The Rival Clansmen

A Scottish Vendetta.

CHAPTER XVI.

NED GORDON SEETHS AT M'KENZIE—A NEW CONSPIRACY.

When Hector and Gordon again looked up—tears dimmed their eyes—Roderick M'Leod stood before them, uttering deep and loud lamentations as he saw that the Chief he loved so well was no more. And then the shouting of the advancing band was for a moment hushed as he turned towards them, and cried aloud in mournful accents—

"Clansmen of M'Leod!—kinsmen, sound the death chant! Our Chief is dead, and with his dying breath he thanked God that he had been spared to see us again! His thoughts were with us; let ours be with him."

Then did they burst forth again—not the loud triumphant cry now, but shouts of grief, deep moans, and lamentations, as the M'Leods clustered round the two young men, who still bore in their arms the fast stiffening body of their Chief. "Ochone achree! Ochone—ochone—ochone achree! And is the great M'Leod no more? And is his voice hushed forever and his eagle eye closed? Ochone achree. Woe is this night in the house of M'Leod."

Then did they burst forth with a strangely weird and plaintive tone melody—an air solemn but inspiring—in which all joined, each face lit up with a heroic devotion blending with an expression of melancholy sadness. Then as the last sound floated away on the air and the final echo sent back its answering chorus from the far distant hills, all uncovered and stood with bowed heads and reverent bearing around all that was mortal of Malcolm M'Leod. And when again the bonnets were replaced and the heads raised, the traces of tears which had coursed down browned and furrowed cheeks thick and fast were easily to be distinguished.

But it is necessary that we should here explain, to the very few who have already surmised it, who these were who had approached with the sounds of joy and triumph, and who now stood by the dead body of the Chief. They were, then, a number of those who had been given up by our friends for lost in the dark waters of Loch Maree. They had had a narrow escape from the fate which was believed to have befallen them, but still they had escaped.

The boat farthest to the westward had not been so completely settled as the others, and the clay which had been stuffed into the holes made in the bottom by the Caterans had kept firmly in its place, the result being that by constant being its occupants, amongst whom was Roderick M'Leod, were able to keep the boat afloat, although it lay almost level with the water.

When they saw the other boats go down, and realised the terrible nature of the catastrophe which had occurred, and when they saw the Caterans dancing on the shore with levish glee at the success of their diabolical work, they resolved to head for some of the isles in the centre of the loch, as they were afraid that on the side they were approaching some of the outlaws might be lying in ambush ready to pounce upon them whenever they should land. After extraordinary efforts they succeeded in landing upon the nearest isle, where they resolved to conceal themselves until night, when they expected to be able to make for the shore. From this spot they saw M'Leod and his two companions pass along by south shore, pursued by the Caterans; but, as they could render no assistance to their Chief, they made no demonstration. But after waiting some time longer they saw to their joy, on the north side of the loch, several figures moving along dressed in the tartan of the M'Leods. They at once signalled them, and the reply was such as to remove any doubt as to their really being their kinsmen. Eagerly those on the isle set about patching up their boat, and in a short time had launched her and embarked, and, although every minute in imminent danger of sinking, they were successful in reaching land and in joining their comrades.

It was then they realised the full extent of the loss sustained by the clan. As they stood there they numbered only twenty men—all that were saved besides the Chief, his son, and Gordon, out of over forty who had embarked in the boats. Those whom Roderick and his companions had seen had saved themselves by swimming to the north shore, which was nearest to them—the other shore, which M'Leod and the others had made for, being much more distant. Roderick then told them that the Chief, with Hector and Gordon, had escaped from the loch, but they were pursued by the Caterans, and immediately, exhausted as they were by the gallant attempt resolved to make with all speed for Castle M'Leod. The boat could not be trusted to carry them across the loch again, and as there was danger of being met by the Caterans if they passed the upper end of the loch, they at once started westward; and as this involved a journey of nearly forty miles before they could reach Castle M'Leod besides having to ford the river Ewe, they did not expect to reach their destination before the afternoon had far advanced. They pressed swiftly on, for although that portion which had escaped in the boat succeeded in retaining most of their arms, yet the others were totally unarmed, and besides, being so much fatigued, they felt that could not make a good defence in case of being attacked, and therefore wisely used every effort to escape from the vicinity of the Caterans and those whom they believed to be their allies—the M'Kenzies.
