenault: I see that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is smiling.

Mr. Fleming: He is doing more than that. He is laughing.

Mr. Arsenault: The records of the last ten months show definitely that during those ten months the cost of living index has dropped eight times.

Mr. Fleming: Not on the things that are affected by that legislation.

Mr. Arsenault: For the month of January, 1952, the cost of living index stood at 191·5. It dropped down to 190·8 in February, to 189·1 in March, to 188·7 in April, to 186·7 in May. It went up a fraction of one point to 187·3 in June and then to 188 in July, again to follow the trend downward to 187·6 in August, down to 186·5 in September, down to 185 in October, or the lowest level since June, 1951, seventeen months ago. During that same period the cost of living was steadily climbing in the United States.

Mr. Fleming: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Arsenault: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: Does my hon. friend attribute the decrease in the cost of living to the passage of the government's legislation last December?

Mr. Arsenault: The hon. member for Eglinton will recall that on December 18, as reported at page 2160 of Hansard, he stated in this house as follows, and I quote from his own speech:

> . . . their proposal—
> That is the proposal of the government.
> —to bring in legislation to ban resale price maintenance, is an invitation to the Canadian people to submit themselves to being fooled and deluded into thinking this legislation is going to bring them a reduction in the cost of their living.

Mr. Fleming: And the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed.

An hon. Member: The hon. member has to eat those words now.

Mr. Fleming: The Prime Minister said it would not affect the cost of living.

Mr. Arsenault: The members of the official opposition in this house—at least this is what I gathered—were then struggling to capture the imagination of the population of this country in a desperate move to raise the stock of the Conservative party in the public's mind.

An hon. Member: That cannot be done.

Mr. Graydon: What about the by-elections?

Mr. Arsenault: When one reads those lengthy and boring speeches delivered in this house about a year ago opposing the government legislation amending the Combines Investigation Act, which legislation was devised in an attempt to curb the high cost of living; and when today one analyses the benefits of that legislation and its influence in lowering the cost of living, one does not wonder why it is that the stock of the Progressive Conservative party, as shown by the Gallup poll reports published from time to time, has dropped even faster than has the cost of living index in this country.

Mr. Fleming: What about the by-elections? What about New Brunswick?

Mr. Arsenault: I should ask the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres and the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean to reply to that question.

Mr. Fleming: Go back to the six by-elections last June. There were six of them last June.

An hon. Member: Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Lapointe: Wrong timing.

Mr. Arsenault: That is the sanction for displaying abusive political practices in useless efforts to try to undermine the confidence which the population of the whole of Canada had in 1949, has today and will undoubtedly have on the next election day, in the St. Laurent administration.

An hon. Member: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Arsenault: I left that party a long time ago. So much so, that when one looks today toward hon. members opposite, one is asking himself seriously which of the three political groups sitting in front of us will become the official opposition after the next general election. And we are not alone in such speculations. Quoting from an editorial in the Evening Citizen as recently as November 20, I read:

> There is not just one opposition party (as in the United States) striving to push the government out of power, but three, and no one of them has shown any sign of rising to a really dominant position over the others . . . The Liberals, on the other hand, have in Mr. St. Laurent a leader whose prestige stands high throughout the country. Especially is this true of his own province, and no Canadian political party can hope to win office without showing marked strength in Quebec.

As I have said before, a year ago we were in session, and the policy of the Conservative party then was to try and induce the population of Canada to believe that this government did not want to do anything about the high cost of living. It was their blunder. We now know the results. Today to try and pry up their stock they put emphasis on taxation. On the one hand they are struggling by all means at their disposal inside and outside of this House of Commons to try and make the Canadian people believe this government is spending too much, while at the same time they themselves, the Conservatives, have voted most enthusiastically the huge amount of $3½ billion a year that we are spending for our national security, for the social security of our people and for the carrying charges on our national debt.

Second, only in recent months—as was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in this house yesterday—they themselves have proposed increases in our expenditures which, if carried out, would double the present rate of income tax. And third, throughout the years the Conservative party has always taken the stand that we never had enough men and women in our defence forces and that we were never spending enough for war purposes.

On the other hand they are attempting to make the Canadian people believe that this government, and especially and particularly our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), has stubbornly opposed the lowering of taxes, when they very well know, or at least should know, that no minister of finance since confederation has ever lowered taxes to a greater extent than did our present minister over the years 1948, 1949 and 1950, at a time when our economy was being converted, and at a time when our economy could be converted, from a wartime basis to a peacetime basis.

Mr. Fleming: Briefly, you mean the time of the last election.

Mr. Arsenault: Everyone should recall that in the fiscal year 1945-46, when the war ended, our total expenditures amounted to more than $5 billion. By 1949-50 that had dropped to $2½ billion. That is a 50 per cent cut. For example, a married man without dependents, and with an income of $5,000 a year, paid an income tax of $1,378 at the peak of wartime taxation as compared with only $510 in 1949-50. This was achieved by our present Minister of Finance as a result of the policy of a government which certainly does not hesitate, does not object to lowering taxes when conditions permit.

But as we all remember, then came days of anxiety, the cold war, international unrest, international tension and finally, in the summer of 1950, the outbreak of the Korean war, and with these various implications, the greatest threat we were ever confronted with to our freedom, to our security and to the security of the free nations of the world. Overnight the whole situation was completely altered.

The short period of vacationing under the shining sun in low taxation land was over. The dark clouds of a dreadful storm of the greatest magnitude were in sight. We were facing the grave and real danger of another world war. Would that third world war break out today or tomorrow? We did not know, and we still do not know. To meet this most serious threat to our security and to the security of the free world, we were compelled, with the other nations of the North Atlantic alliance, to undertake a rearmament program of some $2 billion a year, bringing our total expenditures up from the $2½ billion of the early budget of 1950 to the $4½ billion budget of April of this year.

Surely, nobody likes paying taxes. But the taxes that we are now paying is the price we ourselves have decided to pay for our own security, the security of the Canadian people; and I am deeply sorry to see the once great Conservative party taking in this house an identical stand to that taken by communist groups in other parliaments of free nations, such as France and Italy, with regard to the common defence effort of the free nations of the world against communism. The communists of France and Italy also find that their governments are stockpiling too much defence material and equipment. They also struggle for a reduction of taxes in what free countries of the world are left, at a time when the fate of the whole of humanity is being played on the poker table of the world. It is my sincere hope that the Conservatives in this house are not unconsciously playing the communist game.

Mr. Fraser: You have a wonderful imagination.

Mr. Arsenault: Out of a budget of $4½ billion, $2 billion is our share towards collective security of the free nations against strangulation by communism. This was voted by the Conservatives. Another billion dollars is the contribution of this government toward the social security of the Canadian people, such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' pensions and allowances and so forth. This also was voted by the Conservatives.

Mr. Fleming: Tell us about the neckties.

Mr. Arsenault: A half billion dollars goes for carrying charges on the national debt, the result of the last two wars and of deficits of past administrations, including the Bennett administration. This was shared by the Conservatives also. The sum of $300 million goes to statutory subsidies and tax rental payments to the provinces, and finally just about $700 million, or only 15 per cent of the entire budget, is the amount required by all the other activities of the government such as agriculture, citizenship and immigration, fisheries, justice, labour, mines and technical surveys, post office, public works, resources and development, Canadian mounted police, trade and commerce, transport, railway and steamship services, and so forth.

Now, while some opposition members find taxes quite high, as we all do, yet they will never tell our Minister of Finance where we could make a substantial cut in a specific project or program. We have a most striking example in the case of our friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), who only last Friday, as we all remember very well, asked the Minister of Finance in this house whether a special budget would be introduced at an early date in order to lower taxes. Just recently, according to a press dispatch, the same hon. member made a statement to the effect that in his opinion the only solution to the Anglo-Canadian trade difficulties lies in further credits to Britain. Well, I do not question his views. I do not blame the hon. member at all for expressing that opinion but, with many others, I am really astonished to see that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), as anxious as he may be to see taxes reduced, does not seem to realize that more credits or, in other terms, more billions to Britain, would mean heavier taxation for our Canadian people.

Now, are we going to cut down on our two billion dollar defence program, which alone accounts for almost half the total budget, before such time as we can really hope for a peaceful settlement of the many great international problems still outstanding? The Conservative newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, says no; and it adds, in an editorial published on November 21:

> The Journal does not know of any Canadian anywhere who objects to paying for the country's defence program.

But what the Journal and some opposition members in this house object to is what they call the stockpiling of certain categories of material and equipment. They find that we have purchased too many raincoats, too many shoes, too many jackets, trousers and overalls, too many blankets, too many neckties and so forth.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear; you got around to neckties at last.

Mr. Arsenault: Well, is not the whole defence program nothing more and nothing less than a stockpiling program of major size? Are we not stockpiling aircraft, jet planes, warships, minesweepers, machine guns, shotguns, bullets, and material such as steel, cotton, wool, as well as equipment such as jackets, underwear, trousers, overalls and shoes, that we may perhaps never use for warfare purposes, just as our American friends are stockpiling billions of dollars worth of atom bombs which, we pray God, may also never be used for purposes of warfare?

But if a real red-hot war were declared tomorrow, and we were compelled in a matter of months to bring about one million men and women into active service, would not that newspaper and those opposition members be the very first to blame the Department of National Defence and this government most forcefully and bitterly for its shortsightedness, if it was then found that we were short of material and equipment?

Mr. Fleming: We will not be short of neckties.

Mr. Arsenault: I am positively sure that the Canadian people find much more relief in learning about the huge stockpiling the government is doing in their contribution to our defence effort than they would be to learn, through the Ottawa Journal or some opposition members in this house, that in spite of their so generous contribution to our defence program, our army stores were empty.

And this goes without saying, that at any time responsible authorities may declare that we really have a surplus in some of our army material or equipment, the opposition members will be only too glad to support the government in making these surpluses available to some friendly nations of the Atlantic alliance as a contribution to our common security.

Mr. Fleming: Those neckties will certainly be useful.

Mr. Arsenault: But where the Canadian people find yet more comfort is in the conviction that all of that huge budget is spent in their best interests by a reliable, efficient and honest administration.

I should like to read again to the house the editorial from the Ottawa Journal of August 27, which has already been placed before hon. members by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider). This is what the editorial says:

> To the eternal credit of our public men, no man in this country today dares to rise and say, or can say with truth, that a single cent of the billions spent was diverted to a private pocket from its proper channel. For our democracy, whatever its shortcomings, that is a glory.

Does any opposition member suggest that we should cut down on the billion dollars we pay for the social security of the Canadian people? Should we cut down family allowances, or old age pensions, or veterans' allowances in order to reduce taxation? Obviously, the answer is no. Can we make a cut in that half billion dollars which goes as interest on our national debt? No, unless we have surpluses which may be used to bring down our national debt. And, fortunately enough, in using our past surpluses for the reduction of our national debt our Minister of Finance is saving the Canadian taxpayers over $5 million a month in interest.

Is there any suggestion that the $300 million that go as statutory subsidies and tax rentals to the provinces should be reduced? Finally, we are left with the $700 million required for all other government services and activities which I enumerated earlier, the total of which represents only 15 per cent of the entire budget.

These are the facts which each member of this house, whether he be on the government side or the opposition side, should have the courage to face. There is no political gain to be made in hiding the truth from the Canadian public.

The Canadian taxpayers do not believe, and will never be misled to believe that, should the Conservative party have been in power since Korea, they would not have been paying any taxes or, if any, very little taxes. The people of Canada will never be misled to believe that the Conservatives are merely a group of magicians who can give something for nothing. These are disloyal and unfair political practices which lead a political party nowhere, or keep it in the wilderness.

Our Minister of Finance, who deserves the recognition and admiration of all true Canadians for his valorous, most courageous and strenuous work in the accomplishment of his duties, has proved before that conditions permitting, he would not hesitate in slashing taxes. He did it in 1948; he did it in 1949; he did it in 1950. And he is just the right man to do it again, at the very first opportunity; that is, as soon as new, favourable, international as well as national circumstances arise which will allow the government of this country to reduce taxes without endangering the security of the Canadian people.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall deign to reply to the speech to which we have just listened—

An hon. Member: We dare you to.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): —except to say that I do not think the house should cheer when he said that the defence spokesman for the Conservative party, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), a man who wears the Victoria Cross, the Military Cross, and other decorations, is playing the communist game. That is the type of speech we have heard tonight.

I join with others in congratulating the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This is the traditional speech we hear at every session, and I think the one this year indicates quite well to the house and to the people that we are approaching a time when we may expect one of the cyclical budgets of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It will be recalled that he promised a reduction in taxes in 1949, and within the next eighteen months we can look forward to another treat of that kind. But the people of Canada have not forgotten the taxes that have been heaped upon them since 1949 and the arbitrary way in which our taxation laws, particularly the Income Tax Act, have been enforced.

We all realize, of course, that we are living in the shadow of possible war. I do not think there is a Canadian who objects to paying taxes for the defence of Canada. What we do object to is waste and extravagance.

There is an old saying that wilful waste makes woeful want, and that is becoming very true throughout the country. We see where the Department of Defence Production has purchased within the past year almost one million dollars worth of broadloom rugs. People do not mind paying for aeroplanes, guns and other supplies for our troops, but I think the people of Canada are getting sick and tired of this arm chair army for which we are buying supplies. As I say, Canadians are prepared to make every sacrifice to prevent war; but, while the budget may be quite a distance off, I think from now on we can look for soft music.

Two things are notable in the throne speech, one for its presence and the other for its absence. One thing I should like to mention particularly is the reference to mail courier contracts. The Conservative party has long pointed out that changes were due in our rural mail service. Last fall many of the Liberal members from western Ontario took part in the debate on the postal estimates, and all mentioned the rural mail service. It was quite obvious that they had been tipped off that changes were going to be made and therefore they had better get in on the ground floor.

While I am dealing with this matter I should like to point out to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that while a change in the system of rural mail contracts has been long overdue, there have been very few changes in the rural mail system itself. This system was set up in the horse and buggy days, and the requirements that have to be met before a rural mail service extension is provided have not been changed. The result is that in many areas farmers still have to go long distances to get their mail. I ask the Postmaster General to realize that not only are we in the automobile age, we are in the jet age and he should step up the tempo of postal deliveries in rural areas.

Another thing noticeable by its absence is the removal of the means test in connection with pensions to blind persons. I do not think I need say anything more, other than that the Minister of Finance was in London not long ago to lay the cornerstone of a new building being erected by the local branch of the institute for the blind.

I noticed recently in the newspapers that at a recent meeting in Ottawa of the Liberal federation it was suggested that the $2.50 licence fee on radios be abolished. The Conservative party have long advocated that, and now that an election is approaching the Liberals are beginning to wise up to the wishes of the people. I do not think the people will forget that we advocated this long ago. This is just another piece of sucker bait for the next election.

Mr. Garson: It apparently depends upon who suggests it, whether it is sucker bait or not.

Mr. Lennard: We have said it for years. You had better wake up.

Mr. Garson: Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There are two far more vital subjects with which I wish to deal, markets and taxes. I do not believe there has ever been a time when the people of Canada were more perturbed and worried about taxes at all levels of government. I just received a statement of how the taxes collected by the township of London in my constituency are spent. Of every dollar collected by the township, 25 cents goes to the county, 45 cents goes to the schools and the township has only 30 cents for its own purposes.

I should like to indicate how municipal taxes have gone up; and at this time I should like to commend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) for the practical approach to this problem which he indicated in the speech he delivered yesterday. The farm I am going to give as an example is known as Weldwood farm; it is located in the township of Westminster and consists of 212 acres. In 1946 the municipal taxes on this farm were $252; in 1952 they were $750.42. Farm land is not going to be able to carry such a burden of taxation, particularly with the falling prices for agricultural products. This situation is becoming so serious that municipal authorities all over the country are becoming quite worried. I shall say more about this matter later when I deal with the question of power. I mention it now just to show the serious situation of our municipalities.

Yesterday my leader referred to the fact that the cost of civil defence falls entirely upon the municipality. In addition the municipality must pay a sales tax on whatever goods it is required to buy. Should there be any amount of unemployment the municipalities will be saddled with further expense at a time when many of them will have lessened incomes.

So they are in a very serious situation. I think the seriousness of the situation was evidenced by the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in the west some time ago, but it was not evidenced in his desire to find a market for surplus farm products. His remarks were designed to find a scapegoat on whom to lay the blame. In that speech, as reported by the press, he was blaming President-elect Eisenhower, and I suppose before this session is over he will blame the late R. B. Bennett, he will blame George Drew and he will blame the Conservative party. But Canadians generally are getting wised up to that and are not going to fall for it. Canadians will not soon forget how long this party has been in power, and that year after year markets for our natural products of the farms, the fisheries and forests have slowly but surely disappeared.

Paragraph 6 of the speech from the throne has to do with the commonwealth prime ministers' conference now convening in Great Britain. I think it is—I was going to say timely—but it too is long overdue, because many sessions ago I said that the countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization should be able to trade together because the military alliance would not last long if those people were not able to trade with each other.

I might also point out that if we expect Britain to buy our farm products we must also buy from them in turn. Yesterday it was pointed out how our exports have grown. True, dollar values have grown, and many strategic war materials and other scarce commodities are in great demand, but not so the products of the forests, of the fisheries and of the farms. They have followed a very different pattern, and that economy is built on a rather false hope because, should the possibility of war diminish and the purchase of those strategic materials by other countries cease, we would certainly be in a very serious situation.

The United States glibly ignored the Geneva trade treaties when we were in a serious situation, and banned our dairy products and other products under the excuse of a defence situation. Every treaty this country has negotiated has seemed to get us into difficulty, including the international monetary fund, and we have found that through them our markets have been lost. During the time we enjoyed, and others enjoyed, the British preference we were able to market certain farm products abroad. Now the Geneva trade treaties have torn that up and here we are sitting with surpluses of many farm products and with decreased production. We could increase our food production as we did during the war so long as those who do produce or would produce are rewarded. We are again in the position of finding farmers in the community penalized for producing in abundance while we have a starving world around us. There were high sounding phrases back in the days when they wanted more food. They said "Food will win the war and preserve the peace".

Mr. Howe: Is my hon. friend aware that we sold more food last year than ever in our history?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Maybe we did, but we have a lot on hand that you have not sold.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You can't answer that.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), who seconded the address, mentioned and praised the government's meat floor price policy. I want to point out to this house and to the Canadian farmers that that is the packers' point of view. What about the consumer? The reduction in retail meat prices is infinitesimal, while the price paid for beef except for good and extra good quality has been reduced. The member for Waterloo North mentioned a figure of 15 cents and I have the quotation from page 11 of Hansard of November 21:

> Without the floor prices and the government support buying, livestock prices could have dropped to 15 cents or even 10 cents instead of holding at 25 cents and 26 cents.

Just the week before last a neighbour of mine shipped some very good cattle to Toronto and all he got was 12 cents. It would not be so bad if the consumer were getting some advantage, but it is the packers who are making a killing in two ways. As I mentioned before the producers are taking a beating, and if the consumer were getting the benefit it just would not seem to be so bad.

Not long ago, the week before last, I was invited to attend a hog producers' meeting at Clinton, Ontario. Some of the delegates from Waterloo North said they had approached their member and he had advised them that the solution to their problem was cheaper grain. I want to ask him if he recommends cheaper oats and barley for the Canadian farmer in the west. Price support as applied to beef, as is the case with many other commodities, is a joke.

The situation in which the farmer finds himself is being very forcibly impressed on labour in this country. The steelworkers in Hamilton, Toronto, Brantford and Woodstock are being let out in large numbers, and I have before me a copy of a memorandum sent to the government dealing with this particular problem. I wish to compliment local 2868, united steelworkers of America, C.I.O., of Hamilton, and locals 439, 458 and 636, international union of automobile, aircraft and agricultural implement workers of America, C.I.O., representing the employees of the Massey-Harris and Cockshutt Plow companies, of Toronto, Brantford, and Woodstock for their very realistic approach to the problem of markets for Canadian farmers. Drastic unemployment in the agricultural implement industry is but an indication that unless the farmer can sell at reasonable prices he cannot buy.

I wish to quote briefly from the steelworkers' memorandum:

> For a healthy farm implement industry in Canada it is necessary for Canada to trade with other nations of the world. Millions of people in the world are short of food. The requirements of many nations for farm implements to increase food production has recently been the concern of the United Nations. Many of the nations where food shortages are most acute are unable to pay for their equipment in American or Canadian dollars. It is the responsibility of the Canadian government to arrange for trade agreements with these nations. Where it is not possible for the other government to pay for Canadian farm implements in cash, arrangements should be made for trade in goods or through long-term payment plans.

The labourers in those particular agricultural implement factories are finding that since the farmer cannot sell his products he cannot buy the products of labour and consequently these people are being let out. Neither can they buy Canadian cheese, bacon, eggs and the many other foods that are necessary for those who are working in heavy industry, so the vicious circle continues.

Paragraph 9 of the speech from the throne deals with our economic conditions and reads as follows:

> Our economic conditions remain favourable and the level of external trade is high. While the dangers of inflation have not disappeared, pressures have eased and it has been possible to suspend the operation of some of the anti-inflationary measures.

Trade, Mr. Speaker, is our life line, and anti-inflationary measures are certainly not necessary. It is too late to help. Inflation has put our prices up until we have priced ourselves out of world markets, and the government is to blame. They had control of credit and currency through the Bank of Canada. Did they exercise it? They allowed prices to go up and up, and in a sense they have approved of it. They give it their blessing. Why? Because it provided the buoyant revenues of which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) spoke so glowingly.

Coming back for a moment to taxation, I mentioned the taxes at the municipal level. People in the municipalities are able to see what has been done with their tax dollar. They have their roads, bridges and schools right under their eyes. They know what is happening. When we come to the provincial level, we see our highways and the results of many other expenditures such as the development of natural resources. They are pretty well watched. But when you come to the federal level, not only are the taxes hidden but the expenditures are well veiled, so far as possible, so that we have little to show, in comparison with the municipal and provincial levels, for what has been done with our tax dollar. As I said before, the people are thoroughly aroused over the high taxation.

I believe that a complete revision of the Income Tax Act is also long overdue. It has been added to by amendments, rulings and precedents, until even accountants do not know just where they stand. Even now men are being taxed because of their intentions. That seems ridiculous, but such is the case and it applies when assessments are being made on so-called capital gains.

Paragraph 12 of the throne speech deals with the issuance of an order of approval by the international joint commission for the development of hydroelectric power in the international section of the St. Lawrence river. I think Canadians generally welcome an opportunity to demonstrate to the world in general, and the United States in particular, that we can proceed with the St. Lawrence development on our own, both as to the seaway and as to the power development. While I am dealing with power and I have the opportunity at this time to do so, I want to say that farmers and many others view with alarm the recent suggestion that hydro rates would have to be increased. I believe, therefore, that in our approach to this development of power we should exercise a little economy. With falling prices for agricultural products and increasing costs all along the line, as I mentioned in connection with taxes, farmers and others are not going to be able to pay increased rates.

Just last week I was in Strathroy, Ontario. A resident had received his hydro bill for $75. He said, "While I am not a farmer, I am living in the country; and where I am going to get $75 to pay this bill I do not know because I depend on the farm trade for my income, and it is slowly but surely disappearing". The same argument applies to freight rates. I see that we are going to have a meeting of the board of transport commissioners, and that will be one of the subjects on the agenda. I want to point out that increased freight rates are not only going to penalize the producer but they will also penalize the consumer. Farmers generally believe we have reached the point where we can go no further with these increases.

> You will be invited to consider a measure to provide for federal co-operation with the provincial governments in the conservation of the water resources of Canada.

I believe Canadians approve of that. In western Ontario we have the Thames valley authority which is building the Fanshawe dam. I believe the people appreciate what is being done in that area, and that good results will come from it. While I am mentioning that, about June 10 last there was an editorial in the St. Marys Journal-Argus which was reprinted in the London Free Press, which dealt with the statement I made that along with the Thames valley authority and the Fanshawe dam we should investigate the possibility of pumping water from Lake Huron into the Thames watershed during the summer months. The editorial said:

> How would Mr. White make water run uphill?

I just want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the St. Marys Journal-Argus that civilization is measured by man's ability to make water run uphill. Many of the residents of the St. Marys area would have been glad this summer to demonstrate how to make water run uphill, if they had had some water at the bottom of the well with which to give a demonstration with the old farm pump. Some time ago it was my privilege to visit the Grand Coulee dam and see the great lake that is 150 miles long, and which has been raised to some 450 feet by the Grand Coulee dam. The water from this reservoir is pumped up 250 feet more into the valley of the old Columbia river, and is used to irrigate the whole of that valley in Washington. That demonstrates man's ability to make water run uphill.

Mr. Laing: You are hundreds of miles out.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): What is the matter with you? Hydro has made it possible to make water run uphill.

Finally, I commend my leader for his speech yesterday in which he pointed out how the extravagances of this government were costing the taxpayers unnecessary dollars; how the municipalities and the provinces were finding themselves in a difficult situation because of the taxing rights of federal, provincial and municipal governments. I am going to support the amendment he moved at that time.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes tonight I wish to deal with one or two problems in which I am interested. At the outset I want to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I also wish to congratulate my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) on the contribution he made this afternoon. I believe that he had good material and that his ideas were appreciated.

It would appear that too few of our Canadian citizens have the knowledge that I feel they should have in connection with this enormous defence expenditure. It gets far too little publicity. I realize that in many cases it is utterly impossible to give it the publicity it would warrant. Secrecy would bar any chance of giving out the full details. But I picked up a little clipping tonight. It refers to words used by a great Yankee, Cardinal Spellman, and this is what he said:

> It is better to have strength and not need it than to need it and not have it.

I believe that is the very position we find ourselves in tonight. We are preparing for trouble should it occur. We are hoping it does not. At the same time we dare not neglect that preparation because, when we do so, we put ourselves in an extremely vulnerable position. For that reason we must continue to prepare and we must continue to spend. The public are not given the information that I feel in many cases they should have.

I have listened with great interest this last day or day and a half to the speeches by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other parties; and on so many occasions, particularly by the leader of the official opposition and by the leader of the Social Credit group, the government has been bitterly criticized for the loss of the British markets. In fact I believe it was the leader of the Social Credit group who made this statement which appears at page 59 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I wonder how long a man does have to keep pressing for the strengthening of the commonwealth and the restoration of our traditional market, that is the market the Liberals have thrown out the window . . .

If those markets have been thrown out the window I am sure it has not been done by Canadians. We are told about the loss of markets. We are told about roadblocks. Those roadblocks were not erected by Canadians, and I do not believe Canadians have any authority to take them down. We have in this country no authority to tell the people in Great Britain what they should do with their United States or Canadian dollars or with their sterling. I believe they have a perfect right to buy where they wish to buy. I believe this country, since 1940 particularly, has made a contribution to the British Isles that does not take second place to any contribution that has been made within the commonwealth. According to the figures, we have made gifts and loans of about $6 billion. Few persons stop to realize just what $6 billion means, but it is an enormous contribution for 14 million people to make.

During the last two days I have heard bitter criticism of the market that has been built up with our friends to the south. In this debate it has been stated that 80 per cent of our foreign trade, in the way of exports, is with the United States. I cannot think of a better country to be trading with, and I wonder today if the majority of the Canadian people do not feel the same way I do about the matter. Would it be right to turn down that market for cash and sell on credit? In this country today we have an extremely high standard of living, second only perhaps to that of our neighbours to the south. If we gave our goods away or sold them on credit could we maintain that standard of living to the same extent that we could if we sold for cash?

Perhaps citizens coming from the part of the country from which I come, namely the maritime provinces, take a different view. I believe that we are more conscious of the fact that those United States markets are the very lifestream of our part of Canada. Without those markets we would be completely lost. It is true that many of the things we produce go across the border in a raw state but there is no market for that material in Canada, and a great percentage of it is of a perishable character. So far as the maritime provinces are concerned, the only normal market for it is the United States. I often wonder what sort of position we would be in if restrictive tariffs were placed on those goods by the United States. With the small population we now have, I feel that we could still look for a great decrease should that event ever happen. We are extremely dependent upon those markets.

I want to say here that I was greatly encouraged when I picked up a newspaper a few days ago and read extracts from a speech that was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in Detroit. I believe there is much food for thought in the suggestions he made at that time. I might also say that in my opinion it is a good Liberal speech. This is what he said:

> While trade relations between Canada and the U.S. have never been better, they are capable of considerable improvement . . .
> While there were no serious restrictions in the exchange of raw materials between the two countries, "can the same be said of manufactured goods and agricultural products?" asked Mr. Howe, then added:
> "You know the answer to that as well as I do."

I picked up a clipping today, and I fail to understand why it ever appeared in the Globe and Mail. It is dated November 14 and is by a citizen of the city of Toronto who has returned from the United States. This is what that gentleman had to say:

> I have just returned from the United States. I bought the practical limit permitted for a forty-eight hour visit. My purchases consisted of identical brand name articles of merchandise sold both in Canada and the United States.
> I drove home on gasoline that cost me 27·9 cents (Canadian measure) in New Jersey, 31 cents in New York and 40 cents in Ontario—

When this oil boom came to Alberta we were all given to understand that we might expect cheaper gas and oil in this country. I can only say that in the part of the country from which I come there has been no reduction but rather there has been an increase. This gentleman goes on to say:

> —on four new 6·40 by 15 tires, price $67.16 in the States and $129.60 in Toronto.

I have put these figures on the record before with regard to the tire that is made by the identical company, one in the United States and the other in Canada. The four tires cost him $67.16 in the United States, and they were $129.60 in Toronto.

I just want to take a moment to say that in this House of Commons I have also heard a great deal of criticism with regard to the subsidization of farm products, fishery products, or whatever they might be. If ever there was a glaring example of subsidization in any country, there it is. Subsidizing industry is the difference between the price in the United States and duty paid value in Canada. Whatever that amount is that is the subsidy. It cannot be called anything else. Sometimes I believe those of us in the maritime provinces have a better right to complain about this unjust treatment than they have in some other parts of this country.

These are the prices here as compared with the prices in the United States. This article goes on to give a name brand of glycol; that is, anti-freeze. It was $3.75 in the United States and $5.95 in Canada. Only a few days ago I noticed that representatives of one of the great Canadian corporations appeared before the tariff board in Ottawa and asked for further protection. That spread is not enough to satisfy Canadian manufacturers, and they appeared before the tariff board in Ottawa asking for greater protection.

An electric mixer bought for a gift was $12.95 in the United States; it is $30 in Canada. That is a difference of a great deal over 100 per cent. An orlon shirt was $4.95 in the United States; an equivalent nylon shirt in Canada is $10.50. These are companies that are asking this government today to bar the importation of foreign textiles, at a time when there is a difference of nearly 100 per cent in the price of the finished product.

Mr. Fraser: That is what your Liberal government which has been in office for twenty years has done for you.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): God help us if we ever have a Tory government, particularly if they follow the same course they have followed since confederation.

Mr. McLure: What about New Brunswick?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He mentions an electric razor. It cost $18 in Harrison, New Jersey. The same razor, made by the same company, was quoted at $29.95 in Toronto. These are the remarks at the end of his letter:

> Just why, in the light of the higher wages and salaries paid in the United States as well as the excellent profits now being reported, anyone should deprive themselves of the benefits of the obviously more efficient manufacturing and distributing methods leaves a lot to be explained.

That is signed by E. L. Patchet of Toronto.

I want to turn to one more subject along that line and deal with it briefly. Last summer we received from the Vancouver motor dealers' association a great deal of literature comparing prices of automobiles in Canada and the United States, and the different tax structures in the two countries with regard to this commodity. I was down in Connecticut for several days during the presidential election. I listened to the story and watched the proceedings on television. As you realize, during an election campaign they come out with everything they have to offer to the public. In a radio address I heard a very prominent announcer in the United States state that the federal tax on a $2,000 car in that country was $620. The next day I got copies of two Connecticut papers in which that statement appeared. Unfortunately I have lost them, but these figures are correct. According to the literature that was sent out by the Vancouver motor dealers' association the federal taxation in the United States was $100. There is quite a difference between a tax of $100 and $620. That statement was in the United States press. I can get a copy of it. It appeared on November 3 last.

When the subject is mentioned and the great variation between the prices of automobiles in the two countries is shown, the first answer that the automobile manufacturers come up with is that it is taxation. A tax of $620 works out to about 32 per cent. That is the federal tax on an automobile in the United States. I am sure the federal tax on an automobile is not any greater in Canada. But what is the reason for this great differential in the price of the same make of car, one manufactured in Detroit and the other manufactured across the river in Windsor, or in Oshawa? I feel that Canadians have every right in the world to believe that they are being robbed. It is unfair for any company, with branches on both sides of the border, to take advantage of every bit of protection that is accorded to it.

I can see the force of a new company that is being established, perhaps with very little finances, asking for protection while trying to get on their feet, trying to manufacture. I believe they should be protected. But when you come to old established companies which are declaring dividends in the millions every year, and you find that they are still asking for protection and still charging the Canadian people 50 per cent more than they are charging United States citizens on the other side of the border, then something should be done.

I want to return for one moment to the subject I mentioned at the outset, namely the loss of British markets. I feel quite strongly on this subject. I feel that that matter has been in the hands of three very capable men, namely the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Perhaps I would feel this way naturally, but going back over history I have found it impossible to find a better team at any time since confederation. I believe these three men have used every avenue. They have taken every advantage. They have done everything that was humanly possible to restore and hold those British markets for Canadian goods.

We all appreciate the British markets. There is not a Canadian in this chamber, there is not a Canadian that I know of, who does not appreciate the markets that we have had in Britain over the years. I am coming out with a suggestion that perhaps has never been mentioned before in the House of Commons. If we want better marketing conditions; if we want better world conditions, we shall have to do something along these lines. Our Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are on their way overseas tonight. The result of the meeting they are to attend will not be known for a few days. We all realize they have a big job to do, but I want to say in all sincerity that the biggest job that Canadians might sponsor today is free trade within the NATO nations, if we want to create good will and good understanding.

Go back through history and you will find, and you will be convinced immediately, that a great number of the wars we have had down through the years have developed because of tariff walls. Tariff walls have been responsible for them. As I look back at the figures I find that since 1940 the United States has contributed $87 billion to Europe and Asia. That includes, of course, the assistance they gave Russia when that country was our ally during the war. A great deal of that $87 billion has gone into Germany, Japan, and countries that were devastated during the war. They must come back in order to produce and manufacture to live as we would like to see them live. But it would seem to me that it is simply giving with one hand and taking away with the other if, after they get into a position where they can manufacture and export, we stick up a tariff wall and refuse to do business with them.

You will never have world peace, you will never create within the United Nations the feeling that should be created, so long as tariff walls stand as a barrier. There is one way and only one way a proper feeling can be created, and that is to tear the gates down in all the countries within NATO. When you do that not only will you make friends there, but some of the democratic countries outside NATO will then wish to become members. They will realize that this organization is not one that takes only a negative stand or uses them when world conditions are such that we might use them to our advantage. They will then realize that we are trying to help them not only to build up a war machine but to trade with them and to a great extent be responsible for improving their standard of living.

I believe communism would be licked today if in this world we could just fill the stomachs. It is utterly impossible to convince people who are hungry, people who are without clothing and without shelter, that our way of life is the only way of life. I have seen some pretty desperate circumstances overseas, such as to convince me immediately that people in desperation are in the same position as a drowning man reaching for a straw—"Anything is better than what we have." So many at that stage are content to accept some ideology which at other times would seem utterly hopeless to them. But through starvation and hunger they are obliged to accept whatever is offered to them.

By creating free trade within the United Nations I believe that we in Canada could continue with the standard of living we now have. We are an exporting nation. Fourteen millions of people can never consume what they can manufacture and create. Our prosperity is based upon the amount we can export.

For that reason we are the country that should be leading the way. As was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in Detroit, the only way we will ever obtain world peace, the only way we will ever satisfy our allies and friends, is by leading the way ourselves, throwing down the gates and taking what they have to offer. When that is done we will hear members in this House of Commons rising to their feet defending industry in their own constituencies. They will be complaining because the importation of Japanese balloons, or something else, is depriving people of their living.

We must contend with that. In this connection I should like to place on record an article I came across the other day in Time magazine, dealing with Mr. Parker of the Parker Pen Company. Parker was sent to England by his father many years ago to establish a branch of their industry in that country. The article points out that in the first year he was there he lost $100,000 through not knowing the English methods of distribution. He continued in his efforts, however, and found it wise to hire British merchandisers, until today the products of the Parker Pen Company are being advertised in thirty-one languages and last year foreign sales rose to a volume of $13,700,000, or about 40 per cent of the total sales. The article goes on to say:

> While expanding abroad into 121 countries, Ken Parker did not forget his 1,900 employees at home. They have a union shop, liberal welfare benefits, and a respect for Parker's enlightened methods; never in the company's 60-year history have they called a strike. A year and a half ago, feeling that the time clock irritated employees, Parker abolished it. Tardiness and absenteeism dwindled to almost zero.

And the final paragraph of the article attributes these words to Mr. Parker:

> We'll take our chances on U.S. production and merchandising savvy any time against all comers. And with the bars down in both directions, U.S. manufacturers would have access to the two billion consumers in the world, instead of only 150 million at home.

I suggest he might be described as a gentleman of vision. The Parker pen is one of the most expensive manufactured on this continent. We see many types of ball pens and pens of the traditional type but, despite the pens offered on the market, this company has built up a large volume of business, and is prepared to take on all comers. They have thrown down the bars and have said they are prepared to compete with any other man. That is the spirit that must be developed in all the NATO countries, particularly in Canada and the United States. We have to encourage others, and no better way can be found to give that encouragement than to be prepared to buy from them. We cannot have it just one way: If we want to sell to them we must buy from them. I noted that in a recent speech Dean Acheson said this:

> If we and our partners in the free world are to build the kind of economic and military strength we need for our security, we must all co-operate to reduce and minimize the barriers to trade between us.

In my opinion truer words were never spoken. There is nothing we can do and nothing the United Nations can do that would go further toward the making of peace and the betterment of world conditions than to treat our friends as we would like to be treated.

The hon. member who preceded me in the debate referred to prices being paid today for farm products. Travelling to Ottawa the other day I drove through four states and made comparisons of farm prices along the way with the prices I had been obliged to pay in the little town in which I live. Malone, New York, is only about 90 miles from Ottawa. In three grocery stores in Malone bacon was selling at three pounds for a dollar and pork loin at 40 cents a pound. Yet I cannot buy bacon at three pounds for a dollar. Some hon. member may know somewhere he can get it at that price, but I cannot find it. Those are the prices they are receiving today for pork in the United States.

The Canadian product cannot go into the United States today, and one would take it for granted that, with Canadian meats barred from that market, prices would be much greater there than they are in Canada, because in this country we have a surplus. But those are the prices they are receiving for pork and pork products in the United States of America.

I feel that perhaps it is not only the Canadian farmer who is beginning to feel the pinch. The hon. member who took his seat a few moments ago referred to inflation. Well, there is only one way to do away with inflation and that is to get prices down. We will never do away with it so long as prices are spiralling. They have to come down, and will have to start somewhere. My experience has been that they usually start with the primary producer. That has already taken place in the maritime provinces. The demand this year for fish and fish products is much less than it was last year, and very much less than it was two years ago. Prices are down. I feel that perhaps the primary producers are not able to meet this situation. They do not like to see the prices of raw materials being the first to come down.

Today our people are living better than ever before. There is no question about that. Prices are high in most cases, but some day there is going to be a slump. It has to start somewhere. The cost of living index has been dropping slowly during the past three or four months, but the time is coming when it must drop more rapidly. Prices must fall.

In conclusion may I say that I hope the government will give serious consideration to the lowering of tariffs. I feel that that action would be of greater benefit to Canada than it would to many other countries in the world. We are an exporting nation and we should be leading the way. If we want to create a feeling of respect, if we want to give the people of other countries hope for the future, we cannot follow a better course than to throw down our tariff walls and deal with our friends and allies as we would like to have them deal with us.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, one of the privileges we have under our system of government is that of taking part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I trust that this privilege will be long continued and that no effort will be made to drastically curtail a discussion which permits us to voice our grievances, to express our ideas and to bring parliament more or less up to date. I know there are those who will disagree with me on this score, but I do trust there will be no curtailment of this discussion. It is true that there is a certain amount of repetition; it is true there are some rather long speeches, but I feel that the collective views expressed in this debate give us a knowledge that is well for us to have.

We are meeting under conditions which are not greatly changed from those which obtained when we adjourned in July. Canada is still building up defences against aggression in an effort to avert global conflict. This is something close to the hearts and minds of all of us. We hope these efforts will continue, because if another global war were to develop it would create the most calamitous situation this world has ever known.

I think our people are generally in accord with the government on its defence policy provided reasonable value is obtained for the expenditures made. The question is whether we are getting value for the money spent in this regard. From the rather shocking revelations in the press and the questions that have been asked in the house it would seem to be indicated that we have not been getting full value for our defence expenditures. The references that have been made to the ultra-extravagant methods pursued by the defence purchasing department has created grave doubts in our mind.

We as members of Her Majesty's most loyal opposition, and I think the majority of the 14 million people of Canada, will go all-out with the government provided our country is placed on an equal standing with other free nations in the world. We will co-operate to the full if our government provides the best of military equipment for all our armed forces. We will give credit where credit is due when the government acts as we feel it should in the best interests of all the people of Canada.

But we will not and we cannot acquiesce in expenditures of the type that have just been brought to our notice. I think it is the duty of every member of parliament to scrutinize closely every expenditure of government, not just defence expenditures. I hope the day will never come when we are not permitted to carry out this prerogative to the full. I hope the day will never come when the government of the day will not invite or even welcome all members—and not just those of the opposition—to dig deeply into the intricacies of government operations. If by so doing they are able to find inequalities, unjustifiable actions, improper methods and deficiencies the government should congratulate the members who have brought such matters to their attention and take immediate steps to remedy the situation. That is my idea of good government.

I came to parliament—and I know this is true of all hon. members—with the idea of being useful and of giving the best representation possible. The people of Haldimand, whom I have the privilege of representing, are pretty sound-thinking people. They have proved this by consistently returning Conservative members to this house for the past fifty years. You cannot continue to be associated with people such as we have in Haldimand—and this would apply to most rural constituencies—unless your actions and voice reflect the thinking of those people.

As their representatives in this the highest court of the land they expect us to protect their interests, to protect their rights and to protect their privileges at all times. That is our trust. It is a great honour to be a member of parliament. I hope no government member will criticize or condemn any member of this house, even a member of the government party, who makes an effort, rightly or perhaps even wrongly at times—this does not occur too often—to improve or better conditions through the medium of this House of Commons.

It is rather interesting to note how much further advanced is the National Liberal Federation than is the government itself. There was a recent meeting of the Liberal federation at which a number of resolutions were passed which were in complete conformity with views which have been expressed in the House of Commons by members of the opposition. Hon. members will recall how in recent sessions our party, under the leadership of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), so well brought to the attention of this house the great needs of many of our veterans and their families. We know something of what those needs are. Because of the high cost of living, these people were finding it difficult to get along. We now find that the National Liberal Federation is in complete agreement with the suggestions that were made in this house by the Conservative party.

Hon. members will also recall that at every session since the commencement of the twenty-first parliament we have requested the government to take some action in connection with the Post Office Department. We are glad to notice that the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) is showing an increasing interest in these matters. These problems are most serious, and they have been brought to the attention of the government on many occasions. There have been complaints about mail deliveries in the urban centres and the plight of the rural mail carriers. The National Liberal Federation has recognized again the reasonableness of the oft-repeated request made in this house by members of our party. Then again we find the Liberal congress in complete acquiescence with our views in regard to the abolition of the nuisance radio licence fee of $2.50. That has been brought very strongly to the attention of the house by my leader and others on many occasions. We have requested that the C.B.C. should not have a monopoly on radio and television service across the country. That too was brought very forcibly to the attention of the house by my leader in his opening address in this debate, and again we find the Liberal federation approving that policy.

As we look back over the past three and one-half years we find on the pages of Hansard innumerable references by members of our party to which members of the Liberal federation now give their support. In other words they now support those things for which we have pressed for many years.

There was one particular matter I would like to bring to the attention of the government, more particularly to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). He is not in his seat at the present time, but I would like to suggest that he undertake a geological survey in a certain section of southwestern Ontario. On this I would like to quote Mr. W. A. Bell at page 18 of the statistics for the department where he says:

> The guiding objective of the geological survey is a systematic study of the geology of Canada. Until the geology of any area is thoroughly known no just appraisal can be made of the economic value of its rocks and unconsolidated deposits, and of the probabilities of the occurrence of commercial quantities of minerals and fuels.

Further on in his survey report Mr. Bell states that geological surveys have provided data of great value to the discovery and development of oil in the foothills of Alberta. We certainly have no quarrel with that statement; I think it is quite true. My reason for asking for a survey of the southwestern Ontario area is because of the immense resources of natural gas we have in that section of which Haldimand county may be classed as the centre. As the production of natural gas is associated with oil in many cases, I think it would be particularly justifiable to ask for a survey.

Haldimand county has over 2,000 natural gas wells and the neighbouring county of Norfolk has approximately 350, with a combined annual production of well over 2 billion cubic feet of gas. We also have the gas field in the southwestern portion of Ontario along the shores of lake Erie, where owing to the heavily-producing gas area oil might be found. I trust the minister will give some consideration to this request, as I feel under the conditions it is a very normal one we are making.

The Conservative party has consistently urged the government to give some measure of relief to the taxpayers, but this request has just as consistently fallen on deaf ears. Our party has pointed out that the policies of overtaxation which have been so much in evidence since the election of 1949 have created a feeling of frustration and a feeling of "what's the use" in so many of our people. In spite of that the government has increased taxes beginning with the first budget after 1949, producing huge surpluses, and has repeatedly stated each year that they have to tax heavily in order that we may continue our defence and social security projects. I think the best answer that has been given comes from the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Canadian Bar Association, an organization I know all hon. members will agree is of a non-political nature. After a most careful study of the tax structure they have concluded that a substantial measure of relief could be given. They announced that a surplus of $300 million could very well be possible; and the suggestions were made after careful study of the situation.

The Canadian people have reason to believe that this high taxation should be cut down to a certain extent, for to be overtaxed year after year just means that there are many sacrifices which have to be made by our people. For instance, they cannot make a little extra payment on a mortgage as otherwise they might. They perhaps cannot buy that fur coat—or not perhaps a fur coat but a badly needed coat for the wife—and it means giving up many other little things that go to make our way of life what so many of our Canadian people feel it should be.

There is just one other matter I would like to deal with, and it is one which is and should be of great concern to every member of this house. I refer particularly to the fact that there was no reference in the speech from the throne to the situation which concerns the farm people in this country, and the disposition of our farm products. I have just completed reading a lengthy and rather detailed account of the meeting of the United Nations food and agriculture organization held in Rome this year. After reading that report I find it emphasizes the often expressed sentiments of so many people that there is definitely something radically wrong with our system of food distribution throughout this and other lands. It is unfortunate that some system cannot be devised under which we could have a more proper distribution of food throughout the rest of the world. Each year, and perhaps this year more than at any other time, the FAO has striven to emphasize the urgent need for greater production of foods to ensure the very minimum of requirements for the people of the world.

I would like to ask members of this house if it is just the purpose of this organization to meet year after year to study and analyse the world food situation, to make recommendations as to what should be done, and there to let the matter rest. To many people the setting up of that organization some seven years ago was one thing in which we felt there would be an advance, something to help solve the world's greatest problem next to that of war, that of relief from the haunting fear of hunger and starvation. In many places throughout the Asiatic world people are starving due to the fact that we have not as yet established that necessary form of distribution. What hope is there for a free world as long as that situation continues, after seven years of meeting together with members of over sixty nations; and what have we accomplished? Exactly nothing. When we consider the high hopes we had at that time and what little has been attained we naturally feel that this body is not serving the useful purpose it should. That would be a natural conclusion. However, I feel that a certain responsibility rests with the United Nations assembly. I definitely feel this matter should be high on the agenda of the United Nations discussions because, Mr. Speaker, again I say there is no greater problem that faces us, next to the battle against aggression, than the battle against famine and hunger.

This is a matter that deeply concerns us all. The facts are that before world war II there was enough food being produced to provide every man, woman and child with 2,380 calories per day. After twelve years of so-called progress we have enough food to supply every man, woman and child with 2,260 calories per day, 120 calories less than we had twelve years ago. We can therefore understand the reason that the food and agriculture organization recommends an increased demand for food. Again I say this problem should rest with the United Nations assembly itself.

The speech from the throne made no reference to the position of agriculture. I believe that was an important and very serious omission on the part of the government. I feel that agriculture in Canada today is in a most difficult position, regardless of the statements by the previous speaker. In my view the present position of the farmer is certainly not bright.

I have just come from the farm to attend this session of parliament, and many of our members have some knowledge of the situation. It is really very serious indeed. The farmers have seen labour ask for and receive higher remuneration for their services; they have seen the prices of the goods that they have to purchase rising higher and higher. On the other hand they see the prices of pork and beef tumbling. They see a lessening in the demand for poultry products, and dairy prices are levelling off. These, gentlemen, are not very nice things to have to bring before the house. We would like to say that conditions are bright and cheerful, but such is not the case.

A real challenge faces us in this House of Commons, as we meet to discuss and debate these problems. Agriculture today is fast approaching a crisis. Whatever is done about the farm situation at the present session of parliament is going to be very important to the primary producers of this country. We trust that legislation will be brought forth which will improve the position of the farmers of Canada. We, as Canadian citizens, owe so much to our farm people. When that industry is kept in a strong, healthy condition, it means that Canada's economy is healthy. It is to be hoped the government will make a definite statement of policy as to what they have in view, particularly with regard to regaining our markets.

We know that on many occasions we have pressed for a commonwealth conference. We know that our leader has repeatedly suggested such a conference. As farmers we realize what such a meeting means. It means a great deal to us. We trust that the commonwealth meeting which is now being held, and which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is attending, will result in something of value to the agricultural industry of Canada. I hope that, along with what I have suggested, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the members of the government will take into very serious consideration the fact that this matter of trade is so important to the farm people of Canada.

Mr. Shaw: In view of the fact it is almost ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should like permission of the house to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 26, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED LAYOFFS AT ELDORADO REFINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production, now the Acting Prime Minister. Will the minister give the house a statement concerning the reported layoff at the Eldorado Mining and Refining company plant at Port Hope? Will the minister tell us also whether further layoffs are contemplated, and if so where the uranium mined in Canada is to be processed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, a telephone call was received in my office requesting this information, and I tried to reach the president of the company but found that he was in the Northwest Territories. The facts as I have them are that the fire which destroyed the mill at Port Radium is primarily responsible. The mill which was burnt was an old mill designed chiefly for the recovery of radium ore. Since the fire it has been replaced by a more modern mill which gives a greater degree of concentration of the uranium recovered. This means there is a smaller tonnage of ore to be treated at Port Hope, and therefore instead of a three-shift operation the refinery will, in the future, operate on a two-shift basis.

A further factor is that part of the staff at Port Hope were engaged in experimental work in designing a new refinery. It has been decided to defer the building of a new refinery for the time being. The staff engaged in that particular problem, numbering some ten or twelve, has been dispensed with. The employment, as of July 31, which was the peak employment, was 227 people. At present there are 199 people, and on December 15, when it is expected the two-shift operation will commence, employment will be between 150 and 160 people.

In answer to the second part of the question, I might say that all the uranium that is being mined in Canada is being refined at Port Hope.

LIGHT AND ROADBED AT C.N.R. WHARF, CHARLOTTETOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a petition from the labourers protective union, No. 9568, at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, asking for the supplying of light at the Canadian National Railways wharf, and also asking for a proper roadbed for the labourers while pushing their hand-loaded trucks to load the cars or boats for shipment at the Charlottetown warehouse? If so, what action will be taken?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of great urgency, but if it is in my hon. friend's mind I can say to him that I have no recollection of having received such a petition. It may be that one has arrived in the office, and I shall inquire.

Mr. Graydon: You are too busy with the Winnipeg communications, of course.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) could put his question on the order paper and the Minister of Transport could answer it in the ordinary way.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): When speaking in the house yesterday, and as recorded at page 76 of Hansard, the hon member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) had this to say:

> It becomes clear from the speech of the leader of the official opposition and the speech of the leader of the Social Credit party that today the C.C.F. is the only party in this house which is prepared at this session to support legislation for the inauguration of a national health insurance program.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South completely misunderstood the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) when he outlined our position with respect to health insurance. Had my leader been opposed to a scheme of national health insurance, surely he would not have proceeded to envision the type of health insurance scheme which we would conceive of.

What the hon. member for Peace River asserted was that we are in favour of a national health insurance scheme, to commence at the earliest possible time; but he cautioned the house against any overeager effort on the part of anyone to catapult this nation or the state into any comprehensive scheme of health insurance or hospitalization before the means are available or the facilities are ready for it. The Social Credit leader indicated that the kind of health insurance scheme which we envision would first ensure that we have sufficient doctors, dentists, technicians, clinics and hospital beds available in order to provide the services for all our people under a national health insurance scheme.

The hon. member for Peace River then went on to list what he considered to be five essential features to be embodied in any national health insurance scheme. They were, first, that we have a fair measure of individual responsibility; second, that the patients will be guaranteed the right to have their choice of doctors and that the program must guarantee that there will be no regimentation of patients, doctors, nurses and hospitals; third, that emphasis must be placed upon preventive medicine or, in other words, keeping the people well; fourth, joint co-operation on the municipal, provincial and federal levels, with administration by the municipalities and the provincial governments working in co-operation; and then finally, provincial and federal subsidies to keep costs down.

Such a stand, Mr. Speaker, does not represent opposition to the establishment or the inauguration of a national health insurance program at this session. What we are opposed to, as my leader stated, is being catapulted holus-bolus into a complete scheme where we have not the necessary facilities in order to guarantee the services to our people. But surely a step can be taken now, along with steps that have already been taken, to establish health services with the idea in mind that this is a part of a national health insurance scheme. We say that this represents a common-sense, practical approach to this extremely important proposition. I hope it will not be said again that we are opposed to the inauguration of a national health insurance scheme at this session.

[Mr. Shaw.]

During this debate several hon. members who have spoken have made reference to agriculture and the present position of agriculture in our national economy. I hope to devote only a few moments to this subject, because I do desire to bring before the house one important matter which I think is deserving of immediate and serious consideration. It is true—and I have said this here upon many occasions—that my constituency embraces one of the finest mixed farming areas in Canada. The livestock produced in that area, along with other farm products, have been consistent winners at fairs in this country. That is a fact which testifies, of course, to the excellence of the agricultural products which are produced in that area. More than one world title has gone to the Red Deer area.

We all know, especially when we live in a mixed farming area of that kind, that livestock prices, in the main, determine the degree of stability or instability of the basic industry. Last spring, as I pointed out in this house, the closed markets resulting from foot-and-mouth disease had a most disastrous effect upon livestock producers in that area, especially upon those who were feeding cattle and preparing them for the markets. The existing floor prices for hogs and for cattle, quoted invariably f.o.b. some other place except that where the commodities are produced, leave much to be desired as far as our agriculture is concerned. Apart from the most exceptional cases, the floor prices for those products are absolutely meaningless as far as our producers are concerned. All one has to do is to examine the returns which the farmers are receiving for cattle and hogs. Too frequently—and I feel it necessary to mention this matter—the cost-conscious tax-burdened consuming public regard excessive resale prices for farm products as an indication of undue profits accruing to the farmers and what they would think to be a generally prosperous agriculture.

It is my conviction, Mr. Speaker, that the consuming public should be made to understand that, despite high resale prices for farm products, the net position of the farmer today, under excessive production costs, leaves a good deal to be desired and leaves the agricultural industry—especially that aspect of it relating to livestock production—in a precarious position in many instances.

In my estimation price spreads should be the major concern of any government, and every government should make every effort to find out the facts, to make those facts known to the public, and in short to interpret the position of the farmer to the consuming public of this country.

Mr. Blackmore: Accurately.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, accurately, as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) interjects.

With regard to agriculture and matters relative thereto, I should like to devote just a moment to the question of prairie farm assistance, particularly as prairie farm assistance applies to an area such as mine where farmers do not qualify as a consequence of crop losses resulting from drought but rather as a consequence of crop losses resulting from hail. In 1951 disastrous hail storms swept across that area. Losses were heavy. For almost the first time in thirteen years, during which time the farmers have been compelled to pay into the fund under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, they looked to the P.F.A.A. for some compensation as a consequence of those losses. One of the first things we learned, Mr. Speaker, was that the P.F.A.A. was originally designed to take care of crop losses resulting from drought. The same regulations are carried forward today, in the main, and the endeavour is made to apply them to hail areas. As a result, the act becomes almost impossible of administration, and the unfairness which develops as a consequence is causing the farmers of my area to charge the government with the rankest kind of discrimination. I am telling the house only exactly what the farmers themselves are saying. Regardless of their politics, in every part of that area they are issuing that charge.

I should like to underline the fact, Mr. Speaker, that for twelve to thirteen years those farmers have been paying one per cent of the price on all grains which have been marketed, through the recognized channels of marketing, of course. In the first place, I should like to know why with respect to an area such as the Red Deer area, where actually little wheat is grown, the main crops being coarse grains, they should persist in using wheat as the grain to determine eligibility. In the second place, in contrast to drought, hail cuts narrow swaths through the area. Hail will hop, skip and jump through an area. In a good area where production is so heavy, where hail does not strike, it is virtually impossible for 60 per cent of the farmers to qualify, because part of that township can be devastated, but because production is so high in the other part of the area it brings the average up above that which is used to exclude the township.

In the third place, the six section block which must exist, the block in which production is less than eight bushels to the acre, is unreasonable and altogether too high as far as hail is concerned.

When farmers proposed that the unit of eligibility be lowered below the six-section block they were told that it would encourage poor farming. Poor farming has been encouraged in the dried-out areas ever since this act came into effect. The farmers in my area claim that there is no reason in the world why the unit of eligibility under P.F.A.A. in relation to hail should not be reduced at least to the one-section basis.

The farmers have indicated to me that they are willing to pay more than the one per cent; but if they are going to pay they would like to be in a position where they would have a reasonable chance to qualify under the act. We find situations like these. I think of one where twelve sections in a solid block were hailed out a hundred per cent. They paid P.F.A. on sections one to eleven. Section twelve was part of the block that was hailed out a hundred per cent, but because they are able to drag it in with five other sections alongside of an ineligible township, they excluded the area wholly and completely, leaving those farmers with devastated crops but yet not a cent available under the act.

There is another aspect of this which is causing quite some concern. While farmers with 100 acres to 200 acres under cultivation lose everything as a consequence of hail and get nothing from P.F.A., yet we find a policy under which the government will pay a $200 flat award on farms where the actual acreage under cultivation is less than 25, categorizing such farms as a farm in the development stage. I have no objection to these farmers getting $200, since they paid for it, but it is hard to reconcile that with the situation where farmers lose 200 acres of grain and qualify for absolutely nothing. I am not criticizing the inspectors; I am not criticizing the men in the district offices who administer P.F.A.A. They are trying to do the best possible job with an act that is, as I said before, almost impossible of administration, if you want justice, equity and fairness, and the absolute removal of anything which appears to be discriminatory in character.

Let me point out that this has caused a lot of criticism. It has caused a lot of unhappiness. In my view, this act should be referred to the agriculture committee and a complete study should be made of P.F.A.A. in relation to hail, because, and I repeat, the regulations, originally designed to compensate farmers who had lost their crops as a consequence of drought, do not make sense when they are applied to these hailed-out areas.

During this debate, Mr. Speaker, considerable attention has been given to national defence. It is to national defence and defence production that I desire to devote my attention for a while. We Social Crediters have been wholly conscious at all times of the grave dangers confronting this nation. As a consequence of that, we have supported appropriations for defence. When these estimates have come before the house we have invariably questioned and sought information, and we have supported what the government considers to be essential appropriations for national defence. We are absolutely convinced that Canadians are fully prepared to bear whatever burden is necessary in order to ensure that we shall have the best possible and most adequate defences.

We have also supported the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the provisions made by this parliament for Canada's share of the costs of NATO. We have gone considerably farther than any other group in this house in urging compulsory service in Canada's home defence units, and we have at all times urged the establishment of realistic trade practices to strengthen Canada economically and to strengthen the commonwealth. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we have displayed through our actions that we have supported and that we will support all appropriations, as I said before, even though they may appear to be burdens, which are necessary in order to provide adequate defences. The Canadian taxpayers, however, demand one thing of us as a parliament. They demand that we give the very closest consideration to every item of defence expenditure, and that we make every conceivable effort to see to it that we are getting our money's worth out of every dollar spent in defence.

I know that during the last session of parliament this house set up a defence expenditures committee. We supported that action because we believed that such was necessary. It was said last year that the purpose of that committee was to try to effect economies consistent with the execution of policies decided by the government. It was under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and although I was not a member of that committee I personally feel that he conducted himself as chairman in commendable fashion.

Between April 8 and June 12 that committee held eighteen meetings. That was a very short period of time, it is true. During the period from April 8 to June 12 the committee, so my reading indicates to me, examined into government policy as far as defence expenditures were concerned. I noticed in reading all the reports that they gave consideration to control and accounting of materials and stores in the Department of National Defence. I also noticed that they gave consideration to write-off procedure which is followed by the government, including the write-offs resulting from theft, fire and other causes. The committee considered defence orders which had been placed between 1950 and 1952.

They gave consideration to military functions, economies and the possibility of alternative sources of supply. I believe they delved into the naval shipbuilding program. They also gave consideration to the requirements of the army, the navy and the air force. And then, shortly before the committee concluded its deliberations, the construction program of the Department of National Defence, as carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and Defence Construction Limited, was given some consideration. As a matter of fact, Mr. D. B. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, did, I understand, make a statement to the committee.

Apparently the committee's deliberations concluded following its consideration of policy and procedure relative to the defence construction program. In my estimation the most important work they have to do is ahead of them. I was very pleased to note that the defence expenditures committee is to be reconstituted. I am going to make several recommendations to the committee that it may, when it is reconstituted, take into consideration.

The first is that I think it has given reasonable consideration to policy; now I think it should devote its attention to the practical application of that policy in the field. And it is in that respect, as I said a moment ago, that I have a few things to say. Let me point out in passing that much consideration has been given to the procurement of such things as uniforms, and it has been said that too many of this have been bought or too much of that. Well, that does not concern me particularly at the moment. I well recall that I was one of those who levelled rather severe criticism at the government back in the early forties for being so wholly unprepared when war broke out. I realize it is most difficult to say that we need just exactly this number of that commodity or that number of another commodity. I say: within reasonable limits let us make sure we have enough to meet any emergency which may suddenly come upon us. I hope we will not be unmindful of the probability that such an emergency could be only hours away. Let us hope it is much farther away than that.

My personal conviction, one based upon a good deal of personal investigation, is that the defence expenditures committee should be instructed, or that by resolution it should instruct itself. To be more specific, I would suggest that the committee resolve to pick out one particular military establishment in Canada and examine carefully into every aspect of construction relative thereto.

To be even more specific I might go so far as to suggest that they take an establishment within my own constituency, that at Penhold —although I would not want any investigation to be limited to that air station alone. I am going to give one or two reasons why I think such an investigation should be undertaken. First, there is ample evidence—and I witnessed it over a period of months prior to coming down here to Ottawa—of growing public concern and indignation over some of the things that are going on at Penhold. Information came to me; I did not go seeking it until so much of it had come to me that I considered it essential in the public interest to satisfy myself about some of these things.

Needless to say I became absolutely convinced that the defence expenditures committee should carry out an investigation. To be even more specific, I am not satisfied at all with respect to the construction of housing for airmen at some of these establishments. I shall leave Penhold for a moment and come to Namao, in the Edmonton district, where approximately 250 houses are under construction. So far as I know there is no evidence that adequate inspection has been carried out continuously, so far as that project is concerned. There is every evidence for me to believe certain things—and I suggest the committee should ascertain the facts, first of all, about the foundations of these buildings.

On the basis of my own investigations, I feel the contractors have not carried out the specifications as laid down in the contracts.

Mr. Johnston: That is not peculiar.

Mr. Shaw: Foundations are run sloppy, as we say. The tamping of concrete has been at an absolute minimum, and footings have been poured on loose backfill, with the obvious result that the foundations cracked and the buildings have settled until all one has to do is go up to them and place a level on the side to discover whether they are plumb or not.

There is reason to believe that green lumber has been used extensively by the contractors, with consequent shrinkage following the application of heat to those buildings, and that cracking in the finish has been general.

There is evidence to believe that the lumber used for framing is of a very inferior quality. It is warped, knotted and checked. So far as those houses are concerned, I suggest the committee should find out whether or not the joists were doubled, as per specifications. I would like the committee to find whether the chimney wells were doubled as per specifications, and whether the bridging of joists was carried out according to specifications.

I would like to know where the nails were that are presumed to have been used in a building that has to stand for any length of time.

So far as the general framing is concerned, the materials are highly questionable, again. The prefabricated wall sections have been left outside, some of them as far back as last winter, and have warped. Nailing appears to be at a minimum, and partition girths are hanging by nails having been driven up from underneath, again not according to specifications.

I would like the committee to look into these cracked walls, and to find out whether the inside studding has been carried out according to specifications. I would like to know whether or not in some of these buildings the centres are sixteen inches, according to specifications, or whether they are forty-eight inches. I think, too, that the single plates on the partitions are not continuous throughout.

I am not going to continue enumerating all these individual items so far as that particular station is concerned. However, I have scores upon scores of them I would be quite willing to make available to the committee. And, oh yes, I would like to know how the hardwood flooring has been put on, whether it was placed crosswise in some of the halls, or carried out according to specifications. I would ask the committee to examine the floors and see to what extent they are blocked up to the sole plates, in respect of both the exterior and the interior walls.

I should like to know whether lime mortar has been used in these chimneys or whether cement mortar was used as provided for by the specifications. I should also like the committee to find out in how many cases lime mortar froze before it was ever used. I should like the committee to examine the basement floors to see whether they were steel trowelled or whether they were properly dry finished as per specifications. I should like to know also whether these buildings all have the number of windows called for by the specifications.

On top of all this I think the committee should find out how many change orders were issued after the buildings were under construction. I should like to know if the change orders were carried out as per specifications and what additional amounts were paid to the contractors as a result of those change orders. I should like to know how many of those change orders were absolutely essential.

I think if the committee is to look into these things it should call in the inspectors who have been connected with this job. Not only should the committee call in inspectors who are presently on the job; it is quite conceivable it might be wise to call in inspectors who are no longer on the job.

I indicated a moment ago that I should like to see the committee go to Penhold. These things are causing consternation among the people. There are some questions which should be answered. First I should like to find out something which has to do with construction only indirectly. I should like to know what it has cost the Canadian taxpayer as a consequence of the R.C.A.F. moving families out to that area before the houses for their accommodation were even nearly completed. What allowances have been paid to airmen to house their families in an area where it is difficult to procure civilian housing, a condition which has been so for a long period of time. I should like to know what additional costs have been involved and why these families were moved from where they were quartered when they were.

With regard to heating, I should like to know the exact cost of installing the temporary heating system which was operated with boilers brought in from New York. What extra amounts have been paid to the prime contractor as a consequence of installing the temporary heating system I should like to find out also what is involved in the establishment of an overhead heating system which has never been used and which according to my information will never be used because it is intended to have a central underground heating system. We should find out the why and wherefore of this heating.

Here is another thing the committee should look into. They built some pretty good roads at Penhold. They went down as I think they should have, they scarified the surface, they moved in new dirt and spent a lot of money constructing roads with the exception of putting on a hard surface. But then they came along to instal the water and steam distribution system and their sewage system. In doing this they just cut crisscross over the roads which had just been built. Why should a thing of that sort occur? Was there a lack of co-ordination or planning? What is the reason?

[Mr. Shaw.]

People in my area are asking me why trucks moved in 48-inch cement culverts, pounding down the road with them day after day, and then turned right around, hauled them out and then hauled in 24-inch culverts. That is something that should be looked into. These were to be used for storm sewers, I presume on the runway, although I am not too certain of that.

I want to know above all else what provision is being made to repay to the Canadian taxpayers money saved by contractors who are using R.C.A.F. equipment in carrying out their contracts, who are using draglines, bulldozers, et cetera, belonging to the R.C.A.F. I should like to know if proper deductions have been made for the use of that equipment which, as I say, belongs to the Royal Canadian Air Force. There is evidence that several contractors are using government equipment in order to carry out contracts which they have entered into.

I think the committee should find out about the lighting arrangements. Is there a bulk contract with the power company, or are meters used? I have reason to believe that they are operating on meters. If they are, and I say "if they are", it must be costing the Canadian taxpayer a pretty sum because thousands of powerful lights are going day after day and night after night, in the hangars and out of the hangars, when the station is not even operating. This was true up to two weeks ago. If they are operating on meters, I should like to know what the committee thinks about that. If they are not operating on meters we should be told something of the bulk contract, if such exists.

Then about water. I am informed that International Water Wells have been in there ever since last spring. People have come to me and asked whether they were drilling for oil. Penhold was operated as an air station during the last war and adequate amounts of water were secured at depths of 150 to 200 feet to carry out the training scheme at that time. I would say that that would be adequate for any scheme which might be inaugurated at this time. I should like to know the amount and nature of the contract with International Water Wells because, as I say, they seem to be just playing around there. They could have got a lot more done if they had been drilling for oil. Let me re-emphasize that there are wells producing abundant water from 150, 175 and 200 feet, and have been right along.

The fuel contract has caused some people a good deal of concern and I think it should be examined into. The supply contract does not concern me quite so much as the handling contract. I should like to know how many times the coal is handled and I should like to know the details of the contract each handler has. I should like to know whether the amount paid to the final handler, as it were, is considerably in excess of what is paid at other stations. I should like to know also whether that contractor is ever around the station or did he simply let a subcontract and do very well as a consequence. I have no grievance as far as the individuals are concerned; it is simply a matter of practice and policy.

I assume that my time is almost exhausted but I do want to conclude by saying that during last summer and early fall a great many people came to me. I did not go out seeking anything. These taxpayers began to express concern and I deemed it my duty to try to find out a few things. I am disturbed and people are disturbed. If everything is all right, then I think it necessary that we find that out through a properly constituted method of examination. I know that there have been denials, but that does not surprise me because when I charged in 1945 that there was wanton destruction of surplus war material at Penhold I was confronted with vehement denials from all quarters. In fact, on the floor of this house my charges were denied and everything was done to discourage me. However, it so happened that I was a member of the war expenditures and economies committee at that time, and after a great many weeks and a great deal of cross-examination we were given the frank admission that the charges were absolutely true and the committee recommended a change of policy relative thereto. Therefore I am never too greatly impressed by blanket denials. I know the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) cannot be on each one of these jobs but I do say we should be able to acquire a sufficient number of properly qualified inspectors with the right to do their jobs without being hampered, and that they should be allowed to go in there and see that these contracts are carried out as they should be carried out and that the materials that are being used are materials which are essential to the construction of permanent establishments.

It is my understanding that these are to be permanent establishments, and who knows but what the cold war may carry on for twenty-five years or forever, as far as that goes, although we hope not. It is my understanding that they are trying to bring an element of permanency into the construction of these establishments. After all, we are faced with an emergency. We know that. But Canada is not being attacked and it is not as if we were required to put only half the necessary number of nails into a building to get it done in a hurry so that we could drive the enemy back from our shores.

The Canadian taxpayers will bear the burden. They have indicated their willingness to bear the burden of defence no matter what it may be but they require that every conceivable effort be made to ensure that the money which is taken from them and spent is spent in such a way that the results will be obtained which they hope will be achieved, and within a reasonably short period of time. I hope that the government will see fit to recommend to the defence expenditures committee that it should look into these matters or that the committee will take it upon itself to do so. I am sure the taxpayers of Canada will be greatly relieved if they know that that is going to be done.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I realize that, the practice having been established in this house some time ago, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) should be congratulated on their efforts in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Having been subjected to the same pressures at one time, I feel that probably I realize, more than is generally the case, the excellence of their speeches made under such pressures.

Looking at our national picture at this time in the life of this government I would say that the keynote of the government's activities has been a sort of gathering up of the loose ends that have resulted from the pressures exerted on our national unity and the building of this country once again and forever into one solid unit. Geographically, as I have said before in the house, we are split by miles and miles of area separating the various portions of the country one from the other, and it is very easy for us to drift into a position where we are sectional in our outlook. With the various sectional appeals that have been made to different groups in this country in the past by other governments, I do not feel that any other government would have the ability to continue moulding this country into one national unit as our present government has done.

In Saskatchewan we recently had a little contest about who was going to run that province, and the party which might form an alternative government at some time in this country was so short of candidates that I do not see how it could ever feel that it could form an alternative government to the one in power today.

Mr. Graydon: You were short after it was over too.

Mr. Larson: Yes, but we at least tried. The present government, in conformity with the policy of building up the national unity of the country, has carried out a social welfare and security policy which I think—and I think I will meet with agreement—is second to none in the world. It was felt by many of us that after our senior citizens had served their time in adding to our economic welfare they should receive compensation as of right for their services, and hence the old age pension without a means test. It was also realized by the present government that it was most necessary to foster the interests of our greatest asset, the youth of the country. In some cases it was thought that they were not receiving as much of our national wealth as they should and under our family allowance system mothers were given a bonus according to the number of their children.

It was thought by the government that workers who, for certain reasons, could not obtain employment should have some sort of insurance against unemployment—hence unemployment insurance. Large numbers of people throughout the country and among the representation in the House of Commons are asking for a health insurance scheme. I have lived under a health insurance scheme most of my life provided by our own municipal doctor and hospital set-up, and a good many other rural municipalities in my part of the country have done the same thing. We found that it worked very well and up until the time the health system was put on a provincial basis we seemed to be getting along quite well in my part of the country.

I am certainly in favour of a national health insurance scheme, but one fact that I think we should look at is that there have been national health insurance schemes in many other countries. I do not think anybody will debate the question very strongly with me when I say that the roadblock in the dollar-sterling relationship may be caused to quite some extent by the health scheme put into effect in Great Britain under the labour movement. I think we should examine that situation very carefully because as a nation we certainly do not want to get ourselves into the position where we start something that is not on a sound basis and which we cannot carry out.

The province of Saskatchewan, where I live, has established a provincial hospitalization plan. It was thought that it could be carried on through the contribution by each family of a certain amount of money. It was found that not even half of the cost could be paid for by such contributions and a good deal of money had to be taken out of the consolidated revenues of the province in order to continue the system. The health unit that has been set up in Swift Current is one that has been mentioned in this house. The way the new constituency of Kindersley has been established, the health unit in Swift Current will become in the future one of my direct interests, and I have made some inquiries about it. It involves a large number of doctors. Some years ago the government of Saskatchewan set up a scale, which has been revised from time to time, of doctors' charges, and the top of that scale is considered to be one hundred per cent. Doctors who are doing certain work in cancer research, tuberculosis research and other types of research have had their fee set at three-quarters of the one hundred per cent or seventy-five per cent.

In the Swift Current health unit, the scale of fees as set up by the province partly applies, along with several other deductions, changes and alterations, and the fees for purposes of medical services in that unit have been set at fifty-three per cent of what the government of Saskatchewan considers should be one hundred per cent.

Now, when you consider that doctors are also looking after old age pensioners on a very reduced basis, it appears to me that this system, which has been so highly lauded by various people, is being supported mainly by the doctors themselves. A doctor, like anyone else, has to make a living. If health schemes are going to be supported chiefly by these men who have spent so much time in training, and who should be in the position to make themselves comparatively well off, it seems to me we are asking a great deal of them. When I hear about medical services not being available to people who cannot afford them, I feel like saying that I do not know of a single instance in which a Canadian doctor has ever said to a person, "I will not give my services to you because you cannot pay for them."

All these measures that I have mentioned are actually measures which tend towards welding this country into one national unit. Some people say that perhaps it is time for a change. I believe we should consider what the alternative would be; I think that is a very important consideration, and I believe the people of Canada will consider it very carefully.

Another problem which we have in Canada is our international responsibilities. We joined wholeheartedly in originating the United Nations, and we have closely supported that organization during the whole of its existence. I feel that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who has had such great honours conferred upon him recently, is correct when he says that the United Nations is still the chief hope for peace. However, we, as well as the people who live behind the iron curtain, did not feel that we could trust our future to a parliament of the world such as the United Nations could have been. The reason for that is that there are too many people, who might be termed rather irresponsible, controlling a lot of votes in that organization. It was for that reason the security council, with the power of veto, was set up by the big five.

This move, brought about by apprehension in many quarters, practically took the teeth out of the United Nations and hampered its ability to make decisions that would be effective and binding. An armaments build-up was taking place behind the iron curtain, and our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in common with other men who worked closely in designing methods of preventing war, felt that legally we were quite entitled to set up a defence organization within the United Nations. Hence, we have NATO. Now, Canada's responsibilities under NATO are quite extensive. Every day we see criticism levelled at that very much overworked and very responsible minister, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). He is doing a job which, in times past, has required two or three ministers. It is only recently that he has been given an associate minister to help him with that job.

We find absolutely little criticism—we have charges levelled in the house by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw)—of the expenditure of the entire amount of our national revenue. I am speaking percentage-wise. There have been the small disappearances in places like Petawawa which have been brought up. We have never had levelled at this government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or the Minister of National Defence, any charge that could be made stick that there was any amount of fraud or money being diverted into somebody's pocket when it should have been diverted into the channels for which it was intended.

We are going to hear a lot as we go on from various people who feel that we should put the effort we are putting into our NATO commitments into sending food to Asiatic countries. I agree that there is possibly some merit in what they say, but I want to make one point clear. There is absolutely no foundation for the thought that you can stop people from becoming communists by feeding them. For one thing, the job of feeding them is impossible, and communism is not a solution for service. Communism is a materialistic religion which requires of those people who live under its domination worship of the state. The main reason that we will have nothing to do with communism is that we feel we can worship a higher power which is above the state. For that reason all parties in this house have committed themselves to checking that particular phase of life in some of the misled peoples of this world.

The national unity, which I was discussing, depends a good deal on providing satisfaction for the problems which have to be solved in every part of the world as much as in the various parts of this country that are split up by such wide geographical differences. Let us consider some of the things that affect the prairies, because that is the part of the country I represent. The first thing on which I wish to congratulate this government is the operation of the wheat board. I hope that the pressures that are being put on the wheat board from different angles to get higher prices, to do this or that differently, do not affect too seriously the thinking of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because I feel that people generally—even though we have some kickers—are one hundred per cent behind the board.

For another thing, it is easy for me as a farmer to say that I should have this, that I should have that and that I should have something else; but it would be much harder for me as a farmer if I were given the responsibility to go out and get it. I think that people throughout this country agree with me that in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) we have the best "getter" handling our wheat problems at the present time. I hope that he will not take too seriously some of the criticism that is being levelled at him. I agree that we should get the most that we can for our wheat, but I also agree that we are being well served by those who are at present handling the western wheat crop.

There is one other matter I wish to mention, and I have discussed it before. It is something which my people, consisting mostly of farmers and small businessmen, have asked me to bring up for consideration in the House of Commons. I sympathize completely with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in the task that he has before him because nobody can be popular and collect taxes. I also want to put one thing on the record, and that is that the farmers of Saskatchewan do not mind paying taxes. When the farmers of Saskatchewan know that their tax money is being spent in the efficient way it is being spent by this government, there is on their part no more reticence to pay taxes than there is on the part of any other group in this country. None of us likes to pay taxes. However, there is no greater reticence on the part of the farmers of Saskatchewan to pay their fair share of what is required to carry out our national responsibility than there is on the part of any other group in Canada.

But there is one matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue and it is not a criticism of him. It is merely a wish that some sort of system could be evolved so that these people might pay their fair share without having to go through this business of having to keep records. A farmer must keep a certain number of records in order to know where he stands; but, on a small farm, to keep the detailed records that are required properly to make out an income tax return involves a tremendous amount of work and, I might say, annoyance on the part of the farmer and the small businessman. I strongly urge that some formula be worked out—possibly a production tax or some other method of assessment—whereby those people could pay their fair share of the money that they need to pay without having to go into this business of trying to be farmers and accountants all at the same time.

There is only one other matter which I should like to discuss, and it should interest my Social Credit friends. I lived in Calgary when the founder of that party was operating at his peak and when his government was elected in Alberta. He was absolutely insistent that the credit of the country be controlled by the people of the country. He was not the only one who felt that way about the matter. As a result a Liberal government has set up the central bank, and the central bank has, within its powers, that of bolstering credit, if credit needs to be bolstered, or of drawing in credit if a boom or something of that kind is going too wild in this country.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, did I understand the hon. member to say that the Liberal government instituted the central Bank of Canada? I think he is wrong there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is dreaming a bit.

Mr. Hansell: I think it was Mr. Bennett's regime which did that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Also the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. Larson: In any event, the central bank is now operating. If Mr. Bennett did it, all the more credit to Mr. Bennett. Anyway, that institution has been operating, as has been the farm improvement loan system. The people in my part of the country are extremely happy with the farm improvement loan system. The businessmen and the farmers are happy with it. The farmers can get the equipment they need under these guaranteed loans and the businessmen can get paid for the goods which they supply. It is one of the most beneficial measures in our part of the country, and I wish to compliment the government on the operation of this farm improvement loan system.

As we go along we hear—and we are going to hear more—about the dissatisfaction among the people of Canada. When the time comes for the people of Canada to decide, I am sure they are going to say that they have done very well. As a matter of fact, in the words of the popular song-writer, I think they are going to feel that they have never had it so good.

(Translation):

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the few remarks I wish to offer, I should like to congratulate the hon. member who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Deslieres), as well as the hon. member who seconded the motion (Mr. Schneider).

Everybody here knows that it is never easy for a member to make his maiden speech in this house. These two hon. gentlemen, nevertheless, have acquitted themselves of this task very well. I wish to assure you, though, that I do not share all the ideas expressed by these gentlemen, for reasons which I intend to acquaint you with very shortly.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, we are told—and there are signs aplenty of it—that this House of Commons assembled now for the seventh session of the twenty-first parliament has assembled for its final session. I think we may welcome that fact because, with the end of this parliament there will end, I think, the worst situation that has existed in the House of Commons since confederation.

An hon. Member: Be careful.

Mr. Fleming: In the course of the life of this parliament extending over the past three and a half years we have witnessed a decline in the position of the private member on the government side—yes, an end of all pretence of independence; and as to the government, we have seen them waxing ever more and more arrogant, smug and stiff-necked. Bureaucracy is still written all over their attitudes; and if evidences of repentance are to be forthcoming now, assuredly they come too late to be convincing.

I shall have some observations to make on some of the speeches which have been contributed to this debate, particularly that contributed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). But I wish to say this, and say it fairly and frankly, that the long speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) delivered in this house on Monday is I think by far the weakest speech that any of us ever heard him deliver.

I hope there will be an opportunity to examine some of the things that the Prime Minister had to say in trying to defend the action of his government in levying exorbitant and extortionate taxation and defending those enormous expenditures, and at the same time, after a speech of two and a quarter hours, still found it possible to be utterly silent on two matters that had engaged the attention of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) at some length in his speech, namely, the policy of the government on television, and the matter of health insurance. It certainly was not for lack of time that the Prime Minister did not say a word about either of those subjects. The oversight could not have been unintentional; it can only be inferred, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister ran away from these two subjects.

In 1949 we saw this house assemble. The government, with the largest majority in this house that any government has ever had since confederation, had unrivalled opportunities to solve all the problems of the country. What do we find three and a half years later? We find, sir, that the problems facing this country are greater by far than they were in 1949. This great opportunity that was given to the government to address itself effectively and courageously to meeting Canadian problems has been wasted by this government. These past three and a half years will go down in history as the wasted years. And now we are told that this government is to ask for another chance. In the face of a record like that, of wasted years and lost opportunities, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the people of this country will think very carefully before giving another chance to this government to perpetrate another failure.

Sir, the subject of taxation may well engage the attention of this house, because this country is suffering—and that means the vast majority of Canadians in every walk of life—from crushing taxation at the hands of a government that seems to care very little about the burdens that they are imposing upon the people. You see that cavalier attitude reflected in the speech of the Prime Minister on Monday when he said: "I do not think there has been any overtaxation." That is the statement of the Prime Minister, and I presume that is the position upon which his followers are prepared to face the electors, that there has been no overtaxation. Is that not reminiscent of the words used by the Prime Minister in this house on March 6 last, when he attempted to answer the charge of the Leader of the Opposition that, as revenues and expenditures for the current year then stood, the government had overtaxed every Canadian family—not just taxed, overtaxed—by the sum of $250. The Prime Minister warmed to his task and defended that rate of overtaxation, because he said it was a good thing for the Canadian people that they should be relieved of that surplus purchasing power.

It was a good thing for the Canadian people, so ran his words and his thought, to relieve them of that embarrassing surplus purchasing power. Well, relieve the Canadian people of that surplus purchasing power the government certainly did, and apparently they are quite unrepentant after having deprived the Canadian people of their earnings at a time when the cost of living was high, at a time when most Canadian families were having very great difficulty in making ends meet. The Prime Minister found satisfaction in the extent to which the people were relieved of their means.

And then, of course, while I do not wish to spend too long on the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), in his very interesting speech last evening, displaying all the helter-skelter zeal of the political convert, he spent no less than half an hour endeavouring to prove that a reduction in taxation is impossible without, so he intimated, following the communist line.

I say in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, let us have more of these speeches, of the kind made by the Prime Minister when he said that there has been no overtaxation, more of the kind contributed by the hon. member for Bonaventure last evening, because certainly these hon. gentlemen, when the budget comes down in March, are going to have to eat their words; otherwise, it is going to be a very different kind of budget from the one that the same Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) introduced in 1949 to meet the political exigencies of the Liberal machine.

Before anybody pays too much attention to the views of the two hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, I should like to put alongside them the comments upon the rates of taxation in this country which have appeared in the columns of two very eminent newspapers. I mention first of all Le Devoir, which on February 18 last said this:

> Les impôts règlent l'activité économique d'un pays. Quand les impôts deviennent excessifs, ils tuent l'esprit d'initiative et le commerce aussi sûrement que les détruit le socialisme.

If I may attempt a free translation, Mr. Speaker, this is what I would offer:

Taxes regulate the economic activity of a country. When taxes become excessive they kill the spirit of initiative and trade as surely as socialism destroys it.

Then on the same day in the very eminent L'Action Catholique the following statement appeared, and I invite my hon. and effusive friend from Montmagny-L'Islet to listen to this.

Mr. Lesage: I read it.

Mr. Fleming: The quotation is as follows:

Le gouvernement fédéral saigne le contribuable canadien à blanc.

If I may offer a free translation of that statement, Mr. Speaker, it is this:

The federal government is bleeding the Canadian taxpayer white.

When hon. gentlemen opposite say that those of us who are demanding an end to this crushing overtaxation are following the communist line, I wonder what they have to say when responsible newspapers like L'Action Catholique say precisely the same thing, namely, that the Canadian government is bleeding the Canadian taxpayer white.

Mr. Lesage: It does not say it is overtaxed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are strained to follow the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet in that rather nice distinction he has drawn. He says that there is a difference between overtaxation on the one hand, and bleeding the Canadian taxpayer white on the other. Well, let him have his choice. The Canadian taxpayer is being bled; his blood is running fast.

The story does not end there, Mr. Speaker. We have hon. members opposite saying in effect that the surpluses are so wonderful, and asking, Are we not glad we have them? One would have thought that it was evidence of supreme achievement when the Minister of Finance, by these extortionate rates of taxation that he has amassed with the assistance of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet and others, has reported this evidence of gross overtaxation at the end of the year. In measuring these unparalleled blunders in national financing we will not be too ready, I am sure, to accept statements to the effect that last year's surplus was, as we were told at one stage, $356 million, at another stage some $250 million. We will rather go back and recall that before the Minister of Finance started to put $100 million in one pocket in the consolidated revenue fund, and another $100 million somewhere else, and then engage in a good deal of heavy expenditure in the closing days of the fiscal year in order to relieve himself of the embarrassment of that huge surplus, he had about $900 million surplus which was the true measure of the government's excessive taxation last year.

It was with that alternative in mind, and other aspects of the budget that was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last spring, that another very eminent newspaper in this country made comment. Le Soleil, in its columns of April 12 last said this:

La presse française du Québec a accueilli avec une impression teintée de désappointement le budget de M. Abbott. Aucun journal ne lui manifeste de l'enthousiasme. La note générale est celle d'une déception.

If I may offer a free translation, Mr. Speaker, it would run like this: that the French press of Quebec greeted the budget of Mr. Abbott with a reception tinged with disappointment. No newspaper manifests any enthusiasm for it; the general note is that of a deception. Yet in the face of that very pertinent observation on this government's taxation policies we hear hon. gentlemen opposite rising now and saying with great gusto, and some evidence that they are whistling to keep up their courage, that it is impossible for the Minister of Finance to reduce taxes. Well, I think, Mr. Speaker, before we are finished with this debate ways in which the Minister of Finance could reduce taxes, if there were, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, any will to reduce unnecessary expenditures and to eliminate extravagance, will be fully dealt with.

But let us look now to see what the Minister of Finance himself has to say on this interesting subject. We find that he has not been silent between the sessions. He made a tour of the maritime provinces and a tour of the west. His speech of September 23 is reported thus in the Winnipeg Free Press of September 30. He says:

Taxes are high these days in Canada.

As if he had to go all the way to Winnipeg to tell the people that! And then he continues:

Are taxes too high? This, of course, is simply another way of asking, "Are we spending too much?"

I interject to say that I think there is a good deal to be said for his interpretation. He continues:

You can take my word for it that the official opposition in parliament these days seem to think that we are spending too much.

Well, I can assure the hon. gentleman that he spoke with complete accuracy when he said the official opposition in parliament these days seem to think that the government is spending too much. Nothing could be more certain.

Then he continued on his merry way. In Charlottetown on October 6 he made a speech in which he is reported to have spoken to this effect, that he would be happy if he could break even on this year's budget, but he held out the possibility of tax cuts if Canada's production keeps rising.

Mr. Speaker, we have it both ways there. The man who has delivered these excessive budgets since 1949 said he would be happy to break even on this year's federal budget; but then this member of the cabinet who will be called to the rescue of the Liberal party when he delivers his budget speech next March rose to the occasion and said that he held out the possibility of tax cuts, if Canada's production keeps rising.

Then he moved on to Vancouver. In the Vancouver Sun of October 20 the minister is reported to this effect:

> Canadians may look forward to federal tax cuts but certainly not in next year's budget, finance minister Douglas Abbott said here today.

Then he is reported to have said, during the course of a 6,000-word address to the Vancouver board of trade:

> To those who think the federal government will enjoy a fat surplus at the end of its fiscal year, Mr. Abbott said, "I shall be happy if we break even."

Then his interview with the press before he made his speech is reported in this way by the Vancouver Sun:

> Mr. Abbott said that this goal—

That is, the goal of improving our standard of living.

> —should be reached and taxes cut—

You will note, Mr. Speaker, he is saying that taxes ought to be cut. Then he says this:

> —but there is little chance of its attainment by next March when the 1953 budget will be brought down.

Then he is reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 21 as having said this in his Vancouver speech:

> We can confidently expect that increased production in Canada will make taxation less, despite continuing expenditures for defence and social welfare.
> But Mr. Abbott added in a later interview that there is "little chance" of tax cuts in the next budget.

I am sure those words of the minister must have chilled the blood of hon. gentlemen opposite, when he intimated that there would be no tax cuts in his next budget, to be introduced next March. Because the one hope that is nourishing the political lives of hon. gentlemen opposite has been that in his 1953 budget the minister would repeat the rabbit act of 1949 when, after announcing for several previous years that taxation reductions were impossible, somehow he trotted out substantial reductions in taxation on the eve of the election to save their political hides for the occasion.

Now at least we have the Minister of Finance saying in October that hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as the Canadian people, need not expect any taxation reductions in the next year. Well, I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will have to do some whistling, from now on, to keep up their failing and flagging spirits.

I mentioned that the Minister of Finance had said that we of the official opposition had been saying the government is spending too much. Of course we say that. We know very well how much this government likes to spend money. This government has the idea that it helps to make votes for itself by spending money. That is one reason they are so anxious to spend so much money before the next election. How otherwise can anyone possibly attribute to sane people these reckless expenditures in which the government is indulging at the present time?

In a book I read recently I found an interesting paragraph. This is a book containing several lectures by Bertrand de Jouvenel. It is entitled "The Ethics of Redistribution", and at page 73 contains this paragraph:

> The more one considers the matter, the clearer it becomes that redistribution is in effect far less a redistribution of free income from the richer to the poorer, as we imagined, than a redistribution of power from the individual to the state.

Whatever one's views may be on the observations of the author, it is clear that the spending of money on the part of a government does mean power, and the view of this government is that it does mean votes. I well recall a conversation I had with one of the ministers some six years ago, when I was commenting on wastefulness in duplicated services and expenditures on the part of the dominion and the provinces. I said to him, with regard to one expenditure in particular, "Would it not be much more sensible if the dominion and the provinces got together and shared the expenditures, so the money could be devoted to its purpose through the provinces?" With a knowing smile he said, "Oh, no; that would give"—and he mentioned by name the premier of the province in which he resided—"a chance to make votes".

Well, you see the thought of this government is that if they spend money they make votes; and that is the reason, and the only reason, you see these reckless expenditures being made at the present time. Here we have this record, one which would shock people who were not already accustomed to shocks at the hands of a spendthrift and mismanaging government.

After having already purchased 1,153,155 neckties, the government in the first half of October spent $32,638 on more neckties. What contribution are those neckties going to make toward resisting aggression in the world? I understood that the whole basis on which the house was called upon to vote something like $2,100 million for national defence this year was that it would have the effect, first, of deterring aggression and, second, if unhappily aggression should come it would enable us to bear our fair share of the burden of resisting aggression successfully. What important functions are these neckties going to serve in resisting aggression or overcoming aggression? As the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) said in a recent radio broadcast, it may be that these neckties are to be used to bind hand and foot every aggressor who might set foot on Canadian soil.

In the eleven months up to February 29 last a total of 1,304,407 pairs of men's shoes had been purchased and orders are still being placed. We were told in a return that in the thirteen months up to April 30 last 117,800 pairs of women's shoes were purchased. I do not intend to take the time to refer again to serving forks except to comment that the scaling down of the orders for serving forks from 63,500 to 14,500 is attributable to the vigilance of the official opposition.

There are six full-time officers and 900 officers and other ranks in the reserve in the Canadian Women's Army Corps. In order to keep off the raindrops a total of 15,000 raincoats have been purchased for them.

Then there is the $839,903 which has been spent on carpets and rugs for the armed forces. As my leader pointed out, that would provide a square yard of rug or carpet for every two members of the armed forces on active service. It is quite evident that the government is showing very great concern about the purchases of rugs, carpets, neckties, raincoats and shoes.

There is no possible way of explaining or justifying expenditures on this scale except that they are being made now with a conscious view toward making friends for this government.

Mr. McIvor: It does not need them.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member says "it does not need them." If that is so, why does he not get up in the house and tell the government to eliminate these wasteful and extravagant expenditures?

So it goes; and this story of reckless extravagance does not end there. Yesterday my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), had something to say about the shortcomings in the operations of the unemployment insurance commission. Hon. members might be surprised to know that the unemployment insurance commission of Canada is turning out screeds like this at the public expense. This is issued by the Montreal office of the unemployment insurance commission and is entitled "The Older Worker." I am glad the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is in the chamber because if he does not know that this sort of thing is being turned out, I think he ought to know and should have known before this. This is how it reads:

> In savage tribes, where skulls are thick,
> And primal passions rage,
> They have a system, sure and quick,
> To cure the blight of age.
> For when a native's youth has fled,
> And age has sapped his vim,
> They simply knock him on the head,
> And put an end to him.
> But we in our enlightened age,
> Are built of nobler stuff,
> And so we look with scorn and rage,
> On deeds so harsh and rough.
> And when a man is old and gray,
> And stooped and short of breath,
> We simply take his job away,
> And let him starve to death.

That was issued by the unemployment insurance commission of Canada at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. Yet the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) has the effrontery to stand before this house and say that there is no overtaxation. I tell you that there is shameful overtaxation, there is shameful extravagance in the way this government is throwing around the hard-earned money of the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to interject at this stage. He has referred to the Montreal office of the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Fleming: Is this a question?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Yes. Has the hon. member compared the document which he has just read with the useful and worthy propaganda which has been issued by the Montreal office in connection with handicapped workers? Montreal has about the best record in Canada for the re-establishment of handicapped workers.

Mr. Fleming: I trust that my time will not be docked for this interpolation which bears only a slight resemblance to a question. I esteem the hon. gentleman as one of my closest personal friends in this house, but may I say to him that if the Montreal office of the unemployment insurance commission is doing its best to redeem itself for having turned out nonsense like this at the expense of the taxpayer I am glad to know it. But I do hold them responsible and I hold the government responsible for the profligate waste of the taxpayers' money on rubbish such as this.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: I understand that the hon. member speaks very good French. Would he permit a question? What proof has he that this document was issued by the Montreal office of the unemployment insurance commission or that the document given to him is not a fake?

Mr. Fleming: It gives me great pleasure to show the hon. member the document which I have just read. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I would like very much to show it to every member in this house.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I am anxious to see it.

Mr. Fleming: With pleasure.

(Text):

What is the government doing about all this? During the course of his speech on Monday the Prime Minister wrung his hands in the face of accusations and proof of prodigality in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money. He said that we should not hold them responsible for it. When the railway siding up at Petawawa disappeared he said we could not hold them responsible because they were carrying out some prosecutions. He asked us if we had been reading the papers lately. I happen to have been reading the papers about the prosecutions and I am wondering why the rest of them have not been proceeded with. There are others who have been charged, but as yet their trials have not been held.

Where is the Currie report on thefts? We have not heard anything about that. Mr. Currie went overseas at the time of his appointment but it may be that others have been carrying on the work in his absence. Where is that report? Speaking of these thefts the Prime Minister in a most extraordinary excursion said that they had followed up and prosecuted and then he said in effect, "What more could anybody do?"

If the government would exhibit a little more concern over these wasteful expenditures I am quite satisfied that there would be more vigilance throughout the government service. How can you expect vigilance to be exercised, in the Department of National Defence for example, when apparently the minister at the head of the department and the deputy minister were not aware of these extravagant expenditures on clothing? The Prime Minister said in effect, "Well, it might have been different if the minister of the department or the deputy minister of the department had seen these orders before they went out." He left us with the clear understanding that the minister and the deputy minister did not know anything about these orders before they went out. These orders, Mr. Speaker, have been going out month after month now over a period of practically two years. Are we to be told now by the Prime Minister that the minister and the deputy minister of that department did not know what kind of orders were being issued? That is the impression the Prime Minister gave the house, and he invited the house to excuse the minister and the deputy on that account.

We want no further proof of the incompetence of the minister in charge of that department, or that the government spending machine has been running wild in that department as well as others, than the fact that now, after so much of the damage has been done, the government suddenly decides to appoint an Associate Minister of National Defence. For what purpose? Well, after the generous tributes heaped upon the head of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) last Monday by the Prime Minister it certainly could not be with a view to exercising supervision over his general activities. Oh no! Is it possible that now the door is to be locked on these profligate contracts after the horse has been stolen? It is a fine time now for the government to wake up. Where has the government been all this time?

Mr. Fraser: Asleep.

Mr. Fleming: The fact of the matter is, as we all well know, that the government spending machine has been running wild. It has not been checked by the ministers opposite, and today, while many of them are running about the country making political speeches, these contracts are being handed out and the money of the taxpayers of this country squandered on quite unnecessary expenditures. It is about time these hon. gentlemen stayed on the job and did the job that the country expects of them and that they are paid to do.

There are many things I would have wished to say today, but time does not permit. I wish to add my voice in support of the position taken by my leader when he drew attention in his speech on Monday to the necessity for some concerted effort being made now in the direction of the allocation of assured sources of tax revenue to the governments of this country at the various levels. It is no answer for the Prime Minister to say that the provinces are free to tax in fields within their constitutional powers even though the dominion is also there. What is the sense of talking that way? Once the dominion enters these fields, then under its present rates of taxation it certainly uses up all taxing powers. There is nothing left even in the way of bare pickings for anybody else coming into these fields.

You know so well, Mr. Speaker, how the federal government has been extending its power and in fact has been remaking the constitutional set-up of the country without any amendment of the constitution simply by taking unto itself more and more taxing powers. In 1939 the dominion took 51 per cent of the tax dollar in Canada. In 1951, just twelve years later, it was taking 77 per cent of the tax dollar.

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry, but my time is almost up; I have not time now. In 1940 the tax revenues of the municipalities were $270 million, those of the provinces $355 million and of the dominion $562 million. In 1951 the estimated tax revenues of the municipalities were $600 million, of the provinces $910 million and of the dominion $4 billion. In the face of that situation, hon. members know how the provinces and the municipalities today are curtailing their efforts to meet the needs of their people and to fulfil what is expected of them. In the banking and commerce committee last spring we found that probably the greatest obstacle to increased housing construction today is the fact that municipalities in the areas where houses are most needed at the present time are without the means to provide municipal services. They cannot do it on their present sources of revenue.

What is being done? The provinces have gone as far as they can go, and I think this is true of all of them, in trying to assist municipalities. Yet the federal government, although its responsibility with respect to the housing shortage in Canada is the first and primary responsibility, far greater than that of the provinces and municipalities, nevertheless refuses—

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: —to meet this need in any form even in the light of the fact that it is curtailing housing construction in Canada today. The same applies to health services. These are a very heavy burden on our provinces and municipalities today. The plight of the municipalities is indeed serious. Therefore I should have thought the house would welcome the contention of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that it is abundantly necessary now that there should be dominion-provincial conferences with a view to arriving at an understanding among the various levels of government, including the municipalities, so governments will know exactly what their sources of revenue are and to pay the shot, the government's answer is that they will allow private enterprise to so there will be a more resolute attempt made to meet the needs of other levels of government and in particular the municipalities.

An hon. Member: What about the gasoline tax?

Mr. Fleming: This is a major problem and the government is apparently not prepared to do anything to meet it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, because I see my time is almost up—

An hon. Member: It should have been up sooner.

Mr. Fleming: —I should like to say something with respect to the subject of television and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a subject concerning which I hope I shall have the opportunity to say more at a later stage of the session.

If there comes about at long last the elimination of that $2.50 nuisance tax, namely the fee on radio receiving sets, the people of Canada will be able to thank the official opposition for the fight it has waged without abatement for more than a decade for the elimination of that nuisance tax.

I make this observation on television. After having taken unto itself in a most bureaucratic and paternalistic manner all control over television and in effect preventing the development of television in Canada so that this country at present, compared with the stage reached in the United Kingdom and the United States, is in a most primitive stage of development thanks to government policy and nothing else, what has been said in the throne speech by the government in offering to let private enterprise in on some of the areas which the C.B.C. is not prepared to enter is nothing but throwing to private enterprise a bone from which all meat and nourishment have been completely removed.

It is not because there has been any unwillingness or lack of enterprise in this country, apart from the government, that we have not adequate development of television in Canada. Private enterprise has been waiting for years for the government to make up its mind. Some applications for television channels have been pending before the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for more than seven years; yet the government has simply sat like a dog in a manger. It was not doing anything effective itself for the development of television and it would not let anybody else do anything. Now that they have got service established in two centres in Canada, Montreal and Toronto, and other parts of the country are very properly complaining about the concentration of government service in these two areas while the rest of the country is helping develop in areas where there is no possible opportunity of competition for the C.B.C. It is in keeping with the bureaucratic attitude of this government that they foster monopoly. I am sure you well remember, Mr. Speaker, when you and I were members of the special committee on radio broadcasting in 1946 that in reply to a question I put to him, the chairman of the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation said he thought that competition from the large privately owned radio stations had been a good thing for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation because it helped to keep the C.B.C. on their toes. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that was true with regard to radio broadcasting in 1946, why not allow a little competition with respect to television in this year 1952?

Here is private capital and private enterprise willing to take all the risks involved if this bureaucratic government, with its mania for monopoly and bureaucracy, will not restrain the development of something for which the people of Canada are crying. Last December the number of television receiving sets in this country was estimated at 60,000. I am prepared to assume that by this time it must be 100,000. Canada has engineers and technicians and artists who are capable of helping this country lead in the development of television. The reason Canada is not leading the field is that this government is stifling and thwarting this development.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to support the amendment of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), calling as it does upon this government to introduce at this session legislation to establish a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial participation. I may tell you, sir, that there will be several other members of this group who will speak in this debate and join in urging the government to give serious consideration to what is set forth in our amendment.

The reason we shall repeatedly return to the attack, so far as the need for health insurance is concerned, is that it is becoming quite apparent that the government of the day does not realize how important this question is to the people of Canada. The record, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, supports the statement I have just made, namely that the government does not recognize the importance of this question. How could any Liberal claim to recognize its importance in view of the fact that it has been in the platform of the Liberal party ever since 1919. Despite the fact it has been in the platform of that party for all those years, when I drew that to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) last June his reply was, yes, it is in our platform and it has been there for 33 years, but surely you do not expect us to bring it in overnight.

I remind you, sir, that on top of all the committee reports and investigations that have been made, evidence of which was placed before this house again yesterday by my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), a year ago last June we had what we thought was a promise that there would be a special committee on health insurance during the session which met in the early part of 1952. We did not feel that another committee was necessary in view of all the inquiries that had been conducted. But despite our feeling that a committee was not necessary, we were glad to know that we were making at least that much progress. We dared to hope that the promised committee would be set up, and that it would have a result comparable to the result which followed the 1950 committee on old age security, namely that there would be legislation in this important field.

Despite what we thought was a clear-cut promise that there would be such a committee at the first session of 1952, when we met and asked when that committee was to be set up we were informed that the government had decided not to establish such a committee at that session. We are now in another session—indeed this is the third session since the one in 1951 when the promise to take at least the action of setting up a committee was suggested—and still we have no suggestion of any action by this government on the question of health insurance. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the record is a clear indication of the failure of the government and its supporters to realize how important this question is to the Canadian people.

I regret that the other two opposition parties in this house, in my view, despite their professed support of the principle of health insurance, are playing into the government's hands. The Progressive Conservatives, in their amendment, have asked for another inquiry into this question. If anything could be more unnecessary I do not know what it is. The information and material on the basis of which legislation could be enacted is already abundant and complete. Our friends to the left in the Social Credit group profess support of a program of health insurance, but the other night in speaking about this matter the leader of the party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), suggested that what was needed in relation to this question was to move gradually. They may mean by that the support which the member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) suggested today, but I suggest that to tell this government to set up another inquiry, as the Tories are doing, or to suggest to the members of the government that they move gradually, as the Social Crediters are doing, is to play right into the hands of the Liberals who are quite prepared to stall on this question as they have done already for 33 years.

We feel we are expressing the views of the Canadian people when we say that this is one of the important questions that should be dealt with at this session. It is not one of those questions that should be bandied about during the course of an election campaign, with the promise to set up a committee in the next parliament and perhaps take action in the parliament following that one. This is a question that calls for action at this session of parliament.

I have been referring, Mr. Speaker, to the importance of this question. We do wish we could impress upon the government what it means to the average Canadian citizen not to be able to afford the full measure of health services and health protection that modern medical science is in a position to offer, if we could only organize the financing of the cost of medical services.

According to the 1951 census figures, some of which are now coming to us, in Canada's twenty largest cities we find 27·8 per cent of the total population. In those twenty largest cities 49·8 per cent of all wage and salary earners received an annual income of less than $2,000. According to another survey made by the dominion bureau of statistics in 1947-48, it was ascertained that families in that year—I admit I am speaking about different years but one has to take these figures as he gets them and allow for any adjustments that should be made—who had incomes of $2,000 or less were able to spend on health care not more than $70 in any case. The figure ranged from $70 per year down for all those with incomes of $2,000 per year or less.

Other figures which I have obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics show that in 1950, which was in between the two years I have already mentioned, the average stay in hospital in Canada was 10·5 days, at an average cost per patient day of $8.13 or an average total hospital expense of $85.36. That is the average annual hospital bill, $85.36. Yet the survey of family income and expenditure to which I have already referred indicated that the people with incomes of $2,000 or less were able to spend on all health care, in the course of a year, only $70 or less.

I could go on and show likewise, from figures for the year 1951, that the total expenditure on health in Canada in that year made by Canadians privately was $496 million, which results in an average family expenditure of $129.50. What I ask hon. members to note is this. If the average hospital cost is $85.36 and the average total family expenditure on health per year is $129.50, what is the position of the large number of wage and salary earners who, according to the other survey to which I referred, are able to spend only $70 a year or less on all health, medical and hospital care?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When he speaks of the average earner getting $2,000 or less, is he not failing to take into account that there may be two or three earners in the family? Does that consideration not upset his calculation?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I was not speaking of an average worker. Averages are often misleading. I was taking the actual fact that 49·8 per cent of the wage and salary earners in the twenty largest cities to which I referred are receiving not an average income of $2,000; rather all of that number are receiving $2,000 a year or less.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The question is still good.

Mr. Knowles: I think not. But even if my hon. friend wants to contend for purposes of his position, whatever it is, that there are some families in which there is more than one earner, I ask him to consider the families where there is only one earner, and that is the case in most of them. They are able to spend on all health, hospital and medical care only $70 a year or less, whereas the annual average cost for hospital care is $85.36 per family, and the average per family for medical expenses is $129.50. It simply means that there is a whole section of our population which is getting—because it cannot afford to pay for it—less of health, hospital and medical care than, on an average, would seem to be the minimum requirement for Canadians at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, when you interpret that situation in terms of ill health, suffering, mental anguish and concern over unpaid hospital and doctors' bills, I suggest that we in Canada are submitting ourselves to a social, psychological and economic loss that common sense would dictate we should not endure.

In the course of this debate I have heard a number of hon. members comment on the large number of people who receive help from doctors despite the fact that they cannot afford to pay for it. I have heard references to many cases where doctors receive far less than would be their normal fee for the type of service they are giving, and I recognize all of that to be true. But what I ask hon. members to bear in mind is that many Canadians need medical care, the attention of doctors and hospitalization, but because they cannot afford it they do not seek it or do not ask for it, or in cases of necessity they put it off for much longer than, for the sake of their health, should be the case. What we are suggesting is that we should have a plan that is based on common sense, on organization, on pooling and sharing this problem so that all our people can get the best of medical and hospital care that is available.

This idea is not one that we alone advocate. It has been put forward, as I say, by the Liberals ever since their convention in 1919, and the library shelves contain books and periodicals which are full of arguments in support of the whole principle of health insurance. In its green book proposals to the provinces in 1945 the dominion government spelled it out very well when it said:

> Health insurance enables the cost of illness to be prepaid, so that by paying regular sums when they are well people are able to meet the costs of illness when they are ill without being financially crippled.

The government also said at that time:

> Health insurance not only enables individuals to prepay their medical costs, but does this in such a way as to secure a wide pooling of risks and distribution of costs in much the same manner as any other form of insurance.

I also hold in my hand an extremely interesting little booklet put out during the war by the wartime information board, mainly for the benefit of the armed forces. It is entitled "Canadian Affairs", volume I, No. 21, November 15, 1944. Its subject was "Canada Plans Security". It was written by a gentleman who was then not a civil servant but who is now one of the top and most esteemed civil servants in this country, namely Dr. George F. Davidson, deputy minister of welfare in the Department of National Health and Welfare. In this pamphlet, Dr. Davidson says:

> There are still gaps in our social security program. Chief among these concerns the question of illness. When sickness strikes, it strikes with a two-edged sword. Not only does the workman lose his pay during the period he is away from work—worse than that, he has to bear the crushing blow of medical, hospital, and other expenses, running sometimes into hundreds of dollars.

He then goes on to say that health insurance is the remedy. Then he develops certain details, gives us the history of the study that has been given to health insurance, and reminds us of the proposals that have been made. Then toward the end of the pamphlet, having summed up various aspects of social security, including a health insurance program, which he felt were in the cards so far as the future was concerned, this is what he said under the heading of "What It All Costs":

> But not all of this represents additional cost. We are meeting now from our own individual resources, as best we can, the heavy medical and hospital expenses that we encounter from time to time. We are carrying now in large part the cost of our own unemployment, eating up our savings when we fall out of work. We are paying now, to whatever extent we can, through private insurance plans and through savings of one kind or another, for the possibility of retirement or death.
> So, in large part, government intervention to provide these social schemes would mean we would pay by taxes and contributions for what we have been trying—unsuccessfully on the whole—to purchase privately.

The concluding paragraph of this extremely interesting pamphlet commences with these very telling words:

> Canada, in short, can afford to provide security for her people. She cannot afford not to provide it.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, when the special committee on old age security met in 1950, it found it impossible not to deal to some extent with the question of health insurance, for it as well as other matters was related to the whole question of old age security. Despite the fact that this matter was outside of our terms of reference, our report which was tabled in the House of Commons on June 28, 1950 dealt—briefly, it is true but nevertheless it dealt with it—with the question of health insurance; and this is what it said in part:

> It has been estimated, however, that the over-all cost of a comprehensive system of health insurance would probably be not less than $300 million annually, although it must be added that a large proportion of such an amount would represent not a new burden on the people of Canada, but merely a rechannelling of existing expenditures on various forms of health care.

That in the main, Mr. Speaker, is what we are advocating when we put forward the claim for a program of health insurance. It is not in the main something new so far as health services are concerned, although it is true that a great extension is needed. What we are asking is that there be a rechannelling of our expenditures, a pooling of the burden of health costs so that on a common-sense basis all our Canadian people can get the care they need and that medical science and our medical people are able in this modern age to provide.

It has already been indicated—indeed it was by the hon. member for York South yesterday—what illness means in terms of lost man hours at work. The elimination of that economic loss would have to be set off against any additional cost that health insurance might involve. And I suggest that as a modern civilization that knows how to span the world, as we do, by amazing means of transportation and communication, we are just being stupid if we do not organize the financing of our health services so that all our Canadian people can have the benefit of the best health services that are available today. I hope that the other members on the opposition side of the house will join with us as this session proceeds in pressing upon the government the urgency of this matter.

It is not something to be the subject of a further inquiry, as the official opposition suggests. It is not something to be approached gradually, as the leader of the Social Credit party suggests. It has been going on gradually for a third of a century or more. It is something that is of concern to Canadians now; it is something that calls for legislation at this particular session. While we wait for these further inquiries that the Tories here suggest; while we move gradually as the Social Credit leader would suggest, people are being sick and are not getting the attention they need; people are dying unnecessarily; people are burdened with the costs of medical and hospital bills that are around their necks as long as they live. And not only that; Canada as a whole suffers a great loss because we do not make it possible for all that medical science knows to be brought to bear upon the life and the health of our Canadian people.

I hope that with greater urgency being pressed upon the government by the entire opposition, the government will realize that this is not a question on which they can play politics any longer, that they can put off until after the next election. It is a question for action at this session of parliament; and if the members of the cabinet are not prepared, on their own initiative, to do something about it, I hope the private members on the Liberal side of the house, in their caucuses behind closed doors, will press upon the government that this is one subject about which they must do something at this session of parliament.

I wish to say a few words about another question that comes under the heading of social security, namely old age security. It seems to be a matter of pride on the part of supporters of the Liberal government that at long last they responded to our demands and the pressure of public opinion in this country for the removal of the means test from the old age pension—and it was a splendid move. But those same Liberals seem to be quite satisfied with the fact that the pension being paid to our citizens 70 years of age and over is only $40 a month. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it does not need to be argued at all that that amount is hopelessly and woefully inadequate, and that if we do accept the principles of social security that were outlined in this booklet by Dr. Davidson from which I quoted a few moments ago, the time has come to increase the amount of the old age security payment to a figure more commensurate with today's cost of living. I would suggest in responsible terms that it should be not less than $60 a month. There are many who feel —and personally I share that feeling—that the amount should be even higher than that.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that with the tendency in industry generally to retire people at the age of 65, we are being most unfair to our people to leave that gap between 65 and 70 with the means test. Thus another change that should be made is that the means test should be taken off at age 65.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, I feel—and I was glad to note one of the new Liberal members of the house the other day expressing this view as well—the time has come to remove completely the means test from the pension paid to our blind citizens. Surely with that special handicap which these people have we should do our best to make up for it slightly by giving them a pension not on the basis of means but as a matter of right as some compensation which their fellow Canadians feel they should have.

It is perfectly proper for anyone who listens to what I am saying, calling as I am for extensions in the field of social security—health and old age security, removal of the means test for the blind, and so on—to raise questions about the cost. And that of course is a very popular reply on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and on the part of government supporters; that it is all very well provided that we are prepared to pay for it. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when we are considering this whole question of the cost of social security benefits what we should do is look at them in a proper perspective. We should relate them to the total productive capacity of the country. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and others on the government side like to create the impression that a disproportionately large amount of our national income is going into social security. We are told that in round figures our budget is something over $4 billion. We are told that a little over half that, $2 billion, is for national defence, and that nearly half of the other half, or nearly one-quarter of the total of our national budget, is going into social security.

There came to my desk a few days ago, as no doubt there came to the desks of all hon. members, a further document from the research division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. This one is social security series memorandum No. 14. I congratulate this department on the tremendous amount of very valuable research they have done in all aspects of social security. But this one seems to be designed to support the contention of government supporters that too large a proportion of our money is going into social security or at least as much as the country can stand. For example, to take the extreme case that is built up in this memorandum, I find that on page 15 reference is made to the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, and to the total expenditures of the federal government, of all provincial governments and of all municipalities, and then they are added up. As against that total there is set the total amount spent at each of these levels in health and social welfare expenditures, and they are added up, and then the one total is set against the other in terms of a percentage. On that basis we are told that for the fiscal year that ended March 31, 1951, the total amount of health and social welfare expenditures was $1,058,738,000. This was out of total expenditures by all levels of government of $4,858,305,000. In other words the argument, or the case, is set before us in these terms: 21·8 per cent of the total of the revenues of all governments was spent on health and social welfare expenditures.

Before I make the main comment I want to make on that I should like to point out that included in these health and social welfare expenditures are not only all expenditures that could be considered as such by the provincial and municipal governments, but in the case of the federal government there are included old age pensions, pensions for the blind, family allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, veterans' pensions, war veterans' allowances, hospital and other allowances for veterans, and even prairie farm emergency fund payments. Thus one must not think that that figure I have given of over a billion dollars relates to the more exclusive forms of social security as we usually understand them.

I shall come back to that in a moment. But even before I do, what it seems to me this house should realize is that while this total sum, this large sum of $1,058,738,000 that the department was able to build up, is 21·8 per cent of the revenues of the three levels of government, it is only 4·9 per cent of the gross national product for the year for which these figures were prepared.

I believe a society such as ours that believes in social security, that believes in bearing one another's burdens, that believes in the whole idea of community responsibility and of being civilized, is not going too far and indeed, is not going far enough when it devotes—even at the highest figure, the department can build up—only 4·9 per cent of its gross national product on these various health and welfare expenditures.

Those are the figures, of course, for the year ended March 31, 1951. We are now in a different year, and in the meantime we have had a change in the old age program. Hence those figures will be different when they come out for another year. But I am satisfied that the increase in the amount spent on these various items will not represent any higher percentage of the gross national product because the gross national product is going up. The figure for that earlier year was $21,241 million. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has estimated that for this fiscal year it will be $22,500 million; so the percentage will probably be no greater when we have the comparable report for the current fiscal year.

But with respect to the current fiscal year the estimates indicate that we have voted $322 million for old age security. That is one of the figures ministers use to build up the large sum they say we are spending on social security, and they give it to us in terms of its percentage of the national revenue. But I submit that a realistic perspective is to look at it in terms of the gross national product, of the total wealth we are producing in this country.

The Minister of Finance says that this year our gross national product will be $22,500 million. Well, the $322 million which we allocate for old age security is only 1·4 per cent of that gross national product. And yet our senior citizens, 70 years of age and over, number about 5 per cent of the population. That, in straightforward and realistic terms, is what we are doing. We are allocating 1·4 per cent of the gross national product to 5 per cent of the citizens of this country. If there were acceptance of my suggestion that it should be increased to not less than $60 per month, the percentage would be increased only 2·1 per cent of the gross national product for 5 per cent of the population of the country. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, therefore, that a suggestion of that kind is not at all out of line. It is not as far as our older citizens might ask us to go; surely we should not fail to go at least that far.

Similarly, if one built up the other items for which I have argued—the removal of the means test after the age of 65, the removal of the means test so far as blind pensioners are concerned, a health insurance program, and so on—all these put together would still leave the total amount we would spend on health and social welfare at a figure not much over five or six per cent of the gross national product or of the total wealth we produce in this country.

I suggest that if we were to spend that amount of money, particularly that portion of it which would be in a health insurance program, the saving in the loss of man-days of work and the general improvement that we would create in the lives of our people could result in a comparable increase in the gross national product. I say that what we are proposing is not that some Santa Claus should hand things out; rather, what we are proposing is just plain, ordinary common sense, and I am satisfied that is the way the people of this country feel.

I hope the proposals we are making will be considered by the government in that light, that it will realize we are not asking that the Canadian people be given something for nothing, but rather that we are simply asking that the people of the country who produce the nation's wealth, who are responsible for our huge gross national product, get back a reasonable share of that gross national product, and that they get part of that reasonable proportion or share in the form of social security and in the form of protection of their health so they can enjoy life as it should be possible in Canada at this time.

Before my time comes to a close may I touch briefly on two or three other subjects. I join wholeheartedly with those who have called upon the government to take action at this session in connection with the means test as it applies to the War Veterans Allowance Act. Hon. members know that last session, when the act was amended, some of us were not at all satisfied with the income ceilings that were retained in the act, which permit in most cases only $10 a month of other income to a burnt-out pensioner, be he single or married.

[Mr. Knowles.]

It is not without significance that the Canadian Legion so soon after that legislation was passed has again launched a campaign, which I support, calling for an increase in the permissible income ceiling. Everyone knows how responsible that body is, and I suggest real attention should be paid by the government to the fact that they are back already insisting that something be done about the means test under the War Veterans Allowance Act. For my part, I think the allowance should have been $60 and $120 for single and married persons respectively, as the Legion asked. But at least action should be taken at this session to raise substantially the permissible income ceiling provided in the act.

Similarly I still feel, and hon. members have heard me mention this repeatedly on the floor of the house, that something should be done for our retired civil servants, particularly those in the lower income brackets. During the years I have been urging the government to take action on this matter, other governments have taken action. In the United States they have passed a special provision for increasing on a percentage basis, within certain brackets, the pensions of those already retired. Recently there has been a second pensions increase bill in the United Kingdom, raising the pensions of those already retired. There has been recognition by those governments that while those people were retired on the pension rates provided by the law at the time they retired, conditions over which the pensioners had no control have increased their cost of living, and that they are entitled to a better break.

I hope our Canadian retired civil servants will be given consideration at this session. I could hope that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) was not off the beam yesterday, as I fear he was, when he expressed the view that in the speech from the throne he saw that something was going to be done for them. I am afraid the hon. member had not read it carefully, because the speech from the throne says only that the Civil Service Superannuation Act is to be amended. That affects only those who are still in the service. I contend that something must also be done for those already retired, particularly those in the lower brackets.

Before this session gets along much farther there will be opportunity for some of us to call to the attention of the government other items of unfinished business left over from former sessions. There will be the question of the check-off of trade union dues, which I hope the government will endorse this year. There is also the question to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made reference the other night, namely the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes. I would remind hon. members what happened at the last session. My motion seeking removal of the 4 per cent limitation passed the house unanimously, but the Minister of Finance chose not to change the act accordingly. The people of Canada expect a better deal than that this time. My motion is on the order paper again this session, and I hope greater consideration will be given to what I am satisfied are the wishes of the Canadian people in respect of this matter of medical expenses in relation to income tax.

One other thought, and I shall take my seat—and I believe I shall have finished within my 40 minutes—and that is to express the hope that there will not be a delay of ten years, or even nine years or five years, in dealing with the question as to how future redistributions of seats in the House of Commons are to be effected. It is not my purpose at this moment nor is there time to revive the feeling which existed in the house last June because of the redistribution which was effected at that time. The feelings which some of us had have been confirmed by the feelings we found to exist in our constituencies and in various parts of Canada during the recess.

The point I wish to make is that there was a much wider feeling this year than ever before that the time has come for redistribution to be carried out by an independent commission. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) suggested on several occasions that the time to raise the question of an independent commission—although I did not agree with him—was not when we were dealing with redistribution. He suggested that he would be glad to have me join with him at the first session after that last redistribution in proposing that this matter of finding another way to do it should be given serious study. I hope when the hon. member for Quebec South gets back to the house he will remember the suggestion he made and will call upon the government to set up a committee at this session of parliament to study the whole question of having future redistributions of the seats in this House of Commons effected by an independent commission.

There is a good deal of dissatisfaction in the country with what was done last June and July. That dissatisfaction is very evident in my own province where the new constituencies vary all the way from one with only 40,000 population to one with over 81,000. No one can possibly defend such a discrepancy. The only answer to that kind of situation and the kind of boundary lines that are drawn by parliamentary committees is to get this business out of parliament and have it done by an independent commission so the people of Canada will feel that the job is being done for them and not for hon. members who happen to be sitting in parliament at the time the matter is under review.

I hope this matter will receive consideration along with the others that I have suggested. And once again I press upon the government as a matter of top importance at this session the urgent need for a nation-wide program of health insurance as is proposed in the C.C.F. amendment now before this house.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, my first words are of sincere congratulation to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These two new members have covered themselves and their constituents with glory by their maiden speeches, and I am sure all hon. members look forward to their continued participation in the debates of this house.

I want to express my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney). These two gentlemen have been well and favourably known in this house for many years, and we wish them every success in carrying out the new and heavy responsibilities which have fallen upon them.

It is a pleasure to me to speak this afternoon for the first time through the fine voice-raising equipment which has been installed in this chamber by a firm located in the constituency of Halifax. As this system continues to be in operation I hope that not only hon. members of the house but members of the public who come into the galleries to follow our deliberations will find it of great benefit in properly following the proceedings.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) dealt in some detail with complaints which he had received regarding two construction projects which are under way in his province for the Department of National Defence. No one is more anxious to receive notice of complaints of this nature than the ministers of the departments of this government who are responsible for construction activities of this kind. From time to time we do get word of complaints, and those complaints are quickly and thoroughly investigated. I am happy to say that on almost every occasion careful investigation satisfies the concern of those who have brought the matter to the attention of the proper authority.

I assure the hon. member that so far as the Department of Defence Production and Defence Construction Limited are concerned, we believe that conditions at both the locations mentioned are satisfactory. However, immediate inquiry will be made to establish that fact. We will welcome and will co-operate fully in any investigation conducted by the committee on defence expenditures when that committee is set up.

I should like to deal briefly with certain suggestions which have been made outside this house that the morale of Canada's armed forces serving in Europe as part of our NATO army and air force leaves something to be desired. I had the privilege and I may say the pleasure of visiting our army and air force units in Europe and the United Kingdom some three weeks ago. From my observations and experience I think I can assure the house and the country that there is definitely no serious difficulty. The morale of our forces is extremely high and satisfactory.

Perhaps if I gave a brief résumé of what I saw in Europe you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members would be in a better position to judge the facts. The main burden of the complaints which I have heard is in connection with our army component of the NATO forces, which consists of the 27th brigade stationed in and around Hanover in Western Germany. Hanover is a large city situated approximately 45 miles west of the boundary of the east zone of Germany, and is therefore quite close to the iron curtain. It was quite an experience to a person like myself to feel that I was so near to the border of that area of the world which is causing us so much concern at the present time.

For the past few years Hanover has been the centre of a large concentration of displaced persons, and it is only recently that the city has got back to a more normal and ordinary life. It would require some time for me to describe the various units of the brigade and the exact nature of the quarters in which they are located. Suffice it to say that the Canadian troops are all quartered in excellent permanent barracks with living quarters for officers, N.C.O.'s and men that are the equal of anything in this country and in my experience distinctly better than most. Adequate canteen and recreational facilities are available to our troops in the form of movie theatres, canteens, reading rooms and the like. There are in our barrack areas gymnasiums and one excellent indoor swimming pool which provide facilities for indoor exercise both as a matter of drill and also free time relaxation. A program of rigorous training and a sports program give more than adequate opportunity for outdoor exercise to all our troops. The sports program includes everything from boxing and gymnastics to cross-country running.

The medical, dental and postal services are excellent. Our field ambulance unit has a small hospital for the immediate use of the Canadian troops, and a large and well-equipped British military hospital is available for more serious cases.

I was particularly impressed with the nature and extent of the educational program available to our brigade troops. I formed the opinion that it is by all standards a better and wider program than is available at the present time to similar troops in Canada. It is true that the opportunities for giving time for an educational program are better in the conditions under which the brigade finds itself in Germany, and there has perhaps been more incentive to the personnel to take advantage of the educational facilities that are available. However, the fact is that they are entering into the educational program very well indeed.

One of the main matters of concern to any troops or any army is that of food. The ration situation of our brigade and all our NATO forces is extremely good indeed. We are drawing rations from the United States quartermaster's corps supplemented to Canadian scale, and there is absolutely no complaint with the food at all. The personnel of the brigade are as you would expect. The officers are largely young men, almost 100 per cent of them having overseas service during world war II. The same is true of the N.C.O.'s and men. They are all first-class young Canadians, and from my observation I would say they are enjoying their military service as much as any Canadians could be expected to enjoy being outside of Canada for the length of time and under the conditions under which they are serving.

The general impression the brigade gives to any visitor, and certainly which it gave to me, is one of smartness and efficiency. I was able to make inquiries outside of the brigade in the Hanover area and also in other parts of Germany and in England. I was informed by people who know that the Canadian brigade gave a superb performance in recent extensive manoeuvres in West Germany, and I know that they gave a very fine account of themselves.

What about morale? As you, Mr. Speaker, and many members of the house are aware, morale is an indefinable thing. It is a composite of pride of service, pride in your formation and pride in your unit, of confidence in the leadership that the officers and N.C.O.'s give to the men. It is a composite of general satisfaction with food and living conditions and a realization that reasonable facilities for recreation, sports and amusements are available.

All these elements exist so far as our brigade is concerned, and I can assure hon. members that the result is that the morale of the brigade is very high indeed. Reports indicating that there is some concern about low morale have arisen, I understand, from newspaper stories dealing with the subject which were based not on personal evidence but on secondhand opinions and suggestions. Having been on the spot, I can say most sincerely that these suggestions are not soundly based.

I was interested after returning from Europe when several statements by other people who had had an experience similar to mine were brought to my attention. For example, in the Hamilton Spectator of November 15 there is an account given by a resident of Dundas. It reads as follows:

> . . . though he was no authority on military procedure, he and his companion, having spent twelve days in Germany and considerable time at Hanover where the 27th brigade is stationed, were of the opinion that the morale of the troops was fine. Their main complaint to Mr. Bowen and himself, he said, was that they did not have enough to keep them busy.

I am sure the reference to their not having enough to keep them busy did not arise from statements by the troops that they did not find their training sufficiently active and rigorous, because the training program is exceptionally good. However, young Canadians in a foreign land do like to get around and see the country in which they are living, and many of our troops find that their inability to speak German limits their activities in this direction. In the Montreal Gazette of November 17 there is a story from Ottawa reporting statements made by Brigadier W. C. Coke, now retiring from the army as director general of medical services. The article reads:

> "I have just returned from Germany after visiting every unit of the brigade", Brigadier Coke said.

That is the 27th brigade.

> "I found nothing wrong with morale or welfare." He added that on a recent exercise "Very senior British officers expressed admiration of the bearing and fitness of this formation. This brigade is rated second to none in Germany. I have never seen a brigade training under peacetime conditions exhibit a higher degree of esprit de corps."

I can confirm every word of that statement by Brigadier Coke, and my considered opinion is that the morale of the 27th brigade is extremely good indeed.

The other components of our NATO forces are two fighter wings of the R.C.A.F. There has been no real suggestion that these units are not satisfactory from the point of view of morale and everything else so far as I know, but having visited them I think I should say that they present a most satisfactory picture to anyone coming to see how they are getting along. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we are up to date on our commitments to our NATO allies. The fact is that the six F-86 squadrons that we have in Europe form the largest number of fighters considered fully capable of dealing with the Russian MIG-15. Those Canadian planes, which have been proven in combat in Korea, are now stationed one wing in France and one wing in England. They have proven themselves to be ready to meet whatever may be before them.

The first Canadian fighter wing is at North Luffenham. They are established there in permanent R.A.F. barracks at a very fine R.A.F. airdrome. It could be nothing but a pleasure for anyone to see how well they are getting along, and the excellent facilities they have. The three squadrons are all happy and indulging in very detailed and busy competition among themselves on matters of fitness. The pilots are obviously delighted with their aircraft. Their pride is helped by the fact that they realize that their colleagues in all the other air forces on the continent are jealous of the fine planes and are looking forward to having comparable equipment themselves.

One fighter squadron at North Luffenham reached that base by means of operation "Leapfrog I", in which those planes were flown from Canada to England. The second Canadian fighter wing is stationed at a new airfield which has been built for the NATO forces in France. The planes arrived there as a result of operation Leapfrog II, in which they were all flown from Canada direct to their airfield in France. This was one of the finest operations that has been carried out by any air force since the end of world war II. The arrival of this squadron in France under these conditions made a tremendous impression on all the members of the NATO alliance in Europe. The airport itself is still partially under construction, that is to say the runways are complete and the marguerites, but some of the living accommodation and other facilities were not completed at the time the airfield was occupied. The construction is going ahead satisfactorily, and while personnel met very severe weather conditions during the period in which they did not have full occupancy of their living quarters, they put up with this discomfort in good spirit. I am sure they all look back with satisfaction on the way No. 2 fighter wing occupied that airfield and brought it to fighting efficiency under very difficult circumstances.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, may I say that neither the 27th brigade nor the R.C.A.F. units in our NATO forces have any peers in Europe today, and we can all be extremely proud of the manner in which they have conducted themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with another question which has many aspects, one of which is closely connected with the question of morale in all our armed forces, whether at home or abroad. This is the very generalized and repetitious criticisms about procurement for the armed forces which we have been hearing over the last few months. This criticism is always accompanied by general remarks regarding waste, extravagance and unnecessary expenditures. I think it is not unfair to say that these criticisms are founded on the allegation that the items that have been singled out for attention are examples of expenditures which are unjustified, either in their nature or in their extent.

A good example of this type of criticism can be found in the remarks made by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) during this debate last evening. As an introduction to what I have to say on the question —my remarks will not be directed solely to the hon. member's statement but to similar statements made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) this afternoon—I should like to quote what the hon. member for Middlesex East said at page 89 of Hansard for November 25:

> We see where the Department of Defence Production has purchased within the past year almost one million dollars worth of broadloom rugs. People do not mind paying for airplanes, guns and other supplies for our troops, but I think the people of Canada are getting sick and tired of this arm chair army for which we are buying supplies.

I regard that as a very significant and illuminating statement, Mr. Speaker. I should like to examine it in some detail, as it emphasizes the kind of thinking that is going on in the ranks of the official opposition and the manner in which they are employing half truths in order to make some baseless suggestions and to pattern innuendoes in an attempt to create an atmosphere of suspicion and bad feeling. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), who spoke earlier this afternoon, dealt with this kind of thing very briefly but quite effectively when he pointed out the work that had been done last year by the defence expenditures committee in examining and putting on the record the facts in relation to these matters which have been raised. It is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that we have heard of the rugs, the boots and other matters that have been mentioned.

The purpose, I presume, of these baseless suggestions is to achieve some political damage in so far as this government is concerned. I am afraid they will achieve some very different purpose which I shall suggest in a moment. First of all I should like to draw attention to the facts relating to the purchase of rugs, to see just exactly what they are.

The statement is:

> We see where the Department of Defence Production has purchased within the past year almost one million dollars worth of broadloom rugs.

This is the fact. The purchases of broadloom rugs from April 1950 to date are approximately $1 million. But the way in which the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) spoke, as well as other members of the official opposition who have been dealing with these problems, leaves the impression that this bald statement of an expenditure of $1 million for a certain purpose is all the information that is available.

I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Middlesex East, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) the proceedings of a committee of parliament which sat last session and on which certain members of the official opposition were extremely active members. The proceedings of that committee have been published. I hold in my hand a copy of the proceedings, No. 15, which deals with the evidence that was given on Tuesday, June 10, 1952, and it has been available to the hon. member for Middlesex East and to all the other members of this house—and for that matter to the members of the public—since some time toward the end of June of last year. The question of rugs, which was dealt with in some twenty words by the hon. member for Middlesex East, was dealt with in that committee in its proceedings of that particular day as follows. This is a statement made by the deputy minister of national defence, who was dealing seriously with this particular problem. I may say that I am sorry to put this long quotation on Hansard, Mr. Speaker, but I think it should be done. This is what he said:

> The next item is rugs and carpets. Rugs and carpets are slightly more complicated a category to explain in that there are quite a few articles under the heading of rugs and carpets. Included in these are not only the type of rug of a size 9 feet by 12 feet which is placed on the floor of lounges and messes but the kind of matting used on the interior decks of a number of ships.

I might perhaps try to outline to the members of the committee what the various rugs are used for. A rug or carpet 6 feet 9 inches by 9 feet is provided in each officer's single quarter. A small rug 2 feet 3 inches by 4 feet 6 inches is provided as something to cover the concrete or linoleum floor alongside the bed of each man in the other ranks single quarters. In lounges, officers lounges and NCO's lounges and men's lounges in the active force, larger rugs 9 feet by 12 feet are provided on the general basis of one per 200 square feet of floor area. The allowance for the reserve force is just one half of that—one per 400 feet of floor area.

In hospitals there is provided in sunrooms or solaria one per 300 square feet of floor area and, in addition, there are a limited number provided at government expense in married quarters at isolated units. We have found by experience that it is more economical to furnish completely a married quarter at an isolated station—and by isolated I mean really isolated such as Aklavik, Goose Bay, some of the stations on the northwest highway system, and so on—than it is to move the furnishings of the dependents. There is quite a substantial saving on the transportation charges and the cost of furnishing isolated married quarters completely is less than paying those transportation charges.

That is the basis then of the issue of the various rugs. Now, the number required in this two-year period would necessarily be quite large by reason of the substantial construction program that is now being carried on. All new single quarters for men are provided with one of these small throw rugs I mention as are all new NCO's quarters. The numbers which have been ordered are related not only to what was being constructed during the period in question but also to the quarters scheduled to come to completion during the subsequent twelve-month period.

That is a much different thing than a bald statement that we have spent $1 million on broadloom rugs.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the statement which I will repeat again from Hansard:

. . . but I think the people of Canada are getting sick and tired of this arm chair army for which we are buying supplies.

I am not going to make any comment on the appropriateness of applying to the general buying of these supplies the suggestion that they are being bought for an arm chair army; but I would ask the hon. member if it is buying rugs for an arm chair army to buy rugs to go in sunrooms and solaria of military hospitals; if it is buying rugs for an arm chair army to provide, on a logical basis, rugs for married quarters at Aklavik, Goose Bay and stations on the northwest highway system; if it is buying rugs for an arm chair army to provide one small rug in the quarters of airmen, sailors and soldiers under training in various parts of this country—in air stations all over western Canada, in naval stations on both coasts far from their homes; if it is buying rugs for an arm chair army to provide one small rug to put in the rooms occupied by those young men. If that is buying rugs or anything else for an arm chair army, then my understanding of any term of that kind is much different from the understanding of the hon. member.

This, Mr. Speaker, I think is true of much of the criticism that we have been hearing both last session and this one. We are hearing repeated this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton the same bald statements which were made the last session and which were thoroughly dealt with in the committee on defence expenditures. The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned boots. In this particular issue of the proceedings of the defence expenditures committee there are three pages of evidence given by the deputy minister of national defence dealing with boots alone, in which he went into detail as to the numbers of the armed forces that had to be supplied with boots, the scales of issue and the calculation of the supplies necessary for stockpiling for possible mobilization, with the single exception that the actual numbers of mobilization stores would not be given. I think the house will agree that it would be extremely unwise for us to give an indication of that kind, as to what our mobilization plans might be. But these statements and criticisms are repeated, not in the light of the information that is available to the members who are speaking as well as to every other member of the house and to the public, but as if what they say—the bald figure—is the only information that is available. Mr. Speaker, I submit that that procedure is dealing with these things in the way of putting before this house and the country as half truths matters that are not only capable of explanation but which have already been explained.

My original point was that this matter had a close connection with the morale of our forces. It has a connection in this sense. The suggestion is made that these supplies are being purchased in an extravagant and unreasonable manner in order to give us supplies of rugs which are not used or to which the people to whom they are issued for use are not entitled, or that there is some other strange reason for procuring these things. The officers of the Department of National Defence—as I am sure it is obvious from the material that was supplied by that department to the defence expenditures committee—have gone to the greatest lengths they can go to explain why these things are required. Yet after the committee has sat, and after the proceedings are published and available for the use of anybody who wishes to use them, the same baseless arguments are put forward and the same senseless suggestions are made that there is waste and extravagance which has not been explained.

Mistakes have been made; they are in the proceedings of the defence expenditures committee. No one can complain about dealing with matters of that kind. But I think it is a dangerous practice to take a position that is likely to make some sort of rift between our armed forces and the people of Canada which would be based on any misapprehension or misunderstanding of what are the real facts. I hope that when the committee on defence expenditures is reconstituted the facts that are brought out before that committee will be put to more use by the members of the official opposition and not completely disregarded, as it is apparent they have disregarded the work done by the committee last session.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Poulin the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 27, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TELECOMMUNICATION

REDUCTION IN RATES BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND MAINLAND

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement concerning telecommunications between Newfoundland and the mainland.

An agreement has been reached by the six companies providing long distance telephone services between these points reducing the rates effective Monday, December 1, between Newfoundland and the mainland.

The companies involved are the two crown companies, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which operate the over-water link for the network, and the Canadian National Telegraphs, which provide land line services in Newfoundland, and the radio communication between Port aux Basques and North Sydney. The four private companies are the Avalon Telephone Company of St. John's, Newfoundland, the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and the New Brunswick Telephone Company. The toll reductions will be borne proportionally by each of the companies concerned, according to the amount of service rendered.

The new rates for three-minute calls between Newfoundland and the maritime provinces are based on mileage instead of the present flat charge of $7.20. For example, the new rate between St. John's and Halifax will be $3.20, a reduction of $4; between Corner Brook and Moncton, $2.65 or a reduction of $4.55. The rate for calls between anywhere in Quebec and Newfoundland will be reduced to $4.50 from $7.20; from Ontario the new rate will be $6 instead of $7.50; from Manitoba, $6 instead of $9; comparable reductions will go into effect for calls to and from Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

In June of this year, I indicated to the house that there was a contemplated reduction in long distance telephone charges between Newfoundland and the mainland, and I am gratified at the results of the discussions which have taken place between the various companies involved.

I think that the results achieved are very satisfactory, and I am sure that hon. members, representing Newfoundland in this house, will join with me in extending our appreciation to the officers of the companies involved and, more particularly, to those of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation for the manner in which the problem of the long distance telephone rates has been solved.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the people of Newfoundland will be pleased to learn that these reductions are coming into effect on December 1. There is one question I should like to ask the minister and it is this. Are there to be any other reductions in rates for calls after hours—that is after six p.m.—and on Sundays as are in effect in the rest of Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: The agreement that I have referred to in this instance covers over-all long distance calls. I know of no other coverage by this agreement. It may be that another matter is being considered by the Canadian National Telegraphs for posts and other communities outside of their land lines. I shall be glad to inquire.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Transport and to ask him whether he is aware of the news dispatch which appeared in the press this morning stating that there was a likelihood of something like an 18-months delay in the construction of the St. Lawrence power and seaway channel arising out of a possible reference from the federal power commission of the United States to the federal court and then to the supreme court of that country. I wish to ask the minister first of all whether that speculation or comment has good grounds; second, whether or not there are likely to be any other obstacles of a legal or technical nature raised against the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway at an early date.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The questions that the hon. member for Peel asks are of a broad character. I saw the report in the morning press.

Inquiries of the Ministry

All I should like to say at the present time is, first of all, that this is a matter that has to do with an application that is before a body in another country, and I would hesitate to make any comment on a matter of that kind. But I think I should at least say this: As I understand the matter, it is not a legal or a constitutional point that is involved. What is involved is an application of the New York State power authority before the federal power commission for a licence to join with Ontario hydro in the development of power in the international section. The matter has not yet been heard. There is no legal matter before any court at this time.

In so far as the legal point is concerned, it has always been a contentious matter in the United States. By "it" I mean the power and navigational project, and it is not surprising that there may be some litigation. But I should like to say that the co-operation we have received from our United States friends is such that I have confidence it will continue in the present application. Given that kind of co-operation, I am not at all disturbed by the statement that has been made. I am still confident that we shall proceed with this development in the not too distant future.

CIGARETTES

REPORTED SALES OF UNITED STATES BRANDS—DUTIES AND TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the attention of the minister been called to recent press reports stating that cigarettes of United States manufacture are being sold in chain stores in Canada, at prices which are lower than those charged for cigarettes of domestic manufacture, and, if so, what action does the minister propose to take?

A further question: Will the minister also indicate what are the rates of duty and taxes on cigarettes imported from the United States, and whether any dumping duty applies?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The second question is one which I am sure should appear on the order paper. Perhaps the minister would like to answer the first question. It could also of course appear on the order paper, but if the minister would like to answer it now and the house has no objection to make, he may do so.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member was good enough to give me advance notice of his question, and in reply I would like to say that I am aware of the press reports stating that cigarettes of United States manufacture are being sold in some Canadian chain stores at prices lower than domestic cigarettes. The department is now looking into this matter and is carrying on investigations to establish whether the proper duties and taxes have been paid.

The customs duty on cigarettes imported from the United States is $2 per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem plus $2 per thousand cigarettes.

The sales tax of 10 per cent is payable on the duty paid value. There is also an excise tax of two cents per unit of 5 or any fraction thereof. Dumping duty would not apply in the case of these imports for the reason that under the provisions of subsection 2 (i) of section 6 of the Customs Tariff goods which, like cigarettes, are of a class subject to excise duties under the Excise Act, are exempt from special or dumping duty.

THE CABINET

INQUIRY AS TO DESIGNATION "OFFICERS OF THE CROWN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret to state I have not given him previous notice of the question that I am going to ask but I am quite sure that with the alacrity of his brain he can answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacDougall: If not, he can take it as notice. I should like to know what members of the cabinet are considered officers of the crown. If there are any members of the cabinet who are not in that category, who are those specific ministers of the crown who are not so considered?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I am afraid that even the alacrity of the Minister of Justice is not equal to that question, without notice. I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's question as a notice and bring down an answer.

PENSION ACT

DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED SERVICE PERSONNEL—REQUESTED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister received a copy of the resolution of the Silver Cross Women of Canada, as I believe have all members, asking for certain changes in section 33 of the Pension Act with respect to pensions paid to dependent parents of deceased servicemen? Will consideration be given to this request?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have received such a resolution, and I have made arrangements to meet with the officers of that association in the very near future to discuss the matter with them.

ARMED FORCES

WELFARE FACILITIES—VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the continuing expansion of the armed forces, does the government intend to make use of the welfare facilities offered by the voluntary organizations which served so effectively during world war II?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member for Brandon was good enough to give me notice of his question. At present we have a brigade group in Korea, a reinforcement group and other units in Japan, an air force wing and a depot in England, a brigade in Germany and an air force wing in France. The heads of the three services consider that it would be unwise, uneconomical and unnecessary to establish at all these places the five welfare agencies that we used during the second world war and I agree with them. Whatever welfare services are required will continue to be supplied by one means or another, depending on the circumstances.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I came to Ottawa to attend the present session firmly determined not to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. However, after listening to the various speeches made during the last few days I changed my mind. Many will undoubtedly say that that is where I erred. As a solace, I might tell them that my remarks will be brief.

Like the previous speakers, I wish to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address for their magnificent and successful effort to uphold, according to the tradition of the house, the quality and dignity of those speeches.

I also associate myself with the wishes expressed by the previous speakers for the complete success of the celebrations marking the coronation of the Queen of Canada.

I say without hesitation that, in my humble opinion, our present political system is not the one I prefer. For instance, I have often asked myself what is the necessity or even the usefulness of a governor general, even a Canadian governor general, and of lieutenant governors in the various provinces. However, as long as we are governed by a constitutional monarchy, the person vested with supreme authority, whether man or woman, will find no more respectful subject than I. Consequently, I sincerely trust, without any reservation, that our new queen will enjoy a reign both happy for herself and her family, and beneficial to the loyal subjects that we are.

At this stage of the debate on the address, we are considering the amendment to the amendment moved by the member for Rosetown-Biggar on behalf of the socialist party of which he is the leader.

The said motion reads as follows:

We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(a) to recommend legislation establishing a a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration.

I wish to state right now that I am decidedly opposed—not because I am a doctor myself but as a Canadian citizen—to any state-controlled health insurance scheme.

Health, treatment of ailments, relations between the patient and his doctor or nurse, hygiene, medical education, hospitalization, all these are hallowed fields in which moral and psychological factors are just as important as therapeutic or hygienic considerations. It therefore appears to me to be absolutely unseemly—if not altogether impossible—to let the state look after medical matters in a country such as ours.

Though it may be argued that freedom of choice would be safeguarded, as regards both the doctor and the patient, it is nevertheless a fact that the physician would become a civil servant; he would be forced to abandon all kinds of personal undertakings which are just as necessary in the medical field as in other scientific fields. He would be obliged to put down in writing any number of declarations directly opposed to his professional oath of secrecy and entailing an unnecessary loss of often precious time. Even were the family doctor or the consulting specialist to retain all those privileges which they now enjoy, and which give to his relationships with his patients an almost sacred quality of friendliness and confidence, the fact would nevertheless remain that state-controlled medicine would bring about a type of officialdom whose doings would be prejudicial to the best interests of the patients.

In a country such as ours, in particular, where there is duality of culture and religion, can you imagine, for instance, an atheistic high official—and it is not the first time that persons of that category have sat on Canadian government bodies—in charge of health control with the education which that involves? Can you imagine this official being required to pass upon the advisability of allowing or prohibiting therapeutic abortion, or to give advice concerning sexual intercourse or chastity in marriage, or else on the gynaecological care to be given in maternity cases? Can you imagine this same person expounding doctrines of birth-control or sexual education to be given to adolescents? It would indeed be interesting to see a Dr. Chisholm —the less said about him the better— approaching these problems! It is not therefore surprising to note that, in Catholic Ireland, in 1951, that is, last year, the bishops forced the Costello government to dispense with the services of Dr. Browne who was in charge of the health department, because he favoured a government plan for medical care to mother and child.

On the other hand, I am bound to admit that a great number of our people are not getting adequate medical care yet, in spite of the fact that great progress has been accomplished during the last decade in the field of preventive medicine. Such an improvement has been possible thanks to an acceptable co-operation between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the provincial governments.

I acknowledge, and I am pleased to do so, that the federal government has done much in this field in lending genuine support to the constant efforts of the provinces. I would like to add that, on the whole, provincial autonomy as well as the sacred field of medicine has been respected by Ottawa. In co-operation with the provinces, the federal government has been concerned mainly with hygiene and preventive medicine. In this field we have by now reached a reasonable level, which compares favourably with the level attained in several other countries. Could the federal government go further than that? Could it do more than it has done so far?

[Mr. Poulin.]

As I just said, preventive medicine is making considerable progress. The most serious deficiencies are now felt in another sector, that of curative medicine, and this is the field which the federal government will have to invade, if it wants to make further progress. A great many people of limited means are surely deprived of medical care because they are unable, with their small income, to pay the very high cost of such services. Nevertheless, I contend that this sector of medicine is a field which the central government should not invade, for the reasons I gave a few moments ago.

I now contend that even the provincial governments should abstain from interfering. That field is too intimate, too personal; it is a temple too sacred to be violated by civil servants, to whichever party or group they may belong.

In his speech of the 24th instant, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, after having discussed state-controlled health schemes—and I quote his very words:

> We discover more and more that prominent physicians can be brought to see the necessity of such a program.

He quoted but one authority in support of his statement. One must admit that the list of prominent doctors referred to by the hon. member is not very impressive, being limited to one person. Proceeding with his speech, the hon. member named the president of the association of French-speaking physicians of America, Dr. Jean-Baptiste Jobin, as one of those doctors who could be persuaded that a national health insurance scheme was a necessity. As proof of this, he quoted a few words that Dr. Jobin is reported to have said at Laval university on September 23, 1952. I am referring to page 53 of Hansard of November 24, 1952:

> Social medicine is a must if modern medical services are to be accessible to everyone.

From these few words, the hon. member hastens to conclude that the prominent physician referred to has allowed himself to be convinced of the need for state-controlled medicine.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this statement go unchallenged. Following the speech delivered by the hon. member, I contacted Dr. Jobin and here is the letter I received from him yesterday.

Quebec, November 25, 1952.

Dr. Raoul Poulin,
Member for Beauce,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Doctor,

I am glad to send you, in reply to your telegram about Mr Coldwell's project, the whole text of my statement. You will see that I was misquoted by newspapermen who garbled my text.

Ever since I was played that mean trick by a newspaper whose name I will not mention, that paper's article has been reproduced everywhere by people who, ignoring my original text, have quoted me right and left as having said something I do not believe in the least.

At the closing banquet of the convention held at the Chateau Frontenac, in Quebec city, I made it quite clear that I was personally and categorically against state medicine, that I had been the victim of misinterpretation and that I favoured on the contrary private medical practice, in so far as is possible. You will see that such is the statement I made last September at Convocation hall.

I beg you to accept, my dear Doctor Poulin, the expression of my best wishes.

Yours truly,

J. B. Jobin

In my opinion, the only way of solving this problem would be to encourage the population to enrol in independent insurance plans with prepaid premiums, through various companies entirely independent from the different governments. It is well known, in that respect, that such insurance plans are becoming increasingly popular. In 1950, half the population of the United States was protected by plans of that type, while in Canada some three and a half million people were covered by private insurance plans. In the case of low-income people, the government of each province would pay the premium. That would increase the expenditures of the provinces, which, I know, would make the plan quite unwelcome to a few people who will hold that certain provinces are financially incapable of paying the cost of such an insurance plan. That brings us to another current topic which was debated at some length in the house by the Leader of the Opposition: the division between the federal government and the provinces, of the different fields of taxation, and the matter of provincial autonomy.

My point of view would be accepted in the province of Quebec, I think, since the premier is a determined partisan of autonomy, even if, on some occasions, he has let slip by some opportunities to consolidate its foundations. However, he made quite recently in this connection a statement which has made me very happy. He is reported as having said last week at a press conference that he will no longer accept the federal government's aid to universities and classical colleges. Being one of the very few members in this house who have challenged that recommendation of the Massey commission, I cannot help but be delighted at this new stand taken by the premier of Quebec, and I offer him my most sincere congratulations.

The provinces should be able to find the revenues they need to give the poor of the country the medical care to which they are entitled, pursuant to the principles of Christian charity, and without having to resort to state medicine.

To this end, should the federal government return to some of these provinces the sources of revenue with which they parted more or less willingly I do not hesitate to answer that the interests at stake are certainly worth while.

Mr. Speaker, the problem of the medical care that should be given to the needy is too utterly human to make a mess of it by exaggerated partisanship.

I am convinced that there is not a single member of this house who is not ready to do his best so that the unfortunate may receive not only the assistance necessary to relieve their misfortune and their sufferings, but that they may receive that assistance fully in the most human and most comforting way possible. I believe, speaking in all sincerity, that governments can strive to attain this goal without intruding into the field of medicine.

(Text):

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I should like first of all, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate most warmly the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) discharged their difficult tasks in a way which brought honour to their constituencies, and they deserve every congratulation. I am sure that the members of the armed forces, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force would be most appreciative of what those members, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) have said about them in their speeches in this debate.

Ordinarily on taking part in a debate of this kind I would have felt it my duty to survey the international situation, particularly as regards Korea and the work of the United Nations to stop aggression there, and the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its work to prevent aggression in Europe. Then, I would have endeavoured to give an account to the house of some of the main developments in our armed forces since we last met. There will be other opportunities to do that, either during this debate or later in the session, and I shall be glad to take advantage of those opportunities as they occur. Today I propose to deal with boots, forks and rugs.

An hon. Member: And neckties, too?

Mr. Claxton: I am not omitting neckties. My reason for taking this course is that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) made these articles and our extravagant expenditure on them, as he put it, the main basis of his attack against the Department of National Defence. These have been the subject also of some newspaper articles.

Now, the purchase of clothing and barrack stores for the armed forces is a matter of the most serious concern to this house and to the country. It involves very large expenditures of money, and must be done with all possible economy. If anyone can point to any way in which greater economies can be effected, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), myself and the officers of the armed forces will be the most pleased persons in the world, because we want to get the most value we can and have the biggest defence forces possible for the tax dollar.

This matter, therefore, is of grave concern. As it happens, it is a matter on which the special committee on defence expenditures set up by this house spent most of its time. Hon. members have available to them, even though they may not have looked at them, the proceedings of that committee as they are in the papers and official records of this house. They will see there spread out information bearing on most of these subjects. I suggest it would be useful if, before making sweeping assertions about these subjects, an hon. member would at least look at the published records of the house to see what the facts are that have been brought out.

Clothing and barracks stores are required for four purposes. First, there is the original issue to a man or an establishment, to the man when he joins the armed forces or to the establishment when it is set up. Second, there is the replacement of articles worn out through use, that is, maintenance. Third, there is the establishment of sufficient stocks in depots and other stores to meet normal demands as well as sudden requirements that cannot be anticipated, and also to provide for the varying sizes of the people who have to be outfitted. Anyone familiar with retail practices will know what I mean by this. It is usual to provide something in the nature of 25 per cent extra for size, that figure depending on the article concerned. Fourth, and finally, we want stores and clothing for mobilization.

I announced in the house on February 5, 1951, the expanded defence program and I said that it would make provision for—> the administrative staff, training establishments, depots, stores, clothing and equipment to provide for rapid mobilization in a total effort.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Let me deal with each one of these four purposes for having clothing and barracks stores, in the order I have given.

First, initial outfitting. Every man entering the forces is provided with an outfit of clothing which is personal to him. The average cost for a man in the active forces is $369. In other words, for each man joining the active forces the clothing issued to him costs $369, not an excessive sum. At considerably less cost a much less elaborate kit of clothing is issued to men joining the reserve forces, the university training plans or the cadet services.

In the period from April 1, 1949, to October 31, 1952, we have enlisted in these various categories a total of 227,000 personnel each of whom had to be initially outfitted. Here I begin to mention figures that I am sure will strike the house with their magnitude. There have been 227,000 new outfits for officers and men of the active and reserve forces and the cadet services since April 1, 1949. Provided a man serves a minimum of 90 days in the active forces, and a correspondingly longer period for the reserve forces and cadets, he is entitled to retain part or all of his clothing on discharge. It will be seen therefore that initial outfitting alone calls for a very substantial number of garments.

Second, we have maintenance in respect of the replacement of articles consumed by use and by wear. Every effort is made to assure that we get the utmost possible wear out of each article. Many hon. members have visited No. 26 ordnance depot at Plouffe park and have seen there the workshops where this work is carried on. They have seen the thoroughness with which boots and shoes and other articles of clothing are completely rehabilitated by expert service and civilian workmen.

As of October 31, 1952, the strength of the active forces, reserve forces and the cadet services was 248,000. Rates of wear of military clothing for these various categories will obviously vary considerably between the extremes of the soldier engaged in active combat and one engaged in more sedentary work such as the signal system. But even so 248,000 men and women wear out a considerable number of garments in the course of a single year.

Third, we have the necessity of establishing stocks. Over and above those out on initial issue or those required for maintenance, we must have stocks to meet needs that can be anticipated and also to provide for sizing and distribution. When you consider that there are 1,402 units of the active and reserve forces, quite apart from cadets, at most of which issues are made of clothing, you can appreciate that we need quite a considerable quantity of articles of each type in stock so as to provide for distribution and sizing.

There has been a very considerable increase in the size of the forces since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. The total number has increased in the active forces from some 47,000 to over 100,000, that figure having been reached on the 6th of November last. To meet that increase we have had to add to our stocks, but that having been done we do not need to do it again. Once you establish stocks for distribution and sizing you do not need to do that operation again.

Finally, we need clothing and equipment for mobilization. Some hon. members will recall the situation that faced us in 1914 and all hon. members will recall the situation that faced us in 1939 when large numbers of men had to be mobilized, and the resultant difficulties in having men proceed with realistic training or even with guard duties through lack of proper military clothing. The next mobilization, if it comes, will in all probability be far more urgent and far more serious because we now face for the first time the possibility of a direct attack upon the land of Canada. Accordingly I announced the policy of acquiring mobilization stores when I announced the expanded defence program in the speech of February 5, 1951, from which I have just quoted.

At that time no member of the opposition and, as far as I know, no newspaper in Canada took any exception wnatever to the policy then declared. So far as I know, no member of the opposition and no newspaper has yet taken a position of opposition to the policy then declared. All countries acquire stocks for mobilization, stores for mobilization, stores with which to equip the men they have to take on strength to meet the challenge after it occurs. I came across a very interesting and helpful observation by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). Speaking in the house on November 11, 1949, he said, as recorded at page 1691 of Hansard:

> I remember that when we were mobilized in 1939 the men of my unit went around without uniforms for a considerable length of time. There were no uniforms for them at all; and this condition was not corrected until the first issue of battledress came along in November, I believe it was, 1939.

The hon. member for Calgary East goes on to say—and this is the policy we are pursuing:

> There should not be any repetition of that; there is no need for it, particularly with the large amounts spent for defence purposes at the present time.

Mr. Harkness: There is no need to go to extremes either.

An hon. Member: Oh, quiet.

Mr. Claxton: I am glad to see that the hon. member is here and he will no doubt support what he said in 1949.

The next note I have is: how far you go is a matter of opinion and a matter of judgment. In arriving at that judgment you take into account your experience in previous wars and your experience since the second world war. The officers responsible for drawing up the schedules—and we have complete schedules for every one of the 15,000 items of clothing and barracks stores required in the event of mobilization—have drawn them on the basis of that experience. From time to time we get different experience, as is the case with Korea. Manufacturers may deliver things faster than we expect and therefore we do not need so long a lead time—the time it takes to begin production on a considerable scale after we have an approved design, new machinery for production, and an order to go.

As I say, with the increased or changed experience then we modify our ideas. I will tell the house quite frankly that we have made some quite important modifications during the last year and no doubt will make others.

In the department we use a term—and I do not know whether it is in general commercial use or not—to differentiate between things that are easy to make and which are generally similar to those in civilian use, and those which are usually of metal and consist of weapons, ammunition and the like. The first category we call "soft" goods as opposed to weapons, equipment and ammunition, etc., which are "hard" goods. The time taken to produce goods from beginning to end will vary with the article but, by and large, our experience in peacetime has been that in the case of soft goods it takes from nine months up to secure a flow of production from the time when we make the requisitions on the Department of Defence Production; and in the case of hard goods it may take as long as five years for a new aircraft or eighteen months for a gun. Generally speaking the time for hard goods is of the magnitude of eighteen months up—that is the lead time for weapons, equipment, motor vehicles and ammunition. In placing orders for anything we have to take into account the fact that deliveries of most of these soft goods will begin about nine months after requisition, and of the hard goods about eighteen months.

You can see that orders placed in the spring and summer of 1951 for soft goods have been largely delivered and those for hard goods are still in process of being delivered. Consequently, of our total defence program, as announced on February 5, 1951, we have completed a very much larger proportion of the category of goods falling under the heading of clothing and barracks stores and so on, and a smaller proportion of weapons, equipment and ammunition.

Now, sir, had a war occurred during this period I can just hear the ringing tones in which the Leader of the Opposition, and members of the opposition opposite, would have criticized the government, criticized the department and criticized the armed forces for not doing just about what we have done.

The question then arises: Have we been right in ordering the things in the quantities and at the times when we have? Here again there is room for difference of opinion and the decision must vary with the article. There is no point, to my mind, in stockpiling anything that can be bought off the shelves from civilian sources of supply or produced by ordinary suppliers by the time that it is needed for use. The general idea was that we should stockpile those things with which it was necessary to equip the forces that would be available. No neckties whatever have been stockpiled—only those items that would be necessary to equip the forces that would be mobilized within the first three months or so of a general war. Now, mark that.

It is important that we should see this. The general object in stockpiling clothing and barracks stores was to get those things which we could not get from civilian sources and which were necessary to equip the troops that we expect to have to mobilize during the first three months of an emergency, and that is all.

Mr. Harkness: Is a necktie necessary for mobilization?

Mr. Claxton: I have just said that we are not stockpiling any neckties.

An hon. Member: They are good for hanging.

An hon. Member: What about Sam Hughes?

Mr. Claxton: That all brings me to the way in which the Globe and Mail and some other newspapers have used the figures which they have obtained from the published reports of the Department of Defence Production. They have taken orders generally placed with the intention of rebuilding stocks for the four purposes I have mentioned; they have related them to a single issue to 100,000 men; and they then arrive at the result that each man is to have fifteen pairs of boots. They have left out of account every trace of recognition that to a large extent the stocks of clothing we are acquiring are for both active and reserve force purposes of supply next year, partly the following year, and then for mobilization should it occur.

In 1939, three months after we started to mobilize to meet the needs of the second world war, the strength of the armed forces had increased from their peacetime level by over 60,000. I mention that figure to show something of the magnitude of the job that is faced when you begin to talk about mobilization stores. I am not in a position to give the figure of men we would expect to take on in the unfortunate event that there is a third world war, but the figure is likely to be considerably larger than in 1939.

Before going into the figures I want to emphasize again the fact, made so abundantly plain by the Prime Minister, that this defence operation is big business. Ten per cent of the national income is taken for purposes of national defence; and 10 per cent of the population, if you take members of the active force working full time, members of the reserve force working part time and those engaged directly or indirectly in defence projects, together with those in servicing industries, and their dependents, are involved.

My colleague, the Minister of Defence Production, and I have not been able to scrutinize personally in detail, as we would have liked to, all the requisitions made or contracts placed. Since March 31, 1947, 527,000 contracts have been placed. We have seen the larger ones and have also overseen the general policy. I repeat that the contracts placed, the requirements we work out and the estimates we make are subject to constant review; and I add that what is surprising is that in this huge volume of business, done under great pressure and with staffs inadequate in size, without any previous experience of so rapid a peacetime build-up, or in maintaining the very considerable forces we have had in the Far East and in Europe at the same time, the errors discovered so far have proved so small relative to the total operation.

I want to make one other point and it is this. If there have been errors or if errors are discovered in the future, either in our estimate of our current requirements or in the estimate of requirements for stockpiling, we can consume the excess of articles to meet recurring needs. I do not think that in many fields we will have stockpiled more than we would have required in about a year or a year and a quarter of ordinary current needs. In other words, not a single article has been or will be wasted; everything will be used.

Against this background, let us see what the charges are that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition and others. It is not necessary for us to search far in order to see what the bases of his charges were. There used to be an old rule against reading newspaper articles, and it was a fairly good one. The Leader of the Opposition referred to this subject himself in a speech in Toronto quoted in the Globe and Mail for November 5, 1952, with the headline "No Ghost Writers for P.C.'s, Drew Tells Ontario Rally". The article reads in part:

Commenting on an article by a U.S. columnist in which the writer stated he "knew" every man in public life employs ghost writers, Mr. Drew said it was a sad commentary on public life. He did not suggest that either presidential candidate had reached that point, but in Ottawa it has reached such a state that some cabinet ministers had not read over their speeches before they delivered them.

"It is a remarkable departure from the idea that democracy was based on the free interchange of ideas by which individuals express their convictions," he said.

With that foundation, Mr. Speaker, let us see what the Leader of the Opposition said on these various heads and from where he obtained his material. In his speech in the house, as reported at page 22 of Hansard, he said:

In the last few weeks articles have been appearing throughout Canada in some of the most responsible of Canadian newspapers, analysing facts and figures in regard to defence purchases, which are a challenge to every member of the house.

I agree that they are a challenge to every member of the house. They are a challenge to every member of the house to look at the records of the house before he uses such statements. I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition would have been better briefed had he taken the trouble to consult the minutes of proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditures set up in answer to his request.

On the subject of clothing in general, as reported at page 23 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition said:

Since November 20, 1950, it is stated that clothing orders alone have amounted to some $142,150,000. The total strength of the three armed services just exceeds 100,000 which works out to approximately $1,400 for every member of the three services. That is not, of course, the amount which has been spent to provide uniforms for each of the members, because the department did estimate that the average cost of the kit of a soldier, sailor or airman is about $390. That seems high enough in itself, but the figures also show that orders are out of all relation to the number of those now in the services, or for the target figure of 115,000 which has been set for 1954.

Mr. Speaker, let us look at the Leader of the Opposition's authority for those statements. I wish that the rules relative to printing Hansard permitted the statement of the Leader of the Opposition and the source from which he quoted to be printed in parallel columns, but we will do that later.

The authority for this is George Bain, in the Globe and Mail of November 18, 1952, who said:

Since November 20, 1950, the first date covered by the contract information clothing orders alone have amounted to some $142,150,000.

The total strength of the three armed services has only recently edged past the hundred thousand mark; the target is 115,000 by 1954.

According to figures contained in "Canada's Defence Program 1952-53" published by the Defence Department, the average cost of a sailor's, soldier's or airman's kit is about $390.

As will be seen, Mr. Speaker, there is a fairly close resemblance between the two statements.

As I mentioned earlier, since April 1, 1949, and up to October 31, 1952, we have enrolled approximately 227,000 men and women in the active and reserve forces and in the cadet services. We have outfitted them with clothing at an average cost of $224.43 each or $50,955,000 in total.

During the same period all the forces, active, reserve and cadets, have put in a total of 701,182 man years—that is the service of a man for a year, an actual figure—and it has cost an average of $77.06 to maintain their clothing and to establish depot stocks, or a total of $54,035,000.

I should explain that takes into account the fact that during the first year the man has had his original issue and needs very little maintenance. If we were dealing with maintenance alone, after the first year the cost of maintaining a member of the regular forces would be $156.34; of the reserve force, $57.72; a cadet, $27.86; or an average of $77.06.

In the same period we acquired special clothing such as Arctic clothing, winter clothing, aircrew clothing, protective clothing and similar clothing that is not ordinarily issued as part of a man's outfit, at a cost of $16,721,000.

Finally, $37,786,000 has been expended on the provision of mobilization stocks of clothing. Those stocks are in store ready to be issued should there be a mobilization. But if there is no mobilization, or if the international climate changes, or if we decide that it is no longer necessary to have mobilization stores of that character, then all these articles can be issued to meet current requirements and would be used up in about a year after that operation started.

I think hon. members will agree that the figure of $156 as the figure of maintaining a soldier's, sailor's or airman's clothing for a year is not an excessive figure. It is about 4½ per cent to 5 per cent of the average personnel costs per man per year. The dominion bureau of statistics informs me that they estimate that the average cost of a male's clothing per year is about 7 per cent of his wages. The Toronto social welfare council estimates that last year there should have been spent on a manual worker's clothing a total of $152.50. On our service personnel it was $156, and he required a good deal more and better clothing. Now, on the average, our soldiers, sailors and airmen receive each year in cash or kind $3,022. That is for all other ranks, from the newest recruit to the most senior warrant officer first class tradesman, an average of $3,022 for pay, allowances, pension, clothing, food, medical, dental and hospital services. That is the equivalent of a civilian wage. In the United States it is far more of course. Therefore you will see that the figure of $156, the cost of maintaining his clothing, is about 5 per cent of that amount, and less than the dominion bureau of statistics estimate.

I should now like to pass on to the subject of boots and shoes. On this the Leader of the Opposition said on November 24, 1952, as reported at page 22 of Hansard:

> Since these have appeared throughout the whole of Canada, they are the kind of examples which it would seem necessary for us to examine. During a single ten-month period orders for boots and shoes for the armed forces totalled $15,292,241. Even at the very high estimate of $15 a pair, which would indeed be a high cost for service footwear, this would mean more than one million pair of shoes for 100,000 members of the armed forces. The suggestion that orders of this kind are necessary for the reserves simply does not hold water, because plenty of shoes have been available for the reserve army for some years. Orders are still being placed.

The authority for this is Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette of October 30, 1952:

> During a single ten-month period, orders for boots and shoes in the armed forces had totalled about $15,292,241. Even at $15 a pair—high for service footwear—this works out to better than a million pairs. Yet there were fewer than 100,000 personnel in the armed forces to wear them . . . the explanation didn't satisfy anyone. Meanwhile, boot and shoe orders are still being placed.

It seems to bear some similarity. Now, sir, the story about boots and shoes was spread on the record of the defence expenditures committee by the deputy minister of national defence on June 10, 1952, and it appears at pages 385 and 392 of the proceedings of that committee. I am not going to go into that again, but I should like to describe to you in summary what the situation is.

From April 1, 1950, to September 30 of this year the services received 1,563,539 pairs of leather footwear, with further deliveries due of 52,059 pairs. In addition there have been substantial purchases of other articles of footwear such as rubbers, gym shoes, overshoes, mukluks, and so forth. The total amount is based on requirements which, if examined objectively, will, I believe, be found to be sensible and prudent. Everything I have said about the increased personnel, about distribution, about stock levels, about lead time and about stockpiling applies with particular force to boots, ankle. It will be appreciated that requirements for footwear, particularly boots, ankle, will be different for the different categories of footwear and for each of the services, and often according to the area where a man is serving. For example, our experience is that a man wears out four pairs of boots a year in Korea, two a year in Germany, and generally speaking less than one and a half per year in Canada. We vary the issue for the navy and air force because they use less footwear than does the army.

Trade figures on footwear give an estimate that the average male in Canada buys 2·38 pairs of shoes or boots each year. The amount we provide for the armed forces of boots, ankle, is less than that.

As boots represent the largest item, perhaps I might give some figures with regard to them. At September 30, 1952, depot stocks were 479,643, and stocks held against possible mobilization amounted to 361,971. Further deliveries will be 6,928. The annual consumption in 1952-53, both initial issues and replacements, is estimated at 263,000. Maintenance stocks are therefore the equivalent of less than two years expected consumption. Having regard to the lead time for manufacture and the necessity for having at all times a minimum stock for distribution and sizing, this seems to be about right for this time of the fiscal year.

Now, may I take up neckties? Speaking in the House of Commons on November 24, 1952, at page 22 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> During the last session it was found that orders have been placed for $1,150,000 neckties. Not satisfied with this incredible accumulation of neckwear, orders are still being placed for more neckties. One might well wonder what particular military service these additional ties are supposed to perform.

The authority for this seems to have been Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette of October 30, 1952:

> By early last session, arms orders had been placed for a total of 1,150,000 neckties. A prejudiced and sceptical Conservative M.P. gibed that there were plenty to, 'bound hand and foot any number of aggressors who might attempt to land on our shores'. But the defence department isn't taking any chances. Orders are still being placed.

It will be noted that the Leader of the Opposition's speech, as reported in Hansard, has the dollar sign before the number of neckties. I have checked up with the text of the speech from which he read on Monday, and I find that the dollar sign is not there, so that this is a typographical error in Hansard.

Mr. Fleming: How does the minister know that the Leader of the Opposition did not use the word "dollar" in his speech delivered in the house?

Mr. Claxton: If he had, it would make the statement even more fantastic, because these neckties cost from 30 to 40 cents each, and that would mean that there were some three or four times as many neckties as he said. There is another reason, and that is that the Leader of the Opposition, both in Hansard and in the text of his speech from which he read, used the word "neckties" after the figures, indicating that the dollar sign was a mistake in Hansard. The scale of issue of neckties for a man joining the forces is: for the active forces, two; for the reserve forces, one; for cadets, one. Maintenance is calculated—and this is an estimate, of course, as they are only re-issued if needed—for the active forces, two; reserve forces, one; cadets, one every two years.

Personally, I use a good many more neckties than two a year. I have been wearing the particular type of necktie I am wearing now for the last six months, and during that period I have used five. Two a year is not excessive. The total consumption for the current fiscal year for all three services is 420,000. Our depot stocks will look after our needs for about the next year or a year and a half. In other words, there are no neckties stockpiled for mobilization. We could fight a war without them.

The next item is serving forks, and with respect to them the Leader of the Opposition said, as reported at page 22 of Hansard:

> Then there was the remarkable order for 62,000 large serving forks, three for every five men in uniform. As a result of the publicity directed toward this remarkable piece of extravagance, it was finally scaled down by different stages to 14,500, which some people would think would be a fairly adequate supply of service forks of that kind, particularly when one remembers that these figures include a great many people who were having their meals in their own establishments.

Arthur Blakely in the Gazette of October 30 says this:

> Closest the defence department has come to admitting that it pulled a boner was in connection with serving forks. The original order was for 62,000 forks—three for every five men in uniform. Questions were asked in parliament. The order was scaled down to 40,000 . . . Anyway, there were more questions and the department finally decided that 14,500 serving forks would be plenty.

This subject of forks was most adequately dealt with by the deputy minister before the committee on defence expenditures, as set out in the proceedings of the committee at page 388, on June 10, 1952. But I would say this, that the first reference to the matter came in a question put on the order paper, which was answered on November 28, 1951, at which time the answer given was 40,000.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) brought up the question in committee on December 13 when he said that he had been told it was 63,500, but now this was apparently scaled down to 40,000. This is at page 139 of the proceedings. Then he brought it up again in the house on April 22, as reported at page 1481 of Hansard. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) said that at the committee meeting that morning—and the hon. member for Greenwood was a member of the committee—a statement was tabled showing the number ordered actually was 14,500.

Here there was a miscalculation by the officer concerned. He calculated the original order by estimating the number required on the basis of one for each six men, for what is called "family style" messing. That is where the food is put on a table, with forms down each side, seating six. You need one or more serving forks for each such table. But since the scale of requirements was worked out on that basis it has been possible for us pretty well across the country to establish the cafeteria style of messing, where we need much less in the way of serving forks. These serving forks cost 49 cents. They are used to serve potatoes, meat and so on, and you need quite a number of them; and the number appears to be reasonable.

The hon. member for Halifax dealt yesterday with the subject of rugs. I wish to mention only one or two things in that connection. Making reference to rugs, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> In less than two years the Department of National Defence has ordered $839,903 of rugs and carpets, which would provide approximately one square yard of rug or carpet for every two members of the active service.

George Bain in the Toronto Globe and Mail said:

> In less than two years $839,903 worth of rugs and carpets have been ordered by the Department of National Defence.
> On this rug all the thousands of men and women of Canada's active navy, army and air force could be assembled—two to a yard—without crowding.

Well, I hope we can do better than that for the men of the armed forces. I can see no reason why a young man who is brought up in a good home in Canada, and who joins the armed forces, should not have a small square of what is really carpet beside his bed, to cover the cement or the linoleum that is over the cement floor. And that is provided for. I think we do a little better than two to a yard; we have one to a little more than a yard. And also carpets are provided, on the scale that has been mentioned in the committee on defence expenditures, for married quarters in isolated places, because it would cost far more to transport furniture, including the carpets and rugs of dependents up there, than it would for us to pay for one outfit and leave it there. They are also provided for officers' messes and for recreation rooms on a very limited scale which in no case is extravagant at all.

It should be remembered that during this year we have built or have had under construction over 100 new barracks blocks and places where men are quartered or fed. Consequently this is in the nature of capital outlay which will not be repeated on anything like that scale in future years.

The Leader of the Opposition also referred to teapots. I see that my time is going and I shall not dwell upon it at length. However, I will say that the answer to the question raised in connection with teapots is much similar to that in connection with forks. But the scale of issue can be gathered from the fact that on June 10, 1952, when we checked on the question when it came up before the committee on defence expenditures, we found that at Camp Borden where they have 5,526 men they had a total of 1,962 teapots. That seems a large proportion, possibly; but additional ones were needed there to take care of peak loads of reserve forces when they come in for summer training. But it indicates that, with forces of the size that we have, you need very considerable numbers of articles.

Raincoats were mentioned and almost all these are acquired for mobilization. The number actually needed for issue to members of the C.W.A.C., nursing sisters and so on is estimated at 3,950 for the current year.

Reference was made to the packaging of plumbing fixtures; this is for packaging of stores of certain plumbing fixtures that would be necessary in the prefabricated houses we are acquiring in connection with needs for mobilization.

I think I have mentioned all the articles to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, or that have been mentioned by other hon. members since the session began. There have been a number of others referred to by the press, for example paper napkins. We are accused of having spent extravagantly the sum of $11,000 on paper napkins. The newspapers said that this was a pretty large number of paper napkins. No doubt it is; but we provide a large number of meals. About 40,000 out of the 100,000 men on strength eat in, and they get three meals a day. That makes 120,000 meals per day, or 840,000 per week, or 43,680,000 per year.

Mr. Brooks: Do they get fresh napkins at every meal?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, paper napkins—and so do most everybody else who use them. Would you think that they would wrap them up and carry them home, or does the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) suggest that they should share them? The number of napkins covered by this order amounted to 18,400,000, so that the order, costing $11,000 for paper napkins, will meet the needs of the armed forces for about seven months, at which time we will have another order.

Now, I have spent a good deal of time discussing these articles. I did not think it would be necessary, because what we have been doing is in accordance with the policy declared and, so far as I know, acquiesced in by the house. For some five or six years members of the opposition have spent a good deal of their time saying that we are not doing enough. Now they seem to be saying that we are doing too much. But once again I ask hon. members where we would be, and where I would be in my position of responsibility in the preparation of this country to meet an emergency, should one arise, if we were not doing just about what we are doing with regard to these matters.

Once again, the matter is under continuous review. If in respect of any of these articles we have one too many, we can take it into stock, issue it, and we can get rid of the whole lot within the period of about a year of current use. This is, therefore, part of the cost of insurance for peace. That is all that our defence expenditures are, whether they be on personnel, on ships, on aircraft or guns or food or barrack stores and clothing. The people of this country must appreciate that with 100,000 in the active forces engaged in a war to stop aggression in Korea, and engaged as part of the integrated forces in western Europe standing there to prevent aggression, we are having to incur some rather heavy expenditures over a considerable length of time. We are doing that in co-operation with our neighbours, in co-operation with the United Nations and in co-operation with the North Atlantic alliance. We are doing this because we believe it is the one way in which we can preserve peace, have security and have that kind of country in which we want our children to live.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question which arises out of a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). In fairness to the minister, I think I should bring it to his attention. At page 39 of Hansard for November 24 after he had been speaking about the purchase of neckties, the Prime Minister said:

> It may well be that the officers in the requisitioning departments, having that in mind, did order more than the minister would have sanctioned, had it come to his attention, or that the deputy minister would have sanctioned had it come to his attention.

May I ask the minister if those orders came to his attention before they were placed?

Mr. Claxton: That is the kind of question we can go into very satisfactorily and at length before the committee on defence expenditures. Since the member has put it, I want to answer it. The practice with regard to these big programs is that we discuss them within the department, at cabinet defence committee and in cabinet. As a general principle, it was decided that we should acquire a certain amount of mobilization stores. I signed a requisition on my colleague the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) for certain mobilization stores. The individual orders for individual items were subsequently sent to him and reviewed by the deputy minister or by myself, either at the time or later, but they have all been reviewed at one time or another.

An hon. Member: Who is right?

Mr. Claxton: The Prime Minister said "it may well be—"

Mr. Graydon: He said it may well be that it was a mistake.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, no, he did not.

Mr. Graydon: I have it right here.

Mr. Howe: My flippant friend.

Mr. Dickey: Read about it in the defence expenditures committee.

Mr. Graydon: I am reading what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): May I first offer my congratulations, Mr. Speaker, to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I feel that they performed their duties ably, although there will be a great difference of opinion as to some of the observations made by both of those speakers. I should like also to concur in what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and others about that part of His Excellency's address concerning the coronation which is to take place in the old country next June. I should like, too, to concur in what the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister and others have been saying about our pride in our fighting forces both within and from this nation of Canada. I do not think there is any issue within this house about that. We are all extremely proud of those fighting forces of ours.

Mr. Dickey: How about the arm chair army?

Mr. Ross (Souris): They are well outfitted, but there has been great waste and extravagant expenditure taking place.

An hon. Member: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was going to say that that is a matter of opinion, and I am one of those who have some criticism about the wasteful expenditures in procuring equipment.

Mr. Dickey: What are they?

Mr. Ross (Souris): You will have a chance to get up and tell your story.

Mr. Dickey: I have been up during this debate.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, and it was not so convincing, either.

Mr. Graydon: You want to convince the Prime Minister; he is the one you want to convince.

Mr. Dickey: Go on, what are they?

Mr. Ross (Souris): In comparison with some of the Prime Minister's speeches to which I have listened and which I have read in the newspapers in the past few months, I believe the first paragraph in the speech from the throne is rather creating a new pattern. I presume he is now undertaking to make it easier for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to bring in his new budget during this session. On several occasions I had heard the Prime Minister point out to the people of Canada that, with the great threat of war and the cost of national defence, we could not expect any cuts in taxation. Now, in the first paragraph of the speech from the throne it is stated that there are signs of a lessening of the danger of an outbreak of war on a global scale. I think he is preparing the picture for a reduction that we may expect in the next budget. I am not objecting to a reduction, but it is too late.

During past sessions we have listened to the Minister of Finance tell us about his theories on cyclical budgeting. We have come to learn that he did have a plan which meant excessive taxation for three, four or perhaps five years, and then a very fine reduction on the eve of an election. I believe that the people can count on that during this session of parliament. I am one of those who believe that there has been excessive taxation in this country. Economists have pointed out how much that has cost the heads of families and individuals in this country, but I do not intend to repeat those figures.

Just before I rose I listened to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) reply to certain statements which had been made during this debate. I think there is still a misunderstanding or a difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, because the other day I followed the Prime Minister rather closely. He dealt with the subject of overtaxation at some length. During the discussion of the estimates in this house I recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) pointed out to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that we might save a million dollars; but during these times what is a million dollars? Well, the Prime Minister goes a long way beyond that, because in his speech about overtaxation he referred to a request for a commission somewhat like the Hoover commission. He pointed out that by such means you could not save $500 million or $600 million. He doubted if it would reach $100 million. We have had inflation in this country, but I did not know it had reached the extent that we could jump from one million to one hundred million, as the Prime Minister did the other day. Speaking in this debate he mentioned the possible saving that might result from a commission such as the Hoover commission being set up in Canada and pointed out that the whole amount to which such a commission of inquiry would apply is something of the order of $621 million. The Prime Minister went on to say, as found at page 43 of Hansard:

> It would be rather difficult, therefore, to squeeze $500 million out of that. I submit it would be difficult to squeeze $100 million out of it, unless some of these services were going to be eliminated.

But the Prime Minister certainly does say by inference that there is $100 million being wasted that might well be saved for the taxpayers.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have put his exact words on the record—

An hon. Member: Brilliant.

Mr. Ross (Souris): —and he has given the figure of $100 million as the amount that might be saved. That is his guess. It could be that it is wishful thinking on the part of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Dickey: Your wishful thinking.

Mr. Ross (Souris): With respect to the figures given this afternoon, we have had a set of figures placed on the record, and without repeating them all may I say that I have been told on very good authority that it is costing the taxpayers of Canada $17,000 per man in the armed services of this country per year. That is approximately one-third higher than the figure for the United States. It is the highest figure for the armed services of any nation in the world today. I think it is recognized that the civilian citizens of that great nation to the south of us enjoy a higher standard of living than we do in Canada. Yet our cost per man in the armed services is one-third higher than the cost per man in the United States.

Mr. Campney: What is your authority?

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Have you a question to ask?

Mr. Graydon: Get a microphone before you start to ask questions. We cannot hear you.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It was pointed out in the throne speech the other day that there is still a great threat of war and a national emergency. It is intimated in the speech from the throne that the Emergency Powers Act will be continued for another year. I think that gives us an idea of the serious state of affairs prevailing at the present time.

I wish to deal now with the agricultural situation in Canada at the present time. It is most unsatisfactory and there is great fear amongst agricultural producers from coast to coast with respect to their future. The speech from the throne refers to the fact that early in 1953 negotiations will be carried on in Washington for a new international wheat agreement to replace the existing agreement which expires on July 31 next. It continues with these words:

> You will be asked to consider amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

I think that is a very important item. It may seem rather strange that during the past year food production in Canada has been the highest in the history of this nation. According to government statistics, I believe that the total farm output is some 15 per cent higher than any previous record. That is a serious fact because the cost of production for farm operators has steadily increased while selling prices for their produce have decreased to a great extent. In fact the Department of Agriculture has issued a statement pointing out that food production is 15 per cent greater than any previous year, the next highest year being 1942.

It is true that we were very unfortunate in having an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada and we are most fortunate that it was cleared up as rapidly as it was; but nevertheless our beef producers in particular have suffered greatly as a result of the embargo imposed. So far as farm costs are concerned, I should like to refer to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 20 headed "Farm Costs". The article reads in part as follows:

> Our correspondent points out that in the past fifteen months the price index of all goods, the machinery, gasoline, oil and other items the farmers must buy, has risen sharply. At the same time the price index of all that the farmer has to sell—wheat, livestock, feeds, etc.,—has gone down. The difference is quite marked. The price index for what the farmer has to sell has fallen from 295·1 in August, 1951 to 259·7 in August, 1952. Against this the price index for what the farmer must buy has gone up from 237·8 in August, 1951, to 243·4 in August, 1952.
> Further, and this is of major importance, the drop in farm prices is chiefly right here in the west. The farmers of the east have not felt the pinch to anything like the same degree. Herein is food for thought. As the prairie farmer sells his products and buys his supplies, he will do well to ask himself why his dollars are shrinking.

The article goes on to deal with the international exchange situation and the fact that the farmers have been subsidizing the consumers of Canada and of other nations so far as the price of their wheat is concerned. It points out that under the international wheat agreement western wheat farmers have suffered a loss of 44 cents a bushel and are doing so today under that agreement. It is a rather lengthy article and I shall not quote from it further, but I wish to point out at this time, in view of past arguments in the house, that as a new international wheat agreement is to be arranged in the next few months the experience we had under the other agreement should be taken into consideration. The farmers of the west took a great loss of money and when organizations asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) if the deal could be renegotiated before the completion of the term of the agreement his advice was that it could not be done.

I think that in the new agreement there should be an escalator clause providing for renegotiation. Great inflation has taken place in Canada since the agreement was first put into effect and I think some provision against that should be made in the new international wheat agreement. With the great surplus of wheat in this country, probably the greatest we have ever had, I believe that the wheat producers of the prairies want a new agreement of some kind. I am not as optimistic as the Minister of Trade and Commerce about getting rid of the great surplus in the near future, and I think we may have difficulties if we have another normal crop next year. Therefore I hope that in the negotiation of the new international wheat agreement these things will be taken into account and that its provisions will be more elastic so that if costs increase greatly, as they have in the past, that may be taken into account and not have a static agreement in force for a number of years.

I referred to the fact that under the international wheat agreement we were losing 44 cents a bushel compared with the recognized market price. On the day that the house opened I find, according to the Searle grain index report, that a farmer in Portal, North Dakota, on their side of the street, received $2.12¼ for a bushel of wheat while a Canadian farmer who sold his wheat in North Portal, Saskatchewan, on the same day received $1.23 a bushel. In all fairness, I should point out that that farmer hopes to receive a further payment as this was only the initial payment at that particular time.

Mr. Howe: Don't strain yourself to be fair.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have always tried to be fair and I am happy to say that I have not strained myself yet.

An hon. Member: You would have the farmer sell his own wheat.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not advocating that the farmer should sell his own wheat although I am one person who thinks that he should have an alternative market. He should not be so hamstrung as he has been under the international wheat agreement. While you are talking about his selling his own wheat, may I say that I think he should also have the opportunity to sell his feed. That affects the eastern farmers very much because there is too great a disparity altogether at some point between what the western producer receives for his coarse grain and what the eastern livestock feeder has to pay for it. It is all handled through the Canadian wheat board and it is not all speculation either, because if it was there should not be these great differences between what the western producer does receive ultimately and what the feeder has to pay for feed. I cannot tell you just where the trouble is but I think there is real room for investigation of that very unhealthy situation.

With respect to the matter of livestock prices, according to the dominion bureau of statistics the Canadian livestock prices have slumped in 1952 as compared with 1951 by 37·3 per cent. That is a drastic reduction in one year's time in this country. We have heard a great deal about floor prices on livestock in this country. I am one of those who believe that the floor prices as operated on beef in this country have been very, very unsatisfactory. In fact on a great deal of fat beef today they are just inoperative. I think probably they do attempt to operate them on choice steers but if you were to go into the St. Boniface market today you would see fat cows being sold for several cents under the schedule of floor prices. On fat beef, cows and young stock, the situation is very chaotic. I wish to refer to a press article which appeared back in September when a number of people thought they should sell livestock to assist in meeting the cost of their harvest operation. This is an article by Mr. Trepel, president of the livestock commission at that time. He is neither a packer nor a producer and I think it makes a difference to your approach to the floor prices—depending on whether you are in the packing business or a livestock producer. It is a rather lengthy article but on down in the report it states:

Challenges Gardiner

Mr. Trepel took issue with a recent Regina statement by Mr. Gardiner regarding maintenance of beef floors.

Following last week's general price slump at the union stockyards here, Mr. Trepel said, good light steers are again selling at "or slightly above" the floor. But heavy steers, heifers and cows are still selling at $2 to $3 below floor levels, he added.

Mr. Trepel estimated that Winnipeg area marketings were 20 per cent greater than could be absorbed at "reasonable prices". The surplus of heavy beef animals was averaging about 1,200 head weekly, or about 18 cars of dressed beef, Mr. Trepel said.

During the summer months, the exchange president said, government allocations to packers for the purchase of this surplus beef at floor prices had been a major factor in keeping beef prices steady. But for the week ending August 29, Mr. Trepel revealed, government allocations among the five large packing houses in this area dropped to less than one car. The allocation was doubled for the week ending September 6, he added.

He goes on to deal with government purchases and he points out that you cannot even expect the packers to pay the steady prices unless the government is prepared to carry out its announced policy—which it was not doing at that time and which it is not doing today in those yards and, I am informed, in many other yards in this country—other than on choice steers. As a result, there is a very great fear among the livestock producers in this country from coast to coast regarding their future operations. I agree that a great deal does depend on the lifting of the embargo in the U.S.A., but with respect to the operation of these floor prices, right from their announcement to the present time, they have not been satisfactory to the beef producers right across Canada who are very disturbed about the situation.

During the past few years we have lost our overseas markets for practically all our agricultural products except wheat. Our British market for bacon, cheese, apples, poultry, and coarse grains has disappeared. We have requested by resolution that the Canadian government take steps to arrange a British commonwealth conference on trade but we have been consistently voted down by the supporters of our Canadian government. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are now away to Britain at the invitation of the British government, and I am sure every member of this house and every citizen of Canada sincerely hope that some good may accrue with respect to future markets, especially for the agricultural production of this country; because it is only a matter of time, if agriculture suffers a depression, until that affects all other businesses in this nation. It is of more or less importance to every citizen of the nation.

Added to these difficulties with the farmers we have repeated requests by the railways for increased freight rates. Farm organizations of all sorts, especially those in western Canada, have been sending resolutions to their members protesting against further increases in freight rates—and I think quite rightly so because every time there is an increase that adds to the cost of production on every farm in western Canada and it lessens the sale price for their produce. Every implement and other matter entering into farm production has freight added to its cost but in grain marketing they deduct the freight to the head of the lakes. Every western farmer gets the increase both ways. On behalf of those organizations I want to press as much as I can against the granting of any further increase in freight rates during these times.

In the throne speech there is reference to amendment of the Farm Improvement Loans Act and before that measure is prepared for introduction I want to suggest that the ceiling of $3,000 which can be obtained as a farm improvement loan is not now high enough. When this matter was introduced some years ago inflation had not developed to the extent it has now. You could buy a self-propelled combine for about half the money it costs today, and I think that should be taken into consideration. Last year an amendment to the Canadian Farm Loan Act was passed which I think about doubled the ceiling on the loan to an individual. I think much the same thing should be done in dealing with the farm improvement loan in view of advancing costs in recent years. I hope those responsible will take this suggestion into account when they are dealing with the matter at this session of parliament.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer—the international peace garden. I am sorry that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) is not present now. A great many of us have taken this matter up with him but he cannot see his way clear to leave the grant in his estimates for the present year as it has been in the past. A great many organizations are interested in the international peace garden and in the past our government has made a small grant of $15,000 towards its development and maintenance; and the United States has made a grant of $100,000. Many organizations have interested themselves in this very fine project which is on the international boundary just halfway across Canada and midway on the North American continent. Just yesterday in the newspapers there appeared an article:

I.O.D.E. Asks Government to Endow Peace Garden

A resolution asking the Canadian government to resume and increase its contribution to the international peace garden was approved at a recent meeting of the executive committee, Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire.

It will be forwarded to Prime Minister St. Laurent and to party leaders in House of Commons.

The federal government indicated it was unwilling to contribute during the present year.

The order said that it found any discontinuance of maintenance of the garden unfair to the United States which recently contributed $100,000.

The active promotion of the peace garden in the form of an international peace garden should be part of any defence program, the resolution concluded.

As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is in his seat he might kindly point this out to his colleague and, I hope, use his influence so that the grant may be reinstituted for this coming year.

I attended the annual meeting of the directorate of the garden held in September last. The chairman, who puts a great deal of thought and energy into this work—that is Mr. D. G. McKenzie—pointed out that if the government withhold these grants they may have to forgo the extremely fine work that is taking place there. I quite seriously plead with the minister and the government to reinstate this grant to the international peace garden.

There is also another item to which I wish to make reference. I have believed in past years that there should be a standing committee on veterans affairs in this House of Commons. I realize that a great deal has been accomplished over the years on behalf of our veterans of past wars, but the situation with respect to the war veterans allowance especially is still unsatisfactory. The permissible ceiling on veterans' income is altogether too meagre and is unsatisfactory. There are other items which are needing attention, such as the situation of the widow of a pensioner who dies with probably slightly under 50 per cent pension. There are many of these matters which yet need to be rectified, and I sincerely hope that they will be dealt with at this session of parliament. Again I plead that there should be a standing committee on veterans affairs in this House of Commons. I hope serious consideration will be given to that question.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, when I first entered the House of Commons in January 1951, it was my honour to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. By experience, therefore, I knew what a formidable task confronted the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address at this session. But they carried out their tasks in an admirable manner and with distinction, and I should like to congratulate them.

At that time I said I was in favour of national health insurance, and I still favour it. I am in agreement with all hon. members who say there should be the present free relationship between the doctor and his patient. I am opposed to state medicine as such, but I should like to see some such scheme as we have now, namely that on the fee for service basis. I resent many implications sometimes made that many people die because of the lack of hospitalization and medical attention. I have been in the practice of medicine and surgery for over 30 years in a highly industrialized community, and not once in that time have I known of one patient who has died because of lack of immediate hospitalization and immediate medical care when it was necessary.

It is argued that many people do not go to doctors because of financial reasons. I believe this to be true, but this is not the whole story. Many people who are fully insured consult their doctor late when they have some condition such as cancer, when the symptoms of this condition have been evident to them for a considerable length of time.

I will refer to the medical services in the province of Ontario, because they are the only medical services in Canada with which I am familiar. Most centres have had a great shortage of hospital beds, but this difficulty has been gradually overcome through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments in helping local centres in hospital construction. In my province the hospitals have always co-operated in admitting serious surgical and medical cases and accident cases. The doctors have co-operated by delaying medical and surgical procedures of election, that is, in cases which could be safely postponed.

The province of Ontario, through successive governments, has developed a high standard of health. The Leader of the Opposition was premier of our province, and I want to pay tribute to his government as well as to other Ontario governments which have brought about this high standard.

As I stated before, the province with the help of the federal government has aided various communities to provide hospital beds. There are many trained personnel engaged in preventive medicine, and many thousands of dollars worth of preventives such as vaccines, serums and toxoids have been provided without direct cost to the individuals. The province also provides or helps to provide many diagnostic and curative services in pathology, mental diseases, tuberculosis, cancer and so on. I might say that the federal government also gives a good deal of help financially in these particular services.

When we discuss health insurance I realize that we are dealing with a matter which lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces themselves, and that to bring about health insurance on a national scale would involve consultation and agreement with the provinces. I understand that this government has consulted the provinces and has invited briefs and opinions on this subject. I also understand that the last brief or opinion has been submitted within the last few months, I think probably since the last session of parliament. I am told that only two provincial governments were in favour of its immediate adoption, while the rest of the provinces either were opposed to it or thought the time was not opportune, or had other reasons for not agreeing. Until such time as more of our provinces signify their intention of full co-operation with regard to national health insurance, and having in mind all the financial obligations now assumed by the three levels of government, namely federal, provincial and municipal, I feel that the passing of this subamendment would have little meaning as far as national health insurance itself is concerned.

By its national health plan our federal government has done a great deal to raise the health standards of our people by means of large grants to the provinces; they have helped to raise the standard of medicine in almost all its phases. I think national health insurance would be extremely popular with the people, but I do not see how we can be constitutional in passing legislation with respect to a matter which is outside our jurisdiction until we get some agreement with the provinces; and to me it does not seem evident that we can get this agreement at this time.

Earlier I referred to the fact that claims were made that many people had died because they did not get proper hospitalization. I want to refer to Hansard, page 78, where the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) is reported as follows, though I am sure he did not mean exactly what it says here:

> You know the freedom we enjoy under our present medical system? Forty-one babies out of every thousand who were born in Canada in 1950 had the freedom to die because there was no national health insurance program to help save their lives.

He went further, but to me that statement rather implies that the whole forty-one died because we did not have national health insurance. It is true that he quoted statistics further on, stating that twenty in a thousand died in one country, while in England the mortality was thirty-one in a thousand. But I think he forgets that in our country, in the northern outposts, in the sparsely settled areas, medical attention is not always obtainable. When he says that forty-one in a thousand had their freedom to die, he forgets certain conditions, which occur quite often, such as malformation and so forth in the new-born which have baffled the medical profession, and which in my opinion will always baffle the medical profession.

We would like to save every one of those forty-one in a thousand who die, but unfortunately this cannot be done. Even in our very best equipped hospitals they have quite a mortality rate.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the subject that I wish particularly to bring to your attention this afternoon, I should like to say just a word or two about the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I think this house and this opposition may congratulate themselves that they have produced at least some action, because it was only on Monday that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) told us that the ministers concerned, namely the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), did not have too much time to reply to criticisms. I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister say that. He did not seem to indicate there were not criticisms, but that there was no time to reply. At any rate the Minister of National Defence has given us a reply this afternoon.

I propose to make only one or two comments on it. I think he was quite right in outlining to us the general principles which govern, and he was certainly right in saying that the question was a matter of judgment. With the additional information which he has given the citizens of Canada will be able to arrive at a better conclusion, and that is all to the good. One is inclined, perhaps, to assess the judgment of those in authority by the things which happen to be most familiar to oneself.

I did make somewhat of a study of serving forks. I do not propose to weary the house with it at any length. My real feeling was that a great mistake had been made, and I should have been greatly reassured if instead of doing what seemed to me to be twisting and squirming and trying to avoid coming out and saying they were wrong, the department had said: Look, we made a mistake. Well, in effect, after all these months they are saying that now, and my only comment is that I would have been far more reassured if they had said it earlier. No doubt that will affect the judgment of other people also.

We have the various things that the minister defended this afternoon, and I am not going into them any further. There is one final comment I should like to make. He is a very extravagant man in the matter of neckties, judging by my standards, having worn five neckties in an incredibly short time; but I am not suggesting that that unfits him to be Minister of National Defence.

I wish to pay my tribute to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address. The making of one's first speech in this house is not an easy thing, and when to that is added the responsibility of being the mover and seconder of the address, I am sure it must be an additional burden. They may, perhaps, have this advantage over the rest of us. I suppose they can get more research assistance than the rest of us in order to make speeches of so much importance.

The Prime Minister said on Monday last—and I was surprised to hear him say it—"I do not think there has been any overtaxation." In saying that I think the Prime Minister is in a small minority, I would almost guess a minority of one in this house. Certainly I think if he set out to find citizens who do not object to the present taxation he would be in great difficulty. There was an ancient gentleman called Diogenes who went around carrying a lantern, looking for an honest man. If the Prime Minister wants to find a satisfied taxpayer he would need a light very much stronger than the lantern which Diogenes had. If only I could have your authority, Mr. Speaker, to poll the Liberal members of this house and to ask them if they and their constituents are satisfied taxpayers, I would have no doubt whatever as to the result. I am sure none of them would be prepared to say publicly that their taxpayers were satisfied; and if one by some magic could only pass invisibly into the Liberal caucus and listen to what goes on I am sure one would learn a great many interesting things about their attitude in the matter of taxation. The truth of the matter is that the ordinary citizen is tax angry, inflation angry and waste angry. I do not for a minute think the members of the cabinet are so stupid that they are not tax conscious, tax fearful and perhaps at times a little tax panicky.

I think there are three main reasons why public feeling is aroused as it is. First of all there is the actual size of expenditures which the federal government is making. Second, there is the old question of the surplus; and third, there is the question of waste, or to use the word used by the Winnipeg Free Press, profligacy, when we take the actual amount, $4,800 million or thereabouts. I should like to suggest to the house one or two yardsticks which I think would be of interest, some of which I actually used in the spring. I then compared the public expenditure of $4,800 million with the manufacturing output of this country for 1950, which was close to the same amount, $4,378 million, and with the agricultural output of the same year, which was $1,792 million or only about one-third as much.

Next I should like to point out that the federal expenditure will be as much as the personal income of the citizens of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia; in other words, of all the provinces except Ontario, Quebec and Saskatchewan. If you include provincial and municipal taxation, that would equal more than the amount of Saskatchewan's expenditure; so that if you actually took all the taxation it would equal all the income of all the provinces except Ontario and Quebec.

Now, personal income is not exactly the same as total income, net national income as it is called, but it is closer to it than I realized. Actually, in the year 1950, the personal income amounted to $13,004 million odd, and the net national income to $14,004 million odd. Therefore it is very close to being the net national income figure.

There is one further figure I should like to give, namely to make a comparison with the federal expenditures over the years that are past. Actually the expenditure this year will be the equivalent of federal government expenditure from the year 1868 till 1916; in other words, approximately 50 years. Now, I am not suggesting that those illustrations I have given prove anything exactly, but I think they are disturbing. I believe the public naturally feels uneasy when they see these huge figures. I think it was the Winnipeg Free Press that used the word "appalling" with regard to them—and they are appalling.

If you look at them from another point of view you find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is now, in effect, a majority shareholder of every corporation in Canada, because he is actually getting the lion's share of the income. He himself deprecated that and said he regretted it, and that it was unsound. Nevertheless it was done. I do not suppose we can describe him exactly as a sleeping partner, but if he were a sleeping partner I think we ought to hope that he would not wake up, or he might take the whole thing.

Then a word about surpluses. This subject has been discussed at length and I will not go into it to any considerable extent, more than to say that I think the public has been very critical of surpluses, particularly at a time when they feel they are straining every effort to meet the huge defence bill. Therefore the argument we hear about the desirability of paying off the debt—an argument which I think we recognize as well as anybody else—has to be measured against the tremendous load we are carrying, the tremendous strain on the ordinary taxpayer, and his natural irritation at finding that sums which look to him vast—sums which not so long ago were considered vast—have been taken, over and above what was needed.

We are given, again, at the end of October a surplus figure of $287 million. The Minister of Finance comments on that by saying that he thinks it will change before the end of the year. Indeed, he said he would be glad if he reaches the end of the year without a deficit. Of course the trouble about that is that people have heard this so often that the old phrase "Once bitten, twice shy" would seem to apply. Indeed if you are bitten three or four times you become more than twice shy; you become very concerned. One naturally feels that these mistakes which have been made ought to have set up a standard by which people could calculate, and that the department ought to be able to make a calculation from its old mistakes. I have mentioned before the old story of the Irishman who said, "When the clock strikes nine the hands are at seven, and then I know it's twenty minutes to eleven."

However that may be, the feeling is that these surpluses which pop up year after year are not things to be proud of, that they do not reflect accurate budgeting and that, in fact, they are bearing unnecessarily hard on the ordinary taxpayer.

I come now to waste and extravagance, and in this respect shall be brief. If we can judge as to the validity of the charge of waste and extravagance from the very inadequate answers that have been made, then it seems to me that those charges are more than fully justified. I am not referring now to what was said this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), but rather to other items brought to the attention of the house last spring, and again brought to its attention the other day.

There is the question of the huge amounts spent for publicity and removal expenses, the huge amounts spent for telegraph and telephone charges in the army, as well as other means of communication. Last spring I mentioned these items, and pointed out that they totalled somewhere about $70 million. They were mentioned of course only as samples, to illustrate the kind of extravagance which many believe exist, and which I feel the public of Canada are coming to resent very strongly.

Actually I had a search made, and I think no answer of any kind has been made by any minister with respect to those three points. I do not think there was any answer made. It would not be fair, exactly, to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) answered the other day, although he did refer to one item. He referred to the item of travelling and removal expenses, but I could not understand what was going on in his mind; because when he discussed this item he suggested that if it were entirely stricken out it would be a strange thing, something of which we would not approve. For example, he said that the item for removal and travelling included the money spent to cover the return of troops from Korea, of which we all approve. But the Prime Minister seemed to avoid or even to evade entirely the question which was raised, which was not that of deleting these items altogether, not the suggestion that there should be nothing for travelling expenses, but that a serious attempt should be considered to assess the amount.

As I say, this has not been done. Indeed, it was at that time that the Prime Minister, speaking in general, said that the ministers I have mentioned—the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production—"do not have too much time to reply to criticisms." It seemed to me that the Prime Minister was going over the situation with a feather duster when what we actually wanted was a housecleaning. We were left with only this trivial, this very superficial way of dealing with the situation. I think it would not be disrespectful to the Prime Minister to say that, in spite of his conciliatory manner and his delicate phrasing, in plain words he did not deal with the matter at all.

There are two possible explanations of this: One is that there is no answer, and that it is thought better to steer away from these things; the other—and those of us in the opposition have suggested this—that the government are really too pleased with themselves, too intent on their own ideas to pay any attention to what anyone else says, and are content to puff themselves up and say, "We are the government, and that is what we are doing; don't bother us."

That is an attitude which those of us on this side of the house frequently criticize. I suggest that that attitude may be present here again, as it has been in the past. There is of course another possibility, and that is that the government is repeating what it did some years ago. It may be that they feel they can spend our money much better than we can spend it ourselves, that they are regarding it as a good thing to have this heavy measure of taxation, this burden, so that we will not be foolish in using our money. That came up in March of 1949 when the Minister of Finance was making the somewhat difficult explanation he had to make at that time as to why in 1949 there would be a tax reduction when he had been at such great pains just a year earlier to explain that he could not give any tax reduction. At that time he gave a most interesting explanation upon which, I suggest, we might reflect. These are his words as they are reported at page 2183 of Hansard for 1949, upon which occasion I quoted the minister's words as they had been reported in Hansard for 1948. At that time he said that—

> . . . large tax reductions last year would have come too early to be of real value—

And when the applause from that had subsided he went on to say:

> —to the public as a whole, because the public's expenditure, even without tax reductions, was large enough to buy everything available.

That explanation, interesting as it may be, and satisfying as it may be to the minister, will be profoundly unsatisfying to the ordinary citizen of Canada. He does not like to be told that, really, father knows best, that the taxpayer has too much money, and that the government is taking some of it away from him.

I should like to digress for a moment to speak briefly about taxation in general, and about one or two of the principles I think we should have in mind. In the first place I think we should remember, when we are discussing taxation, that we are not merely discussing personal difficulties, our own difficulties, the question as to whether A is taxed too high or B has received unfair relief that A does not have. We are dealing with something much broader than that. We are dealing with the happiness and welfare of citizens, with justice between man and man, and the whole question of freedom. It is this last about which I should like to say a word.

There is a great tendency, and we see it in connection with dominion-provincial relations, for rulers of states to conduct themselves in such a way as to concentrate the taxing power in their own hands, and thus increase more and more the personal power which they have. It is interesting to go back some forty years to what I suppose may be called the rather earlier days of British socialism. Sidney Webb, a well-known socialist at that time, had this to say:

> A large part of what we call taxation is merely the collective ownership of a portion of the income of the country.

He went on to indicate that he hoped for "a progressive transfer of more and more" of the income of individuals from their own control to government control. Indeed, he went beyond that and said it was perfectly obvious—this was in England in 1913—that people were spending their money foolishly and that hundreds of millions of pounds were being spent that might be better spent in other ways. He probably included the lighter side of life which as a serious student he did not regard in a favourable light. By a curious coincidence I met a man who, as a boy, knew Sidney Webb, and who said he would be very much surprised if he were sufficiently against the lighter side of life that he was not prepared to take a drink.

However, what I want to comment on is that I do not think socialists of that day such as Webb and his friends, who were high-minded people and had their thoughts concentrated upon the better world which they thought their socialist doctrine was going to bring, visualized what has become so clear to us in the interval; that is, the tremendous concentration of power which is inevitable as government acquires more and more of the national income. In that connection there is a very interesting quotation from the same author the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) quoted yesterday, the distinguished French author Bertrand de Jouvenel, who was lecturing at Cambridge. This book is a reprint of a couple of lectures he gave. He said some things which I think are of interest and which go to the root of the problem which concerns so many of us in this house. He said:

> Rulers of course tend to believe that the greater fraction of private income they can draw into the treasury, the better for the community as a whole.

Then he asks this ironical question:

> Are they not the best judges of the common interest which the individual, sunk in his selfish pursuits, cannot perceive.

Then he goes on and adds this by way of answer:

> Taxpayers have shown through the centuries little understanding of the superior capacity of their rulers to spend the citizens' earnings and have obdurately maintained their right to spend their income in their own manner.

Later again he says:

> The taxpayers' front was then a bulwark of individual freedom and the cornerstone of political liberty. It is remarkable how this front has disintegrated in the last generation.

I think that is a warning, Mr. Speaker, upon which we might well reflect seriously. He said that it is remarkable how this front, the resistance of the individual taxpayer to the constant desire of the government to bring into the treasury as much as they can of the national income, has disintegrated. He says that front has disintegrated in the last generation to a remarkable extent.

Of course we are very familiar here with the use of taxes as an instrument of policy which is constantly augmenting the central power. The central authority is constantly bringing more and more power into its hands, directly and indirectly. Let us take the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It does a great deal of good, and let me say that at once before anyone accuses me of not conceding it in advance. But it is a great potential instrument of power, and my experience is that when power is lying around loose there are plenty of people to pick it up and use it.

Along with that goes the question of rewards to various elements in the community for political support. We know what that means. I think most of us believe we are going to see evidence of that next spring. I shall have a little more to say about that before I take my seat. Then, of course, inflation has been a great instrument of policy. The government has used the inflation of currency as an instrument of policy, as something to make it easier for them to pay their way. This leads me to comment on something which is taking place right now, and which I think is a very serious matter indeed.

We have been talking about the high cost of living. I believe we have accepted it as evidence of inflation. We have felt that it is an enemy to be tackled. We have had it constantly before us month after month. These figures have come out, and they have alarmed us. It has always been up to the government each month to say what they are going to do about them. Now all that is going to be changed. The old cost of living index is to disappear and we are to have a new consumer price index. I know how easy it is to argue that that is according to the best dictates of economics. It may be that these new figures are more scientific, although on a rough glance they look very much like the old ones. The great difference is going to be that we are starting now from scratch. Instead of people being reminded year by year or month by month that we are in a highly inflationary economy, month by month and year by year we are going to forget. We are going to start out, as I say, with this new index, this new yardstick, and the government will relieve themselves of this burden by the use of this device. Inflation is now going to be camouflaged and gradually, with the exception of students of economics and I hope members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, it will tend to be forgotten.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that the people are very annoyed with the tax situation. I believe they are desperately annoyed. I believe everybody in this house, and I might even be bold enough to include the Prime Minister if he were in the house, feels that the question is, what are we going to do about it? Here again I am going to ask you to take a short glance into the past. I would remind you of what happened in 1949, just three and a half years ago. Most of you will remember that in 1948 we had cogent arguments put forth that nothing could be done by way of reducing taxes. In 1949 the minister had quite a task on his hands. He had to distinguish the situation in 1949 from that in 1948, and he had to make a valid argument that after having left us with a lemon in 1948 he could now, in the year 1949, an election year, cut a melon. I will not take you through the minister's various gyrations. They were interesting. He did quite a job of hairsplitting and tightrope walking, but in the end he slipped right off the rope and fell into the real explanation which appears at page 1795 of Hansard for March 22, 1949, and which reads as follows:

> Finally, sir, I should say that I have been led to believe in recent months, as no doubt other hon. members have, that most of the Canadian people would support and even welcome an enlarged measure of tax reduction this year.

You have to admit that is clear. That makes it perfectly clear what the minister is doing. It says virtually in so many words that there is an election coming on and that that is the reason for giving a tax reduction.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe we should have an election every year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That would be of course too wonderful. I should like to draw attention to what the ministers have been saying, and I must admit you cannot accuse our ministers of being idle. They have been going up and down the country talking about many things, and very seldom has one of them got up without mentioning the subject of tax reduction. I think that is very natural because they know as well as any of the rest of us that it is in the minds of everybody and that something must be done about it. I go back to July 5 and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). He was very moderate at that time. He did not get as far as they got later. He was restrained in what he said. The headline is, "Pearson Hopes Defence Taxation May Be Cut Within 'Year or Two' ".

That does not take you very far. That was not very good. On September 10 the Prime Minister was even chillier. He really chilled the people of the country by what he said in Portage la Prairie. He said that Canadians should not look for any big cut in defence bills or taxes as long as present dangers exist. The Prime Minister spoke to us the other day in that frank way of his, but I am always afraid of the Prime Minister when he is being too frank. When he tells you he is not very good at politics I say to myself, "Look out; be careful of that." At any rate in what the Prime Minister said in his speech on September 10 he does not seem, in the judgment of other members of the cabinet, to have been at his political best.

Of course one does not know the considerations which may have been in his mind, but at any rate it was felt that something should be done to improve the situation. A little later the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was speaking in Montreal, and he introduced a word which is very important. I think it was the first time the word "substantially" has been used. I looked up the word "substantially" in the dictionary and it really imports something very big and important. You can do quite a lot in the way of reducing taxes without coming within the four corners of the word "substantially", so there was just a slight note of hope when the Minister of Finance used the word "substantially" on September 23. I find the following in the Montreal Star with respect to what he said at that time:

> . . . we must not delude ourselves with the belief that we can substantially (Mr. Abbott stressed this word) alter the size of the budget or the weight of the tax burden . . .

Well, that was a little better but not much better. Then the genial Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) got into the act on September 29. He carried it one step further, not much but every little bit helps, and every little bit has carried it that much further. According to the report in the Montreal Star of September 29 he said:

> The Canadian taxpayer can definitely hope—

Now the word "definitely" comes into it. That is useful too.

> —for a tax cut "in a not too distant future" . . .

Well, there was the word "definitely", but on the other hand the "not too distant future" still left it remote. But there are good things to come and I now wish to refer to a dispatch from Ottawa dated October 11, to be found in the Hamilton Spectator of that date. This dispatch followed the visit which the Minister of Finance made to Prince Edward Island. That visit attracted a good deal of attention. I do not see why anyone should be surprised at people going to Prince Edward Island. It is a delightful place to go to, but apparently ministers of finance have not been in the habit of going there. They are strange people anyway, and they have not been in the habit of visiting the island. But the minister went, and his speech there gave a great deal of encouragement to the boys. The account begins like this:

> Finance minister Douglas Abbott's speech in Prince Edward Island this week was seen today as the advance glow of a tax-slashing "sunshine budget" . . .

I must admit when you read what he actually said it may not be as clear as people would like, although later on in the article I read the following:

> In principle the Abbott speech was regarded as pretty well reversing the Brandon speech of a month ago in which the Prime Minister specifically undertook to discourage any hopes at all of major tax cuts.

So you see there is a further step. Then the writer of the article warms to his work and says that there are two conditions now. A new condition is introduced, increased production. I give the Minister of Finance credit for that. I think that just begins to open the door very wide. How are you going to tie him down to anything there? You now have the door open to a cut provided it is not too substantial and provided there is increased production. That was in Prince Edward Island just before October 11, but by October 20 the Minister of Finance had got out as far as Vancouver. The air of the Pacific had evidently done him a lot of good, because the account in the Ottawa Citizen of October 20 begins as follows:

Finance Minister Abbott today forecast boosted production—

There you have it. We can have a tax reduction if there is increased production. The finance minister goes out to Vancouver and I find the following account of what he said with respect to increased production:

Finance Minister Abbott today forecast boosted production, virtually assuring Canadians of tax cuts in the next budget . . . Then, referring to the possibilities of a production boost, he added for the first time: "This, I believe, we can confidently expect."

That brings me very near the end, Mr. Speaker, but I think the end is most important because the Prime Minister, who had sounded a dirge-like note only a month before, when he was sounding the election rallying call to Liberals from coast to coast on October 29 also had something much more cheering to say about the matter of taxation. He said, as found in the Ottawa Citizen of October 29:

If we keep increasing our national production,—

There you have it, you see.

—keep strict control of all expenditures, save wherever we can, and do not make too many new demands on government, some relief should be possible . . .

So you see, Mr. Speaker, we are now at the point where the minister will not have nearly as much difficulty in the spring of 1953 as he had in the spring of 1949. He will not have to make all these excuses. He is getting ready now, and I think you have to give him credit for what you might call preparing the ground. The only thing is that I think he should go and tell the Prime Minister not to keep on saying that there has not been any overtaxation. As I say, it would be a very ungenerous man who would not admit that this build-up has been going on; but on the other hand if this is all merely saying that the Minister of Finance can mulct the taxpayers in 1952 in order that he may be generous to them in 1953, then I would say that if the minister comes with his budget speech and asks to be canonized next spring because of giving tax reductions it will be most proper for us to remind him of what has been going on in the last year or two and how he has persisted, despite all the warnings that have been given to him, in wringing unnecessary dollars out of the taxpayers.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

In the spring of 1951, contrary to our usual practice and only because the situation was so obvious, we suggested to him that he might forgo the additional 2 per cent sales tax that he was putting on then. We suggested that it would raise the cost of living, as it did. We suggested to him then that the amount which he would forgo by giving it up would in all probability be covered by the amount of his surplus, as it was several times over. Therefore I think we should ask the people of Canada to bear all this in mind; and also to remember—and I think this is relevant too—the extent to which it is in the power of the minister to regulate the actual out-turn as he sees fit.

After all we have hundreds of millions of dollars worth of contracts outstanding in the defence department and the Department of Defence Production. It only needs a little slowing of the tempo of work or the time of payment or both to provide large sums which might be available for the election purposes.

I think we may, consequently, expect and assure the voters that these taxes will be maintained until the political cycle, not the economic cycle and not the needs of the voters, gives the signal and suggests a change.

In other words we may expect a change at the time of the next budget, and if it does not come then we will know there will be no election until 1954. Little Jack Horner must pull out a plum before the voter is asked to give his vote.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I listened very carefully to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) this afternoon in the case he made for the government's contention that there is not any undue waste in the Department of National Defence. He said one thing, however, that causes me concern; that was that a great many of the contracts, particularly smaller contracts that are let by the government, do not pass over his desk and he does not himself give these contracts any scrutiny.

I have before me a Department of Defence Production publication of today showing that the number of contracts let between November 1 and November 15 total some $18 million. Of these only two can be taken as large contracts, totalling just over $5½ million. In other words, two-thirds of the $18 million let out in these 120 contracts might be listed as smaller contracts. I think it is absolutely necessary in our system of responsible government that all of the contracts, both large and small, should be given the careful scrutiny of some cabinet minister. If one man only is given the responsibility of checking all these contracts then I think one can say that a great deal of waste is bound to creep in.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support along with other members of this group the amendment placed before the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) calling on the government to implement at this session a nation-wide scheme of health insurance. I hope a little later on to discuss some of the problems that are facing agriculture, but I think the whole of what I have to say might be entitled "security". It seems to me that no matter what some political parties believe, the people of Canada are anxious to have the greatest possible amount of security; security in their jobs, security in the prices of the products they produce, security in their old age, and security in time of ill health.

I think it should be the main responsibility of government at this stage of history to provide those measures of security that a country as wealthy as Canada can so well afford. We have asked the government to adopt a scheme of national health insurance. It has already been said in this debate a number of times that this is not a new idea. In fact we in the C.C.F. cannot claim that health insurance was originally our idea. Certainly the Liberal party had the idea of health insurance as long ago as their convention of 1919. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) last year questioned the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as to why the Liberal party had not in 33 years implemented its promise of 1919, the Minister of National Health and Welfare replied that surely he could not be expected and the government could not be expected to inaugurate health insurance overnight. Thirty-three years in my opinion is a night that should be far too long even for a stagnant and immobile Liberal party. Surely after these 33 years of darkness it is about time the Liberal party saw the dawn and provided Canada with an adequate health insurance program.

The proposals which were placed before the provinces in 1945 were in my opinion sound. Those proposals, or proposals like them, should now be offered to any province that is willing to go forward and adopt a system of health insurance. We in the province of Saskatchewan are proud indeed of our hospitalization program. If anything was an issue in the Saskatchewan election this year it certainly was not the hospitalization program; because all parties, as they made certain to say—including the Liberal party—were supporting that program.

Our hospitalization program has not been brought about without a considerable cost both to the provincial treasury and to the individual who must pay, as an adult, a maximum of $10 per year for hospitalization. However, if the government of Canada, the Liberal party, were now prepared to implement its own promises of national health insurance, we in Saskatchewan would be prepared to accept that offer immediately and in the shortest possible time we would have a complete health insurance program in our province. As a matter of fact, our people are so interested in the matter of health that even if this government should continue to delay the provision of health insurance, they are not going to stand still. It will be much more difficult but, step by step, we shall add various health measures to our present hospitalization plan until finally, with or without the help of the federal government, we shall have a health insurance program established in that province. But if we can obtain from the federal treasury, from the federal government, even so much as a hospitalization program in which we can participate, then the moneys which would be released from our own hospitalization program would indeed help us in the province of Saskatchewan to provide medical care, dental care and other health measures in a very short time. No matter what advice the government may receive from the Conservative party, or from the Social Credit party—

Mr. Johnston: Go easy, now.

Mr. Argue: I hear one of the Social Credit members say, "Go easy, now". That is exactly what his leader said to the government: "Go easy on health insurance". The Conservative party says, "Let us have another conference with the provinces". Rather, in my opinion the people of Canada want action. If action is not forthcoming I believe the people of Canada will to a larger extent turn to the C.C.F., a party which when given the opportunity will provide a health insurance program for the people of all Canada.

Mr. Fair: Tell them the truth.

Mr. Argue: Oh, oh; the leader of the Social Credit party said, "Go slow; we do not want to be catapulted into this thing". He said, "Do it gradually".

Mr. Johnston: But efficiently.

Mr. Argue: Yes, efficiently. The C.C.F. say, "Let us do it now". That is the difference in our attitudes.

I also want to support the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that our old age pension legislation is today inadequate. Although we are all proud that our elderly citizens reaching the age of 70 can obtain a pension without a means test, nevertheless $40 a month for our elderly citizens is most inadequate. For a pensioner who has no other source of income, $40 a month today is, in my opinion, nothing less than slow starvation. It certainly is not a pension that is in keeping with the wealth and the production of our nation. A pension of $60 a month at 65, without a means test and adjusted to the cost of living index is, in my opinion, the very minimum that should be provided at this time.

I also want to support the case for the burnt-out pensioner, and urge that the pension should be increased to $60 a month for a single person and $120 a month for a married couple. I would also agree with the proposition put forward by the Canadian Legion that allowable income ceilings should be increased to $1,200 for a single person, and $2,000 for a married person. Certainly those veterans who sacrificed so much in protecting our freedom should be given better treatment than a pension of $50 for a single pensioner and $90 a month for a married pensioner, and they should be allowed to earn without penalty more than the present $10 a month by way of supplementary income.

I feel that there is another ever-increasing gap in our social security program. The Liberal party takes a great deal of credit—and I am not attempting and never have attempted to take away any of that credit—for providing family allowances. But while in 1945 they provided family allowances with one hand, they have been gradually taking them away with the other hand by allowing the cost of living continually to go up without providing corresponding increases in family allowances. If this government believes that their original Family Allowances Act was a good measure, then in my opinion the least they could do would be to protect the purchasing power of the family allowance as first provided by now increasing it by 60 per cent, from a minimum of $5 per month to $8 and from a maximum of $8 a month to $13. Such an increase would constitute a great improvement in our social security program. The money to provide such a program would have to be raised. Probably a good percentage of it could be taken out of the budget surplus if there were no tax reductions made. But I feel that the people of Canada are willing to pay a nominal amount per year, much like an insurance premium, if by so doing they can get adequate protection in time of ill health, in their old age, and if, by so doing, parents will receive some assistance toward providing better food, better clothing and a better education for our young Canadian citizens.

[Mr. Argue.]

I turn now to a discussion of some aspects of the government's policy in relation to agriculture. I believe that the agricultural producer in Canada also wants security. He does not want an extremely high price for his products one year and an extremely low price another year. He desires stability. He wishes to receive for his products a price sufficient to cover his cost of production and to provide the farm family with a standard of living comparable to that of other Canadian citizens.

The other day the government announced the final payment for the 1951 wheat crop. That payment was greeted with a good deal of commendation from farm organizations; I think they were pleased to receive a payment of that size, particularly when they understood the difficulty the wheat board faced in marketing the lower grades of the previous crop. Their commendation, I believe, went mainly to the wheat board, because I do not think the government can take much satisfaction in the total price paid for wheat produced in the year 1951. The total payment for a bushel of wheat produced in 1951 is no more than the price paid for a bushel of wheat produced in 1945. The final payment for No. 1 wheat produced in 1945 was $1.833 a bushel at Fort William. The price for wheat produced in 1951 is exactly the same, right to the decimal point. Yet from 1945 to 1952 the farmer's cost of production went up some 60 per cent, according to the dominion bureau of statistics figures. In 1945 the cost of production index was 152·1; in 1952 it was 243·2. If the wheat producer today were to receive, in relation to the cost of production, an amount equivalent in purchasing power to the price for wheat produced in 1945, he would receive a price of $2.52 a bushel, or an increase of almost 70 cents.

Some factors in keeping the price of 1951 wheat low have been a direct result of the policy of this government. In the year 1948-49 the wheat board received, for wheat sold to the United Kingdom and wheat consumed in Canada, $2 a bushel. From September 1949 until October, 1950 the Canadian dollar was devalued 10 per cent. Therefore, all of the wheat sold under the international wheat agreement and the wheat that went into domestic consumption in the early part of 1950 was paid for at the rate of $1.98 a bushel. But exchange controls were lifted in October, 1950, and the value of the Canadian dollar has been increasing since then. We see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and other cabinet ministers going around the country patting themselves on the back and congratulating themselves that the Canadian dollar is worth so much, and is now worth more than the United States dollar. It may make some Canadians pleased with themselves, when they travel to the United States, to know that they can obtain a little additional United States currency by way of premium. But the increased value of the Canadian dollar has created a real hardship for the western wheat producer. Now with our dollar worth 4 per cent more than the United States dollar rather than 10 per cent less, as it was, it means a loss to the farmer of 25 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat sold under the international wheat agreement, and every bushel of wheat sold in the domestic market.

The people of Canada should not now expect to obtain wheat at a price that is 25 cents less than the $2 price the Canadian consumer paid back in 1948. It is not right that, with the terrific increase in the cost of production, wheat alone should be sold at a reduced price.

I have never advocated, and I do not expect I ever shall, an increased price to the Canadian people that would place a burden on the lower income groups. But if the government feel that $1.74 a bushel is all the Canadian people can afford to pay for the wheat, then the government, out of the national treasury, should make up that 25 cents a bushel loss to the wheat producers. This government does not need to say it is afraid of subsidies; it does not need to say that it has not considered the cost to certain industries of an appreciating Canadian dollar. On Monday, November 24, the Minister of Finance announced that the government was increasing the subsidy to certain gold mining companies. In part he had this to say, as reported at page 16 of Hansard:

> During 1952 the industry's costs have continued to rise. At the same time the appreciation in the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has meant that for most of the year the mines have received a steadily decreasing return from their sales.

He might well have substituted agriculture for the gold mining industry, because the grain producers of Canada, and of western Canada in particular, are in exactly the same position as the gold mining companies. The costs of production of gold mining companies have risen. The price of their product has not risen to the same extent, but indeed has fallen. The Canadian farmer's cost of production has risen. The price for most of the producers' wheat sold by the wheat board has gone down. If the government can afford to pay the gold mining industry a large subsidy to help them dig gold out of one hole in the ground in Canada merely to have it placed in another hole in the ground in the United States, surely equal assistance should be given for the production of food, which to my way of thinking is much more valuable to the world than is the production of gold.

A couple of days ago I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) whether the government would consider making an advance on farm-stored grain. In a nutshell the minister's reply was no. His reasons were that the western grain producer is receiving final payments on his grain, and has sold so far this year somewhat more grain than he sold a year ago.

That answer did not satisfy me, at any rate, Mr. Speaker. The time farmers need an advance on farm-stored grain is when they have grain on the farms. It is as simple as that. There is more grain on farms in western Canada today, that farmers are unable to market, than ever before in the history of Canada. The minister said: "Oh, well, the farmers can go to the banks." A year ago farmers had difficulty harvesting and selling their grain and the minister said the same thing. He then said "The farmers can go to the banks." But in order to persuade the banks to lend some money to the farmers he had to guarantee the banks 25 per cent of their aggregate loans. I have been told, and on good authority, that the wheat pool organization was prepared to advance money to farmers on farm-stored grain for an aggregate guarantee of 2½ per cent of the loans made. Instead, the government said: "We will do it through the banks, and we shall make the guarantees to the banks ten times as great as the guarantee asked for by the wheat pool organization."

The average farmer in western Canada today, even though he has 2,000, 3,000 or 4,000 bushels of grain on his farm, cannot go to the bank and get a loan on that grain because the proceeds the farmers will receive when that grain is sold are already committed, already owing in many instances. The average farmer will owe a store bill; he will owe the local implement dealer, the local dealer in petroleum products. He may well have substantial payments coming due on new farm machinery that he has purchased, he will have to pay his taxes and buy his winter's supplies. If the average farmer sold all of his crop tomorrow morning, 24 hours later he would have very little cash on hand because he would have paid his bills in his local town, paid any moneys that were due on the farm implements, paid his taxes and put a little aside for family supplies and other farm expenses.

The average farmer cannot go to the bank and get a loan because bankers seem to many a strange sort of people in doing business. If you go to a banker and prove to him that you do not need a loan at all, that you have some cash at home, that you have very few debts, he will say: "Fellow, I will give you just about anything you ask for." But if another farmer goes in and says to the banker: "Look, I owe the storekeeper $500 and the oil dealer $500; I owe $3,000 on my new self-propelled combine; I owe $500 taxes, and I have 4,000 bushels of grain on the farm." He will say: "You are not a very good risk; you already owe a great deal. I do not think you need the money." That is why I say, Mr. Speaker, that farmers should be able to obtain an advance on farm-stored grain; such provision should be part of a permanent agricultural policy.

The farmer in the United States can obtain a loan on farm-stored grain. I do not think there is any great risk involved at all. Farmers, like other groups in Canada, are essentially honest. They will protect the quality of the grain they have in store. There is not one in a hundred who would make a false application. I can see no reason at all why a scheme could not and should not be set up to provide advance payments for grain stored on the farm. The farmer needs money today. Quite a lot of the business in western Canada is now being done not with money but with wheat as the medium of exchange. I am told that there is one large implement and automobile dealer in the city of Estevan, which is in the southeast part of Saskatchewan, who has already acquired in sales he has made more than 100,000 bushels of wheat. That is an inconvenient and often an expensive way for the farmer to purchase an automobile or a tractor. If the farmers had obtained advance payments at a nominal rate of interest I believe it would not only assist the farmer but would also assist our merchants in collecting their outstanding accounts.

Mr. Howe: To whom does the implement dealer sell the wheat?

Mr. Argue: I do not know that, Mr. Minister, but I have this information on what I consider to be good authority. I could give the implement dealer's name, but I would rather do so off the record. However, if I am pressed I would name the dealer, as it was given to me. I believe my information is correct, and if the minister wants it I shall pass it on to him.

Mr. Howe: The wheat board is debarred from accepting grain from other than bona fide producers, and I should like to know his name. Perhaps the hon. member would tell me later what the implement company does with this grain.

Mr. Bryce: An implement dealer might be a farmer, too.

Mr. Howe: "Might" be.

Mr. Argue: A lot of them are. I do not want to use my time speculating as to what the implement dealer might do with the grain. He might wait until the quota is open. He might sell it on the quota books of the farmers from whom he accepted grain. But in the meantime, on the best and most reliable information I can get, 100,000 bushels is in store in the city of Estevan, which has been taken to provide payments for farm machinery and automobiles.

Mr. Ferrie: Would the hon. member give us the name of that man?

Mr. Argue: His name was not given to me in confidence; the practice is general knowledge in that area. I would prefer not to bring any names into the discussion, but will give the name to the hon. member at six o'clock in private, if he wants to have it.

I turn now to discuss another aspect of the government's agricultural policy. The Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed in 1944. In asking parliament to provide $200 million for the purposes of that act the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) pointed out that the farmers had had their prices held down by price ceilings during the war, and he felt there should be adequate floors placed under agricultural prices in the post-war period.

The government has had difficulty in finding markets for many agricultural products. Canada has lost the British market, largely because of this government's policies. Let us consider the government's action in regard to hogs this year. In the early part of the year the support price on hogs was $32.50 per hundredweight for Wiltshire sides at Halifax. In February the government dropped the floor to $26 per hundredweight, with the basis changed to Toronto.

As soon as the farmers of Canada needed a floor price under hogs, as soon as they were offering hogs to the government under that floor price, the minister said, "Well, I must change the floor price", and he reduced it. Hogs are now coming on the Canadian market in considerable numbers, but the export market is almost non-existent. Yet the best the Minister of Agriculture can do is announce another drop in the floor price of hogs to take place on January 1, when the support price will drop from $26 to $23.

The Minister of Agriculture has been very successful in getting rid of the bulk of our hog-producing industry in Canada. No producer can raise hogs and have any return for his labour and his investment with a floor price of only $23 per hundredweight.

The government has placed a floor of 38 cents a dozen under grade A eggs, plus 5 cents for storage charges payable to the packers. When I was home this summer I noted that throughout the small towns in my province one could buy eggs at 15, 16 or 17 cents a dozen—good, sound fresh eggs. That is not a support price at all. The fact is that while legislation was on the statute book something happened so that the producer did not receive the support price.

A neighbour of mine shipped twenty hens to market this fall and she received for them a cheque for only $6.20, or 31 cents each. Similar hens in downtown Ottawa stores today are selling for $2 each. Something has happened in between. I do not know who has made the profit, but it certainly has not been the producer.

Cattle prices have been going down, down. Sure; the Minister of Agriculture placed a floor under cattle. After he did that he made a speech at Melville in October in which he said that agricultural prices are being stabilized at the highest level in Canadian history. A couple of days later he went to Estevan, and speaking to the livestock producers there he said, as reported in the Leader-Post of October 24, that he was well aware the producers were not getting the floor price the federal government had anticipated.

That is real double talk. One day he says that prices are being stabilized at the highest level in Canadian history, and two days later he admits the farmers are not getting these support prices. Since the Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed in 1944, according to the latest annual report it has cost the federal treasury something less than $10 million. Yet in the same period the same government paid out $40 million in subsidies to the gold mining industry. Surely, the government should not think four times as much of the gold mining industry as it does of the 750,000 farm families who compose the agricultural industry in Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to go over what I feel is discrimination in the collection of income taxes from farmers in various parts of Canada. I was going to refer, as I have on previous occasions, to the fact that while approximately $6,725,000 was collected in 1949 from farmers in Saskatchewan, for example, in the same year only $51,000 was collected from all the farmers in Quebec. I had hoped to answer some of the statements made towards the end of the last session by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I can remember him saying that it was difficult to collect farm income taxes in Quebec, but even so in that province the government had only 22 income tax inspectors, whereas in Saskatchewan, where according to the minister it was a simple matter to collect income tax from the farmers, he had 60 income tax inspectors. However, with my time rapidly running out I shall have to leave the discussion of this issue to another occasion.

I think it is well known now by most Canadians that we are going to get at this session a sunshine budget which will reduce income taxes, coming as it does just before the next election. The main reason, yes the only reason, the income tax will be reduced is that the government is going to the country. The Liberal government has a policy of high taxation in its first three years in office, then reducing income taxes just before an election. After the election, whenever they are successful, the taxes go back to their original level and the government starts accumulating for another three years another large surplus so they can introduce another reduction just before the next election.

Before sitting down I want to mention some matters in regard to Canada's position in international affairs. As a member of the United Nations, Canada has taken a strong stand, along with the other democratic nations, in the battle against communism. We have taken a particularly strong stand in the Korean situation. To my mind it is equally important that Canada should take a strong stand in regard to fascism or the concepts of fascism wherever they may rear their ugly head. To be quite frank I was disappointed with the stand taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), Canada's representative at the United Nations, in the vote that was taken on November 21 on setting up of a commission to inquire into race segregation policies in South Africa. I feel that when we have within the last ten years had to engage in a terrible war because of those fascist concepts of racial superiority, followed as they were by racial discrimination, it was a serious mistake for our delegate at the United Nations to abstain from voting, instead of taking his place with the other nations who were asking for the establishment of a three-man commission to inquire into the race segregation policies of the Malan government in South Africa. I feel it is important that through the United Nations we should do everything possible to remove such racial discrimination policies wherever they may be found.

I have noticed, as I am sure other members have, that the President-elect Eisenhower is going to Korea to attempt to settle the war in that country. Along with other Canadians I am wishing him every success. We hope that the Korean war may be ended in the very near future. I for one hope that General Eisenhower will not embark on the same kind of military adventure as General MacArthur did in taking the United Nations troops almost to the Manchurian border. I hope our government has already advised General Eisenhower that we do not wish to follow the United States or anyone else into that kind of adventure. Anything that is done to settle the war in Korea should be a truly United Nations undertaking, and should not be anything that is done by the United States or any other single nation.

The matter of our defence program, to my way of thinking, is not a political issue. When Canada decided to spend $5 billion over a three-year period to build up our defence program, that action was supported by every political party in parliament. But I feel that if that is all that Canada does in regard to defence against communism, we shall have failed humanity. Obviously I am thinking of our large agricultural surplus of grain and livestock products. It seems to me that one of the best ways to battle communism and win friends for democracy throughout the world is to help these underprivileged countries by supplying needed food. FAO reports have pointed out that two-thirds of the people of the world go to bed hungry every night. That being the case, surely the very least Canada could do would be to spend a sum equal to 10 per cent or even 20 per cent of the amount we spend on our defence program to move surplus food from Canada to help feed the hungry peoples of the world.

I think we could do that on the basis of self-interest. I think we should do it on the basis of our Christian beliefs. If Canada would do its part, as we surely can in this year 1952, in helping to provide food for the needy peoples of the world, I think we would be playing our part in bringing about that day when there will be peace and good will among men.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all join with other members of the house in complimenting the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Although I am more or less a new member myself, I can say that the manner in which these two gentlemen acquitted themselves was certainly in the best traditions of the house. We can look forward to very valuable contributions that will be made by these two gentlemen in due course. I was particularly impressed with the reference made by the hon. member for Waterloo North to the composition of the people in his constituency. Apparently there are people there who came from various parts of Europe at one time but, as he put it, "whatever they may have been at one time they are now Canadians all." I am glad that this conception of Canadian citizenship, of Canadianism, has become deeply rooted in the minds of the Canadian people.

May I now refer, Mr. Speaker, to that sports classic which will take place the day after tomorrow at Toronto varsity stadium between two great football teams, the Toronto Argonauts and the Edmonton Eskimos. May the better team win.

Mr. Fleming: It will. Thank you very much.

Mr. Decore: May I tell the hon. member who has interjected that the best team does not always win. I understand from the sports writers that the best team did not win not so long ago, when we thought the best team was the Hamilton Tigers.

Mr. Croll: We heard the same rumour about the Bombers too.

Mr. Decore: In any event I hope the hon. member will have the opportunity to see that game.

Mr. Murphy: They are all professionals anyway, not like Sarnia.

An hon. Member: What about tickets?

Mr. Decore: Somebody is talking about tickets. I can only refer the hon. member to our minister from Alberta, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham).

Mr. Graydon: That is where they all are.

Mr. Decore: I have my own opinion as to the two teams and I strongly believe our team from the west is the best one. My reason for drawing the attention of the house to this particular event is because I feel this is one occasion when the west has an opportunity to meet the east and the east to meet the west. I do not know of any other single event that brings about more good will between the east and the west. As a member who comes from western Canada, it seems to me that probably the people of eastern Canada—and in referring to eastern Canada may I say that we in the west include the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as part of eastern Canada—do not quite understand us. They do not appreciate some of the many problems we have in the west. They may know something about our agriculture, about our scenic beauty as found at lake Louise and Jasper and on the other side of the mountains, about our oil and natural gas in Alberta, but I do not think they quite appreciate some of our problems—and we have many of them.

In my opinion one of the biggest problems we have in the west is that we lack a larger and more self-sustaining population. It is only some sixty years ago that Edward Blake lamented "an empty west, empty still." Only fifty years ago Sir Clifford Sifton, that outstanding minister of immigration in the Laurier government, made this statement with reference to the western plains when he was speaking at Winnipeg:

> We look in the near future to see upon these western plains a great population; not depressed by poverty, but a population characterized in its social conditions by a high degree of comfort and prosperity.

Half a century has passed and the west is still empty. The west still lacks a large and self-sustaining population. If you look at the 1951 census you will find that after fifty years of growth the west has entered into a period of decline. What has happened in the three prairie provinces during the last ten years? If you compare the 1941 census with that of 1951 you will find in the province of Alberta, from which I come, that although there is an apparent gain in the population of some 140,000 it does not portray a true picture of what has actually happened in that province. It does not take into account a very important factor in considering population, the factor of natural increase. By "natural increase" I mean the number of births in excess of the number of deaths. Very accurate figures are available in that regard, and we find that in the last ten years we had a net loss in the population of the province of Alberta of some nine and a half thousand people.

That may not be a very large figure, but if you take the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan the figures are much more disastrous. In the province of Manitoba there has been a net loss of population of over 65,000 and in the province of Saskatchewan there has been a net loss of over 200,000.

Mr. MacDougall: They all go to British Columbia.

Mr. Decore: If you take the three prairie provinces you will note that there was a net loss in population of over a quarter of a million people, and that is something I consider to be very serious. In other words, I am trying to point out that we in the western provinces have not only failed to attract people to these provinces, but we have failed to keep the population that we already had.

Actually we have many resources in the west, but I believe the greatest resource of any province or any country is its population. The reason for the situation in the west is that westerners have migrated to industrial centres such as Toronto or Hamilton. Some have gone to British Columbia or across the border to the United States. All have done so because they were looking for better opportunities. Where there is a greater population there is an opportunity to give greater service and people therefore have better opportunities in industrial centres. That is the reason we have lost our population in the last ten years.

It is true that the period from 1941 to 1951 was a period of buoyant economy and expanding production throughout the nation, but during that period the prairie provinces became heir to the economically devastating depression which took place in the hungry thirties when wheat sold for 18 cents a bushel and cattle at $10 a head, when people were driving the so-called Bennett buggies. That was the situation, and we fell heir to the results of that devastating depression. There is no guarantee that something of that kind will not happen again. If it did it certainly would be most serious for us in the west. The people of Ontario did not feel the economic depression of the hungry thirties as much as we did in the west. In Ontario there are industries. Where you have industries you have a bigger population and farm produce, for example, was probably being sold there at somewhat better prices. In the west we have many resources but our economy is essentially agricultural in nature. As producers of agricultural products, we in the west have been handicapped by distances from markets and by export trade. We have to pay heavy and important levies on everything we ship out and everything we bring in. That explains why there has been such bitter resentment and struggling concerning freight rates in the west. We are fortunate that the Massey commission made certain recommendations and as a result we have certain legislation providing for equalization of freight rates in western Canada.

We have been struggling at all times against the high tariff policies that have existed, and we will continue to do so. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) made a very important contribution the other day when he spoke on this matter, and especially when he pointed out, among other things, that to buy four new 6.40 x 15 tires in the United States costs $67.16 but in Toronto the price is $129.60. The tires apparently are the same tires made by the same company. There are numerous examples and one could go on almost indefinitely pointing out the differences that exist. We are, of course, fighting against high tariffs.

I agreed also with the hon. member for Charlotte when he said there had been too much criticism from people in eastern Canada regarding the so-called subsidization of farm products. I know that a lot of members of this house, especially those who come from the central provinces, may have difficulty explaining to their constituents the $65 million paid by this government under the five-year pool, but I feel there is no better example of subsidy than what has happened in some of these industries. Actually subsidization of industry is reflected in the difference between prices in the United States and the duty paid value in Canada. I point these things out because we are misunderstood; our problems at times are not quite appreciated the way they should be.

I arrived here in 1949, Mr. Speaker, and after listening to some of the members of the opposition I was impressed by statements they made; but, frankly, if one were to believe everything that was said he would have come to the inevitable conclusion that Canada was going to the dogs. You have heard about the high cost of living. Of course we have had a high cost of living, and the cost of living is still high; but let us not forget that the cost of living has dropped from 191·1 to 185·0 and is continuing to drop. You have heard from time to time, and still hear, that the farmer is going to be ruined. We heard complaints about the abolition of resale price maintenance, when it was said that would ruin the small businessman. I have met a lot of small businessmen and so far no one has complained that this legislation has ruined him. We have heard criticism pertaining to foot-and-mouth disease but actually this government should be given credit for having eradicated foot-and-mouth disease in the shortest period on record for any nation in the world.

We hear much about markets. We have all heard since 1947 that Canada is going to be ruined and that we have lost the markets of the world. The fact remains that trade has expanded to new heights both in value and in volume. Canada has now become the greatest trading nation in the world on a per capita basis and fourth in terms of volume. The year 1952 promises to be the greatest year on record.

You have heard from certain people that we have hitched ourselves to the wrong markets. You heard that from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) who spoke the other day; here is what he said as reported on page 56 of Hansard:

> I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberals are just now beginning to wake up to the fact that they have hitched themselves to the most uncertain market in the world, the most uncertain market for Canada—that is the market in the United States; and for all too long they have neglected to do what ought to have been done to restore Canada to the best market she ever had and the market which she ought to continue to hold if she can in the years to come.

He goes on to say:

> I think the government should hang its head in shame over the fact that Britain has had to go behind the iron curtain, to Russia, to the enemy of the free world for a number of things she has had to get such as coarse grain, lumber, and things like that which Canada could very well have supplied.

Let me remind the hon. member for Peace River that since 1946 this government has lent to the United Kingdom the sum of $1¼ billion for the purpose of stimulating trade between Canada and the commonwealth nations. Let me remind him that we are now participating in the Colombo plan, the primary purpose of which is to help those Asiatic countries, and at the same time we are endeavouring to encourage trade there. Let me remind the hon. member that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are in London right now endeavouring to work out some trade agreement or better trade understanding between Britain and Canada. We also know that the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is going on a trip to several South American countries for the purpose of stimulating trade between Canada and those countries.

What about farm prices? As I say, we have our problems in the west and I have pointed out some of them; but when we compare farm incomes we find that last year's figure was twice as great as that in 1944, and in 1944 production was 50 per cent higher although the returns were only half as great. What about cattle? It is true that we have had this foot-and-mouth disease, yet returns from cattle today are the highest in the history of Canada except for last year, 1951. As I say, we Canadians have had a lot of obstacles and a lot of difficulties. But whether it be inflation, the high cost of living, foot-and-mouth disease or national emergency, I feel that we can overcome those difficulties, especially with this government.

There are two matters, Mr. Speaker, pertaining to my home constituency to which I should like to refer. I would like to have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) take them into consideration. The first matter concerns the uncompleted Canadian National Railways line which runs east from Edmonton to Heinsburg. There is a gap from Heinsburg to Frenchman Butte of some 39 miles; that distance is not completed. I drew this matter to the attention of the minister in 1949 when I first came here. I should like just to quote what I said at that time and the reply the minister gave. As reported at page 1233 of Hansard for October 28, 1949, this is what I said:

> I want to draw the minister's attention to the Canadian National Railway line which runs east from Edmonton to a point called Heinsburg. It so happens that this railway line runs through a thickly-populated farming area, but there is a gap of some 39 miles from Heinsburg to a point called Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan. The result is that the farmers' cost of production is considerably higher than it would otherwise be. I understand that the reason this line was not completed was the coming of depression years and the war.
> Conditions have now changed. Quite significant developments have taken place along that line which I think are of importance to our Canadian economy. It so happens that along this line the famous Redwater oil field has been discovered. This is the largest field not only in Alberta but in Canada. Farther along the line there is a salt mine which has been developed only within the last year. The result is that there is quite a considerable strain on rail transportation. As the people in my constituency are affected, is the minister in a position to give us any information on whether the Canadian National Railway Company has any intention of completing this gap some time in the near future?

The minister made this reply:

> I thank the hon. member for Vegreville for his interest in the unfilled gap between Heinsburg, Alberta and Frenchman Butte, Saskatchewan. The Canadian National Railways have been giving some careful study to this line, not only in 1949 but in 1948 and 1947; and, I must tell my hon. friend, they have it fairly high up in their priority list.

Then he continues further and says:

> But I can tell my hon. friend that the discovery of the oil wells and the salt mines are two features which should add considerably to the chances of construction. They certainly should add to the economic advantages. The best I can say at this time is that the Canadian National Railways have the matter under careful review and that they have it fairly high up in their priority list.

I realize that this statement was made in 1949 and that since that time we have been burdened with an extremely heavy national defence program. I also realize that there is a shortage of steel. But I believe things will come back to normal, and I only hope that in the meantime the minister will continue to hold this matter in the same light as he held it at the time when he made that statement, so that when the proper time arrives the project will be proceeded with.

Another point I should like to draw attention to is in connection with an experimental farm in northeastern Alberta. This is a matter which concerns the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have mentioned this matter before. I brought it to the attention of the house last session, and I felt that the minister was somewhat sympathetic. I pointed out some of the reasons why we feel there should be an experimental farm in northeastern Alberta. To begin with, the closest experimental farm is at Lacombe, which is some considerable distance away. I feel that you can get the best farming methods by taking advantage of the educational facilities afforded by these experimental farms. It may be that these experimental farms have been too greatly centralized, and have been too large. It may be that they should be on a smaller scale and be more numerous, in order to make them more easily accessible to the farmers so they can come in and see what is happening, not only as to experiments but in order to take advantage of the educational values that such farms afford.

As a matter of fact, exactly three weeks ago today the Minister of Agriculture visited the Vegreville constituency and the town of Vegreville. Incidentally I may say that he made many friends there, including a large number who previously voted Social Credit. The minister had occasion to hold meetings with some 40 municipal councillors representing 40 municipal divisions and representing a vast area in northeastern Alberta. He saw the enthusiasm that was displayed at that meeting. I only hope the minister will give this matter further consideration. I sincerely hope that this project may be proceeded with.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, rather than include in my congratulations only the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I want to include most of those who have thus far taken part in this traditional debate, because my personal feeling is that unusual enthusiasm has been brought to bear during the discussion up to the present moment. It might be, of course, that because of the fact that, as is generally agreed, we are in the last session before the election, more effort and more vigour is being employed with regard to the discussions at hand. The vehemence on the part of the supporters of the government seems to lie in the typical direction of whitewashing the government program; and from the standpoint of those of us who are in the opposition, we are more vigorous in our criticisms of government policy. I suppose that is as it should be, or at least that it is inevitable under our party system.

It is, however, almost too much to expect members of the opposition to agree that the government record is without spot and without blemish entirely, as some of those who have spoken in support of the government would tend to suggest. In fact there are so many skeletons out of the cupboard at the present time that it is going to be extremely difficult indeed to bury them. This fact has become increasingly obvious as we have had recent expressions of public opinion from across Canada.

I was impressed by a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) during his remarks the other day. Since coming into the chamber I have found that the Prime Minister endeavours to be fair in most of his remarks, except perhaps sometimes when he finds himself in bad company; and that is inevitable under the circumstances. The observation he made with regard to the role of the official opposition in the chamber impressed me. As recorded at page 34 of Hansard, he said:

> . . . I extend congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition for the very frank, and perhaps some of us may sometimes think severe, criticism of the actions of the government. It is a part of our democratic institutions that there should be someone recognized in our official organizations whose duty it is to watch and criticize what is being done by the advisers of the crown, and I think it is helpful that that should be so.

That is a fair and unbiased appraisal of the role of the opposition. Regardless of the discussion which took place the other day as to ghost writers, I am sure he was speaking from personal experience so far as that matter is concerned. While on the subject of ghost writers—and I notice that it was raised again this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton)—may I say that I think the final word arises from an incident that occurred some time ago in the United States when a politician who had grown accustomed to the habit of relying on the efforts of ghost writers on one occasion found himself placed in an extremely embarrassing position. He had neglected to read the speech before he began to give it. He progressed through pages 1, 2 and 3. Everything was going well until he got to page 4, which he found blank with the exception of one line at the top. That line said: "You are on your own, you old windbag; I quit." That is the last comment that should be made in regard to ghost-writing in this chamber.

In contrast to the Prime Minister's reference to the role of the opposition, I find sometimes that more eager and rash members of the government group have a different opinion. It has been expressed, mostly outside this chamber, to the effect that "an opposition member can be of little or no service to the people and can only be, like the leader of the official opposition, an obstructionist and a destructive critic". I am glad to see that the Prime Minister does not agree with that viewpoint. Actually, from what I have already observed in the chamber, I am glad that we do have an opposition group to keep a close check on government activities. I am sure the claim that has been made three times already during this debate by various members is true, namely that whatever can be said concerning the government, it cannot be accused of reckless dishonesty, graft and other similar activities such as sometimes occur south of the border. To back up that observation the Ottawa Journal has been referred to.

Apparently that paper is a journal of considerable reputation, if one is to judge from the emphasis and the confidence placed in it by government speakers. It is significant that that journal on various occasions has declared that the present opposition leadership in this house is the best that Canada has seen since confederation. I am sure if we rely upon the opinion of that paper in one instance, we must accept it as an unbiased opinion in the other.

The members of the government should be very grateful to the opposition in this regard. The reason things are more closely under control in our House of Commons, under our parliamentary system, is that the ministers are directly responsible to the elected representatives, and not as in the United States more or less operating outside of the framework of the elected bodies. In that country the ministers have to report to the electorate only at four-year intervals.

Furthermore, the impact of the opposition criticism can be seen in some of the legislation that is brought in. For example, in the speech from the throne reference was made to fair employment practices; to changes in attitude regarding television; to the abolition of the radio licence, and a rather more solicitous approach to the handling of commonwealth relations problems, all of which have been advocated by members of the official opposition for some considerable time. We can come to the conclusion, however, that there are still some things that have been left undone, judging from the remarks on this side in reference to taxation, inflation, extravagance, failure to ease means test restrictions on war veterans' allowances and also on pensions for the blind. These are subjects which have come up on several occasions already in this house in this debate on the speech from the throne. I am not going to deal with these matters because they are of general concern to all Canadians, and they have already been dealt with at some considerable length by other speakers. I shall rather, as did the speaker who preceded me in this debate, concentrate on problems that might be regarded as peculiar to the west.

I find myself in sympathy with a good many of the viewpoints expressed by the previous speaker. Because the voice of the west in this House of Commons is rather a weak one from the standpoint of numerical representation, I think that we might well concentrate on our particular difficulties. Not only is it a weak voice; it is growing weaker as a result of what has been referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as the fairest redistribution ever undertaken in the Dominion of Canada. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am afraid that depends on your own viewpoint. I am sure that my colleague the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and myself do not agree that it is the fairest redistribution that has been carried out in the history of Canada. As I say, it depends on your own viewpoint.

I do feel, along with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), that there is some misunderstanding concerning our problems in the west, and this misunderstanding goes further than the realm of football. The west, along with Canada generally, has been feeling the effects of the industrial revolution, only our boom might be described as a quiet one, rather than one of the gigantic proportions that we see here in central Canada. The main reason for the relative slowness of development of the prairies of course arises from the effects of centralization. Centralization of population has been mentioned tonight, industrial development, and also more recently, since we became faced with the threat of aggression, the distribution of defence contracts. It is fairly generally understood that the bulk of the contracts are finding their way to the industries of the central provinces rather than to the industrial potential on the prairies. I surveyed the situation in my own constituency before I left, and found that there was very little change so far as defence contracts are concerned.

Then too, of course, we were a long time recovering from the effects of the depression. In the province of Manitoba we have had a government which has established quite a record for longevity. In fact it has broken the record established by this government by a considerable number of years. We have had a government in office continuously since 1922, and it has not been overly enthusiastic in promoting provincial welfare. In fact we might even go so far as to say it has been extremely cautious, but there is a gradual awakening in this regard, and this awakening comes from the civil service more than it does from direct government policy. The assistant deputy minister of the Manitoba department of industry and commerce, in speaking to a chamber of commerce gathering in Swan River, said that Manitobans must become as industrially minded as they are agriculturally minded if they wish to continue to progress. Or, to express it another way, agriculture must accept its new partners, oil and general industrial development. Actually that partnership is well under way in the province of Manitoba.

That is a statement that should be self-evident, particularly during these post-war years, but it does not seem to be so in certain responsible circles. For example, our Manitoba minister speaking recently in Preeceville, Saskatchewan, criticized the trend toward industrialization on the prairies, claiming it to be a revival of what he termed Tory protectionism, whatever that may be. I think the charge actually arose from a speech made recently by the Leader of the Opposition in regard to Canada's golden future, suggesting that we might better benefit ourselves by processing our own raw material rather than by allowing ourselves to be despoiled. That hits directly at our problem of industrialization on the prairies.

The reasoning behind the minister's statement was to the effect that such local processing of our natural resources would disturb world trade, cutting off the world markets for our agricultural products. As I look at that statement objectively I think it is merely an attempt to revive the old technique of dividing and conquering through the process of arousing regional prejudices. That worked perhaps at one time during the twenties, when the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec were industrializing very rapidly, when certain protective measures were exercised in their favour, and the old cry of protectionism on the prairies had its effect. But so far as I can see from a study of the economics of the prairies, this is as dead as the dodo bird at the present time because, above all else, the west must industrialize if a balanced economy right across Canada is to be developed. If we are going to increase our population so as to fill these vast and wide open spaces, we must have a diversified economy. In so doing we will not be so dependent upon external markets because we will have developed domestic markets, and we will achieve a level of social and cultural development worthy of a country occupying the strategic importance of Canada in the modern world.

I would say that lack of awareness of new trends on the prairies, particularly in respect to this matter of industrialization, is indicative of a lack of leadership in high government circles. I suppose this is inevitable after long years in office. I was quite amazed—perhaps I should not say "amazed", because it is something more or less universally understood—but I was quite impressed, shall I say, when reading that interesting book "The Incredible Canadian" to find that in 1921 the late Mr. Mackenzie King made the same complaint, that the government had been too long in office, had got out of touch with the people, had become arrogant, and that nothing could be done until public opinion spoke, until the people rose up and protested through their votes.

That is exactly what is happening right across this country at the present time. Incidentally that is why, under our British parliamentary institutions, we have the two-party system, so that as one group grows decrepit with age another has grown vigorous in opposition so that it can take its place and carry on the business of responsible government.

In Manitoba we find evidence of the revival of a vigorous community spirit. The movement is coming from the people in Manitoba and the government is being forced into action in spite of itself. For example, in the city of Brandon we have appointed an industrial commissioner. I believe we are the smallest city to become active in this regard. It has all been done on the local community level, with very little inspiration from higher levels of government.

We have traditions of community activity in this country which are interesting. A few weeks ago it was my experience to go down into that small but unique community of Steinbach and, although it is not in my constituency, I was impressed by what I saw there. Steinbach is the centre of a Mennonite community and has been referred to as Manitoba's moneyed mile, because of the wealth and prosperity located there. Right from the beginning the citizens of Steinbach have practised the diversified economy that the rest of Manitoba is only now beginning to appreciate. They did it in face of the fact that they had no railway communications, and still have none, for that matter. Actually what I found in Steinbach was a way of life, because as you approach the city you see two signs, one of which says "Sign of progress" and, close by, the other saying "Believe on the Lord". I think it is the existence of that sort of spirit among the people—they are God-fearing, thrifty and hard-working—that has made that little community one of the most prosperous, on a proportionate basis, in the whole of Manitoba.

I might add, however, that the same spirit is being felt in other areas of our province. Along with this development, which must inevitably come if we are going to occupy our rightful place in the Canadian economy, we have the general story of oil. My deskmate and colleague, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) has told the story of oil in a much more capable way than I could and, because of his background and knowledge, is better able to do so. However, those of us in western Manitoba, particularly in my constituency, have encouraging progress to report. In the Daly oil field west of Virden there are now 14 oil wells capable of producing a thousand barrels a day, so I am informed. It is oil of high quality which will produce gasoline and lubricating oil, as well as crude oil. I understand that oil is being delivered directly to the pipe line operating through the area. So we in Manitoba have the resources, we have the power and we now have the fuel. All we need is a bit of encouragement and inspiration from our senior governments. And perhaps, too, we need a boost in human resources, because no matter what we have in natural resources, nothing can be done until we have a population sufficiently large to carry out the developments to be made there in the near future.

This brings me to the problem of immigration, a subject that has been discussed frequently in recent days across Canada. We have various estimates of the potential Canadian population by the end of the century running all the way from 100 million down to 25 million. Judging from those figures we are due for a very rapid increase in population immediately. One of the chief sources, if not indeed the chief, will be through the process of immigration. In Manitoba we have had it drawn to our attention by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) that he visualizes within the next decade a population of some 100,000 citizens north of 53, where now there are only some 10,000. Certainly there is every encouragement for an increase in population as we view the situation in Manitoba.

Looking at it from the other side of the picture, it would seem that the countries of Europe and the United Kingdom are quite anxious to send their surplus population to our shores. It is estimated, for example, that the United Kingdom alone has a surplus population of approximately 20 million who could be settled in Canada as well as other parts of the commonwealth. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has spoken on this theme on several occasions and is very interested in the problem because he comes from the wide open spaces of the prairies.

Along with the vacillation and the changing moods in regard to prairie industrialization, we also see government vacillation in regard to immigration policy. This was referred to in an article in Saturday Night a few weeks ago, October 4, written by Mr. Michael Barkway, who referred to statements made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). It reads in part as follows:

> The contradiction between profession and performance has grown wider with each succeeding government statement. Prime Minister St. Laurent has been stumping the country proclaiming that Canada will have a population of 35 million by the end of the century. Walter Harris, the minister directly responsible, is presumably more accurately aware of what the government is actually doing. His prophecy (at London) was a lot more cautious. He forecast 25 million "in the foreseeable future" . . . Deference for his boss, or a misguided attempt to paper over the party's cracks, led to a modified prophecy in a later speech at Montreal. It then became "25 to 35 million people before the end of the century."
> The curious contradiction reached a laughable culmination in the official release on immigration in July. July—as Harris had prophesied—showed the first results of the restrictions he introduced earlier in the year. The number of new arrivals was 15 per cent less than July of last year. Their origins were even more drastically changed. The proportion of immigrants from Britain continued the marked increase which started last winter. Last year they were 15 per cent of the total. In the first five months of 1952 they were 23 per cent. In July they were more than 28 per cent.

Now, there seems to be some vacillation in policy, even though it was stated in the minister's speech last July, as I recall, that immigration policy cannot be a stop and go affair. If there is any opposition to immigration it does not come from the prairies, which are urgently in need of population if they are to develop their program of industrialization.

It is interesting to compare this policy with the record of previous immigration ministers in this house, such as Hon. Clifford Sifton. Between 1895 and 1914 Canada doubled her population with the admission of 5 million immigrants. Among the group was my own father, who came over in 1906. I know there are very difficult problems in connection with immigration, just as there are in regard to other situations. Surely, the government which professes to be responsible for the prosperity in Canada at the present time, and all the other wonderful benefits, could find a solution to this difficulty. I know there are problems of assimilation, problems of housing, social welfare, general employment and economic dislocation as the result of an influx of population. We need people, however. Other countries have surplus population and we have the room. The only obvious solution is a continued policy of immigration.

Again volunteer community effort is expressing itself in this regard. Here perhaps our biggest job is assimilation. We have the Canadian citizenship council in the field, as well as the various groups from the Canadian Legion, the Y.M.C.A. and various church groups who are trying to deal, on a local level, with this problem of assimilating our new Canadian citizens. I am sure that had our community life, the feeling of neighbourliness, not tended to disintegrate as a result of the neglect of municipalities and so forth, there would have been an even keener participation on the local level in this very important problem of immigration.

It of course remains to be said that, notwithstanding the industrialization and the problem of population arising therefrom, agriculture is still the basic industry of the prairies. Our agricultural industry is perhaps not as unstable as it was formerly, but it still suffers from relative instability from time to time. We hear protests from the producers. Before I make some general observations in this regard I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) concerning the P.F.A.A. I have run into some difficulties in connection with farmers who have suffered crop loss from hail damage. There is no possibility of assistance because of the present large areas required under the act. Hail damage is a special problem.

At the present time farm costs are going up and income is going down. I think it is fair to conclude that only a succession of bumper crops has kept the agricultural economy of the prairies afloat. As is well known to the members of the house, the present crop is the largest we have ever gathered on the prairies. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) made a reference the other night to the drop in the price index and gave credit, as is usually the case in observations from that side of the house, to the government. Actually the decline in the price index is at the expense of our prairie producers. Returns from produce are going down and costs are going up.

The farmer is even suffering from the high value of the Canadian dollar, because being a producer he is being sacrificed for the American investor.

The lyrical tributes we find in various United States periodicals of recent date are indicative that our friends across the border take a favourable view of the present exchange rate between the Canadian dollar and the United States dollar. It is estimated that out of our bumper crop the farmer will actually receive a half million dollars less than he would have received had the dollar been at par. I am not going to deal with that problem, other than to say that it seems that all down the line the people in the continental west, the prairie people, seem to get into difficulty as compared with the more favourably situated people in central Canada. I say that, regardless of the transition taking place, we still must take an interest in our agricultural economy, and it is not without some reason that the various agricultural organizations on the prairies, particularly the farmers' unions, are now advocating that general discussions be held on agricultural policies.

To sum up my remarks, the difficulties I have outlined with respect to inequitable development across the prairies, concentration in the central provinces, high taxation, extravagance and so forth are inevitable under the present parliamentary situation in Canada. We have lived through three very unhealthy years politically with an overwhelming government majority in the house. We find that by appeals to a broad cross-section of the people on the basis of what you might call phony liberalism, by appeals to state welfarism and expounding the idea that the state can solve all problems, we have developed a situation of political imbalance in Canada. There have been more cautious statements recently, and I was quite impressed with the remarks the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made when he was out west and told the people that you do not get anything for nothing. Seemingly it was a belated return to a more basic liberal viewpoint. However, we still have cries that Canada is enjoying an unprecedented period of prosperity which is all due to government beneficence or, as it was put in the chamber yesterday quoting a popular song, "You never had it so good."

An hon. Member: That was what they said in the United States before their election.

Mr. Dinsdale: Prosperity is not the only thing in a country. Our prosperity is not unending and we must remember that what we have is almost unique to the North American continent. We actually have an island of prosperity in a sea of poverty, and our responsibilities are all the greater because of that situation. We must also remember that often nations that have entered into a decline have done so at the peak period of prosperity or, as the poet says:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

Therefore prosperity is actually no criterion of the actual state of well-being of a country. We admit there is prosperity. We do not deny the fact. But let me read a quotation from what was said recently by Senator Harry F. Byrd, speaking in the United States. He made what I regard as a very penetrating statement on the problem of centralization in the direction of the superstate, the all-powerful state. He said:

> Centralized power and purse breed a sinister political philosophy which scorns frugality, efficiency and integrity; which attaches no importance to waste, debt or immorality; which advocates indefinitely the political formula of tax, spend and elect; and which has no scruples against using public money to influence political decisions.

That is inevitable as long as human nature is what it is and regardless of the political complexion of the party that happens to find itself in office over a long period of time. I came across a quotation in the Rivers Gazette, one of our weekly papers in western Manitoba. It is a parody of the 23rd psalm and reads as follows:

> The government is my shepherd, I need not work. It allows me to lie down on good jobs; it leadeth me beside still factories.
> It destroyeth my initiative; it leads me into paths of the parasite for politics' sake.
> Yea, though I walk through the valley of laziness and deficit spending I will fear no evil; for the government is with me; its doles and its vote-getters, they comfort me.
> It prepareth an economic Utopia for me by appropriating the earnings of my grandchildren. It filleth my head with baloney; my efficiency runneth over.
> Surely the government shall care for me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in a fool's paradise forever.

I thought this was very appropriate in view of certain developments we have seen south of the border and in this country. Actually it is impossible for a group whose vision is obscured by power to see the difficulties and to accept criticisms of extravagance, unnecessary expenditures and so on. A group long in office is pushed by pressure from all its friends, from the spoil seekers, bandwagon climbers and general camp followers. In the final analysis it is only the sovereign voice of the people that can call a halt. It would seem that the day of deliverance is not too far away.

I should like to refer to another matter outside the main points of my remarks. On the orders of the day today I raised a question with respect to accepting the offer of the volunteer organizations to carry on welfare activities among our armed forces. In replying the minister indicated that there was no change in policy in that regard. Obviously there is considerable interest throughout the country with respect to the problem, and well there might be because we have achieved a level of recruitment in our armed forces that closely parallels a wartime situation. Church groups have been disturbed about the fact that volunteer welfare organizations have been excluded from participation in the welfare activities among the troops which they carried on so effectively and efficiently during world war II. They established an outstanding reputation with respect to their services.

I was most disturbed to discover from the minister's remarks that there is a principle involved of no change in the present policy and that the former type of welfare service is not going to be operated among our Canadian forces. Because of the reputation established by these organizations during the war, I think the only groups that can adequately serve the troops both abroad and in the numerous depots and military establishments at home are those qualified by experience and actual training. The problem confronting welfare organizations among the armed forces is not necessarily a matter of cigarettes, movies and radio programs, the tangible outward things. It is the intangibles that have to be dealt with among military men who find themselves in a difficult social situation, removed from their families, removed from their churches and removed from general community responsibility.

I strongly suggest that if at all possible something should be done to accept the generous offer of these voluntary organizations. It does not necessarily mean having someone from each organization. They could perhaps pool their resources, but surely from their experience in world war II they have accumulated knowledge that can prove invaluable and thus help to deal with the problem of morale which is so important if we are going to produce strong fighting forces in each of the three armed services.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker, my remarks at this stage of the debate will be very brief. They have been prompted by a charge which a member of the opposition made in the debate yesterday against the administration of the national employment service for which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is responsible to parliament. Before proceeding farther, however, Mr. Speaker, I find it a very pleasant duty to join with all speakers who have preceded me in warmly congratulating the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have set for themselves a high standard of discussion which will inspire them both in their further participation in debates in this chamber. I offer them my sincerest wishes for success.

In his speech yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) resorted, in my view, to tactics which I like to believe will appear outside this house as a hopeless attempt to catch the eye of the public and further the advancement of his party's interests; because it was done without too much concern for the principles of truth and righteousness.

The official opposition has been anxiously searching in the past few months in the administration of various departments for material which they could use to support their irresponsible charges of waste and extravagance by the government. The most they could achieve in their search was to get and put together bits and pieces of information which could give a semblance of truth to their charges against the government, but which in no instance stand the test of conscientious and objective analysis.

The part of the speech by the hon. member for Eglinton which had to do with the Department of Labour received generous hospitality in the columns of the Globe and Mail this morning, but no other paper I know of has carried any reference to it. I would assume that the latter were all convinced of the emptiness of that particular attack of my hon. friend; and if that is their judgment I fully concur.

Since the last war ended our national employment service has made great strides toward improving its machinery and technique for increasing the production of the country by maintaining our labour force at work where it can best serve, and by reducing to the bare minimum the unavoidable periods of unemployment which are characteristic of certain trades and industry in Canada. I could have much to say on that subject but I will leave it for another opportunity in this debate or later in the session.

For the moment I would like to call attention to the Montreal office, which was the office criticized by the hon. member for Eglinton yesterday. The Montreal branch of the national employment service, as is the case with any other branch, is assisted in its work by a local employment committee formed by representatives of industry, labour and the main organizations in the community, both social and business. It is an advisory committee. Their advice has contributed in the past to the launching of a campaign of publicity and education to develop the trust and eventual co-operation of all parties in industry with the facilities offered by the national employment service. These endeavours have been carried out by means of film showings, newspaper releases, articles, radio talks and personal contacts with employers.

At the Montreal office level, meetings with the advisory committee and other contacts with employers have been followed up during the past five years by the publication of a monthly bulletin. This bulletin is not a publication designed for the public at large. It has a circulation limited to 1,200, 1,000 copies going to the most influential employers of the metropolitan area and about 200 to trade unions, social and business organizations. Often when the bulletin deals with one category of job applicants only, for instance sales and clerical, professional and executive or handicapped and older workers, the bulletin may be sent out to only from 300 to 500, only to those among employers who may have a definite interest in the eventual hiring of that class of applicant. The cost of this bulletin at its very top circulation may run between $20 and $25 a month exclusive of postage. It is in mimeographed form and usually contains from three to five pages. The editor of this monthly bulletin puts together all the resources of his knowledge and ingenuity to make the publication one which will appeal to the employer and be spared from the wastepaper basket for some time at least after it is received.

Usually the bulletin opens with a thought on the plight of the unemployed and the imperative duty for an employer in a country like ours to humanize his handling of employees. The next two or three pages carry a list of job applicants. Their names are omitted purposely and they are referred to by index numbers, by their age and special qualifications. This bulletin issued by the Montreal employment service office has done a great job in the past five years and can still render valuable service. The hon. member for Eglinton may disagree with its editor and the quality of his literature, on the propriety of its quotations or the thoughts which the editor aims to impress upon the minds of employers; but my hon. friend will appreciate from the figures I will give him in a moment that the bulletin in its present form has effectively served its purpose as a liaison agent between the employers and the employment service and as an active factor of effective co-operation between the two.

The total number of placements by the national employment service of Canada for the calendar year 1951 was 926,149. Of that total Montreal contributed 113,705 or 12 per cent. In the section of handicapped and older workers falling in that category, for the year 1951 the total placements for Canada have been 14,344, of which Montreal contributed 4,097 or 28·5 per cent. For this year, up to October 30, the proportion is still higher at 29·5 per cent, Montreal having contributed 3,696 placements of applicants in a total for all of Canada of 12,516 handicapped or older workers.

It was with those figures in mind that I interjected during my hon. friend's speech yesterday that Montreal had about the best record in the whole of Canada for the placement of handicapped and older workers. I should now like to get back to what the hon. member had to say of that bulletin which has been an important factor in the successful placement of unemployed in Montreal. Yesterday afternoon, brandishing the last issue of the bulletin in his hand, the hon. member exclaimed, as reported at page 115 of Hansard:

> . . . I hold the government responsible for the profligate waste of the taxpayers' money on rubbish such as this.

The poetry as to which my hon. friend has offered his comment is not new. I am sure it is known to many of the members of this house. In line with the course of action outlined to him by the local employment committee, the editor of the bulletin had chosen that poetry to combat a modern economic tendency by conveying to the mind of management that it is often inhuman to lay off the worker who has reached the age when it will be most difficult for him to find another job. It was intended to be a caution call, a stop and think twice advice to employers who may be about to dispense with the services of an ageing or disabled worker. To be effective, you have to talk to management as well as to labour in a language which will impress them and which they will understand. If the hon. member for Eglinton would now look at this bulletin again and read that poetry, as to which he tried to make so much yesterday, and do it in the light of the information and the circumstances which I have just recited, I am sure he will have altogether different language to use in his comments on it. Fair-minded as I know him to be, he would have only words of praise for the Montreal office and its advisory committee who sponsor this bulletin which costs so little to the public—a mere $20 a month—and which has been so important a factor in the gaining of such an enviable record for the Montreal office in the placement of older workers, handicapped workers and the unemployed generally.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to say just a word of comment on certain criticism which the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) made last Tuesday. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has already replied to one of his attacks. I do not intend to come back to that particular part of his speech. Turning to Hansard, at page 84 I notice that the hon. member, at the opening of his remarks, tried to make an eloquent appeal which is recorded as follows:

> I want to deal with a great injustice which exists under the Unemployment Insurance Act and which I believe is long overdue for correction. I am referring to the refusal of the government to pay unemployment insurance which a man or woman has standing to his or her credit when that person becomes incapacitated and is unable to continue to work.

I wish to say to my hon. friend that this matter has been discussed quite often since the act came into operation on July 1, 1941, but the administration have always held to the same course, which is that as long as this act is one to deal with unemployment insurance, there is no possibility that its coverage may be extended beyond the scope which was determined in the act by parliament. This is an act of parliament which has been amended quite often in the past ten or eleven years. This fact will indicate the desire and the readiness of the Minister of Labour and of the administration to improve this act more and more in accordance with suggestions which come from organized labour, management and other responsible organizations in this country.

We are still willing—and I think I can speak for the Minister of Labour in saying this—to try to improve upon what we have achieved in the coverage of this act. We shall do it with the guidance of the unemployment insurance advisory committee which is composed of representatives of organized labour, of industry, and of Canada generally. As we go on I think the country, and labour more particularly, will realize that in this government, and more particularly in the Department of Labour, they have real friends who are anxious to provide social assistance to any extent that this parliament will allow.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate—not because it is the custom but because they deserve it—the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both have discharged their duties in a remarkable way, a fact which justifies the confidence reposed in them by the government. I also extend my compliments to the two newly-appointed ministers, namely the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney). The vast experience which they acquired as parliamentary assistants to ministers of the crown and their wide knowledge of public affairs gives assurance that they will perform their functions to the benefit of their respective departments as well as to the advantage of the community.

By reading carefully the speech from the throne one will notice that it contains suggestions which are proper to the present government; that is, the putting into practice of sound policies, such as those applied in the past, in all spheres of our national activity. In other words it is a program of future realizations to be added to all the good measures put forward and realized by the present Liberal administration for the good of the people.

The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) has the thankless task of expressing the point of view of his party. He has measured up to expectations. On the other hand the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his magnificent address, among many other interesting matters with which he dealt, said, as recorded at page 34 of Hansard:

> It is a part of our democratic institutions that there should be someone recognized in our official organizations whose duty it is to watch and criticize what is being done by the advisers of the crown, and I think it is helpful that that should be so. For three and a half years now the government has been attempting to discharge the mandate entrusted to it in 1949. It has not had too much time available to answer criticism, but it has always given close attention to criticism and has always been as attentive as it could be to remedy such weaknesses as the criticism revealed.

These words show the real picture of our Prime Minister, and are a reflection of his good faith and intentions. Never has he turned a deaf ear to what he considered to be good suggestions, regardless of the side of the house from which they came. That is what I call real statesmanship.

Let us see how far the government went in the realization of the program submitted for the approval of the electorate in 1949. The Liberal party at that time, as it always had, stood for the social welfare and the unity of all Canadians. In accordance with their declarations the Liberals, once in office, have made it their duty to adopt measures in order to improve the conditions of life of the less fortunate without neglecting the interests of the others. I mention as examples measures such as that extending old age pensions to the category of people of 65 years of age to 70, and also that providing for the universal pension to those above that age. They have also increased the veterans' pensions and established pensions for the blind. They have also awarded an increase in wages to the civil servants. The grants to hospitals and contributions to health laboratories or clinics in every province amount to millions of dollars, which indicates the solicitude of the government towards the improvement of health conditions and adequate treatment in Canada.

This brings me, incidentally, to a part of the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), concerning a health insurance program, which reads as follows:

> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration.

I know that such a program exists in the province of Saskatchewan, and has existed for a few years. It seems to have given satisfactory results. I know that special attention is being given at the present time, and has been for some time past, to the establishment of a similar plan on a national basis; but I am of the opinion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), whose words were interpreted as follows by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), as reported in Hansard of November 26 at page 102:

> What the hon. member for Peace River asserted was that we are in favour of a national health insurance scheme, to commence at the earliest possible time; but he cautioned the house against any overeager effort on the part of anyone to catapult this nation or the state into any comprehensive scheme of health insurance or hospitalization before the means are available or the facilities are ready for it. The Social Credit leader indicated that the kind of health insurance scheme which we envision would first ensure that we have sufficient doctors, dentists, technicians, clinics and hospital beds available in order to provide the services for all our people under a national health insurance scheme.

This point of view, which I fully endorse, is real wisdom. I know this government is giving this important matter its constant attention, and I am quite sure that in due time, after surveys have been made and necessary precautions taken, and availability of adequate hospitalization assured, a national health insurance program will be added to the many realizations of the party actually in power.

Now let us come back to what this government has done during its present term of office. Many things were said by the opposition in the discussion on the amendment to the Combines Investigation Act, introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), dealing with fixed retail prices. This measure has given good results, except with regard to a few low-cost articles and in particular cigarettes, on which the profit is so low. The abolition of fixed prices on medium or high-priced articles has helped in lowering the cost of living.

In addition to many other opportune measures assuring social security, housing has been given special care and labour problems also have found salutary solutions. The St. Lawrence seaway project is under way; so is the trans-Canada highway, and vast projects of public works are under study.

What has been the most important problem for the government is to assure adequate national defence in order (a) to provide the forces to defend Canada against attack; (b) to provide operational and administrative staffs, equipment, training personnel and secure organization capable of rapid expansion; (c) to work out with other free nations plans for joint defence based on self-help and mutual aid as part of a combined effort to preserve peace and to restrain aggression.

I remember in the early days of my coming to parliament speeches from members of the opposition in which they reproached the government for its lack of real leadership in the face of the sad outlook caused by the opening of hostilities in Korea. These members stated in a combined movement of unsound criticism that Canada was not ready to face the situation. Time has shown that this pessimism was manifested only to serve political purposes. The participation of Canada in the united action of all free nations has been beyond all expectations. Although nothing must be spared, our country is ready to face any aggression. We paid the price for such protection and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, it is the premium paid for the assurance of the survival of democracy.

All these expenses for national defence obviously cannot be made without carrying with them a heavy burden of taxation. Let the menace of war disappear and taxes will accordingly decrease in proportion. Everyone in this house knows that nearly half of all our revenues serves to assure adequate national defence. How can we slow down our efforts in that direction without endangering the lives of our nation and of our allies. Thank God there seems to be place for hope that the danger of war is less and less imminent. Nevertheless no one would suggest, I am sure, that we should cease immediately to prepare ourselves for the eventuality of an unexpected aggression. Hence we must not foresee for some time the complete disappearance of the taxes imposed for national defence purposes, although we might expect a diminution, owing to the fact previously mentioned, namely the absence of immediate danger of war. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the one who will be the most happy to reduce taxes is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). First of all, as a citizen, he has to contribute himself; and second, knowing his natural disposition, I can assert that he will not fail to seize the first opportunity to alleviate the burden imposed on the shoulders of the taxpayers. As all observe, we foresee an increase of production and business and undoubtedly, if prospects are such as they seem to be for the coming year, he will certainly take into account this eventual situation when preparing the next budget.

I am pleased to see him a little more optimistic. Let us hope that this optimism presages good news for Canadians in the taxation field. Although sometimes his decisions were not a source of popularity for the Minister of Finance, he has never shifted his responsibilities. He has been the advocate of the pay-as-you-go policy, avoiding a heavy mortgage on future generations.

Since I am talking of the budget for the coming fiscal year, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the necessity of changing the rate of income tax especially for married people and the heads of families. I know that a couple of years ago—not on the eve of an election, mind you—the scale of deduction was increased, but I respectfully submit that there is place for improvement in this connection. Again I also suggest that all revenues derived from stock market profits, or sales of businesses, should be taxed at the source when the transaction takes place. I know of some people selling their stores and properties and realizing a profit of thousands of dollars after only a few years of possession. Fortunes have been realized in stock market transactions without any sort of tax being imposed on the beneficiaries.

I ardently hope that the rate of excise tax imposed on cigarettes will be again decreased, and for many reasons, the principal one being the urgent need of putting an end to smuggling, which has become the greatest competitor of the manufacturers of this product. These manufacturers in certain cases have been forced to lay off some of their personnel. If the expenditures for defence production are to be less and the rhythm of business increased, these suggestions can be put into effect without fear of a deficit.

There is one particular point I wish to bring to the attention of the government, and that is the necessity of studying the opportunity of imposing higher duties on raw materials being exported, if it is at all possible to do so. I shall mention one only, although a complete revision should be made in respect of other products. I would make particular mention of raw furs, which are bought here at a low price, used on a wide scale in the manufacture of coats and all sorts of other garments, and which are dumped here afterwards at very low prices, due to mass production which is carried out particularly in the United States. The result is that our fur workers are kept idle many months of the year when they could be employed manufacturing these products, if it were not for the unfair competition they cannot meet.

Coming back to the reduction of taxes, one must bear in mind the fact that this would not be possible if the government were to listen to the suggestions coming from the opposite side of the house from hon. members who illogically call for increased expenditures approaching some $600 million and demand at the same time a diminution in taxes.

Mr. Fleming: Don't say that.

Mr. Dupuis: You do not say that?

Mr. Fleming: Don't say we called for increased expenditures; that is far from the fact.

Mr. Dupuis: That is what you have been saying for a long time.

Mr. Fleming: No; that is what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said erroneously the other night.

Mr. Dupuis: I have heard it from you.

Mr. Fleming: You heard the Prime Minister say it.

Mr. Dupuis: No; I heard your leader, and the hon. member for Eglinton at the same time, proposing all sorts of expenditures while at the same time asking diminution in taxation. I heard that.

Mr. Fleming: No, you did not hear that.

Mr. Dupuis: Well, if you did not say it I am afraid you are going to be reproached by your chief. Enough has been said on this subject, so that I shall not take more time in offering proof as to how inconsistent these suggestions are. It is evident that this kind of opposition is only an attempt to get votes at the next election. Well, let me tell my hon. friends that they are wasting their time, because the people of this country have enough sense to read the minds of these alleged saviours, and to realize their lack of sincerity and seriousness.

An appeal to the people is expected during the course of the next year. Already all sorts of prognostications are in the air. These are not very promising for any of the opposition parties, and if there is any doubt in their minds I would refer their supporters to the Gallup poll inquiries which indicate, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), that the stock of the Conservative party has dropped even faster than has the cost of living index in this country. The same will be the fate of the other two parties, if the predictions of the article which appears in the Evening Citizen of November 20 are realized. This article was quoted by the hon. member to whom I have just referred, and reads as follows:

> There is not just one opposition party, as in the United States, striving to push the government out of power, but three, and no one of them has shown any sign of rising to a really dominant position over the others. The Liberals, on the other hand, have in Mr. St. Laurent a leader whose prestige stands high throughout the country. Especially is this true of his own province, and no Canadian political party can hope to win office without showing marked strength in Quebec.

I understand the opponents of the Liberal party will use the slogan which some people believe contributed in a high degree to the victory of General Eisenhower in the recent American election. That was the slogan "It's time for a change".

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dupuis: Well, you will not say "Hear, hear" in a while. Just listen to the rest of what I have to say. It's time for a change—not on this side of the house, but on your side—a change in the ideals you have set out in the past, a change in the principles of your party.

What a disillusionment! Everyone knows that the situation created by the Democratic party in the United States through scandals connected with high-ranking Democratic public servants does not apply in Canada, or to this Liberal government. This is the government which held office throughout the last war, handling and spending billions of dollars, and without a single scandal.

Mr. Casselman: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Dupuis: Are you feeling badly already about my remarks? I am just starting. I am just beginning to be myself, because generally I begin to warm up only after I have been speaking about an hour and a half.

Mr. Casselman: Do it tomorrow, and you will have more time.

Mr. Knowles: Is that how you beat the Liberal in St. Mary?

Mr. Dupuis: I did not beat any Liberal in St. Mary. I was a Liberal myself, and I thought I would be a better representative than my opponent. Some other people thought the same way, and I am here.

In Canada we can depend on the honesty of our public servants, and that of this Liberal government which, during its long term of office, has never been suspected of corruption of any sort. Eisenhower has to his credit a life entirely devoted and heroically consecrated to his country. I wonder if we could find a person with such merit in the ranks of the opposition, so they might feel that they have a chance to take office after the next appeal to the people.

Other factors, such as controversies in connection with the settlement of labour questions, and the part taken by the United States in international affairs, have engaged the attention of our neighbours, and there is no doubt that these factors influenced the verdict of the electors in that country. In Canada the achievement of the Liberal party in all spheres of our national economy is the assurance of the confidence it will receive from the Canadian people. Under the direction of its most worthy chief, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, the Liberal party can face the coming appeal to the people with serenity.

Mr. Fleming: When is it coming?

Mr. Dupuis: Well, I think it will be too soon for the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: Bring it on.

Mr. Dupuis: Is it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

On motion of Mr. Dupuis the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 28, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GARSON—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR BRANDON

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon I was carrying out an engagement on public business in my own office and I was necessarily absent from the chamber when the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale), in the course of his remarks, attributed to me a statement in these words, which I must repudiate as being incorrect. They are found on page 163 of Hansard, as follows:

> For example, our Manitoba minister, speaking recently in Preeceville, Saskatchewan, criticized the trend toward industrialization on the prairies, claiming it to be a revival of what he termed Tory protectionism, whatever that may be.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in that address I never even mentioned the trend toward industrialization on the prairies, let alone criticize it. What I said—and I will quote two sentences—was this:

> Yet, some people in Canada argue that the course of our development should be altered, that we should process and finish more of our own raw materials in Canada; and that, for example, rather than export iron ore, we should enlarge the steel-producing capacity of this country. Now, while from our government's deeds it is perfectly clear—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I ask what is the point of privilege that is under consideration?

Mr. Garson: I have just stated it. If my hon. friend will contain himself for about fifteen seconds I shall finish my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Minister of Justice was not in the house when the hon. member for Brandon attributed to him certain statements which he states were not made by him. If the minister had been in the house, according to custom, he would have been permitted, at the end of the speech of the hon. member, to correct any incorrect statements that had been made regarding him.

Mr. Drew: I am merely raising the question because it is obvious that he would be in a position on a question of privilege to correct any inaccurate statements, but I would point out that the minister is taking the occasion to make a speech, and we have from him another speech.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I must object to my hon. friend's interjection. I am not making a speech; I am repudiating what is attributed to me, and stating what I actually said at that time.

Mr. Casselman: What page?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister of Justice should only complete the statement which he actually did make, without further comment thereon.

Mr. Garson: As I was quoting, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted:

> Now, while from our government's deeds it is perfectly clear that we believe in enlarging the steel or any other producing capacity of Canada to the optimum point, we do not by any means agree with the view that we should process all of our raw materials in this country.

Mr. Pearkes: Are you going to read the whole speech?

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR PEACE RIVER

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege; I did not want to raise this while the hon. member was speaking, but the other afternoon I endeavoured to correct a statement which was being made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I was told that I could not do that until the amendment to the amendment had been disposed of. I am in the very difficult position today of not having been able to say anything to correct what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. My recollection is that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stated that he had the proof of the statement which he made, and he wanted to prove what he had previously said. Of course I could not allow that. Today the Minister of Justice has corrected a statement which was directed to him. The other day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) wanted to prove a statement he had already made.

Mr. Coldwell: I think probably you misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member had made a statement that I had said something, and I wished to correct it. I think perhaps there was a misunderstanding in that regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: If there was a misunderstanding, it is unfortunate, and I regret it. In any event I could not have allowed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to make another speech at that time.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that.

FISHERIES

OPENING OF CHANNEL TO FACILITATE SALMON FISHING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister state what action he intends to take in regard to the request of west coast fishermen that salmon fishing in December be allowed in part of area 3 owing to the fact that labour disputes interfered with fishing this year?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question, because it afforded me an opportunity to get in touch with the west coast. This winter run of chum salmon is a type of fishing which has never been fished in the past, for conservation reasons. However, because fishing stoppages last summer have resulted in adequate escapement of salmon for spawning this year, as an experiment it is intended to open the area from Satellite channel to Comox from December 15 to December 31.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention to set up a special committee on atomic energy during the present session? He will remember that there was some discussion of this matter at the last session. I believe at that time he intimated that it was probable there would be such a committee during the 1953 session.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): No consideration has been given to the subject matter of the question as yet. However, when the time arrives to set up committees, consideration will be given and I will give an answer at that time.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that I, too, think it would be a good idea to have that committee set up.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

ARMED FORCES

SUPPLIES OF APPLE JUICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production. Has his attention been drawn to an article appearing in this morning's Ottawa Citizen dealing with the purchase for our armed forces of a quantity of apple juice, and would he care to comment thereon?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I did notice the article. I had a word with my parliamentary assistant, the hon. senior member for Halifax. Perhaps he could throw some light on the subject.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question I would reply that Canadian apple juice, fortified or vitamized, is on the ration scale of all three of our armed services, and is purchased in volume for consumption. Purchases are made from the industry in Nova Scotia, central Canada and British Columbia.

Apple processors do not operate their plants on a year-round basis, and do not have storage space to hold large quantities available. It is therefore good business for us to purchase these seemingly large amounts from the processors, in season, rather than from wholesalers as required throughout the year. The purchases referred to in the press dispatch, to which reference has been made, constitute one year's supply for the army, navy and air force.

ESTABLISHMENT OF UNITED STATES FIGHTER SQUADRONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has seen a dispatch in several newspapers today, including the Gazette and the Globe and Mail to the effect that United States fighter squadrons are to be established in Newfoundland at various points, and whether he is prepared to make comment.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yes, I have seen these references, and I would be glad to make a statement in view of them. It had been intended that a statement would be made on the subject before this, but it was necessary, in the practice of international courtesy, to clear the statement with the United States authorities before it was made. That statement was cleared on November 25 and I am informed that it was issued that day by External Affairs to the Canadian press. I do not think however that it has appeared in the press, except in the form to which the hon. member referred.

The statement is as follows:

In the agreement between the Canadian and Newfoundland governments at the time of the construction of Goose Bay air base, it was agreed that the base should be available to the USAF for the duration of the war and for such time thereafter as the governments agreed was necessary in the interests of common defence. The USAF have remained at Goose Bay with the consent of the Canadian government since the war.

In view of the increased international tension during the last three years the USAF and RCAF facilities at Goose Bay have been considerably expanded. The base is, in effect, a joint defence installation and is being used by both air forces in accordance with their agreed requirements.

As a result of this situation there have been USAF squadrons at Goose Bay from time to time.

I should add—despite the fact that this has not been cleared with the United States authorities, I think the house is entitled to the information, and newspaper reports make it necessary—that this is part of the Canadian-United States regional security arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Under these arrangements we have had considerable formations training in the United States, and they have had considerable formations training in Canada.

I recall for example the 25th brigade training at Fort Lewis, and almost all amphibious training of Canadian forces has been done in the United States. This is an arrangement of exactly the same kind, and it should not be regarded as anything else. It will involve from time to time United States squadrons visiting Canadian stations and being stationed there for limited periods of time, subject of course to our preliminary agreement in each case—except with respect to the leased bases—all in accordance with the arrangements we have worked out. In every case—except in the leased bases—the station will continue under Canadian command.

Mr. Pearkes: Is it intended to extend this principle to other parts of Canada? The minister made reference to the temporary stationing of units in Canada. But, so far as Goose Bay is concerned, is it not on a more permanent basis?

Mr. Claxton: No, there is no intention of stationing any squadron in Canada at the present time. Goose is the only place contemplated within the territory of Canada, except the leased bases.

Mr. Higgins: Not the squadron personnel at Torbay?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Higgins: Are the facilities of these airports to be increased to take care of this additional use?

Mr. Claxton: Torbay is to be expanded to take care of increased supply requirements of the United States air force, particularly pointing toward the northeast, to Greenland. But it is not intended at the present time to increase the operational activities at Torbay.

PHOTOGRAPHY—INQUIRY CONCERNING PERMISSION FROM WASHINGTON

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the statement of Mr. Clete Roberts, I should like to ask if it is correct that before he was permitted to take pictures of the Royal Canadian Air Force he had, first of all, to clear them with Washington—or at least our air force had to clear with Washington before permission could be given to take those pictures of our own air force.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I am not aware of that matter. I shall have to look into it. However, we would not permit United States photographers to take photographs of Canadian stations without having Canadian permission.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not what he said. He said the Canadian air force had to clear with Washington before permission could be given for him to take the pictures.

Mr. Claxton: I think it would be necessary for him to clear the matter, for purposes of security, and to make arrangements for joint examination before they were shown.

POSTAL SERVICE

SATURDAY AFTERNOON CLOSING—MEDICINE HAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, on November 25 the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) asked the following question as reported at page 62 of Hansard of that date:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I am sorry that I did not send him notice of it, but I imagine that he will be able to answer it. In view of the fact that the post office in the city of Medicine Hat is closed on Saturday afternoons, will he give serious consideration to keeping it open on those afternoons? It is a big handicap to the people to have to come in to the city on Saturdays.

Since this question was, at the time, taken as a notice, I now wish to answer it as follows:

Medicine Hat post office closes all wickets on Saturday afternoons at 1 p.m., which is the practice in a large number of city post offices.

Other phases of postal business, such as receipt and dispatch of mail, are provided as usual.

The wickets are closed in the majority of post offices on the afternoon of the day that is observed as the weekly half holiday by the majority of business houses in the community, which in Medicine Hat is Saturday, for the following reason:

(a) There is a decided falling off in the demand for service from the public, and

(b) The observance of a weekly half holiday makes it easier to provide a 44-hour week to the employees in the post office concerned.

This is the first complaint that we have received from Medicine Hat with regard to the closing of wickets on Saturday afternoons, but if it is the wish of the majority of the patrons that Wednesday afternoon be observed instead, the department would have no objection.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I was just saying at the adjournment last night that the Liberal party can face the coming appeal to the people with serenity. We are proud of our most worthy chief, Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, who still has the confidence of the nation. Nobody ever thought that the present government was perfect, but I do not hesitate to say that its leaders have always shown a sense of real comprehension of the aspirations of the people and have endeavoured to serve their interests to the best of their ability, and with an ardent desire to assure the highest standard of living ever known here, contrary to the situation existing under some Conservative governments, and especially during the period of 1930 to 1935.

I will admit that it is time for change. That will be, I think, the slogan of the opposition. It may be time for a change, as I said yesterday, in the leadership of the Conservative party in this country, and also in the ideals of that party. As to the other parties represented in this house, I do not think that their respective principles or doctrines would be beneficial to our country, and I do not think that they can count on a large support among the electorate. I wish I had better news to give to my friends on the other side of the house.

While Sir John Macdonald, Laurier, Borden, King and now St. Laurent have exerted themselves to assure national unity in our country, we see on the other hand politicians provoking the minority, thus creating dissension by declarations such as the following, which has not been denied and which was made by the present leader of the official opposition. I will quote an excerpt from an article which appeared in Everybody's Weekly, a British publication, on September 30, 1944, containing an interview of the man who at that time was premier of the province of Ontario:

> "Bax", said the latter to the English M.P., "I want British stock for Ontario. We can take thousands and thousands of your people. The one thing that can keep the French-Canadian pressure within bounds is a strong Ontario, peopled by British stock."

That was said by the present Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the hon. member is reading what has been handed to him, and I excuse him to that extent. But I would point out that what he probably does not know is—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: Never mind. I like these interruptions.

Mr. Drew: What the hon. member probably does not know is that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Leader of the Opposition is rising to deny that he made a statement that has been attributed to him. I think he should be allowed to do that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that what the hon. member probably does not know is that at that time it was quite clearly demonstrated that the interview had not taken place and that fact was recognized at the time and generally understood. I can only add at this point that the hon. member is making a wonderful contribution to the national unity which he pretends to advocate.

Mr. Dupuis: I know quite well that the Leader of the Opposition regrets having uttered such words.

Mr. Brooks: He never uttered them.

Mr. Dupuis: Really, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to compare the Leader of the Opposition to a criminal. There is no doubt about that. But he makes me think of a man, on the morning of his execution, getting on the scaffold and imploring the hangman for mercy, and telling him that he will not do it any more.

Those words have never been denied before. I find that they indicate a great magnanimity, a great patriotism and a good sense of mutual comprehension!

On another occasion the same gentleman proved what use he was making of national unity when he declared in a radio speech which he delivered on August 9, 1944, the folowing words as reported the next day in one of his friend's dailies, the Toronto Star.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: That is all right. Maybe I make a mistake once in a while, but I hope that I will not live long enough to make as many and as ghastly mistakes as the Conservative party has made ever since confederation has existed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: Just a minute. I know it is not very pleasant but we have some questions to settle here. The report stated:

Mr. Drew termed the family allowance bill an obvious bribe and said "there was every reason why this measure should meet with approval in Quebec where there was a very important election approaching.

It was not written by anybody else but the paper that reported it; and mind you, nobody ever touched that speech of mine. If I am reading a bit, I am just following the example given me by the Leader of the Opposition who read his speech right through. The report continues:

The premier—

That is the premier of Ontario at that time, now the Leader of the Opposition. He has probably not changed his mentality but rather his way of expressing himself in order to try to get some votes.

—asked, "Are we going to permit one isolationist province to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada? I hope that each one of you will answer a resounding "no" which will be heard in every part of the province of Quebec."

I assure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that the resounding "no" has been heard in every part of Quebec and in the country at large and by our English-speaking fellow citizens of other provinces who believe that harmony and comprehension are the basis of the future prosperity of the country. Yes, this resounding "no" is still in the ears of all good Canadians and the disastrous political fate of the one responsible for such an outrage to millions of Canadians will be the ransom of this unpatriotic appeal.

It is good to say these things because after all there is no statesman, no politician who has the right to insult or provoke any race in this country. It will take very many speeches by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), who was elected by accident, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche), who was also elected by accident, before the people will forget such seditious remarks. All those who stand for national unity have already repudiated the author of such attacks against millions of Canadians. I know the broadmindedness of my English-speaking fellow citizens, and I am sure that they do not concur in such subversive language. I want to assure my colleagues who speak the English language, Mr. Speaker, that, notwithstanding my origin, notwithstanding the language I speak in my home, I am proud of one thing, not only of being a French Canadian but of being a Canadian, whatever my origin may be. At the same time I cannot support anybody insulting the millions of the minority in this great country.

Yes, it is time for a change. I repeat that it is time for a change, not on this side but on the other side of the house, in the ideals of the nation's destroyers of this calibre. Canada will never take the chance of placing its destiny in such hands. That is my own feeling and I am sure that I echo the opinion of the majority in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has referred to two other hon. members as having been elected by accident. That is not in accordance with the rules of the house and I think the hon. member must withdraw those remarks. I could not on account of the interruptions follow the hon. member closely enough, but I think he also accused certain hon. members of sedition. If so, I would ask him to withdraw those remarks also.

Mr. Dupuis: I will say "non-amicable speeches" instead of "seditious". As far as those two members being elected by accident is concerned would the words "by luck" be allowed?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member ought to know.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose that might apply to all of us.

Mr. Dupuis: My modesty forbids me to say the contrary. Coming back to the chances of my dear friends on the other side, of other opposition parties, particularly the C.C.F., I must say that the province of Quebec, together with all other provinces except Saskatchewan, believes in private enterprise and will not adhere for a long time, if it ever does, to a policy of state control of industries. It is too bad for my friends of the C C.F. party but really I do not see any chance for them in the whole of Canada.

I turn now to the Social Crediters. You know, Mr. Speaker, I am analysing the chances of these parties because once in a while people get up on the other side of the house and say, "Wait for the next appeal; you are going to have to take responsibility for this, that and the other thing when you appeal to the people." I am just giving my own opinion about what I think.

An hon. Member: It is not worth much.

Mr. Dupuis: This is not an election speech. It is a speech I can make in this parliament just the same as if I were on the hustings because what I say on the hustings I can repeat in parliament. I do not use different words and I do not have different feelings.

Mr. Argue: How many thousand reprints are you getting?

Mr. Dupuis: I am not going to get one reprint of my speech, and I never have. The people know that the representative of the constituency of St. Mary always does his duty and that is what I am doing at the present time. As to the Social Crediters, I have only a few words. Apparently this party seems to carry on the administration of the government of Alberta to the satisfaction of the people of that province but I find it strange that its leaders have thought it wiser not to put into force the doctrine of the founder of social credit who repudiated Canadian Social Crediters for this very reason. Have they realized that this doctrine is a doctrine of Utopia? I do not know. I was told that a large number of Social Credit supporters were only disguised Tories. That is not a good recommendation as far as I am concerned, and there is good proof of it. Considering the matter further, if we look at the new cabinet that has been formed in British Columbia we find many ministers who were at one time prominent members of the Conservative party, so if they are not disguised Tories they are at least converted Tories.

To summarize my remarks, and before I address a special request to the government, I must say that the majority of Canadians find that they are fortunate to have in charge of the direction of the affairs of our country men of the type represented by those who compose the present government and who belong to the party responsible for the prodigious strides our country has known during the twentieth century, which will be that of Canada, as predicted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I come now to my request that I mentioned a moment ago. Before doing so, I must say that my remarks have not been based on hatred or vengeance, but I say to the Leader of the Opposition that if you spare the rod you are liable to spoil the child, and if my remarks lead him to change whatever opinion he may have had in the past I will be the first one to be glad of it.

Once more I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to a matter I have mentioned before. I ask him to give special consideration to the request of thousands of people for the abolition of the tolls charged on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges. These are the only two government bridges on which a toll is levied. I understand that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) will introduce during the course of this session a motion to abolish these tolls which I will be pleased to second. I know about the high cost of construction of the Jacques Cartier bridge but it is no more than that of the Quebec bridge on which the toll was abolished after an agreement with the province of Quebec. I wonder if the same thing cannot be done for the Jacques Cartier bridge.

The south shore of the St. Lawrence opposite Montreal has developed amazingly and the population is increasing very rapidly. For example, one can refer to the town of Jacques Cartier of ten years ago when it had a population of at the most 700 people whereas today it has a population of 30,000 to 35,000. There is a reason for that. These people were previously citizens of Montreal and they had to leave the city and build homes on the south shore because of the expensive construction costs involved in complying with municipal construction regulations. These people still work in Montreal. They have to use the bridge every day and, although they combine together and travel for instance five in a car, they have to pay a fee each day which, at the end of the month, represents quite a large sum for those workers who have been forced to migrate to the south shore, if I may express myself that way. I hope the minister will give the matter special attention.

In addition, on week ends especially, a real bottleneck for traffic is created there. People have to wait for blocks and blocks and blocks before they can get on the bridge. If there could be some understanding arrived at with the province of Quebec, as was the case with the Quebec bridge, we could probably expect to give satisfaction to that part of what I call greater Montreal.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell every member of this house that he can count on my support for every move tending to better living conditions in this country and to assure perfect comprehension between citizens, irrespective of their origin, creed or language.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of unduly extending this debate. However, I am duty bound to place before the house the problems of my constituents.

Following the example set by previous speakers, I am happy to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have performed their duty in a manner that honours their electors.

May I also be permitted to offer my congratulations and best wishes to the two new members of the cabinet as well as to our new colleagues, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque).

As I previously stated in this house, the electors of Kamouraska are mainly farmers, which is normal for agriculture is the main source of income of our people, since 76 per cent of the territory of my constituency is made up of forests. There are not many industries, yet our workers are quite skilled and only awaiting a favourable occasion to show what they can do.

When I assumed the task of representing the electors of Kamouraska, I thought it my duty to take every possible means to promote industrial expansion and development in the district. For the natural increase of the population being considerable, five or six hundred of our young men and women are forced, every year, to look for employment elsewhere after completing their high-school or technical education. A study of our vital statistics has enabled me to grasp the extent of this problem. This is the reason why I am opposing any mass and uncontrolled immigration.

I know we have large unsettled areas and I understand that it is our duty to accept new citizens when it is in the interest of the economy of the country as a whole to do so.

As the population of the constituency of Kamouraska is made up of farmers, I will speak first of the agricultural situation in the province of Quebec and convey to this house the observations which have been suggested to me. Twenty-two per cent of the 670,000 acres of the constituency of Kamouraska are devoted to agriculture and, in spite of sound price support legislation, present economic conditions make our farmers somewhat uneasy. These last few years, thanks to a well managed economy, our farmers have enjoyed prosperous times. I must admit that they work hard from dawn to dusk and that theirs is not a forty-hour week.

In my district, this year, the hay crop has been plentiful. Grain production, though, is far below standard. Taking into account a possible drop in beef or pork prices, it must be recognized that there is no adequate relationship between feed prices and the price of products such as milk, meat or eggs. Farmers gain little profit thereby.

Such being the case, I wonder if it would not be advisable to establish in the east a branch office of the grain exchange. In this way our merchants and farmers would be able to control the value of the goods they buy. I am perfectly aware of the situation and I would like this matter to be studied seriously.

I know, however, that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has shown a great solicitude toward the farmers, but I wonder whether the officials of the Department have given him adequate information about agriculture in Quebec.

Besides, Mr. Minister, you have endowed my constituency with an agricultural centre which is all to your honour. The experimental farm of Ste. Anne de la Pocatière benefits from your generosity. Moreover, you have authorized the construction of a new research laboratory and I know that this building will receive all the personnel and equipment that it requires, so that it may be adequate to the beauty of the site it occupies.

However, our fairs do not receive the assistance one may expect and the regulations of your department should be, in my opinion, more flexible, in order that we may apply them more readily to our type of farming.

We should give our agriculture enough publicity if we wish to avoid, as between our urban and rural population, a state of unbalance which might become dangerous for those in charge of administration. Up to now, our agricultural societies have borne alone the whole burden of expenses. A glance at the shifting of Quebec's population shows that in 1871, 77 per cent of our people lived on the land and 23 per cent in the cities.

Now, in 1941, our urban population represents 63 per cent and our rural population 37 per cent of the total. Those figures rather lead us to believe in the existence of a certain unbalance, which it will be necessary to correct in the interest of Canada's economy as a whole.

I bring my remarks on agriculture to a close by congratulating the Department of Agriculture on having provided for grants to our farmers, under the Canada Grain Act. This measure has been enthusiastically received in the province of Quebec and I am convinced that it has proved most popular among our farmers. However, I wish the act were more precise with regard to grain mixtures, so that buyers would have no misgivings about what they are buying.

During the month of August, it was my privilege to attend a meeting of the Federation of the Catholic Farmers' Union held in Ste. Anne de la Pocatière. I was present at all sessions and admired the seriousness of their discussions. Three of the resolutions that were sent to the federal government had to do with the adoption of a Canadian flag, an envoy to the Vatican and bilingual pension cheques.

The adoption of a flag: This request was also sent to me by members of La Société Saint-Jean Baptiste. I understand that one reason why the adoption of that measure has been delayed is perhaps the distance which divides the different racial groups comprising our nation. The flag must hold in its folds the good will of a united nation. Far from loosening the bonds of what we have most at heart, Canadian unity, it must draw those bonds closer. No nation can live without the union of all its forces, without that respect which gives confidence, without that love which unites the power of men.

Why shouldn't we send an ambassador to the Vatican since other countries have thought and still think that religious differences must not enter into consideration in the matter of deciding whether or not to send a representative to the only state which is absolutely independent? But there again, such a gesture should not be interpreted as something which might divide the various elements constituting the nation.

We come now to the question of bilingual cheques. Why shouldn't the Department of Finance send out bilingual cheques, so that our brothers in the maritimes, our neighbours in Ontario, the western farmers, and our Newfoundland friends may thus feel the unity of our nation? Our nation is complex not on account of differences in opinion but because of the distances which separate its various elements.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention very briefly another point. Since August, I have received a great many messages from those of my constituents who belong to the Union of Electors of the province of Quebec. They want the rate of payment of family allowances to be doubled. I know that family allowances and old age pensions have greatly benefited and helped many people. I am aware that the cost of living is very high, but I am confident in the future. I shall be only too glad if economic conditions permit such an expenditure.

However, we must remember that old age pensions are paid by a Liberal federal government; the Liberal federal government takes upon itself the whole cost of old age pensions to people aged 70 and pays half the cost of pensions to those between 65 and 70 years of age. I am therefore satisfied that such a request cannot be immediately granted unless the necessary revenues can be found for that purpose without the government having to increase our already high level of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, I have already asked the house to do something for destitute and crippled people. A government that has already come to the assistance of our aged citizens is duty bound to help the handicapped. However, requests of that kind should not be detrimental to our economy and tend to increase the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by asking the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to have a survey made by the engineers of his department of the damages caused by erosion in some parts of my constituency, at Riviere-Ouelle in particular. I have already indicated in this house the causes of this erosion which it might be very easy to remedy in some cases and in so doing we will contribute greatly to alleviating the concern of owners of properties bordering on the river.

I have made these few remarks as a contribution to the improvement of the situation and also in the interest of my constituents.

I know that the state cannot replace the farmers themselves but it is its duty to inform, educate and find new markets, in order to ensure the welfare of the farmers of Quebec and of the whole country. The best way to foster Canadian unity is through the boundless confidence of every Canadian in their leaders and the present government of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent gives us every guarantee in that respect.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like first, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Yesterday an hon. member rose to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) a question concerning the latest arrival of cigarettes into Canada from the United States. The tobacco business not being foreign to me in any way, having grown tobacco, manufactured it, wholesaled it, retailed it, smoked it and chewed it, I felt I could say something of interest on the subject. At the moment I see this problem perhaps in a more serious aspect than many hon. members.

We have in this country, over the course of several years, developed very fine types of tobacco. We had to produce the very finest type in order to compete with the United States product in the world markets. For instance, Great Britain was formerly buying the United States product. As everyone here knows, ever since the party opposite, which now holds the reins of government in Ottawa, has been in power, they have extracted from the tobacco industry excessive and exorbitant taxes.

An hon. Member: They are doing pretty well.

Mr. Murphy: Someone said, "They are doing pretty well". They could do better. The policy of the Liberal party has been to crucify the tobacco grower; in any event they have been doing it for years. We now find this cigarette, as many people must know, coming into Canada to retail in the large chain grocery stores at 33 cents as against our ordinary cigarette selling at 39 cents. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, this big difference of 6 cents in a package of 20 cigarettes arises from the difference in quality of the various brands. Anyone who has smoked this new brand knows that it is what you might call an outdoor cigarette. Anyone who would dare to smoke it in the house would be chased out by his own wife or his neighbour. Anyone who has attempted to smoke even two or three puffs of it knows that it is manufactured out of what we call distress tobacco.

I have no interest in any way, shape or form in any tobacco business, including those fields that I covered a few moments ago; but at stake in this country is the interest of tobacco producers in many parts of Canada, especially in Ontario. I have particular reference to flue-cured tobacco, burley and plug, and also the cigar tobacco which is produced in Quebec. It may be that these people have complied with the law with respect to dumping duty, customs regulations and tariffs and all that sort of thing, but if our manufacturers are to compete with that particular brand—and I recognize that the same manufacturer can produce different brands of the same cigarette—some help will have to be given to them. It is going to have a terrific impact on our tobacco growers, especially those in Ontario. If the manufacturer in this country is to compete against that type of tobacco he will have to use a similar type of tobacco to produce a similar cigarette to sell at a low price. That will mean a lessening of the demand for the higher types of tobacco, which we have taken years to perfect.

I hate to think of what will happen next year to the tobacco growers who have a huge investment in tobacco plantations in this country. I hate to think what will happen not only when they come to plant, but also when they come to sell. We have lost our British market for most of this tobacco—that is the better class of tobacco—and if the manufacturers are to compete against this particular brand, then the producers will be crucified because of the lack of action on the part of the government.

Many of these people grow tobacco on land that is not suitable for anything else. Anyone who is in the tobacco business knows that. There is a way out. Like other nations, we have subscribed to treaties and trade agreements. There is a clause in the Geneva trade agreement that would apply to the subject which I shall also discuss in a few minutes. I am referring to the sugar beet industry and the importation of refined sugar from Cuba. As I recall it, article 19 is the governing clause. The essence of the article is that any country whose primary producers are suffering because of the importation of goods of any kind may protect those producers. That is the essence of protection which can be afforded to our producers. It applies not only to tobacco growers in Ontario and elsewhere, but to others as well. It is now the responsibility of the government to do something. We would not be the first country on the face of this earth that has subscribed to trade agreements and at the same time availed itself of the escape clauses provided in the agreements.

Before the session opened I noticed several instances of Liberal members, who of course had attended the Liberal meeting here in Ottawa some few weeks ago, warning the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the other ministers about the radio tax and the television tax. Their complaint was that their constituents should not be burdened with these picayune taxes on radios and that in their areas a television tax should not be imposed. Our party has gone on record in respect to radio licence fees ever since I have been in this house. We have opposed them for many years. Many of us in the official opposition have, on more than one occasion, stated on the floor of this house that we are opposed to any government levying a tax on television in Canada, especially in those areas that are now, and will continue to be, serviced by United States outlets. In the course of his speech on Monday last the leader of this party devoted some time to the question of television, and I fully subscribe to what he said.

There is another matter which concerns many business people in this country. I refer to the sort of double talk that we have been hearing from ministers of the crown with respect to whether we are going to have a decrease in our taxes. When the Minister of Finance was in British Columbia some few weeks ago, apparently attempting to mend some political fences that are in a bad state of disrepair, he made a speech which implied that the government had tax reductions in mind. This was recorded by the press of Canada. A reference to tax reductions was hurled across the nation that same night by the C.B.C. in its national news broadcast. However, the next day the newspapers had an interview with the minister, and he was reported as having said that tax reductions could not be expected in the next budget. I bring this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because it brings to mind the same tactics used by the same minister when he presented his budget last session. The first part of that budget seemed to indicate a reduction in taxes. When the ten o'clock news came on the air the news was hurled across the nation that the minister had brought down a tax reduction. When the speech was completed we found, of course, that taxes were not decreased but were increased. I say, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians have had enough of this two-way presentation of fiscal policy which in one breath promises tax reductions, and in the next takes them away or even increases them. We have the same illustration in the Quebec by-elections. As reported in the press, the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) made the statement down there that tax reductions are warranted. Yet, in the same campaign the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) said the government needed the money, and that taxes could not be reduced.

If they are allowed to continue, these political manoeuvres—because that is what they are—will be detrimental to the country. They serve only to create a state of confusion as to what might be expected by way of taxation. I do not think that is fair to the business people or to the wage earners in this country.

Today people must plan ahead. This way of conducting the affairs of the country beclouds the issue and confuses the Canadian taxpayer.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Let me say this same Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), about whom I spoke a moment ago, has, since December 10, 1946, accumulated surplus after surplus each year, to the extent of well over a million dollars a day. This, I would point out, is taxation in excess of the cost of government, in excess of the cost of social security, in excess of the cost of our defence program, all of which were adequately provided for by parliament. In respect of defence requirements, the amount proved to be more than the government was able to spend. This record of overtaxation, which takes away a million dollars each day, was never the intent and purpose of parliament and was never, in my opinion, intended to be the fiscal policy of this country. Yet the government has extracted this huge amount of money from the Canadian people over and above the requirements granted by parliament.

The wage earner who goes home each week, or at the end of every two weeks, with his pay cheque is greatly disturbed about the amount of money he must pay in taxation, particularly when he sees the extravagance and recklessness of the government. No wonder that in the last few months we find that when government representatives have appeared before the people in by-elections, they have been defeated. Prior to the last two, nine of those by-elections were won by Progressive Conservative candidates.

In New Brunswick only a few weeks ago the party which has held office almost as long as the one in office here in Ottawa was rebuked by the voters of that province. And, remember, it is the voter who has the power to rebuke. I feel satisfied that when the Canadian people have the opportunity at the next election they will do across the country what they did in New Brunswick only a few weeks ago.

I should like at this time to refer to a few of the items so ably covered by my leader last Monday. I refer to these cases of extravagance and reckless buying for defence purposes. I would refer, first, to an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail some few days ago. I am sure, as my leader said, this article can be relied upon.

I would refer first to rugs and carpets costing $839,903. I notice that the item for carpets amounts to $643,000—practically $645,000. If that carpet were to be laid over a sidewalk three feet wide it would extend some 37 miles.

There is an item of $450,000 for linoleum which, I would hope, would not cost more than $3 a yard. I am sure the carpets could be bought for $10 a square yard. The linoleum would cover a sidewalk three feet wide and 80 miles long. That is a little more than anyone would care to walk, for light exercise.

Mr. Dickey: Has the hon. member read the proceedings of the defence expenditures committee, at the time when all these matters were dealt with much more fully than they are in the press clippings to which he is referring?

Mr. Murphy: I would hope that when the defence committee meets again it would not be throttled by a huge Liberal majority.

Mr. Dickey: That is a pretty poor answer.

Mr. Murphy: Then, enough raincoats have been purchased to last those requiring them for the next fifty years. Yet this Liberal government is now asking the veterans who fought in two world wars and are preparing for a third to pay such extravagant amounts for this department—and no doubt the same thing applies in other departments. It is unfair to the veterans and to everyone else in this country. These people are placed in the position where they must spend dollars out of their pay cheques to make these unnecessary expenditures. That is the way the public feel about it today.

We had a good illustration of this at the last session when the hon. member for Greenwood, who sits in front of me, brought evidence that the government had ordered some 60,000 serving forks for an armed personnel of 100,000. The government was ridiculed time after time. Someone had the courage to bring the old fork into the house—and I do not know what he intended to do with it. However, I was satisfied that it was not the kind of fork that would be used on the table every day. That purchase of 60,000 serving forks for an armed personnel of a little over 100,000 was just about as much as the people of this country could stand.

After the government had been subjected to ridicule time after time, they got the order down to 40,000, and then to 24,000. I see now it is down to 14,500, and I am still wondering what the armed services will do with 14,500 serving forks. Will we have them for the next 50 years, and let the veterans who fought in the last two wars pay for them?

A few days ago the Prime Minister took two hours and a half in an attempt to make a defence. In this connection I should like to quote an editorial which appeared in the Sarnia paper the day after his speech. I make reference to this editorial because it reflects the thinking of Canadians from coast to coast. The editorial in the Sarnia Observer of November 26 is headed "P.M. Provides Ammunition For Opponents In Election".

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed wide latitude in quoting from newspapers during this debate, but I have not yet allowed an hon. member to quote from a newspaper any article referring to what has been said in the house during the present debate. If I were to allow that we would find ourselves in a position where hon. members in the house would be debating with someone outside the house.

To decide what articles should be allowed to be read is a difficult problem. On every occasion I have endeavoured to allow editorials to be read if they referred to something that had taken place before the house assembled, or if they could be considered to contain expert opinions. However, I have tried to keep away from permitting controversy in the house with someone outside.

Mr. Murphy: I appreciate Your Honour's fairness in all cases. Perhaps I might be permitted to make reference to something that is not an editorial but I believe would prove interesting to hon. members. This appeared last night in the Toronto Telegram, and I am sure many hon. members will have seen it. It deals with the $3 million item to which the Prime Minister referred the other day when he said that we would be spending only $3 million anyway. Well, some few sessions ago we heard another right hon. gentleman say, "It is only a million dollars. What is a million dollars?" What I now hold in my hand is a cartoon bearing the title "But it's The Same Old Song". On the right side I see the picture of a very fine-looking gentleman who, as a rule, leads the house in the absence of the Prime Minister. The name I notice here is "C. D. Howe". At the top of his picture is, "Hey, you're in a higher key, ain't you boss?" The title of the song is, "What's a million?" On the other side is, "You'll only save $3,000,000." That is in a different key—probably a higher key—and they are both trying to sing that song, but unfortunately it is not very good harmony. But as I notice the music written here, I do not know who could sing it anyway. However, that is quite some feat in singing.

I noticed the other day that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had to sing for his dinner some place down in New York. I should like to see close harmony like that among the ministers of the cabinet; but we apparently have evidence that it does not exist in all cases because we find contradictory opinions expressed respecting when they are going to lower taxes and when they are not going to lower taxes. We have the statement made a year ago that a million did not mean very much; and now of course we have this new song. I think they will get a title for it—I do not know whether it will be copyrighted—but I do not think we will find it in the Liberal propaganda.

Mr. Speaker, what I intend to deal with for the rest of the time at my disposal is a matter which also affects the primary producer in Canada. I am referring now to those in Ontario who produce sugar beets. I do not pretend to speak with authority for those in other parts of Canada, but I am sure that there are other members in this House of Commons, in other parties, who are vitally interested in this predicament in which the producers and processors now find themselves owing to the importation from Cuba of some 30 million pounds of Cuban refined sugar already this year.

In order that the house may get a better understanding of this unfortunate situation, I think I should give some basic facts. I want to say first that sugar beets are grown in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario. In the last three years—and I have the figures—Ontario has produced in two years more than any other province; and Alberta, I think, last year produced more than Ontario in either of those years.

In order that hon. members may realize the extent of this particular industry, may I say that we have in Ontario some 6,000 growers. This crop is grown in the counties of Kent, Lambton, Essex, Huron, Middlesex, Elgin, Perth and Oxford; and as a matter of fact this year a considerable acreage was planted in Wellington. It is really a hard crop to grow, from a manual labour standpoint, and it is an expensive crop to harvest.

Over the last several years the sugar industry has faced several ups and downs. As a matter of fact, in the early thirties Cuba was shipping into this country an amount of sugar which reached a peak of some 40 million pounds one year. That amount was later reduced, and then curtailed completely because of the change in the Customs Act which placed a value for duty purposes on refined sugar coming into Canada from Cuba. That condition existed up until the time of the outbreak of war when a sugar administrator was appointed, and in fact lasted until 1949. Unfortunately this year the growers find themselves in this position. In less than a year and a half after the government made an agreement with Cuba we have in one year —the last twelve months of that first eighteen —no less than approximately 30 million pounds coming into Canada at a price which is, or has been thus far—and will no doubt continue to be—much lower than what our producers can produce this crop for. The result is that sugar has dropped in Canada from some $10.20 per hundred in January of this year to $8.60 per hundred, Montreal. Worse still, in Ontario we have not been able to move the 1952 beet sugar to the regular markets—for instance, in the Windsor, Hamilton and Toronto areas—because we find that the market is already glutted with refined Cuban sugar.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this industry found itself in considerable difficulty some few years ago when the present leader of our party was premier of the province of Ontario. Because of the necessity for increased acreage or increased production of sugar in Canada, it was necessary to encourage the growers to grow a greater acreage, and our present leader at that time came to their assistance by paying some $675,000 over the course of three or four years. The sugar industry in Ontario was revitalized and made its contribution as a war effort.

There are other considerations here, and I think if I quote a paragraph from a brief which I have just received from the chamber of commerce in Chatham it will serve my purpose. Chatham is in the heart of the sugar beet industry in Ontario. There are two huge refining industries in Ontario, one in Wallaceburg and one in Chatham. This industry, of course, affects the grower and the processor but also practically everybody in business as well as a great number of people engaged in labour. This industry incidentally has been an important factor in encouraging these new Canadians in this country to find immediate employment either in the field or in the processing of sugar or at other times to find jobs in the fruit and tobacco markets and in general farming throughout that part of the country. The industry has been no small factor in encouraging these people; and I think all hon. members will agree with me that they need some encouragement, and this in a most practical way. I know that hon. members will be interested in knowing this. I find that over the course of the years many of these immigrants or, shall I say, new Canadians have obtained their start in Canada maybe by working in the fields, and today we find them to have some of the finest buildings and some of the finest farms you can see in any part of Ontario.

The first paragraph of this brief which was sent to me and which, I understand, was sent to all the ministers in the cabinet, reads as follows:

> The sugar beet and beet sugar industry in Chatham and district, which represents an annual income of $12 million per year to growers, field and factory labourers, merchants, truckers, professional men and others in our community, is threatened with extinction.

This crisis arises from unrestricted quantities of Cuban refined sugar unloaded in the largest urban market of Toronto and Hamilton, which have been served by our beet sugar industry, for 51 years. Until this year, no Cuban refined has come to Canada in twenty years, not even during war-short years. This Cuban sugar, produced by native labour which does not enjoy the same high standard of living as Canadian labour, is being unloaded at nearly one cent per pound less than the same sugar is sold in the United States, despite the fact that the freight haul to Canada is longer, and the United States market absorbs about 50 per cent of Cuba's combined raw and refined sugar productions.

In the United States the beet grower is protected by a quota. The United States does bring in sugar from Cuba but only on a quota basis so that the primary producer there never has his position as a producer jeopardized through any threat by Cuba or any other nation sending refined sugar to that country. We find that in 1951 a statement was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on May 8, which is recorded at page 2829 of Hansard, with reference to an agreement between Cuba and Canada respecting sugar and products which we hoped to sell to Cuba. On that occasion he said:

In the case of Cuba, I wish to make an announcement of considerable importance. The government of Canada has ensured the purchase on that market, by Canadian refineries or otherwise, of 75,000 short tons of Cuban raw sugar, within each of the calendar years 1951, 1952 and 1953, out of supplies made available by Cuba to the world market.

The last paragraph on the same page reads as follows:

The Cuban government has now undertaken to revalidate until January 1, 1954, important tariff concessions which were originally granted to Canada at Geneva, including amongst others, codfish, wheat flour and potatoes. This will be of definite interest to our maritime provinces. Cuba has withdrawn four detailed concessions from us which she made at Geneva. None of them has accounted for much trade, and Canada is being compensated by a small reduction in the Cuban duty on codfish.

We all assumed at that time we would benefit very greatly by our increased exports to Cuba of these various products. I wish to place on the record the figures as to the trade we have had with Cuba, and remember that the Canada-Cuba raw sugar agreement announced on May 8, 1951, was effective from that date. Our imports from Cuba for the first six months of 1951, January to June, were $2,776,000. For the period from January to June, 1952, our imports were $10,200,000 odd. Our exports to Cuba in the period from January to June, 1951, were $9 million odd and in the same period in 1952 were $13 million odd. In other words, our imports from Cuba in 1952 were four times as much as they were in 1951 and our exports to Cuba were about 50 per cent more.

I also want to place on the record the amount of the increase in our trade with Cuba with respect to the particular articles I mentioned a moment ago concerning which the minister hoped that there would be an increase in trade. The articles involved are wheat flour, potatoes and salt codfish. The minister was interested in the export of these articles to that country. I will not break down the figures because it would take too much time. The figures are for the period from January to September in each case. For 1950 the figure is $5,941,000, for 1951, $6,472,000 and for 1952, $4,530,000. The point I wish to make simply is that since the agreement became effective our exports to Cuba of the three products where we hoped there would be an increase have decreased and not increased. I think that is most important, and I say it is no wonder that the sugar beet growers of this country are very much disturbed about their present predicament.

The growers in the various counties of Ontario have several million dollars invested in equipment. They rotate their crops, and they find themselves in the position where they have a great deal of equipment that is not usable for other farming purposes. Unless they can establish continued use for it in the production of sugar beets it will remain idle. I fear that what has already happened in the province of Ontario will also take place elsewhere throughout the dominion. Most of the sugar that has come into Canada within the last few months—in fact a boat was unloaded at a certain port only a few days ago—has come into Ontario. As soon as navigation opens next year we will find that boat loads of Cuban sugar will be shipped to the head of the lakes and distributed throughout the west. Then the producers of Manitoba and Alberta will be very much concerned about the importation of refined sugar from Cuba. The same will apply to the province of Quebec.

I have no doubt that within a few months Cuba will do as it has done in the United States. It will be in a position to package its refined sugar in five and ten pound lots and sell it wholesale to the various stores in the usual manner. After the opening of navigation next spring we will no doubt find that the sugar beet growers not only in Ontario but elsewhere in Canada will be wondering if they will be able to afford to grow sugar beets for another year and make contracts with the Dominion Sugar Company or other sugar processors in the Dominion of Canada.

No grower can afford to take a loss of some $30 an acre on sugar beets, and that is the loss they are taking today. The cheques that were sent out not long ago from Chatham to the growers were some three or four hundred thousand dollars short, and that is only the initial payment. The growers know as well as I do that they cannot meet the competition of the product coming into this country from Cuba. These growers suggest that the government should consider ways and means, which are open to it under the Geneva trade agreement, that will allow them to stay in business as producers in Canada, and so that their industry will not be sacrificed and crucified by this or any other government.

There is available under the Geneva trade agreement the same escape clause of which one other country not too far away from our boundary has availed itself in recent months, and no doubt will do so again. I say that in all fairness to the Canadian producers we in this country who are subscribers to the agreement must also avail ourselves of the escape clause, which was put in there for a purpose, in order that these people who have so much invested may be protected. This industry, which means so much to our own economy, must have the assurance that it can continue to stay in business and not have its interests jeopardized. I do not think that there is any segment of the agricultural development of this country which can be sacrificed because each means too much to our economy.

We find the tobacco industry of this country threatened with ruin. We also find the sugar beet industry threatened with ruin. That statement applies not only to the producers but to many people who find labour there at different times of the year. We need not confine ourselves to those two industries. We see what has happened to pork products in this country, to cheese products, to milk products, to apples and to oats. It is about time that these primary producers received some consideration from this government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are other aspects of this agreement about which I would like to place statements on the record. I feel that there may be some reason for Cuba's recent overproduction. She may want a larger quota of the sugar production of the world. That of course is something for the experts and the minister in charge to consider. Now is the time, I think, for steps to be taken by Canada's senior government to stop the unrestricted flow of refined Cuban sugar to Canada—to save the sugar beet crop and the sugar beet industry. Otherwise it seems doomed to go out of business in southwestern Ontario—in not only southwestern Ontario but the other provinces of the dominion. The industry is contributing many millions of dollars and the effect of its loss on our agricultural and general economy would be incalculable. I feel that there should not be any delay, Mr. Speaker. There is no reason for delay and no reason why this government should now throw any responsibility on any provincial government where sugar beets are being grown.

A few years ago the leader of our national party had the courage to take steps to keep the sugar growing industry in business not only in our own province but elsewhere. The sugar beet producers in this country find themselves now at the mercy of this present government because of the policies of this government, and no one else is responsible. I feel and the sugar beet producers feel that some of these experts and bureaucrats in various departments have had the idea that the producer was protected, and have said: Well, we will accept an importation of 75,000 tons a year over the next three years; but did they or did they not know they were selling this industry down the river? That is certainly what they did because they are crucifying the sugar beet industry not only in Ontario but in other provinces of Canada.

I feel there should be no delay. Although in retrospect there is a great deal of wisdom, the only solution I see is for this government to now recognize its own mistakes and repair them before any further loss is suffered by these producers in Canada. I think that with all their huge investments here they are entitled to have protection. This difficulty is not of their own doing, of their own choice, and they cannot afford to grow the product in view of losses they now face. I do not mind repeating that the basic price for sugar beets depends on the price the processor can obtain for his sugar and his other by-products.

What surprises everybody in this country is that when the delegation came down to see the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) some time in October, to present a brief representing the growers not only of Ontario but of other provinces, they did not at any time refer to dumping duties. No press reporter appeared at the conference but, after it was over, perhaps as an alibi, we find in the newspapers the indication that the interested farmers were blaming the government for dumping Cuban sugar into Canada. As I understand it, the word "dumping" was never used by any member of the delegation. Whoever, on the government side, at this high level, gave such information to the press gave false information.

I want to go on record, Mr. Speaker, as saying that we may be faced here with such a situation, not only with respect to tobacco and sugar but other primary products which I spoke of a moment ago, because of these uncertain times; that it is necessary for the government notwithstanding the fact that we are subscribers to the Geneva agreements to protect our own local industries. I refer to farming as an industry in Canada. It means too much to have to make these sacrifices now or at any time.

In the early 1930's we did have action by the then Conservative government, when the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was prime minister of this country. We face the same situation today and we still have the same remedies. The producers do not object to raw sugar coming into this country but they do claim, and I think with all justification, that there should be a quota on refined sugar coming into Canada as there is in the United States. They are not asking for any unusual subsidies as are given in the United States to producers of sugar beets, or as are given in Great Britain. Great Britain had to produce its own sugar during the war and made a huge success of it. The prices they are receiving for sugar beets in Great Britain are far in excess of what the primary producer gets in Canada.

If these conditions continue to exist only one thing is going to happen: the sugar beet industry in Canada will be ruined without any doubt, because Cuba is in a position to supply all of Canada's requirements for refined sugar. If that happens all of the people in the various provinces I mentioned a few moments ago will be affected. Every taxpayer, every citizen of the Dominion of Canada will be affected, because no government can wreck any industry—whether it be farming or tobacco—without affecting everyone else in the dominion. Therefore I urge, Mr. Speaker, that other members in this House of Commons, not only from Ontario but from other provinces and other parties, take an interest on behalf of these people who today find themselves in such a sad plight owing to the action of the present government. We feel too that the government has its own selfish reason for protecting any sort of an industry in this country. The government is the greatest shareholder in any industry in Canada today. They are the tax collectors and they share the profits although they contribute nothing in the event of losses. We are going to find losses. I gave you plenty of evidence of that.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that my voice is not good, even for football.

Mr. Wylie: You had better vote for the west, anyway.

Mr. Murphy: You can bet your bottom dollar I will vote for the west anyway. Perhaps some of you fellows from the west will also speak about the sugar industry in Alberta and Manitoba.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I intend to continue this argument when my voice is in better shape. I believe it is important that all the facts be placed before the members of the house so that they can weigh them, regardless of the party which they represent, and I do hope that they will find access to the minister's office so that they can make proper representations on behalf of these unfortunate people. I have not any hesitation in saying that not only are these people, some 6,000 in western Ontario and many thousands in other parts of Canada, disturbed about their predicament, but the members who represent those particular ridings have a responsibility to place their constituents' case before this high court. If I were a Liberal in the House of Commons I would hesitate to go into these ridings and say, "I am sorry, my friends, but I could not do anything for you; the government in power today is in a position where they say you just have to take it on the chin the same as anybody else." So far as I am concerned, I am in this position. I can go to any place in western Canada or any other place in Canada, and I can assure these people that when Mr. Drew forms the next government they will get action without any delay.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, to support the subamendment moved on November 24 by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). For the sake of continuity, I believe it would be advisable to read that amendment.

> That the amendment be amended by deleting paragraphs (d) and (e) and by substituting therefor the following:
> "We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
>
> (a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration;
> (b) To implement their proposals to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945."

A few days ago the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) made an excellent speech in which he reviewed the historical developments in Canada so far as health insurance programs were concerned and so far as the promises of this government and previous Liberal governments were concerned throughout the years. Yesterday the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in his usually lucid, comprehensive and all-embracing manner, dealt with, and I think very clearly, the need for a national health insurance program in Canada and the capacity of the Canadian people, based on the wealth of Canada, to pay for this program easily.

This afternoon I intend, in my humble way, to more or less supplement the arguments provided by previous speakers, and to try to provide further evidence of the increasing need for a national health insurance program in Canada, as well as the obvious ability of the Canadian people to pay for such a program. Finally, I would simply point to the scheme introduced by the Labour government in Great Britain under circumstances far more difficult than would be experienced or are experienced in Canada.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, the principles of the C.C.F. health policy follow the broad lines of the national health service in Great Britain, that is generally speaking, allowing for the fact that in Britain you have a unitary state government and in Canada we have a federal system. Rather than make bald assertions or give opinions I believe it is much better, in supporting an argument for a national health plan, to produce evidence.

The first evidence I want to produce as to the need for a plan is to quote from the remarks made by the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) as found in Hansard for June 21, 1951, at page 4457. This is what he had to say:

> . . . from 15,000 to 20,000 die yearly of ailments which could be cured or prevented by timely medical care; that a third of the people of Canada do not have the services of a family doctor, and wait too long before seeking medical care; and that only 20 per cent of the people of Canada are able to afford all the medical care that they need.

That is the voice of a prominent member of the Liberal party supporting the argument for national health insurance. I know this, Mr. Speaker, that when the member for Spadina speaks, he speaks with some knowledge and as a result of a close study of social problems in Canada and in the constituency which he represents. I am sure that a perusal of his speeches in this house will prove to anyone that he makes a careful study of any subject before he speaks on that subject, and when he speaks he demonstrates his attachment to liberal policies—spelled with a small "l" —and humanitarian principles.

What do we find in the evidence as to the health of children at the present time? We hear it stated repeatedly in this house that the children of the country are the greatest asset this nation has. How are we treating our greatest asset at the present time? I quote from the Montreal Gazette of February 7, 1946:

> Dr. Jules Gilbert, director of health education for Quebec: "In our primary schools, 80 per cent of the pupils suffer from physical defects."

Fancy a prominent director of education in one of our greatest provinces being able to make a statement such as that in a country so rich in natural resources and in natural wealth as Canada. Without question, similar conditions exist in other provinces. Report after report made by persons interested in this subject, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, indicate a condition similar to that mentioned by Dr. Jules Gilbert, director of health education for the province of Quebec. In many cases, it is a totally unnecessary condition. Are we, Mr. Speaker, as representatives of the people, going to sit idly by year after year without taking the necessary action, and allow these conditions to continue?

In the Globe and Mail of December 6, 1950, I find the following news report:

> In a survey carried out in London, Ontario, it was shown that 63·7 per cent of separate school children have defective teeth, and in some schools the rate is as high as 80 per cent.

We know that a similar condition exists in many other places at this time. When you hear of defective teeth existing to that extent across this country you know it is not only evidence of a lack of medical supervision and attention after birth, but in many cases it is evidence of a lack of pre-natal care as well. Is this a continuing process? What happens to these children in later life? To indicate what happens I want to quote from the Montreal Gazette of November 14, 1952.

> In a Kitchener Remembrance day address—
> That is the last Remembrance day.
> —Lieutenant-Colonel H. V. Matthews of Toronto declared that more than 50 per cent of youths trying to enlist in Canada's armed forces are physically unfit.

After all our talk of this grand and glorious country, which it is, and in the knowledge of the wealth abundant in this country, the production of this country, we in this group believe that is a shocking state of affairs. It indicates that what has proven to be the condition of children in primary grades continues to exist until young men reach a sufficient age to volunteer to join the armed services. It is continuing evidence that many of our young people do not receive the necessary medical attention. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is a shocking illustration of our failure to conserve our human resources by properly utilizing our natural resources.

In continuing that line of argument I want to present some further evidence of the failure of this government and previous governments to meet this problem. Again I quote from the Globe and Mail of February 5, 1952:

> Dental records of recruits joining Canadian army show nine out of ten need dental treatment, according to dental officers at defence headquarters. Most of these recruits are in their twenties or late teens.
> When the Korean brigade was assembled at Petawawa in the fall of 1950, 6,061, or 90 per cent of the men, required dental treatment. As all the work necessary could not be done in time, a team of nine dental officers was sent to Korea to finish the work there.

That is an illustration of the continuing lack of care of young men and women growing up in this country. That is the condition of those who were accepted. What about the physical condition of those who were rejected? Over 50 per cent were rejected after making application to join the armed services. The figures I have given refer to the fittest, the cream of the crop. The general need, Mr. Speaker, based on this evidence, must be even greater than we actually realize. That is why we in this group continue to say that only a national health plan will reveal the true situation and remedy the conditions that exist today.

The evidence I have given illustrates the position with regard to physical health. I now want to give some further evidence with respect to mental health in this country, which is a growing and increasingly serious problem at this time. Again I quote from the Montreal Gazette of April 30, 1951:

> Dr. J. C. Meakins, president of the Canadian Mental Health Association, speaking in Montreal, said that Canada has one million citizens permanently, partially or temporarily disabled by mental ill health at a cost, indirect or direct, of $800 million a year. In 1945 the population of Canada's mental health hospitals was 50,000, by last year it was nearly 65,000.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of the members of this group, it is questionable whether there is any other social problem with which is associated more public ignorance concerning the facts, the suffering involved and the need to meet the problem with knowledge and with social planning. A federal report published in 1947, dealing with this question, indicates that the largest group of persons who are mentally ill come from those people with marginal incomes. That means that it is an economic problem. It is an indication that those with above marginal incomes can do something to prevent the development of mental ill health. But in many cases those in the marginal groups, those with the lower incomes, need the means to do the things that are necessary to prevent the development of mental ill health. In the Montreal Gazette of February 11, 1952, I find the following:

> Dr. J. D. Griffin, director general of the Canadian Mental Health Association, said that there are as many patients in Canada's mental hospitals as in all the general hospitals combined. In addition to this, 30 to 50 per cent of all patients consulting family doctors are suffering from illnesses either caused or accentuated by emotional or mental factors.
> Poor mental health cripples, in considerable measure, the working efficiency of 10 per cent of our population. It disables more people than tuberculosis and cancer combined. Anxiety states and neurotic disorders are important factors in industrial absenteeism and poor production, in marital discord and broken homes and in social dependence and delinquency.

We have further evidence of the enormous direct price we are paying because of our neglect in this very important matter. In our opinion, Mr. Speaker, the only possibility of saving this enormous waste of lives, of saving the consequent production for the Canadian economy, and restoring those thousands to happiness, is through the establishment in Canada of an over-all national health program.

I want to refer to a theme that I dealt with at some length a year or two ago, namely the question of patent medicines. Quackery always gets my back up wherever it arises—I do not want the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) to think that I am referring to him. I cannot stand that sort of thing, and throughout the years I have bought a number of books dealing with the patent medicine racket. I see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) paying great attention at this time, which I appreciate, but there has been a great increase in the production of patent medicines in Canada in recent years. Because of their inability to pay for proper medical care many Canadian citizens are forced to turn, or think they are forced to turn, to quack remedies which, although they still cost money, are cheaper than proper medical care under present conditions. Canadians spend hundreds of thousands of dollars each year on patent medicines, many of which are sold as a result of exaggerated advertisements.

I am sure all of us know individuals who have faith in patent medicines. I know a great many people who feel they cannot afford operations and cannot afford proper medical treatment, but who will buy these patent medicines in the hope that they may be helped. Hope springs eternal in the human breast. I have known people who have gone year after year wasting their limited resources on quack medicines of numerous kinds.

Mr. Studer: Socialism is a patent medicine.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, and I would jolly well like to give you a big dose of it.

Mr. Knowles: It would be good for what ails him.

Mr. Herridge: We cure all those suffering from political ill health.

But, Mr. Speaker, since the end of the war, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, the gross value of the production of the patent medicine industry has jumped from the figure of $60,331,000 in 1945 to $89,249,000 in 1951. The gross value of patent medicines only produced in Canada indicates a growing use of those medicines. My source is the dominion bureau of statistics industrial and merchandising division. These figures in respect of the gross value of patent medicines only, produced in Canada, are as follows: In 1947, $8,560,000 worth of quackery; in 1948, $12,827,000 worth of quackery; in 1949, $13,083,000 worth of quackery; in 1950, $14,334,000 worth of quackery and in 1951, $16,285,000.

Here we see a continued increase in the amount of patent medicines purchased. The Globe and Mail in a New York Times special dispatch of April 4, 1951 says this:

> U.S. federal trade commission ordered "Carter's Little Liver Pills" to drop word "Liver" from the trade name of their product because the pills have no therapeutic value in the treatment of the liver. According to the order the pills have no medicinal effect other than the temporary relief of an ordinary laxative.

I do not think this government has taken action in that respect. I believe Carter's Little Liver Pills are still sold as Carter's Little Liver Pills, because it was only recently I was talking to a constituent of mine who told me that he had bought them for some complaint from which he was suffering, in the hope that it would do him some good so far as his liver was concerned.

Then again I find this in the Globe and Mail of May 21, 1947:

> Charles W. Crawford, associate U.S. commissioner of food and drugs, said among the products investigated by his department was a vapour-bath system for diabetes costing $2,200; an apparatus for administering electric shock for abscess of the liver, heart disease and cancer, costing $1,200; a device for administering an enema for arthritis, rheumatism, stomach ulcers and other ailments, costing $1,900.

People buy these quack remedies in an effort to find some relief from disease. Quite recently I was in the shack of an old-timer in my district who had spent more than $50 for some contraption sent to him from Montreal. He was sitting in his chair with his feet in a tub of water, two electrodes strapped to his legs and his hands wired to something else. He presumed that so long as he continued using this mechanical contrivance for about 15 minutes each day he would be cured of some sort of skin disease, as well as a form of rheumatism or arthritis. He would carry out this treatment conscientiously for a period of a month or two after which, obtaining no results, he would turn to something else. That is the sort of thing people do. When they cannot afford to take proper treatment and to have proper medical attention they will buy these patent machines. This is happening throughout Canada because we have not at the present time a national health insurance program.

The Montreal Gazette of January 30, 1951 states this:

> Mrs. H. E. Taylor, owner of Canadian Health Aids of Toronto, was fined $100 and $25 costs or one month when she was convicted of advertising cider vinegar and crude molasses as treatments for obesity, gallstones, heart disease and high blood pressure.
> Joseph Singer, counsel for the federal health department, said after the conviction, "We are not interested in obtaining a large fine. The crown wants to put a stop to this tremendous racket which has gone from one end of the country to the other."

I submit that if the crown wishes to put a stop to these rackets, then the easiest way to do it would be to have a national health insurance program which would make it possible for everyone to consult a doctor, to take hospital treatment and to secure the medicines and drugs they require. I am sure that would be the most effective way of stopping this patent medicine racket, and the sales of various quack medical appliances.

And, in passing, I cannot refrain from saying how delighted I am to see that I have the rapt attention of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. Gibson: I am learning something.

Mr. Herridge: Rackets are developing because quackery continues and will continue so long as we in Canada fail to use the natural resources and the healing waters we have in such abundance, given to us by the Creator. Quackery is rampant and the nation's healing powers are neglected because we have not a national health insurance program and have not the required co-operation between federal and provincial governments.

I mention this because I am particularly interested in one aspect of the subject. We all know the tremendous toll that arthritis and various forms of rheumatism are taking in Canada at the present time, and have taken throughout the year. That toll seems to be increasing. Yet we find thousands upon thousands of people who, not being able to afford other treatment, are turning to patent medicines and quack appliances at a time when we have right here in this country the means of preventing a great deal of suffering, relieving many people and curing many others. Mr. S. Katz in Maclean's magazine of June 15, 1952, says this:

> Preventative care for arthritis and rheumatism: "Research has shown that 90 per cent of arthritics need not suffer any disablement if they receive early treatment."

I know that, from experience extending over many years. In the constituency of West Kootenay which I have the honor to represent we have a number of splendid hot springs. Among these are the Ainsworth hot springs, the Halcyon hot springs, the St. Leon hot springs, the Nakusp hot springs, all of which are mineral waters coming out of the ground at temperatures of from 130 degrees up. These have proven very beneficial in the treatment of certain types of rheumatism.

I might say that the first dollar I ever earned in Canada as a young man was with a string of pack horses I owned, packing in supplies for men who were doing some building some ten miles back in the mountains at the hot springs near the community of Nakusp. I never forgot that experience, because those were the days of the wild and woolly west. I shall never forget the first pack horse I ever owned. We used to pack about 150 to 200 pounds on their backs. The load on the first horse was a case of clam chowder on one side, a crate of strawberries on the other side, and two cases of whisky on the top. When they got to the destination that night they had what was known as clam chowder whisky cocktails. They took the lid off the coal-oil can—it was a five-gallon can—dumped all the whisky in the tin, dumped all the clam chowder in on top of it, and boiled it. I am not suggesting that was a cure for rheumatism, but I never forgot that, not taking part in the ceremony myself.

From that time on I have been interested in that spring. Unfortunately it is still a small development. There is a bath built, and even today, an average of 500 to 600 people walk over a ten-mile rough mountain trail in order to get relief from various forms of rheumatism. The trees and the buildings are hung with crutches which people have left there. They are people who could not afford to go to expensive institutions, who could not afford to go to places where they had to pay any considerable amount of money. Working people went and took these treatments. I have taken men in on pack horses and saddle horses when I had to rope the man on in order to keep him on, and he has asked me to let him off before I got there but I refused to do so because if I took him off the horse I could not get him back on again. I have had men almost screaming in agony when I had to keep them on the horse to take them to the springs. I have seen those same people walk out two months later either completely cured or generally relieved.

The point I am coming to is this, Mr. Speaker. A small percentage of our population know of these places and can find their way to them. In our district we happen to have a famous hot springs known as Halcyon hot springs on the upper Arrow lakes, a few miles above where I live, which has been developed since the early days of this century. Shortly after the first world war an organization known as the White Cross was formed under General Burnham, who was a doctor in the Canadian armed forces and also in the armed forces of the Serbian government in the first world war. General Burnham's whole life has been given to the study of treatment for rheumatism and to the relief of persons suffering from rheumatism. This is an excellent building. He has carried on this work without any thought of profit. All that General Burnham has had out of his work in 35 years has been his necessary food and lodgings and the price of an occasional trip to Vancouver or somewhere on business.

This spa has become well known all over North America. People come there for treatment from New York, the southern states and eastern Canada. They include people of wealth and people with little money. General Burnham has provided hotel accommodation there, meals, all the treatment you want in the baths, and medical attention—he is a doctor—for $4.50 a day. He has not raised his rates and he refuses to raise them regardless of the increase in the cost of living and things of that sort.

I have personal knowledge of thousands of people being benefited by treatment at those springs. General Burnham tells me that in the early stages certain types of rheumatism can be definitely cured by taking treatments in those hot springs; that in the second stage rheumatism can be arrested, and that in the third stage at least a great deal of relief can be found through the use of these beneficial waters. I know this from an experience of my own mother who suffered from arthritis in her later years. While there was no possibility of her being cured, the occasional treatment she was able to take at Halcyon hot springs meant that she was relieved of pain for a considerable period during and after taking that treatment.

Here in Canada, Mr. Speaker, we have multitudes suffering from various forms of rheumatism and arthritis; there are multitudes in the early stages who could be cured, multitudes whose complaints could be arrested, and many who at least would find some relief in taking these hot springs treatments. Why is it not possible for these people to take these treatments? For financial reasons. The great majority of those who suffer from these unfortunate complaints are not able to take advantage of the natural healing provided by the Creator in Canada in the hot springs existing throughout the country. I think here is a splendid opportunity for federal-provincial co-operation in a national health insurance plan. Here is an opportunity for us to put our natural resources to work and to provide a great amount of healing and a great amount of cure with respect to some diseases across this country.

Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), because I am likely to do otherwise later on, for the excellent work that is being done in the development of Radium hot springs in Kootenay East. I have had an opportunity to visit the baths since their recent improvement, and I am sure that the minister, the department, his officials and all those concerned deserve to be congratulated on the splendid development that is taking place at Radium hot springs. The springs I am speaking of are equally good; they are splendid waters. If only we could get a development like that in these other springs I mentioned, coupled with a national health insurance program that would make it possible for people suffering from arthritis and various forms of rheumatism to seek and use these healing waters, we would have gone a long way to relieve a great deal of unnecessary misery that exists in Canada at this time.

In pursuing this subject I wish to quote, again from the Montreal Gazette of November 4, 1952, a man who I think is a competent authority. Dr. Campbell Gardner of Montreal, surgeon in chief at Queen Mary veterans hospital and an assistant professor at McGill university, speaking to the women's guild of Christ Church cathedral, Montreal, stated:

> I believe we cannot afford not to give complete medical care for all, just as we cannot afford not to give pure water to all. If some drink typhoid laden water, the epidemic will quickly spread to those who have a pure water supply. Likewise an epidemic of influenza beginning among those unable to obtain adequate medical care will quickly spread and affect us all.

Mr. Speaker, I think we all know that the need is obvious. It has been demonstrated in evidence from many sources. There is no doubt that the demand is there. Labour organizations, veterans' organizations, farmers' organizations and others have in the past urged this government, and are urging them today, to give effect to legislation that will provide a national health insurance program.

I am always interested, Mr. Speaker, in the local touch. In picking up my paper this morning, the Nelson Daily News—which is the best daily paper published in a city of its size in Canada—I was interested to read that on the very day my leader was moving a subamendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, advocating a national health insurance program, the Kootenay boundary central farmers' institute were meeting in Nelson. On that very day the delegates attending that farmers' meeting unanimously passed a resolution to this effect:

> . . . the meeting decided to petition the federal minister of health and welfare to consider the matter of a federal health insurance plan, with or without provincial participation. A copy of the resolution will go to H. W. Herridge, M.P. for Kootenay West.

I am very pleased that my people never forget me. The need, Mr. Speaker, is recognized by all who face facts. Our capacity to meet this need is greater than that of any other nation on earth in proportion to our population. Why delay? In Great Britain the Labour party for years proposed a national health insurance plan. The Labour party's proposals were opposed for years by the Conservatives of Great Britain. The Conservative party of Great Britain opposed the plan right up to the finish. On the second reading of the bill in May, 1948, which gave to Great Britain their present national health insurance plan, the Tory party to a man voted against that legislation.

But today, Mr. Speaker, no government in Great Britain dares to rescind the legislation that has given the people of Great Britain an over-all health and medical service. Here is what the London correspondent of the Wall Street Journal had to say in the issue of November 27, 1951:

> . . . one pillar of socialism—
> Mind you, only one pillar.
> —"socialized medicine" is certain to remain intact . . . The "free" health service set up by the late Labour government is so popular that it can no longer be made a political issue here.

I predict that if the government took action in that direction, suited and adapted to Canadian conditions, it would not be long before national health insurance could no longer be a political issue in Canada. Proof of the success of the health insurance plan of Great Britain is found in the health of the nation, which was never better. The administrative success of the program is recognized by all fair-minded people throughout the democratic world, and the cost is being met in Great Britain regardless of the unusual financial difficulties in which she finds herself.

I have proven the need in Canada without question, and I think the majority of the members of the house realize that need. We have the capacity to meet the cost based on contributions according to ability to pay. With that knowledge the C.C.F. urges the government to accept its responsibility in this matter this session and institute a national health insurance plan that will be for the advantage of the people of Canada of today and succeeding generations.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as well as in the course of his political campaign in the province of Quebec, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) stressed the difficulties that have arisen in dominion-provincial relations with regard to taxation, but he is wary of suggesting means of arriving at some permanent form of agreement in the matter. In my opinion that shows the irresponsibility of his attitude. I believe that the electors of Quebec have good cause to doubt the sincerity of the Leader of the Opposition and are bound to examine his political past before passing judgment on the matter.

I must say that the political background of a man still is the best way of weighing what he says as a member of the opposition against what he would do should he ever win an election. In that connection may I be permitted to draw the attention of the house to the following statements of the Leader of the Opposition on provincial autonomy, giving the dates they were uttered, and as reproduced in Le Canada of Thursday, September 4, 1952. On February 23, 1935, he said:

> If everything had to be done all over again, who would be mad enough to establish in Canada ten governments instead of one?

On November 10, 1936, he said:

> Canada must do away with the costly inefficiency of ten governments which, in most cases, do what a single government could accomplish.

On January 26, 1939, he had this to say:

> I declare myself in favour of consolidating national ties and depriving the provinces of all powers incompatible with those of the central government, when these powers are not required for the administration of the province.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): That is the way to say it.

Mr. LaCroix: On April 24, 1941, he said:

> The integrity of a nation can be safeguarded only through a strong feeling in favour of centralization.

On November 10, 1936, he had this to say:

> Canada should remedy the costly ineptitude of ten governments.

As for his friendliness towards our compatriots of the province of Quebec, this is what he had to say on November 29, 1936:

> I do not think it unfair to remind French-Canadians that they belong to a vanquished race.

Again in August, 1944, on the occasion of the plebiscite, he said:

> Are we to allow an isolationist province to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada? I hope that every one of you will reply with a resounding "no" which shall be heard in every part of the province of Quebec.

All these remarks were uttered while the Leader of the Opposition was either in power or the leader of his party in Ontario. I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, to the Leader of the Opposition here in this house that whether or not he likes it his political past dogs his footsteps. I believe the province of Quebec to be firmly attached to its motto, "Je me souviens". It certainly is not the present Leader of the Opposition who is capable of solving the problem of fiscal relations with Quebec. I have far more confidence in the ability of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to arrive at a permanent settlement of this question.

Section 91 of the British North America Act enables the federal government to raise moneys by any form or system of taxation in order to ensure an efficient administration for the promotion of peace and order in this country. On the other hand, section 92 grants to provincial governments the exclusive right to implement direct taxation in the provinces in order to enable them to levy the funds necessary for the administration of their provinces.

On the face of it, it seems that both governments enjoy the same rights of taxation and, to my knowledge, this opinion has never been questioned by our courts, for no provincial government has ever dared to institute proceedings in this regard, probably being convinced in advance that a final ruling would grant the same rights to both governments in this field. In any event I am convinced that, regardless of the government in power, Quebec will never surrender the rights guaranteed to her by section 92, any more than the federal government will surrender those which it claims are guaranteed to it by section 91.

Obviously the fathers of confederation had not foreseen that one day Canada would be a great nation and that we would be involved in international problems demanding tremendous expenses which the beginning of our federal existence could not foreshadow. This is an unfortunate situation, for it is evident that the federal government, like the provincial governments, may embark upon a wild rush toward the same fields of taxation, although according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) himself, they have now reached the extreme point of saturation. Consequently a solution must be found which, without depriving the federal government and the provinces of the privileges they enjoy under the constitution, would ensure their security in the field of revenue, without having to increase the burden on an already overtaxed population.

I believe it would be in everybody's interest to revise and specify as soon as possible the limits of taxation possibilities granted each government; for temporary subsidies, because of vested interests, leave the receiving government at the donor's mercy and produce an entirely inacceptable situation as far as my province is concerned. In view of this, may I be allowed to submit to the government the following solution which, I believe, would have the advantage of abolishing the system of subsidies, which is sure to be considered in time as a final withdrawal of the provinces.

Subsidies could be replaced by a permanent arrangement which would provide, under our constitution, for the annual remittance to each province of a percentage, to be determined, of the total income and corporation taxes collected by Ottawa in that province, while leaving the latter in full control of succession duties. As far as Quebec is concerned, there are special reasons to retain succession duties owing to the close relationship between the requirements of our French civil code and our successions.

According to figures provided by the Department of Finance, the income and corporate taxes in Ontario for the year ending March 31, 1952, yielded a total amount of $998,517,170.22. Under the recent agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario, providing for withdrawal from these two fields of taxation, the province of Ontario will receive annually a grant of $123,327,363.07. This amounts to a little more than 12 per cent of the total revenue collected in a year by the federal government in Ontario in these two fields of taxation. My information is that the province of Ontario yields the largest amount of income and corporate tax.

An agreement providing for an automatic refund to the province of Quebec of a percentage, to be agreed upon between the central government and the province of Quebec, of the total amount of income and corporate taxes collected annually in Quebec would recognize, I think, the undeniable right of the province to levy direct taxes, would simplify collection, and at the same time allow for the variations in Canada's economic situation. I believe that in time it would prove to the advantage of both governments, since the federal government would not have to enter into temporary financial agreements which at the end of five years, or perhaps sooner, might seem quite heavy on the budget. Unless both governments come to some permanent agreement one may well expect that, should a depression come about, the two above-mentioned taxes will be applied in a manner that will soon bring about an economic disaster and a real threat to our Canadian economy.

For the people of Quebec an agreement is essential because otherwise corporations will continue to pay to the province of Quebec a 7 per cent tax which, added to the federal tax, makes a total of 54 per cent; while in Ontario and the other provinces that have signed agreements, of a so-called temporary character, corporations will pay one tax only amounting to 52 per cent. Such a state of affairs is bound to be detrimental to Quebec's industrial development, since many large industrial concerns which obtain their raw material from outside Quebec might resolve, in order to avoid paying 2 per cent more on capital and profit, to move their installations to the province of Ontario.

It would also be possible to implement, through an agreement between the two governments, the proposition that a single form for both personal and corporation income tax be set, each government collecting separately the share required under their respective legislation. This would undoubtedly provide the public with an opportunity to understand better the burden laid upon them by each government.

I cannot be reckoned as a political admirer of Mr. Duplessis and my feelings in this connection are well-known. Nevertheless I do believe that Mr. Lapalme, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, would also welcome an agreement defining once and for all the taxation powers of each government. The pretext of fiscal autonomy must cease to be used as a continuously resorted to political expedient, without the least solution ever being suggested.

Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty from my seat in the House of Commons to make these suggestions, which are not perfect but, nevertheless, deserve to be studied.

The present Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who is most favourably disposed towards my province, will not hold office eternally. We are by no means sure that his successor, acting under the inspiration of an essentially centralizing bureaucracy, will not adopt as his fiscal mottoes the declarations made by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on February 23, 1935, November 10, 1936, January 26, 1939, April 24, 1941, and so on. Such an attitude will prevent Quebec from controlling its educational, hospital and other services, services which are our very own, which are guaranteed by the constitution, which are essential to the maintenance and development of a French and Catholic culture which in turn provides this whole country with a really invaluable intellectual asset.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister has already made many efforts to arrive at an agreement in this matter. I believe there should be a solution. If the Right Hon. Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec could manage to save our federal system of government, whatever the effort, they would be doing this country immense service. In a land as rich and diversified as ours, it is the only system compatible with true democracy.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In doing so I want to say that we should have no fear for the Liberal party in this country when they can go out and persuade men of such calibre to run for membership in this House of Commons. They have proven themselves beyond doubt to be men of real ability, and I wish them well from now on.

Just yesterday the member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) said that a great event was taking place in Toronto tomorrow, a football game. Next week an event is taking place in the city of Ottawa, and it is another kind of game, an election. Both the candidates for mayor have said that they are running on a ticket for higher federal grants. I believe it is time, Mr. Speaker, that someone said something in this house about these grants. In Canada we have a constitution, the British North America Act. In that act it is stated that no government shall pay taxes. The city of Ottawa is claiming that grants should be paid to the city from the federal treasury for the services that are being rendered to the people of Canada. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are rendering a service to this city. Why should the people of Ottawa ask the people of Canada to help them pay their taxes?

Today between 38,000 and 40,000 people in the city of Ottawa are working for the people of Canada. If it were not for the buildings that are here, if it were not for the fact the government is here, would there be such a place as Ottawa? Many years ago it was known as Bytown, and it would still be known as Bytown if it had not been chosen as the capital city. I want to say that if the government is going to give this grant to the city of Ottawa, then let them give grants to the 4,200 other municipalities in the Dominion of Canada. The municipalities in the western provinces are just as much entitled to those grants as the city of Ottawa. These two candidates have appeared on the platform and asked the people of Ottawa to elect one of them as mayor of this city, but both say that they want higher federal grants. When the estimate covering this grant comes up I, for one, am going to propose that it be cut to $1. I am sure that the people of Canada would be well satisfied to see these grants reduced. These people in the city of Ottawa are just as much entitled to pay taxes for improvements as anyone else in any other part of the country.

Mr. Knowles: Well, don't they?

Mr. Ferrie: I want to say how pleased I am, Mr. Speaker, to see this announcement: "U.S.A. lifts livestock ban on March 1". I want to say also that we have a great feeling of pride in the outstanding performance our Department of Agriculture has given in cleaning up the foot-and-mouth disease around Regina.

Mr. MacDougall: A world record.

Mr. Ferrie: As has just been said, it is a world record. I want to add my small voice to the others in saying how thankful we are to see the United States market opened. It will be of benefit not only to the people of western Canada but to the dairy farmers of eastern Canada who will have a market for their cattle in the spring. I hope that market will stay open forever.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to make my annual speech about the defence highway. I am not going to pass up the opportunity this year. I still maintain that the Department of National Defence should render a service to the people of western Canada by building a highway from Edmonton to Winnipeg. Why do I say that? The reason is that some time in October there was a movement of troops and guns from Wainwright down to Petawawa. The movement took place over this highway I have mentioned, and by the time they had proceeded a few miles there were ruts in the road which cars could never begin to navigate.

If one watches the news from Korea, one finds that at the end of every week we are told how many planes were shot down. If you will look at the news you will find that most of those planes have been shot down as a result of anti-aircraft fire. If the Department of National Defence wanted to move guns up to the northwest corner of Canada, they would find that they could not possibly do so over any road that we have in western Canada. Once again I say that we are entitled to that road not only because we live there but because we have shown Canada and the world that we can produce. No one can say that the Dominion of Canada cannot afford to build a highway of that description. They can afford it because the wealth that comes out of those three western provinces would pay for it in a very short time.

I should like to say a word about another highway, namely highway No. 35 from Nipawin to Flin Flon and the largest village in the province of Saskatchewan. I am not sure that it is not the largest village in Canada. I refer to the village by the name of Creighton. It is only a town, but it is big enough to be a city. Flin Flon has 12,000 people. The people who live in that mining area cannot go west. They have to go east and south about 150 miles before they can start to go west. That is not fair. These people have gone up into that country and produced wealth. The city of Flin Flon has paid around $80 million in taxes. Surely they are not asking too much when they ask the federal government to help them to build highway No. 35 from Flin Flon to White Fox or Nipawin. I had the pleasure of flying over that proposed highway last summer. I flew from Prince Albert, and followed the proposed highway through the slash, through the bush and across the muskeg in a plane up to the top of Cumberland lake. I then flew down from the top of Cumberland lake to Cumberland House. I am sure there is nothing up there that cannot be overcome with the machinery we have these days.

In the province of Saskatchewan we have a minister who says things and has them printed, but they are a little bit far-fetched. I refer to Mr. J. T. Douglas of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Casselman: I thought it was Jimmy Gardiner.

Mr. Ferrie: If you were half as good as Jimmy Gardiner you would be all right.

Mr. Ross (Souris): How do you mean?

[Mr. Ferrie.]

Mr. Ferrie: Any way you like to take it. J. T. Douglas has said to some of the people in Flin Flon that he has made application to the federal government to help them to build this highway. I have been waiting for two years. Twice I said on the floor of the house that he should make application. At this time he says he has made application. He has done nothing of the kind.

What is the reason for this? We do not understand why Mr. Douglas, the minister of highways in the province of Saskatchewan, should not want this highway built. I am sure he would get a sympathetic hearing in Ottawa if he would just humble himself and ask for a little help.

I should like to bring to the attention of this house one or two things that have been said by some of the members from Saskatchewan who sit with the C.C.F. Some of these hon. members have made certain statements. I look around me and I see my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He made the statement in Saskatchewan at his own nomination meeting, and at two or three other nomination meetings, that we as Liberals would not co-operate with him or with their party in any way, shape or form. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, and I want to let the people of Saskatchewan know, that never once since I have been down here has any member of the C.C.F. ever come to me and asked me to co-operate with him in getting any measure through the house. They never came in any way, shape or form. At one time we Liberals from western Canada were in a little difficulty in trying to get through this house a grant of $65 million for the farmers of western Canada. I think some people here realize just exactly what it cost us to persuade some of the members of this house to support us.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It will cost you your seat.

Mr. Ferrie: I hope you heard that from another man from western Canada. That is the Conservative idea, that we should not get it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It was just one-tenth enough.

Mr. Ferrie: As far as we went at that time we did our utmost to help the farmers of western Canada, and we not only had kicks from the east but we had kicks from the west. The point I am trying to put over, Mr. Speaker, is simply this. When we were in that difficulty we decided that we might need some help. The hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith) went around to the leader of the C.C.F. party and said: "We might need the help—

Mr. Ross (Souris): No wonder there was trouble brewing.

Mr. Ferrie: —to put over this legislation." He said, "All right, I shall go and round them up." The hon. member for Moose Mountain said, "Those C.C.F. members from Saskatchewan are gone." The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, "My C.C.F. members are not gone," and he started out to round them up. Then he came back and said, "They are gone," and as a matter of fact they had gone.

These are the C.C.F. members who are the great boys, who say, "We are out for the farmer; we are out to help him." Because they could not get everything they sulked, they beefed; they said, "If we cannot get all the loaf we will not take any of it. We will just let the farmer down. We will not vote for him at all."

An hon. Member: Where was the hon. member for Souris?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Come down to Souris riding and you will find out.

Mr. Ferrie: Let me say that is not the only time this has been done. They get out in the province of Saskatchewan and tell all sorts of stories about what the Liberals are doing here in Ottawa. They tell us we are the ones who are always wrong, that we are the ones who are doing injury to the farming population of western Canada.

Right now we are being accused of failing to put health insurance into operation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that.

An hon. Member: Off centre.

Mr. Ferrie: Yes, he is off centre, too. He has said that Liberal members should get up and say something about health insurance. Well, let me tell him that I have forgotten more about health insurance than he will ever know. In the municipality I represent we have had a form of health insurance since 1928. At one time I went down to Toronto and bought a 50-bed hospital—and I bought it alone—for the use of the people of western Canada. That hospital was put into operation. Let me ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if Winnipeg has even hospitalization? I say to him he has not yet sold it to the people of Winnipeg. It has been sold to the people of Dauphin, but it has not been sold to the people of Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member not know the extent of the free medical services we have been able to build in Winnipeg?

Mr. Ferrie: But you have not free hospitalization and free medical care such as we have. You should be selling that, before you try to sell it to us in other parts of western Canada.

Then, in the second place, why do you not sell it to Ontario and Quebec? You should have no trouble in selling it to us, because west of Winnipeg we are health-insurance conscious. We know all about it, because we have tried it. We have a great number of municipalities in Saskatchewan and in Alberta and quite a few in Manitoba that are giving free medical care. He should try to sell it to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that you will vote for it?

Mr. Ferrie: I will not vote for your motion, that's a sure thing. Any time I vote for a C.C.F. motion there will be two moons in the sky.

Mr. Gibson: You have to have some pride.

Mr. Knowles: Broad-minded Liberals!

Mr. Ferrie: I never voted socialist in my life, and I am not going to. So far as we in our province are concerned, when we started this medical care we paid for it.

An hon. Member: It is not free, then.

Mr. Ferrie: We are not yelling to anybody to pay for it. We taxed our people and paid the bills, and we are still doing it. And we are not doing what the socialist outfit is doing in Saskatchewan. I have in my hand a card put out by the C.C.F. government. On the back of it they say exactly what they are going to do. The card indicates that operating and case-room facilities are free. The lady who held this card had to avail herself of these facilities, and had paid $5 for her ticket in 1947. She went to the hospital and, although she was not confined to bed, she had the required work done. This work has to be repeated every so often. What has happened? Well, they say that, in addition, it will cost her $35, and she has said that she is not going to pay it. This Mrs. Kemper has been asked to pay the $35 and her reply has been, "No, I won't pay it". That is the way the C.C.F. do it.

An hon. Member: With their free hospitalization.

Mr. Ferrie: Yes, with their free hospitalization, as one hon. member says. What did they do in this case? They sent her a final notice, this time from the city of Toronto, because they dare not do it in Saskatchewan. The notice in this instance was received from the Medical Audit Association at 32 Front street west, Toronto, and it points out that if she does not pay she will be sued and that legal fees will be added.

Mr. Gibson: The wolves of Bay street.

Mr. Ferrie: These are the things that happen under the C.C.F. government, the controlled outfit in Saskatchewan. These are the things we are against. In the municipalities of Saskatchewan we have spent thousands upon thousands of dollars for medical care, and I do not think anyone would find a case where we acted in this way.

An hon. Member: And did not put them in jail, either.

Mr. Ferrie: What I have described has happened in Saskatchewan; yet these C.C.F. members are asking us to go ahead and to put something into operation, without knowing where we are going.

Then let us go back a little and see what happens. In 1944 an outstanding piece of legislation was set out in the speech from the throne. Everyone in this building in those days was talking about family allowances. To make a long story short, some of these people including Premier Douglas and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) are saying that they were responsible for placing this security legislation on the statute books. Let us consider that 1944 vote on the speech from the throne. It has been mentioned before in this house, and I think it should be mentioned again. When the motion was brought on the floor of the house a vote was taken, and the then leader of the Conservative party in this house, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), said there was only one piece of legislation in that speech from the throne that really mattered. He said that as the family allowance was going to be a benefit to all the people and the children of Canada, he persuaded his party to vote for that bill or to vote for the speech from the throne; and he did vote for it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Where did you get that quotation?

Mr. Ferrie: From his own account. If the hon. member looks at it he will find it at page 364. All the Conservatives voted for it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member said he persuaded his party to do so.

Mr. Ferrie: Yes. That is what he himself said. You can look it up in Hansard, if you like to do so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What page?

Mr. Ferrie: April 25, 1949. He made a speech, and he knows this because I asked him about it. He said he did. That is exactly what happened. The Conservative party of that time voted with the Liberals on the speech from the throne when the family allowance measure was in that speech. What happened with regard to all these people who never do anything wrong, who are always trying to tell us that we are the ones who do not do anything but exploit the people? What did they do? The C.C.F. members from Saskatchewan voted against this speech from the throne. I will ask them what would have happened if the Conservatives had not voted with the Liberals.

Mr. Knowles: The government had a majority.

Mr. Ferrie: The government might have gone down. Then how long would it have taken for even the Liberal party or anybody else to sell family allowances to the people of Canada again? Let us see who they were who voted against this speech from the throne, these men who said that they did not want family allowances.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ferrie: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the hon. member has no right to interpret a vote of non-confidence, a vote on the speech from the throne, as a vote on any particular measure that might have been mentioned in that speech from the throne. He is trying to show that the C.C.F. voted against family allowances, which is completely false. If he is fair he will tell you that, when the vote was taken on second reading of the family allowances bill, every member of the C.C.F.—indeed every member present in the house, in all parties—voted for it.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, the point I am trying to bring out is just exactly what the hon. member says. He voted for it when he knew the country was for it. He did not take any chances at all. These are the gentlemen that voted against the speech from the throne: Blackmore, Bryce, Burton, Castleden, Coldwell, Dorion, Douglas (Weyburn), Fair, Gillis, Hansell, Hlynka, Johnston (Bow River), Knowles, Kuhl, MacInnis, Marshall, Nicholson. This last gentleman has just been nominated to run against me. Then there was another great man who got to his feet here the other day, talking about all that they were doing, that they were the only people that had pushed anything. I refer to Noseworthy. Noseworthy voted against it.

Mr. Knowles: Against what?

Mr. Ferrie: Against the speech from the throne. If it had been defeated, what would have happened? There would not have been any family allowances, and you know there would not have been. Why did you vote against it? Because you did not know what the people were thinking. That is why.

Mr. Knowles: You are crazy. You used that argument in the 1949 election and you are going to try it again. It will not work this time.

Mr. Ferrie: I can see that we have got their goats, Mr. Speaker.

I want to say this in closing; it is getting near six o'clock. We have been told by the C.C.F. party in the province of Saskatchewan that everything we do is wrong. I have a quotation here, but I will not take up any more time. Here is Premier Douglas telling the people to vote against the marketing policy of this government. What does the marketing policy mean? It means the sale of our wheat and the floor price of our cattle. I should have liked to go into that matter, but I cannot do it now; I will do so, however, in the budget debate. I will speak with regard to the speech which was made by Mr. Douglas in protest and also with regard to the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) and his price for cattle. I should like to say something about that. Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock and I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Ferrie the debate was adjourned.

CIVIL SERVICE

PRESS REPORT AS TO LEGISLATION TO PERMIT GARNISHEEING OF WAGES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement with regard to a matter concerning which I think a good deal of misunderstanding will arise if it is not corrected promptly.

Mr. Drew: What is the nature of the statement? What is the subject matter? If we are told that, we can indicate whether or not we agree to the statement being made.

Mr. Garson: The subject matter is a story in this evening's Citizen to this effect:

> The garnisheeing of wages of federal government employees is expected to be permitted under legislation which may be introduced at the current session of parliament, it was learned today.

I think it would create a great deal of misunderstanding if a story like that went out. I may say that there is no foundation for that story. There is no intention to introduce any such legislation. The reference in the speech from the throne which is quoted in this newspaper article to this effect—and I am now quoting from the reference in the newspaper—

> . . . A measure will be submitted designed to place the crown in substantially the same position as a private person with respect to liability for acts committed by its servants.

—is only partially quoted. The full text of that selection from the speech from the throne goes on in the speech itself as follows:

> . . . for breach of duty arising out of the ownership or occupation of property, and for salvage claims . . .

Exposing the crown to suit for the acts of its servants in connection with breach of duty arising out of the ownership or occupation of property has nothing to do with the garnishee process at all, and it is not the intention of the government to introduce legislation permitting the garnisheeing of civil service wages.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the house adjourn until Monday at 2.30 p.m., if that meets with the approval of hon. members.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 1, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. POULIOT—FELICITATIONS ON ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise at the moment on a question not so much of privilege as of courtesy. Yesterday afternoon I happened to look through the Parliamentary Guide, and found that one of our distinguished members in the house is today celebrating his twenty-eighth anniversary as a member of the house. I refer of course to our genial and very good friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata, Mr. Jean François Pouliot.

He was first elected to the House of Commons in a by-election on December 1, 1924, and has been elected in seven general elections since that time, a period of twenty-eight years—three years more than a quarter of a century.

While in the house we may have our differences, while there may be harsh words exchanged at different times across the floor of the chamber, nevertheless I think that on an occasion of this kind we might pause a moment and pay a well-deserved mark of courtesy to one of our senior members in the house. I do this with a great deal of pleasure, although perhaps all too inadequately.

I noticed further, in reviewing the comments in the Parliamentary Guide, that the Pouliot family has been quite distinguished in its record of public service. I believe the hon. member's father was a member of the House of Commons, and that his grandfather and great-grandfather served in various legislative capacities.

It is clear therefore that the background of the Pouliot family in the public life of this country has been most significant. Having in mind the atmosphere of this institution, and what it means to serve here a long time, I think all hon. members this afternoon would wish to pay our tribute of respect, and to offer our congratulations and very best wishes to the hon. member for Temiscouata.

I believe I speak for all members in the House of Commons when I extend to the hon. member our very best wishes.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I indicate my own hope that everyone will join in extending good wishes to the very genial member for Temiscouata. May I point out that he occupies a unique position in the house, not only by reason of the association of his family with the public service of this country, but perhaps in another way. I refer of course to the fact that he has differences of opinion not only across the floor of the house, but at times even on the same side of the house. In the relatively short time I have been here, he has never hesitated in that respect to express his opinion. He knows I do not always share his opinions, and I have discovered he does not always share mine. I know that with whatever friendship I extend my congratulations today, and I do so with good friendship indeed, he will not expect me to assist him unduly in continuing this long record of public service—although I must say he seems to have got on very well without that in the past.

In all seriousness may I say that it is a matter for comment that in one family there should be such a unique record of public service. When anyone can look back on 28 years of personal service and recall that his father, his grandfather and his great-grandfather served Canada in a similar capacity, it is indeed right that he should claim to have sought to help Canada by serving the country publicly. In doing so there has been established a family tradition.

Whatever differences of opinion there may be, and these differences of opinion characterize this free democratic system of ours, may I add to what has been said already—I feel sure that this is the conviction of every hon. member here—and extend to the hon. member for Temiscouata all good wishes and hopes that he may enjoy in health and happiness the many friendships he has established.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the official whip of the government and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) have spoken for all of us. In the seventeen years that I have been here it has been my pleasure to sit almost directly opposite to the hon. member for Temiscouata. Not only have I listened to his contributions to the debates that have appeared in Hansard; I have also heard the witticisms in which he has indulged and which on occasion did not get into Hansard. I have enjoyed both and I hope that at least for the lifetime of this parliament all of us may continue to enjoy these witticisms.

As the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) have said, it is unique that a dynasty in elective service, for such it is, should have been established in parliament and legislatures for four generations. I would hope that this tradition will be carried on when the time comes by the young son of the hon. member. I am very happy indeed to join in these felicitations.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious to all present that there is nothing further to be said. The Social Credit group join with their fellow members in the fine things that have been said concerning the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, as next-door neighbour to the hon. member for Temiscouata in our room accommodations, and as a friend of long standing, I want to say a word about the hon. member. For a short period of time I occupied the position of leader of the opposition, and at that time I am afraid I was a very green stick of political timber. While I was carrying on my duties in that capacity, I shall never forget the great kindness and the extreme courtesy that I always received from the experienced and brilliant member for Temiscouata.

At all times I have been the recipient of many acts of kindness, in and out of the house, by this member from the province of Quebec. Two years ago he came into the county of Peel to address one of our important organizations which, I hasten to say, has nothing to do with politics. I think he left one of the best impressions that any parliamentarian who has come into my part of the country has ever left upon the people. As an ambassador of good will between the different sections of Canada he has made an outstanding success.

Quite often at the United Nations—I am sure my feelings are shared by other members who have been there—when listening to Vishinsky carrying on in his top form and doing the most damage he could, I have wished that for a few fleeting minutes Jean François Pouliot could be there to deal with him as he deserved.

When he visited us in Brampton two years ago we presented his charming wife, through him, with a bouquet of flowers from the flower town of Canada. I only wanted to rise and add to that bouquet a verbal orchid of my own.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, as a former deskmate of the hon. member for Temiscouata, may I say that I have always found him courteous and kind to me in my inexperience, and sober, sensible and convincing in his remarks. I want to bring to him greetings from a number of friends in Fort William who wish him at least 28 years more in the House of Commons. We wish him not only success here but peace in his own heart.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the chief government whip, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. gentleman who leads the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), my good friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), and my good friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

I am quite fortunate in having been a member of parliament for 28 years. I went through eight general elections, three within twenty-two months, and here I am listening to the finest obituary to which one could listen. It was most kind of the whip to speak as he did and I am deeply touched by what he and the other gentlemen said.

I remember when I was first elected to the House of Commons 28 years ago. It was a Monday like today, with fine weather. It had been a terrific election. When I was invited to the land of flowers, to Brampton, to speak before a social club there, I told them some of the incidents that had occurred during that election and perhaps I could repeat one or two at this time.

I did not run as an independent, I ran as a straight Liberal. The official candidate was not actually the member for Temiscouata, it was another gentleman. It was quite difficult to convince some of the die-hard Liberals that their duty was to vote for me. Therefore my friends got a good-looking chap with dark hair who went from house to house to canvass the people. He told them that he was Mackenzie King's messenger and that it was their duty to vote for Pouliot. When they asked his name he said he was Chubby Power. He was not actually the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), he was just a good friend of mine. There was no impersonation, because he voted in his own name. That is just one of the numerous stories I told in Brampton.

I think my hon. friends know that I do not intend to make a long speech but I would like to tell the house the secret for survival in politics. I think each member of parliament knows it. The motto we used to read in our copy books when we were at school—"Honesty is the best policy". Another one is "I serve."

Mr. Coldwell: Is that illustrated by the story?

Mr. Pouliot: One must stand by one's own people provided that the member honestly believes they are right; and if they are wrong, which happens seldom, he must tell them so. This is the only condition for survival. Besides that one must not promise more than can be done.

I never expected that so many members of parliament would be so kind. I have done my best to be fair with all my colleagues without distinction, and if we disagree at times with regard to various policies we nevertheless have a common bond that ties us very strongly, namely, that though we may belong to this or that party we are in the first place members of the House of Commons and as such we are brothers. Not only that, I think that the members of the House of Commons form indeed an exclusive club. They also form a very representative cross-section of the country and a very good slice of mankind. Those who come here to attend our deliberations are in a position to have a fair opinion of the Canadian people at large.

I have been touched by the very kind remarks of all those who have spoken, by the remarks of the whip who has always been very kind to me. Often when I was not sure what to do I sought advice from him, and he has been most helpful to me, as have all my colleagues. I have also appreciated warmly the kind words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). We disagree but we remain friends. This is a thing that is essential in public life; otherwise life would be unbearable. I say the same thing of the leader of the C.C.F. group and the former leader of the Social Credit party. They have been very generous to me. I appreciate it. I do not know what are the future plans of my son. I do not think he will get into politics but I will surely send him a copy of Hansard.

It was very kind of my good neighbour, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who was formerly leader of the opposition, to associate the name of my wife with the work that I have done as a member of parliament. Our wives deserve even more sympathy than we who are in politics. Life is very hard for them, and I have been comforted by the kindness and the support of my wife. I am very thankful to her and I am thankful to my electors who have been most kind to me. They have been fair, they have been very generous and kind to me, and I cannot speak highly enough of them. I managed well with my neighbour. I managed well also with my former deskmate, the hon. member for Fort William, who is one of the kindest members of the house. The good he said of me I think of him and I cannot say any better. I thank all hon. members of the house for this tribute, which I appreciate very deeply.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMINISTRATION AT PETAWAWA CAMP—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he inform us when he will receive the report which we were assured was being prepared some time ago by Mr. Currie with respect to the administration of the Department of National Defence so far as it affects Petawawa camp?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not been in touch with Mr. Currie myself for some time but I am informed by the deputy minister that he has been in touch with members of Mr. Currie's staff, and that it is expected that the report will be available within the next week or two. It has not been made yet.

Mr. Drew: As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government has received an interim report?

Mr. Claxton: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF PLANES OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY BY UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence. Under what authority do United States planes cross into Canada for the purpose of investigating planes flying over Canadian territory?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): As hon. members know, the defence of North America must be regarded as a single operation, and in consequence of recommendations of the permanent joint board an arrangement has been worked out related to the defence of North America against air attack. The important element in this arrangement is that air defence identification zones have been set up along both sides of the international border and along both coasts. Civil aeronautical regulations require that any aircraft operating in these zones should file flight plans.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Any unidentified aircraft flying in an air defence zone near the international border and apparently heading toward the border is liable to interception for purposes of identification by military aircraft of the country towards which the unidentified aircraft is believed to be headed. For this purpose United States air force aircraft may cross the border into Canada and R.C.A.F. aircraft may cross into the United States. Interceptor aircraft must obey the rules of interception procedure laid down by the country over which the interception is made. United States aircraft when flying over Canada are not permitted to order any aircraft to land.

With respect to the press report which gives rise to this matter, I think I should say that the Globe and Mail refers to three specific incidents. The information made available to me by officers of the R.C.A.F. and by the Department of Transport would indicate that one incident referred to as taking place recently and involving a Leavens Brothers aircraft actually took place in 1950 long before this arrangement was in effect. Another incident referred to concerned an Austin Airways plane. This, I am informed, related to an incident that occurred well on the United States side of the border. I am informed that no report regarding the interception of the Ed Thomas-piloted photographic plane has been received by either air force headquarters or the Department of Transport, but from their own information they believe it occurred in March or April of 1952.

CIVIL SERVICE

FIVE-DAY WEEK—WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in his capacity as Acting Minister of Finance? Will Winnipeg be included with Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver as a city where the year round five-day week will be established for certain branches of the civil service according to the letter from the Minister of Finance which was tabled in this house on Friday?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance): At the present time the treasury board does not contemplate the extension of the five-day week to government employees in Winnipeg. The advice received by the officers of the board's staff from the civil service commission is to the effect that the five-day week is not sufficiently predominant among private employers and employees in Winnipeg that it is necessary to extend it to the government staffs in that city.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Knowles: Will the situation in Winnipeg be reviewed in the light of additional information that may be received from that city?

Mr. Garson: I think the situation would be reviewed in the ordinary course of the government's handling of the matter at the present time.

KOREA

INTEGRATION OF SOUTH KOREAN FORCES WITH CANADIAN UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) a question? Recent reports would indicate that there is a new policy being followed with regard to the integration of South Korean troops with Canadian units. Could the minister indicate whether the reports are or are not correct?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): It is the policy of the Canadian government to support any action which will enhance the military effectiveness of the South Koreans and to assist them to defend their own country. On a proposal emanating from commonwealth representatives with the United Nations command, discussions have taken place with other commonwealth countries concerned, with a view to reaching agreement on the integration of South Korean personnel into units of the first commonwealth division.

For some months past the United States divisions in Korea have integrated a number of South Koreans divided among their division units. The American practice has been to feed, clothe and lend arms to the South Koreans serving with United States units, while the South Korean government has been responsible for their pay. It is probable that the arrangements contemplated for the integration of South Koreans into the commonwealth division, if agreed to, will be on lines similar in effect to the United States formations.

PERCENTAGE OF SOUTH KOREAN FORCES ENGAGED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Is there any objection to giving the house information as to the percentage of Republic of Korea troops engaged in the United Nations activities there? What is the percentage of South Koreans as opposed to the others?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not got that information at this moment and I am sure that I could not give it without reference to the United Nations command in the Far East.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

STATEMENT BY UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): With permission of the house I should like to place on record a statement which was issued from Washington the other day and forwarded to us. It was issued on November 28 and reads as follows:

Acting Secretary of Agriculture Knox T. Hutchinson announced today that if present favourable conditions continue, Canada will be declared free of foot-and-mouth disease on March 1, 1953.

Consultations were held with the department's livestock industry advisory committee on foot and mouth disease in Denver this week regarding the re-opening of the Canadian border to livestock and livestock products. The committee recommended the March 1 date.

Action has been started on regulations which will permit the entry of Canadian cattle, sheep, other domestic ruminants, and swine, and fresh, chilled, or frozen beef, veal, mutton, lamb and pork. Restrictions applying to other animal products and hay also will be removed.

The United States border has been closed to such imports since February 25, 1952, when the Canadian government announced the appearance of foot-and-mouth disease in the province of Saskatchewan. Strong measures adopted by the Canadian officials, which included quarantines, inspection, slaughter of diseased and exposed herds, and disinfection of premises, confined the disease to a relatively small area of that province. In addition to the original infection near Regina, two subsequent appearances of the disease nearer the United States border were brought under control without spread to other premises. The last infection was found on April 28 and the infected animals were slaughtered three days later.

The same prohibitions and restrictions applying since February 25 will continue in effect until the new order becomes effective. This applies to susceptible game animals as well as domestic livestock.

This is the report as put out in Washington and we received it on Saturday last.

TELECOMMUNICATION

RATES BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). As the new long distance telephone rates between Newfoundland and the mainland come into effect today, I wonder whether the minister is in a position to answer a question I asked the other day. Are there special rates for calls put in after six o'clock and on Sundays, as is the case in the rest of Canada?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am afraid that I shall have to take notice of the question and inquire what the situation is. The statement I made the other day covered the tariff for the usual calls. I am sorry that I have not the information available.

TRANSPORT SERVICES

TERMINAL FACILITIES AT PORT AUX BASQUES AND GANDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) whether he has read the comment of the director of tourist development of New York relating to Canadian National Railways facilities at Port aux Basques and another article appearing in the Citizen on November 26 with respect to improved facilities at Gander airport, and whether he is prepared to comment on both.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have not read the article in the Citizen although my parliamentary assistant has told me about it. I do not know that it is a proper thing to comment on articles of the press on orders of the day and I do not want to be disrespectful to my hon. friend, but my parliamentary assistant tells me that the article covers a long-range program for terminal facilities for airports across Canada. I should think the place to comment on that would be when the estimates of the Department of Transport are up for consideration. We have under review from time to time plans for Gander and other international airports for Canada and the items covering those expenditures will be placed in the estimates. They are subject to review by the treasury board and also the approval of the house and I do not think I would like to comment beyond that.

In so far as the other matter is concerned, conditions at Port aux Basques, which are said to be disgraceful: I visited Port aux Basques this summer and I did not find conditions too good, but I would remind my hon. friend and the house that there is a tremendous amount of construction going on there for new terminal facilities. I saw nothing there that I did not see in two or three other places, for instance on the north shore of the river St. Lawrence at Sept Iles where there was a great deal of construction work going on. The Canadian National Railways have been given the job of building the facilities. It is just to remedy the present position that they have been put in charge of the operations. I think that any disorder that is to be found there at the moment will be remedied when the new wharf and terminal facilities are completed.

[Later:]

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I hope the Minister of Transport will regard this as an appropriate comment on what he has just said. A question has been asked in regard to certain facilities in Newfoundland, related to different points, but I would suggest that the airport at Gander is in a special position. It is the front door to Canada to scores of thousands, and will be to hundreds of thousands within the coming year. I would think that this is something that might well be discussed without waiting for the estimates, and that the members of this house would wish to know, in fact would be entitled to know, if the government does contemplate, as has been suggested, that the airport facilities at Gander are to be improved in keeping with the tremendous movement of people which will take place through there in the coming year.

Mr. Chevrier: The question that was directed to me was a request for a comment on a newspaper article which I have not had the opportunity of reading. It is a very long one outlining long-term plans in connection with all the airports. I was telling the hon. gentleman that I did not think it was appropriate to discuss that on the orders of the day.

As my hon. friend says, of course, Gander is an airport of great importance, just as Vancouver and the other transcontinental airports are. It would strike me that if my hon. friend had a definite question to ask, perhaps I could deal with it. I was asked to comment on the whole series of plans, and I think perhaps it would be better if that could be done at another opportunity, such as my estimates.

Mr. Higgins: May I ask the minister, are there to be improved facilities made available immediately at Gander?

Mr. Chevrier: There are in the estimates now, I can tell my hon. friend, provisions for additional facilities. Those estimates, of course, will have to be approved by the treasury board. At this time I believe it would not be advisable to give any details as to what they are, but at the appropriate time I shall be glad to give them to the house.

TELEVISION

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL SERVICE IN TORONTO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). In view of the unfortunate break-down of television broadcasting in an otherwise good telecast last Saturday of the Grey Cup game, are the minister and his government now prepared to consider licensing other stations in the area so that there will not be simply a monopoly enjoyed by the one C.B.C. station?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): That is a matter which has not yet received attention.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—PROPOSED FEDERAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the protests made by Sir Brian Dunfield, who is chairman of the town planning commission of St. John's, Newfoundland, and the endorsation of both daily newspapers of St. John's of the protest against the erection of the new federal building on the grounds of Government House at St. John's, is he prepared to give an undertaking that the building will not be erected in this place?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): This morning I had a most interesting talk with the hon. gentleman about this site. He told me he would ask whether I had read about the protests against the site of the new federal building. I may tell him that I have received protests against every and all sites we have considered up to date. The last protest would be the one from Sir Brian Dunfield, who says that if we put the building on that site we would be squashing the heart and lungs of St. John's. I am in very serious doubts, and when I am in doubt I generally do not act.

Mr. Graydon: Is that why you are holding back the election?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have not much to say about that. This newspaper clipping was sent over by the hon. gentleman, and it is entitled "Wants say in site". Actually I find that I am the only one who has no say in connection with the site.

CRIMINAL CODE

REFERENCE OF AMENDMENTS TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether the proposed revision of the Criminal Code, if it is introduced at this session, will be referred to a committee of the house so that interested persons or organizations may appear before that committee and make representations with respect to any sections over which there may be concern?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The Criminal Code, Mr. Speaker, has already been introduced in the Senate. It has been given first and second readings and referred to the Senate committee on banking and commerce, by which committee it is now being considered. When that legislation comes to this house it will be referred to a committee of the house which will be assigned power to hear interested persons and organizations.

THE CABINET

DESIGNATION "OFFICERS OF THE CROWN"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question which was asked last Thursday, November 27, by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), in these terms:

> I should like to know what members of the cabinet are considered officers of the crown. If there are any members of the cabinet who are not in that category, who are those specific ministers of the crown who are not so considered?

I have drafted an answer to that question after speaking to the hon. member and finding out from him that what he had in mind was a recent decision by the president of the exchequer court to the effect that the Secretary of State is not an officer of the crown within the meaning of that expression in paragraph (c) of section 30 of the Exchequer Court Act, which gives the court jurisdiction in all cases in which a demand is made or relief sought against any officer of the crown for anything done or omitted to be done in the performance of his duties as such officer. I have no reason to suppose that the court would not hold similarly in the case of any other cabinet minister, that he is not an officer of the crown within the meaning of that expression in section 30 of the Exchequer Court Act. This decision should be regarded as the law of Canada so long as it stands unreversed by a higher court, but it applies of course only to paragraph (c) of section 30 of the Exchequer Court Act.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, November 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): When we adjourned the debate on Friday night, Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the price of cattle. Since I have looked over Hansard, I should like to say a few words concerning what the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said on page 189 of Hansard for November 28. He made the statement that I had no right to come to the conclusion I did with regard to what that party did in 1944 on the family allowance vote.

Then, going over to page 199 of the same volume, he says that I won an election on this statement but I will not do it again. I should like to bring to the hon. gentleman's attention this point. If I won an election in 1949 on this particular point, there must have been a great many people in my constituency who thought the same as I did, and they still do.

I want to tell the hon. member that I did not win the election on that alone. The C.C.F. party, over the signature of the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), issued a pamphlet entitled "Who owns Canada". This statement came to my notice, and I may say that in my constituency there is one of the best farmers organizations in Canada, the United Grain Growers. There are thousands and thousands of farmers in that organization, and the United Grain Growers has elevators scattered to the north, south, east and west of my constituency. In this pamphlet "Who owns Canada", you will see that there are one hundred organizations listed with a capital amounting to $9 billion. It is these organizations that the C.C.F. say they are going to take over. Some of these same gentlemen say that they stick up for the farmers, that they are doing everything for the people that it is possible for them to do, but that we as Liberals from western Canada do not do anything. I want to tell them that we go in to fight where there is some sense in fighting, not by standing up on the floor of the house and trying to bawl others out. We go to fight to get things for western Canada where we know that we will have some recognition and that someone will listen to us.

In this article, Mr. Speaker, you find that they say that they are going to take over the United Grain Growers, amounting to $28,-128,000. The men who started this company started it away back in 1908 or 1909, or maybe a little bit earlier than that. When they started that company, I know of one man who went to one of those meetings and who drove his horses 100 miles—

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Ferrie: You sit down. There is no question at all. I have only a few minutes left. I did not interrupt you. You sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: All right; I will sit down. I just wished to ask the hon. member to read the section.

Mr. Ferrie: I have only a few minutes left in which to finish.

Mr. Coldwell: Such a statement is not there. That is why I wanted to ask the hon. member to read it.

Mr. Ferrie: These farmers put their money in. As I said before, one of these men drove a team of horses 100 miles, then he went the rest of the way to this meeting, which was about 15 miles, on foot. His horses were played out and he walked the rest of the 15 miles. He was a shareholder from our part of the country in the United Grain Growers. He walked to this meeting in order to add his voice in helping that elevator system along. We now come along to this point, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen put out this pamphlet and say that they are going to take over this farmers' organization, and that they would take it right in with this same body of people. The only one that they have left out is the pool. They left our pool out because they dare not put that in.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is time the people of western Canada woke up and realized just exactly what is happening. We are trying to fight for them down here in Ottawa, in an effort to get something for western Canada; but all we get from our opposition in western Canada is abuse. I want to say that I have sat here and taken it long enough—we have got lots more like this—and we will not take it any more.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, I had fifteen minutes. I started at 25 minutes to the hour and I went on until 3 minutes to the hour, and now I have fifteen minutes.

Mr. Coldwell: The Speaker decides.

Mr. Speaker: It is unfortunate that there is a misunderstanding. My information was that the hon. member had just a few minutes left. I do not want to deprive him of his time, if he has any left. Probably we should give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, surely a record is kept. If the hon. member has not exhausted his time, and the record shows it, there is no objection to his continuing. The hon. gentleman would allow no question to be asked, and I do not see why he should have any extra time, under those circumstances. Ordinarily, I would be prepared to agree but I am not prepared to agree now.

Mr. Speaker: The clerks at the table who keep the time inform me that the hon. member has exhausted his time. Unless there is unanimous consent, I cannot allow him to continue.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry there has been a misunderstanding, but I am bound by the information I receive from the clerks at the table.

Mr. Ferrie: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker; I will accept your ruling but it certainly is not right. I started at 25 minutes to the hour and I did not—

Mr. Noseworthy: The only man right in this house!

Mr. Speaker: The record shows that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) started to speak at 5.21 on Friday and that the debate was adjourned at 5.59 p.m. I am informed by the Clerk that that amounts to 38 minutes, which would have left him two minutes today. I have allowed him at least five minutes. I cannot go beyond that without the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, under a C.C.F. protest I will relinquish my time.

Mr. Coldwell: Rubbish.

Mr. Knowles: That is a comment on Your Honour.

Mr. Coldwell: That is a comment on the Speaker and not on anyone in the house. The hon. gentleman would not allow a courtesy question, and consequently he cannot expect to receive favours from those to whom he will not grant favours.

Mr. Ferrie: I am not looking for favours.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that what the hon. member for Mackenzie said is a reflection upon the Speaker. I think he is of the opinion that there is a mistake in the facts; but, as I say, I am bound by the information which I receive from the table.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) rose to take part in this debate on Thursday of last week, he prefaced his remarks by saying, as reported at page 134 of Hansard:

> Today I propose to deal with boots, forks and rugs.

I could not help thinking that perhaps he was going to quote from "Alice in Wonderland":

> Of shoes—and ships—and sealing wax—
> Of cabbages—and kings—

Then somebody mentioned neckties—hundreds of thousands of them. In fact, there were so many neckties that if they were placed end to end they would stretch from the minister's office to the firehall in Winnipeg—a thousand miles of neckties.

The minister then went on to explain why it was necessary that large quantities of stores of clothing and equipment should be purchased.

Stores of clothing and equipment were required for mobilization purposes. Everybody, of course, knows that large quantities of stores are required for mobilization purposes, and it is the duty of the government to provide those stores. But it is also the duty of the government to buy those stores in the most economical way possible. In order to attempt to prove his case the minister placed a great many figures on the record. But one set of figures which he did not give were those which would indicate what articles have been sold at bargain prices in the last few years through such organizations as War Assets Corporation. From the return which was made to this house in the early part of 1949, we know that the government had received no less a sum than $454 million for goods that it had sold at bargain prices. Or course in those days the word "stockpiling" did not enter into the minister's vocabulary.

Today I am not going to pursue that subject any further. I want to speak about another matter which affects the reputation of an officer and this country's standing in the sphere of international affairs and co-operation, in that it is in respect of the question of national defence. When the public is aroused by some particular incident and the government of the day gives only vague replies, a certain responsibility rests upon Her Majesty's opposition. When the public conscience feels uneasy over the treatment of one of its public servants, then it is again the duty of the opposition to ask for further clarification on that point. I intend this afternoon to ask for further clarification in the case of a brilliant young officer whose career was cut short suddenly in the middle of last summer. I refer to Brigadier A. B. Connelly, who was recalled from Korea and was retired at the age of 44.

Suspicion has been aroused because the government endeavoured to hide the fact that he was being recalled, and that he had been retired. It was only because of a news release in a foreign newspaper, the Chicago Tribune, that the facts—or at least some of the facts—regarding this case leaked out. The only definite information given by the Department of National Defence is in a release made by Mr. W. H. Dumsday, director of national defence public relations. He gave, I presume on instructions, the following release:

> Brigadier Connelly is on retirement leave which will extend over a period of some months. The department does not normally give reason for retirements, except that senior officers are retired when there is no further suitable employment for them. With regard to the report that he was retired for his failure to immediately notify the Canadian government of the intention to use Canadian troops on Koje island, the department has no comment.

As appears in a dispatch in the Regina Leader-Post of October 7, 1952, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said that he could neither confirm nor deny the report that the Koje incident was involved in the retirement. Then the release states, in inverted commas, "I know nothing about it," he said. That is, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he knew nothing about it.

However, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) of course does know all about this case, and he has made no statement over his own signature. There have been press comments and statements. The Victoria Daily Colonist refers to—> —a report from Ottawa published in a great many papers over the signature of Gerald Waring in which he says that the army has not even admitted officially that Connelly was sacked because he failed to advise the government last May that a company of Canadian soldiers was being sent to riot-torn Koje island to help guard prisoners of war.

Then it goes on to say:

> However, high-ranking officers say that it was the "immediate cause" of Connelly's retirement.

I do suggest that by this silence and these rather cowardly insinuations the reputation of this officer may have been damaged, and his opportunity of finding employment, now that he has been forced to retire from the army, is handicapped. It is for these reasons I feel that the public of Canada and the members of the House of Commons are entitled to a full and clear statement.

It should be noted that Brigadier Connelly did not retire. He was retired, and retired eleven years prior to the time when, under normal circumstances, he would have reached the age limit for retirement. It is also to be noted that there have been other promotions made from lieutenant-colonel or colonel to the rank of brigadier, since the time of Brigadier Connelly's forced retirement.

So the public are asking why this has been done. Can they be assured—and they want to be assured—that their public servants, particularly those on active service overseas, are treated with absolute fairness? They are asking why this promising career has suddenly been cut off, after this officer had been educated at great public expense. He attended the Royal Military College at Kingston, an educational establishment maintained very largely by public funds. After having done exceptionally well in his four-year course at Royal Military College, he was given further education at public expense by being sent to McGill university. In 1931 he joined the permanent force and, in the course of his years of service, attended various other schools of instruction.

When war broke out in 1939 he went overseas and soon rose to the rank of senior engineer officer in the first Canadian division. He was then transferred to the position of senior engineer officer in the fourth armoured division and, shortly after that, promoted to the position of chief engineer of the first Canadian corps.

Then he was selected to command all the engineer reinforcements of all the Canadian forces in the United Kingdom. Then he became deputy chief of staff in London, and as such was responsible for the return of the Canadian troops remaining in the United Kingdom after the cessation of hostilities. In all I believe he spent some seven years out of this country on active service in Europe.

When he came back he was first of all made deputy adjutant general and then, because of his engineering experience, in 1948 he was selected to be the commander of the northwest highway system. As all hon. members know, the northwest highway system administers the Alaska highway which runs from northern British Columbia into the Yukon. Many glowing reports have been made to the house, particularly by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons) and Cariboo (Mr. Murray), as well as by the ministers concerned, as to the importance of that great highway both from the point of view of national defence and from that of the economic life of the country.

I know that during Brigadier Connelly's tenure of command in the northwest highway system he was personally visited by members of this government. I never heard any complaint as to the work being done on that highway system; in fact, the contrary has been the case. In an address delivered in the house by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River these words are used, as they are reported at page 1366 of Hansard for November 1, 1949:

> The Canadian portion of the Alaska highway from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to the Alaska-Yukon border, a distance of 1,223 miles, is maintained by the northwest highway system of the Canadian army and I wish, at this time, to commend them for the excellent job they are doing under the command of Brigadier Connelly, in keeping this highway open.

General A. G. L. McNaughton writes and says that he is personally familiar with Brigadier Connelly's work in connection with this section of the northwest highway system and says:

> I consider that Brigadier Connelly is well qualified to assist in the organization and administration of important construction projects.

After two and a half years' service in the far north Brigadier Connelly was appointed commander of the Saskatchewan area where he remained until he was moved to a position of greater importance, namely, to be acting general officer commanding, prairie command. After the war broke out in Korea and the United Nations had established supreme headquarters in Tokyo, Brigadier Connelly was selected to be the liaison officer or military adviser from Canada to the United Nations supreme command.

I think hon. members will recognize at once that his has been a remarkable career, one which reflects great credit not only upon the officer concerned but upon the whole Canadian army. The public moneys which have been spent on his education would have been justified had he been permitted to complete his normal term of service.

The public want to know why he was retired on pension eleven years before the time at which he might ordinarily be expected to retire. He is still in good health, being a young man of only forty-four years of age; yet he is retired on a pension of more than $4,000 per year. Over the next eleven years that will amount to close to $50,000 of public money.

Mr. Claxton: It is $11,000, I am sorry.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it is nearer to $50,000 than to $11,000.

Mr. Claxton: The present value of the cost of his retirement today instead of in eleven years is $11,000.

Mr. Pearkes: He is being retired on a pension of $4,400 a year and he still had eleven years to go. That would come close to $50,000 for that period. For the next eleven years we will get no value from his services. That is why there is widespread feeling that Brigadier Connelly has been made the scapegoat for the Koje incident.

Let us examine Brigadier Connelly's position. He was liaison officer to the United Nations supreme headquarters situated at Tokyo where for the last year General Mark Clark has been in supreme command. The liaison officers serve under the assistant chief of staff of the eighth army who is particularly detailed to look after intelligence. General R. F. Ennis was the officer in charge of the United Nations Far Eastern command at that time so far as intelligence was concerned.

The duty of the liaison officer was to keep the government of Canada informed from such information as he could obtain with regard to contemplated operations and the progress of such operations. I presume he would write to the commanders in the field and would send in written reports or if necessary communicate with Canada by cable. I would emphasize that the liaison officer is not a commander.

I understand that this matter of sending troops to Koje was discussed with Brigadier Connelly and the commonwealth liaison officers in Tokyo and that before giving a definite answer, although it was hardly his place to do so, Brigadier Connelly suggested that the matter be referred to the commander of the 25th brigade, the officer designated as the senior Canadian officer in the Far East. The inference can be drawn from the press reports that this move was made while the matter was still in the consultative stage. Another inference which may be drawn is that Brigadier Connelly did report in his regular weekly reports to Ottawa that the matter of sending Canadian troops to share in guard duties at the prisoner of war camp on Koje island had been discussed with him and he had referred the matter to the commander of the troops.

Subsequently orders were issued through the regular channel of command passing down from the eighth army, from the commonwealth division to the commander of the Canadian brigade, that a company of troops would be required in order to give a more United Nations aspect to the guarding of the prisoners of war in that camp. It is fairly obvious that the troops did not consider this incident to be unusual. Canadian troops were under the command of the commonwealth division which in turn was under the command of the eighth army. Other detachments had been made along the lines of communication and certain Canadian troops were retained in Japan.

When the commander received the order he notified Ottawa in the ordinary course of events that he was sending one company of one of his battalions to assist in this guard duty. This house was informed on May 26 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) of this fact, and I quote from page 2552 of Hansard of that day as follows:

> On the afternoon of Thursday, May 22, the chief of the general staff received a telegram from the officer commanding 25th Canadian infantry brigade, Korea, to the effect that he had received an order from the first (commonwealth) division issued in accordance with a request from the United Nations command to post a company from the brigade to guard duty at the prisoner-of-war camp on Koje island, and that he was accordingly assigning a company from the Royal Canadian Regiment for this duty.

All of this had been in accordance with the plan for Canadian co-operation in the United Nations effort. We were part of the one effort striving for a common end. General Clark certainly had it within his authority to call upon any commonwealth troops to carry out any special duty within the area of the command that he considered was a reasonable task to assign to them. He was anxious to give a more United Nations aspect to this guarding of the prisoners of war. They were prisoners of war who had been captured by United States and commonwealth troops. In fact many of them had actually been captured by the Canadian forces. The continuation of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs reads as follows:

> The Canadian government therefore views with concern the dispatch of a company of the 25th infantry brigade to Koje island without prior consultation with the Canadian government . . .

Apparently the government seemed to go off rather half-cocked at that time because they issued this protest to Washington without taking time to discover whether the matter of sending a company to the Koje prisoner-of-war camp had been discussed with the commanders in the field or with the liaison officer. Faces were rather red when Washington came back and said that this matter had been discussed, that they had discussed it in Tokyo, and that the commander of the 25th brigade had been informed and had raised no objection.

It would appear that the government was embarrassed by this incident and they did not hesitate to let it be known that they had been embarrassed. So a whipping boy had to be found. Of course the darling of the government could not be chastised. Somebody had to take the beating for him. It may have been an error in judgment on the part of Brigadier Connelly when he did not send back by wire the fact that the matter of sending a company of Canadian troops to Koje island was being considered and merely reported it in a written statement, but it would hardly seem that one such error in judgment would be full and sufficient justification for cutting short the career of an officer who had already rendered such distinguished service and from whom the people of Canada might well expect to have additional valuable service rendered.

The opinion held by the United Nations officers under whom Brigadier Connelly was serving in Tokyo is of the very highest. I have a copy of a letter signed by General Mark W. Clark, the general in supreme command there. It is dated August 25, 1952, is addressed to Brigadier Connelly, and reads as follows:

> Upon your departure from this command I wish to express to you my appreciation for the outstanding service you have rendered to the United Nations cause during the past ten months. Your unfailing courtesy, co-operative attitude and efficient handling of the tasks pertaining to your assignment have been of material assistance to this headquarters.

Then Brigadier Connelly's immediate superior, Major General Ennis, took the trouble to write directly to the Minister of National Defence expressing his deepest regret at hearing of Brigadier Connelly's pending departure.

Mr. Claxton: May I ask the hon. member where he obtained this letter? Was it from General Ennis or myself?

Mr. Pearkes: You did not send it to me, sir.

Mr. Claxton: I was not asked for it.

Mr. Pearkes: In this letter, dated August 6, 1952, General Ennis says:

> Never have I had the opportunity of working with a representative of an allied country that has given me more satisfaction and pleasure. Brigadier Connelly's impeccable honesty, diplomacy, sincerity, courtesy, humility and devotion to his country have won for Canada and for himself the highest respect from all United Nations representatives in this command.

He goes on to say:

> We, your neighbours to the south, feel a great sense of pride and assurance in the future when we have the privilege of associating with such outstanding soldiers of the Canadian army.

He concludes by saying:

> Those of us who have been closely associated with Brigadier Connelly during this past year wish him continued success in what will unquestionably be an outstanding military career.

That outstanding military career has suddenly been cut short. I repeat that in my opinion Brigadier Connelly has been used to cover up government embarrassment. He has been retired from the service without justification, his character besmirched by innuendoes. I think this is a particularly vicious example of the government policy of concentrating control in Ottawa. To my knowledge it has already had a bad effect upon the morale of the troops. Commanders feel that their initiative is restricted, that they must refer every little detail to Ottawa thousands of miles away. Surely the question must be answered: Are we in or are we out of the United Nations Organization?

I cannot help thinking that, if the government had been honest with itself, then instead of retiring Brigadier Connelly the real blunderer would have been promoted to the other place. All I am asking is that the government make amends for the wrong it has done to this promising officer. Let right be done now. Let further employment be found for him so that the people of Canada may still have the benefit of the money they have spent on his education and the experience he has gained in the service of his country.

I want to touch briefly upon one other matter having to do with the question of national defence. Last August a new instruction was issued entitled "Regular Officer Training Plan". It laid down the means by which assistance would be given to selected students to obtain academic standards suitable for a career in the regular army. The instruction reads in part as follows:

> This entails a guarantee of a minimum of two years university training beyond senior matriculation or equivalent to selected students who are enrolled as members of the active force and who remain in good standing from both academic and military viewpoints.

It goes on to say:

> In addition to a special scale of pay, the assistance to students will consist of payment of tuition and all essential fees, books and instruments, required during the periods spent at academic training.

It explains that this training may be carried out at such military training establishments as the interservice colleges, R.M.C., Royal Roads and the college at St. Johns, Quebec. It lays down the scale of pay that they will receive while taking such training. During the first year they will receive $30 a month and the second year while they are serving in camps $170 a month. The point I want to make is referred to particularly in the next paragraph, which deals with the Defence Services Pension Act, and there it is stated that, as members of the forces, all officer cadets are eligible for the benefits prescribed in the act. Service from the date of enrolment, including time spent at university and at summer training, is pensionable service.

I have no quarrel with the conditions as laid down. I recognize that every effort is being made to obtain officers for the services and to give them a thorough education; but an anomaly does exist in that there will be officers still in the active army who passed through those colleges last year and in years previous who will not be able to count their service at service colleges towards pension. The young man taking advantage of this scheme, as promulgated on the tenth of August of this year, will have a very decided advantage over his fellow officers who are serving in the same units at the present time. Therefore, I would ask the minister if an amendment could not be introduced into the necessary acts in order to allow service at the interservice colleges to be deemed to be service in the forces—so that members who are now in the active force may have the same advantage as these new officers who are going in. Officers who are now serving in the active army will then also be allowed to count as pensionable service periods they spent at Royal Military College and elsewhere.

I think it is a reasonable request. In many respects service at the colleges is regarded as military service. The cadets are subject to military discipline, Queen's regulations, and so forth. They swear allegiance to the crown and if they receive injury through accident while they are at the college they receive a pension in much the same way as any soldier who suffers injury through accident. I think it would be only fair to those officers who have passed through these colleges and who, in many respects, do not get the same advantages as will be given the younger men who will be going through from now on. Those serving in the active army today should be granted the right to count their service at the colleges as pensionable service in exactly the same way as those who are now and who will be in the future passing through the colleges.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): By coincidence I follow a distinguished and gallant army officer. I am a good friend of his and also of the gentleman referred to as being formerly in charge of the Alaska highway and northwest service command. Therefore I am very hesitant as a layman to make any comments further than to say that in these days all sorts of things are being said about army officers. Over the week end I had the opportunity of reading a book, the work of a distinguished Canadian author, which purported to be a biographical sketch of a former prime minister of this country. I see the statement made in that book that at a certain time certain army officers were in revolt against the crown, against the government and against the prime minister, and that there was a mutiny in the Canadian army. That is stated in so many words.

I was shocked and surprised to find that such a statement should have been made and that no one has risen to contradict it. I must refer to the book here, and I am probably doing good work for the publisher in referring to "The Incredible Canadian", which goes on and refers to all kinds of people here and pays "compliments" to the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. It is surprising to those of us who were his humble followers over the period of his public life to read such things. Statements in the Chicago Tribune and books of this kind should be carefully studied before they are accepted as truth.

Mr. King is referred to on one page of this book as the "lord high executioner" in relation to the position with regard to Colonel Ralston at a very important period during the war. The inference is that Colonel Ralston was ruthlessly slaughtered and set aside by that cruel and relentless man, Mackenzie King. I am not willing to accept that statement simply because I see it in print here. In another place in the book Mr. King is referred to as a grasping, mean little man; at another, as Mr. Uriah Heep, the most despicable character in all the works of Dickens. You will remember that Mr. Heep was "an 'umble man"—"always at your service, sir". At another point Mr. King is referred to as an old spinster and at another point he is referred to as man with a mailed fist sending people to slaughter; a liar. Well, that is a word that is seldom heard in parliament although it is often heard out on the hustings. He is referred to as a conniver, a schemer, a ruthless—I would almost say "monster" from reading the book—a lover of luxury, a gourmet, and a spiritualist.

It would be unfortunate in the affairs of this parliament if anything like that were to be allowed to go unanswered—although who am I to answer it? A student of Liberalism for many years as I have been, and a follower of Mr. King throughout, and a close observer too—I admit I am thirty years too late getting into the House of Commons but that is another story—I regard him as having been a great humanitarian, a stout champion of the poor, and while he was branded as a pacifist by some of his enemies, of course, I will say he was a Christian gentleman. He was a diplomat and he may have been a negotiator, but he was a very unselfish, very modest man, simple in his habits, a man who lived in a very modest way. Anyone who goes out to Kingsmere and looks over the little cottage in which he died will see that. They will see the rugged stony acres where he had his walks. About the only enjoyment the man must have had was taking walks over the hills back of Kingsmere and watching the sunset. It is regrettable that such things are said of this outstanding man, outstanding in the affairs of this country, of the United Nations and of the world.

This afternoon when we were paying tribute to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I wondered whether he was dead, from the fine things that were being said in the house. I want to tell some of these leaders over here that it is another grim feature of death when, three years after a prime minister of this country is placed in his coffin, circulation is given to literature which tends to belittle him in the eyes of the public. It is a very sad commentary upon our country. I hope that the time is not far distant when certain volumes will be published which are based upon the facts as contained in Hansard or other official records concerning that man's life, so that that will be the story that will go into the libraries of the land and not a book, as I say, that is calculated to break down and destroy the reputation of a great leader of this country.

Mr. MacDougall: By his works he shall be known.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard says that by their works ye shall know them. I think a further applicable reference would be that you do not gather figs from thistles. The great contributions of this statesman to our country are evidence of the man he was, and the position he will undoubtedly hold in history.

Turning to military matters, I had in mind making some reference to the Alaska highway, which is part of the northwest highway system. Anything that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) said about the officer responsible for the management of the Alaska highway was, I am sure, well said. The same could be said about Brigadier Geoffrey Walsh, who preceded him. These men, and the Canadian army, have done an excellent job in maintaining that highway. I hope that we shall follow the example of the United States with respect to the Alaska highway, and see that a hard surface is laid as soon as it is convenient to lay one. Hundreds of miles within the territory of Alaska have been paved, and I think it should be our policy to start at mile zero, lay down fifty miles of pavement, and continue that paving program throughout the length of the highway.

This highway was one of those war services which have been of tremendous value in the industrial and peacetime life of the country. We have heard of the oil development up in the Peace river territory in British Columbia, as well as the development of the vast natural gas resources. Access to these drilling sites has been made possible by the Alaska highway and that very costly bridge over the Peace river. In fact, I do not know how much of the oil and natural gas development is due to the discoveries made by the men who built the highway. The first gas well was discovered by a firm of road builders who drilled a well for water at their camp and were surprised when natural gas gushed forth. For a long time there was a huge torch burning in front of that camp, just as if nature were crying out and trying to advertise the natural resources that were there.

When test drilling was undertaken for the bridge, they contacted a certain series of rocks containing fossils which gave geologists information in drilling for oil. The first oil well was drilled a few miles from this bridge. It was an achievement which, costly as it was, is now opening up the country to agriculture, mining and the peacetime development of the country.

There is a recent development to which I should like to refer, and that is the loss of so many aircraft between the United States boundary and the territory of Alaska. This leads me to say that there is a genuine need for a railway running north from Prince George in the direction of Alaska. The position now is that the United States is endeavouring to establish an airlift from Montana and the army camps to the south of the international border to the territory of Alaska. Such an airlift would cover a distance of between 1,500 and 2,500 miles, and in bad weather it is questionable whether such an airlift could be maintained. It is well to experiment with it. It is well to try to discover whether certain things could be done.

The loss the other day of an aircraft with fifty-two persons aboard, after flying across British Columbia, was a very regrettable thing. Some days before an aircraft with thirty-nine persons aboard went down, and a great number of lives have been lost on what I think is the foolhardy policy of the United States government in attempting to sustain an airlift from the United States to the Alaska border. I believe that General Eisenhower will probably have something to say about this matter, because there are few men who are better acquainted with that territory than that distinguished army officer.

On repeated occasions he visited the highway as well as the airports, and undoubtedly if we are to have security in the northwest the present airfields and highway will have to be supplemented by a modern railway running from Prince George. Such a railway, like so many of the things that have been carried out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as a wartime measure, would turn out to be a great peacetime achievement, because it would open up the extensive valleys to great mining industries. You already have the oil along that route.

In the interval since we were here before I made a journey from Prince George in my riding a distance of 360 miles over the Parsnip and Finlay rivers to Fort Grahame and Fort Ware. This journey was made by boat, and I wish to say to you that we passed through magnificent country in which the agricultural possibilities are as good as they must have been in the Ottawa valley in the very early days of the settlement. In the whole 360 miles, we met about six white people and probably twenty Indians. Now, that is the Great Trench, as it is called by engineers. It runs due north and south from Prince George to Whitehorse. In that valley the United States army made a survey for a railway, and I believe such a railway should at some time be built through Sifton pass and north to Whitehorse and Alaska. Then, an armoured train carrying troops or civilian personnel could roll right from Puget sound through Vancouver to Prince George, Whitehorse and on to Alaska. I do not know why there has been a cooling off towards the idea of building that railway, but I am sure that in due course it must be built if we are to make this place secure and give the maximum amount of protection north of Edmonton.

I do not want to understate the fine defensive organization which is up there now. The airports are being well maintained and communication systems are being established. They are most modern in character. I have it on the authority of some very qualified army men that if an army of 150,000 men were to be placed in Alaska for the defence of that part of the continent, they could not be supplied by a highway or by airway and a railway would be an absolute necessity in order to provide supplies, munitions, guns and so forth for the service of such an army.

The riding which I have the duty to represent was given a high honour, during the early fall, when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself came through and paid us a visit. He travelled by air and came into Prince George from Prince Rupert. While he was there for only three hours or a little bit more, he endeared himself to a great many people. We had a fine audience out to greet him. There were probably 5,000 people there. Some wise strategists said that there should not be any political speeches, so that restriction cut me out of the program fairly well. All I could do was to go with the chairman of the board of trade and his worship the mayor, to see that the Prime Minister was given a good luncheon and that he was enabled to meet the people.

At the great public ground there the little children gathered around with their parents; there were many thousands of them. It was a perfect day. The Prime Minister proceeded to make his address. He said that he was not going to make any political references because it was sort of understood that this was more or less a personal visit. He went on and talked about Canada, our need of being good Canadians, and so on. Many of his listeners were children, of course. He said, "You know, down at Ottawa we try to conduct the government of the country in such a way as to safeguard your interests and to pass along to you young children who are here a better country than that which we received when we came into power". Just then, a dog came up in front of the platform, barked three or four times and then began to growl. The Prime Minister paused and then he said, "Don't you growl, because if our kind of good government is carried on, the bone which you get will have a lot more meat on it than was usual before we came into power." That is just a little human interest incident that shows the wit of the man and the gift which he has in greeting people of all ages and all conditions and moving among them.

After his speech he went out among the audience. I suppose he met probably 500 of those children in the concourse before him. How he does it, I do not know, but he has a smile for this one, shakes hands with that one and moves among the people. There is no necessity for any police to be around for his protection. We got him back on his plane in good time. He remarked upon the magnitude of the country over which he had flown from Prince Rupert, over that Alcan dam and up along towards Grande Prairie and Edmonton, a vast country where there is limited settlement. If I have any criticism at all to offer of the government benches it is that during the interval we have been here we have not paid enough attention to putting settlers—and by that I mean people who are fit to take over land—on that land or in that part of the country.

I know there are headaches and all that sort of thing in getting newcomers in here from Europe, from the United States and elsewhere; but we should have embarked upon a plan of settlement. I hope that in the next parliament that will be done. There are vast areas in there awaiting settlement. The resources are already well proved. In the Peace river block in British Columbia alone we will turn out, I suppose, eight million bushels of grain this year. You will remember that 20 years ago Sir Henry Thornton said that if we got ten million bushels in the entire Peace river country he would build us a railway. I hesitate to ask Mr. Donald Gordon to build a railway in there, but if there are that eight million bushels in the Peace river block, I will bet that there are 58 million in the entire Peace river country which would be served by a railway from there down to the Pacific coast. The present back-haul to Edmonton is expensive. It is retarding development.

As I say, we need settlers there. I think that we should draw the line at bringing any more foreigners into Canada and putting them in the cities. They have come and have brought along with them their skills, their knowledge of the various trades and so on, and some of them have been extremely valuable acquisitions. But if we want to do them and ourselves a service, we should fill up some of these vacant valleys that I have mentioned up in my riding and in those other ridings on the northern frontier of this country. We should have more people from the province of Quebec up in there, because the farmers from Quebec—who are trained and are familiar with the handling of livestock, grain and so on, who know how to use a broad-axe and can file a saw—could go in there with little capital and, with the roads that are now built and the facilities that are now there, could establish new communities.

I repeat what I have said before, namely that I think such settlement would support the military effort. I am not one of those who are greatly enthused over the Korean situation. We are there and we have got to stay there; we have a job to do. It is a vast problem out there on the Pacific. Unless miracles are performed, we are going to be in there for a good many years to come. What is more sane, then, than to settle these valleys in the northwest, in those regions which are close to the Pacific? Get a population in there and allow them to prosper under a good sane government, have a few federal buildings built now and again when the hon. member for Cariboo asks for them, give them the other facilities which are necessary for carrying on the affairs of the country, and we will make a great contribution to Canada and to our allies.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

I am aware of the fact that this is probably the last session of this parliament. I find that the time has passed rapidly. It is later than we think. I do not know what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his associate will bring back from the commonwealth conference in England, but a good many of our people up in the northwest would like to see an early election. They point to the fact that the coronation is to take place in June. The government has outlined its program fairly well. Its policies are fairly well understood. The advice that I receive from my friends there is not to be overholding tenants but to urge the ministers to go to the country as early as possible so as to get another mandate to carry on good government in Canada. Some of them also said that in 1897, when Queen Victoria enjoyed her great jubilee, Canada sent over to England a distinguished prime minister to take part in those festivities, in the person of the then Mr. Wilfrid Laurier. With all the other leaders from the colonies or from the empire, he was there in attendance at those festivities. The record from that time up till now is of Canada steadily progressing as a member of the British commonwealth and as a great and prosperous land. My friends are saying that we should have an election and, if possible, send Mr. St. Laurent over to London so that he could follow in the footsteps of Laurier and represent this country at the crowning of the young sovereign. That would be my message. I hope that, before the summer is over, the election will be held and that the opinion of Canada will be taken on those great issues which have been so properly put before parliament since 1949.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak in support of the C.C.F. amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne and to speak more particularly upon the health insurance plan which the members of my party have put forward at this time, especially one phase of it. The care of the sick and the helpless is surely something with which we should be concerned. Indeed, I suppose it is the yardstick by which one can measure to what extent we are humanitarians or, perhaps, practical Christians. The survival of the fittest may be a perfectly good animal law, but we think that the care of the ill should surely be a human obligation.

Then, too, the benefits of healing must not be the sole prerogative of the privileged, as at least to some extent it is today. There are those who by reason of age, by reason of accident, by reason of a weak constitution or by reason of the vicissitudes of illness must be cared for, and we cannot pass by on the other side.

In this connection I should like to divide the public into several classes. First we have the medical men, the scientists, the technologists, the nurses, those people whose services are at the disposal of the ill. At present, under our way of doing things, there are too few of these; and the fact that they are scarce in number adds at least in some cases to the price of their services, a price which many people find to be at a level they cannot afford.

Then among the general public there are those who, by their extra ability, by reason of good health or just through plain luck are able to obtain and to pay for, without limit, such medical services as they need. Those are the fortunate few. But we come then to the great middle group, a group for whom the fear of illness is always like an overhanging shadow, the group who know that a serious operation or a protracted stay in a hospital means for them and their families not only illness and pain but also economic ruin.

As I said, the great masses of the people fall into that category. What they want, what they would like to have now, is some insurance against such unfortunate contingencies. When I first came in contact with this sort of thing I was homesteading in northern Saskatchewan among a group of people who had gone up into that rough country to try to hew out a life for themselves. They went there with an axe, a grub hoe and, if they were fortunate enough, a team of oxen and a walking plow.

I saw there what it means to have no medical attendance, to live 42 miles from a railway. I recall having sold the municipality three-quarters of an acre on the side of a coulee as an addition to the graveyard. I can remember on cold winter nights when there would be a knock on my door. My neighbour would be there, and we would go out to the graveyard with a stable lantern and dig another grave on the side of that little hill, perhaps to bury the mother of a family. Perhaps that family had decided to take a chance, because they knew if they went for a doctor and brought him that considerable distance, and learned that it was a case for hospitalization, they would be crippled in their attempt to get on their economic feet, if I may so describe it, and would be set back for years and years. So they took the chance, and as a result they buried another Canadian mother, and perhaps an unborn child. We were very anxious about immigration in those days; we encouraged it. But we buried a great many Canadian babies and their dead mothers, when we should not have had to do it.

The third group I have in mind are the poor, the indigent, the maimed, the halt and the blind, those who are unable to take care of themselves, the victims of untoward circumstances, the victims of their own disabilities, or, if you like, sometimes of their own inabilities. They, too, are human beings; and no nation which vaunts its Christian philosophy can afford to neglect them, particularly in a Canada so blessed in its natural resources and its wealth. We cannot pass them by on the other side.

In the old days there was the charity ward, the infirmary, the poorhouse. I believe the people of this land are individually entitled to health services, in so far as they and their neighbours, speaking nationally, can afford to provide them. I believe my interest in education has been well established in the house; but let me say that while I consider education important, I consider of even greater importance the health of the people. I believe each Canadian is as much entitled to health, in so far as it can be provided, as each Canadian child is entitled to a free and full education.

All hon. members are old enough to have witnessed something of the ravages of disease, and the physical and economic ruin which in most cases are its results. It is enemy number one in the life of the nation, and the entire resources of the nation must be massed in battle against it. Science and the medical profession are embattled against it now, but I suggest embattled against it under handicaps.

I wish to pay tribute to the medical profession. My own father was a doctor, and perhaps I would have been one, too, had I not been in a preferred position to witness, and to come to dread, the spectacle of human misery brought about by suffering. Among my earliest recollections is the clanging of the night bell in the quiet and dark of the night and then, a few minutes later, the clop-clop of the sharp-shod mare on the stones of the street, taking my father out upon his errand of mercy, perhaps in the rain or the snow, and in an open vehicle.

I pay my tribute to him here, and to those other noble-souled doctors like him. He did more work for nothing than work he was paid for. Occasionally when he found it difficult to meet his own financial obligations he might say to us, in the morning at the breakfast table, "You know, I really ought to send some bills to those people"—but I do not think he ever did.

I do not believe the doctors of today make such sacrifices; and let me hasten to add that

I do not think they should have to. In any event, free services to some mean eventually the higher cost of services to others. I think a doctor should be paid for all his work, and that fee should come out of the collective purse of the nation, where the amount of payment would be based upon the ability to pay.

We have not enough medical services; we have not enough doctors. Sometimes it is as difficult to see a doctor today as it would be to see the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I remember last June sitting in the office of an eye, ear and throat specialist in Saskatoon. While I sat there a farmer came in, walked up to the desk past twenty or thirty people who were waiting there, and said, "I want to see the doctor." The young lady in charge looked at him in amazement. "Have you an appointment?" No, he had not an appointment. He had never been in before but had come 200 miles. He said he would like to see the doctor. She told him that the best they could do was to give him an appointment on August 24, two months later. The argument that doctors are scarce is no argument against the immediate inauguration of a health plan. I shall develop this point later on.

There is one item I should like to deal with at once. Some people contend that the development of such a plan would somehow or other entail the loss of freedom. The only loss of freedom which would result would be in the payment of taxes to support such a plan. Of course those taxes would be compulsory, but the same can be said of any other form of taxation to which we are subjected. If there is any loss of freedom involved in the hospitalization fee in Saskatchewan, for example, apparently the people of that province are happy indeed about it. Last June they indicated that they were prepared to accept that loss.

There is not much freedom in the charity ward. Instead of any loss of freedom, on the contrary there has been in that province the opening up of new paths of freedom. There has been freedom from care and anxiety, there has been created that mental freedom which comes from security. This has been present since the passage of our hospitalization act. This feeling of satisfaction is so widespread in the province that it is only rarely that someone will get up, generally someone who is motivated by political intent, at a meeting and say, "I am strong and well, why should I pay $10 a year to provide hospitalization for someone else?"

On various occasions I have replied to people of that sort by saying, "I hope you will always remain strong and well. I am reasonably healthy and reasonably strong, but I say to you that I shall be glad if I am able to pay $10 a year for the rest of my life even though I may not be ill a single day. I will consider that as not just insurance for myself for the rest of my life; I will be proud and happy to pay that for the benefit of some sufferer who may be less fortunate." I think that is the motive behind a medical health plan. There is still the question: Am I my brother's keeper? You can answer that just as you like.

Many of my colleagues have spoken on this plan during the present debate but there is one phase I should like to deal with, namely the shortages we have heard so much about. I shall have time to cover only the rather important one of hospital beds. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that these shortages are likely to preclude any immediate inauguration of a national health insurance plan.

The Liberal party has behind it a long string of promises in regard to a national health insurance plan which have not as yet been implemented. I need not remind you that the first of those promises goes back to 1919. I should like to read a few quotations from Hansard of that and other days. A health insurance plan was promised in the speech from the throne in January, 1943 and also in the election of 1945. I should like to quote what Mr. Mackenzie King stated on May 14, 1948, as reported on page 3932 of Hansard. He said:

> We have accordingly pledged ourselves to support a measure for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance, to include assistance to the provinces for preventive medicine.

That is fair enough. I could quote again from the same page where Mr. King is reported as saying that this measure represented the first stage in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan for all Canada. Those grants were to pave the way for health insurance. They were to permit the necessary planning to be done. They were to eliminate the shortages which the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) now brings forth as the reason these promises cannot be implemented, particularly the shortage of hospitals, hospital beds and certain key personnel.

At that time Mr. King went on to say that the purpose of these grants was to assist the provinces in planning the extension of hospital accommodation and the proper organization of hospital and medical care insurance. Referring to professional training Mr. King said, as reported on page 3934:

> The purpose of this grant will be to assist in making available the public health personnel which will be required in the development of an enlarged public health program in all fields. The grant will also be available to assist in developing and training the personnel required for the operation of constantly expanding hospital services.

In discussing hospital construction, Mr. King went on to say:

Before health insurance can be established on an adequate basis, another development is essential. At the present time there is a tremendous shortage of hospital beds in Canada.

He then went on to say that the government would seek an appropriation for outright grants toward the construction of additional hospital accommodation. So much for Mr. King. It was made quite clear at the time he spoke and at the time the government program was announced in 1948 that the health grants were intended or designed specifically to pave the way for a nation-wide system of health insurance by eliminating shortages through inducing the provinces to undertake the required planning.

Four and a half years have gone by since 1948. Four and a half years of the program have been completed and what is the result? Apparently the government has no intention at the moment of introducing a health insurance plan and is still using the excuse of shortages in various fields as a reason why health insurance cannot be undertaken. The Prime Minister was reported in the Globe and Mail of September 6 last as having said in Victoria on September 5:

There isn't sufficient hospital space in Canada at present to make a federal health insurance program feasible . . . I don't feel that the government has the right to give Canadians contractual rights to hospital treatment until there is sufficient accommodation in the hospitals to enable the government to fulfil the obligation. I don't feel that there is sufficient hospital space to enable all who have contractual rights to receive hospital treatment.

We in the C.C.F. party have long contended that shortages should never be allowed to delay the introduction of the scheme itself. In fact it is our contention that the graver those shortages are, the more urgent is the necessity of seeing that such services as are available are distributed according to medical need and not according to the ability to pay. When the government now says that there are not enough hospital beds to permit health insurance it is simply condemning itself, because this was a specific task which the government undertook when it gave these grants four and a half years ago. They undertook by giving these health grants to provide the hospitals, the hospital beds and the personnel necessary to permit the establishment of a health insurance scheme.

The C.C.F. is only too pleased to acknowledge the fine work that has been accomplished as a result of these plans, but as far as eliminating shortages of personnel and facilities is concerned the surface has not even been scratched. We claim that the most effective stimulus for the elimination of these shortages would be the introduction of a health scheme. The shortages will not be overcome until a vigorous attack is made on the problem as part of a nation-wide health plan. That has been the experience of every government that has undertaken comprehensive health measures. If the government waits until all shortages are overcome before introducing a health plan then we shall be waiting forever and no plan will be introduced.

I want to deal specifically with the most important of the shortages and the one which I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) emphasized in his Victoria speech, namely the shortage of hospital beds. Reliable authorities—I may say I have documented what I am about to say and have the authorities here whether or not I quote them —have estimated that a minimum of 7·5 hospital beds per thousand of population is required. Indeed some authorities have estimated the figure to be somewhat higher. They go as high as 9 per thousand, including acute and chronic cases. But if we take the lower figure of 7·5 per thousand of population and calculate on the basis of our 1951 population, Canada should have a hospital bed capacity of 103,800 odd. We actually only have some 69,400, and I think that figure is too low, because it would necessarily imply certain duplication. It is a figure taken from the pamphlet "List of Hospitals" issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Thus it is that on the basis of this standard —and, mark you, that is after approximately four years of the government's hospital building plan—there was still a shortage, according to their own figures, of 34,000 hospital beds in Canada. One of the things that must be remembered is that while there has been some increase in the actual number of beds there has been a corresponding or even greater increase proportionately in the population of Canada itself. In fact we have had an increase in population of roughly 2 million in the last five years, which years would be covered by these grants. This of course means an extra demand upon hospital space. For example, between 1948 and 1950 the average daily patient population of hospitals increased from 48,000 to 53,000, an increase of 10 per cent. The reference there is to the annual reports of hospitals, 1948 to 1950, dominion bureau of statistics. The point was very well made in the annual report of hospitals for 1949 at page 10 in these words:

Although the number of reporting hospitals and their combined bed capacity has shown an increase in the past seventeen years, the ratio of bed capacity per 100,000 population for the same period has shown little variation.

Necessary though these grants were, we should ask ourselves what success they have had in bringing us closer to the ideal which prompted the giving of them. Of course there has been an increase in the number of hospitals built over the years, and no doubt we must give credit—and we give it cheerfully—to the hospital construction scheme of the government. But from 1948 when the grants were announced to 1951, four out of the five years, hospital bed capacity has only increased by roughly 13,500 beds, which is far short of the goal of 40,000 beds announced by Mr. King in May of 1948. This leaves approximately 26,500 beds to be completed in this last year of the program. I suggest to you, sir, that is a construction program for one year roughly twice the total of the past four years. It may be physically possible that that objective will be achieved but I would suggest it is highly unlikely.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Knight: I would much prefer to deal with questions later.

Mr. McCusker: I know the hon. member does not wish to give wrong figures.

Mr. Knight: Quite true.

Mr. McCusker: I wish to correct the hon. member with respect to the hospital figures he has given.

Mr. Knight: That is not asking a question. If the hon. member wants to ask me the source of any figure I will be pleased to give it.

Mr. McCusker: Does he wish to give correct figures?

Mr. Knight: The answer is yes.

Mr. McCusker: Then will the hon. member permit me to give them?

Mr. Knight: No. As I explained, I have the source for all these figures. If my friend wishes to correct them in a speech of his own that is his responsibility.

An hon. Member: Anything but the truth.

Mr. Knight: I took particular care to have all these figures documented. I have a complete list of such documentation which I will give my hon. friend when I have finished. I want to deal with another matter after I finish with this subject and I would rather not have my hon. friend give me a lecture at the moment. The fact of the matter is that the hospital grants program is going to fall far short of its goal, and it is extremely doubtful if even half the five year goal will be reached.

Why is it that hospital construction is failing so badly? The only reason I can find is that the grants are too small. The program makes available $1,000 per bed for active treatment cases and $1,500 per bed for those cases which may be termed chronic or convalescent. But this is such a small proportion of the total amount required to build hospitals that it has not stimulated hospital construction sufficiently. In 1948-49, when the program got under way, hospital construction costs were approximately $10,000 per bed. That is a statement by an Ottawa man, Controller Paul Tardif, when speaking on March 14, 1949.

If we look at the composite index of wholesale building costs, including all construction materials and wages, we find that it has gone up from 200 in 1948 to 260 in mid-1952. If we use this as a measure of increase in hospital construction costs during that period, we find that construction costs would have gone up by at least $3,000 per bed in that period. In other words there would have been an increase over the period of $3,000 per bed, but the federal grant is only $1,000 per bed. At that rate it is no wonder that the program is failing in its objective.

Let me repeat that the only way to be sure that such shortages can be overcome is to undertake a nation-wide health scheme first. Far more generous grants would have to be made in connection with the program, and I want to emphasize that the stimulus to increase construction arising from the increased demand for hospital services will do more than any other factor to ensure that the requisite hospitals are constructed quickly. This has been well demonstrated in my own province. When the C.C.F. government was elected in Saskatchewan in 1944 that province was short of hospital beds, as was the rest of Canada. It only had 3·75 hospital beds per thousand population. My authority here is the annual report of the Saskatchewan hospital service plan, 1951.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit me to give him the correct figure for hospital beds in Saskatchewan in 1944? It is 4·7, not 3·75.

Mr. Knight: I have the correct figure as found in the report of the Saskatchewan hospital service plan, 1951, page 12.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member must not interrupt the member who has the floor, without his consent.

Mr. Knight: We have had some bold and imaginative action which, coupled with a lot of hard work, resulted in a tremendous hospital construction boom. I shall say, too, for the benefit of my hon. friend who has interrupted me that a great part of that construction was undertaken before federal hospital construction grants were available at all. The result has been that hospital beds in Saskatchewan have increased from 3·75 per thousand in 1944 to 6·7 per thousand at the end of 1951. By the end of this year there will be well over 7 beds per thousand.

Saskatchewan, thanks to its inauguration of a provincial hospital scheme and a vigorous construction program undertaken in conjunction with that scheme, is the only province in Canada which has anything like adequate hospital facilities available. This experience, we think, should be applied in the federal field. The best stimulus, I repeat, that could be provided to overcome the hospital shortage would be the inauguration of a national health insurance program such as is advocated by this party.

A similar experience has been found in the United Kingdom in connection with their universal health services plan, the one they undertook in 1948. They too were faced with severe shortages of hospitals as well as personnel. But, in the three years after—note that I say "after" and not "before"—the inauguration of their program, they increased the number of staffed hospital beds by nearly 40,000.

In literally dozens of countries it has been the same story—insufficient doctors, hospitals, nurses, and so on. If they had waited until those shortages had disappeared they would be still waiting as we are still waiting in Canada, but they proceeded with their plans for health services. They introduced them themselves, and that introduction was the best stimulus to overcoming the shortages. It is the demand which creates the supply, and it is useless to build hospitals unless at the same time provision is made by which the general public can be enabled to pay for those services when they are provided.

I would like to have said a word or two about the shortage of nurses. Just as with hospitals, there have been shortages of facilities for training nurses. Other governments have found that the best method of dealing with those shortages is the inauguration of a health plan. In the United Kingdom the most acute shortage, as a matter of fact, was in the nursing field. In preparation for, and later as part of the national health service plan introduced in that country, working conditions were improved and pay was increased not only for nurses but also for other hospital workers. As a result of those measures and as a result of the better financial circumstances of the hospitals resulting from the inauguration of the health plan—and by the way that is something we discovered in our province: the hospitals are no longer running behind financially—nursing staffs in the United Kingdom increased from 127,200 in 1947 to 153,100 in 1949. That is an increase of more than 20 per cent in a little more than two years. To my hon. friend I would recommend the reading of a new book by James Ross, "National Health Services in Great Britain, 1952".

In Saskatchewan the effort to increase the supply of nurses has been described in the Saskatchewan health survey report, volume 1, page 176, and I quote:

> In 1945 a plan was instituted by the health services planning commission whereby the hospitals with nursing schools which could legitimately enrol more than their normal quota of nursing students would be paid a grant to defray the additional expense incurred in doing so . . . Since 1947 the costs of operating the schools of nursing have been recognized as hospital operating costs under the payment system of the Saskatchewan hospital services plan. As a result of these efforts there has been a substantial increase in enrolment in schools of nursing.

This is also a statement from the report:

> From 1945 to 1949 there was an increase of 29 per cent in enrolment in schools of nursing in Saskatchewan. During the five years, 1945 to 1949, the increase in the number of students enrolled almost kept pace with the increase in the rated capacity of those hospitals.

With the improved conditions of nursing and with the active encouragement of the government in the manner indicated, the rate of withdrawal of nursing students in Saskatchewan has been reduced to 20 per cent, well below the rate in the rest of Canada, which is 33 per cent, and below the figure of 30 per cent for the United States.

The government says there are shortages and that it cannot undertake a national health insurance plan until the shortages are overcome. It is the C.C.F. contention that the government's program for overcoming these shortages will fail miserably, and that rather than a health insurance program being dependent upon the overcoming of shortages it will be the best single means, if not the only means, by which the shortages may be overcome. This applies not only in the two fields I have been discussing—hospitals and nurses—but also as far as physicians, dentists, psychiatrists, technicians and other personnel are concerned.

Sir, I have now to turn rather abruptly and hurriedly to another subject. I am almost compelled to raise it by the fact that I have a letter from the branch of the Canadian Legion in my own city, and I have a file of other letters from private individuals. I want simply to quote this letter from the Legion:

For your information we are attaching copies of letters despatched to the Prime Minister and to the president, Canadian National Railways, with respect to the recent demotion of Mr. R. S. Pitt, from manager of the Fort Garry Hotel, to that of Prince Edward Hotel.

Mr. Pitt served our country well in time of war, being mentioned in despatches and awarded the M.B.E.

We feel certain that the explanation now given by Mr. Chevrier on behalf of the government was not the basis of the demotion at the time it was made and we urge your interest until justice is accorded this veteran.

That was from the Legion, and I have another from a well-known gentleman who owns a couple of hotels and who assures us of Mr. Pitt's honesty, efficiency and courtesy. I should refer to the answer given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to the question which was previously asked in regard to this man's demotion. The minister stated that he was satisfied with the explanation of the Canadian National Railways management, but I would like to say that I and these other people do not feel satisfied and I have written to the minister to say so. Many people have written me that they are not satisfied. After all, this Canadian National Railways is publicly owned and we are pretty much concerned about the method of treatment of our employees.

I have stated the case. I felt I should put it on the record. Our city daily paper which, in its editorial policy, usually supports the government, is also extremely critical. I think I should include for the record what that newspaper has to say, in my plea that there may be a further investigation into this matter. I assure you that if the matter is not again raised in the house somebody—and if no one else does it I shall do it myself—will question the officials of the Canadian National Railways in regard to what is apparently felt in my city at least to be a matter of some injustice. I shall close my remarks by quoting a line or two from the editorial in question. It is headed "Unsavoury incident".

The thousands of citizens of this city who recall Mr. Bob Pitt erstwhile manager of the Bessborough hotel with affection and respect must certainly be dissatisfied with the excuses offered for his summary demotion from manager of the Fort Garry in Winnipeg to manager of the Brandon hotel. It is said that he neglected to greet the Prime Minister on his arrival at the Fort Garry last summer. Investigation has shown that Mr. St. Laurent was met in the hotel by some dozens of local dignitaries and it is understandable that Mr. Pitt, whose 25 years in the service has given him broad experience—

I am going to skip that part.

[Mr. Knight.]

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Knight: Very well.

. . . Mr. Pitt, whose 25 years in the service has given him broad experience in such matters, would not barge into a group whose evident connection with the Prime Minister was much closer than his as hotel manager.

News stories in Winnipeg have also suggested that the hotel system management charges that the Fort Garry has been mismanaged under Mr. Pitt. We who recall the splendid and courteous management he gave our own institution would like proof.

We suspect that some member of the Prime Minister's group, possibly some officious party slavey—

That is his word, not mine.

—who might have regarded the railway system as strictly Liberal party property, in a fit of pique registered a complaint, and that this brought disaster to a lifetime of service. It is too bad it seems to us that the Prime Minister's name should have been linked with such a business.

This newspaper, which in this matter presumes to speak for the owners of the C.N.R. who happen to live in this city and who have had the privilege of having Mr. Pitt serve them, would like a fuller explanation from the hotel management and from the Prime Minister's office which, whether properly or not, is involved in the matter.

I should simply say that I, too, would welcome an investigation. I hold no brief for Mr. Pitt. I know nothing of the circumstances but I think he or any other man in the public service who is demoted in that manner has a right to a hearing. It is only proper that the public should know the reason for this demotion, and if this was not merely routine what was the reason for it. If it was merely routine, why the demotion?

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): This afternoon I am going to follow a little different line of thought from the previous speakers. It has been most interesting during the past several sessions for me to watch the chief opposition party under the direction of its leader, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), change direction many times in its attack on the Department of National Defence. In the fall of 1950, some months after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, the Leader of the Opposition had this to say, and I quote from page 473 of Hansard for September 8, 1950:

Does any hon. member think that the men in the Kremlin are going to be greatly impressed by the news that some months from now we are going to have a special brigade available? In the face of their 175 fully mobilized divisions and their 350 divisions which could be in the field in a very short time, is one special brigade, with three or four thousand combatants, going to leave very much impression in their minds of the urgency, vigour and determination with which we are playing our collective part in the responsibility of saving freedom for ourselves and for others?

In actual fact the Department of National Defence extended its facilities so greatly that in the spring there was an announcement to this house of a $5 billion defence program.

This $5 billion was to be spent over a period of three years. In the fiscal year 1951-52 parliament authorized the Department of National Defence to spend $1,700 million. This was an extremely ambitious program, of which more than one-third was to be implemented in the first year. In spite of the fact that this program was extremely ambitious, the Canadian part of it was almost accomplished. The bulk of the $340 million odd which was not spent was made up of undelivered orders placed in the United States. It was later stated that all that Canada was behind in that defence program was the undelivered orders from the United States.

Then last spring, lo and behold, the Leader of the Opposition changed his tactics and played up the overtaxation theme, chiefly because of this surplus that had been built up. He refused to recognize that the bulk of that accumulated surplus was the underspent portion of the defence program. Some of the words that were used during that last session by members of the chief opposition party were "waste" and "inefficiency". Inefficiency was supposedly rampant in the armed forces and they spoke of large-scale looting, theft, fraud and incendiarism.

Then at the opening of this session and the beginning of this debate the Leader of the Opposition continued his charges of waste and inefficiency, and brought up material that had been thoroughly covered in the defence expenditures committee last spring. He went further, and I quote from page 23 of Hansard for November 24, 1952:

> This government has largely destroyed the effectiveness of the committee system established by this parliament for the examination of government expenditure by permitting and in fact encouraging the use of a majority of government supporters on those committees to deny any real opportunity to conduct effective inquiries.

It has been my privilege, Mr. Speaker, in the last two sessions of parliament to be a member of the defence expenditures committee. In the two final years, 1951 and 1952, $2 billion of the taxpayers' money was spent by the Department of National Defence. That is a great deal of money, and it came out of the pockets of our taxpayers, including the pockets of the taxpayers in my constituency. As a member of that committee I felt it was my responsibility to my constituents to assure myself as to whether or not that money had been spent to the best advantage.

Any other hon. members who are concerned would do well to read the third and final report of the defence expenditures committee of last session. I am going to quote one paragraph:

> Mr. E. B. Armstrong, assistant deputy minister, Department of National Defence, gave a detailed explanation of the control and accounting of materiel and stores in the Department of National Defence. In addition, the committee requested and obtained documents containing detailed information regarding thefts, frauds, fires and other write-offs in the navy, army and air force during the fiscal years 1950-51 and 1951-52. These documents contained a total of 182 pages of relevant information.

I hold in my hand those 182 pages of relevant information which were given to the committee on defence expenditures last spring. While the committee was sitting, certain figures were given. These figures which were given to the committee were commented upon later in the house by the Leader of the Opposition. I again quote from page 2329 of Hansard for May 19, 1952 where he said:

> . . . but there have become available reports of theft, looting and fires, some of them incendiary, which have resulted in the last two years in a loss estimated by the Department of National Defence at a figure of more than $7 million.

He tried to leave the impression that this figure had resulted entirely from theft, looting and incendiary fires. Not only did he do that; he tried to leave the impression that this $7 million figure was greatly underestimated and should have been much greater, because a few lines further on he said:

> If the accounting methods of the Department of National Defence report a loss of only $3,500 at Farnham, then the statement given of the total loss as in the statement prepared by the department, showing a loss of more than $7 million, should contain figures very much higher than it actually does.

I just wonder how much higher the Leader of the Opposition would have liked the people of Canada to believe they should have been, whether it was $5 million, $10 million or even perhaps $20 million.

Along with these documents I showed to the house there was a recapitulation giving the amount. The first heading was "Losses due to Theft or Fraud" and it gives the total sum for all three services at $85,809.75. The next item was "Losses due to fire", and the total for the three services was given at $5,205,970.54. Finally, the third item was "Other Write-Offs" amounting to $2,212,-931.15. It is this figure for "Other Write-Offs" that I particularly want to deal with this afternoon.

I should point out that "Other Write-Offs" covers the units, the amount of the write-off, and the surplus taken on charge at the same time. There is also another column showing "Estimate of Total Holding" and a column showing the reasons for the write-offs. In these figures that I read out there was nothing to show how much had been taken on charge at the same time; and in the committee I asked that this figure be supplied. This figure was supplied as $643,193.09. I will shortly give you the reasons I quoted it in this way.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in the committee asked for a break-down of one of these items, and this break-down was filed in the committee as exhibit G. I will just mention two of these items. In stocktaking there was an item, three globe valves ¼" x 300 pounds. Those were written off. Right under that there is another item of three globe valves ¼" x 280 pounds, taken on charge. In other words, valves of the exact designation ¼" x 300 pounds were not there, but there were three valves with a slightly different designation and they were taken on charge. Another item was 12 globe valves 2" x 150 lbs. written off and another twelve valves with a slightly different designation taken on charge. The total written off in this particular exhibit was approximately $7,000 and the total taken on charge was approximately $6,600, so that there was a net write-off of just $452. This is carried all the way through the many documents—taking on charge an amount, as I gave you before, of $643,000 approximately, which naturally should have been subtracted from that figure. Then on going through these documents it was found that among the things written off was one North Star aircraft valued at $225,000. This aircraft was destroyed by explosion. I will read from the remarks column where this information was given to the committee:

> Explosion occurred while aircraft was being refuelled. It is believed that the N.C.O. who had removed the snow from the aircraft had accumulated electric static in his body and by kneeling on a broom and a piece of rag caused a spark which resulted in the explosion.

We are enjoying nice weather down here in Ottawa at the present time and we are all quite comfortable. I wonder whether those who have been so critical of the soldiers, airmen and naval personnel would remember that this aircraft was destroyed at Whitehorse in the Yukon.

Then there was damage in a crash, to a Lancaster aircraft, amounting to $78,000. Another item written off—I am not going to give the exact figures because it takes a great deal of time to do that; I will give round figures—was approximately $500 for the loss of propeller and anchor from a marine craft:

> The propeller was lost while proceeding out Miramichi river. The craft returned to Chatham on the starboard engine. It was necessary to use anchors to hold the stern of the craft against the tide. One anchor had become caught in an old sunken crib and it was impossible to raise and recover the anchor.

I am sure hon. members will recognize that this item does not fall under any of the classifications of looting, theft or fraud.

Another item was $14,000 for radio equipment to be replaced following a fire in the Department of Transport control tower at Coral Harbour. I am sure that would not come under the heading of theft, fraud or looting. Here is another one that struck my fancy. This one amounts to approximately $2,500 and is for the loss of 335 empty gasoline drums:

> The loss occurred while being transferred to Norman Wells via Waterways. The loss is attributed to a storm on Great Slave lake.

That could bear no relationship to theft, fraud or looting. Then there was a figure of approximately $3,500 for other damage in aircraft crashes, including loss of wing tanks, parachutes, airmen's kits, and so on. Here is another one amounting to $16,000, gas written off in northern gas caches. These gas caches are spread over the Northwest Territories all across northern Canada. They are there and are used under circumstances of great urgency, usually when the thermometer is at a very low point. I am sure none of the airmen who get cold fingers trying to transfer gasoline from one of these caches far from civilization would like it thought that the figures of write-offs in these cases were included in the figures given to the committee on defence expenditures under the heading of thefts, frauds or looting.

Another item was for $10,000 of bridging equipment carried away by flood in British Columbia. There is a further item of $4,000 for bridging equipment damaged and sunk in British Columbia. Then there was a total of approximately $23,000 for accidental damage to vehicles and other equipment. Just to mention two of these items, there was one for $4,000 and one for $6,000 for aircraft engine damage.

Thus far I have overlooked one large item. In the figures given to the defence expenditures committee under this recapitulation there is included naval aircraft write-off for 1950-1951 and naval aircraft write-off for 1951-52. In one year it was $385,000 and in the other $670,000, or a total of $1,055,000. This certainly cannot be classed as theft, fraud, looting or incendiarism.

The figures I have given total $1,434,028.67. I have already explained the figure described as "taken on charge". That, added to the previous figure I have given, makes a total of $2,077,221.76. All these amounts must be subtracted from the figure given before, namely $2,200,000 odd. I have not begun to give all the things written off that are of a similar nature to the ones I have already given. However, subtracting the total from the figure given for "other write-offs" we have left $135,709.39. It is only in this figure that there might be room for some dishonesty, along with some carelessness and perhaps some mistakes. But that is a far cry from $2,212,931.15.

Let us now consider the subject of fires. According to this recapitulation, losses due to fires in two years amounted to something more than $5,200,000. Among these were two large fires, one at Trenton with a loss of $2,300,000 and one at the 26th Canadian ordnance depot. These two losses totalled approximately $3,031,000.

These losses drew no special criticism from the committee. As a member of the committee I had all the information available, and I could see no reason to suppose that these were not in the same category as fires in other cities in Canada. In fact these fires were far below the rate of fires in six representative cities. This information was given to the house last session by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). But of all the fires listed in these documents there were one case of incendiarism and three cases of suspected arson, although they were not proven.

In this recapitulation I have allowed the three cases of suspected arson, in order to meet the conditions set out by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the statement I read, where there was reference to theft, looting and fires, some of them incendiary. Meeting these conditions, the totals would now appear to be: losses due to theft or fraud $85,809.75; losses due to incendiary fires and suspected arson, $218,096.33, and other write-offs where there might be room for some carelessness, dishonesty or mistakes, the sum of $135,709.39, making a total of $439,615.47.

Mr. Hodgson: Where did you get those figures?

Mr. Weaver: Which figures?

Mr. Hodgson: That you just read.

Mr. Weaver: They are available to any member of the committee on defence expenditures, of which I was a member. I went to considerable trouble in digging them out from the documents placed before us. They are available to all hon. members.

Mr. Hodgson: You missed some.

Mr. Weaver: I missed a lot of them, and I have already explained that. I might tell hon. members I was questioned about this matter last summer in my own constituency, about thefts and frauds in the army amounting to $7 million. I have shown hon. members that this figure is now contracted to less than $450,000, and I say further that any hon. member who would take the trouble to go through the information available can reduce the figure drastically below $450,000.

Hon. members have spent a good deal of time in making reference to Petawawa. So far as I know the situation there is still sub judice. However, the amounts involved are included in the figures I have placed on Hansard this afternoon, and the total losses at that point are part of this $450,000. I am sure this will surprise many hon. members, and certainly will come as a surprise to many Canadians who have been seriously misled by these charges concerning looting and theft by members of the armed forces.

If I am fortunate enough to serve as a member of the committee on defence expenditures, which according to the notice on the order paper is to be set up at this session, I shall spare no effort in determining to my satisfaction, and on behalf of my constituents, that the large sums of money being spent by the Department of National Defence are being spent to the best advantage.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, as a newly-elected member who was introduced to the House of Commons on the same day as was the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), I would indeed be remiss in my duty if I did not join hon. members on all sides of the house and extend my sincere congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the able manner in which they have discharged their respective duties.

I crave the indulgence of the house if I find it necessary to confine myself to matters of purely local interest. I do so cognizant of the fact that there are those more able than myself who can discuss questions that are of major national or international importance. If I steer a somewhat homeward course it is done in the hope of better fulfilling the mandate which has been given to me by my constituents. I intend to speak about matters about which I know something rather than to trespass into unknown fields.

It is my intention to limit my modest contribution to this debate by dealing first with a passage from the speech from the throne which raises a matter of interest to the province of New Brunswick. I shall then centre the remainder of my remarks around certain policies and practices of the present administration which directly affect the primary industries of my own constituency of Gloucester.

In the speech from the throne it is indicated that parliament will be asked to make financial provision for a proposed new ferry service between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia and Bar Harbor, Maine. I preface my remarks at this point with the clear statement that my native province of New Brunswick has no animus against our neighbouring province of Nova Scotia. The fact is that the two provinces have many things in common. Ethnically our people spring from the same ancestry. Geographically we are neighbours and partners in the maritimes. Economically we have similar problems. New Brunswick, as you know, has always been ready to champion any cause put forth by our sister province which we felt would be conducive to the attainment of economic advantage. Let it be understood that the support of Nova Scotia in any maritime-wide effort has always been appreciated by every New Brunswicker.

However, when the announcement was made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in November last that a contract for the construction of a vessel to operate between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Bar Harbor, Maine, had been awarded to the Davie Shipbuilding Company of Lauzon, Quebec at a price of $3,926,000 we in New Brunswick were indeed deeply concerned. We realized that this project was the result of a most laudable effort by the Nova Scotia government to attract a greater number of United States tourists to that province by providing a short-route ferry between the points I have mentioned. Were the province of Nova Scotia to assume the greater part of the cost of the construction and operation of this ferry we in New Brunswick would have next to nothing to complain about, but as I understand the situation the provincial government of Nova Scotia has succeeded in convincing its counterpart, the federal government, that it should assume approximately two-thirds of the cost of construction as well as a substantial share of the cost of operating this ferry.

It is reported that the new ferry will have an over-all length of 345 feet 10 inches and a service speed of 18½ knots. It will make one round trip a day during daylight hours and will have a capacity of some 600 passengers and about 150 automobiles. In announcing the award of the contract the Minister of Transport, according to a special press dispatch from Ottawa, was reported to have said that when in operation the new ship will add considerable impetus to the interchange of traffic between Nova Scotia and the New England states and will attract tourist traffic to the maritimes.

It would be most illogical to take issue with the first part of the minister's statement, as undoubtedly traffic between Nova Scotia and the New England states will be considerably increased by the proposed new service, but I am not prepared to concur in the second part of the minister's statement where he says that the car ferry will attract tourist traffic to the maritimes as a whole. The position we take in New Brunswick is that the proposed new service will prove detrimental to our tourist trade. The Moncton Times of September 26 put it tersely in an editorial as follows:

> In committing the dominion government to such a bargain, Hon. Lionel Chevrier is directly discriminating against New Brunswick in its tourist industry. Or to put it another way, Ottawa is subsidizing Nova Scotia's vacation travel business to the detriment of a border province, and, therefore, is at once unfair and unjust to the latter. This federally-aided Bar Harbor-Yarmouth ferry will, unmistakably, funnel off from this province a very considerable volume of motor-visitor travel from U.S.A., and on which we have expended quite large sums of money to promote.

The people of our province, particularly those in the southern part, are gravely concerned over what they consider to be discrimination against New Brunswick on the part of the federal government. The general opinion is that the ferry short-cut will deprive New Brunswick of numerous tourist cars which otherwise would travel through the province en route to Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. The New Brunswick tourist industry is bound to be affected by the new service, as a considerable number of United States tourists will take advantage of the ferry service and go to Nova Scotia rather than motor through the beautiful province of New Brunswick. Such being the situation as we in New Brunswick view it, are there any possible solutions in order to at least palliate our lot as a contributing partner to this project? It is suggested that the matter would be at least partly solved if arrangements could be made to operate the ferry on a triangular route including a call at the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, for instance. Again, if the former link between Saint John and Boston through the passenger liner service of Eastern Steamship Lines could be re-established, this, we submit, would increase the tourist traffic to the province of New Brunswick without too much interference from the proposed Yarmouth-Bar Harbor, Maine, ferry. However, as the matter now stands the province of New Brunswick is bound to lose in the deal.

We are unfairly called upon to contribute our share as a province of this dominion to a costly project which cannot but prove highly detrimental to our own interests. I am fully aware of the principle that particular local interests or provincialism, if you want to call it that, must often be forgotten or sacrificed to bring about the attainment of a greater common good. Yet I cannot see any justification in a project involving a considerable expenditure of public moneys to which New Brunswick will have to contribute its share, whose resultant effects will necessarily prove detrimental to our province to the exclusive benefit of our sister province of Nova Scotia. I therefore feel that I am voicing the opinion of my province in protesting against this proposed large federal subsidy to the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor, Maine, ferry.

Coming now to the consideration of certain policies or practices of the government in so far as they directly affect Gloucester county, I must deplore the loss of markets for unmanufactured wood and underline certain policies or practices on the part of the Department of Public Works bordering on malfeasance and, most particularly, on nonfeasance, which are seriously hindering the expansion and development of our fisheries. The products of our forests have played a most important part in the economic development of our county. During the past few years one of the most profitable exports from Gloucester county, the Miramichi area, and from all our New Brunswick eastern ports down as far as Pugwash, Nova Scotia, has undoubtedly been our pit props.

Perhaps the main reason pit props have proven to be one of the most convenient resources on the farms of my own and other counties of the maritime provinces lies in the fact that almost every farmer has on his woodlot jackpine, spruce or fir, which are all adaptable to the making of pit props. One cord of pit props cut and peeled is a fair average day's work for our eastern farmers in their off-season spare time, and this represents the appreciable sum of $30. In 1948 total Canadian exports of pit props to Great Britain amounted to $7,580,399. In 1951 these same exports had fallen to $2,566,136. I dare say that most of these pit props, especially in 1951, came from the maritime provinces.

According to the latest available statistics the total value of pit props exported to the British market during the first nine months of 1952 has shrunk to $1,812,902. It may be said that competition from the Baltic countries and the scarcity of so-called "hard money" in Great Britain are responsible for this loss of markets. Nevertheless this is a situation which is bringing hardship to the people of my constituency and of other counties in the maritime provinces, and we naturally look to the federal government to do something about it.

There has also been a marked decrease in our exports of peeled and rough pulpwood, as it is called, to the United Kingdom. Whereas our exports of peeled pulpwood to those overseas markets represented a dollar value of $1,846,297 in 1951, we only exported to the amount of $152,086 during the first nine months of 1952, or about one-twelfth of our 1951 export value. Similarly our exports of rough pulpwood fell from $1,383,607 in 1951 to a paltry $6,507 during the first nine months of the present year.

These figures, Mr. Speaker, are tragically eloquent in their significance to the pit-prop and pulpwood operators, to the woodsmen and the farmers of the northern and eastern parts of New Brunswick. Prospects for the coming year at the present time are on the dark and gloomy side. Britain's 1953 pit prop requirements will be mostly filled by Poland, Finland, Sweden and Russia. I am informed that we cannot expect any substantial contracts from Great Britain next year. This picture of our exports of unmanufactured wood is obviously far from rosy and promising for the coming cutting season. Already our newly elected government in New Brunswick, fully awake to the gravity of the situation, has taken active steps with a view to inducing the buyers in Great Britain to continue their patronage in pit props at least to the operators, woodsmen and farmers of New Brunswick. This problem is of such magnitude as to necessitate the direct intervention of the federal government and I therefore make a strong appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to explore every avenue, every possible means of reopening the markets which we are losing in Britain to the great detriment of the woodsmen, farmers and operators of our maritime provinces.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, just before the recess I had been quoting statistics in support of the contention that we are faced with losing our British markets for pit props and pulpwood. In view of these considerations, which have had such an immediately unfavourable reflection on an important factor of the economy of my constituency, as well as that of many other counties in the maritime provinces, I certainly cannot endorse nor accept that part of the throne speech which states:

> Our economic conditions remain favourable and the level of external trade is high.

I turn now to fisheries. In my maiden speech in this house I took a definite stand on behalf of the fishermen of the county of Gloucester. I stated then and I repeat now that fishing is positively one of our most important industries. For quite a few years the federal government has agreed to pay to the fishermen's loan board of the Atlantic coast provinces a subsidy of up to $165 per gross ton towards the construction of dragger or long-liner type vessels. In Gloucester county several draggers have been constructed under that arrangement. The subsidies provided by the federal government have certainly proved to be a good investment because landings and landed value of cod, and more particularly flatfish, have certainly increased since our fleet of draggers has been operating. Lately there has been a considerable increase in the landings of flounders particularly in the bay of Fundy and northern New Brunswick. With a ready market for these fish, the marked increase in the catch from 9,351,000 pounds in 1949 to 15,159,000 pounds in 1950 represented quite a substantial increase in revenue for our fishermen. In New Brunswick alone for the first nine months of 1952 the landed value of plaice and other flatfish was $174,000 as compared with $154,000 in 1951.

I think it is safe to say that most of those fish were caught by the Gloucester county dragger fleet in the course of their cod-dragging operations. In 1949, when the landings of cod and other ground fish showed a marked decrease, especially in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, our Gloucester county fleet draggers produced an increase of 2 million pounds over the preceding year. Those figures substantiate the contention that the new type draggers have certainly revolutionized the fishing industry in northern New Brunswick. There is an increasing demand for those draggers and it is my hope that the New Brunswick fishermen's loan board will continue to receive ever-increasing assistance from the federal government as this type of federal assistance has certainly proved to be a practical and efficient way of increasing the production of our deep-sea fisheries.

May I, at this stage, bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) a clause in the contracts heretofore entered into between the fishermen's loan board of the province of New Brunswick and applicants for dragger type vessels. This clause has already given rise to numerous justifiable complaints on the part of dragger owners. I wish to refer to the contractual obligation under which our fishermen are bound to sell all their catch, if not to specified dealers then at least within the province of New Brunswick. This clause, in the dragger contracts, has always seemed to me most unfair to our fishermen. It borders, in my submission, on a clause in restraint of trade inasmuch as it gives local dealers an opportunity to agree on a set price which in some instances may be lower than market conditions warrant; and at the same time it forces our fishermen to sell at such a dealer's agreed or set price. I have been informed that draggers coming in from the fishing banks with a load could easily, in a few hours, cross the baie de Chaleur and sell their fish on the Gaspe shore at a price higher than the Caraquet or Shippigan dealers will allow them. Yet being bound by their contract they cannot avail themselves of such a profitable opportunity.

According to the September issue of the "Monthly Review of Canadian Fisheries Statistics", the price received by fishermen for cod at Caraquet, New Brunswick, as at September, 1951, was 2½ cents per pound as landed. During the same period cod commanded a price of 3 cents per pound at Souris, Prince Edward Island, 3 to 4½ cents per pound at Halifax and 3½ cents per pound at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. As at September 15, 1952, our fishermen were receiving 3 cents per pound for cod at Caraquet when they could have sold the same cod at prices varying between 3¼ and 3¾ cents per pound at Souris which is a most accessible port for them, especially during the late summer and fall operations.

The above statistics clearly show a disparity of prices which is detrimental to our Gloucester county fishermen, bound as they are by the already mentioned restrictive clause in their contracts. The dragger fishermen cannot protest too loudly against this unfair situation, or when they can protest it is too late as they must sign their agreement before they can obtain a loan from the New Brunswick fishermen's loan board. On the face of it, however, this restrictive and mandatory clause in their contracts militates to the detriment of the fishermen and favours the dealers. I consider it my duty to bring this situation to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) with a view to obtaining his assistance and collaboration, so that our New Brunswick fishermen's loan board may be induced to have this unfair clause deleted from all our dragger contracts.

I hope I have in no uncertain terms underlined the importance of the dragger type of vessel in the development of our deep-sea fisheries. This brings me to the problem of dragger operations and their effect on inshore fisheries, particularly along the coast of the baie de Chaleur. Numerous complaints have already been filed with the Department of Fisheries on behalf of several long-line fishermen in my county. According to the terms of condition 1 printed on the licence issued to draggers, no fishing operations can be carried on within one-half mile of boats or vessels fishing with hooks and lines or any stationary fishing apparatus, nor interfere with other methods of fishing. Unfortunately it is a well known fact that this regulation is disregarded by several small draggers, some of which come from the Quebec side of the baie de Chaleur during their fishing operations in our bay. Hundreds of dollars worth of actual damage to trawls and other fishing equipment have already been reported to departmental officials. Were we to add to these amounts the catch value of the fish lost as a result of the damaged gear and the time and labour involved in repair and replacement, we would realize that the fishermen who depend for a livelihood on inshore fishing along the coast of Gloucester county certainly have good grounds for complaint. We have been told that the problem is under active consideration. May I urge the Minister of Fisheries and his technical advisers to spare no effort in finding a solution to this important problem.

I am and always will be prepared to assist in promoting the best interests of our dragger fishermen. I am one of those who believe that these dragger type vessels are essential to the modern concept of deep-sea fish production. On the other hand I feel that I owe a duty to the no less deserving inshore fishermen who are entitled also to a full measure of protection and encouragement. Having approved the actual method of federally subsidizing the construction of dragger or small dragger type vessels, may I now suggest to the Department of Public Works some of the ways by which it can also assist in promoting and encouraging our fisheries in Gloucester county.

I have stated already in this house that the county of Gloucester has been sadly neglected by the present federal government, particularly with regard to certain public works which the people of my constituency consider essential to the full development of our fisheries potentialities. In the estimates for 1952-53 there was an item of $32,000 for the dredging of Ferguson gully near Tracadie, New Brunswick. The dredging of this gully has been a perennial promise by Liberal candidates at every federal election since the turn of the century. The dredging of this gully is a matter of major importance to the fishermen of that locality. Although the moneys were voted at the last session, nothing has been done so far. How much longer shall the fishermen of Tracadie Beach and Big Tracadie river have to wait for the realization of this project?

Likewise, strong representations have been made to the Department of Public Works and the Department of Fisheries by the Tracadie board of trade urging the opening of the main Tracadie gully and protecting it by adequate breakwaters, so as to provide the Tracadie fishermen with a navigable outlet to the gulf of St. Lawrence fishing banks. This important undertaking, were it properly carried out along the lines suggested by the Tracadie board of trade, would provide Tracadie with its own fishing fleet and would undoubtedly mean the opening in the very near future of a large fish processing plant in that thriving village. As yet nothing is being done by our federal government.

Last summer I witnessed a spectacle which I would have liked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Fisheries to view for themselves. I happened to be at Miscou Point one afternoon as the fishermen were hauling their boats ashore. Hardship and brawn were the natural qualificatives which came to my mind as I watched these hardy Miscou fishermen straining, with the assistance of a homemade winch, to haul those heavy brine-soaked boats ashore. There is no wharf, no breakwater at Miscou Point. Yet within a few hundred yards from where I stood I was shown a spot locally known as Lake Fry which, with a little dredging, would provide a navigable entrance and thus afford a natural shelter at which the fleet could safely anchor. A somewhat similar situation obtains at Island River on Shippigan island, where lack of dredging deprives the local fishermen of another safe and natural haven for their boats.

Then if we proceed up shore we come to Maisonnette, another important fishing village of our county. There also we meet with another very discouraging situation for our fishermen because of the lack of a proper wharf at which to tie their numerous fishing boats safely. There is hardly one storm of any consequence in which several of their boats are not seriously damaged on the shore. Is it any wonder that, with local situations such as these prevailing in the best and most productive fishing county of New Brunswick, our boys abandon our fishing villages to seek an easier life somewhere else?

We all deplore the exodus of our young boys from the farms of Gloucester county. In so far as agriculture is concerned, we are passing through a real crisis. There are far too many abandoned farms in my county. A few years ago many of our good people raised their own vegetables, potatoes and turnips, grain and hay in sufficient quantities to feed their cows, hogs and hens, but now they go to the general store to purchase canned milk, potatoes, eggs and vegetables. This is a serious situation, and before long I fear we may experience the same slump in our fishing industry unless something is done by our federal government to encourage the sons of our fishermen to follow their fathers' calling and take to the open sea.

Another example of neglect on the part of our federal government is to be found in the village of Blue Cove. It is also an important and strategically located fishing centre. A number of companies consider Blue Cove as the real spot for the establishment of important fish processing plants. Along these shores herring and cod are especially plentiful. The lack of proper wharf facilities have so far prevented any major fishing development there. Oh, yes, Blue Cove has a wharf or breakwater. I do not know under what classification the Department of Public Works has listed the structure it erected at Blue Cove in 1929 or it might have been on the eve of the 1930 election, in apparent fulfilment of a promise made by Liberal politicians from time immemorial. It is quite a substantial structure, but it is not linked with the shore. By actual measurement the so-called Blue Cove wharf is exactly 750 feet from the shore at high tide, and 650 feet therefrom at low tide. Hon. gentlemen can realize the practical value of such a freak in public works. When you are on it, you need a boat to get ashore; and when fishing boats are moored thereto and a storm suddenly arises, you cannot reach this unfinished symphony, even with a boat, to salvage the fishing boats. I greatly doubt whether another such masterpiece exists in Canada, with the exception of course of Beresford, another fishing village in my own county of Gloucester where we were also gratified—by a Liberal administration, of course—with a similar anomaly of about the same vintage and uselessness as the Blue Cove wharf.

In order to bring these anomalies clearly to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair)—because I do not expect the hon. gentleman will ever visit Blue Cove in the county of Gloucester—I have had enlargements made of photographs of the Blue Cove so-called wharf. I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not here now because I wanted the permission of the Speaker to send the enlargements over to him, but I will do it later. I wish I could put them in Hansard, but unfortunately I cannot do so. I know that photographs are perfectly admissible in court as the best evidence. I therefore hope I am in order in sending them across the house to the Minister of Fisheries and to the Minister of Public Works. With these exhibits of best evidence in hand, surely the ministers will realize that it is high time the fishermen of Blue Cove and Beresford were given more humane and equitable treatment, and that those two unfinished, useless and costly structures were linked with the shore, as I hope they soon will be.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Public Works is coming into the chamber now.

Mr. Robichaud: These are but a few of the most pressing needs of the fishermen of my constituency. It is not my intention, nor will time permit me today, to catalogue all the undertakings which the county of Gloucester deserves and expects from the federal Department of Public Works. Gloucester county has been the orphan child of the present federal administration. This is precisely one of the main reasons why our people indicated, by their votes at the May by-election, that it was time for a change—not the change advocated on Friday, I think it was, by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), but a real change this time. There was then, and still is, in this large county of ours which stands as the headpiece of the province of New Brunswick, between the mighty waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence on one side and the majesty of the baie de Chaleur on the other, a prevailing strong current of public opinion opposed to the present federal government because we have not received our just share in the distribution of public moneys. I was elected to the House of Commons in order that the voice of Gloucester would once again be heard, to further the interests of my constituents, to make their needs known to the government, and to appeal for fair and equitable treatment for our large county of Gloucester.

Before concluding my remarks on the question of fisheries, may I again stress the necessity of providing fishermen with some form of remuneration for losses sustained through storms. I am informed that a plan is now under advisement by the Department of Fisheries to establish a permanent program of insurance as well as loans—interest free, I hope—to storm-stricken fishermen. May I advocate the elaboration of a system following the broad outline of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which has proved to be highly beneficial to western farmers. I am also in favour of extending the plan now under study so as to embrace some kind of cheap contributory insurance not alone on the fishing equipment but on the lives of our fishermen as well. After all, there is in my submission no more hazardous occupation than that of those hardy and courageous toilers of the sea who risk everything and face the ever-recurring dangers of storm and sea in order to develop the fishing grounds of Canada's Atlantic and Pacific coasts, which are recognized as the richest in the world. Hence special consideration should be given by our government to the welfare of Canada's fishermen; and a protective scheme of assistance and insurance is indeed long past due.

In the course of my remarks I have endeavoured to state the position of the province of New Brunswick with reference to the proposed Yarmouth-Bar Harbor, Maine, ferry service. I have also stressed the detrimental effects of the loss of British markets for our unmanufactured wood. Several aspects of our Gloucester county fisheries have been underlined with a view to obtaining more protection and more encouragement for our fishermen.

Before concluding, may I express the hope that my observations will receive the consideration which the people of my native province of New Brunswick and my own constituents are justified in expecting from the departments concerned.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to say a few words with respect to what I think might be a misunderstanding as to the relationship between the Social Credit movement in this country and other political parties. Before doing so, may I say that I was a bit disappointed in the apparent timidity with which this present debate started. I refer particularly to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the reply given to him by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). We had felt, and perhaps justifiably, that this was a pre-election session. It still may be a pre-election session. I think most of us felt that perhaps there would be a good deal of fireworks, and that the first people to start the fireworks would be the leader of the official opposition and the Prime Minister in defence of his government. Before I left home many people expressed to me the opinion that we might expect a fairly lively pre-election session. Let us hope that it will get more lively as the days go by.

An hon. Member: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Hansell: I do not know that I can contribute a great deal to the liveliness of the present debate. After all I am perhaps small fry sitting on the back benches, but that description does not apply to the leader of the official opposition or the Prime Minister of Canada.

An hon. Member: How about your own leader?

Mr. Hansell: If there was any excitement at all, it was when my own leader spoke. As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition and to the Prime Minister I noticed that, after they had finished, both were wearing their suspenders and everything was intact. I felt that perhaps there might even have been an understanding between them to this effect: "If you don't let me down, I won't let you down."

Be that as it may, I want to say a word about the charge which has been levelled at the Social Credit movement for some considerable time. It is a charge that has been levelled at us by writers and by some political observers to the effect that, in reality, we are Conservatives. I noticed that when the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) spoke the other day he said something similar to that. Referring to the Social Crediters he said, as reported at page 178 of Hansard:

> I was told that a large number of Social Credit supporters were only disguised Tories. That is not a good recommendation as far as I am concerned, and there is good proof of it. Considering the matter further, if we look at the new cabinet that has been formed in British Columbia we find many ministers who were at one time prominent members of the Conservative party, so if they are not disguised Tories they are at least converted Tories.

That was said in this House of Commons. I am reminded that the hon. member who said this, while he now sits on the other side of the house, sat behind us when he first came here. Perhaps there is a measure of conversion there.

We have heard observations here and there about this same matter. Very often when newspaper writers are commenting on the record of the Alberta government they like to say that it is really a good, honest Conservative government. What gives rise to that sort of opinion? I think perhaps there may be three main reasons, the first of which is that for the last 17 years, since Social Credit was first represented in the House of Commons, we have been sitting in opposition with the Tory party in Canada. This is no indication that we are part and parcel of them, but the fact is that often opposition members applaud opposition members. It just seems to be the normal process. Very often amendments and motions of want of confidence are offered, and we vote with the Tories. Perhaps that has added a little fuel to the fire.

Then there is this further basis of comparison, in that we do feel that our relationship with the British commonwealth of nations is very important. Traditionally, of course, the Conservatives take that position. We, too, have tried to stress our absolute allegiance to the British crown. We have that feeling; we hold that belief, and we have not wavered when we have had to come to any decision affecting that loyalty. It may be that that, too, has been a factor of similarity from which people have drawn certain conclusions.

Then the third point, of course, is found in the recent political trends. I refer of course to the British Columbia election and the fact that Mr. Bennett, a one-time member of the Conservative party, came over to the Social Credit ranks, is now premier of the province and is evidently doing a good job. Because a thing of that kind happens is no reason for saying that Social Crediters are, in reality, nothing but Tories. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Let us look at this matter from a safe and sane standpoint. In the first place, while some more or less prominent Conservatives may have come over to our movement in British Columbia, several rather prominent Liberals have also come over to us.

Mr. Johnston: The best of the Liberals come over to us.

Mr. Hansell: Regardless of that, the Social Credit movement in Canada is a new movement. If we are to gain support from the people of this country, from whom is it that we must obtain that support if not from those who have been connected with the other political parties? Any citizen who can be properly described as a loyal citizen must take an interest in the welfare of the country or of the province in which he lives, and it is possible that he might have been active in political affairs. If we are to get support, from where shall we get it? I am saying right now that if our movement grows, as we expect it to grow, more and more Conservatives and Liberals will join us.

Mr. Blackmore: All the intelligent ones.

Mr. Mott: What about the C.C.F.?

Mr. Blackmore: All the intelligent ones.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): You would not have them, eh?

Mr. Hansell: If we do attract to our movement people who have been prominent in other parties, it means only one thing: that is the other political parties have not been able to hold them. That is a self-evident fact.

We have need to reflect upon these things a little more deeply. Recently the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) made a tour across Canada, upon which occasion he made a number of statements. I am not too much concerned about what he said, but perhaps I should read one or two of his observations because it would seem that he, evidently, is not claiming any relationship between the two parties.

An hon. Member: What about the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Hansell: The Globe and Mail is an independent paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: A Tory paper.

Mr. Knowles: Just like the Toronto Star.

Mr. Hansell: The Globe and Mail may have been supporting Conservative policies throughout the years; but if it wishes to print its opinions, we still have a free press. The Star has been supporting the Liberal party and its policies for a good many years.

Mr. Fraser: And the socialist party.

Mr. Hansell: And the socialists, too. But if it wishes to express its opinions, we still have a free press. I am not going to hold it against the Globe and Mail or the Star if occasionally they want to write favourably about the Social Credit movement. According to a press report in the Vancouver Province, when the Leader of the Opposition was in Victoria recently a newspaper reporter noted that some Conservatives were joining Social Credit in British Columbia. The reporter then went on to say that Socreds were just Conservatives of a different shade and asked the Leader of the Opposition if he would like to draw a distinction. The article then continues:

> Mr. Drew said that might be difficult because he knew what Conservatives stood for but he had never been able to understand much about Social Credit.

I will not deny that he has not been able to understand Social Credit, but I will observe that for the leader of what is today one of the major parties in Canada to make an admission like that means that he has not given much thought to it.

Mr. Johnston: Or else he has not the ability.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) says, "or else he has not the ability." I believe he has the ability. At least he has written a few books and he should be able to read some. If he can read, surely he will not stand up here and say that although he has been in public life the number of years he has he cannot understand some of the rudimentary principles of Social Credit. I claim that Social Credit is not difficult to understand. Where I find the people getting into difficulty is in trying to understand the present monetary system. They simply do not understand it.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that any suggestion that the two parties were the same was utter nonsense. I am glad that comes from the lips of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Canada. That should settle the thing once and for all. We did not say it; he said it and that should settle it.

An hon. Member: Don't believe everything he says.

Mr. Hansell: I have drawn a number of other conclusions. The Leader of the Opposition during that tour appealed to the people to get back to what he called the two-party system. He referred to other parties, presumably meaning the C.C.F., the Social Credit and perhaps one or two others, as splinter parties. The term "splinter parties" is not original with the Leader of the Opposition, it is a phrase which has been coined. When you analyse that phrase you realize that it does not express what is really meant. A splinter is simply a piece of wood that has been knocked off the main beam. Let us analyse it. Will anyone say—I am now referring to our C.C.F. friends—that the socialists have been splintered off some other party?

An hon. Member: Liberals in a hurry, the Prime Minister said.

An hon. Member: They are certainly off the beam.

Mr. Hansell: Socialism was an idea long before the Liberal party ever appeared in Canada.

An hon. Member: Or the C.C.F.

Mr. Hansell: I am talking about socialism. There have always been socialists. Socialism appeared in the political realm in Great Britain many years ago. It was not splintered off the main beam at all; it was a new idea that was propounded. The same thing applies to Social Credit. We have not been splintered off something else. Twenty years ago Mr. Aberhart read about the new economics known as Social Credit. He took the idea to his heart and mind and began to teach it. It was a new idea and nobody can say that it was splintered off something else.

An hon. Member: No, but they can say that it is off the beam.

Mr. Hansell: That is playing with words. If my hon. friend is so bright that he wants to play like that, I will let him enjoy himself for a minute.

An hon. Member: Tell him to take the beam out of his eye.

Mr. Hansell: This cry to get back to the two-party system is nothing more or less than the cry of frustrated politicians who feel that their grip is slipping. That is all it is. I believe in a two-party system, but it has to be made up of two parties with distinctive ideas, two parties with basic principles that are opposed one to the other. Surely my hon. friends are not going to say that the thing that distinguishes one party from another is the name or the political machine that runs the party. Surely they are not going to stand up and admit anything of that kind. Surely they must realize that what distinguishes one party from another is the basic principles upon which each party is founded and the objectives at which it is aiming.

I believe in a two-party system because there are only two ways of life. Those two ways of life are gradually emerging today in Canada. I should like to suggest to those who write about splinter parties and to the Leader of the Opposition that Canada is coming back to a two-party system, but it will not necessarily be a system composed of two parties bearing the names Liberal and Progressive Conservative.

An hon. Member: What will it be?

Mr. Hansell: I do not know what the names will be, but I can make a pretty good guess. I have nothing against my friends who sit to my far right. They are good fellows; I like them all and I try to work with them. But I want to say to them that if this country does come back to a two-party system the Progressive Conservative party will not be one of them.

I do not claim to be a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I ask you to look at what happened in Great Britain. Just reminisce for a while. Years ago when I was a boy the two great parties in Great Britain were the Liberals and the Conservatives. Well, what happened in the process of time? Labour came into the picture with a fairly strong leadership. Their ideas, which embraced certain tenets of socialism, came into the picture. They began to emerge and became stronger until Labour took over the government. Then they went back a little later on and the Conservatives took over the government. We find that the Liberals in that country gradually diminished in numbers, and I am not now comparing the Liberals of Great Britain with the Liberals of Canada or the Conservatives of Great Britain with the Conservatives of this country. All I am saying is that one of the old major parties in England is a forgotten factor today.

The same thing can happen here. The only issue today in England between the parties is whether you want socialism or whether you want private enterprise. That is the issue, and that is going to be the issue as the days go by in Canada. I am not a prophet, but I will make this suggestion that, whether or not I live to see the day, either the C.C.F. will take over the Liberal party or the Liberal party will absorb the C.C.F.

An hon. Member: Never.

An hon. Member: And you will take over the Tories.

Mr. Weir: Now we are going to get it.

Mr. Hansell: That is going to happen and they will emerge as one of the great parties in Canada. If my guess is right the Social Crediters will emerge as the private enterprise advocates in Canada who will put a little effectiveness and freedom into our democratic way of life. That is my guess. You can dispute it if you like.

Mr. Harkness: That is your hope.

Mr. Wylie: You would not know any better anyway.

Mr. Hansell: I would say yes, it is our hope; but in saying it is our hope let me tell my hon. friend that I am not hoping it because I want to sit over on that side of the house or because I want my party to take the reins of government. I am not saying it with that hope. I am saying it with the hope that I may see Canada governed by a party that can govern according to private enterprise principles, keep the people free and at the same time give us an administration that will reflect the true physical facts of life and give the people of Canada the things they want. That is my hope, and I do not care who it is that puts it across.

I was talking about the difference between parties, not in their machinery but in their concepts, and I come once again to the two main parties of this country. The Leader of the Opposition tried to tell the government where they had failed and what they should do with respect to cutting taxation and at the same time keeping up their expenditures. The Prime Minister replied and although he was not fiery and did not wake the dead at all he was logical in presenting the facts to the Leader of the Opposition and asking him, "If you want to cut taxation, where are you going to cut it? If you want to cut expenditures, where are you going to cut them?" He was perfectly right in asking those questions.

As far as I am concerned there is no difference fundamentally in the basic financial policies of the two parties, not a bit of difference. They argue about little things but do not come to grips with the vital errors inherent in the present financial policy of Canada. The old financial system is just like a man with one leg shorter than the other going around in a circle all the time. The Conservatives and the Liberals are arguing with one another about this short-legged chap going around in a circle. What are they arguing? The Liberals say, "Well, of course we know the reason he is going around in a circle is that one leg is shorter than the other." The Conservatives jump up and say, "No, that is not it. The reason he is going around in a circle is that one leg is longer than the other." So they argue that point without coming to grips with the real situation.

The fact of the matter is that there is something wrong with our present financial system. To journalists and others who like to try to say that we Social Crediters of Canada are nothing but Conservatives made over, let me say it is true that in the province of Alberta they have not been able to exercise the Social Credit financial technique. That is true. We admit it. We know it. But let it not be said that if Alberta had the constitutional right to change monetary technique it would not do so. In that respect I want to quote from the report of an interview that the Lethbridge Herald had with Premier Manning during the recent provincial election campaign. Mr. Manning was asked whether or not Social Crediters were satisfied that they could not put Social Credit monetary technique into effect in Alberta, and this is the way the reporter wrote up Mr. Manning's reply. I am reading from the edition of the Lethbridge Herald of the 19th of July. The article reads as follows:

He dismissed—

The "he" refers to Premier Manning.

—as an "unsound theory" the idea that the Social Credit party no longer held to its original principles and was concentrating instead on providing a conservative administration. "We are blocked (by federal laws) from instituting our monetary proposals, but that was only one field of Social Credit ideas" he continued. "We have kept the guiding principle that our policies should enhance the freedom and security of the individual." This had been partly accomplished through decentralization —leaving as much power as possible in the hands of local elected bodies. If, however, the constitution were changed to permit Social Credit to put its monetary theories into practise, "we would immediately implement them."

Those are the words of Premier Manning, and in that respect I want to say: Let nobody write or think that if Social Credit should take over the reins of government here they would only follow along the lines of good honest conservative government. If the Social Credit party took over the government of Canada let it be understood they would introduce Social Credit technique. There will not be any argument about that. If you want to go out on the election platform and fight on that ground that will be all right with us.

An hon. Member: That is different from good honest government.

Mr. Wylie: It may come in time and it will worry you if it does.

Mr. Hansell: The fact of the matter is that there is no use dilly-dallying around the outside of the problem. We have to get right at the heart of things and come to grips with the real issues facing the country. The real issue in the country is not to adjust your taxation so as to move it from one class of people to another, or to cut this expenditure here or something else there. We have to recognize—and I must say I have a little sympathy with the present government—that they have pursued certain policies along certain lines which have involved certain expenditures. They will not listen to us on where to get the money, so they have to get it by taxation. If they are to keep up the vast expenditures that are necessary they must get the money from somewhere, and their policy is to get it from taxation. That is all there is to it as far as they are concerned.

I think, too, that when we propose things here—this goes for any member, and certainly we Social Crediters have adhered to it in the past—we should be capable of showing how we would do it. I was noticing the order paper and although I am not permitted to discuss resolutions on the order paper, I see that the Ottawa Journal referred to the matter tonight. There are perhaps six and certainly four resolutions on the order paper which ask the government to spend more on social legislation. That is all very well. Of course we cannot put resolutions on the order paper calling for an increase in expenditures, so the way to get around it is to word the thing in such a way that the request is not for an increase in expenditures but that the government give consideration to this or that, and that gets around the technical point. I often wonder what would happen if we revised our parliamentary rules and forms. What would happen if we made them to the effect that when a person puts such resolutions as that on the order paper he should also state where the government would get the money to do the thing proposed? I wonder what kind of resolutions we would get.

Well, we would get the same suggestions as the Liberals and Conservatives are compelled to give: "We will have to get it from the people; we will have to get it from taxation, or we will have to borrow". It is a nice thing to put these resolutions on the order paper but it is another thing to say how we are to accomplish the thing we are after.

An hon. Member: Come on, let's have it.

Mr. Hansell: If you have been here all these years and cannot understand it, well, why should I bother answering the small fry anyway? If we—and I am not talking about ourselves, but anyone—want to appeal to the people to solve this country's problems and make Canada one of the greatest nations on the earth, and it can be made that, then let us go to the people with our proposals as to how we are to do this thing. Right now I think I should read from an editorial on this same subject that appeared recently in the Western Producer. The editorial is entitled "Social Security" and I will not read it all but it starts off:

> In some quarters there is growing complaint about the rising cost of welfare measures.

It goes on to comment on those costs and indicates that just so long as we remain within the confines of present financial policy, of course those measures have to be paid for and the money must come from somewhere. Then it says, and this is what I want to read:

> Those whose aim it is to eliminate unnecessary want and poverty will have to raise their sights. They cannot attain their objective if they confine their efforts to redistributing by means of taxation the present national financial income. Taking from the rich to give to the poor will not do the job because under the most equitable system of redistribution there isn't enough money to do it.

That is the thing our friends do not recognize. The editorial continues:

> But there is enough and to spare potentially, if not actually, of goods and services to satisfy every reasonable demand. What is needed is a change in our economic system which will encourage the maximum use of our material and human resources to the point of optimum production and a reorganization of the method of distribution so that the resulting goods and services are made available to consumers. That implies a drastic revision of finance and banking.

Now, the sooner we recognize that the better it will be for this country. I am going to skip a bit for the sake of brevity; but the editorial refers to the welfare state and here, I think, is a gem:

As one high authority recently stated, "the welfare state as a permanent institution bears witness not to the success of government but to its failure" . . . The ultimate aim should be economic policies which will remove the shackles from production so that it can function to capacity thus providing plenty for all. In the transition period generous welfare measures should be provided to aid all those in need. But the need for welfare legislation is the mark of the age of scarcity and the object should be to move with all possible speed from the age of scarcity to the age of plenty.

Mr. Knowles: Would you do away with welfare legislation?

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I take advantage of the pause to tell the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. Hansell: I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question if I may. It has always been found that you cannot readily retract or undo something the country has already done; but I would say that the greatest welfare that can come to the people is to leave with them their absolute freedom to act according to their own conscience and will, and see that their incomes are such that they can make available to themselves the highest standard of living the resources of the country can give without interfering with that freedom. That to me is the greatest possible welfare state.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: In your statement you said you wanted free enterprise. Would you want to put all the grain in western Canada back on the grain exchange?

Mr. Hansell: I do not regard that as a very clever question. However, I will answer my hon. friend. When we talk of private enterprise we do not say: Now, we are going to scrap all such things as orderly marketing. We certainly would not do that. We believe in orderly marketing because we believe that in a complex world it is necessary. We do not believe that you have to cast away all regulation. We do not believe in substituting liberty for licence.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): I wish to associate myself, Mr. Speaker, with those who have spoken before in conveying my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish to also convey my congratulations to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). Both the hon. members have proven to be able parliamentary assistants, and I believe they will be active and capable ministers.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, with all my fellow Canadians from coast to coast, I rejoice at the elevation of His Excellency Archbishop Paul-Emile Léger to the rank of cardinal. The people of Villeneuve county are happy to pay tribute to him and to assure him of their filial devotion.

(Text):

My main purpose in rising this evening is to draw to the attention of this house some of the problems of my constituents. I do so because I sincerely believe that other constituencies in Canada are concerned with the same problems. I welcome the opportunity to discuss the speech from the throne, and desire particularly to refer briefly to one paragraph because I believe Canadians should be interested in it. The paragraph reads:

You will be invited to consider a measure to provide for federal co-operation with the provincial governments in the conservation of the water resources of Canada.

I am sure every right-thinking Canadian will welcome this legislation. I am hopeful also that each and every one of the provincial governments will take steps to provide the legislation, the administrative organization and the educational services necessary for the effective conservation of the water resources. In 1949, without a dissenting voice, the forestry act became law, thus opening the door to federal-provincial teamwork. I hope the same thing will happen in connection with this legislation.

The conservation of our natural resources is actually a problem of prime importance. The conservation of our forests, of our soil, of our water and the preservation of our wildlife are matters of grave concern to every Canadian. The conservation of water is of paramount importance, and it bears a close relationship to the conservation of our forests and our agricultural land. Floods and the shortage of water are too often considered by the public only from the standpoint of immediate inconvenience. Much more publicity will have to reach the public. Hard campaigning for conservation has been carried out by the Canadian Forestry Association and L'Association Forestière Québécoise. Both devoted the main part of their revenues to bringing home to the public, through their magazines and other publications, the idea of conservation. For this reason they must command greater financial support from all governments, especially from the federal government.

At this point, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) for having provided larger grants to the Canadian Forestry Association during the last two years. I hope the minister will see his way clear to recommending to the government that a substantial amount be granted to L'Association Forestière Québécoise. It has been wisely stated that the wealth and health of this world lies in the top six inches of its surface. The conservation of these top six inches is a problem of paramount importance to every nation, in order that its people may be well nourished and survive. If we do everything we can towards the conservation of our forests, our soil and our water, it will be easy to preserve that top six inches for our own good and for the welfare of our children.

There is another paragraph, Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne which to my mind is of great importance to all Canadians. This paragraph reads:

> To give effect to recommendations made by the standing committee on banking and commerce at the last session of parliament and to extend its scope your approval will be sought for an amendment to the National Housing Act.

I do not intend to elaborate on this subject, but I hope we will do everything we can to provide all Canadians with adequate housing. I wish to congratulate the government for what it has done in the past; the undertaking was far-reaching and the results have been substantial.

Many other measures will be brought before this house. When they come before us we shall consider them calmly, laying aside and sacrificing if necessary our own interests and ambitions to think only of the interests of Canada and Canadians. Hon. members are aware of the importance of Canadian mining. It is already a great industry, and the future is even more impressive. A new record of production will be attained this year, if not in value at least in volume. Canada occupies first place in world production of asbestos, nickel and platinum. Canada occupies second place in world production of aluminum, cadmium, gold and zinc. It is third in the production of silver, fourth in cobalt, copper and lead. In 1951 the production of these minerals by our Canadian mines was as follows:

Mineral	Production
Asbestos	967,000 tons
Aluminum	445,000 tons
Zinc	334,000 tons
Copper	270,000 tons
Lead	153,000 tons
Nickel	137,000 tons
Cadmium	1,210,000 pounds
Cobalt	947,000 pounds
Silver	24,200,000 ounces
Gold	4,300,000 ounces
Platinum	154,000 ounces

The iron ore production in Canada this year will reach 4·8 million tons and the day is not far off when it will be 25 million tons. The petroleum production of 1951 had a value of $121 million. In 1952 it will reach $149 million, an increase of $28 million. The total value of the mineral production of Canada for 1951 was $1,228 million. In 1939 it was only $475 million. These are extremely impressive figures. During the last 50 years Canada has produced mineral products worth more than $12 billion, and actual mining operations are adding more than $1 billion every year. Every new mine adds to the richness of Canada and of Canadians. The past was great but the future will be greater.

Is Canadian mining going to continue to forge ahead? Will the value of our mineral industry move upward to the $2 billion mark in the near future? In both cases I hope the answer is yes. However, this objective cannot be accomplished without careful planning. We shall need a large amount of risk capital. Our leading operators, our engineers and our miners have, in the past, shown that they were equal to the task. We shall need more of their kind. Our governments, federal and provincial, will have the responsibility of building more roads, more railroads and more airfields in order to facilitate transportation and give access to new mining camps. Over and above that, we shall need people who are imbued with the spirit of determination and perseverance, people who have the vocation of pioneers. We shall need people of the same calibre as those who in the past took up the challenge and met it successfully, thus rewarding Canada with tremendous advantages which are felt in every home in this country.

The Cambrian shield, this V-shaped area covering more than half of Canada, has not yet yielded its full measure of usefulness to Canada and to Canadians. This great storehouse retains untold treasures yet to be found. The success of the past is merely an indication of what may be found in the future.

The mining industry means the steady creation of new wealth for the people of Canada. The earth's most essential minerals are of greatest importance to the entire civilized world. From Newfoundland to British Columbia the industry gives employment to more than 110,000 men. These men are the breadwinners of their families, and counting them with others who are supported directly by mining and who are living in Canadian mining communities, we have a population of over 500,000 people.

Mining communities may seem to bear little relation to the prosperity of eastern and western farmers, but let me say this, Mr. Speaker: 500,000 people represent a large number of mouths to feed and a large number of people to clothe and shelter. Statistics are available to prove that these mining centres buy more than $65 million worth of food each year from the Canadian farmers. What do the mining communities mean to the manufacturing and lumbering industries? The answer is this. Annually the mining communities are buying more than $150 million worth of clothing, shelter, furniture and other articles, and the same communities are buying each year more than $100 million worth of lumber, machinery, electrical equipment and other similar products.

Keeping in mind what I have just said, we will have a look at the gold mining industry and briefly analyse what it means to the economy of this country. Every day close to 50,000 tons of ore-bearing gold, silver and other minerals worth close to half a million dollars are passing through the 59 mills operated by the Canadian gold mines. Every working day close to 22,000 men, the breadwinners of a population of some 130,000 people, are employed in these mines.

There are 30 Canadian gold mining communities and they buy more than $12 million worth of food from Canadian farmers and more than $50 million worth of other services from the manufacturing and the lumbering industries. Each year the gold mines themselves are paying over $70 million in wages and more than $45 million in purchases of all kinds.

Surely an industry such as this must be considered to be of primary importance. I am sure hon. members will agree that an industry which has played so great a part in opening up northern Canada and in building up our national economy must be a matter of interest and concern to all Canadians. History may repeat itself and the gold mining industry may be called upon again—if not this time to save the country from bankruptcy, as it did before—at least to strengthen our national credit.

[Mr. Dumas.]

The gold mining industry is going through a difficult period because the official price set for the precious metal is much too low. Were it not for the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act few gold mines would still be operating. This legislation really rescued the declining industry. Many producers owe their continued operation to this assistance. The gold mining communities have also greatly benefited by it. The facts show that the legislation enacted by the government has done a real job. Proposed amendments to the act were outlined in a statement made last week by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and they will surely be of great help in assisting the industry to survive.

In this respect, I should like to quote an article which appeared under the title "Help For Gold Mines" in the Ottawa Journal of November 26, 1952:

> More aid for marginal gold mines, beginning with 1953, should be welcomed by more than gold miners and owners of gold shares. Gold mining is one of the important industries of this country, supporting many communities, providing work and wages for scores of thousands, providing a profitable market for many allied industries, and undoubtedly a major factor in taking care of our international balances.
> During recent years gold mining has suffered grievously through the fact that while operators of the mines have had to meet soaring costs in wages and other needs the world price of gold has remained at a fixed official level.
> The help now provided by the government may not meet this situation entirely (the formula of assistance is so complicated a layman cannot understand it) but it is bound to make some difference, and in some instances, the Journal is informed by mining men, may make a substantial difference.
> The only question that may be fairly asked is: In the light of knowledge by everybody that gold mining has been in jeopardy these past three years, why was this aid not given before?

While the article is good, I think the last paragraph is superfluous. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was instituted at the beginning of 1948. It has been amended and extended, and has been profitable to the great majority of gold mines.

Many other newspapers had articles commenting favourably upon the proposed amendments to the assistance act. I should like to quote from a letter I received yesterday. It is dated November 28, 1952, addressed to myself, and states:

> Our association wishes to go on record as commending heartily the recent amendment to the gold mines assistance act, under which additional cost-aid has been provided for the hard-pressed gold producers of the country.
> Yours very truly,
> Prospectors & Developers Association
> V. R. MacMillan
> President.

I have received many similar letters from people closely connected with the industry. They are all thankful for what is being done by the government to provide additional assistance to the gold mines.

Altogether there is ample evidence that this government is doing much to help the industry. The welfare of the gold mining communities has always been regarded by the government as of very great importance. For this I wish to express my thanks. The fact that the government has definitely stated that increased assistance will be provided is encouraging to the industry and to the residents of the gold mining communities. We are all very thankful.

No government would have made this effort and gone to this expense unless it was firmly convinced that the price of gold was much too low, and unless it had in mind that the situation was indeed a temporary one, that it should be corrected or that it would in time correct itself.

We must not forget this. We are sellers of gold, so we can hardly dictate the price to the buyers. We are not the largest producers, and for this reason we can only more or less influence the market. And, last but not least, the production and sale of gold is very important to our economy. I firmly believe that better days are not too far ahead for the gold mining industry. The future of gold is much better than some of us are inclined to think. I saw in this morning's press that Canada intends to support South Africa's request for a higher price for gold. I congratulate the Canadian government on this logical attitude, and for two reasons. The first is that this is the best way I know of to help the sterling bloc to get back on its feet. The second reason is that it will also be of great assistance to our people generally, and to the gold mines in particular.

There are two ways of helping the other commonwealth countries. The first is to give or lend them billions of dollars which either we will have lost or they will have to repay. The second is to do something that will be beneficial to all of us. In supporting South Africa we will be choosing the second method, which will be the most beneficial to all of us. I believe the choice is obvious.

When the price of gold is where it should be, the industry will take its rightful place in our economy. Instead of being a burden to the taxpayers of this country it will, as it did in the past, contribute generously to the welfare of Canada and its people. For the benefit of those who are afraid that the government is not doing the right thing, or that it is doing too much for the gold mines, I should like to quote a short article from the Rouyn-Noranda Press of November 20, 1952. It states:

> In terms of Canada's total budget gold assistance payments are not large. They are not large when compared to the sums paid out to carry other key industries, notably wheat growing, through bad times. They are not large when set against the revenues the federal government derives in corporation and personal income taxes from the industry and those who work in it.

I will ask those who are worried over this question to think twice before objecting to this increased assistance to an industry which needs it so badly. I will repeat what I said at the outset: Let us consider this question calmly, laying aside and, if necessary, sacrificing our personal interests and ambitions, to think only of the betterment of the nation as a whole, which demands everywhere and always that citizens shall be happy and contented with their lot.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the speech from the throne one usually performs the perfunctory duty of complimenting the mover and seconder of the address in response to the speech from the throne. In this instance it is no perfunctory duty; it is a genuine pleasure. I can say without hesitation that in my view the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) as mover and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) as seconder made the best speeches I have heard on any parallel occasion during the years I have sat in the House of Commons. Certainly their speeches have put to shame many of the more futile efforts of those of us who have sat in the chamber a much longer time.

It was most gratifying to hear in the speech from the throne mention of the findings of the international joint commission in relation to the St. Lawrence seaway.

Recently I had the privilege of addressing a group of citizens of Canton, New York, in a large auditorium which had recently been opened at St. Lawrence university. I tried to deal with this matter from a different angle than is generally used. I did a little research, particularly on the subject of navigational facilities between the great lakes and the sea. I had said that all my life I had heard this referred to as the St. Lawrence deep waterway, and latterly as the St. Lawrence seaway and power development. I found that I spoke better than I knew because the first committee to advance the project was founded in 1902, and that happens to be the very year I was born.

As one delves into the history of the navigational facilities connecting the lakes and the ocean he will be interested to note that from the beginning Canada has taken the initiative. The first connecting link was around the Lachine rapids and was constructed by the Capuchin Fathers in 1700. Naturally it was only a narrow ditch capable of carrying canoes loaded with furs. Then in 1797 the Northwest Fur Company, a private company, constructed a canal connecting lake Superior with lake Huron. This canal served a most useful purpose for fifteen years, but was completely destroyed by the United States army in the war of 1812.

I shall not bore the house with all the details of this history but shall try to say enough to demonstrate how proud we Canadians ought to be of the work we have undertaken. In the 1820's a private company began and completed a canal connecting lake Erie with lake Ontario. That was no small feat in those days when it is considered that the height of Niagara falls and the drop of the Niagara river had to be taken into account when the canal and locks were built. Later on this canal was taken over by the government of Upper Canada. Previous to that the government of Lower Canada had circumvented the stretch of river between Beauharnois and lake St. Francis. Strangely enough the canal of that day followed closely what is now the Beauharnois canal.

It was not until many years later that the present Soulanges canal, which is used at present for navigational purposes, was built. Then in the 1840's the government of Upper Canada started and completed in stages the Cornwall canal and the Williamsburg canal. Those were finally completed in 1848 and permitted small draught vessels to ply between the upper great lakes and the St. Lawrence river below Montreal.

With the completion of the great Welland canal ships with a draught of 27 feet could be accommodated and the only real bottleneck that exists today is the area from just above Cornwall, Ontario, down to the foot of the Lachine canal. There would be no restrictions upon Canada building a deep waterway in its entirety, as this section would be entirely within Canadian territory.

The section about which we would have to negotiate with the United States begins just above Cornwall and continues to a point just above Cardinal. This is the international section which will have to be developed jointly. Canada can go ahead with the navigational section and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has said that Canada courageously will go ahead. But we must have the co-operation of the United States in order to develop power.

We all know that the Canadian power will be developed by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. The international joint commission has given the green light to go ahead, but the matter is still being held up because of uncertainty in the United States as to which authority in the state of New York will be given the right to develop power, whether a federal power authority or a New York state power authority.

In the report of the international joint commission reference was made to the Gut dam; I trust you will not call me to order when I say "Gut dam". The Gut dam was built by Canada at a point between Prescott and Cardinal in order to divert water flowing between two islands to the head of the Cardinal canal and thus eliminate certain dangerously swift currents, and at the same time create a somewhat safer channel. I understand that engineers have estimated that this dam makes as much as eight inches difference in the water level of the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river, with a somewhat lesser effect in lake Ontario. Not being an engineer I cannot give an expert opinion, but I venture to say that it does not make half an inch difference. I base that statement upon evidence I heard last summer at a hearing of the international joint commission at Ogdensburg, New York. At that time the treasurer of the Ogdensburg Trust Company stated that he owned land on the United States side both below and above the dam and he found that the height of water on both sides of the dam was exactly the same. In other words the water below the dam on the United States side was as high as the water above the dam. We who live in that part of the country know that on the United States side the dam is not visible. The shore line simply seems to be a continuation of the New York state side of the river. To me that evidence showed conclusively that the Gut dam made no difference. However, the international joint commission recommended that Canada should destroy this dam and work is now in progress to carry out that recommendation.

With Canada showing its good faith, I think it is only reasonable to ask our friends to the south to give proof of their good neighbour policy toward us by not holding up any longer than is necessary the action that will determine which body will be given the authority to proceed with the development of the power, whether it be the federal power authority or the New York state power authority. I am sure that every one of us in this house was most alarmed when we read last week in the press of Canada that the whole project may be held up eighteen months or more while Washington decides which authority will be granted the right to develop the power. Surely it is not asking too much of our great neighbours to the south to ask them to co-operate with us as we have co-operated with them by carrying out the order of the international joint commission.

I should like to suggest that along the connecting waters of the St. Lawrence seaway project certain of the larger ports be designated as harbours under the Canada Shipping Act. I make this suggestion so that these harbours will have the necessary authority to regulate the course and speed of vessels plying up and down the narrow channels. Naturally I have special reference to my own town of Brockville. Recently large ships, both domestic and foreign, have been increasing their speed and the wash from these ships is constituting a menace not only to small craft owners who leave their craft in their boathouses but also and particularly to people who are out on the water in small craft such as rowboats, boats with outboard motors or even canoes. Sometimes in recent years we have seen waves come in that would almost make one think they were rollers coming off a vast ocean.

It has been stated that some years ago when the port of Albany, New York, was opened as the head of the seaway from New York city up the Hudson river one of the large steamship lines proceeded to send an ocean vessel up to Albany. That was well before the war, and that particular line is still settling lawsuits for the damage that was done to small craft, docks, boathouses and other buildings along the Hudson river. Certainly we do not want to see that happen when the St. Lawrence seaway is built. A certain amount of damage is being caused now, and I think it could be avoided if the necessary authority were given to the ports along the various streams connecting the great lakes and along the St. Lawrence connecting lake Ontario with the ocean.

I also should like—and I have mentioned this in the house before—to call to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the advisability of establishing a weather station somewhere along the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river. At present the weather prophesying facilities in this district are unreliable. We do not have much fog in the Thousand Islands region but when we do they are bad fogs. Eventually a weather station will have to be set up somewhere between Cornwall and Kingston, and I should like to recommend that it be established as soon as possible. It must be done when navigation facilities for larger vessels are completed, and if it were done now it would be an invaluable aid to farmers in prophesying how severe a frost will be.

We are told to look at the Ottawa valley weather reports, that they will tell us what we can expect. That is not so, and I will give the house a concrete example. Last night, according to the official bulletins in the elevators in the parliament buildings, the temperature in Ottawa reached a minimum of 4 degrees above zero which would be more than enough to create a navigational hazard on the St. Lawrence. I understand that the lowest temperature reached in Brockville was 14 and that the lowest in Montreal was 13, which is not enough to cause a navigational hazard. Therefore in spite of the fact that Ottawa is so near the St. Lawrence valley the fact remains that we are in a different weather belt, and I believe our request for a weather station should be given consideration with the least possible delay.

On motion of Mr. Fulford the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 2, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GRAIN

INDEBTEDNESS ON ADVANCES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I should like to table a list of apportionments and adjustments of indebtedness on advances of seed grain.

QUOTAS ON COARSE GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will coarse grain quotas be raised to fifteen bushels per acre in the same manner as wheat quotas or will they continue to be increased at a slower rate? Is it expected that quotas can be raised sufficiently to enable producers to market all grain before the end of the present crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to let me have notice of his question. From approximately December 1, quota policy will be more definitely related to equalizing delivery opportunity amongst producers and as between grains. It must be remembered that producers will market some two bushels of wheat for every bushel of oats and barley and this relationship should be more or less preserved throughout the crop year. Up to November 20, marketing of oats and barley amounted to 94 million bushels as compared with 192 million bushels of wheat. Deliveries to date therefore are not seriously out of line with the volume of wheat and coarse grains which will be delivered during the crop year. Actually barley deliveries in per cent of expected marketings during the crop year are ahead of wheat, owing in part to the provision that a producer can market a car lot of barley accepted for malting or other industrial purposes over and above established quotas. Oats deliveries, in relation to prospective marketing, are running behind wheat and barley, and this is one of the factors which will be corrected as the crop year progresses.

It will be the policy to keep deliveries of wheat, oats and barley running in proper relationship to expected marketings of each grain and this factor will be reflected in the rate at which delivery quotas are increased. This is the important consideration rather than the actual delivery quotas established. In general, however, the board will work towards 15 bushel quotas on oats and barley. There are certain areas in the west where oats and barley are relatively more important. These specialized areas will be given consideration in connection with coarse grain delivery quotas.

In reply to the hon. member's second question, may I say that although sales, export clearances and shipments out of country elevators are proceeding at a rate in excess of last year's accomplishments, it is difficult to forecast at this stage of the season's operations the total quantity of grain it will be possible to receive into storage facilities from producers during the crop year. If, for storage reasons, it is not possible to take delivery of all the grains which producers wish to market, the Canadian wheat board will endeavour to distribute the excess as equitably as possible amongst all producers. The intent is maximum marketings, maximum transportation, and maximum sales.

TRANSFERS TO 1952-53 POOLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a further question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister indicate to the house the amount of wheat and coarse grains that were transferred from the 1951-52 crop pool to the 1952-53 pool and the prices at which such transfers were made?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In answer to the hon. member for Melfort's question, the orders in council covering the transfer of the 1951-52 coarse grain pools to the respective 1952-53 pools are order in council P.C. 4304 of October 15, 1952, in the case of oats, and P.C. 4331 of October 23 in the case of barley. These two orders in council were included in the group of statutory orders and regulations tabled in the house on November 13. P.C. 4508 of November 19 covers the transfer of the 1951-52 wheat pool to the 1952-53 pool. This order in council will be included in the group of statutory orders and regulations to be tabled on December 11 next in accordance with the customary procedure. The quantity of wheat transferred was 103,208,409 bushels and 16 pounds valued at $169,853,350.92. I might say that 222 grades of wheat were involved in the transfer.

RAILWAY CROSSINGS

RAITH, ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. At the town of Raith children have difficulty crossing the railway track in going to school. When will it be possible for the people there to have a crossing so that settlers can get their goods across, children can be protected and others can cross in safety?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member kindly told me a few moments ago that he was going to ask this question. I understand that an application has been made to the board of transport commissioners who have the matter under investigation, and I am hopeful that the decision which they will hand down may be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF VETERANS' HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Have complaints been received from Indian veterans with reference to the poor and incomplete construction of Indian veterans' homes at Micmac, Nova Scotia, and Big Cove, New Brunswick? If so, will an effort be made to have this situation corrected at once before more severe winter weather sets in?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice a few hours ago, but in the meantime I have not been able to get in touch with the agency concerned, so my answer will have to be based on the information available in Ottawa. We have not received any complaints from Indian veterans on the reserves mentioned. On the other hand, I did receive a personal letter about the 20th of last month from an individual who is not resident in the maritimes about conditions there. In answering him I promised an investigation and ordered it, I believe on the 22nd of November. I have not had a report but I will ask for it right away.

HOGS

INQUIRY AS TO PRICE CUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I had intended to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture but perhaps his parliamentary assistant will take note of it. In view of the minister's announcement yesterday regarding the lifting of the United States embargo, will the minister give further consideration to the cut in hog prices to take effect on December 31? Perhaps this cut could be postponed to March 1 or later.

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I will take note of the hon. member's question and an answer will be given in due course.

COBALT

REPORTED CONTRACT WITH UNITED STATES—ARRANGEMENTS FOR PURCHASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister prepared to comment on press reports from Washington which allege that Silver Miller Mines Limited of Toronto agreed to pay $835,000 to a former assistant secretary of defence at Washington to promote a contract with the United States government for the purchase of cobalt from this firm? Would the minister care to tell the house whether the Canadian government is purchasing cobalt from this firm, and if so, under what terms?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Arrangements for the purchase of cobalt for defence purposes were announced in the house on February 15, 1951, and a revision of the plan was announced on December 28, 1951. A public announcement was made at both times. The government agency is purchasing cobalt from any source that offers cobalt to the smelter on the terms of those two announcements. The Silver Miller situation is one that involves certain Canadian citizens and a procurement agency of the government of the United States. We have no knowledge of the circumstances and are not particularly interested.

The situation could have been avoided if the procurement agency of the United States had followed the arrangement we have suggested to it, and which has been followed generally, that any purchase contract for metal in Canada be cleared through the Department of Defence Production before the contract is closed.

Mr. Knowles: Is the present price of $2 a pound, which appears in the press reports, the price that was fixed in the revised arrangements made on December 28, 1951?

Mr. Howe: I am sorry to say my memory is not that good. I do not remember whether the price is $2. However, I know my hon. friend is very good on research, and if he will look up the statement I made in the house on the date mentioned he will find the arrangement set out in great detail.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, December 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, last night when I adjourned the debate I had been dealing with the particular phase of the speech from the throne having to do with the St. Lawrence seaway. Today it is my intention to deal with matters of an entirely different nature. First of all, I am sure that we all wish the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) well in their discussions at the economic conference between the various commonwealth nations now being held in London. I know furthermore that we regret that the Minister of Trade and Commerce could not join the Canadian delegation that is over there at the present time, but at the same time I can think of no better person who could have been left behind to head the government during the absence of the Prime Minister.

We all feel that probably at the root of the trouble so far as commonwealth trade and world trade generally are concerned is the peculiar and unfortunate position of the pound. Certainly everyone would like to see some method devised whereby convertibility of the pound and Canadian and United States dollars could be brought about. The best way of bringing this about of course is to increase our trade with the United Kingdom and other parts of the commonwealth, but we in Canada have come to a place where I doubt very much whether our dairy farmers and our beef and hog producers would be satisfied if they were dependent on the former contracts with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on record some figures which I obtained from the Department of Trade and Commerce. I might say that these figures are as of November 18, 1952. The prices of products of countries other than Canada are those at present in effect and in terms of the Canadian equivalent in cents per pound f.o.b. the country of origin for approximately the same quality.

We will take bacon. The price of bacon in Denmark and in Holland is 30·32 cents per pound. In Canada it is 36 cents per pound. For beef, New Zealand top quality, average 14 cents; medium, average 12·5 cents; and cows, average 9·8 cents per pound. Argentine prices are presently being negotiated but the asking price for all meat in the Argentine is 18·7 cents. The Canadian prices are: good, average 44 cents; commercial, average 42 cents; cows, average 36 cents. Then we go to butter. In Australia the price is 37·8 cents; New Zealand, 37·8 cents; in Denmark which is a little closer to the British market, and that makes up the price differential, 40·7 cents; and the Canadian price is 62 cents. With respect to cheese, Australia and New Zealand both have the same price, 21·2 cents per pound. In Canada the price is 32 cents per pound.

I have one more set of figures I should like to place on the record. These are supplied by the Department of Agriculture and they have to do with eggs. The figures quoted per dozen are the mid-September prices, 1952: Australia, 52·2 cents per dozen; Ireland, 54·2 cents per dozen; and Denmark 46·4 cents per dozen. Grade A large eggs were selling in Montreal at that time for 61 cents per dozen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it does not take much argument on my part to show that we cannot blast our way into such markets. Quite a famous Conservative leader some twenty years ago—

An hon. Member: What was his name?

Mr. Fulford: Well, we do not speak ill of the dead, and he was a great Canadian.

An hon. Member: We heard yesterday about the dead.

Mr. Fulford: It does not take much vision to see that it would not be to Canada's advantage at this time to try to blast our way into the agricultural markets of Great Britain with produce from the Canadian farms. One important thing that those opposite are always trying to say is that we are losing our markets and that we should have more markets in the United Kingdom. Well, we should have more markets in the United Kingdom, but it is an axiom of trade that in order to sell you have got to buy. It is a strange paradox that when we do purchase in quantity from the United Kingdom our friends opposite are the first to raise their voices in protest, and in particular I will mention the textile trade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulford: When we try to increase our trade there we are told that we should not do it and that we are destroying Canadian industry. I cannot imagine a more inconsistent policy.

Also, our friends opposite are wont to criticize. That is their privilege and, as a matter of fact, it is the duty of all opposition parties to criticize; but I feel that they leave uncriticized those things which should be criticized and they criticize those things which should be uncriticized and there is no wisdom in them.

We hear so much in this house and also in the press of Canada about our surpluses—surpluses which have created nothing short of phenomenal decreases in our public debt. These attacks on the surpluses are attacks on something for which the rest of the world admires and envies us, there is no doubt about that.

If the productive capacity of this country is such that it produces more revenue than can be anticipated when the budget is drawn up, then surely the Minister of Finance cannot be criticized but is to be complimented. Our policies are such that we are making Canada more prosperous, and Canada is more prosperous than could possibly have been originally anticipated. Had our gross national product fallen and had we shown annual deficits as are shown in practically all of the governments of the rest of the world, and had our national debt increased since the war, then our friends opposite would have had plenty to criticize and to criticize rightly. I can imagine the hue and cry that would have been set up. It would have drowned out every other noise in the land.

I would like to read now figures to show just how our national debt has decreased since the war and what the savings to the taxpayers of Canada are. In 1938, before world war II—and I am using the North American figure for billions—our national debt stood at $4,336 million. That increased during world war II to reach its high point in 1945 with a total of $17,479 million. By 1951 it had been reduced to $15,342 million, a reduction of more than $2 billion in six years. At the rate of interest we are now paying, the interest on $2 billion repaid in the last six years would have amounted to $1½ million per week, with which our national budget is no longer burdened. If we have to contemplate deficit spending in times of emergency most people would feel that we should reduce our outstanding obligations in times of prosperity.

Listening to our friends opposite and the press representatives in the country, one would imagine that we Liberals derive some sort of diabolical pleasure from raising taxes. Well, certainly, no one enjoys paying taxes. I am sure that cabinet ministers do not like taxes or paying them any more than private members of parliament, or party followers, or the public generally—or even that little fellow the Montreal Gazette depicts every day, a little fellow called "You know who". None of us like to pay taxes. I certainly have no reason personally to love the income tax but I am unlike—for those of you who saw the play "You can't take it with you"—Grandpa Vanderhoof, who asked the tax collector: "Why should I pay income taxes; what do I get out of it?" We realize that these taxes have to be paid in order to keep Canada in a sound financial position, and at the same time to meet the foreign obligations that we have contracted; to pay our share in trying to keep the world at peace, and in order to keep Soviet Russia from breaking its bonds, thereby throwing us all into the most terrible holocaust that human imagination could conceive. That is why taxes are high. Certainly, I would be the first to condemn any government that wilfully wasted taxes or wilfully raised them when they were not needed. To say that our taxes are destroying private industry is sheer nonsense.

Our expansion and development since the end of the war is advancing beyond our most exaggerated expectations. Canada is now considered the safest and best investment market in the world. Evidence of this is seen in the flood of United States dollars, Swiss francs and other hard currencies into our markets, making the Canadian dollar the highest in the world.

I should like to read an article which appeared in the Brockville Recorder and Times as early as September 30, 1952. It is entitled "The Economist"—that is the London Economist—"examines Canada's horizons." It reads as follows:

> The boom in Canada seems to have slackened temporarily. Taxes admittedly are high. There is some spotty unemployment, and the people of New Brunswick recently indicated in some measure their protest against Liberal fiscal policies. Seen from "inside" Canada the view of the future may be a trifle unclear. What of the view of Canada's future as seen from "outside"?
> The London Economist, one of Britain's most respected newspapers looked editorially at Canada's horizons, recently. In part, this is what the Economist saw: "Already occupied with a load of work that less vigorous countries might stretch over a generation, Canada has the faith, and professes to have the capacity to proceed with the gigantic St. Lawrence seaway scheme and to disregard Washington's refusal to participate."

"It would certainly be unwise to reach the conclusion that too much is being attempted too quickly. . . . The rise in both industrial and agricultural productivity since the war has been so astonishing that Canada may well be able to provide guns, factories and butter all at the same time."

Perhaps of even more interest to Canadians than this optimistic examination of Canada by the Economist is the principal reason which the London newspaper cites as being responsible for our situation today. The reason: "Canada is not merely favoured with abundant material resources. It has had the good sense—or the good luck—to provide itself with good government. Its economic affairs have been handled with a skill unexampled throughout the world. It has found in the short space of two or three years, a degree of self-confidence that is the proper mark of a country entering upon the early stages of economic maturity."

Here the Brockville Recorder inserts its own observations.

Here then is some pretty solid food for thought for those Canadians who cry "it's time for a change in Ottawa", but who don't know for sure just what the change would involve. Looking before leaping is sound practice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to agree with my hon. friend the member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), when he suggested that our friends opposite change their policies, their tactics and their leadership. Oh, no; I think that these same policies, tactics and leadership have done much for the cause of Liberalism in Canada. I know that the Liberals are satisfied with this government, and I am fairly confident that the majority of the people in Canada feel the same way. We must never allow ourselves to become complacent or self-satisfied. We must ever strive to improve our standard of living on the farm, in the factory, in the office and in the home. I feel that the speech from the throne contains much that points towards this goal.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): In discussing the speech from the throne this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal primarily with questions raised in that speech which are of particular interest to the Pacific coast. Since there are several of these subjects, I do not intend to take any time on preliminaries but rather to get right down to my criticisms and suggestions with regard to these questions which are of such importance to us on the west coast.

The first subject, of course, is that of the commonwealth conference now under way in England. In particular, we are interested in commonwealth trade. We hope, in fact we demand, that from this commonwealth conference there will come an improvement in commonwealth trade. It has always been of great importance to the west coast of Canada, and for many months now we have been looking forward to the conference hoping for favourable results. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun, published as long ago as July 14 of this year. It is entitled "Trade Revival Urgent." It opens with these words:

The coming meeting of commonwealth finance ministers in London will be momentous for Canada and this country's relations with its sister realms in the commonwealth.

Something must be done quickly to perk up trade both ways between Canada and Britain and other parts of the sterling area.

British Columbia is deeply concerned. We must regain our British market for lumber, fruit, salmon and other commodities.

The statements in that editorial are quite accurate. I propose to mention three of those commodities. First, I shall mention lumber. A few months ago one of our leading lumbermen said that the United Kingdom market for lumber is "B.C.'s old faithful." That, of course, is true. This year that market will be about 20 per cent lower than it was last year, and the same is expected to be the case for the Australian, New Zealand and South African lumber markets. I am told on good authority that it is likely that the Canadian west coast will export about 500 million feet less of lumber than was the case in the year 1951. In addition to the cuts in these exports, we are meeting increasing competition from the Baltic countries. That situation is becoming serious in each one of the markets to which I have referred.

We believe that the prospect for 1953 is no better. The word has come out that during that year the market for British Columbia lumber in the United Kingdom, for example, will be held down to about one half of the pre-war market. That, of course, is an extremely serious situation and it cannot be blamed in any way on the lumbermen themselves. They have first-class selling arrangements. I do not believe that there are any more efficient exporters in any line in Canada than the lumber exporters on the west coast.

So much for lumber. The situation with regard to canned salmon is also extremely serious. Last summer our warehouses were full of canned salmon from the 1951 pack. Since then there has been the 1952 pack, and we are completely out of the United Kingdom market. In 1950 and 1951 that market purchased over $6 million worth of canned salmon, but in 1952 it is purchasing nothing at all.

I have before me the annual report of our largest fishing company, namely British Columbia Packers, Limited. It is dated July 11 of this year, and we find this reference by the president to the prospects for exporting canned salmon:

The combination of a near record pack of canned salmon in the 1951 season and a very much reduced marketing area has created a difficult sales problem. There has been further impairment in the dollar exchange position of such important former markets as South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. All these countries still prohibit the import of British Columbia salmon. Recently an even greater blow was received when the British Ministry of Food reluctantly advised that it would be unable to purchase canned salmon from the 1952 pack. This important buyer has constituted the largest single export outlet for canned salmon over the past three years, having taken from the industry 410,000 cases in 1949, 227,000 cases in 1950 and 290,000 cases in 1951.

Concerning the loss of the United Kingdom market for salmon, resolutions have also been passed by the Vancouver, New Westminster and district trades and labour council, a responsible body in our province. The same position has been taken by the fisheries council of Canada. They are a nation-wide organization with headquarters in Ottawa. In their publication of October 3 I find these words:

We hear about the 40 million pounds of canned pork now on hand—but there is more canned salmon and canned sardines looking for a market right now than there is canned pork . . .

The Canadian fishing industry has always been dependent to a large extent on its export market. What has happened to many of these markets is now an old story—lack of dollars on the part of our old customers. With government assuming steadily increasing responsibility for international trade, the industry has no alternative but to look to government for assistance in the solution of these problems.

Then the report goes on:

It is to be hoped that the Canadian government realizes fully the gravity of the present situation. Something must be done to restore our traditional markets if the fishing industry is to continue to provide a livelihood for the numbers of persons now dependent on it.

I believe that the fishing industry has asked the government for help similar to that given to the pork producer.

Then our other British Columbia product which is in great trouble having regard to commonwealth markets is the apple. We have been shut out of all the commonwealth markets for apples.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore the smugness of the government on this question of commonwealth trade. During the last election in 1949 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce made a speech in Vancouver and he blurted out this statement in the middle of his speech.

Mr. Howe: I never blurt. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not blurt.

Mr. Green: The minister says "I never blurt." I say that he does.

Mr. Howe: Why does the hon. member not be a gentleman and say "the minister said"?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: All right. The minister said:

Anyone who suggests we are losing our British markets is talking nonsense.

Mr. Howe: Right.

Mr. Green: He says "right" today, and he still feels the same way. I say that he is too smug. That is what is the trouble with him in connection with that subject.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member is expressing my views as to himself.

Mr. Green: I did not hear that remark. Just a few months ago in this very house we had a resolution introduced by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) which suggested as follows:

. . . that the government should consider the advisability of taking steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth to seek means by which there may be convertibility of commonwealth currencies and to explore all the possibilities for restoring and enlarging those traditional markets upon which our prosperity so largely depends.

That resolution was, of course, voted down by the government majority in this house. Then this fall the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) came to Vancouver and made a speech. He did some blurting as well. In that speech he advised us to produce more and to be more efficient and thus all our problems would be solved. I have here an article written, shortly after that speech, by Roy W. Brown, who without a doubt is the dean of our newspaper editorial writers. It is headed "B.C. Merely First to Suffer"; "Abbott Overlooked Dropping Exports"; and Mr. Brown had this to say:

Hon. Douglas Abbott's clear and excellent speech in Vancouver Monday did not bring much satisfaction to leading businessmen of Vancouver who are exporters of natural products.

Mr. Abbott admitted the problem posed against timber and salmon shipments contained in the exchange premium, but his smug comment did not promise relief.

Instead, he offered some advice, oft-repeated during recent months by learned Easterners to the effect that "this means that efficiency and low net cost of production are vital to your prosperity."

It has come to be the fashion to direct not a little of what one may call high-class kidding to the B.C. manufacturing scene. Actually, what it seems to boil down to is that because our labour costs are higher than in centres on the Atlantic coast, then we must therefore be inefficient. I challenge this as incorrect and altogether a wrong picture.

Real efficiency has reached a high pitch, especially in most of the top operations in B.C. timber and fishing. What we are really suffering from is a restriction of markets.

In the loss of markets, we are just feeling the pinch about a year or 15 months sooner than central Canada.

That article appeared in the Vancouver Sun which is a supporter of this government; and just about two weeks ago the Sun had a final comment concerning this particular situation and the attitude of the government to it, which is as follows. I am now reading from the issue of November 15:

> To British Columbia producers at the moment the stirring challenge of Mr. Abbott to produce more has a slightly hollow ring because the producers of this province face shrinking markets for their most important primary product, lumber, and for other things beside. To pleas for help in opening new markets or for bolstering the old, weakening markets, the government—if not deaf—is at least seemingly indifferent.

I regret that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not at this commonwealth conference. He should be there. Even though it would have been necessary to withhold the calling of this session until after the new year, our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) should have been at that commonwealth conference.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the criticism contained in the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) with regard to this question is more than justified when he regrets the failure of the government—> —to take any effective steps to regain the commonwealth markets for food and other products upon which the prosperity of our farmers and other basic producers so directly depends.

I repeat, on this question, that this commonwealth conference must find a way to improve commonwealth trade.

On the west coast we hope also that the commonwealth conference will take steps to promote increased co-operation between the freedom-loving nations of the Pacific area. The conference is in a splendid position to give such leadership because, in the first place, seven of the eight commonwealth nations have vital interests in the Pacific. The only one which has not is South Africa. In the second place, the association of these seven commonwealth nations constitutes the best bridge there is between the east and the west.

At the present time there is no broad plan for maintaining peace in the Pacific area as there is in the Atlantic, and indeed in the Mediterranean areas, by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In the Pacific we have a series of treaties between the United States and other countries. There is one treaty between the United States and Japan; another between the United States and the Philippines; another between the United States, Australia and New Zealand. It is strange, but apparently Canada and the United Kingdom are not welcomed to this treaty between the United States, Australia and New Zealand, known as ANZUS; we are being shouldered out of that treaty, and so is the United Kingdom, although our two countries are the ones which have the largest number of troops fighting in the Pacific, with the exception of the United States.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Pacific should not be considered a United States lake. With the new government of the United States obviously placing greater importance on the Pacific area than did the Truman administration, now is the time for the nations of the commonwealth to try to work out with the United States a general plan for security in the Pacific area.

Reference is made in the speech from the throne also to Vancouver harbour. We are told that there are to be certain improvements and engineering studies. Naturally I approve of that proposal. I would point out, however, that in addition to improvements in the harbour there must also be additional modern docking facilities. With regard to the harbour itself, there are two jobs to be done. I want to make sure that that distinction is kept in mind by the ministers who are responsible. There is the larger job, which is the widening of the channel of the first and second narrows and the reduction of the current. That particular work will require study. I think it is very wise to have a model set up to work out the best plan. It will take time, and it will be expensive.

But there is a smaller and more urgent job to be done in Vancouver harbour, namely, the deepening of the present channel in the first narrows. I am told, by the people in Vancouver who know, that this does not require study; that there is already a plan; in fact that there has been a plan for over forty years, and that in deepening the first narrows channel there would be very little change made in the current, so that there is no reason why that work should have to wait for a model. Time is pressing on this work because we have now a problem with oil tankers. Some of the tankers are waiting outside the harbour, and coming in at high tide. The channel is deep enough for those present tankers, but even now there is that difficulty, and when the oil pipe line reaches Vancouver, which we hope will be in 1954, it is expected that much larger tankers will be coming into the harbour, and there will be trouble with them, unless the first narrows is deepened to 40 feet.

We are worried now for fear failure to deepen the harbour entrance may result in most of the oil going down to the Washington state coast rather than coming to Vancouver. Therefore I urge upon the Minister of Public Works, and his associates in the government, that they put in a supplementary estimate for the present year, 1952-53, so that a start can be made after the new year on the deepening of the first narrows channel.

In addition to being Canada's great seaport on the Pacific, Vancouver is also Canada's great Pacific air terminus. It serves over half the people of the province, because over half the population of British Columbia is in greater Vancouver. There are lines running out across the Pacific, to the south and up the coast, and of course to the east across Canada. In a short time we shall have a line from Vancouver to South America. Our airport is one of the great airports of Canada, and yet the approach is a disgrace. It is across the north arm of the Fraser river by a low level bridge known as Marpole bridge. This bridge opens many times a day. I was held up there myself just two weeks ago tomorrow by a very small tug pulling a scow of sawdust. I cannot imagine such a situation existing on the road to the Dorval or Malton airports. In fact I know that at either of those airports such a condition would have been done away with many years ago. We ask that similar steps be taken in Vancouver now.

Then there has been haggling about the purchase of the airport. The government has offered $900,000. The city is asking $1,287,000. In other words, they are less than $400,000 apart, yet they have reached an impasse and apparently nothing can be done. I suggest there should be further steps to settle it. The purchase price paid by the dominion is to be turned over to be applied on a new Marpole bridge anyway. The provincial government is ready to help with this bridge, and all that is necessary is for the dominion to take a lead in the project. This government should look at the broad picture of Vancouver as Canada's great terminus and outlet on the Pacific.

In the speech from the throne reference is also made to studies of possible improvements to navigation on the Pacific coast. On our coast there has been a great increase in shipping. I need only remind hon. members of the construction going on at Kitimat, of the growth of Prince Rupert and of the developments in Alaska. There is far more shipping on that coast now than there has ever been before. Furthermore, with radar, the ships are expected to run regardless of fog. In many cases in earlier days they would have tied up; now, the ship owners expect the officers to keep the ships in operation, and I may say that we have as fine a group of ships' officers on our coast as can be found anywhere in this country.

During the last few months there have been some serious accidents. About a year ago the Princess Kathleen and the Prince Rupert collided in a fog. The radar was not in operation at the time. Then this summer the Princess Kathleen, which was the flagship of the Canadian Pacific, was sunk a short distance out of Skagway. There again the radar was not in operation at the time of the accident. Later on in the summer the Prince George very nearly ran aground but was saved by splendid seamanship. In this case the radar had gone out of commission during the run to the north and as there were no facilities at Prince Rupert for repairing it the ship was being operated without radar.

I am told that there is urgent need on the west coast for further aids to navigation. I believe that if there had been a fog signal at the point where the Prince George nearly ran aground that trouble would have been averted.

A decision must be made by the Department of Transport with regard to the use of radar. The court of inquiry which inquired into the collision last year between the Princess Kathleen and the Prince Rupert recommended that the use of radar should be compulsory and that training in its use should also be made compulsory. That was not done although a voluntary scheme was set up for training officers in the use of radar. With these accidents behind us it becomes essential that the Department of Transport make up its mind as to what provisions it will make for the use of radar and also whether or not wireless operators must be carried. In recent years there has been a relaxation of the regulations governing the use of wireless and I believe the government should make provision on both these points at this session.

Then steps should be taken to remove Ripple rock. This has become more or less a joke in the house. When anyone mentions Ripple rock the rest of the house laugh, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) laughs, and that is all there is to it. In the meantime the rock remains. The people on the west coast are becoming increasingly annoyed that the Department of Public Works seem to have neither the energy nor the vision to do something about this rock. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun in which they suggest a commission to deal with Ripple rock. The editorial is rather harsh on the Minister of Public Works, the first paragraph reading as follows:

> Federal works minister Fournier's admission of defeat in the removal of Ripple rock is a disgrace to Canadian engineers and contractors.

The last paragraph reads:

> The time has come for Mr. Fournier to stand aside. He's thrown up his hands in defeat and disgrace. Let him set up a commission to handle the job. B.C. members of parliament should demand that he do so.

I would not be that hard on my good friend, the Minister of Public Works, because I realize this will be a most difficult job. But I repeat that some attempt should be made immediately to deal with this menace.

There have also been serious complaints in British Columbia in connection with the Department of Defence Production. One of the senior officers of this department, the director of the small industries division, Mr. F. W. Hore, went out to Vancouver in July and was reported as saying that British Columbia defence orders were then at a maximum and that no increase in defence orders for British Columbia was in sight. I should like to quote from the Vancouver Province of July 22 as follows:

No increase in defence orders is in sight for British Columbia, though B.C.'s "share" is admittedly less than the rest of Canada, according to F. W. Hore, director of small industries division, Department of Defence Production, Ottawa.

Mr. Hore, who is here consulting with manufacturers and suppliers, said that British Columbia's $29,000,000 shipbuilding contracts are the only big arms manufacturing B.C. can expect. "Higher labour rates more than anything else" put B.C. at a fatal disadvantage with eastern Canadian plants, and the freight to destination is the second major factor working against the coast, said Mr. Hore.

In other words, we are losing out because we are paying adequate wages and because we happen to be too far away from Ottawa. I believe that in some cases these goods have to be shipped to Ottawa and then distributed from Ottawa to the different centres across the country. That is an unfair situation. We should not be penalized for either of those reasons.

A firm known as Canadian Mobile Company tendered last summer on some forklift trucks. They are the only firm in Canada making this equipment. They do business with the trade in the east in the ordinary way but lost this government contract; it meant that fifty employees were laid off. The union took up the matter; in fact it was through the union that I heard of the trouble. I wrote to the deputy minister of defence production and discovered that this equipment had been purchased from a United States firm.

It is true that the price was about $1,000 less per unit but when one takes into consideration that about $500 would have been paid to the Canadian National for transporting each piece of equipment, that the discount on the United States dollar made a further difference of $300 per unit, and that the government would lose corporation taxes from the company and income tax from the men in addition to having to pay unemployment insurance, it would appear that in the long run the government lost out by placing this contract in the United States. I suggest that the minister look into this matter. The deputy minister replied to me as follows:

On the question of securing defence items from American sources, Mr. Howe has often mentioned in the house the importance of our trade with the United States, particularly in view of the very close co-operation that exists between our two countries on all matters pertaining to defence.

That is not a very satisfactory answer to fifty men who have been thrown out of work because a defence production contract has gone to the United States. Later on in the summer this same company lost out again because a tender actually called for United States equipment.

Further trouble is caused through the notices of tenders not being received sufficiently early to permit firms to tender. For example, tenders were called for the construction of wooden ships and I am informed that firms on the coast received these only one day before the tenders had to be submitted. As a result it was impossible for them to submit tenders. That may not be accurate, but it is the report I have received and I hope that the minister will look into it.

This department has very wide control over industry and can influence business both now and for the future. I believe that great care should be taken by the department to see that firms in the more distant parts of the country receive their fair share of the contracts.

There is also much annoyance on the west coast with respect to television. There is quite a long reference to this subject in the speech from the throne, and apparently it is to be the fate of the people of Vancouver not to be able to have Canadian television until a station is built there by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I do not know how long that will be, perhaps a year, two years or even longer. Vancouver is told to wait for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and even then there can be no competition from any Canadian private station. We already have a great many television sets in operation in Vancouver, and the owners of these sets are watching United States privately-sponsored television. Just last week a television record was made of the opening of parliament and we had the four youngest, most handsome and promising ministers in the cabinet, although I understand they needed grease paint even at that, in television.

Mr. Graydon: Where were you, Jimmy?

Mr. Green: The Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) was not in it.

Mr. Graydon: I am talking about the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann).

Mr. Green: How do you suppose the people of Vancouver saw the television show of these four ministers? They saw it last Thursday night over station KING in Seattle.

Mr. Gibson: Free enterprise.

Mr. McCann: How did they look?

Mr. Green: That is a ridiculous situation. The new government policy on television means that Vancouver people will be able to tune in privately-owned television stations in Washington state but not privately-owned Canadian stations although there are several Canadian firms anxious to build television stations in Vancouver. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to have competition for listeners anyway from the United States. Why not let private Canadian stations enter the field? I must tell the minister that there is very bitter criticism of this policy on the west coast by the press of all parties and particularly in the press which supports the Liberal party. This policy should be reconsidered. I do not believe it is good enough for the west coast in the year 1952.

Finally, I should like to deal with the reference in the speech from the throne to the veterans of Canada. I deal with them last not because that is the least important subject in the speech from the throne but because this problem is nearest to my own heart. We find the following reference to veterans:

> A bill designed to provide greater educational opportunities for children whose fathers died as the result of war service will be placed before you.

I heartily approve of that plan. It is long overdue. Many of us have been pressing for it for some years and so have the great veterans organizations of Canada. I only hope the measure will be a broad one. There is also a reference to a bill to continue the benefits of the Veterans Benefit Act for another year. Everyone will be in favour of that measure. I regret, however, that there is no reference whatever to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Amendments were made to that legislation at the earlier session this year but there was great dissatisfaction with them on the west coast. Hon. members will recall that the amount of the allowance was increased to $50 for a single veteran and to $90 for a married veteran although the veterans organizations had asked for $60 for a single veteran and $120 for a married veteran. Furthermore the total permissive income of a single veteran for a year was raised to $720 and for a married veteran to $1,200. That meant that over and above his war veterans allowance a veteran, whether single or married, could only receive by way of a small pension or additional earnings $120 a year or $10 a month. Before this amendment was made the figures had been $125 for a single veteran and $250 for a married man. Even under the Old Age Assistance Act the ceiling is $240 a year over the amount of the assistance. There is obvious discrimination here against veterans who were front-line troops.

Last session the special committee recommended that the government should give further consideration to the recommendations of the veterans organizations and particularly with respect to permissive income. I had hoped that there would be some mention in the speech from the throne of further amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and perhaps it is even yet not too late for the government to introduce such amendments. I cannot urge too strongly the need of making further improvements to this act.

There is a tendency growing up in the country, Mr. Speaker, to treat these veterans as welfare cases. Apparently some departments of the government are trying to get the veteran on the same basis as the recipient of welfare assistance. So far as the newer veterans are concerned, I have been disappointed to find in recent weeks that in Vancouver Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which administers houses rented to veterans, is considered by the authorities to be more hard-boiled than civilian landlords when it comes to evicting tenants. There is no excuse for an official attitude of that kind. There is something wrong with the approach to the problems of these veterans, and it is well illustrated by a pamphlet put out by the Department of Veterans Affairs after the last session entitled, "A message to older veterans, employment and war veterans allowance". In it we find these suggestions to the older veterans under the heading, "A few personal pointers":

> Keep your hair neatly trimmed, boots clean, and, so far as your circumstances will permit your clothing neat and clean. Your hands and nails should be tidy. You should not enter the office with a cigarette in your mouth or smoke during the interview unless the interviewer offers you a cigarette. Do not attempt to shake hands unless the employer makes the first gesture. Do not rush into his office; walk forward easily and confidently. Don't sprawl in the chair or sit with feet and legs wide apart. Because a man's name is very important to him, be sure that you have previously inquired—even if it be from a member of the outside staff—what the executive's name is, and then greet him with a courteous "good morning" or "how do you do, Mr. Jones."

That pamphlet is an insult to the fighting men of Canada who are entitled to the war veterans allowance. Nothing could be more calculated to wound the spirit of these gallant Canadians. I suggest that anything they get from the Canadian government is not a handout but only partial payment for services rendered. There is an obligation of this parliament to these men which I, for one, do not propose to see forgotten.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, if I make my first remarks in French, it is because I like to hear the walls of this house echo once in a while to the tongue of Racine and Corneille, and also because, during the provincial election held last summer in Quebec, there were increasing complaints of encroachments. I heard such indignant denunciations of the so-called federal encroachments upon provincial rights that I made a point to say in this house that, in spite of these alleged encroachments—exaggerated, magnified and multiplied at pleasure by those who complain about them—we still speak French in the province of Quebec, we still keep the same religious belief and we go on hoping that we will always speak this beautiful language.

May I now be permitted to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who so brilliantly accomplished their task. In choosing them to move and second the address, the government has honoured not only those two members, but also their respective constituencies and those who have recognized their merits by sending them to the House of Commons.

In this year 1952, my thoughts inevitably and unconsciously go back to the Quebec legislature where I had the honour of sitting for the first time on October 31, 1927, as member for Portneuf county. I have therefore been a member of the provincial legislature or of this deliberating assembly for twenty-five years. The other day I was happy to see my friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), celebrate the 28th anniversary of his election to the House of Commons. If my memory serves me right, it was the hon. member for Temiscouata who sent me the first letter of congratulations following my election as representative of Portneuf county in the provincial assembly.

I also have other congratulations to offer, Mr. Speaker, and this time they go to the government. Some of my colleagues may know why I want to do so. It is quite simple. I wish to congratulate the government on not having opposed the admission of Spain to UNESCO. As you know, for several years now I have spoken here, in this house and in the committee on external affairs, in favour of the admission of Spain to the United Nations. I have brought up this subject more than once and attempted to be as objective as possible. I had been sent to Europe by my municipality, on the occasion of the Holy Year. While there I thought it would be a good idea to investigate conditions on the spot and I spent a week in and around Madrid—which is not very long, admittedly—in order to find out whether Spain was as fascist as its opponents make it out to be.

I had been told, by the way, that I should not bring any camera with me since it would be confiscated. Still I took every picture I wanted of interesting landscapes; I even took pictures of public buildings such as the civic building in Madrid and the building which houses Franco's external affairs department, and nobody, no policeman, ever came around to ask me what I was doing. Consequently this propaganda about everything being the same in Spain as behind the iron curtain is absolutely misleading.

In any case, if Spain has not been admitted to the United Nations up to now, if there has been delay in recognizing that this country is probably the most unsurmountable obstacle in the way of communism, it is because well organized, well directed propaganda, amplified even at various meetings of the United Nations, has served to conceal that country's real worth.

Through skilful propaganda, the Franco government was criticized for its attitude towards so-called heroes who it is claimed fought in the French maquis for the liberation of France. I have made serious research on the subject and, with the help of official documents, I found that these so-called heroes were born in the very fertile imagination of the communists who had spread all over the world this false propaganda. Hence, there is no reason whatever why Spain should not have been admitted to the United Nations, to UNESCO or to other international organizations long before today.

In any event, I wish to congratulate the Canadian government for not having objected to the admission of Spain to UNESCO; I hope that the veil will vanish more and more and that the door will open as wide as ever, so that Spain may some day take her rightful place in the United Nations as well as in all organizations which are concerned with the welfare of the world generally.

I listened with great attention the other day—as I always do in any case—to the speech of my friend the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche), who spoke of Mr. Henri Bourassa, the great Canadian orator.

I agree with most of his laudatory remarks about that great Canadian. He was one of our best French-Canadian speakers, a fighter who fought almost until his death. In some debates, I would say that he was ferociously energetic. He made mistakes like any other human being, but I believe that history will place Mr. Henri Bourassa among the great men of our country.

He made several prophetic utterances in the House of Commons. I remember that at the time of the constitutional crisis in our parliament around 1926, Mr. Henri Bourassa was among the first to support Mr. Mackenzie King's suggestion that the Canadian people should be asked whether the Canadian constitution was binding or whether it could be disregarded according to some official's will or passing fancy. Needless to say, I do not agree with all the hon. member for Labelle said, especially about the C.B.C.

I know that, up to a certain point, the C.B.C. is a government enterprise. He spoke of monopoly and, once he got steamed up for a great electoral speech, he thoughtlessly used the word "socialism" which is so often uttered by our opponents when they try to link the socialist party with the Liberal party. That is their business, but one must remember that words have a meaning and that they should not be used at random about this and that.

I feel that radio broadcasting is too important a matter to entrust it to anyone at all. Neither private enterprise nor anyone else has the right to say that such and such a program is good or not so good or even bad for the public. I know that some officials of the C.B.C. may have let some things go by that we did not like and that we would not like to hear again. Along with my colleague from Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), who is a member of the radio broadcasting committee, I have protested against the broadcasting of certain talks by Bertrand Russell, Anna Freud, and others, because we believed that the ideas expressed by these speakers should not be fed indiscriminately to the public without being subjected to a certain control. Indeed we did not share their opinion, which were often erroneous. But we must not overlook the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a man-controlled institution, as are the private stations, and as such can make mistakes. I repeat radio broadcasting is too important to leave it to the public at large to decide whether or not a program is acceptable. Therefore, I also feel that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be maintained in order that a certain control may be exercised over radio broadcasting. I understand that certain private stations, the majority of them perhaps, may not take a favourable view of control exercised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) in his remarks. He is right in saying that they are not allowed to operate networks. Moreover, were we to ask them to contribute to the maintenance of a national network from one end of the country to the other, the private stations would oppose these suggestions, precisely because they are commercial undertakings first and foremost. The operation of such a network would not be profitable, far from it. On the other hand the C.B.C., thanks to the state subsidies it receives, can operate two national networks and relay to the farthest corners of this country—and goodness knows we have a large country—programs which are quite acceptable to the people as a whole. Private stations would never dare to do so, for financial reasons.

On the other hand, private stations are allowed to have regional stations. As a matter of fact, when listening to CKAC, I often turn to another station when reception is poor, to get the same broadcast over another station. This advantage is due to the fact that private stations are allowed regional affiliates. But to imply that the C.B.C. operates a state monopoly and that it is tainted with socialism—after all one must know the meaning of words. I understand that, politically speaking, the word "socialism" uttered during an election battle or through the new loudspeakers of the House of Commons, may serve to diminish one's opponent in the eyes of the public. But you will admit that there is a difference between the C.B.C. monopoly and socialism. Furthermore, even if private stations enjoyed such complete freedom as the one advocated by the member, there would still be the danger which existed in the past.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to embark upon a too deep and too wide philosophical explanation, but I still say that the hon. member wants to go too far to the right and that he will eventually sink into economic liberalism. Of course, economic liberalism cannot be compared to the Liberal party doctrine, for everyone knows to what extent the former has been harmful to democracies. It is fortunate that the Liberal party doctrine in Canada is excellent. Its definition differs widely from that of economic liberalism, and I believe it is worth remembering because it is quite applicable to the present Liberal policy—it is the progressive attainment of our civil, social, individual, political, economic, and religious freedoms, all of them based upon a moral law. Such are the ideals of the Canadian Liberal party, ideals which deserve to be encouraged.

If, on the contrary, we afforded to anybody with talent, anybody in a favourable position, anybody with connections, anybody with certain financial advantages, the opportunity of making all the money he could, so that eventually a small group of men would control all the wealth of the world, that would be a return to economic liberalism, and then man would become a mere economic creature, striving to make money and benefit therefrom. Those are not the ideals of the Canadian Liberal party. In fact, I don't have to stress that fact since one has only to recall the social legislation the Canadian parliament has enacted, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowances, and many more, to find the Liberal doctrine in Canada is very good.

Moreover, may I say to my hon. friend that those who lean too much to the right—to use a word which illustrates well what I have in mind—are bound to sink into economic liberalism which is very different from what is called "Canadian liberalism"; that those who tried to link "Canadian liberalism" with historical liberalism, condemned by the church, in a word, those who lean too much towards historical liberalism become inevitably engulfed in monopolistic capitalism. And monopolistic capitalism—whether my friend believes it or not—allowed Marx, on the strength of a theory on economic liberalism expounded by an English economist, to bring about class struggle after transposing a synthesis of that theory. Then, when the chosen, as they were called at that time, were to be the ones entitled to make money, because of their intellectual superiority, Marx transposed the theory and instigated class struggle. Today, the proletarian class and not capitalism comes first. He merely transposed a theory.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, monopolistic capitalism has of course given false ideals to all who have been disappointed, who have had a hard time to make a living, to all who have had to work harder and who were in difficult conditions. Contrary to those who believe that a depression gives birth to communism, I say that a depression fosters communism but does not bring it about. Communism is born of something more remote, deeper. It is a muddle of the theories of Hegel: the contradiction in ideas. It comes also from the materialism of Fuerbach and of a Frenchman, Proudhon, who had lent Marx his theory on the class struggle. The errors of historical liberalism have been taken over by Marx and transformed by him; that is where he found his inspiration. He claimed that it was now the turn of the workers, instead of a small fortunate group, to take advantage of conditions. Unfortunately Marx went too far. Instead of the unfortunate class being the only one to gain by it, he created another group, that of the bureaucrats. The group of bureaucrats I speak of is not at all like the one we have in Canada. There is no comparison between the two.

This group of bureaucrats consists of one and a half million people, who control a population of 235 million people; they have all the opportunities and the means to acquire wealth, food, clothes, beautiful cars, and so on.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, my words may seem remote from the matter of the C.B.C. But it would be a shame if we succeeded in getting out of difficulties brought about by abuses only to be faced with new ones.

I would now like to discuss the C.B.C. broadcasts to our most remote regions. I am not always able to share my hon. friend's opinion; to my mind, his speech has been most interesting; but I shall not go as far as to say that we should abolish the C.B.C. monopoly. I doubt whether it would be wise, for I am confident that the C.B.C. controls programs more efficiently than private stations would and sees to it that the Canadian people get first rate broadcasts. Besides, if this monopoly is so detrimental to private stations, how is it that more than 80 of these out of 110 are linked with the C.B.C., and relay its programs? I believe private stations benefit from this situation, financially at least.

The other day, at the opening of a station in Saskatchewan, several speeches were made. One of the directors of the C.B.C., Mr. Adrien Pouliot, and another, spoke. They congratulated all who had worked for years to get French broadcasting in the west. It should be recognized also that the C.B.C. affords to private stations, and particularly French language stations, certain advantages.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who expressed the opinion that the speech read by the Governor General should be read one year in French and the next year in English. Let me mention as an example, Mr. Speaker, the prayer which is alternately recited in the two languages, in French one day and in English the next. May I say that we are in a country with two cultures and two official languages, even though our constitution does not entirely recognize them as such. However, everybody admits the existence of two official languages. Furthermore, I would not deny the hon. member for Fort William who is very broad-minded and who undoubtedly recognizes the existence of two cultures in Canada, I would not deny him, I repeat, for a whole year the pleasure of hearing the present speech in French and he would not likewise deny me the pleasure of hearing the same speech in English. Therefore, I believe that the speech from the throne must be read immediately in French and in English instead of being read first in one language and then in the other language a year later. That is my opinion.

I have listened very carefully to the speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The hon. member also believes in a bicultural Canada; he has often enough expressed himself in French in the house. I offer him my congratulations. However, it seems to me that his words exceeded his thoughts when he criticized the government with regard to an alleged scandal in the purchase of neckties—which we ordinarily call "faux cols" in Canada—as well as the purchase of serving forks and of a great quantity of soldiers' footwear. Reference was also made, in the Quebec legislature, to the speech made by the hon. member for Eglinton. Indeed, a minister cried out: "What about the million neckties?" On certain lips, on those of some members of the Union Nationale, for instance, the word "million" sounds queer. They throw it at you with disconcerting ease, cheerfully, as the hon. member for Beauharnois would say. What about the million neckties? Well, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) dealt with this point the other day, and I believe he said just what ought to have been said. What he told was the truth. Besides, there is no point in gloating over it. I notice the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) is smiling. We must believe what the Minister of National Defence said, we must take his word because he is a member of this house and a minister of the crown. Last week end a veteran came up to me and said: "Pierre, what's the matter with our Conservative friends and why do they talk about scandals concerning ties, shoes, and serving forks?" Do they think that because we are soldiers we do not need two, three or four ties every year? Do they think that because we are soldiers we do not need shoes and serving forks? The federal government and the Department of National Defence have to provide for the needs of servicemen, for their clothes and their shoes, as these gentlemen provide for their own needs.

Mr. Speaker, I am a poor man, but I have to buy five or six ties every year. Our soldiers need four or five neckties every year. Furthermore, we are aware that they work hard and are ready at any time to risk their lives to protect our freedom. This veteran told me that they were going too far, that they should worry about more important matters, about savings which would really be of interest to all Canadian taxpayers.

That reminds me of a fact. When I was a member of the legislative assembly I often read the debates of the House of Commons. At that time, the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who represented Quebec East, was also minister of justice. Mr. Meighen or Mr. Bennett, one of them or perhaps both, I do not recall correctly, was speaking of an alleged scandal. The Hon. Mr. Lapointe told him: "You act in a petty way about important things and take unimportant matters too seriously." As you can see it is always dangerous to discuss certain little scandals which actually are not scandalous at all.

I know that such things are bound to surprise. The other day I read a newspaper clipping which one of my electors had sent me. The item was captioned: "Why should I vote for the Liberals?" It seems that a member of the provincial legislature was going about the province of Quebec repeating after his minister: "Tell us more about neckties." He repeated those words every time he made a speech. Then, one of my constituents queried: "Why vote Liberal?" And I understand that he considered this as an abominable scandal. Now, I sent him part of the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) dealing with this question of ties and serving forks and I hope, knowing that man as I do—he is truly unbiased—that he will return that press report and say: "Now, I know why I should vote Liberal. It is because the Liberal party is serious while the Tories are not." That is all I wanted to say about the small scandal alleged against the Liberal party which has been amplified, inflated and multiplied at pleasure by different speakers, especially those of the Conservative "Union Nationale" in our district.

Moreover, since an agreement was entered into by the province of Ontario and the federal government, those who enjoy harping on the constitution and the question of autonomy now feel uneasy since they have found out that Mr. Frost is not, after all, so disappointed in the fiscal arrangement he has entered into with the federal government. Now, in this connection here is a British United Press dispatch published in the Action Catholique of October 21, 1952. These, by the way, are Mr. Frost's exact words:

He added that in this connection Ontario had sacrificed nothing of its constitutional rights.

This is clear; this is a trustworthy paper, one which is often quoted by our opponents.

I have kept this British United Press dispatch in order to show it to my friends. I tell those who are afraid, those who are fainthearted, that Mr. Frost, in concluding this arrangement with the federal government, has sacrificed none of his province's constitutional rights.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I carried my investigation a little further. I am not a lawyer and, consequently, I must work harder. I must be careful not to make a legal heresy, but I found in a book dealing with the Canadian constitution that in the Quebec resolutions, before the federal pact became an accomplished fact, and especially in the resolutions of October 10, 1864, in section 29, paragraph 5, the following provision:

That the raising of money by all or any other modes or systems of taxation belongs to the federal . . .

And in the London resolutions of December 1866, section 28, paragraph 3, the same facility is granted the federal government. Moreover, I think the other day, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned the fact that the federal government had the right to levy funds by all modes or systems of taxation. I know that my hon. friends say and repeat unceasingly that provinces have exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of direct taxation. But, Mr. Speaker, I know that when someone speaks about income tax, everybody wants to add his word. I admit that I do not like it more than anyone else. I have to pay it like everybody else. We have to do so at the present time owing to the social security legislation we enacted for the benefit of our people and owing to the enormous national defence program we have undertaken. The people of our country cannot cease to contribute, by way of taxes, to those two programs. I am confident that the Liberal government would hasten to lower income taxes if the war in Korea had come to an end. Our opponents say that our country is badly run, that the Liberal administration should be replaced; we need a change, as they say not infrequently, using a slogan which was used profusely in connection with the election of General Eisenhower in the United States. And yet, the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) discussed that subject the other day. He told them what was the change he advocated; it seems to me they should have caught on. I must add that certain countries, our neighbours in particular, are keeping an eye on us.

I read in a special dispatch to the Star dated June 10, 1952, that the Americans are all flabbergasted at the masterly manner in which we manage our political economy, so as to make a success of it. The dispatch is headed:

(Text):

Oh, Canada, how do you do it?
Dollar upset humiliating—N.Y.

Referring to the fact that the Canadian dollar is now worth more than the United States dollar as a "humiliating upset" the Daily News of New York today asks if the Truman administration might not learn a useful lesson from this and other facts about the Canadian economy.

We move that Truman and company send a commission to Ottawa to find out more—much more—about how Canada does it. This would involve a feat of pride-pocketing of which, frankly, we don't think the fair dealers are capable. But it would also dig up a barrel of useful tips and information which the people of the United States badly need. What ho, Harry?

(Translation):

So you see for yourself what numerous contradictory assertions our adversaries are guilty of—in spite of themselves, however, for they notice them only long after they have been uttered, after a more or less protracted period of gestation. It seems to me that they should delve into the past and ask themselves why, all things considered, they have not won the support of the people of Quebec which, as a political party, they were entitled to expect.

I have before me an article taken from Le Droit, explaining why the Conservative party has failed to secure the support they had hoped to gain from Quebec. This article was written on May 1, 1952, by Mr. Georges Henri Dagneau who is not an employee of the Liberal government, I am sure.

It is well known, that one of the main reasons—

He is speaking about the blundering of the Conservatives and the little support they are gaining in the province of Quebec.

It is well known, that one of the main reasons for this situation may be found in the lack of know-how, which the federal Conservative party shows by invariably taking an attitude which alienates Quebec. The present session—

That is, the last session.

—supplies three instances: First of all, when Massey was nominated to the post of Governor General, the leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Drew, kept silent in a clearly reproving manner, while some of his lieutenants vented vigorous diatribes; soon after the federal government had announced its bill granting aid to universities, the C.C.F. party emphasized its demands in favour of subsidies for primary and secondary education, and the Conservatives took this opportunity to join the latter, after fifteen years of fighting the C.C.F. as well as the Liberals; finally they acted in quite the same way with regard to divorce; the Conservative members supported the C.C.F. motion.

That is, the resolution sponsored by Mr. Knight.

There we have a reliable newspaperman, well known in Quebec, giving the reasons why the Conservative party should change its attitude, or at least its policies, not only with regard to Quebec, but with regard to the whole of Canada. And I say that our friends opposite should not speak one way in Quebec and another way in the other provinces.

I remember one famous election, and my hon. friend knows what I am talking about, because he speaks French now and understands it, but I will speak in English. (Text):

I was in Roberval that afternoon when the chief of the Conservative party spoke. It was a wonderful day, and the theatre was full of partisans. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and other friends of the Conservative party in Quebec were there. As I said, it was a bright Sunday afternoon and speeches were delivered aimed at the election and directed especially to Quebec.

An hon. Member: Was it a religious meeting?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was not a religious meeting. I have arguments other than religious to put forward, and I am ready to present them to you so you can send them on to your Union Nationale friends in Quebec.

The speeches were delivered in French, and I congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on the manner in which he read his speech. I do not blame him for that because French is not his mother tongue. He is making a wonderful effort to try to speak French. After his speech was delivered he sat down on the platform while his friends spoke in French. One speaker indicated that he was strongly opposed to any policy of immigration for Canada and everyone applauded, including the Leader of the Opposition. Another speaker said we should have a national flag without the Union Jack on it and everyone applauded, including the Leader of the Opposition. That cannot be denied. I was there and I have witnesses.

The Leader of the Opposition cannot say that he does not understand French, and he was applauding just like all the others. If my hon. friend had kept quiet I would not have dealt with this. However, he asked for it and he is getting it. I am sure everyone will be pleased to hear that the Leader of the Opposition wants a Canadian flag without the Union Jack and wants no immigration whatsoever into Canada. The Leader of the Opposition applauded when one speaker asked that our soldiers be brought back from Europe, that they had no business there.

Apparently they have two policies, one for Quebec and one for the rest of Canada. That is not what the Liberal party does. That is why we have stayed so long in power and that is why we will be in power after the next election.

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address you for the first time in this distinguished assembly I do so with a deep sense of personal responsibility to the great traditions represented in your person and office and also in the time-honoured customs of this house. I wish to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Coming as I do from the one constituency in the great province of Ontario which has the honour to bear the name of the province itself I find many reasons for pride as well as humbleness when I am told that according to the usages of this house I alone of all the members can be referred to as the member for Ontario. There are many other reasons for the mixed feelings of humility and gratitude, yes, of pride which I feel at this moment.

In the short time I have been here I have learned much of the story of the great democratic institutions exemplified in the distinguished office of Mr. Speaker, in the offices of the responsible ministers of the crown, of the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, of the leaders of the other representative groups, of the Clerk of the House of Commons, of the Sergeant-at-Arms and last but not least of the members of the parliamentary press gallery.

My own presence here, by your permission and at your command, I venture to say is to some Canadians a readily understood symbol of the reality of Canadian democracy of which this house is at one and the same time the chief functionary, symbol and guardian.

I refer first of all to my fellow Canadians in Ontario constituency who know me as a plain man working at an everyday job. They knew me so well that they rejected my first three offers to represent them in their municipal affairs, but I am glad to say they later relented and have given me some measure of their confidence in the city of Oshawa for the last nine years. I refer also to an even larger group of my fellow Canadians whom it is the current fashion to call "new Canadians," for I am one of these, though having the honour and good fortune to be born in Canada.

I do not know at what precise point in time one ceases to be a new Canadian and becomes an old Canadian. Nor does it matter. We have Conservative and Liberal Canadians, French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians, rich and poor Canadians, eastern and western Canadians, C.C.F. and Social Credit Canadians; so whether we are old or new Canadians, we are all Canadians. Only the other day I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) say in a public address in Toronto that he disliked the term "new Canadian" when applied only to those who have come here from the continent of Europe. He said that it should apply equally to newcomers from the British Isles and even to the many thousands of future citizens whose daily arrival places are the maternity wards of our hospitals from Corner Brook in Newfoundland to Dawson in the Yukon.

I agree with my hon. leader, and if I may speak for those most closely concerned I think it can be said that they care not what the first adjective may be as long as the second word is "Canadian", nor what the temporary designation may be as long as they feel, as they most certainly do, that their welcome here is warm and generous and that the opportunity here is what they themselves make it by their own deportment and the degree to which they learn what it really means to be a loyal Canadian.

Nor will it matter much to them or to any of us what they may be called, seriously or in jest, as long as the son of a poor emigrant from the Ukraine can take his place in this house, as I have done, sir, commended to your favour by a group of Canadians old and new, of many creeds and faiths, of different positions and occupations in life, from the city, towns, villages and farms of Ontario riding including the historic old township of Whitby, East Whitby, Pickering, Reach, Uxbridge, Scott and Scugog. I mention these famous old Ontario municipalities because I am humbly aware of the fact, especially after hearing some of the hon. members these last few days, that my own experience in the many problems that confront governments is limited strictly to the local field of municipal self-government.

Yet as I have sat here during this session and listened to the discussions of our national problems I have become more and more convinced that the very real problems of Canada's 4,000 municipalities cannot be solved at the local level or at the provincial level, but are in a truly national sense a very proper subject for your attention, Mr. Speaker, and for the attention of this house. Particularly, as I hope to show, they are a matter for the consideration of the present government; for it is my opinion, based on experience in the administration of one representative Canadian city, that the main cause contributing to the financial plight of the municipalities of this country today is the policy of higher and higher federal taxation followed for so long with such undisguised zeal by the present government here in Ottawa. I am aware, sir, that it is the current fashion of the hon. members opposite to dismiss any such statement with the very offhand excuse that municipalities are none of their concern because they are what they call the mere "creatures of the provinces." It is, I believe, a lawyers' phrase, and I have no doubt that it is strictly correct in the legal sense. But I am sure that the many thousands of earnest men and women who have been concerned during the last decade with the pressing problems of municipal government regard it as the poorest possible excuse for the present continuing and expanding federal invasion of the sources of municipal income and livelihood.

I refer to the mythical Canadian tax dollar. It is mythical in name only. In practice it is a grim reality blandly ignored, it seems to me, by the federal government, but ever present in the frantic planning and thinking that goes on every hour of the day in a municipal board or council somewhere in Canada. I think the facts speak for themselves. The Canadian tax dollar is a representation of the total amount of all tax collections on the level of the three authorities which, under our Canadian federal system, have responsibilities in the matter of the expenditure of public funds. As of the last fiscal year for which complete figures are available, 1950, it represents the staggering total of $4,292·7 million as against a mere $1,032·2 million in 1939. That is the total of all taxation in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the tax burden has increased in this short period almost four times.

In the very limited field in which I have had experience our first instinct when we discover a situation like that is to look for the villain. We check over the expenditures of each department and ask, "Who caused this? Who is spending all the money?" These can sometimes be embarrassing questions, but at a level of government as close to the people as we are in the municipalities we have no alternative. We must not only ask the question but we must also find the answers.

If we apply this simple test to the astounding fourfold increase in Canadian taxation since 1939, we discover the answer very quickly. We find that the provincial and municipal governments have been extraordinarily modest in their demands for a share of the Canadian tax dollar, but not so the federal government. The latest study which has been made covers the years 1930 to 1948. It was undertaken by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities last year. It shows that the dollar value of municipal taxes all across Canada in 1948 was almost the same as in 1930. I cite that amazing accomplishment as proof positive of the tax-conscious, budget-wise, good and careful housekeeping which is the guiding principle of municipal government in Canada today.

I am sure it follows that if all governments had been as tax-careful as the municipalities in these years we would have today an almost ideal tax situation in Canada. But what happened? In 1930 the municipal share of the tax dollar paid by Canadians to all governments was 39·4 per cent but in 1948 it was only 12·7 per cent, and current estimates indicate that it will even be lower in 1952. The share taken by all provincial governments also decreased in this period from 22 per cent to 19·8 per cent. These are what our economists call the lower levels of government, and rightly so. They are not only lower in authority and taxing powers but they are also lower in what they think the taxpaying traffic will bear.

What has happened on the highest level of government, the government of Canada? In the answer to that question we have the whole story of the crushing and unbearable taxation in Canada today. Between 1930 and 1948 the percentage of the Canadian taxpayer's dollar pre-empted by the federal government rose from a mere and reasonable 38·6 per cent in 1930 to 67·5 per cent in 1948, and it is still climbing. As the Leader of the Opposition said in the house a few days ago, the latest estimate of the share of the Canadian tax dollar which is being taken by the federal government is no less than 77 per cent, leaving a mere 12 per cent for provincial governments and only 11 per cent for all the 4,000 municipalities.

I can well imagine hon. members opposite saying that the municipalities can get more if they want to, that all they have to do is raise taxes. That attitude toward the raising of money for government purposes is well known to the people of Canada. It is an attitude which they almost automatically associate with the present federal administration, which has increased the level of the Canadian tax burden more than all other administrations put together since confederation. Fortunately, however, this come and get it viewpoint has not been shared by our so-called lower levels of government, and one does not have to be an economist to know the reason. It is no mere accident that the level of government that has been the most economical in its operation, and therefore the least demanding on the taxpayers, has been that level which is closest to the people and which accounts to them at all times and most often.

The facts are there for all to see and note. In this period of just over twenty years, while the federal government has been doubling its percentage demands on the taxpayer's dollar, the provincial governments have reduced their demands by about half and the municipal governments by about two-thirds. In other words, local governments are today asking for only one-third the share of the tax dollar which they received in 1930. They have made this remarkable contribution to good housekeeping in spite of steadily increasing demands on their services. That is an important point. I need not detail here the nature and extent of these demands except to say that they include the majority of those facilities and services which determine whether the standard of living of our people is to be high or low. They centre about the school and the home which, next to the church, are the most important and vital institutions in our way of life.

In the welter of publicity that rolls out from Ottawa every day it is easy to lose sight of the fact that the welfare state is no new creation of the central government but has long existed as an achievement of municipal government. It is the local, not the central or the provincial, government which must provide the hospitals in which young Canadians are born, the day nurseries to relieve working mothers of some of their burdens, and the schools in which our children are fitted for citizenship. It is the local government which provides the community basis of the home, which supplies the water, the electricity, the protection from fire and theft, the roads and streets within the community and the systems of public transportation. It is the local government which still, in spite of some contrary claims, assumes the principal share of responsibility for the welfare of our people in those emergencies of life which come to all sooner or later. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to such things as hospitalization, economic misfortune, and even to the problems which beset so many in the autumn of life requiring the provision of shelter and maintenance.

Our population has increased greatly in the last few years, and this has meant increasing demands upon the municipalities for all their services. Costs of providing these services have more than doubled since 1930. Many new areas, both residential and industrial, have been opened up. New municipalities have been created.

I cite these facts, sir, because we are so often told about the increased demands upon the federal treasury. I do not wish to minimize those but it is important, I think, that we remember that the proportionate demands upon the municipalities have been just as great and perhaps greater; yet municipal revenue all across Canada is no more than double the 1930 total. In terms of real dollars and measured by the purchasing values in 1930 and 1952 the total municipal income in Canada today is no more than it was 22 years ago. In the last 12 years, on the other hand, the federal tax load on our people has multiplied itself more than four times; personal income tax has increased ten times; corporation taxes at the federal level have increased ten times; customs revenue three times; liquor taxes five times; tobacco taxes four times, and so on.

How then, we may ask, have the municipalities managed to achieve this miracle of money management? Not, I hasten to say, Mr. Speaker, by going into debt. To the many glories of the accomplishments of our municipalities must be added, sir, their steady rejection of the principle of taxing unborn generations to pay for the comforts and facilities of the moment. In total dollar volume the combined debts of all 4,000 Canadian municipalities is less today than it was in 1933. When we remember that today's dollars mean much less than the dollars of 1933, the real burden of municipal debt is much lower than at that time.

If our municipalities are in a sound financial condition today, Mr. Speaker, it is not because of any high level of income, nor has it been achieved by borrowing. They have balanced their budgets, sir, by the old-fashioned family virtue of not spending money which their taxpayers cannot afford to pay. It is a principle which I may well recommend to hon. members opposite as a sound basis of public as well as private finance.

However, merely not spending does not solve the problems of municipalities. It is well known to every hon. member that the backlog of necessary and long overdue municipal capital expenditure is the most pressing single need in Canada today if we are to maintain and improve the standard of living to which we would appear to be entitled as a result of the great bounty of Providence and the hard work and energy of our people.

We are told that Canada leads the world in industrial expansion. Canada is booming. Our productive capacity, our national income, and our output of goods are rising to dizzy heights undreamed of even a decade ago. For what reason? For what reason, Mr. Speaker, do we work, save and invest, except to raise our family and individual standard of good living? Why sir, they are the very things that we expect our municipalities to provide—hospitals, schools, community services and comfortable, well protected homes, well supplied with power, water and sewage systems in keeping with a progressive civilization.

What is the situation today? The plain fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that we are lagging behind in all these things. We are not getting the benefits of the boom because our municipal governments are being denied a fair share of the Canadian tax dollar. What good is prosperity expressed only in terms of million and billion dollar industrial plants, if it does not reflect on the home and the standard of living of the residential community?

Not far from the borders of my own constituency of Ontario we have the billion dollar mile on the eastern limits of Toronto. It is a magnificent industrial achievement, the credit for which, incidentally, must be given to wise and farsighted municipal government in the township of Scarborough. Here we see the industrial boom at its biggest and best. Huge new plants by the dozen have been rushed to completion along both sides of what was a farm road a few years ago. Already a billion dollars has been invested in plant and equipment in that fabulous mile, and more is being added every week.

Only a few miles away—15 at the most—there is a thriving village in my constituency. It is no backwoods hamlet. It is an old community settled 150 years ago by United Empire Loyalists and situated on Ontario's main street, the great east to west thoroughfare linking Toronto and Montreal. On a clear day you can see the smoke rising from the factories along the billion dollar mile; and yet, Mr. Speaker, the residents of Pickering village canot afford a municipal water system, surely one of the earliest evidences of progress in community living in this country. Indeed, sir, when there was severe drought in that area last month, some of the trucks hauling supplies for the billion dollar mile had to be diverted to the town of Whitby to haul water by the tankful for the homes of Pickering.

It may be said, of course, that Pickering could have water if its citizens were willing to pay for it. That is true. But it is also true that they have investigated the matter thoroughly and have reached the conclusion, expressed at the polls last December, that they could not afford to pay the additional taxes which would be required to finance it. Why? Because, sir, they are already so overburdened with federal taxes that they have reached the breaking point. This is the situation in most of our municipalities today. Regardless of what the opinion of the federal government may be, these local governments, which are close to the people, and which must account to them every year, know there is a limit to the bearable taxation load. They hesitate to add to that burden when they see the federal government reaching into the taxpayers' pockets with an increasingly heavy and greedy hand every year.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that a serious and indeed dangerous state of affairs has been reached in this matter. A few months ago the annual meeting of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities was held at Calgary and those present heard the results of "An Analysis and Study of Urban Growth and Municipal Finance"—that is the official title—prepared by Mr. D. C. Corbett, a lecturer in public administration at McGill university. In that report I read the following summary of the present plight of our municipalities:

> Everywhere one goes, on the outskirts of growing cities and towns and in the new suburbs, one sees streets unpaved, and sidewalks not laid. Water, sewerage and street lighting, far from preceding the new developments, have not yet caught up with them in many areas. We hear of new districts where residents buy their water by the pail and where the spring thaw mires the roads.

The same is true, of course, of the older municipal areas. On this I think I can quote no better authority than the premier of the province of Ontario. In a recent speech in the Ontario legislature he had this to say:

> The municipalities of Ontario face an acute problem in their efforts to restrict or curtail the construction of many projects which are essential to their operation. Facilities such as water supply systems, street car and bus lines, streets, schools and disposal plants which may have been adequate a decade ago are now breaking down under the wear and tear of trying to provide services for their populations which in many instances have increased by 50 per cent.

The municipalities of all our provinces face the same problems. We may call these organizations of local government by different names—counties, parishes, townships, cities, towns or villages—but in the long run they are all part of a level of government which is just as essential to the federal principle as are the provinces or the government of Canada. It will be, indeed, a catastrophe if the time should ever come when they are forced into obscurity or insignificance by the taxation grab of any other level of government. This, to my way of thinking, is the real danger of the centralization of so many of the functions and powers of government here in Ottawa.

On the other hand it will be just as much a calamity if the municipalities are forced, by the sheer necessity of everyday problems, to so increase the taxation load that home owning becomes in Canada a mark either of great wealth or economic folly. I need not remind hon. members that no less than 80 per cent of all municipal taxation is borne by real estate. There are other sources of income but our municipalities, far from reaching out to impose more and more taxes, have deliberately restricted their own sources of income in the public interest. It is true that we have a municipal sales tax in a few cities, and taxes on gas and electric bills in another. We hope these are temporary expedients only, and that in time they will be made unnecessary by wiser taxation policies of the federal government. It is not so long ago, Mr. Speaker, that we had a general levy of municipal income taxes in this country. We shall all hope that their return will never be forced upon our local governments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may be asked what the federal government should do, in an immediate and constructive way, to help this critical situation. I do not have to go far afield to find the answer. In the first place there must be a re-balancing of the taxation books between the federal government on the one hand and the provinces and municipalities on the other. In other words the central government must learn—as we have all to learn in our private lives—to get along with less. Taxation must be reduced.

Particularly the federal share of the Canadian tax dollar must be brought within reason to allow the municipalities to levy taxes which are at least close to being within keeping with the increased demands on their resources. After all, this relationship between federal, provincial and municipal governments is a family affair. There is only so much money in the family budget, and if one member of the family takes more than he needs, the others must suffer. We do not say that all should share equally, but it does seem to make sense that each should participate in the family finances, not according to his strength, size or power, but according to his needs as agreed upon in family council.

And that is my second suggestion, Mr. Speaker; the calling of a friendly family council to discuss these matters. Specifically I suggest the reconvening of the economic committee that was set up with such high hopes a few years ago during the federal-provincial discussions of the immediate post-war years. It met, I believe, in December 1945 and in January 1946. Then it faded somehow out of existence. The municipalities of Canada have asked that it be reconvened on a very wide basis of representation, and I urge the government to give this immediate consideration.

There are many things which could be worked out to the mutual satisfaction and advantage of all of us in such a setting. To mention only two, there is the taxation of crown property and crown companies; the exemption of municipal purchases from the federal sales tax to the same extent and for the same good reasons that provincial purchases are now exempt.

These very questions, I am informed, will be brought to the attention of the federal government this week when a delegation from the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities calls upon the government here in Ottawa. That meeting, Mr. Speaker, could be a momentous one for the whole future of this country if the government will look upon the delegation in the spirit in which we would expect the senior members of any family to listen to a plea from its junior members for assistance in a financial matter whose seriousness is no fault of their own and whose solution is beyond their income and allowance. I hope they will not receive, instead, long and learned lectures on the British North America Act or the usual unreal excuses that the head of family is too hard-pressed financially to help. Most of us know better.

Above all, sir, the government will render a great service to all the people of Canada if they will admit their share of responsibility for the plight of the municipalities. For it is the weight of federal taxes that embarrasses every one of the 4,000 municipalities of this country. It is a weight so burdensome and unbearable that it threatens their future, and thereby endangers our whole democratic system. For taxes, Mr. Speaker, may not only cripple; they can also destroy.

The wise words of the great Chief Justice Marshall in the supreme court of the United States as long ago as the year 1819 are as valid in this municipal problem as they proved to be in those problems which confronted our neighbours to the south many years ago. None of us, sir, has any doubt about the power of this present administration to tax us, but we do ask that in these things which so closely touch our daily lives they heed John Marshall's warning to all who have great taxing powers:

> The power to tax, is the power to destroy.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I believe it is a coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that in this debate a long-time reeve of a municipality should follow the young mayor from Oshawa. I do not know just how long he has been mayor, but judging by what he has said in the house I do not think it has been very long. He has still much to learn about being mayor.

This may well be the last time I shall take part in a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Sinnott: At this time I wish to offer my sincere thanks to all the members in this house who have been so kind and co-operative during the past seven years. We have had our differences at times during debates, but on the whole you will not find a better group of men with whom to work.

There are a few very important subjects to which I should like to draw the attention of the government. First of all I should like to make a clear statement concerning a newspaper article which was carried in the Ottawa Journal, entitled "Had to Play Ball with the Cabinet". When this newspaperman interviewed me I told him I was a member of the Liberal party, that we could get along very much better if we worked together than if we worked separately, and that in doing that sometimes I had a sense of duty to work with my party. Newspaper reporters, of course, can always twist words to suit themselves, and that is quite natural on the part of opposition newspapermen.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that certain members of the opposition have made several charges of waste and extravagance against the government, up to the present time there has not been one bit of evidence to prove their charges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: The opposition was crying to the high heavens about overtaxation, but in not one single instance has that party put forth any concrete suggestions to amount to anything. They have talked about a few neckties, a few dishes and a few teapots, but in total the amount is incidental. At no time in the history of Canada has this nation been better off financially; at no time in the history of this country have there been so many people actively employed; at no time has this country been looked upon by the rest of the world as such a good place for financial investment. At no time has our income from agriculture been so abundant in volume, and at no time has our industrial capacity enjoyed such great expansion. To cap it all, at no time has the Canadian dollar been at such a high premium, thereby encouraging much foreign investment which, in turn, is a great help to our national expansion.

Mr. Speaker, I should like the whip of the Progressive Conservative party to notify his chief that I am going to talk about him later on and that I should like him to be here to hear me. The cry of the opposition has been and will continue to be that the Liberal government has taxed the people of Canada to death.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: I hear someone say "hear, hear". That is the only slogan they can find at the present time. I wish at this time to say that no country in the world under any government has a better record of financial improvement and expansion than has our present government. For six consecutive years we have had a balanced budget with a fair surplus. Ours is a government which has brought in important measures of social security, including family allowances, unemployment insurance, floor prices for agricultural and fish products, veterans' benefits, pensions for the blind and old age pensions. In the year 1951 over a billion dollars was spent by the government to provide these services, while at the same time having reduced Canada's national debt to the tune of approximately $2½ billion; and if this were not paid, our tax load would be increased a further $62 million per year for interest charges.

Is it the policy of the opposition to have this cancer of civilization which is called interest take away most of our profits? If that is so, it is certainly not the policy of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), his Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or his government. Mr. Speaker, to make a long story short, our 1951 tax dollar was spent as follows: We spent three cents in payments to the provinces in subsidies and tax rentals. Fourteen and a half cents of our tax dollar were paid back to the people of Canada in social security measures. Five and a half cents of our tax dollar were paid to Canadian veterans of both world wars and Korea. Thirteen and one-third cents were paid in annual charges on our national debt. Six and a quarter cents were paid to reduce the national debt. Thirty-six and one-third cents were applied to Canada's national defence, and I do not suppose anybody complains about that. Twenty-one cents were spent on all activities and services provided by the government; that is, railway transportation, railroads, ships and the rest of it.

I want to emphasize the fact that a large portion of the taxes over which the opposition are crying so much is for purposes other than the operation of the federal government. I refer to the large increase in subsidies and tax rentals which have been turned over to the provincial governments and which have been passed on to the municipalities; and they in turn have passed substantial amounts on to the various school boards. I want to direct the attention of the last speaker to these facts.

The opposition has repeatedly stated how terribly poor some municipalities have found themselves to be, and that comment applies to the last speaker. One of their members referred to the increase in taxes from $252 to $700, and at the same time that 45 per cent of the increase was due to special school taxes which would amount to some $315. This statement, Mr. Speaker, has nothing whatsoever to do with the federal government but is merely a red herring which has been drawn across the trail so that this member may fool some of his constituents who are not familiar with the way the municipal and school boards raise their funds.

Mr. Speaker, I am told that the Leader of the Opposition is behind the curtain. I should like to have him come into the chamber. The Leader of the Opposition spent a considerable amount of his time on this same theme, knowing full well that this is strictly a provincial and municipal matter. The financial critic of the Progressive Conservative party, (Mr. Macdonnell) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who have had a good deal to do with public finance, and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), have all failed miserably in their attempts to paint an adverse picture. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you cannot blame them too much, when they are trying their best to assume power in this country—and God forbid that.

The Leader of the Opposition used to be the premier of Ontario. Because of his attacks on the provincial governments, the present premier of Ontario has had to go to bat to defend the action which he has taken in helping the municipalities in Ontario. This quotation is from the Globe and Mail of December 2, 1952. The article is headed "Frost Defends Record on Municipalities' Aid", and I think it would be well for me to read it into the record because it is just exactly the opposite of what we have heard here from the opposition. It reads as follows:

> Premier Frost took the occasion of the opening of the new water filtration plant at Scarboro yesterday to defend his government's record in financial aid to the municipalities—but no mention was made of any impending increase in that aid.
> Taking Scarboro statistics, he illustrated the change in his 10 years as provincial treasurer. In 1943, exclusive of education, Premier Frost said Scarboro was receiving $48,380 from the province. In 1952 this amount had grown 677 per cent, he said, to $375,778. This included fire, police, children's protection and assistance for Home for the Aged, but the biggest single item was road maintenance and construction which has grown from $23,250 to $315,000.
> In the same period, Premier Frost said, assistance to schools has increased by 600 per cent.

I want the last speaker to take particular notice of that item, Mr. Speaker. The article continues:

> In 1944, the total education subsidies were $74,981; in 1951, $524,725. In addition, through the Municipal Improvement Corporation, the province has helped Scarboro purchase $3,965,000 in bonds at much less than market cost, he said. Purchase of another $394,000 has been authorized, and about $445,000 additional is pending.

If that is not substantial aid, I do not know what is. To continue:

> These tremendous sums which are common to municipalities across Ontario have substantially supplemented the work of municipal councils, Premier Frost said. This is keeping our municipalities strong and solvent in days of most extraordinary demands and growth.

What does the hon. member for Ontario think about that? The article continues:

> While we all feel the impact of high costs and the high cost of living, this assistance has very measurably decreased the taxes which our real estate owners pay, the premier said.

These are the words of the premier of Ontario, and they are the exact opposite of what the hon. member said here a short time ago.

In order to give a little more light on where this extra money is coming from I should like to quote some figures which I obtained from the bureau of statistics. They are tax rental payments to the provinces under the terms of the tax rental agreements. I am not going to read them all, but with the consent of the house I should like to put them on Hansard, because they are very enlightening. I should like to give a little illustration of the totals in the four years previous to the present time. In 1949-50 the total tax rentals received by all the provinces of Canada amounted to $99,874,082; in 1950-51, they increased to $111,506,696; in 1951-52 they had increased to $122,415,769 and in 1952-53, this year, the opposition say the federal government are taxing the people to death but they gave back to the municipalities the sum of $284,219,011. The opposition say the federal government is taxing the people to death, but a large proportion of the money is being returned to the people through the provinces, through the municipalities, and through the school boards.

Just a few weeks ago the premier of Ontario saw the light of day. He was getting no tax rentals in 1949-50, none in 1950-51 and none in 1951-52. But after he saw the light of day what do you think he got? He got $123,327,363 from the federal treasury in 1952. If that is not a generous handout from the federal government I do not know what is. Therefore when our Tory friends go around the country telling the people that the federal government is taxing the people to death, I want them to be honest and fair and tell the people that a large proportion of those taxes is returned to the provinces. I think that pretty well sums up the position with respect to tax rentals from the provinces. With the consent of the house I should like to put this schedule on Hansard and have it added to my speech so it will inform hon. members just exactly what the provinces are getting.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Read it all.

Some hon. Members: Read it all.

Some hon. Members: No, put it on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the request of the hon. member agreed to?

Mr. Ross (Souris): No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Sinnott: The schedule is as follows:

Tax rental payments to provinces under terms of tax rental agreements
(In addition to statutory subsidies)

Province	1947 Agreements 1949-50	1950-51	1951-52	1952 Agreements 1952-53
	$	$	$	$
Newfoundland	6,549,745	7,372,231	8,143,744	10,722,461

Nova Scotia	11,617,199	12,899,563	14,075,951	18,093,575
New Brunswick	9,504,980	10,581,550	11,571,895	14,945,605
Ontario	....	....	....	123,327,363
Manitoba	14,608,738	16,221,061	17,775,291	23,004,768
Saskatchewan	15,152,776	16,600,091	17,972,432	23,529,886
Alberta	15,676,357	17,783,572	19,830,983	27,241,552
British Columbia	24,780,511	27,814,483	30,571,187	40,095,064
	99,874,082	111,506,696	122,415,769	284,219,011

The payments shown for three years under the 1947 agreements are those as finally calculated in June, 1952.

The amounts shown as payable in 1952-53 under the 1952 agreements are subject to recalculation.

I was very pleased to see the fine results of the resale price maintenance bill all through the country. Electric refrigerators, electric stoves and many hundreds of articles are now being purchased on a competitive market. I recall how strenuously our Tory friends fought the investigation in committee, as well as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) of the C.C.F. party, who made a right-about turn. However, those who were crying crocodile tears and blue ruin are still maintaining thriving businesses, including the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I understand that his refrigerator business has increased 40 per cent.

When our Tory friends talk about cutting down expenditures may I say this. It might have been good policy on their part to have stopped talking just before Christmas last year, and thereby avoided bringing all the members back here at additional expense to the country. The country was put to the expense of thousands of dollars, which can be attributed to nobody but our Tory friends. The C.C.F. party, the Social Credit party, the independents did not vote against the bill, but the Tories voted to protect their manufacturing friends to the limit.

[Mr. Sinnott.]

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) made several repetitious speeches during the debate, and one cannot forget what a disservice they rendered to their constituents and to Canada as a whole. There, Mr. Speaker, was the true Tory party catering to their manufacturing friends, trying to dictate to the consumers of Canada; but thanks to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Liberal party we were able to render a real service to the people. When the vote came on this issue the Conservatives voted alone against this legislation. They voted alone against legislation which saved the consumers of Canada millions of dollars.

I think the recent appointment of the former attorney general of Manitoba to the position of chairman of the restrictive trade practices commission is to be commended. He has every qualification for the position. His appointment will do much in the years to come to keep down the ever-increasing groups uniting in order to stifle competition.

I also wish to congratulate the government on the appointment of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) to the post of Minister of Fisheries. I am sure it will meet with the approval of all the fishermen of the east coast as well as the west coast, and particularly his constituents. I also wish to express my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) on his recent appointment as Associate Minister of National Defence.

As to the interruptions coming from a place called Peterborough, I think, may I say that we have been trying for a long time to nail the hon. member down, and I am going to nail him down right now. He asked me who wrote my speech. Here are my rough notes that I wrote myself in my room. Come over and have a look at them. Furthermore I did not have the help of the Conservative party as has the Leader of the Opposition. I did not have the help of Rod Finlayson.

Mr. Fraser: No; Pickersgill.

Mr. Sinnott: I am talking about the Leader of the Opposition who read every word of his speech.

I wish now to take a few minutes to divulge exactly what is taking place with regard to the exorbitant prices farmers are paying for their farm machinery. There is what is called a retail farm dealers' association, which meets once a year, at which dealers throughout the country gather. There methods of distribution, rates of commissions, and so forth are discussed. Prices are arranged and a program is drawn up for dealers to follow. Commissions are set, and so forth, on implement sales and parts. Commissions on implements and parts have greatly increased in the last few years, with the result that dealers now charge a commission as high as $1,500 on the sale of a self-propelled combine, which two men can put together in two days.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is more than that.

Mr. Sinnott: Surely this is most unreasonable. I think the hon. member for Souris said the commission is more than that. If it is more than that I should like to know the exact figures. Farmers as a whole do not complain, but, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come when the chairman of the restrictive trade practices commission should look into this highway robbery to which farmers have been subjected.

While on the subject of exorbitant prices, may I say that there is plenty of room to investigate the prices charged for ladies' shoes and apparel. I am sure the ladies of this country would be very pleased if something were done about the prices of the shoes which they have to buy. Some shoes consist of only a few ounces of leather, for which prices range to as high as $22. Large manufacturers and retailers are gouging the consumers for all they can possibly obtain. Here again this is not the fault of the government, but the get-rich-quick idea is to blame. Here is a place for the restrictive trade practices commission to step in.

Building material is another item which needs a thorough investigation, especially the cement business in the city of Winnipeg. If ever a combine situation existed any place to keep the average person from obtaining enough cement to build his own home that condition certainly prevails in Winnipeg. No cement whatsoever is available to a private individual. Yet you can call up a certain company and all the cement you require will be poured in your basement for the small sum of $14 a yard. Talk about cheap homes; no, sir, not as long as this kind of distribution continues, and I suppose this method exists in all parts of Canada. Here is another job for the combines commissioner. The price of lumber is another item which is worth while looking into. I am sure these subjects I have mentioned will receive very careful consideration by the government and its law officers.

Another matter I should like to draw to the attention of the house is that almost everyone is led to believe that the western farmer receives $2 per bushel for his wheat on the farm. Such prices are a long way off the beam. All prices quoted are f.o.b. Fort William, which nets the farmer on an average for the three prairie provinces:

No. 1 dry wheat	$1.68
No. 2 dry wheat	1.66
No. 3 dry wheat	1.64
Feed dry wheat	1.34
Damp feed wheat	1.32

These prices are subject to a 1 per cent deduction for the P.F.A.A. which works out at less than $1.52 on the average. Quite a difference, I am sure.

Now to make my statement more clear as to what I would like to accomplish, it is to reduce the cost of production to the grower and at the same time make it possible for the eastern feeder to obtain his feed grains at a lower cost. As it is at the present time, the western farmer is asked to pay the freight on all grain shipped to the lakehead, and again he is asked to pay the freight on all his agricultural implements, farm trucks, et cetera, going west to his farm. In this way the western farmer is required to pay the freight both ways.

If the manufacturers were to pool the various shipping destinations and make an over-all price applicable to all parts of Canada, an implement now costing $6,000 in western Canada would be considerably less. The adjustment in commissions on the same farm machinery costing $6,000 would mean that it could no doubt be bought by the farmer for something less than $5,000. This would reduce the western farmer's operating costs, thus enabling him to produce much cheaper. He would then be able to compete on a more equal basis with other exporters of grain. The farmers in the west, due to freight, have to pay approximately $200 to $400 more for each large tractor and family automobile.

I understand that an application was made some time ago to the railways by the railway unions for an increase of 45 cents per hour. A board of conciliation did award a 16 cent per hour increase which up to the present time has not been accepted by the railway unions. I should like at this time to strongly protest the action of the union leaders in not accepting this very favourable increase. The cost of living has been continuously declining for the past four or five months. Prices of farm products have been dropping by from 10 to 30 per cent. Therefore the demands being made by the railway unions are not only totally unwarranted and unjustified, they have become a chronic disease. I do not pretend to be unkind to labour and I have always advocated a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, but the time has come when labour union leaders must realize they have to be honest and fair with the rest of the country as well as themselves. These continuous demands for higher wages in turn only cause the railways to ask for higher freight rates which in turn makes it impossible for the cost of living to be reduced.

It might be well for the labour unions throughout the country to realize that the present government has bent over backwards to meet their demands, but that the time has now come when the government itself will be forced to say "no" to further increases even though it takes the chance of being turned out of office. Union leaders would do well to think back to the days of the thirties when there were soup kitchens and men were being paid $5 a month by the Bennett government to stay on the farm. This situation could very well come again if labour is not reasonable in its demands.

I have a resolution prepared which I shall introduce in the House of Commons as soon as the resolution which I have now on the order paper has been disposed of, and which will read as follows:

Resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, in view of the emergency now existing and the urgency of a program of war preparedness, the government should take into early consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to make strikes illegal for a period of two years, providing, at the same time, for the settlement of labour disputes by arbitration between labour and management.

In conclusion may I say that in my opinion we are very fortunate to be able to say that Canada is the envy of the world. No other nation with our population can come anywhere near the record of achievement by its people or by its government. I therefore take great pleasure in closing by saying good luck to you, Mr. Speaker, good luck to the government and good luck to the rest of my colleagues in the House of Commons.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. members who have preceded me, I have the pleasure to pay a tribute to the two brilliant members who have moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider). I also take this opportunity to congratulate the new members for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) and Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). The house will surely benefit from their presence in our midst.

I have read carefully the speech delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) and I could not help seeing that the political creed of the party to which he belongs has not varied from time immemorial since he is still ready to uphold at any cost the very excesses of what they call the incomparable advantages of private enterprise.

Whatever the subject of the debate, whether it be the prohibition of resale price maintenance, the act concerning combines and monopolies, or the question of broadcasting and television, the hon. member for Labelle always adheres strictly to the classical and well-known line that the "profit" motive must alone be responsible for anything that is fine and good in our modern society.

Does not the hon. member imply that the government are becoming socialistic because they have to a large extent given effect to the conclusions of the Massey report on the arts, letters and sciences, as did their predecessors when dealing with the Aird report on radio broadcasting.

If my colleague has that word "socialism" at heart, may I add that there is not much to choose between socialism and the abuses of private initiative. Many countries have obtained good results steering a middle course, that is to promote private initiative while trying at the same time to remedy some of its inescapable abuses. That is what the present government tries to do by giving effect to the recommendations of the Massey report on radio broadcasting and television.

And now, since the hon. member for Labelle neglected to study the question from every angle, it would be a good idea to go back a little and consider the reasons why the C.B.C. entered the field of radio broadcasting and television.

Thirty years ago, the Canadian people were beginning to take an interest in radio broadcasting. Radio broadcasting was becoming a wonderful means of recreation and culture for the entire population, rural and urban, and particularly for those citizens who had to live alone, isolated from their neighbours by the vastness of the country.

Our first programs, as could be expected, were brought in from the United States for the benefit of those who lived near the border. For quite a few years, the government limited its activity to the granting of permits for receiving sets and broadcasting stations. The first license was granted in 1919. In 1929, ten years later, there were in Canada 10 broadcasting stations and 296,926 receiving sets, most of them located in large cities, and our rural population, especially the isolated settlements in the western provinces, had to forgo the benefits of this invention.

The Aird commission, established in 1928 to inquire into the field of broadcasting, praised the efforts of private enterprise but deplored the growing commercialism which characterized the new industry, the all but dominating influence of American music and advertising, the gradual lowering of the quality of the programs which were automatically adapted to the poorest cultural standard of the listening masses.

Besides, a large proportion of the people, those who live in the country far from the large cities, were urging the government to intervene so that they might enjoy as soon as possible the numerous advantages of radio broadcasting.

Consequently, after an investigation conducted among many groups, the government decided to intervene in order to establish in Canada a radio broadcasting system so as to, first, set up a national network; secondly, protect this propaganda medium against an overdose of American influence; thirdly, to encourage our Canadian artists.

Certain aspects of the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may have been open to criticism. But, out of 170 various organizations whose opinions were sought by the said corporation, such as the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and others, the greatest majority supported the stand taken by the government on radio broadcasting and television.

Profiting from the experience acquired in England, where radio is an absolute state monopoly, with no commercial advertising whatever, and in the United States, where radio is an entirely private concern sponsored by commercial and industrial firms, the Canadian government had decided to steer a middle course and to aid the public while, at the same time, allowing private enterprise to compete with the official network.

Then, at last, came the organization of television in Canada, an undertaking which has aroused, and for that matter is still arousing, greater enthusiasm than all the others.

At present relatively few countries enjoy television broadcasts. Great Britain, France, the United States, Russia, Mexico, Brazil and Cuba were the only countries providing television services in 1951, when the Massey report was completed. There were, at that time, two television stations in Russia, two in England, two in France and 107 in the United States, the latter being distributed amongst 66 American cities.

The only other countries which are at present concerning themselves with television are Italy, Denmark and Switzerland, but, so far, they have not progressed beyond the experimental stage.

England and France have organized television as a state monopoly, without any commercial advertising. The United States alone, followed by Mexico, Cuba and Brazil, rely exclusively on the trial and error method of free enterprise.

It is true that television has developed more rapidly in the United States, under the system of private enterprise. But it was at the price of enormous costs which could be justified by the great profits made by radio, by the large urban population and by the wealth of sponsors. Canada can neither afford such luxury nor fall completely under the control of American television whose publicity extravagances and low quality programs have even been criticized by the Americans themselves.

It may be that a certain number of listeners are contented with baseball, hockey or wrestling. But there are others who would prefer a much wider variety of programs comprising good music, theatre, and educational features.

Commercial experience has shown that it is hardly possible under a solely private system to better the quality of the programs and especially to build up a national system for the great majority of the Canadian people.

I wonder if my colleague had considered all these factors when he criticized the policy of the C.B.C., if he had considered the tremendous effect that television will have on the customs of our people, particularly on the education of our children. Is he going to go on holding that the "profit" motive must be the decisive factor in the use of television in Canada?

England was the first country in the world to have television broadcasts, which have existed in that country since 1936. There experience has taught the English people that television implies a moral and cultural responsibility which private enterprise, prompted by the profit motive, cannot take upon itself alone.

"All the men and women who devote all their energies to broadcasting—declared the general manager of the B.B.C., Sir William Haley—should know how to hold out against the pressure put on them by people who are all the more vocal for not knowing what they are talking about."

Would the hon. member for Labelle suggest that the chairman of the B.B.C. was wrong in making that statement?

On the other hand, here is a letter addressed to the editor of the Times on December 20, 1950, by a British citizen, on his return from the United States. You will find the text of this letter on page 413 of the Massey report. I quote:

In your issue of December 17 you announce that the B.B.C. proposes to spend over £4m. during the next three years on the development of television. I have just returned from a visit to the United States, where television (though not, I believe, more highly developed technically) has become an habitual form of entertainment in many more households than here. Among persons of my own acquaintance I found only anxiety and apprehension about the social effects of this pastime, and especially about its effect (mentally, morally, and physically) upon small children.

Before making an effort to popularize it further in our country, why could we not consider its results with regard to the American people and gather some information from experienced opinion in the United States about possible safeguards and restrictions? The concern expressed by my American friends could scarcely be dispelled by televising only programs of a superior and inoffensive kind; it was due to the television habit, whatever the program might be.

May I add that my hon. friend should remember that, without the C.B.C., the French-Canadian group would necessarily be at the mercy of American programs, which are less costly than our own.

If there is a field where those who speak our language must ask the government for help, it is undoubtedly the field of television; for, assuming responsibilities and considering motives superior to the production cost, the state alone is able to bear the continuous burden of educational and artistic programs in French.

May I conclude my remarks by giving some figures concerning the cost of television.

A broadcasting station with studio and modern equipment costs $2 million; a single transmitting station costs $250,000; a co-axial cable for the transmission of pictures costs about $10,000 per mile; broadcasting time costs $1,500 to $3,000 an hour, according to the number of programs and not including their content.

On the other hand, rapid technical progress in television and the setting up of colour television give rise to as many financial problems which would prevent the normal development of television in Canada. Private enterprise could not alone assume all those risks without help from the government.

The very limited number of wavelengths creates another kind of problem which has to be faced.

For all those reasons, the government was wise and well-advised to entrust the C.B.C. with the task of initiating television in Canada.

Private enterprise and commercial advertising will have their place in the organization of this new instrument of culture and entertainment as they have it in the field of radio. We are looking forward to the day when private stations will be set up in every part of Canada to supplement the work of the C.B.C.

In this field as in all others, we are certainly in favour of private enterprise; however, we recognize that it cannot alone assume the physical, moral and intellectual responsibilities for an invention which is bound to revolutionize our way of life.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, the excellent work presented by the chamber of commerce of Montreal last November on the problem of provincial and federal revenues, the agreements signed by all provinces of Canada except Quebec with the federal government, emphasize the urgency of a settlement of the fiscal problem. The chief of the federal government, by convoking the federal-provincial conference in 1950, has proved his intention to reach a useful conclusion to the necessity of the constitutional amendments compatible with provincial autonomy.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has also expressed his desire to respect the provincial autonomy, but his declaration has been contradictory on many occasions, as was demonstrated by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). As this problem is of great urgency, especially regarding fiscal agreements, I believe that this house would like to hear a clear statement by the hon. member for Carleton on direct taxation. This clarification is of great importance in regard to the attitude of the leader of the Quebec provincial government, who is pretending freely that the federal government has no jurisdiction in direct ways of taxation. It is true that Mr. Duplessis has never said so at the federal-provincial conferences, either in 1945 nor in 1950, but it is a public contention intended to be only a political football.

I believe that as members of the federal parliament our duty is to discuss federal problems in their relation to the provincial government and, like all the members for the province of Quebec, I am anxious to see a settlement of the particularly urgent problem of taxation. If I am strongly favourable to the provincial autonomy, however, I do not think I can assume a position which is inconsistent with the confederation act, the interpretation of the judicial committee of the privy council and the accepted opinion of jurists and experts.

May I quote on this subject a declaration made by the hon. member for Carleton as it appeared at the plenary conference discussions of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, at page 11:

> There is one fundamental weakness in the British North America Act which lies at the root of many of our difficulties. While the legislative powers of the dominion and provincial governments were defined with reasonable clarity, the division of taxing powers was left in a much less satisfactory position. The provinces were empowered to levy taxes in the field of direct taxation, as every one of us has so much reason to know, whereas the dominion government was authorized to raise money by any form of taxation.

May I ask the hon. member for Carleton how he can now reconcile this declaration with Mr. Duplessis' stand on the question? For my part I believe that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency is a good one. In matters of direct taxation, especially in the income tax field, the federal government might prepare forms with federal-provincial headings. The provinces would receive no more subsidies or grants in return for their right to direct taxation on revenue but would share a percentage of those taxes.

I sincerely hope that the federal and the provincial governments will at last come to an agreement which respects both federal obligations and provincial autonomy.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you call it six o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, just before the house rises, I have checked with Hansard in regard to a remark I made while the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) was speaking. I find it was not reported in Hansard and I simply wish to state that I interjected, in regard to the remarks he made about my applauding certain statements made at Roberval, that there is not a word of truth in the statements that he made.

Mr. Speaker: Of course I do not recall what took place at that time. I understood the hon. member for Portneuf to say that he had seen the Leader of the Opposition applaud the remarks. Now I take it that the Leader of the Opposition says he did not applaud the remarks.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I had interjected a remark at the time but I checked with Hansard and it was not picked up. I made the statement then, and I repeat that statement, that the remarks the hon. member has made about that meeting are utterly untrue.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is in order. I cannot accept the statement that the hon. member for Portneuf has said what is untrue.

Mr. Drew: All I am doing is placing a statement on the record that I had thought was on the record earlier, and I am not asking you, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the question of fact.

Mr. Speaker: I must deal with charges against other hon. members, and it is against the rules of the house to charge an hon. member with making a statement which he knew to be untrue.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the fact that I have not said that. I have said that the statement is untrue, and I do not ask you to rule on the facts. I have made the statement and that statement has been made on other occasions, as Your Honour well knows by the record; and I am simply stating that it is untrue and I am leaving that as a statement of fact.

Mr. Speaker: I can accept the statement that the Leader of the Opposition did not applaud certain remarks. I can accept that, but I cannot accept the statement that the hon. member for Portneuf said something that he knew was untrue.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I have not said what you have just quoted. I have said the statement is untrue. If you prefer it in the form that I did not applaud the remarks, which was the statement which he made, I am quite prepared to have it that way.

Mr. Speaker: I think the house will realize the position in which I found myself when I first heard the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, but I think he has now clarified the point.

Mr. Drew: I just realize that the remark I have made now might not be full enough. I wish to make it clear also that neither did I applaud them nor were the remarks made to which the hon. member for Portneuf has referred.

Mr. Knowles: Why don't you get the two of them together?

Mr. Speaker: I suppose that is a question of fact—the hon. member for Portneuf said they were made; the Leader of the Opposition said they were not made. They were both there, so I will have to leave it at that.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, for the past fifteen years or so, public opinion in this country has constantly been alerted on the question of the sharing of powers between the federal and provincial governments. The federal government has carried out an ever-increasing effort towards centralization. In this connection protests have come from every province in Canada and more particularly from the province of Quebec. Though other governments may be interested in the retention of provincial rights for financial reasons it is only natural that we of Quebec whose language is different, whose soul, culture, traditions and religion are different, should always have taken a very keen interest in the constitutional arrangements under which we are living.

Our representatives, in 1867, consented to join the rest of Canada precisely because, at that time, they were being offered a federative compact, since it was suggested that a confederation be established wherein the various powers would be apportioned between the central government and each of the various provinces in such a way as to ensure, for many years to come, the survival of our language, our traditions, of our French schools, in short of our very racial group.

Confederation is a constitutional pact between the two great races of this country. It is a document which we, from Quebec, have learned to admire, for it has favoured here, in Canadian territory, the prosperity of two ethnical groups of different cultures; it has enabled them to blend themselves firmly enough to make of the Canadian nation one of the great nations of the world.

Unfortunately, the spirit which at the time inspired the fathers of confederation seems now to have disappeared and, today, the very existence of this federative pact is shaken every day. The federal government is insatiable and wishes to monopolize all powers of taxation and thus relegate the provincial legislatures to the rank of administrative commissions.

The Quebec government has waged a stubborn fight, a daily fight against this exaggerated centralization of the central power and up to the last few months, it was supported by the Ontario government.

Unfortunately, the whole question of federal-provincial relations has taken a still more tragic aspect, especially since the prime minister of the most populous province of Canada has accepted the proposals of the central government. But here again, while he accepted these direct grants in return for the taxation rights surrendered by his province, the premier of Ontario did not hesitate to make it clear that it was regretfully that he consented to sign that agreement and that it was on his part a gesture of a purely temporary nature. He hoped that this question of the distribution of taxes would be the object of a more exhaustive study so that a new plan could be proposed without delay.

The fact remains however that Quebec is the only province which was able to refuse the mess of pottage offered by the central government. And, as a member from the province of Quebec, I can only rejoice that our province is headed by a government which has always sustained the rights of the provinces, while confronted by the centralizing pressure of the federal government.

In my capacity as a Conservative member, I note with pride that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) is also imbued with the same respect for our confederation and that, at the very beginning of this session, he did not hesitate to raise this problem in the house and to demand, in his first speech, that a conference be held between the central government and the provinces, so that the latter may at last obtain justice.

It goes without saying that the provinces have not only rights but also duties. However, by taking over their sources of taxation, the federal government has increased its power in an exaggerated manner and has destroyed altogether the balance established between the provinces and the central government, under the British North America Act.

So that it is really the government which is to blame. It has monopolized taxation rights which, since 1867, belonged to the provinces under the pretext that this was essential for the conduct of our national war effort. But the government had more or less promised to relinquish those rights one year after the war.

The war came to an end seven years ago but the federal government has not yet relinquished these sources of taxation. It is determined more or less to starve the provinces as Mr. Filion so aptly put it in his editorial published last Saturday in Le Devoir. I quote:

> The power of taxation as understood by Mr. St. Laurent is the power to starve. According to the Prime Minister, Ottawa would be entitled to monopolize every source of taxation assigned to the central power under our constitution and to let the municipalities and the provinces go bankrupt.
> During the war, Ottawa got into the habit of taxing as much as it could and it never lost this habit altogether. It has used the moneys thus collected to set up social services which are within the fields of the provinces; it has accumulated from year to year considerable surpluses; last year, the Minister of Finance collected very close to three quarters of a billion over and above his needs.
> While Ottawa is rolling in wealth, provinces and municipalities have trouble to make ends meet. Nine Canadian provinces, several of them reluctantly, had to surrender to the federal government because they were unable to meet their obligations in any other way. Municipalities and school boards are all repeating the same desperate cry: their responsibilities are increasing while their sources of revenue remain inadequate.

Every day the federal government tries to obtain more and more from the provinces, asks them to abandon such and such a right in its favour, so much so that it has succeeded in getting all taxes to flow into its own coffers. In 1939, when the federal government was getting 51 per cent of taxation revenues, the provinces and municipalities were getting 49 per cent. Today, after thirteen years of Liberal regime, Ottawa is taking 77 per cent while provincial governments are getting only 12 per cent and municipalities only 11 per cent.

It is impossible for the provincial or the municipal authorities to collect another cent from the taxpayers when they are being clipped by the federal authorities as they are today through increased taxation.

So much so that during a period of prosperity like the one we are experiencing at the present time, the provinces and the municipalities, especially the latter, are unable to face their responsibilities. And they are forced to seek a handout from the federal government which is piling up surpluses.

The federal government is infiltrating every field of government under the pretext that the provinces are financially unable to cope with the situation, and if the provinces lack the means to do it, it is only because Ottawa takes all their resources away from them; the federal government is depriving them of their sources of revenue and taking everything for itself.

For instance, let us consider education. Education is the exclusive field of the provinces, granted to them by the British North America Act. While every province has always kept a jealous watch over its autonomy in the field of education, we, in the province of Quebec, realize that it is the very foundation of our racial and religious survival, and the population of the province of Quebec will never give up on that point.

No doubt the federal government, with its millions in surpluses, will put forward very tempting offers of direct subsidies. They should know, though, as the Leader of the Opposition so well put it, that what the provinces need in this connection are not horse traders' gifts, but merely the respect of those ideas which served to inspire the fathers of confederation.

If the federal government is seeking the disappearance of confederation, its replacement by a unitary state, let them say so, but let them put a stop to this policy of horse-trading and so-called gifts which are merely detrimental to the rights of the provinces.

The Liberal premier of Nova Scotia, a former member of the government, did not hesitate to raise the alarm.

This country is on the way to becoming, rapidly, a unitary state, a totalitarian state.

It is our duty, as members from Quebec, to see to it that this centralization, so harmful and so dangerous from the point of view of our racial group, be stopped as quickly as possible.

If we do not apply a brake to these centralizing tendencies, it is possible that ten or twenty years hence, the province of Quebec may well have lost its power to legislate.

And I am glad to belong to a party which was the party of confederation and which is headed by a convinced autonomist who did not hesitate to declare in the very legislature of Ontario the following words:

> There are excellent reasons why Quebec should attach particular importance to the provisions of the B.N.A. Act and should be less disposed to accept important amendments brought about without the consent of that province and without reasonable protection by way of compensation, if it is a matter of restriction to certain of its established rights. The province of Quebec considers with reason the B.N.A. Act as the guarantee protecting its civil law, its customs, its language and its religion . . .

These words were uttered by none other than the leader of the Conservative opposition.

Besides, the serious warnings of Premier Duplessis and of my chief have been heard and understood by the whole population of my province.

The vital importance of the question, both from the economic and the social points of view, has moved the forty thousand members of the chamber of commerce of Quebec to choose it as the main subject to be studied during its convention in Ottawa, and last week they presented to the Quebec legislature a brief in which they stated their opinion in no uncertain terms.

That body cannot be accused of playing politics because it is absolutely free from political ties with any party. It is, however, a gathering of French-Canadian businessmen who believe that the present situation is an evil one since the population of Quebec must pay higher taxes than the other provinces, simply because the provincial government refuses to yield to the pressure exerted in Ottawa in favour of centralization. I would like to quote an editorial written by Mr. L'Heureux, editor of Le Droit, the newspaper that the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) was quoting with so much satisfaction this afternoon.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Surely.

Mr. Balcer: This article, which is to be found in the newspaper Le Droit of this day, December 2, 1952, shows the importance of the whole question under the title:

Provincial Autonomy

An important brief has been submitted to Premier Duplessis by the Chamber of Commerce of the province of Quebec on relations between the federal government and the provinces.

That public body justly affirms that never in the history of the Canadian confederation have the rights of the province of Quebec, so far as provincial autonomy is concerned, been so seriously imperiled. According to this group, the increasing centralization of taxation powers into the hands of the federal government reached its peak with the last world war and the 1947 tax rental agreements. Since the end of the war, the federal authorities have found no other solution to the problem than that of extending the application of the principles laid down during the last war in order to give renewed impetus to our production. Which means that the provinces and municipalities are deprived of the freedom of movement required to adjust their services to the people's needs. The provincial governments are getting only 13 per cent of the total tax revenues, instead of 28 per cent they were receiving in 1937.

Mr. Duplessis, whose firm stand in the fight against centralization was recognized by the Quebec Chamber of Commerce accepted the proposal in principle. For some fifteen years, the present Quebec government has been the only one to resist effectively. Quebec has been fortunate to have him at the head of her government for the past eight years. In all fairness, it must be admitted that if the people had not elected Mr. Duplessis in 1944 and kept him at the helm of her administration, Quebec's autonomy would undoubtedly have been sacrificed on the altar of centralization by those who would have been in power in the province.

True, that picture will not please politicians, but truth must come to light. Since 1944, the Duplessis government has been the bulwark of provincial autonomy against which all attempts from the centralizers in Ottawa have failed. In a way, its stout resistance can be said to be the Verdun of the epoch-making fight that went on in the dying days of the King regime and which is still going on.

Those are the words of Mr. L'Heureux. Again:

In the face of that united opposition, our statesmen in Ottawa should wake up and those who represent the province of Quebec in the federal field should also climb off the fence.

No better example can be provided of the importance of the present crisis than the views expressed by all the editorial writers of the province of Quebec, especially as regards provincial autonomy which is at present endangered as it has not been for the past fifteen years.

Mr. Speaker, those are the reasons why I heartily endorse the views of my leader on this matter and why I will support with pleasure his amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne in which he once more asks for a new understanding between the federal government and the provinces so that the latter may enjoy those powers of taxation necessary to discharge their duties and face their responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I would like to say to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), who stated Friday that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) and myself were elected by luck, that we much prefer to have been elected as we have been elected rather than being a so-called independent who was not recognized by his own party as its official candidate, and who, in order to be accepted by his party, has nothing better to do than to sling mud at the person of my chief, the Leader of the Opposition. It was a surprise to me to see the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency—

Mr. Dupuis: It is shocking.

Mr. Balcer: —do exactly the same thing, though he has much to be forgiven, when we consider how the scandal about C. D. Howe and Company was disclosed. No wonder he has something to be forgiven by his own party. I come now to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) who was so brave as to hide behind a door, during a meeting which we held at Dolbeau during the Roberval by-election.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was in the hall, not behind the door.

Mr. Balcer: I come to the member for Portneuf, who was in the hall, and who was therefore personally able to view the triumphal reception accorded my leader by the people of Dolbeau on the occasion of the Roberval election.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was well organized.

Mr. Dupuis: It was touching.

Mr. Balcer: The member for Portneuf quotes words which have never been uttered; which exist only in his imagination. Does he wish to render the leader of a party responsible for what his supporters say in the course of a campaign? I wonder then if the Right Hon. the Prime Minister approves Mr. Potvin, his official candidate in Roberval who, at a large meeting in St. Felicien said, and here I quote the dispatch published by the Action Catholique on May 20, 1952:

> Having recalled that the present electoral campaign was more than a battle between two political parties, but a war "between two races and two men of different religious beliefs" . . .

I wonder if the present Prime Minister would be proud to admit that these words are a part of his party's platform? And this same Mr. Potvin, the official Liberal candidate, declared in the same speech that a vote for Drew meant a vote for our economic and social ruin—

Mr. Dupuis: That is true.

Mr. Balcer: —in attacking with an unspeakable boldness—

Mr. Spence: Our people did not believe him.

Mr. Dupuis: That is true.

Mr. Balcer: —our clergy. I wonder if such policy is admitted by the hon. member for Portneuf. I wonder whether the member for Portneuf would be prepared to integrate such a policy into the program of his party. Besides, it is an old Liberal practice in the province of Quebec to deceive or garble the speech of the leader of the Conservative party in order to cause him injury, and they wish to have him known as a bogey, but the people have reacted otherwise and have already shown it in the provincial elections. The Canadian people judge men by their acts—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Balcer: —and the people will know that Mr. Drew is a guarantee of provincial autonomy and the people will recognize it. This worn-out practice which consists in saying to the people of Ontario that the leader of the Conservative party is too much of a francophile and to the people of Quebec that he is "anti-Canadian" will soon cease to bear fruit.

An hon. Member: Oh! no.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Oh! no.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member for Portneuf says "Oh! no." Let me tell him that on the eve of the election the Toronto Star had a 10x12 picture spread over its front page. It was the picture of our leader and of Camillien Houde, and the caption said: "Vote against the Drew-Houde axis". Above this picture, the following words could be read: "Keep Canada British. Vote St. Laurent." These were in four-inch type.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I also have pictures.

Mr. Balcer: The Toronto Star saw to it that this picture was published on the Saturday previous to the election. But it did not appear in the province of Quebec. The Liberals tried to give to our leader the reputation of being "anti-Canadian."

Mr. Speaker, it is up to the people to decide and it will be up to the people of the province of Quebec at the next election to show its appreciation to the leader of the Conservative party, as, for instance, the French-speaking population of Ontario was thankful for the $100,000 grant to the University of Ottawa by the premier of Ontario, as well as for the excellent treatment meted out to the separate schools of his province. The French-speaking population showed its gratitude by electing seven out of eight of his candidates. The same thing is happening today and will happen again.

(Text):

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of following the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) in the last part of his speech, which was mostly political. However, I want to follow the first part of his speech in which he discussed specifically the fourth paragraph of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). This fourth paragraph reads as follows:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (e) to reach agreement with the provincial governments in regard to a clearly defined reallocation of taxing powers so that the provincial governments and municipal councils may have adequate financial resources to carry out their rapidly increasing responsibilities.

In explaining that part of his proposed amendment, the Leader of the Opposition paid special attention to the province of Quebec, which he mentioned twice, and for reasons which are easy to understand. Since he has become the Leader of the Opposition, and as a matter of fact since he first had some hopes of becoming the leader of his party, he has been bidding for the Quebec votes, after taking a tremendous somersault. Having claimed in 1937 that the provinces had assumed powers meant for the federal government, and that we should go back to one strong government, he now claims, with an eye to the votes of the province of Quebec, that Ottawa should divest itself of still more powers in favour of the provinces, although those powers are given to the federal parliament by our constitution.

In our province, Quebec, we know very well, sir, the traditions of the Conservative party. We know what the Conservatives think; we know that their sudden love for our people, this extraordinary about-face, comes more from a lust for power that has been denied to them for so long by the people of Canada, than it comes from the heart. From the very beginning their great chief, the founder of their party, whom I respect, Sir John A. Macdonald, said in the parliamentary debates on confederation:

> Those who were, like myself, in favour of legislative union, were obliged to modify their views and accept the project of a federal union.

And later:

> We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation . . . we will have in fact all the advantages of a legislative union under one administration.

How much like the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, when he exclaims:

> We must start all over again from confederation, if we are to have one country instead of nine.

How history repeats itself, but how inconsistent is the Leader of the Opposition. This is, sir, the short story of the Conservative party for three-quarters of a century. Sir John, whilst renouncing his ideal of a unitary state, declared that confederation was to be a form of centralized federalism, and this has always been the aim and philosophy of the Conservative party. Let us remember 1934 and 1935 under Mr. Bennett. It is for this reason that in opposition to what took place in the United States, and in opposition to what was to happen later in Australia, the residue of powers was given in Canada to the federal government. The powers of the provinces were enumerated in 1867 in a very restricted list, being essentially those of a local and private nature, in line with the importance which Sir John A. Macdonald intended to give to the provincial authorities.

The federal government, according to Sir John, in 1866, was to have the right to appoint and dismiss the lieutenant governors of the provinces; also the right was to be granted to the federal government to disallow the laws passed by the legislatures within the year following their assent. We sometimes find it surprising that the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial authorities gave rise to so little discussion at the time. The explanation given by Sir John was that the delegates at the conference had realized the necessity of creating a strong and powerful central government. That is the record of the founder of the Conservative party.

Let us examine now what are the reasons alleged by the Leader of the Opposition to accuse the present government of centralization. I quote from his speech in this house on Monday, November 24, as reported at page 32 of Hansard:

> The rapidly increasing trend toward centralization of taxing powers has greatly weakened the position of the provincial and municipal governments.

The hon. member for Three Rivers has just made the same assertion in other words. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has learned to listen to his friends of the Union Nationale of the province of Quebec, of which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) is no doubt a proud member.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): L'Union Nationale Conservatrice.

Mr. Lesage: Two or three weeks ago the premier of Quebec said in the legislature that the provinces had been robbed of their sources of taxation by the federal government, that the fiscal rights of the provinces should be restored and that the spirit of the pact of confederation and the intention of its fathers should be respected in that field. Those were the words pronounced by the hon. member for Three Rivers a few moments ago, that the intention of the fathers of confederation should be respected.

Many people seem to ignore or forget the facts. What were the real facts at the time of confederation? That is where we should look to learn what were the exact intentions of the authors of the British North America Act. At that time the provinces were using very little of whatever taxation rights they had under the constitution, and in 1867 nearly two-thirds of the budgets of the provinces were met by subsidies paid to them by the federal government. Since then the provinces have gained more and more independence in that field until they have reached the point where if it could have been said that at the time of confederation the provinces were subservient to the federal government as far as taxation is concerned, they have now reached complete autonomy in the field of taxation.

For instance, in 1937 federal subsidies accounted for only 4·5 per cent of the budget of the province of Quebec. Listening to the hon. member for Three Rivers and to the outcries and accusations in relation to the centralization of taxing powers and against the present Liberal administration, one would expect that the trend had been reversed since 1937. On the contrary, in 1951 the total revenues of the province of Quebec were $275·5 million, of which only $3,300,000 was from federal subsidies, or a little over 1 per cent. The province of Quebec was collecting through its own means of taxation 99 per cent of its revenue, whereas in 1867 it was collecting only one-third. Where is their fiscal subservience in that? Does not the difference between 60 per cent and 1 per cent prove that far from having lost its fiscal autonomy the province of Quebec has now complete fiscal independence?

If you will allow me to say so, let us not be fooled by grandiloquent speeches, by outcries of Au voleur! A l'assassin! Non, écoutons plutôt la raison et les faits. Let us look at the facts; let us look at the figures; let us look at the record. Let me ask this question: Are there any provincial taxation rights that have been stolen by the federal government and that should be restored to the provinces?

An hon. Member: Income tax.

Mr. Lesage: I am coming to income tax. That tax was first imposed by the Conservative government in 1917, and it was never tested in the courts by the province of Quebec. My young colleague should know that, and I think he does know it. The Leader of the Opposition was most careful not to point out any one. The hon. member for Three Rivers was very careful not to point out any one. They did not for the good reason that there is not any one. According to section 91 subsection 3 of the British North America Act the federal parliament has the right to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. In spite of that provision the federal government is presently levying taxes in only four fields of taxation; first, customs duties; second, excise taxes and duties; third, personal and corporate income taxes and, fourth, succession duties on estates of a value of over $50,000. Does the levying of taxes in any of those four fields—

An hon. Member: Sales tax.

Mr. Lesage: That is an excise tax. Perhaps my colleague does not know that the sales tax is an excise tax.

Mr. Fulton: Maybe you do not either.

Mr. Lesage: I do.

Mr. Fulton: Maybe you do not know that the sales tax is a sale tax.

Mr. Lesage: It is because you do not know anything that you are never in power. The first two fields of taxation are customs duties and excise duties and taxes. There never has been any question about those. They are reserved expressly to the federal government by the constitution. That leaves us with three and four, personal and corporate income taxes and succession duties.

Would any member of the opposition, especially the Leader of the Opposition, deny the rights of this parliament in those fields? Let us consult the real authority on the matter, the British North America Act. I should like to read from sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, 1867. Section 91 reads:

> . . . the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

Section 92 reads:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

What is the meaning of those paragraphs? They mean precisely what they say, that the federal parliament has the exclusive power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, whether by direct or indirect taxes, and that the provinces may impose direct taxes for provincial purposes only. In Silver Brothers and the Attorney General for Quebec v. the Attorney General of Canada, 1932 A.C. 514, Viscount Dunedin is reported as saying:

> The two taxations, dominion and provincial, can stand side by side without interfering with each other, but as soon as you come to the concomitant privileges of absolute priority they cannot stand side by side and must clash; consequently the dominion must prevail.

If by imposing income taxation on individuals and corporations, or if by imposing succession duties the federal parliament had overridden its jurisdiction it is easy to imagine what would have happened. As I said a moment ago, it was over thirty years ago that the Conservative party then in power initiated the income tax. Does anyone think that if that legislation had been ultra vires of the federal parliament, during that long period from 1917 to 1952 some provincial government, especially a Union Nationale government, would not have tested its validity?

There is no use in stressing the point that there has been no attack upon provincial autonomy. Provincial autonomy has no more been affected thereby at the present time than it was in 1917 when the bill was introduced by the Conservative minister of finance, Sir Thomas White. As I mentioned a few moments ago, there has been a substantial evolution in the political set-up since confederation. There is no doubt that the provinces owe a debt of gratitude to the supreme court and the privy council which bodies did not quite follow the wishes of Sir John A. Macdonald. On the contrary, these courts went as far as they could go to restore the autonomy of the provinces, more especially by invoking the clause in section 92 of the British North America Act respecting property and civil rights. I also believe and am convinced that the head of the government, his ministers and the members of this party do not wish to violate provincial autonomy to any extent.

I am convinced that the present premier of the province of Quebec will agree with me when I say that the cause of provincial autonomy was admirably served and helped by those great Liberal leaders of the province of Quebec, Mercier, Gouin, and Taschereau. These men never failed at any time to be the convinced champions of minority rights and of provincial autonomy well understood and liberally conceived. In speaking tonight in this House of Commons I am proud to repeat that there is no member of the Liberal party who wants to encroach on provincial autonomy.

An hon. Member: Why do you do it, then?

Mr. Lesage: The Liberal tradition is one of respect for our constitution as it has evolved in favour of the provinces since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, and the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Three Rivers can count on the present speaker as a staunch defender of provincial autonomy. But that does not mean this parliament does not have its autonomy and its rights which are a corollary of its very important and even enormous obligation at this time. It is the duty of all members of the house to see to it that the autonomy of parliament is protected so that in turn it can protect the security of Canadian citizens.

Coming back to direct taxation, it is understood that the provinces share the field with the central parliament; but the fact that there is a concurrent right and the fact that we are using it does not mean that we are preventing our partners, the provinces, from using it themselves. The province of Quebec, for instance, is at the present time levying corporate income taxes apart from a number of other taxes it collects from corporations. An income tax on individuals was imposed in the province of Quebec in 1940 and 1941, I believe. I may be wrong and if so I am open to correction on that point, but my memory is good and I feel sure it was in 1940 and 1941, at a time when federal rates of taxation were quite high. But since the end of the last war the government of Quebec has not chosen to levy that kind of tax even when the federal rates of taxation were low as in 1948 and 1949, particularly 1949.

Mr. Murphy: An election year.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but it was not an election year in Quebec. They could have imposed such a tax if they had wished to do so. At the present time there is nothing at all preventing the Quebec government from fixing any rates it wishes for corporation and individual income taxes of its own except of course—and I am using the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—"the unwisdom of trying to collect too much from an individual taxpayer." But the same limitation, Mr. Speaker—and my hon. friends opposite will agree, particularly the member who just interrupted—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Surely.

Mr. Lesage: —exists for the federal government and of course would exist—and this is important—if a personal income tax were imposed by the Quebec legislature. The same limitation would apply to both.

Now, sir, allow me to come back to the alleged "robbery", to the outcries of "au meurtre, au voleur, à l'assassin!" Have the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, for instance, lost any revenue since 1939? Let us look at the figures of the Quebec and Ontario governments. They have not lost any revenue as has been alleged.

An hon. Member: Good governments in both provinces.

Mr. Lesage: They are good collectors anyway. You will see that is the case. On the contrary, in 1939 the total revenue of the province of Ontario was $87·5 million.

In 1951 it was $291·1 million. It tripled and more. In 1939 the total revenue of the province of Quebec was $59·8 million. In 1951-52 it was $275·5 million, and it is expected to be around $300 million in 1952-53, which means it has increased fivefold since 1939. How is it possible to contend, as the hon. member for Three Rivers did, that the present Liberal regime has deprived the Quebec government of its taxing rights when the latter has increased its revenues five times in the last thirteen or fourteen years? Where is the robbery? Where is the tendency towards centralization, especially when you realize that the federal government has not entered any new field of taxation since 1939—

Mr. Murphy: They did not need to.

Mr. Lesage: —except that of succession duties?

Mr. Hodgson: What about the excise tax?

Mr. Lesage: Excise taxes are reserved to the federal government. Parliament is taxing estates of the value of over $50,000, the quasi-totality of which have been accumulated through interprovincial or international trading, business and activities. It is true that during the war Quebec rented certain taxation rights to Ottawa, but since 1945 the federal government has withdrawn from all those fields except that of succession duties for the reasons I have just mentioned. The total amount of succession duties collected during the current fiscal year by the federal government is only $43 million. For instance, the federal government was levying a tax on gasoline during the war but it abandoned the field immediately the war ended, and the provincial government of Quebec is now imposing a tax of 13 cents per gallon on gasoline sold in that province, which is a rate of 30 per cent, speaking of high rates.

Mr. Murphy: How does it compare with the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax?

Mr. Lesage: The Leader of the Opposition in his speech on November 24 said that in 1939—and this was repeated by the hon. member for Three Rivers—municipal governments collected 30 per cent of every tax dollar, provincial governments 19 per cent and the federal government 51 per cent. Those percentages are taken from the green book of the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, pages 32 and 33, and for the purpose of those calculations the fiscal years used are those nearest to the calendar years. I must point out that those percentages are based on a figure of total revenue for the provinces which is not complete. To that revenue must be added the following:

1. $28·1 million from motor vehicle licences.

2. $24 million from the public domain.

3. $9 million from miscellaneous licences. If you take those into account you can reach the exact percentage figures, which are as follows: federal, 48 per cent; provincial, 23 per cent; municipal, 29 per cent. That is for 1939, when the expenditures of the federal government for national defence and for social security were practically nil.

The Leader of the Opposition said in the same speech that, last year—

An hon. Member: Two years ago.

Mr. Lesage: He said that last year, in 1951, the federal government took 77 per cent of our tax dollar, leaving the provincial governments 12 per cent and the municipal governments 11 per cent. I have here the figures for the total revenue of each group for the fiscal year nearest to the calendar year 1951, which is the last known figure. The federal revenue was $3,657 million. The total provincial revenue including licences was $904·9 million and the municipal revenue was $528·8 million. Those figures are taken from the Bank of Canada statistical summary for 1951. The exact percentages are as follows: federal government, 71 per cent—not 77 per cent; provincial, 18 per cent—not 12 per cent; municipalities, 11 per cent—correct.

For the current year the federal revenues will be comparatively higher because of higher taxation; and according to the estimates I have studied and taking as a basis for my calculations a total federal revenue of around $4·4 billion, the percentages would be as follows: federal government, 75 per cent; provincial governments, 15 per cent; municipalities, 10 per cent. The federal revenue is going to be spent as follows: First, for national defence or national security, $2·1 billion; or, if you wish, 35 per cent of every tax dollar collected in Canada is going for national defence or national security; second, social security, $900 million or 16 per cent of every tax dollar; then interest on the national debt, around $430 million or 8 per cent of the total revenue. Payments to the provinces as subsidies or following the tax agreements will amount to $300 million; 5 per cent of every tax dollar. All other services, all the other services of the federal government, will cost $700 million. So only 11 per cent of every tax dollar in Canada is going to be used by the federal government for all of the services except national defence, social security and interest on the national debt.

Mr. Murphy: Wake up some of your members over there or you won't need it.

An hon. Member: That is so stupid.

Mr. Lesage: It is surprising, sir, that these gentlemen will grumble only when it hurts.

An hon. Member: Never mind the weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; get going.

Mr. Lesage: The figures I have just given show that while in 1939 the federal government took 48 per cent of every tax dollar at a time when there was practically no expenditure for national defence or for social security, it now spends 35 per cent of every dollar levied in Canada for national security, leaving only 40 per cent for all other federal expenditures including those for social security.

As you know, under social security we have the following main expenditures: benefits to veterans which are, I believe, a consequence of the last two wars; and that is expenditure which is directly linked to national security. Then we have family allowances; and I do not believe my friends opposite would ask the federal government to leave the field of family allowances—nobody in my riding would, anyway. The figure for social security includes payments for old age pensions and the provinces have all given their consent to an amendment to the constitution in that field. Federal expenditures for social security, I repeat, take 16 per cent of every tax dollar levied, and they are mostly transfer payments. The national debt was incurred mainly during the two world wars and practically 8 per cent of every tax dollar goes to the service of the national debt, which must be more or less directly attributed again to national security.

More than three-quarters of the present federal expenditure is on security, past, present and future; international security and social security combined. Finally I just mention that among the important items of expenditure about $300 million a year is being paid to the provincial governments through subsidies and tax rental payments. This accounts, I repeat, for 5 per cent of every tax dollar. We are left then with something less than $700 million out of a total budget of $4·5 billion to spend on all the other services and activities which the government is asked to carry on in the course of its ordinary operations.

[Mr. Lesage.]

An hon. Member: What is $300 million?

Mr. Lesage: Only $700 million is left to spend on all the services of the federal government, that is to say only 11 per cent of every tax dollar collected in Canada, when the provinces will have at their disposal this year 15 per cent of every tax dollar.

To put it in figures, let us say that the federal government will have only $700 million to spend on its ordinary services while, for instance, the total budget of the province of Quebec will be of the order of $300 million, which is just a little less than half. I believe that all of these figures speak for themselves and prove what I said a few minutes ago, that the provinces are in a better position than they have ever been; that the federal government has not taken away from them any field of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, the reason federal taxation is high today is that the present government and the members of my party believe that it is our first duty to see to it that the Canadian citizen enjoys security and freedom.

An hon. Member: Plenty of neckties.

Mr. Lesage: According to our constitution it is the obligation of the federal government to ensure national security, and it is for the protection of our citizens that we are spending huge amounts of money as an insurance premium for the protection of the North American continent and to fulfil our obligations towards NATO and the United Nations. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in the house on November 24—

Mr. Murphy: What is $300 million?

Mr. Lesage: —and I quote from page 35 of Hansard, we have—> —the responsibility for taking all measures required for the continued existence and freedom of this country. That constitutional responsibility was clearly envisaged by those who drafted the British North America Act which came into force in 1867. It was that defence, national security, would be the responsibility of the federal government and that the federal government would have by constitutional declaration the right to resort to any and every form of taxation on the Canadian people.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow the example of my hon. friend from Three Rivers, who has been quoting extracts from newspapers. I have an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Star on October 24 last, commenting on a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition at North Hatley. I quote:

> Stage by stage, Mr. Drew told the Conservative organizers at North Hatley yesterday, the federal government has infiltrated into provincial spheres of taxation, attempting to weaken the provincial governments by taking a large share of their revenues.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Lesage: I do not believe the hon. member who just interrupted listened to what I said. While I was speaking I never heard one field of taxation named that we have invaded. I asked the question many times, and the interruptions to which I was subjected were not as serious as that. The newspaper article goes on:

It would be interesting to see some documentation of this persistent accusation. For the reiteration of this charge must puzzle a great many people who cannot for the life of them see what field of provincial taxation the federal authority has entered that it did not have a right to enter.

A little further down, it reads:

The clear implication of Mr. Drew's statement is that if the Conservative party took office it would hand something back to the provinces. But what would it hand back? Nothing has been taken. The further implication is that Ottawa can do with much less money than it now spends. But could it? Could the federal budget be cut back? How? By reducing expenditures for defence? For social services? These are the major items of the federal budget and the Conservative party has not opposed them in the house. The money to finance them has come from the people of Canada as a whole. No province has been subjugated in the process, no taxation field invaded that was not already at the disposal of the federal authority.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I did not look at the time when I started my speech. Do I still have five minutes?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: You have only one minute left.

Mr. Lesage: I thank you. I have not enough time left to continue my remarks.

(Text):

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): I wish to express a few thoughts this evening, Mr. Speaker, upon taxation, the welfare state, economy in government, a short statement about Brigadier Connelly and finally a few words about some rather important new developments in the petroleum industry in Canada. Before doing that, I take this opportunity to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They both made fine maiden efforts in their speeches to this house. At the same time I express my congratulations to my colleague, the new member representing Ontario constituency (Mr. Starr), for a very thought-provoking, interesting and timely address this afternoon. Finally, since I am extending congratulations on speeches, may I extend congratulations also to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). I do not agree with everything the hon. member had to say in what he described as his final speech in this house, but I did enjoy it in many ways. I was happy to see that, after spending a vocal quarter sidelined on the bench, he is winding up the final few minutes of the game playing ball again.

Mr. Sinnott: Very well put.

Mr. Nickle: My colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) spoke at considerable length yesterday concerning the case of Brigadier Connelly, a gentleman who was born in my home community of Calgary. He has made a substantial contribution to this country of ours during his long years of military service. May I say that I endorse completely the statements made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I say that, having had an opportunity over the past few weeks to study the Connelly case very thoroughly. I have seen much of the correspondence relating to that particular affair. It is a disgrace to Canada that this very able officer, who since his graduation from the Royal Military College has used his engineering and military training in a career of service to this nation, should now be suddenly booted out of the army and his service lost to Canada. This has happened merely because the Ottawa government believes that a political error on its part should be covered up by making Brigadier Connelly the goat. I believe this government should, without further delay, rectify the serious error it has made and clear the name of a very able soldier.

It is not often that a member from Calgary asks for something for his particular community. However, tonight I should like to comment briefly on two things.

An hon. Member: You want the Grey Cup.

Mr. Nickle: No, we will get the Grey Cup next year. The mayor of Calgary has presented to the government a proposal for the joint financing by the city of Calgary and the federal government, of a new terminal for the Calgary airport. Incidentally, this airport is the fifth busiest in Canada. It is the busiest airport between Toronto on the east and Vancouver on the west. When the runways were lengthened three years ago we were required to relinquish the services of a fair-sized terminal building. Since that time old shacks which were used during the last war by the United States air force have been used as terminal facilities. For an airport as busy as this one, it is a disgrace that the port of entry to a very progressive community such as Calgary should have as terminal facilities a sizeable but most inadequate tarpaper shack. The proposal made by the city of Calgary is simply that the city put up about a quarter of a million dollars to be matched by the dominion government, to provide for the erection of a modern air terminal.

The other question concerns something which has been hanging fire for six or seven months. Apparently it takes that length of time to get something accomplished through the rather lengthy mass of red tape separating defence officials in Calgary from those in the national capital at Ottawa. This has to do with the community of Altadore in southwest Calgary, built by the defence department to accommodate the married men and their families from Currie military barracks. Unfortunately, due to an oversight, presumably by the Ottawa authorities, storm sewers were not provided. The result was that, in the midst of this modern community in the city of Calgary, there developed a large slough which has been a source of danger and inconvenience to many of the service families residing near Currie barracks.

Some months ago the city of Calgary offered to split the cost of the installation of storm sewers, which would bring about the removal of that slough and enable that new part of our city to function in the normal way. I am glad to say that, after a great many complaints from the service families in the district and strong requests from the city of Calgary, a few days ago the federal government apparently finally passed an order in council to provide for its contribution of $105,000 toward the cost of constructing these storm sewers. This will now clear the way for the city of Calgary to go ahead, after the completion of the storm sewers, and provide a means of bus transportation by finishing off the road under which that storm sewer will be laid.

Returning to the major issues as I see them, the by-election which brought me to this house last December was decided, I believe, mainly on the issue that this Liberal government was being too liberal with the taxpayers' money, was spending high, wide and handsome, spending wastefully and trying to be Santa Claus by wildly tossing luscious parcels to the Canadian voters, trying to kid the voters into thinking that the money for fancy presents was hoisted from somebody else's piggy bank, not their own.

This brings us to the question of social security, which in essence is the taking by the government of part of the national product to provide greater measures of social security for the underprivileged, the aged, the sick and the maimed. Social security is recognized by the mass of the public and by all political parties as a responsibility of government. On the municipal, provincial and federal level Canada has already gone well along the way to the welfare state. I for one would fight against any retreat from the social security progress already made, just as would all members in this house.

Like you, I realize also that in the present welfare program there are certain inequalities and injustices to some segments of our population. Some adjustments of a relatively minor nature could and should be made now. However, I firmly believe that Canada cannot now afford any further major steps toward a more complete welfare state. Direct and indirect taxation has for far too long been drawing too heavy a share of the national product. All those who contribute to that national product—the workers in all our businesses and industries and the corporations that are our businesses and industries—are bearing an excessive load of taxation. Our nation is bearing this load partly to provide the essential needs for defence, a spending with which the nation has no quarrel provided waste is eliminated from it. Canada is bearing a federal tax load partly to provide about $1 billion yearly for social security, which is also something that most of us approve. Canada is bearing that load partly to provide a host of essential government services, again without quarrel provided government waste is eliminated from the spending.

The levels of taxation on both personal and corporate incomes help to determine our ability to finance an increasing national productivity and a higher standard of living. Too excessive taxation, regardless of its purpose, is like underfeeding the goose that lays golden eggs. Sometimes it seems to me that it is wiser to defer big-surplus budgeting and more welfare statism and to slash the fat of waste from government spending habits in order to give the goose a full-growth diet and thus boost the golden egg production for years ahead. I believe that time is past due for Canada. You can load a great deal of weight on a pack-horse and get to your destination of greater and more widespread national posterity; but if you overload the pack-horse, meaning the taxpayer, he will sink into the mud of depression, carrying this nation and its hopes with him.

This government, too long in power, has been seeking to extend its tenure by more and fancier handouts, by more and better jobs for party supporters, by lavish passing around of the taxpayers' money and I think also by general extravagance. It is high time that tenure ended, just as the tenure of the free-spending, socialist-minded government has ended in the United States and has also ended in Britain, and Canada had a return to a Conservative and economy-minded government dedicated to letting our citizens keep a larger share of their earnings to spend and build with as they please, and to leading the nation to the great destiny that can be ours. I believe, of course, that such a government would be one headed by the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, the leader of my party.

There are other alternatives, of course. We have the socialists represented by my friends to my left who are now wooing the citizen taxpayers with the offer of what would be another billion dollars of welfare statism through a costly national health plan and higher old age pensions. There could also be the Social Crediters, the group which was described last night by one of its members as the splinter off the beam.

As to the Social Credit group and their national policy, I must be guided—because I have seen no other statement of national policy recently—by the platform adopted a week or so ago by the Social Crediters meeting in convention in Saskatchewan. At that time they adopted a platform calling for a $100 a month old age pension without a means test, coupled with the raising of tax exemptions to $5,000 for married taxpayers and to $2,500 for single ones. Of course that poses the problem: who is going to pay the shot for the extra $700 or $800 million of pensions? Maybe their answer lies in the nebulous thing called Social Credit dividends, that wondrous currency backed by gosh knows what; but personally I prefer to put more reliance in real dollars.

I notice that on the order paper we have some resolutions from several members of the existing government calling for new and better handouts of various types. All these remind me of a cartoon which I saw recently in the New Yorker magazine and which I should like to see reprinted in Hansard. The cartoon shows a political gathering, with the usual politician spouting lustily from the platform; and in the audience are two ministers of the gospel listening to this politician. One of them turns to the other and says, "Why, that is more than even we can promise them".

Mr. Speaker, I was happy that a day or two ago the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale), when discussing the problems of the west, dealt at some length with the problem of increased population to aid in the building further of western Canada. I want to say that I fully agree with him. I should like to quote briefly from an address on the subject entitled "Building the Future for Western Canada" which I made at Winnipeg a month or so ago. In it I said:

> To fully realize the future offered by our natural resources, therefore, we western Canadians must expand our efforts to match our resources with markets . . .
> One phase is to encourage an accelerated rate of immigration to western Canada, not only to provide greater home markets for our products, but also to provide the human resources with which to build a much broader industrial potential. An enlarged program of selective immigration of men and women of pioneering temperament and a wide range of knowledge and special skills is essential to the long-range planning of a still brighter western future.

I trust that this government will greatly enlarge its efforts to ensure that the west and all Canada, in fact, will reach this great objective of 20 million, 25 million or 35 million people before the end of this century.

At the present time we have under way in London a conference of commonwealth prime ministers. Regardless of politics, I am sure the Canadian delegation carries with it the hope of all in this house and all in this country that they will come back with great results which will bring market expansion. However, I noticed in the Ottawa Journal tonight a Canadian Press story dealing with the conference, and in it there is one statement that may be taken with considerable concern in the west. The Canadian Press statement dealing with the commonwealth conference reads in part:

> In the case of wheat, for instance, it was noted that in 1950-51 the sterling area imported 5,400,000 tons from dollar sources, principally Canada, at a cost of $490 million. The ministers agreed that increased wheat production is needed particularly in such countries as Pakistan, India and Australia.
> It is understood that Canadian officials take no objection to increased commonwealth production of wheat, one of Canada's leading products.

This is what concerns me.

> For one thing, Canada is "bullish" about wheat at the moment, and for another Canadian ministers have always said that all they want is a free market run.

I am sure every wheat producer of western Canada and of the east hopes that the apparent optimism of the government as to its ability to find markets for the growing wheat surplus of the west will be rewarded with success.

In this morning's paper there was another headline, whose background means far more than is implied in the words of the headline itself. It reads: "Plan to extend west pipe line to Sarnia". Back of this announcement made in Toronto today is the start on a third major pipe-line project to serve western Canadian oil. With this particular project, and in the expansion of lines to be tied in with that project across western Canada, will come a transport system for oil adequate, when they reach full capacity, to handle at least 40 per cent more oil than the entire petroleum consumption of this country.

It may be of some interest to this house to know that during the first ten and one-half months of this year western Canada has been coming through with a rather remarkable record. During those months this year 155 new discoveries of either oil or gas were recorded in the western provinces. It included some 80 oil discoveries, 64 discoveries of natural gas, plus 11 discoveries of wet gas or gas laden with liquid products. This rate of discovery, about one every two days, is 50 per cent higher than the former all-time Canadian record set in 1951. It will interest this house to know, I am sure, that in this string of discoveries the four western provinces have shared. Alberta came through with 118 discoveries of various types. Saskatchewan, as a new oil province, has come through with 25 discoveries this year of oil and gas; northeastern British Columbia, another new oil province, has come through with nine discoveries of oil or gas this year. Southwest Manitoba has come through with three more oil discoveries.

Among the great discoveries of this year, which account for this announcement concerning the new expansion of pipe lines, is the discovery in Fort St. John, northeastern British Columbia, of a natural gas field already proved to contain something over 1,300 billion cubic feet of natural gas. And in central Alberta has come a discovery of the Bonnie Glen-Pigeon Trend field. It contains, on the basis of knowledge to date, a minimum of 250 million barrels of crude oil. This year western Canada is going to record the greatest increase in proved reserves of oil and gas in the history of this country. Oil reserves, for example, for 1952 are going to increase about 500 million barrels, to a total of about 2 billion barrels by the end of this year. Natural gas reserves this year are going to increase about 3,500 billion cubic feet to around 10½ thousand billion cubic feet by the year's end. These figures may mean a little more to you when I tell you that back in 1946, only six years ago, our west had oil reserves of only some 65 million barrels, and gas reserves of something like 2,000 billion cubic feet.

More important than the discoveries of oil and gas, with their gross value of more than $5 billion, are the beacons they have lit pointing the way to the future. Our reserves have been developed by an intensity of exploration less than 5 per cent of that in the United States oil states. Undoubtedly ultimate Canadian oil and gas reserves will be several and perhaps many times those proved today.

The oil potential, or our ability to produce out west, has climbed by the present day to something like 280,000 barrels a day. Our actual oil production has climbed this year to an average of 162,000 barrels a day. In other words we are running well behind production, compared with actual ability to produce. In the light of this situation and the growing reserves and discoveries that have been made since last spring, there have been two important pipeline developments. One was the start of the construction of an $80 million pipe line across the Rocky mountains from Edmonton to Vancouver. That pipe line, I may say, will be completed next August, and the first oil by pipe line to reach Vancouver refineries will start servicing the market on the coast next October.

A few weeks ago it was announced that on the Pacific coast, in the state of Washington, just south of Vancouver, a $35 million oil refinery would be erected to use Alberta crude oil. The Washington refinery will be completed in the summer of 1954. Word has also come in recent days of the purchase of a refinery site by another major United States oil company in the general Seattle area, and it is reasonably assumed that in the not too distant future plans will be announced for a second United States oil refinery to use our oil on the Pacific coast.

With the growing oil reserve potential, I might say that during this coming year our ability to produce oil will climb to at least 350,000 barrels a day; it will climb in 1954 to probably beyond 400,000 barrels a day, and in 1955 our ability to produce may pass half a million barrels a day, or the equivalent of self-sufficiency for Canada.

With these growing reserves there has been a great deal of concern as to where the oil would go beyond the Pacific coast and the markets west of the existing interprovincial oil pipe line from Alberta through to Superior, Wisconsin, the head of the great lakes area. Today comes the announcement of what is going to be done. A 630-odd mile oil pipe line, 30 inches in diameter, capable of carrying at its peak more than 350,000 barrels of oil a day, will be started immediately from Superior, Wisconsin, across northern Michigan, across the four-mile wide Mackinac strait, through central Michigan and across the St. Clair river at Sarnia, Ontario. That pipe line will be built and placed in operation within one year. So far as our prairie provinces oil producers are concerned, it will open the way for a year-round direct market into Ontario; and so far as Sarnia is concerned, the hon. member for that constituency will perhaps be interested to know that the development of a direct route by pipe line to Sarnia ensures that city's place in the scheme of things, so that it will likely become the greatest single oil and chemical refining centre in eastern Canada.

This oil pipe line that is being started across United States territory to Sarnia is going to cost something like $75 million. Arrangements to finance that project are now being completed. The necessary steel, 160,000 tons, has recently been allocated by the United States department of defence production. Coupled with this pipe line construction will be a further expansion of the existing interprovincial pipe line leading to the great lakes. Over the next two to four years, depending on the rate of oil reserve growth and the rate of development of oil markets, will come the spending of about $200 million to provide an eastward pipe-line system from Alberta to Ontario and the Detroit region of the United States capable of handling something over 350,000 barrels of oil a day. The Pacific coast pipe line is now being completed and will be in operation next August. It is designed to handle ultimately something over 200,000 barrels of oil per day.

With the several pipe-line systems under construction or well on the way there will be developed an oil transport system capable of handling at the peak more than 650,000 barrels of oil per day. When the west can produce that volume and the markets of this country and our neighbour to the south can consume that amount of oil, Canada will be more than self-sufficient for the first time in her history so far as petroleum is concerned.

As to natural gas, we have had a lot of discussion on this matter during the past session and previously, and I am not going to go into it in any detail. I am happy to say that at the present time a survey, financed by private capital, is being carried out by a great United States university and a university in the province of Ontario. A study will be made of the entire fuel picture of eastern Canada and of the best methods of matching the fuel reserves in western Canada and in the United States with the great market of eastern Canada.

A few days ago the president of Shell Oil Company of Canada, W. M. V. Ash, made an address in Montreal which contains some thoughts on the question of natural gas that I think are worth repeating to this house. Of course he was speaking as the head of one of the large companies which have played a material part in the exploration for and development of oil and gas reserves in western Canada. Speaking in Montreal on November 20 Mr. Ash said:

> As a producer of both oil and gas therefore I would urge with all the force at my command that those responsible for framing Canada's gas policy should base it on fundamental economic principles. After gas reserves have been set aside for the foreseeable local needs, including new industry, let our first and most valuable gas be delivered to the nearest and greatest market, where the best price can be had. Later, as we develop further gas, let us look to the more distant and marginal markets.
> Today the picture seems to shape up like this. Substantial reserves have been found in northwestern Alberta and in the northeastern portion of British Columbia, and additions to these reserves are being discovered almost daily. Canadian and provincial permits have been given to one pipe line company which in effect dedicate these reserves of gas to movement to Vancouver and southward to U.S. markets. Percentage-wise, it is anticipated that about 85 per cent of the gas will be delivered to the U.S. markets. The necessary U.S. permits for the on-movement beyond the border are presently the subject of hearings before the U.S. federal power commission. Their award will depend on the answer to the question—do adequate proven reserves exist in the north to satisfy the large northwestern United States demand? Personally I am confident that the strong and growing exploration activity, which is steadily pressing further north, will inevitably prove more than enough reserves of gas. On the other hand delay may cause the insistent demand to be supplied from other sources and that market will be lost forever to Canada.

That is a statement which this government as well as the governments of Alberta and British Columbia might well take to heart. Mr. Ash continues:

> Thus while this dedication of the northwestern Alberta and northeast British Columbia reserves to the Vancouver and southward movement seems a logical and sensible move by the authorities, since it is difficult to visualize any other economic market to which those reserves can go, nevertheless this will not provide for the marketing of the large quantities of gas which will be produced with oil throughout the body of Alberta.
> To avoid such a situation there has been a school of thought which advocates a trunk line from north to south through Alberta and thence either east or west. Such a system would tap all of Alberta's gas reserves, it would make gas available to a maximum number of Albertans, and in effect would pool Alberta's gas for movement to any market, domestic or otherwise, in any direction.
>
> The questions whether that direction should be east or west, whether any eastern movement should be intra-Canada or should include United States outlets, and other problems, have divided the parties according to two opposing philosophies. The one advocates that western gas, after serving prairie communities, should seek the nearest and largest markets south of the border. The other aims to keep Canadian gas wholly on our side of the border, would serve the same prairie communities, but from Winnipeg would cross relatively sparsely populated terrain over a long and expensive route to Toronto and possibly Montreal. The cost of such gas, unless subsidized, either by the western or the eastern taxpayer, or both, is substantially greater than the cost of gas from American sources.
> Possibly the philosophy inherent in the second of these two schemes is not surprising in these times when nationalism is the cry all over the world. I hope that in our country economic and not isolationist principles will prevail. In the long view surely it is best, not only for Canada's gas producing industry but for Canada at large, to sell its raw material in the most profitable market and to use the revenue obtained thereby to purchase equivalent energy from the most economic sources available to it.

With that quotation from the remarks of Mr. Ash, president of Shell, I shall close my comments on gas. However, I should like to state that in discussing gas going to various markets one prime concern is the price received at the Alberta or prairie end of the pipe line. It has been said that our present reserves are something like ten trillion cubic feet, or ten thousand billion. With that volume of gas a difference of one cent per thousand cubic feet in the price means a difference of $100 million to the Canadian economy. An uneconomic gas pipe line might mean a difference of from two to perhaps five cents per thousand cubic feet. In other words, the difference to the economy of this country might be anywhere from $100 million to $500 million based upon the presently known reserves.

In this connection it might be interesting to have a break-down of where that extra $100 million represented by a difference of one cent in the price of the gas would go. About $15 million would go to the owners of the royalties, mainly the Alberta government. Taking the balance of $85 million and considering our present corporation tax rates and the fact that this would come off the top, more than $42 million would be lost in the way of corporation tax income to the federal government. The balance of around $43 million would represent extra income which the oil or gas producers could use for further expansion, exploration or development; or it would represent dividends to those who are paying the major part of the shot for this tremendous development in western Canada or to the foreign investors and shareholders of so many small and large oil and gas companies.

In his concluding remarks in Montreal Mr. Ash dealt with a subject which I have discussed before in this house. I should like to close with his words in regard to that subject. He said:

When you add to this the fact that the eastern Canadian markets of Toronto and Montreal can be served by American gas at a substantial saving over western Canadian gas, surely every effort should be made by our nation, and by our neighbours to the south, to work out a pooling or "unification", or exchange of the continent's gas supplies.

The same principle has been followed to date and is being followed for the future in the planning for the matching of oil reserves and markets in Canada and the United States.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Deslieres), and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If I were to say more I would only be repeating what has been said already about these two hon. members. It is always of interest to me to hear the speech from the throne read, and I am sure that it pictures for each and every one of us some of the things that we expect will come to pass in the coming year. I was particularly interested to note that one of the subjects about which I had spoken in the house was included in the speech from the throne, namely the question of the rural mail carriers. I am sure some satisfactory arrangement will be made for these men and women who are providing a very creditable service for many people.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the things that are said in this chamber to the ministers of the crown. I have always been amazed at the direct criticism offered to them from which one might assume that the sworn ministers of the crown are not wholly responsible citizens, but I am sure that is not the case. Often opposition members conjure up in the minds of the Canadian people something that is not in true perspective. It is always rather disagreeable for me to have to refer to some of these remarks. However, I note that my good friend, the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), had the following to say as appears at page 89 of Hansard for November 25:

People do not mind paying for aeroplanes, guns and other supplies for our troops, but I think the people of Canada are getting sick and tired of this arm chair army.

I was obliged to write a note of sympathy to a mother in my community whose son made the supreme sacrifice in Korea. I am sure in her mind and in the minds of her friends that son did not belong to the arm chair army referred to by the hon. member. On page 182 of Hansard for November 28 I find that my very good friend the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) has painted another picture of the things that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) are doing for our armed services. He has painted a picture of 37 miles of carpet which would be quite a waste if only used to take light exercise. I would say that if there was a rug beside the bed of that soldier who lost his life in Korea the people would not object to it having been placed there.

Last summer I had the privilege of having dinner with one of our servicemen. He told me among other things that he was going up to the icecap of Canada to serve his country. He also told me that when he got to Churchill he would only be half-way to his destination. He left his wife behind him and went there to serve Canada. If the government chooses to provide some of the amenities of life for men who are willing to do such things, we should not complain.

I would also say that there is hardly a man in any of the three armed services today who could not leave that service and enjoy, with the labour force of Canada, the greatest period of earning that anyone could possibly have. The dominion bureau of statistics has this to say:

> Canadian labour income reached an all-time monthly peak of $922 million in August—

That is this year.

> —as compared with $833 million in the same month last year.

I say, therefore, that these men are leaving their arm chairs behind them and making a great contribution to Canada and the security of the nation. When the members of the opposition point to those on the other side who are responsible for the direction of the defence effort they must do so having it in mind that three fingers are pointing back toward them, because we were told in the house only two days ago that at the beginning of world war II the government was criticized for not doing enough. Now they are criticized for providing too many things. That is the way I view some of the criticism being levelled at our senior cabinet ministers.

The hon. member for Middlesex East also referred to the taxes levied against a farm in his county. He indicated the increase that had taken place. I think it is a good defence of the spending of the government. Each and every one of us pay taxes. I also happen to be engaged in the occupation of farming. My taxes have increased, but that is because I had asked for better drainage and better roads, because we have better accommodation in our schools. I and the other people of my municipality asked for these things. So far as industry is concerned, I was speaking with an industrialist of the city of Chatham right after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had paid his visit to that city. The industrialist said to me, "I appreciate very much the position of the Minister of Finance because different sections of my industry come to me and say that so much money is needed for expansion and development." He said, "We add all these expenses together and the price tag is put on the article as it leaves my plant." That is the way that we are financing the preparedness effort that is being put forward on behalf of Canada.

Now I would like to refer to my own particular part of the country, the part I represent. I come from a very diversified agricultural area. There are some 19 or 20 specialized crops and they often need special attention. I believe one thing that could assist us a great deal in that area—and we expect a survey to be made on the river Thames—would be to have more ships pass up and down the river, as was the case when this river was open to traffic. We could then get a storage terminal which would assist us to overcome the congestion that comes from time to time when special crops are being harvested. That is one of the things that could be of assistance to our community.

At this time there is one crop that is particularly pertinent and on which I would like to delay the house for a few moments by referring to its history. The sugar industry is of great importance to our economy and provides an annual purchasing power of some $120 million. This was the amount paid for material and services in 1951. The sugar beet industry was established permanently at the turn of the century after some unsuccessful attempts. The sugar refinery located at Chatham is the largest of its kind in Canada and has earned for the city the title, "The sweetest city on earth". The sugar company employs during the refining season some 1,200 people and maintains a permanent staff for its operations. In southern Ontario there are some 6,200 growers. One-half are in the county of Kent. This company provides an annual purchasing power of $11 million for services and the raw products based on 1951 operations. You will note the benefits an industry of this nature brings to any community of Canada.

All the beets for the production of beet sugar are grown locally, providing employment for many people, especially our new Canadians, and this has helped to assimilate many of our immigrants into the fabric of our communities. We have encouraged immigration. The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company of Chatham have had a prime interest in establishing many of our new citizens. They have indicated in their publications their appreciation of the assistance that was given to them by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Labour. It would be unfortunate to have an industry of this size disrupted to such an extent that it would be necessary to shift our workers to other places for gainful employment.

I would like to relate some of the facts of the sugar industry. Canadians consume 95 pounds per capita per year. The Canadian sugar beet industry produces some 300 million pounds or approximately 23 per cent of our consumption. The balance of our requirements are imported, mostly from empire sources. The break-down during the present year will be: domestic, 23 per cent; raw sugar, empire sources, 64 per cent; Cuban raw contract, 75,000 tons or 11 per cent; and Cuban refined sugar 2 per cent. The problem that faces the industry today is related to the importation of refined sugar. The problems over the years have been closely allied to this class of sugar. We are affected when there is an overproduction in the large producing areas. This past year Cuba produced nearly 8 million tons of sugar, which is away above the average. This amount has prompted the industry in Cuba to restrict the production for 1953 to some 5½ million tons in the hope they can dispose of their 2 million ton carryover.

If Cuba regards her production as hazardous to the industry, and does not apply restriction to production, it will mean instead of a stabilized industry one that is static and unrealistic. May I refer to the conditions around 1920. The greatest boom and slump year in modern history was 1920. The United States government, which had purchased the entire 1918 and 1919 Cuban sugar crops, had allocated supplies in co-operation with the United Kingdom sugar commission. This had exercised a stabilizing effect upon prices. At the end of 1919, with world sugar stocks rather low, the United States threw off all sugar skyrocketed to 22½ cents by May, 1920. of world sugar shortage became prevalent and a great price boom began. From about 6 cents per pound, the price of decontrol, raw sugar skyrocketed to 22½ cents by May, 1920. This fantastic price attracted sugar shipments from all over the world, from countries hitherto considered far too distant to ship to the United States and Canada. Then a disastrous slump in prices started which was not halted until 3⅝ cents was reached in December.

Neither condition was justified by the world supply situation, as there were no genuine shortages nor later surpluses. This condition was repeated in the 1930's. There is a similar parallel which is now reflected in the sugar industry. With the advent of the police action in Korea, and no one knowing how far this would develop, several countries stockpiled considerable sugar. From dominion bureau of statistics figures it will be noted that in 1950 we imported $76 million worth of sugar; in 1951, $75 million; and this year, if the last quarter is on a par with the first three quarters, we will expend around $50 million. This action was duplicated, no doubt, by all importing countries.

Mr. Murphy: You are talking about raw sugar.

Mr. Huffman: I refer to raw sugar. The international bank for reconstruction and development has stated:

> Cuba has expanded sugar production at the expense of soil fertility and water supply. They also contend they are in a precarious position through failure to diversify agricultural production.

I contend we are encouraging this condition by taking sugar from their surplus production. I also contend we are limiting diversification of our agricultural production, as this purchased surplus will result in lower sugar beet acreage across Canada. The sugar industry is located from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It is designed to refine the sugar requirements of Canada, and has done this in the past, as we have imported very limited amounts of refined sugar. It is the employer of Canadian labour. It is Canadian know-how, Canadian investment to a large extent. The sugar beet part of the industry is 100 per cent Canadian. We will never in the future of Canada produce enough sugar beets to meet the domestic requirements. This is not true of many agricultural crops. The government of Canada has lent assistance to market surplus crops in the past. This condition can be alleviated by encouraging more non-surplus crops. The production of sugar beets is at the moment carried on in four provinces, Alberta, Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario.

Many were of the opinion that the contract for Cuban raw sugar was designed so that it would earn dollars and assist Cuba to purchase greater quantities of our basic production.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I notice it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Huffman: May I have the indulgence of the house to carry on for a few minutes?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asks for the indulgence of the house for a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Huffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We find their purchases of oats down 50 per cent from 1951; flour down 50 per cent for the same period; malt up 27 per cent; seed potatoes up 40 per cent, but the total is small; codfish, no change; machinery up 40 per cent; copper up 4½ times or 10 per cent of total exports. There are other items which have altered very little. This indicates the balance of trade was derived from materials, not basic production.

Our people have no complaint regarding the importing of raw sugar from Cuba, and if it is thought that the amount of refined sugar, namely the 30 million pounds exported to us this year, is the correct amount for Cuba to supply, let this be added to the Cuban contract. This would make the amount 90,000 tons instead of 75,000. But I must say I am partial to empire sources of supply.

The United States government of late imports almost all the sugar requirements of that country on a quota basis, first knowing their consumption, and then analysing their sugar beet production. Then quotas for raw sugar imports are set. This procedure does away with the fluctuation caused by unusual amounts of sugar being brought in unnecessarily. Imports of refined sugar have caused a stockpiling by our local company. If it had not been for the progressive views held by the sugar company, and the building of cylindrical silos to store the bulk sugar, they would not have been in a position to accommodate this year's production.

It is very evident Cuba is employing a determined effort to dispose of this year's crop. I note that H. R. Mackeson, British secretary for overseas trade, stated:

> The government in the United Kingdom is determined not to buy more Cuban sugar than they are at present."

In March of this year representatives of the governments of producing areas and the sugar industry met in London. On September 29 the inter-sugar conference opened in London, and on this occasion it is understood Cuba was seeking control of prices—no doubt through some influence of the international bank for reconstruction and development. If Cuba wishes now to avoid chaos in the sugar industry, it is important to us that her earlier actions do not further disrupt our domestic sugar industry. Our growers have a participating sugar beet contract. The price they receive is related to the sale of sugar and plant by-products. This session I recall the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) suggesting that if industry wish to have good relations with labour, they should share their returns. May I say this form of contract has been in effect for some time in this industry.

I have stated some of the reasons for the position the industry finds itself in today. May I state some of the things that could be done to overcome the problem. It has been suggested by grower associations that a quota system for imports of raw sugar would prevent the unfortunate condition in which the industry now finds itself. Some might feel the consumer would be the forgotten person, but I believe there are two safeguards. First, the refiners of Canada would have to buy in competition. Second, if there were no competition at the wholesale level the office of the combines investigation commission could see that there was no special arrangement between companies.

The producer of sugar beets would then be safeguarded against the position in which he finds himself. This year, after producing the crop with labour costs estimated on returns for 1951, he now finds the return per acre considerably reduced due to importations of Cuba's surplus crop and the decline in his participating contract.

Adopting the quota system would provide for the raw sugar exporters a calculated amount of import requirements. It would do away with unnecessary importations of sugar, and stabilize the entire industry. Canada is moving toward stabilization in many phases of her economy. We listened to the announcement that will help stabilize the gold industry. The international wheat agreement has a stabilizing effect on wheat. Subsidies for farm products have had the same effect. These references could be enlarged.

I trust that this is a reasoned and reasonable résumé of an important industry, and with co-operation we can attain a satisfactory solution.

On motion of Mr. Casselman the debate was adjourned.

It being eight minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 3, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE SOLEIL"

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I rise on a question of privilege.

Things are always happening to me that are different from what happen to other people. I have to rise on a question of privilege about a very charming piece of news published on my account in yesterday's edition of Le Soleil.

The first statement is erroneous; it is a question of fact. Le Soleil writes as follows:

—the Pouliot family had eminently served the country, as members of the House of Commons or as officials of the House of Commons.

None of my relatives has been an official of the House of Commons.

The second sentence which I find astonishing is the following:

Also everybody believes that Mr. Pouliot has no desire of going to the Senate, because he likes the atmosphere of the House of Commons and would feel somewhat lost in the upper chamber.

The first part of the sentence is very kind but, on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that I would not feel lost in the Senate any more than in the House of Commons and I am convinced that though the first part of this article has been written by the correspondent of Le Soleil, whom I haven't seen since the beginning of the session, the second part has been concocted in a cafeteria at the corner of Cote d'Abraham and De la Couronne street in Quebec city, in the Le Soleil building.

It seems very tactless to make statements of that kind without waiting for the decision of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who undoubtedly has something to say about appointments to the Senate, and without consulting the man directly concerned who is none other than the member for Temiscouata.

I hope that Le Soleil will publish these remarks tomorrow at the same place the article appeared.

I remember that, when I was elected for the first time, I brought a $10,000 action for damages against the newspaper Le Soleil, to which I had sent a long letter to set the facts in their true light.

This letter was published. Le Soleil paid the costs of the action and made a retraction, in an editorial, saying that the new member for Temiscouata was "a charming fellow". I hope that I won't be compelled to resort to the same methods to have the statements of Le Soleil corrected.

HEALTH SURVEYS

TABLING OF REPORTS

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I beg leave to lay on the table the following survey reports: Saskatchewan health survey report, two volumes; Alberta health survey report, one volume; Quebec health survey report, twelve volumes; and Manitoba health survey report, three volumes.

ATOMIC ENERGY

FORECAST OF COMMERCIAL USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, according to press reports the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made an important announcement yesterday regarding the use of atomic energy for commercial purposes in the near future. I wonder if he would give the house a statement regarding this matter—not necessarily now but when he is prepared to do so within the next few days.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I may as well clear the matter up now. A representative of one of our newspapers was writing an article on atomic energy marking a ten year anniversary of some kind in respect of the use of atomic energy for war purposes. He asked me when I thought there would be commercial use of atomic energy as power. I gave him my estimate as being five years. I did not regard it as an important announcement, and it is simply my own opinion based on what I have seen of the development of important work in that direction.

Mr. Coldwell: It seemed important to some of us.

Mr. Howe: If it had been announced as a fact rather than a surmise I think it would have been more important.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

INQUIRY AS TO PRINTING WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Meeker (Waterloo South): In the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) I would like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Garson). Is he aware of the fact that job printing work in connection with the recent Canada savings bond issue was done in the United States? Why was this, and can the minister assure this house that Canadian printers will be given an opportunity to do this work in the future?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend had not given me notice of his question I will take notice of it now and bring the answer down.

JUDGES

DISTRICT COURTS, NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of which I have not given notice to the minister, but it concerns a matter about which I have spoken to him several times. I wonder if there has been any correspondence or other steps taken in connection with the appointment of district court judges in Newfoundland.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question I may say there has been no correspondence on the subject for several months.

EXPORT REGULATIONS

DRUGS TO IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I would like to ask whether the government is prohibiting the export of drugs to Russia and other iron curtain countries, as does the United States government. A broadcast yesterday said that Canada was not prohibiting such exports.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the regulations covering the destination by areas of Canadian exports are exactly the same as those of the United States. I am not sure that all drugs are covered in the regulations but certainly all drugs that have strategic value are covered. Subject to correction, I think the restrictions apply to all drugs.

SCRAP IRON TO IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): In August there was a dispute regarding scrap iron going to iron curtain countries and I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) whether such export is now prohibited by Canada.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, all export of scrap iron is prohibited except under permit and I can assure my hon. friend that no permits are granted for export to iron curtain countries or to areas near iron curtain countries.

HOGS

PRICES—CANNING OF SURPLUS PORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would answer the question I asked yesterday.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question of which I was given notice yesterday, although I was not here, was as follows:

I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's announcement yesterday regarding the lifting of the embargo to the United States, will the minister give further consideration to the cut in hog prices to take effect December 31? Perhaps this cut could be postponed to March 1.

I would just like to say that the federal government does not set a price for hogs. All we have done so far is to say that, if no one else buys the hogs at $23 as of January 1, then we are prepared to buy them at that price. Of course, that sets a support price under hogs but it does not set a price. In addition, I would like to say that the support price on hogs has never at any time been associated with the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic. The foot-and-mouth disease epidemic did affect the cost to the government but we have not allowed the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic to affect in any way the support price put under hogs. I would hesitate at this time, when we are drawing near the end of our experience with foot-and-mouth disease, to have the two associated. We have already announced our intentions with regard to the support price under hogs, being 23 cents as of January 1, and I do not think there is anything in the recent announcement which would cause us to change that position.

Mr. Bryce: May I ask a supplementary question of the hon. gentleman? I think most farmers are worrying about the fact that the announcement, effective the 31st of December, is going to cause tremendous fluctuations in the market, and if something could be done to stretch it out it would be a boon to farmers who have hogs to sell.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): May I ask the minister whether, in view of the fact that he is not going to change the price now, there is going to be any quota set on the amount of pork which the government will buy at 26 cents from now until the first of January?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, up to the moment, and there has been no announcement of any change in policy, the government has been taking the surplus of pork and canning it. We are still proceeding with that plan. Provision has been made to can up to 90 million pounds; that is, in so far as the amount of money provided for the purpose is concerned, we are in a position to can 90 million pounds. The figure is something over 80 million pounds now and we anticipate that any surplus that does come will be taken care of until the end of the year under that plan.

Mr. Charlton: Is it true that you cannot buy more than 10 million pounds between now and the first of January?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not true that we cannot buy more than 10 million pounds. We can buy as much as the government provides us with money to buy—and up to now they have not refused us.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, for a short time this afternoon I wish to discuss some matters which I know are of general interest to the people of Canada, and also some particular matters which are of interest to my own province of New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces.

Before discussing those matters I want to join with those who have already paid tribute to the mover and seconder of the address. I did not have the pleasure of listening to their speeches but I have read them and I agree that they were good, from the government's standpoint at least. I also extend congratulations, Mr. Speaker, to the new cabinet ministers—the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) and the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). The member for Coast-Capilano has been appointed Minister of Fisheries and we in the maritime provinces are always interested, of course, in the appointee to this cabinet position; because, as everyone knows, fisheries is one of the great industries of our province.

I was somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, at all these appointments—surprised that three of them should come from the province of British Columbia. When I say "three of them" I refer to the appointment of the Hon. Mr. Mayhew as ambassador to Japan as well. I think it is a very good appointment but, as I say, I was surprised that British Columbians should be picked for all these very important positions.

Mr. Cruickshank: A real province.

Mr. Brooks: When parliamentary assistants were appointed, we understood that they were appointed so that they might become conversant with some particular cabinet position in order that later on they might be appointed to that position. I thought that this was a sound policy. Just why the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), who had been parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, was appointed to the Department of Fisheries I do not understand. I doubt if he had very many qualifications for the position, and we were greatly surprised.

We have had a parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries who came from the maritime provinces. When there were three appointments to be made, Mr. Speaker, we did feel that one of those appointments could very well have come to the maritime provinces, to Prince Edward Island. If these appointments were made as a reward for services to the government, the province of Prince Edward Island has certainly shown more indication, in recent years at least, of supporting the Liberal party than has the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Brooks: We only have to go back to the recent provincial elections—

Mr. Cruickshank: Where did the Tories get?

Mr. Brooks: The Tories were pulled down by the Grits. They associated with them for too long, and it was very unfortunate.

Mr. Cruickshank: You had better change your leader again.

Mr. Brooks: As I say, I was surprised that Prince Edward Island, which is the home of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, was not honoured. In the past when members of the Liberal government or the prime ministers have been defeated in other parts of Canada, they came down to Prince county in Prince Edward Island seeking a seat. I believe it was rather discourteous to overlook Prince Edward Island in this connection, and to overlook the parliamentary assistant from Prince.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne contains many interesting items. It is not my intention to discuss all of them this afternoon; in fact it would be impossible to do so. We are interested, of course, in the international wheat agreement. Wheat is of great concern, not only to the people of the west but to the people of the world. With the great crop of wheat in western Canada this year, the matter of markets is now of great concern to Canada.

We are interested also in the note regarding the St. Lawrence seaway. This matter was discussed last year, and it does not require much discussion at the present time. I believe that the people of Canada were very proud indeed when they learned that the development of the St. Lawrence seaway was to be carried out by Canada alone. It was a great source of pride for our people.

We are interested also in the item referring to national health grants. This subject will be discussed at greater length later on, but this matter of health is one of the most important with which we have to deal. I should like to read an item which refers to the health of the people of our dominion. This item appeared in the press a short time ago and the heading is "Says More than half Unfit for Service". It is dated, Kitchener, Ontario, November 12, and reads as follows:

> Lt. Col. H. V. Matthews of Toronto said last night that more than 50 per cent of youths trying to enlist in Canada are unfit for military service.
> He told a Remembrance Day gathering that of those accepted, many break down under training and have to be discharged.
>
> "We reject more people than we accept."
>
> He said he deplored lack of cleanliness among troops, apathy towards sport, absenteeism and illiteracy, and lack of ability of the men to look after themselves.
> Colonel Matthews is commanding officer of a rifle battalion at camp Ipperwash.

I feel that this is a very sad commentary upon the condition of the young men of this dominion. It is a great reflection also on the propaganda which has been sent out by the health department, because they have been trying to make the people believe that the health of our people is good.

In that article there is a particular reference to the apathy of the men towards sports. Sports is a very interesting subject in itself, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that at some time it may come in for a general discussion in this house. When I say "sports" I mean sports that are part of the national life of this country. I do not mean sports such as we read about recently where 27,000 people got together and cheered for athletes who were paid, and who came from a foreign country. I mean sports in which our young people take part, and where their prowess is reflected in what they do in international sports such as the Olympic games, the empire games or other international sports as well as sports at home.

The most important item in the speech from the throne was the reference to the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to London. The paragraph reads:

> My Prime Minister and my Minister of Finance will attend the meeting of the prime ministers of the commonwealth to open in London later this month to consider important economic and monetary problems.

Our Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are there already. I am sure I express the wish of every member in this house when I say that we hope that they have every success. This matter of commonwealth trade is something which concerns not only the people of the commonwealth but the people of western Europe, the people of the United States, and in fact the whole free world. I listened to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) a few days ago, and despite what the hon. member said I do not agree with his reference to trade with the United States. We are greatly interested, of course, in trade with the United States, but we should be more interested in the development of trade with Great Britain and the commonwealth countries.

In the past Great Britain and the commonwealth were the countries to which we exported most of our products. I hope the time will come again when these channels of export will be opened up and the commonwealth will again become the recipient of most of the exports from this country. A few days ago I read an article entitled "The Buying Picture". It reads as follows:

> The official Canadian statistics reveal the following picture; Britain purchased from Canada during the first eight months of this year products valued at $537 million, but Canada purchased from Britain during this same period British goods and commodities valued at only $228 million.

We are buying just 50 per cent of the amount of goods from Britain that she is purchasing from us.

During this same eight months, however, Canada purchased from the United States goods and commodities valued at no less than $1,917 million, or Canada purchased approximately eight times as much from the United States as she purchased from Britain.

The article goes on to say:

The problem is, then, for Britain to sell more goods in Canada so that Canada can buy more goods from Britain.

Trade with Great Britain and with the commonwealth countries, while it is of the utmost importance to the people of Canada in general, is particularly important to the people of the maritime provinces. It is not so long ago that we considered Great Britain, for instance, to be our best market for our long lumber and for our apples. If you go to Nova Scotia today, down in the Annapolis valley, you will find that where, not many years ago, they were exporting many millions of bushels of apples to Great Britain, today this trade has all dried up, much to the detriment of that beautiful part of Canada in Nova Scotia. We in New Brunswick, in years past, found a great market in Great Britain for pit props. I listened to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) the other evening; I am not going to repeat what he so eloquently presented to the house. Great Britain was a great market for Canadian pit props and she would be today, just as she would be a great market for much of our pulpwood, if she was only in a position to purchase from us.

In days gone by the British West Indies were also a great market for the people of the maritime provinces and could be again a great market for the people of Canada in general. In connection with the British West Indies I might say that we have noted in the press in recent years articles which seem to imply that the West Indies are today at loose ends, that they are looking around for some country or some place in which they can find more security. My opinion is that the British West Indies could well become, both politically and economically, a part of this great country of ours and I should like to see the day come when she is, because I believe it would be to the great advantage of the people in the maritimes especially if the British West Indies were the eleventh province of this dominion.

We in Canada want millions of dollars' worth of the products of the West Indies. They need our fish, our lumber, our manufactured products and our farm products. The West Indies being a tropical country, we need their fruits like bananas, grapefruit and other products such as cane sugar. At the present time we are buying great quantities of sugar from Cuba. We could buy sugar from the West Indies. We could also buy—and I suppose we do—much of our rum from the West Indies. It is a tropical country; we are a northern country. As I say, it would be a great advantage to a great northern country like this if we had a tropical province such as the West Indies would be, in order to round out our country, as it were.

I believe the United States has her eyes on the West Indies at the present time. She is ever increasing her influence there. From the press we learn that Great Britain has been withdrawing, from necessity more or less, her influence in this part of the world. The United States is moving into airfields. Great Britain is taking out her troops. There is every reason to believe that the West Indies today are looking for some other country with which they might join. The logical country, to my mind, is our own country of Canada.

In speaking last year, I think it was, on the subject of our trade with Great Britain, I asked at that time whether we were buying as much as we could from Great Britain. At that time I pointed out that there were certain products such as television, certain military equipment, and so on, which we had been buying from the United States and which could have been bought more cheaply from Great Britain. At that time I also pointed out that the United States, which in its papers had been advising its people to "buy British", was not carrying out the instructions which it was giving to its people but rather was making large purchases elsewhere or at least was turning down purchases from Great Britain in the matter of hydro engines and generators. I quoted particularly the instance of Seattle, which could have bought from Britain generators for its great hydro plants at almost half the price which was paid in the United States. Still she turned Great Britain down. In commenting on that situation at that time the ambassador of Great Britain said: "Do they really want to trade with us or do they not?"

Just a short time ago I read an article in the Monetary Times. I think the leader of the Social Credit party mentioned this matter the other day. It had to do with the question of advertising British cars here in Canada at certain motor car exhibits. This is an article which was published in the Monetary Times of November of this year. The heading is "British Cars in Canada" and it reads as follows:

Action of Canadian motor car manufacturers in excluding British cars from two Canadian winter auto shows has been received with mixed feelings. Some United Kingdom motor manufacturers look upon it as a form of flattery and an admission that British-made cars constitute a serious threat to Canadian models. While they protest the ban on principle, they feel "quality will out" and Canadians will buy the car that gives them the most for the price.

In some circles the move is seen as being at odds with the "buy-British" drives of the past few years, and certainly spiking campaigns to sell more to Britain. Sir William Welsh, North American representative of the British Society of Motor Manufacturers, described it as "a rather strange interpretation of free enterprise," while others questioned Canadian chances of improving exports.

I think that article speaks for itself. There is another article in the Searle Grain bulletin which gives us an indication of how the western people feel with regard to our British markets. This article is headed "Buy British or Sell Canadian", and it reads as follows:

Great Britain is the largest single market for Canadian wheat and flour. Last year Britain purchased Canadian wheat and flour equivalent to 108 million bushels of wheat, which represented 30 per cent of all Canada's export sales of these commodities. Prairie farmers and all of us in Canada must then be greatly interested in doing everything we can to assist Britain to maintain these annual purchases and if possible to enlarge them. Britain can only continue to purchase large quantities of our wheat, flour and other Canadian products as long as Canadians in turn purchase large quantities of British goods, for that is the only way by which Britain can secure the necessary Canadian dollars with which to buy our Canadian products.

That is the reason I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure that members of this house hope that some arrangement will be made at this conference which is being held in London at the present time so that there may be more trade between our country and Great Britain and the British commonwealth.

There is a matter to which I wish to refer particularly this afternoon. It has to do with the military training area which is being established in the province of New Brunswick. I am sorry that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is not in his seat, because this is a matter which concerns his department, and it is one in which I know he is very much interested. It was recently necessary for us in Canada to establish a training area. This became very evident to our department and the government and to the people here a few years ago when we found, very much to the surprise of us all, that there was not sufficient accommodation in Canada for the training of our troops to send either to Korea or to Germany. The result was that the Canadian troops had to be trained in the United States. This, as I say, amazed the people of Canada. They were amazed to find that in this great, broad country of ours we could not find a suitable training area for our men, and had to send them into a foreign country to be trained.

[Mr. Brooks.]

We were not surprised, therefore, when the government and the department began looking around for a suitable training area in Canada. We received very little information from the Department of National Defence with reference to the selection of this training area. In December, 1951, I asked the minister what was being done in connection with the development of a military training area in Canada, and he said that it was under consideration. Again, in April, 1952—that is last session—I asked the minister a question regarding the selection of a training area. At that time he had no definite information, but simply stated that the matter was still being considered, and that certain areas were being inspected. There was no information when the house closed on July 4 of this year; but when I went down to my own province of New Brunswick I heard rumours around that a part of my constituency of Royal was to be selected as a training area. I wrote to the minister on July 16, and had a reply from him. Again he said that the matter was under consideration and that he could give no definite information regarding it.

On August 1 the announcement was made that a training area had been selected in New Brunswick, and the area selected was, as I say, part of the constituency of Royal, an area not far from the Saint John river. That was the first intimation that the people of New Brunswick, or the people of that area, had that this big training area was being selected. I think I am putting it mildly when I say that it came as a great shock to the people living in this area to read in the newspapers that their homes were to be taken from them and that this was to be a military area.

It was a notice that they had to leave their homes, that they had to leave their farms, and that they had to leave all their communities and all their associations. This will be done, Mr. Speaker, at great sacrifice. It is not easy for people to pick up and leave home; it is not easy for them to leave their churches, their schools, their friends and societies. There are over 1,100 families in this area in Queens and Sunbury counties of New Brunswick. There are over 1,100 homes, and the people in those homes have to be displaced. They are splendid people; they are people whose ancestors lived in that section of the country for four and five generations. It is one of the oldest settled parts of the county of Queens in the province of New Brunswick.

As I have said, all these people wanted was to be sure that the site was required, and all they read was what they saw in the newspapers in a short article. I have it here. It simply says: "Huge New Brunswick army campsite is confirmed. Land purchases for big project will begin soon." The people wanted to be sure first that it was necessary for them to leave their homes, to leave their churches, to leave their societies, to leave all that they had had in the past; that it was necessary for the defence of this country.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Defence, in connection with a matter such as this, should have gone down and told these people why it was necessary for them to leave their homes. As I said, there are 1,100 families, some 2,500 people, to be moved out. This matter should not have been first announced in the newspapers. This was a great shock to them. The minister owed a duty to these people, a duty which should have been carried out. If the minister himself could not have made the visit, then the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who is our representative in the cabinet, and the deputy minister of national defence, might have done it; but it was not done. Instead of that, Mr. Speaker, a false impression was given. The impression was given that this area was being selected by politicians. In the article of August 2, after the announcement of the campsite was made we have under the caption "Worked to get campsite" the pictures of the three members of parliament, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley), the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and myself. The article goes on to say:

> Three New Brunswick members of parliament who took leading roles in the campaign to have Canada's biggest military training base established in New Brunswick are seen above.

Well, I was in this house all during the time that I have mentioned. No mention of this campsite in New Brunswick was ever made. These people, who as I say should have been advised by the Department of National Defence, read in the paper that this campsite was more or less selected by members of parliament. They asked me, as they had a right to ask, what qualifications, for instance, has the hon. member for Saint John-Albert to pick out a campsite for the training of a brigade or a division in this country? They asked of the hon. member for Charlotte, what are his qualifications?

Mr. Fraser: None.

Mr. Brooks: They could ask of me, what are my qualifications? I think I have a little more perhaps than either of the other two because I have some little experience; but none of us had any qualifications. These people who are losing their homes wanted to know why it was that three politicians should be mentioned as having been responsible for getting a campsite down in the province of New Brunswick. They were satisfied that there was only one way in which a campsite should be chosen, namely, by the best military experts that there are in this country visiting that site and visiting other sites and selecting a site which they considered the best; and after having visited the site and made their selection then they should have reported to the government. The government made the decision, as I said a moment ago. Then the Minister of National Defence or some other outstanding person from his department should have gone to these people, who are being asked to make so great a sacrifice, and explained to them why it was that they would have to leave their homes, and leave everything which they have cherished over a great many years.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I wonder whether I could ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Is the hon. member prepared to state that he is in favour of having a campsite in New Brunswick or not?

Mr. Brooks: I am the only one of all the members of the province of New Brunswick who ever advocated a campsite in that province. I also say to my hon. friend that I am not opposed to the campsite where it is today if, as these people wish to be assured, it is in the interests of the defence of this country, and if no other comparable campsite could have been obtained without the displacement of 1,100 families.

I know what my hon. friend means. This campsite is partly in my constituency. I have said, and I repeat today, that more care should have been taken in making the selection. Some of my opponents have tried to make it appear that I have been opposed to a campsite in New Brunswick. I am asking the minister to give us a report not only on the campsite to which I am referring, but on the other five campsites, or prospective sites, which were inspected.

I would ask for a report on the campsite near Utopia, in my hon. friend's constituency. I advocated in the house that it should have been chosen as the campsite for New Brunswick. Why? Because the department already has a large military camp in the area, and some millions of dollars have been spent at Utopia. We have an airfield there, we have headquarters, we have sewage and water facilities. In addition there is an extensive area at the rear in which no one is living—there are no 1,100 families to be displaced. True, one might find a few families, but there would be no great displacement of people.

Then, near Utopia is the bay of Fundy; and in these days, when we read of military manoeuvres, what better site could we have for combined operations than one near the bay of Fundy, where ships could be used? An airfield is already established at camp Utopia, and there is also a great back area that could be used for the manoeuvring of army personnel.

Utopia I thought would have made an excellent campsite. I still think so; and until the Minister of National Defence gives the House of Commons and the people of Canada the reason why it was not selected, and the area on the Saint John river was, I will continue to have that opinion.

I have this further to say. If it is necessary for these people to make this sacrifice in the defence of Canada, I am sure they are willing to do so. A few moments ago I made reference to the people in that area, and I can say there are no finer in New Brunswick. One has only to go back to the records of the last two wars to learn the calibre and the patriotism of these people. They have their war memorials on which the names of their dead are carved. They have their honour rolls, which compare more than favourably with those of most other sections of equal size. They have good farm land and good dairy herds; some of the finest in the province are found in this area. Adjacent to it is a large dairy. Seventy-five per cent of the milk and cream comes from this area.

If these people are to be displaced, then let me impress upon the government the fact that they must be well paid. They must receive more than mere payment for their lands. They must be paid not only for their lands alone but also for the sacrifice they are making. It is not easy for people to leave their friends, their communities, their society, their schools—yes, and their cemeteries. I am told it is the intention of the department to take up the bodies of those who have been buried there for years and to move them to other cemeteries in the province.

This whole area, which for five generations or more has been the home of some of our best New Brunswick citizens, is to be practically obliterated, and they are to be scattered to wherever they can find other homes. Not only is the cost of the farms involved, but the further fact that these farmers have been spending much of their time looking at other places in the province, and in other provinces, to which they may move.

This year they are selling off their stock, so that they will not have the income from cattle that they had last year. They have made no provision for next year's crops, because they are to be moved out. The result is that they will have no income. I would hope that when the department is considering the purchase of the farms from these people it will take into careful consideration the matters I have mentioned and others.

I shall discuss only briefly the question of employment. I believe the minister's department has given the guarantee that citizens of this area will be given preference in filling the 2,000 or 3,000 jobs that will be available. That is only right. However, only a week ago I received a wire from people down there saying that employees were being brought in from other provinces to work in this area. Upon making inquiry I was told by the department that it would investigate the matter.

We do not want that sort of thing. There is much unemployment in New Brunswick today. Let me impress upon the department and the government that it is not necessary to bring in workers from other provinces to this area, except to do some technical work which the people in the area might not be capable of performing.

In the matter of purchases of produce and the like, I should hope that the farmers of the surrounding area and New Brunswick in general would be given preference.

Then, large quantities of coal will be required. Arrangements will have to be made so that New Brunswick coal can be used. Suitable heating equipment will have to be set up for this purpose. I know that the coal miners association of New Brunswick located at Minto has been in touch with the government, and has given all the particulars in the matter. I would simply renew these representations. The Minto coal area is only a few miles away from the area in question, and I suggest it would be both convenient and economic for the department to obtain its coal supplies from the Minto area. This certainly should be done.

I do not intend to discuss this subject at greater length this afternoon, except to say to the government that I ask—yes, I demand—that the people in this area who are making the sacrifice not only for the people of their own province but, as they have been told, for the whole of Canada, shall be treated justly and fairly.

My time has almost expired. It had been my intention to deal with another item in the speech from the throne connected with veterans affairs. There will be an opportunity to do that later. However, I notice that the benefits provided under the Veterans Benefit Act are to be continued. This is something which is of course a routine matter and will be continued as long as the Korean war is in progress. The second item is education for children whose fathers died during war service. This is something which has been recommended by the Canadian Legion and the veterans affairs committee on different occasions, and I am very pleased to note that the government is now taking the matter under consideration.

The Prime Minister, when discussing in his speech the other day the increases for veterans asked for by different members, said that the hon. member for Royal had asked for many such increases. That is a fact and I make no apology for having done so. When the government came before the veterans affairs committee in 1948, for instance, and offered the veterans of this country an increase of 10 per cent in their pensions, I moved an amendment that the increase be 33⅓ per cent. At that time they were raised by 25 per cent and today the increase is greater than 33⅓ per cent. I feel I was quite justified, as were other members, in asking for that increase.

When the pensions were increased in 1951 we asked for an increase in war veterans allowances. It was justified then and if it had been given at that time many of our old soldiers who suffered during the winter of 1951 would have had a much easier and more comfortable time. I and other members asked for an increase at that time. The increase for which I had asked was given in 1952, and in the eyes of the government it was then justified. I have asked time and again for increases. If there is a veterans affairs committee this session, as I feel there should be, I shall again ask for what I believe to be reasonable consideration for war veterans.

We have had the different veterans organizations before us in the veterans affairs committee many times. They have presented their briefs on these occasions but I have never felt that the veterans and pensioners of this country were trying to exploit the government and the taxpayers of Canada. I have always felt that what they asked for was reasonable, just and right and that their only object in making such requests was to improve the situation of their comrades and other veterans.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I was gratified to hear the assurance given to the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) two weeks ago when he said that he had impressed upon the royal commission inquiring into the South Saskatchewan river project the urgency of submitting a report with the greatest possible dispatch. The Prime Minister said at that time that he would be disappointed if the commission's report was not available before Christmas. As a member from Saskatchewan, I have naturally followed the deliberations and the progress of the commission with very close interest, and I shall have more to say on the matter when the report is made public.

I have risen to speak in the throne speech debate because of a subject that is of particular interest to me as a physician and because of my association with the Department of National Health and Welfare as parliamentary assistant to the minister. I welcome the reference in the throne speech debate to the extension, with certain changes, of the federal national health program. I might say here that it has given me particular pleasure to note the great interest displayed in this subject by various speakers who have preceded me. However, there seems to be a certain amount of misunderstanding because a number of members referred to a "proposed" national health plan. Surely hon. members are not unaware that there is a very ambitious national health plan under which the federal government has, during the past four and a half years, spent approximately $100 million. I believe they made available for this plan approximately $167 million but the provincial services had not advanced sufficiently to be able to absorb the grants as rapidly as they were offered.

Because of this program greater health progress has been made during these four and a half years than during any other similar period in Canada's history. I am sure every member of the house would give his full support to any measure that would help to strengthen the health services available to the people of this country. For this reason the house will await with interest a statement in due course that will amplify the government's intention as expressed in the speech from the throne. I am sure it will readily agree that any statement of government policy in this regard should be made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). As hon. members know, the minister is now attending the general assembly of the United Nations where he is acting as chairman of the Canadian delegation. I think I can assure hon. members that on his return he will give the house more information as to the next steps that are proposed in our national health plan.

My purpose in speaking today then is not to outline future plans but rather to clear up certain misunderstandings that now seem to exist as to the purpose, the scope and the progress of Canada's national health plan. The house now has before it an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on behalf of the socialist party of which he is the leader. This amendment expresses regret that the government has failed to recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration. In order to see the problem in its proper perspective, it seems to me that we must examine two key questions suggested by the amendment itself. The first is: What is health insurance? Second, since the amendment to the amendment suggests provincial administration, we must take a look at the constitutional alignment of responsibilities in Canada in the health field.

Since we are considering a subamendment dealing with health insurance, it is important that every member of the house should have a clear appreciation of just what is meant by this term. Health insurance in the best sense is a good deal more than providing some method of prepaying costs of illness. I am afraid that when people think of health insurance too many of them think of it in the much more limited sense of sickness insurance, as I fear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no.

Mr. McCusker: As a physician I recognize the importance of this aspect of health insurance. I realize the difficulty experienced by many families in meeting costs of hospitalization and medical care when sudden illness strikes. But as a physician I also recognize that any health insurance program worthy of the name should have a much broader objective. It should be a comprehensive plan organized and directed towards promoting good health. A comprehensive national health plan should include the establishment of adequate preventive, diagnostic and early treatment services and should encourage the full use of these services in order to see that every citizen will not only be assured of adequate care in the event of illness but will be encouraged to take positive steps toward the goal of good health. When a national health plan is considered in terms of these broader objectives it becomes clear what was meant by the late prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, when, in announcing a national health program in 1948, he emphasized that the federal grants thus provided represented foundation measures and, indeed, the first steps in the overall development of a comprehensive national health plan. When we consider the program within this broader framework it must be evident to every member that much solid progress has already been made in Canada towards achieving our goal of the best health insurance system in the world.

In a few moments I wish to outline a few highlights of the national health plan, but before doing so let me say a word about the constitutional division of responsibility for health and welfare in this country. Governmental responsibility for health and welfare action in Canada provides an interesting study. In Canada at confederation there was no such thing as social welfare in the modern sense and, for this reason, there is no clear statement in the British North America Act placing social welfare under the jurisdiction of either provincial or federal governments. However, in the health field, apart from certain statutory responsibilities delegated to the federal government—such as control of food and drugs, sick mariners and others—the responsibility for health services is clearly placed in the hands of the provincial authorities.

Over the years the need for social action has increased and, gradually, public opinion has changed to favour a measure of national responsibility for welfare services. The pressure was no doubt increased by our experience during the depression years, when the municipal and provincial governments found it exceedingly difficult to bear the increasing costs of various social measures; and so the federal government has been asked to share more and more responsibility in this field.

The upward thrust of responsibility from municipal to provincial and from provincial to federal governments has been particularly marked during the post-war years, and we have seen the federal government progressively drawn into the health as well as the welfare field. To illustrate the vast increase in the extent of health and welfare measures, and to indicate the changing responsibilities, it might be useful to examine the changed pattern of social expenditures over the past twenty-five years. Let us compare health and welfare expenditures in 1926 to similar governmental expenditures in 1950. In this twenty-five-year period municipal expenditures on health and welfare increased from $21 million to $72 million. Provincial expenditures increased from $17 million to $238 million. Federal expenditures increased from $50 million to $723 million.

These figures clearly illustrate the increased cost of health and welfare measures and the vastly increased participation of the federal government in those fields. This year all governments in Canada will spend $1·25 billion on various health and welfare measures. Here I might remind hon. members that a clear distinction cannot be drawn between what is spent on health and what is spent on welfare. In the final analysis health and welfare are indivisible. For example, family allowances, which provide greater economic security to the whole family, have their effect on the health of the people by making possible better standards of nutrition and more adequate medical and dental care. Other welfare grants such as old age pensions, veterans allowances, blind pensions, unemployment insurance, and I could name many others, all have their beneficial effects on health.

Today, however, I would like to deal only with those federal expenditures directly bearing on health. When the health grants came into effect in 1948 the federal government recognized that there were certain weaknesses and deficiencies in Canada's health services that could not be corrected within the limits of provincial budgets. The federal government decided, therefore, to make federal grants available to all provinces to assist them in improving their health facilities and thus to pave the way for the introduction of a comprehensive health plan.

There were three main areas in which the federal government felt that accelerated progress was needed and grants were accordingly directed towards those needs. The first was in health information. Basic information on the nation's health facilities and services and on our future needs was wholly inadequate. To offset this situation the government offered grants to each province for the purpose of conducting comprehensive surveys of the provinces' health resources. I shall have more to say about those surveys in a moment.

To supplement the information contained in the provincial surveys, the government undertook a national sickness survey to ascertain the incidence of ill health in this country, as well as the adequacy of health care available to the average Canadian family. We were short of facilities and equipment. To help overcome deficiencies in our health facilities, the government offered grants for hospital construction as well as for the establishment of clinics and other health services.

Grants were also made available for the training and employment of badly needed health workers and for the purchase of specialized equipment and supplies for local and provincial health services.

It was recognized that a great deal more could be done to combat such serious health problems as cancer, tuberculosis, mental illness, crippling conditions in children, arthritis and rheumatism.

Special grants were earmarked to help the provinces develop improved services and facilities in these fields.

Now let me say a word about provincial health surveys to which I have already referred. Let me emphasize that the preliminary work of building the necessary facilities and equipment with the aid of federal grants has, from the first, been recognized as an essential prelude to the inauguration of the insurance aspects of our national health plan. The purpose of the provincial surveys are twofold. Through the surveys accurate information would be made available on the future needs of the provinces and would provide for the intelligent utilization of the grants. The surveys would give each province an opportunity of indicating whether they felt they could now move on to some further stage of health insurance. Nine of the ten surveys have now been received and it is interesting to note the views they expressed.

In general, they commend the government on its grant program and reaffirm the fact that facilities and services will have to be brought to better levels before the next step can be taken with any assurance of success. In view of the wide publicity that has been given to the provincial surveys it seems rather astonishing that so much misinformation or lack of information seems to exist on the subject.

Let us consider statements in the past ten days by members of the three opposition parties in this house—first of all, the official opposition—the Progressive Conservative party. On November 24 the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said in this house, and I quote from page 29 of Hansard:

> . . . there should be general agreement that the first and necessary step in dealing with this subject is to institute an inquiry which would be conducted by representatives of the medical profession, the hospital boards, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments.

Note that the Leader of the Opposition suggests that "the first step" in the institution of a national health plan is to conduct such an inquiry. He said that it would be improper for the dominion government to proceed further with its plan in this field without the most extensive inquiry to ascertain the basic facts upon which any sound approach to this problem must depend. Surely the Leader of the Opposition, for all his extensive travels in recent months, could not have gotten so completely out of touch with things in his own country that he was not aware that ten provincial surveys had already been conducted, nine completed, on the very kind of inquiry that he had suggested. Surely, the Conservative party is not so conservative that it still wants us to call conferences that have been called already, make studies that have already been made or draw plans that have been drawn up. How could a party and its leader be so far out of touch with reality as to be unaware of what has taken place in the country for the past four and a half years.

The only parallel I can find for this state of amnesia is in the fabled sleep of Rip van Winkle. May I point out also that the artillery used by the Conservatives in attacking the government health program is just as rusty and ineffective as was the old fowling piece of Rip van Winkle after it had lain beside him during his twenty years of slumber.

The C.C.F. party do not want studies. They want action, headlong action, regardless of the consequences. Last session the C.C.F. party was embarrassed by the conservative views of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), whom I see sitting over there today. He would like to see the means test reimposed on old age pensions and extended to family allowances. What are his views on the demands of his party today? He has not been allowed to express them. This time they are not taking any chances. Their leader has laid down the party line right at the start. The socialists who want the co-operation of the provinces should re-read the provincial health surveys. If they did, they would find that only two of these reports have suggested that the time is opportune.

The member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) suggests that we take the health insurance plans of other countries, Sweden, France, Belgium, Holland, New Zealand or England, and superimpose them upon our own excellent health services. I submit that would be just as sensible as superimposing a volkswagen body on a Cadillac chassis.

Then, last Wednesday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) again assured us that a national health plan is not something to be approached gradually. No; the C.C.F. would have us go ahead regardless of whether we are ready or not and regardless of the views of the provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Did you not just say that plans were already drawn?

Mr. McCusker: Just a moment; I am making this speech. The Social Credit is one party on the other side of the house which is properly labelled, for in the realm of social action they at least give credit where credit is due. Hon. members will recall the words used by the leader of that party about two weeks ago when he said, and I quote from page 56 of Hansard for November 24:

> I think a fair start has already been made in Canada, and it should be aggressively expanded and extended as rapidly as resources can be made available, consistent with sound development practices.

[Mr. McCusker.]

At least the Social Crediters have some appreciation of the progress that has been made over the past four and a half years to build a better level of health services throughout Canada. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) at least recognizes that we have had for four and a half years a definite, concrete and aggressive health program, and does not continually refer to a "proposed" national health plan. The attitude of the hon. member for Peace River is oddly at variance, however, with the tone of the Alberta health survey report which recommends the immediate introduction of compulsory health insurance. I have the report here. In view of the remarkable divergence of views between the Social Credit government of Alberta and the national leader of the Social Credit party, it might be just as well if the hon. member were to state which is the official view.

So much for the surveys; so let me now deal briefly with some of the other features of the federal national health plan. Time will not permit me to go into detail on all that has been accomplished with the aid of federal grants towards building up the needed hospital accommodation, training additional staff, extending existing services and establishing entirely new facilities. Perhaps I might first pick out from the thousands of projects that have been submitted by the provinces over the past four and a half years, and involving federal expenditures of $100 million, seven or eight of the main highlights.

Since the beginning of the program, federal aid has been approved for more than 400 individual hospital construction projects which will provide 41,000 new hospital beds. To help overcome staff shortages, special training has been provided to some 3,900 professional health workers in various fields. Federal funds have been used to employ several thousand additional health workers in provincial and local health departments. Substantial support has been given towards the establishment and equipping of various clinics, diagnostic centres, outpatient departments in hospitals, and other public health services. Over two million Canadians are receiving X-ray examinations each year in an effort to help detect unsuspected tuberculosis in its earliest stages. Assistance has been given towards the establishment of mobile and stationary clinics for the treatment of arthritis and rheumatism. Campaigns against cancer and other serious health hazards have been greatly intensified.

When I am speaking about cancer, may I produce here the act that was passed in Saskatchewan in 1944 and made law in June before the C.C.F. came into power. I am doing this because on a previous occasion when I spoke in this house the member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) said that the cancer legislation had been introduced by the C.C.F. government. Here is the act, and it was law before the C.C.F. government came into power. I may say that the body of the act has not been changed since that time.

Mr. Coldwell: What was the date of the act?

Mr. McCusker: It is the Cancer Control Act, 1944, and it was made law on June 15.

Mr. Coldwell: Just a month before the dissolution of the legislature.

Mr. McCusker: Well, it was law. There has been an impressive increase in medical and public health research. These are but a few of the encouraging developments of the past few years. There are some who claim that the Liberal government has been promising action but doing nothing since a health program was first considered in 1919.

I would ask them to look at the record of the past 33 years. They will see a tremendous increase in government expenditures on health from 1919 to 1951. I have just quoted you the figures. They will also see many evidences that these expenditures have paid off in better health. The general mortality rate has been impressively decreased. Infant and maternal mortality rates have been slashed. Tuberculosis is being brought under control. Diseases like smallpox, diphtheria, whooping cough, etc., have been effectively checked. There can be no question but that Canadians today have access to better health than at any previous time in our history.

Gradually and unceasingly over the years, more particularly since the inauguration of the national health program, Canada has moved ahead along the path towards a comprehensive nation-wide health plan for the people. In the light of past progress and existing needs, plans for the future will be made.

Before taking my seat I should like to say a few words about the stand of the C.C.F. and about their record in my home province of Saskatchewan. Let me first point out a few glaring inconsistencies in the statements of the C.C.F. members.

In a national broadcast their leader said that health insurance would "replace entirely" the amounts now being spent by individuals on health care. Surely the hon. gentleman knows this is not realistic. Surely he knows that these services must be paid for by somebody. Hon. members must realize that we have gone a long way on the path towards ensuring the best of health for Canadians. The transition has been gradual and has not disrupted our economy.

I think the following story will illustrate the manner in which this transition is taking place. Professor Howell of the Royal Victoria hospital in Montreal was asked to outline for McGill university a curriculum which, if followed, would result in the graduating of cultured young men and women. He replied that this was difficult. Culture, he said, was something that came upon one who studied, who read and who thought a great deal and it came upon him gradually and was lasting. This is the manner in which our health program has progressed, it has been built gradually, firmly and it will last.

True health insurance cannot be purchased with a lump of money nor can it be achieved by a half-baked C.C.F. pre-election plan. It will be the reward of much planning, much thought, much study and a great deal of hard work.

It is only a few months since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was castigating the government for its failure to set up a parliamentary committee on health insurance. Now his leader says he hopes the government will not set up a committee. He says we have had enough committees.

Then in another national broadcast the leader of the C.C.F. party suggested that the federal grants are not high enough to encourage hospital building. Surely the hon. member must consider 41,000 beds in 4½ years to be a fairly good record.

When speaking the other day the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was quoting figures that I did not consider were correct, and I asked his permission to place the correct figures on Hansard. I asked if he wanted the correct figures and he said no.

Mr. Coldwell: He said yes.

Mr. McCusker: He said no.

Mr. Noseworthy: He said yes.

Mr. McCusker: I will read you Hansard. He said no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. McCusker: I have here statistics of hospital construction grants, beds approved up until November 12, 1952. Grants have been approved for 41,075 hospital beds and also—something that we had not been planning for until recently and which is a new grant—3,245 nurses' beds. While I am correcting the statement made by the hon. member for Saskatoon I might just as well correct a statement that the leader of the C.C.F. made on the radio. He said that in 1944 there were less than 4 beds per thousand in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Saskatoon said that there were 3·7. The correct figure is 4·8. I have the statistics here which show that. I have them for the year 1941 and they give the figures. I have not time to give them all but they are available to the house if hon. members want them.

There is another matter that both the leader of the C.C.F. party and the hon. member for Saskatoon forgot to mention. They were telling of the great number of beds, almost 7 per thousand, that we have in Saskatchewan. The fact that they forgot to mention is that the population of Saskatchewan has fallen off 7 per cent since we have had a socialist government there, while the population of Canada has increased 18 per cent. It is therefore easier to provide beds when you have a falling population, coming down to the beds that you have, than when you are building up to catch up with an expanding population.

I now wish to say a few words about the health program in my home province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. member proceeds, may I say this.

An hon. Member: I hope you take this time out, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not objecting to an extension of the time. I suggest that the hon. member look at page 220 of Hansard. If he does so, he will see there the following:

Mr. McCusker: Does he wish to give correct figures?

Mr. Knight: The answer is yes.

Mr. McCusker: All right. Read the next question.

Mr. Coldwell: Very well.

Mr. McCusker: Then will the hon. member permit me to give them?

Mr. Croll: And the answer is no.

Mr. Coldwell: The answer is:

Mr. Knight: No. As I explained, I have the source for all these figures. If my friend wishes to correct them in a speech of his own, that is his responsibility.

He is doing that now.

Mr. McCusker: I am doing that now.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what was suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

Mr. McCusker: Now I wish to say a few words about the health program in my own province of Saskatchewan which receives such extravagant praise from the socialist side of the house. There is a sort of legend which has grown up in Canada that the C.C.F. has built a wonderful health program in the province of Saskatchewan. As a Saskatchewan physician, I would be the last to suggest that Saskatchewan has not an excellent health program; even though we have nothing to be complacent about, I am proud of it. But if we are going to pay tribute to the health progress made in my home province let us look to the facts and pay tribute to those pioneers who were responsible for it.

Mr. Coldwell: I have done that.

Mr. McCusker: Our excellent health structure in Saskatchewan was not built up in the comparatively short time that the province has been in socialist hands but over the past two generations. Long before anyone had ever heard of the C.C.F., the foundations were laid. For instance, I know that the first elements in the province's health insurance program date back beyond 1916. I know that the municipal doctor schemes and the district hospital plans date back to the first world war. The province's excellent tuberculosis control program goes back even further to 1910, and free treatment for all patients in sanatoria was inaugurated in 1929. I saw these and other health programs develop under other administrations. I was present at the birth and know who fathered these plans for which the C.C.F. now claim parentage. The solid health structure that now exists in Saskatchewan has been a slow and steady development, built on sound foundations.

In Saskatchewan we constantly hear it said that we had no public health department. Let me quote a few statistics on health in Saskatchewan. In 1922 there were 134·7 cases of diphtheria per 100,000 people and in 1944 the rate was down to 10·9 cases per 100,000 people. As to scarlet fever, in the period 1920 to 1924 inclusive, there were 289 deaths from that disease in Saskatchewan. In 1940 to 1944 inclusive, there were 39 deaths from that disease. With regard to smallpox, in 1922 there were 33·1 cases per 100,000 of population. By 1944 the rate was down to no cases per 100,000; there was no smallpox. As to typhoid fever, in 1922 there were 31·6 cases per 100,000 people. By 1944, the rate was down to 2·1 cases per 100,000. In the five years from 1938 to 1943, preceding the C.C.F. advent in Saskatchewan, over 500,000 children were immunized against smallpox, diphtheria, scarlet fever and whooping cough.

I ask hon. members this question: Can you say that a province can achieve that record without a good health service?

The province's excellent Cancer Control Act was enacted by a Liberal government before the C.C.F. came into office. When the socialists got in in 1944, their first step was to engage Dr. Henry E. Sigerist, dean of medicine of Johns Hopkins university, to survey the province's health services. I have his report here. Let me read a quotation from the Saskatchewan Star-Phœnix of September 21, 1944, reporting a public address by Dr. Sigerist:

> He praised the present facilities and standards of health in Saskatchewan, stating that the province had a superb record and a splendid set-up which had been built up in years of gradual work. It was only a question of extending those facilities.

Dr. Sigerist went on to say:

> When a history of North American medicine was written, Saskatchewan would have a special chapter for its pioneer work in this field.

We all know who the pioneers in medicine were in Saskatchewan, and they certainly were not socialists, nor were they friendly toward socialism, or its ideas. They were men who detested socialism. Dr. Maurice Seymour, the first deputy minister of health in Saskatchewan, was responsible for a lot of the good record that I have just read. Then there was Dr. Ferguson, who was responsible for the organization of our campaign and the building of our hospitals in Saskatchewan to take care of tuberculosis, and who is world famous. Dr. Munroe—and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) will be glad to hear this because he was the Conservative minister of health in Dr. Anderson's government—introduced the cancer legislation in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Drew: I am not learning that from you just now. Like the other things, I knew this for a long time, because I was associated with him.

Mr. McCusker: You forgot them the other day.

Mr. Drew: No, I have not forgotten them.

Mr. McCusker: Dr. Uhrich, the minister of health in the Liberal government of Saskatchewan, introduced free cancer treatment, among other things. It must be evident to all that the health program for which the C.C.F. is taking much credit in Saskatchewan is simply an extension of earlier programs inaugurated by other governments, and that any developments, outside of hospitalization, taking place today are being paid for in substantial measure out of federal grants, and that we are also paying our share toward hospital and nursing residence construction.

Once upon a time the leaders of the C.C.F. party in Saskatchewan were mostly poor men who talked about socialism. Now they are mostly comfortable capitalists with a love of travel. They believe in private ownership for themselves and state ownership for others. If they cannot get votes on socialism, they try to get them on sickness. Despite the hysterical campaign the C.C.F. party is conducting in an attempt to urge precipitate action on this house, I am convinced that Canadians generally are favouring the sensible, gradual approach to these problems that has been the mark of Liberal policy over the years. That labour does not approve of this campaign is indicated by the following editorial from the current issue of the Trades and Labour Congress magazine:

> There is no question that the vast majority of Canadians need and want a system of health insurance. Our politicians have realized this for a very long time and have used it many times for vote-catching purposes. Most people want it with or without any petitions which might be construed as another effort to advance a particular political cause by some further exploitation of a long overdue and urgently desired need for better health. Organized labour does not want to see the question of health insurance politically muddied.

Is this not precisely what the C.C.F. is doing today when they are issuing petitions, putting on campaigns to force this on the government in spite of what the people of the different provinces have indicated they want?

Disraeli said:

> Health is the first duty of a statesman.

Today, judging by the C.C.F. campaign, there is danger of it becoming the last refuge of a politician.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate my first observation would be that the speech from the throne reminds me very much of the grab bags which used to be sold in our general stores some years ago. When you opened them you found a lot of everything in them, but not much of any one particular thing. That seems to be about the story with regard to the speech from the throne. It deals with a great many subjects, among them being the subject which has just been dealt with by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker). He has given us a considerable number of statistics with regard to what has been done in the field of health in the dominion and in the province of Saskatchewan over the last few years. His remark that the C.C.F. in the province of Saskatchewan are not now giving credit to the people who started some of these health measures is not true. On many occasions I have heard ministers of the crown in the province of Saskatchewan giving credit to Dr. Munroe. In fact they named one of the wings of the cancer clinic in Regina for Dr. Munroe, in honour of the basic work he had done in that respect.

The hon. member for Regina City indicated that I had on one occasion stated that the legislation with regard to cancer in the province of Saskatchewan had been passed by the C.C.F. government. He also indicated that the act had actually been proclaimed, if I remember correctly, on June 15, 1944. If my memory serves me rightly, I think the election was held on June 18, 1944. In other words, the act was proclaimed just four days before the provincial election.

Mr. McCusker: I am sure the hon. member does not want to be inaccurate. The act had passed through the legislature and had been approved—

Mr. Coldwell: Just before the dissolution.

Mr. Wright: It was proclaimed just four days before the provincial election. There is no doubt that a national health scheme for Canada can only be put into effect, and be effective, when there is basic education with regard to health and welfare services in this country. But surely if the figures given by the hon. member for Regina City of the basic investigations that have been carried out over the years are true, then we have reached the time when we can take another step forward in these health services which are so necessary to our Canadian people.

I am sure that Canadians were startled during the last war when it was proven that out of the men enlisting for active service approximately 42 per cent were unfit. That condition is not much better today. In fact it is worse, if the figures given recently by Lieutenant Colonel Matthews are correct, in which he states that 50 per cent enlisting today are physically and emotionally unfit for service in our armed forces. Surely it is time we made another step forward. We in the C.C.F. believe that national health insurance is the next forward step that should be made in Canada toward an over-all social security program for our people.

There are three distinct differences of opinion with regard to this matter. The Liberals state their position quite clearly in the speech from the throne. They say this:

> Much has been accomplished since the inauguration in 1948 of the five-year national health grants program to strengthen and improve, in co-operation with the provincial governments, the health and hospital facilities available to our people. To ensure the continued expansion of this important work, my government proposes to ask you to give consideration to the extension, with certain changes, of this program of co-operation with the provincial governments.

I do not know what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) may announce as to what that further step will be; whether it is just going to be an extension of the present hospital grants; whether it is going to mean an increase in those hospital grants, or whether it is going to mean what I believe, and what we in this group believe, should be a new step forward, which will give to our people complete health care. I say that because I am convinced we have reached the point in Canada where we can take this step, by extending the services we now have and which we are able to extend.

The health survey tabled by the government in Saskatchewan indicates that in that province we have carried on an experiment in provincial health services which could serve as a guide to other provinces, and to the dominion, in extending our medical services to full coverage at this time.

As the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) said, medical health services in western Canada have been growing over a period of years. The municipal doctor plan was inaugurated after the first war, and there are now in Saskatchewan 110 physicians with municipal doctor contracts. These physicians provide a varying range of services to approximately 200,000 persons in 107 municipalities in which there are municipal doctors.

Not only this, but in that province a great number of our physicians are engaged in some form of social medicine. Out of 563 active practitioners, 58 are employed in hospitals or institutions, 110 have municipal doctor contracts, and 36 are engaged in the Swift Current health area. This means that in Saskatchewan 204 out of 563 medical practitioners are already engaged in some form of social medicine. So with the introduction of a federal scheme we would simply be extending something already in existence in that province. I think members of the medical profession agree that some form of medical health insurance is necessary. As a matter of fact, already our doctors are engaging voluntarily in the clinic form of medicine. In Saskatchewan the trend among the members of the medical profession is to practise in partnerships and groups. The figures show that 205, or 43 per cent of the 479 general practitioners and specialists are engaged in this type of practice.

An examination of the distribution according to age groups reveals that in age groups below 40 physicians practising in groups or partnerships outnumber those practising alone by a ratio of four to three. The converse is true of age groups from 40 to 49 years and from 50 to 59 years. Of the 86 general practitioners and specialists over 60, 65 are practising alone.

In other words today the doctors themselves are voluntarily forming clinics to work at their profession. The day of the individual practitioner is over in Canada; and by instituting some over-all form of health insurance we will only be continuing something that is already growing in Canada.

The attitude of the Progressive Conservative party in this matter is expressed quite clearly in its amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Paragraph (d) of that amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) says this:

(d) To conduct inquiries in consultation with the provincial governments, so that necessary information may be available for the dominion and provincial governments to consider jointly a national health insurance program.

Well, evidence was placed before the house by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) indicating that there have been some 30 general surveys and reports in the last ten years. Today the hon. member for Regina City tabled the reports of five provinces and their surveys with respect to health insurance. Surely we do not need another one at this time. Surely we have reached the point where, over the years, we have built up a sense of the need for some further medical health care, to the point where we are prepared to take the necessary steps forward at this time.

That is why we in the C.C.F. offered our amendment to the amendment. Moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it stated that we should recommend legislation at this session establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration. I believe that is the position taken by the great majority of people in this country. The government has received the annual reports of the various labour organizations, including the A.F. of L., the C.I.O. and the Catholic Confederation of Labour. In nearly all these annual reports the recommendation is made that an over-all medical health scheme for Canada be instituted.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, women's institutes and farm unions—practically every organization in Canada, in making its report to our government, has asked for health insurance. A Gallup poll indicated that 75 per cent of our people are in favour of a national health insurance program. Surely this should be an indication to the government as to the position taken by people across this country.

In the C.C.F. all we are doing is trying to voice the will of the people in respect of a federal health service. I am sure if the Liberal party is to meet the needs of the people it must do more at this session than simply take another step, or extend steps already taken. It is true that health grants to the provinces have assisted. It is also true that the hospital grants now given are not sufficient. As a matter of fact the $1,000 per bed given by the dominion government, and supplemented in an equal amount by the various provincial governments, represents today only the increased cost of building hospitals in Canada since the time the grant was first given in 1948. There has been a tremendous increase in costs, and the grants only meet that increase; in fact, I do not think they do meet the whole of it. Municipalities are still burdened with the major cost of hospital construction.

I think that in the matter of hospital construction the municipalities must accept a share of the responsibility. In my view the building and the administration of hospitals throughout the country should remain under municipal control, because the closer one gets to the people in the administration of local services the more economically they are likely to be operated.

That has been the object of the health scheme in Saskatchewan. The province has tried to assist the municipalities in building these facilities. The moment some of these services are made available to the people you create the desire or the will to build the facilities to meet those services. It was the general hospitalization scheme introduced in Saskatchewan that caused the municipalities to begin a hospital building program. When the people in the province found that these services were to be made available to them, immediately they put pressure on their municipal governments to create the facilities, so they might use the hospitalization scheme then introduced.

The same thing would take place right across Canada. If we passed a national health scheme for the Dominion of Canada we would find a desire created, even in those provinces which may today be below the average in hospital beds available to their population, that would force municipalities to build the necessary facilities to make the act effective. That is why we in the C.C.F. believe we should make a real step forward in health insurance at this session of parliament.

I should now like to refer to another matter which is included in the speech from the throne. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are now in Great Britain at the commonwealth conference on trade relations. We do not know what the outcome of that conference may be. We do not know what recommendations may come out of it. One press report states that the matter of the revaluation of gold is under consideration and that the question of exchange rates may be taken up. I am sure every member of the house is anxious that out of this conference shall come better trade relations not only within the commonwealth but throughout the free areas of the world. It seems to me if that is to be accomplished there are certain basic things which we must take into consideration.

We in Canada and on the North American continent are in a very fortunate position. During the last war Canada was able to build up many of its productive facilities. We were able to increase the plant capacity of the country for manufacturing. We were able to increase our production of various raw materials. After the war we found ourselves in a much better position as far as trade was concerned than before the war started. Just the opposite was the case in Europe and in Great Britain. On the continent particularly they found that many of their factories had been destroyed. In England some of their factories were destroyed, and others became obsolete through almost continuous use in the production of war materials.

Let us see how we increased the value of our plant capacity in Canada. I am going to use the Aluminum Company of Canada as an example. During the war the capital of that company expanded by over $100 million. That plant was paid for out of the price which we obtained for aluminum. One of the greatest buyers of aluminum was Great Britain. In other words Great Britain, through her purchases of aluminum in Canada, made a very large investment in the expansion of that plant and the production of aluminum in this country, while at the same time much of her plant and equipment was becoming obsolete.

That can be carried into practically every field of manufacture. Our allies during the war, through the price they paid Canada for much of the equipment and material they needed, and which they used in bringing of the war to a successful conclusion, brought about the expansion of our plant and equipment. We find now when the war is over that we have expanded our plant and equipment in Canada while the markets for much of the goods supplied at one time by Great Britain have been lost to her. Her investments in this country were dissipated during the war or were used at that time for the purchase of raw materials and goods from this country. Now we are finding that we cannot trade with Great Britain, we cannot sell our farm products to Great Britain.

You know, it seems there is something wrong when we in this country have an abundance of feed grain and all the facilities to produce bacon in large quantities, yet in Great Britain the people are on a ration of two or three ounces of bacon a week. Are we genuine in our relationships with our NATO partners when we say to some of the European countries and Great Britain, for instance, as some people in this country do—I am very glad to say there are not many members of parliament in this class—that they should reduce their standard of living even further? These people say that Great Britain should do this so she may take her place alongside us in the production of the necessary materials to secure our protection and theirs against aggression in the world.

It seems to me that we have to reciprocate. We have to do something which Great Britain did in the early years of Canada's development. In those years Great Britain invested a lot of money in Canada in our railroads, in our early manufacturing plants and other enterprises that brought about the development of the country. Surely now in the hour of Great Britain's need, after she has dissipated her resources in two great wars, we should be prepared to reciprocate and try to build up in Great Britain and other NATO countries some of the plant and equipment which they used lavishly for our protection during the last war.

How can we do that? I think the proposals made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar should be given serious consideration. If we want to sell our agricultural products to Great Britain there is only one way in which Great Britain can pay for them, and that is in goods or services. She cannot produce these goods and services with her present plant and equipment. Therefore it seems to me that the wise thing for us to do would be to accept sterling for some of the goods and services we can supply to her. Let us sell her bacon, sell her apples, sell her cheese, accept sterling and invest that sterling in plant and equipment in Great Britain to assist in improving her ability to produce more goods and services so that later she can pay us for the products we produce in Canada.

I do not think that we can solve our trade problems by manipulating the price of gold or manipulating exchanges. The price of gold and the manipulation of exchanges simply are a barometer indicating what has taken place in trade. It may be a balance wheel to a certain extent, but the only true balance wheel in trade is the trading of goods for goods; and until the countries with which we are dealing are able to produce the goods we need at a price at which we are prepared to accept them, then trade will be a one-way street and will die. I agree with much of what the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) said the other day. We have to take down some of the barriers this country has erected against trade. We have to try to make trade a two-way street. We have to invest in some of these countries with which we want to trade so they can produce goods and services to pay for the things we have to sell to them. It does not make sense to see an agricultural policy being followed in this country which would restrict our production of agricultural products to what we can consume in this country when there are other countries engaged with us in a common defence program under NATO that have a standard of living which is much below ours.

This matter of exchange is rather a mystery to a lot of people. It seems an anomaly that today, through the manipulation of our exchange—I do not like the use of the word "manipulation", but through the fluctuations of our exchange—we, as western wheat producers, should be receiving about 20 cents a bushel, I believe—and it was 25 or 26 cents a bushel some three or four weeks ago—less than we were receiving six months ago when our Canadian dollar was 10 cents under the United States dollar. Under the international wheat agreement the last quotation I saw was $1.76. That price was $1.98 some six months ago. It has been as low as $1.72.

We are receiving less, yet the British are paying more for that grain than they were paying previously, just because the price paid by the British was fixed on the basis of the United States dollar. Usually when the producer receives less for a product one naturally assumes the consumer is paying less for it. That is the whole basis for fluctuations in price. When the producer receives less the consumer pays less, and because of the lesser price he is paying he consumes a bit more and you get an adjustment in price; but that is not what is taking place today. We are getting less and the British are paying the same for their purchases of our wheat. Not only that, the millers in Canada are paying less for the wheat because of the increase in the value of our Canadian dollar. They purchase the wheat at the international wheat agreement price. Some six months ago they were paying $1.98 plus regular carrying and diversion charges. Today they are paying the international wheat agreement price of $1.76; but are consumers in this country getting flour any cheaper as a result of that? Not at all. The price of flour has remained the same even though the price of wheat to millers has dropped by as much as 25 cents a bushel. Somebody must be making a greater profit out of the milling of wheat than they were before.

Notwithstanding all this the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) indicated to this house, and to the committee on agriculture, that he was pretty adamant in his position on wheat, that the domestic price for wheat should be the same as the international wheat agreement price. Surely he cannot argue today, with the millers buying the wheat at from 20 to 25 cents less because of the fluctuations in the exchange rates, that it is a position that we in Canada should be in now. Surely there is no reason, just because there was a rise in the value of the Canadian dollar, for the millers of this country to be able to purchase wheat cheaper by 20 to 26 cents. If they do, then certainly that cheaper wheat should be reflected in cheaper flour to the consumers of this country, and that has not been the case to date.

The primary producers of this country are taking a tremendous loss today because of the fluctuations in the exchange rates. Estimates have been made by various authorities. I have here an editorial in the Western Producer which indicates that the loss this year to the western grain producers may amount to as much as $150 million. That is a serious loss. They state here:

> It is possible that Mr. Abbott is not fully cognizant of the enormous penalty paid by prairie wheat growers as a result of the exchange situation. It is costing them a full 25 cents per bushel when compared with the rate prevailing at the time the wheat agreement was negotiated. That will amount to something like $150 million on the grain going to market this year. It will cost a farmer $250 on every 1,000 bushels of wheat. The farmer who harvests 10,000 bushels of wheat is nicked to the tune of $2,500.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) may think that is all right, that the western wheat producers should have $150 million less to spend on goods and services this year, but there will not be the same demand for those goods and services. They will not buy as many refrigerators or as much new machinery as they might have had they received this additional purchasing power. It enables the government to keep down the cost of living in this country, but surely the primary producers—and the pulp and paper and lumber people are in the same position as the western farmers—should not be asked to subsidize the lowering of the cost of living in this country. That is what is taking place with the present exchange fluctuations.

It is all very well to say that it is fine for our Canadian dollar to be at a premium over the United States dollar, but some people are paying a pretty high price for that fact, and they are the primary producers, the wheat producers in western Canada.

We all agree that we should have an international wheat agreement. I think 95 per cent of the wheat producers in western Canada are behind the wheat board and the government in trying to negotiate another wheat agreement. What we do object to in western Canada is that when we have negotiated these long-term agreements the government should then change the conditions under which we as producers have to fulfil them. That has happened twice now. When we entered into the British contract in 1947 there was a price ceiling on most of the things which went into the cost of production in this country. Immediately after we made that agreement the government took off the price ceilings in this country with the result that the producers, whose product had been sold at a fixed price for three years and at a negotiated price in the last year, saw their cost of production go up by from 25 to 50 per cent. As a result that agreement, which had been a good agreement as far as the wheat producers were concerned when it was entered into, became not nearly so good, because conditions over which the government had control changed. Now the same thing is taking place with regard to the international wheat agreement.

When we entered into the international wheat agreement the price was fixed on the basis of the United States dollar, and during much of that contract as a result of the price being fixed on the basis of the United States dollar, we were getting for our wheat $1.98 plus carrying charges. The government then, on the advice of the Conservative party, did away with the foreign exchange control board and freed the Canadian dollar. Immediately that dollar began to rise until it reached $1.04½ as compared with the United States dollar. That resulted at once in a change in the conditions under which wheat growers were producing their product to fulfil the agreement entered into on their behalf. As I said before it meant that they would get 20 to 25 cents a bushel less for their grain, because this government changed the conditions that Canada had control over, thereby reducing the price received by the producers for their product.

That is the surest way by which we can discourage our people or attempt to discourage our people from entering into these agreements. In western Canada we certainly believe in these long-term agreements and we believe that the government, in negotiating them, should take the advice of some of the officials of our various organizations in western Canada. I have in my hand a copy of an address given by J. H. Wesson at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. I believe that in a couple of sentences he sums up the position of the producers of western Canada very effectively. He states:

> I think we should concern ourselves with this one point, and I hope you raise this in the country, What are we likely to get in prices if we don't have an agreement? That should be our concern.

He continues later:

> In other words the whole principle of international agreement, that we debated over 22 years ago, was that we wanted prices fair to the producer and fair to the consumer alike, and we wanted to get away from this so-called three-dollar wheat and the next year 40-cent wheat. So I want to repeat we can't expect to get peak prices under an international wheat agreement, but we don't face those cellar prices of 38 and 40 cents as we did in the black thirties. I think the most important thing that our people should consider today is not how much we could get in a ceiling price, as how high we can get the floor price for our own protection for the future of the next four years.

I think that sums up pretty well the attitude of the western wheat producer. I hope that in negotiating another wheat contract our government will take this into consideration.

For just a few minutes I want to deal with the question of transportation facilities. We are going to have quite a problem in getting our crop to market this year. I feel that the wheat board and the transportation companies did a reasonably good job in moving our crop last year. In western Canada we have had two years in which our crop was out of condition, in which a large percentage of it was in the lower grades and a large percentage was tough and damp. These crops have been moved to market without any serious loss. I believe the wheat board and the various authorities who have had charge of the movement of those crops have done a reasonable job. It is true that there have been certain localities in which conditions have existed which should not have existed. Some localities were able to get their crop to market quicker than other areas. But taken as a whole there has been a reasonable attempt made to move our crop to market in an orderly manner.

This year we are going to face problems as great or greater. It is going to take all the facilities we have available to market our crop before the next crop year. One of our facilities which I believe should be extended at this time is the port of Churchill. We have there a government elevator which has approximately a 2·5 million bushel capacity.

This year we have moved through that port the largest amount of grain that has been moved to date, about 8¼ million bushels. Anyone who knows anything about the movement of grain knows the problem there is when you move 8¼ million bushels of grain during the short period that port is open, and with an elevator capacity of approximately 2·5 million bushels. In other words there is about 2 million bushels capacity available there, and the space for the other half million bushels has to be used for working space.

If we are to increase the deliveries through that port, as I believe we should, then action should be taken. By delivering grain through that port we can deliver a much greater amount with the same number of box cars than we could if those box cars were used to bring grain to Port Arthur and Fort William, and the amount would be even greater if those box cars must be used to bring grain to eastern Canada. The On-to-the-Bay Association in western Canada is an active body. They have made certain recommendations to the government upon which I believe the government should take action.

They suggest first that the elevator capacity at Churchill should be doubled before the opening of the 1953 season. In answer to a question the other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) indicated that this matter would be given consideration. I hope that consideration is going to be given in sufficient time to enable us to handle more of our grain through that port in the 1953 season.

The second recommendation reads:

In view of increase in overseas and coastal trade, enlargement of dock and equipment to allow berthing and loading two more ships, making berth space for five boats.

3. Essential that an effective ice patrol by air be organized out of Churchill by plane or helicopter effective mid July until late August with assurance that all information and advice be given ships before they approach and leave Churchill.

4. All season effective air patrol of the straits.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, I have just a few more of the proposals made by this organization to read. If I could have the unanimous consent of the house, I would do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Mr. Ferrie: I object.

Mr. Wright: As the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) has objected to my putting on the record the recommendations of this organization—

Mr. Ferrie: You would not let me, so I will not let anyone else.

Mr. Wright: —I shall use another opportunity to put them on the record.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, for the able way in which they fulfilled the task entrusted to them. Their speeches show without the shadow of a doubt that the electors of Brome-Missisquoi and of Waterloo North have every reason to be proud of the members they recently chose to represent them.

Before beginning my remarks, I would like to mention some incidents that occurred during the past year about which the people of Lake St. John have reason to be proud.

First, last February, their member had the honour of being chosen as seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I then had the pleasure of telling the house of the beauty, the wealth and the prodigious development of that part of our country.

Later, in June to be exact, with the encouragement and co-operation of my colleagues from Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) and from Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), I was able to demonstrate on the spot to a group of 65 members and their wives how well-founded were the statements I had made in my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This trip, I am sure, was much appreciated and has been for quite a few a true revelation. The sentiment of pride, felt by the people of my constituency and the people of the whole Saguenay district, was unsurpassed except for the honour and the pleasure they had in welcoming such a delegation of distinguished and keenly interested people.

Visits like these are surely enough to revive our pride in being Canadians and to strengthen our desire for national unity.

Finally, we had the honour, during the month of August, to welcome the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He was able to appreciate for himself the immense industrial possibilities of a district newly opened but still full of promise. We are thankful to Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent for the interest he takes in every part of our immense country; the prosperity enjoyed in this "kingdom" of the Saguenay is not peculiar to this part of Canada, for it spreads all over the country.

Mr. Speaker, like every other member of this house and every other Canadian, I was proud and happy to learn of the elevation by our holy father the Pope of His Excellency Archbishop Leger to the exalted rank of cardinal. The people from the constituency of Lake St. John extend to him their most heartfelt congratulations, assure him of their filial submission and respectful good wishes.

Last week, in this house, we heard some severe criticism levelled at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), in an excellent speech delivered yesterday, supported the government's action in regard to television. He did so with skill, with convincing arguments. He deserves our congratulations.

I do not intend to deal with this matter in such an exhaustive way. Still I would like to express my own opinion. The Liberal party has always championed Canadian unity and, for the past 25 years, and especially under its present leader has attempted to bring into play all those factors favourable to the development of a true Canadian spirit and of an attitude worthy of a sovereign nation mindful of the duties which it is called upon to discharge.

Radio broadcasting goes back to 1919, but each station has been operated first and foremost for the income which such and such program could produce; unfortunately, there was no organized body capable of guiding radio activities in the interest of Canadian listeners and in that of Canada as a nation.

In 1929, the government which was then headed by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, in a foresighted gesture, instituted a royal commission of inquiry presided over by Sir John Aird. Insisting on the fact that radio broadcasting was a responsible public institution and that it is an excellent means of popular education, that commission, even if it recognized the laudable efforts of private stations, made recommendations which were eventually to bring about a system which was to become one of the greatest factors of national unity and better understanding between the different racial groups of this country.

[Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John).]

The opinion claiming that radio broadcasting should serve, first and foremost, to create and maintain a Canadian culture is now firmly established and does not give rise to any discussion. In order to allow for the implementation of such a policy, in order that its application may become a constant practice, it was necessary to have a directing body entrusted with the supervision of foreign broadcasts, with the fostering of programs liable to awaken national interest, in short, with the orientation of broadcasting to programs of Canadian inspiration, more in keeping with our national mentality.

I am not suggesting that it was necessary to give this body the name of C.B.C. or Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any other name but I declare that even if it were to exist outside the national network, it would be necessary to grant the latter privileges and advantages which would allow it to attain the objective for which it was created.

What is true of radio is even more so of television. The present government cannot repeat the mistake committed in the early days of radio. I for one would not want to see a menace of cultural annexation by the Americans threaten once again the present generation. Has it not been said before the Massey commission on national development in arts, letters and sciences, by a representative of a private station that the best way to raise the cultural level in Canada would be to take full advantage of the culture which has progressed most rapidly, that of the United States.

Do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the conscious or unconscious tendency towards the acquisition of American culture greatly endangers the future of our young nation, such a tendency being moreover favoured by economic factors, inasmuch as private broadcasting stations are considered. From a strictly commercial point of view, it is easy to see that a private station owner would be strongly tempted to import films or to pipe in programs produced by American stations more cheaply than in Canada.

For that reason, I favour the present policy of the government in respect to television. It is advisable that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be the first to guide television and produce programs of Canadian inspiration.

I do not pretend that the C.B.C. is a perfect institution: it has made errors and it will likely make others. Together with the members of the Massey-Lévesque commission, I believe that some of the gaps can be filled in. As an example of that, I give the following conclusion put forward by the royal commission:

That persons engaged in radio broadcasting in Canada directly and adversely affected by a final decision of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on any matter in which this board has final authority be granted the right of appeal to a federal court against substantial miscarriage of justice.

Although there might be room for improvement as far as the status of the C.B.C. is concerned or for the amendment of some of its regulations, I cannot accept the conclusions of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) who says, at page 76 of Hansard:

Neither do I hesitate to accept the conclusions of Basil Dean, whose texts published in the Calgary Herald have been translated into French and published in pamphlet form under the title "Freedom of the Airwaves" In so far as television is concerned, his conclusions are as follows: Television in Canada, he writes, will have to be submitted to some sort of control—of course—but not to that of the C.B.C. It should be the same kind of control that is asked for radio—a purely technical control. That control should be exercised by an independent commission, similar to the board of transport commissioners; that commission should assign the radio frequencies and television wave-lengths. That is, after all, the only formal control that should exist.

The hon. member says that he accepts the conclusions of Basil Dean; it means, in other words, that he would be favourable to a purely technical control the sole purpose of which would be to assign television wavelengths. It is truly impossible for me to support such policy.

Mr. Speaker, we from Quebec have particular reasons to resist the threat of American cultural assimilation. We have a profound devotion to our language, our religion and our traditions—in a word, to our French culture.

The present policy of this government is favourable to the growth of a distinctive Canadian culture, as well as to the maintenance of French culture, which is an absolutely essential element in the existence of this Canadian nation of ours.

Certainly, sooner or later, private enterprise will have a hand in television, but the latter will have, meanwhile, learned to serve the national interest.

It will be pointed out to us that censorship may play a truly useful part in the cleaning up of television broadcasts. I agree. I might add in passing, too, that censorship belongs to the provincial field and must be applied by provincial governments. Still, by its very nature, censorship exerts a purely passive or negative action, in that it prevents the spread of what may be more particularly injurious to the morals and education of our youth. It can never replace with any efficiency a state-supported body whose mission is to foster and maintain the growth of Canadian unity, of a true Canadianism. In short, we must have a positive and constructive television policy. There is the whole difference, Mr. Speaker, between the policy put forward by the Progressive Conservative party and that expounded by the Liberal party.

The former favours a policy of abstention, a purely negative or passive one, whereas the latter demonstrates in this connection, as in others, foresight, realism and patriotism.

(Text):

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate this afternoon I feel that we are coming back to finish up some of the jobs we should have done last session, or perhaps two or three sessions ago. I refer now to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

It will be remembered that for some time we on the opposition side have tried to have something done about that, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) was good enough to set up a committee at the last session and make certain changes. Until that time a single veteran was getting an allowance of $40 a month and a married veteran $70 a month. Many of us who had been out around the country did not feel, and still do not feel that that is sufficient for those veterans. Recommendations were made that this be increased from $40 to $60 and from $70 to $120; but when the bill was brought in provision was made to increase the allowance for the single veteran to $50 a month, and for the married veteran to $90 a month.

I have not heard any veterans' organization, or any veterans, say they are satisfied with that amount. We must remember that since 1939 the value of our dollar has dropped to 50 cents. I think everybody will agree that no veteran can exist on that allowance. Many of them are suffering from very poor health. In my opinion, instead of putting them off with $50 and $90 they should have preferred treatment, because they are the men who, some years ago, went overseas and offered everything they had, namely their lives, in order that Canada should be free. Had this not been done many of us would not be able to sit here in comfort in this house today and discuss this and many other matters.

On many occasions in the past I have referred to a statement made by Sir Robert Borden, who was at that time prime minister of Canada. I am going to bring the matter a little more up to date with another statement by the late prime minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King. This is taken from Hansard of February 24, 1930, at page 44, and has to do with the veterans' problem. Mr. King had this to say:

> May I say that after giving a great deal of time and careful thought and study to this question, the government has come to the conclusion that the existing legislation is not adequate. In particular it has been borne in upon us that there are a large number of returned men who, while not suffering from any disability immediately traceable to some particular happening, are nevertheless finding themselves breaking down through causes more or less unknown. In other words, they are experiencing after a number of years what I think would be described in medical terms as the effects of deferred reaction. Though they went through the strain of the war, though they suffered mentally and physically as they did in those years, the fact that at the time they were strong and in good health led to nothing being immediately visible as a consequence of the strain they had been called upon to endure. As the years have gone by however, and the system has weakened from other causes, the strain of past years has begun to tell and many men are breaking down today apparently for no other reason than that of the strain of the war period.

That is the opinion of a man who was for a long time the leader of the government of this country, and I believe he did give that question a lot of study. A great deal of study has also been given the same question by many others, but I think a little more help would be better than continued study. Are we withholding this help because we cannot afford it? I do not think so. At the present time our bins are full of grain. We are wondering how in the world we are going to get rid of it all; yet these veterans, who as I said before went over to defend Canada, are not getting the assistance to which they are properly entitled. Only the other day, and since the session commenced, we had the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) tell us that they were going to provide additional subsidies for gold mines. It would be much more appropriate if some of this assistance were made available so that our veterans could get better treatment.

There is another group of people I have been speaking about for the past few years, and thinking about in fact for much longer than that but holding back to some extent because of the survey that has been going on for the past number of years. I refer to the incapacitated. Each time we asked about them we were told that a survey was under way. I believe the survey is finished in most provinces at the present time, and I should like to know what action is now going to be taken. We know that many people who are in the very best of health are having difficulties, in some instances, through no fault of their own, in making a living. Then when we go about the streets and go into the homes and find people in wheel chairs or in bed and not able to take care of themselves we wonder why the country cannot do something about it, particularly when the relatives, the parents, perhaps the brothers and sisters of these people are not able to help them without suffering themselves. When that pension is brought in, as I hope it will be during this session, I should like to see it enacted without a means test.

In connection with the people about whom I spoke a few moments ago, namely the veterans, while the legislation brought in at the last session did help to some extent, one change was made that I believe is not in keeping with our ability to provide further help. These people, single and married, cannot have outside earnings of more than $120 a year or $10 a month without having their war veterans allowance cut down. That is very poor business. While we have had a lot to say about health insurance at the present time, I think that giving these people an opportunity to get out and do a little work, if they are in physical shape to do it, would be one method of helping them attain better health. So, increase the allowable earnings.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announce the other day that the cattle embargo to the United States will be lifted on March 1. I am sure that will be welcome news to many of the cattle producers; and not only to them, because what is good for them is also good for the rest of the country. I hope that some suitable arrangements can be made so that those who have held cattle off the market will not lose on account of that embargo, and that full use will be made of the floor prices for beef until this problem has been brought down to normal again.

Many of our cattlemen have suffered much in dollars and in worry through no fault of their own and through no fault of the government, as far as foot-and-mouth disease is concerned. We blame them for a lot of other things, but they are not to blame for that particular calamity.

In connection with the question of pork I, like many others, was sorry to learn that the price will be down to 23 cents a pound after January 1. Today we have many people producing hogs, and when they find that the price at which they can sell is uneconomical they will naturally go out of business. Perhaps the result will be that some of those people who are protesting against the payment of subsidies or floor prices will find that because of the lower production of pork they will have to pay a much higher price because pork will not be produced. I know that at the present time we have plenty of pork to supply our market; but I am not satisfied that our market should be confined to Canada.

Only a couple of months ago I noticed that a considerable portion of it had been taken over by Denmark, something I was sorry to see. According to a newspaper item it appears that Great Britain has agreed to take at least 90 per cent of the exports from that country, and at substantial prices. More recently I noticed that Holland had made a short-term agreement along similar lines.

I believe that if some of our trade restrictions were removed, particularly those affecting our currencies, we would have kept much of that market, and the condition would be improved for people in other countries as well. I believe the government is making some attempt to remove some of the restrictions. We know the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are in London at the present time. The stand they should take was made abundantly clear in the house before they left. They went to London with good intentions and, had they been able in a Liberal party of around 180 members to find another man able to assume the duties of deputy prime minister, perhaps our good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would have gone along, too. He seems to be the dealer in the family; and while he does not always make the best deals, the fact remains that he does make them.

A recent issue of the Ottawa Citizen indicates that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in New York recently and spoke to the United States foreign trade council. The newspaper article contains some comment on his trip. He told them that—> —trade barriers have multipled in some countries at an alarming rate. But there are signs that countries with import controls now are more receptive to the idea of getting rid of them.

> "How general that attitude has become, I do not know," said Mr. Howe, "but it has been in evidence in some very important quarters and it is certainly a most significant and welcome sign."
>
> Some of the sterling area countries were trying to learn the precise and true causes of its dollar shortage, but, said Mr. Howe, the free world could not afford to postpone reduction of restrictions until this was done.

I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce is catching on to some of the things that are wrong.

> Import restrictions, imposed for temporary purposes, had a way of becoming permanent. Quantitative controls on imports, imposed to halt a drain on dollar exchange, made a permanent cure for the dollar problem more difficult. The responsibility for removing the controls rested with countries which had imposed them. But he doubted whether they would be removed "without the encouragement and co-operation of our two countries and particularly the United States."
> The time was ripe for a new attack on the world's trade restrictions, said Mr. Howe. He was confident that a world in which non-restrictive trade policies predominated could be re-established. But there was one "great essential"—a need for "close and tenacious co-operation by all the free nations—a resolute will to work together."

I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues will work together to bring about the condition this article indicates. I believe the Canadian farmers could produce much more, both for the benefit of themselves and the country as a whole, and to relieve starving nations overseas. The farmers feel, however, that if they do not have some assurance of a market there is not much use in producing grain and livestock. Our experience in the past has been that unless we have some contracts, some method of getting rid of our products after they are produced, the farmer must take the rap in the form of lower prices. Certainly he derives no benefit from lower prices, because such prices do not apply to the same extent in respect of the articles he must use in order to produce.

Trade restrictions should be removed. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) early in this session, and on another occasion last session, set out some of the things that are happening in respect of prices in this country as compared with those in the country immediately south of us. Many of us who travel through the United States on our way to the west have purchased goods of different kinds in that country. Many times we are able to get them at no more than half the price we must pay on this side of the border.

We have the raw material in this country, and I do not think we are paying as high wages as are paid in the United States. Yet, because of the protection in different forms given to our manufacturers, our consumers are compelled on many occasions to pay 150 per cent of the amount that should be paid. As examples one thinks immediately of automobiles, tires, shoes, clothing and many other commodities. Especially is this true of electrical goods.

I was pleased to note that a little less than a year ago the government did introduce a bill to remedy this condition. While that legislation kept us here in Ottawa almost until Christmas day, and made it necessary to resume after Christmas, the bill was passed, and I believe it had much to do with cutting down the prices of goods. People are receiving as much as $150 trade-in allowance for some item of little value from the kitchen when purchasing a refrigerator, a stove, a washing machine or something of that nature.

For a few moments I should like to discuss the wheat situation. Before doing so, however, personally and on behalf of the people I represent I should like to compliment the chief commissioner and his associates in the Canadian wheat board. While they are continuously being sniped at by the Winnipeg grain exchange and their friends, it is my belief that the men in the wheat board have done a first-class job. The final payments announced a short time ago have made many of our farmers happy. In its restricted form the wheat board has done an excellent job; and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes his next trip to Washington I hope he will not permit himself to be tied down to the prices to which we have been subjected in the past.

The crops in 1950 and 1951 were two of the most difficult to handle. Despite out-of-condition and low-grade grain, the wheat board has done a job satisfactory to all, so far as I am aware. I hope they will continue in office and to do good work, even though some may wish to get rid of them. They are the farmers' salvation.

I should like now to discuss the international wheat agreement. In common with other hon. members who have already spoken, I would like to have a new one. I am not convinced that the terms of the present agreement are satisfactory or in the interests of our producers. The price ceiling is $1.80 per bushel in United States funds. For some months this gave the farmers an advantage whereby they received $1.98 per bushel for their top-grade grain, basis Fort William-Port Arthur-Vancouver. But, because of the fiddling around with our dollar and gold and other things connected with the monetary system, we find that at one time our Canadian dollar was at a premium of 5 per cent over the United States dollar. As a result there have been quotations for wheat under the international wheat agreement as low as $1.72 a bushel instead of the price of $1.98. This means a drop of 26 cents per bushel, and those on the sidelines do not see any reason whatever for that difference in price. When the present international wheat agreement was being negotiated we did not vote against it. We thought an international agreement was a good thing but, as I stated before, we were not satisfied with the terms. When we have a definite ceiling price on the grain that we are to sell over the four-year period without having any ceiling whatever on the costs of production, then I think we are stepping into very dangerous territory.

That was pointed out very clearly to the government by those in this group, and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) made a suggestion one day that there should be a fluctuating price for our grain. In other words the price of our grain should be tied to the price of goods in the importing countries, and if the price of goods in those countries went up then the price of our wheat would go up. If the price of goods in the importing countries went down then the price of wheat should go down correspondingly. By that method we would have the opportunity to bring back the same quantity of the other fellow's goods regardless of high or low price.

But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did not feel that it was possible to get figures upon which to base a deal of that kind. The hon. member for Acadia of course came back and told him that the international monetary fund had all these figures available and had had them for months past. But even with that information in the possession of the minister nothing whatever was done. As a result of the set-up hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat have been sold under the agreement at as much as 50 cents a bushel below the price of class II wheat, which is the wheat sold by the wheat board to countries other than those covered by the international wheat agreement.

I hope this pitfall will be avoided when the next international wheat agreement is negotiated. I understand the meeting is to be held in Washington on January 12, although some press reports state that an attempt is being made to delay the conference until after the new president takes office on January 20. We shall be quite satisfied to wait until after that date provided we can get a deal that is worth while. As I stated before, I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go there in the same spirit evidenced in statements he has made during past weeks, when he has said that we are not going to be too easily satisfied. I believe an international wheat agreement is a good thing, but we must not sacrifice price and other things for the sake of getting such an agreement. The wheat board is doing a good job, and if we cannot get satisfactory terms under such an agreement then I believe the wheat board is also capable of doing this job.

Another matter that has been giving many people a lot of trouble is the question of supplying wheat to Canadian millers for consumption within Canada at the international wheat agreement price. That is a definite steal from the wheat growers of Canada because they get nothing whatever, not a single solitary cent, in return for that. On one occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he would not agree to the Canadian taxpayer subsidizing the wheat growers in order that the class II price might be paid them. There is no subsidy whatever connected with the matter and the people who grow wheat and who take a reduced price, sometimes to the extent of 50 cents a bushel, are well aware of that fact. That is a part of the program.

In order to bring down the cost of producing wheat to some extent I would suggest, as I have on two or three other occasions, that an investigation be made into the cost of farm implements. We have examples of prices for farm machinery that are entirely unjustifiable. Cars and trucks are also used in connection with the production of grain, and I would suggest that something be done to find out why the prices of such items are so high compared with prices across the line. That is one way that we might help our producers to cut down the cost of production.

In order to make things better for our national safety, I would again urge the government to take into consideration the early construction of a highway from Winnipeg to the coast over the Yellowhead pass route. There is provision made for a highway in the southern part of western Canada, but Canada is a big country and its defence seems to be one of our worst headaches. We are contributing more than $2 billion a year toward the preparations. I think some of that money could well be spent in the building of a highway from Winnipeg through Saskatoon, my own home town of Vermilion, Edmonton, and on through the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver.

There is another item that has been talked about quite a lot, and on a few occasions I have mentioned it myself. I refer to taxation. We feel we have far too many taxes, far more than are necessary for the purposes for which they are levied. On this occasion, however, I want to deal with the problem of a particular case of taxation involving a farmer and his wife. Last session on July 4, the day we adjourned, I took up this matter, and before that I wrote the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) about it. I had very nice letters from him. He was most courteous, but I believe that somebody in his department is making wrong decisions because I know that the minister would not be guilty of making the decision which was made in the particular case with which I am going to deal for the next five minutes or so.

This case concerns a man and his wife. I believe they were married away back in 1914. At that time the wife would be about 20 and, as far as I can figure it out, her husband would be about 29. I remember that I got married once too, and I was about the same age as this man and my wife was about the same age as the lady involved. I can remember the enthusiasm with which we entered into the farming experience. In the particular case to which I am referring the lady concerned, either by using her own earnings or perhaps as a gift from her folks, was in possession of one cow and one heifer when she was married. They struggled along. They were living in a semi-dry part of the country, and even farmers living in the best part of the country have had quite a struggle all through the years from that time until now.

As I said, in 1914 this lady on her own account had one cow and one heifer. That makes two animals. In 1915, because it takes only nine months for an increase of one calf, there would be four head of cattle. In 1916 there would be six head in the ordinary course of events, and in 1917, provided some of the first calves turned out to be heifers, there would be an even greater increase. Anybody who wishes to do a little arithmetic may work out the problem for themselves. Of course there would have to be a lot of supposition because all calves are not heifers; some of them are bulls. I am bringing out the point at this time to show the nonsense that is sometimes practised in the Department of National Revenue. From 1914 to 1948 is a period of 34 years. With the natural increase of two calves a year, with only two cows being in the production line, we would have a total of 68 head of cattle. I will leave it at that for the time being.

As I stated before, plenty of lean years were experienced because this was a dry district. This lady and her husband worked hard, very hard. I do not know of any group of women in Canada who work as hard and for as long hours as do our farm women. That was particularly true in days gone by. As a result of her start of a herd of cattle she finally built up a nice herd and was able to purchase a half section of land. As time went on they, like a good many other people on the farm, had broken health. In 1948 they sold a part of their basic herd. I say "their" basic herd because I presume this man had some cattle of his own and the two herds grew up together, and naturally they carried on as they should have done. This lady believes there should be a community interest in the case of man and wife.

After selling a part of their basic herd they decided, for the security of the wife, that they would buy an annuity for her. They decided to buy a government annuity, ten years, guaranteeing $100 monthly. That annuity cost them $13,268.76. Looking at it from my point of view I believe the price was a little higher than it should have been. I have not inquired into that as it just caught my eye yesterday.

In 1948 the woman had $1,000 in her bank account and the husband apparently wrote the cheque which paid for the annuity, $13,268.76. The balance of the amount which accrued from sales of livestock, grain, et cetera, was in the husband's name. Over that account the wife had power of attorney. The husband, as I say, wrote the cheque to pay for the annuity for his wife and it must be clearly pointed out that the money they had in the bank and which was used to pay for that annuity was income from their farm operations and livestock. It had been fully assessed and full taxes had been paid to the Department of National Revenue. There is no argument so far. In my opinion the money belonged to them and they could do with it just as they saw fit.

When the annuity was purchased they were advised by the Edmonton office that there would be no tax since the purchase was made from income on which income tax had already been paid. They were advised that there might be tax on the interest portion of the annuity as they received it. In 1951 the husband was assessed gift tax of $1,184.63. That was protested immediately to the Department of National Revenue and an attempt was made to have the annuity cancelled. Of course that did not succeed, because if you buy a government annuity, I understand the money is there and you cannot do anything about it. You wait until it begins to pay and you carry on from there.

This all means that an annuity guaranteeing $100 a month for ten years cost them $13,268.76 plus gift tax of $1,184.63, or a total of $14,453.39. That was the family's own money. Had the wife written a cheque herself on her own account, if she had had $13,000 or $14,000 instead of $1,000, there would have been no attempt made to collect gift tax on the amount.

Should this lady, who is not now in good health, die after ten years she will have collected ten times $1,200 or $12,000. Without saying one word about interest it has already cost them $14,453.39. I believe quite sincerely that this gift tax was wrongly levied, as the wife's profits were lumped together with those of her husband. I point out that this team worked together on their farm. They worked hard, very hard. I know the territory in which they lived, and they had to work hard. In spite of that, because the man wrote the cheque he is assessed this amount of gift tax.

The wife had $1,000 in her own bank account, and I come back again to the herd of cattle that was started back in 1914 with two potential producers, one cow and one heifer. It is estimated by the Department of National Revenue, I believe the Edmonton branch, that the $1,000 she had in the bank would account for the value of the two head of cattle she started with and any increase that should have accrued in the meantime. I think it is time that whoever did that figuring was sent out to a farm to get a little experience on the end of a fork handle or something else.

As I pointed out, from the two head she started with, in the 34 years between 1914 and 1948 there would have been a total herd of 68 head of cattle with only two producing each year. We should also remember that during recent years cattle were a fairly good price. One thousand dollars or even fourteen thousand dollars would not begin to pay for the cattle that would have accumulated on this lady's own property plus the half section of land they purchased.

They protested to the department and could not get anything done. In my opinion, if the clerks in the Department of National Revenue office in Edmonton, and perhaps other centres as well, cannot figure dollars of assessment any better than they figured the offspring of those two head of cattle from 1914 on, then it is time something radical was done. There is an injustice here which the minister investigated after I took the question up last July. He wrote me a very nice letter. Again I say I am not accusing the minister of any of the injustice that has occurred in this case. I have known the minister here since 1935 and I would not for a moment think of attributing anything like that to him; but he is the minister responsible and he must take full responsibility for what is done by his officials in Edmonton and elsewhere.

I notice that the regulation is to the effect that overpayment of tax may be refunded to the taxpayer upon written application therefor if the request is received within twelve months of the overpayment. I am quite satisfied from what I have read that other farmers have found themselves in exactly the same position, and I am bringing the matter to the attention of the house for a second time so this injustice may be rectified. It is the minister's responsibility. This lady's husband, and the lady herself, have been wrongfully cheated out of $1,184.63 and I think it should be taken care of. I know the minister does not want to impose a wrong like that on a Canadian farmer or on anybody else. I believe I have placed their case fairly on the record today. I would ask the minister, in the name of justice, that consideration be given to this case. I understand that these people are now off the farm and are not working it any more. In the interest of a little harmony and fair play in the country, I would ask the minister to investigate this case and make a refund of the amount I have mentioned. I hope the minister will do that because I know he does not want to be unfair. I have every confidence in him, and I hope this matter will be adjusted.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): In the few minutes I have at my disposal before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to one or two matters that concern my constituency more directly. First of all may I extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the manner in which they both performed their tasks in the house. I should like to add one more word of congratulation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) upon the very high position to which he has been named in the United Nations. As one who had the privilege and honour of serving under him at the fourth session of the general assembly I fully appreciate the task that he has been given as president of the general assembly. This is a tribute not only to him personally; it is certainly an indication of the high regard in which he is held at the United Nations, as well as a tribute to our country. I am very pleased to be able to extend my congratulations to him.

I want to refer briefly to the P.F.R.A. This afternoon mention has been made of the South Saskatchewan river project. I fully support this project and hope it will come to realization. At the same time, however, I should like to say that the magnitude of this important project that is being undertaken by the P.F.R.A. should not overshadow or relegate to the background the true purpose for which this splendid act was initiated. In the first place, all the people in the west know that this act has done a tremendous amount of good through the small, individual projects which have been carried out. We in the Red river valley are aware of this as well.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Red river is known to be very temperamental. A few years ago we were complaining about having far too much water in our district, and this year the opposite is the case. The Red river is very low. Actually there is some fear that if this winter proves to be severe the river might freeze solidly to the bottom, and the water may not be usable at all. However, we are used to that and we have many dugouts which were built under P.F.R.A. Many farmers have more than one of these dugouts to assure a supply of water. This year, because of the dry season, most of these dugouts are almost dry, and we may have a severe shortage of water during the winter.

I believe that the P.F.R.A. could help us, not so much financially but by helping us try to make greater use of the water we have at the present time. As a matter of fact, most of the farmers went to great expense this fall to get pumping equipment and hose by means of which they hoped to pump all the water available in the area into one dugout. On an individual basis this proved a rather costly operation. Possibly the P.F.R.A. could give consideration to renting whatever pumping equipment or hose they have so we could make use of every drop of water that is available in the area.

I want to say a word, too, about the Canadian farm loan board. They have been doing a very good job out west. There is an area in the southeast corner of Manitoba in which I think the Canadian farm loan board could do a great deal more than it has done in the past. I am sure the result of this increased activity would be almost to transform that southeastern corner of the province. The people in that area have been relying almost exclusively on pulpwood to earn their living. The supply is getting shorter all the time, and a great deal of that land is almost ready to be broken up and turned into agricultural production. I prophesy that in a few years you will see grain elevators there, and this will be very productive and high-priced land.

However, at the present time the farmers living there are short of cash. Since these farms have not been developed, the farmers have difficulty in getting credit and that is where I think the farm loan board could be of assistance. By a liberal use of credit this whole section of Manitoba could be transformed into a new and very productive source of foodstuffs for the years to come.

I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 4, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMINISTRATION AT PETAWAWA CAMP—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, in view of the fact that it has been announced that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) will be leaving tomorrow, I wish to direct a question to him. I ask whether, since Mr. Currie's appointment was announced on April 21, 1952, he has received any positive recommendations from Mr. Currie in regard to the subject matter of his inquiry, in writing or orally, and if so is the minister prepared to convey to the house some information as to the nature of the recommendations which have been made.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Currie's appointment I have seen him about this matter on one occasion only. That was when he was in national defence headquarters carrying on his inquiry. I asked him to see me and he did. I then asked him if he was getting all the information that he wanted and he said he was. I told him that if at any time he wanted further powers or more information such would be made available to him.

I have had no other communication of whatever kind with him.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister read to us a letter from Mr. Currie, assuring us at the time of his appointment that he would proceed with the utmost speed to make inquiry into this matter and communicate his views to the minister, may I ask if the minister has pointed that out to him and has he not indicated that it is very desirable that we have the report at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I have not interfered with Mr. Currie's investigation in any way whatever. He knows as well as the Leader of the Opposition that it is desirable that a report should be made at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I ask one further supplementary question. To the knowledge of the minister, has Mr. Currie seen the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to this matter within recent weeks?

Mr. Claxton: I have no information bearing on that at all. Had Mr. Currie seen the Prime Minister I am sure the Prime Minister would have spoken to me about it. Since he has not done so I assume that Mr. Currie has not seen him.

Mr. Drew: There seems a strange lack of interest in such an important matter.

NATO CONFERENCE

FURTHER CANADIAN MILITARY COMMITMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) arising out of a Canadian Press dispatch appearing in this morning's paper. Is the minister in a position to assure the house that Canada, at the forthcoming NATO conference, will not agree to any increase in its military commitments under NATO for the coming year?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): When we form part of an alliance, Mr. Speaker, we do so in good faith. At the meeting of the council to be held in Paris on December 15, we will sit down with the other thirteen members of the North Atlantic alliance to consider what should be done. Everything that is suggested will be considered. I shall certainly not be in a position, under our constitutional practice, to make any additional commitments without reporting back to the cabinet. So far as I know, there has been no suggestion that we should make any further commitments for military activity.

FISHERIES

STORM DAMAGE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister say what steps are being taken by the government with respect to the recent storm damage in Newfoundland?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The attitude of the federal government towards such catastrophes in provinces has been stated by the Prime Minister on several occasions, and it has been that property rights are primarily a matter for the provinces. It is only in cases where the losses in such catastrophes are beyond the financial ability of the province to handle that the federal government does assist. So far we have received no request from Newfoundland for such assistance.

We do know, from our own fisheries officials, that the storm damage is very severe, more severe than any in the last twenty years. We do know that the government of Newfoundland has set up a cabinet committee to assess the damage. When they have completed that assessment, they will take the steps that they think proper in the circumstances.

FLOOD CONTROL

REQUEST FOR SURVEY OF SEINE RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development the following question: Will the long range Manitoba flood control plans being now completed, which include a hydrographic survey of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, also include a hydrographic and topographical survey of the Seine river, which flows through the city of St. Boniface, the municipality of St. Vital and the rural municipalities of Tache and Ste. Anne, and which every year causes untold damage to the urban and rural populations of those areas?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Hydrographic and topographic surveys of the mouth of the Seine river and of the Seine river flowing through St. Boniface are included in this study.

HOUSING

REQUESTS FOR REDUCTION OF DOWN PAYMENT AND INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Will the Minister of Resources and Development state whether the government is considering reducing down payments on N.H.A. housing from 20 per cent to 10 per cent?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I can only say that the government has a great many things under consideration, and that policy in these fields is announced in due course as it is arrived at.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees)? Has the minister been advised of the resolution passed recently by the Liberal association of Winnipeg North, asking that the down payment under the National Housing Act be reduced to 10 per cent and also that the interest rate on housing loans be lowered? Will consideration be given to both of those requests?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, I would reply that consideration is given to every reasonable request.

Mr. Knowles: Are not Liberal requests reasonable?

SHACK ON FEDERAL PROPERTY DESTROYED BY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the press report correct that the tarpaper shack which was yesterday destroyed by fire, and in which an Ottawa family lost their possessions and in which one of their children lost its life, is the property of a federal government agency and rented by that agency to the family for $10 per month? Secondly, if so, will the Acting Prime Minister indicate what assistance, if any, the federal government or the federal district commission as landlord will render this family in their present circumstances?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have not had sufficient time, Mr. Speaker, to get all the facts. I have determined that the Department of Public Works is not the owner of the shack. I have not had time to receive any reply from the federal district commission. The impression I have gained is that this is a squatters' shack, built there without ownership of the land or authority from anyone to build it. However, the matter will be investigated and if there is anything further to report I shall let the hon. member know.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUESTION AS TO DISCRIMINATION IN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Since the Minister of Labour is absent, I shall direct my question to his parliamentary assistant. Has the Minister of Labour received a resolution from the Ontario

Women's Liberal Association urging that the orders in council prohibiting discrimination in government contracts be amended so as to include discrimination for reasons of sex? If such a request has been received, will the parliamentary assistant say whether it will be accepted?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. member has kindly sent notice of his question to the minister. On his behalf I wish to thank him. This resolution was received by the minister last Monday, and as soon as the minister has an opportunity of giving consideration to the resolution, a proper reply will be sent to the association.

RAILWAYS

REPORTED CONSTRUCTION IN PEACE RIVER COUNTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I was not able to furnish him with a copy of the question before I came into the house, for which I am sorry. If the minister is not in a position to answer the question today, he may take my question as notice and bring in an answer at a later date.

Does the minister know whether there is any foundation for the rumour that a railway line is to be built from some point on the Northern Alberta Railway in the Peace river country to Great Slave lake to serve the mining interests there?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have not heard of any such rumour, Mr. Speaker. I think if it were to be built by the Canadian National Railways I should know something about it. So far as the other railway is concerned, I cannot speak for it. If there is anything in addition to what I have said already, I shall be glad to give it to the house at a later date.

GRAIN

ALLEGED ILLEGAL MIXING BY TERMINAL ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce seen the report in this morning's press that the Saskatchewan farmers union has threatened to take court action against terminal elevator companies for alleged illegal mixing of grain? Can the minister give his assurance that amendments to the Canada Grain Act will be placed before parliament at this session in order to guarantee that such practices will not take place?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have seen the press notices, Mr. Speaker, and I can tell the hon. member that the regulations covering the mixing of grain by terminal elevators are precisely set out in the Canada Grain Act. At this time, I know of no amendment that can be made in the act which would strengthen the situation. If Mr. Phelps or anyone else can give proof to the board of grain commissioners that the regulations are being violated, appropriate action will be taken. I may say, however, that I have read several very wild statements by Mr. Phelps recently about illegal practices all over the prairies. Personally, I place very little stock in the report in question.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

PRINTING WORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Meeker) asked me the following question, as Acting Minister of Finance:

> Is he aware of the fact that job printing work in connection with the recent Canada savings bond issue was done in the United States? Why was this, and can the minister assure this house that Canadian printers will be given an opportunity to do this work in the future?

The answer is as follows: It is not true, as the hon. member's question states, that job printing work in connection with the recent Canada savings bond issue was done in the United States. As part of their sales promotion program the payroll savings organization in Ontario purchased bulletin blanks from a firm in Stamford, Connecticut. These bulletin blanks were not printed to order and do not constitute job printing. Six thousand four hundred and fifty of these blanks were purchased at a cost of $206.99. To have charged the art work and lithographing plates against an order of this size in Canada would have cost many times more than this figure.

Approximately $102,000 has been spent for printing forms and publicity material for the seventh series of Canada savings bonds, all of which, with the exception of the bulletin blanks, has been spent in Canada, so that the cost of these blanks represents about 1/500th part of the total amount expended.

Mr. Graydon: Watch that this is not the thin edge of the wedge, then.

[Later:]

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question was asked about the advertising of Canada savings bonds in the United States. In view of the article itself, I was wondering whether the fact that a squirrel was put on a limb has any significance with regard to having them printed in a foreign country.

An hon. Member: No answer is required.

Mr. Cruickshank: You fellows are out on a limb anyway.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

REGINA MANIFESTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question. Has the Regina manifesto been brought to the attention of the responsible minister?

TELECOMMUNICATION

RATES BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was asked some few days ago by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) in connection with the announcement I made concerning a reduction in rates on telephone calls between Newfoundland and the mainland. He inquired whether that statement covered a reduction in rates on calls on Sundays and after six o'clock.

I am informed that the statement which I made does not cover such calls but that the companies concerned would prefer to see the new agreement go into force in order to determine the effects of the new rates and at a later date to consider whether rates between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada could not be reduced on Sundays and after six o'clock.

TAX AGREEMENTS

CORPORATIONS—REMISSION OF INTEREST ON INSTALMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table an order in council passed today having to do with the remission of interest on instalments paid pursuant to the provisions of section 47 of the Income Tax Act, and relating to the fiscal periods ending prior to May 1, 1953, by corporations which were liable to tax on net income under the corporation tax act, 1939 (Ontario), where these are insufficient as a result of the deduction of an amount or amounts calculated under the provisions of section 37 of the Income Tax Act.

[Mr. Rowe.]

In that connection I wish to make the following statement as it is of interest to business corporations in Ontario.

As a result of the tax agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario, signed on October 29, 1952, being made retroactive to January 1, 1952, corporate taxpayers carrying on business in Ontario may have underpaid instalments of federal income tax. In view of the inequity of charging interest on the deficient instalments of federal income tax caused in this way, the provisions of the Financial Administration Act have been invoked to remit such interest, in so far as the under-remittance of instalments relates to the 5 per cent tax formerly deductible under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, and for the period up to the 31st December, 1952. In the result, corporations formerly paying corporation tax in Ontario will not be charged interest on the deficiency in their instalment payments of federal income tax to the extent that these instalments have been reduced in anticipation of the obligation to pay Ontario corporation tax, provided that their position is corrected before December 31 of this year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the number of questions on the order paper is getting to be quite large and that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne seems to be going to continue for a while yet, I wonder whether arrangements could be made for order paper questions to be called for answer fairly soon? Perhaps they could be taken once a week?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the subject and make a statement later.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister is going to look into this subject, I might say that if questions on the order paper are to be answered in the near future, I must ask hon. members to confine questions which they ask to those which should properly be asked on the orders of the day, namely questions that are urgent. I have allowed considerable latitude this session because questions on the order paper were not being answered.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to his Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, today I propose to deal with the trade policies of the government as related also to the trade policies of the official opposition. In western Canada we are probably more aware or more conscious of the importance of our export trade than are any other parts of Canada. Through experience we have learned that our prosperity, our standard of living, is directly tied up to the markets that can be found for our products outside of Canada. Consequently, anything that is said or done about this vital question of export trade is of great interest, and indeed of great concern, to all of us in western Canada. As a matter of fact, this question of export trade affects not only that part of Canada but all parts of Canada since history and the record prove that when our export trade was high, the country went through a period of prosperity.

Naturally, we were interested when the leader of the official opposition announced that he was going abroad, particularly to the United Kingdom and to Europe, on a fact-finding tour in order to find a solution for some of the problems and then to offer suggestions upon his return. From press releases we found that when he returned to Canada he was rather reticent in his remarks and in the announcement of his policy. As a matter of fact, from the press releases it would appear that he more or less took the attitude: "Elect me first, and then I will tell you what my policy is." However, shortly after his return he was out on a tour of the western provinces, and then he toured some of the eastern provinces. Of course, since the house has been sitting we have heard gradually the announcement of that policy and the echo in the official opposition in the house. We find now that their policy is simply to revive, or to retransplant into Canada, the old Tory school of England who advocate the creation of British commonwealth and empire blocs, higher tariff walls and self-sufficiency, to some degree at least, regardless of the cost to the country.

When the Leader of the Opposition was in my province, he was naturally asked many questions on the policy itself. It is obvious that he tried, to the best of his ability, to hide the true identity of the policy, through various means of using fancy words and press denials. However, this policy is so well known that I am sure nobody can forget it, particularly in western Canada, and it was soon recognized. I am not surprised at the Social Credit party swallowing this from the official opposition, because, as we know, most of the Social Crediters are Tories in background.

Mr. Blackmore: That is an absolute falsehood.

Mr. Jutras: They are just ordinary Tories, with a variety of bibles thrown in. I was more surprised, however, to see the socialists fall for the same policy as well. The only explanation I can find is that they see a possibility of their dream coming true, because they have always dreamed that we would get back to the conditions of the 1930's, and those are the conditions under which they thrive.

At any rate, we find that the official opposition is now advocating the very same policies that were advocated and that were put into force by them during the 1930's. As I said, the leader of the official opposition has not said too much on the subject. However, when he was in the United Kingdom no doubt he spoke with greater confidence, and I find in the London Daily Express of October 8 of this year the following. This is in direct quotation marks, which indicates it is taken from the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, and it has to do with his policies. He says:

> This is no new and strange idea. It would merely be a return to the situation which existed until 1939.

So that he is quite prepared, apparently, to return to the conditions of the 1930's, and is quite conscious that he is returning to those conditions. His other policy of advocating greater use, as he puts it, of resources within the country means, as was pointed out to him by a newspaperman in Manitoba, a restrictive policy to a certain degree. He denied that categorically. I read from the Winnipeg Free Press of October 31 an editorial entitled "Double Talk":

> Mr. George Drew, speaking in this city Tuesday at a Conservative meeting, once more denied that he is advocating higher tariffs and a policy of protection when he urges the greater use in domestic manufacture of our primary raw material. This is a distinction without a difference. What is worse, it is a refusal to identify his policy by its correct name.

I find that when the Leader of the Opposition went through Nipigon, Ontario, he also made a speech, and in explanation of what he meant by this policy he used an example which I think illustrates the point very well. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of October 18, 1952:

> Opposition Leader Drew yesterday indicated that conservation of resources for the primary use of Canadians will be an important plank in the Progressive Conservatives' general election platform.
> Mr. Drew said the "manufacturing clause" in Ontario provincial legislation has ensured the processing of forest raw materials in areas where the people would benefit from employment and income in the north.
> The clause restricted the export of unmanufactured forest products and ensured the continuance of pulp and paper mills around which have grown prosperous communities.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether there is a more striking example of the result that can be obtained from a policy of restriction of this nature. As a matter of fact, if you take that very industry, the paper industry in Canada, which is dependent upon markets outside of Canada to the extent of 90 per cent of its production, and apply any policy of restriction to it, and there is retaliation in other countries, it is easy to see in what position the industry would find itself in a very short time. It is quite obvious that once more the Leader of the Opposition has not yet outgrown his provincial outlook.

To justify this revival of this policy of the 1930's, the official opposition has drummed up the cry that we have lost our markets in Europe, that we have lost our markets in the commonwealth, and that we have lost our markets in the United Kingdom. Of course, the record is there and nothing could be farther from the truth. This is not new; this was the cry that they used in the 1945 election and they used it again in the 1949 election. We have had this repetitious cry ever since the end of the war, that we were losing markets. One does not have to analyse the statistics or even look at the record. It seems to me that the answer is quite obvious.

Since the end of the war our population has increased by 20 per cent. Sixteen billion dollars' worth of new capital expenditure has been poured into this country to expand production. As a matter of fact, the production of the country has increased by 100 per cent. It stands to reason that we must have found some markets outside, and that our export market must have expanded to take care of this 100 per cent increase in production, and at the same time permit the country to go through the greatest prosperity it has ever known. It is a matter of record indeed that the export trade of the country has gone up by 75 per cent since 1939, and as a result, as I just mentioned, we are going through a period of prosperity.

[Mr. Jutras.]

It is also a matter of record that at the present time a family of four earns one and a half times as much—and I mean in real terms—as it earned in 1939. The record of the figures of export trade speaks for itself.

When the Tory Conservative government turned over the reins of office to the Liberal party in 1935 the total export trade was in the neighbourhood of $700 million. This increased to over $3,000 million in 1948 and stood at $4,000 million in 1951, the last complete year for which we have statistics. As a matter of fact, there is every indication at the present time, according to the figures that are available, that this year will also be a record year so far as exports are concerned.

It is good to remember that under this policy they are advocating at the present time, this government took over a condition of unemployment, relief and despair throughout Canada in 1935. It is a matter of record that in less than a month the Liberal government signed a trade agreement with the United States, and this was followed by twenty trade agreements with twenty different countries, with the result, as statistics show, that there has been an increase and a betterment of conditions in the country gradually. May I say this for the benefit of those in the other corner, particularly those from western Canada. It is also a matter of record that by 1939, before the war, or from 1935 to 1939, the gross national income of the farmers of western Canada had increased by 90 per cent as a result of this policy of finding greater markets and expanding markets throughout the world and removing as many trade barriers as possible. It is also a matter of interest to wheat producers that when the Liberals left office in 1930 they left a carry-over in wheat of some 30 odd million bushels. When they resumed office four years later there was a carry-over of over 200 million bushels of wheat which, in those days, was considered an abnormally high carry-over, and no doubt exerted a downward pressure on the price of grain. The result was, as we know, that grain prices at that time were very low. This, again, indicates the effect of this type of policy.

I should like to apply the test of Liberal trade policies to the last grain crop of which we have record, namely, that of 1951-52. This crop was valued at $1,500 million, one of the most valuable we have had in this country. If we compare the value of that crop with the value of crude oil production in Canada, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did in Toronto, which amounts to $120 million, we at once realize the importance of the western grain crop when it reaches a figure of $1,500 million. And the current crop is expected to reach a figure of $1,800 million.

So that at the beginning of that crop year—just to show what the Department of Trade and Commerce was able to do, through the very able management of the minister of that department—we began that year with a carry-over of 190 million bushels. To that were added deliveries of 718 million bushels, making a total of close to a billion bushels of grain that had to be disposed of.

It must also be remembered that in that year out west the weather conditions were unsatisfactory in the fall. The grain that was delivered was in very poor condition. As a matter of fact 66 per cent of the crop was delivered in tough, damp or non-straight grades. The non-straight grades accounted for 66 per cent of the crops. About 100 million bushels had to be put through the driers, because it was not in a condition to be kept or shipped.

Despite these facts—and this is also a great tribute to the Canadian wheat board—despite these great difficulties, and the difficulty of movement, having in mind the fact that the grain cannot be hauled any great distance in that condition without heating or spoiling, it is a matter of record that, even under those very bad conditions, not a single bushel of grain was lost.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the board marketed 650 million bushels of grain, 141 million domestically and 509 million by export. This is the second highest export of grain in the history of the nation, despite all the difficulties I have mentioned, and the condition in which it was delivered.

The disposition of this export grain is also most revealing. Dealing first with the export of wheat and wheat flour, we find that the Department of Trade and Commerce sold wheat to 86 different countries in six continents of the world. They sold 386 million bushels of wheat, representing an export increase to the extent of 37 per cent over the previous year. That is not losing markets.

The distribution of that wheat is of special interest. I find that 63 per cent of the amount exported went to 20 countries in Europe—and I would ask the opposition to take note of that. Then 3·5 per cent went to 17 countries in Africa; 14 per cent to North America, 4·8 per cent to South America, and some smaller amounts to Oceania. Twenty-three areas of the commonwealth took 45·4 per cent. Then of course the United Kingdom, which is still the leading buyer, bought 127·6 million bushels, or 36 per cent of the crop. That is a very large amount for local consumption in the United Kingdom. Even the United States, which has a surplus of wheat, bought almost 39 million bushels from Canada.

Turning now to barley exports we find that the government exported 70 million bushels of barley, or three times the amount exported last year. This, too, is an all-time record, so far as the export of barley is concerned. It is of particular interest, too, to note that whereas formerly 80 per cent of the barley went to the United States, the biggest buyer of barley from the 1951-52 crop was in Europe. We sold to eight different countries. Belgium was the biggest buyer, with a purchase of 18 million bushels, Japan came next with 15 million, the United States 10 million, the United Kingdom 7·7 million, Germany 5·8 million, Denmark 3·3 million, The Netherlands 2·8 million and Norway 2·4 million.

The story is the same so far as the export of oats is concerned. There again 70 million bushels were exported, double the amount exported the year before, and again an all-time record. It went to ten different countries. Then, oatmeal and rolled oats were shipped to 26 countries. In connection with oats the United States was the biggest buyer with a total of 58 million bushels; Belgium was next with 8·3 million; and The Netherlands bought 1·8 million.

So that the total export of the five principal grains was 505·3 million bushels, again the highest export figure in the history of this nation. This grain was valued at $860 million, and represented 20 per cent of the total value of exports of the nation.

I hasten to point out that, in spite of these large exports of feed grains throughout the world, the domestic market was well cared for. As a matter of fact, there were left over 20 million tons of feed in Canada, which works out to roughly something more than one ton of feed to each feed-consuming animal in Canada. As a matter of fact this represents an increase of 33 per cent over the previous year.

Not only have markets been found outside Canada, but a local market, right within our boundaries, has been developed. Under the freight assistance program this new market has been developed right here in Canada. It is interesting to note that whereas the average amount of feed going to eastern Canada over the ten-year period from 1931 to 1940 was 12 million bushels per year, that figure has now increased to anywhere from 70 million to 75 million bushels per year. So that the increase is from 12 million to 70 million.

I wish therefore to tell hon. members from the east, from the maritime provinces, that those of us in western Canada appreciate this market within Canada and we are ready to co-operate with them at all times in its development. Unfortunately when coarse grains were brought under the Canadian wheat board there was some criticism from feeders in eastern Canada who were a little disappointed in the way they were being affected. I warned them at the time that they were bound to be disappointed because I am afraid a great many supported the idea of the inclusion of coarse grains in the operations of the wheat board because they did not believe in such a system of marketing and were under the impression that the board would not be able to get the highest price and consequently they would get cheaper feeds.

Naturally they were caught short in their supplies in the first year and there was some criticism. I should like to place on the record the prices actually received by the farmer in western Canada for the feed sold in eastern Canada. I think upon a close examination of the facts they will find that the fluctuations under this system of marketing were not as great nor was the margin as wide as some of them believed they would be.

Feed wheat No. 1 paid the western producer $1.49 basis Fort William, and the low on the market was $1.44 with the high being $1.56. It will be seen that the margin was not so great. No. 1 feed barley paid the western producer $1.21 basis Fort William, with the market in eastern Canada showing a low of $1.11 and a high of 1.48. Oats paid the producer 77 cents a bushel, with the market low being 77 cents and the high $1.08. It will be seen that the fluctuations and the disparity were not very great.

Attempts have been made to alleviate the situation and some time ago the western co-operatives suggested to Quebec, Ontario and the maritime provinces the setting up of a central buying agency to ensure supplies for eastern Canada. This appeared to be a sensible suggestion and it should work to the advantage of eastern Canada. However, in a venture of this nature the first requisite is a staff of competent and experienced men and there is a possibility there may be difficulty in getting such staff.

In order to show their good faith the western co-operatives offered to pay 50 per cent of any losses during the first year of operation up to $100,000. That offer is still pending and it may help to smooth out the differences between the east and the west. I believe that this marketing policy has worked to the advantage of the eastern and western provinces. It has eliminated some of the fluctuations and while the western producer has not received the highest prices he feels that he is getting a reasonable and fair price when all factors are taken into consideration.

I have attempted to analyse the export situation in connection with this mainstay of western agriculture and I think I have demonstrated that not only have we not lost world markets, we have constantly expanded our markets throughout the world. The history and experience of this country indicates that that is the only way we can ensure prosperity. We should trade as much as possible with every country in the world and build up markets wherever they can be found so that there may be a greater demand for Canadian products.

The record shows that not only has the Liberal government attempted to get greater markets for Canadian products, they have endeavoured on every occasion to enlarge the markets of other nations. That is why we have joined in these various international agreements which I think should remain in effect. We have attempted to reduce trade barriers and we have concentrated on expanding the trade of this country, thus increasing our standard of living. Any government that would adopt restrictive practices or even mention that they contemplated adopting such policies would do great damage to the economy of the country.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I propose at this time to draw attention to the war in Korea and Canada's part therein. The speech from the throne contains the following:

> The sacrifices of those directly involved in the United Nations police action in Korea and the anxieties of their families are an inevitable and most regrettable part of the price we are paying to prevent another world war.

I am sure that we all want to express our sympathy to the families that have been bereaved and to the men who have been wounded.

I notice that the Canadian casualty lists show a steady increase and the seriousness of the war can be gauged from these lists. The casualty list dated Ottawa, November 23, and sent out by Canadian Press was as follows:

> A Korean casualty list Saturday included four men killed in action and one officer and six men wounded.
> The list brought to 1,234 total casualties suffered by Canadian troops in Korea, including 231 dead, 890 wounded, 28 missing, 84 injured in action and one captured.
> The navy has reported three dead and three injured.

That was the 153rd casualty list that had been issued. On May 12 of this year the 108th casualty list was issued and showed the total number of casualties at that time as 784. In the six months from May to November 23 the increase has been 88 killed, 319 wounded and 20 missing. As an indication of the increasing seriousness of the war in Korea I should like to refer to the casualty lists in this way: In the first nine months since the brigade was in Korea the casualties were at the rate of 42 per month; in the following seven months the rate was 58 per month; in the last six months, that is from May to November of this year, the rate was 75 per month.

How serious are our casualties in Korea in comparison with other wars? In the first place, casualties should be shown as a percentage of the fighting troops, not of the total enlistment. Only in this way can a true picture be obtained. For every man who is actively engaged with the enemy there are at least four who are in the rear areas or on the lines of communication. The heaviest casualties are suffered by the infantry. In world war I, according to the casualty figures shown in the memorial chamber of this building, the infantry who were in France and Flanders suffered 68 per cent of the total casualties.

Consider the casualty list of Dieppe. In that action 5,000 Canadians participated. Six infantry battalions and other formations landed on the beaches and all non-fighting personnel of each unit had been left in England. Dead and wounded were approximately 3,000, or 60 per cent of the total fighting strength of the Dieppe force.

In Korea we have a brigade consisting of supporting units and of three infantry battalions: the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Royal 22nd Regiment and the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. The front line fighting strength of each battalion may be estimated at 600, or 1,800 for the three battalions. On these men has fallen the brunt of the fighting and of the casualties.

The total battle casualties, if we omit those listed as injured or captured, amount to 1,149 and of that number I am assuming most are infantry men for I have not the figures for the tanks, signals, engineers or artillery. Had there been no rotation of battalions and had the original brigade remained in Korea from February of 1951 to the present time without replacement, the fighting strength of the brigade would now be one battalion, not three.

In other words, the casualties have been approximately 68 per cent, the same heavy casualty rate as at Dieppe. The only difference is that at Dieppe the casualty rate of 60 per cent was suffered in a period of nine hours and the casualty rate of 68 per cent in Korea has been spread over 22 months.

This is not a police action in Korea; it is war, with all its horrors, its suffering, and its bloodshed.

On November 25, I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in these words as given in Hansard at page 63:

> . . . are tanks used by Canadian forces in Korea so short of ammunition that they are permitted to fire only two shells per tank per day?

The minister replied in these words:

> . . . I can say that during relatively static periods on any battlefront ammunition is rationed in the sense that guns of all types are allowed a certain number of rounds per day. That is so that they can build up stocks either to meet an attack or, in this case, to meet the possible contingency of an ultimate armistice. We certainly are not going to give the number of rounds per day that are to be fired by any Canadian artillery until they have been fired. The hon. member knows very well indeed that it would be highly improper to do so even if it referred only to the Canadian forces. But in this case our ammunition is supplied from United States sources. We are on the United States supply line and get precisely the same treatment as the Americans get. I am sure that the American military authorities in the United Nations would be the first to refuse this information.

I was not asking for a disclosure as to the number of rounds that might be fired each day by the artillery. I was inquiring whether there was a shortage of ammunition. My experience would lead me to conclude that a ration of two shells per gun per day means there is a shortage of ammunition.

I think you would have to go back to the year 1915 to discover a parallel to this situation. In May of 1915, according to the British official history of the war, very frequently battles had to be brought to a conclusion because of a scarcity of ammunition; and the common phrase used in the order was "the battle must now cease". You will find that expression in the official history of the war, 1915, page 37. A cessation of hostilities due to lack of ammunition occurred at the battle of Festubert in which Canadian forces were engaged.

It might be appropriate at this stage to mention that the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry first battalion, which has just returned from Korea, has had a casualty list of 36 killed, 2 missing believed killed, and 196 wounded—a total of 236 casualties in eleven months of service in Korea. The original Princess Patricia's serving in France in May of 1915, at the time of this shortage of ammunition, suffered very severely during a twenty-four hour period from the evening of May 7 until the evening of May 8. Six hundred and thirty-five men of the original Patricia's answered the roll call on the 7th of May. When they were relieved on the night of the 8th they mustered only 150.

At that particular time, in May, 1915, a dispatch was published in the London Times dated May 12, from the Times correspondent in France in these words, and I quote:

> The want of an unlimited supply of high explosives was a fatal bar to our success.

That dispatch resulted in editorials in the newspapers, the stirring up of public interest in the question, the organization of a ministry of munitions, the appointment of Lloyd George as the head of that department, and a general increase in the production of ammunition. If a shortage of ammunition in May, 1915, resulted in that type of attention and action, what about the situation we are facing today?

My question was based on a Canadian Press dispatch from Tokyo which appeared in the Globe and Mail about ten days or perhaps two weeks ago. The last paragraph reads as follows:

> Bill Boss, Canadian Press correspondent in Korea, reported today that the tanks are allowed to fire only two shells a day apiece from their 76 mm. main guns and quoted one officer as saying that, "rationed as we are, we've had to pass up targets galore".

I discovered subsequently that the full dispatch had not been printed in that paper but had appeared in the Calgary Herald. It went on to say they were not permitted to use their machine gun ammunition from the tanks except in case of enemy attack.

There are two sentences in the minister's reply to my question which deserve attention. Speaking of the rationing of ammunition he said, and I quote:

> That is so that they can build up stocks either to meet an attack or, as in this case, to meet the possible contingency of an ultimate armistice.

I fail to understand what is meant by "to meet the possible contingency of an ultimate armistice". Does that mean that artillery fire should be kept to a minimum while armistice negotiations are continuing, in order not to exasperate the enemy? If that is the case, why fire at all? If you do not harass the enemy with fire he is free to make all manner of preparations on his side for a surprise attack. If our gunners are passing up targets galore, the enemy is obviously being very bold and very active.

Armistice negotiations have been going on for the last seventeen months, and for at least the last six months the point at issue has been narrowed down to a method of exchanging prisoners; but the armistice still lurks around the corner. During the last six months Canadian casualties have been 88 killed, 319 wounded, 22 missing, or a total of 429. We suffer 429 casualties, and yet restrict harassing fire on the enemy while we await an armistice. No army could fight under those conditions. Forces in contact with the enemy cannot be looking over their shoulder for the dove of peace without running the risk of being surprised by the enemy. Let us recall the German attack on the Ardennes in December, 1944, a very critical period in the last war.

In November, 1918, every soldier in the Canadian army knew an armistice was expected at any moment. Was there any let-up in the relentless drive of the Canadian corps? On the morning of November 11, Canadian troops continued to advance, and those who were in support were warned to be ready to leapfrog the forward troops and push onward if necessary on the 12th. There was no rationing of ammunition in those days to meet the possible contingency of an armistice. In May, 1945, every soldier in the Canadian army knew that German resistance was on the point of collapsing. Yet, on the 4th of May we find, and I quote the official historian:

> . . . divisions of the second Canadian corps were still advancing northward and still meeting opposition.

That is found in "The Canadian Army, 1939-45", page 270. As late as noon of that day, impending attacks by Canadians were cancelled by the army commander on instructions from General Montgomery's headquarters because the German surrender was at that time being negotiated and was about to be signed, as it was the same day. There had been no rationing of ammunition down to two shells per gun per day.

The second sentence in the minister's reply, to which close attention should be given, reads as follows:

> We are on the United States supply line, and get precisely the same treatment as the Americans get.

I suppose the minister would include the South Koreans. In other words, if there is a restriction on the use of ammunition or a shortage of ammunition all formations in the army in Korea get the same treatment.

At this point, it would be interesting to refer to another dispatch from Korea, and again I am indebted to the Ottawa Citizen of November 24. This dispatch is from the Kumhwa front, Korea, and the headline reads: "Allied officers sick at heart; appalling loss of men in fighting for Kumhwa." The dispatch describes the attack by the Korean second division on Sniper ridge and by the United States seventh division on Triangle hill. The battle commenced on October 14. On October 24, the Koreans relieved the United States division. The Chinese counter-attacked on October 31 and overran Triangle, inflicting heavy casualties on troops who refused to retreat. Then the dispatch reads as follows:

> The allied situation at this point was made extremely difficult by restrictions that cut back sharply the rate of allied artillery fire in order to save shells.
> This paralyzing order came just as the communists completed the massing of more than 200 field guns and thousands of mortars on the front.
> Then the high command, appalled at the communist fire power, threw economy to the winds and poured guns and shells into the sector in the greatest artillery mobilization since the second world war.

Had the commonwealth division taken over Sniper ridge and Triangle hill from the U.S. seventh division, we would now be mourning the annihilation of the Canadian 25th brigade because of a paralysing order to cut back the rate of artillery fire in order to save shells. If the 25th Canadian brigade is involved in a major action in December, will there be ammunition available against counter-attack? Is there a shortage of ammunition in Korea? There is no secrecy or security involved in this matter because these dispatches have informed the world that all is not well on the allied side in Korea.

What is the nature of the Korean conflict? General Van Fleet, commander-in-chief of the eighth army, has given the answer in an article reprinted in part in the Ottawa Citizen of November 24. He was commenting on the increased use of South Korean troops and their employment with allied forces, and considered this arrangement suitable—I give his words—"for the type of defensive warfare in which we are engaged—static positions with little movement in mountainous terrain". That is the Korean picture; a mountainous country, with the armies deadlocked in static positions and the emphasis on defence. It is not a repetition of world war II but of world war I.

The terrain precludes the continuous trench system of the western front system of 1914-18, but obviously favours the fortification of mountain strongholds. It is generally accepted that, under these conditions, the defenders are more favourably situated than the attackers. With observation posts in the hills and sufficient fire power available, the passes through the hills can be denied the enemy without the necessity of actually occupying the low ground with troops. Veterans of the Italian campaign would recognize, I assume, many similarities in the Korean battlefront. Monte Cassino, the anchor of the Gustav line of defence in Italy, is an example of the value and strength of a fortified hill position. Consider Vimy Ridge of the first world war. It was not a mountain, of course, but a commanding hill position. Fortified by the Germans it was proof against all attack during 1915 and 1916, and cost the lives of 50,000 Frenchmen. This position was taken only by a major assault in 1917.

If our military plan in Korea is to remain on the defensive, and I think it should be, if the warfare is static and not mobile, then I should like to know something about the nature of our defensive preparations. My observation has been that under static conditions of warfare there is every opportunity to establish enormous dumps of ammunition. It is under mobile conditions that supply lines tend to break down and that restrictions on the use of ammunition have to be imposed. Look at the situation in which we find ourselves. There is no submarine menace; we have an airlift and the railway system in Korea is functioning. There are 38 trains daily moving from Pusan to Seoul. They have 60 modern diesels, 360 steam locomotives, and we have air supremacy to protect our supply lines. We have the industrial capacity of the North American continent, and still we are told by correspondents in Korea that there is a shortage of ammunition under these static conditions.

Now, someone may say that I am trespassing on the forbidden ground of the higher military command. My answer is that if the reports are authentic about a shortage of ammunition in Korea or of restrictions on the use of ammunition, even in the face of enemy attacks, then a complete explanation of the conduct and direction of the Korean war should be given to parliament without delay. Have we anything to say as a Canadian nation in regard to the conduct and direction of the war in Korea? A few months ago some concern was expressed about the employment of Canadian troops at the prisoner of war camps. Has anything yet been said about the ammunition supply in Korea or about the methods of defence? These seem to me to be of much greater importance.

What is our military position in Korea? Have we sent merely token forces to meet our obligation as a member of the United Nations? Have we given hostages to fortune? What is our means of communication with the commander of the eighth army? If our 25th brigade should be assigned a role in Korea that, in the opinion of our brigade commander, would result in needless loss of life, has our brigadier any authority to raise objection? Have we at eighth army headquarters any Canadian officer of sufficiently high rank to influence decisions? The British have a major-general as liaison officer with the United Nations staff in Korea.

We have now two major commitments abroad, namely, in Korea and in Europe. In the future, we may face other commitments of an international nature. How are we protecting Canadian interests under these circumstances?

These questions are not academic. Military doctrine and military methods differ. Continental powers with large populations, such as Russia, Germany and the United States, have tended to be more prodigal in their use of manpower than have Great Britain and Canada. Profiting by the lessons of world war I, the commonwealth armies husbanded their manpower and used armoured vehicles and unlimited supplies of ammunition. The result was only one-third as many casualties as in the first war.

General Montgomery was criticized by some people for what they called over-insurance. General Montgomery believed in expending ammunition, not men. So did General Crerar. On February 8, 1945, when the assault by British and Canadian troops was launched against the Reichwalde forest and the Siegfried line, the artillery under his command fired 160,000 shells just in a few hours.

What is the policy in Korea? If my information is correct, United States military teaching has emphasized attack and has paid less attention to defence and withdrawal. British and Canadian military instruction has given much greater emphasis to defence and withdrawal, owing to wide experience with expeditionary forces fighting against superior numbers; and we are fighting against superior numbers in Korea. We are supposed to be on the defensive. How effective is our line of defence? The 155-mile front has its flanks on the sea. We cannot be outflanked. Sixty per cent of the line is held by South Koreans, 25 per cent by United States troops, and 15 per cent by other United Nations forces including, of course, the commonwealth division and our Canadian brigade. We should be able to resist a frontal attack. The only course then open to the enemy who cannot outflank you is, under these circumstances, an airborne assault behind our front line. But we have air superiority which effectively prevents an airborne attack.

After seventeen months of static warfare, are we so dug in in depth that the enemy cannot effect a penetration of our lines? Is our defensive fire plan so effective that we cannot be surprised? It does not appear so.

The third battalion of the Princess Patricia's is now in Korea. Its first task, its initiation into warfare, was to counter-attack, to assist the Black Watch, who had been overrun. Canada then issued its 153rd casualty list. Yet in the Globe and Mail of November 28 I read that two Chinese attacks on Sniper ridge on November 27 had failed because allied defensive fire was intense and accurate. The question that arises in my mind is this: What was the defensive fire plan on the commonwealth division front? Were our troops short of ammunition?

In fact, the whole plan of defence in Korea puzzles me. Are our troops still eking out an existence in foxholes? Do we need an organization in Korea similar in purpose to the German Todt group to build defensive lines of permanence that provide full protection for the troops and that are proof against anything except an all-out major effort? Consider the German defences in Italy in the recent war. They had three substantial defence lines. They had the Gustav line, the Adolf Hitler line and the Caesar line. Our official historian, Colonel Stacey, in dealing with this matter says of the Hitler line:

> The line depended for its strength upon a formidable barrier of concrete and steel structures . . . a number of these were miniature fortresses . . . and each was flanked by additional anti-tank guns manned by crews whose living quarters were secure concrete burrows twenty feet below ground.

Of the Gustav line he says:

> On the German side carefully sited weapon positions on the valley floor and in the mountains to north and south permitted the enemy to sweep the whole of the fortified zone with fire, while deep shelters protected the defenders against our air and artillery bombardment.

One can think of other lines of defence such as the Atlantic wall, the Siegfried line of 1939-45 and the Hindenburg line of 1917-18. These are all examples of the art of defence, where the defender has an adequate zone of fire and has adequate protection for the men who are in this defensive position.

What are we relying upon in Korea? Are we relying on concrete gun emplacements, pill-boxes, mine fields and barbed wire or are we relying upon air power and counter-attacks by infantry?

Reports from Korea indicate that the Chinese have increased appreciably the number of their mortars and guns. Have we done the same? If not, are we planning to do so? Should we not now double the artillery component of the brigade, increase the mortars, and add more heavy machine guns? For defensive static warfare, these are the weapons. Have we the multiple rocket projector in Korea? Its effect was devastating in north-west Europe. Should we double our tank strength? No great increase in personnel will be required to do this, but even if there were an increase in artillery personnel, for example, we would save on casualties that are inflicted on the infantry.

The experience of the two great wars has been that each successive year there was an increase in the fire power of the opposing armies. More guns and more ammunition were available. Part of the success of the Canadian corps in 1917 and 1918 was due to the fact that it had more artillery pieces and more machine guns than had other corps. Its machine gun strength was doubled in 1918 almost overnight. Under static conditions, with guns properly sited and with observation posts established, the Canadian corps was impregnable. At the battle of Hill 70 in the summer of 1917, the Germans launched 13 counter-attacks. Each counter-attack was destroyed by artillery and machine gun fire. Not one German reached our front line despite these desperate efforts. Cannot the same methods be used and similar results be achieved in Korea? The lesson of the war of 1914-18 is that men unaided by tanks simply cannot make an effective break-through by frontal attack. Not even Chinese are proof against artillery and mortar and machine-gun fire. Fire power rather than counter-attacks by infantry should be the defensive plan in Korea.

Another problem arises. Is the war in Korea now being considered as a war of attrition? I have seen several articles that have suggested that the Chinese cannot long endure the heavy losses they have suffered. Some Canadian officers, in conversation with me, have ventured the same opinion. There are at least three things wrong with this opinion. In the first place, the estimates of Chinese casualties have been grossly exaggerated. If they were true, General Van Fleet says: "There wouldn't be a live Chinese or North Korean opposing us." You will find that quotation on page 39 of the Reader's Digest for December. In the second place, a war of attrition against an enemy whose population exceeds 400 million is simply ridiculous. In the third place, the concept of the war of attrition by means of offensive action was applied in 1916 and 1917 with grievous effect to the wrong side; for the casualty lists published after that war showed that the allies had suffered greater losses than had the Germans in those very years when the military commanders were claiming that Germany's lifeblood was being drained away. And we of the British commonwealth expended 250,000 lives in the Ypres salient alone. War by attrition does not necessarily affect the other side.

I suggest to the Minister of National Defence that for the instruction of our present generation of military officers we proceed rapidly with the official history of world war I. Our competent official historian will be able to deduce many a lesson on the effective use of fire power against superior numbers and on the tactics of defence under static conditions. These lessons will be valuable for officers whose practical experience has been only with mobile forces in the advance, efficient as they proved themselves to be under those circumstances.

There need be no conflict between politicians and military leaders in those matters. I am putting forward various suggestions in the hope of obtaining the type of information that I think should be available to parliament. I am in agreement with the minister. He is already on record in Hansard of 1952, volume I, page 1080. These are his words:

> When we have men in battle facing a foe abroad we put above everything else the necessity of supporting, in every way, those men who are risking and giving their lives in order that peace may be restored and freedom preserved.

How do we support these men in every way, these men who are risking their lives? We must support them by having some part in determining the conduct of the war in Korea. Canadian military experience is, at the very least, the equal of United States military experience. Is Canadian military experience playing a part on the higher levels in the Korean conflict? We must support these men by providing the arms and ammunition. In the third year of any war, there should be not a trickle but a flood of ammunition. We must support them with adequate fully-trained replacements. Will the minister assure the house that that is being done? We must support them by retaining effective political control over our forces and not relinquishing that control to the military. That is in the British and Canadian tradition. What assurance can the minister give us on that point?

What is the future in Korea? For those who are interested in the subject—and I imagine every member of the House of Commons is—may I suggest that they will find a brief and well written survey in the International Journal of the autumn of 1952 by G. H. Stanley, who is at the Royal Military College at Kingston. In the last issue of the U. S. News and World Report, which is dated December 5, there is a good summary of the Korean situation, and the various proposals are there balanced one against the other. I have no time to go into that, but I do suggest that parliament should seriously consider Canada's position with regard to decisions that may be made in connection with the war in Korea, because on those decisions depend a great many things and the lives of our soldiers may be at stake.

For our Canadian forces in Korea I have nothing but admiration—for their courage and for their devotion to duty. They are Canadians; it follows that they have no superiors on the battlefield. I hope that the fortune of war will not strike down any one of our battalions as the Gloucesters were struck down. Should our brigade be called upon to storm a ridge like Sniper ridge or Triangle hill, and hold it without sufficient artillery support, I am confident that they will face their hour of trial with fortitude and determination.

We are engaged in Korea not in a police action but in a war. We have lost the equivalent of the fighting strength of two battalions. We are calling upon our young men to sacrifice their lives on the field of battle thousands of miles from home. Are we taking every precaution to see that not one of those lives is needlessly lost?

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): This house is fully aware that national health insurance ranks high on the government's list of unfinished business. It is the next great step towards social security. I think that it affects every one of Canada's 14,009,429 people, and I would not be exaggerating if I said that it is a matter of life and death for some of the people of this country.

If you are a wage earner with dependents you are all right until you get sick and then you are licked. The subject of health insurance is scarcely a new one. It has to my personal knowledge been discussed and debated in the house at least since 1945, and it was by no means a new subject then.

It may be of interest if I recall to hon. members that today there are 39 countries in the world that have national health insurance plans. Most of them provide not only for medical but also for hospital services. Many of them provide for sickness and maternity benefits. Lest there should be anyone in this house who thinks that only socialist Britain and Soviet Russia have taken this step, I want to point out that the other countries include Sweden and Norway, Denmark, Iceland, New Zealand, Guatemala and even little Panama. Nor is health insurance a post-war freak, for the earliest scheme of health insurance was set up in Austria in 1883, almost 70 years ago. It is only fair to say that these schemes are by no means perfect or Utopian. All observers who have had an opportunity to view these health plans admit that they are handicapped by shortages of technical staffs and hospital facilities. But that does not deter those countries from setting up health insurance plans. It is significant that in every country where a health insurance plan has been set up it has acted as a spur to hospital expansion, encouraging and accelerating building and medical facilities.

In Britain, to take only one recent example, the number of doctors, nurses and laboratory technicians has increased faster since the health plan was set up in 1948 than ever before. We find that Canada is behind many countries in providing adequate health care at costs which the people can afford. A nation with the second highest standard of living is twelfth in infant mortality rate.

Mr. Knowles: Shame!

Mr. Croll: Let me read you just a few health statistics which will help us to understand the problem that is involved. Every year in Canada the following deaths occur because of sickness and disease: Tuberculosis, in 1950, 3,583; in 1951, 3,418; communicable diseases, in 1950, 5,577; in 1951, 6,999; infants under one year, 15,324 in 1950 and 14,584 in 1951; infants at birth, under one day, 3,996 in 1950 and 3,637 in 1951.

Here we have nearly 30,000 deaths a year, most of which are caused by lack of proper living conditions and medical care. Just think of it! Thirty thousand people die every year, more than a quarter of a million every ten years, and most of the deaths could have been prevented.

Nor is my list of statistics complete by any means. Let me recall some figures that were given the house several years ago by a former minister of labour. He pointed out that out of 1,014,491 men examined under mobilization regulations 55 per cent were unfit for front-line service and 285,055 were unfit for service anywhere, in any capacity.

I have here a report contained in the Ottawa Journal of November 12, 1952, in which Lieutenant Colonel H. V. Matthews of Toronto, speaking before an armistice gathering in Kitchener, said:

> More than 50 per cent of the youths trying to enlist in Canada are unfit for military service. We reject more people than we accept.

In other words, out of more than a million Canadians examined, more than half had health defects which made them unfit for military service. These figures are only for men of military age. What about the women and children, and the older people? We can assume that these shocking figures can be projected across the entire population of this country. A balance sheet of national health would contain a staggering figure of human lives lost or impaired, of millions of man-hours lost, of untold pain and suffering and sickness. The net result is a wastage of human life, manpower and money which dwarfs understanding.

Faced with this appalling balance sheet of health, no one person in the House of Commons or in the country will deny that everything possible must be done to help remedy the situation. There is of course no simple prescription for national health. It is compounded of many ingredients, and there may not be general agreement on all of them. But one vital ingredient is beyond dispute: It is simply this, a better distribution of all health services. No prescription for national health which does not include this can possibly be effective. We must find the means of providing better health for all, regardless of ability to pay. We must remove the price tag from health, and share the cost of illness. We must make sure that economic needs do not prevent Canadians from having access to the health care they need. Patients must have the right to choose their doctors, and the doctor his patients. Doctors are not to be servants of the state, but are to be free to serve their patients.

I am just as much opposed to socialized medicine as is any doctor. I do not want to see our doctors on the government payroll. But we need the help and guidance of the medical profession in a constructive spirit to help solve our problem. In common with many others in this country I believe our answer is to be found in some plan of national health insurance underwritten by the dominion and administered by the provinces for the benefit of all Canadians.

I am well aware there are some objections to national health insurance. I suppose the first objection is that our medical facilities in Canada are not developed sufficiently to support a comprehensive plan of national health insurance. That may well be true. But let us not lose sight of a few things. First, I do not believe our medical facilities are less either in quantity or in quality than those of most other civilized nations. I know that our doctors, our nurses and our technical people are second to none in the world. I know of few countries that can boast finer or better equipped hospitals or clinics.

No doubt it may be said, and with truth, that we have not enough of these things. But what country has? I do not wish to make unfavourable comparisons with any other country; but I would ask whether Canada is in any worse position medically speaking than Norway, New Zealand or Panama. I cannot believe it. Yet these small nations are among the 39 which have introduced national health insurance.

Of course we have not enough medical and health facilities; no country has. But if we are going to sit back and wait until we do, then you know when we are going to get health insurance: just about never. I am convinced that greater health facilities will come with a health insurance plan. That has been the experience of every country that has adopted such a plan; and it is significant that in no country was a plan abandoned because facilities proved unequal to the task.

Today we may lack personnel and facilities which are deemed sufficient; but is that a good enough reason for not starting a plan, even in a limited fashion? It just cannot be argued that a country as rich as we are cannot bed down its sick and remove from its people the constant fear that illness may strike their homes tomorrow and throw them on charity.

The next objection of course may come from members of the medical profession. It is regrettable that the subject of national health insurance should be viewed with such suspicion, alarm—and worse—by a considerable number of Canadian doctors. Yet such is the case. The stock reply we get from the doctor is: Why should I become a civil servant? This feeling, which I call civil service phobia, dies very hard. Leaving aside for the moment the slander against civil servants, whom I personally have found to be diligent and conscientious, I believe that this reaction from a portion of the medical profession betrays a lack of understanding of the whole subject of health insurance.

I do not suggest that doctors are not fully aware of the need for expanded health services. No one has better opportunity than has the doctor, who meets the problem a hundred times a day. But I feel the medical profession are under a misconception of the true meaning and purpose of national health insurance. No one is proposing to take away from the doctor or the patient freedom of choice in their dealings one with the other. No one is proposing to make doctors civil servants or to turn patients into slaves of a bureaucratic medical system. By our administration of social services in this country we have amply demonstrated that we can have welfare without tyranny. Another objection to health insurance doubtless will be its cost. I can only ask hon. members to refer to the health figures I quoted earlier.

This country cannot afford to be without health insurance. Of course health insurance cannot be had for nothing. We must not mislead either the people or ourselves on that score at this stage of our thinking on the subject. I do not think that anyone can do any more than hazard a guess as to the cost. It depends upon the extent of the plan and one thing is sure: the more extensive, the more expensive. I say again: Can we afford to be without health insurance? Once that question is answered we can go on to examine the problem of the cost. The Toronto Star of February 15, 1950, contained the following:

> Public medical care programs for persons receiving public assistance are now in operation in four provinces. Ontario was the first to establish, in 1935, a public medical service for persons on relief. In 1942 the service was extended to old age pensioners and families receiving mothers' allowance. In 1945, Saskatchewan put into operation a more generous medical care service for all recipients of public assistance, and since 1947 similar programs were put into effect by the governments of Alberta and British Columbia.
> These programs are helping to build experience and to train administrators of health insurance in Canada.

I quote that because I happen to know something of that problem. I am no great authority on health insurance, but the house will be interested to know that as minister of welfare for Ontario in 1935 it was my responsibility to look after the people who were victims of the depression. At that time one in ten residents of Ontario needed medical care. Acting in my capacity as minister in consultation with the medical association we found a formula that provided medical care for those people on a fee-for-service basis. We paid the medical association which in turn paid the doctors. This was the first province-wide health plan in Canada. As the article indicates, that plan has been continued in Ontario as a model arrangement. In 1942 it was extended to old age pensioners and those receiving family allowances. It was copied in 1945 in Saskatchewan, and in 1947 by the Alberta and British Columbia governments.

As a supporter of health insurance and as an innovator, I have some appreciation of the administrative problems involved. I think I have some idea of the intimate and precise study and preparation required before we can take the next step.

Before I say anything further may I indicate to the house that I had the privilege of hearing the report by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Time did not permit him to relate more than a small portion of the achievements of that department, and they are many and great. The government's record on health and welfare must be described in glowing terms. I support what has already been done and I associate myself with its accomplishments. The minister has been consistently an advocate of health insurance. He has been intimately concerned with the sick and the ill. It may be that he thinks he has moved as fast as circumstances and conditions will permit. I think he is moving a little slowly. For that reason I am prepared to push him, but I am not prepared to shove him.

Let us see what courses are open to us. The government could present a bill on health insurance, we could debate and criticize it, and as a government measure it would have to pass. I do not think anyone in this house suggests that that course of action should be adopted. On the other hand, the minister could present a bill on national health insurance, its principle could be adopted, and then the bill could be referred to a committee of this house or to a joint committee of both houses to consider and report back. In that case the committee would be limited to making inquiries within the scope of the bill. I do not think that that is good enough.

Then the government could appoint a committee of this house or a joint committee with wide powers to study health insurance in the light of modern needs, conditions and accomplishments, with instructions to bring in a report which the government might or might not adopt in part or in whole. I think that that is the proper course to follow. I ask the government to set up at this session a joint committee of both houses to prepare a blueprint for national health insurance.

We in this house know very little about health insurance; the public knows even less. The public feel that they need it, they want it, but they are not quite sure what it will entail. They have a feeling it would be for their good. There has been a great deal of talk in the house about the number of studies that have been carried on, but the fact is that only two studies of this problem have been made in the last twenty-five years. I cannot emphasize that too strongly.

In 1928 the standing committee on industrial and international relations investigated insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity and brought in two reports. On June 1, 1928, they brought in a report dealing with the legislative jurisdiction, and I quote:

> That the evidence of the justice department makes it clear that the responsibility for such legislation rests on the provincial authorities, it being within their jurisdiction under the provisions of the British North America Act; but that it would be within the power of parliament to contribute by grant to such provinces as adopted such legislation, following the precedents set in the matter of technical education, highway construction, and, more recently, the Old Age Pensions Act.

On May 1, 1929, the same committee brought in a further recommendation as follows:

> That with regard to sickness insurance, the Department of Pensions and National Health be requested to initiate a comprehensive survey of the field of public health, with special reference to a national health program. In this, it is believed that it would be possible to secure the co-operation of the provincial and municipal health departments, as well as the organized profession.

That date of May 1, 1929, is significant. Everyone remembers the hungry thirties. At the end of the thirties we entered a war and we did not come out of it until 1945. It is significant that in 1948 definite steps were taken, not only to comply with this recommendation but to go even beyond the recommendation.

In 1943 we had a special committee on health composed of top civil servants which was known as the Heagerty committee. They did a very able job, but the Heagerty report is now ten years old. We are living in the penicillin age. Scientific progress has been rapid in recent years and the demand for better care and the cost of providing it have both increased sharply. We are faced with a whole new set of problems in the field of health. Surely the friends of health insurance recognize the need for an up-to-date study by members of this house.

The impression is often given here that the British introduced their health scheme overnight. No such thing. A parliamentary committee studied it and brought in a report; and they had before them the Beveridge report which has used it as the basis for recommending the present health plan. Then I hear many people say: Oh, you have been promising it since 1919. That is true. Does it ever occur to those who make the statement that this is not an overnight project? It was 1911 when Lloyd George first introduced health and unemployment insurance in Great Britain but it was 37 years later when the act came into effect. It was 1912 when Teddy Roosevelt, not Franklin, first suggested health insurance in the United States. They still have not got it. The last report was made on health insurance following a request by President Truman in September of 1948, a significant year because we did something about health at the same time. President Truman wrote to Oscar Ewing, who was the federal security administrator, and asked him to make a survey; and Mr. Ewing did so. He told the President there were four phases to health insurance, and I quote from page 91 of "The Nation's Health—A Ten-year Program". This is a United States government publication.

> Phase one
> Federal legislation to settle the basic policies of a system of government insurance and to decide important details; and to provide for a three-year "tooling-up" period before the date on which insurance benefits are made available.
>
> Phase two
> The tooling-up period during which procedures would be worked out co-operatively by professional groups, localities, states and the federal government; agreements arrived at with individuals and groups providing medical services; and the machinery for actual operations set up.
> Phase three
> Operations begin, services are provided up to the ceiling set by resources as they exist at the time.
>
> Phase four
>
> Expansion of services, as the accelerated increase and improved distribution of medical manpower and facilities lift the ceiling, until comprehensive services are available to everyone, everywhere in the country.

Mr. Ewing further told the President that would take ten years.

I think it would be unfair to the members of this house and it would be hazardous to the public to ask us to inaugurate a comprehensive insurance plan until we have much more information. Let us just deal with the question of cost for a few minutes. It has been suggested by a group in the house that the cost is likely to be $30 per capita. The minister has made the suggestion that it is likely to be $43 per capita, and the voluntary agencies suggest that $50 is a better figure. If for a family of three the cost will be approximately $12 a month, how is it to be paid? Is it to be paid entirely by the employer or by the employee, or is there to be a division? Is it to be a flat rate or a graduated rate or a combination of flat and graduated? What will be the government contribution?

Should we not know something about what has been done with the $160 million that we appropriated in 1948 which was for a five-year health grants program? How much of that has been committed? How much has been spent? How many new beds have resulted from construction? How are they distributed? How many people have they trained professionally?

What about the attitude of the provincial government? Should we not give detailed study to the provincial surveys? They have gone to a lot of trouble. Would I be wrong if I said that no one in this house has read them? Would we not be subject to very serious criticism if we did not first read the surveys and find out where the provinces stand?

I have a report from the Windsor Star dated October 24 which deals with the provincial attitudes to health insurance. It reads:

> . . . Newfoundland has not yet reported . . . Ontario and Quebec did not comment . . . British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan are strongly in favour of some such plan. Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are satisfied for the time being to leave it to the voluntary plans. New Brunswick, while seeing both advantages and disadvantages, . . . seems to oppose an immediate start. Manitoba favours health insurance in principle but feels that it is not feasible at the present time.

Not much comfort there. What about the private agencies? How many persons are covered by the voluntary agencies such as Blue Cross, physicians' service, insurance companies and co-operative organizations? Some employers at the present time are obligated to pay a portion of the employees' cost of health insurance. Will that obligation carry on if the voluntary agencies are integrated or taken over? Should the plan be an over-all plan or should health insurance be introduced progressively? As far as I am concerned, I can take my health insurance without wigs, toupees or false teeth on the first day it starts.

Is not a joint committee the proper place to study other health plans, to compare costs, question witnesses, and give public bodies a chance to be heard? Will it not also be of educational value to the people of Canada in the interests of a clear understanding of what is involved?

Dr. Malcolm G. Taylor, director of the Saskatchewan health planning commission, is quoted in the Toronto Star of February 5, 1950, as saying:

> Since, as appears evident, Canada is approaching the day of decision concerning health insurance, the important question is, what kind of health insurance?

The editorial goes on:

> Dr. Taylor has suggested that this would depend on the answers to the following, among other questions:
>
> 1. Should it be a national scheme, on the British model, or should there be ten different schemes, evolved by the provinces?
> 2. Should professional associations have administrative authority? Should government funds be turned over to a profession or an association for distribution to its own members?
> 3. How shall health insurance be paid for? Should it be entirely or partly financed by the state? Should it be compulsory or voluntary? Which of the three levels of government should participate and in what proportion? Should individuals pay according to a flat rate or by graded income tax levy? Should employers contribute?
> 4. Should all services be provided from the start? If not, what should be included and what left out?

Now, it is quite true that the opposition will say that a committee is merely a stall, but because that charge is made is no reason to refuse to set up a committee. With this government the public does not demand every promise in writing and notarized. They have given us their trust and confidence for almost two generations. We have not failed them. We, who have given this country every worthwhile social measure, intend to secure for the people whatever is required against the ravages of disease and ill health.

I have already indicated that there are many problems that need study. There are five particular aspects that have to be studied by some committee at some time. First is the question of health grants; what has been done with them and how effective they have been. Second is the question of provincial co-operation and how we can obtain it. Third are the voluntary agencies and how we can integrate them. Fourth is the attitude of the medical profession, how we can pacify them. Fifth is the question of costs and their distribution.

I think, in the light of these problems, it is clear that only a committee could now make progress to blueprint a health insurance program. We need to assess our manpower, facilities, knowledge, and funds to be used for health insurance. It is true that the time is short. It is not likely that any committee could be organized before the middle of January. If there should be a spring election it would be almost impossible for the committee to complete its deliberations. If, on the other hand, there should be an election in the fall it may be possible to bring in a report before we adjourn, which would be about the middle of May. I do not know, but I believe it is time we got at the job.

I have said that a committee could recommend a formula for health insurance, but it would do more than that. It would help prepare the country for health insurance and perhaps deal with the most pertinent problem before us: shall it be all or nothing at this time? In its wisdom it may well recommend a limited service to be increased progressively; that has been the experience with every plan that is in existence at the present time. It is quite possible the committee may find that the country is in a position to undertake immediately or within the very near future hospitalization or diagnostic treatment. The medical profession generally welcome the extension of hospitalization to the public, and I think they would co-operate fully. Perhaps that would be our first step. I am sure none of us is prepared to accept a half-baked plan that may well set back health insurance for a generation in this country.

When I said that health insurance ranks high on the government's list of unfinished business I heard someone across the floor say "hear, hear." I believe it would be worth while, in the few minutes I have at my disposal, to look at the position of the other political parties in the house on health insurance. Their position is put forward in Hansard. The position of the official opposition is found at page 29 of Hansard for November 24:

> For that reason there should be general agreement that the first and necessary step in dealing with this subject is to institute an inquiry which would be conducted by representatives of the medical profession, the hospital boards, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments.

The position of the Social Credit party is found at page 56 of Hansard for November 24:

> The Social Credit kind of national health program would ensure that sufficient doctors, dentists, nurses, technicians, clinics and hospital beds would be made available first to take on the work as the scheme is extended.

In so far as the C.C.F. position is concerned, they say: "Health insurance here and now; we have had enough committees and surveys. What we want now is action." It is obvious from the statements on the record, and we who are parliamentarians know exactly what all the parties mean. We can reach only one conclusion. The Liberal party is the only party that can bring health insurance to the Canadian people because the Tories won't and the C.C.F. can't.

Mr. Knowles: And the Liberals won't unless they are shoved.

Mr. Croll: My suggestion is that this is the time to begin. If we do not, we shall be answerable to future generations for our complacency and our failure. So long as a single life is lost unnecessarily; so long as one person endures suffering which could have been prevented; so long as sickness takes its needless toll, then we shall have failed in our responsibility to the Canadian people. I repeat my suggestion that at this time we can make progress in one way and one way only, by setting up a committee of this house or a joint committee to blueprint health insurance.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I wish to direct some attention to the Canadian beet sugar industry as it relates to national defence. There are in Canada at present seven beet sugar factories. There are three in Alberta, all in the Lethbridge area, one in Manitoba and two in Ontario, as well as one in Quebec. These seven factories can produce an estimated 25 per cent of the needs of Canadians in respect of sugar. Both the sugar beet growers and the sugar beet factory owners are fearful that this valuable Canadian industry is in grave danger. It can be destroyed before long by the rising importations of Cuban granulated cane sugar.

The Chatham Daily News of November 7, 1952, carries the following headlines:

> Sugar beet industry facing extinction.
> Refined Cuban sugar floods domestic market.
> By Ted Aitkin

In the lower right-hand corner of the front page appeared this headline:

> Sugar beet marketing board urges Ottawa to protect sugar beet industry.

The same newspaper in its November 17 issue on page 11 carried this headline:

> Cuban refined sugar forces down domestic beet payment.

As everybody knows, if domestic beet payments are forced down our farmers will be warned away from the production of sugar beets. Thus the industry could be easily destroyed.

Far too few Canadians realize how serious a situation this could indicate, first as regards Canadian sugar supply in case of war and even in peace, and second, as regards Canadian sovereignty.

Let me review some of the facts concerning the sugar supply in world war II. In Canada sugar rationing was introduced on July 1, 1942, and continued until November 3, 1947. Throughout most of this period the household ration was a half pound per person per week, plus a varying extra allowance during the home canning season. In 1945 the ration was reduced to about six ounces a week. The industrial users of sugar such as bakers, confectioners, soft drink manufacturers, etc., were rationed at varying rates at varying times from as low as 50 per cent to as high as 90 per cent of the July, 1941, usage.

The total annual per capita consumption of sugar, direct and indirect, including the sugar content in jams, biscuits, confectionery, canned fruit, etc., is indicated in the first column below. The second column gives the total annual per capita consumption of sugar in all its forms, including the sugar content of glucose, corn syrup, honey, etc. The table is as follows:

Annual Per Capita Consumption

	Cane and beet sugar	Sugars of all kinds including sugar content of glucose, corn syrup, honey etc.
1935-39	94·7	101·7
1943	72·1	85·6
1944	83·8	97·6
1945	68·9	79·2
1946	72·2	84·8
1947	89·0	100·2
1948	98·7	106·2
1949	99·3	106·5

By glancing at those figures we can readily see how seriously the people of Canada were limited in the matter of sugar consumption. Sugar is one of the absolute musts in the diet.

Let us see what were the main causes of this rationing, that we may be able to judge whether or not those causes can apply in any coming conflict in which Canada may be engaged.

First, there was a sharp reduction in the world output. The Philippine sugar industry was destroyed. The sugar industry of Java was destroyed. The sugar industry of many of the European nations, especially those that were occupied and overrun, was in large measure destroyed. Such countries as Poland and the Ukraine also had their sugar industry destroyed.

Production was greatly impaired in such countries as Australia, Fiji, Trinidad and Antigua. This impairment was caused by a variety of reasons. One would be lack of fertilizers, and there were many others.

The total falling off in the world's production of sugar amounted to 8 million tons. This falling off reduced the world sugar production from 31 million tons in 1939-40 to 23 million tons in 1945. These figures I take from a report of the wartime prices and trade board released in March of 1946.

Meanwhile the world population was increasing. We must make allowance for the rapid increase in the world population. Many people are afraid that we are not going to be able to produce all the food the world needs, even under the best of conditions. It is estimated that probably the world population is increasing at the rate of some 25 million a year, and that at this rate of increase the world population will practically double in the next 70 years. All those who are contemplating the production of food in the world should bear strictly in mind figures like that. Seventy years is not a long period. Babies lying in our cradles today will probably see that time and have to cope with the dreadful problems which will then prevail.

In any world war of at least the immediate future, we must expect still greater destruction of sugar production; for if matters continue as they are now we shall have Russia and her satellites, with a tremendous population, ranged against the United States and the so-called NATO and other free nations. That will mean that we shall have a world in conflict in two opposing camps, and all the rest of the world will be the battleground. There will not be much chance of producing sugar up to normal in most of the battleground and perhaps in much of the territory occupied and held by the great combatants.

Let it be borne in mind that we shall have submarines of far wider range, of far greater striking power and of much greater versatility in the next war than those we had in the last one; and submarines accounted for a good many cargoes of sugar. We shall also have aircraft of far greater range, striking power and versatility than those we had in the war just past. We shall have guided missiles, with all the fearful possibilities that could derive from their use in the matter of sinking cargoes of sugar that suppliers might attempt to bring to the Canadian shore. I am not mentioning the possibilities of the use of the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb. Just imagine what would be left of the finest of the sugar-producing islands if an atomic bomb or a hydrogen bomb were dropped on it. As sober Canadians in a responsible position we, together with the people throughout Canada, must take cognizance of these facts and must guide our future policies with our eyes upon those facts, not upon theories, no matter how much we might have loved those theories.

It will be argued that Canada might safely rely upon the United States to bolster the Canadian sugar supply in case of need. In world war II Canadians were fast wearing their welcome out as dependent neighbours of the United States in the matter of sugar supplies.

To bring this matter forcibly to the attention of all interested people throughout the country and throughout the house, I ask permission to read into Hansard a quotation from the United States Congressional Record of 1947, at page A507:

United States Press Criticizes Work of Sugar Pool. Extension of Remarks of Hon. Roy O. Woodruff of Michigan in The House of Representatives.

Thursday, January 30, 1947.

Mr. Woodruff: Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following article from Sugar Facts, published at Chatham, Ontario, of January 15, 1947:

United States Press criticizes work of sugar pool—Editorial comment supports Representative Woodruff's charge United States contributing more than fair share—Canada attacked as one giving less.

A letter forwarded to Hon. Thomas A. Jenkins, chairman of the Republican congressional food study committee, with respect to the sugar situation has occasioned a flood of editorial comment throughout the United States. Author of the letter, Representative Roy O. Woodruff (Republican), of Michigan, wrote in part: "With our beet-sugar production up and Cuba's production up, one may well ask why our sugar bowls are empty and why so much fruit and vegetables cannot be canned for lack of sugar. The answer is found in the program carried out by the combined food board, which has lately been expanded into the international emergency food commission. The combined food board was composed of the United States, Great Britain and Canada. The United States and its offshore territories make the greatest contribution to the pool, as they furnish over 60 per cent of the sugar consumed in this country in addition to sharing with other nations the 3,768,000 tons which the United States bought from Cuba. In short, United States consumers get only 2,125,000 tons from Cuba, and the remaining 1,643,000 tons are distributed to other nations by the commission. By comparison, Britain will provide less than 30 per cent of her sugar consumption, whereas Canada will produce only 18 per cent of its sugar needs.

"Sugar rationing continues in the United States with promise of only a microscopic increase in allowances, yet Canada recently declared a sugar dividend of three extra pounds per person to her household consumers. This dividend has been reported in the press as being justified by increased supplies of sugar. Canada is producing only 65 per cent of its beet-sugar plant capacity, with the largest beet-sugar plant in Ontario standing idle for the past 5 years."

Mr. Woodruff's letter goes on to quote J. H. Blackmore, M.P., who told the Canadian House of Commons, "I am utterly amazed at the indifference which prevails in this house and in the Dominion of Canada with respect to the sugar supply."

"It is obvious," wrote Mr. Woodruff, "that the administration in Washington has simply stood on the sidelines and let the American producers and consumers carry the load for other nations".

The press of the United States sprang eagerly to Mr. Woodruff's cause. The Tri-County Banner, of Blanchard, Mich., ran his letter under a page 1 headline, "Bureaucrats cause of sugar shortage, claims Woodruff".

The Bay City Times editorialized "He deserves the gratitude of the public for starting the ball rolling." The Detroit Sunday Times, reporting a speech by James Vernor, ginger ale tycoon, headed the story, "United States sugar shortage laid to new deal plan." The same paper, in another story, reports "In Washington, stacks of letters from outraged housewives, denouncing the sugar shortage and demanding relief, are being exhibited by congressmen."

The Los Angeles Examiner ran a banner headline, "Housewives' sugar fight urged" with a page 1 box "Want more sweets? Tell Congressmen." The Detroit Times of December 24 cried plaintively, "Europe got (our) Yule sugar."

Senator Bridges, Republican, from New Hampshire, warned Secretary of Agriculture Anderson to supply sugar, declaring that while Anderson is prepared to ask only 9 pounds more sugar per person in 1947, sugar industry experts have produced figures showing that were Americans to get their rightful share they would have 19 pounds more sugar per person than in 1946.

The Detroit Free Press quoted Chairman Jenkins, of the Republican food study commission, as saying, "The American housewife has suffered more than her share of the wartime sugar shortage as compared with the industrial user of sugar . . . any increase in the ration for 1947 beyond the 20 per cent extra already recommended should go directly to individual housewives." (The 20 per cent increases suggested by Jenkins are double the amount of increase considered likely for 1947 by the department of agriculture.)

Anyone reading that statement will readily see that if the war had gone on for two or three more years those protests would have registered in congress with such vigour that congressmen would have been forced to take action and Canada would have been without the sugar we had, little as it was. I hope we shall all bear in mind, inside this house and outside the house, that very solemn fact.

It will be argued that there is a world surplus of sugar production. That is no responsibility of Canada or Canadians. It seems to me that I have known a good many people who feel that because there is a world surplus of sugar we ought to do something about it. We do not have to do anything about it. Let those who are overproducing do something about it. Every nation certainly has an inalienable right to increase its production of any commodity to the point of self-sufficiency in respect of that commodity, provided that the nation is well adapted for the production of that commodity.

There can be no conceivable doubt that Canada is eminently fitted for the production of sugar. Canadians can produce all the sugar they need in the province of Alberta alone, south of High River. In my own constituency where there are now three sugar factories, there could be two more. I am not saying there should be, but there could be. We are now constructing the great St. Mary-Milk river water conservation project, which will put water on 350,000 odd acres. Thirty thousand acres, according to the estimates of those who know, will support a sugar factory of 1,500 tons slicing capacity such as is the factory at Raymond, in my constituency, which can supply Canadians with roughly 5 per cent of their sugar needs.

We also have the Canada Land and Irrigation project. We have the Eastern irrigation project around Brooks and Rosemary. These all comprise land which is eminently suitable for the production of sugar. These irrigation projects together with others in southern Alberta would provide land for the production of all the sugar needed by Canada's present population. There may be objection to subsidizing the price of the sugar, or the freight on it, so as to move it down to Ontario and Quebec or out to British Columbia where it may be needed. But the simple fact is we can physically produce the sugar.

In Ontario there is room for many sugar factories. In Saskatchewan, in the Carrot river valley, sugar can be produced with great success, according to estimates. Sugar is also being produced in Manitoba. We have no grounds for supposing that Manitoba could not support another sugar factory. Therefore there is simply no conceivable excuse for Canada's failure to produce sufficient sugar to meet her needs, and to do so under highly economic conditions, as I shall show before I finish my remarks.

It will be argued that the beet sugar industry is an uneconomic industry, unable to compete successfully with the cane sugar industry without subsidies and various kinds of help, the whole result being that by using the beet sugar industry the way we do we are making our consumers pay an unjustly high cost for sugar. I propose to read into the record an excerpt from the submission to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations by the Alberta co-operative sugar beet growers association in 1937. From a perusal of this excerpt in this report it will be easy for anyone to see that the beet sugar industry can hold its own quite successfully if it is not subjected to handicaps to which no one in his right mind would think of subjecting any industry.

When you stop to think of the kind of protection which is given our manufacturing industries producing agricultural machines, our manufacturing industry producing automobiles, and almost every other industry including wheat, apples, carrots, table beets, cabbages, and almost anything you can name, when you consider the protection given these you begin to say: "Well, an ordinary amount of protection to the Canadian beet sugar industry is only logical." I read:

To indicate the value of this industry to the agriculture of our district, the community in general and the Dominion of Canada, we submit the following figures relating to the 1937 beet crop: 235,481 tons of beets were produced from 19,829 acres of irrigated land—an average of 11·88 tons per acre; 75,603,700 pounds of sugar were manufactured; 3,813 pounds was the per acre yield of refined sugar; $3,040,000 worth of sugar was manufactured; $155 was the total gross return per acre; $77.50 was the gross return to the manufacturer; $77.50 was the gross return per acre to the farmer.

The farmers' costs approximated $60 per acre which includes $25 per acre paid for hand labour by the farmer. Those figures were given in a speech made by T. George Wood, manager, Canadian Sugar Factories Limited at Lethbridge, Wednesday, March 23, 1938. We believe that this land is producing more food value per acre than any other land in the dominion.

I believe it was, too. I continue:

Sugar beets of the highest quality can be grown, harvested and manufactured into refined sugar on all of our irrigated lands in Alberta. This industry has, in the districts where it is established, made a tremendous contribution toward the prosperity of both the urban and rural sections and to our national economy.

The annual returns from the Lethbridge northern irrigation district rose from $761,000 in 1935 to $1,057,000 in 1936, the first year the new sugar factory operated in that territory.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The sugar factory referred to is the one at Picture Butte.

I continue:

Average yields of sugar beets 1926-29

	tons per acre
Great Britain	7·70
Belgium	10·98
Czechoslovakia	10·12
France	9·11
Germany	9·91
The Netherlands	13·10
United States of America	9·63
Average	10·7

What did Alberta do?

The average for Alberta for the same years was 8·0 tons per acre. For the year 1937 the average yield in Alberta was 11·88 per acre, while in the United States it was 11·77. As for the quality of beets in Alberta, the average sugar content from 1925 to 1937 was 16·6 per cent, while for the 1937 crop it was 18·16 per cent.

I wish to state now, Mr. Speaker, that 18·16 per cent would probably be one of the very highest sugar content figures to be found on the American continent, and perhaps in most countries of the world.

Since 1937 the mechanization of the beet sugar industry has progressed tremendously and spectacularly. Now it is possible, by the use of remarkable machinery which has been developed, to carry on almost any process in connection with the production of sugar beets almost entirely by machinery. I saw this year a number of machines being pulled along by tractors. There would be two people standing on the machine and operating it, carrying out the work of digging the beets, topping them, and dumping them into a truck being driven alongside. The machine would travel just a little faster than a team would pull a plow. Well, that is enough to show that the beet sugar industry has a wonderful future before it. It is not a thing that ought to be kicked around.

Since 1946, Mr. Speaker, Liberal government policy has permitted an enormous increase in the cost of production of beet sugar. Nevertheless sugar from sugar beets at present prices easily surpasses other staple foods in respect of comparative cost per calorie. To support this assertion may I read into the record a statement which is printed in the November 20, 1952 issue of Sugar Facts, which the United States congressman thought worthy of quoting. The quotation is as follows:

Sugar Is a Bargain In Our Food Budget

With the price of proteins—steaks and roasts—what it is today, Canadians have a cheap energy food in sugar. It is estimated that in Canada and

United States today, about one-fourth of the energy requirement is met through eating sugar in various forms at fire sale prices.

Scientists claim the average person uses approximately 3,000 calories per day and witness how cheaply sugar—compared to today's high prices for other foods—can supply the much needed energy.

If food is purchased on a caloric basis alone, and flavor and variety disregarded, the costs for 1,000 calories are:

	Cents
Sugar	5·2
Margarine	11·3
White bread	11·6
Butter	20·0
Bacon (rindless)	21·2
Potatoes	21·7
White milk	28·8
Cheese	30·5
Ham (whole, smoked)	53·5
Apples	56·0
Prime rib roast (rolled)	95.0

Of course purchases cannot be based on a caloric value alone, for a balanced diet of proteins, fats and carbohydrates is needed, but in terms of calories, sugar is the bargain in the budget.

Those figures seem to hew out from under them the ground upon which those men would stand who feel that we should import sugar from Cuba, because of the need to reduce sugar prices. I know that any Canadian government is likely to be under almost irresistible pressure demanding the admission of cheap cane sugar into Canada. Any Canadian government requires all the support possible to help resist such pressure.

The people of Canada, and some members of the House of Commons, will be interested to know that there are five agencies in the world today, several of them right here in Canada, that are seeking to destroy the Canadian beet sugar industry, for various reasons. First in Canada we have the owners of cane refineries. These men obviously would like to get rid of the beet sugar industry. Second, we have Canadians who have invested money in plantations in cane producing countries. There are some powerful men in both those classes. Third, there are the Canadian interests eager to sell abroad. It is easy enough, for example, for automobile or machinery manufacturers to say, "Well, bring in Cuban sugar. Let us have a chance to sell our goods abroad."

Fourth are the internationalists and world centralizers. No nation can be entirely free that is not able to produce its own needs of life. Now, there are men in the world—and if every member in the house does not know them, he ought to—who are seeking definitely to deprive nations of their sovereignty. Nothing could possibly be better designed to destroy Canada's sovereignty than to place her in a vulnerable position in respect of sugar. In case any government which internationalists might desire to control should be elected in Canada, the internationalist would say, "Now, look, you government of Canada, if you put your foot on the dotted line, you will get your sugar. But if you do not, we are not so sure about it."

That may sound grotesque; nevertheless it is real. If we do not recognize that fact and govern ourselves accordingly, our children and our children's children will suffer because of our neglect.

The fifth group are the doctrinaire unrealists enamoured of fallacious philosophies of international trade. There exists in Canada the widest diversity of opinion in respect of international trade. We have heard these opinions expressed right here on the floor of the house. We have heard extremes on both sides. Probably the extremes are wrong; but it is a very easy matter to make serious mistakes in respect of international trade and its over-all necessity and desirability. I am now making no comment on the matter, more than to say that every man in Canada and every woman in Canada will do well to review with the utmost care his philosophy of international trade, to see whether or not he or she has been making a mistake.

I have spoken this afternoon to help strengthen the hand of each minister striving to protect the Canadian beet sugar industry. I know in the present Canadian cabinet there are many ministers who realize the value of the beet sugar industry and who desire to protect it. But there are also men in the cabinet, I fear, who do not realize the value of the beet sugar industry and who do not want to protect it. I have spoken of those who desire to protect it, and I would venture the assumption that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is among those who so desire.

At a later time I shall have something to say about other aspects of the Canadian beet sugar industry. But I submit that anyone who takes into consideration the arguments I have presented this afternoon will realize with me that it is a policy bordering on absolute lunacy to permit enough cane sugar to come into Canada, to seriously impair or possibly destroy the beet sugar industry of this country.

Mr. Laing: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Certainly.

Mr. Laing: Would he give us some idea of what amount of protection he thinks would be required to maintain the industry in a healthy condition?

Mr. Blackmore: In order to give a statement of that kind—and I must say it is a most discerning and worth-while question—I would have to obtain a good many figures. Probably I shall be able to give them at a future time, and place the whole thing on Hansard so everybody can consider the matter. I am not sure that anybody knows at the present time just how low the price of beet sugar can go without driving farmers out of the production of sugar beets. That is the important factor. If the farmers cannot make enough producing sugar beets and delivering them to the factories to encourage them in production, they will produce wheat or tobacco or soy beans or other crops.

Mr. Laing: The hon. member is convinced that some protection is necessary?

Mr. Blackmore: I am convinced that protection is necessary for the simple reason that the Cubans have brought down the price of their sugar in the Cuban market, if I recall rightly, to a point under four cents per pound. They had to do this in order to avoid the imposition of anti-dumping measures by Canada. Just imagine any industry in Canada which must produce at the high prices which have prevailed in the last year and a half, having to meet competition which is created by the conditions which prevail in Cuba at the present time! Cubans are able to produce their sugar and have it carried by water right to Toronto, Windsor and Montreal and have it dumped there. I suppose it can be carried from Cuba for less than our producers must pay to have their product transported from the factory to the consumer. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Mr. Speaker, the gift of oratory is a great gift, but it should never be dilapidated in such a way as to obscure true facts or issues. When we in this house were privileged to listen to the ear-flattering utterances of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), I am sure that I and other hon. members were inspired with greater reverence for the Creator of all things who with His usual wisdom in His munificence gives to those to whom He denies forensic ability the compensation of an added measure of patience so that we may bear with sound in order that eventually we may hope truth and fact will emerge.

On the second day of this session it was with no small degree of humility and with still more patience that we on this side listened to the opening oration of the Leader of the Opposition in the hope that this year he might say what he has never said; that he might at last firmly establish his position or his right to the potential leadership of this country. But as usual it was a forlorn hope.

When on November 24 the Leader of the Opposition went ferreting out facts and figures in the field of defence expenditures we who were here in 1949 were reminded of his ill-fated adventure in a similar field. I am sure that no one living in or about Montreal will ever forget the extraordinary statements about Canadair made by the hon. gentleman nor his no less extraordinary mishap following those accusations. That memory will condition the reception in Montreal and Quebec and throughout Canada of the latest of these sorties by the Leader of the Opposition.

I think he should be aware by now that a keen mind for haberdashery is not necessarily a criterion of great political sagacity. While his detailing of military ties, raincoats, shoes, etc. was most interesting, I am sure, to one whose mind has a bent for trivia, it could hardly be taken by this country as evidence of leadership. I fear that as usual the Progressive Conservative party in its quest for what we call in French "la petite bête" has by-passed the main issue, which is good government and leadership. The attitude of the Leader of the Opposition is somewhat akin to that of a concert conductor who forgets the general conducting of a concerto in a search for fly specks among his notes.

There may be fly specks on the defence inventory ledgers in the form of overstocking of boots, ties, forks, knives and overcoats, but they are only fly specks. Before any hon. member on the other side accuses me of considering hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars as being fly specks, let me say to hon. members that I have an honest regard and a great fondness for the dollar, and I have a very especial regard for the public dollar.

I do not consider that the unnecessary expenditure of dollars can be characterized as fly specks, but I would remind the house that the hon. gentleman has not accused this government of throwing away money. He has simply accused the government of having overstocked or stocked in excess certain of these supplies which are necessary for our present or eventual defence.

As I say, these may be fly specks in our defence ledgers, but that is not too surprising to anyone who has been connected with big business in private enterprise. In spite of all precautions to protect one's own interest, it is frequently found that ill-advised and perhaps unnecessary commitments are made. Expenditures or purchases may be entered into because of confidence in firms or individuals which may from time to time be misplaced. But such incidents are not deprecated in private industry unless they are so serious as to compromise the success of the over-all operation. They are treated in their proper light as a minor incident in the general scheme of the operation.

If every private business were to be scrutinized by the Leader of the Opposition in the same way few if any would come out unscathed, few if any of those whom we consider our business leaders would escape. That would sound the death knell of private enterprise. The hon. gentleman would do better, I think, to concentrate his mind on the over-all picture. He would do better to bring to this house a different viewpoint, a viewpoint more appropriate to this house and I would suggest that he would do much better to leave the searching of fly specks to one or two others who have delegated unto themselves the authority for such searching. The attitude of those gentlemen, I might remind him, toward private enterprise, qualifies them much better to pass impartially on both private and public expenditures.

The hon. gentleman is absent now because of other inevitable commitments, but no doubt he is familiar with something which is along the line of what he, in public affairs recently, has been discussing. I read a headline from the Montreal Herald of Friday, November 28: "Gang rooks oil company for $3 million". The story inside goes on to say that one oil company in Montreal through the dishonesty of its subalterns was rooked of $3 million. The hon. gentleman will also recall the unfortunate incident which happened to one of our leading banks not very long ago. He would be inclined to agree with me, I am sure, that these things happen in private business; and they are relegated to their proper position in private business as they should be in public affairs. I am sure that none of the heads of either business will be accused or will be found guilty if they are accused of having mismanaged or misdirected the affairs which were entrusted to them.

During a speech on November 24 the hon. gentleman took it upon himself to deal with television. I do not intend to dissect here his speech on television. There will be many other opportunities and may I convey to him, and ask his followers to convey to him, the statement that I shall welcome every single opportunity. The hon. gentleman stated, as appears in Hansard of November 24, page 24, when dealing with television:

> This is strangely inconsistent with the decision made just two weeks ago by the government of the United Kingdom which still retains a monopoly . . .

Mr. Speaker, it may be strangely inconsistent to the Leader of the Opposition that we in this country are determined to lead Canadian affairs with some degree of inconsistency with other countries, perhaps. However, the statement by the hon. gentleman is far from being inconsistent with Conservative policy. It is not inconsistent with the manner in which too many of them too long have thought too little of self-operation in Canada. I would suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that when we do resume discussion of radio and television broadcasting he bring to this house a slightly different approach, determined in his mind that discussion is going to be allowed on the basis of Canadian things for Canada and Canada for Canadian people, not on the basis of whether our manner of conducting Canadian affairs is consistent or inconsistent with the operation of—let us call them by name—Tory governments of other countries.

Mr. Hodgson: Pull up your socks and cut out the guff.

Mr. Beaudry: I heard that four years ago from exactly the same source.

May I now deal with another of the gentlemen who sit on that side of the house, the member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche). On November 25 he established just how firmly he believes in Voltaire's theory "Mentez, mentez, il en restera toujours quelque chose". I refer to page 73 of Hansard for November 25 where amongst other things he says:

> Radio-Canada peut imposer ses programmes aux postes privés. Radio-Canada exige un permis onéreux de chaque transmetteur de postes privés...

The translation reads:

> The C.B.C. can impose its own programs on private stations. Private stations are compelled to pay costly licence fees to the C.B.C. for each of their transmitters, and the C.B.C. uses those revenues to build stations of its own that will compete with private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the hon. gentleman refers to television and radio with the contempt which can be brought only by his obvious lack of familiarity with the situation. I would say to him if he were here, and I will say to him when he and I again discuss television, that although I may not speak with the same assurance I speak with a modicum of authority. For the benefit of those gentlemen on the other side of the house who may not be aware of it, for some years I owned, operated and managed the only private network of radio stations then existing. In order to allay any possibility that hon. gentlemen might put their foot in it and accuse anyone of political favouritism, let me state that I purchased that private radio network as an operating network. The people from whom I purchased it were then known and are still known, notably in one case, as recognizing politically only one liege lord, the present Leader of the Opposition.

May I say to the hon. gentleman that when one comes to this house he is not perhaps expected to be fully familiar with all that has been placed on our statute books over a period of years; but surely when discussing matters with such authority and assurance as the hon. gentleman did, and when discussing a question which the Conservative party is determined to place in an exalted position this year, the hon. gentleman should at least become cognizant of the relevant act. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation can impose its programs upon private radio stations, but there he is so far away from the truth that one wonders if he should be accused of gross ignorance or perhaps of wandering away from the truth by habit. If the hon. gentleman has a copy of the act I would suggest that at the first opportunity, which will be either tonight or tomorrow, he quote me one line or one word from the act which authorizes him to state that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation . . . . "peut imposer ses programmes aux postes privés" . . . . can impose its programs on private radio stations.

There is, however, one reference in section 8. The corporation may for that purpose:

(d) make operating agreements with private stations for the broadcasting of programs.

If, of course, his contention stems from the general inference that parliament can do anything then of course he is right—but only if his assertion stems from that inference—and even then perhaps he should be reminded that the inference is valueless in this discussion. It is an admitted legal principle that the only thing parliament cannot do, at least this was the example given when I attended legal schools, is to change a man into a woman. But, I understand, in at least two countries recently that has been done, so perhaps the maxim should be changed. I would suggest to the professors of law—at least in that part of the country where I live, because as you all know we have a different code of law than the rest of the country—that the simile be changed and that we now quote as an instance of the power of parliament, "The only thing parliament cannot do is to change the present crop of Conservatives into statesmen."

The hon. member having established to his own satisfaction and perhaps to no one else's that the C.B.C. can impose its programs on private radio stations—which is not true—he goes on to say that the C.B.C. yearly charges onerous fees to the private radio stations in order that it may set up stations of its own to compete with private enterprise. The hon. member for Labelle, I am afraid, uses the word "onerous" as one of the imponderable words with which he is not too familiar, and which could mean anything to him. In order to help him mathematically, if he can follow me, I shall point out to him that last year the entire revenue received by the Department of Transport to be turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the entire revenue collected from some 120 private radio stations in this country, amounted to $221,000. I think a simple process of very elementary division will bring us to the conclusion that the radio stations in this country operating privately paid, on the average, a sum of $1,800 a year for this privilege.

I may say this to the hon. member for Labelle before he leaves us permanently, which I am reasonably sure will be within a matter of months. Does he know why this money is collected from private radio stations? Does he know to what use that money is being put. In his own words, the fee is exacted so that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may extend its network of national stations in order the better to compete with private radio. I do not believe the hon. member is aware of the original purpose of this fee. Until a few years ago this fee was not payable to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but to the Department of Transport and was used to meet part of the expenses, not for national radio but for the upkeep of private radio; for the monitoring of private radio; for the reading of schedules of private radio, and all those things which are necessary if this country is going to supervise, as does every other country, the operations of private radio.

May I also ask the hon. gentleman this? Does he know why this money, formerly handled by the Department of Transport, is being turned over to the C.B.C.? If he does not, let me ask him one other question? Does he know that his own compatriots, the French-speaking Canadians in northern Quebec, only have radio because the C.B.C. has helped them to get it? Does he know, or is that inconsistent with the higher feelings of his party, that a group of French-speaking Canadians in northern Ontario is entirely dependent upon the C.B.C. and its association with private stations? Does he know that that is true of another segment of northern Ontario; or is he aloof to that? Does he know that a large part of those fees collected now go towards giving the French-speaking people of St. Boniface, in the province of Manitoba, radio programs which they could not have without the C.B.C.? Is it unimportant in his eyes, sitting on that side of the house, that the payment of these fees also means that a French-language group on the fringe of Edmonton and in the south of Alberta are provided with radio in their own tongue? That is our concept of national radio. This is made possible because the C.B.C., despite the hon. member for Labelle and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), collects from each of 120 private radio stations an average of $1,800 a year.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of radio and television. I repeat that there will be other opportunities to discuss these questions, and I repeat that I shall welcome every single one of them. As usual, consistent with the true philosophy and true mores of the Progressive Conservative party, they believe that in everything the principle should be by-passed for the exception, the truth for the half truth or even a lesser part. I feel sorry for the hon. member for Labelle. I feel sorry because he failed to bring with him into this house the only sword with which he should have girded his loins, the sword of truth. He preferred to fill his scabbard with split hairs in the hope that one would be suddenly transmuted into a weapon which he could wield in defence of private radio.

I have taken more time than I intended, Mr. Speaker, but may I conclude with this. From time to time I have meetings with a friend of mine, an ancient Asiatic philosopher who deigns to impart to this undeserving one some of his Chinese philosophy. May I commend to the Leader of the Opposition and his party this fable, divested of its native garb and shorn of its oriental embellishments. "Time is like all commodities, cheap to him who has it in abundance but so precious to him who uses it to the hilt. The wise man, wishing to determine whether it is day or night, is content with looking at the sun; but the foolish man would rather ignore the sun the better to watch the sweep hand of the clock." In this country most of us are content to be guided by the sun. The clock watching, the sweep hand watching of the Conservative party, can only earn its leader and itself one lone degree. I take a great deal of pleasure in conferring upon the Leader of the Opposition and his party a degree—given I am sure with the best wishes of the majority of this house who join in the accolade to the leader of the Conservative party, who has earned it during the last three years in this house and by his opening speech on November 24—the degree of master of trivia. In view of his exalted position, I should add summa cum ignominia.

Mr. Speaker: I had been out of the chair for a short time, and upon returning to the chair, I understood the hon. member to question the veracity of another hon. member. I hope I was not correct in that, but if he said another hon. member was deliberately not telling the truth or saying certain things which he knew to be untrue, then of course I cannot allow that statement to stand. I think the hon. member should clear up that question.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Speaker, I have too much respect for the Chair ever to allow myself to say of another member that he never spoke the truth.

An hon. Member: That is what you said.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Speaker, once Hansard is printed I will tender the proper apologies, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I should leave the matter at that. If the hon. member suggested that another hon. member was not telling the truth in any matter, knowing it to be false, then I would ask him to withdraw the statement now.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Speaker, I think I said he was far from the truth; but if the Chair construed that I said what has been indicated, then I withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to prove anything. I think I should clear up the matter now. It is not wise to allow these matters to stand over. If the hon. member made a statement about another hon. member to the effect that the hon. member was saying things which he knew were not true, I would ask him to withdraw that statement now.

Mr. Beaudry: I was speaking extemporaneously. My memory may be bad. But if I did—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear the hon. member when there are so many interruptions.

Mr. Beaudry: If I made the statement, unwillingly and unwittingly, I withdraw it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I should like to add my congratulations to those of the previous speakers to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should also like to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) on being elevated to cabinet positions. I do not mean to refer to the speech of the hon. member who spoke just previous to the dinner hour other than to say it is rather unfortunate that the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) does not visit us more often.

The throne speech unfortunately offers nothing to eastern farmers. Since becoming a member of this House of Commons I have tried to impress upon the government the importance of agriculture to the nation. Everything which detracts from the economic position of the farmer must eventually reflect on the national economy. The effect that is being felt now in industry and in urban municipalities is obvious from several quarters. The income of the average 100-acre farm will be reduced this year by approximately $1,000. In other words every farmer has taken a $1,000 cut in wages, or approximately $20 a week. In spite of that fact, the prices of the products the farmer has to buy have gone up. Can you imagine the howl that would be put up in this House of Commons if we as members were asked to take a reduction of $1,000 in our indemnities? Farmers in general, but particularly those adjacent to urban municipalities, are being taxed off their farms. Land alone should not be expected to bear such a high proportion of the taxation burden. There must be some incentive at least to keep people who are on the land at the present time interested, if we want food.

The farmers' buying power is an important factor in any community. That buying power has been reduced by a considerable amount this year, and farmers are wondering just what the future holds for them. They are becoming more cost-conscious every year, and are dropping the non-paying branches of the industry. There are those who wonder whether the dairy cow is headed for oblivion, just as the work horse is an historic monument of the past.

We cannot expect any industry in this country to survive if it is forced to compete with the cheaper labour of another land. This government is forcing two of the greatest industries in this country out of business through an apparent lack of interest in their problems. I refer to the textile and dairy industries and I mention them jointly because they are faced with an identical problem, that of unbearable competition from lower wage-rate countries.

We are fighting a desperate and costly battle against communism which we call a cold war. Our most devastating weapon in this fight is truth. With it we can build the strength of the democratic nations and undermine that of our enemies. We in the opposition are seeking the truth. The government hedges, and hedging is the mother of suspicion and distrust. The Canadian people are carrying a terrific burden of overtaxation. They are ready and willing to pay their fair share, and know that defence expenditures are necessary in these troubled times. But are we getting value for our money?

We as individuals are forced to cut our costs and increase the efficiency of our operations. Why can't the government? People ask me why the Department of National Defence bought ten pairs of shoes per man, when most of us are lucky if we have two pairs, or why it is necessary to have 12 neckties per man and three serving forks for every five men in the service. If a housewife ever bought for her family in the same proportion little Jimmy would have to do without shirts to pay for the neckties, and the Sunday roast would have to be cancelled to pay for the forks to serve it.

I am sure everyone in this country, especially the government, was glad to see the recent announcement in the press regarding the lifting of the United States embargo on livestock and hay. During the past nine months the meat packers of this country have enjoyed the proverbial Roman holiday. I commend the government for the idea of floor prices on beef and pork, but I must criticize them severely for the administration of that policy. Suggested prices to producers have certainly not been maintained on the lower grades, and prices to consumers on the same grades have not dropped by anywhere near the same proportions. In other words the producer has been left at the mercy of the packer, and the consumer has not received the benefit.

Another serious problem for farmers today is the livestock feed situation. While the western producer naturally wants to get a fair price for his grain, the eastern feeder can afford to pay only a price that will give a fair return when the finished product is marketed. On previous occasions in this house I have given the spread between the western producer and the eastern feeder. I was disappointed this afternoon when the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) was speaking. I thought he was going to delve further into that matter, but apparently he did not want to. According to an article in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture news information bulletin of October, 1952, Dr. E. C. Hope, economist for that organization, reveals the spread on No. 1 feed oats at 38·3 cents a bushel, or $1.13 a hundredweight, and on No. 1 feed barley, 52·6 cents a bushel, or $1.09 a hundredweight. If the government, through its wheat board, cannot find some solution to this problem, then it should step aside and let farmer organizations handle the problem of feed grain between western producer and eastern feeder without any strings attached to it.

The government, finally realizing the importance of our water resources, is considering some measures of conservation. I take a great pride, Mr. Speaker, in the fact that those along the Grand river have been the first to pioneer water conservation and flood control. The organization now known as the Grand valley conservation authority is to be congratulated on its accomplishments, and I sincerely hope that this government will contribute their share toward the Conestogo project which was passed upon and accepted by the provincial government some time ago.

I have said on several occasions in this house that rural mail carriers have been grossly underpaid. The government has finally decided to do something to correct this injustice, but I will withhold further comment until it is known what the proposal is.

I am sure all hon. members have received the memorandum prepared jointly by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Council of the Blind with reference to the elimination of the means test in the Blind Persons Act of Canada. I support that request, and I most sincerely hope the government will this session bring down the required legislation to eliminate this embarrassing means test.

The throne speech mentions a bill which will be introduced to place the historic sites and monuments board of Canada on a statutory basis. We in Brant are very proud of our forefathers and the part they played in the development of our country. The triennial conference of the Associated Countrywomen of the World with a membership of six million in 25 different countries will meet in Toronto in August, 1953. The chief aim of this organization is to improve rural conditions in all parts of the world. This conference has a special significance to members of the women's institutes in the riding which I represent. Last June when we allotted money to this association in our government estimates I made mention of this fact. It was in this district that Adelaide Hunter Hoodless, founder of the now world-wide organization, was born and attended public school. The white frame house, her birthplace, still stands in our community. Little did anyone dream that this child would be the founder of an organization which has done so much for rural women and their respective communities.

We also had the distinction of having a cairn marking Mrs. Hoodless' birthplace erected in the district and unveiled by Lady Tweedsmuir in 1937. It is situated in a small park at the junction of highways 5 and 24. Funds for its erection were raised by the women's institutes of Brant county. In the 1947-49 Tweedsmuir historical competition, St. George won first place in Ontario. In 1949-51 competition, Glen Morris won first in Ontario and second in the dominion competition. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) were present in 1950 when an oil painting of Mrs. Hoodless, presented to Canada by the federated women's institutes of Ontario, was unveiled and hung in the archives by Mrs. Raymond Sayre from the United States, then president of the Associated Countrywomen of the World.

In view of the fact that the conference of the Associated Countrywomen of the World is to be held in Toronto next year, and delegates from many countries will be visiting this cairn and the birthplace of Mrs. Hoodless, I would sincerely hope that the historic sites and monuments board would see fit to suitably mark this cairn before the date of the conference.

On several previous occasions I have asked the government, through the historic sites and monuments board, to aid in some suitable way the council of the Six Nations reservation in the restoration and preservation of Chiefswood, birthplace of Pauline Johnson, well-known and gifted Indian poetess. Chiefswood was built over one hundred years ago, and if restored could be made into one of the greatest tourist attractions along the Grand river. Many distinguished visitors from England, Europe and America have been entertained there by Chief Johnson and his English bride, Emily Howells. From Chiefswood, Pauline Johnson became a national figure and her memory will ever remain in the hearts of those who knew her.

I also mentioned on previous occasions the Mohawk chapel, properly known as St. Paul's, His Majesty's Chapel of the Mohawks. This little church was built in 1780 for the Mohawk people who emigrated from New York to Canada during the war of independence, and is the oldest Protestant church in Upper Canada. Contained in this church is a stained leather bible and a silver communion set, both gifts of Queen Anne of England to the Mohawks, and carried by them during the war of independence from the old church at Fort Hunter in New York to be buried under a tree more than five years and borne north into safety at the conclusion of the war. Behind the altar in letters of gold are written the apostles' creed, the ten commandments and the Lord's prayer, all in the Indian language. To the left of the altar is one of the finest coats of arms in Canada, carved from a single block of oak and presented to the Indians by King George III.

I would be very remiss if I did not mention also the West Dumfries chapel built in 1845, commonly known as the Paris Plains church. For many years this old historic spot was not in use, but in 1948 interested citizens formed the Paris Plains restoration committee and have had the building restored as a memorial to the early pioneers of the district. Each year on the second Sunday in June a memorial outdoor church service is held.

I urge again the importance of restoring and marking such historic landmarks so they may stand as memorials to be seen and revered by future generations.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that when a member of this house recommends that consideration be given to certain necessary action, this involves the expenditure of public money. The expenditure of public money is made possible by taxation. Taxation in this country is at an unwarranted high level at present and should be reduced.

I sincerely believe, Mr. Speaker, that a firm determination by those in authority to eradicate waste and extravagance in governmental administration would not only make possible many essential services, but allow as well for necessary tax reductions in this country.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment to the amendment moved by the C.C.F. Before doing so, however, there are one or two other comments I should like to make.

According to an answer given to a question asked in the house this week it would appear that at last the government has consented to purchase apple juice for the armed services. This is most gratifying to the processors of that excellent product, who have worked so hard in its production. It will also help the growers to recover some income from fruit that would be lost unless processed. I am pleased personally because nearly a year ago I brought to the attention of the house the fact that only imported juices were consumed by the armed forces, and that apple juice was excluded completely.

While this matter has reached a satisfactory conclusion, the fruit and vegetable growers of interior British Columbia still have several problems I should like to bring to the attention of the house. Tonight I shall deal briefly with only one of them, and that is the unfair competition offered by United States soft fruits and vegetables in our domestic market.

This situation is present across Canada, but it is particularly vicious in British Columbia. The extent of this market loss can be gauged by an article which appeared in Country Life, which is a monthly publication issued to the farmers of British Columbia and to my mind is one of the best dealing with farm and vegetable production in the Dominion of Canada. I take this publication as an authority on what they have to say about this particular market which has been lost.

The article reads:

> It is hard to understand in a province capable of growing the widest diversity of the finest fruits and vegetables we yet continue to consume annually $3 million worth of vegetables imported from another country while only eating $2 million worth of our own B.C. grown vegetables. This would not be so if consumers knew of the relative nutritional values. It is an incongruous situation with some wholesalers importing foreign vegetables for your table at a time when the same produce grown in British Columbia is available. This can only be corrected by you, the consumer. When buying fresh vegetables insist on B.C. produce only.

If that condition exists generally across Canada it will mean a market loss running into many millions of dollars for our domestically produced vegetables and soft fruits. I agree to a certain extent with the article when it says that consumers can help, but the remedy is not there. The remedy must be brought about by government action.

This year soft fruits and vegetables were left on the trees and on the ground of the Okanagan valley because of a lack of markets. This applied particularly to prunes, peaches, and cabbages and other vegetables. I know of one veteran who was rather proud of an acre of cabbages which he had grown, but he was not able to sell a single cabbage on the market because it was filled already with cabbages that had been brought in from across the line. One grower went to Yakima to find out what the trouble was and he spoke to me on his return. He went to a packing house there where they were putting up tomatoes. Apparently the system has been changed in the United States because they now have a No. 1 grade and a No. 2 grade of tomatoes. This grower examined both grades and could not find one shade of difference. No. 1 was selling at $110 per ton and was practically all sold on the United States domestic market. No. 2 was listed at $55 per ton, but this grade was mostly in storage. He inquired who purchased the No. 2 and he was told that although one or two cars had been sent to Seattle, the bulk was sent to the Canadian market.

It is true that they are offered for sale in small quantities, but probably the dealers in the United States are told, "we have none left." However, he was told that one or two cars had been sent to Seattle. This would conform with the dumping regulations which requires that they must be offered for sale in the country of origin at the price they are offered in Canada. In this case the price was one-half the price being asked for the No. 1 tomatoes and, as I pointed out, there was no discernible difference in the two grades.

The difficulty we are faced with is that our earliest crop comes on the market when the second or a later United States crop is also coming on the market. This is usually more plentiful and available at lower prices. This is a rather serious difficulty because there are many veterans who are going in for fruit growing who will have to wait five, six or eight years until their fruit trees are bearing. In the meantime they are trying to earn a livelihood by growing vegetables between the trees. They are being victimized because of these importations of competitive vegetables from the United States. For their sake and for the sake of other soft fruit and vegetable growers I ask the Department of Agriculture to investigate the situation.

I have not time to go into the details, but I do suggest that the situation be investigated at once and that steps be taken to protect our domestic market especially during the period when the market can be well and amply supplied by home-grown fruits and vegetables. A situation such as that described by Country Life, where the British Columbia market of $5 million is being shared on the basis of the domestic producer getting $2 million of it while our competitive neighbours to the south capture $3 million, is not healthy. That is why I appeal to the government for an early investigation with a view to taking steps to correct the situation before next year. There will be plenty of time, and I would be willing to give evidence as to what I claim is unfair competition brought about by the heavier crops produced in the United States.

I should like to deal now with the subject matter of our subamendment. Previous speakers, particularly Liberal speakers, have emphasized that before a national health plan can be entertained a good deal of ground work will have to be done, and they claim that this ground work is being done. Possibly part of that claim is correct, but I do feel that there is a branch of ground work that has been neglected, and I should like to deal briefly with it tonight.

One of the problems facing the Canadian people which the C.C.F. believes can be met successfully by the introduction of health insurance is a serious shortage of doctors, dentists, nurses and other health personnel as well as a shortage of hospitals and hospital facilities. My colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has dealt with the question of hospital shortages and some of the aspects of the nursing shortage, but I should like to deal particularly with the question of doctors and dentists.

By an authoritative standard, Canada is extremely short of doctors and the shortage of dentists is alarming. Furthermore the shortage is getting worse rather than better. The health grants program was designed primarily to overcome these shortages, but it has made almost no attempt to deal with the shortages in the fields that I have mentioned. According to an authoritative United States study which has been widely accepted in this country there should be one physician for every 704 persons. On this basis we should have had in Canada in 1951 a total of 19,904 physicians for our population of 14,009,429, whereas we had only 14,325 physicians. There was a shortage in that census year of 5,579 physicians in our country. If Canada is to reach an acceptable standard there must be an increase of more than 50 per cent in the number of doctors in this country.

What is actually happening? The situation since the end of the war has been getting worse rather than better. The population has been growing at a faster rate than the number of doctors. Thus in 1947 there was one active physician for every 938 people, but by 1951 the population per physician had gone up to 978.

The same alarming trend is noted with respect to dentists. There has been some increase in the number of dentists since the end of the war, but it has not nearly kept pace with the increase in population. In 1947 there was one dentist for every 2,729 people in Canada. In 1951 there was only one dentist for every 3,040 people. Thus the shortage of dentists in relation to the population has grown worse by more than 10 per cent in the four-year period. This deterioration in the supply of dentists in relation to the population is even more striking when it is examined in the light of acceptable standards. In 1943 there was one dentist for every 669 people in Canada's armed forces. If it is assumed that the civilian population should have at least as good care as was provided for members of the armed services this would have meant, on the basis of the 1951 population, a total of 20,940 dentists; but we actually had in that year only 4,608 dentists. Thus, the shortage of dentists in 1951 was 16,332. To reach the standard I have referred to would require almost a 400 per cent increase in the number of dentists.

This general shortage of doctors and dentists screens the fact, however, that the actual shortage in many of the more remote areas is far more acute and that a much higher percentage of doctors, dentists, and medical specialists is concentrated in the large cities. In 1949, 71·2 per cent of all physicians in Canada were located in urban centres of 10,000 and more population, but only 45·7 per cent of Canada's people resided in these cities. On December 1, 1946, 72 per cent of the dentists were located in urban centres of 10,000 population or more.

The reason for this maldistribution is not hard to find. Practice in the smaller centres is not so convenient as it is in the city. Facilities are inadequate. The income is lower and the social and cultural life is less attractive. But it is quite clear that if medical and dental training were made more readily available, if the hospital and research facilities were improved in rural areas, as they would be if a nation-wide health services plan were set up, many more young doctors would be attracted to service in rural areas.

We cannot overcome the shortages of dentists and doctors with our present facilities. There are only ten schools in Canada which offer complete medical courses and these are constantly overcrowded. We boast only five dental colleges. Clearly the training facilities have to be expanded, and this will mean federal financial assistance. Furthermore, it is a well known fact that the tuition fees at medical colleges and dental schools are very high. They are beyond the reach of the average Canadian student or his family. In 1946 the Canadian association of medical students and internes conducted a survey of the financial background of medical students. They found that the largest percentage of medical students came from the families which had the highest incomes; 28·6 per cent came from professional families but these families represented only 4·7 per cent of the total population. Only 12·2 per cent of the medical students came from Canada's farms where 36·5 per cent of the total population live. This survey further revealed that 7·3 per cent of the students polled were going through medical college entirely on their own resources. Three-quarters of them, 74·5 per cent, relied on their families as well as their own earnings, and 17·5 per cent were going through entirely at their families' expense. Nearly half were required to pay back their families after graduation.

Add to these economic difficulties the fact that medical school fees have more than doubled since 1925. In that year the average annual fee was $185; in 1945 it was $317; and in 1951 it was about $438. Dental college fees have climbed from approximately $293 in 1945 to about $385 in 1951. These fees are over and above what it costs the students to live during their courses and what it costs them for clothing and other expenses. The need for expanded training facilities and for a system of medical scholarships is self-evident. Not only is there a need for federal scholarships and bursaries for medical and dental students, but there is a need for special assistance to students who will undertake to practise in rural areas for a given number of years following graduation.

As I have said, the inauguration of health insurance itself, in addition to the particular measures I have just indicated, will do a great deal toward overcoming these shortages of personnel. This is made very clear in the Saskatchewan health survey report, "The Expanding Hospital System."

> The continuing development of the hospitals of the province, with emphasis on district and regional as well as on the base hospitals, should have some influence in attracting physicians to areas outside the large urban centres. By placing emphasis on larger district hospitals, a number of advantages are obtained. The larger hospital can be more adequately equipped, it is better able to hold qualified technical and nursing personnel, and, with sufficient beds for more than one doctor, it helps to overcome the feeling of professional isolation. All of these factors operate to provide a better medical service for patients. As the national conference on rural health of the American Medical Association reported: "We do not want poor medical service made more available. Convenience is of secondary importance."
> That the extension of the principle of prepayment has a favourable influence on the number and distribution of physicians has been shown by the experience of the municipal doctor plans and by the Swift Current medical care program.

Thus it will be seen that Saskatchewan's progress in hospital and health insurance is helping that province to overcome its very serious shortage of medical personnel. In one field, that of mental health, Saskatchewan has received rare praise. The world famous psychiatrist, Dr. Carl Menninger of the Menninger clinic, Topeka, Kansas, stated on September 20, 1951, a little over a year ago, that Saskatchewan was "the only area in the world that has all the competent psychiatrists it needs." He said that the psychiatric aid training program being carried out in Saskatchewan was the envy of the world and was being copied by others.

In the United Kingdom a very substantial effort has been made, as part of the national health service introduced in 1948, to overcome the shortage of doctors and dentists. In 1950, the latest date for which statistics are available, government grants were assisting some 3,178 students in medicine in the United Kingdom and 915 students in dentistry.

Mr. Fulton: What universities are they attending?

Mr. Jones: Practically all the universities. I can give you the names if you wish.

Another shortage that will hold up any national health plan, and which has to be overcome before you can consider it, is the shortage of nurses. This problem has been with us for many years. In fact as early as 1920 the following mention of this situation was placed on the minutes of the dominion conference on child welfare held in Ottawa on October 19 and 20 of that year:

> Whereas there is a great shortage of trained and untrained nurses for the care of the sick and for public health work in the Dominion of Canada.
> And whereas there is an increasing shortage of applicants to nurse training schools all over the continent—

Various attempts have been made to measure the shortage of nurses. According to authorities, one rough guide is that there should be in hospitals one trained nurse, including the superintendent and supervisors, for every two patients. Using this guide for 1950, the latest year for which statistics are available, we find that there was an average of 53,300 patients in Canadian hospitals every day in that year. Thus, according to the rule, there should have been approximately 26,600 trained nurses, but actually there were only 14,900. In other words there was a shortage of 11,700 graduate nurses in our hospitals. But this is not the only place where the shortage of nurses is felt. Another measure, according to public health standards, is that there should be one nurse for every 280 population. If this standard were applied in Canada we should have had 53,880 practising graduate nurses in 1951, whereas according to the census we had only 35,138, a shortage of 18,742.

What is being done to meet these shortages? While the government, through its health grants program, has made some attempt to overcome the hospital shortage—although as I have indicated it is an exceedingly feeble attempt and will very likely fail in its five-year objective—there has been almost no effort at all to overcome the general shortage of nurses. There is no specific grant for assisting the training of nurses generally. Some money has been made available for assisting in the training of public health nurses, but this is only a small fraction of the problem. No concerted attempt has been made by the federal government to overcome the general shortage of nurses. Thus it is stated in one of the government's own reports:

> It is extremely doubtful that at current rates of output of graduate nurses the present shortage of nurses will be overcome.

The government has admitted that the health grants program is not going to overcome the shortage of nurses. Referring to the professional training grant, the data prepared by the Department of National Health and Welfare for the 57th meeting of the dominion council of health stated:

> However, professional training under the health grants has, for the most part, been specialized training or refresher courses for graduate nurses and has improved the quality of nursing service provided. It has not been a factor in increasing the number of undergraduate and practical nurses in training.

I think that before solutions to the problem are proposed we should examine the reasons for the nursing shortage. Again let me quote the government memorandum:

> Perhaps the most basic cause of the problem in hospital nurse education is economic in character and deeply rooted. Hospitals in Canada have always faced difficulties in meeting financial needs. In the 1870's hospitals instituted schools of nursing with the view to the function of providing nursing to hospital patients as well as education for nurses. Down through the years, the economic advantages of making large scale use of student services were apparent and it became difficult to see where nursing for the student ended and education began.
> The Canadian Nurses Association listed the main reasons for this high rate of student wastage as follows: (a) physical fatigue induced by the hurry and tension in overcrowded, understaffed, wards; (b) excessively long working day; (c) imposition of duties they are not sufficiently mature to assume; (d) imposition of duties which should be assigned to domestic workers.

It is clear that the education of student nurses leaves much to be desired. Economic disadvantages, coupled with the unsatisfactory working conditions referred to by the Canadian Nurses Association, are important reasons why such a large number of girls who begin training as nurses drop out before their training is completed.

Briefly, to recapitulate what I have said, I think one of the first steps the government has to take is to establish subsidies for schools or some form of assistance for training nurses to overcome the present shortage, and to train them in public health work for the inauguration of a national health plan. As far as student nurses are concerned, the C.C.F. suggests that recognized schools of nursing could be subsidized so they do not have to use students for work in the hospitals as the major means of deferring the costs of their tuition.

As I have said before, the inauguration of a health insurance plan itself will place all hospitals in a better financial position, including hospitals which operate schools of nursing, and this will in itself be a major factor in permitting them to provide better facilities for student nurses. In addition to this, however, subsidies are necessary to permit remuneration to student nurses, as well as better conditions and training facilities.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I wish first of all, Mr. Speaker, to add my congratulations to those of previous speakers in commending the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, for their splendid performance. They were a credit to themselves, and they are worthy additions to this house.

The hon. member from Ottawa who represents the Peace River constituency (Mr. Low) was generous enough to refer to me recently as "the minister from Edmonton". As the elected member for Edmonton West I share with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) the honour of representing one of the most progressive and ambitious cities on the continent. We are proud of the fact that Edmonton is the centre of the greatest oil development activity in Canada. Although Edmonton shares with Calgary some of the business, and especially the investment end of the oil business, the Edmonton area produces most of the oil. Great new industries, including important petrochemical industries, are coming into being as a result of the oil.

Another claim to distinction is the Edmonton Eskimos football club, which emerged from the current season as champions of western Canada and went into the final Grey Cup competition with distinction and ability.

I had the pleasure recently of attending a meeting in northern Alberta, to which the hon. member from Ottawa who represents the Peace River constituency has made reference. At that gathering I had the pleasure of meeting approximately 250 fine, intelligent people, as able and as well informed as any representative group that could be gathered together any place in Canada. Because these people are at present represented by a member who has never lived in that constituency, and who now lives in Ottawa—

Mr. Low: Where does your leader live?

Mr. Prudham: —do not let it be thought for a moment that the district does not possess people capable enough to represent it in parliament.

Mr. Low: Where does the minister live?

[Mr. Jones.]

Mr. Prudham: I live in Edmonton.

Mr. Low: Oh, no, you do not.

Mr. Prudham: This is no reflection on the hon. member from Ottawa who represents Peace River.

Mr. Low: Why try to make it one, then?

Mr. Prudham: The people of that district are becoming very much aware of the fact that they should have a member of their own community representing them. This is no reflection on the hon. member from Ottawa who tries to speak for them in this house. Peace River is too important a constituency to be represented by a person who does not live in that constituency. The leader of the Social Credit group has described my recent visit to the Peace river area as a casual one.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) just found that out.

Mr. Prudham: During the last ten years, in the course of my business activities, I have spent a great deal of time in the Peace river district. My contacts with the Peace river country, at first hand, have been more varied and extensive than those of the member who happens to represent Peace River in this house.

In this great empire to the north of Edmonton, totalling about 80,000 square miles, we have a fertile and prosperous farming district much larger than England. The Peace river country is one of Canada's most productive areas, bringing into existence every year prodigious amounts of new wealth. This year alone the grain crop in the Peace river area is estimated at 36 million bushels.

Mr. Johnston: When is the election going to be?

Mr. Prudham: There are still large tracts of land awaiting suitable opportunities for large-scale agricultural development. What the Peace river area needs more than anything else is people. The opportunities are there but without a large enough population to take advantage of them. If the many thousands of immigrants coming to Canada would proceed to the empire of the Peace river, they would find there not only their livelihood but prosperity as well. My colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) informed me this morning that his department had made provision to advance the cost of the fares beyond Winnipeg for people who are prepared to work.

The Peace river district, as well as being an agricultural area, has been endowed with large resources of timber. I am sorry to say that these timber resources are being depleted at a fast rate with little or no evidence of any effort by the provincial government to do any careful planning or to put into effect any conservation or reforestation measures.

Mr. Low: That is entirely contrary to the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. Prudham: One place in Alberta where conservation is being practised is on the important eastern slopes of the Rockies where under a federal-provincial arrangement a splendid timber and water conservation program is being carried out. In this case, under the joint agreement, the federal government is contributing the major share of the required funds, close to $4 million to date.

Mr. Johnston: What percentage do they contribute?

Mr. Prudham: In recent years there have been important discoveries of gas and oil in the Peace river district. I plan to show later on in my remarks how the federal government has aided and participated in this mineral development.

Mr. Fulton: It is nothing like the gas that has been discovered in Edmonton in the last few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Prudham: The provincial government, in its wisdom, has allocated a portion of this gas to be exported. With the development of the Northwest Territories and the building of the Mackenzie highway, the towns of the areas have become important distributing centres. The Alaska highway, owned and maintained by the federal government, is now one of the finest highways on the continent. It stretches from Dawson Creek, B.C., to Alaska. But the full value of this highway cannot be realized as yet because the connecting provincial roads through the Peace river area are far from being adequate. The British Columbia government has recently completed a highway connection from the Peace river district to the Pacific coast, which is just the first step toward—

Mr. Fulton: Will you say that again?

Mr. Prudham: —meeting the needs of the district for adequate transportation outlets.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member had better get somebody who knows the facts to write his speech.

Mr. Prudham: I wrote the speech.

Mr. Fulton: You had better learn the facts.

An hon. Member: It is some way to read it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. Prudham: The British Columbia government has opened a highway, and the people of the district look forward to the day when they can have rail transportation to the coast.

Mr. Low: Hear, hear. They have been looking for it for 35 years under Liberal promises.

Mr. Prudham: Spokesmen for the Social Credit party often make an effort to leave the impression that their party is especially endowed with the attributes of Christianity.

Mr. Fulton: I am strictly neutral.

Mr. Prudham: I want to say that the Social Credit party has no monopoly on Christianity. These people who are always so eager to label themselves as the "Christian party of Canada" are equally fond of indulging in criticism of government policy that is often distorted, misleading and altogether unfair.

I want to deal with some subjects that provide examples of the sort of thing I have mentioned. From time to time Social Credit speakers, possibly in a light-hearted manner, have claimed that Providence delayed the recent discovery of gas and oil until a good Christian party came along to develop them. I feel it should also be said that a great deal of Christian hard work and planning had been applied to the development of Alberta's natural resources long before Social Credit was thought of. The recent oil and gas development would not have been possible but for the federal geological surveys and studies as well as the production of federal maps ever since 1873.

From that time to the present there have been, on a yearly average, eight federal geological parties operating in what is now the province of Alberta. In addition the federal government has surveyed by air some 15,000 square miles in the province. The information gathered in this way has provided a reliable basis on which exploration for mineral wealth, including oil and gas, could be carried on. Evidence of this is shown by the fact that the department of mines and minerals of Alberta ordered 5,000 copies of the 1950 federal geological map of Alberta as soon as it was off the press.

Several hundred reports and maps directly related to possible deposits of petroleum and natural gas have been compiled and published by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. These federal government publications have been of the greatest practical use and benefit to private companies. They were the basic reason, in many cases, why many of these companies persisted in their search. The results of this research and effort are now well recognized. Oil and gas fields of first grade importance have been developed in Alberta. This development in Alberta was no accident. It was made possible only because the region was thoroughly surveyed and mapped.

The Canadian petroleum industry still looks to the federal survey for further geological work and is guided by its findings in planning exploration programs. Geological mapping has led private enterprise to productive areas in Alberta such as Pincher Creek, Jumping Pound, Sullivan creek, Brazeau and others.

In addition, the geological survey of my department has collected 1½ million drill samples, representing more than 15 million feet of drilling. These samples are studied and correlated and the information is made available to the industry. Incidentally, the government of Alberta over the past year has charged the federal government in excess of $10,000 in connection with the supply of these samples.

I should like to say a few words on the subject of coal. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), speaking on the coal board estimates last session, expressed fear that everything possible was not being done, by subvention and otherwise, to keep the coal industry of this country in a healthy state in order to meet any national emergency that might develop. As the minister responsible to parliament for the dominion coal board I should like to draw attention to the extent to which the coal industry of Canada has been assisted by federal policy.

The subvention policy has been in effect since 1923, almost 30 years. Last year the rate of subvention assistance to western mines was increased when the railways decided to raise their flat rate on the eastward movement of Canadian coal.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has been assisting the coal industry in a number of ways. The department maintains an office in Calgary from which field representatives work with mine operators on coal preparation problems and improvement in coal-mining methods. In co-operation with McGill university the department is also assisting with the Mordell project. This is an experiment, under Professor Mordell's direction, toward the development of a coal-fired gas turbine engine. If it is successful, the coal industry will be helped substantially. Up until the end of the present fiscal year the federal government will have assisted this project to the extent of $200,000.

On the other hand, so far as the coal industry is concerned, in my opinion the Alberta government, though it has collected large sums in royalties, has done little to assist the industry in a practical way. Actually a total of over $6 million in royalties, fees, rentals and mineral taxes has been collected by the Social Credit government from coal mines in Alberta since it came into office. I want to make it quite clear, however, that the Alberta research council, within the scope of its limited facilities, has co-operated at all times with federal agencies. The relations between the scientists of the council and the scientists of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys have always been most cordial and mutually helpful.

During the course of this parliament, Social Credit members have referred to the Alberta tar sands. On May 1 of this year, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), in dealing with the subject, made the following observation as reported at page 1768 of Hansard:

> We remember that during the war the federal government spent around $5 million by way of investments in the tar sands of Alberta. The work done by the federal government was absolutely of no use.
> The development carried out by the federal government in connection with the tar sands, from away back in 1914 up to the present time, is very little, compared with what has been done by the province, and when compared with the progress the province has made since the federal government burned up that plant at Fort McMurray.

In fairness to the facts of the situation I propose to give a brief résumé of the tar sands developments. These sands, located in northern Alberta, consist of heavy oil and sand particles and in that state commercial use is difficult. The first step was to find areas where the deposits were of a sufficiently high oil content to be commercially workable. After years of preliminary surface exploration by members of the mines branch, the federal government in 1942 began an intensive search for such deposits. This work, which entailed development of a special core recovery method, led to the discovery of better grade sands in the Fort McMurray district. By means of drilling, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys proved that in an area of four and a half square miles there are deposits of oil estimated at 900 million barrels. That is sufficient, they tell me, to keep a 20,000 barrel a day refinery in operation for a hundred years.

The second step was to develop an efficient method of separating the heavy oil from the sands, and a field process of transforming it into pipe-line crude. There was also the problem of removing the sulphur content. Federal scientists and engineers joined forces with Abasand Oils Limited to obtain a process for the economic extraction of bitumen from the sands. At this company's plant, rebuilt with federal aid, tests were made of the McClave hot water process of separation. When the plant was accidentally destroyed by fire in 1945 as the result of a spark from a welder's torch, work which had been started on a cold water process was further developed in a pilot plant set up at the mines branch in Ottawa. This plant was also used to develop means for reducing heavy oil to pipe-line crude. The results of these experiments were at all times made available to the Alberta government.

I am not discounting the activities of the provincial government, but it is time the federal government received credit for its large share in these developments.

Studies are being concentrated at the present time on the removal of sulphur from the oil, which would otherwise be very corrosive and unacceptable. This was recognized as one of the crucial problems in utilizing the oil in the report prepared by S. M. Blair, the technical consultant employed by the Alberta government. During the current year the mines branch of my department has set up equipment to carry out extensive research by hydrogenation as applied to this problem. Other tests of Alberta bitumen will also be made at the Ottawa plant.

So, as you can see, the federal government has played an important role in the development of these resources for the people of Alberta and of Canada. The scientists and engineers of my department have combined their efforts with those of private industry and of the provincial government to find the best and most practical means of utilizing the oil in the tar sands. There has always been a free exchange of information between the provincial and dominion scientists.

Such projects can only be brought to a successful conclusion by joint effort on the part of the federal and provincial governments and private enterprise. This co-operation is the key to the success of this confederation of ours. The hon. member for Bow River apparently lost sight of these facts or tried to distort them.

Mr. Johnston: No, he did not lose sight of any of them.

Mr. Prudham: In still another field of government activity the hon. member from Ottawa, representing Peace River, made reference to the hospitalization scheme that is in operation in Alberta at the present time. He referred to it as the best in Canada. I would like to point out that the federal Department of National Health and Welfare is entitled to at least part of the credit for anything of this nature done in Alberta.

Under the Liberal government's national health program over $2 million is being provided this fiscal year alone for 33 hospitals in the province. There is an additional $1 million set aside to help the province strengthen its health services in the field of tuberculosis, cancer, mental health, care of crippled children, and other public services. Incidentally, the federal government grant of $58,000 in aid of the construction of an addition to the provincial mental institute at Oliver has just been approved.

In Edmonton a great monument has been built to the high priest of Social Credit, the late Hon. William Aberhart. It is a beautiful, up-to-date and modern sanatorium. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare contributed $600,000 to the cost of that building, including furnishings and equipment. So far as I have been able to find out the provincial government has not at any time publicly acknowledged this assistance.

The hon. member representing Peace River and other members of his group on occasion have made very urgent pleas for greater federal aid for education. In the Peace river district two years ago a new school of agriculture was opened at Fairview. The federal government, through the Department of Labour, made a direct contribution of some $262,000 to the cost of construction at that school, including equipment. Again, on the occasion of the opening of that building, they did not have the courtesy to invite a representative of the federal government.

The members of this house are well aware of what this government has done during the life of this parliament by way of aid to universities and technical education. I do not need to take the time of the house to review it, except to indicate that in addition to the federal grant to the Alberta provincial university, the dominion government has contributed to the construction of agricultural schools at Olds and Vermilion as well as high schools in Edmonton and Calgary. Under the constitution the responsibility for education rests with the provinces. While the federal government has demonstrated its willingness to give indirect assistance, does it seem reasonable that a provincial government with a bank account of more than $75 million should need further federal aid for education?

The matter of highway construction is yet another example of federal aid. The trans-Canada highway, which is being constructed in Alberta, is without question the best engineered and best constructed highway in the province. This has been done under supervision of the Department of Resources and Development. Approximately $10 million *of federal money has been spent to date on this one highway. It is hoped that the provincial government will in future follow the same engineering practices that have been instituted on that project, and endeavour to bring the provincial highways up to a safe standard.

Mr. Low: Harper Prowse got licked on that.

Mr. Prudham: It is my observation that the provincial highways in Alberta very closely resemble the Social Credit movement; they have a very expensive top but no solid foundation.

Mr. Johnston: At least they have a good top; that is more than can be said of some over there.

Mr. Prudham: A smooth top, too. The Social Credit party has busily propagated the idea that there is good government in Alberta. I would say that the reason they have a type of government often referred to as orthodox is that their administration of affairs has been marked by the absence of social credit rather than by any application of it.

No fewer than 14 acts of the Alberta legislature and 3 bills, which were wisely reserved by the lieutenant governor, have been declared ultra vires since 1935.

Mr. Low: Now you are getting down to the answer.

Mr. Prudham: Besides destroying our confederation and undermining national unity these acts, had they been implemented, would have drastically affected the rights and freedoms of the people of Alberta.

Mr. Low: That is nonsense.

Mr. Prudham: The Social Credit schemers were so bold as to entitle one of their acts "An act to provide for the restriction of the civil rights of certain persons". And we all know that the infamous "Accurate news and information act" would in effect have muzzled the free press of the province. So today, when we hear the pious platitudes of the Social Crediters, let the hon. members and the people of Canada recall what might have happened to our most cherished freedoms had we in Alberta not been protected by the courts of the land.

I would also like to remind this house that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was a member of the Social Credit government when many of these unconstitutional acts were passed by the Alberta legislature. Anyone unthinking enough to believe in the manufactured myth of Social Credit good government might ponder what would happen if these Social Crediters ever held the power at Ottawa to carry their policies into effect. This intention is clearly indicated in the speech made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) last Monday evening.

One of the chief claims made in promoting this idea is that of attributing to the provincial government of Alberta credit for reducing the debt of the province. In this connection I would refer hon. members of this house to bureau of statistics records which indicate that the provincial net bonded debt since 1940 has been reduced by $28,487,000 while during the same period the municipal net debenture debt in the province, owed by the same people of Alberta, has increased by $49,455,000. While the Alberta government boasts of a huge bank account, many of the municipalities are actually in a desperate financial position because of a maldistribution of revenues as between the provincial government and the municipalities.

Mr. Shaw: Tell them how many Liberals were elected in Alberta.

Mr. Prudham: On the other hand the federal government has assumed its obligations in this regard—

Mr. Shaw: Tell them how many Liberals were elected.

Mr. Prudham: —through the dominion-provincial tax agreements and ordinary subsidies. Under these agreements and subsidy arrangements the federal government collects and turns over to the Alberta government approximately one-quarter of the money that government spends annually. If it were not for these tax agreements the provincial government, of course, would have the privilege of raising that much additional money by direct taxation.

If the great prophetic day ever arrived when the Social Credit party would be in position to take office at Ottawa, I do not think that anyone for a moment would expect the hon. member for Peace River to be appointed prime minister. His present position seems to be that of a voice crying in the wilderness, preparing the way for another.

Mr. Low: Why are you Liberals so worried, then?

Mr. Prudham: Undoubtedly the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) would be designated minister of finance.

Mr. Blackmore: And would do a whale of a good job at it, too.

Mr. Prudham: It would not be a matter of speculation as to how long it would take his printing press policies to destroy the confidence of Canadians and of the world in the stability of Canada's financial structure.

NOTE: *See "Corrigendum" on page 364.

Mr. Shaw: That is what they said about Alberta in 1935, too.

Mr. Prudham: And you were prevented from doing it, by the courts.

It is surprising to hear the hon. member for Peace River, of all people, talk about his burning and consistent desire to strengthen over the years the ties of the commonwealth and the promotion of trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. He has been speaking lately of the great regard and respect which his party holds for the throne, and of how its position has been weakened by the appointment of a Canadian as governor general. As a matter of record, soon after the Social Credit party came into power in Alberta they showed the most flagrant disrespect for the crown by rudely turning the lieutenant governor out of his official residence, Government House, and auctioning its contents, showing not the least concern for the dignity and traditions associated with the high position of the representative of the crown in the province.

The federal government has, of course, seen to it that Government House in Edmonton was not allowed to go unoccupied or to be commercialized. It has been converted into a war veterans' hospital. But the point is that when Social Credit leaders advertise their profound attachment for commonwealth ties, most people will assess those convictions on the basis of actions, not words. The hon. member for Peace River was a member of the Alberta government at that time.

In addition, if the Social Credit party had been successful in discovering a scheme to carry their wild theories into effect without violating the constitution, they would have put Alberta in an economic strait-jacket, isolated from the rest of Canada and seeking to operate as a so-called self-contained unit. Had this been accomplished it would have been not only a cynical denial of the value of empire and international trade but a critical blow at the commercial structure of Canada.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but it comes with ill grace from the leader of the Social Credit party in this house to speak about any preponderance of Canadian trade with the United States over our trade with the United Kingdom. In the past few years, the Social Credit government in Alberta has relied very largely on United States capital and enterprise in the exploitation of Alberta's natural resources.

Mr. Low: Who wrote the speech you are reading?

Mr. Prudham: On the one hand they go about this country attacking the fifty big shots, or the international money power, as they describe it, while on the other hand welcoming to Alberta any money power they can get, international or otherwise.

I would remind the people of Canada, and those investors and businessmen who have regarded the Alberta government as orthodox, of the dangerous policies to which the Social Credit party subscribed in the early days of that movement, and which the national president of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Macleod, reiterated in this house in the course of this debate. He said at page 235 of Hansard:

> Let nobody write or think that if Social Credit should take over the reins of government here, they would only follow along the lines of good honest conservative government. If the Social Credit took over the government of Canada let it be understood they would introduce Social Credit technique.

That speech has done a lot to clear the air and to dissipate the fable of a Social Credit good, conservative government. It must come as a shock to many people to find that the Social Credit party still stands for the ruinous funny-money schemes to which they first subscribed.

To those who feel the emotional impact of Social Credit, I would say once again that the Social Credit party has no monopoly on Christianity. At this point I would like to read into the record from a news report that appeared in the Edmonton Journal, and which was carried by Canadian Press, covering the speech made by the hon. member for Peace River at Edmonton on November 26th. I quote:

> Premier Manning made a triumphant tour of eastern Canada—not for political purposes but to do a job in religion . . . It has its political implications. It will hold implications for us, the party, I am sure.

Mr. Low: Why do you not go on and read the rest of the sentence?

Mr. Prudham: I would, but I have not the time.

Mr. Low: I'll say you haven't.

Mr. Prudham: I am not making any comment on these remarks of the hon. member, as his words speak for themselves. Mr. Speaker, I would say that the members for Peace River and Macleod have done much to clear the air and to show just where the Social Credit party stands, and the means they are using to gain political power.

The record of the Liberal party in strengthening and encouraging trade between the United Kingdom and Canada speaks for itself.

Mr. Low: I'll say it does. You have lost all the markets we ever had.

Mr. Prudham: I need only mention the billion and a quarter dollar loan by this country to Great Britain supplementing the billion dollar wartime gift to the mother country, the international wheat agreement and the various arrangements made for marketing a wide variety of Canadian farm products in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Low: That was a gift by the Canadian farmers.

Mr. Prudham: Everyone familiar with the record knows that the Liberal party works for the expansion of trade with all nations. That has been the whole tradition and direction of Liberal party policy over the years. That is why Canada on a per capita basis is today the world's greatest trading nation. That is why on the basis of total volume of international commerce, Canada is the fourth largest trading nation in the world at the present time.

An hon. Member: What page are you on now?

Mr. Prudham: By the time I have given this speech as often as we have heard the same Social Credit speeches in this house I will be able to say it backwards.

Mr. Mutch: And, saying it backwards, it will make just as much sense as they did.

Mr. Knowles: Is that all you can say for it?

Mr. Prudham: In conclusion I want to say I am proud of our Liberal leadership, proud of the Liberal record of achievement—the party that brought the country out of the depression, through a war, through the period of re-establishment, and is now directing it through another period of rearmament; and the country is enjoying a state of prosperity such as we have never known before.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to make a few remarks in the interests of the people whom I represent, and I hope that these remarks will ultimately be in the interests of all Canadians. To begin with I recognize that we in the maritimes have certain natural disadvantages as well as many natural advantages. I am not going to speak in detail tonight about our natural disadvantages, but I should like to refer briefly to one or two of them.

To begin with, because the borders of the maritime provinces were not adjacent to the vast hinterland areas of Canada the boundaries of our provinces have remained as they were when we entered confederation, whereas in the case of seven other provinces their areas have been greatly expanded by the addition of large tracts of what was once hinterland. In the last few years these areas have been found to be rich in mineral wealth in the form of oil, nickel, iron ore and so forth, with the result that money is now pouring into their treasuries both directly and indirectly. We in the maritimes have not been given a commensurate compensation for that position.

There are also many artificial ways in which we in the maritimes seem to be at a disadvantage. Geographically we are away down at the far end of the Canadian table. We are smaller than most of the other provinces in population, and the result seems to be that when the big fellows have been looked after there may or may not be something left for us.

For instance, the people of the city of Charlottetown in the riding of Queens have had high hopes over the years that some of the promises which had been made to them for the improvement of the federal public works would be fulfilled. They had high hopes that a new federal office building would be built, as well as new armouries and new naval barracks. There were many other things they hoped for but which do not seem to be in sight. I hear an hon. member say that these things will not be forthcoming as long as I represent Queens. I have represented Queens for a short time only, and these wants have been in existence for a great number of years. No better results accrued to Queens when it was represented by a member of another party.

These public works and other requirements have been pointed out by many citizens of Prince Edward Island and representatives of many organizations. I have even been bold enough to point them out to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) although I realized that was superfluous. I notice that there is a great deal of building going on in Ottawa in the way of permanent federal office space. If I did not know the keen perception and keen mind of the Minister of Public Works I might think that he thought I had said "Charlotte's town" when I actually said Charlottetown.

The people of Charlottetown have had high hopes that their busy airport would be extended. I believe that proposition is now receiving the consideration of the government, and I am confident that it will be dealt with in the near future and the desired results realized.

Generally speaking we in the maritimes appear to be neglected, or at least we think so, in connection with public works, defence contracts and many other things. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) has just told us of the many geological surveys which have been carried on by the federal government in Alberta. It would seem that when the people of Alberta ask for something they get at least a geological survey, whereas when we in Prince Edward Island ask for something we usually get a stony stare.

These are things which I mention only in passing, but there is one serious injustice which I should like to bring to the attention of the government which affects the people of the province from which I come. I refer to the corporation tax on public utilities companies. This problem has been dealt with in a measure, but I should like to refresh the memory of the house in this regard by quoting from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) delivered in this chamber on April 8 last.

The minister is reported on page 1253 of Hansard of April 8, 1952, as follows:

> The house will recall that in my budget speech a year ago, I expressed special concern over the effect of our present high corporate tax rate on certain public utility companies which are forced by the nature of their business and their franchises to raise large amounts of capital to finance expansion of services required to be performed for the public, and which because of public control of rates are allowed to earn only a modest return on their capital.

And later on he said:

> During the past year much further study has been given to the problem and I have now decided to recommend a change in our law which I believe can be administered and which will grant a measure of relief to certain of these companies as long as the present very high corporate tax rate continues to apply. This relief will apply to companies whose main business is the distribution to, or generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam, and will take the form of a deduction from the tax otherwise payable of an amount sufficient to reduce to 43 per cent the tax payable under the Income Tax Act on that part of a corporation's taxable income that is derived from such distribution or generation.

And further on:

> It is also, generally speaking, the group of companies which for a variety of reasons finds the greatest difficulty in securing adequate income to attract the heavy volume of capital required to keep pace with public demand.

This state of affairs has a special and unfortunate impact upon the economy of Prince Edward Island. The people of Prince Edward Island believe in free enterprise, with the result that both our telephone and electrical services are supplied wholly by privately-owned companies. In this day and age it is natural that people in the country as well as in the city expect to have the benefit and convenience of electrical power, and as a result the people in my province are most anxious that many of the fine agricultural districts should be electrified as quickly as possible. The company which supplies the power is in the position that it cannot attract sufficient capital to allow it to expand and extend its rural electrification project as rapidly as it would like to do. That is by reason of the fact that the company, like all other companies in that field, pays large amounts of taxes into the federal treasury.

I cite this case because it is an injustice. The consumers of electric power in my province have to pay into the federal treasury large amounts of taxes when the corresponding people in other provinces do not have to, simply because electric power is distributed by a private company in Prince Edward Island rather by a commission or co-operative or provincially-owned crown company as may be the case in most other provinces. The result is that the average family using electric power in Prince Edward Island has about $10 per annum unnecessarily added to its electric power bill. That $10 goes into the federal treasury in the form of taxation.

My province is already at a natural disadvantage as far as electric power is concerned because we have no hydroelectric power. All our electric power must be generated by steam. Furthermore, the fuel for generating that power must be imported from other provinces. It is either oil or coal and, as a result, the cost of electric power in rural areas in my province is very high.

Even if the farmers in some areas were willing to pay very high rates they would have very little hope of receiving service in the near future. I feel very strongly that this situation could be relieved very considerably if a uniform method of taxing public utilities could be found, regardless of the organization of the capital structure of the service which is being extended. This state of affairs, of course, also applies to the telephone systems of some of our provinces although it may not apply in others. That again creates an uneven distribution of the federal tax load on the Canadian people.

That is all I wish to say on those matters for the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to make some remarks which have a bearing on another of our industries in Prince Edward Island. One of our main industries down there, apart from fisheries and agriculture, is of course the tourist industry. For a tourist industry to be successful one of the main requirements is that the area to be visited by tourists should be readily accessible, especially by road in this modern age. Therefore a frequent and high quality service for motorists to and from Prince Edward Island is a primary requirement. That being the case, I would like to point out to the government the difficulties under which the tourist industry in my province labours due to the bottlenecks in travel to and from the island by the two ferry services which exist. There is a ferry service from Cape Tormentine to Borden, operated by the Canadian National Railways. It is a very good service but, at the same time, during the peak months of the summer it is inadequate. The result is that motorists must wait for a long time on each side before getting from or to the island. I would therefore suggest that the government give serious consideration to supplying a second ferry boat on that service for summer use. It would not have to be an icebreaker. It would not have to be as expensive a boat as we have there now, but it would be a boat that would relieve the peak traffic periods during the summer when tourists are going to and from Prince Edward Island.

The other main ferry service is operated by Northumberland Ferries Limited from Wood Island to Caribou, Nova Scotia. This company finds itself in a very difficult situation because at the present time it seems to be impossible for it to acquire adequate and suitable ships for service. This service is one which has been growing very rapidly in the last few years. Traffic over the route is increasing to the point where, at the present time, the company is unable to cope with it with its present facilities. A third ferry of some description is required to be made available for next summer so that congestion on the route will be somewhat relieved. That would only be a temporary measure, and I would recommend most strongly to the government that consideration be given to either providing a boat for this company, which might be run on a management basis, or creating an environment which would allow this company to build a suitable boat for its own operations so the service could be improved.

Another matter which has some bearing on our tourist industry is the advertising which is done by various departments of the government for the purpose of attracting tourists to our province. I feel that perhaps this advertising is not sufficient. Until recently I was under the impression that the advertising was adequate, but some unfortunate circumstances with respect to my province have recently been reported in a widely-read Canadian periodical. It concerns a very well known and famous citizen of Ottawa who had occasion to go to our province last summer. Due to circumstances about which I have no information it would seem that this man was very unfortunate in the accommodation which was provided for him there. The result was that while he was spending some time in Prince Edward Island, as quoted in this periodical, he had "the worst meal he had ever eaten in Canada".

The most unfortunate thing about this is that such a state of affairs is entirely unnecessary. I myself have eaten in most of the public eating places in Queens county and so has the senior member for Queens (Mr. McLure). I must say that in most cases the food was very good and I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me when I say that both the senior member for Queens and myself look reasonably well fed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This unfortunate gentleman, who is a great man, and being a great man no doubt is a humble man, probably has tastes that are not unnecessarily extravagant. I expect that he would have demands with regard to food which were not unreasonable. Nevertheless he apparently ended up in a fifth rate hotel because, as I said, he was served the worst meal he ever ate in Canada. I think that is most unfortunate, because with a little advertising in the right places people going from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island would have a better idea where to go. There are excellent places in Prince Edward Island at which to eat. I am quite sure every hon. member will agree with me when I say that.

For instance, the Ontario motor league publishes a booklet which is called "Travel in North America", or something of that sort, and it lists at least three hotels in my riding which have a triple A rating. I understand that is the highest rating that association gives. In addition to that, if there were any doubt about the matter, there are many places in my riding which are recommended in various travel folders as good places at which to dine. For instance, in a book called "Let us Visit Canada" by Byron Steele, which was published in 1948, a couple of places are mentioned. He refers to one as having as its specialty seafood and steaks; another serves excellent chicken dinners. I believe, therefore, that with a little suitable advertising either by the Department of Transport or the Department of Resources and Development people in the rest of Canada might be educated to such an extent that they would not have such an unfortunate experience.

This man does not say where he had the misfortune to stay. I am sure he could have stayed in some very fine hotels, one of which would be the Charlottetown hotel. I feel that if that were sufficiently advertised it would attract more notable clients from this part of the country. I see that the Canadian National Railways do put out a little booklet advertising their hotels. It is entitled "Canadian National Railways Hotels Coast to Coast." With reference to the Charlottetown hotel, it says it has 110 rooms, each with a private bath. Then the booklet goes on to say:

> Georgian in architecture, this modern fireproof structure is one of the finest in the Canadian National Railways chain of hotels. Conveniently situated close to the business and shopping district of Charlottetown, it is but a half mile from the Canadian National Railways station.
> The Charlottetown is celebrated for its excellent cuisine, seafood dishes being a special feature.

I hope that it was not seafood that caused this notable gentleman a bad time, because he does admit that he is unable to distinguish a live lobster from a cooked one, not knowing that a live lobster is dark green and a cooked one is bright red. I point out this experience, Mr. Speaker, merely to give the government some small idea of the importance of good advertising to the residents of Prince Edward Island, to whom the tourist industry is of great importance. I believe this especially necessary because in my constituency we not only have a very fine Canadian National Railways hotel; we also have a very fine park, and there are some excellent privately run hotels.

(Translation):

Mr. P. L. Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, for the splendid manner in which they discharged their duties.

I also wish to congratulate the Clerk of the House on the lecture he gave at the Capitol theatre last Sunday night. I am sure that everyone present found it very interesting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the government to the shortage of cement in my province, especially in my constituency. It is rather strange to find that cement becomes scarcer as the weather gets more favourable for building projects. Such a situation is annoying for people who intend to build a house or erect any other kind of building. Every season we experience the same trouble with regard to that essential building material.

We are well aware of the present housing situation. Therefore, in order to further the erection of housing units, production of building materials must be increased and an adequate distribution assured.

In my district, when we speak of cement, we are under the general impression, rightly or wrongly, that our people are at the mercy of the Canada Cement Company who are in a position to supply or deny this building material to whoever wishes to build a home.

Many people wonder why there is only one cement producing company in this country where the use of this material is so widespread and, especially, when there is an inexhaustible supply of the raw materials used in the manufacturing of cement.

In my humble opinion, though I have made no personal inquiry or study of the situation, I realize that our people are the innocent prey of monopolizing interests. This opinion is also shared by our farmers and our workers who are particularly affected by the scarcity of that building material. There are some who take advantage of the present shortage to speculate and exploit those who need cement. This product, which was selling for 80 or 90 cents a bag before the shortage, now fetches ridiculous prices, such as $1.50 or $2.10, and even $3.10, I am told, in certain cases. It is easy to see that cement is being sold on the black market by individuals who, foreseeing this shortage, have accumulated stocks which they are now marketing at these exorbitant prices.

I believe it is time for the government to intervene immediately to put a stop to this kind of thing, so that the people of this country may buy, for a reasonable price, this product manufactured from our own natural resources. I am convinced that private enterprise is bound to fail unless our governments manage to set fair standards. If we want to do away with communism in our midst, let us try to inspire the people with greater confidence in the social benefits of private enterprise. People do not live from slogans, but from daily bread, from a proper distribution of goods, from equal opportunities for all, not only in theory, but in practise.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that the governments of Quebec and New Brunswick have finally agreed to apply to the federal government for the necessary grants for the construction of a bridge across the Restigouche river, between Campbellton, New Brunswick, and Cross Point, Quebec.

The population of the city of Campbellton has asked for the construction of this bridge for so long that it will no doubt welcome this agreement between the two provinces.

I hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will respond favourably to the wishes of the people of both sides who rightly deserve that the necessary grants be accorded them for the early implementation of this project.

The city of Campbellton is now important enough, and the joining of both provinces by means of this bridge will be profitable to everyone and will be of much help in the development of activities in this area. In former days roads were bad and automobiles rather scarce. Today it is another story. Most people own automobiles and travel, especially since the completion of the trans-Canada highway.

A large number of those people who visited Gaspé this year would have crossed over to visit New Brunswick, and vice versa, if only there had been a bridge between Cross Point and Campbellton. Some motorists do not like to take the ferry, both because they do not like to wait for the return of the boat thus wasting precious moments and because they are not confident of their ability to drive their car onto it. But, mainly, it is because of the loss of time. Everything moves so quickly today. A bridge is far more convenient, there is no doubt about that.

Since both provinces are equally deserving of a visit from those who want to see all of Canada, I really believe that the government would quickly recover the moneys put into this venture, through a constant increase in the tourist trade.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I wish to contradict the statement made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) concerning the railway employees. According to him, their wage demands are not justified.

If the hon. member for Springfield knew of all the expense railway employees incur while at work, I am sure he would not have spoken the way he did. If he only knew the responsibilities which they face, I am sure he would not introduce in this house a bill to prevent them from striking for the next two years. Should he introduce this bill, I will vote against it.

*CORRIGENDUM

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a correction of a statement made by me in this debate, as recorded at the top of the first column on page 358 of Hansard, where I was making reference to the trans-Canada highway. The statement reads:

> Approximately $10 million of federal money has been spent to date on this one highway.

The information which came to my office, on which this statement was based, was that contractual commitments on the trans-Canada highway in Alberta are now $10,103,514.17. Actually, under the trans-Canada highway agreements this figure is a total, and is shared equally by the federal and provincial governments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 5, 1952

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

KOREA

REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY MEMBER FOR WINNIPEG SOUTH CENTRE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last night the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) made a number of statements, and he expressly asked me to give certain assurances. Because of the nature of those statements and their possible effect on the forces abroad and their families at home, I felt that in the national interest I should make an immediate statement. Accordingly, I have delayed my departure abroad, and if I have the unanimous consent of the house, I shall proceed to make a statement now. It will not be long.

I refer to that part of the hon. member's speech in which the impression is created that the rate of casualties suffered is, in any way whatever, comparable to those at Dieppe. Whilst this may not have been the intention of the hon. member, you can see the impression created by the reference in the dispatch as it appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette. It reads:

> The Winnipeg soldier M.P. warned that to date Canadian casualties in Korea had been about 60 per cent—"the same heavy casualties rate as at Dieppe".

At Dieppe, of forces numbering 4,963, 3,371 were casualties in eight hours. In Korea the 25th Canadian infantry brigade have been there a total of 7,900 man years. The total number of casualties suffered numbers 1,248 or 16 per cent as opposed to the 68 per cent in eight hours at Dieppe. It must be remembered and emphasized that the 25th Canadian infantry brigade is practically all in the active theatre of operations in front of brigade headquarters. I am informed by the chief of the general staff that the casualty rate of the 25th brigade, as related to the actions in which they have been engaged, has been lower than any comparable formation in the war in Korea or in the second world war, and that has been due to the finest possible equipment, good training, maintenance of strength and good leadership. The fact that so far the brigade has only lost one prisoner of war is a remarkable tribute to its fighting quality and fighting spirit.

The care that casualties receive is shown by the fact that of the non-fatal battle casualties less than 3 per cent died of wounds while the figure was 6 per cent in the second world war and 8·1 per cent in the first world war.

So far as ammunition is concerned, the position in Korea is precisely as I outlined it the other day. Canadian troops have never been subjected to unnecessary casualties by any shortage of ammunition, nor are they in the least likely to be exposed in such a manner. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of ammunition used in Korea far exceeds that ever used before in any campaign in the history of mankind for any force of a comparable size. During quiet periods ammunition is conserved, on precisely the same basis for the Canadians as for the other forces, against the possibility of attack and to maintain an essential theatre reserve against contingencies. If an armistice is agreed on it might well include a condition that there should be no supplementing of military formations or stores in the theatre while it is in force. If an armistice is agreed on such terms and fighting should subsequently break out again, the forces would have placed themselves in a position of unjustifiable risk had they not provided for theatre stocks.

As for the political and superior military control of the Canadian forces, we have a position in the commonwealth division and in the army appropriate to our position as having the third largest fighting force among the United Nations in Korea.

The brigade commander may, either through the usual channels or direct, bring to attention any situation in which he feels that Canadian lives would be needlessly risked, or any other circumstances requiring attention, in Korea, in Japan and, if necessary, at Washington. The brigade commander is specifically given the right of direct communication to the chief of the general staff in Ottawa on any matter and can call for representation to be made to the United Nations command either through military or governmental channels in the event that he should feel that he was required to take any action which involved the acceptance of unjustifiable military risks to his troops. Happily, no situation has arisen necessitating such an appeal, and with the confidence which we may feel in the calibre of the command in the theatre such an appeal is not to be expected.

NATO Conference

I am sure that the hon. member did not intend his remarks to be harmful to the magnificent spirit of our fighting forces and I am sure he did not want to cause additional distress and concern to their wives and mothers at home here in Canada.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister would not care to have one of his statements misinterpreted this afternoon. As I heard it, I think he was suggesting that I had not drawn a careful distinction between the casualties at Dieppe which were suffered over a period of a few hours and the casualties suffered by the 25th brigade over a period of 22 months. I was extremely careful to note the time element involved in those two cases.

NATO CONFERENCE

PRESS REPORT—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's desire to remove any uncertainties before he leaves, may I ask him if he will inform the house whether the statement conveyed to the people of Canada by the Canadian Press yesterday, and which informed the Canadian people as to the attitude that he and the members of his party are to take at the NATO meetings, does in fact represent the position of the government, in view of the fact that the statement was said to come from responsible authorities?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am in no way responsible for what the newspapers print. When I make statements, I am glad to have them printed as I make them. Yesterday I made a statement in answer to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) which I think covers the situation completely. Canada entered into the North Atlantic treaty in good faith. She has formed a partnership for the preservation of peace. We have already taken part in every meeting of the council and have made the commitments which I have reported to this house. We will consider with our other fellow members everything brought before us that is likely to strengthen the forces which we are building up to prevent aggression and to preserve peace. I will not make any commitment abroad because that would not be in accordance with our constitutional practice, but I will be glad to participate in discussions and to exchange views freely and fully with my colleagues, most of whom I know well. Then I will make a report to the government.

Mr. Drew: As a result of that statement, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he will give instructions that in future officials of his department will not give statements, without names attached, which create these impressions?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, there is no justification whatever for the Leader of the Opposition to make any such assertion. He knows quite well that none of the people on this side of the house or on that side, and none of the officials of the department, have the least control over what the press does or how it uses anything. We hope for the best.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

INVESTMENT IN BONDS ISSUED BY INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 7 (from the Senate), to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

INVESTMENT IN BONDS ISSUED BY INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 8 (from the Senate), to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT AFFIDAVIT TO BE SWORN BEFORE A NOTARY OR A COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 9 (from the Senate), to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTINUATION OF ACT FROM MAY 31, 1953, TO MAY 31, 1954

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year, that is from the thirty-first day of May, 1953, to the thirty-first day of May, 1954.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

PROVISION TO EXTEND OPERATION FOR A FURTHER PERIOD, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, to extend its operation for a further period by closing out on March 31, 1953, in lieu of February 28, 1954, the present three year pool of loans guaranteed by the government under the act and by providing for a new three year pool commencing April 1, 1953, and ending March 31, 1956; to provide further that the maximum amount of bank loans made in the new period and guaranteed under the act shall be $300 million.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR HIGH SEAS FISHERIES

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure providing for the approval and confirmation of the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, signed by Canada, the United States and Japan, in Tokyo, on the 9th of May, 1952, and for carrying out Canada's obligations under the convention.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

SALARY FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGE OF SUPREME COURT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to authorize payment of a salary for an additional judge of the supreme court of British Columbia.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Proposed Legislation

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, to increase the appropriation provided by section 7 for loans under part I from $300 million to $500 million, and the appropriation provided by section 13 for loans under part II from $150 million to $250 million, also with respect to grants in aid of slum clearance and to certain other matters deemed necessary for the proper administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WATER RESOURCES

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES FOR CONSERVATION PURPOSES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and one-half per cent of the projects and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above-mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD ON STATUTORY BASIS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the establishment of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada on a statutory basis; to provide that the board shall consist of twelve members and for its powers and duties; to provide also that the appointed members shall be paid a fee for attending each meeting and travelling and living expenses incurred in connection with the business of the board; to provide also for the appointment and remuneration of a secretary of the board; and to provide further that all expenditures for the purposes of the act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament therefor.

Proposed Legislation

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES ACT

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS—ADJUSTMENT OF CAPITAL STRUCTURE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to provide that the corporation shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of nine persons in lieu of seven; to increase the powers of the corporation, and to adjust its capital structure in such a way as to conform to normal commercial practice.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

CHANGE IN DATE OF EXPIRATION

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, to provide that the act shall expire on the last day of the first session of parliament in 1954 in lieu of the last day of the first session of parliament in 1953.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ARMED FORCES

ASSISTANCE FOR HIGHER EDUCATION OF CHILDREN OF CERTAIN DECEASED MEMBERS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons, all allowances and costs payable under the act to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Winters.]

RADIO BROADCASTING

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION TO POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct to the Minister of National Revenue a question of which I have given him notice. In view of a letter appearing in the Montreal Gazette today in regard to the fact that no broadcast is alleged to be extended to Poland in the international service, may I ask him whether that is a fact, and if so what the reason is that Poland alone of the major countries beyond the iron curtain is not receiving at this time programs of the nature being extended by the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I just received the notice of this question as I was coming into the house, and I shall have to take it as notice and give an answer at a future time.

Mr. Drew: It may be that there was some delay in the delivery of the notice, and if that is the case the same comment may apply to another question, but I shall ask the question notwithstanding that, because the minister may be able to answer it.

TELEVISION

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAM ENTITLED "HILDA MORGAN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Canadian television program entitled "Hilda Morgan" broadcast over CBLT, Toronto, on November 27, 1952, been brought to the attention of the minister?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The program "Hilda Morgan" has not been officially brought to my attention, although I did read some press comments on it. A copy of the program has been requested, and if it proves to have been objectionable, similar programs in future will not be telecast.

PENSION ACT

DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED SERVICE PERSONNEL—REQUESTED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can the minister make a statement concerning the conference he had recently with representatives of the Silver Cross Women of Canada? Is consideration being given to their request for certain changes in section 33 of the Pension Act with respect to pensions paid to dependent parents of deceased servicemen?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not believe there is any statement to be made at the present time, other than that I met with the representatives of this organization two days ago. They presented me with a brief, which was discussed between themselves and myself and officers of my department, and the brief will receive consideration by the cabinet.

FISHERIES

NAFEL—COMMENT ON STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister comment on the recent statement made at St. John's by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) with respect to the continuation of the Newfoundland fisheries organization known as NAFEL?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the St. John's paper. NAFEL is the single marketing agency for export of fish from Newfoundland, which was set up under the commission form of government prior to Newfoundland entering confederation, and, as one of the terms of union with Canada, was allowed to be carried over to the spring of 1954. The statement made by the Secretary of State is quite right. In the forthcoming year very serious consideration will be given by the Department of Fisheries and the provincial government in consultation with the fishing industry and the fishermen as to what course will be taken when the present agreement lapses. When a decision is taken it will be announced in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I take this opportunity of commending the hon. member for St. John's East for having sent the dispatch to the minister. That is the proper way of bringing a dispatch to the attention of the minister. I am afraid that during the last few weeks hon. members have been reading dispatches in the press, copies of letters or telegrams, to the house. That is not in accordance with our rules. If an hon. member wants information about something which he may have seen in the press, he should send the article to the minister, as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) has done in this case, and then he can ask the minister if he would like to comment upon it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE—REQUEST FOR RAISING OF PERMISSIBLE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has consideration been given to the request of the Canadian Legion for raising the permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act at this session?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Consideration is being given to all representations made either by the Legion or by other organized veterans bodies to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting of the house I was asked if questions could be answered at an early date. I have been told it is customary to make such an arrangement at this stage in the debate. Therefore if on Wednesday next Your Honour will call the order "Questions", members of the cabinet will be prepared to answer. Perhaps that could be established for each Wednesday until the current debate ends.

Mr. Knowles: Will that also apply to notices of motions for the production of papers?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I desire for a very short time to give some attention to the excellent speeches of the hon. members, respectively, for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), whose speeches inaugurated the present debate. I was particularly interested in the case made by the hon. member for Waterloo North on behalf of those very unfortunate people, the blind of this country. I think it is a great credit to the House of Commons that a man whose name for many years has been associated with the larger industrialization of this country should have made such a plea. For myself, I consider it an excellent omen for the continued vitality of the party to which both he and I belong.

Mr. Speaker, I must make reference to the recent appointments to the cabinet from British Columbia. We were delighted in British Columbia—and I say that all the people of that province were delighted—when the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) was appointed to the post of Minister of Fisheries. And we were doubly delighted when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) was appointed to the post of Solicitor General. We in British Columbia interpret these appointments as indicating that some attention is being paid by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his government to the growing strength and the growing responsibility of British Columbia within this nation. But, more than that we are sure these two members will bring new strength and new lustre to the wider councils of the nation.

I should like also to refer to the former minister of fisheries for the Dominion of Canada, who has gone to a new and onerous task as Canada's first post-war ambassador to Japan. We in British Columbia, whose windows look out upon the Pacific, have for many years been deeply concerned over the contraction of trade in that general area. In a world which is increasing its population at the rate of 60,000 souls per day, one-half of all the world's population lives on the rim of the Pacific.

There was a time when we had the great white Empresses, and the ships of other lines, running regularly across the Pacific. But in recent years these have disappeared. We were happy in British Columbia when the Canadian Pacific Railway took two of its better freight ships recently and put them on that run. But we in that province earnestly hope that the re-establishment of Japanese trade will be used as a springboard for the resumption of trade all around the Pacific. And I am going to say this, that of all the people who have been in the public service of this country we could not have appointed to that post a more able and more deeply versed businessman than Mr. Mayhew.

Mr. Speaker, I have one or two local problems associated with my own city with which I should like to deal first; and the first of these has to do with the Vancouver international airport. I was a little surprised the other day when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) brought up the matter of the connecting link between the city and the airport. With one part of his assertion I agree entirely, and that is as to the importance of our Vancouver international airport. With the single exception of the item of air mail, our Vancouver international airport is today the greatest in the Dominion of Canada, and it is shortly going to be one of the greatest airports on this continent. In the matter of passengers it is today handling 1,700 per day. It is handling a higher weight of air freight than any other airport in Canada. It was established in 1929 as a city airport, and has grown markedly every year since that time. Out of it travel all the Trans-Canada Air Lines and United Air Lines service to the United States, as well as the service of Canadian Pacific Air Lines across the Pacific. And there is now being inaugurated service to South America and to the Antipodes. It is a great airport.

But the other evening the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra dealt with it as if the only important matter were the connecting link. Well, I have been the member for Vancouver South since 1949. I know however that before that the hon. member who is now the member for Vancouver-Quadra represented Vancouver South. I have searched in vain for anything he said, prior to 1949, in reference either to the airport or to the connecting link.

It is true that the connecting link is not a good one. We refer to it as the Marpole bridge. I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows that the first bridge was built there prior to 1890 and that there have been no fewer than four re-establishments of bridges at that location since. The last bridge was built in 1927 at a cost of $275,000.

At the present time the bridge is carrying over 18,000 vehicles per day, a fact which I think is a great tribute to British Columbia lumber and British Columbia pilings capable of carrying that weight for that amount of money.

This bridge is 100 per cent the responsibility of the provincial government, because it was taken over by a bill which passed the British Columbia legislature. The hon. member referred to negotiations which had been undertaken between the federal government and the city of Vancouver for the acquisition of the airport. After all, I would remind him that even in the city of Vancouver it takes two to make a bargain. The federal administration and the Department of Transport have repeatedly done their level best to come to some agreement in respect of the purchase of that airport where, today, for every dollar invested by the city the government of Canada has at least twenty.

There were and there still are on the city council in Vancouver some members who think that the airport is a goose which will lay golden eggs, and that the city should retain it. I am not of that opinion because I think that, from the very nature of the airport, the cost should be visited upon the widest possible taxation basis, and that is all the people of Canada. I would suggest to him that in the ensuing months we may have an opportunity of reopening with the city council of Vancouver the question of the acquisition of the airport, and I know that any help he will be able to give us at that time will be deeply appreciated. It will then be soon enough for us to consider a contribution by the federal administration toward the cost of improvements and increased facilities at that airport.

There is another problem which is of great concern to my city and which was referred to in the speech from the throne, which stated that Canada had been blessed with the greatest grain crop on record. I had made a short compilation of the storage facilities at different points, which are as follows:

	Millions of bushels
Vancouver and Westminster	20·6
Prince Rupert	1·25
Fort William-Port Arthur	93·1
Montreal	15·9
Saint John, N.B.	3·0
Churchill	2·5
Halifax	2·2

I think it would be helpful if we had a factor indicating the shipments made from the various points in relation to the storage capacity. The following figures are for the last crop year for which we have a record, the one ending on August 1 this year:

Vancouver	5·4
Prince Rupert	4·8
Fort William-Port Arthur	5·0
Montreal	7·8
Saint John, N.B.	4·7
Churchill	3·0
Halifax	4·5

There is every indication that additional storage capacity is required for Canadian grains and this capacity should be located at the points closest to the eventual markets. We are assured by people in Vancouver that during the current year they will ship not less than 125 million bushels, which would give us a factor of over six bushels. I am assured also that during the current year Prince Rupert will ship no less than ten million bushels. Vancouver has many great advantages, not the least being our magnificent weather. Vancouver is an all-year port and we have advantages which are denied to other ports in Canada where storage facilities are located.

In addition to that we are strategically located, and this refers also to that great and growing port of Prince Rupert. As a result, during recent years considerable shipments of United States grain have been made through Vancouver from the great area in Washington state. There have been other shipments of United States corn for partial storage. Because of the situation existing on the Pacific, in the eventuality of that tragedy which we all fear, the dispersal of this grain is of great advantage to those people who are on our side.

I suggest that the time will soon arrive when we should have increased storage capacity in the port of Vancouver. I leave this matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in the hope that he or the wheat board will find some way to increase this capacity. I think it could well be increased at this time by not less than ten million bushels.

I was delighted yesterday to hear the speech delivered in this house by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I want to take my place beside him in asking for a parliamentary committee to investigate every aspect of a national system of health insurance. I do that because I cannot support the subamendment introduced by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell); for implicit in that subamendment is the thought that we can embark immediately upon a system of national health insurance.

I want to say at the start that I have no confidence in state medicine, which has been so construed in some countries and which it has been attempted to put into operation in others. I want no system that will interfere with the normal relation that exists between patient and doctor. But I do want, as soon as we can bring it about in this country, a system that will place the responsibility for illness, accident, incapacity and ill health upon all the people of the country instead of upon those unfortunates who happen to be in that position.

This is a problem of tremendous area. It is a problem whose horizons are forever receding. I was interested recently in reading some material put out by some medical men who point out that recent studies in endocrinology and the use of antibiotics may well increase longevity by another ten years by the end of this century. That would have a tremendous influence upon the whole problem and I believe that the eventual action that will have to be taken will be indicated more clearly if we appoint a committee at once to make the broadest possible inquiries in every sphere.

The social services which we now have in Canada are more generous than those of any nation on the face of the earth having regard to our population. I was interested in an article which appeared in the December 5 issue of U. S. News and World Report entitled "Pay-As-You-Go Social Security" and subheaded "The Plan: Today's Benefits from Today's Taxes." The article reads:

> A new plan, favoured by a growing number of businessmen and business organizations, calls for an end to the idea of a multibillion-dollar social security reserve fund. Payroll taxes, instead, would be levied only as needed to finance pensions for all on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Which is the very plan that we decided upon recently in Canada. Here is a further indication of the generosity of the Canadian system:

> Retired workers, aged 65 or more, who now are not eligible for pensions will start to draw monthly benefits of $25 to $35 a month. Their wives, if 65 or over, will draw half that much.

In the realm of old age pensions, old age insurance, veterans pensions, veterans allowances and family allowances, we are paying something in excess of one billion dollars. If we add to that the cost of the health plans upon which we have embarked we find we are paying one and a quarter billion dollars annually. I think we have in Canada today the most enlightened and most generous plans in the way of social security. Notwithstanding that, I am prepared to support the hon. member for Spadina in the very excellent presentation he made yesterday.

I want for a few moments to deal with some matters of trade, and with particular reference to the attitude that is apparently growing among members of the official opposition. During the last interlude between our sessional sittings we had visits to the city of Vancouver by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell). Both of them received a resounding Vancouver welcome. That is to be expected because all the girls love to be courted even though the swain is ineligible. Somebody behind me says we had a visit from the Prime Minister. Yes, we did. We had a visit from the Prime Minister, and I detract nothing from my references to the other two hon. members when I say I think the Prime Minister was the most sincerely and deeply loved of them all.

I was particularly interested in certain comments made by the Leader of the Opposition in his Vancouver speech to which I listened. It took me back to the days of 1949 when there was circulated within our province a piece of Tory propaganda which started out by saying "lost". They told the people of British Columbia that all the markets for lumber had been lost, all the markets for fish had been lost, and all the markets for apples had been lost. They said we had lost everything. This propaganda was printed on white paper in Tory blue, and the contents were bluer and more pessimistic than the ink. I have some of it here. This is the material that was put out for Progressive Conservative speakers in 1949—"lost, lost, lost, lost". Well, we are hearing it all over again.

An hon. Member: They lost the election.

Mr. Laing: We heard it all over again in Vancouver. The Leader of the Opposition had been in the United Kingdom a short time previously and when he said to his audience in Vancouver that we want to re-establish contacts with the mother country he was speaking to a receptive audience, and he knew it. There is great thought, there is great hope in our province for the mother country. He said it was not good enough to say that we could not conduct business between the United Kingdom and Canada. He said that if a trigger-happy Russian soldier were to start a third world war we would find a way in two weeks. Of course we would find a way. We would find the identical way we found in the last war, by loans and gifts, because I am now convinced that all of us on the free side of the world will quickly act as firemen if a fire starts in the house of any one of us.

But what contribution is that to the idea of trade, not aid? We want something better than that. As a matter of fact I never expected to hear such a comment in our city from the leader of the Conservative party. We have been hearing that kind of stuff for years from the leaders of the provincial group of the C.C.F. party. We have been hearing that we will not have any prosperity unless we get involved in a capitalistic war. That is what the C.C.F. provincial leadership has been telling us for a long time. Well, we are going to have trade and not aid. The very nature of trade makes it a two-way street, and I think that is a fact that has been lost on the members of the Conservative party in this house. We cannot bring meat from England. They eat meat but they do not produce it. They have no wheat. They import wheat. If we are going to trade with the United Kingdom we must be prepared to take the things that they are best adapted to give us, textiles.

I want to quote certain remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), a man for whom I have the greatest respect. On March 7, 1952, he stated in the house that Great Britain is the chief exporter of woollen goods to Canada, and has now obtained an increasing share of our domestic market amounting to 86 per cent of all imports. He also said, as found at page 209 of Hansard:

> A great percentage of the wool fabrics that have been imported into Canada came from Great Britain, and there is no control or restriction on the volume of these imports.

Trade, not aid; but as soon as the old mother country sends us the things that she is most capable of giving us we raise once again the cry that once resounded in this house, tariffs as high as Haman's gallows.

I was most interested in a speech made in the house the other night by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) dealing with sugar and tobacco. He wants neither sugar nor tobacco brought into this country but ample protection given for Canadian production of both. In that he is joined by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who advised me yesterday that he wanted some protection for sugar, and he is going to let me know how much at a later date. The hon. member for Lambton West had a great deal to say about sugar, and there was another time when he had a great deal to say about the cost of living in this country. In the house on February 8, 1951, when the cry of the Tory party was that the government had better get busy and do something about inflation and the rising cost of living, the hon. member for Lambton West had this to say, as found at page 189 of Hansard:

> It is the story of the housewife in Sarnia and in Ottawa, in Winnipeg and in Vancouver, who daily is fighting a losing battle against the rising cost of living. And for the housewife with a family of small children it is a bitter struggle as the household dollar shrinks to the point where food has to be sacrificed in order to buy clothes, or clothes have to be sacrificed in order that enough can be provided the family to eat. Here again the federal government stubbornly refuses to translate into action facts as they exist.

He was full of tears that night for the consumers of Canada. As the result of actions of this government, what has happened to prices? I now wish to refer to the Toronto Star of November 22, 1952, with respect to what prices are doing. Sugar was $10.30 a hundred pounds in November, 1951, and it is now $8.60. Does the hon. member for Lambton West deplore the fact that sugar has come down from $10.30 to $8.60? Does he want it to be protected so that it will go back from $8.60 to $10.30?

An hon. Member: Certainly.

Mr. Laing: Is that the attitude of the hon. member for Lethbridge too? So far as the hon. member for Lethbridge is concerned, I have told him privately since he spoke yesterday that it is my opinion that the farmers in his area who are producing sugar are doing exceptionally well. I am told that every year when the company opens its offices for quotas there is a line-up and many are turned away because capacity does not exist to the extent that the people in that area want to grow sugar beets.

Mr. Blackmore: Canada wants to keep it that way too.

Mr. Laing: Well, I don't know.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, I do.

Mr. Laing: I think the consumers of Canada, for whom hon. members on the other side of the house were so solicitous in 1951, require something of a break too.

I want to deal with some utter inconsistencies that have existed on the other side of the house. We have talked about exports, and when we come to make exports available in this country somebody on that side of the house says, "Do not expect anything; keep it all here to build up this country." That has been the cry. On May 9, 1950, the Leader of the Opposition said, as found at page 2327 of Hansard:

> We may withdraw nickel, copper or iron from the soil. We may refine it and send it in bulk to the United States, to the United Kingdom or to any other country in the world; and we have received the money for what we have produced . . . But as to power, we are not only exporting a commodity, something that comes from the soil; we are exporting the thing which in turn produces products of other kinds.

Then, I quote from the Ottawa Journal of October 18, 1952, an article reporting a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition at Nipigon. This is the headline, "Drew wants resources used for benefit of people of Canada".

Mr. Fulton: Don't you?

Mr. Laing: To what an admirable degree we are doing just that today. We are using those resources for the benefit of the people of Canada. My hon. friend says "Don't you?". I came here to point out some of the inconsistencies, and how inconsistent that statement of the Leader of the Opposition is with a statement made in this house the other night by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle). The hon. member quoted Mr. Ash, president of the Shell Oil Company, and recommended that gentleman's speech to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. The hon. member was in favour of the immediate export of both gas and oil from his province. There is nothing very consistent about the whole plan. The arrows point nowhere.

I come now to iron ore. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is not in his seat. We are exporting iron ore from British Columbia to Japan at the rate of about 100,000 tons per month. The hon. member has called it a scandal and a disgrace. What is the situation with respect to that iron ore? The Japanese came out of the conflict with a steel capacity of about 10 million tons. It was decided by the people on our side that it was imperative that that capacity be used to its full extent. Japan formerly drew its ore from Korea and the mainland, and with that source entirely cut off they are taking iron ore from British Columbia today on a basis that is not economic. They are paying $8 or $8.50 a ton for the ore and they are paying over $12 a ton for the freight. The United States, which our friends see as a dangerous country to deal with and a country of which we should beware, is subsidizing the economy of Japan to the extent of $700 million annually to keep Japan out of the sphere of red China.

Unless we make a study of our position, I do not see how we can have a policy in this country in respect to trade. The hit and miss style I have heard coming from the other side I think might well place Canada, if these people came to power, in one of the most dangerous positions in which Canada has ever been.

Today trade is difficult. It is based fundamentally on conciliation, and if you are going to say to someone, "Keep your goods, we will not buy them but we demand a market for ours," then this trade situation which is very critical in the world today could be delivered into disaster.

Mr. Brooks: That is what we are doing with Great Britain.

Mr. Laing: I am quoting from the supporters of the same leader that my hon. friend supports. If he wants to read Hansard and the various points that they have made, I do not think he will find much continuity of thought in it. As a matter of fact, it was only last session that my hon. friend was advocating we should keep all the resources within Canada. I asked him a question then as to how he would apply that to the importation of bauxite for the production of aluminum. His reply was, "Well, if other countries want to act that way, that is all right, but Canada should keep her own resources".

Well, there is a very great story to tell in the development of just that question, and I want to deal with it for just a moment. We have a number of items which are of considerable importance to us, one of which is petroleum. Where would Canada have been during the war had she not the co-operation of the United States government in shipping petroleum? Our production today is going ahead by leaps and bounds, but where would we be today without imports of petroleum? Today we are bringing in petroleum at the rate of $158 million per annum from the United States, and to a greater extent from other countries.

Mr. Fulton: Where do you stand on the pipe line question? On both sides of it, as usual?

Mr. McIlraith: Which pipe line is the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) talking about?

Mr. Laing: What about the bauxite to which my hon. friend referred?

Mr. Brooks: They have not the hydro power with which to develop it in those countries, and that is why it is selling here.

Mr. Laing: We have not got bauxite. We have the power and the intelligence to make aluminum. In the last year we bought 2·5 million tons of bauxite.

Mr. Brooks: We have the hydro power which those people have not.

Mr. Fulford: There is plenty of hydro power in British Guiana, but not developed.

Mr. Laing: This bauxite was not of very great value, but the resultant aluminum which we shipped out of this country constituted one of our greatest exports.

Then, in our province of British Columbia we have the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, with one of the greatest fertilizer plants in the world.

Mr. Brooks: And great hydro power.

Mr. Laing: We have great hydro power there, and we have the intelligence there to make fertilizer. We have not any phosphate rock in the Dominion of Canada, at least none of commercial values to date which could be used in the making of ammonium phosphate, phosphoric acid or superphosphates. Last year we brought in from the state of Montana 500,000 tons of raw rock phosphate. It was worth only seven dollars a ton and the import cost was $3·5 million. We shipped back to the United States 118,000 tons of ammonium phosphate worth $7·5 million. In addition to that, out of the raw phosphate rock we made 100,000 tons of ammonium phosphate for the Canadian prairies to produce more wheat. In addition to that, we exported some 75,000 tons abroad.

Mr. Brooks: How much did we get from the United States?

Mr. Laing: If my hon. friend wants to make a speech, he can make one after I am through.

An hon. Member: He has made his, such as it was.

Mr. Brooks: Yes; and the hon. member made a great one too.

Mr. Laing: If the attitude of my hon. friend were to prevail in this house, he would say: "We will take all the advantages and we will deny you any entry of your goods".

Mr. Brooks: No. I never said that.

Mr. Laing: That attitude could lead only to retaliation; and in a world of retaliation I think this young country of 14½ million people probably would have more to lose than would any other country.

An hon. Member: R. B. Bennett found that out, too.

Mr. Laing: I am glad of the interjection dealing with Mr. R. B. Bennett. I must return again to my good friend the hon. member for Lambton West, who spoke in this house on November 28. He made a statement that I never thought I would hear a Tory utter. As reported at page 187, he said:

> In the early 1930's we did have action by the then Conservative government, when the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was prime minister of this country. We face the same situation today and we still have the same remedies.

In 1932 the entire trade of Canada was a little bit over $1 billion. This year it is $8 billion. But the hon. member wants to return to 1932! In that year the receipts of the federal government were a little bit more than one-fifteenth of what they are today. They were operating on deficit financing and the deficit in one of those years was a little bit greater than the surplus produced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last year.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman knows that was an inheritance from the 1928 Liberal policies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laing: I cannot do better than commend to the hon. member's attention the words of the hon. member for Lambton West to the effect that we have the same conditions and the same remedies.

Mr. Fulton: Go and read the bureau of statistics figures and you will see that situation was inherited from the 1928 Liberal policies. That fact has been proven over and over again.

An hon. Member: How about making a speech?

Mr. Fulton: I will.

An hon. Member: Hire a hall.

Mr. Laing: Positive things have been done in recent years by this country in the matter of trade. I am not going to stand up here and say that every fine thing that has been done in the matter of trade has been done by this government. If conditions were different, however, there are those on the other side of the house who would be prepared to take the opposite argument. This I do say, however. With the precarious nature of trade today, with a condition in the world where reconciliation and conciliation are necessary at all times, I think Canada has been fortunate to have as its Minister of Trade and Commerce a man of whom, in spite of the fact that he seemingly has arrived at the position where he is not greatly influenced by either praise or blame, it will be said, when the history of his times is written, that the contribution he made was at least as great as that made by any other Canadian.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the mover, (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their speeches were well prepared and well delivered. It is my intention today to devote my time to a discussion of the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The subamendment reads as follows:

> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed: (a) To recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial administration; (b) to implement their proposals to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945.

It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this matter will be freely debated in this house and that all members will express their opinions concerning a question of such vital importance.

During the time that I have been a member of this house I have advocated a plan of health insurance and in consideration of statistics involving mortality rates, incidence of disease, hospital accommodation, preventive measures and other considerations relating to this subject, I have frequently expressed impatience that we were not proceeding more rapidly to a solution of a matter so vital to our nation.

I regard this subject as of such grave importance that I hope there will be in no way any political shadow-boxing either in this chamber or in the forthcoming general elections. There is no doubt of the necessity of additional health measures, but we must have a clear understanding of the whole situation and the measures necessary to remedy and to correct inadequacies of our present situation.

It is a trait of human nature that man should be concerned about the physical well-being of his family; and there exists in the mind of every citizen the fear of sickness and suffering in his immediate circle. Sickness or accident may invade any member of the family—the breadwinner, the mother or the children. But when for financial reasons medical services cannot be secured, the fear becomes intensified and becomes a matter of constant worry. The consideration of health services should not be a dull routine discussion in the House of Commons. Serious consideration to measures which would give proper assurance against the recurring fear of uncertainty in the ability of all citizens to obtain adequate treatment should be the concern of any government that has regard for the happiness of the people.

The most important asset of any country is its people. There can be only one sound foundation upon which a happy and prosperous nation can be built, namely, the good health of its members. This should be the primary concern of government. The ultimate objective of various departments of health should be to bring to everyone an equal opportunity to attain physical and mental health regardless of race, economic status or geographical position.

There are certain factors that are necessary to a proper health program. I place these factors as follows: One, sufficient hospitals and other institutions concerned with the care of those members of the nation who are ill; two, sufficient doctors, nurses, and trained personnel to carry out a full and complete program; three, diagnostic and preventive facilities; four, research; five, an educational program in order that the plan may receive the support of the public; six and last, but most important, government aid and direction.

The position in which we find ourselves in Canada is not one that we can view with complacency regarding our national health. Much has been accomplished, but much remains to be done before we can feel satisfied that we have corrected all existing deficiencies.

Let us give consideration to our present situation. The cost of medical care has increased tremendously in the past twenty years, as new methods of diagnosis and treatment have been discovered. However, these new methods of diagnosis have resulted in the successful treatment of diseases that were formerly considered incurable. The costs of medical services are increasing, but the ability of the people to pay for these services has not increased.

Medical science is making great strides, but the application of some of those discoveries has not been made available to all our people. It is the duty of the community and of the state to care for the unfortunate who are unable to seek and procure proper attention. It is unfortunate that people in the lower salaries who formerly were able to pay are no longer able to do so on account of the high and increasing costs of hospitalization and treatment. Even in the most severe illnesses, they cannot afford the necessities such as special nurses and hospital service. Unless an illness is acute, these people are forced to neglect chronic conditions for financial reasons.

Family allowances have done much for children, but it is regrettable that children belonging to those families cannot have defects corrected at a time when such correction would be of most benefit to them. It is most important that we develop good citizens in Canada, since the future of the nation depends on the physical, mental and moral health of our youth. The necessity of the physical health of our young men was brought sharply to our attention during the last war when over 40 per cent of our young men did not measure up to the required standards at the time of enlistment.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay a tribute to those serving on boards of hospital administration throughout Canada. Faced with mounting costs of maintenance, and almost prohibitive costs of new construction, they have endeavoured to meet those additional expenses and provide accommodation for their patients at a daily rate as low as possible. In this they have not been successful. The costs to the patients have risen to a point where sickness is getting beyond the financial means of the average citizen.

In view of the marked shortage of beds in some areas, it has been necessary to place patients on a waiting list for weeks and even months. I pay tribute to the staffs of the hospitals, and especially to the doctors, both in their practices in and outside hospitals. To their credit let it be said that they have not hesitated to give freely of their service without recompense. I especially mention the general practitioners, who made it a point of pride that no cases requiring attention should go unattended.

It should be pointed out that while doctors charge their patients who can pay, they also provide free attention to those who cannot pay. Unfortunately the public does not give the doctor credit for the large amount of service given gratis.

There are few hospitals which do not have a deficit at the end of each financial year. Often hospital boards attempt to make up this deficit by an appeal for voluntary support. Both in the financial help required and in the number of appeals in the past few years, it is doubtful whether the general public can satisfy this need, in view of the higher living costs and higher taxes. The heavy expenses incurred by hospitals, and to which these deficits are accountable, are largely in providing public ward accommodation and diagnostic services, in addition to the general costs of maintenance of the whole hospital. This places a heavy burden on the patient who pays for private or semi-private rooms. While considering hospital costs and accommodation, we must mention the number of chronic cases occupying beds which could very well be used for the treatment of acute cases. Unfortunately, there is very little in the way of hospitals in Canada for chronic cases. General hospitals in most areas are the only accommodation. These patients occupy active treatment beds for long periods at considerable expense, and cause a shortage of hospital beds for acute cases. The shortage of hospital beds exists in many provinces in spite of hospital grants as in Ontario, my own province, where the province and the dominion both give grants for new hospital construction on a rate per bed. But even with these grants, rising construction costs overcome the grants and these grants, while a help, are insufficient.

It is true that the federal government has made grants toward construction of a large number of hospital beds since the introduction of the health plans in 1948. These grants amount to $1,000 per bed for acute cases, and $1,500 per bed for chronic cases. When the late prime minister, Mr. King, introduced health grants in the House of Commons he said, as reported in Hansard of May, 1948, at page 3934:

> The proposed hospital construction grants represent only a portion of the costs of hospital construction. The balance will have to be met by provincial grants and by local funds from other sources.

There has been a sharp rise in building costs since that time. Building costs vary in different areas, but I am informed that in one Ontario city contemplating further hospital extension, the cost per bed has been estimated at $15,000. Allowing for the federal grant and the grant which will come from the province, this will leave a sum of approximately $1,300,000 to be financed by the province and the municipality.

I have mentioned hospitals for chronic cases and the fact that we are faced with a shortage of beds for this type of case. Owing to the introduction of new treatment, our population is increasing in the older age groups.

New treatment is making our population longer-lived. Diseases such as pneumonia, which afflicted so many people in advanced age and rated high in the list of the causes of death, is no longer such a menace. But it is natural that old people should ultimately become afflicted with some form of invalidism requiring institutional care. Not only old people but many in the younger age groups require care for chronic conditions. At present there is a shortage of beds for such cases and they become a problem for the hospitals requiring beds for the acute cases. Cancer cases may be included in this group requiring a long period of hospitalization.

Cancer may be regarded as the greatest problem facing medical research today, and any attack we make on this problem must be a long-term attack. Education must be an important factor. An educational program should emphasize not only early symptoms but ability to procure early treatment.

We must see to it that opportunities for early treatment and diagnosis are made available to every patient. In the last year for which I was able to obtain statistics, 16,258 people in Canada died of this disease. Better and more extensive facilities are required if we are to bring this terrible disease under some semblance of control. But the real tragedy of the fact lies in this, that many of these cases occurred because the disease was not recognized in its early stages, when a cure could have been effected. Although the number of cases of tuberculosis is slowly being lessened, yet we must not believe that a disease which caused over 4,000 deaths in the last year is under control. Not only is hospital care for this disease expensive, but it is a disease of early adult life, and occurs in the most productive age group.

In consideration of the mortality of 4,000 cases in the last year, we must also remember the thousands of people who have been cured, and the fact that this disease is a menace to our population.

We can be proud of our progress in maternal mortality, but our infant mortality rates are much higher as compared with other countries. A high percentage of these deaths occurred in the first month of life. In 1948, the last year for which I was able to obtain statistics, 3,892 babies died because of premature. Excellent results have been obtained in handling premature cases, but such care is not available to all mothers. The infant mortality rate for Canada was 44 last year per thousand live births. I shall give the rate per province, because there is a variation in it. That information is as follows:

	Infant mortality rate per province
New Brunswick	61
Quebec	54
Nova Scotia	39
Manitoba	41
Saskatchewan	40
Alberta	39
Prince Edward Island	34
Ontario	35
British Columbia	33

And now, with the rate in Canada of 44 per thousand live births in mind, it would be interesting to hon. members to compare that with the world rate, which is as follows:

	Infant mortality rate
Iceland	22
New Zealand (including the Maoris)	22
Sweden	23
Australia	28
Netherlands	29
Norway	30
United States	32
England and Wales	34
Denmark	35
Israel (Jewish population)	35
Switzerland	36
Union of South Africa (whites)	37
Northern Ireland	45
Scotland	45
Ireland	49
Panama	50
France	51
Finland	52
Belgium	59
Spain	59
Italy	70
Austria	76
Japan	76
Ceylon	92
Costa Rica	92
Jamaica	92
El Salvador	96
Hungary	111
Bulgaria	130
Chile	160
Roumania	199

I would draw attention particularly to the rate in the United States as compared with that in Canada.

The number of deaths in Canada of children under five years of age was 17,899. Many of these cases were the result of communicable disease; yet a comparison of several years' statistics shows that there are wide variations between provinces.

[Mr. Blair.]

Several years ago, when I was speaking in this chamber regarding our infant mortality rates, I made the statement that these babies were the best immigrants that Canada could procure. They are the descendants of those sturdy people responsible for the building of our nation. Canada can ill afford to lose them.

It is not my purpose to elaborate upon statistics of all mortality rates in diseases, but I have mentioned these for the purpose of showing the further need for action in Canada. I could also mention the high and increasing incidence of mental disease and, again, the shortage of beds for these cases.

According to a recent statement by the bureau of statistics, the number of cases in mental institutions has increased proportionately by nearly 31 per cent in the last twenty years. The first survey since 1931 shows that 394 out of every 100,000 are patients in mental institutions. This shows an increase of 93 from the former figure of 301 per 100,000 registered in the 1931 census. These statistics are disturbing and we must take every means to lower these percentages. Hospital beds must be available, staffed with psychiatrists and trained personnel. Let me summarize our needs as follows:

1. Hospital beds for—

(a) acute cases; (b) chronic cases; (c) mental illness.

2. Adequate provision for early diagnosis and early treatment of cancer.

3. Relief to our people from the high costs of treatment, especially from the high cost of hospitalization.

4. Extension of program to train more personnel to staff hospitals, especially facilities to provide trained nurses.

5. Further program to cut down infant and child mortality rate.

If any health plan is undertaken it is essential to have a sufficient number of beds and sufficient personnel trained to carry out such a scheme. To anyone present who is satisfied with our present conditions, let me again refer him to the fact that such a large number of our young men were unfit for service in the last war. During my time in the House of Commons I have almost yearly pleaded for a health plan to overcome these drawbacks to our nation. In 1949 I made the following statement on behalf of the party and the position taken by it. This statement, as reported at page 1154 of Hansard for Friday, March 4, 1949, and which still stands as our policy, is as follows:

This party has long realized the necessity for a plan of health in the Dominion of Canada. Let there be no doubt where this party stands on that now. We stand in favour of a plan which, in co-operation with the provinces, will give the people the maximum of services, and yet be a plan of freedom, where the doctors will not be civil servants, and which will allow free choice between doctor and patient. We have got a full realization of the deficiencies in treatment services, and we stand ready to implement a plan to overcome these deficiencies, and which will raise health standards in Canada to the equal of that in any other country of the world.

All political parties in this house are committed to health insurance. The Liberal party promised health insurance in 1919. Since that time, they have never at any time suggested that they did not stand by that promise, but on the contrary have reasserted it on a number of occasions. It is appropriate to point out that it would be unfortunate if any promises were made, in addition to those which already have been made, which could not be carried into effect.

The present government placed certain general proposals regarding a national health program before the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. These proposals may be found in the blue book relating to national health insurance, which was placed before that conference. Discussion of that part of the proposals did not proceed in any detail, because the government emphasized the fact that this could not be proceeded with until there was a full and general examination of this problem. That has been the position of the government, and it is for this reason that we have been pressing for some years to have an inquiry of this nature take place, which will provide the basic information without which no satisfactory plan for Canada can be developed.

Health grants were brought into effect in 1948. We gladly voted for these grants on the ground that any money voted for health purposes would help in some degree to cut down mortality and relieve suffering and misery. We felt that in many ways the grants were insufficient and only a stopgap to avoid dealing with a broader problem. Let me make this clear. We recognize that any health plan may accomplish some good, but at the same time by objectional features may not give return for the money expended, or may disturb certain relationships which should be retained if the plan is to meet with success.

For the safety of the state we have made commitments of $5 billion for defence. We require large sums for social security measures already in effect. Any political party which recommends the inauguration of a health plan must display a sense of responsibility and should not attempt to obtain political support by deliberately overlooking the difficulties in the way.

Let me emphasize that we stand for the introduction of a contributory health plan. When we form a government we will proceed with contributory national health insurance. But we think it should be carefully planned.

In the event of total war, there would be added a tremendous burden of taxes in addition to our already heavy commitments. The safety of Canada must rank first in our expenditures. In the process of development of a young nation there will be other expenditures of a nature vital to our growth and expansion. But we must realize also that medical science has infinitely more to give than the people receive. Professor Sigerist of the Johns Hopkins university has stated:

> We could eliminate venereal diseases in a couple of years at the cost of one or two battleships, but we are not doing so.

We have solved more difficult economic problems in the past. When we are attacked by an enemy we can raise the money we need. Disease is also an enemy. It may have a less spectacular attack, but it is just as pernicious as actual warfare. We can find the funds to fight to a victorious end this war against disease and misery.

In view of the fact that the high cost of sickness and hospitalization is becoming beyond the financial means of our people, for the safety and benefit of the state we must eliminate deficiencies in our present health situation and lay the groundwork for a plan of national health. There has been too much glib talk about such a plan without getting down to certain basic and essential considerations. We hear statements from time to time that the reason health insurance is not introduced in Canada is that there are insufficient beds to carry out such a plan. When such a statement has been made there should also be added another potent reason—that health is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

The following steps are necessary before any plan can be brought into effect. Any political statement that does not take these steps into consideration is futile.

1. Under the British North America Act, except for marine and military services, health is under the control of the provinces. There must be no interference with that right.

2. Before any plan can be brought into effect there must be further consultations with and between the dominion and the provinces, and agreement reached. It will be necessary to make financial agreements and allocation of funds.

3. There must be a thorough investigation in advance as regards the best type of plan.

4. The plan must meet the approval of municipal and provincial authorities. Medical authorities must be fully consulted, as to a large degree success of the plan rests with their approval.

We should proceed to lay the groundwork of the plan by calling a dominion-provincial conference and open discussions. I believe that all provinces are willing and anxious to better health conditions in their respective provinces, provided there is no interference with their rights to control health services. There should be a thorough investigation of conditions in addition to the mass of information already accumulated.

Because of the fact that municipalities are today so gravely concerned about their increasing obligations in connection with the construction of new hospital accommodation, and also the maintenance of existing hospitals, I have stated that the municipalities should have a part in any discussions that take place. Municipalities gain their power and existence through provincial legislation. The municipalities are the authorities mostly concerned with the responsibility of assuring that the hospitals continue to operate on a satisfactory scale. For this reason I would strongly emphasize their place in any preliminary discussions and in the steps which will lead up to satisfactory agreements.

As for the type of plan, let me state that some of the prepaid plans already in existence are unsatisfactory. Other plans are rendering excellent service. Very often people do not read the clauses in their contract, sometimes in small print, and find themselves where they are not fully covered for insurance. The hon. leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) stated in his speech that the plan already in existence in England would be satisfactory.

Mr. Coldwell: Satisfactory there, I said.

Mr. Blair: This plan is unsatisfactory. It is a plan with a very heavy drain on the treasury. Owing to the socialistic nature of this scheme, it is arbitrary, with features unsuitable to this country. In any plans for Canada it is essential that doctors be not civil servants, and the fine relationship between doctor and patient must be preserved. There must be a free choice and it must be a plan of freedom. It is quite plain that the subamendment favours a plan of state medicine. It is also plain that consultations with the provinces must be the first step, followed thereafter by legislation. We are in favour of a contributory health insurance plan for this country, and that we proceed to lay the groundwork for the plan as our finances permit; yet we must be careful of the choice we make. Under these circumstances we cannot support the subamendment.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of this opportunity to take part in this debate as there are one or two things I should like to draw to the attention of the government. Before I do that may I say that I support the amendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell). As the subamendment has been read two or three times I shall not read it again.

I think it is safe to say that national health insurance is long overdue. It was in the platform of the Liberal party in 1919 and has been discussed many times since. The government and other organizations have compiled about 40 reports in the last 30 years dealing with national health plans.

National health insurance is not something new. As a matter of fact many countries have had national health plans for a great many years. These countries are Norway, Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. Of the larger countries only three are without health insurance, namely, Canada, the United States and Australia; but Australia has a hospitalization plan of some kind. I had the privilege of meeting a group of parliamentarians from all over the commonwealth, and while we discussed many subjects naturally health insurance in the United Kingdom was one of the things we discussed. I talked with different members about the plan they have. There was general agreement that, while there might have been some difficulties in the plan when it was first introduced, it was today not only the most popular piece of legislation in the United Kingdom but also the most beneficial.

When we think of the various organizations that over the last several years have asked for a national health scheme or plan for this country, we find that they make a very impressive list. We have several representative organizations such as the federation of agriculture and other farm organizations, both national labour congresses—the American Federation of Labor and the Canadian Congress of Labour—the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, the railway transportation brotherhoods, the Canadian Legion, the board of evangelism of the United Church of Canada and numerous other organizations which have all asked for a national health plan.

It seems to me that if other countries can provide their people with health insurance there is no reason why Canada should lag behind. Travelling throughout the country one meets very few people who have anything against health insurance. One runs up against the problem sometimes of where the money is going to come from. When we consider the cost of a national health plan we should remember that it will not be a new expense for the nation. We are already spending vast sums on health services which are inadequate. It is estimated that Canadians spent $500 million for medical and hospital bills last year, and our government spent $175 million for various health services. Altogether therefore the Canadian people, as individuals and as governments, spent approximately $675 million. That is something that people should remember, especially those who criticize health insurance on the ground that it would cost too much.

Health insurance would replace the amounts spent by individuals and would replace a large portion of the present expenditures by federal and provincial governments. The C.C.F. believes that the bulk of the cost can likely be met out of present budget surpluses and that there need not be any substantial increase in taxes to pay for it. However, if it is found necessary to make special financial provision to meet some of the cost the C.C.F. believes that the supplementary amount should be raised by a social security contribution graduated according to ability to pay.

I could go on longer, Mr. Speaker, dealing with this subject but I think it has been pretty well covered and I have some other items that I want to place before the government. Some time ago I saw in the Winnipeg papers that Mr. Patterson had resigned from the board of transport commissioners in order to become lieutenant governor of the province of Saskatchewan. I watched the papers to see who would get his job on the board, and in due time I saw the announcement by the minister that Mr. Matthews of Kingston had been appointed. At the time I thought that was funny, an easterner taking a westerner's job, but I waited. I thought that perhaps there were too many westerners already members of the board, but later I found that there is only one western man on it.

It is a disgrace that western Canada has only one representative on the board of transport commissioners. I made it my business to find out who the members of the board are and I have the information here. The chief commissioner is the Hon. Mr. Justice John D. Kearney of Montreal. The assistant chief commissioner is Hugh Wardrope of Hamilton, Ontario. The deputy chief commissioner is Armand Sylvestre of Quebec. The commissioners are Frank M. MacPherson from Ontario, but thank goodness he can represent the west because he spent twenty-five years there. He knows the western train of thought. Then there is Howard B. Chase of Ottawa and the gentleman who took Mr. Patterson's place, O. A. Matthews, Q.C.

I think it is terrible that there should be only one westerner on the board. We had two but one left and another easterner was appointed. We of the west, who bear the brunt of any freight rate increases, have only one representative on the board. I do not think that is fair. Central Canada is sitting in a fine position so far as rates are concerned, because rates are lowered to meet truck and water competition. With five members of the board coming from Ontario or Quebec, it is just not good enough for the western people.

Mr. Brooks: How about the maritimes?

Mr. Bryce: And the maritimes too. I have a big enough job fighting for the westerners without fighting for the maritimers but I can assure those who come from the maritimes that I am sympathetic to them. You have no representation whatever on the board and we have only one member who comes from British Columbia. Then there are Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta which, as I said before, bear the brunt of any increases in freight rates made by the board.

Mr. Brooks: Most unfair.

Mr. Bryce: The west wants a square deal so far as representation on the board of transport commissioners is concerned. The minister may tell me that the act does not say where a man must live in order to be a member of the board, but it is only common sense that the west should have representation. This sort of thing creates disunity in Canada. It creates the impression that we are a country of two parts, the haves and the have-nots. Continued high freight rates can easily lead to a depressed economy in western Canada. Such a calamity should be headed off by the government immediately pending the appointment of additional western representatives on the board of transport commissioners so the western point of view can be given adequate consideration.

I have another matter I want to raise at this time and that is the question of the war veterans allowance. I have been requested to do so by the Legion branches in my constituency. The minister certainly did something for members who asked for an increase because the pensions were increased last year from $40 to $50 for a single veteran and from $70 to $90 for a married veteran.

Mr. Brooks: The war veterans allowance.

Mr. Bryce: Yes. The recommendation was made by the Legion that the rates should be $60 and $120. When you consider the cost of living today, and then consider what you paid for the same things when the pensions were set, I think you will realize that the Legion is not asking for too much. Many cases could be cited in which the circumstances warrant a much higher pension. I have in mind a veteran who is paralysed on one side and unable to work. One of his girls is training to be a nurse, and she receives only $5 per month. He has two other children for whom to provide. With an income of only $90 per month, this family must do some real planning to exist. The Canadian Legion's request has been a reasonable one, and speaking as a member of the Legion I think it should have further consideration.

I want to call attention to a matter that I raised last year. I spoke about the sewage disposal system at Roblin Park subdivision in my constituency. The department was good enough to make an investigation, but the engineer who was employed to make the investigation was the engineer who laid out the scheme in the first place. Surely the V.L.A. did not expect Mr. Scott, the engineer, to condemn his own work. If I hired someone to build a house and the occupants were not satisfied with the work done, it would be of no value to ask the man who built the house in the first place if he had done a good job. I am sure the same thing would be true in this case. Mr. Scott did the work in the first place, and having inspected the work is satisfied. In section 18 of his report he says:

> With intelligent operation and maintenance therefor, I am of the opinion that these sewage disposal systems will give satisfactory service—as they did during the first years of operation. They need first however to be cleaned and freed of obstructions. Many an owner with a pump (a necessity) and hose and a few tools could do most of this work himself.

It is difficult to understand, after reading Mr. Scott's report, how he determines that this sewage system is in good shape, in view of the quality of the gravel and the distribution of the fluid throughout the field. Some digging was done and an examination of the laterals was conducted, but that was all that was done at Roblin Park. I understand that at some of the other places they did more.

In paragraph 4 Mr. Scott states that some of these tanks have given trouble-free service for from two to five years. About twenty disposal fields were frozen during the winter of 1946-47, which was the first year of operation. The number of frozen systems has steadily increased every year.

In paragraph 13, Mr. Scott states that his inspection revealed that in practically every case the drainage tile was partly filled, and in some case completely plugged, with material which seemed to be tea leaves, coffee grounds and other such materials which did not disintegrate. Such materials should be classed as garbage and burned. At the time of the inspection the veterans requested the V.L.A. officials to have laboratory tests made to ascertain what really was in the pipes. I can find some of these veterans who would swear on a stack of bibles that they never put tea leaves or coffee grounds in that system.

I have some photographs here that I wanted to show the minister, but evidently he has stepped out of the house. When they dug up some of these fields they found that in some places the pipe was crushed by a stone. When the pipe is crushed flat it could not possibly allow the sewage through. In one case a hole was dug at the end of the lateral and then one of these roto-rooters was used. It was discovered that one pipe was about four inches below the other pipe. How could you expect such a system to work. This just shows the folly of sending a man who did the work in the first place to see if it works all right. If the department wants to do the fair thing for the veterans, they will send somebody else to look into it.

The following is a description of what was found at one residence:

> Residence of H. A. Putman, 277 Pepperloaf Crescent—(1) Second lateral on the south side, removed piece of broken tile and after roto-rooter passed through and completely cleared the lateral. Level of this lateral too high to allow water to show at end when tank flushes.
> (2) Third lateral on the south side cleared by roto-rooter. Also too high of level to show any water when tank flushes.

If I might explain, I would say that the tile is laid in a trench. The end of the trench next to the house is lower, so the water remains there and freezes. In another case the tile was laid in soft soil instead of hard-packed soil so that it would hold its position. The fill used was unsatisfactory because sand and large stones were used instead of the crushed stone. In some cases a test was made by plugging one end of the tile, and then when the tank was flushed no water appeared. This shows that the tile is not properly set. No purpose is served by going over all these cases, because they show the same thing. I was delighted when the minister said he would investigate the matter. I thought I had done something for the veterans. The investigation consisted of digging a hole, but the veterans are still pumping sewage out in that district.

Someone said the minister just came in, but I do not see him. I hope he will come in because I should like to talk to him about this matter. I do not know how long these conditions are going to continue. I do not know how long the provincial sanitary authorities are going to tolerate this condition in a district in which children are playing. I visited these homes before I left and found the men pumping out sewage. You may ask where they pump it. They pump it on to the next fellow's land and then he pumps it on to the next fellow's. The area used to be an old hay swamp, and the land is water-soaked. The soil will not absorb the sewage. I appeal to the minister to do something about this problem to assure the veterans a square deal. Things cannot go on as they are at the present time at Roblin Park. They need immediate attention. I have obtained these photographs to prove that what I am saying is correct. It is not something that somebody else told me and about which I am exaggerating. I was there. I saw the situation for myself. The actual photographs that were taken are here. A new school was built there, but those who built it certainly made sure that they did not run the sewer into the hay swamp this time. They ran it into the river, and I think that is the solution to this problem. There should be a large sewer system and it should be sent into the river. Nothing was good enough for these follows when they went to fight for us. Now that we have sold them houses, if the sewer system does not work their houses are worth about $1,000 less than they agreed to pay for them.

I want to say something about pork and the reduction in the floor price from 26 to 23 cents per pound which takes place on December 31. That is $4.50 a hog less that the farmer is going to take on January 1 than he will get on December 31. This reduction will certainly hit the small producer. A great many pigs are produced by the small men. It is a sideline with them, and this reduction in the floor price is going to hit them hard.

Another point to consider is that this price cut may actually force many pork producers out of the business altogether. This would result in a shortage, with pork becoming scarce and prices rising again. Is this not contrary to the policy of price stabilization, without which this industry is doomed to failure? Unless parity prices can be guaranteed over a reasonable period of time, enabling the producer to plan his industry, the inevitable result is instability. An inadequate floor price of 23 cents a pound, with no long-term markets assured, is bound to produce instability.

The government refers to this 23 cents as a floor price; but experience in the past has shown that government floor prices often become ceiling prices in actual practice. Indeed, recent experience shows that there is no guarantee that the farm producers will receive even an inadequate floor price set by the government.

All these uncertainties come at a time when it is forecast—and I quote the economic division of the Department of Agriculture—that the net farm income will drop 5 per cent below that of a year ago; for farm operating costs and depreciation charges are higher than they were a year ago. The short-sightedness of the government's policy is illustrated by the fact that it is reducing the floor price two months before the United States embargo on Canadian meats is removed. It was announced by the minister that it will be removed on March 1, 1953. Why does the government not wait to determine what marketing conditions will exist in the United States after March 1? There is no assurance yet that our meat exports to the United States, when resumed, will be under the same conditions that prevailed prior to February 23 last. Indeed there are indications that the shortage of United States supplies which existed at this time last year—and upon which our meat exports depended—may have been substantially made up in the interim by the recent increase in production in that country. One does not have to be a prophet to foresee that once the United States is able to produce to meet its own needs, Canadian meat producers will again experience a loss of markets in that country.

There is also little prospect that the present commonwealth conference, even if it should prove to be a success, will be able to solve overnight the problems that hinder our trade with the United Kingdom. In this connection I wish to emphasize that it is my opinion that our government should take whatever steps are necessary to promote the maximum amount of trade at the earliest possible moment between Canada and the United Kingdom and other sterling countries. Instead of cutting production we should try to get some agreement with the United Kingdom. Get a five-year agreement and set a price. Then producers will know where they are as to price and the outlet for their produce.

Already there are plenty of signs that unless new market outlets for pork are forthcoming in the near future, serious curtailment of pork production will result. In some areas there has been an actual reduction of 30 per cent in sow breedings. I have here a clipping from the Rural Co-operator of November 27, 1952. The heading of the article is "Urges Hog Producers Avoid 'Same Old Stew'" and it reads as follows:

Bruce county survey of hog production from Tara to Port Elgin, and another survey in Carrick have shown a decline of about 30 per cent in sow breedings. These surveys will be taken every six months to direct the production of hogs.

The present drop indicates that if farmers keep the present number of sows they will be able to meet the limited market situation, but if any further breedings occur they will be in the same old stew with too many hogs.

Anybody wishing to take advantage of the 30 per cent decline in production, by breeding a large number of sows, is a short-sighted producer and has more concern for his own interests than the over-all good of the industry.

2 Equals 3

Why feed three sows when you can get just as much money by feeding two? Co-operation is necessary from every producer in trying to gauge our production to meet the market outlets.

The Federation of Agriculture will keep the farmer posted on production survey every six months. If as a result of this, speculators sneak into the business, it will mean that the steady producers will be asking for a controlled production.

The prospects for this important Canadian industry are not bright unless long-term markets with guaranteed stable prices can be obtained. I believe in forward prices. I have seen them in operation in New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain, and the farmers seem to favour them. If we would only try them on some things I think we would see how well they would go here.

I do not wonder why labour is always asking for an advance in wages. If we could stabilize farm prices and guarantee the farmer the same price for five years, with certain qualifications, labour would then have no justification for asking for increased wages. Labour generally asks for increased wages when something has become scarce, when the farmer has not produced enough of it. Then they want higher wages to buy the product at the new prices. Therefore I think forward prices would do a wonderful job for the farmers, and at the same time they would stabilize prices in the whole country.

I should like to have said something about cattle prices, but my time has expired and I shall conclude my remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate our two new colleagues on their excellent speeches in connection with the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) have well maintained the dignity and good reputation of this house. I wish them a very successful parliamentary career.

(Text):

I am moved to enter this debate by the glaring and inconceivable contradictions in the facts and the figures presented by hon. members on the opposite side of the house during the sessions of the present parliament. Their doing so can perhaps be epitomized in the simple statement, that constant demands for large expenditures are made by them on one day, and equally vehement requests for reductions in taxes are made by them the next day. This, Mr. Speaker, is an obvious inconsistency. One cannot, even though he may be possessed of the most ingenious devices, call for increased expenditures and reduced taxes at the same time, and expect to achieve both objectives.

Let us first take a brief look at some of the additional expenditures and payments of large sums of money which have been and are constantly being urged by the hon. members of the opposition. They suggest, for example, that the government spend money for projects they consider so very vital to the interests of the country, such as the setting up of a national peace park—an item of extreme importance—without which our country could not progress. They further suggest that the government spend money to build a wall to protect an island near Toronto from erosion—another very vital matter that calls for expenditures, according to their judgment. They suggest that the government spend large sums of money to build an Alaska railway; to set up a modern merchant marine; to establish a bigger travel bureau and, Mr. Speaker, to give Great Britain a gift of $100 million and an additional credit of $80 million; also that we organize and set up a Pacific peace pact. These are suggestions that have come from the hon. members on the opposite side of the house. All of these they have suggested of their own motion, and in their burst of generosity they urge the government to supplement expenditures which already have been initiated by legislation of this house. They advise the government to increase the subsidies to farmers; to vote huge subsidies for federal aid to education and increase the subsidies to universities. They urge an increase in soldiers' pensions; an increase in old age pensions, and to make greater defence expenditures. Most recent of all, Mr. Speaker, they now urge the government to set up a national health plan.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, and I am certain the government does, too, that there was available sufficient money to do all these things without calling on the taxpayer for the necessary funds. But unfortunately there is no other way of doing so. To provide these funds would require a substantial increase in our national revenue and the consequent imposition of additional taxes. That is very obvious, but the irony of the situation is that with the request for all these things there is an overtone in what the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) yesterday called a symphony, calling for reduced taxes. That is just not possible, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the conductor of this inharmonious symphony knows full well that this music is nothing but an election air.

Why then are the house and the country consistently dunned by the continuous banging upon the bass drum for reduction of taxes? Of course the position taken by the opposition is obviously motivated by a desire to embarrass the government in power rather than to help the people. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) so very appropriately described these tactics in his address to the house on February 12 of last year, when he highlighted for an opposition the typical Tammany Hall precept: Never vote for a tax measure, and never oppose a public expenditure. It is therefore very simple to detect that this constant paradoxical and contradictory position has ominous motives. Is it the welfare of the country that is considered first, or is it the welfare of a political party that is sought?

Political parties must essentially place the interests of the country before the interests of their party. A famous British statesman once said: "My God comes first; my king comes next; my country follows, and then, and only then, my party". It is my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, that the tactics of the hon. gentlemen of the opposition ignore this dictum and disclose a lamentable preference for party interest over the welfare of the country as a whole. That is sad indeed.

Why do they choose to forget the great advances made by our country in every way, and choose instead unjustifiably to harp on trivial, relatively unimportant matters? These manoeuvres, Mr. Speaker, are intended only to befog and obscure the progress of our country, and because of this it is necessary to remind the people again and again of the great achievements that have been attained.

Let the people of Canada judge from the record—from the whole record, Mr. Speaker, and not from incomplete extracts slanted for political purposes. And in looking at the record, Mr. Speaker, I am not so much concerned with the fortuitous and accidental discoveries and the worth of our natural resources; but I do want to look at the record showing the direct results of the planning, ingenuity, foresight, courage and daring of men, men of government, who I admit may not be faultless, but who nevertheless have proven by their accomplishments a perspicacity and judgment which merits the fullest and fairest recognition by all men of justice, irrespective of what side of the house they may sit on.

Referring, for example, to our advances in direct and intimate welfare and benefits to the people of our country, I cite only some of the legislation which our government has enacted: The veterans' charter which, together with subsequent amendments, provides for our heroes and their dependents in a way which is a model, excels similar legislation in any other country in the world. Is this a cause for criticism and for impeding the government's progress? Our legislation on unemployment insurance, family allowances and old age security is such that it challenges similar legislation in any other country, and provides our people with a social welfare program as good as if not better than any in the world. And no other country, Mr. Speaker, within such a short space of time provided its people with better social security legislation. It may hurt politically for our friends to admit this, but as men of honour and truth they cannot help but agree, and admire it. Is this a reason why our government should be criticized, ridiculed and sniped at from every salient?

Now let us have a further look at the record from the international standpoint. Our country, in proportion to its means and population, during the last seven years has done more for the preservation of peace throughout the world than any other country. This is a universally accepted fact. The dedication of our diplomats stands out over that of the diplomats of the entire world in this phase of international relations to the point where the recognition of the world acclaims the wisdom and the sense of justice of our representatives by offering to them the most responsible posts in international councils.

Is this cause for justifiable criticism? Again I emphasize that, as hon. gentlemen, our friends on the opposite side must admit —perhaps with a secret and glowing pride— the soundness of these facts.

All records disclose that our commercial and industrial progress has been truly miraculous and amazing. I use the term miraculous because our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) accomplished what he did notwithstanding the prophets of doom, some of whom sit on the opposition benches and who predicted insurmountable depression, unemployment, hunger, the collapse of our economy, the halting of industry and the impossibility of doing anything advantageous for the people of Canada. But let us see briefly what world opinion thinks of our position today. In this connection I quote an extract from Time magazine of February 4, 1952 where, at page 25, it states:

> Since 1939, Canada has: Quadrupled her national production, made a 50 per cent advance in the Canadian standard of living, raising her average income for a family of four to $4,000 a year—$622 above the corresponding U.S. average, kept her finances in splendid solvency.
> Canada's growing industrial muscle has expanded her world influence to an extent never before achieved by a country of 14 million inhabitants. The swelling flood of foodstuffs, metals, oil, newsprint and goods flowing from her fields, forests, mines and factories has given Canada a position of importance in the free world's councils subordinate only to the U.S. and Britain. Canada now supplies:
>
> More than 90 per cent of the free world's nickel, and an important share of the zinc, copper, aluminum, and other strategic metals for the west's defence.
> Half the world's newsprint; three out of five of the world's newspaper pages are printed on Canada paper.
> A growing share of North America's oil and natural gas from the new-found Alberta fields, the "Texas of the north".
> A substantial supply of uranium for U.S. atomic bombs.
> The world's second-biggest export wheat crop, a source of food for 71 nations.
> Canada's vast area throbs with industrial action.
> This spirit of growing confidence, both at home and abroad, has helped attract an ample supply of fresh capital to keep the boom going. Canadian investors, who were once somewhat timid about their own prospects, last year plowed back a record 22 per cent of their national income into new development. United States, British and Swiss capital is rushing into the bullish Canadian market. American investors have put more than $7 billion into Canada, the heaviest U.S. stake in any foreign country. And the flow is increasing steadily, as Canada shows that she has both the wealth and the men to work it.
> The free nations overseas also look to thriving Canada for assistance. She is the only member besides the U.S. who can pay her own way and help the other eleven countries of the North Atlantic alliance. Canada has already shipped $145·4 million worth of arms to NATO allies and has sent troops to Korea and Europe. But more is expected, and from a nation of Canada's strength and promise, more will surely come.

I should like to add that similar opinions in various forms have been expressed repeatedly in leading financial, commercial and industrial publications in most of the democratic countries of the world. That is what the world thinks of the achievements of our government, and the present position of our country. Well, the right hon. minister has performed the impossible. I am reminded of a quip which was produced in a reply by an Israeli when he was questioned, in wondrous amazement, about the things being done by his little country which appeared impossible. He was asked, "How do you manage to do all these things? Some of them are impossible; the other things are extremely difficult." "Ah", replied the Israeli, "we have a system. First of all we do the impossible things, and then when we have a little more time we do the difficult ones." That, perhaps, is the secret weapon of our efficient minister. First of all he does the things that seem impossible, the things that hon. members on the other side of the house thought were impossible, and when he has a little spare time he does the difficult things.

There is the record on this level. Can these accomplishments and achievements be criticized justifiably? Is this not a truly miraculous record of progress? Should this not provoke the admiration of hon. members of the opposition, if they considered the welfare of the country before the welfare of their party? What, then, is the resultant status of these prophets of doom when, in the face of their predictions, just the reverse has been achieved? Some hon. members opposite saw discouragement, depression, want, hunger and an ominous future for our country. On this side of the house men looked upward with courage, determination and conviction and, in spite of continuous road-blocks, this record of achievement which I have just presented was attained.

We then come to the great concern of hon. members of the opposition with respect to the reduction of taxes. If the opposition was sincerely anxious to keep taxes down, why did it not oppose the financial assistance voted to the victims of the Fraser river floods, to the extent of $5 million for rehabilitation and $4,500,000 for repairing and strengthening dikes? They did not oppose it because it was not politically wise for them to do so. Why did they not oppose the voting of funds to assist the victims of the Rimouski fire, to the extent of $2,500,000? Oh no, it was not wise for them to oppose it. And the same thing applies to the victims of the Cabano fire, to the extent of $300,000. Why did they not oppose and vote against the contributions to the victims of the Red river flood, to the extent of an interim payment of $12,500,000 plus 75 per cent of all re-diking costs? Why did they not vote against the grants to universities in the sum of $7 million? Why did they not vote against the bill to establish old age pensions to the extent of an estimated $365 million a year or $1 million per day for every day of the year? Why did they not oppose and vote against the payment of family allowances to the extent of an estimated $350 million?

At the time these requests came before the house, not only did members of the opposition fail to oppose these expenditures; on the contrary they approved them unanimously because it was then politically wise for them to do so. But what do they do today? Today when political exigency makes it advisable they change their tune and accuse the government of overspending, which makes taxes high. If they had voted against these measures I could understand their statements today about high taxes, but having voted for these expenditures they know full well, and the country does too, that their complaint is nothing but a purely political outcry.

These tactics are so obvious that they require no emphasis. So are the tactics disclosed by the following specious type of criticism which we have been hearing. If ministers travel in their line of duty the opposition refer to them as flitting about the country for political purposes. If they do not travel and remain in Ottawa at their desks, they are criticized for being arm chair diplomats. If they are on the alert for preparedness against a sudden attack and stockpile essential supplies, they are criticized for overspending. If they do not take the necessary precautions they are criticized for exposing the security of the country to grave danger. If they vote allowances to veterans they are criticized for creating a need for higher taxation. If they do not, they are criticized for neglecting the heroes of our country. If the government subsidizes education in Canada there is another outcry of throwing a burden on the taxpayer. If they do not, they are charged with neglecting the future citizens of the country. If the government makes provision for needy families, indigents and the older citizens of our country, they are criticized again for making it necessary to impose taxes. If they do not, they are criticized for being indifferent to the progress of social security measures. If taxes are not reduced, the government is most severely criticized. If taxes are reduced, the government is accused of doing it for political purposes.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crestohl: Exactly; hear, hear. How far can a political party go with this double talk? Do hon. members of the opposition really think they can hoodwink an intelligent public by singing one tune one day and another tune the next day? It is apparent that the hon. gentlemen are attempting to focus the attention of the Canadian public on unimportant trivialities in order to detract their attention from the basic and important things achieved by the government of this country.

I was astounded to hear intelligent men make an issue of 14,000 serving forks, or even three times 14,000. If sufficient serving forks were not available then the very same gentlemen would complain from the floor of this house that our men were being neglected and deprived of the most primitive comforts. I was equally surprised to listen to a complaint that essential stores and supplies are stockpiled for the armed forces; too many shoes, too many uniforms, too many raincoats. What a cry would come from the floor of this house if a shooting war was to break out and the country was not prepared to provide uniforms, clothing and shoes for the many thousands of men and women who would suddenly be projected into military service.

Is that not the better part of wisdom rather than to be caught short? Ah, but it makes good ground for criticism, and so it is exploited to the limit. I am confident that the Canadian people will see through these beguiling tactics.

How amusing too is the issue made about neckties. So the army has ordered three times the number of neckties that there are men in the services. I do not know how often the army issues neckties, but I know they certainly wear out very quickly. But even this is used as a basis for criticism, insignificant as the item is. I am certain that this argument only helps to emphasize to the people of Canada how very shallow and puerile are the grounds for the criticism levelled by the opposition against the government.

At this point I should like to commend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for the full and satisfactory explanation he gave the house with respect to the forks, neckties, shoes, uniforms and raincoats. He most thoroughly exploded the entire myth which the hon. gentlemen opposite have attempted to create, a myth which was without any substance and was even devoid of sound political air to the opposition. I feel certain that he left nothing unexplained which could be the basis for criticism in any of these trivial matters. In fact I consider it a high compliment which the opposition is paying quite unwittingly to the government when for its criticism it has nothing more serious with which to make an assault than these insignificant matters. After all, when you reflect upon the tremendous obligations which the government is called upon to discharge and the fantastic responsibilities which the government carries and you find nothing more serious to criticize, then I say that even if they are true—and indeed they are not—the over-all consequence of this great but empty demonstration by the opposition is a mark of the greatest flattery to the government.

I am sure that the people of Canada understand this and they no doubt realize by reaction that this country has had, indeed, a fine, trustworthy and competent government.

The many facets of its responsibilities are almost faultlessly co-ordinated by a competent administration which has placed our country in the enviable position in which it is. What more could have been done?

Canada has acquired a position of preeminence throughout the world. How much greater could such an achievement be? How much more recognition could our diplomats bring to Canada than to be amongst the topmost diplomats in the world? Our currency is the strongest in the world. How much more perfect than the strongest in the world can the hon. members of the opposition expect our currency to be? Canada is reputed to have the soundest industrial policy in the world. How much better than the soundest industrial policy in the world can our friends in the opposition expect our industrial policy to be? Canada is attracting the greatest quantity of foreign capital in the world. How much more than the greatest quantity in the world could the hon. gentlemen in the opposition expect Canada to attract? Our social security program is reputed to be the best of any country in the world. How much better than the best could the hon. gentlemen of the opposition expect our social security program to be? This country enjoys living conditions that are the envy of the entire world. How much better than that could the hon. members of the opposition expect living conditions in Canada to be?

If we take a look at Canada today, impartially and purely objectively, we will see a country which abundantly discloses a steadily expanding prosperity in every field of trade, commerce and industry. We will see a country with a minimum of unemployment or poverty, a country whose people earn reasonably satisfactory salaries for their labours. We will see a country in which there is an abundance of food and comforts, a country with an enviable educational system available to every child. We will see a country which enjoys most respectful international relations. We will see a country with the finest social security program in the world, a country in which there is full and complete enjoyment by everyone of the four basic freedoms—yes, Mr. Speaker, a country which is a model of true democracy.

What more, therefore, could any country in the world wish for? We are indeed blessed. Let us all recognize it, every one of us, government, opposition, the people of Canada, and let us work together to preserve it, not to change it, but to preserve it, in peace and national unity, for our ever-growing country and for the generations that will follow.

[Mr. Crestohl.]

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, being a new member it is with hesitation that I venture to take part in this debate. I desire first to join other hon. members in extending my compliments and congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the excellent manner in which they acquitted themselves in their first addresses to hon. members of this house. I certainly go along with the hon. member for Waterloo North in extending my compliments to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi for his fluency in both French and English. It is an attainment which I should like to achieve even if in a much lesser degree. Having entered parliament on the same day as these two hon. members, I feel a friendly and neighbourly kinship toward them even though they appear to have been misled in their early political training. Nevertheless I am very glad to compliment them as I feel they made a good contribution to the debate and performed a service for their constituencies.

Just as the hon. member for Waterloo North spoke with pride of the industry, thrift, integrity and other qualities of the people of his constituency, I can likewise claim those qualities for the people of my constituency. Yes, I can claim them for both French and English. We live and work side by side and enjoy the best of relations. Like people in other parts of the maritimes we respect ourselves, we respect each other and share a common pride in our community life, in the industries and institutions which have been built up in the lands by the sea.

I should like at this time to pay a compliment to my predecessor, a man beloved by the people of my constituency to whom he gave unstinting service until his passing. Although in poor health during the last year he never spared himself and always put the interests of his people first. The loyal friendship of one's associates is an outstanding achievement, and that the late Mr. H. H. Hatfield attained.

I should also like to congratulate at this time the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) on their promotion to the cabinet. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano of course is no stranger to us in New Brunswick. He has been down there before, but now that he has become Minister of Fisheries I am sure we will welcome him a great deal more because in the maritimes we are very much interested in his department.

Since becoming a member of this house I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches of hon. members. One cannot help but be conscious of the privilege and responsibility of helping to shape and build this vast country of ours which we are so proud to call Canada. The House of Commons is the nerve centre of our nation where east meets west and the central section is the host. The problems, privileges and obligations of the two great races in this vast area are discussed as well as the requirements of different sections of our country, and by a tolerant democratic method we hammer out on the anvil of good will laws that serve to unify this great land.

One cannot help but be inspired by the surroundings of parliament hill. On every hand you see evidence of statesmen who have, each in his own way, contributed to the building of Canada as a great democracy, a country which today in a very troubled world is an outstanding example of unity, tolerance and prosperity of people of different races, languages and habits.

This takes me back to my own constituency, a lovely section of New Brunswick lying in the beautiful Saint John river valley, settled and hewed from the wilderness by French and English speaking people who have continued to live in harmony side by side during the last 125 years. It is a portion of my province which we hope in the near future will become industrialized in large measure as a result of hydro development which at the present time is under study.

When I speak of "capital" you may think of property, stocks and bonds; but to the people of my province, and I think to the people of the maritimes generally, the word has another meaning. It is the capital of the spirit which is not only the basis of our economy but is our very way of life.

The people of my riding depend upon mixed farming, lumber and potatoes. As many hon. members know, potatoes have become a highly specialized crop with a great potential value on the one hand but a tremendous risk on the other. Potato raisers may become wealthy in a few years but just as quickly may face bankruptcy. There is something very fascinating about handling and raising potatoes. Large fields of potatoes in blossom are a beautiful picture, and when I refer to large fields I refer to hundreds of acres in some places.

This year the potato grower is very happy. His "spuds", as we call them, are a reasonably good price and are likely to remain so until the crop is cleaned up. However, it is a crop that cannot be carried over. The amount of money a potato farmer ties up annually in seed, fertilizer, spray materials, help and machinery is tremendous, to say nothing of his investment in land and necessary storage facilities. That is why in years of no market or low prices bankruptcy stares these men in the face and, make no mistake about it, the year 1950-51 put a lot of farmers on the rocks. They fell back on grain, hay and stock, but due to the drought this year hundreds of acres of the oat crop were not even harvested. In my constituency a good part of the grain crop that was harvested has not given more than a 50 per cent return. This season has created a difficult situation for the mixed farmer. He has no grain to sell, but still worse he is faced with the prospect of having to buy feed or dispose of his stock. Either of these possibilities would be disastrous and, notwithstanding the hardship of the coming winter, they will face another seeding season empty-handed. A situation such as we are facing this season in my constituency is discouraging, to say the least. Those who were able to finance a potato crop last spring are having a feast, while the mixed farmer is facing a famine.

Our farmers have no market for hay, and no substantial market for beef or pork. However, the farmers are hopeful now that the United States government has announced its intention of lifting the embargo in the near future. This may afford an outlet for our hay, but the farmers have been reducing their hog production.

The farmers inform me that when the English market was lost, there was no other to take its place. It is for this reason that the farmers in my province are hoping something good will come out of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference now being held in London which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are attending. The people will follow the proceedings closely, because they want to see the United Kingdom markets reopened to Canadian farm products. The leading daily newspaper in New Brunswick, the Telegraph-Journal, after mentioning in its issue of November 26 that the Prime Minister had left for London, stated:

> The meeting he will attend, the commonwealth prime ministers' conference opening in London on Thursday (the 27th), will be the biggest thing of its kind since the Ottawa conference of 1932.

We in the maritimes must have outside markets, markets that can be relied upon year after year. The farmers in my part of the province will tell you—in fact they have told me—that the United States market is not reliable. If the United States is short of a commodity it is easy to enter their market, but ordinarily they are our greatest competitor in world markets for agricultural commodities. While they may be friendly rivals, they are nevertheless ruthless and businesslike in all their dealings. I am informed that the farm lobby in Washington is one of the most potent political forces in United States politics, ever on the alert to see that Canadian producers get a minimum of access to the United States food market. For these reasons and others, no long-term scheme for absorbing Canadian surplus production can be arranged with the United States.

I should like to remind hon. members of this house that when our farmers are unfortunate enough to lose their grain crops because of drought, as many in my riding lost their grain crop this year, there is no relief such as the western farmer may receive under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I understand, of course, that the western farmers make a contribution under that act. It was for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that in my opening remarks I referred to "the capital of the spirit". The farmers of my province have to meet the ups and downs of uncertain markets by ingenuity in finding ways and means of carrying on and providing such prosperity and security as may be obtained through hard work, long hours and strict economy.

It is understandable, therefore, why we in the provinces by the sea are vitally interested in markets for agricultural commodities. We realize that any agricultural policy for Canada must be elastic because of our vast area and the different conditions and requirements of each area. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, and I think I fairly represent the opinion of the farmers of my province, they feel it is the responsibility of the government to do everything possible in finding and developing export markets as well as assisting in the home market.

Agriculture, industry and trade are very much tied together in this world of varying monetary systems and different standards of living. While it is recognized that the hon. members responsible have no easy task, nevertheless, because it is a vital matter to our primary producers, I am sure that all hon. members are fervently hoping for some tangible agreement under which commonwealth trade will start to flow more freely. If such an agreement is made, perhaps some form of permanent trade arrangement may be made that will provide a reliable and profitable outlet for our farmers' products. We are hoping that these results will flow from the conference now taking place in London, in which our own Prime Minister will no doubt play a prominent role.

Having listened with interest to the speeches thus far, I felt compelled to take part in this debate in order to bring to the hon. members of this house the views of many people in my constituency, and to place their problems and difficulties before you. I feel that the solution of many of the problems of my province lies in an agricultural policy of some permanence, so that our small, mixed farmers may proceed to develop their lands on a planned economy which will give them a feeling of security and contentedness.

In conclusion I should like to say a word or two concerning a national health scheme. There is nothing in the speech from the throne that would grant the ordinary citizen relief from taxation or give him some feeling of comfort and protection in matters of health. As the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood) so well stated, there is nothing in the speech from the throne that would indicate "relief and the end of the sacrifices of the past few years". Since there appears to be no hope that the ordinary fellow who lives around the corner or across the tracks will receive better treatment, I commend my leader for proposing the amendment to the speech from the throne, and I can wholeheartedly support it.

Let me repeat what I said a few minutes ago. We are here as representatives of all parts of Canada to make laws, but according to the tolerant democratic method. This is the highest level of government in our country, and is often referred to as the federal government. How did this federal government become a reality? How did our constitution in Canada come into being? Was it not by consultation and agreement? Did not the representatives of various sections of this country get together and work out an agreement on which the British North America Act was based?

That was over 80 years ago, and many things have changed in 80 years. There have been changes that have created many problems that were never dreamed of then. In the light of such changes, further consultation among the partners in confederation—the provinces and the federal government—should again take place, in an atmosphere of tolerance and give and take, in order to sincerely try to arrive at a solution that will benefit all the people at various levels of government.

I know there have been conferences, but rightly or wrongly the people of my province —and I believe the same is true in many other provinces—feel that the federal government is not meeting the provinces half-way. They feel that the dominion government is taking the lion's share of the national revenue. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it expresses the feeling of the people. After all, Ottawa is a long way from the homes of most citizens of Canada but the municipal government is on their doorstep, even closer than the provincial government; it therefore can be more closely supervised and more easily understood.

All governments realize, or should, that there is a limit beyond which taxation should not go unless there is a national emergency. But a proper distribution of such revenues is the problem upon which there has not been agreement. As I see it, that is the reason for my leader's amendment. If it were not so, why would a group representing the mayors of cities in every part of Canada be appearing before this government? While this group represents only the cities, other municipalities have problems which are just as serious. Coming as I do from a small town, and having had considerable interest in rural municipalities, I know that the problems with regard to education, hospital and medical care or health services are tremendous. It is growing beyond the resident taxpayers' ability to provide these services, even with all the assistance that comes from provincial governments, part of which in turn comes from Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going into all the reasons that have helped to create this heavy burden. Suffice it for me to say that it is a live issue. Many people cannot afford to have the necessaries of our standard of living, let alone to be sick. No one is ill by choice. Illness comes like a thief in the night. Sooner or later, on account of illness, anyone may be faced with obligations that he just cannot pay. It is no answer to tell these poor people: "Sorry; the municipality must look after you. It is their problem." As far as the legal responsibility is concerned, they know that they are part of the municipality. They also know that the municipality has not the wherewithal to help them.

I like the expression coined by my colleague the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) when he said that our democracy should work like a family; that the federal government is considered the senior or daddy of the family, so the lesser lights look to daddy. Is there much wonder that they do so, in view of the tremendous sums of revenue collected by daddy? This is why the mayors of cities are waiting upon this government. Unless some logical rearrangement satisfactory to all governments is worked out, the delegations will not be confined to representatives of the cities. I am no alarmist. In my humble way I am trying to bring to the attention of the government some of the problems of the ordinary people who feel that they have been forgotten.

Before closing I think it fair that I should place myself on record in reference to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). As I understand the constitutional issue and set-up, it seems to me that the government is being asked to do something which it is not yet in a position to carry out, namely to bring down at this session legislation providing for a national health insurance program. I am not convinced that sufficient groundwork has been done and that a common formula has been worked out with the provinces. Hence I cannot see my way clear to support the amendment to the amendment. But that fact does not in the least indicate that I am opposed to a sound health scheme. On the contrary, I am fully in accord with a scheme worked out jointly between the dominion and the provincial governments as a national health program in order to bring to families in the low and the ordinary income brackets—yes, possibly to all—the assurance that they will receive the necessary medical and hospital care when required, without the worry and hardship entailed in having to pay the bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek): This evening, Mr. Speaker, the people whom I represent in the constituency of Maple Creek, in the southwest corner of the province of Saskatchewan, would want to associate themselves with me in extending the good wishes and the congratulations of all of us to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is a consolation to them to know that people from all over the Dominion of Canada have an interest not only in their own constituencies but in all of the people of Canada, so that through the efforts of all of us we can continue to build the great nation that has been developed up to this time. They would also want me to say to those who may be fortunate enough to attend the coronation of Her Majesty the Queen in England next summer: Give our good wishes to our sovereign, that she may have the good fortune and the blessing of the Almighty upon her so that her reign may be long and glorious in the interests of all her subjects.

We represent our constituencies; therefore it is our duty to present the problems, if any, of these constituencies to the government and to the houses of parliament. In my endeavour to discharge that duty as it applies to me I would ask your indulgence for a few minutes to listen to the conditions that exist in that great constituency of Maple Creek. Conditions there today differ from those which existed at other times when I have had the privilege of speaking about that constituency. We have had a good crop this year in most of my constituency. In spite of the generally good crop conditions all over the west—which please everyone and add greatly to the wealth of Canada, since every bushel of wheat means approximately another $1.50 added to the general wealth of the people of all Canada, because we all derive benefit from it—in spite of that good fortune, nevertheless there are parts of the constituency of Maple Creek in which prairie farm assistance payments, that is crop failure payments, will again be made this year.

The reason for that is this. In that country the constituencies are large. A constituency is a whole country in itself, much larger than some of the provinces of Canada. The result is that a change in weather conditions can be very pronounced, and what may bring good conditions in one area can bring about most unfortunate conditions in another. But altogether, over the whole, we have been blessed with good fortune during the past year.

In addition to that, Maple Creek is the type of constituency, and its area is so vast, that if there are any abnormal conditions they are bound to exist there. In spite of the many times it has been my duty to point out that crop failures have existed due to drought in that constituency, this year we have had the very opposite. We have had flood conditions in that constituency, believe it or not. We had flood conditions that created for the individual just as great havoc as the flood condition at Winnipeg of a year or two ago. Although not on as extensive a scale, yet to the individual the loss was just as great. In the constituency of Maple Creek we have over 90 per cent of the irrigation in the province of Saskatchewan. We had flood conditions in that constituency which inundated whole towns such as Eastend. Towns were under water for a period of approximately a month. All the people had to be removed from those towns lying in those valleys because of the abnormal conditions. The snow, which thawed too rapidly, produced a volume of water that no precautions could have prevented. It flooded irrigation projects, and the people living in the valleys of Eastend and Valmarie were flooded out. We almost had a tragic situation at Swift Current, Saskatchewan, where the Duncairn dam, through almost superhuman efforts of the P.F.R.A. officials, was prevented from collapsing and inundating a large part of that city.

Because of those conditions those people have suffered heavy losses. The P.F.R.A. officials went to extreme lengths to recondition the lands, rehabilitate the irrigation ditches, rebuild the streets of the towns, pump the water from the basements and make it possible for those people to go back to the towns and take up living where they left off. In the meantime many of the farmers lost their seed grain, lost their feed, lost some livestock, and had difficulty in re-establishing themselves. Some of the men on those lands are returned men.

I think under those conditions the province of Saskatchewan should have been much more willing to help out in the emergency. Officials of the province come to Ottawa and ask the federal government to assist in rehabilitating and financing the work that has to go on in those areas. As I see the situation, it was not a national disaster. As I pointed out, it was a disaster to the individual, but it was not a national disaster when compared with the Winnipeg floods and the fires in Rimouski and in other places.

Generally, the situation in connection with financing losses of that kind is this. If the loss is within the $100 class or category the municipality takes care of it. If it comes within the hundreds of thousands of dollars category, the provincial government takes care of it. If it comes within the category of millions of dollars, then the federal government takes care of it. Therefore I ask the province to reimburse those people who have suffered financial losses. If they cannot finance the situation, if the amount involved is too great, then they should come to the federal government and the federal government will consider whether or not the province can finance it. I have never known the federal government to take an attitude at any time that is not responsive to the demands of any province, any municipality or any people in difficulty. I ask the province to rehabilitate those people and place them in the financial position they deserve, as has been done when other people have found themselves in difficulty.

If any province or any area suffered from the affliction of foot-and-mouth disease, certainly the constituency of Maple Creek did, because it comprises much of the ranching area of southern Saskatchewan and of the whole of Saskatchewan. I do not know of any area that was more affected by anything that happened to the beef industry than we were when the foot-and-mouth disease disaster struck us. Another thing that affects us is the distance from all the ports through which we ship our wheat. We are practically the same distance from Churchill as we are from Vancouver, and as we are from Fort William. That being the case, we in the southwest portion of the province are usually the last to be served in the delivery of our wheat because, as everyone knows, if there is a shortage of box cars or a shortage of space, or if deliveries of certain grades of grain have to be made on account of sales to other countries at the appropriate time, in order to make the sales those box cars can be utilized twice as often from practically any point in Manitoba to Fort William, as they could be from southwest Saskatchewan.

So just until recently we were practically still on the five-bushel quota. And while I am talking about that I hope the wheat board takes an interest in this matter, and that before all the other wheat delivery quotas are raised they will provide facilities for southwest Saskatchewan in order to equalize their quota deliveries with people in the other provinces.

Much has been mentioned about the farm storage proposition in western Canada. When there are heavy crops a great deal of farm storage becomes necessary, and the problem becomes acute. This is especially so when it is impossible to deliver your grain under the quota system. I do not know of any way to circumvent this except by providing more box cars. There is no way of limiting this except by providing more storage space.

It has been suggested by some that the government should provide facilities or make advances to the farmers so they could store farm grain. What I need in southwestern Saskatchewan is room enough for my grain so I will get the full value for it in relation to the money spent in its production, and so I do not have to borrow money and pay interest on it, and have to repay it at some future date. I have never had any trouble in borrowing money; my trouble has always been in repaying it. If facilities could be provided so there would be plenty of room for storage facilities on the farms or in the cities, through elevator storage facilities, and through government storage elevators that might pay for themselves in time—and they have paid for themselves and would pay for themselves—then I think that southwest area of Saskatchewan, which certainly has been overlooked in connection with government terminal elevator storage and those specialized facilities, would be satisfied.

I think the government could very well consider those additional facilities either at Shaunavon or at Swift Current, and for a twofold purpose. They would be useful in conditions such as we have had in the last few years, and also when there are conditions of drought and large parts of the province are faced with crop failure. The result would be to keep the economy of that country in better condition, and there would be feed grain and seed grain in an area where it would be needed.

Only too often have the farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan had to pay freight for seed and feed from Fort William, or from some other parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, arising from crop failures which have occurred through no fault of their own. I think proper storage facilities should be provided in southwestern Saskatchewan, and no one would lose any money on it.

There has been much talk in regard to loans to farmers on the grain. Last year in this house and again this year there has been discussion as to the amount of money that should be provided in loans or guarantees of loans to farmers who had their wheat in the snow last year and were unable to deliver this year. There was a whole lot of talk and a lot of difficulty in connection with providing a guarantee or a loan to the extent of $20 million to farmers last year. As a matter of interest, the amount actually used by farmers under that loan which was made available by the Prairie Grain Producers Interim Financing Act was $625,671.41, out of a total of $20 million.

I say again that the farmer wants a place to deliver his grain in southwestern Saskatchewan, and a place to store it as a secondary feature. We say the farmer in southwestern Saskatchewan does not want a system whereby he is going to be compelled to pay storage charges for other farmers throughout the length and breadth of the three western provinces, who can well afford to keep their grain. And if storage is paid on the grain, then the people in southwestern Saskatchewan who over a period of years have had about twelve bushels to the acre will be paying storage on the grain of other farmers in the three western provinces. Unless a new system can be devised, then the farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan will be penalized for charges that others are not obliged to pay.

I am not in favour of this. I am not in favour of advances to be paid to the farmers throughout the three western provinces that the farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan cannot take advantage of. The best advance I know of is the advance that applies in connection with the sale of wheat. If the rest of us can get that, then it will take care of most of the other troubles we have in southwestern Saskatchewan; that is, if we have the wheat to sell.

We have heard a lot about subsidies in this country. It appears to me there has never been a session of the House of Commons when subsidies have not been mentioned at some time or another. We had an instance of it the other day when a comparison was made between the subsidy that was paid to the farmers or allowed to the farmers under the Agricultural Prices Support Act during the past year, amounting to $10 million, and the subsidy paid to the gold mining industry of $40 million—a most unfair comparison if I ever heard one, because there is no similarity between them.

The Agricultural Prices Support Act provided some $200 million to stabilize the market for farm products when the price was low. It was not established to lose money, but rather to stabilize the prices of the farmers' products for a period of time. If they were not stabilized, the farmer lost money.

If you wish to make a comparison of farming and the gold mining industry in the matter of subsidies, then make a comparison between the subsidy that has actually been paid the farmers, and that has nothing at all to do with the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I have here in the Western Producer of October 9, 1952—and no one can say that this is a Liberal paper—a record of the federal government's action in subsidizing agriculture. The actual amount paid in subsidies to the agricultural industry across Canada from 1940 to 1950-51 has been $853,300,000, or more than three-quarters of a billion dollars. That has been the subsidy paid to agriculture during that time.

Let us compare that with the subsidy paid to the gold mining industry, and we will have the answer. Do not let anyone get the idea that I think the gold mining industry in Canada is in trouble. I do not know, but it seems to me the people handling that can take care of themselves pretty well. Yet I know this, that there are almost a million people engaged in gold mining, or who are earning their living from that industry. I also know that the incentive offered by gold mining has spread to other valuable minerals being produced. The incentive offered by gold mining has induced the prospector to go out to find other valuable minerals throughout the country. This subsidy has encouraged the gold mining industry, so that we could make the most of our mineral resources.

Let my hon. friends in Saskatchewan who are complaining about the subsidy to gold mining remember that we have the largest uranium discovery in the world in northern Saskatchewan. I am not too much concerned about the gold mining industry; I am not worried about it. I have not been troubled at any time with having too much gold under my control, and I think the same thing can be said for most of the farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan. There has never been an overabundance of gold under their control. It is a lack of gold or its equivalent that has caused a difficult situation in south Saskatchewan and the difficulties that have been inflicted upon the farmers there during past years.

If it is possible to keep a million people employed in this country, I want to see those people employed. I want to see them have the right to earn a living whether at gold mining, in industry, in oil, in agriculture, in our manufacturing plants, on our railroads or wherever they may be. Those people have a right to live and it is the government's duty to provide a means whereby they can earn a living. That is a duty the government owes to all the inhabitants of the country. If the government finds it necessary to provide a gold subsidy to maintain this million people at work, what can I do but support it in the hope that the gold mining industry along with agriculture and all other industries will prosper so that subsidies will not be needed in the future.

Something has been said about the wheat situation. I think the position in this regard can be summarized in a very few words. This government has faced tremendous problems in the last few years. The wheat board and the Department of Trade and Commerce were faced with over a billion bushels of grain last year and with more than that this year, or over two billion bushels in twenty-four months. At least half that amount has been moved. Facilities have been provided and markets found under the most adverse conditions. Over 240 million bushels of damp and tough grain has been moved at a reasonable price. That is one of the greatest accomplishments ever achieved in Canada or any country in the world.

I do not say that is good enough. Nothing is good enough in the Liberal party. If there is anything bad, they are determined to make it good. That is the Liberal policy. If it is good they are determined to make it better. If it is wrong, they will make it right. If it is right, they will bring it to perfection. That is what we subscribe to.

The international wheat agreement will shortly be coming up again for consideration. Let no one in Canada think for one moment that every effort is not going to be made to obtain the best possible results in connection with the wheat agreement for the benefit of the farmers of this country. We are not going to have a fire sale. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will never agree to give our wheat away at any price nor attempt to blast our way into the markets of the world at any price. We are going to obtain for that wheat what it is worth, plus, in all the markets of the world; we will obtain what the markets of the world will be willing to pay. We are not going to price ourselves out of the markets of the world. There are two times when agriculture gets into difficulty; one is when there is no production, when there is a crop failure, and the other is when there is too much wheat. Our friends the socialists wish to give our production away; but they should hold up as an example what other socialist countries in the world have given away to the underprivileged people during all the time we have heard of socialism. Their policy is to give everything away until we become one of the underprivileged countries of the world.

We have the international wheat agreement and we have the wheat board. The government has just made a final payment on last year's crop. I think even the socialists will agree that that payment was quite good. However, they are not ready to give the government credit for it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will not ask for any credit, but the fact is it was a pretty good wheat payment. If it was more than the average producer expected, and I think it was; if the government is to receive no credit for it, then why should the government be faced with a political implication that it has not acted as it should when the final payment is a few cents less than was expected?

We hear our socialist friends talking about the support they are giving to the international wheat agreement and the wheat board. Do not believe it; they are out to destroy it, and here is the proof. They asked the people to vote against the wheat steal. That is a contribution the socialists made during the by-election in Gravelbourg a year and a half ago. Vote against the wheat steal. Who stole the wheat? No one was handling wheat except the wheat board; and every farmer and every socialist recognized that advertisement which appeared in all the papers and which was passed out to the people in the form of handbills. Vote against the wheat steal. Why didn't they say, "Vote against the wheat board?" The implication was there, yet they tell us they are in favour of the wheat board. They will never make me believe that because there are their words and this time their words speak louder than their actions.

What the socialists say west of the great lakes they do not say east of the great lakes. That is the great trouble in this country. It is exactly the same with the Progressive Conservatives. What they say in Quebec they do not say in Ontario. That is one barrier to unity throughout the whole country, the difference between what politicians in the west say for their own political advancement, and what they say in eastern Canada.

So I suggest to all who care to take the suggestion—and I do not imagine many over in that particular area of the House of Commons will take it—that they make their actions conform with their words and get behind the international wheat agreement and the wheat board. The socialists in western Canada should get behind a policy that will guarantee a wheat board in the future, and not support any political party that will be in a position to destroy what has been built up during the last fifteen years through the efforts of the farmers, their farm organizations and their wheat pools. That should not be permitted to be destroyed in one fell swoop. They have a duty to perform, not only for their own particular advancement but for the benefit of the rest of the people of Canada.

I want the Minister of Trade and Commerce to ask right now for farmer representation on the wheat board. I think this is the time for that. I suggest to him that the best possible men in the country be hired to operate the wheat board. I heard some farm union officials in western Canada criticizing the wheat board and intimating that some of the officials were not fit to operate the board because they had previously been connected with the grain trade. The Minister of Trade and Commerce should try to obtain the best men possible to operate the wheat board, and I think the minister will do that.

There is no government in the world, no grain board or wheat board that will tolerate anyone stealing the farmers' wheat. If they do, then they are not fit to handle that wheat. I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he ask the farm organizations and the wheat pools to offer their best men as representatives of the farmers of western Canada on our wheat board.

We have heard a lot about floor prices. Let me tell the house that because of the inefficiency, the uselessness and the impotence of the minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan, the farmers of Saskatchewan have lost $140 million.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think an hon. member of this house should reflect upon a minister of a provincial government.

Mr. Fulton: It is all right for him to reflect upon his own minister. It might have been truer if he had said it about his own minister.

Mr. Studer: Certainly I do not need to reflect on anybody. Everyone knows, and without any reflection, that what I said is true. The attitude the minister took in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease and his entirely unwarranted criticism as to inefficiency on the part of the federal government veterinarians in controlling the disease was immediately responsible for the embargo by the provinces and hastened the imposition of the embargo by the United States. I say the farmers lost the equivalent of what they had gained between the time the foot-and-mouth disease was first determined and the time the actual embargoes were put in force. The farmers lost $140 million; and they also lost because the provincial government and their minister of agriculture never accepted their responsibility in Saskatchewan to provide storage space for the production of the farmers of western Canada which at various times of the year, and almost every year, exceeds the demand.

As a result eggs and other products have to be shipped out of the province and the storage is paid in other provinces. That is a loss for every farmer in Saskatchewan. Then there is also the loss that arises in connection with floor prices. Under the provincial government's marketing legislation it is their direct responsibility, when floor prices are not paid to the farmers, to buy the products, sell them to the federal government at the floor price, and in the meantime pay the floor price to the farmers of western Canada.

In Saskatchewan the government was most derelict in its duty. If they have no value except to criticize, what in the world are the people of Canada doing with a provincial government and a minister of agriculture so inefficient as in the province of Saskatchewan? They are throwing away our money. The loss has been at least $140 million, and the only thing we have there is a critical attitude. That is why I said last year that under a foreign policy imported into this country by the socialists, unconditional socialists are conditional Canadians because they will not co-operate with anyone in Canada unless they are willing to adopt socialist policy. I will stand by that statement.

Mr. Thatcher: They liked it in Saskatchewan the last time.

Mr. Studer: We have a situation with regard to socialists and health upon which I should like to dwell. In the one instance they advocate that we spend another $500 million for health. We are all in favour of health. The federal government has made available $1 billion each year for health and social services. The socialists want us to add another half billion dollars to the expenditures of the federal government. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells us that the country now is rich enough to support the additional expenditure of half a billion dollars, and in the same place, although perhaps not at the same time, the leader of the socialists will tell you that the country is going to the dogs and that we will not be able to continue to have our marvellous system of social services that is a credit to all. He admits that we have prosperity, but he says it is deceptive. He says it will not last, that it is a mirage, that it will deceive you, that it will disintegrate, that it will collapse, and then he asks us to spend $500 million in one fell swoop.

I should like to ask the leader of the socialists in this house, or any other socialist, what right anyone has who is not a producer of wealth to be a socialist? What right has a non-producer of wealth to be a socialist? If any one of them has the right to be a socialist I wish he would stand up in the house and proclaim it because the first thing you have to do is produce some wealth before you can distribute it. Where did the socialists get the right to be socialists when they are not producers? Did they get it from God? No. Even God knows you have to produce before you can distribute. Do they get it from Karl Marx or Engels? No; neither Marx nor Engels were producers. They did not have the right of succession passed on. Did they get it because of humanitarian reasons? Oh, it is easy to be a humanitarian and a do-gooder with somebody else's money.

Did they get it from the people? No, because they were socialists before the people ever heard of them. Did they get it from nature? No, because even the drones in the beehives have not the right to distribute the honey of the worker bees. There are too many would-be educators in this country who have found it much more profitable for themselves to become agitators. There are too many people in other vocations in this country who have found it much more profitable for themselves to go out and try to save hides rather than save souls. Yet the socialists get up in the House of Commons and proclaim their right to be socialists. If you cannot do that, then go out in the country and tell the people that the socialist system is a fake, fraud and deception. West of the great lakes they preach one story. East of the great lakes they preach another story. East of the great lakes they are wolves in sheep's clothing and west of the great lakes sheep in wolves' clothing. That is true of all of them with the exception of that lovable, likeable member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). He is not a sheep. He is merely a well conditioned capitalistic lamb being led to a socialistic slaughter.

But there are other socialist members who have the right to be socialists, and one of them is the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). He is a producer. He has the right to be a socialist along with others. He is a successful farmer. He has made money. There are only two ways you can make money when you are a farmer and a politician. As a farmer you can make money by reason of the policies of the dominion government. That is the only way you can do it. The other is as a politician. Which of the two is it? I ask the hon. member for Melfort which it is. Socialism is built on a false premise and the people know it.

When the truth catches up with what the people have been told there will not be any more socialists because socialism means control. It means less of everything, including people. It means destruction, it means no production, it means death, and that is the truth. So we will tell these socialists that in order to have the right to be socialists they should become producers. I suggest to them that there are too many rich socialists in the country today, and that is part of our trouble in Saskatchewan. It used to be that people talked about the rich capitalists, but now it is the rich socialists. It is rank heresy in the rank and file of the socialists, and you can leave the file out because they are all rank. It is rank heresy in the ranks of the socialists.

I know of rich socialists in Saskatchewan who, through the agricultural policies of the dominion government, have accumulated from 3,000 to 5,000 acres of good agricultural land during the past fifteen years, and that is under the system they are out to destroy. When are they going to socialize the rich socialists in Saskatchewan including those who are government members?

An hon. Member: That fits you, Ross.

Mr. Studer: Talking about Ross, I should like to have him justify his position as a distributor at a profit of the sweat and labour of others. He is not a producer but a distributor of the work of others. Again I say it is rank heresy in the ranks of the socialists. Let them justify it. Production for use and not for profit is the battlecry of the socialists, and here we have an instance where it is distribution for profit to individuals. If that is socialism, I hope the Lord prevents us from having too much of it.

I should like to give a little bit of advice, hoping that someone will take it. I should like to suggest to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that he adopt a system in western Canada with respect to the collection of taxes that will not be so aggressive toward the people of western Canada. We are living in Canada. We are not living in Russia. I do not like the policy that is in effect out there under which the farmers were put through the wringer, through the grindstone you might call it, to extract that which ten years ago they had no idea they were ever going to be compelled to pay. The Conservatives here talk about the overemphasis on national revenue. They say the Minister of Finance did not judge right because he has too great a surplus. That is not where the surplus came from; the surplus came from the collection of tax arrears from the farmers out in Saskatchewan. Give consideration to the farmers in applying these measures. These are not the days of the inquisition. These are days when every man has his right. I think he has the right to be heard, and these farmers in Saskatchewan are not being heard to the extent that any Canadian citizen should be heard in connection with the collection of arrears of income tax.

To the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) I should like to say that I want him to institute a plan of unemployment insurance for farm labour. I want him to get busy at that right away. If we are going to maintain any employment on our farms, it is necessary. Without question, day after day our farm labourers are going to the cities. There is one reason for that, and it is that they can receive consideration in the cities that they cannot be assured will be available on the farm. Such a measure would prevent some of that. I want every action taken in the interests of the labouring people. I ask the government never to take its eyes away from the plight of the poor. Do not worry about the rich. I never heard of one of them who did not get along very well. We should worry about the poor people of this country. In opposition to the policy of the socialists, who are always trying to make the rich poor, this government is going to make all the poor rich.

I want the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)—give him credit for a job well done, to almost the same extent as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—to continue doing what he has just done in connection with the transporting of grain in this country. After the trans-Canada highway is completed, I want him to immediately inaugurate a plan whereby we shall have separate truck roads for all trucking done in this country. I hesitate to pick up the paper each day and read about the disasters that are happening on all our highways because of the truck traffic which prevents the normal use of the roads by the motoring public. The railways built their lines for transportation, and if the trucks can transport goods cheaper than the railways then I think the co-operation of the provinces should be sought in providing roads to take advantage of this cheaper transportation. A truck road system should be made available throughout the country; then the trucks would not be continually in conflict with the motoring public, resulting in the deaths that inevitably follow.

To the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), I would say "keep up your solicitude on behalf of the veterans of this country." They risked their lives for us, and if it were not for them we would not be here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Studer: No matter what you do, keep a solicitous eye, a benevolent eye, on them. There are many of these veterans in southwestern Saskatchewan who are farming land under extremely difficult conditions. I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs well enough to know that he will do his utmost for them.

To the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I would say that we want him to stabilize prices as close to parity as possible, with the help of all the provinces but not the opposition of all the provinces. If that is done we will create stability in this country unheard of in any other country in the world. But we need the co-operation of the provinces.

Finally, to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) I want to say this. Do not worry too much because there happen to be a few surplus ties or other commodities. You worry about protecting the people of Canada, and worry about that only. If you do not, and listen to the opposition, the same thing will happen that happened at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. I want him to keep Canada safe. You can build up the highest civilization, the highest standard of living, and it can be endangered. Today countries do not declare war; they destroy you, and then declare war. I want the Minister of National Defence to protect the people of this country so they will never be in a position, regardless of the criticism of anyone, where it will be a matter of too little, too late.

There is another matter I want to draw to the attention of the house. I think it is time for the people of Canada to pray. It seems to be the fashion nowadays, among at least some political parties. I think all could avail themselves of it without any detriment to themselves. Danger comes to any country not when it is poor but when it is rich. I believe everyone will agree with me that Canada is fast becoming rich to an extent that past generations would not have believed. Canada will continue to do so if we keep this government and its policies in the future. However, let us offer a prayer for the protection of our country, and if it be done in a proper manner we should be protected from without as well as from within. Often the danger from within is greater than the danger from without. In that connection I would suggest that we be protected from within from that combination or residue of conservative technocrats, that combination seasoned with ginger, pepper and a liberal sprinkling of holy water who call themselves Social Credit. I think we should be protected from that.

In the early days there used to be crusaders who went out to convert people to Christianity. Today we have a situation in which we have crusaders going out to convert Christians to politics. Also guard us from the socialism that is inevitable if the socialists ever obtain power. Guard us from being destroyed through the methods they advocate, controls that lead to destruction. Guard us from becoming the underprivileged people of the world. We have prosperity. There is no alternative or question about that; everybody admits it, even the leader of the socialists. It took the Liberals fifteen years to build up this prosperity; do you want to destroy it overnight? Lastly, save us from the contradiction of free trade one day and protection the next, the wandering in the desert, reactionary, puny, petty, feeble politics of the Conservatives, who aspire to be the government. Save the country from that disaster. We Liberals always advance, never retreat; we add, we do not subtract; we build, we do not destroy; we succeed, we do not fail. Time for a change? Never is the time to change from good times.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I think that under ordinary circumstances the hon. member who just took his seat should only be allotted twenty minutes, because he can get more words into twenty minutes than any other member in the house can get in in an hour.

Mr. Cruickshank: He can say more in five minutes than you could in two hours.

Mr. Thomas: You just woke up. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) can be assured of one thing, and that is that I shall be speaking here long after he has gone.

An hon. Member: I doubt it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my plea to that made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) the other night when he asked for some changes to be made in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as it applies to hail benefits. Under the present six-section eligibility clause we find that we have a great deal of discrimination. It is not deliberate discrimination; but with hail acting in the way it does, it cannot be helped. It is almost impossible to administer an act such as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act unless there is some reduction in the eligibility clause. All westerners know that hail is extremely unpredictable. At times you will have a narrow strip where the hail will cut a swathe many miles long. At other times it will hit one farm, skip one and hit another. This phenomenon makes it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to administer the act as it should be administered. The only real solution to this problem would be found if the hail benefits were to be reduced to an individual basis. If the government is not willing to do that—that is, bring it down to the individual basis—they should at least bring it down to a one-section basis so the farmers who are suffering hail damage will not be discriminated against.

I was greatly interested the other night when the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production was giving his report on his visit to the troops in Germany. At that time he stated that the morale of the troops in Germany was extremely high, that they lacked nothing in the way of recreational facilities and that they were doing well. I am not prepared to argue with the parliamentary assistant on that score. I simply do not know. I am not satisfied, however, that the whole story was told.

Last session I made the suggestion to the government that on some of these tours to theatres of action or to theatres in which we have Canadian troops, some opposition members or at least one opposition member should be taken along so that we can get the real or the whole story. If the morale is as high as the parliamentary assistant says it is, the government should be tickled to death to have an opposition member come back to the House of Commons and give the assurances that the parliamentary assistant gave the other night. If the morale is not high—and in the press there have been many reports that the morale is not as high as we would like to see it—then the people of Canada should find out, and we should have something done about it.

Whether we are having an election in the next year or whether we are not, that matter is not half as important as is the welfare of our boys who are overseas at the present time. Too often we get these glowing reports from government members and then later on have reports to the contrary. If these boys in Germany need more recreational facilities, let us see that they have them. If they need anything, we should know about it and see that they get it. After all, those fellows are there for our protection; and nothing is too good for them in the line of recreation or any other line you could mention. The only way we can find out about the matter, to the satisfaction of the people at home, is to send over somebody from the opposition so that he can speak, and agree or otherwise, as to the reports given by those on the government side of the house.

I am not going to follow the Conservatives' policy of criticizing the government's purchase of clothing, neckties, teapots and so on. Having had a certain amount of experience in the selling of clothing and other articles, I realize that it is necessary to have on hand stocks of many sizes in order to sell clothing or, as in the case of the army, to issue it.

Mr. Fulton: Even neckties and serving forks?

Mr. Thomas: We ought just to keep this fact in mind, and this will answer the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). We never know when we may have to make an all-out war effort and go into an all-out war. The hon. member for Kamloops would be the first to jump to his feet and holler "shame" if we were not prepared for it.

Mr. Fulton: Especially with neckties and serving forks.

Mr. Thomas: If we are not better prepared than we were before, we shall have to strangle the enemy with neckties and poke them with forks.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear. Let us buy something else. I would rather spend money on something else.

Mr. Laing: Let me guess what.

Mr. Fulton: Shells.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I notice that I am getting some help.

Mr. Fulton: Ammunition for Korea.

An hon. Member: Who is making this speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I honestly believe that we should supply not only present needs but that we should and must stockpile in case of an emergency. As members of our group have stated and as I, speaking for them on many occasions, have stated, we will go all-out with the government on any productive effort that they want to go on with, if it is necessary; and I think at the present time it is necessary. I believe, however, that the taxpayers of Canada are suffering great losses as a result of poor management in their defence construction program. I think the hon. member for Red Deer covered that subject fairly thoroughly the other night, and so far I have not heard one government voice dissenting. I notice that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production have spoken and that they said nothing about it.

I think it is imperative that we have a complete investigation into the defence construction program, not only in the two centres mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer but in the centres all across Canada. Some new inspectors should be sent out to all these places to find out whether things are going well. If they are going well, we shall be pleased to hear it. If they are not going well, let us get them rectified and get on with the job.

As to smaller stores, I think there is a certain amount of misuse in consumable stores. As a matter of fact, a friend of mine was telling me one day about getting 85-cent T-bone steaks in a restaurant, and he could not figure out how he was doing it until one day he saw the Department of National Defence stamp on the rind. If the minister or the parliamentary assistant would like to come and ask me about it, I will give him the name and location of the restaurant so they may investigate the matter.

I should like to say just a brief word about the government's T.V. policy. I want to protest most strongly against this policy of suppression of private companies. I know that the C.B.C. claims that it is encouraging Canadian talent and Canadian culture, but it is having exactly the opposite effect. In the cities where they have Canadian television and where they can also bring in United States stations, I find that the television sets are invariably tuned to the United States, so they can absorb more of the United States culture and leave our own Canadian culture alone. I cannot understand why the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation insist on spending the taxpayers' money to do a job that private concerns are willing to do with no cost at all to the Canadian taxpayers. They could probably do it better and much cheaper. As a matter of fact the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation set $1 million as the cost of a television station on the west coast, where private companies have claimed that they can set one up for as little as $500,000.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in television as in radio, is operating not only as a competitor but as the controlling body, and as such can develop into the most vicious propaganda machine imaginable. They have that type of thing in Russia, but there is no place for it in a democratic country such as ours. It would make one wonder whether the forthcoming election might not have something to do with Canadian television policy.

If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to be the controlling body for television and radio, then it should get out of circulation as a competing body; or if it is going to be the competing body, then let us set up some other body to control both radio and television. So much for that, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to urge the government to set up a special committee on veterans affairs during this session, or better still make it a standing committee instead of a special committee. We need a complete revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act, particularly to consider increasing the ceilings on their total income, so that a man can work without being penalized. Many of them today are living in abject poverty, and it is a shame and a disgrace that those men should have to live under those conditions after all the sacrifices they made for this parliamentary system that we have in Canada.

I would add my word to that expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) this afternoon when he asked that something be done for the blind people of this country. I suggest that the government remove the means test from the blind pension and consider it as an acknowledgment of the handicap, and let them go to work so they can take their places as producers in this country of ours.

Speaking of our group the other night the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) said that he must be guided—because he had seen no other statement of policy recently—by the platform adopted by the Social Crediters in Saskatchewan, asking for an old age pension of $100 without the means test, and for tax exemptions of $2,500 and $5,000. Well, I am amazed that an hon. member of his reputed intelligence could make such a statement. Surely the hon. member has been here long enough to know our platform, if he had paid any attention to the speeches that have been made from this corner of the house. If he had any doubts about anything that has been said in this house, or needed a copy of our platform, any of our offices are just as close as his telephone. He could pick it up and telephone us and ask us what was going on. It is quite apparent that the hon. member for Calgary West prefers to remain in ignorance of our policies.

Mr. Nickle: I have been close to them for 17 years.

Mr. Thomas: In the event that he has not been able to get anything out of our speeches, I am going to take the opportunity of sending him over a copy of our charter so that when he makes any more speeches in future he will have something to go on without digging into some resolution that was passed in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Cruickshank: Send me a copy, too.

Mr. Thomas: Drop around any time.

Mr. Johnston: You will get enough of it.

Mr. Nickle: Do you accept this Saskatchewan policy as national policy?

Mr. Thomas: That was a resolution.

Mr. Byrne: Based on Douglas social credit?

Mr. Cruickshank: Is $25 a month in that book?

Mr. Johnston: You had better take your $25 a month or you won't have a seat.

Mr. Thomas: The other day the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) spoke of Social Crediters being ex-Tories and Tories at the present time. I can understand the hon. member making a statement like that, and I can understand quite a few of the hon. members on the other side of the house making such statements. It is wishful thinking. They hope that the Social Crediters will not take their strength away from them but will take only the Tories'. Many of them had better keep on hoping. The hon. member for Vancouver South shakes his head. He should be the last one to say anything about that. I had a long talk with his campaign manager at the last general election. He ran as a Social Credit candidate in Vancouver during the last provincial election.

Mr. Johnston: Laugh that one off.

Mr. Laing: He ran in a different riding from mine.

Mr. Thomas: He was still a Social Crediter and the hon. member was trying to intimate that we gained all our strength from the Tories.

Mr. Laing: He ran in a different place.

Mr. Johnston: The best Liberals are going Social Credit.

Mr. Laing: I hope he runs federally next time.

Mr. Thomas: The other night the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) read a manuscript in the house. The author of that manuscript is unknown.

Mr. Prudham: Whom do you think it is?

Mr. Thomas: We are convinced that he is the same writer who prepared a similar manuscript for Mr. J. Harper Prowse, the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta during the last provincial election.

Mr. Prudham: It is still good stuff; it is still true.

Mr. Thomas: The people of Alberta were so enthused over the platform that they elected 4 Liberal members in a house of 60. Just for comparison it may be interesting to note that that comes to one-fifteenth, and if we take the 17 federal seats in Alberta and divide them by fifteen we get one and two-fifteenths. When we use seniority we find that the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) has been here longer than any of the others, so we can presume that he is going to be elected again. That leaves two-fifteenths. I am not going to say what member is that two-fifteenths. Far be it from me to do that, but last night the minister indicated that he was coming back.

Mr. Prudham: There will be more Liberals than the last time, anyway.

Mr. Thomas: I do wish that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys would at least revise that old speech that went through the provincial campaign.

Mr. Prudham: Don't you like it?

Mr. Thomas: Because it did not do any good. He may as well admit that the Liberal party in Alberta is in a rut. The only difference between a rut and a grave is the dimensions, and they are almost ready for it. As a matter of fact many of the Liberals in Alberta were so pleased with the Social

Credit administration that they did not even nominate candidates to run in some of those ridings, and last night the minister was talking about the pathetic municipal situation within Alberta—

Mr. Johnston: As he called it.

Mr. Thomas: Yes, as he called it; and they did not even run a candidate against the minister of municipal affairs. He went in by acclamation. I wonder just what the Liberals within that riding think of the minister of municipal affairs. We can understand quite easily how disturbed the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys must be when he knows that the Liberal following from Alberta in the next house can quite easily be nil. He has to be thinking of something, and because of that fear we have to expect numerous frenzied attacks such as we experienced last night.

Mr. Prudham: That was just the truth.

Mr. Thomas: I am speaking of Alberta, and British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: British Columbia will look after itself.

Mr. Thomas: They sure did last summer.

Mr. Cruickshank: And regret it already.

Mr. Thomas: Last night the minister mentioned roads—

Mr. Laing: Nineteen out of forty-eight.

An hon. Member: How many Liberals?

Mr. Laing: The aristocracy of the unqualified.

Mr. Thomas: The minister mentioned roads last night. How well do I remember the road policy advocated during the provincial election campaign in 1948, when their leader Mr. Prowse stood up and said, "If the Liberals are elected we will give you the best roads you have ever seen in Alberta. First thing, we will borrow $100 million, and we will build roads with it".

Mr. Blackmore: And that would mortgage the oil industry completely.

Mr. Thomas: The people of Alberta did not like it.

Mr. Prudham: And we still have not got the roads.

Mr. Cruickshank: You got the oil, and not the roads.

Mr. Thomas: I will come to that. While we are talking about Liberal policy, I would like to read from the Bank of Canada report which deals with the financial position of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1937.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Cruickshank: Read about British Columbia, too.

Mr. Laing: A Tory report.

Mr. Cruickshank: Look on the other page.

Mr. Thomas: At page 34 we find the summary and conclusions in this Bank of Canada report. Speaking of the period between 1905 and 1922, a period of Liberal administration, the report says:

> After making full allowance for the rapid economic development of the new province, and the legitimate cost of facilities provided by the government to aid and stimulate this development, it remains the case—in our opinion—that the 1905-22 period was characterized by waste, loose administration, and incurrence of debt to an extent which could not be justified even when allowance is made for the optimistic spirit of the times.

Mr. Johnston: And that was Liberalism.

Mr. Thomas: Now, when we have our province in a pretty fair position, they want to start over again and ruin it again for us. The minister also said last night in referring to Alberta that it was oil that had contributed to her wealth, and that policies had nothing to do with it. Well, listen to this same report at page 25:

> By the summer of 1935 Alberta had largely exhausted its liquid and realizable assets in order to meet its chronic cash deficiencies, and when a run on the savings certificates took place in August, 1935, the necessary funds were not available.

That is what it was like when they took over.

Mr. Prudham: That all changed in 1948, though.

Mr. Thomas: Let us just go to 1937, ten years before we had oil in Alberta, and see what the Bank of Canada report says. It says this:

> It is the case, however, that Alberta's budgetary position differs materially from that of the other provinces, by reason of the fact that interest payments have been reduced by 50 per cent, or $3,400,000, and, other things being equal, its cash requirements have been reduced by the same amount.

And then it goes on to say:

> We find that Alberta can maintain its governmental services on as favourable a basis as Manitoba or Saskatchewan without receipt of additional assistance, and we therefore see no basis for recommending that temporary financial aid should be extended by the dominion government.

That was two years after we took over.

Mr. Prudham: You defaulted on your bonds, that is why. That is no credit to you.

Mr. Thomas: You would like to have some of those today, wouldn't you?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, after you found oil.

Mr. Thomas: The minister last night—

Mr. Blackmore: After we found the brains, that was the main thing; brains and character.

Mr. Thomas: The minister last night—

Mr. Cruickshank: You got the characters, all right; we admit that.

Mr. Thomas: The minister last night tried to ridicule the hon. member for Peace River about living in Ottawa.

Mr. Prudham: No, I did not.

Mr. Thomas: He knows, as does every other member in the House of Commons, that it has been the custom for the leaders of groups to live in Ottawa, where they can be close to their work. That has been done by Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit. They have to be close to their work. And if the minister does not know that—well, my goodness—

Mr. Prudham: He never has lived in the constituency.

Mr. Thomas: And he has not run from province to province trying to find a seat he can win.

Mr. Prudham: He has run from constituency to constituency, though.

Mr. Blackmore: But they chose him.

Mr. Shaw: How about your former prime minister?

Mr. Cruickshank: He was a prime minister, not the leader of a little jerkwater joint.

Mr. Thomas: Sour grapes won't help you.

Mr. Bryce: Read what Bruce Hutchison said about him.

Mr. Laing: Leave it over to the next election.

Mr. Thomas: The minister last night made reference to our taking the stand that we have the only Christians, or that we are the only political party in Canada with Christian beliefs. We have never claimed to be the only one.

Mr. Cruickshank: You have so.

Mr. Thomas: No; but we do claim we have Christian principles today in our movement. That is correct.

Mr. Prudham: I said you have no monopoly; that is all.

Mr. Thomas: There is probably a lot of Christianity in the Liberal policy. But the financial set-up that we are labouring under and which the Canadian government adheres to is as anti-Christian as anything could be, and the minister knows it. The Creator placed all things on this earth so that we might use them. They were put there for our use. Yet we are tied down to a financial system which will not allow us to use them. Money was created to use, as a means of distribution of the wealth of this country. Today we find that the productive system of the country is enslaved by the monetary system.

Mr. Laing: Who are these international financiers?

Mr. Blackmore: I will give you a book about them, so you can find out.

Mr. Cruickshank: You send a book, and then you charge 50 cents for it.

Mr. Laing: Tell us now.

Mr. Thomas: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) mentioned funny money. Could there be anything funnier than money that has reduced its value 50 per cent in the last ten years?

Mr. Laing: Explain to us the fair price. What is the fair price?

Mr. Shaw: Funny money—50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Thomas: They talk about the printing press. Every dollar the minister has in his pocket tonight came from the printing press.

Mr. Laing: Explain the meaning of the fair price.

Mr. Thomas: The only difference between Social Credit policy and the policy of the present government is the fact that we use some common sense in the issuing of that money.

Mr. Cruickshank: Our money is good, yours is not; that's the only difference.

Mr. Shaw: Fifty cents for every dollar.

Mr. Cruickshank: And it is good anywhere in the world.

Mr. Shaw: At a 50 per cent discount.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of each session the speech from the throne informs parliament of the matters that will be discussed and forecasts the legislation to be enacted for the good of the country. The speech contains wide, general and sometimes vague statements. One must read between the lines to find out exactly what legislation is proposed. The wider the meaning, the greater opportunity it affords of debating the various aspects of our national problems. This year the speech places before us such important matters as international policy, the St. Lawrence seaway project, radio television, international trade, and so forth. Before expressing an opinion on one or two of those problems which are so important to Canadians I should like to add my congratulations to those already offered to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) and to the seconder, the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) upon the manner in which they have discharged a difficult task. They have won the admiration of this house and have fully justified the confidence placed in them by the electors of their respective constituencies.

I should like also to congratulate the two hon. gentlemen who have been appointed members of the government. I refer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) who is an Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) who is our new Minister of Fisheries. I have no doubt that both of these gentlemen will carry out their duties with competence and with the highest standards of responsibility.

I want to extend a welcome to our new colleagues the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque). Their presence in this chamber is evidence that hon. members opposite are in a brown study if they think the Liberal party has lost any of its strength in the province of Quebec.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in my mother tongue about a matter that has already been dealt with by the hon. members for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) and for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). It is about a great Canadian, Mr. Henri Bourassa. In doing so, I must not forget that one of his friends, Mr. Paul-Emile Lamarche, was member for Nicolet-Yamaska from 1911 to 1917 and I should also recall to the house that Mr. Paul-Emile Lamarche was always true to Mr. Bourassa.

As I said a moment ago, the hon. members for Labelle and for Portneuf paid a well-deserved tribute to Mr. Bourassa. At the turn of the century, I was too young to accept or reject Mr. Bourassa's ideas. However I had occasion to meet him during the course of my legal practice and I always had much admiration and sympathy for his wide talent and his spirited oratory. He was a dangerous politician and he will be remembered.

A friend of Laurier, he fought against him and then made friends again. He deserves that we honour his memory, that we remember him as a man of exceptional culture, constantly inspired by a strong desire to clash with someone on the ideological field.

In the course of the last debates in which he took part, he voted against the party to which the hon. member for Labelle is quite proud and happy to belong. I am sorry that he is not in his seat tonight. On a matter of great interest, trade relations between Great Britain and the commonwealth, Mr. Bourassa spoke as follows, on May 15, 1930. I quote from page 2127 of Hansard:

> "I sympathize with the English, I think the world would be worse if England disappeared, the world would suffer if English power were too greatly weakened. However, it is ridiculous, it is the thought of a parvenu or of a child who has not measured his strength, to imagine that we can settle the affairs of England. Let us rather come back to the thought which has been frequently expressed by the leader of this government and by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): Let us frame our policy first to suit ourselves, but frame it with an open eye, so that we may deal preferentially with people who are prepared to deal with us. I wish to state that there is no people on earth with whom I would rather deal, or with whom I would rather commune mentally or politically, than the British people.

At this very moment, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are in England where they are attending a conference which will deal with problems similar to those we had to face in 1930. There is no doubt, on this side of the house, that our representatives will take stands consistent with the best traditions of our party and in the best interest of our country. We do not see very well how our relations with Great Britain and the nations of the commonwealth could affect our actual sovereignty and the authority of our parliament over our own affairs as a nation. It is difficult to understand what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) meant when he said, during the present debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as reported on page 28 of Hansard:

> Our real sovereignty and full authority over our own affairs as a nation will depend in very large measure on the extent to which the Canadian government succeeds in reopening the commonwealth and sterling markets so that our trade is better balanced, and we have some freedom of action in the event of economic storms in the United States or acting at any time by their government which might interrupt the flow of our exports. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate any intention on the part of the government to take appropriate action in pursuance of this great need.

It is strange that the Leader of the Opposition could have spoken of centralization in connection with relations between the government and the provinces, when, in his opinion, our sovereignty as a nation would be threatened if we failed to resume trade relations with England and the commonwealth countries. Does it mean that our sovereignty is still partly dependent on Great Britain? If that were the case, it would be imperative for the hon. member from Labelle to shed his Harlequin's coat. His nationalism is closely akin to that of those who betrayed Bourassa and of whom he complained all his life.

(Text):

I should like to deal with some of the international problems. What emerges most strikingly from the speech from the throne, the terms, aspects and forecasts of which we are now studying, are policies both national and international. There are very few questions which are not in one way or another linked up with the unsettled and threatening international situation. Certain problems which seem to be of a purely local economic nature become interwoven with conditions that arise in distant or neighbouring countries. For instance, the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease was a local affair, but that was followed by an embargo imposed by the government of the United States which made inoperative for a time a trade agreement of international character.

Canada was blessed with a bumper crop this year, but our western farmers will not benefit unless it is disposed of in the markets of the world under our trade agreements. Again this is a matter of policy at the international level.

I have already stated that in the international field the situation is confused, uncertain and even gloomy. The Korean war does not seem to have given rise, in so far as the democratic countries are concerned, to an emotional reaction which would cause this struggle to be considered by the people involved as a holy war, one which falls well within the terms of the first paragraph of article 1 of the United Nations charter signed at San Francisco on June 26, 1945. This article reads as follows:

> The purposes of the United Nations are:
> 1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace.

When the United Nations charter was signed a wave of confidence swept over the world. It seemed to us all that at last the whole globe would be delivered from the nightmare of war and that the peoples of the world, having walked a bloody path for so long, would at length understand how to adapt civilization to modern conditions, would be capable of establishing an international sovereignty based on a peaceful rule of law, with no recourse to armaments more shocking and terrifying than the fires of heaven. Yet, unfortunately, nothing has changed except for the worse. Russia, thanks to its communist agents, has managed to bring into its sphere of influence, through devious means incorporating blackmail and threats, would-be free nations such as Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Roumania, to speak of Europe. In Asia we have China, this inexhaustible reservoir of human beings whose poverty and fatalism may in time make possible the formation of immense armies ready to undertake violent wars of conquest at Russia's behest in the name of that materialistic ideology which, so to speak, divorces the human spirit from its true function, which is thought, and weds it instead to a doctrine of blind animal subservience. The docility and servility of these armies would turn them into instruments of mass murder and destruction.
