I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Lionel Massey,
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
The Senate,
Ottawa

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mr. Brunt, the Senate adjourned until 2.50 p.m.

SECOND SITTING

The Senate met at 2.50 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Second Session of the Twenty-fourth Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

I welcome you as you foregather to resume your parliamentary duties.

All Canadians look forward with the greatest pleasure to the forthcoming visit to Canada of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness, the Prince Philip, on the occasion of the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. It is particularly gratifying that Her Majesty also plans to visit all the provinces and the two territories in order to meet her Canadian subjects in many parts of our country.

Canada's close relations with the other countries of the commonwealth, and the sense of community of interest within this association of free nations itself, have been confirmed and vitalized by the recent visit of my Prime Minister to the commonwealth capitals of the United Kingdom, Pakistan, India, Ceylon, Malaya, Singapore, Australia and New Zealand. These consultations between heads of government provided an opportunity for an exchange of views on international questions, on the possibilities for expanding trade and on other problems of mutual concern.

Canadians recognize that the most pressing need of all nations is an enduring peace. My Government will continue to work steadfastly and in a spirit of genuine co-operation towards the settlement of outstanding issues which threaten that peace.

My ministers are concerned over recent developments in the Berlin situation. They deplore the attempt by the Soviet Union to abrogate unilaterally the inter-allied agreements relating to Berlin, and they believe that the freedom of West Berlin must be assured pending agreement on the establishment of a united and free Germany.

My ministers have been pleased to note that some advance has been made during the past year in the vital field of disarmament. The drafting of an agreement for the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests is a hopeful beginning.

It is Canada's desire that the scientific achievements which now have made possible the penetration of outer space should be a blessing to all mankind. My Government is convinced that international agreement must be reached without delay to ensure that outer space is used only for peaceful purposes with full co-operation among all nations.

In concert with its allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canada has reaffirmed its determination to maintain and improve the power of the alliance as a deterrent against aggression. You will be asked to provide for maintaining the effective power of Canada's defence forces. The importance of the alliance was re-emphasized by the visit of my Prime Minister to the United Kingdom, France, West Germany and Italy. His consultations with the heads of government in those countries included trade and economic policies, as well as the more general questions confronting the alliance.

Discussions are taking place with the Government of the United States to enable Canadian industry to share in the production of equipment being procured by the United States for joint defence purposes.

My ministers continue to recognize the necessity of providing economic assistance to under-developed nations. Approval will be sought for the appropriations needed for this purpose, so that Canada may play its full part in helping the emerging states of Asia and Africa, particularly those in the commonwealth.

My ministers expect that the increases which have been proposed in the resources of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund will be approved by the votes of the member countries and when that has occurred you will be asked to approve the necessary legislation to implement these important measures for improving the facilities for financing world trade and economic development.

In response to suggestions put forward by my Government, a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference was held in Montreal last September. This meeting, one of the most important in the history of the commonwealth, was attended by ministers representing the self-governing nations of the commonwealth and the countries now looking forward to obtaining full sovereignty. A large measure of agreement was reached on trade and economic matters. This has led to far-reaching decisions on the part of the United Kingdom and other countries to restore convertibility of their currencies and to remove restrictions on imports.

My Government has taken action to reduce unemployment by expediting national works programs, by programs undertaken in co-operation with the provinces, and by encouraging Canadians generally to undertake constructive activities particularly in the winter season. You will be asked to assist the municipalities of Canada in the financing of work on construction projects which would not otherwise have been undertaken during the winter months.

Certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be submitted to you.

My Government welcomes the evidence of recovery from the recession and will continue to foster and assist this improvement. They believe that as recovery proceeds there will be increasing need for care to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency.

My Government will continue in its economic policies to lay emphasis upon national development. My ministers believe that by the wise use of the resources with which nature has endowed this country, Canadians can achieve a continually rising standard of living. My Government will therefore foster and encourage the proper development and use of these resources and the growth of efficient industry based upon them. Many projects for national development have already been put in hand; you will be asked to vote the supply necessary to continue these projects and to initiate others.

Additional legislation in the field of agriculture will be recommended. A measure will be laid before you to institute a system of crop insurance in co-operation with such provinces as so desire. You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

You will be asked to enact a Bill of Rights which will make manifest the intent that fundamental rights and freedoms shall prevail and remain inviolate in all matters within the competence of Parliament.

At the earliest opportunity you will be invited to authorize the establishment of a National Energy Board to ensure, so far as it lies within the jurisdiction of Parliament, that Canada's energy resources are used effectively and prudently to the best advantage of Canadians.

My ministers have been gratified to see the all-time record in house construction which has been made possible by Government loans under the National Housing Act.

They will recommend to you further amendments to that act to continue this program and to encourage the flow of private funds into mortgages.

For the purpose of increasing the range and effectiveness of the guarantees provided for financing exports, you will be asked to make certain amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act.

My Government will place before you certain amendments to the laws respecting trade practices.

You will be asked to consider a bill containing numerous amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

My Government will request your approval of its participation in a contributory plan to provide medical benefits for civil servants pursuant to recommendations of the National Joint Council of the Public Service.

A comprehensive review of the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act will be proposed and amendments to ensure that veteran farmers also can take greater advantage of modern agricultural practices. Amendments to the Veterans Rehabilitation Act and the War Service Grants Act will also be recommended.

My Government will recommend an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for another year the increase made last year in the provincial share of personal income tax revenue.

My Government proposes that the entire subject of financial relations between the dominion and the provinces shall receive continued active co-operative study. All provincial Governments are being asked to agree to the use, for this purpose, of the machinery of the existing Federal-Provincial Continuing Committee on Fiscal and Economic Matters working under the direction of a committee consisting of the Minister of Finance and all provincial Treasurers.

My ministers will recommend to you action to alleviate the discriminatory effects of the recent horizontal increase in freight rates.

Recommendations for a number of changes in the Criminal Code will be placed before you including some to strengthen the provisions respecting obscene literature.

My ministers will propose to you measures to revise the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to revise and consolidate the relevant pension provisions.

You will be asked to approve a statute to authorize the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers of the Crown.

My Government will put forward a resolution to establish a Joint Committee of both houses to review the Indian Act and the administration of Indian affairs.

A recommendation will be placed before you for a statute to continue on a permanent basis the supplementary pensions for retired civil servants, members of the armed services and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that were provided on an interim basis by an appropriation last year.

My ministers will recommend an increase in the total funds that may be expended under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

You will be asked to revise the Seeds Act, to approve and implement by statute an agreement with the Province of New Brunswick concerning Indian lands, and to extend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act for a further three years.

You will also be asked to amend the Northwest Territories Act, the Public Lands Grants Act, the National Defence Act, the Defence Services Pension Act, the Broadcasting Act, the Public Servants Inventions Act and certain other statutes.

Members of the House of Commons,

You will be invited to establish a special committee of the House to review broadcasting policy and operations.

It will be proposed that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections review the Elections Act in preparation for subsequent legislation.

It will also be proposed that the question of ensuring the use of humane methods in the slaughtering of animals be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for consideration.

You will be asked to appropriate the sums required for carrying on the government of Canada during the next fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence bless you and guide you in your duties.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ROYAL VISIT

ITINERARY OF TOUR OF CANADA BY THE QUEEN AND PRINCE PHILIP

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, at this time I think I should make a brief statement with respect to the royal visit.

You are no doubt all aware of the coming visit to Canada of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and His Royal Highness Prince Philip. During that visit Her Majesty will officiate at ceremonies being held in connection with opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Our Queen is expected to arrive in Canada, in the province of Newfoundland, on or about the 18th day of June, and will be in Ottawa on July 1st for the purpose of celebrating our national birthday. The royal party will spend some six weeks in Canada, and during that period will visit many parts of this country which have never been visited before by any King or Queen of Canada.

I have just received from the office of the Prime Minister a copy of the itinerary, which, with the leave of the house, I will table and ask that it be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard, so that all honourable senators will have a copy of it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

See Appendix "A" to today's Hansard, pp. 12-15.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It stands to reason that more details as to dates, times, proceedings and other matters will be furnished in the near future, shortly before the visit.

In my opinion, honourable senators, this visit will be one of the great events of Canadian history. It is my hope that, if this session of Parliament is about ready to be prorogued before Her Majesty leaves Canada for her return home, she will be able to preside here on that occasion.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we all agree with the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that the itinerary should appear in our Hansard so that it will be available to every member of the Senate. If there is a motion I will second it now. I am sure all honourable senators were very pleased to read in the press some time ago that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip will visit Canada this summer, and now we are happy to hear this news made official by the announcement just made by the honourable Leader of the Government.

I join with the honourable leader in expressing the wish that Her Majesty will be able to prorogue Parliament when she is in Ottawa, on July 1. I would suggest that no time of Parliament at this session should be wasted on unnecessary debate which might prevent that event from taking place. I can assure the honourable Leader of the Government that no unnecessary debate will take place from this side of the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps the Government will bring down its legislation in time this session.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I know there is quite a feeling of disappointment throughout he land, especially on the part of many young people, because Prince Charles, the Prince of Wales, and his lovely little sister, Princess Anne, will not accompany their royal parents to Canada. However, on account of their ages I think that a visit by them at this time would not be advisable. But I feel sure that all Canadians look forward to the day when we can welcome to our shores not only our beloved Sovereign and Prince Philip, but also the heir to the throne and Princess Anne.

THE LATE SENATOR NICOL

TRIBUTES

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the regular work this evening I have a sad duty to perform, and that is to refer to the passing of the late Honourable Senator Jacob Nicol.

Senator Nicol was a great friend of most of us in this chamber, and we all regretted very much to learn of his death on September 23 last, very shortly after the last session of Parliament was prorogued. I had been intimately acquainted with him for more than fifteen years. His room in the Senate was next door to the one occupied by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) and myself for twenty years or more, and whenever Senator Nicol came to Ottawa to attend to his business here he visited us, and we learned from him many of the wonderful things that had happened to him during his lifetime. He told us about his university career—how he had gone to, I think, three universities, and graduated from all of them, and he explained to us the letters which appear after his name in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide—more letters, I would say, than appear after the name of any other senator, namely, B.A., LL.M., Q.C., D.C.L.,

LL.D. After graduating from the universities, he qualified as an advocate in the province of Quebec, and practised for many years in the Sherbrooke district, where he was exceptionally well known to our honourable colleague from Wellington, (Hon. Mr. Howard). Senator Nicol told us about his legal affairs, and from what he said I gathered that he was very successful; in fact, he used his profession as a lawyer to advance himself in many of his business connections. Then a little later he stood for the legislature in the province of Quebec and was elected in 1921, and immediately became, so I am informed, Provincial Treasurer, which office he held until 1929. At that time he was named to the Legislative Council of Quebec, and this appointment he held up to the time of his death. He was, therefore, a member of the Legislative Council of Quebec when he became a member of the Senate of Canada, and his is the distinction of having remained a member of both houses over the intervening years. In other words, he continued to function in both capacities.

During the time that he was practising law and building up a business he became interested in newspaper work and he established and managed four daily newspapers in the province of Quebec. But shortly after coming to this house he advised me that he had sold out his interests and that he was going to give his whole attention to his political duties.

Senator Nicol was, in my opinion, a very kindly man. He was generous to a fault. He believed in helping those people who helped themselves, but he was not inclined to be so generous to people who were not doing their best to get along. He was a shrewd businessman. He was tolerant in all his dealings, both political and otherwise. He was a hard worker, spending most of his time at business, and his only real relaxation, according to his close friends, was that of fishing.

As soon as I heard the sad news of his demise I wrote to his widow, Madame Nicol, and I now wish to express the sincere sympathy and regrets of the members on this side of the house at his passing.

Senator Nicol was a faithful representative of the province of Quebec and his own district in this house, and we shall miss him very much indeed.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, when parliament was prorogued last September Senator Nicol was a very sick man—in fact, he was critically ill—and we did not think that he would recover. Therefore, it did not come to us as a great surprise when we learned that he had passed away on September 23.

I would like to join with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in extending my very deep sympathy to his widow and other dear ones.

I had known Senator Nicol before coming to this house. I believe I met him about the year 1945. At that time Mr. L. O. Breithaupt, who later became Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, conceived the idea of restoring the boyhood home of the late Right Honourable Mackenzie King—who was alive at that time —at Kitchener, Ontario. He called a meeting of a number of members of the House of Commons and of this house to consider the matter. One matter that had to be decided at the meeting was how the necessary money would be raised, and I realized then that Senator Nicol was a man of wide business experience. He remained a friend of mine from the first time I met him until the last day I saw him in this house.

I had another association with Senator Nicol, in connection with mutual friends. The late senator attended McMaster University, which was then in Toronto, and also Woodstock College, at Woodstock, Ontario. Very dear friends of his lived in my home city of Brantford, and he corresponded with them throughout the years. On every occasion when I returned from Brantford to Ottawa he would ask me about his friends in Brantford, and likewise when I went to Brantford they would ask me about him. In that way we felt we had something in common.

Senator Nicol was a scholar with a keen mind; he was indeed a man of great intelligence. The three universities from which he graduated were McMaster, Laval and Bishop's. The Leader of the Government has told us something of the late senator's outstanding contribution as a member of the Quebec Legislature. He has also told us about his interest in journalism. The late senator was president and publisher of three daily newspapers: Le Soleil and L'Evenement Journal of Quebec; Le Nouveliste of Three Rivers, and La Tribune of Sherbrooke.

Senator Nicol took a great interest in the financial affairs of our country, and he had a direct association with many financial organizations. He was vice-president of the Canadian National Bank, Montreal; vice-president of the Trust General of Canada, Montreal; a director of Sherbrooke Trust Company, Sherbrooke, Quebec, and president and a director of several insurance companies.

The services of Senator Nicol to his country were recognized when he was created by France a Knight of the Legion of Honour.

A scholar, a businessman and a statesman, Senator Nicol passed away in his eighty-third year. He had indeed served his country well.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, as the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has remarked, the member of this chamber who was most intimately acquainted with our late colleague Senator Jacob Nicol is the senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard). They lived in the same city, the beautiful city of Sherbrooke in the Eastern Townships of the province of Quebec, and for many years, they were very closely associated in political and business life and in other respects.

As honourable senators perhaps know, Senator Howard is not at the moment in the best of health, although he expects to be able to attend the sittings of the Senate before long. He wrote to my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) enclosing a tribute to his old friend Senator Nicol, asking that a member of this house should read that tribute to the house. That duty has now fallen upon me. Perhaps it is not an altogether fortuitous thing, for after all I come from the same province as Senator Howard and the late Senator Nicol; and on one occasion some years ago I had the advantage of enjoying the charming hospitality of the late Senator Nicol and his wife at their house in Sherbrooke.

Now I shall, with permission, read this tribute that one old friend pays to another:

"The death of Senator Jacob Nicol does not solely affect the members of his family. The district where he lived, the province of Quebec, and the whole country lose a prominent citizen whose extensive activity greatly contributed to the progress of our nation. He was one of those few men in a generation who made a success of everything they undertook, through their rare combination of talents.

"A native of the Eastern Townships, this district which is called a province within the province of Quebec, he was born in a modest family where he acquired a love for work, a sound judgment and exceptional broadmindedness, which qualities account for his subsequent success in the political and business world. In the Legislature and in the Legislative Council of Quebec, as well as in the Senate he never deviated from the line of conduct which his duties imposed upon him; his political opponents as well as his friends are unanimous in admitting that he was a great Canadian.

"Successively provincial member for Richmond and Compton, Provincial Treasurer, Minister without Portfolio, President of the Quebec Legislative Council and member of the Senate of Canada, he showed exceptional talents which were frequently called upon by his colleagues.

"His influence was widely felt in his native Eastern Townships, to whose development he contributed to a marked degree. He had faith in the future of his district where French- and English-speaking Canadians live in full harmony and work together toward the prosperity of their province and their country. Due to his energy, his extraordinary capacity for work and his sound judgment, during more than half a century, he spared no effort to establish and administer enterprises and institutions which today constitute the greatest monument to the grandeur of his conceptions.

"He founded a French language daily newspaper in Sherbrooke, and actively interested himself in newspaper work to the extent that during several years he was publisher of four dailies who owe to him most of the prestige they presently enjoy. When radio came into existence, Senator Nicol soon understood the importance of this new means of communication. He closely followed its developments and in 1937 he gave the Eastern Townships their first local broadcasting station. Soon after, an English language station was established in order to provide for the needs of both racial groups of the population. He also interested himself in television and followed all its progress. It is due to him that the city of Sherbrooke can boast of having an excellent television station.

"While working for his district, he also worked for his province and his country. Therefore it is not surprising that his influence soon spread beyond the limits of his district in order to encompass wider horizons. To business activities he added politics, in which he took an active part from 1928 until his death. He was one of the last citizens of his province to hold both the office of member of the Quebec Legislative Council and member of the Senate of Canada.

"But a man with such a wide-ranging mind could not restrict himself to a few aspects of our national life. He also interested himself in finance, as director or president of various insurance and trust companies, and in educational problems. Since he had had to work to pay for his secondary studies and his university training, he made it a point of duty to show his generosity toward all those who were worthy of it, and today many may be grateful to him for having been able to enjoy the benefits of advanced studies. He considered the cause of education to be extremely important, and many universities recognized this fact by awarding him honorary doctor's degrees.

"We are mourning the passing of a man who will rank high in the history of our country and particularly in the history of his province. He leaves behind him seeds which will continue to grow and bear fruit and which will benefit future generations.

Few men may claim this privilege and know how to use it for the general advantage. The honourable Senator Jacob Nicol was one of those persons, and he applied for the good of his compatriots the exceptional talents which Providence had bestowed upon him. He was an honourable citizen and a great Canadian."

That, honourable senators, is the tribute of one old friend to another; and all that I can do is to associate myself in every way with the words that I have just spoken, and to join with the two leaders in expressing our condolences to his family.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I would not like to let this occasion pass by without a French-speaking voice joining with that of my colleagues to express our sadness at the loss we have sustained.

I met Senator Nicol severay years ago at a time when he had already attained the pinnacle of success to which reference has been made in the speeches which we have just heard. He had the talent of bringing order in to everything he undertook. After seeing him at work in the field of finance as well as politics, I felt a great admiration for so gifted a man.

Senator Nicol, as was pointed out, had a very modest background. He travelled the sometimes difficult road of life without ever hurting or harming anyone, and in the various fields of his activity he showed talent, judgment and a driving energy for work which explain his great success and which led him to the highest place in Canadian politics and finance.

He was endowed with so much judgment that I am not surprised tonight to see that our English-speaking compatriots claim him as one of their own. As Provincial Treasurer of the province of Quebec, he occupied a post which had, until then, always been filled by an English-speaking person. In Quebec, however, perhaps even more than in the Eastern Townships, he was considered as a French-speaking citizen; indeed, the four daily newspapers he owned were published in French. Born of a family which considered the English language as its mother tongue, he had such a sound judgment that he managed to publish four French newspapers in four of the important cities of the province of Quebec, without ever annoying or offending the population, in majority French-Canadian, which he tried to educate through his newspapers.

In the field of finance, he was one of the most influential men of the province of Quebec and his reputation certainly extended far beyond the limits of that province. As a politician and a business man he was widely appreciated. But it should be pointed out that after having climbed, as I said a moment ago, the sometimes difficult paths of life and having become well to do, he was one of the most charitable and the most generous men one could hope to meet. No one will ever know the number of families he helped, the number of young men who owe their education to him, the people to whom he gave not only sympathy, but often the things they could not do without and which he gave in such a way as not to humiliate them; very often it was Senator Nicol who helped these people to save their reputation and to keep a reasonable attitude toward life.

His achievements in the political field were undoubtedly due to his sound judgment and great talents. While representing a riding which was mostly English-speaking, he acquired in the Legislature at Quebec and also in the Legislative Council an extraordinary reputation. And in the Senate, all those who met him or who had anything to do with him soon came to trust him and often had recourse to his advice.

I take pleasure in joining with all my English- and French-speaking compatriots to say that, while Senator Nicol was one of our most highly esteemed citizens, we French Canadians found him most generous and will never forget him. I join with those who have spoken before me in offering Mrs. Nicol and the members of her family our most sincere sympathy. I would like them to know how deeply we will miss one of our wisest counsellors, whose memory will linger on.

(Text):

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, as a fellow newspaper publisher of the late Senator Nicol, I feel I should say a few words for the record in regard to his newspaper publishing ability. In addition to being a very fine senator and able lawyer, Senator Nicol was also a most successful newspaper publisher. The story of his start and his success as he used to tell it, and as he has probably told it to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on various occasions, is a fascinating one. He believed in picking good men for his newspaper staffs. He was honoured by his fellow newspaper publishers by being made a director of the Canadian Press, which is a dominion-wide news gathering organization. He also assisted the Canadian Press and the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, which is concerned with the commercial side of the newspaper business, by permitting two of his most capable employees to take high positions in those organizations. The editor of his Quebec newspaper became president of the Canadian Press, a position he held for two years. The manager of his newspaper in Three Rivers became president of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association. They took these offices not only with the concurrence of Senator Nicol but with his most hearty co-operation.

I can assure honourable senators that the newspaper publishers of this country valued most highly the advice and help of Senator Nicol, because he had been so successful himself. He published good, clean newspapers, and as a newspaper publisher I am very pleased at this time to pay him this tribute.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present to the Senate the report of the Parliamentary Librarian to the Second Session of the Twenty-Fourth Parliament.

Ordered, that the report be tabled.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table some 25 documents and reports, as follows:

The Canada Gazette, Part II, Statutory Orders and Regulations, 1958, as follows:

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Last year I was criticized, I believe by the honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), for not reading to the house the titles of documents I was tabling. It was for that reason I did not ask to have the reading of the titles dispensed with now. However, with the consent of honourable members I will not read the list of documents on this occasion because it would probably take me 20 minutes to do so. Is it the wish of honourable senators that I table these documents now, on the understanding that the full list of them will appear in tomorrow's Minutes of Proceedings?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: On division.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Before the documents are tabled I would like to know if the so-called "hidden report" is included amongst them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have taken certain steps in that connection and I will see what I can do about it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is it not included in those documents? I understand it was tabled in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did make certain inquiries about it but I was not aware that it was included. However, I believe now that it is. I hope honourable senators will not ask me in the future to remember every one of the reports and documents that I table. I am going to keep in my desk a list of them so that if I am asked I will be able to refresh my memory without looking up official proceedings of the Senate.

I wish to say that among the documents tabled this evening is the Report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada, dated December 1958, entitled: "Personnel Administration in the Public Service". The French translation of this report is in mimeographed form and does not contain the appendixes shown in the printed copy in English. The printed copy of the French text of the report and the appendixes thereto will be available from the Queen's Printer in about two weeks' time and I shall place them before the house.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I will not ask a question but I would put once more the same reminder on record about the famous speech delivered at Edmonton last June by Dr. W. Kaye Lamb, Dominion Archivist, in which he said the worthy biographies of Canadians could be counted on the fingers of one hand. I wonder if that speech is among the reports that the honourable leader has tabled?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, it would not be.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: This is just a reminder.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine presented Bill S-2, to amend the Public Lands Grants Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In case honourable senators would like a brief explanation of this bill, I may say that it has to do with the method of transferring land from Canada to a province. I understand that in the past this was done by way of issuing a patent from Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the Dominion of Canada to Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the province to whom the land had been transferred. It has been thought for some time that this is not the proper way to do it, and all this bill does is set out a different way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And what is the different way?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: By order in council.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thursday next.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine presented Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, this bill is much more complicated than the one I have just presented and explained, in that it consists of a large number of varied technical amendments of the type which are made periodically to bring this large act up to date and to improve its operation. This act, by the way, was introduced in the Senate quite a number of years ago, and passed through this house first.

Perhaps one of the main matters which is included in this bill is the amendment in respect of marine pilotage on the Great Lakes and in general.

A more detailed explanation of the varied and technical amendments will be given on second reading, and it will be possible for honourable senators to obtain any technical information they desire in committee, from expert witnesses.

That is all the explanation I am prepared to give at the present moment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thursday next.

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

Hon. George S. White presented the first report of the Committee of Selection.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session make their first report, as follows:

Your committee have the honour to submit herewith the list of senators selected by them to serve on the Standing Committee on Divorce, namely:

The Honourable Senators *Aseltine, Baird, Barbour, Burchill, Cameron, Croll, Emerson, Euler, Farquhar, Farris, Fergusson, Gershaw, Golding, Haig, Hodges, Horner, Howard, Howden, Isnor, Kinley, *Macdonald, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Taylor (Westmorland) and Thorvaldson. (23) *Ex officio members.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. White: With leave I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before this report goes through, I have just a remark to make about the selection of senators for the membership of their committees. I do not disagree with the selection for the Divorce Committee, but I think that it is unfair to members of the Senate who attend as regularly as they can at the sittings of the Senate to have placed on the membership of committees the names of senators who come here just for the opening and prorogation. There are two kinds of senators, those who attend the sittings of the Senate regularly and those who come very seldom. The fact that we have on the membership of committees—for there are large committees of 50 members, and others of 25—the names of senators who do not attend regularly, or as regularly as most of us do, at the sittings of the Senate, precludes other senators who would like to be members of such committee from helping when they can. I make that suggestion so as not to embarrass those senators who do not come often, perhaps for very good reasons, and are at home instead of being here when the Senate is sitting. If their names are on a committee and they receive a notice when they are at home, they will think "The committee is sitting today, and I am very sorry that I am not attending the meeting, where I should be, as I have allowed my name to be put on the membership list." It seems to me, honourable senators, that you would render a signal service to those very members and you would relieve their conscience by not putting their names on the membership of any such committee, and this would give a chance to other members to belong to those committees.

I see the names of senators who come here for the opening and prorogation on five, six or seven committees, while other members who come here regularly are named to serve on two or three. I am not going to insist about it—I leave it to your spirit of fairness.

Some of you may say that the personal opinion that I have expressed lacks delicacy and sweet manner but we are here to speak to each other as men, and the time seems to have arrived for that when members who make sacrifices to be here are left aside while others who stay at home, and perhaps for very good reason, take the place of those who come here. That is all I have to say.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine, with leave of the Senate, moved:

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, it gives me a great deal of pleasure and I feel honoured in being given the opportunity by the Leader of the Senate and members of the Senate to move the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I would like to refer to the round-the-world trip of the Prime Minister to meet the heads of the commonwealth countries, and I am sure everyone will feel that, coupled with the trip made by the previous Prime Minister, great benefit will come to Canada and the empire. I foresee a time in the not too distant future, when, through our common ties to the Crown, the empire will become the third major power in the world; first, especially if the countries of the empire unite in a common effort to develop and make use of all the scientific ideas which are coming to the fore so rapidly. Each of the two great powers that we see—the United States to the south of us and the Soviet Union to the north—is a vast bloc with a tremendous concentration of wealth in one area. In this way they are able to develop these new ideas of missiles, sputniks and so forth. But, honourable senators, if the countries of our British Empire were to unite in their scientific ideas and develop these things as a unit—if they were to work together, each sharing the cost, I believe that this empire would do just as well as these other two great nations. Secondly, the convertibility of funds by Great Britain indicates that the sterling area is now in a position to consider an easier flow of trade among all parts of the empire. Both these things—the sharing of scientific ideas and the better flow of trade—should very quickly add to the wealth and power of the Commonwealth.

Prior to the two great wars most countries in the world looked to the United Kingdom for leadership in finance and in government. The cost of these wars, however, brought Britain to her knees; yet, at the same time, brought forward two other great nations, our neighbours to the south and the Soviet Union. A great many people felt that we, in keeping with previous empires that we have read about in history, were on the downgrade and would eventually become a second or third-rate power and, in time, through neglect or indifference, would disintegrate. Little did we or the rest of the world realize that the vitality which had made this the greatest empire was now building up, and with the help of discussions of common interest and meetings of our leaders of the various parts, we again see the empire recovering from those great wounds suffered on behalf of the preservation of peace and our way of life. Once again, we will emerge as a force for the good of mankind in the world.

Another point in this connection which indicates the growing importance of Canada in world affairs was the meeting held in Washington just recently for an exchange of ideas by members of both houses in Ottawa and Washington. This came about as a result of a statement made in the House of Commons by our own Prime Minister and also made by one of the United States senators in Washington. As a result of this statement a steering committee was set up which consisted of a few members of this body and of the House of Commons, headed by, as we are proud to note, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons. A similar small committee was set up in Washington representing the Senate and the House of Representatives. These two bodies met very recently in Washington and have worked out a plan and an agenda for a future and much larger committee, which is expected to meet sometime during this year. This again shows, as I mentioned before, the great and growing importance of Canada in international affairs.

Honourable senators, I would like to say something with regard to agriculture in western Canada, particularly referring to Saskatchewan, in which province I have lived for the greater part of my life. I would like to paint a word picture of the progress which has been made by the farmers of that province within the past 60 to 65 years.

At the beginning of the twentieth century there was a great rush to that province from eastern Canada, western United States and Europe, to take up homesteads. In those days one picked out 160 acres, or a quarter section of land, paid $10 to the federal Government for registration and, to obtain the right to own this land, it was necessary to break up 30 acres within three years and put up a small shack and barn. There being no specifications as to the size and quality of which the buildings should consist, we found that all manner of material was used. Those settlers who were close enough to the railway and had some money, coupled with means of transportation to their land, built them of lumber. Those who settled near to any timber built them of logs and plastered them with a mixture of yellow and white clay and straw and then whitewashed them with lime both inside and out. Others who were too distant from transportation used their plow to turn over sods on the prairie and cut them into two-foot lengths by about 18 inches wide and 4 inches thick. These sods were laid out flat, one upon the other, for the walls of the house, leaving a small space for windows and a doorway. For these sod shacks the roof was, of course, made of poles and brush cut from around the sloughs which, in turn, was covered with sod to shed the rain. Contrary to the opinion of those who weren't familiar with these sod shacks, I might say that they were very, very warm in the wintertime and comfortable in the summertime when the cookstove was not being used for the baking of bread or cooking the tough old chickens which were raised around the farms in those days.

The problem of power to work the farm in the early days was taken care of by the use of horses or oxen. Many of the older farmers, even today, claim that the oxen were the finest of motive power that the farmer ever had with which to break land. They, however, were very slow in taking the farmer's grain to market and, when one had to travel some 30 or 40 miles to rail, it was very often necessary to take two days to get to market and two days to get back. They were so slow that I recall one case where a man travelled on foot 25 miles to town for a hundred-pound sack of flour, carried it back home, and reckoned that he made it in much quicker time than if he had used his oxen.

In clearing the land, if you were in a parkland area, you used an axe or logging chain to pull the trees out or cut them down or, if on the prairie, in most areas, one would have to use a heavy bar to dig out the rocks or prairie boulders before a plow could be put into the soil. This was slow work. But by 1910 the country began to take on the appearance of considerable development. Roads were being cut on the square to replace the trails which ran all over the country, telephone lines were being built, farmers were putting up fences to contain their stock, and new homes were showing up all over the country—hip-roof barns and two-storey houses.

During the time from 1908 through to 1912 the country, having proven itself through the efforts of these homesteaders, was being invaded by thousands of people from the United States and eastern Canada who had the money and wanted to establish themselves in this virgin and already-proven, fine wheat country. Development then grew very rapidly. In fact, it was said that the telephones arrived at the farms before the houses were built, in many cases—an indication of the rapidity with which development took place. A great many of these farmers brought in the new, heavy tractors, run by steam or oil, which would pull a 9-bottom plow, a set of double discs to cover the width of the land broken by the plow, and a set of harrows as well, or a float to level the land down. Thus, some of these farmers, working day and night, would bring about 500 acres of land under cultivation in a single year.

At the time of World War I all this rapid expansion was called to a halt for a year or two until a sudden demand for agricultural products became evident and the farmers again speeded up their production. This demand brought a tremendous increase in price to the farmer for his products. With his added wealth and good crops he was able to expand quite rapidly, buying more land and bringing it under cultivation as quickly as possible. There was considerable evidence of prosperity in western Canada during that period and through into the twenties. Then came the hard years of the thirties when, coupled with the great depression, large areas of Saskatchewan, in particular, suffered from a severe drought. These large areas continued to have set-backs right through until 1942, with the exception of one or two intervening years in which they got an average crop. A great many farmers abandoned their farms and moved to the cities; others moved north or east of Saskatchewan, and many went as far as the Peace River country, where, they felt, they would be secure in obtaining fuel and also feed for their stock, both of which they were not able to get in the great wheat belt.

In the early 1940's crops all over the West started to come back as the dry areas receded. The Second World War was on and, again, a tremendous demand arose for farm products. In this period the great majority of farms were mechanized, new homes were built and new cars or trucks appeared on almost every farm. In fact, the whole face of our farming community had changed completely and, to look back over the previous fifty years, it would have been almost impossible for an old-timer to believe that he was looking at the same country. New highways were black-topped or gravelled, running in all directions to the rapidly-expanding cities, electric power was expanded tremendously and many farms were electrified. New modern homes began to replace homes built in the 1900's and the 1920's. Many farmers built or bought homes in the adjacent small towns to which they would retire for the winter and enjoy a bout of curling.

So we get a picture of Western Canada over the past 60 years of tremendous advancement from the days of our homestead pioneers. Of course, it must be remembered that you can still find many farmers who, due to bad or incapable management or adverse conditions in certain areas, have not been able to keep up with the pace set by those in most other areas.

There is, however, one trouble which bothers farmers today and which did not exist a short time ago, and that is the very rapid increase in the cost of the tools of production.

The farmer realizes that labour and management are entitled to good wages and a profit, for while they are making good money there is a much better and close market for farm products. However, paying good wages and making a profit, plus the cost of factory expansion and the cost of taxation, have had an effect on the price of the farmer's tools of production, and during the past ten years this increase has been rapid; yet at the same time of increasing costs of farm machinery there has been a trend downward in the price of farm grains which has left the farmer with the problem of how to make the two meet. Two groups of farmers through their own efforts are able to maintain the balance between cost of production and the value of the products which they have to sell. The first of these groups are the farmers who, having large areas for growing cereal grains, operate anywhere from a section to three or four sections of land. The other group are those who developed a good herd of beef cattle which, as you know, commands a very good price on the market today. These two groups, so far, have been able to avoid the cost-price squeeze.

This indicates that when we have areas where farmers are hard up and crushed in spirit, we find that the main cause has been the lack of credit which would have enabled them to participate in either one of the aforementioned projects, namely, to increase acreage or build up a good herd of cattle. For that reason I would commend the Government for stating in the Speech from the Throne as follows:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

Lack of long-term credit, in my estimation, is one of the main hindrances to a great many farmers in maintaining their continued advance and prosperity.

I also commend the Government for its action in starting a crop-insurance plan, and I trust the western provinces, along with the other provinces, will take advantage of this legislation. It is, of course, difficult at this time to know how extensive a coverage this insurance will be, but I am sure that the Government will make every effort to cover as large a field as possible. In a good many areas in western Canada you will have a drought, as we did this past season, which in turn followed on top of violent hail storms of the previous year. Catastrophes such as these make it very difficult for the farmers to recover and, in some cases, it crushes them so badly they are forced to leave their farms.

Honourable senators, I should like to close this address on a note of optimism. We in Canada today are a young nation almost bursting at the seams with energy to move forward to greater prosperity and development of our resources. We have a tremendous advantage in that we are not tied to the thinking or traditions of the older countries of Europe or, for that matter, even of the United States, which is yet so young and vigorous. We see all around from east to west the growth of our cities and factories and the good life that everyone seems to enjoy, in spite of the recession which has taken place and from which we are now rapidly recovering. In the Speech from the Throne I am very pleased to note that the "Government will therefore foster and encourage the proper development and use of these resources and the growth of efficient industry based upon them. Many projects for national development have already been put in hand."

In our own province of Saskatchewan we know that there is one of the largest undeveloped, mineralized areas in the dominion. All it needs is capital, roads and the energy of our young Canadian people to make this one of the great mining areas of the continent. We have heard the Government intends to push roads into the northern areas of all provinces in an effort to assist them in the development of their mineral, timber and fishing resources.

In the early part of this century the great and rapid development of western Canada, after the homesteaders had accomplished the first difficult opening, was due to the Americans who came in thousands to push ahead the opening up of this great wheat area—much the same as they had done in the great "Gold Rush" days of California. This great spirit of adventure is needed to carry our young men into the new north. Too, our young women have got to be prepared to follow their men. Canada must take a bold and constructive hold of her resources and develop them, or shall we leave all this development in the north to Americans? Our oil industry in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba is largely owned and developed by American money and American men. Now is the time for our young people to be thinking of the future, rather than be satisfied to sit down between jobs and live on unemployment insurance. Leadership is needed so very urgently by our businessmen. Let us as a nation not be just the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" but go out and conquer, develop our own resources, and build our own new industries and cities.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, in seconding the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, it is my intention to begin in the French language and to conclude in the English language.

The Speech from the Throne, honourable colleagues, contains numerous items which should give Canadians cause for rejoicing. It is with a great deal of pleasure that the members of this house have learned that our Most Gracious Queen will honour us once more by visiting Canada on the occasion of the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, next June. This visit will enable English-speaking as well as French-speaking Canadians to show their loyalty and their affection to the Queen of Canada.

The recent visit which the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, made to Asiatic and other countries of the commonwealth is another cause for rejoicing. This tour has strengthened the bonds which unite the members of this great community of nations and has emphasized the part played by Canada in this connection. When Mr. Diefenbaker was in India, the Eastern Economist of New Delhi pointed this out quite appropriately:

> There are few countries which possess such ability for retaining a fine balance between what might be called the American and the European ways of living and thinking. Canada is better prepared than any other country to act as a bridge.

as it were. Canada is a member of NATO but never, in its policies, does it avail itself of this title. It has turned its back on isolationism which was the basis of American policy before Roosevelt. Like the United States, it is now associated with Europe. Like Great Britain and Australia, it is taking an important part in the Colombo Plan. Its personality will make itself felt in future in other countries than Great Britain and the United States. In the last two years, Canada has become a world power, but in its association with under-developed countries it has succeeded in convincing them that it has no desire for aggrandizement and neither does it wish to exert any undue influence. Thanks to the remarkable ability which it has displayed, it has reached the rank which it occupies today. It has been said in India that Canadians possess a comprehensiveness which no other nation has yet acquired. It is meet and just to pay this tribute to Canada while its prime minister is visiting us.

From this statement, honourable colleagues, I wish to stress the way in which Asia looks upon the part played by Canada on the international scene, in the first place that of an intermediary between the American way of living and thinking and the European way of living and thinking and, in the second place, between the Western democracies and the under-developed members of the commonwealth.

In that statement, I should also like to point out the reasons for which Asia believes that our country is particularly well suited for such a role. Although it is a part of America, Canada is related to Europe by its double culture, both English and French, which has shaped its way of living and of thinking. Canada has no desire for conquest and is motivated solely by unselfish reasons. It shows a great spirit of understanding and a deep respect for the views of other peoples. Endowed with such a mentality, it can devote to the cause of universal peace and welfare its territory's great resources and its ever increasing international prestige.

Inspired with the spirit of peace and anxious to ensure the prosperity of all, the Canadian government demands, in the matter of disarmament, an agreement banning all nuclear armaments and an international agreement on the use of outer space for peaceful purposes only. It was likewise this desire for peace and prosperity which prompted the Canadian government to propose the holding in Montreal, last September, of a Commonwealth Economic Conference, through which the United Kingdom and eight other European countries were persuaded to re-establish in part the convertibility of their currency and to do away, in large measure, with existing restrictions on imports. These two measures, more than any others, will promote common peace and prosperity.

In my opinion, honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne underlines especially the care which the Government, in the course of the present session, will exercise in order to stimulate economic recovery, the first signs of which are already apparent and which will progress throughout 1959. A simple enumeration of the more important measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne shows the truth of this statement: Increased funds for municipalities, to help them finance projects which would not, otherwise, have been undertaken this winter; amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to increase the number of its beneficiaries; public investments to develop our natural resources and create new jobs; establishment of a crop insurance system in co-operation with the provinces who so desire; revision of farm credit legislation to increase its usefulness and effectiveness; establishment of a national energy board which would not infringe upon the rights of the provinces; legislation to encourage the flow of private funds into mortgages for housing construction; government participation in a contributory plan to provide medical benefits for civil servants; increased help to veterans; action to alleviate the discriminatory effects of the recent flat increase in freight rates.

Because of the economic recession which has hit the North American continent, all governments are faced with difficult problems. It must be recognized that, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, the Canadian Government intends to settle these problems once and for all.

Before concluding, honourable senators, may I point out two other measures which have aroused great interest in different circles.

The first one concerns the Bill of Rights which Parliament will be asked to approve. This is a delicate subject as the philosophy of the two main racial groups in our country is often at variance and also because Canada is a federation. But I trust that, in their wisdom, the representatives of our two houses will agree upon a bill acceptable to all.

Those who, on the other hand, have taken an interest in the fight against obscene publications rejoice to learn that the Government intends to submit certain recommendations with a view to reinforcing the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with the sale of obscene publications. Representations have long been made to convince the Government to take the necessary steps in this direction. We are not yet acquainted in detail with those which the government will submit for our approval. But I trust that they will be examined with a view to protecting our young people, as have so rightly done all authorities entrusted more directly with the moral protection of our children.

It is obvious, honourable colleagues, from a cursory look at the Speech from the Throne, that the legislative program for this session is a heavy one. But this house, which includes so many men of wisdom, is willing to fulfil its traditional role, which is essential to our parliamentary system, under the guidance of its distinguished Speaker and with the help of its standing committees. I am sure that when the session comes to an end the Canadian people will have nothing but praise for the Senate, which a small minority of our people, who do not understand its true function, would wrongly like to abolish.

(Text):

May I now conclude with a few observations in English.

In seconding the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I should like to thank the honourable the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for the high honour he has bestowed upon me. The honour, as I see it, is not intended so much for myself personally as for the French-speaking Canadians in all parts of our great country.

I have been delighted to observe the steady progress being made to strengten the bonds of friendship and understanding between the two pioneer races which were the joint architects of Canada. The most recent and in some respects the most dramatic indication of this progress is the installation of a system of simultaneous translation in the other house. I am confident that we will soon have a similar system in this chamber so that there will be that fullness of communication in both languages which is the basis of all understanding. As that great statesman, Sir Robert Borden—whose stature grows with the passage of time—so wisely said:

> The qualities of the French and English temperaments are in many respects complementary. Each is capable of distinctive service to the state and each has given it. Not in fusion but through co-operation, the highest service of the two races can best be given to Canada.

Honourable senators, I am a Conservative in both the senses in which that word is used. As such, I am opposed to change simply for the sake of change. And that is why I am highly pleased that those who so faithfully and ably guided the deliberations in this chamber during the last session are still in their accustomed places. I have already referred to the genial and capable Leader of the Government. May I now make reference to his equally genial and capable deputy, the honourable gentleman from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt). I had occasion during my maiden speech to compliment the Honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) on his unfailing courtesy. That was perhaps a first impression but one which has since been confirmed in countless ways both inside and outside this chamber. Finally, I believe I am expressing the views of all within the sound of my voice when I say that we are blessed with an outstanding Speaker who, whether he is presiding in this chamber or representing us beyond its doors, adds constantly to the lustre of the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, it would not be desirable, even if it were possible, to comment in any detail upon the measures contemplated in the Speech from the Throne. The details of the measures are not disclosed in the speech, nor will they be disclosed until the individual bills are introduced. There will be ample opportunity to discuss them severally as they reach the Senate and they will certainly be given in committee the careful scrutiny we have come to expect of our committees.

But perhaps I might usefully make some general comments on the speech as a whole. In the first place, we are all delighted that Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip will visit us this year on the occasion of the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway and that they will travel to most parts of Canada. On their last visit they endeared themselves anew to the people of Canada. Her Majesty and the Prince will come this time not merely as symbols of royalty but as good friends.

May I remark also on the visit of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to the commonwealth capitals. Out of the visit much good, both tangible and intangible, must surely come. And by the same token, much good must come—and indeed already has come—from the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference held in Montreal last September.

Honourable senators, the joint aims of government are peace and prosperity. I believe that from both points of view we may look forward to 1959 with cautious optimism. There are sure signs that we are moving out of the recent recession and that we may realize our high hopes for the continued long-term advancement of the Canadian economy. As James Muir, Chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada, said in speaking to the 90th annual meeting of shareholders on January 8, 1959:

> Canada has everything needed to solve her own problems of economic development. She has abundant natural resources, a highly productive and growing labour force, enterprising and imaginative management in government and business, and an increasingly diversified economy on a strong agricultural base. With these natural advantages, it is only a matter of will for Canadians to meet all the conditions for sustained and healthy economic growth. Moreover, in so doing, Canada will become a living demonstration to the rest of the world, East and West, that the surest and healthiest type of economic growth and social progress is that attained in an atmosphere of political and economic freedom.

The Berlin situation is certainly a matter for concern, but there seems every likelihood that the freedom of West Berlin will be maintained pending a general settlement of the German question, and that the hounds of war will not be unleashed on that account. While I am not an economist, it is obvious that the joint challenge of unemployment and inflation is with us and must be met. I am confident that this challenge is being met and will continue to be met by the present government and that anything that can be done by the federal authority to resolve it or relieve its impact will be done. These are matters with which all Canadians will be concerned when the new budget is brought down.

Honourable senators, it is apparent from the nature and extent of the legislative program foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne that we may expect a busy, interesting and indeed a strenuous session. I am satisfied that the Senate, with the aid of its standing committees and their highly competent chairmen, will acquit itself well. We are well organized and ready for eventualities. But may I express a personal hope, which I feel sure is shared by other honourable gentlemen, that we may be able to deal with what comes before us with such reasonable dispatch that we may be able to spend at least part of next summer in the great out-of-doors.

Honourable senators, may I say a few words in conclusion. I mentioned earlier in my remarks that the precise terms of the measures to be introduced at this session have not yet been disclosed. However, this is only partly true of one proposed measure—the proposal for the enactment of a Canadian Bill of Rights. Bill C-60, incorporating a Canadian Bill of Rights, was introduced in the other place by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the closing days of the last session, given first reading, spoken to by himself and by the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the C.C.F. group, and then allowed to expire upon the order paper. We cannot, of course, be sure that the new bill will be in precisely the same form of words as the former bill, but we have at least a substantial idea as to its probable tenor.

We must, as always, reserve final judgment on the terms of the bill until it reaches this chamber. However, I do feel that a few general observations might be appropriate on this particular proposal, which in a special sense is the personal, long-standing project of the Prime Minister. He has advocated a Canadian Bill of Rights consistently almost from the first day he sat in Parliament, and has since advocated it from almost every platform—and there are many—from which he has spoken in Canada.

In my own opinion, he has a mandate from the people of Canada, and a very substantial one, as he perseveres in his efforts to reaffirm at least in statutory form the basic rights and freedoms of all Canadians. My personal belief is that most people respect his motives and agree with him in principle with regard to the proposed measure. Indeed, my expectation is that the debates in both houses will be on the highest possible level and that the partisanship which necessarily and properly attends the discussion of many controversial measures will in this instance be conspicuous by its absence.

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister has persevered but he has not rushed this measure. There has been every opportunity afforded to the public at large, as well as to individuals, associations and societies, to examine and consider the implications of the proposed legislation. And there is every indication that full advantage has been taken of the opportunity by all those interested in strengthening and preserving our rights and liberties, not only against possible external foes but indeed against ourselves. It has been observed by many that since the outbreak of the first Great War there has been a tendency towards the erosion of personal liberty and that the expedients of wartime—inter arma leges silent—tend to become the practices of peace. I am sure that there is in all of us a fundamental love of liberty and that the danger in future is perhaps not so much that there will be infringements by deliberate intent, but that they may occur through expediency, haste, apathy or neglect. At least, I hope that this is so. The process of erosion must stop, and be stopped in whatever manner is open to us.

Perhaps I need not remind honourable senators that the desirability of enacting a measure incorporating in statutory form a Canadian Bill of Rights has already been endorsed by the Senate of Canada. In 1950 the Senate unanimously approved the report of the Special Committee on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, presided over by our colleague Senator Roebuck, which concluded in part as follows:

> Your committee therefore recommends that, as an interim measure, the Canadian Parliament adopt a declaration of human rights to be strictly limited to its own legislative jurisdiction.
> —Such a declaration of human rights adopted by the Canadian Parliament would solemnly affirm the faith of all Canadians in the basic principles of freedom, and it would evidence a national concern for human rights and security. Judges would recognize the principles of such a declaration as part of Canada's public policy, and subsequent parliaments would hesitate to enact legislation violating its revered principles. To adults it would convey a feeling of security, and children would memorize its terms with pride.
> Canada should lead the world in reliance upon the rule of law, in her respect for human rights and in her care for fundamental freedom, and in a love of liberty. Her adoption of a national bill of rights in due time would set an example which would enhance her status among the nations and which might lead to similar progress by others.

Honourable senators, I do not usually employ ornate or dramatic language, but I hope that you may agree that a pound of prose deserves at least an ounce of rhetoric. We know that in many parts of the world the lamps of freedom are either out or burn but dimly in the courageous hearts of men. But we may be sure of this, that man's struggle for personal freedom in an organized society dedicated to the emancipation and development of the human personality and spirit will extend into the millenium, or at least until the lamps of freedom are burning brightly everywhere in the world. Let us do whatever we can as Canadians and as world-citizens to further the cause of liberty and justice under the law.

Honourable senators, I second the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the newly-summoned senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

GUESTS IN SENATE GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that we have in our gallery this afternoon two very important visitors from India; they arrived here in Ottawa at 1:50 this noon, and I met them in the name of the Senate at Uplands airfield, greeted them in your name, and invited them to sit in with us in the gallery this afternoon. I welcome them, and we hope, all of us, that their stay in Ottawa will be a very pleasant one indeed. I will do my best in your name, honourable senators, to make it that way, and I think they will leave Ottawa on Saturday, to fly back to India, happy that they paid us this visit here in Ottawa.

The first gentleman on the left, in the grey suit, is the Honourable Shri S. V. Krishnamoorthy Rao, Deputy Chairman of the Indian Senate. The second gentleman, in the centre, is the Honourable Dr. U. Krishna Rau, Speaker of the Madras Legislative Assembly. The gentleman accompanying them is Mr. N. B. Menon, First Secretary of the Indian High Commission in Canada.

Honourable senators, may I also take this occasion to greet the beautiful women in the gallery who are part of the families of the three new senators. I think I can give the ladies the assurance that for a few weeks at least our honourable senators on the left will treat the new senators with very special care and will be very kind to them indeed. They should have no worries for at least a few weeks.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table certain reports, as follows:

Report of the Department of National Revenue containing statements relative to customs-excise revenue and other services by ports and outports, excise and income of Canada, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of National Revenue Act, Chapter 75, R.S. 1952. (English and French texts).

Report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, pursuant to section 34 of the Department of Transport Act, Chapter 79, R.S. 1952. (English text).

Report of the Air Transport Board to the Minister of Transport dated December 31, 1958, concerning transcontinental air services. (English and French texts).

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 1958

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF REPORT

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on Tuesday night the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) tabled the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce entitled, "Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958 and Statistical Supplement", in the English text. I was amazed today when I endeavoured to get a copy of that report to find that there is only one copy in existence in the Senate, and that is the copy that was tabled in this house.

Now, honourable senators, this is a very important document and I cannot understand why more copies have not been received in the Senate. I remember distinctly that when a similar report for the year 1957 was tabled in the other house there were plenty of copies available. I would appeal to the Leader of the Government to obtain copies of this important report so that each senator could have a copy of same.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will look into the matter and see what can be done about it.

DIVORCE

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Hon. George S. White, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Hnatyshyn be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, January 27, 1959, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

UKRAINIAN NATIONAL REPUBLIC

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, with the consent of honourable members I should like once again to bring to the attention of this house the fact that today, January 22, marks what is the forty-first anniversary of the Proclamation of Ukrainian National Sovereignty and Independence. This event occurred in 1918, in the capital city of Kiev, in Eastern Ukraine. In November of the same year the Ukrainians in what we term Western Ukraine similarly proclaimed their free will to national self-determination and sovereignty; and on January 22, 1919 the then free and democratically governed Ukrainian states achieved political unification and proceeded to organize a new, modern, democratic and Christian state.

I know that the Canadian citizens of Ukrainian descent—and there are approximately 450,000 of them—would deeply appreciate the fact that some mention was made in the Parliament of Canada of these highly significant events in the gallant yet tragic struggle of the Ukrainian people in their historic search for democratic freedoms and national self determination. Such recognition would revitalize their undimmed convictions that there is, in fact, an increased awareness in Canada of the historical record of the momentous, confusing yet incontrovertible events which preceded and followed their Ukrainian declarations of national sovereignty and complete independence. This public awareness will be our safeguard and effective insulator against the mounting barrage of communist propaganda which attempts to prove the thesis that the Union of Ukraine with Russia—which, incidentally, communist spokesmen date back to the infamous Treaty of Pereyaslav in 1654—is a logical and legitimate result of the whole past history of the two brother Slav nations, the Russian and the Ukrainian. A whole series of special books and monographs has been ground out by them to prove that this ostensibly voluntary and fraternal development is a free expression of the will of the Ukrainian people, supposedly because of the many centuries of economic, political and cultural bonds between Ukraine and Russia. Indisputable facts about Tsarist oppression and the present colonial position of the Ukrainian S.S.R. are conveniently overlooked or denied, in the hope that the continued and painful existence of the Ukrainian problem in Eastern Europe and the legitimate hopes and aspirations of the submerged and enslaved people within the U.S.S.R. may be relegated below the level of active public consciousness and conscience, and thus removed from the stage of active, public discussion and consideration. This, honourable senators, must not be allowed to happen.

It is not my purpose to discuss at length the confused and tragic events which preceded and followed these declarations of political independence and unification. Lacking friends and allies, the gallant Ukrainian National Republic was attacked simultaneously by groups and régimes unfriendly to her, and her peoples were partitioned and forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Roumania. After World War II there occurred the communist version of political unification and the so-called free federation of the remaining Ukrainian people with the U.S.S.R.

It is of some significance, however, to underline that Ukraine is one of the oldest European nations, with cultural, religious and governmental tradition going back more than a thousand years. The Ukrainian people are a traditionally democratic and Christian nation, cherishing freedom and the rule of law, and valiantly struggling for a free and sovereign right to build an independent Christian state. Because of her vitally strategic geo-political position in Eastern Europe, because of her wealth of natural resources and the fabulous richness of her soil, and because of the creative husbandry of her people, Ukraine has always been a prime target of aggression by her many neighbours.

It is also important to remember that although the Ukrainian republic was short-lived and fell under the forcible occupation of the Russian communists, the love of democracy and freedom lives on in these suppressed peoples and their resistance to atheistic communist totalitarianism has never ceased.

No people have been more heroic, nor fought more bravely for liberty and freedom than the Ukrainian people. Surely we in Canada, enjoying the blessings of democratic freedoms—which are our tried and trusted means expressing man's undying will to live in peace and friendship with his fellowman in accordance with the commandments of God—cannot and will not forget the other freedom-loving peoples of the world who are not free, those who also cherish liberty but who must live without it.

Furthermore, a just solution of the problem of Ukraine continues to present—and this I underline—the freedom-loving peoples of the western world with a dominant and significant key in the continuing struggle against communism, to which struggle are inextricably related the causes of freedom and peace in the whole world.

This traditional observance of Ukrainian Independence Day, overtly by all Ukrainians in the free world—and there are some two million of them—and silently in the innermost recesses of their hearts by approximately 40 million presently muzzled and subjugated Ukrainians—has been a solemn occasion for the reaffirmation of our active faith in the eventual liberation of all the enslaved peoples within the communist empire. Ukrainians believe that the causes of liberation and national freedom are indivisible and that if we are to sustain our own national security, then our time-tested democratic ideals of inalienable, God-given rights of liberty and justice under laws which are democratically evolved must be applicable to all captive nations within the ever-more threatening modern colonial tyranny of Soviet Russia.

Permit me to underline what I consider to be the basic significance of these declarations of independence. Surely the Ukrainian people have the right and indeed the duty to express freely and without forcible duress what is their considered and free will concerning their form of government. This right and this duty they exercised in 1918 and 1919, the only time they were free to do so. And what was this freely, democratically-expressed verdict? To organize an independent sovereign, democratic, Christian national republic. The validity and the legality of this verdict is an historical milestone which continues to be our beacon light—until and unless the Ukrainian people freely and openly resign from this centuries-old position. Communist preachments to the contrary, this free and untrammelled expression of the will of the Ukrainian people has been denied to them by tyrannical means and practices which it is not my purpose to identify or discuss on this occasion. It should suffice that I simply and categorically reiterate that the Ukrainian people have been constitutionally disfranchised of their personal and national freedoms and rights, persecuted and martyred for their religious and democratic beliefs, and effectively exploited as a provincial colony of the Soviet Union economically, socially and culturally. Wherever Ukrainians reside, they voice what they believe to be the true aspirations and hopes of their captive brothers and sisters, namely, that they suffer this subjection to Soviet despotism only under duress and that they are not reconciled to a continuation of this denial of genuine personal freedom and true national independence.

I close with what I believe to be a stirring quotation from an address of the Honourable Senator Herbert H. Lehman of New York, delivered in the Senate of the United States on January 21, 1955:

> In this day and age, when the gathered force of public opinion, and of world opinion, exerts so powerful an influence on the course of history, no iron curtain, however strong, no slave state, however high its gates, and however powerful its masters, will be able to survive the persistent onslaught of the world's will to freedom.
> Just as the walls of Jericho crumbled at the sound of Joshua's trumpets, five thousand years ago, just as surely will the iron curtain fall under the rays of freedom's piercing light. It cannot be otherwise. This is our faith and our creed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, my first remarks should be words of welcome to our three new senators. I am sure that it will not be long before they will feel very much at home in this chamber and with their fellow senators. The three newly-appointed senators are men of wide business experience and interested in the affairs of state. In fact, I understand that one of them made five unsuccessful attempts to get into either the Legislative Assembly of his province or the House of Commons before he was fortunate enough to get into the Senate. I am not as high in his class as he is. However, I might say that I made two unsuccessful attempts to get into the House of Commons before I arrived there.

Another new senator was the Leader of the Opposition in the legislature of one of our provinces. The remaining new senator, I understand, has taken a very active interest in the political association of his province.

We welcome these three new senators this afternoon. I am sure I can tell them that they are coming into a body which is not closely bound by narrow party prejudices nor by political advantages. We are not strictly partisan. The late Senator Dandurand once said:

> We stand above the sharp division of party that exists in the other chamber.

Also, I can assure our newcomers that we in this body are all friends. When I say "My friend the Leader of the Government" I do not say it in any perfunctory way, but in a very sincere way. So we welcome the three new senators today as friends.

Honourable senators, I join with those who have already spoken in saying how happy we are to have Mr. Speaker back with us again this year. His Honour represented us with distinction at various international assemblies last year. Among them was the meeting in Paris of the NATO Parliamentary Association, an organization which was established largely through the instrumentality of the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson). Representatives from both sides of this house were present at that assembly. Then quite recently in Washington there was a gathering of members of the American Congress and of our Canadian Parliament, at which also there were representatives from both sides of this house, along with representatives from both sides of the House of Commons. In the early part of the winter this year I understand there will be a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting in Australia, an association to which the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) contributed greatly. I have no doubt that at that gathering there will be representatives from both sides of this house. Another very important international gathering was that of the United Nations in New York. An excellent representative from the Senate, the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), was in attendance at that meeting, but I regret to say that he was the sole representative from this house. There was not a representative from the Opposition side of the house. It seems to me that at such an important gathering there should be at least one representative from each side of the Senate. I think it was said that when the Liberals were in power there was only one representative from this house at the United Nations gathering. I pointed out at that time that the numbers of the Opposition, unfortunately, were very small. At the present time there are over three times as many members in the so-called Opposition as are on the Government benches. Under these circumstances, surely, we should have one representative. I am quite satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) would support all I am saying; and now I am appealing to you, sir, to use your good offices to see that at the next meeting of the United Nations there will be a representative from each side of this house.

Honourable senators, I now wish to compliment the mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) on the splendid addresses they delivered. I am sure we all enjoyed them greatly. The mover described conditions in western Canada in the early days very well. It was a fine thing for him to do, for we are too apt to forget the hardships under which our forefathers struggled. He pictured the early conditions very vividly, and in paying a well-deserved tribute to our forefathers brought back to our memories the fact that they did much to make our path easier.

(Translation):

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I also wish to offer my sincere congratulations to the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) who seconded the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was deeply touched by the kind words he spoke about me, and I know that the good relations we have always had will continue in future. The honourable senator is endowed with extraordinary oratorical gifts, and the conviction with which he spoke has been apparent to everyone. After mentioning the fact that Senator Choquette is perfectly bilingual, may I continue my speech in English.

(Text):

I have said that the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is completely bilingual. We were amazed, and I think somewhat envious, that he could express himself so well in both our languages. I noticed particularly that he did not just deliver a speech first in French and turn around and translate it into English; he delivered two separate speeches. During his remarks, the honourable senator said that he looked forward to the day when we would have the installation of a system of simultaneous translation in this chamber. No doubt that would be of advantage to many members, and I certainly am not opposing it, but one sometimes wonders if it would not make us a little more content to know just one language.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When I was Speaker of the House of Commons I felt that I should try to learn French, and I studied that language more or less as a pastime—and it was a very rewarding pastime indeed. I do not know French well, but I managed to get along. I was in France last summer, and I was surprised how well I got along with the knowledge of French that I have. Some may feel they are too old to learn French. Honourable senators, I started to speak that language when I was 60 years of age, so there is hope for many senators here who do not speak it.

Honourable senators, this is the third session of Parliament since the present Government took over the administration of the affairs of our country, but I think I can fairly say that it is the first regular session. The other two might be called "emergency" sessions. At least they were emergency sessions so far as the Government was concerned. The emergency in the first session—that was the one which opened on the 14th of October 1957 and was closed in an unprecedented manner by the Prime Minister when he announced to the members seated in the House of Commons who thought they were in session that actually they were not in session because Parliament had already been dissolved—the emergency in that session was the anxiety of the Government to rush through certain legislation which had a popular appeal so as to assure the Government of re-election at the pending election which was to be in the very near future. You will recall, honourable senators, that during that first session Parliament sat a little more than three and a half months, including the Christmas recess, and passed more bills than are usually passed in a session of twice that duration.

The second session, which I will also describe as an emergency session so far as the Government was concerned, commenced on the 12th of May 1958, after the Government's resounding victory at the polls, and again was prorogued after sitting scarcely more than three and a half months, on the 6th day of September 1958. During that session, as in the previous one, the Government set a record by placing on the Statute Books more important legislation—I think I can safely say more important legislation—than had ever been placed on the Statute Books in such a short space of time. Of course there was an emergency in that session: it was the Government's understanding that it was necessary to get all this legislation through Parliament in a hurry so as to enable the Ministers of the Crown to travel to, oh, so many places throughout the world disseminating good will and friendship to the peoples of those many lands. Never in the history of this country have Ministers of the Crown travelled so far at the same time and in such a short time after having been elected to office. Now, honourable senators, I do not want you to think that I am opposed to all these voyages, for many of them contributed much to the development of trade and to the creation of better understanding among the peoples of the world. But what I do object to is the rushing through of legislation without giving to Parliament all the information which is in the possession of the Government and which Parliament is entitled to have. Either the journeys can wait or the legislation can wait.

Let me take one example. Honourable senators will recall that at the tail-end of last session, in fact on the very day of prorogation, this house received for consideration one of the most important items of legislation that came to us in the whole session, namely, the amendment to the Customs Act, generally referred to as the Anti-Dumping Bill. A number of honourable senators on this side of the house were very deeply concerned about this measure, for various reasons. For instance, some of us thought it would constitute a violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to which Canada is a signatory, and that other nations which are parties to the agreement might consider it a breach of faith on the part of Canada and in consequence perhaps withdraw from the agreement. But we were assured at that time, directly or by implication, that no country which was a party to GATT had taken exception to what Canada was doing.

Now, honourable senators, I regret to say that that was not the fact. This anti-dumping legislation was passed by the House of Commons on the 5th of September and by this house on the 6th of September. I repeat that at the time of the passing of the bill—and I cannot emphasize this too strongly—both houses were assured by the Government, either directly or by implication, that no nation which was a party to GATT had made any representations against the provisions of the bill or had raised any question that it was a violation of GATT. But what was the fact? On September 3—that is, before the bill was considered by the House of Commons—the United States Ambassador to Canada, the Honourable Livingston Merchant, after having previously written a letter which went unanswered, had written a second letter to the Government in which he stated that it was his Government's opinion that the legislation was not entirely consistent with Canada's obligations under the multi-country General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and that it was a violation of GATT. He also stated in that letter that in his country's opinion Canada had taken a retrograde step on international trade, and that this legislation would impede the flow of shipments between the two countries and might force the United States to impose restrictive measures of her own.

Honourable senators, the Government says now that something very unusual happened in the Department of External Affairs in connection with that letter dated September 3. The Government does not deny that the letter was received at the Department of External Affairs on September 3, but it states that it was received by a junior member of the External Affairs Department. How junior, I do not know. This junior official in this department where everything is supposed to be streamlined and where communications from representatives of foreign countries are treated with such great respect and almost as sacred documents, is said to have kept this document to himself until the bill passed the House of Commons—a most unusual occurrence, but I do not wish to comment further with regard to it. I would point out that no one has yet denied that the Government knew the contents of that letter when the bill was presented to this house, and that it knew the contents when the bill went through the House of Commons. Was the letter held up one more day? No one has stated. Everyone admits that the first letter, of June 26, was in the hands of the ministers before the bill was introduced in the House of Commons. I think no one will take issue with me when I say that Parliament was entitled to know the contents of the American Ambassador's letter, and it was the duty of the Government to give this information to Parliament before the Government asked us to pass that legislation.

I am not suggesting that the Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) knew of those letters. I am satisfied that he would not stoop to being a party to any arrangement to withhold knowingly any information, and I would ask him to inform the members of his Government that if they want the co-operation of this honourable body we expect them to be perfectly frank and honest with us.

While I am dealing with legislation, may I compliment the Leader of the Government on being able to introduce two bills into this house so early in the session. We were quite disappointed in this respect during the past two sessions, but, as I have said, they were emergency sessions, and we will let bygones be bygones. The Leader of the Government told us the other day, and we were all delighted to hear it, that it is expected that the work of Parliament will be concluded so that Her Majesty can prorogue Parliament on July 1. This house is well prepared and anxious to assist the Government to bring about that state of affairs, and I can assure the Leader of the Government that we on this side of the house welcome more legislation being turned over by the Government to the leader in this house. In that way we can help the Government to get legislation through in time so that prorogation can take place on July 1.

Honourable senators, you may say I have not said much about the Speech from the Throne so far. There is a great deal in the Speech to which I would like to refer, but I will not take time to mention more than one or two items. I should like to refer to the problem of inflation. It is a terrific problem, the impact of which has terrifying results. This came to me very forcibly when I was in France last fall and for every Canadian dollar I had I received about 400 francs. At the present rate of exchange I would get nearer to 500 francs. Not so long ago the franc was worth 20 cents in Canadian money; at that time instead of receiving 500 francs for a Canadian dollar, we received 5 francs. I do not wish to suggest that our money is deteriorating to anything like that extent. I merely mention it to show what an evil thing inflation is. Reference has been made to what would happen today to the proceeds of an insurance policy in France. Suppose a man had taken out a policy for $1,000 in terms of our money when the franc was worth 20 cents—that would be a policy for 5,000 French francs. If it came due today his widow, if she were the beneficiary, would receive 5,000 francs, but they would be worth only $10 in our money. Or, if when the franc was worth 20 cents the widow had a monthly pension of, say, 500 francs, or $100 in our money, her monthly pension today would still yield her 500 francs, but they would be worth only one Canadian dollar. You may say that 500 francs will buy more in France than one Canadian dollar will buy here. Well, honourable senators, I did not find it that way. I did not find that prices were a great deal different in France from what they are in Canada.

I recently read in the Brantford Expositor, an interesting little article entitled "Inflation", which I should like to quote. It says:

> At one time, not so long ago, either, a one-thousand-franc note was worth $200 Canadian. Today it is worth two dollars and thirty-eight cents at the official rate of exchange.
> What would happen if our proud Canadian dollar were to take a similar skid? Well, to give an illustration, a suit of clothes you now buy for about $100 would cost you $8,400. What about a car? A so-called low-priced job would run you a mere $250,000.
> This is what inflation means—and we could get into it.

Honourable senators, I do not suggest that our dollar is depreciating to anything like the extent to which the franc has depreciated. I hesitate to suggest what would happen if things got as bad as that in Canada, because I cannot anticipate their ever getting that bad here, but I mention these things so that we might realize just what distress inflation can cause when it gets out of hand.

There was in the Speech from the Throne one reference to inflation; it is just one sentence in a short paragraph:

> They
> That is the Government—
> —believe that as recovery proceeds there will be increasing need for care to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency.

Note the words, "increasing need for care". That is indeed a classic example of understatement. To many of us it would appear that little, if any, care has been taken up to the present time to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency.

Now that the monster of inflation is getting too close for our comfort the Government states that increasing care must be taken to combat it. Why was that care not taken months ago, when we could have prevented ourselves from getting into the predicament in which we now find ourselves where, for the first time in our history, Canada cannot sell its bonds to the general public but must resort to selling them to the chartered banks or to the Bank of Canada? In January 1958 the general public held $8,628 million in Government bonds, which figure does not include the bonds held by the banks. At the beginning of this year, notwithstanding the continued increase in our population and the larger sum of money in circulation, the public held only $7,953 million of those bonds. That is, the holding of Government bonds by the general public had decreased in about a year by approximately $1 billion. These figures are approximate, but there is no mistaking the fact that the holding of Government bonds by the public is definitely on the downgrade. This is a regrettable trend which we must do all in our power to correct.

I do not want anyone to say to me that I am a fear-spreader or a calamity howler. I am merely stating regrettable facts which must be brought to the attention of our people. In this way I am rendering a service to the Government, for when the people are fully aware of what is taking place it will be easier for the Government to apply the necessary remedy.

There is another matter which has had a direct bearing on the inflationary spiral in which we find ourselves; and that is the fact that, although a very considerable increase has occurred in the amount of money in circulation, there has not been in the same time any noticeable increase in the volume of goods and services produced. This fact has been stated many times. We have seen it in the Financial Times, the Financial Post, and other financial and general papers; I remember an article on the same subject in Maclean's, and I also read one in a magazine edited by my honourable friend from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt), La Revue Desjardins. There is also a very good compilation of editorials which appeared in the Leader-Post of Regina and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. These booklets are entitled "Stop Thief" and "Inflation Spells Ruination". They contain much useful information, and honourable senators who get them will find them very interesting indeed. One statement I obtained from these sources is that during the 13 months ended October of last year the flow of money in the hands of the people increased by 14 per cent. That is to say that at the end of October 1958 there was in circulation or in the banks capable of being circulated $114 for every $100 that had been in existence 13 months earlier; and as I have stated, during that period there had been no increase in the volume of output of goods and services. My information is that this 14 per cent increase of money means, in dollars, the huge amount of $1,500 million. So at the end of October 1958, in the pockets of the people or in the banks, there were 1,500 million more dollars than there had been at the end of September, 1957.

Honourable senators may ask me, if the public is not buying the bonds, how is the Government raising sufficient funds to provide for the enormous deficit which is resulting from its spending? The answer, of course, is quite simple. The Government takes its bonds to a bank, either a chartered bank or the Bank of Canada. The bank buys the bonds and pays for them by giving the Government a credit on the bank's books for the amount of the bonds, and from time to time the bank issues the money necessary to meet the withdrawals which are made by the Government on the credits that the bank has provided for it.

This Government has been in power for 18 months. If this type of financing continues, I hesitate to think to what extent the spiral of inflation will rise during the next 18 months unless the Government is courageous enough to face up to this problem. It is not beyond solution. I recognize it is a difficult problem—a very difficult problem —but I repeat, it is not beyond solution. The Government of the United Kingdom has faced up to it, and as a result the cost of living in that country has not increased during the 12-month period which ended last November.

I realize, honourable senators, that the Government has been deeply engrossed in political matters which at the moment were rewarding, but the Government cannot say that it was not warned of the pitfalls that beset it. Speech after speech, most of them eloquent and all of them convincing, was made in this house, in which honourable senators warned the Government of the folly of its spendthrift policies and besought it to desist therefrom. If the Government had listened to the advice of these senators who, as the Government must know, are men of broad experience both in affairs of state and affairs of business, and none of whom have any political axe to grind, it would not have waited until the Speech from the Throne of 1959 to start to take care to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency. The Government, however, has started. That is encouraging, and it is something for which we are all thankful.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What did it start?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My honourable friend asks, what has it done? Well, the Government at least refers to the problem in the Speech from the Throne. It will no doubt call upon the Canadian people, and more particularly those in the business world, to take a united stand against forces of inflation. But the Government must give leadership, and that cannot be done by minimizing the importance of this problem, or by saying, for example, "It isn't as bad as some people think", nor by calling it "really only creeping inflation". In combatting the rising tendency the Government must give the necessary leadership, and people are expecting that leadership from the Government.

The former administration did face up to that issue and give the necessary leadership. When the present administration came into power it adopted a financial policy which was a direct reversal of the policy of the former administration. And with what dire results! I have not any doubt, honourable senators, that if the present administration had followed the financial policies of the St. Laurent Government under its able Minister of Finance, the Honourable Walter Harris, we should not have had either the unemployment or the inflation which today beclouds the future of our country.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: He could not get re-elected on that policy.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My friend immediately talks about being re-elected. Is that all my friends on the other side of the house think about—being re-elected? I am not talking about that; I am talking about the welfare of the country, and I intend to continue my speech along those lines.

But, honourable senators, before leaving the subject let me say that I do not want to create the impression that I believe we would have been better off if over the years there had never been any inflation. I do not pine for the "good old days" when eggs were 10 cents a dozen, butter was 12 cents a pound, coal $4 a ton, et cetera, et cetera. Our history has been one of great economic advancement. Our natural resources have been tremendously developed. Along with this our standard of living has been greatly increased. This has been made possible by the development of our physical resources, and more money has of necessity become available to more people. That is all to the good. But it must be remembered that this increase in the supply of money took place during a period of an expanding economy with full employment. On the other hand, today we are seeing an upward spiral of inflation during a period of recession and high unemployment. That is where the danger lies.

That is all I will say about inflation, but there is another problem which concerns us all and which I know is giving the Government deep and heart-searching concern, and that is the unprecedented number, for this time of year, of our able-bodied men and women who are out of employment. The latest figures, announced just the other day, are to the effect that 440,000 men and women were out of work in December and looking for jobs. That figure is 79,000 greater than the figure for the month of November and 48,000 higher than the figure for the corresponding month of the previous year.

Honourable senators will recall that in March of last year, which was the peak period of our unemployment, there were 559,000 unemployed men and women in Canada. I am afraid that, if the rate of increase over the past few months continues, the regrettable record of March 1958 will be broken in March 1959. Let us sincerely hope that this will not be the case.

Whenever figures are quoted with regard to unemployment some other figures are always brought forward by way of contradiction. Someone suggests there are more people working today than there were last year, or somebody else submits that more people are included in the unemployment figures than are actually out of work. I do not want to get into a discussion as to whether there are more or fewer people unemployed today than at some other time. What does concern us all is that there are at least 440,000 able-bodied men and women out of employment. That figure suggests to me that the finding of work for these hundreds of thousands of men and women remains one of Canada's top problems, and one for whose solution I can assure the Government it can count on the help of all members on this side of the house.

The question does arise, and I think we should consider it: why do we in this prosperous land find ourselves with so many people unemployed? There are many reasons, but in my opinion one of the fundamental causes is a result of the Government's trade policies.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Unemployment insurance is the main cause.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not going to argue that with my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). I am not analysing all the causes, but I repeat that one of the fundamental causes is a result of the present trade policies of the Government. These policies, instead of bringing about an increase in our overall trade, have contributed to the bringing about of a reduction in that trade. The high standard of living to which this country has attained is due in no small measure to its overall trade; that is, to the grand total of our combined imports and exports. Whenever that trade is disrupted on a large scale it results in most serious and often disastrous consequences within our country. I think you will all agree with me that we must maintain a high level of foreign trade, that is of our exports and imports. A reduction in one without a corresponding increase in the other results in a slackening of our economy.

During the eleven-month period ending in November our imports decreased by 9 per cent to $4,769,500,000 from $5,230,800,000. During the same period our exports remained practically unchanged from $4,481,200,000 to $4,480,200,000. This reduction in our imports with no corresponding increase in our exports is a direct reflection of the slowing down in business. Honourable senators will recall that the Prime Minister suggested we should reduce our imports from the United States by 15 per cent and increase our exports to commonwealth countries by a similar amount. Well, we have decreased to a considerable extent our imports from the United States, but at the same time our total imports from the commonwealth countries also decreased. It is obvious and unnecessary for me to repeat, but I do so for emphasis only, that a decrease in our imports with no corresponding increase in our exports results in a reduction in our overall trade and, because of our expanding population, which this year has increased from 16,887,000 to 17,275,000, is bound to bring about a condition of unemployment in our country.

Now, what effort has the Government made to develop Canada's trade? I do not think I am being unfair when I say that the Government has brought down no legislation whatsoever which would be beneficial to the development of world trade and thereby to the creation of jobs for our unemployed. During the election the Prime Minister promised—and thereby gained many votes which elected many candidates—to do something to help the ailing textile and woollen goods industries. The Government has been in power for a year and a half and nothing beneficial has been done. It has brought in two restrictive trade measures, neither of which has put one man into employment in the woollen goods and textile trades. During the eighteen months that the Government has been in power the number employed by textile and woollen mills has decreased rather than increased. During this period mills which prospered under the former administration have had to close their doors, either to give up business permanently or to move to other parts of the world. Workers in those mills voted for the present administration on the promise that legislation would be passed which would prevent such an event from taking place. It is obvious that restrictive trade measures will not restore jobs to these unemployed workers, and they are looking to the Government to declare just what it proposes to do by way of legislation to enable it to keep its promise with woollen and textile workers.

It may be said for the Government that it was instrumental in calling a conference in the early part of this month between cabinet ministers from Canada and from the United States to discuss trade between the two countries. This conference must have been a great disappointment to the Canadian ministers. Cabinet ministers from the two countries talked with one another at official meetings for nine hours, and it is interesting to note that they then spent three hours haggling over the wording of the report. Well, I can quite understand that, because nothing was decided; everything was left for a future conference. The report itself tells of the problems, but in each case it says that consideration will be given at the next meeting.

Another important gathering, a commonwealth conference, took place in Montreal at the end of September. It was hailed, according to the Financial Times of Montreal, as a great conference to discuss problems of mutual interest "to an expanding commonwealth in an expanding world". At its conclusion it was described in Lord Beaverbrook's Express as the "saddest imperial conference that ever took place". I must admit that my knowledge of previous conferences is not wide enough for me to compare results, but whether or not the September conference was as fruitless as the Express implies I think it is and will continue to be a good thing for representatives of the different commonwealth countries to get together periodically and discuss problems of mutual interest. Even if the problems discussed at Montreal were not solved, I am sure that the representatives of commonwealth countries got to know one another better as individuals and came away with a better understanding of their mutual problems and of the specific problems of each country. I thought, however, that our Government was going a little too far in claiming that the lifting of certain British import restrictions was a direct result of this conference. If the Government wants to take satisfaction for that I will not stand in its way, but it seems to me that the withdrawing of these import restrictions had been decided by the British Government long before the delegates ever came to Canada and that it was merely the announcement that was made in Canada.

The Government also gives credit to this commonwealth conference for the introduction of so-called convertibility by the United Kingdom. In that claim, honourable senators, again I feel the Government is going just a little too far. The Canadian Government was no party to the arrangement for bringing about convertibility. The fact is that the convertibility which has been announced is not general convertibility, but only external convertibility, which had been in effect for some considerable time. This external convertibility is hailed by our Government as an intention on the part of the countries of western Europe to ease currency restrictions so that they can buy more of our goods. The difficulty that Canadian manufacturers and producers have in selling their goods abroad is due not so much to the currency restrictions as to the import quotas on a large variety of the goods which Canadians produce. If Canadian exporters are not to be disappointed, the official announcement will have little effect unless the British and the other European countries are prepared to do away with their import quotas. It is the import quotas which are the biggest trade barriers that our exporters have to hurdle.

Honourable senators, there is just one other matter I would like to mention briefly. I refer to the legislation which this Government introduced last session with respect to our trade. These bills were definitely restrictive trade measures, similar to the legislation passed by former Conservative administrations, and were the result of their high tariff policies, which invariably brought hard times to our country. The legislation passed last session did not go quite so far, but it did signify that the trade policies of the present Government are leaning in that direction. The Government seems to have forgotten something which has been repeated so often that it has become a cliché, namely, that trade is a two-way street. Our ships and trains and trucks must not only be loaded with Canadian products and manufactured goods destined to other countries, but must also be returning with goods produced in those countries.

At the present time practically every country in Western Europe is buying more goods from us than we are buying from them, and that applies not only to European countries but to practically every country in the world, with the exception of the United States. I have not the figures from 1958, but I have figures for the full calendar year of 1957, which I took from an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail. Without doubt they are authentic. In the year 1957 we sold to Britain $737 million worth of goods and bought from her in return goods worth $522 million, giving us a surplus of $215 million. To West Germany we sold $151 million, and we purchased $97 million from her, giving us a surplus of $54 million. What about Japan? In 1957 she was our fourth best customer. We sold to her $139 million worth of goods and purchased in return $61 million, giving us a surplus of $78 million. In 1957 we exported goods worth more than $10 million to 30 different nations. With five of the nations, namely, Switzerland, India, Cuba, Columbia and Sweden, our trade practically balanced; with four nations, namely, the United States, Venezuela, Jamaica and Brazil, the balance was in their favour; and with the remaining 21 nations the balance was clearly in our favour.

Let me mention some of the countries which had an unfavourable trade with us. We sold to Italy, France, Australia and Mexico twice as much as we bought from them; to the Netherlands, Argentina, Russia and Peru three times as much; to Panama and the Philippines four times as much; to South Africa seven times as much; to Porto Rico twelve times as much; to Poland sixteen times as much; to Norway eighteen times as much; and to Pakistan twenty-two times as much.

Honourable senators, if we are to continue to have a large volume of trade with these countries we must pass legislation which will make it easier for us not only to sell more goods to them but at the same time to buy more goods from them. That is not going to be easy. That has been the type of legislation which has brought prosperity to Canada in years gone by—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Free trade?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: —and is the only type of legislation that can bring prosperity and increase employment in Canada, not only in the immediate future, but in the era of great prosperity which I am very confident awaits Canada.

Honourable senators, we are all very much concerned with these great problems which beset us. I am one who is confident that we can solve them. I see for Canada a great and glorious future, but we must tackle these problems vigorously and courageously, with the determination to make Canada the greatest and the finest country in the world.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 22, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am pleased to see in attendance on both sides of the chamber so many of my senator friends, all apparently in the best of health. I feel that all of you are ready, willing, able and anxious to get down to work and do your usual good job.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald)) was kind enough, when speaking last Thursday, to refer very generously to the three new senators who have just been summoned to and become members of this chamber. I also wish to welcome them and to say a few words with regard to each of them.

I have known Senator Hnatyshyn for, probably, 25 years, and believe that he will make a very valuable senator and do good work in this house. I would like to quote what the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix had to say about him after his appointment:

The Appointment of Mr. John Hnatyshyn, Q.C., as a Senator of Canada is a meritorious one and is so acclaimed in Saskatoon and beyond, and regardless of party affiliations and party considerations. The esteem in which Mr. Hnatyshyn is held is measured in large part by the fact that he is the president of the Saskatoon Bar Association. The underlying importance of his appointment to the Red Chamber is in the fact that Mr. Hnatyshyn is a native of the Ukraine, and his choice by Prime Minister Diefenbaker as the first of his race in Saskatchewan to go to the Senate is a recognition of the great role Canadian Ukrainians have played, and are continuing to play in this growing country.

The St. John's News also had a few words to say about the Honourable Senator Higgins, and I would like to read it to you:

> The first senator to be appointed in Newfoundland by the Conservative Government is a lawyer who commands the liking and even affection of all who know him.
> John Gilbert Higgins was known in his youth as a brilliant student and a fine athlete. He was at St. Bon's College in 1909 when he won a Rhodes scholarship. He completed his education at Merton College, Oxford, and was called to the Bar of England in 1913. While at Oxford he was captain of the university's hockey team.

It goes on to say:

> Jack Higgins has been all his life the model of a good citizen of Newfoundland. Its history and traditions have been his lifetime interest.

It further states that his only venture into politics was in 1949, when he led the Opposition in the Legislature of Newfoundland.

I would now make reference to the other honourable gentleman who has recently been named to this chamber, the Honourable Senator Buchanan, who comes from the great province of Alberta, and I should like to read in part what the Edmonton Journal has to say about him:

> When Senator John Alexander Buchanan assumes his place in the Canadian Senate, he will be bringing with him not only a solid knowledge of Alberta achieved through nearly a half-century of living here, but a wealth of practical experience in the northland as well.
> As a builder and surveyor, he has spent many years practising all that is implied in Edmonton's role as gateway to the North. Perhaps only through surveying can one obtain a detailed knowledge of a new land. It is to Canada's benefit that Senator Buchanan has had that experience in the North. As a builder, he has an understanding of the needs and the future of communities like Yellowknife, Fort Smith and Fort Norman.

The article goes on to say he was cost engineer on the Canol Pipeline Project during the Second World War, and has been interested in Alberta affairs and the development of the North for the last 50 years.

Honourable senators, we have a new member from the far west, Alberta, and a new member from the comparatively far west, Saskatchewan, and also one from the far east, Newfoundland. It seems to me that as senators we should visit the different provinces more often than we do. I was born in Ontario, so I think I know quite a bit about this province. In 1903 I went west and became well acquainted with Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. Since my appointment to the Senate I have become well acquainted with the province of Quebec and the people who live there. I like them very much and I think they are the most hospitable people you would find anywhere. I have also been as far east in Canada as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but I have not yet spent any time in Prince Edward Island or in Newfoundland, except at the airport. I would suggest that honourable senators make it a point to visit the various parts of Canada more often than they do. They could discuss local problems with the people and in this way broaden their own horizon. I would be very glad indeed if any honourable member from another part of the country would come out to Saskachewan in the summertime when the wheat fields are shining for miles in the sun and billowing in the gentle prairie winds. It is a sight well worth seeing.

I would like to compliment the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The mover, like myself, has been in western Canada for many years. He has seen it grow from almost its beginning. I was much interested in what he had to say, for I have experienced most of the things he talked about. I wish to congratulate him on a good effort.

I also offer my congratulations to the seconder. As was stated by the honourable Leader of the Opposition a few days ago, the seconder made two complete speeches: one in French and a second one in English. I for one admired the fluency and the oratory of our colleague who is able to speak so well in both languages. I am sure he was the envy of every member of the house.

Next I would like to say a word or two about His Honour the Speaker. We are glad indeed to have him with us. He has been looking after affairs for the Senate and Canada not only in Europe but also in the United States of America. The only thing I am afraid of is that he might become internationally famous and we might lose him.

I am also glad to say a word or two about the Leader of the Opposition, who mentioned me in his address. We are pleased that he is with us again, in the best of health as ever, of which he gave evidence a few days ago by making a good fighting speech.

Honourable senators, I am afraid some of you may be disappointed in what I have to say tonight, because I am not going to make a political speech—at any rate, not a partisan political speech. I have never done so here, for it has been my desire at all times to keep partisanship at a minimum in the Senate—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You and I are in agreement, then.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: —and to preserve the independence of the Senate. At the present time there are three times as many members on the opposite side of this chamber as I have in my party on this side; however, that has not interfered in any way with getting business of the Senate properly done. The same thing happened in 1921. After the election of that year the Opposition in the Senate had a majority. This was also the case after the election of 1935. And now, in 1959 the Opposition here has a very large majority—as I said, it has about three times as many members as we have on the Government side. In the past this has not interfered with the dispatch of business in a non-partisan manner.

I remember reading the Senate Debates of 1922. That was the first session after the election of 1921. Senator Lougheed had formerly been the Leader of the Government forces in the Senate, and when he got up to speak in 1922 he told the Honourable Senator Dandurand, who was then the Leader of the Government, that even though there was a majority against the Government in this chamber he would see to it that the business of the Senate was not interfered with by virtue of that fact, and that he would do everything to carry on and help with the legislation. In reply, Senator Dandurand said:

> Here, honourable gentlemen, I crave permission to take up a matter which is not contained in the Speech from the Throne. It may seem a matter personal to myself, but it bears on the conduct of affairs of this chamber. I refer to an attitude of mind which has permeated the Senate through tradition and for a long period of years. At the root of the matter is the whole question of the function of the Senate and the exercise of its powers. Should it be administered by party groups—by a Ministerial party and an Opposition? I confess that ever since I entered this chamber I have been reluctant to submit to party rule. I thought that the Senate should be, in appearance as well as in reality, an independent body exercising quasi-judicial functions.

In 1936, when the Government changed again, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen had something to say on the same subject. I will read what he said, as appears in the Senate Debates of 1936, at page 20:

> We shall receive the legislation of the Administration in the spirit in which—I say it with all appreciation—honourable members opposite received ours in the years that have gone by. In this house we have made an effort, which has been common to both sides, to review carefully and to improve legislation with a single eye to the good of Canada. In that work we had the assistance—the industrious assistance—and the utmost co-operation of the honourable senator who now leads this House (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) and of those associated with him. We owe it to them that we now reciprocate to the full. We owe it to them that we utterly abandon prejudice and deal with legislation on its merits. We owe it to them that we make the committees of this house a medium by which all persons peculiarly and directly interested in and affected by legislation may have their arguments heard and make their wishes known, to the end that our legislative product may be the more acceptable. Such service we have endeavoured to perform and we shall endeavour to perform in days to come. It may be, indeed, that the field of opportunity for review and improvement will be enlarged in these years beyond what it has been in the five years that have gone by . . . Be that so or not, it will be the endeavour of us all, whether we are in the majority or in the minority, to make our own conduct a credit to this house and to Parliament.
> It will be our desire that as little of partisanship as possible invade our deliberations. I am sure I am speaking in this respect the mind of all those who sit behind me, and I ask honourable members opposite to let their judgment of our sincerity be governed by results in the next few years.

Senator Dandurand replied as follows, as reported on page 22:

> I was happy to hear from my right honourable friend that he did not intend to play the role of leader of an opposition. That is similar to what I told him when he came into this chamber. I remember his first word was—and I appreciated it as a high compliment—that I should be henceforth the opponent worthy of his steel. I told him that I disclaimed any such honour, and moreover would not be an opponent, because I did not recognize the existence of such an institution as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this chamber. He seemed somewhat surprised, but I think that during the five sessions we have worked together he has come to realize that there is no systematic opposition here and that we are all bent upon doing our best to improve the legislation that comes to us from the House of Commons.

He then goes on to refer to what happened in 1922.

Honourable senators, these statements have probably been read in the Senate before, and I hope you will excuse me for reiterating them at the present time, but I just wanted to explain why I was not going to make a partisan political speech. I think we should conduct our business in the manner approved by these great men who preceded us. The attitude which prevailed in this house during those years has prevailed here during the past two sessions. I feel that it will continue during this session, and that we will all try to keep our political feelings at as low an ebb as possible. I deeply appreciate the co-operation received at all times during the short time that I have occupied the position of Leader of the Government in the Senate.

At this time I had intended to refer to the Speech from the Throne in so far as it affects the Trans-Canada highway, and then to deal with another subject not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, namely, the Crowsnest Pass rates. However, I will leave those matters for the moment, because I might not have time to deal with them, and also my voice might play out before I could finish what I wished to say about them.

Honourable senators, we are living in a great country. I am proud indeed to be a Canadian. During the last few years I have done considerable travelling here and there, and I must say that on every such occasion I have been mighty glad to get back to Canada. We have a beautiful country, which has wonderful natural resources and a great future. I am not one of those people who think that the world is coming to an end or that we in Canada are going to the dogs. I suppose I am an optimist, for I always try to look on the bright side of things. In spite of the recession that we speak about, and which I am not blaming on anyone, I think that 1958, considering everything, was a comparatively good year in Canada. I would like to mention some of the things which, in my opinion, made it an outstanding year. In the first place, our dollar is the most valuable of any currency in the world, being on the average at a premium of 3 per cent over the United States dollar.

Next, our retail sales during 1958 reached an all time high in all parts of Canada. Later on I will give you some details of what these sales amounted to in Saskatchewan, where we were said to have had rather a poor crop.

Our bank clearances also reached an all-time high, Toronto having the second largest on the continent of North America—$62.5 billion in that city alone.

Construction of housing and other buildings reached an all time high in 1958. Housing was up 30 per cent over 1957.

More people were employed and more wages paid. It is true, honourable senators, that we have a large number of unemployed, but let us take a look at the United States. In December the United States had 5 million unemployed, with unemployment still rising; and in Britain there were 500,000 unemployed, and unemployment was still rising there also.

In 1958 there was the greatest salmon run in the province of British Columbia since the year 1905. I hope the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) will make a speech to us later on and tell us all about that wonderful salmon run, and give us any other information he has about what he has been doing out in his province since we saw him last summer.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I will.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In 1958 our export wheat sales were higher than they have been for some years. I will give some more information on that later on.

Prices for our cattle are high, owing to heavy exports to the United States.

In spite of what has been said about our bonds, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics summary of January 7 indicates that from September to January there was a substantial decline in the bond holdings of the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks and that the general public's holdings of market issues increased during that time by some $499 million. It does not look to me, therefore, as though the public were running away from our bonds.

In 1958, particularly in the month of December, car loadings were up.

Life insurance increased in volume, and that leads me to give you some figures with regard to income for 1958.

In so far as the farming industry is concerned 1958 was not a bad year; it was considerably better than 1957. Taking wheat first, I find that the cash income from wheat was $415 million, whereas in 1957 it was $375.9 million. The cash income from potatoes was $41.5 million; and in 1957 it was $39.9 million; from vegetable, $65 million; in 1957, $58.1 million. Tobacco sales, 1958, $87 million; 1957, $66.9 million. Cattle: In 1958 the cash income was a way up, $607 million; in 1957 it was $482 million. Hogs: In 1958, $312 million; in 1957, $292.3 million. Poultry: In 1958, $195 million; in 1957, $168.6 million. Dairy products: 1958, $491.5 million; 1957, $459.6 million.

Those figures, when added up, show that the farm cash income for 1958 was up 10 per cent over and above 1957. If you consider that the cost of services that the farmers had to buy during the same period went up approximately only 1 per cent, I think it is obvious that in 1958 the farm picture was not too bad.

Now let us look at western Canada. After my return to Ottawa I cut some clippings from various newspapers which came to hand. Here is one from the Financial Post of January 24 last, under the heading "Manitoba '58 Farm Most Productive Ever." The article goes on to say:

> Manitoba farmers in 1958 had their most productive year in history.
> Provincial department of agriculture figures show net farm production of $307 million—
> Average net production per farm, on the basis of 49,000 operated farms, was $6,266.

The article, which I do not intend to read in full, goes on to give a breakdown and comparisons for the years 1951 to 1957.

In another paper I find this heading, "Retail sales hit high mark", according to Saskatchewan Retail Merchants Association. This, I point out, is in Saskatchewan, which had a comparatively short wheat crop last year.

The article points out that retail sales last year in the province amounted to $883 million odd, up from 1957 by some $40 million. That situation applied not only to the cities of our province, but to the rural areas as well.

I have a clipping here from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, stating that Saskatoon bank clearings reached an all time high last year, up $66,780,000 from 1957 to a record high of $541,129,000.

I should like to inform honourable senators that the province of Saskatchewan does not any more depend entirely on wheat. I have before me a report of the Saskatchewan mineral production for the year 1958, which shows that the total production of oil, gas, gold, copper, salt and other minerals in that year was $200 million. The production of these items is a great help to the economy of our large wheat-growing province. I have the details on the mineral aspect of our economy, but I shall not go into them.

Let us look at conditions a little farther west, in the province of Alberta. Here is a clipping from a newspaper with the heading "Alberta's farmers had hefty 1958 income". The article goes on to say:

> A preliminary estimate by the provincial government officials puts farm cash income in 1958 at $488 million, a gain of $46 million over the previous year.

Another article carrying the heading, "Outlook in Alberta bright", has this to say:

> Unemployment has caused concern in Alberta just as it has elsewhere in Canada . . . but it is still difficult to make any kind of case for a recession in this province.

The article goes on to tell us that the value of manufacturing in Alberta last year amounted to $800 million.

Another article is headed "Beef prices expected to stay steadily high". Of course Manitoba and Alberta are provinces which produce great herds of cattle. By the way, Manitoba is one of the best mixed farming provinces in the whole of Canada at the present time, and the fact that beef prices have been high has added greatly to the prosperity of the farmers in that province, and as well to that of the farmers of western Saskatchewan and southern Alberta who are also in the cattle business.

Now, what is the outlook for 1959? I have read a good deal in the newspapers since returning to Ottawa, and I find that the outlook does not look too bad. The Financial Post of January 24, in an article about steel, says the steel demand looks bright for 1959.

A clipping from the Montreal Gazette contains these words:

> Another construction record is seen this year.

The Gazette's Annual Review predicts that the chemistry industry is going to have a record year.

The Financial Post, in its "Trend of Business", makes these statements: Manufacturing output higher in November. Outlook for 1959 good. Value of inventory owned by manufacturers up. Upswing in new orders in November. Construction dollars hit high record in 1958. Then it goes on to talk about bank clearings. Incidentally, I read another article which said that zinc and lead sales were going up.

Now let us look at the economy of the United States of America. The economy of that country is expected to rise this year to $500 billion. That being the case, the Americans can look forward to a good year which, no doubt, will be reflected and have a bearing on prosperity in Canada. In this respect I recently noticed that the manufacturing of cars is on the upgrade.

So, honourable senators, I am not at all despondent. We had a fairly good year in 1958, when you consider there was a recession; I feel things are well under control now, and that we will possibly have another good year in 1959; indeed, in my honest opinion it will be a better year than 1958.

Now, everyone seems to be talking about inflation and cost of living. I am not enough of an expert to tell honourable senators how we can cure inflation. I read a few days ago an article written by that famous columnist Bruce Hutchison, in which he said the only way to cure inflation was to raise taxes—put them a way up—pay our debts with hard money, and do that kind of thing. He did not say what effect all this would have on unemployment. On the other hand, I have before me a statement taken from the Winnipeg Tribune after the Canadian Chamber of Commerce had filed its brief with the dominion Government. It is headed: "Chamber asks tax cuts to end inflation threat".

I don't see how the two can be reconciled. One person says, "Raise the taxes". The chambers of commerce say, "Lower them; that will help to end inflation." There is also the assertion of an ex-member of Parliament, now connected with the labour union, to the effect that high wages and a 30-hour week and all that kind of thing have nothing to do with inflation. As I have said, I am not an expert and I do not intend to go into this matter any further.

Last year the cost of living rose 2.5 per cent, but if one looks back, honourable senators, one finds that between 1946 and 1948 the increase in the cost of living was 21 per cent. The tendency to rise, therefore, must at this time be at least partially under control. I am not blaming anyone for the earlier rise: the war was over, things were booming, and prices were going up.

As I mentioned earlier this evening, I had it in mind to make a few remarks on this occasion about the Trans-Canada Highway, but the only reference I shall make to it at this time is to quote the following statement in the Speech from the Throne:

My ministers will recommend an increase in the total funds that may be expended under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

I have here material for quite a speech which I intended to deliver, but I shall hold it for some future occasion, and merely say that Saskatchewan is the only province of the nine by whom the agreement was signed that has completed its Trans-Canada highway construction—406 miles from the border of Manitoba to the border of Alberta, and all completed in the fall of 1957.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is an unfair comparison, though. You cannot go through the mountains as easily as you can move over the prairie.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I should like just to mention that the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) and I, with our families, went to Regina to celebrate the opening of the highway. We had a good time.

It is expected that the entire highway, except perhaps a portion in Newfoundland, will be finished in 1960.

A few minutes ago I suggested that I could regale you with a lot of information about the Crowsnest Pass rates, but I see that it is now nine o'clock and I do not wish to impose on honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Go on; go on.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Let us hear about the Crowsnest.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That being the case, and as my voice is still holding up fairly well, I should like to deal with the rates briefly. Of recent months, both before and after the judgment delivered by the Board of Transport Commissioners on November 7, 1958, we have heard much in the press, both of the east and west, regarding the Crowsnest rates on grain and grain products.

As honourable senators know, the railway companies have been agitating for many years for the repeal of these rates. Commissioner H. B. Chase in his observations attached to the report of the board, makes special reference to them, terming them "the statutory rates". He does not actually recommend that they be done away with, but I gather from his remarks that he thinks they should be either abolished or remodelled. As these rates are of vital importance to the prairie provinces, I think I should say something about them at this time. They came into existence some fifty years ago.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Sixty years ago.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Parliament of that day was of the opinion that something should be done to help the great grain-growing industry of the prairies, which was becoming of much importance to the Canadian economy. The Government decided it was necessary to make some arrangement with the railway company in respect of freight rates, not only for the bringing in of supplies from the east but for the taking out of the produce of the farms to the markets of the world. Eventually, in 1897, Parliament acted, and an agreement was entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. One of the terms was the fixing of freight rates on goods coming in from east of Fort William and Port Arthur, and on produce leaving western Canada for export. In 1897 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was anxious to build a line from Lethbridge, Alberta, through the Crowsnest Pass as far as Nelson, in British Columbia. The company needed financial assistance. It was anxious to get in there ahead of United States lines which were threatening to enter the province, and thus to provide itself with a real link from the main line through the Kootenay area. The company therefore applied to the dominion Government for a subsidy of $3,630,000, or $11,000 per mile of railway. The province of British Columbia, which owned its natural resources, offered to make the company a grant of 250,000 acres of land. It is but fair to say that after the deal was consummated the railway company transferred 50,000 acres of coal-bearing lands to the Dominion of Canada.

In return for the subsidy the Canadian Pacific Railway entered into certain covenants with regard to freight rates, which later became generally known as the Crowsnest Pass rates. This was a double-barreled arrangement. The agreement first reduced the general rates and tolls on certain kinds of goods westbound from points east of Fort William and Port Arthur on the company's main lines and other lines. This is one part of the agreement which is very often overlooked. The railway company agreed to reduce the general rates and tolls on green fruits and vegetables by 33⅓ per cent, on coal oil by 20 per cent, and on the following goods by 10 per cent: binder twine, agricultural implements and parts, certain iron products, bars, bands, plates, nails, spikes, horseshoes, et cetera, wire of all kinds, window glass, building paper and roofing felt, paints and oils, livestock, wooden ware and household furniture. The reductions were to take place on January 1, 1898, and the company agreed that no higher rates would thereafter be charged on such goods carried by it between the said points.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Would the honourable senator state again the points between which these rates applied?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: From points east of Fort William and Port Arthur to western Canada.

The second part of the agreement had to do with the reduction in the company's then present rates on grain and flour from all points on its main lines, branch lines or connections, west of Fort William and Port Arthur to all points east, the reduction to be 3 cents per 100 pounds on the current rates.

The railway line was built and the company was paid a subsidy of $3,404,720, and the agreement with respect to the freight rates came into force on September 1, 1899. However, the scope—and this is what a lot of people do not know—of the Crowsnest Pass rates over the years has been whittled away and these rates are now in force only on shipments of grain, flour and certain other grain products at a level of 3 cents per 100 pounds less than the C.P.R. rates as of September, 1897.

Hon. Mr. Reid: For export only.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. The Regina rate at that time was 23 cents per 100 pounds, and this rate was reduced to 20 cents per 100 pounds, and from all other points at that rate, depending on the distance from Fort William and Port Arthur. That is the way it was worked out.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: How much does it work out to per ton mile?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: These rates were fixed in perpetuity, according to my interpretation of the agreement and, as I will show later on, they now apply to all railway lines west to Vancouver and Pacific ports and to Churchill. This reduced Regina rate of 20 cents per 100 pounds remained in effect from September, 1899, to October, 1903, when it was reduced to 18 cents. The change came about in this way. The province of Manitoba was in need of railways and the Canadian Northern Railway—Mackenzie and Mann interests were building them, but Mackenzie and Mann needed to have their bonds guaranteed by the Manitoba Government. The Manitoba Government entered into an agreement to guarantee the payment of $7 million worth of Canadian Northern Railway bonds in return for which the Canadian Northern Railway Company was to make certain concessions with regard to freight rates, which under the agreement would be fixed by the government of the province of Manitoba.

When that agreement came into effect the C.N.R.—it was then called the Canadian Northern Railway—reduced its rates to 18 cents per 100 pounds, and the C.P.R., in order to meet the competition, also reduced its rates to 18 cents per 100 pounds. That rate was in effect for 15 years, until the Manitoba agreement ran out. As soon as the agreement ran out the rate went back up to 20 cents per 100 pounds on all railways.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Was that 20-cent rate not from Calgary and Edmonton? It was not from Regina, was it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: At the time this agreement was entered into the grain was not moving to the west coast, but later on it started to go from Calgary and Edmonton, so arrangements were made that the mileage between those two points and the Pacific ports would be considered to be the same. My understanding is that the rate of 20 cents per 100 pounds is based on that mileage, no matter from what point the grain is shipped.

In August 1918, as a result of the McAdoo award in the United States, and because there were great increases in the cost of transportation, and so on, the Canadian Government asked the Board of Railway Commissioners to prepare a new schedule of freight rates. This was done, and the new rates became effective on August 12, 1918, by an order in council passed by the Dominion Government under the War Measures Act. That order in council was in force until some time in 1919. In the session of 1919 the House of Commons brought in an amendment to the Railway Act which, if it had passed and become law, would have completely done away with the Crowsnest Pass rates. The amendment was passed in the House of Commons, but when the bill reached the Senate a number of senators, including Senator Lougheed and Senator Watson, looked into the matter carefully and discovered that if the Senate passed the amendment and it was assented to and became law the Crowsnest Pass rates would be no more. They objected very strenuously.

I remember a debate that took place in this house in 1945 when the late Senator Fred Johnston of Saskatchewan told us all about what happened in the Senate in 1919 when that amendment to the Railway Act was before the house. He read excerpts from the speeches which were made by Senators Lougheed, Watson and others. As we know, the Senate in 1919 refused to pass the bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You are putting bad ideas into our heads.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That was bad legislation then; it is good now.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But after many conferences back and forth the bill was allowed to pass, with this proviso, that it was to remain in force for only three years. As soon as the bill was passed, up went the rates. The Regina rate went up to 25 cents per 100 pounds, and in 1920 it went up to 32.5 cents. On January 1, 1921, the rate went down to 31 cents, and on December 1 of that year, to 29 cents. At the end of the three-year period it went back to 20 cents.

Between 1922 and 1925 there was a lot of confusion. Neither the farmers nor the railways knew where they stood, and no one could tell what was going to happen to these rates. However, in 1925 the Government brought in a bill which released the railway with respect to the reduced rates on westbound traffic but provided for the continuance of the Crowsnest rates on shipments of grain, flour and grain products in perpetuity. In 1927, by order of the Railway Board, the Crowsnest rates were extended westward to Pacific ports and to Churchill, and these rates have remained in force ever since.

Honourable senators, the action of the Senate in 1919 saved the people of the Prairie provinces many millions of dollars. I have heard estimates of the amount saved, some high and some low, but I know that with a big crop and the rates remaining as they were in 1897 many millions of dollars have as a result gone into the pockets of the farmers of the Prairie provinces every year and assisted the grain growers of those provinces in marketing their grain and flour in the markets of the world, without which assistance they would have been unable to compete for that business, which in some years has amounted to $1 billion.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Thank you; that is the figure I wanted.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Crowsnest Pass rates are therefore statutory, and it has been held that they cannot be changed by the Transport Board, but only by act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would the honourable senator tell me this: While the rates have remained at the figure of 20 cents, or whatever it is, for all these years since 1897, has the value of the money in which they have been paid remained constant?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, you would not expect me to answer that question, would you? As I said, these Crowsnest Pass rates are therefore statutory, and it has been held that they cannot be changed except by act of Parliament. In 1951 the Government set up a Royal Commission on Transportation, known as the Turgeon Commission, which fully investigated these rates and dealt with all the arguments by the railway companies for their repeal, and by the farmers and provinces, and others for their continuance. In its report of February 1951, at page 249, the commission gave the following decision:

> The conclusion which commends itself to the commission is that the time has not come for Parliament to divest itself of the immediate control of these rates which it assumed in 1897. Such a time may come later with the evolution of the country's economic position, but it seems certain that it has not yet come in this case. On the contrary it would be against the national interest at this moment, in view of the uncertainties which exist in world affairs, and consequently in world market prospects, to subject this great export industry to the disturbance which the abandonment of statutory protection would undoubtedly cause. This abandonment would mean that Parliament no longer looks upon western Canada's production of grain for export as an industry requiring special consideration in the national interest. There is no doubt that the effect of such a measure at this time would be particularly unfortunate.

Honourable senators, I would like to say that the retention of the Crowsnest Pass rates is, in my opinion, to the lasting credit of the Senate of Canada. As I have said, they are most vital to the economy of the Prairie provinces, enabling them to compete with other nations which are closer to the sea in respect to grain, flour and grain products; and I understand that the grain growers of western Canada were greatly relieved when the Prime Minister made a statement not long ago in the other place that there is no intention of doing away with these Crowsnest Pass rates.

I have nearly finished. We are going to have a heavy program of legislation; at least, that is my opinion after reading the Speech from the Throne carefully several times, and I am going to make an effort to have as much legislation as possible introduced in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have already introduced two bills, and there is another one that I hope will be ready for introduction tomorrow or the next day.

Honourable senators will gather from my remarks that I am not the least bit downhearted. I look forward to the future with the greatest confidence. Let us hope that peace and good will will continue to prevail throughout the world.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), after having painted such a bright picture of Saskatchewan, would explain why the gas station operators showed a decrease of something like $2 million in their receipts?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Do you mean the service station operators?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: The gas station operators showed a decrease of something like $2 million in 1958 as against 1957, in Saskatchewan alone.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Are you sure of those figures?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am quite sure that you would accept the source from which they came.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: My understanding is that there never was so much car business in Saskatchewan as there was last year.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not so much gas!

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am quoting from a speech made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the other place on January 19, in which he showed a decrease by the gas operators.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not mention any of the decreases, I was mentioning the increases.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A truer word was never spoken.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Before we adjourn and in order that the members of the Opposition can enter into the work of the Senate in that spirit of co-operation to which the Leader referred at the opening of his remarks, would he be good enough to inform the house what the business will be tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand that the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) is going to continue the debate on the Address. Also I intend to go ahead with the motion for the second reading of the bill to amend the Public Lands Act, as well as the motion for the second reading of the bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act. These will take a little time. I may also be able to introduce another bill.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

NATIONAL GALLERY

PURCHASES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, this is January 28, 1959, and to commemorate the answers given a year ago today by the then Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Haig) about the National Gallery, I have these questions to ask:

1. What was the accession number, the medium, the artist, the title, the date of acquisition, the source, and the cost (in Canadian dollars) of each one of the works of art purchased by the National Gallery of Canada, from accession No. 6911 of September 18, 1957 to date?

2. What commissions have been paid for the purchase of each one of the works of art bought by the National Gallery of Canada from accession No. 6327 of May 18, 1955, (pages 529-539 of the Senate Hansard of January 28, 1958) to be completed to date, and to whom in each case?

DIVORCE

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Hon. George S. White, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Bradley be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES

On the Order, Inquiries Nos. 1 and 2:

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I might mention, for the information of the honourable senators by whom these inquiries have been made, that we try every day to hurry the answers along, but some of them take considerable time. I would ask that the inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: The inquiries stand.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, I would like at once, as Mr. King used to say, to echo the sentiments of the distinguished senators who expressed so eloquently their appreciation of the efforts of the honourable senators who moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and who welcomed to our midst the three gentlemen who have joined us this session. Anything I could add to the aptness of their phraseology in these respects would be a mere gilding of the lily.

Probably, of the trio who were introduced, the most fortunate is the honourable senator from Newfoundland in that, like his associates from Newfoundland and his colleagues from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, he has the exceptional good fortune to come from an area adjacent to the province of Nova Scotia. It may be that some of these gentlemen are not so appreciative of this honour as they should be, but I am always hoping for a change of mind in that respect. Let it not be supposed that I am seeking to discourage any honourable senator who is not so fortunately situated as the honourable senator from Newfoundland. In the years that lie ahead they will have to labour under this disadvantage and seek by good works to overcome it.

I want to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) on their speeches. I shall not attempt to go into the details of what they said. I am sure the performance of the Leader of the Opposition met with commendation on this side of the house, as I am sure the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Government did on the other side of the house and, indeed, on both sides.

I am not sure that I am as optimistic about economic conditions as the honourable Leader of the Government was, but I realize, as he admitted himself, that he was dealing with increases rather than decreases. That is perhaps accountable for the particular frame of mind he was in. In passing may I, as one who has had some little experience in the responsibilities of the office he now holds, say that I think he has done a good job in his capacity as Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I believe the manner in which he has fulfilled his duties has met with the approval of all members of this house.

I want to take this opportunity to express pleasure at the news carried in the Speech from the Throne of the forthcoming visit to Canada of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness Prince Philip. It is good news to all Canadians. I am sure the royal couple would be welcome in Canada on any occasion, and they can rest assured of being well received. I am inclined to share the fears expressed in an editorial entitled "Save The Queen" which appeared in the Montreal Gazette. The writer feared that perhaps the Queen's itinerary was too difficult, and I must confess that, even though she may have graciously acquiesced to it, there would appear to be danger of taxing her to her capacity. I suppose the matter has been taken into full consideration, and perhaps the itinerary will turn out to be not too taxing after all.

I should like to say something else with respect to the coming visit of Her Majesty.

A few days ago when I was turning over in my mind what I would say in this speech I planned to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that I had heard a great many recurring rumours that various Canadian citizens had been trying over on their pianos the sound of titles prefixed to their names. I intended saying to the Prime Minister that I hoped he would have the courage not to lift the present ban, for I believe that we in Canada have enough class distinctions, without adding to them. In the meantime, however, the Prime Minister is reported to have taken this view himself. Although I have not seen his exact statement, I take this opportunity of congratulating him on the stand that I would have taken myself. I hope he refuses all importunities that are made to him. He will save himself many headaches in the future if he holds to that course.

I want to refer to one other item in the Speech from the Throne, and then I will direct myself to what I have particularly in mind. It is an item which suggests that legislation will be introduced to authorize appointment of parliamentary secretaries. In principle that would not be materially different from the appointment of parliamentary assistants by the former administration. If it is contemplated to set forth carefully in detail what their duties are to be, I think that is all to the good. Of course, for details, we must wait until the legislation comes down, but I can see no reason to object to the principle. However, honourable senators, this gives me an occasion to say again something which I said when I held the position of Leader of the Government in the Senate. I believe it is as true today as it was then that if parliamentary assistants or secretaries are to be appointed there is more need for them in the Senate than in the House of Commons. At that time I ventured to suggest that six might be allotted to this house, but I did not get very far with the Government of which I was a member. When the matter comes up again I shall be a little more modest in my proposal, but I shall emphasize once more the needs of the Senate. I will point out that in the other chamber there are 23 ministers of the crown. As I understand it, the legislation will contemplate adding, say, 15 parliamentary secretaries entirely in the House of Commons, so in that house there will be a total of 38 ministers and parliamentary secretaries. It will be the duty of these parliamentary secretaries to supply the members of the House of Commons with information in regard to legislation and to answer questions. At the present time there is in this house neither a minister of the crown nor a parliamentary secretary. The odds are 38 to nothing. I have always been prepared to admit, honourable senators, that the average experience and knowledge of legislation of a senator is materially above that of the average member of the House of Commons. In making this statement I mean no disrespect to members of that house. However, when a situation develops that in parliament there are 38 ministers of the Crown and parliamentary secretaries in the House of Commons for the purpose of serving that branch of Parliament, and none whatever here, it is so unequal that it would be ludicrous, if it were not a serious matter. When I was Government Leader here I said some years ago that I realized the insufficiency of the information furnished to explain legislation and to answer questions to the best advantage, despite the very splendid people I had around me, and that my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, had around him.

I say it is fundamentally wrong that there should be that wide disparity between the two houses of Parliament. It is absolutely wrong. It was wrong in my day when I was Government Leader and it is even more so now, because then there was a member of the Government in the capacity of Government Leader of this house and there is none today. I say to the Prime Minister, for whom I have the greatest respect, and to the Government that it is in the nature of a discourtesy to this house and it should be rectified.

I realize that our direct avenues of representation to the Government officially no longer exist, but I am going to point out that there are among the membership of this house, in the person of His Honour the Speaker and of the Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Brunt), two men who are reputed to hold as close a position personally with the Prime Minister of this country as do any two individuals in Canada, not excepting the ministers of his Government, and I suggest that the Deputy Leader of this house carry to the Prime Minister the representations of at least of one senator. I hold the Prime Minister in very high regard, as I would anyone holding that position, and I say to him that the present situation is a discourtesy to the Senate. I would not be so presumptuous as to suggest to Mr. Diefenbaker whom he should take into his Government—he is quite capable of making up his own Government himself—but were he to ask me I would say he has no better choice than the one who at present occupies the position of Government Leader in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I think someone should convey that opinion to the Government, and I personally—speaking for myself and myself alone—would ask the Deputy Leader of this house to do so, rather than the Leader, for it would be embarrassing for him. I would further ask the Deputy Leader to convey in due course to this house what the view of the Prime Minister is.

As to the rest of the legislation to be presented to this house, in not referring to the Speech from the Throne I mean no discourtesy to the Government who prepared it or to the Governor General who read it. It mentions many subjects that are of very vital interest—some of which have been partially referred to already by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and there will be discussion by various members when the details of the legislation come before the house.

I want rather to deal briefly with a subject that certainly is not entirely foreign to the Speech from the Throne, a matter in which I have always had considerable interest and which is of vital importance at this moment. I think that developments at present taking place in western Europe are the most dramatic developments of our time and are calculated to change the whole trading outlook of the Western world. I think we in this country can take a leaf from the notebooks of those countries, because they have had a very wide experience in the problems and questions that we are facing in this country. They have gone through all the dangers and the difficulties of inflation and they are today, in my judgment, dealing with inflation more intelligently than is any other area in the world. I think they have learned through long experience what commercial policies are the most likely to accomplish the end they are seeking. For instance, the hard problem of rising wages and inflation is being met by lowering the cost of living—that is, the standard of living of the wage earner is increased by lowering the cost of living rather than by raising the wage scale, and they are placing themselves in a position that is the admiration of all thinking people in the Western world.

Honourable senators, I have had a little trouble with laryngitis, and I have made some notes to use if my voice and audience stay with me. In these circumstances, with your permission, I will read the notes.

Ten years ago when we signed the North Atlantic Treaty, we bound ourselves under article II to seek economic co-operation with each other and to seek to eliminate our international rivalries. In the intervening period nothing along that line has been done by NATO, and it is now perfectly apparent—I say this with considerable regret—that nothing is likely to be done through the medium of NATO. Tired of waiting, six of our European NATO partners have already moved to implement the spirit of article II of the North Atlantic Treaty outside of NATO. The remaining seven European partners, including the United Kingdom, are at present negotiating to join with them in a free trade area. The United States of America, the fourteenth NATO member, is already seeking to become associated with this development. On June 20 last, before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, the Honourable John Foster Dulles urged that the President be given authority to enter into negotiations with the European Economic Community, saying in part:

> The best opportunity we will have to negotiate with the community for tariff reductions most advantageous to our export trade will be before the new tariff becomes formally established.

The authority was granted and I presume negotiations are in progress. It remains, strange to say, that Canada, the foremost advocate of economic co-operation, and the fifteenth and only remaining member of NATO, as far as I know is taking no action whatsoever. I think we should take action.

On the one hand, there is emerging a United States of Europe, economically, if not politically, with a population of 285 million people bound together in a free trade area with all the advantages of mass production; and on the other hand, there exists as at present the United States of America with 175 million people; and, as matters now stand, Canada is in the centre, isolated economically, the one member of the NATO organization remaining as a citadel of protectionism.

I believe that if nothing is done this will create untold difficulties for us in the future. Our industries, both export and domestic, will be in a most difficult position. The process of bleeding to death, such as Nova Scotia and other Maritime provinces are already encountering, will be further accelerated.

My proposal is this. I believe that Canada should follow the example of the United Kingdom in seeking to become associated with the European Economic Community, by progressively removing tariffs and other obstacles to trade over the next 14 years, as Britain is contemplating, until complete restrictions on trade have been removed; and that, as well, we should seek to enter into a similar arrangement with the United States of America.

I am making this proposal because I consider it of the utmost importance, but not with the thought that by any manner of means it will meet with the approval of all honourable senators; indeed, its terms may be violently challenged. Also I think it desirable that a thorough discussion should take place on our future trading position before the two important conferences are held this year, which delegates from the Senate will be attending. I refer to the Atlantic Congress to be held in London under the auspices of the NATO Parliamentary Association, which is to be opened on June 5 by the Queen and will have in attendance 650 delegates from the NATO countries, 45 of whom will come from Canada; and to the meeting of Canadian and United States legislators to be held in Ottawa later in the year for consideration of matters of mutual interest to our two countries.

I might add that, although I have no information on it, I understand—and if it is so I have no doubt His Honour the Speaker will advise us—that an invitation is also likely to be forthcoming from the Council of Europe, the body under which the economic development of Europe is taking place. As honourable senators know, Canada and the United States are not members, but observers, and there has been a desire in the past that they be represented. I believe at one time we were represented, but not recently. As I say, from some source I understand that an invitation to this council will be forthcoming this year, in which case there would be a third gathering.

With respect to the two conferences to which I referred, I presume we shall be informed in more detail as to what is contemplated when our delegates to the recent NATO conference in Paris and to the recent meeting in Washington report to the Senate. I believe it is of the utmost importance that the delegates who represent us at these two important conferences should be well advised as to what is the viewpoint of the Senate, for it is my experience that unless our delegates do their homework before attending such conferences they will be greatly handicapped in making an effective contribution. I hope, therefore, that discussion on this matter will take place during the debate on the Speech from the Throne. I also hope that the report of our delegates to the recent conferences will be in such form that questions can be asked and comments made. Indeed, it might be well worth while to have our standing committee on Canadian Trade Relations or External Relations afforded an opportunity of hearing from governmental officials and other witnesses.

That, honourable senators, is the basis of my argument. If I may be privileged to do so, I would make a few comments.

As respects our own position in Canada, I want to suggest to this house my opinion, for what it is worth, that despite the very rosy picture which my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) painted for us last evening—and to which I am taking no exception, because I do not have the information he has—that for Canada, from an economic standpoint, particularly in respect to our trade, the honeymoon is over.

Since the close of the recent war we have had tremendous development. As honourable senators know, there has been a ready market for the products of our natural resources and industries, with little world competition and with steady production costs. Much the same situation has existed in our domestic industries. There has been a tremendous capital boom in Canada, which to a great measure has provided markets for our domestic industries.

Now, honourable senators, we are approaching a change. I do not know how soon its major effects will be felt. As the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate said yesterday, there are many factors which indicate continuing progress, and I do not quarrel with him in that respect. However, I would point out, first, that our export industries—which after all have been the keystone to Canada's progress—are facing a changed situation. I need only mention the coming competition from Russia, which our own Prime Minister only two days ago referred to as terrifying. However much of anything we have to sell in the markets of the world, Russia has that much more—of some things perhaps three times as much—and, as evidenced by the congress which has been taking place over the last day or two, she is making a determined effort to develop her economy with a view to matching that of the United States of America.

European countries, in which there is likely to be the fastest growing portion of the Western world, are collectively developing their dependencies in northern and central Africa as a means for providing them with natural resources. The United States is having to take more and more raw materials from Latin America, for political reasons, if for no other.

Our costs are rapidly rising, and by reason of inflation they may rise more rapidly in Canada than elsewhere. A favourable factor, of course, is that so much United states capital has been used in the development of our natural resources up to the present time that there will be an incentive to see that a ready market is provided for Canadian products in the United States. However, I venture the opinion that it is in the realm of secondary manufacturing industry that the most serious competition will develop. Of recent years economic thinking in this respect has completely changed. For many years countries of varying size in Western Europe, ranging from such a small community as Luxembourg, with 500,000 people, to France, Germany, Italy and Britain, each with populations of around 50 million, tried to build up their industries by maintaining national tariffs. Today one finds a complete change. The driving force to combine western Europe in one single free-trade area comes, not from agriculturalists, but from manufacturers who believe that without mass production it will be impossible to operate successfully in the world of the future. Western Europe has an eye on the manufacturing advantages of the United States, with a population of 170 million, and even Russia is looking at the United States as well. Today one sees in Europe a combination of six countries collectively about as populous as the United States.

We in Canada do not seem to have been so much impressed by this development as are the people of the United States. I was recently in that country and had an opportunity of reading a number of American publications. I found expressed there serious doubts whether developments in western Europe will not effectively challenge United States business in the export markets of the world, because of the economies which this combined production can bring into effect. I want to make this first point, that it is the manufacturers who in western Europe are leading the movement for larger markets. They are convinced that for this purpose a unit of 50 million people is too small. It is the agriculturalists, who over recent years have been brought up to depend on price supports, who are either indifferent to a common European market or, perhaps, openly antagonistic to it.

I think these conditions are significant in the light of the situation which faces secondary industry in this country. I would remind the house that considerable changes have occurred since the time when the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) came down to Parliament with 60 Progressive members behind him whose main complaint was that eastern Canada was not anxious to negotiate trade agreements to reduce the tariff. I suggest the time is rapidly approaching when the only salvation for the secondary manufacturing industry in eastern Canada is to get into a large market, as Britain is doing. Let me point out one or two circumstances which, I think, will bring this about. It is my belief that, instead of Winnipeg being the centre of the free-trade area and Toronto the stronghold of protectionists, it will be Toronto that will lead the advance to lower tariffs and wider markets, and it will be the west that will pin its hopes to deficiency payments and the like.

Secondary industry in this country is in a difficult position. To begin with, it has a high-cost production. I am not speaking of the output of newsprint or base metals, but about secondary production. Manufacturers are not producing for export, they depend entirely upon the domestic market, and only recently I have seen statements that they are feeling the pinch of terrific competition from outside; but in my opinion, if I may be pardoned for using a slang phrase, "they ain't seen nuttin' yet."

I want to point out to the house that Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms have never had any real competition from the United States. There may be major industries in the United States without subsidiaries in this country, but there are very few. The real competition which is about to face Canadian secondary industry, however, will come from western Europe, which possesses all the advantages of cheaper production, modern machinery and plants, and a lower basic wage level. I repeat that it is from this source that the most severe competition will come in every branch of our industry, just as it is affecting the automobile industry at the present moment. I used to be in that business, and I know something about it. It is a gigantic industry in the United States. As honourable senators know, motorcars produced in Canada are manufactured by subsidiaries of American companies. If I wanted to compete with one of these subsidiaries I would have to go to the United States and try to get a contract from a parent company for the manufacture of its cars at wholesale prices. Of course, the parent company would refer me to its domestic subsidiary. It is a cast iron rule. If I had the ingenious idea of bringing in nearly new cars, I would be immediately met with the restriction that used cars—becoming such by being driven around the block—are embargoed. But no such restrictions exist as far as western Europe is concerned, and European cars are being imported in increasing numbers. Honourable senators can see how the extension to all our secondary industries of what is happening in the automobile business will affect the whole of our secondary industrial structure.

At the present time it is a popular thing to criticize labour and suggest that it should "hold the line". But the weakness of that argument, honourable senators, is our wage position in Canada vis-à-vis the United States.

The Gordon Report says that secondary industries have existed in Canada up to the present moment only because they have paid their labour about 25 per cent less than corresponding labour is paid in the United States. You can make as many appeals as you like to our organized labour to hold their wage-rate level, but unless living costs in this country are reduced these wage rates will go up. As a matter of fact, our manufacturers might be lucky if they do not have to pay higher wages than are paid in the United States if our living costs become higher than they are there. It is all very well for our manufacturers to say, "We won't pay it," but there is another side to it. I am sorry that the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) is not in his seat, for I would like to compliment him on the far-seeing speech he made last year on this very point. Manufacturers can say to labour in this country that they will not pay as much as American labour for the same work in the same type of factory. But what will happen when the living costs in Canada remain higher? It is all right to say, "We won't pay," but my honourable friend from Winnipeg South pointed out to us, if I remember correctly, that since 1900 approximately the same number of people have emigrated to the United States from Canada as have immigrated to Canada. You cannot keep people in Canada if living conditions are not favourable vis-à-vis the United States, for people will simply move south of the border as long as the American immigration laws do not prevent them from doing so. And there has been no difficulty in this regard in the past, particularly for skilled labour. In fact, we are being asked to embark on great armament expenditures in Montreal and Toronto in order to give employment to our electronic engineers so that they will not go to the United States. Emigration has always been a constant danger.

Honourable senators, I suggest the time is rapidly coming when the manfuacturers in our secondary industries will have to do exactly what these manufacturers have been doing for some time in Europe—look for a larger trading area. I ask you in all reasonableness if a population of 50 million in Europe is too small a market for profitable manufacturing, what about our country, with a population of 17 million—or even if it increases to 25 or 35 million? We are in a hopeless position, and I think great thought should be given to this situation.

Speaking as a senator from Nova Scotia, I can say that, despite the great development in Canada of recent years, we feel very keenly that we have not shared adequately in this progress. Increased social security benefits, increased allowances to the provincial Governments, national defence expenditures, subventions and subsidies have all had a beneficial effect but they have done little to aid our economic development. We have sought to answer the charge that we have not done enough to help ourselves. The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, a joint project of provincial Governments and businessmen, has been making heroic efforts to encourage industry, but it has been an uphill fight. If Canada is to be further self-contained and if these ill-conceived projects to defy nature in the St. Lawrence River are continued, not only will her position industrially become progressively worse, but shipping through our ports will dwindle and die. Many Nova Scotians are thoroughly disillusioned with political parties and are getting in an ugly frame of mind. They will aid in unmaking governments in the future just as dramatically as they have in the past. The truth is that no government, whether Conservative, Liberal or C.C.F., can do much more than has been done in the past unless proposals somewhat along the lines I have suggested are adopted. When they are adopted our Maritime position will become an asset rather than a liability.

I want to say only a word or two in regard to our financial position, for over all our future hangs the shadow of the condition of our national finances. I am not disposed to be critical of this Government in respect of the situation that now exists. I do not think it has shown any particular skill and alacrity in dealing with it, but in my opinion the basic trouble in regard to Canada's financial difficulties is the fact that we are spending too much on armaments. The serious feature of it is that these expenditures on armament are being incorporated into our economy and we are rapidly getting into a position where we cannot get along without such expenditures. I readily understand the outburst by the Prime Minister the other day when he commented on the intensive lobbies that were made in order to ensure that the production of armaments for the CF-105 would be continued. The question of defence purposes has gone out the window and it is now a question of employment. If Russia were as smart as she thinks she is, and as I think she is, she would grant the Western world right at this moment everything it asked in respect to disarmament. What a chaotic condition the Western world, or at least this continent, would be in then! Even at that Canada is not as badly off as the United States. If I remember correctly, the United States budget totals some $77 billion, of which $47 billion is being spent on armaments and foreign armament aid. It is a very much higher percentage than ours, I must admit, but it all points to the terrifying position we are getting in.

And what about the public frame of mind? I know that I am in such a frame of mind that whenever I read any sort of treatise or newspaper article on the necessity of defence I wonder what propaganda I am being subjected to. As a layman I don't know the answer. I don't know who can give an honest opinion. As a responsible member of Parliament I don't know where to turn for unbiased information on the desirable size of our defence. What is going on is reminiscent of the old days. About 60 years ago there paraded through Europe the head of an armament manufacturing company, Sir Basil Zaharoff. It was his business to go from one country to the other disseminating distrust and fear. I never read a book about his activities, but I have read different references to one, and I will quote a passage which struck my fancy. I presume this was written well before World War I:

> And now he spreads word that Germany is building 20 new men-at-war, and so England begins the construction of 25 new vessels. France, not wishing to be left behind, begins building 30 additional ships.

What we have today is Sir Basil Zaharoff parading through this country in the guise of business executives and heads of trade unions, wardens of municipalities, mayors of towns, besieging the Government of the day to make more and more expenditures on armaments. Indeed, if I were running an election, I would not like to go down to my native province of Nova Scotia and advocate a drastic reduction in expenditure on defence, including the navy. We are all touched with this; that is the situation we are living in. Upon my words, I do not know what the answer is, but I think if I were charged with the responsibility I would establish a national defence fund, such as there is for social security, in which I would set apart the amount we were going to spend on defence, and I would procure this amount specifically from income taxes, raising or lowering them annually, depending on the amount required, so that the people would realize the cost of defence and the difficulty it creates with relation to the financial system.

Honourable senators, I have almost finished. I cannot help but join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate in his optimistic references to the future of Canada. I also think we have a great future, but I would remind him that the resources we have in Canada have been lying here undeveloped for a million years, though it is only recently that we have had a market for them, or thought we did. No doubt these resources will remain largely undeveloped for another million years if we cannot obtain markets in which to sell them profitably.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Public Lands Grants Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I desire at this time to make a few remarks with regard to this bill.

As I explained on first reading, the purpose of the bill is to make a purely technical amendment to the Public Lands Grants Act. The amendment has to do with the legal formalities of transferring Crown lands. Under this act the Governor in Council is empowered to authorize the sale, lease, or other disposition of public lands. The legal documents usually used to carry out a sale or lease are letters patent issued under the Great Seal of Canada, or a lease signed on behalf of the Crown by some authorized person or persons. However, when it comes to the occasional transfer of public lands to a provincial Government, the courts have held that neither letters patent nor a lease are appropriate documents. The reasoning is that when public lands are transferred to a province the title remains in the Crown, which is indivisible, and therefore no document which purports to transfer a legal interest in the land can properly be done by letters patent or by lease. It has been held that the transfer of public lands to a province is merely the transfer of the administration, control, and benefit of those lands from one of Her Majesty's Governments to another and that this is properly done by order in council. I am informed that this has been the practice followed for many years.

In a recent case in the Supreme Court of Canada, referred to in the explanatory notes in the bill, considerable doubt arose in the minds of the judges who decided that case as to whether or not the provisions of the act were wide enough to allow the Governor in Council to make these transfers. The purpose of this bill is to amend the act in such a way that transfers of that nature can be properly made by the Governor in Council.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say about the measure. If it is thought advisable to refer the bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, or to any other committee, I do not think there will be any objection, but to my mind it seems to be quite a simple amendment and one which should not give us much difficulty.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wish to direct a question to the honourable Leader of the Government. Is it possible for the Canadian Government to transfer land belonging to us to another nation? I know it is late to bring up the question, but the reason I ask is that it is not generally known that when the 49th parallel was being put through, in passing through near Blaine the line was one-half mile inside Canada. I raised the question before, because by order in council the Government of the day simply called it the 49th parallel, which it is not. I am speaking from actual facts, because as a member of Parliament I spent considerable time studying the record before I spoke in the House of Commons on the subject. I still feel that the transferring of such lands to the United States should have been by act of Parliament rather than by order in council—the handing to the United States of half a mile of territory which really belonged to Canada and is now designated as United States territory.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, is it the wish of the house that this bill be referred to committee?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) raised a point about transferring land that may be in Canada to another country.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That question has nothing to do with this bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is that power included in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, that has nothing to do with this bill. This simply covers transfers of some interest in land from the dominion Government to a province, not to another nation.

Hon. Mr. Reid: A question of that kind is not out of order. I think, because it deals with the transfer of land by the Canadian Government, and the only other place outside of a province that they can transfer land to is to the United States. So the question is quite in order, but nevertheless I got a silent reply.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, my decision is that this question is not relevant to the bill under discussion. This bill deals strictly with the transfer of land from the Canadian Government to a province within Canada. The question put by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) has to do with transactions between Canada and the United States of America. I therefore declare this question out of order.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government whether this bill refers only to the transfer of land within Canada from the Dominion to a province or does it go further than that and include the transfer of land from one province to another?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It has nothing to do with transferring land from one province to another.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, this is a technical bill, which is intended perhaps to clarify a silence in the statute. I looked up the statute and I see that by section 2 the word "grant" is defined as meaning "letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada and any other instrument by which public lands may be granted in fee simple or for an equivalent estate". Now, presumably an order in council would be another such instrument. May I make a suggestion? I understand we are going to have today an explanation of the following bill which is on the Order Paper, that is the Canada Shipping Bill, and if it is referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee perhaps it might be just as well to have the present bill go there too.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Canada Shipping Bill will likely be referred to the Transport and Communications Committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Then perhaps this one could go there too.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think that this bill should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. It may be that the scope of it is intended to be confined to transactions between the Dominion of Canada and the provinces, but this is not so stated in this bill and I think a further explanation is desirable.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I do point out to my honourable friend the leader that, as the honourable senator from Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has said, the bill is not confined by its terms to transfers from the Dominion Government to a provincial Government, but covers a transfer to Her Majesty in any right whatsoever. So, technically speaking, the Government of Canada could under this legislation transfer a part of the property of Canada to the Government of Australia or the Government of South Africa.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Aseltine, moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill proposes quite a number of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. You will remember that prior to the Statute of Westminster we had practically no shipping legislation, but as a result of that statute a bill was brought in to give to the Dominion of Canada complete and independent control over all of its shipping. Not many honourable senators who are here today were here in 1934, when that Shipping Bill was introduced in the Senate. I distinctly remember that the bill, which was intricate and voluminous, was considered very carefully by the Banking and Commerce Committee at some 28 meetings before it was given third reading in the Senate and sent to the House of Commons for their consideration. Since that time some ten amendments have been made to the act, and most of them have been introduced in the Senate.

The amendments to the act which are included in this bill deal with a rather wide variety of subjects. A number of them are in the nature of clarifications or improvements in relation to procedures or technical points where experience has indicated the need for a change, but are relatively minor or routine nature. Others are some of greater importance.

Since it is my intention, honourable senators, to ask that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, I do not propose at this time to deal with each amendment. I will, however, outline some of the more important ones, but I wish to speak chiefly on the principle involved.

In the field of steamship inspection, under section 481 of the act, vessels of five tons are exempt from inspection, although they must comply with certain regulations as to life saving, fire extinguishing equipment and that kind of thing, and they are subject to periodic spot checks. It is proposed that these exceptions should not apply to a vessel of that kind which carries less than 12 passengers. The amendment is designed to provide for a greater measure of inspection in order to ensure the safety of small commercial vessels engaged in carrying passengers.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why limit the inspection to vessels carrying 12 passengers? Why not have it apply to vessels if they carry any passengers at all?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I might have a motor boat in which I carry half a dozen people and it would not come under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are you referring to paying passengers?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If my honourable friend wishes to pursue that question, I suggest that when the bill goes to committee he should ask the experts there.

Section 8 of the bill would repeal section 324 of the act and substitute a new section dealing with matters relating to Maritime pilotage. Under the act the boundaries of the pilotage district may be defined by the Governor in Council, with the exception of the Quebec and Montreal districts, where the boundaries are defined by statute. This results from the long standing history of those two particular districts, which I understand goes back perhaps as far as the nineteenth century. However, changes in working conditions and pilotage procedures now make it desirable to amend the act so as to give the Governor in Council the same authority in defining the boundaries of these two areas as exists for other pilotage districts.

One other important amendment is that proposed to section 346 of the act, under which we are unable to give to American ships the same treatment as we give to our own, and which we have promised to do. This section as it stands contravenes quite a number of navigation treaties which we have with the commonwealth countries and 16 other countries. On that account it bears some importance, and I would like to make a few comments about it.

It is proposed to make certain changes with regard to the right of exemption from payment of compulsory pilotage dues. Under the existing provisions of the act, no ship may be compelled to take on a pilot. However, in certain pilotage districts compulsory payment of pilotage dues may be introduced regardless of whether a pilot is used or not, as a means of ensuring an adequate supply of funds to support the pilotage system in that district. The act also provides that where compulsory dues are introduced, certain vessels may be exempt from this compulsory payment on the basis of exemptions specifically defined in the act, which have been a source of difficulty for some time. The exemptions in the act include certain classes of ships in interprovincial trade or in the coastal trade, fishing vessels and state-owned vessels, but only if of British registry. There is no right to go beyond these particular exemptions, which, in part at least, are based upon the flag of registry. This situation, I believe, is at variance with some of our treaties with other countries, to which I have just referred, and is uneven in its applicability as between foreign countries in the sense that we are not allowed to take any account of competency, but may base our exemptions only upon the flag of registry and the trade in which the ship is employed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable leader if the privilege which he says is being granted under this bill is to apply to Canadian ships only or to the ships of all nations?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The object of the amendment is to clear things up so that the act will not contravene these navigation treaties in such a way that we are acting in breach of agreements we have made.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understood the honourable leader to say when he introduced this clause that it was to confer certain rights on Canadian ships, or to grant certain privileges to Canadian ships.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I don't think I said that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I probably misunderstood you.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think that is part of the amendments contained in the bill.

This matter has been of some concern to the Department of External Affairs, and when the bill goes to committee departmental officers will be there to explain fully what the treaties are and with what countries they are made, and how the act in its present form does not comply with those treaties and what is necessary in order to make it do so.

It is proposed to simplify the existing provisions relating to exemption from compulsory pilotage dues, and add thereto authority to provide other exemptions from time to time.

I should now like to go back and refer honourable senators to the new Part VIA, which has to do with Great Lakes pilotage. The amendment would authorize the Governor in Council to make special regulations regarding navigation on the Great Lakes. The special situation which exists on the Great Lakes, and the fact that we will have to work in close co-operation with the United States authorities in regard to any marine pilotage matters in these waters, make the present pilotage provisions in the act unsuitable for application in that particular area. However, in certain of the restricted waters in this area some marine pilotage will be necessary, and this matter will become increasingly important after the Seaway is completed. Accordingly, it is proposed by this amendment to require that a vessel of 300 gross tons or over navigating the Great Lakes basin shall be piloted by a certified officer or pilot when in such waters as are designated by the Governor in Council for the purpose, and that in the other portions of the Great Lakes basin the vessel shall have on board a specially certificated officer or pilot. This part of the bill is similar to legislation which I understand to be contemplated by the United States Government, and the regulations to be made by the Governor in Council under this part will be similar to those which are now being considered by the United States Government.

In addition, honourable senators, there are a number of lesser amendments covering such items as clarification of the requirements of certification of deck officers on ferry vessels, changes in the recognition in Canada of certificates issued in other parts of the commonwealth, amendment of the definitions of "inland voyages" and "international voyages", and a number of lesser points, which I feel sure can be dealt with much more appropriately in committee than by me at this moment.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honorouble senators, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Shipping Act. It was introduced by the Government Leader here (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and therefore is a Government bill. It is of particular interest to those of us who come from the Maritime provinces, and, I am sure, to those who represent the Pacific coast.

The Canada Shipping Act may be termed the charter of the marine industry in Canada. I am not sure it is a good charter, because over the years the merchant fleet has fallen on evil days. Now the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway brings a new aspect and, we hope, a new opportunity. But at the moment the situation is clouded with failures, and the future seems to be even more threatening. Surely the time has arrived for a new charter and a renewed effort. However, I will not dwell on that matter.

The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, in moving the second reading of the bill, gave us a very good explanation of what it is all about. As he said, it is a type of legislation which is better looked into in committee. It is not a bill with principles that can be established; it is composed of many parts, some quite important, others less so. Part of it is just a tidying up of what should have been done before in legislation of this kind.

Before proceeding with a discussion of the amendments, I want to bring to the notice of honourable senators what is known as the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement. As you know, on the same day in 1931 that the Statute of Westminster was passed, this merchant shipping agreement was also signed. "Mother" is a good trader, and she valued very highly the shipping interests of her own country and also her connections in Canada. So, when we got the Statute of Westminster, we took with it an agreement whereby we conceded equal rights to all parts of the commonwealth. I have a notion that part of our difficulty today with regard to negotiations, especially with the United States, is caused by this agreement. The honourable Leader of the Government has said that we promised the United States something, and this is an effort to give it to them. I can appreciate the necessity of close co-operation with the United States on the St. Lawrence in connection with the waterways, but this bill goes further; it applies to the east and west coast of Canada and to our international trade. In my belief the United States merchant marine is the most nationalistic and closely-controlled marine in the world; it operates for their own nationals, their own country, and their own capital. They have never been very generous as regards provisions which would help our merchant marine. However, I am all for reciprocity with them, especially on the Great Lakes. I believe, if we are to benefit by the St. Lawrence waterway, reciprocity with the United States is essential, because their country has the highest standard of living, they pay the biggest wages to their merchant seamen, and we can compete and co-operate with them with benefit to both countries.

There is a paragraph in this merchant shipping agreement which is of importance so far as our fishing vessels are concerned.

Article (12) states:

> Nothing in the present agreement shall be deemed—
> (i) to derogate from the right of every part of the commonwealth to impose customs tariff duties on ships built outside that part: or
> (ii) to restrict the right of the Government of each part of the commonwealth to give financial assistance to ships registered in that part or its right to regulate the sea fisheries of that part.

I want to emphasize this right of regulation as its affects the fisheries, because it is the feature which most concerns me at the present time. I would particularly refer to sections 9 and 11: I think they are the important parts of the bill, as they deal with the rights or privileges of Canadians and also our association with the Americans on the St. Lawrence waterway. In four clauses of section 9 Her Majesty's dominions—which include Canada—are excluded, and that takes away Canada's preference for exemptions in her own country. Now I can quite see that Americans might object to some parts of the Commonwealth Shipping Agreement in so far as section 11 is concerned for that deals with pilots on the lakes, whereas in section 9 the exemptions are general and apply to the sea coasts. The preference belonging to Her Majesty, or to ships of British registry, is abolished. The amendment covers any ship, not only an American ship but a ship from any part of the world, and in four instances it cuts out our preference. It might be that the words "Canadian ship" should be inserted. I do not think we would have very much trouble if we dealt with Canadian ships. There are not many of them and it seems to me that it would be right to do this.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the honourable senator referring to section 9 of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: At the moment, section 9, which says:

> Section 346 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "Subject to section 347, the following ships are exempt from the payment of pilotage dues:

That is the same as before.

> (b) government ships except ships entrusted for operation and management to an agency of Her Majesty;

That is the same as before. Then it goes on

> (c) ships of such description and size and employed in such voyages as the pilotage authority of the district, with the approval of the Governor in Council, from time to time determines to be exempt from the compulsory payment of pilotage dues in such district;

(d) ships employed in salvage operations;

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is new.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Clause (d) of the present section 346 reads:

ships registered in any part of Her Majesty's dominions while employed in salvage operations;

Then clause (e) of the present act reads:

steamships registered in any part of Her Majesty's dominions

(i) employed in voyages between ports in the same province, or employed in any one port or harbour,

(ii) employed in voyages between any one or more of the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland and any other or others of them, or between a port in any one of the said Provinces and any port in or beyond Hudson Strait or between a port in any of the said Provinces and any port in the United States of America on the River St. Lawrence or the Great Lakes,

Now that says "steamships registered in any part of Her Majesty's dominions" and the amendment provides "ships employed in voyages . . ." It just refers to "ships" and does not specify Canadian or British. Then the new clause (f) reads:

ships of not more than two hundred and fifty tons register tonnage;

In the present act clause (f) says:

ships registered in any of Her Majesty's dominions of not over two hundred and fifty tons register tonnage;

Then the present section goes on to read:

(g) ships entering a harbour for refuge;

That is the same as in the amended section. The amendment goes on to read:

(h) ships of war and hospital ships belonging to such foreign nations as may be specified by the pilotage authority; and

(i) ships engaged in fishing.

In other words, ships engaged in fishing are exempt from the payment of pilotage dues. I must point out to the house that clause (e) which reads:

ships employed in voyages

(i) between ports in the same province—gives to any ship the privilege to enter ports all over Canada and, so far as pilotage dues are concerned, they are exempt. It seems to me that that is too great a provision and too much to ask of Canada in connection with world shipping trade.

A situation will be created in Newfoundland which I am sure will be of interest to the representatives of that province. There is an exception clause at the top of page 6 of the bill which reads:

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), ships of more than two hundred and fifty tons, register tonnage, engaged in fishing are not exempt from the payment of pilotage dues in pilotage districts of the province of Newfoundland—

Newfoundland is singled out—

—unless the pilotage authority of the district so directs by by-law approved by the Governor in Council.

This applies to ships of more than 250 tons, register tonnage. I think the claim is made that no fishing vessel or dragger in this area is over 250 tons. That may be correct today, so far as some fisheries are concerned, but in Lunenburg we have had them at 192 tons, and that is getting pretty high. I am not sure about the seal fisheries but I know that a vessel called The Bear which was repaired in Lunenburg must certainly have been over 250 tons. She was engaged in the seal fishing industry off Newfoundland. I don't know whether the seal fisheries are included in this section of the bill or not.

The main point is that these pilotage rights will be given to all ships, whereas formerly they were given largely to Canadian ships and ships registered in any of Her Majesty's dominions. It seems to me that we are getting so tangled up that we would be in a much better position if in this legislation we considered only registered Canadian ships for exemption privileges.

We have reciprocal agreements with the United States as to pilotage on the Great Lakes, and this is only proper. We could not get along without such agreements and without having the same regulations applying to vessels from both countries. I read in the newspapers that there was quite a controversy as to the necessity of pilots on the lakes and in congested areas. It would appear that this legislation is doing something sensible by providing that there must be pilots on vessels in congested areas, and in other areas there must be a sailing master or skipper who is acquainted with the waters and can navigate them. As time goes on more and more sailors will become proficient in navigating these waters.

Pilotage in Canada is not obligatory except on the Great Lakes. You have to pay pilotage dues, though you do not have to accept the services of pilots; but pilotage is obligatory on the Great Lakes, and I think that is salutary. However, the minister is given wide powers to exempt owners or masters from pilotage requirements on the Great Lakes.

I would also point out that under section 347 of the act the Governor in Council has control over the general exemptions contained in section 9 of the bill.

The bill provides for the recognition in Canada of certificates granted to masters, mates and engineers by the Republic of Ireland, which is not in the commonwealth.

As the honourable Leader of the Government said, there is another amendment dealing with small steamships and pleasure yachts. At the present time steamships not in excess of 5 tons gross tonnage are exempt from annual inspection, but not from regulations respecting safety equipment. An amendment to the act will provide that such steamships, in order to be exempt from these inspections and regulations, may not carry more than 12 passengers. The idea is that these small vessels and pleasure yachts are easily kept in repair, and to have Government inspection of them would be onerous.

An "international voyage" is defined in section 1, subsection 2 of the bill, as follows:

"international voyage" means

(a) when used with reference to Load Line Convention Ships, a voyage (not being an inland voyage) from a port in one country to a port in another country either of these countries being a country to which the Load Line Convention applies, and

(b) when used with reference to Safety Convention Ships, a voyage, from a port in one country to a port in another country either of these countries being a country to which the Safety Convention applies, but does not include a voyage on the Great Lakes, their tributary and connecting waters as far east as the lower exit of the Lachine Canal at Montreal, and for the purposes of this paragraph every territory for the international relations of which a country to which the appropriate Convention applies is responsible or for which the United Nations is the administering authority shall be deemed to be a separate country;

Honourable senators, we should study this bill carefully in committee. I do not think preferential treatment for Canadians in their own country should be invaded in circumstances such as this. Newfoundland is faced with the fact that Portuguese trawlers, about 150 of them, come over to fish off the Grand Banks each year. They get their bait and supplies in Newfoundland. Russian, French and Spanish fishermen do likewise, although the French and Spaniards go for the most part to St. Pierre, Miquelon.

If this legislation goes into effect it will exempt fishing vessels up to 250 tons from pilotage dues, but these dues will be payable on any vessel over this tonnage. It seems to me that if we gave the exemption privileges to Canadian fishermen and Canadian fishing vessels only we would be doing what is only natural under the circumstances, and we would have a situation which should be acceptable to everybody. After all, we would be exempting only our own fishing vessels and in Canada. The idea of fishing vessels paying pilotage dues is not something that is accepted on the Atlantic coast. Fishermen are primary producers; they bring products to the land, and come and go at all times. There is no protection, as it were, because they do not take a pilot, anyway, and do not need to, but they have to pay the pilotage dues. I do not think this taxation should be imposed. The honourable Leader of the Government said that we should deal with bills on their merits, without too much partisanship and in a way that we believe to be in the interests of the people of the country. I suggest that this bill should go to committee, where first-class experts would be available. It seems to me that this idea of exempting foreign ships from pilotage dues in our coastwise trade should not be approved.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, I would like to say it is my intention to have the proceedings of this committee reported and the report distributed as usual, so that everyone will have a full and complete knowledge of the discussion which takes place.

Hon. Mr. Farris: When will the committee sit?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Probably some time next week.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: There will be a good many representations from varied shipping interests to the committee, will there not? We should probably look forward to having meetings for at least two consecutive weeks in case any one wants to make a representation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. I do not think there is any great hurry, except that it should be dealt with before navigation opens next spring, perhaps somewhere around April 1.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

CANADA-NEW BRUNSWICK INDIAN RESERVES AGREEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine presented Bill S-6, to confirm an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Perhaps honourable senators would like a very brief explanation of the bill. In March 1958 an agreement was entered into between the Province of New Brunswick and the Dominion of Canada with respect to certain lands withdrawn from the Indian reserves in that province. This agreement was subject to approval by the Legislature of New Brunswick and the Parliament of Canada. At its last session the Legislature passed an act approving the agreement. The text of that agreement, which is very short, containing only some five paragraphs, is attached as an appendix to the bill, and the preamble in the agreement sets forth in detail what the bill is about. I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, when I shall make a fuller explanation.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 16 to 26, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, as His Honour the Speaker is not a formalist —

The Hon. the Speaker: It all depends. Don't rely on that too much.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No sir, but you always take a broad view of the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: But I am still watching.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I know that you are always on the lookout, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to give notice of motion for:

Copy of the form of contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the producers.

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

I also wish to ask the following questions:

1. Who are the producers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present on strike, and what amount was paid to each of them by the C.B.C. and for what programs?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: For what period?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: For the last calendar year.

2. What was the total cost of each of these programs on television?

I have another question:

What salary was paid to each artist of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958?

I will send to the Leader of the Government a periodical which belongs to the Library of Parliament, namely, Maclean's of May 24, 1958, in which it is stated that two artists on C.B.C. television were to be paid $500 for each of six episodes that they missed, so that if they had played them they would have received $3,000, but they wanted higher remuneration; it is a current rumour that one of them asked for $1,000 for each episode. My point in mentioning this is that the Government should have no objection to giving the information that I am requesting now, since the artists themselves gave those figures to a journalist in an interview.

My final question is as follows:

What amount was paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by each sponsor on television, from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958, and for what programs?

I happened to remark to a journalist that a pop company was paying the big price of $350,000 a year. He said "Oh, no, that is cheap." I would consider it a large amount.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 3, 1959, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL CENTENARY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, I would like the consent of the house to remind honourable senators that today is the centenary of a great event, an event which has had as a consequence the fact that Parliament sits here in Ottawa instead of in Toronto or Kingston or Quebec. I am referring to the centenary of a decision by the Government of Canada, subsequent to advice of Her Majesty Queen Victoria of glorious memory, that Ottawa be chosen the capital of Canada, Lower and Upper Canada having been united since 1841. It is a great event for many reasons, but especially because it gives us an opportunity to ponder the conviction that the British Parliamentary system is one of the best in the world. As a matter of fact, many countries have adopted parts of the British system of Government, even though it is not based on a written constitution. For instance, only last fall, among those charged by General De Gaulle with the drafting of the Constitution for the Fifth Republic of France was Mr. Michel Debré, a very learned French lawyer, who made a study of the British Parliamentary system. Mr. Michel Debré is known to be a keen student of the British system of Government, and whatever he thought good and fitting for the situation existing in France he borrowed from the British system.

Because our Constitution is based on the British parliamentary system Canada is governed by the will of the people under two main divisions: those who are in the majority govern, and those in the minority form the loyal opposition. One result of this is that whenever any people for some reason or another become discontented they ask their representative in Parliament to express their discontent on the floor of one of the houses. In that way revolutions are prevented, and that is why many countries of the world have borrowed from the British parliamentary system.

May I say en passant—and I share this view with the great majority of people in Canada—that it is understandable why the British people are so proud of their country. One reason, among others, is that their almost perfect Constitution, which has been developed through the centuries, is a product of the wisdom of, may I say, our common ancestors—the Britons, Normans, Anglo-Saxons and Celts. It was these peoples who built up point by point the Constitution which today forms part of the parliamentary system that we are glad and proud to enjoy.

On January 29, 1859, Sir Edmund Head, Governor General of Canada, read the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Legislature. May I read a brief quotation from it? He said:

> It is my duty, on the present occasion, to call your attention to the question of the seat of the Government of Canada.
> The Legislature of Canada, having resolved that a fixed seat of Government should be selected, solicited our Gracious Queen, by an address of either house, to exercise her prerogative in making such selection.

And, upon the advice of Her Ministers, she chose Bytown, which is now known as the city of Ottawa.

I should like to read to honourable senators the concluding words of that speech, which I am sure will be found most interesting. It appears that the Governor General in those days felt the sessions were sometimes too long, for he expressed himself as follows:

> I believe that I have summoned you to meet on the present occasion at the time most convenient to yourself. So much beneficial legislation on important subjects has been dealt with in the last few sessions that I shall hope to congratulate you on your release at a time somewhat earlier than usual. With this hope I leave you to your parliamentary labours.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, in the first instance I would like to compliment and pay tribute to the honourable senator from Lumsden, Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Pearson) for the fine speech made by him in moving the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and to congratulate the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) on the excellent address made by him in seconding the motion. I envy the honourable senator from Ottawa East for his ability to speak fluently in the French language and then turn to speak with equal fluency in the English tongue. I sincerely wish I had that facility. I have never heard anyone who was more completely bilingual than the honourable senator from this fair city. The speeches of both the mover and seconder were of a very high calibre, and I know that I am expressing the sentiments of all senators when I say that this chamber enjoyed and benefited greatly from them.

Next, I welcome to this chamber the three new senators who have just been appointed. In referring to them I shall start with the senator who comes from the most easterly part of Canada, and then move west.

I would like to say to Senator John G. Higgins, from Newfoundland, that his reputation as a very able and witty speaker has preceded him to the Senate chamber. He is well known as a lawyer and a Rhodes scholar, and I know all honourable senators look forward with interest and anticipation to hearing Senator Higgins make his maiden speech in this chamber.

The newly appointed senator from Saskatchewan, John Hnatyshyn, has been a personal friend of mine for many years. I understand that he is the first senator ever to be appointed from the city of Saskatoon. I can tell you that he is very highly regarded by all citizens of that city, and they are most proud to have him here with us today. Further, I feel that the Senate of Canada has been greatly improved by the appointment of the first native-born Ukrainian to this chamber, and I know that his contribution to the debates of the Senate will be helpful and worth while.

Now I come to that most prosperous of all the provinces of Canada, Alberta. It gives me great pleasure to welcome Senator John A. Buchanan to this chamber. Senator Buchanan is a well-known and highly respected engineer and contractor from Edmonton. I know that the citizens of his city are very pleased that they have been honoured by the appointment of my friend, who is universally known in his native city as "Buck" Buchanan. It is with interest and anticipation that I look forward to hearing Senator Buchanan make his initial speech.

Honourable senators, the debate on the Speech from the Throne furnishes me with a real opportunity to give to this honourable body a full and complete report of the recent conference in the city of Washington of a Joint Congressional-Parliamentary Committee made up of members of the United States Congress and members of the Parliament of Canada.

The formation of this committee was first suggested by the Prime Minister in an address he made at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire. Then, on July 9, 1958, this house passed a resolution, proposed by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson), which read as follows:

That the Senate of Canada welcomes the suggestion of the Prime Minister of Canada for the establishment of a Joint Parliamentary Committee between Canada and the United States of America, believes that it can be of great benefit in improving the relations between the two countries and offers our wholehearted co-operation.

Eight days later, on the 17th day of July, Senator Neuberger made a speech in the Senate of the United States with respect to this very matter and introduced a resolution, section 7 of which reads as follows:

The resolution shall become effective and a Joint Committee established upon receipt by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of notification that a committee with similar functions and terms of reference has been established by the Canadian Parliament.

On August 8, 1958, the following resolution was considered and agreed to by the Senate of the United States:

Resolved that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations shall establish a subcommittee for the purpose of exploring with proper officials of the Government of the United States and with members of the Canadian Parliament the desirability and feasibility of increased domestic discussions between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern.

As a result of all of this there was set up what was known as a steering committee which was to meet, make plans for the forming of a larger committee for discussion of these problems, endeavour to make and finalize all arrangements necessary for the holding of meetings of the larger committee, arrange for an agenda for the larger committee, and generally superintend and do all these things which would be necessary for successful meetings of the larger committee to be held from time to time in future in each country.

The Canadian committee set up was composed of nine members, as follows: Our Speaker; the honourable senator from Kamloops, the Honourable Sydney J. Smith; and myself, the senator from Hanover: and from the other place, the Speaker; the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, M.P. for Laurier; Messrs. Hazen Argue, M.P. for Assiniboia, William L. Houck, M.P. for Niagara Falls, Richard D. Thrasher, M.P. for Essex South, and Erik Nielsen, M.P. for Yukon.

There were eight members named by the Congress of the United States, as follows: From the Senate: Senator George D. Aiken, of Vermont; Senator Homer Capehart, of Indiana; Senator Mike Mansfield, of Montana; Senator Wayne L. Morse, of Oregon. From the House of Representatives were named: Congresswoman Edna F. Kelly, of New York; Congressman Frank M. Coffin, of Maine; Congressman Walter H. Judd, of Minnesota; Congressman Chester E. Merrow, of New Hampshire.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Was a record kept of the proceedings?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Not a public record. I think I can give this honourable body a brief outline which will cover the highlights of what took place.

The Canadian delegation arrived at Washington about 6 p.m. on Thursday, January 8, and the entire party was entertained that evening at a buffet supper by A. E. Ritchie, Chargé d'Affaires of the Canadian Embassy at Washington.

Following the buffet supper an informal meeting was attended by all members of the Canadian delegation with Mr. Ritchie and the following members of the staff at Washington Embassy: Messrs. Rae, Farquharson, Conroy and Broadbridge. At this meeting there was a thorough discussion with respect to the chairmanship of the committee and matters of procedure. The briefing which was given to the Canadian delegation by the members of the Canadian Embassy mentioned above was very complete, and, I am sure, most helpful to all members of the Canadian delegation.

There was arranged for Friday, at 9.00 a.m., an appointment with the President of the United States for the entire Canadian delegation and their wives. This meeting took place at the White House, and to me it could be considered as the first step toward the improvement of relations between our two countries. The meeting was very informal and friendly. The President took considerable time out of what was, for him, a very busy day to chat with and talk to the entire delegation, and I am sure that all of the members of our delegation came away from this meeting with a very warm feeling for him as a very human person.

Arrangements were made whereby the entire Canadian delegation was to attend a joint session of the Congress of the United States, to hear the State of the Union address by the President.

Unfortunately no arrangements had been made for the members of the press gallery who had accompanied the Canadian delegation to attend this joint session. However, Patrick Nicholson, through the kind co-operation of James Hagerty, the President's press secretary, was able to arrange for the members of our press gallery who had accompanied us to be seated in the press gallery in the House of Representatives so that the address could be heard by them.

I believe that all members of this honourable body would be interested in knowing what took place at the joint session of the Congress at the time the President gave his State of the Union address, and for that reason I am going to take a few minutes to describe this in detail.

First of all, the members of the House of Representatives, the lower chamber of the United States Congress, took their seats in the hall. Then the doorkeeper, the equivalent of the Sergeant-at-Arms in our House of Commons, announced the Vice-President and members of the United States Senate, who came in in a body and sat down. Then the doorkeeper announced the ambassadors and other visiting diplomats from foreign countries, who likewise came in and took seats on the floor of the chamber. Their wives and other people entitled to receive tickets were sitting, like the wife of the President and other officials' wives, in the galleries. Then the doorkeeper announced the Chief Justice and the associate justices of the Supreme Court who, wearing their black gowns, paraded in and took their seats. They were followed by the members of the cabinet of the President of the United States, who are not members of Congress. All members of the President's cabinet are appointed by the President; they are responsible to him and they report to him. Finally, escorted by three senators and three representatives, the President entered. He went to the rostrum immediately above the Speaker's raised seat and it was from this point in the hall that he gave his address.

As each group came into the hall the crowds in the galleries and those already seated on the floor applauded. Applause for the President included cheers from the crowd of about 2,500 people in the huge hall, all of whom rose to their feet, and this welcome for the President lasted for several minutes. In the House of Representatives no member is allocated a seat. A member may take a seat anywhere on the floor, and as there are more than 400 members I can assure you that it is quite a job to record a vote. I have been told by American Congressmen that many times they are missed in the recording of a vote. When this happens to a member he waits until the clerk is finished recording the votes and they go to the front of the chamber and have their vote recorded at that time.

Now, to deal with the State of the Union address by the President. I realize that it would be most improper and inappropriate for me to endeavour to place this address on our Hansard, even as an appendix thereto. However, in view of the fact that the speech was a most courageous one I am going to take the liberty of quoting excerpts from it for consideration by the members of this honourable body. I may say that I have two or three extra copies of the speech and if any honourable senator would like to read the full text I would be only too happy to lend him a copy. Certain parts of the speech are of such a nature as to cause considerable thought to be given to them by all honourable senators. Naturally I do not propose to comment in any way upon the policy of the President as outlined in his speech. That would be very improper on my part.

The first passage which I will quote appears early in the speech. It deals with the national security program of our neighbours to the south, and it is as follows:

> National security programs account for nearly 60 per cent of the entire federal budget for this coming fiscal year.
> The overall cost of introducing Atlas into our armed forces will average $35 million per missile on the firing line.

Some of these figures were really staggering to me.

Another quote:

> This year we—

the United States—

> —are investing an aggregate of close to $7 billion in missile programs alone.
> Our latest atomic submarines will cost $50 million each, while some special types will cost three times as much.

I don't know what types these could be that will cost $150 million each.

A further quote:

> We the United States are now ordering fighter aircraft which are priced at 50 times as much as the fighters of World War II.

Then there was this very surprising and, to me, rather shocking statement:

> We are buying certain bombers that cost their weight in gold.

I mean to say, the expenditures are terrific. And finally, in connection with matters of defence, one finds this statement:

> Our outlook is this: 1960 commitments for our armed forces, the Atomic Energy Commission and military assistance exceed $47 billion. In the foreseeable future they are not likely to be significantly lower.

Another very interesting statement made by the President in his speech on the State of the Union had nothing to do with defence but was on an entirely different subject. He said:

> I plan a committee comprised of educators and representatives of labour, management, finance, the professions and every other kind of useful activity.
> The new committee would be concerned amongst other things with the living standards of our people, their health and education, their better assurance of life and liberty and their greater opportunties.

In this chamber and in the other place a great deal has been said about inflation. The President of the United States made a very unusual statement on inflation, and I am going to take the liberty of reading it:

> Inflation is not a Robin Hood, taking from the rich to give to the poor. Rather, it deals most cruelly with those who can least protect themselves. It strikes hardest those millions of our citizens whose incomes do not quickly rise with the cost of living. When prices soar, the pensioner and the widow see their security undermined, the man of thrift sees his savings melt away; the white collar worker, the minister, and the teacher see their standards of living dragged down. Inflation can be prevented. But this demands statesmanship on the part of business and labour leaders and of Government at all levels.

Later the President made certain remarks with respect to the abuse of trust and power in labour-management affairs. His statements are most courageous and I should like to repeat them now. They are as follows:

> I shall recommend prompt enactment of legislation designed:
> (a) To safeguard workers' funds in union treasuries against misuse of any kind whatsoever;
> (b) To protect the rights and freedoms of individual union members including the basic right to free and secret elections of officers;
> (c) To advance true and responsible collective bargaining;
> (d) To protect the public and innocent third parties from unfair and coercive practices such as boycotting and blackmail picketing.

As the President said:

> The workers and the public must have these vital protections.

As all honourable senators are well aware, the President of the United States has what is known as the right to veto any legislation passed by the Congress. This is a right which all Presidents have had for many, many years, and for my final quote from the speech on the State of the Union I would like to use this particular one:

> I shall recommend to the Congress that the Chief Executive be given the responsibility either to approve or to veto specific items in appropriations and authorization bills. This would save tax dollars.

In other words, the President was asking Congress to give him the right of veto not only in respect to legislation but in respect to the expenditure of money in his country. Whether or not such a power is accorded to the President, time alone will tell. I do not care to express any opinion on this particular matter, but I can assure honourable members that congressmen and senators at Washington have definite opinions about it, some for and some against.

After the President's address on the State of the Union the entire Canadian delegation was taken to lunch as the guests of Congresswoman Edna Kelly, where we met many members of the House of Representatives and were afforded an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with them. The United States Senate was in session on that particular Friday afternoon, and there was before it a motion to amend its rules so as to prevent filibusters. You can readily imagine the surprise experienced by the Canadian delegation when they were informed that the Senate had graciously agreed to adjourn the debate on this motion so that we could be taken on to the floor of the Senate and individually introduced to its members. We were introduced by Senator George D. Aiken of Vermont, who told me he expected that the introduction and speeches to follow would take approximately ten minutes. Honourable senators can imagine how pleased the delegation from Canada was by the fact that the introduction and speeches of welcome and good wishes made by the various members of the United States Senate took over 40 minutes out of a very busy day. What occurred is set out in detail in the Congressional Record under date of Friday, January 9, 1959, and contained on pages 304, 305, 306 and 307. With the permission of this honourable body I would like to have this printed as an appendix to the Debates of our Senate, so that each senator will have an opportunity of reading just what was said about the Canadian delegation.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It consists of how many pages?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: About four pages. They comprise a brief biographical sketch of each member of the Canadian delegation, placed on the record by Senator Aiken, followed by words of welcome and expressions of good will by many senators.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 77-83.

A point of procedure in the Senate of the United States which I am sure will be of interest to every senator here is that at the time the Canadian delegation was taken on to the floor of the Senate the floor was held by Senator Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas, the Majority Leader in the Senate. It will be noted that each senator who welcomed us had to obtain the permission of Senator Johnson before he was allowed to speak. Permission was invariably granted by Senator Johnson, who would say "I yield to my friend from Montana", or "I yield to my distinguished friend, the senator from Oregon", or as the case might be. If this procedure had not been followed Senator Johnson would have lost his priority on the resumption of the debate which was interrupted by our arrival.

The introduction of the Canadian delegation was most impressive and friendly, and it is my sincere wish and hope that if our Parliament is in session when the next meeting of the Congressional-Parliamentary Committee is held in Canada, this honourable body will invite the delegation from the United States into the Senate and accord them the same privilege and honour as we received.

Shortly after the visit of the Canadian delegation to the Senate of the United States the first meeting of the joint committee was held, in Senate Foreign Relations Committee room in the Capitol at Washington. All members from both countries were present, and at the opening of the meeting it was proposed by our honourable Speaker that the United States members of the committee, as hosts, should nominate and provide the chairman for the first meeting. This gracious offer by our Speaker was accepted by the United States delegation, and Congresswoman Edna Kelly of the State of New York was named chairman.

After a few introductory remarks Congresswoman Kelly suggested that the first item of business might be the consideration of the relationship which should exist between the delegations of both countries and the press, and it was agreed that the press release for the first meeting should be confined to the background of the meeting and a short general statement as to the groundwork discussions.

The delegations from both countries then considered a number of matters relating to the organization of the two inter-parliamentary groups. An agreement was reached on the following:

(a) The name of the group would be the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group ("Canada" and "United States" would be interchangeable, depending on which was the host country).

(b) The invitation extended by the Canadian members of the committee to hold the next meeting in Canada was accepted. It was decided that the time of the next meeting should be at the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway during the month of June of this year. It was the feeling of all members of the Canadian delegation that the American delegation should be taken through the Welland Canal in order that they might see and appreciate this great engineering work done there by Canadians, and also a short side visit would be taken to Niagara Falls. Then arrangements would be made for all members of both countries to be present at the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, at which our Queen and President Eisenhower would officiate.

The entire Canadian delegation felt that if our Parliament is then in session a side trip should be arranged for our visitors so that they could travel to Ottawa and see the Canadian Parliament in session. The tour would then continue to Montreal. Through the excellent preliminary work which had been done by our Speaker, we were able to tell our American friends that they would have an opportunity of travelling by boat from Montreal to Seven Islands, and thence by railroad to Knob Lake. On this part of the trip there is no doubt that meetings would be held and discussions would take place which would be of benefit to both countries. Furthermore, meetings could be held at Knob Lake also.

I now express the appreciation of the Canadian delegation, and we feel very grateful to our Speaker for having been able to arrange all this.

A short discussion took place with respect to the number of meetings which should be held each year and the composition of delegations. However, it was decided to leave any final decision on this matter to the meeting which was being held the next day. Just before the meeting closed Senator Morse of Oregon proposed the following, which was adopted, that an agenda committee be formed, consisting of Senator Aiken and Congresswoman Edna Kelly from the American members, the Speaker of the other place and our Speaker from the Canadian Delegation.

The committee was instructed to consider the following:

(a) The agenda for the meeting next day;

(b) To lay plans and give consideration to the preparation of an agenda for the June meeting.

Now, honourable senators, I quite realize that this speech may sound like an amateur's description of a Cook's Tour.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You are doing very well.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: However, I feel that I should call to your attention and tell you about each of the functions that took place. Our hosts, the Americans, treated us in a most gracious and kindly fashion, and for that reason I am going to take the opportunity of mentioning the functions.

On Friday evening we were entertained at a reception given by A. E. Ritchie, Chargé d'Affaires of the Canadian Embassy, the reception being held at the Canadian Chancery. Honourable senators, I must confess my ignorance in that I did not know what the Canadian Chancery was until it was explained to me. It is simply a parliamentary sounding name for the offices of the Canadian Embassy, and I had never heard of it until I got to Washington. It is located on Massachusetts avenue. This was a very enjoyable affair and it gave all the members of the Canadian delegation an opportunity to become acquainted not only with our American friends but also with the various people connected with our Embassy at Washington.

This was followed by a dinner given at the Mayflower Hotel by Senator Green of Rhode Island and Congressman Thomas E. Morgan of Pennsylvania.

I know that there must be senators here who have never met and are not acquainted with Senator Green. He is 92 years of age and a most remarkable man. He is Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and his mind is as sharp, as the saying goes, as a steel trap. He made a speech to us that evening. It was short, but very instructive and very interesting.

Mrs. Brunt and myself had the pleasure of being seated at a table with Senator Wylie and his wife and Representative Coffin and his wife. I can assure all senators here that this country has in Senator Wylie a great advocate of rectification of the Chicago water diversion. He is really a friend of Canada on this particular problem.

The final meeting of the committee was held in the Senate Board of Relations Room on Saturday, January 12. At this meeting many matters were discussed, the first of which was the composition and representation of members of the two steering committees. It was decided that this particular matter should be settled by each parliamentary body. However, each country would have an equal number of members on the committee, and we on the Canadian delegation came to the conclusion that it would be most wise to recommend that the steering committee be made a permanent committee so that at all times there would be a hard core in charge of the arrangements for all meetings which would be held. There is no doubt that this will result in greater efficiency.

Furthermore, the Canadian members of this joint committee were definitely of the opinion that there should be at least 24 members from each country on all future committees, being composed of 8 members of a permanent steering committee and 16 members who would rotate and change for each meeting. If this system were followed it would mean that eventually every representative and every senator of the United States Congress would have an opportunity of meeting senators and members of Parliament from our House of Commons and Senate and we would have an equal opportunity of meeting them. There was one further stipulation, that if either country desired to change the number of its representatives on the committee at any time this could be done on giving notification to the other country.

I want to assure all senators that when the committee is set up for the next meeting to be held here in Canada, in June next, I will put forth every effort possible to see that a goodly number of senators are included. In this Senate we have leaders from all walks of life, namely, from agriculture, education, the legal profession, the medical profession, and the financial and business world, and there is no doubt that a great and worthwhile contribution can be made by Canadian senators to the discussions which will take place at all future meetings.

Next it was agreed that there would be a joint staff, one from each country. However, neither Government was to furnish any experts, since it was felt that they might possibly hinder a free discussion by all members of the committee. It was agreed that after each meeting a report would be prepared and submitted by the committee to the respective legislative body of each country. The Canadian group would also submit a copy of their report to the Department of External Affairs and the United States group would submit their copy to their State Department, so that these departments would be fully informed and advised of all discussions which had taken place and also of any recommendations made.

With respect to the financing of the meetings, it was decided that each country would pay for its delegates' transportation to the host country, and hotel bills in the host country, the host country to pay all other expenses. This of course is based on the premise that meetings would be held alternately in the two countries, otherwise expenses might be shared by the two Governments.

The hope and desire was expressed that the meetings would not always be held in Washington and Ottawa, but would sometimes be held in other parts of each country where specific problems exist. Furthermore, if each country provided 24 members for the committee it was felt that the committee might be split into a number of subcommittees, and thus it would be possible to deal with more of the problems and difficulties that now exist between our two great countries.

Finally, the Agenda Committee which was composed of Senator Aiken and Congresswoman Kelly, with the Speaker of the other place and our Speaker, polled the entire committee for suggestions as to topics and subjects which might be discussed. The following is a partial list:

1. Trade and defence, with specific reference to the Hyde Park Declaration.

2. The protection of fish and fishing rights. I think this was put in for the benefit of the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid).

Hon. Mr. Reid: Good.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: 3. The Columbia River power development and a number of problems relating particularly to the province of British Columbia.

Those suggestions were made by the honourable senator from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Smith). At this time I wish to pay high tribute to Senator Smith, and to assure all honourable senators that he took a very prominent part in all discussions and a worth-while contribution was made by him. Indeed, all members of this honourable body can be justly proud of the work done by the senator from Kamloops.

In passing, may I say that the Smiths and the Brunts got to know each other much better as a result of this Washington trip. So, the trip, in addition to improving Canadian-American relations, also improved the friendly relations which previously existed between members of this honourable chamber. We enjoyed each other's company very much.

The following additional subjects were mentioned: defence and conservation of national resources; defence and economic peace; consideration of ways and means by which Canada and the United States may work together in matters of foreign policy; international boundary waters, and the economic place of minerals in the economy of both countries.

His Honour the Speaker suggested a very interesting subject which he thought should be discussed, that of the need for the schools of the United States to teach Canadian history to permit a better understanding of Canada by the children of the United States. Incidentally, at the present time a course in American history is being taught in our Canadian schools, but no similar course in Canadian history is taught in United States schools.

The next subject which I shall mention is, I am sure, one that is of interest to everyone here, namely, the matter of the disposal of wheat and coarse grains through a joint export selling agency, to be made up of members of both countries. I do not know whether we will ever establish such a commission, but if we could it certainly would eliminate a lot of problems which now exist with respect to the sale of wheat and other coarse grains by both countries.

Another subject was the problems related to the possibility of both countries sharing in defence production. Another was the investment of capital by the United States in Canada, especially the investment of risk capital, and the policy and management of United States subsidiary companies located in Canada.

Another matter was trade defence and tolls on the Welland Canal, and still another was the existing quotas which apply to the importing and exporting of agricultural products between the two countries. And finally, there was the matter of disposal of surplus products in both countries.

The above list of subjects was furnished to the agenda committee, to which I referred earlier, and it was left to this committee to finally decide upon and set up an agenda for the meeting to be held during June next.

When the meeting, which was held on Saturday, adjourned, the entire delegation, consisting of the representatives of both countries, was tendered a luncheon by Senator Aiken of Vermont. The luncheon was held in a very famous room on the Senate side of the Capitol. It was the room which originally was used by the Senate of the United States; later, when the Senate was provided with more spacious quarters this room was used by the Supreme Court of the United States, which continued to occupy it until its own building was erected in Washington. At the present time the room is being used for special functions.

At this particular luncheon we were honoured to have with us—and I use the words used by American congressmen and senators—"that old warrior", namely, Sam Rayburn, a representative from Texas, who is Speaker of the House of Representatives and has served in that office for nine terms. This is an all-time record, and one which I am assured by American senators and congressmen will never be equalled. During the course of his remarks Representative Rayburn told the gathering that he was the son of a blacksmith and had left school at the age of ten. There is no doubt that he is a self-made, self-educated man. Also he told the gathering that he had never been outside the United States, which to me was most startling. I know that it is the feeling of our steering committee that we should endeavour to arrange for a special invitation to be sent to Representative Rayburn to attend at least part of the meeting which will be held in Canada during June next. I realize that as he is Speaker of the House of Representatives it is impossible for him to stay away from Washington for any long period. However, the Canadian members of the committee feel it should be possible for him to get away for a day or two, and of course we would be delighted to have him visit Canada, which would be the first foreign country he has ever visited.

At this luncheon the Honourable Lionel Chevrier and myself were accorded the honour of thanking the American members of the committee for the kind hospitality which was shown to us and for the gracious treatment accorded to all the Canadian delegates. In my few words of thanks I made a plea to Representative Rayburn that he send a large delegation to Canada in June, having been advised by senators and congressmen seated at my table that he would have a great deal of influence in deciding the size of the delegation which would come here.

This luncheon gave all members of the Canadian delegation an opportunity to meet many United States senators and congressmen. Among those whom I had the honour and pleasure of meeting was Senator John J. Sparkman of Alabama, Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana, the son of the late Senator Huey Long, who was well known to many Canadian senators; and, if I may refer to one further senator, Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, who was the only senator in the last election to be elected with a very large majority by a "write-in" vote. That is to say, Senator Thurmond was not nominated by either of the political parties in the United States, and when the voters went to the polls they wrote his name in on the ballot in sufficient numbers to elect him with a tremendous majority.

There is one further matter I should like to mention. As a result of our visit with the United States senators, with the help given me by his Honour the Speaker we have arranged that the Debates of the Senate of Canada be sent to each senator in the United States. I have already received some 50 letters expressing their thanks. I can assure this honourable body that the United States senators are happy to receive a copy of our debates. May I read just one letter I have received, and I am sure honourable senators will understand why I choose to read this one. Senator Wallace F. Bennett of Utah, who is a member of the United States Senate Committee on Finance, writes:

> Dear Senator Brunt:
> I was delighted to receive your letter of January 16 and will enjoy receiving the Senate Hansard.
> If you would have any interest at all in receiving the Congressional Record or if there is any member of the Senate to whom I could send it other than yourself, I would be delighted to make that arrangement, although I freely confess that I find that it is impossible for me to keep up with it. In terms of size, it becomes a terrifying document.
> With kindest personal regards.

If any Canadian senator wishes to receive copies of the Congressional Record, Senator Bennett will be pleased to hear from you. You may not have time to read all of it, but I am sure in it you will find discussions of matters of interest.

Honourable senators, I realize that I have taken too much of your time in trying to give you a picture of what took place in Washington. However, I feel there is nothing I could have left out. In closing, may I say it is my sincere hope and wish that many honourable senators will be members of the committee which will meet in June, since there is no doubt that the members of this chamber can make a great contribution to all the discussions which will take place at that time. Their contributions to such discussions will, I know, go a long way toward solving many of the irritations and difficulties which now exist between these two great countries of the western hemisphere, the United States and Canada.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, may I first extend a sincere word of congratulations to the honourable senators who were chosen to move and second the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Each performed his task in a manner which served so well to continue the tradition of excellence of such speeches in this chamber.

To the three new members of the Senate I add my word of welcome and best wishes. Each, I am sure, will have an important contribution to make to the work of the Senate and its committees.

The year 1959 is a year of a number of important Canadian historical anniversaries. Today the honourable senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) referred to a very important centennial. May I remind honourable senators that an event took place, just 200 years ago, which, although not recognized as such at the time, was the beginning of the slow process of welding two great races to form the independent, free and united nation of which we are so proud.

With your permission I shall look back for a very few minutes on another anniversary—the bicentennial of the founding of my home town of Liverpool, Nova Scotia. Because it took place at an important period in our history, this event may be of more than passing interest to honourable senators.

It may be of special interest to our colleagues whose mother tongue is French that in 1604 Liverpool harbour was visited by De Monts and Champlain, which event has been marked by the Historical Sites and Monuments Board of Canada. This region of Nova Scotia a few years later became part of a French seigneurie and a shore fishery was established. However, it was not until 1759 that a few families from Plymouth of Mayflower stock, arrived, and they became the first permanent settlers of this part of Nova Scotia. They were led by a Captain Sylvanus Cobb, who at that time was more famous as an Indian fighter, and who, as a member of Goreham's Rangers, had served with General Wolfe at Louisburg. Captain Cobb brought with him the materials for his home, which stood in good repair and was continuously occupied until, unfortunately, destroyed by fire just a few years before.

Scores of families from New England followed these original settlers, until, in 1762, it is recorded that they were operating three water-driven sawmills, fed with the magnificent white pine that in those days covered the adjacent watershed of Nova Scotia's largest river. A typical colonial economy was soon taking shape. Vessels were constructed to carry lumber and salt fish to the West Indies, returning with molasses—and with what was considered to be an essential by-product of the latter. Vessels were also constructed to enter the carrying trade, making our Liverpool seamen as familiar with the streets of Rio as they were with those of Halifax.

At the beginning of the Revolutionary War the sympathies of these early settlers, as well as of those in northern Nova Scotia, lay with their kin whom they had left behind in New England. Accidents of history, which always seem to be clearing the path of destiny, changed these natural sympathies and prevented Nova Scotia, which was then composed of New Brunswick and part of Maine as well as the present provincial peninsula, from becoming the fourteenth state of the new republic to the south.

It was indeed fortunate that one of the early settlers, Colonel Simeon Perkins, saw fit to record the day-to-day colonial activities from 1766 until his death in 1812. It is even more fortunate that the Perkins diary has been preserved to this day, and that much of that historical survey has been recorded, in a most interesting fashion, in the historical novels by Thomas H. Raddall, a resident of Liverpool. I particularly commend to my colleagues the reading of Dr. Raddall's first historical novel, His Majesty's Yankees, in which the choice to remain loyal to the king, and the part played by the settlers of Liverpool in the Revolutionary War on the side of the king, has been recorded for present and future generations of readers who prefer their history in a well-flavoured and palatable form. We in Liverpool are very proud of our fellow-townsman, and take special pride in the fact that he has been on two occasions a winner of the Governor General's non-fiction award.

Thomas Raddall has written a number of equally interesting historical and contemporary novels, but his book that tells so well the true tales of the privateers is especially treasured. His stories of privateers are factual accounts of the amazing naval exploits of these vessels and of the skills of their Liverpool crews. Perhaps the most famous was the Packet, which during the War of 1812 captured 200 enemy craft, and was responsible for the American decision to build the Cape Cod Canal.

Some of the original colonial homes of the Liverpool privateersmen are still in excellent condition and are occupied, for the most part, by those who know the lives and times of their former owners. The home, of Cape Cod architecture, built by Colonel Simeon Perkins is now an historical museum, owned and operated as such by the Government of Nova Scotia, having been acquired previously by the local historical society. I invite honourable senators to visit Liverpool in 1959, its bicentennial year, and sample the historical atmosphere of the 18th century. You will find a bustling town of beautiful trees with friendly people, a mixture of the old names of pioneer times with those who came to us as newcomers with the establishment, thirty years ago, of the modern newsprint plant of the Mersey Paper Company.

I should like to say something about the problems of the Atlantic region. I am glad to have had a special reason for saying something about the history of the part of Canada from which I come. A background has thus been provided for some reference to the Atlantic provinces which, it has been stated on occasion, have their roots in history.

Before the time of Confederation—sometimes referred to as the days of wood, wind and water—like the rest of Canada, Nova Scotia had a pioneer economy. I am referring to problems of Nova Scotia, but most of these are common to the other Atlantic provinces. As I say, Nova Scotia had a pioneer economy. In other words, she was relatively self-sufficient in manufactured goods as well as in food requirements. Foreign trade was brisk and it was profitable. The development of economic nationalism, which was to sweep the world and which took the form of a policy of protective tariffs, had not arrived, but was not far away. In 1879 the Canadian protective policy aggravated growing world market problems and, tearing our natural trade out by the roots, forced a transplanting of those roots in unsuitable soil. These Atlantic provinces were forced out of many foreign markets and, turning away from seaborne commerce, which action spelled the end of the carrying trade, looked toward the interior of the new Confederation of Canada, then 12 years old.

In this new east-west trade pattern many difficulties immediately confronted them, difficulties which had not existed before Confederation. In the first place, products at the end of the new trade route were competitive; for example, lumber and apples and manufactured goods of all kinds.

Secondly, cheap water transportation gave way to rail shipments. Their relatively high costs were made even higher by the longer distance followed by the I.C.R.—the Inter-Colonial Railway—built on an all-Canadian route for national security reasons. They seemed to get along fairly well until 1912 but during the period from 1912 to 1926 a phrase, very commonly in use today, was heard from time to time, and each time it spelled more trouble. That phrase was "horizontal increases".

In 1927, after repeated petitions and inquiries on the transportation difficulties, came the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which was an attempt to restore the former transportation position of the Maritimes. The benefits of this act assisted the economy of the region until more recent years, when horizontal increases again became the order of the day and once again accentuated the pressure of geography and economic facts.

Throughout the years the freight rate structure itself has caused a further decline in manufacturing in the Atlantic region, because low rates applied only to low-value raw materials. It is the rate structure itself that has largely been responsible for a progressive concentration of steel manufacturing beyond the Atlantic provinces, where there is a region of abundance of iron ore, coal and manpower.

The expansion of this industry by the A. V. Roe Company—the new owners of DOSCO—in the Montreal area, appears to be the end of any expansion of steel manufacturing in Cape Breton, unless there is a drastic change in the Government's policy in the matter of freight rates whereby the commercial yardstick will become secondary to nation building and equality of opportunity.

After two long years the people of the Atlantic region are still waiting for those promised new transportation policies to be expressed in some concrete form which will bring greater returns to our primary producers and to make a favourable economic climate for expansion, not contraction, of manufacturing, and especially of steel.

I suggest that consideration should be given to an arrangement similar to the Crowsnest Pass Agreement which resulted in the economic agricultural development of the land mass of the west. Something of that nature would make possible the full use of the combined resources of coal and iron ore and labour in the Atlantic region. Studies by the experts made at the direction of the former Government have been going on for three years, which, when added to the information gathered by previous commissions, should have provided this Government with abundant knowledge on this subject. Now, let us hear no more about cabinet committees and ad hoc measures. I think the people of the Atlantic region expect to have new policies developed.

There are problems other than those of tariffs and transportation with their roots in history, both early and recent history. While Canada's protective tariff policy has encouraged national manufacturing over the years, the economic facts of transportation, as well as mass production and market availability have been responsible for a concentration of this activity in the heartland of the St. Lawrence basin. The turning over to the various provinces of the resources of the Canadian Shield was for many years a relatively unimportant historical fact. As time went on, however, it provided the basis of attraction for many of those who migrated from the Maritimes and it contributed to the comparative disabilities of these Atlantic provinces. There, I think, is another problem with its roots in history.

It is a fact of more recent history that accelerated depreciation and salvage value prices greatly assisted the post-war industrial activity of the two central provinces, substantially adding to the disparity of incomes between the people of the Atlantic provinces and the residents of these other provinces. May I point out that 50 per cent of Government investment and 75 per cent of private investment in war plants have found peacetime use in industry. Of interest, too, is the fact that since Korea, in 1951, 90 per cent of the defence plants have been established in Quebec and Ontario, continuing to be a brisk stimulus to manufacturing in those provinces. While the Maritimes were not without a measure of similar expansion in defence manufacturing, it served mostly to point up once again the disparity in economic development. Thus did these Atlantic provinces, in times of war or threat of war, fail to share equally in the national industrial development. Over the years since Confederation the people of the Atlantic area have been paying a high penalty because of geographic location and the denial of opportunity for natural and economic trade on water routes.

Now, honourable senators, what of the present-day and future economic position of the Atlantic region?

Most economists agree that the present economic situation of the Atlantic provinces is closely related to the low productivity of those many rural people engaged in marginal and seasonal activities. Because of this single factor, it has been estimated that there is a resultant loss per annum to the nation of 100,000 man-years of production.

It is evident therefore that a solution to the economic problems of the Atlantic region would make a significant contribution to national income and prosperity. When the day arrives that regional problems—no matter where they exist in Canada—are substantially diminished by effective Government policies, supplementing those carried out by past administrations, we will then have been brought close indeed to complete triumph of nationhood over geography. Then, too, will come the end of financial patchwork with its high cost to the national treasury.

In the process of developing policies, the Government of the day should have a full realization of the importance to the large rural population of the forest products industry, which takes first place in the economy of the Atlantic provinces, with almost 22 per cent of the total production.

This industry is at present in a delicate position, since it is, in general, geared to export markets. Whether these markets will expand is, in large measure, dependent on the kind of trade policies followed by the Government. For example, a deliberate policy of restricting trade with the United States may well have as one of its results an American policy of lessening their dependence on imports of Canadian pulp and paper products through stepped-up encouragement of the utilization of southern pine as an alternative source of fibre. I might add that even now, without financial encouragement by the federal Government of the United States, this rapidly enlarging source of cheaper fibre together with competitive power and labour costs is giving real concern to those who only a few short years ago were confident of a rapid expansion of this all-important Canadian industry. We find that the modern scientific world can overcome handicaps which not so many years ago seemed too great to overcome with regard to the utilization of southern pine.

And how can we expect to regain our export position in the United Kingdom lumber market when present Canadian policy makes it increasingly difficult for a reciprocal entry of British textiles into this country? No part of Canada has to pay such a price for a Canadian policy of protection as do the Atlantic provinces. Ad hoc financial assistance to the Governments of these provinces, with its side effect of encouraging them to live beyond their means, is a poor substitute indeed for freer trade policies which encourage the marketing of our natural resources and provide jobs for our people.

Most honourable senators are aware, I am sure, of the crisis in the steel and coal industry of Nova Scotia. In Springhill there is, of course, a desperate situation resulting from the closing of the mines following the tragic disasters of last year and the previous year. In Pictou County and in Cape Breton, because of loss of markets, it has been found necessary to cut down on production to the extent that this winter more than 5,000 miners will be without jobs, and the future is far from bright.

It seems fashionable at this time for some people to lay all the blame for this situation on the doorstep of A.V. Roe Company and its subsidiary, DOSCO, and I agree that the company must assume some share of responsibility for the present situation. When they were able to obtain control of DOSCO, the president of A.V. Roe Company had this to say:

> —We have but one aim—to expand this Canadian enterprise so that it will be stronger, more enduring and more profitable to its shareholders and employees and, at the same time, contribute something strong, solid and substantial to the development of the Atlantic provinces and their people—

In view of this statement, the people of Nova Scotia expected better things from the company than announcements of large scale lay-offs in the coal industry and almost simultaneous announcements of its intention to build new steel-manufacturing plants in the Montreal area. But I also say that a Government composed of men who went through eastern Nova Scotia during two election campaigns promising increased production of steel and coal has a definite responsibility for doing something about the present critical situation.

Without the programs of assistance through subvention on coal and encouragement of mechanization, devised and carried out for some years by the former Government, this industry, the life blood of eastern Nova Scotia, would have perished long ago from its chronic illness. A natural and economic market for Nova Scotia coal production should be in the Atlantic area itself, and in time such a market may develop; but under present conditions the financial assistance is meagre indeed.

The result of the widely publicized thermal power legislation of the last Parliament is certainly disappointing to the miners of coal, as its effect on the industry has been trifling indeed. In order to ensure a further development of the markets for coal in the Atlantic area, the basis for subventions should be widened to provide competition for oil which is imported from foreign countries.

Perhaps the best immediate marketing prospects for our coal, as well as for alternative employment for our displaced miners, lie in a government-encouraged expansion of the steel industry. I have already mentioned the possibility of a new governmental approach to the problem of transportation of manufactured steel, and I shall have something to say about the fiscal approach to the problem at the conclusion of my remarks.

I should like now to make some reference to the fishing industry, an important one in the Atlantic region and in my own particular area. The former administration did much to encourage the use of more efficient means of production with a program of subsidies for the construction of draggers and long-liners. At the same time financial assistance was given to the construction of bait freezers and cold storage plants where they were needed. With larger quantities available of a better product, attractively packaged and shipped in fresher condition, the time has now arrived for this Government to join with private enterprise in an effective promotion and advertising campaign to enlarge the demand for fish products, both in Canada and in the United States—where three-quarters of the production is sold. With a constantly increasing demand there would then be markets available for a further expanding production at prices which would mean steadily increasing incomes to the primary producers, who by tradition and choice follow this hazardous occupation.

Since so many of our fishermen have been encouraged to use modern long-liners and draggers a situation has developed in which there is greater need than ever before for an improved deep-sea protection service. The views of the present Government regarding the establishment of a full-fledged coast guard service have been clearly stated and are well known, disappointing as they may be to those who advocated such a service. There remain, however, opportunities for much improvement in this field, to add to the great improvement made since the war through the addition of air force personnel and equipment, and a communications system. There are many who believe that a great opportunity for improvement lies in a new concept of the design and use of fishery patrol vessels which now appear to be solely concerned with the policing of lobster fishing regulations. It has been demonstrated on most parts of the coast, and particularly in my own section of Nova Scotian coastline, that fishery patrol vessels should play a minor role in the enforcement of fishery regulations, and that they can be released for the protection of the lives, boats and equipment of the deep sea fishermen themselves.

Honourable senators may recall that in the Speech from the Throne which opened the pre-election session of 1957-58 a specific reference was made to the Atlantic provinces. I will quote from page 4 of the Senate Hansard of October 14, 1957:

> As an immediate start upon a program of more extensive development in the Atlantic provinces,—

Then the Speech went on to refer to the thermal power legislation and to the financing of the Beechwood project.

Now, I have referred to the lack of effect of the thermal power legislation. With regard to Beechwood, how much better off the province of New Brunswick would have been if at the time the power development was under construction they had done their own financing. There have been two results of federal participation in Beechwood:

First, instead of a long-term low interest financing the Power Commission of that province has a short-term higher interest loan from the federal Government.

Secondly, federal funds are being used in the development of power which is being exported to the United States.

I must say, however, that the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in the fall of 1957 led the people to believe that far greater benefits were to be received, and it had its effect on the political fortunes of the Conservative party in those provinces. The Government should now be reminded of the opening words of that paragraph:

> As an immediate start upon a program of extensive development in the Atlantic provinces—

I must say it is a great disappointment and disillusionment to find not a single reference to the problems of the Atlantic regions in the Speech from the Throne under discussion here today. But, of course, there is no election in the offing.

Honourable senators, in this period of recession, which has been accompanied by grave unemployment in the Atlantic area far worse than the national average, this is the time for the Government of the day to take bold and extraordinary steps to improve the economy in this region of Canada.

The solution of the economic problems of the Atlantic region requires the application of a new policy concept which would finally result in the provision of job opportunities for the present and future generations of the people who are born in and choose to remain in those beautiful provinces.

This, surely, is the time to make available for the people of the area the large military market potential located in the Atlantic provinces, wherever there is no serious national disadvantage, by establishing regional priorities for defence production contracts, as well as for other Government purchasing.

This is the time for the application of new policies which would encourage private capital investment in these provinces, one of our greatest needs, by the creation of advantageous conditions by way of special depreciation and other taxation concessions to apply not only to new industries but also to the expansion of those already established.

Such policies would certainly encourage acceleration of the expansion of the forest industries, and particularly with respect to the manufacture of pulp and paper so greatly needed to provide jobs in eastern Nova Scotia, and they would, when added to a new approach in the matter of freight rates on manufactured steel, provide the required encouragement for the expansion of this industry to provide new employment opportunities for those unemployed coal miners who survived the disaster at Springhill, where the prospects are desperate, as well as for those from the Pictou County and Cape Breton mining areas.

This is the time also to put into effect new policies which would provide long-term loans to encourage establishment and expansion of industries in the Atlantic region. I suggest these loans should take the form of equity capital so that in the early years new industry would not be unduly burdened with the necessity of high interest rates and amortization payments. I understand that capital investment by government in depressed areas of the United Kingdom and the United States has taken the form of equity capital with beneficial results.

Governments of earlier days tried to build and weld a nation by devising policies such as were expressed in the Maritime Freight Rates Act, subventions on coal, the Crowsnest Pass Agreement, the transfer payments of the various social security measures, the Dominion-Provincial Tax Agreements and financial assistance to those low income primary producers who work on land and sea. To the extent that nationhood has come to Canada in this stage of our development, these policies of former Governments have contributed greatly to "Political triumph over Geography". It is not enough for a new Conservative Government to coast along on the policies of its predecessors in office; it should devise new policies to take care of the new as well as the old problems of nation building.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

WATERLOO MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. W. D. Euler moved the second reading of Bill S-5, respecting The Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company which seeks federal incorporation under this bill is not a new company; in fact, it is one of the earliest companies in this line of business in the whole of Canada. It is also the oldest in the city of Waterloo which, as honourable senators know, is to some extent the centre of the insurance business. That city is the home of not only the Waterloo Mutual, but the Farmers Mutual and great life insurance companies such as the Dominion Life, the Mutual Life of Canada and the Equitable Life. One would naturally expect them to be excellent companies, located as they are in the choicest part of Canada, of which Kitchener and Waterloo are at the very heart.

The Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company was organized almost one hundred years ago, under the statutes of Upper Canada, thus having been established before the province of Ontario as such was formed. The company has carried on a successful business ever since. For the protection of its policy holders it now has a surplus of about $2 million and its premium income is something more than $3 million per annum.

The company has several reasons for desiring federal incorporation. One of them, I presume, is that it will gain some prestige by reason of being federally chartered, especially as most of its competitors now have that standing.

Another reason given me is that it desires to extend its activities beyond the province of Ontario. Of course, this company can operate in the other provinces by obtaining provincial licences to do so, but if it has federal incorporation it will not be necessary to obtain such licences.

There is a third reason, which perhaps I can state more briefly by reading from the brief that was presented to me. The solicitor for the company states:

> Probably, however, the most important reason is due to the fact that many of the life insurance companies and very nearly all of the American life insurance companies taking mortgages here in Ontario refuse to accept the policies of provincially registered companies on their mortgage loans. They more or less take the stand that they are dominion registered companies and any fire insurance companies insuring buildings on which they make mortgage loans should be also dominion registered and subject to the same inspection. This has cost the company considerable loss of business and cancellation of policies on very good fire insurance risks and has impelled us at this time to take these steps.

I hope that the company's expectations will be fulfilled, but I would like to say to it that federal incorporation will not cure that situation altogether. I speak from some experience in the insurance business. Many loan companies, chiefly trust companies, and perhaps some insurance companies, which make mortgage loans have a preferred list, and when an application for a mortgage loan is made they refuse the loan unless the borrower has insurance with these preferred companies. And here is what I regard as reprehensible: they will put a company on the list if it buys their securities in the form of their debentures. I regard that as an unfair discriminatory piece of business, and I do not hesitate to describe it as a form of legalized blackmail.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Maybe they should be referred to Mr. MacDonald, to be dealt with under the Combines Act.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I thought this was an appropriate time to make the remark, although I had not intended to do so. It occurs to me that it is a practice which should not be permitted. Companies whose policies are in excellent condition cannot get that business unless they get on the preferred list by buying debentures of these companies.

The Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company is a sound company. I say that, although it is an active and friendly competitor of a company with which I am closely associated. I know its directors personally; they are men of character, ability and good repute, and I see no reason why their request should not be granted.

I spoke this morning to the Superintendent of Insurance, and he has given permission for me to say that he looks upon the bill with entire favour.

If the motion for second reading passes, I shall move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, which I understand is the appropriate committee in which to consider a financial measure. Representatives of the company will be present to give further information if desired.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Euler, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—
SECOND READING

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan moved the second reading of Bill S-5, respecting The Canadian Medical Association.

He said: Honourable senators, I am very pleased and happy to have been given the privilege of introducing and explaining this bill respecting the Canadian Medical Association. I am particularly pleased that my distinguished colleague the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) joins with me in this presentation. Also, I should like to include the other members of the medical profession in the Senate, namely, the Honourable Senators Grant, Howden, McGrand and Veniot.

Briefly, it might interest honourable senators to hear some of the pertinent facts concerning the Canadian Medical Association. It was founded in Quebec in 1837, its first president was Sir Charles Tupper, and it was incorporated in 1909. Its membership comprises 80 to 85 per cent of the practising medical personnel of Canada, and throughout all these years it has done everything it could to promote the well-being of Canadian citizens.

The bill seeks to repeal sections 2 and 7 of chapter 62 of the Statutes of 1909. The important additions provided by the bill are paragraphs (f) and (g) of the new section 2, which read as follows:

(f) to promote the interests of the members of the association and to act on their behalf in the promotion thereof;

(g) to grant sums of money out of the funds of the association for the furtherance of these objects;

Briefly, provision for a pension scheme came into effect by statute on January 1, 1957, and members of the Canadian Medical Association now desire to obtain those benefits. I refer to section 79B of the Income Tax Act, which section was added by chapter 29 of the Statutes of 1957. My good friend the senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) brings to my attention the fact that section 10 of the Pension Fund Societies Act, chapter 208 R.S.C. 1952, covers this particular point.

Honourable senators will observe that by the new section 7 we are simply asking that there be no limitation on the value of land to be held by the association. The act of incorporation limits the amount to $50,000. As a result of increased values of properties and the undertakings that have been carried on by the association, it is now desirable to ask for removal of that limitation.

Honourable senators, I believe I have covered the main points of the bill, which I have attempted to do in simple language, not in legal phraseology or confusing medical terminology.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: If the bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sullivan, bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 3, at 8 p.m.

Extract from United States Congressional Record of January 9, 1959

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Aiken: Mr. President, many of us have been looking forward to this day with great pleasure. Senators will recall that on August 8, 1958, the Senate adopted Senate Resolution 359 reading as follows:

Resolved, that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations shall establish a subcommittee for the purpose of exploring, with appropriate officials of the Government of the United States and with members of the Canadian Parliament, the desirability and feasibility of increased systematic discussion between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern.

I shall read two sentences from the committee report of Senate Resolution 359 to indicate the motivation behind the resolution:

It was the feeling of the Committee on Foreign Relations that an attempt should be undertaken to strengthen the bonds between the United States and its great neighbor, the Commonwealth of Canada. In these critical times, it is of crucial importance that the friendship and understanding between our nations be deepened in every possible way.

Mr. President, this Senate resolution did not simply happen. For some years members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs have been keenly aware of the special relationship between the United States and Canada and the useful results which might flow from increased contact between legislators of the two countries. In May, 1957 a report by Representative Frank M. Coffin and Representative Brooks Hays suggested that some form of parliamentary consultation between the two countries be established. In a speech at Wesleyan University on June 8, 1958, Prime Minister Diefenbaker referred to this concept. The subject was further discussed last July by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States.

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 359, I was privileged to be named by Chairman Green of the Committee on Foreign Relations to be the chairman of a liaison committee. My colleagues on that committee are Senators Mansfield, Capehart, and Morse. Last September I went to Ottawa where I was joined by Senator Capehart and we had a preliminary discussion with members of the Canadian Parliament, some of whom are here today. Later in September, Representative Brooks Hays and Representative Frank M. Coffin held similar discussions in Canada. As a result of these discussions it was determined that a delegation of members of the Canadian Parliament would come to Washington at this time. Acting Chairman Morgan of the House Foreign Affairs Committee has appointed a liaison committee composed of Representative Edna F. Kelly, chairman, and Representatives Frank Coffin, Walter H. Judd, and Chester E. Merrow.

Mr. President, this is in brief the background of the introduction which I am about to make. A delegation of most distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament is now with us to continue the consultations begun in Canada last fall. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record at this point in my remarks certain biographic information about the Canadian delegation.

There being no objection, the biographic information was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. Aiken: Mr. President, it is indeed a high privilege to present to this body the Speaker of the Senate of Canada, the Honourable Mark Drouin. (Applause, Senators rising.)

Mr. President, it is also a high privilege to present to the Senate the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, the Honourable Roland Michener. (Applause, Senators rising.)

Speaker Drouin is accompanied by two of his colleagues, the Honourable Sydney John Smith and the Honourable William R. Brunt. (Applause, Senators rising.)

Speaker Michener of the House of Commons is accompanied by five of his colleagues, the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, the Honourable Hazen Argue, the Honourable William L. Houck, the Honourable Richard D. Thrasher, and the Honourable Erik Nielsen. (Applause, Senators rising.)

Mr. President, if the rules of the Senate permitted it, I would call attention to the fact that the wives of seven members of the Canadian delegation and the daughter of one member are in the gallery. (Applause.)

Mr. President, I know that other Members of the Senate wish to pay their respects to our distinguished guests. I am happy to yield at this time for that purpose; and after they leave the floor, they will go to the office of the Vice-President, where other Senators may meet them.

Mr. Capehart: Mr. President—

Mr. Johnson of Texas: Mr. President, before I yield to my delightful friend, the Senator from Indiana, I wish to commend the Senator from Vermont for bringing into the Chamber these very able and distinguished Canadian neighbours of ours. There is no nation for which we have more love or affection, and we are pleased beyond compare that they are here to visit with us. I look forward with great anticipation to meeting them in the office of the Vice-President, and listening and learning.

I yield now to my friend, the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. Capehart: Mr. President, last fall I had the pleasure and the good fortune of visiting with these gentlemen in Ottawa, along with the Senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken). I urge all other Members of this body and also all Members of the House of Representatives to visit with these distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament. I do not know how these gentlemen could have been any nicer to us than they were. If my colleagues want to encounter real hospitality and real friendship, I suggest that they visit Canada and these gentlemen.

I say to our distinguished guests that we in the United States need their co-operation and support, and we appreciate their co-operation and support. I hope we can have many meetings similar to the ones Senator Aiken and I enjoyed with them in Ottawa; and I hope that they and all other members of their Parliament will visit us here.

Mr. Dirksen: Mr. President—

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. Dirksen: Mr. President, understanding and friendship are a two-way street. Out of friendship comes understanding, and out of understanding comes friendship; and of course, that process makes our relationships so pleasant and makes understanding so very easy.

Of course, our two countries have the common experience of Anglo-Saxon background and a common language; and out of that has come, over a long period of time, the felicity which makes you call us your neighbour, and makes us call you our neighbour.

I am glad you are here; and I believe that from parliamentary meetings such as this one and the one I enjoyed attending in Europe so recently, there comes better understanding which advances the whole cause of progress. So I am delighted to see you here.

Mr. Langer: Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. Langer: Mr. President, I wish to say to our distinguished guests and friends that I am their neighbour; I live in North Dakota. I have had many delightful experiences in meeting citizens of Canada who have visited North Dakota.

Of course, I, in turn, like to visit Canada, both to enjoy my experiences there and meetings with its fine citizens and to enjoy the fishing. In addition, we have the benefit of the great Peace Garden.

I want to compliment our distinguished visitors for the fine way their Government treated the farmers of Canada after World War I. Within a year Canada canceled every seed and feed loan. But in North Dakota alone there were 34,000 farmers; and today our Government still is charging 4,000 of them 6 per cent interest a year, and the result is that the interest amounts to a great deal more than the principal.

So when we meet in the Peace Garden and when our farmers join your farmers in celebrating, our farmers are very much distressed to find that they have not received from their Government the fine treatment that your Government has given to the farmers of Canada.

I join my colleagues in bidding you welcome. It is most delightful and indeed a very great pleasure to see you here.

Mr. Morse: Mr. President—

Mr. Johnson of Texas: Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Oregon, who is member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Morse: Mr. President, I wish to say to our Canadian friends that I have the privilege of serving under the leadership of Senator Aiken, who is chairman of our so-called Canadian Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, of which the Senator from Indiana (Mr. Capehart) is also a member; and then I have the privilege of having them serve with me in my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin-American Affairs.

The message I would leave with our distinguished Canadian brothers is that in my opinion we have a comity of interest and obligations in respect to Latin America. I have said at meetings of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I wish to say now to our distinguished guests, that in my judgment Canada and the United States should proceed as brothers in the attempt to solve the relationships with Latin America, to the end that they may be improved and that there will be a better understanding throughout Latin America in regard to her two northern neighbours.

My conversations with members of the Canadian Parliament in the past lead me to believe that you gentlemen share that point of view. Therefore, in my capacity as a member of Senator Aiken's subcommittee and as chairman of the Latin-American Subcommittee. I invite you to join with us in a partnership arrangement, to the end that we may strengthen the policies toward Latin America on the part of both Canada and the United States.

Mr. Javits: Mr. President—

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to my friend, the Senator from New York.

Mr. Javits: Mr. President, I, too, would like to join my distinguished colleagues in a word of welcome to our dear friends, these distinguished Members of the Parliament of Canada. I represent in part the State of New York, a State with which they have many important relationships, both in the economic field, in social terms, and in governmental matters. I hazard the guess that they visit my State perhaps more than any other State in our Nation.

Of course Canadians are always very welcome in New York, as they know. We count them as brothers, and we mean that very literally. Furthermore, the State of New York prides itself on its economic relations with Canada. Canada joins us in connection with the St. Lawrence Seaway and in connection with the use of the waters of the Niagara River and its tremendous power development and the great community of interest that exists between us.

I think I speak advisedly when I say that today our new Governor, Nelson Rockefeller, has very close to his heart the entire matter of United States-Canadian relations, particularly in terms of the interests of our own State; and as these gentlemen have experienced with our Governors prior to Governor Rockefeller, I believe they will find a welcome hand, a warm understanding, and a spirit of great cooperation added to a spirit of new enterprise in terms of the government of the State of New York. I know I certainly bespeak the views of my colleague from New York, who does not happen to be on the floor at the moment.

Mr. Mansfield: Mr. President—

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to my friend from Montana.

Mr. Mansfield: Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in welcoming our neighbours from across the border, members of the Parliament of Canada.

Because I represent, in part, the State which has perhaps the closest contact with the most Canadian provinces, since Montana borders on British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, and because I know something about the many problems which sometimes cause us trouble and difficulty, but never divide us, I am delighted that these members of the Canadian Parliament are here to visit with us, to discuss these difficulties, and to arrive at common understandings.

I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken) for taking the initiative in the establishment of this interparliamentary group, so to speak, and I wish to point out that he got the idea from Premier Diefenbaker, who, while visiting Trinity College, in Connecticut, made a speech to the effect that a liaison group of this kind would be in the best possible interest of both countries.

So I am delighted that these gentlemen are here. I hope this meeting is only the beginning of many similar meetings in the future; and I know that from them will come a better understanding, a better feeling, and an accentuation of the good will which has marked the relationships between our two countries, not only since both of our countries became independent, but even before then.

Mr. Humphrey: Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to my friend, the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. Humphrey: Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues today in extending the warm hand of friendship and welcome to these distinguished members of the Parliament of Canada.

It is my privilege to represent, in part, in this body the great State of Minnesota. Of course, Minnesota joints territorially and geographically the great country of Canada; and our relationships are cordial, friendly, and, indeed, helpful to both areas.

Likewise, we are at the end of the great St. Lawrence Seaway. So that our relationships in the area of commerce with Canada are closer than ever. Many people from Minneapolis and St. Paul travel to Winnipeg, Canada, and many persons from Winnipeg come to the Twin Cities.

When I was mayor of Minneapolis, I visited Winnipeg, and the mayor of Winnipeg came to our area. Those relationships are very happy memories. But I believe now, as has been suggested today, we would do well to talk of the future, and resolve to solve our problems as good friends do, respecting the rights of each other, and making such accommodations as will provide for unity through understanding and mutual respect.

I join with the Senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken), and wish to commend him upon his worthy endeavors and leadership in establishing, on our part, this very fine example of cooperation between two great countries. I am looking forward to the coming days when we can be together again.

Mr. Case of South Dakota: Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. Case of South Dakota: I think probably I am one of the very few Members of the U.S. Senate who found it convenient and desirable to go home last August by way of Canada. I live in South Dakota, but I went to New England, and, from Lake Champlain, went to Canada. I visited Ottawa, and saw the Government House, and some of the very fine and outstanding buildings there. In fact, it was my thought at the time that Ottawa was splendidly equipped to be the scene of international conferences and international groups, as it has been in the past. I am sure it will be in the future.

From there I went north, to Algonquin Provincial Park. I may say to my colleague from North Dakota that I saw a shorthorn cow which I thought was the largest cow I had ever seen. [Laughter.]

I have a picture of it. I am exhibiting it to my friends in South Dakota and saying, "Take a look at that, and do your best." We spent a few days at Huntsville, in the beautiful lake country of that area. It is magnificent. I was proud that it was a part of a country that is our friend, Canada.

You are most welcome here. I hope some of you will visit us in South Dakota.

Mr. Yarborough: Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to my colleague.

Mr. Yarborough: Mr. President, as one of the representatives in the Senate from the State of Texas and as a member of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I want to join in these words of welcome to our friends, the members of the Canadian Parliament with us in the Senate today. The Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has no jurisdiction over legislation dealing with foreign relations but does have jurisdiction over laws relating to foreign commerce.

In the last session we had the privilege of passing two bills which furthered commerce between Canada and the United States. One of those bills extended the time during which a Canadian-owned steamship line may serve the 49th State by furnishing service between Alaska and the other 48 States. I think it is an anomaly that the only regular steamship service between Alaska and the other 48 States is furnished by a Canadian steamship line.

Many citizens from my State have been to Alaska. The only way they can get to Alaska overland is by going through Canada over the Alcan Highway. The only transportation ties between our old 48 States and the new 49th State by land or water have been by Canadian aid, either through using Canadian steamship service, or overland, across Canada itself. Such transportation bridge between our newest State, Alaska, and the older 48 States across the Dominion of Canada, serve to strengthen the ties of commerce and bonds of friendship that link our two nations and peoples.

In the last session of the Congress there also was passed a bill which permitted foreign-owned vessels—British and Canadian owned barges primarily—to use the inland waterways of the United States. Such laws deal with commerce, and not with treaties. They deal with people-to-people relations, further promoting the commercial relations of our two nations.

There is another phase of this subject in which our people are directly interested, and that is gas and oil lines from the great reserves in Canada to markets in the United States. More gas and oil pipelines have been projected.

Our friends will recall that during the dark days of World War II our war effort was crippled by the fact that so many ships were sunk by German submarines. The enemy at that time had only about one-eighth the number of submarines now possessed by countries behind the Iron Curtain.

In the event another such tragedy should befall us, the oil and gas pipelines which link these energy reserves with the industrial centers of our two nations would provide the means of furnishing fuel and energy to both of our countries, to help us survive in any assault which might possibly be made against us.

We want our Canadian friends to know we are appreciative of their co-operation. You have permitted the building of the DEW line, the radar observation chain, in your northern territories, so that the first warning of attack on the United States or Canada will come from your territory. We are grateful to you for the great friendship and co-operation of your people in these endeavours.

I am glad to help welcome you to the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. Cotton: Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. Cotton: As a representative of a State, New Hampshire, which is a neighbour of Canada, on behalf of Senator Bridges and myself I want to express my sincere sympathy for your having had to listen to me and to other Senators in bidding you welcome.

Mr. Lausche: Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. Lausche: As the senior Senator from the State of Ohio, which is in physical contact with Canada except for Lake Erie, I wish to extend a welcome to you in your visit to the United States. I believe I speak the will of the people of Ohio when I say to you we have recognized the mutual interdependence which exists between Canada and the United States.

I feel positive that the people of Ohio recognize that the things which hurt Canada will eventually hurt Ohio. We believe that as Canada grows stronger, the United States will grow stronger. We believe that if we grow weak, Canada will inevitably grow weak. We are neighbours standing shoulder to shoulder, lifted and dropped by every good thing or every bad thing that affects us.

As a Member of the Senate, I should like to say to you that in my approach to my responsibilities with respect to Canada, I will constantly have in mind that anything imprudent which I did, prejudicially affecting your Dominion, inevitably will affect my Nation. I think I speak the thinking and the will of the citizens of Ohio when I deliver that message to you.

Mr. Wiley: Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. Wiley: My friends from Canada, as a representative of a State bordering on Lake Superior, a large part of which provides the southern line of Canada, and speaking also on behalf of the Senator who now occupies the Chair, the junior Senator from the State of Wisconsin (Mr. Proxmire), I bid you welcome. It is good to see some old acquaintances in this delegation, friends I made in connection with meetings of those interested in the St. Lawrence development. One I knew when attending sessions of the United Nations.

Canada has been of interest to me from the days when I was a boy and read the story of Evangeline. As I grew into manhood, I visited the cities of Quebec and Montreal. I travelled through the lake country and across the continent on the Canadian Pacific, up to Lake Louise and Banff, and on to the west coast. It seemed to me that God Almighty had created this continent to be one geographically, to be one in its political approaches, although our Governments were separate as nations, one in the religious approach of our people, and one in the economic approach to domestic and world problems.

I think it is a wonderful thing, gentlemen, that this exchange of members of parliamentary bodies has gotten underway to such a point that groups such as yours, who really are the ambassadors of good thinking and good living, visit their neighbours. It makes for the constructive building up of relationships in every direction. We welcome you, and may you begin today to have the time of your lives in the good old U.S.A.

Mr. Thurmond: Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. Thurmond: I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, since I come from one of the States of the far South, South Carolina, I take this opportunity to extend the glad hand of welcome to these distinguished gentlemen from the far North, from the great Republic of Canada.

Mr. Saltonstall: Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Johnson of Texas: I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. Saltonstall: I may say to you gentlemen from Canada that I come from Massachusetts. I was in Ottawa when the idea was first fostered of the exchange of greetings between members of the Parliament of Canada and ourselves. As a Massachusetts Senator, knowing that many good Canadians are in Massachusetts and that they generally vote Republican, I am very glad to see you here.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. President, I wish to thank the majority leader, the Senator from Texas, for yielding the time for the paying of tributes by the Members of our body to our Canadian friends who are visiting us today. I think this is a great day for the United States and for Canada. As I stated earlier, our friends will be in the Vice President's room for a short time, where they will be glad to meet any Members of the Senate. I hope all those who have not spoken, at least, as well as all those who have spoken, will meet our friends personally.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRODUCERS' STRIKE—PRESS COMMENT ON INQUIRIES

(Translation):

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I trust I may be allowed, not to raise a question of privilege, but to give a personal explanation.

A newspaperman wrote, in the Saturday edition of Le Devoir, that "I amuse myself in guiding public opinion in the wrong direction" and that the questions placed on today's Order Paper especially show up my ignorance concerning the C.B.C. producers' and artists' strike. He claims that I am not aware of what is going on down there. That, I admit, is true. As a matter of fact, it is one of the greatest truisms he ever wrote because, if I made an inquiry, it was evidently to obtain information.

Now, no one from any newspaper is going to dictate to me the policy I should follow. In this Chamber, like my colleagues, I consider each question on its merits. I have a duty to fulfil and I do the best I can.

I can quite understand that this newspaperman, who probably belongs to the producers' group, should know a great deal more than I do about the strike. We would all be very grateful to him if he would lead us into the wonderland of the C.B.C. artists' and producers' mutual admiration society, where we could no doubt find matter for many more questions.

It seems that one day a barber became a C.B.C. producer. He was greeted with the following words: "You are quite welcome because most of us are 'bores' anyway". (Untranslatable pun on the word "raseur" (bore).

ICE-BREAKING COSTS

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. How many ships belonging to the Government were used in connection with ice-breaking on the St. Lawrence River during the period from November 15th, 1958, to January 15th, 1959?
2. What was the total cost of upkeep and operational expenses of these ships during the above period?
3. How were these expenses charged:
(a) To the National Harbours Board,
(b) To the Port of Montreal,
(c) To the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, or to some other agency?
4. What, if any, expenses in connection with ice-breaking were incurred at the Port of Halifax, N.S., during the said period?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have the following answers to the honourable gentleman's questions:

1. The Department used four ships part time in connection with icebreaking on the St. Lawrence River, the d'Iberville, N. B. McLean, Ernest Lapointe and Montcalm. The Labrador was also used for a very short period in the Gulf and River as far as Quebec and the Edward Cornwallis was used for a short period to assist ships into Baie de Chaleur and at Rimouski. During this period also in order to provide adequate icebreaking operations in the Maritimes, the heavy icebreaker N. B. McLean was sent down to the Maritimes and the shallow draft, lighter Saurel was transferred to work in the River.

2. These vessels carry out northern transportation, supply and buoy work, also icebreaking work around Newfoundland, search and rescue work, transportation of passengers, buoy laying, etc., and it is not possible to keep separate costs for any particular item of work. The average monthly operating cost for the year 1957-58 is as follows: (The fiscal year 1958-59 will not be completed until March 31).

d'Iberville	$75,924.23
N. B. McLean	57,822.70
Montcalm	35,811.52
Ernest Lapointe	29,299.60
Edward Cornwallis	34,459.81
Saurel	33,923.67

The Labrador only operated for a period of five months and the average monthly cost is $56,671.

3. Expenses are charged to the Department of Transport Vote, "Marine Service Steamers, Administration, Operation and Maintenance".

4. No ice-breaking operations were carried out within the port of Halifax.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Donald Smith inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

Since June 1957, in each province:

1. How many persons were convicted of murder and sentenced to death?
2. How many such sentences were appealed to appeal courts within the province or to the Supreme Court of Canada and disposed of?
3. How many death sentences were reviewed by the Government and commuted to life imprisonment?
4. In how many such cases were there recommendations of mercy by the jury?
5. In how many such cases was insanity or intoxication raised as a defence?
6. In those cases commuted to life imprisonment, after what period of time will they be eligible for review and further reduction of term by the Parole Board?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have the following answer to the honourable gentleman's questions:

Since June 30, 1957—

Questions	1	2	3	4	5
British Columbia	4	1	2	1	1
Alberta	3	0	3	0	2
Manitoba	1	0	1	1	1
Ontario	11	1	7	2	6
Quebec	4	0	2	0	1
Nova Scotia	2	0	2	0	2

Question 6. The present rule of practice of the Remission Service will be followed by the Parole Board until appropriate regulations are made under section 7(a) of the Parole Act. The present rule of practice involves periodic reviews of the inmate's case while he is serving his sentence, but before he is eligible to be released on ticket of leave he is ordinarily required to serve fifteen years.

NATIONAL GALLERY

PURCHASES—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. What was the accession No., the medium, the artist, the title, the date of acquisition, the source, and the cost (in Canadian dollars) of each one of the works of art purchased by the National Gallery of Canada, from accession No. 6911 of September 18, 1957 to date?

2. What commissions have been paid for the purchase of each one of the works of art brought by the National Gallery of Canada from accession No. 6327 of May 18, 1955, (pages 529-539 of the Senate Hansard of January 28, 1958) to be completed to date, and to whom in each case?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have answers to the honourable gentleman's questions.

As the answer to the first question is voluminous, I would ask the consent of the house to have it printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 99 and 100.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The answer to the second question is: None.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I would like to ask a question of the honourable Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). A few days ago there appeared in the press some extracts from the report of the Auditor General. May I ask when we may expect to receive a copy of the complete report?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I tabled a copy of the report this evening, and I will inquire as to what can be done about distribution of copies.

HON. GEORGE S. WHITE

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS SPECIAL AMBASSADOR TO VENEZUELA

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, over the last weekend I read in the press the very interesting news that the Honourable Senator White had been named a special ambassador to Venezuela, where he will represent Canada at the inauguration of the recently elected president of that country.

Honourable senators, I feel that this is an honour not only to Senator White, but also to the Senate. I am therefore very pleased that the Prime Minister has recognized Senator White and this house in this manner. I am sure Senator White will make an excellent ambassador, and that he will have a very profitable, useful and interesting experience. I extend to him my sincere congratulations.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, naturally, I concur in the remarks made by the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for their very kind remarks. I can only say that I will be both proud and happy to represent the Canadian Government at this special event in Caracas on February 13 next.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 29, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, it is with unusual enthusiasm that I open my observations this evening with compliments to the two honourable gentlemen who respectively moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I think we all feel that their speeches were exceptionally good and exceptionally adequate to the occasion. I was particularly interested in the speech of the honourable senator from Lumsden, Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Pearson) when he described so vividly the change that has taken place in the face of the western prairies during the last 70 or 80 years, since the first settlers migrated into that country. I was particularly impressed by this because, as it happens, I had an opportunity personally to observe part of that process. In the first year that I was in Canada, in the spring of 1908, I was sent out on an engineering party which was superintending the construction of the then Grand Trunk Pacific Railway at a point about 20 miles west of Edmonton, close to a little village called Stony Plain. That country had been settled fairly recently. It was settled by people of a large number of races. The farm on which we had our camp was occupied by a French-Canadian; immediately opposite him, on the other side of the road, was a German; and just a little way down the road was a Scotsman. It was in an area which I think is known as the poplar country of Alberta. The soil, perhaps, was not the same as that of the middle prairies, but nevertheless it was good farming land. The settlers were occupying their original houses, the houses they built when they came; the roads were dirt roads—dirt which changed into a particularly oleaginous kind of mud when the rain came. There were no such things as telephones or electric power; and the only communication with the outside world was the little branch line of the then Canadian Northern Railway, which ran from Edmonton to Stony Plain. For a boy of 16, fresh from an English school, the experience was most interesting. I had no occasion to revisit that country until three years ago. The change that has taken place in that interval is really astonishing; it bears out everything that my honourable friend from Saskatchewan has said. I travelled through the country on a beautiful paved highway; the old farm buildings had disappeared and been replaced by new modern structures; electric lights, of course, and telephones were everywhere; and the only things which were virtually the same were the fields; yet even the fields were a little different because, unlike the scenes of my earlier days, in quite a number of fields one could see a little square surrounded by a wooden frame, in the middle of which was an oil derrick. These recollections, as I said, lead me to welcome with a great deal of pleasure the remarks of my honourable friend from Lumsden.

Second, with regard to my honourable friend from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette), I can only say that his two speeches, in the French and the English languages, were perfect alike in their form and their presentation. His remarkable performance in this respect led me to wish that more of our English people in Canada were able to emulate his performance of the other day.

I should like to add a few words to sup- and in a position to make a contribution, port the welcome that has been given to our three new senators. I can well understand their feelings. I remember clearly, although it happened quite a number of years ago, my own feelings on first taking my seat in this chamber—the realization that now one was a member of the Parliament of Canada however small, to the working of the parliamentary system in the democratic government which is the system we enjoy. I believe my honourable friends will find—in fact I am sure they have already found—that this is a very friendly body. They will also find that it is a most appreciative one, and that it welcomes the contributions of members from their experience and their wisdom, whether in the debates of this house or in the proceedings of the various committees. I look forward to the contributions which our new members will make in due course to our deliberations.

There is, perhaps, only one thing that I should add, and it is that my honourable friends will find, as with so many things in this life, that they will get out of this house just what they care to put into it. If they attend regularly, if they throw their minds into the common pool and do their best in influencing the judgment of the house on matters on which they have special knowledge, they will have the consciousness of a duty well performed.

I want to say a word to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I know that I am expressing the feelings of all members on this side of the house when I tell him how very much we appreciate the manner in which he conducts the proceedings of this body. He is unfailingly courteous, he is scrupulously fair, he is possessed of boundless good humour. Anything that he has to present to the Senate he prepares carefully and presents clearly, and if any of us require information he is always only too willing to supply it to us.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I have only one fault to find with my honourable friend the Leader of the Government. Let me put it this way: this, after all, is a political body. It is true that we do not engage in the excessive partisan proceedings of the other house, but we do have our own strongly held convictions which sometimes differ from those held by members on the other side of the house, and we have necessarily to express them. It is our duty so to do. Now, the fault that I have to find with the honourable Leader of the Government is that it is almost impossible to pick a quarrel with him. I have on occasion carefully prepared and fired across the floor of this house something that I thought was a pretty hot political shot. Well, my honourable friend has received it with a bland smile, with unruffled composure, and has lobbed it back to me over the floor of the chamber, so I have felt my shot was wasted and I have been baffled and frustrated.

I have almost given up hope of piercing through his serene good humour—I say I have almost given up hope, because I am bound to tell him that in dealing with some things this evening I shall have some rather severe comments to make upon the actions of the Government which he supports, and I am still not without hope that I may yet be able to rouse my honourable friend to do battle.

I come now to the Speech from the Throne. It is divided into two parts of very uneven length. The first part deals with international affairs, starting with the forthcoming visit of Her Majesty and Prince Philip, which we all so warmly look forward to. Then it goes on to refer to some of the important international problems of the day. With that part of the Speech I have no quarrel whatsoever. I think, for instance, that its reference to the Berlin situation is wholly admirable.

It is when we come to the second and by far the longer part of the Speech from the Throne, the part dealing with the domestic affairs of the country, that I find I have some criticism to make of this Government. My basic criticism is this. It almost completely ignores what I think is the vital internal problem that confronts the country today, the problem of Government finance and the menace of inflation. I say "almost completely ignores", because it does, it is true, devote one-half sentence to that subject. It is a half sentence buried in a mass of much less important matter. I quote:

> They believe that as recovery proceeds there will be increasing need for care to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency.

This sentence is given the same relative importance, apparently, as other statements contained in adjacent parts of the Speech in which, for example, it is suggested that amendments be made to the Seeds Act, and that the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act is to be brought up for review.

Honourable senators, this one trifling sentence contains all, apparently, that the Government has to say about the most difficult and the most dangerous problem that we face today. I propose to review the financial record of the Government since it came into office, and if possible to throw some light upon the results that that record is likely to have in the not too distant future.

As a starting point perhaps I may be allowed to discuss a matter to which I made a brief reference in this house last August, the conversion loan of last July. Let me first outline the situation which existed at that time. There were then five Victory Loans outstanding—the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth—and $6,400 million of bonds were outstanding under those five Victory Loans, all bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum. The fifth Victory Loan matured this year, the sixth will mature in 1960, the seventh in 1962, the eighth in 1963, and the ninth not till 1966.

With one or two exceptions that are not pertinent to what I have to say, the holders of these bonds were invited—they were indeed urged—to convert their existing bonds either into 3¼ per cent bonds due 1965, into 4¼ per cent bonds due 1972 or into 4½ per cent due 1983. I have the figures here of the actual conversions effected as of mid-December as supplied by the Bank of Montreal to the Annual Commercial and Financial Supplement of the Montreal Gazette. Of the $6,400 million of Victory Loan bonds of these five issues outstanding, $5,800 million have been converted as follows: First, $1,050 million were converted into new 3 per cent bonds, due 1961. That offer was open only, as I recall it, to the holders of the Fifth and Sixth Victory Loans, and does not need to concern us further. Second, $1,265 million were converted into new 3¼ per cent bonds, due 1965. Third, $1,415 million were converted into new 4¼ per cent bonds, due 1972. Fourth, $2,070 million were converted into new 4½ per cent bonds, due 1983.

From those figures it is easy to calculate the increase in the annual interest charge that will be payable by taxpayers of this country. Roughly, it works out as follows: 1½ per cent extra on $2 billion equals $30 million; 1¼ per cent extra on $1½ billion equals $19 million; ¼ per cent extra on $1¼ billion equals $3 million—a total of $52 million a year. To that must be added for the current year $25 million for commissions paid to underwriters and bond houses who participated in distributing this issue to the public and in inducing the public to make the conversion. That was the figure given to us last August by my honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt); plus cash bonuses of a substantial amount offered to holders who converted into the longer term issues; plus an indefinite sum for a high pressure, country-wide campaign by advertisement and radio.

Now, I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that this whole conversion loan conception was an expensive blunder. It was true that you had your fifth Victory Loan falling due in 1959, and that in dealing with that it was probably also advisable to take into account and deal with the sixth Victory Loan falling due the following year. But why in the world it was thought fit to urge the holders of the seventh, eighth and ninth Victory Loans, which bore interest at only 3 per cent, and did not fall due for four, six and eight years respectively, that it was their patriotic duty to accept new 4¼ per cent or 4½ per cent bonds in place of their 3 per cent bonds, I am unable to conceive. What should have been done, what any normal government or any normal corporation would have done, would have been to wait until a reasonably short time before the maturity date of each of these issues, and then, depending upon market conditions at the time, offer to the holders of that issue a conversion into a new issue, either short or long term, or a combination of the two. What has actually been done by this famous conversion operation is to saddle the country with an increased annual debt charge of $50 million for many years to come, by far the larger part of which was totally unnecessary at this time.

There was one further criticism that I made last summer, and which I now repeat. If it was necessary to offer Government bonds yielding as high a rate as 4½ per cent for as long a term as 25 years, then provision should have been made to allow the Government to redeem the bonds prior to maturity, if necessary at a premium. As it is, they cannot be paid off until they mature in 1983, and all future Governments are condemned to go on paying this high interest rate for the next 25 years, no matter how low interest rates may fall during that period.

There is a previous experience along that line which the Government ought to have borne in mind. In the early 1920's the Canadian National Railways made a number of bond issues guaranteed by the Government for substantial amounts, bearing interest at rates varying between 4½ per cent and 5½ per cent—most of them at five per cent—maturing in 25 or 30 years and not redeemable before maturity. The last of those issues was only paid off two or three years ago. The fact that those bonds were not redeemable was bitterly regretted later on, time and time again, during the intervening years, when interest rates went down to 3 per cent or lower. Those bonds might then have been redeemed and paid off, even at a substantial premium, at a great saving in interest to the Canadian National Railways; but it could not be done; the conditions of the bonds did not permit it. Now this Government has repeated the same mistake with the conversion loan, but on an immensely larger scale.

There is one side result of this conversion loan, an incidental result, perhaps, but a serious one nevertheless. The issue of these conversion loan bonds bearing 4½ per cent interest for 25 years has put a tag of 4½ per cent upon long-term borrowings by the federal Government for years to come. That was done last summer at a time when similar long-term bonds of our provincial governments and municipalities were selling on a basis of around 4½ per cent themselves. The inevitable result has been to raise the cost of borrowed money to our provinces and municipalities for the future.

I want to be perfectly fair, and I will say that in the last six months there has been a general increase in interest rates, part of which would no doubt have taken place whether there had been a conversion loan or not, but there is no doubt whatever that the conversion loan has added to the upward pressure. You can see the result if you look at the financial pages of any newspaper today. Today our provinces and municipalities have to pay higher interest rates for borrowed money than at any time in the last 25 years. Within the last three weeks the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have had to raise money on an interest basis of nearly 5½ per cent. Some of the smaller municipalities in Quebec have had to go up to 6 per cent, and the story has been the same for our public utilities. Last December the Bell Telephone Company put out a substantial issue of bonds and they had to offer them at an interest rate higher than it has ever been in the whole history of their company.

That is tight money with a vengeance. Remember, we look to our provinces and our municipalities to provide us with the new roads, new schools, new power plants, and new public conveniences of every kind, which are desperately needed in various parts of the country. Today it is more difficult and more expensive to finance these than at any time in the recent past. We all remember the outcry about the iniquity of tight money that was raised two years ago by the present Minister of Finance at a time when his predecessor, the Honourable Walter Harris, was in office, and when there was a slight stiffening in money rates. I do not propose to quote the adjectives and epithets hurled at the Honourable Walter Harris at that time, but I do say that the present Government, by its actions in connection with the conversion loan, has contributed by no small extent to tighter money and higher interest rates for our provinces and our municipalities than has been known in the country for many years past.

I repeat, and this summarizes this section of my remarks, that in my opinion the conversion loan was an expensive blunder.

I would like to turn to a general consideration of the problem of public finance as it faces us today. The Minister of Finance estimates that his budget deficit for the current year, the fiscal year ending March 31, will be of the order of $700 million. It is generally admitted, I think, that that estimate is on the low side. Some have estimated it as high as $1,000 million. It certainly will be $1,000 million if you add to the $700 million estimated by the Minister of Finance the more than $200 million which he is taking out of the military equipment fund and which is a non-recurring item that he will never be able to take again. But however you look at it, it will be the largest peacetime budgetary deficit in the history of the country.

It might be interesting to inquire how this deficit has come about. Part of it at least is due to the recession, which we all hope has been temporary, and which now shows encouraging signs of passing away. But there are other parts of it for which this Government is itself directly responsible.

In the first place let me refer to the session of the autumn of 1957, which some of us here remember so well. That was the session in which this Government tried to carry out, inadequately and in part, it is true, the extravagant promises which it had made to the electors in the election of the previous summer. In this house we had to consider measure after measure of what were, to put it bluntly, handouts to various sections of the population. We on this side of the house asked for estimates or a budget showing the cost of these measures and their effect upon the finances of the country, but we were refused. Taken as a whole these measures represent additional annual expenditures of about $200 million.

In the second place, there were the tax reductions of December 1957 which reduced the taxes payable by the people of this country by an estimated total of $200 million for the current year. I suppose that can be set down to another attempt to fulfil election promises.

In the third place, there is the conversion loan, of which I have already spoken. The increased interest charges which that loan has brought about, if only for a part of the current year, plus all the commissions and other expenses, must account for at least another $50 million, and I should not be surprised if the true figure is more like $100 million.

So, to summarize, the three items of the budget deficit for which this Government is directly responsible are: 1. $200 million additional expenditures to redeem election promises; 2. $200 million of tax reductions, also to redeem election promises; 3. Up to $100 million for the conversion loan which it should not have undertaken. The result is the largest peacetime budget deficit in the history of this country.

I am sure that some of my honourable colleagues remember their Dickens, and they will recall the character of Mr. Micawber in David Copperfield. It is said, with what truth I do not know, that Dickens drew the character of Micawber from his own father. Mr. Micawber's finances, you will remember, were in a state of disorder. In that respect he reminds me of the present Government. Mr. Micawber was always looking for "something to turn up" to get him out of his difficulties, but even Mr. Micawber had gleams of sober common sense. Let me quote to the house his famous advice to David Copperfield:

> "My other piece of advice, Copperfield," said Mr. Micawber, "you know. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen, nineteen and six, result happiness; annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds 0 and six, result misery. The blossom is blighted, the leaf is withered, the God of day goes down upon the dreary scene, and—and in short you are forever floored. As I am!"

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Would the honourable senator permit one question? Is he aware that the United States has been budgeting for a deficit for the last 20 years and there is not very much misery in the United States?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I will answer my honourable friend in just a moment. Before doing so I want to direct this piece of elementary wisdom of Mr. Micawber to the attention of the present Government.

My honourable friend from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) referred to the United States. It is perfectly true that there is a deficit in the United States in the current fiscal year of $12 billion as compared with our $1 billion, but I direct these three facts to the attention of my honourable friend.

First of all, the gross national product of the United States is between 16 and 17 times that of this country, so the United States is much more able to stand a deficit of $12 billion than we are a deficit of $1 billion.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Just one and a quarter times as able as we are.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Will my honourable friend permit me to continue?

The second thing is that the Government of the United States, realizing the seriousness of the situation, has produced a budget for the coming year which they expect to be in balance.

And the third thing I want to tell my honourable friend is this: when he compares the budget of this country with that of the United States he must bear in mind that as my honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) said last week, over 50 per cent of the budget of the United States goes in defence—in the defence of this country, of the United States and all members of the free world, against communist aggression.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That, of course, has nothing to do with what you are stating.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: If my honourable friend wishes to compare the budget of Canada with that of the United States, and if we were spending proportionately the same amount of defence that the United States is spending, our budget deficit this year would be $2,000 million rather than $1,000 million. I suggest that my honourable friend reflect on those facts.

What is the actual financial situation in which the Government finds itself today? There is a deficit for the current year ending March 31 of anything up to $1,000 million.

The Canada Tax Foundation, of which my honourable friend from Winnipeg-South is a very prominent member—I think in fact he was president of it, was he not?—estimates that the deficit for the next financial year will be at least $1,000 million. It further estimates that if present policies continue there is no prospect of a balanced budget for years to come.

Two things are perfectly clear: First—and here I speak with some personal knowledge—the financial community has become profoundly disturbed at the position that is developing; and, second, the bond buyers of Canada are becoming more and more reluctant to buy the bonds of the Government of Canada. My leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) referred to that fact in his speech a few days ago, but I propose to develop it a little further.

I would like honourable senators to take a look with me at the three public financing operations which this Government has undertaken during the last six months, apart from the last issue of Canada savings bonds in the fall of last year. I have already mentioned the conversion loan. What has happened to the holders of Victory Bonds who, at the urging of the Government, have converted their 3 per cent bonds at par into new bonds bearing interest at 4¼ or 4½ per cent? Within a few weeks the market value of these new bonds dropped from par to as low as 94. Currently they are quoted at about 95 to 96. The holders of these new bonds have suffered in these few months a capital loss of $175 million.

The second piece of public financing was a short-term loan for $600 million of one- and two-year bonds, brought out in September; $400 million of that loan was a refunding operation and $200 million was new money. The only thing worthy of note about that issue was that as soon as it had been brought out the market price of the bonds fell to a discount from the price at which they had been sold, and has remained at a discount ever since.

The third piece of public financing was an offering of $400 million of bonds later in December as follows: $300 million of one-year bonds bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum; and $100 million of four-year bonds, bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum. The history of this last offering is really quite instructive. First, there was the usual misleading announcement by the Minister of Finance, that the loan was a brilliant success; second, the market quotations for the bonds immediately dropped from the price at which they had been offered, and has remained steadily at a discount ever since; and third, the banks and finance houses which had underwritten the issue found that the bonds were left on their hands. The public showed great reluctance to buy them, and it took weeks before they could be disposed of to permanent investors; in fact, I doubt whether that process is finished yet. For a loan issued by the Dominion Government, that is a quite unheard-of thing.

That is the history of the last three issues of Government bonds made during the past six months. To say the least, it is not encouraging. What inducement has a man to invest in a new Government bond issue when he is as certain as he can be that his bond will fall to a discount immediately after he invests his money?

It is common knowledge that the Government will have to raise many hundreds of millions of new money during the next few months to cover its deficit and to meet its other obligations. The question is, in the light of this history that I have mentioned, how is it going to do it?

In the light of that history, and as the market stands today, I venture the statement that the Government cannot go into the market to borrow the savings of the people today unless it offers interest rates substantially higher than any it has offered before, and that will have the effect of raising general money rates even higher than they are at the present.

Well, if the Government cannot borrow the savings of the people, what is the alternative? The Government has to pay its bills; it has to raise money by some means or other. When tax revenues are insufficient, as they are, and when the public refuses to lend its savings by buying Government bonds, there is only one alternative. That alternative is easy, but dangerous. The Government gets the money out of the banking system. It issues its bonds or notes to the Bank of Canada or to one of the chartered banks, and has that bank credit its account accordingly, against which it can draw cheques to cover its expenses. It creates credit for itself out of thin air, just as if a man without a cent to his name wrote a cheque in his own favour for $1,000, took it to the nearest bank, got the bank to credit him with the amount, and proceeded to draw cheques against it. It is as simple as that.

That, honourable senators, is the historic road to inflation. Surely I do not need to enlarge upon it. It is a fact that everybody knows, and it would be a work of supererogation for me to develop it any further.

If honourable senators want any further information I would direct them to the Monthly Letter of the First National City Bank of New York—I think one of the largest, if not the largest, bank in the United States —for the month of December. That Monthly Letter discusses the various ways in which inflation can come about. It says quite categorically that the most infallible way by which the danger of inflation is created is for the Government to borrow from its bank of issue, which in this country is the Bank of Canada, and make that bank create new credit or currency to the extent of its borrowings.

I should like to quote one sentence from an entirely different source, but precisely in the same sense. I receive every now and again in Ottawa—and I think other honourable senators receive it too—a little four-page newspaper called the Rural Scene, a journal of opinion published by the John Atkins Publishing Company in Midland, Canada. It contains a lot of very sound, common sense, expressed in very few words. In the issue of the Rural Scene of mid-January I find these two sentences which, with leave, I will quote to the house:

> But when the Bank of Canada is buying Government bonds and is issuing new, unbacked money to pay for them, and the Government is then using that money to meet its obligations, every dollar so spent absorbs value from the hard earned savings of the people as well as their current wages and salaries. When this situation develops, as it is doing now, somebody has to do something about it to save us from disaster.

Honourable senators, the process that I have been describing has already begun in this country. During the last year this Government, to meet its obligations, has borrowed a great deal more money than it has been able to get from the savings of the people, and it has done so by creating credit for itself out of the banking system in the precise way that I have described. I propose to endeavour to prove that statement, and at the same time to enlarge upon the remarks I made a few minutes ago to the effect that the people of Canada are beginning to refuse to invest in Government bonds, and at the same time to deal with a statement made by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on that subject when he spoke last week. His statement was to the effect that the general public holdings of market issues increased between September and January last to the sum of $499 million. The honourable leader added:

> It does not look to me, therefore, as though the public were running away from our bonds.

That statement of the honourable leader is perfectly true in itself, but it does not tell by any means the whole story; and, taken by itself, it is, as I hope to show him, completely misleading as to the actual circumstances today.

I have in my hand a single sheet which is issued every week by the Bank of Canada. This sheet gives details of certain Government statistics for the week in question and compares them with the corresponding week of the preceding year. The statement is dated January 21, 1959, and the comparison is with the week ended January 22, 1958. It includes Government of Canada securities outstanding at each of these times, and which are divided into three classes: treasury bills, Canada Savings Bonds, and all other direct and guaranteed securities. Of these three the third is by far the largest item. When you talk of treasury bills and of Canada Savings Bonds you are not really referring to the things we call bonds at all. Treasury bills are short-term things payable in 30 or 60 or 90 days; and Canada Savings Bonds, as honourable senators know, can be turned in for cash at any time. Canada Savings Bonds are really only an extension of the banking system. Instead of depositing his money in a bank a man buys a Canada Savings Bond, which gives him a little higher interest return, but he can cash in his savings bond in precisely the same way as he can go into a bank and draw a cheque from his deposit. These are the three items shown in this statement. Then it goes on to show who holds these different kinds of securities. It indicates those which are held by the Bank of Canada, those held by the chartered banks, those held on Government account—a small item—and those held by the general public; and it subdivides the holdings of the general public into Canada Savings Bonds, treasury bills, and other securities.

What does this statement disclose as to the present situation? The first thing it shows is that in this one year the total of Canadian Government securities outstanding has increased by $1,388 million—pretty good for one year, honourable senators. The second thing it shows is this: the general public has increased its holdings. Yes, it has increased its holdings of Canada Savings Bonds by $268 million and its holdings of treasury bills by $164 million, which together make nearly the figure my honourable friend mentioned. But coming to the real bonds, the permanent investments in the country represented by what we refer to as bonds, we have this situation: during the year this Government issued a total of new bonds in the amount of $1,190 million; and of that total how much do you suppose the public has taken? Twenty-eight millions. The remainder has been taken by the Bank of Canada and by the chartered banks. That is precisely the process that I pointed out to the house a few minutes ago, a process by which the Government creates credit for itself out of thin air.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Has the honourable senator the figures for September 1?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. I do not know what change there has been. It may have been worse on September 1, or it may have been better. This is just the comparison for the period January 1958 to January 1959.

I said a few moments ago that the financial community is profoundly disturbed at the present situation. I want to say a word or two more about that. I need only refer to statements made by the presidents of every one of our chartered banks at the annual meetings of their shareholders within the last few months. Without exception, I believe, every one of them has drawn attention to the danger that inflation may come to this country if budgetary conditions are not improved.

But there is another class of financial house, and it is with one of these that I now wish to deal. Probably honourable senators have heard of Greenshields & Company Limited, a very well-known financial and underwriting house, having their head office in Montreal and with branches in many parts of the country. They issue from time to time to their clients a four or five-page publication headed Current Notes; and I have in my hand their issue of this publication for January 19, 1959. It starts off under the heading of "General Outlook", and for the first three or four pages it discusses the general prospects of trade in this country, and its outlook, its prognostication is moderately optimistic. It believes that the recession is lifting. It thinks that trade prospects are reasonably bright and it goes into quite a number of details in support of that view. In fact, this part of the document reads not unlike the speech last week of my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in its view of the general prospects of trade, except of course that it does not go into details about the price of hogs in Saskatoon. But when, further on in this document, it begins to discuss monetary questions and budget prospects, the tone changes very appreciably. First, it refers to the fear of inflation, and comments on the fact that as a result of this fear a large number of people are getting out of bonds and investing in equities, and it goes on to mention the really remarkable and unprecedented result which has come about, that the yields on many first-rate stocks today, based on the dividends that they pay, are less than the yields on many first-rate bonds. Then it refers to the 1958 Canada Savings Bonds issue of last November, I think it was, and it says that that was quite a success, but it adds:

> It seems that under present conditions the public would be unlikely to take up a similar amount of Government financing without receiving the privilege of redeeming their securities at par at any time through the maturity, which is a feature of the Canada Savings Bonds.

That, of course, is why those figures I disclosed a few moments ago show that while the public are at present willing to take up Canada Savings Bonds which they can cash at any time, or 30-day to 90-day treasury notes, they are becoming increasingly unwilling to take long-term bonds.

Then this market letter goes on to refer to the issue of $400 million in Government bonds offered last December, which I mentioned a few moments ago. It has this to say, and I quote:

> The whole bond market turned easier when it became apparent that a large part of these issues remained with investment dealers.

That is precisely what I said a few minutes ago.

Then it concludes with a paragraph which I am going to quote:

> The deficit for the 1958 fiscal year is not yet covered and, although six months will elapse before the next refunding, further borrowing prior to that time appears necessary. The Minister of Finance, in an address delivered in Toronto early in January, stated that the Government is pledged to achieve a sustained rate of growth in terms of employment, development of resources and the maintenance of the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, but he disappointed many observers by failing to describe plans for achieving these objectives which by their nature may be irreconcilable.

Irreconcilable, of course, because you cannot promise all sorts of capital expenditures leading to inflation, and at one and the same time preserve the value of the Canadian dollar. Then it goes on with this final sentence:

> If the Government is to finance its deficits other than through inflationary borrowing from the banking system, then a clear statement of policy and implementation of that policy by the Bank of Canada becomes desirable.

That is a clear indication, in very moderate language, of the distrust and of the alarm for the future which is pervading the financial world today. That is the present situation as I see it. On the one hand you have a Government faced with an enormous budget deficit brought about largely, though not wholly, by its own actions, and needing large sums of money to carry on the business of the country in addition to what it can raise by way of taxation. On the other hand, you have an investing public which, to put it mildly, is showing clear signs of losing confidence in Government securities. As a result you have the real danger that the Government will be forced, as it has already been to a degree, to adopt the measure of inflationary financing that I have described.

If that situation is not remedied, if the Government goes on creating $1,000 million of new credits for itself each year, as it is doing now, the result is foreseeable. Our dollar will quickly decline in value and inflation will be upon us. I do not pretend, and no one can, to predict accurately when that will come about. It might be next month or it might be next year or a year later. Other factors may come into the picture which will have the effect of delaying it or indeed there may be factors which will hasten its arrival. It might be that if there was a tremendous upsurge in the economy of this country in the next year or two, the whole of this increased credit could be absorbed without trouble but that, I think, is altogether too much to expect. All that one can say with certainty is that the conditions for inflation are there, and that sooner or later inflation will surely come unless those conditions are dealt with.

That, honourable senators, is the situation as it exists today. How will it be solved? Well, there is one way in which it will not be solved. It will not be solved by any apocalyptic dream or vision of the Prime Minister. Indeed, the only reference that the Prime Minister has made so far to this vital problem in his speech on the Address in the other house is rather disturbing. He said, in effect, that he would be quite willing to run the risk of inflation in order to help unemployment. Surely that is putting the cart before the horse. Think what inflation, if it comes, will do to the people of this country. It will hurt every wage earner. It will hurt every pensioner. It will hurt everyone who has a savings account in a bank. It will hurt everyone who has an insurance policy. It will hurt everyone who holds a bond or mortgage or a debt claim of any kind. It will hurt everyone who has put by his savings for a rainy day or for his old age. In other words, it will hurt the vast majority of the people of this country.

I suggest that a far truer estimate of the situation than the observation of the Prime Minister is to be found in the statements of two men, leaders in their respective fields in this country. First of all there is the president of the Royal Bank, Mr. James Muir, who in his address to his shareholders on January 8 said this:

> Chronic inflation is the greatest single threat to Canada's economic development.

And only last Thursday the president of one of the largest of our life insurance companies, the Canada Life, Mr. E. C. Gill, told his shareholders at their annual meeting:

> Inflation is a greater danger in Canada today than communism, depression or unemployment, and may bring these and other evils in its train.

To me the Prime Minister's remark is as if a man were to say to himself, "I am going to cure this toothache, even though the remedy I employ makes a drug addict of me for the rest of my life."

To my mind there are only two ways in which the situation will be resolved. There is the hard way and there is the soft way. The hard way will take a great deal of political courage. It involves strict rationing of your expenditures and increasing your taxes with a firm and announced resolve to balance the budget within one, two or three years.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? Would higher taxes increase the burden on the little man more than inflation?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: They didn't in wartime, and I do not see why they should in peacetime. If you are working toward an objective to get back to a sound economy that is the only way, to my mind, in which the Government will restore the confidence of the investor.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Did Mr. Muir say that?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am saying that.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: But why didn't he say that?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, he is not responsible for my speech. That is the only way to my mind in which the Government can restore the confidence of the investor, which is now so sadly and obviously frittering away—the only way in which it can remove his fear of inflation and induce him once more to invest in Government securities.

On the other hand, there is the soft way, and of course it is the easy way. It can be summed up in one sentence. Go on as you are going now. Promise all things to all men, and spend the public money on every scheme which you think will appeal to the electors. When tax moneys run out and when you cannot borrow the savings of the people, create credit for yourself through the Bank of Canada and let the danger of inflation increase day by day.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: After us the deluge.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: After us the deluge, yes.

The Government will have to decide between these two policies, and it will have to decide pretty soon. It is difficult to discover from its public statements just what its policy is. On the one hand, you have this half sentence of pious platitudes in the Speech from the Throne. On the other hand, you have such things as, for instance, the speech made last Thursday by the Minister of Public Works in the other house, promising many millions of dollars worth of new expenditures for public works in various parts of the country.

I can understand the difficulties under which this Government labours. It was returned to power on promises of enormous expenditures of public money in every direction. It has been sustained since on dreams or visions of great developments in the north country and elsewhere involving further great expenditures. It will be difficult for it to change its tune, and yet it is a conservative Government, at least in name. I suggest to them that in managing the financial affairs of this country the time has come for them to be a conservative Government in fact as well as in name.

I cannot avoid the suspicion, honourable senators, that on this really vital question the Government has developed no fixed policy, that it is merely floating with the tide, and, like Mr. Micawber, "waiting for something to turn up". But I warn this Government, if by its policy, or lack of policy, it allows inflation to take a firm grip on this country, with all the dire results that will ensue, it will have a formidable account to settle with the people of Canada some day.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, may I first compliment the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) on the eloquence of their speeches on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I also wish to congratulate the honourable gentleman from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) on the outstanding appointment which he has just received.

In my humble way, I extend my welcome to the new senators who have joined us in this chamber. As an Albertan, I especially welcome the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Buchanan). He and his family have made a great contribution to the welfare of this land that we all love so much.

Briefly, honourable senators, I wish to speak of the immense resources of the province of Alberta. I do this because I find in the Speech from the Throne a statement to the effect that a National Energy Board will be appointed. I assume this board will have wide control of the oil and gas industry, that it will control the export and financing of these resources which are in the hands of various oil and gas companies, and I hope a market will be found for the production which has been accumulating over the last two or three years. I also hope that it will be able to take into consideration not only the proven reserves, but also the prospective findings, because the report issued by the Oil and Gas Conservation Board, and an excellent book written by Professor Eric Hanson, of the University of Alberta, entitled The Dynamic Decade, point out that vast quantities of these fossil fuels can be found in Alberta. We hope that the control of them will not be so strict as to hamper development unduly.

Before 1946 the economy of Alberta was very simple. People lived on farms and ranches; they did not crowd into the cities; they did the work by hand, and by using horses; the population remained pretty stationary. In the decade after 1946 there was great development. It was called a dynamic decade because of the increased development of the petroleum industry. Petroleum is a hydrocarbon, which in its liquid state is called crude oil, and in its gaseous state, natural gas. Of course, the liquid can be changed into gasoline, lubricants and fuel oil. Gas can be transferred through pipes for long distances and, as propane, exported to foreign countries. Great quantities of these substances are found in the sedimentary rock. Geologists tell us that every few million years the oceans and rivers dry up, that there is a change in the surface of the earth, and that new oceans, new rivers, new continents are formed. It seems that oil and gas are evolved from animal material, particularly marine life. Huge prehistoric creatures rest in the bottom of the oceans that were and become surrounded with vegetable matter and sediment; then, with the heaving, buckling, tilting and folding of the earth's surface, they become embedded deep beneath the surface, and the pressure and the chemical changes of that organic material form the gas and the liquid oil which can be found there. Now if that explanation appeals to you it will be quite apparent that these products, gas, oil and coal, are wasting products. There is only so much of them there, and when they are exhausted, there is no more. That certainly is the situation in our generation and will be for many years to come.

Let us take coal, for instance. There are wide seams of coal underlying the prairies, the foothills and mountains in the southern part of the province of Alberta. It is estimated that 48 billion tons of it are there, which is about half of the mineable coal in the whole dominion of Canada. During the last 50 years about 6 million tons per year have been mined, and even if that figure were 10 million tons there is coal enough there to last for 2,000 years. The quality of the coal varies from lignite to types of semi-anthracite, and it is located between 1,000 to 2,000 feet beneath the surface. The collieries are well equipped with modern machinery, so the man-hour production is about the same as that of other places on the continent, yet they are in need of assistance. Even today three of the large collieries are closed down, and as a result there is a lot of unemployment.

Coal is a valuable fuel; it is the most stable of fuels and the least likely to be damaged by enemy action. It is used in the steel and iron industry; it is used as coke; chemicals can be taken from this coal, and altogether it is of great value to the country. It has been suggested that gradually some of the deep, dark dangerous mines in the east might be closed down and the coal from Alberta used where it is in plentiful supply. It does seem very unreasonable to go a mile or two beneath the Atlantic Ocean for coal when there is so much of it right handy there in Alberta.

A thousand barrels of oil is quite a large quantity, but today and yesterday and every day the operators are allowed to take 413,000 barrels of oil up to the surface in order to make use of it. The Premier of the province of Alberta says that twice this amount can be taken without diminishing the supply, and it is stated that even a million barrels could be taken out without depleting the supply. More will be discovered, so that at the end of 30 years there would still be a surplus of about 12,000 million barrels. These tremendous quantities are almost beyond our imagination.

Then, there is the third fuel, natural gas. There is some romance connected with the finding of natural gas. It was discovered first in the Medicine Hat field. From certain surface signs people there thought there might be gas beneath the surface, so they voted some money and borrowed a rig from the Canadian Pacific Railway and drilled. They got down a thousand feet and their money was all gone, but the mayor advised that they go down a little deeper; so they went down another ten feet, then there was a terrific blast which sent the equipment flying far and wide. It was early in the morning when that happened, and the tremendous roar awakened all the people. Some oldtimers in that locality still recall seeing the mayor beating it down the street half dressed, with his braces tagging along at his heels, to find out what had happened.

Since that time, of course, gas has been discovered in many places and in large quantities. By 1909 it was piped to such cities as Calgary and Lethbridge. For half a century now that gas has been used almost entirely for heating, and the people would not use anything else. They are not a bit afraid of it. Accidents may occur very rarely, but they are due to carelessness. Gas has proven itself to be a splendid fuel and the people of Alberta thought so much about it that in 1953 the province passed the Natural Gas Preservation Act to ensure that not one cubic foot of gas would be exported from Alberta until the people of the province were assured of a supply for the next 30 years.

The proven reserves of natural gas at present amount to 23.7 trillion cubic fee and it is estimated that the Trans-Canada Pipe line in the next 30 years will use about 7 trillion cubic feet. That is almost beyond belief. I find in the report of the Oil and Gas Conservation Board that the estimate given to the Borden Royal Commission indicates that the total requirements of the Trans-Canada Pipe line for the next 25-year period will amount to 7.1 trillion cubic feet. Suppose the people of Alberta used about 8 trillion cubic feet in that time, and perhaps some other pipe lines required 3 trillion cubic feet: there you have 18 trillion cubic feet.

So, at the end of 30 years the reserves of the gas would be 5.7 trillion cubic feet, except for one thing and that is prospective discoveries. We do hope that the National Energy Board will take these prospective discoveries into consideration because they are almost beyond belief.

For instance, there are no such things as ghost towns spoken of now, towns that have been deserted because the gas has petered out. Some of the pipe line companies say they are short of gas, but it is not because the gas is not available. It is because they have not contracted for enough area, because if the wells are spaced out they will always get the gas.

There are other reasons for believing that during the next 25 or 30 years the reserves of gas, new quantities discovered, will be about 2.5 trillion cubic feet per year, so that at the end of 30 years the reserve will not be 5.7 trillion cubic feet but will be 75 to 80 trillion cubic feet.

There are about four ways in which that figure is reached. One of them is by making a comparison with the United States, where they have been using natural gas for a long time and where pipe lines have been laid all through that country. There the reserves have been gradually increasing, and at the present time they have 212 trillion cubic feet in reserve. Secondly, there are some very wealthy companies in Canada interested in the petroleum business—the British American Oil Company, the Imperial Oil Company, and so on. Those companies have invested millions of dollars in the industry, and they are convinced that huge quantities of gas and oil will be discovered. In fact, one of the head men in one of the large companies said he was convinced that within the next 25 years 100 trillion cubic feet of gas would be discovered in the west. The companies have already put up their money, and it stands by, awaiting the development.

The Canadian Petroleum Association views the problem in a little different light. They determine by geological means an estimate of what the reserves will be. They estimate there are 340,000 cubic miles of sedimentary rock beneath the surface of the province of Alberta. Each cubic mile produces 30,000 to 50,000 barrels of oil, and each barrel of oil carries with it about 6,000 cubic feet of gas. So, if one is a mathematician, he can calculate that at the end of 30 years there will be approximately 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in reserve. If we arrive at the result by a statistical method we find it works this way: In the past 10 years 4,198 wildcat wells have been drilled; on the average, each wildcat well has produced about 6 billion cubic feet of gas. That means that the 4,000-odd wells produced 23.7 trillion cubic feet of gas. It is altogether likely that if sufficient encouragement is given there will be each year about 400 wildcat wells drilled, and if each well produces 6 billion cubic feet of gas, we will have 2½ trillion cubic feet added to the supply each year.

Looking at it another way, there are in this area 200,000 square miles. If one test well is put down for every 10 square miles, which is considered necessary to explore the country properly, there will be 20,000 wells. That again indicates that at the end of 30 years there will be something in the neighbourhood of 100 trillion cubic feet of obtainable reserves.

There is another factor to be considered, namely, that progress marches on. There was a time when wood was the chief fuel; then wood as a fuel was replaced by coal. Today that too has been replaced in western Canada by oil and gas. The time may come when gas and oil will be replaced by another type of fuel. We have in this country a good supply of uranium, and it is possible that atomic energy produced by the burning of uranium will be used for domestic and commercial purposes. The development of fission reactors may well bring about this change. Also, thermo-nuclear reactors capable of burning heavy hydrogen may be developed. But even if these advances come about, a certain amount of gas and oil will no doubt be required. As I have said, the situation is not too hopeful, because these commodities can be produced in greater quantities today than the markets for them demand. There are, however, two hopeful developments: one is that Venezuela has recently put a tax on oil, which may have the effect of increasing the price and making it possible for us to compete in the oil market; secondly, more efficient methods of operation are being developed by producers.

However, upon a review of the records available to me, the lowest estimate of the amount of reserve of gas at the end of 30 years is about 51 trillion cubic feet. The Trans-Canada Pipe Line, which is 30 inches in diameter, is capable of carrying a heavy flow of gas. But it would take 220 years for 51 trillion cubic feet to flow through that pipe line.

There are in this country abattoirs which, we are told, process every part of the hog but the squeal. This utilization is true also of the natural gas industry. At Pincher Creek, Alberta, the British American Oil Company in its gas processing operation produces daily some 675 molten tons of sulphur. Canada uses a lot of sulphur; as a matter of fact, one nitro-chemical industry uses 135 tons every day, and about 400,000 tons are imported annually into Canada. Sulphur is used extensively by some of our largest industries, including pulp and paper, mining and agriculture. If more sulphur processing plants were developed, we would soon be self-sustaining in that field.

Natural gas, besides containing sulphur, contains butane, propane and methane. Butane, for instance, is used in the manufacture of synthetic rubber, plastics and insecticides. I am sure many honourable senators have travelled across western Canada by train and by automobile, and have noticed beside the homes on the prairie a large cylinder shaped container of propane gas which is used for many purposes such as heating, lighting, pumping the churn, rocking the baby and so on.

The petro-chemical industry offers great opportunities for development in this country. If it can be developed, as reports seem to indicate, it will mean great things for the future of the province of Alberta and for the dominion of Canada. Extension of the industry would mean the setting up of 15 or 20 more processing plants; the Government would benefit by many millions of dollars in royalties; it would promote the permanent employment of perhaps 10,000 persons; it would give oil companies an opportunity to realize something from their investments, and in all it would mean production which might well help to curb the inflation problem to some extent.

Honourable senators, these are days of new discoveries, new inventions and rapid changes. The obligation has fallen upon the people of this generation to search diligently for the truth, to be the true custodians of the great resources which Providence has provided. This generation must not yield either to stampede or stupor. They must be neither misers nor wasteful spenders, but they must decide what to do with the assets they have in the light of the available knowledge which the age affords.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I notice on the Order Paper for tomorrow there is the second reading of Bill S-6, to confirm an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves. Does the honourable Leader of the Government intend to proceed with that tomorrow?

HON. CAIRINE R. WILSON

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called may I direct your attention to the fact that one of the most highly respected members of this body is celebrating her birthday today. I am sure all of you will join with me in wishing her—the Honourable Senator Wilson—many very happy returns of the day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, I hoped that my birthday would perhaps escape recognition, because I did not see the Montreal Gazette this morning; but I am very grateful to you for your good wishes. The newspaper, very considerately, always omits the age of the female so recognized. However, when one is a great grandmother one is not quite so diffident. I have been here a very long time; in fact I am now third on the list of seniority; and I can only hope that I won't attain the first place! Thank you all.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, may I join other honourable senators who have spoken in this debate in an expression of welcome and congratulation to the three new senators who entered this house a few days ago. I have known them for quite a number of years. I confess that prior to the present time I knew the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins) only as a lawyer, having met him from time to time at meetings of the Canadian Bar Association. As members of this chamber are aware, particularly those who are members of my profession, the honourable senator has a great reputation for wit and brilliance of speech. I for one am awaiting an opportunity to hear him speak in this house.

In regard to the two senators from western Canada, I have been acquainted with them and, indeed, I think I have been a close friend of theirs for a number of years. The honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Buchanan) worked with me throughout the years during times when our party was not in very good favour throughout Canada. Those were, of course, dull days indeed.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: For you.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is right, for us and, may I add, for Canada.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In regard to the honourable senator from Saskatoon (Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn), I am happy to say he comes from a city where I had occasion to live at least during the school term of the year for a period of seven years, and consequently we established a close friendship a long time ago. So I do wish to join in the welcome that has been expressed by so many others to these gentlemen. As I said to them on the first day they were here, "I am sure that if you find nothing else in the Senate you will find unfailing courtesy and friendship on the part of every member of this house, no matter on which side he sits." At least, that has been my own experience.

May I also express my congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Naturally I was most interested at the remarks of the mover, knowing his province of Saskatchewan as I do. In regard to the speech made by the seconder, may I say I have real difficulty in trying to decide who is the more perfectly bilingual, the distinguished Speaker of this house or the seconder of the Address, the honourable senator from Ottawa East.

I was very much interested in the opening remarks in the speech made by my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and also in some of the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). Each suggested that in debate in the Senate there should not be the partisanship that is customary in the other house —in fact, that there should be no partisanship here. In consequence of that, I was most interested in reading quotations that were placed on Hansard from speeches made by the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen in, I believe, 1936, and an excerpt from a speech by the Honourable Senator Dandurand. I want to join in the view expressed last night by the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) that soft gloves should not be used here all the time; in fact, I think if we have good hard debate occasionally the Senate will be a much more interesting body than it otherwise would. So may I congratulate the honourable senator from Inkerman on his amazingly lucid and able speech. I wish I could do as well. His speech was political in nature, as I believe it had a right to be, although I shall refer to it in my remarks as being essentially advocacy. However, it was the most brilliant advocacy I have heard in this chamber since I have been a member here.

One reason I refer to it as advocacy is that I recollect using this term while I was sitting in my seat in New York last fall attending a meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Speaker was Mr. Krishna Menon of India. He spoke for about an hour or an hour and a quarter without a note, and after he was through I said to my associate on my right: "What brilliant advocacy. It is too bad there wasn't more real argument in it." For there is a difference between advocacy and what can correctly be called argument. When I was younger I delighted in reading biographies, especially those of such men as Sir Edward Marshall Hall and Sir Edward Carson. In respect to those gentlemen I think it is a fact that on occasions when they made their most brilliant bits of advocacy before juries their clients generally were hanged. So what I mean is this: advocacy can often espouse causes that are not very accurate. So I must say of the speech made last night by my honourable friend from Inkerman, it was a great speech but there were a few holes in it and I do want to pick on some of them.

Honourable senators, while we welcome discussion in regard to the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, my concern, and I am sure yours, is that speeches on this subject should not be unrealistic and unbalanced. I think my honourable friend's speech was somewhat unrealistic in regard to the monetary position of this country, and unbalanced in the respect that in dealing with the potential inflationary condition we all speak of, and that we indeed all know to be present in this country, made no mention of the tremendous pressure of costs and prices on this potentially inflationary condition.

The honourable senator's speech was divided essentially into two parts. One part dealt with the conversion loan operation which was carried out by the Minister of Finance last July. The other part dealt with the potentially inflationary situation that we face in this country at the present time.

Now, the honourable senator's argument in regard to the conversion loan was that it should not have been made because: (1) the brokerage and commission expense was too costly; (2) it adds an undue additional interest burden on Canada; and (3) it tends to increase interest rates for other borrowing.

May I just repeat, for the purpose of the record, what the honourable senator said in regard to the loans that were converted. They were five in number; they were all Victory loans—numbers 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9—and they totalled $6,416 million. The maturity dates, as indicated by the honourable senator, were between January 1, 1959 and September 1, 1966. Then, of course, as is well known to honourable senators, there are other loans in existence in Canada with maturity dates between January 1, 1959 and September 1, 1966, which however have not been converted.

I think the quick answer to the honourable senator's argument is somewhat as follows: (1) The conversion was the result of the combined judgment of (a) The Minister of Finance of Canada, Department of Finance permanent officials, the Governor and other officials of the Bank of Canada; (b) it was concurred in by a large group of the most knowledgeable financial people in Canada; and (c) I have failed to hear of a single serious criticism of this conversion operation from any chairman or president of any Canadian bank or from any head of an insurance company or other financial institution in Canada, or from any reputable economist; and although the honourable senator brings such witnesses as bank and insurance company presidents to his aid on other points, he does not do so in regard to the loan conversion operation.

May I add that I believe it is a fact that editorial opinion in Canada was very nearly unanimous in support of this conversion operation.

Now, within the large framework of the financial operations of the Government of Canada, despite the splendid advocacy of the honourable senator from Inkerman—though not necessarily based on logic, and that is why I use the words "splendid advocacy" rather than "splendid argument"—despite that advocacy, whose judgment should one take on this matter, that of the honourable senator, or that of the group of financial men that I referred to a moment ago, and indeed of Canadians generally?

What about the interest rate on the new bonds—is it too high? Is the fact of the coupon rate attached to these bonds a reason for borrowings by others being done at an unduly high rate? When I say "borrowings by others" I refer to the fact, as the honourable senator alleged, that as a result of the conversion operation other people were compelled to borrow at higher rates than otherwise and therefore that the conversion operation had a tendency to increase interest rates in Canada generally. What evidence is there that the rates in question are too high, and that they have the effect suggested, namely, of increasing interest rates to other borrowers in this country? The rate was, as is well known, 3 per cent on all the issues, and the average rate now is approximately 4 per cent; that is, there is an increased cost on this new borrowing of approximately 25 per cent.

There is absolute and positive evidence that the honourable senator's conclusion is wrong. It is this: the honourable senator referred to the United States, and argued that it was all right for the United States to do deficit financing, but all wrong for Canada to do so. Well, these are the traditional facts in regard to interest rates in Canada and in the United States. Rates on prime borrowings by governments or corporations have always been at least one-half per cent less in the United States than in Canada. Today's interest rates are high in Canada, but so are interest rates in the United States. The fact is that interest rates in the United States are today one-half per cent higher than they are in Canada, despite the fact that there was no conversion loan in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, you are wrong. You said higher; they are lower.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am sorry; I meant to say that the United States rates are lower, but they are still only one-half of one per cent lower than rates in Canada. The point of my argument is this that interest rates have risen in the United States proportionately to the rise in Canada; and there having been no conversion loan in the United States, such as we had in Canada, how can one argue that the result of the conversion loan in Canada has been to increase interest rates all around? I readily admit that interest rates have increased in Canada, but they have increased only to the same extent that they have increased in the United States. I think that is a fact of record which anyone can find out by calling a brokerage house, or even the Department of Finance here. The fact is that interest rates on this continent are higher than they were, conversion loan or no conversion loan. Surely this fact is so well known that anyone should be able to recognize the fallacy of the argument that the effect of the conversion loan was to artificially push up interest rates in Canada; and if this argument is found unworthy, then surely there is very little foundation left for the argument to the effect that the Government's monetary policies are on the verge of resulting in a runaway inflation in this country, at least for that reason.

My honourable friend also says that Canada will pay $50 million additional in interest rates as a result of the conversion. This estimate of course did not mean that that was the case for 1958, but it is a fact that Canada's interest bill is increased by approximately $50 million. However, I think we all know that certain conversions had to be made immediately in any event. As I understand it, $1 billion of the $6 billion had to be converted during the course of 1958. Other conversions would have had to follow in due course, so it is only a wild guess that, as a result of the conversion there may be any long-run cost whatsoever to Canada. That depends on the future of interest rates, and in a free economy, which I hope we will continue to maintain in Canada, I defy anyone, even the economists, to predict the course of interest rates during the next 10 to 25 years or even during the next seven years, which is the period in which all these loans would have required to be converted.

Now, in regard to the cost, it is true that a heavy cost was involved in this conversion but, after all, we must remember that that cost had to be absorbed at some time in any event, and on that it can be argued that the cost of doing a conversion of $6 billion is perhaps less than the cost of converting five different loans separately would have been, even though the conversions were done at the repective maturity dates of those loans.

So honourable senators, despite the views expressed last evening, it is my view, and I believe also the view of the vast majority of Canadians, that the conversion loan of 1958 is a stabilizing factor in our economy and as such is a prime factor in the undoubted economic recovery which is under way today.

I would like to deal now with the second major point which was made in the honourable senator's speech, namely, that the conversion loan operation and other deeds or misdeeds of the Government will have inflationary results, that we are now sitting on a powder keg of inflation and that a runaway inflation would be one of the worst evils that could befall us as a nation.

I hope it does not surprise honourable senators opposite to learn that except for the suggestion regarding the conversion loan I am roughly in agreement with the premises which I have stated, and which I believe are an accurate summary of those stated by the honourable senator last evening—except that I do not think we are on a powder keg, which phrase was indeed not used by the honourable senator. I agree too that runaway inflation would no doubt be an unmitigated evil for this country, and I think everybody, whether inside this chamber or outside it, now agrees on that point. But while my honourable friend did a lot of theorizing and speculating as to the future in regard to that problem I propose to look some facts in the face; and I do think that after we look those facts in the face we should not get as panicky about the problem as the honourable senator's speech made me, at least.

Since 1945 there has been on this continent a great deal of inflation. That degree of inflation is represented by an increase in living costs from an index of 100.0 in 1949 to 125.1 in 1958.

Honourable senators, I would like to place on the record the cost of living index figures issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I referred to the year 1949 as being at 100.0, but these figures go back to 1945. The index in that year was 75.0, and in 1946 it was 77.5; in 1947, 84.8; in 1948, 97.0; in 1949, 100.0; in 1950, 102.9; in 1951, 113.7; in 1952, 116.5; in 1953, 115.5; in 1954, 116.2; in 1955, 116.4; in 1956, 118.1; in 1957, 121.9; and in 1958, 125.1. Figures just released a few days ago for January 1959 establish the index at 126.1. I understand that these are the annual figures averaged for each of those years. As you can see, from 1945 to 1958 the cost of living index has gone up 50 per cent, which is essentially inflation.

Now, during 1958, as stated in the speech of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) here a few days ago, the increase in the cost of living was only 2.5 per cent. One might compare that with an increase of 21 per cent in the cost of living during the years 1946 to 1948. As we all now know, this inflation has resulted largely, if not wholly, from increases in wages, salaries, rents and generally higher costs of doing business, and these increases in costs have been inflationary to the extent that technology and improved production methods failed to keep pace with those rising costs.

I think everyone here is aware of what happened shortly after the war. Let us take the leader in the inflationary parade on this continent, which was unquestionably the United States Steel Corporation. Everyone will recall that for a period of some years after the war that company had recurring strikes or threats of strikes on its hands. In each case the demands of the unions were met—I am not criticizing that at all—but they were met not out of improved technology or methods of production, but out of increases in the price of steel. The inflationary round started with steel and coal in those years, and in due course the spiral continued until wages and costs have gone up as we know them today. With that we have had this tremendous increase in the cost of living, which is in effect inflation.

If anyone would like to pursue some of these matters, I commend the reading of Labour Research, a monthly bulletin published by the Research Department of the Canadian Labour Congress, the editor of which is Professor Eugene Forsey. I refer to a table contained on page 16 of this bulletin, which gives the increases in hourly earnings, 1946-57, of 18 industries, ranked according to size of increases.

Without reading all of the table, may I be allowed to indicate to the house the nature of the information. The table shows, for instance, for tobacco and tobacco products, wage increases between 1946 and 1957 of 180.1 per cent; for products of petroleum and coal, increases between the same years of 152.2 per cent. Honourable senators, may I be allowed to place this table on Hansard?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Thank you.

I would like to admit the point, which is a fact, that with the advent of the current recession on this continent an additional inflationary cause appeared. First, labour and industry have throughout 1958 constantly applied an upward pressure on costs. There has also been added, both in Canada and in the United States, a monetary problem resulting from the necessity of deficit financing, which the United States has been doing for over 20 years without too harmful results. There has also been added the need for additional Government borrowings for such purposes as works to relieve unemployment. Last year we added $250 million to the capital of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of building houses in this country. The Government has also been required to put millions of dollars into such projects as the Trans-Canada Pipe Line and the St. Lawrence Seaway, and now into various projects for the general advancement of this country, many of which are being undertaken in order to relieve the unemployment problem with which we in Canada are faced, along with our neighbours to the south.

Speaking of this monetary problem, I think the most effective point made by the honourable senator from Inkerman in his speech last evening was in that regard, and I wish to admit that the monetary problem has in it potential danger. However, I do wish to analyze somewhat the matter that the honourable senator placed on Hansard in that regard. I am referring to the second column of page 92 of Hansard, where the honourable senator is reported as follows:

> I have in my hand a single sheet which is issued every week by the Bank of Canada. This sheet gives details of certain Government statistics for the week in question and compares them with the corresponding week of the preceding year. The statement is dated January 21, 1959, and the comparison is with the week ended January 22, 1958. It includes Government of Canada securities outstanding at each of these times, and which are divided into three classes: treasury bills, Canada Savings Bonds, and all other direct and guaranteed securities.

Then he said, as shown on page 93, starting in the second column:

> What does this statement disclose as to the present situation? The first thing it shows is that in this one year the total of Canadian Government securities outstanding has increased by $1,388 million—pretty good for one year, honourable senators. The second thing it shows is this: the general public has increased its holdings. Yes, it has increased its holding of Canada Savings Bonds by $268 million and its holding of treasury bills by $164 million, which together make nearly the figure my honourable friend mentioned.

I think this is the meat of it.

But coming to the real bonds, the permanent investments in the country represented by what we refer to as bonds, we have this situation: during the year this Government issued a total of new bonds in the amount of $1,190 million; and of that total how much do you suppose the public has taken? Twenty-eight millions. The remainder has been taken by the Bank of Canada and by the chartered banks. That is precisely the process that I pointed out to the house a few minutes ago, a process by which the Government creates credit for itself out of thin air.

Now honourable senators, if that was all there was to the statement, and there were nothing more, it would be alarming indeed. But I do suggest that it should be analyzed further, and that we should find out just what amounts went to the Bank of Canada on the one hand and the chartered banks on the other hand. I think the crux of the problem is in those figures.

It would indeed be most alarming to me if I thought the Bank of Canada had absorbed $1,190 million of securities of the Government of Canada; but I think it a very different thing if most of that absorption has been by the chartered banks in Canada, instead of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is the difference in effect?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am coming to that. I understand from the officials of the Bank of Canada that the figure of $1,190 million is not exactly correct. I am going to replace that figure with the amount of $1,052 million, which they tell me is correct. The Bank of Canada absorbed $159 million, and the chartered banks absorbed $893 million.

I might indicate here that there is one offsetting factor, namely, that Government accounts, including the Unemployment Insurance Commission and certain Government agencies, are down $124 million in their holdings as between the two dates referred to. During this period, namely from January 21, 1958 to January 22, 1959, the assets of the chartered banks rose by $1,377 million. The main components of this increase were as follows: Dominion Government securities, $893 million; increase in unsecured mortgages, $202 million; provincial securities, $138 million; municipal securities, $29 million; corporation securities, $52 million. General business loans were up $130 million. My point is this, that one can ask any two Canadian bankers or any two economists whether the existing situation is inflationary, and not get agreement. I submit that, under the circumstances prevailing in Canada at the present time, it is impossible to find agreement among Canadian economists as to whether this monetary situation is inflationary; and I have yet to find in any statements by bank presidents a suggestion to this effect.

The honourable senator whose remarks I am discussing also quoted as evidence against the Government, besides the figures cited by him yesterday, statements by Mr. James Muir, Chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada, and Mr. Gill, President of the Canada Life Assurance Company. I have examined Mr. Muir's statements. I find that he does refer to what he calls chronic inflation, but despite careful examination of his speech, nowhere have I discovered a suggestion by him that this country is on the brink of an inflationary disaster. I suppose everyone recognizes that inflationary dangers are ahead, but what we were told last night is that we are on the brink of an inflationary disaster as a result of monetary policy.

At this point I should like to refer to some passages of Mr. Gill's speech. First, a paragraph with reference to conditions in the United States:

For the United States the past year—economically speaking—has been one of violent ups and downs. Statistical movements have been striking. New records have been chalked up; record peacetime deficits in national budgets; record postwar rates of seasonally adjusted unemployment; high levels of personal incomes and savings; high aggregates of construction contracts; a large decline in bond prices and a record peak in stock market prices—all at about the same time.

I read that because that is substantially what has been happening in Canada during this year; and if the Government is to be blamed for these things in Canada, similarly the Eisenhower Government in the United States should be blamed for these conditions.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Then, I wish to refer to certain remarks made by Mr. Gill in regard to inflation, with which I am quite in agreement. He says of this incipient inflation:

It is a greater danger than communism, depression or unemployment, formidable though these enemies are. In fact, inflation can bring all these and other evils in their train.

But in regard to the problem facing Canada, this is what he says:

The inflation with which we are threatened today is unlike anything which has been heretofore encountered. Historically, inflation has resulted from "too many dollars chasing too few goods". No such cause exists today. The cause which does exist and which is giving grave concern that inflation may break lose is an even more powerful one—it is entirely psychological. Too many people believe that inflation is inevitable. This false assumption leads in turn to actions by individuals and governments which, if continued, will result in inflation and the consequent defeat of our responsible enterprise system.

But the real point of this paragraph in regard to the speech that we heard is this. He says that it is not a case of too many dollars chasing too few goods. He continues:

He continues:

This inflation psychology is a major obstacle to government in playing its essential part in the anti-inflationary battle. No government can maintain its mandate to govern without the support of its constituents. Governments must take the lead in avoiding inflation, but to do so it must have the co-operation of the public.

A short time ago I accompanied a delegation of members of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which met with the cabinet, as it does every year, to discuss its policy declarations of the year. The problem of inflation was dealt with by a person whom I consider to be one of the outstanding economists of Canada, Mr. Douglas Gibson, of Toronto, who is now General Manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia. I do not think that anyone, and certainly not Mr. Gibson, expressed any great alarm in regard to the immediate monetary situation, although each of us, I am sure, had in mind the possibly explosive nature of inflation on this continent, in certain eventualities in the future.

We are told by the honourable senator who addressed us yesterday that there are two available remedies which might be taken by the Government of Canada: one of them, an increase in taxes; the other, a decrease of Government expenses. One would think that the president of a bank that claims to have assets in excess of four billion dollars would be most inclined to "call the shot" and recommend either of these courses if he believed our economy to be on the immediate road to ruin. Indeed, did not the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons advocate about ten months ago a tax holiday of three weeks for all Canadians? I calculate that the revenue would have suffered to the extent of about $300 million. And I do not recall the honourable leader suggesting any curtailment of funds in the effort to dispel the recession and unemployment.

But if honourable senators opposite and, indeed, members of the Opposition in the other place, are in agreement with the multiple reasoning contained in the honourable senator's speech, and if they also believe that Canada is so completely on the brink of disaster created by monetary inflation, I would think that when the opportunity arrives, as it soon will, they will act consistently with the brilliant argument advanced by the honourable senator from Inkerman and vote in favour of an increase in taxation or a reduction in expenditure. However, it does seem to me that if these are the answers, Mr. Muir and Mr. Gill would have suggested them.

The stark fact is that although bankers and businessmen and politicians are prone today to issue these dire warnings of disaster, not a single banker will urge an increase in taxes and not a single politician will advocate a reduction in Government expenditure.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: So I conclude by remarking, as I believe to be the case, that the present Government stands pledged to a policy of sound money, to the maintenance of stability in the purchasing power of the dollar, and the conversion loan was a progressive step toward the establishment of a firm foundation for the future financing of Canada's expanding economy.

Better than the evidence of disaster that we heard in this house is the economic forecast presented a few days ago by Prudential Life Insurance Company of America. It was to the effect that our gross national product would increase by no less than the large figure of 7 per cent in 1959 over 1958. That responsible forecast by itself is an assurance that, given reasonably good management, our dollar should continue to be sound, and this country's economic progress will also continue unabated.

I commend to this house a statement by the Minister of Finance in a speech he made a few days ago:

The danger of inflation exists as it has existed during the last 20 years. We will not overcome it by exaggerating it beyond all recognition.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, may I first say to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne how well they acquitted themselves in the reasoned speeches they gave. They have already been praised many times. Some of the members who have spoken are pretty good judges of speeches. I merely add my words of praise to those which have already been so well expressed.

I join in welcoming the new members of the Senate and I tell them that they will find us to be comfortable colleagues. They will find in this house enough scope and opportunity to use their talents in good causes and good government.

I also give them a word of warning, that the mood of this house changes and reflects the country from time to time in fewer and shorter speeches than in the other place. For instance, last session we on this side were hard put to discuss matters that would be profitable from the way we saw things. We exercised a great deal of caution. This session we are surrounded by problems. You can pick on any one of them and give a pretty good speech, and it doesn't have to be advocacy. You can deal with real problems. You can talk about trade, unemployment, inflation, defence, parity prices, freight rates and deficits.

Last night we were privileged to listen to a devasting attack on inflation and the fiscal policy of this country, which was not intended to and did not do the Government any good.

We find the house a little less bellicose than it was last session when challenging statements were thrown across the floor of this chamber. In his speech in the present debate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) displayed an attitude of "Let's work together." That's fine. He has always been easy to work with. The honourable Leader on this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said the same thing and carried out the same policy. I just can't resist the opportunity to remind my friends on the other side of the house about something that has happened. The honourable Leader of the Opposition quoted the debates of 1921 when the Conservatives were in the majority in the Senate and the Liberals were in the minority, and when in the other house the Government had a Liberal majority. The Conservative leader of the Senate said he would co-operate. He did co-operate to a point, but when the Old Age Pension Bill was sent over here from the Liberal House of Commons he made sure it was defeated. That was rather bad judgment on the part of the Conservative Senate. I hope that we will not in any way emulate their judgment. My honourable leader, speaking of unemployment and inflation, having particular reference to the policies of the old Government which was facing up to the problems, was suddenly interrupted by Senator Brunt with this interjection that appears at page 33 of Hansard:

> He could not get re-elected on that policy—

Meaning that the Government could not get elected on that policy. That statement in its own way typifies the basic differences in philosophy between the parties. We stood for principle, whereas the Opposition made promises. I have been a politician long enough to understand that political seduction by way of reckless promises and puffing of issues is understandable in the hustings, but it has no place in Parliament, and it won't pay dividends to the people who are attempting to carry out those irresponsible promises. Easy answers to hard problems will give you the worst of both worlds.

There is another example. The Leader of the Government in his speech very carefully selected the material that he presented to this house. But there happens to be an old political pro on this side, the honourable member from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) who—and this I have seldom seen done before—asked the honourable leader this question, as appears in Hansard of January 27, at page 45:

> Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), after having painted such a bright picture of Saskatchewan, would explain why the gas station operators showed a decrease of something like $2 million in their receipts?

The answer given by the Leader of the Government was as follows:

> I did not mention any of the decreases, I was mentioning the increases.

In that one question my friend from Halifax-Dartmouth demolished and shattered the effect of the leader's whole speech. I thought that was Parliament at its very best.

I do not think that any speaker rising to discuss the problems of this country can avoid or should avoid speaking about unemployment. Yesterday's report from Victoria, British Columbia, indicated that already there have been some hunger marches to the Legislative Buildings. The Government reveals that early in January 749,886 people were registered with the National Employment office as looking for work, an increase of 175,649 over a year ago. That indicates that one out of nine people in this country is out of a job. These are Government figures, and they are bad enough speaking for themselves, but they do not make provision for the following three classes of people that are not included in the calculation, and never have been, namely: (a) the fishermen; it is estimated that there are likely to be 30,000 to 50,000; (b) those who have exhausted their benefits, and there are very many of these; and (c) those who are working less than 35 hours a week. It is estimated these classes may raise the total by another 100,000.

Bad enough as this is, the unemployment insurance fund, which at its peak reached $926 million, hit a new low of $625 million as of December 1, which indicates that the fund may well be in serious trouble and something will have to be done quickly to augment it either by increased contributions or the further involvement of people who are not now covered. These unemployment figures are statistics which actually represent people, and they have reached alarming proportions.

Those of you who have taken the trouble to read the press reports on the Congress of Labor brief, or who have read the brief itself, realize that the union drive for wages will continue because it is the only way they feel that they can maintain purchasing powers in this inflationary period, that the best way to fight inflation is to put idle capacity to work. I know that a great deal of blame is being placed upon labour for price increases, but union wages actually bear an infinitesimal proportion of responsibility for the rises. There has been a decided attempt to make them the scapegoats. Unions, if they are at all responsible, cannot remain passive while the living standards of their members erode and while retail prices are making dashes for freedom. If you listened to the members of the Government you would almost believe that we are being favoured by a booming recession, whereas the fact is that Government policies have brought fear where there should be faith. The Government has finally admitted that there is serious unemployment, but what it is saying to the unemployed is that they are in fact employed on a deseasonalized basis. Yet the longer people are out of work the less likely they are to return to the work they were formerly doing, so we may even face the probability of a permanent pool of jobless as a carryover from the recession.

A moment ago we were talking about inflation. I had not intended to say too much on this, but since the matter has been raised again and I have so glowingly praised the speech of the senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), let me say I agree that inflation flows from policies that we know to be wrong, and it is within the power of the Government to correct them. My friend the senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) was speaking about the conversion loan, and he said it was done on the considered judgment of the Minister and eight top officials. They are the same people who advised Walter Harris—and look what happened to him. If they were wrong before they could very well be wrong now. The senator says that the banks, insurance companies and trust companies have not been critical of the conversion loan. But they are not the kind of people who bite the hand that feeds them. They do very well. However, I will tell you one thing they have been doing. They have been screaming from every platform, and in every newspaper, in the annual bank reports, and by every conceivable advertisement, about the inflation, real or otherwise, in this country. They think it is real.

A good deal has been said about interest rates. Whether the conversion loan raised interest rates or not, I can quote one authority—Fred Gardiner, the mayor of Metropolitan Toronto, who had to do considerable financing immediately after the conversion loan. He tried to do the financing in this country and did not succeed very well, so he went over to the United States and found that he had to pay through the nose. When he came back all he said was, and I will quote him: "The Government has loused up the money market." I do not know by what authority he spoke, but he was very expressive. When we find the largest city in Canada paying 5½ per cent interest we have got to look around and see just what is the trouble. No one can foretell what interest rates will be in the future. They could be considerably lower, and it could be argued that they might rise. No one knows which way they will go. The point made by the honourable senator from Inkerman last evening—and I waited to hear the honourable senator from Winnipeg South refute it—was, as he said:

> —during the year this Government issued a total of new bonds in the amount of $1,190 million; and of that total how much do you suppose the public has taken? Twenty-eight millions.

Having said that in defence of my friend, I must say that I think people like a little inflation. Some inflation resulting from natural development must be understood and tolerated, but we have no assurance that the present creeping inflation will not become runaway inflation. If this is a Government-fed inflation, then it is possible we may be in the midst of a controlled inflation, which may be much less harmful than we anticipate. The time has come for the Government to take action. I am no economist, but I know this, that if our credit falters an embittered public will deal with those responsible at the very first opportunity.

We have in this country at the present time both inflation and unemployment. In the past, we have had serious unemployment. We have dealt with it. In the past we have had inflation, creeping or otherwise, and we have dealt with that. But the present situation is unique. This is an economic paradox—both inflation and unemployment. That certainly was not part of the vision and it was not even promised. Everybody thought it could not be done, but they proceeded to do it and did it very quickly. We find unemployment and inflation are present, and thus it is the duty of every one of us, no matter where we sit, to repeat with stuck-needle repetition that these problems exist and they must be solved.

The Americans have taken a course that they describe as a balanced budget. Our way appears to be the opposite. If I can guess what the Government will do I would say that it will try to spend its way out. I agree that the Government cannot refuse money for housing, airports, hospitals and other very essential services, but fiscal irresponsibility may lead to a tremendous burst of expansion for goods and services which may well start creeping inflation galloping and cause unemployment to expand almost to recession size.

I do not think that a balanced budget is a cure-all, but a controlled budget is another matter. It is not money deficits we are suffering from today—we are suffering from deficits of decisions that ought to be made in high places.

One of the great money-eaters in our country is of course defence. The policy of defence, as well as defence spending, is both confused and misunderstood. I think we have come to the time when we must ask ourselves if national defence is possible in this day and age and in existing circumstances. Do we need manned interceptors or can we rely on missiles? If we need manned interceptors, how are they going to be acquired? Can we afford them? We have to deal with the question of the Avro Arrow airplane. If we need missiles, how are they to be acquired? Can we afford them? That raises the question of the Bomarc.

A few days ago the Prime Minister objected to the lobbying and the pressures that were employed by those people who are concerned and interested in the production of the Arrow. Those of us who have been around here before yesterday know that when vital issues arise in this country these hallowed walls are crawling with lobbyists. They are here on a permanent basis, and they have been here for a long time. Lobbying is not a new profession to Ottawa. It is a way of life, and I am told it is a very pleasant way. As a matter of fact there is a great need for lobbying right here, the strongest possible lobby, to offset the aviation and the electronic lobby in the Pentagon at Washington. Decisions are being made there which ought to be made here. I am not part of that lobby. I have not discussed this matter of the Avro Arrow with the management nor with the union officials, officially or unofficially. I am concerned with our national defence and its cost, and with unemployment and its related problems of inflation.

Let me give you an example of American lobbying that recently took place and brought a protest from the British Government. We have protested to the United States so often on so many matters that the procedure has become routine and they probably are buying an extra cabinet in which to file the protests away. A bid of the English Electric Company offered to build turbines for the United States Army in Arkansas for $1,450,000. The contract was let to a Philadelphia concern for $1,750,000, which was 19 per cent higher than the bid of the English Electric. It was explained that this was done because of the Buy America Act, under which the United States Government buys from domestic suppliers when the foreign bid is not more than 6 per cent lower. In this case it was 19 per cent lower. That act, which vitally concerns us in Canada, is used as a protective tariff, and it means to them whatever they want it to mean under any and all circumstances. Some of you may have been interested in reading in American periodicals that a Representative from the Philadelphia area in Congress boasted that his lobby had succeeded in keeping the business in Philadelphia—at an increased price of $300,000. We need to offset the lobby that is constantly going on at the Pentagon. I do not profess to be an expert on defence. I am a run-of-the-mill expert. But there are men who know something about defence, because it is their job and they have given it their life. I will quote a few of their opinions:

Air Marshal Curtis, former Chief of the Air Staff: "Canada must never again be dependent on outside sources for first line aircraft".

General Earl Partridge, of NORAD: "Manned interceptors will be required in air defence; the day of the manned fighter is far from over."

Air Marshal C. Roy Slemon, second in command of NORAD, "...inescapable requirement until USF.108 chemically powered is ready in 1964. The interceptor's task, particularly in the fringe areas of air defence system such as Canada, favours long range two-seater interceptors".

General Pearkes, Minister of National Defence, speaking before a committee: "Bomarc will not replace manned interceptor, which is supplementary."

Major-General W. S. Macklin, retired, says the jets "will not give us defence, nor will the Bomarc, two useless corks."

That is all I am able to learn from men who appear to have knowledge of the subjects and are prepared to speak about it. There are great numbers who are not in a position to speak as openly as did Air Marshal Slemon.

Canada has already invested $400 million in the CF-105, the Arrow: it is a supersonic, manned fighter to combat invading forces. The reason given by the Prime Minister not to suspend the contract for the Arrow in September was mainly that there was a dangerous situation in Quemoy and Matsu which might have led to war. If it had led to war we would have required both the Arrow and the potential of the airplane and the electronic industry.

Last week evidence was given before the United States Senate Committee by the Secretary of Defence McElroy that the United States was two or three years behind the Soviets in the rocket race. He referred to it as the missile gap. So, suddenly it is admitted that the balance has shifted in favour of the communist world. What he has in effect said is that we lack the capacity to retaliate with rockets in large numbers and we will not catch up for two or three years. Thus, if the communists decide to use the ultimate weapon, it is curtains for all of us. Yet that is not quite true, since we have bases which can strike at the communist world from many directions through NATO. They too face a similar fate.

I am one of those who believe that the communists will not use the ultimate weapon. I remind the house that during the last war both sides could have gassed or germed each other, if either had decided that was the course it wanted to take. For the present the United States is relying on its superiority in long-range atomic bombers, and the Soviets and the communist world are hurrying to overtake the United States. But it will take them two or three years to catch up.

Thus we sit in a situation that is fully as dangerous as was that of Matsu and Quemoy. If war breaks out within the next two or three years it will be the atomic bombers that will be used.

Now, it is true that in the DEW Line by radar and other scientific contraptions we could locate almost a gnat coming over, but we couldn't stop everything. We are told that up to 10 or 15 per cent of the objects coming over would get through, and we have no anti-missiles missile at the present time. So we need a supersonic interceptor to cope with them. That is what all these people have said, with the exception of General Macklin. We in Canada would be in the front line.

There are three possible interceptor planes: the CF-105, which is the Avro Arrow; the F-106, the American Dagger; and the F-108, an American craft, which will be ready in 1964—that is what Air Marshal Slemon said.

Now consider this: the Arrow is a two-seater plane, with a range of 1,500 miles, a speed of 1,400 miles and a ceiling of 60,000 feet. It has great fire power, it is manoeuverable, can carry air-to-air missiles, and until it is shot down it can make many sorties. The F-106, the Dagger, has more speed, but it has less range, a lower ceiling and less fire power. The Americans have stopped producing the Dagger, but they said that they would license the Canadians if we wanted to produce it. The F-108 is an American plane, chemically powered, with a range of 1,000 miles, a speed of 2,200 miles an hour, a ceiling of 75,000 feet, and it will have great fire power. But that plane is now on the drawing boards, and will be ready at the earliest in 1964.

No special type of interceptor is available in any other place. We have to decide what we will do in the interval if we don't go on to build the Arrow. The Bomarc, which we have accepted, is a defence missile; it has a range of 200 to 250 miles, which could be increased to 400 miles; it has a speed of 2,000 miles an hour, and a ceiling of 75,000 feet. It is an unmanned interceptor with complicated gadgetry, subject to malfunction which, they say, is about 50 per cent. That missile can be decoyed, spoofed and actually fooled. It is a one-shot weapon: once it is fired it can't change its course and it does not return. For this country to build a Bomarc wall would give us about as much defence as would the Great Wall of China, or a Seigfried or Maginot line, and it would be just as foolhardy. It may be that missiles will take over—that is years away.

Every one in this chamber heard the talk immediately after the last war that the push-button boys would take over, that there would be no further need for the infantry. Well, the people who said that were wrong. They were wrong in Korea, in Sinai, Lebanon, Jordan and Indonesia. It has been proven that infantry has a future, but to leave Canada without air power would be a national disaster.

I think it is time for us in this chamber to face up to realities. Let us face up to the fact that the missile effort is beyond our means. The United States and Russia can afford it. If the Arrow is scrapped, Canadian dependency on United States military power will be unprecedented in Canadian history, because our role will then be to operate the ground radar defence system and Bomarcs. We will then become a buffer state. The United States is merely using us to protect her Strategic Air Command.

It has been our declared policy that our greatest effort should be made in the air. That is where we can contribute the most. NATO's long-established policy has been to rely on deterrents, a certainty of massive and instantaneous retaliation in the event of an attack. The cost of that defence is astronomical. I quote from the speech made by the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) in this house on Thursday, January 29. These are figures he gave: The Atlas missile costs $35 million, and missile programs for the United States will involve an aggregate of $7 billion. The atomic submarine costs $50 million apiece, and a super-atomic submarine will cost $150 million. Fighter aircraft are priced at 50 times as much as the fighters of World War II. Another unspecified type of bomber will cost, as the President put it, its weight in gold.

We in Canada cannot participate in the costly nuclear rocket race between the United States and the Soviet Union. It is too rich for our blood; we cannot afford it. I think it is time to face facts. If the United States feels that it needs missile bases in Canada for its own protection, let it come and build them, and at its own cost maintain, man and operate them. The question of sovereignty does not arise here any more than it arose as a result of the building of United States missile bases in Britain, France, Italy, Turkey, and other countries. These bases can be built in Canada, subject to similar arrangements. The United States can pay for them. Do not forget that we have built aerodromes in France and in Germany, and we have air bases there. We have apartment buildings to house our people, buildings to house our stores, and we have stationed an air division in Germany. There has been no question of sovereignty.

The declared Canadian policy has been to prevent a nuclear war from developing. We think that conventional forces are of great importance. We need to develop a less risky form of co-existence than rocket-building. Yet we have a role to play as an independent sovereign nation dedicated to stand by our friends and fight if necessary to preserve our way of life. Our only possible role is in the use of conventional weapons. That is all we can afford, and there is some question whether we can afford even that. Certainly we cannot permit ourselves to go broke in protecting a sovereignty which is not in danger. By building the Arrow we shall have the finest plane of its kind in the world today. It is the best contribution we can make, and to cancel it out would give us less in defence, more dependence on the Americans, and deal a death-blow to, or certainly cripple, the aviation and electronics industries.

It is said that the Arrow is too costly. The estimated cost of 100 Arrows is $350 million, and 100 more can be had for an additional $250 million. The Bomarc costs $750,000; it is a missile, a one-shot weapon. The Arrow can continue to do sorties until it is shot down; it can take on many targets; it can remain in constant communication until it takes on a target; and it can change its course. The Bomarc can do none of these things. There is another consideration which, in these days when we are spending fantastic sums of money, is important. Of every $100 spent in the defence of Canada, $65 is recovered by personal and corporation taxes, so the actual cost to the country is no more than $35. Whereas $100 spent by us on an American defence product is $100 lost to the economy of this country. The production and purchase of the Arrow is not a case of throwing good money after bad, but of protecting our country and our investment in the industry and our future. It means an actual expenditure of $90 million a year for the next four years, by which time the F-108, an American chemically-powered supersonic plane, will be ready.

I know that in the back of many people's minds is the thought that the United States has refused to buy the Arrow. That is true. To a large extent that stems from the fact that the powerful United States aircraft and electronic manufacturers have, under various American statutes, prevented the United States Government from buying defence equipment from anybody else. They would rather have overproduction in their own country and sell some of the surplus elsewhere. They are reluctant to acknowledge that we can do anything as well as they can. If the United States should take over the air defences of North America, our airplane and electronic industries will go out of the window. When we need them in the future they will not be there. As a nation we have an investment of $15 billion in topflight industrial plants with engineering and technical facilities. We have assembled and developed here the finest scientific and technical skills, and we are endangering their prospects and increasing unemployment. There will be a loss of brain power to this country, a loss of purchasing power and a loss of taxes, and there will be an exodus of electronic engineers and other highly skilled technical people. After the first announcement by the Prime Minister in which the final decision on the Arrow was put off, the American consul in Toronto literally ran out of application forms for visas. The office just didn't have enough paper, and lines of persons waiting for interviews to make application to leave the country formed 400 feet deep. The Canadian industries that are affected are important: they include R.C.A. Canada, Westinghouse, Canadian Marconi, DeHavilland, Canadair Ltd., Aviation Electronics, Sperry of Canada and Rolls-Royce of Canada.

There are 43,000 people directly employed in the aviation industry. Some of these big companies have already begun the transfer of personnel to the United States, and that country is capitalizing on the uncertain future of aviation and electronics in Canada.

Other Canadian industries cannot absorb the displaced skills. It is all very well to say, "Let the displaced people use their skills in other endeavours." These people cannot go out and make cuckoo clocks or hula hoops. If the engineers go, the toolmakers, patternmakers and craftsmen will follow. When the announcement was first made, 150 toolmakers were laid off. Fifty-seven firms were contacted for jobs, and four jobs were obtained.

This airplane industry has been built up over a long period of time and we ought not to sit by to see the rug pulled from under it, particularly when it offers us defence, as good as anything the Americans provide in the conventional field. We might as well face it—for subsidies is no longer a nasty word in this country—the airplane industry must be subsidized to some extent in the same way that in another day and in another time the automobile industry was subsidized. There was then a great argument in this country: Should we or should we not give the automobile industry in this country protection? Many said no and others said yes, and finally we decided to have an automobile industry. It has been a good thing for us.

In order to have an aviation industry there must be a military requirement to dream up the fantastic future that these planes have. Commercial airlines cannot afford them. The Viscount, which is the most popular plane in Canada, has a turbo engine which was originally developed in Britain for the military, and it is now being adapted to commercial use at a price commercial users can afford to pay. The same thing is true of the British Comet. They spent millions of pounds—not dollars—developing it. The American jets and supersonic planes are adaptations of the military Boeing 707. The French have a plane called, I believe, the Caravelle, which was developed in the military and then turned over for commercial use.

These mechanical teams, and they are teams in this business, took years to develop. This country needs new industries and we cannot go on selling pots and pans. China, India and Africa can do that as well as we can, and they can do it cheaper. As years go on we shall be making less because we cannot meet the lower costs. We are better off to let them make the pots and pans and we will buy from them. We can make the precision goods, the kind of goods we are fitted to make and the kind of goods we know how to make. We need a national industry where know-how, precision and research are paramount. Our mechanical industry in Canada has now grown to a point where the world recognizes that we are able to produce what any other nation can produce. The demands on the industry have made it grow up. To meet the requirements the industry has developed in the respective fields precision instruments never before known.

But as always, we in Canada suffer from an inferiority complex. We should be shouting our achievements and attainments from the housetops, yet in all the talk we have heard about the Arrow no one has suggested that in its field there is no better plane. If we kill the Arrow it may seem like a mechanical sacrifice, but it will be more than that. We shall be killing the future of engineers, narrowing the scientific horizons of our people, and reducing our defensive power.

We in this country have a new breed that knows how to talk the language of science and has the technical ability to produce that which is producible. But we have always had limited scope and limited money, and mechanically we have been a leaping-frog nation. We buy what is produced in some other place and then we develop something better. We have had to do that in order to sell our products. That is one of the reasons why Canadian engineers have had to be more creative.

We spend for welfare purposes in this country—dominion, provincial and municipal—$2 billion, and for armament we spend $1,750 million. The social revolution is not finished. It must go on, sometimes slower, sometimes faster, depending on the mood of the people. We must admit, and it might as well be said here as in any other place, that our economic system needs some military production to prop it up. We might as well face reality. We are not alone in this respect. Sixty per cent of the American budget is spent on military requirement. In Britain, I think, 35 per cent is spent on military requirement, and in France almost 50 per cent. In this country it is 31 per cent. Goodness knows how much the Soviets spend, but it must be far more than the Americans. So when the Communists talk about our needing military requirement to prop up our economy they are merely talking out of one side of their mouth, for they need it more than we do.

We need to develop an aviation industry. We have a vast country with sparsely settled areas. We need to push back frontiers and develop our natural resources. We must not forget that both Kitimat and Quebec Labrador iron ore depend on air transport. Civil aviation depends on military trail blazing.

I have already stated that the Viscount, the Comet and the American commercial jets are all subsidized, and they all came from the military. Other countries subsidize both design and development. Only Governments can afford such subsidies. Recently there has been some raising of eyebrows by Canadians at the presentation of the brief by the union people to the Government of Canada asking it to continue production of the Arrow. Their approach was that their jobs were in jeopardy. I approach it from the point of view of defence, for nothing better than the Arrow exists and it is something that we can afford.

I have always felt that a Government has a responsibility to the people to provide opportunities of employment, and I think it is a far-reaching responsibility. So when these people are fighting for their very existence it is something that should concern all of us. It is well to know that in the recent collective bargain agreement made between American Ford and General Motors and the union there was a clause providing that if the companies abandon any of their plants they must pay their workers severance pay. In other words, the companies could not just leave a community and say, "We are closing the plant". There is a responsibility on the employer.

I don't hold that there is in this instance a direct responsibility of Government. I am not carrying this contention that far, but I am saying that there is a concept that is new and it must not be lost on us. We are a new country. We need new industry. Sometimes industry in its infancy has to be subsidized. I have already indicated what other countries are doing. We are concerned not only with industry but with people who have built homes and communities and who had hope and faith in their future. These are skilled and technical people who are hard to come by. At Malton, just outside Toronto, they have a payroll of $14 million a year, with property taxes of $1¼ million a year paid by the company and homes.

The Prime Minister has told us that the communists have already declared an economic war; in his words, there is a "terrifying Red trade offensive". I agree with him that the economic fight of tomorrow is going to be rough. We should leave no stone unturned to share in what aviation and electronics will bring to that world. We cannot afford missiles and we cannot afford rockets. We can afford the Arrow if it is needed and useful, and it is both. It is the only plane capable of doing what we need to do in the protection of our own country. It is the best plane of its kind in the world. We need it for defence, and we need it as a symbol of our great achievement.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, debate adjourned.

PETITIONS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I present 18 petitions for divorce. These make a total of 288 petitions presented so far this session.

PRIVATE BILL

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. William R. Brunt presented Bill S-8, respecting The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I would appreciate it very much if, with the permission of the Senate this bill could receive second reading on Tuesday next. My reason for making this request—I might as well confess it—is that I hope to leave for a short holiday and I would like to have the bill read the second time and referred to committee before I leave.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In any other circumstances we would agree!

Hon. Mr. Brunt: With leave, I move that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the first report of the committee on Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the bill (S-3), intituled "An act to amend the Canada Shipping Act", report as follows:

Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave of the Senate I move that the report be adopted now.

I would like, if I may, to make one statement to honourable senators about this. The bill is arousing a great deal of interest among the shipping fraternity, and this morning we had a large number of people before the committee, who desire to be heard. The committee has therefore decided to set aside the whole of next Tuesday for consideration of the bill, and has adjourned until Tuesday morning next at 11 o'clock for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, presented the report of the committee on Bill S-5.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, to whom was referred the Bill (S-5) intituled: "An Act respecting The Canadian Medical Association", have in obedience to the order of reference of January 29, 1959, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

Report adopted.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the following notices of inquiries and motion by Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

Inquiries:

No. 1.

1. Who are the producers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present on strike, and what amount was paid to each of them by the C.B.C., and for what programs?

2. What was the total cost of these programs on television?

No. 2.

What salary was paid to each artist of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958?

No. 3.

What amount was paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by each sponsor on television, from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958, and for what programs?

Motion for:

Copy of the form of contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the producers.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Stand.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I would tell the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that the replies to these inquiries and to this motion will do more for the settlement of the C.B.C. producers' strike than any intervention by the union leaders. They are afraid that we might find out how much is paid to the producers. Let us know.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Aseline: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 10, 1959, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John A. McDonald: Honourable senators, I desire to associate myself wholeheartedly with the remarks which have been made concerning the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would also like to join with other honourable members in extending a cordial welcome to the three recently appointed senators.

A great loss was suffered by Parliament and the country at large during 1958 in the passing of Senators MacKinnon, Nicol, Hawkins and Marcotte, four outstanding members of this house and fine friends of those of us who have known them through the years. I wholly agree with all that was said by those who so eloquently paid tribute to the memory of these fine gentlemen who gave generously of themselves to the public service.

May I also, honourable senators, on behalf of those who suffered loss of loved ones and friends in the mine disaster at Springhill in October last, extend thanks to the people of Canada, the United States and abroad for the very practical and generous way in which their sympathies were expressed. Something over $1½ million was spent voluntarily for the benefit of those who were bereaved. As a result of that disaster we have today in Springhill hundreds of miners who are able and willing to work but are unemployed and living from day to day with the hope of a word of encouragement from their employers, the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, a subsidiary of the A. V. Roe Company. They are waiting for heartening news of further work that they might do. I might say that this company has already offered them about 200 odd jobs at work away from home.

I am sure that, like myself, many people have been hoping that a new mine might be opened at Springhill, perhaps on the east side nearer to old No. 4, and one which would be safer than the No. 2 mine, the only one operating at the time of the upheaval last October. I have not been able to find out whether the Government has definitely decided it is not practical to open another mine, but there are many people who still believe it is. To ease the minds of the people of Springhill I think that as soon as possible a decision should be made and some definite statement given out, supported by the most competent mining engineering authority it is possible to secure. It has been the hope of a great many people, including myself, that if a mine should be opened it would be feasible to establish a thermal power plant at or near the pithead; but I am not competent to say whether or not the power generated at such a plant could be used to advantage. This is another matter which appropriate government services could inform us definitely on.

We would hope, of course, that it would be practical to give these men employment in a safer mine in the kind of work for which they are already trained, but if that is impossible then we would hope new industries could be moved in or developed so that the miners will be able to stay in Springhill, thus saving this fine town. If this is not possible then the sooner we take prompt steps to start a vocational school at Springhill the better. The nature of the vocational courses could be decided by the miners themselves, and I would think many of them would be interested in taking short courses in poultry, gardening, and in the production of small fruits and vegetables. Many honourable members know how it stimulates morale to be able to go out to the garden and grow one's own vegetables and keep the grounds looking well. It is something like that that these people need, and the courses I have spoken of, in poultry, gardening, and raising small fruits and vegetables, would be serviceable, no matter whether the miners remain at Springhill or move away.

I desire most sincerely to compliment His Honour the Speaker and our two leaders for the outstanding service they are rendering to this house and to the nation. I hope it will be possible for our Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to bring here for introduction more important legislation this session. That is one way at least that we can still render even greater service than in the past, and by doing so we can save much time and discussion in the other place.

May I also at this time express the hope that the Committee on Land Use will be re-established and asked to finish its work.

I am sure that this house was ably and honourably represented at the World's Fair in Brussels by our Speaker, and more recently at the Joint Parliamentary-Congressional Committee meeting at Washington, at which the Speaker of the other place also and members from both houses were present. We hope that a precedent was established for many more such gatherings in future. Indeed, they are well off to a good start, in that the next meeting, I believe, has already been planned to take place on Canadian soil at about the time of the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. If proper thought and planning goes into the preparing of the agenda for these meetings they should be of great help in maintaining the friendly relations that mean so much to both nations. At these friendly council tables, misunderstandings may be cleared away; the meetings should prove to be helpful in settling trade problems and in making very necessary plans regarding joint defence. Canada, at least, should be associated also with the nations of Western Europe in their plans for freer trade, as the honourable member from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has clearly shown.

I trust that our Speakers' Joint Parliamentary-Congressional Committee at ensuing meetings will give much time for discussion to the very important problems concerning the disposal of the surplus food products of the two countries. Under democratic forms of government, with the required stabilization of prices and favourable production conditions, surplus foods are almost certain to increase, and therefore the need will become even more acute for the United States and Canada to dispose of these products in an organized way without seriously interfering with the marketing abroad. We are proud that Canada has been in a position, as has the United States, to assist less fortunate countries under the Colombo Plan, and I hope that we can carry on to completion the projects now being undertaken; but if there is a possibility that we can increase our contribution, would it not be wise to have at least a part of that assistance given in the form of surplus foods handled by an international disposal marketing board? If some such plan could be made operative it should end the criticism that one country was interfering with the orderly marketing abroad by the other.

As the Minister of Agriculture has already intimated, the Price Stabilization Act, and the manner in which it is being administered, will always have to be carefully watched, in the best interests of the primary producers as well as the public treasury.

In one paragraph from the Speech from the Throne we were advised that:

> —A measure will be laid before you to institute a system of crop insurance in co-operation with such provinces as so desire. You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

I wish to commend the Government for this statement, and I would like to take this opportunity of thanking the Government for having this legislation introduced early in the session so that the farmers who require additional credit in order to carry on successfully this year may be in a position to plan their work before seeding time. There are still many farmers in eastern Canada who must increase production if they expect to continue to operate successfully, in this the best of all occupations. Some of these require improved machinery, others good livestock, and still others may require to increase their acreage in order to keep their expensive equipment operating long enough to produce sufficient to make their units economically sound. Of course, there may be some who would require assistance in more than one of these ways in order to make economic units.

Honourable senators, I have before me a copy of a brief that was submitted recently by a committee representing the agricultural interests of the province of Nova Scotia to federal members of Parliament from that province, and I wish to read a paragraph from the brief in this connection:

> Drastic changes have taken place in farm loan requirements. At one time, the greatest demand for credit was for the acquiring of land and buildings. Even as late as 1931 land and buildings constituted 77 per cent of the total farm value in Canada. For that reason, no doubt, farm credit in this country has been based upon the value of land for agricultural purposes. Today, land and buildings comprise not more than 50 per cent of total farm value. The other 50 per cent is in stock and equipment. It is obvious therefore that our concept of farm credit policy, even 20 years ago, does not measure up to present day requirements.

The expansion of farm units in our province to make them economic units depends on availability of adequate credit—

(1) To assist farmers now operating to extend production in line with the needs of the province in livestock and other farm products;

(2) To assist young farmers to become established on farms that will give them a reasonable income;

(3) To develop agriculture as a basic factor in our provincial economy.

May I say, honourable senators, that the history of Government loans to farmers shows that there is very little risk involved in loaning public funds to farmers who have agricultural education with experience and who are approved for loans by appropriate officials of the departments of agriculture as being applicants who can be assisted to produce economically. In order to produce economically today, farmers must follow most approved scientific methods in production and sound business principles in marketing. For this reason I am pleased to notice that more and more emphasis is being placed on farm management. It is to be hoped that farmers more generally will soon realize the wonderful assistance that they may receive for the asking from capable farm management and extension workers from the provincial departments of agriculture. As I said at one time here recently, I know of no greater service that the provincial departments of agriculture can render in this country than by securing properly trained, well-equipped men to carry on this important work of offering farm mangagement and extension services to our farmers.

Canada has excellent agricultural colleges. We have one of them located in Truro, with a most competent staff. Although it is encouraging to note an increase in attendance, the number taking its courses from the Atlantic area should be doubled, and I have faith that many more will attend when young farmers fully realize that it is so very important to have the advantages that this training can give them. As I have said at other times, earnest agricultural college graduates invariably make successful farmers and usually become leaders in their communities.

The outstanding achievement last year by the farmers in my province was the successful completion of their campaign to finance, with the assistance of the provincial Government, the erection and equipping of an up-to-date abattoir. A contract was recently signed for the building of the plant, and the farmers are now organizing for the all important step in this venture—that of supplying hogs and cattle for slaughter in sufficient quantities to keep the business operating successfully. I feel certain that they can do this if they have the will so to do, provided, of course, that the federal Government will continue—better still, make permanent—its policy of assisting with the freight costs on feed grains. We sincerely hope that a way may be found of relieving our people of the most discouraging event that happended to us in 1958 transportation, that of a 17 per cent increase in freight rates; but we are grateful that this increase is already taken care of by the government so far as the freight on feed grains is concerned.

Our farmers increased their production of pork by over a third last year, and with the advantages of being in a position to sell graded meats with a market at their door it is hoped that soon they will double their production; and this should also apply to beef. There is no country where grass and other green feeds grow more luxuriantly. This together with the fact that vast areas of marsh and dyked lands have been and are being properly dyked and drained, and the very helpful provincial department's pasture improvement policy, should encourage our farmers to keep the abbatoir going to capacity and enable them to sell top graded meats for better prices and supply consumers with the grades of meat of their choice.

It is very important that our Canadian Government join with the United Kingdom in an earnest endeavour to become associated with the Western Economic Community of Nations. Then, with the free convertibility of exchange in sight, the fruit growers, dairy producers and lumbermen would have reason to be encouraged. Just at present there is another difficulty that is causing a great deal of concern. I do not wish to be accused, honourable senators, of playing politics when I mention this; I am simply doing what I consider to be my duty in emphasizing, if I may, by repetition something that has been said so much better by those who have spoken before me, namely, the dwindling value of the farmer's products compared with the prices of those things that he has to buy. Too often in times of inflation the cost of the farmer's necessities, those things that he has to buy, go up in price faster than the prices advance for the things he has to sell; then when the tide turns and prices fall, the prices of the farmer's products fall first.

It would be definitely in the best interest of most Canadians for our Government to adopt and carry through a sound policy to curb inflation and improve our nation's financial standing. Many people are uneasy about the future. If honourable senators on the other side of the house have any doubt about this, if they will just take a trip through the country and visit a lot of people they will find out that what I say is so. As has been stated, at no time before in our history has a Government been faced with the dual problem of curbing inflation and at the same time preventing unemployment, which unfortunately exists in much too large numbers at present.

I know that I should not criticize unless some constructive measures are suggested in return; but this is difficult, for we are not in possession of the facts which members of the Government have to aid them in forming a sane policy. We do know, as our leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has intimated, that these problems have been kept under control in the past. There is, however, one suggestion that I humbly offer to all of us who are taxpayers in all parts of Canada, a suggestion which if adopted would make it much easier for all Governments, federal, provincial and municipal, to carry through strong and sound financial policies. This suggestion is that our people everywhere be more careful, even reserved, in their requests to Governments for financial assistance; in other words that we do not ask for public aid unless in a case such as I have referred to, where loans to primary producers are required to make economic farm units. Another example of where a request for additional public help was justified was the one made recently for the purpose of enabling thousands of miners to return and remain at work. But it has become too much a custom, when cash is needed for some community enterprise or development, to dispatch a delegation to the federal, provincial or municipal Governments for financial suport. Now, I do not doubt that members of these delegations are conscientious community workers endeavouring to carry through projects that are well worth while; but surely when we are faced with a most serious situation such as at present exists, when even Government bonds are sold only at a considerable discount, it is time for all to cease from asking for Government aid except in the most urgent cases. There is only one source from which Governments can secure the money to meet all these requests, and that, of course, is either directly or indirectly from the taxpayers. This fact should always be remembered. Is it not true that our politicians, on all sides, particularly just before elections, are somewhat to blame for the habit that our people have formed of going to Governments for assistance, when sometimes if we used a little more ingenuity and tried a little harder many of the proposed projects could be financed at home? One thing is certain, if we are to avoid disaster, either Governments must save more unnecessary expenditure or else raise taxes directly or indirectly, or both.

I have here a copy of an advertisement which appeared in one of our weekly magazines. I would like to read a couple of sentences from it:

> Where does the federal money come from? YOU. The Government has nothing except what it collects from you. And a lot of what it collects is wasted in the costs of collection. You'd be far better off if you paid for your own "benefits" direct.
> Of course there is one other place the Government can get money—by printing it. But that makes savings accounts, bonds, pensions, life insurance worth less and less; print enough and they're worth nothing.

The present situation is ably explained by Dr. Blair Fraser and by Mr. Bruce Hutchison in the January 31 issue of Maclean's magazine. These two gentlemen will have performed a really fine service for Canada as well as for those in power if these articles have the desired effect.

There was a recent editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and a similar article in Canadian Business Magazine suggesting that the time has come to encourage the purchase of Government bonds, so that our Government will not have to resort again to the exceedingly dangerous expansion of bank credit beyond what has already occurred. These articles suggest that the Government might help to swing the growing preference for common stocks to a greater consideration of bonds as an investment medium, by doing for bonds what was done in 1949 and in 1953 to encourage the buying of stocks through dividend tax credits.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the mover of the Speech from the Throne, the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson), and the seconder, the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette), upon their very excellent speeches. Their appointments were worthy additions to this honourable body.

I returned a few days ago from attending the Canadian Government Trade Fair in Kingston, Jamaica, which was held from January 16 to 25, and I thought this honourable house would be interested in hearing a report about this fair. I might say a similar trade fair will open in Trinidad on February 20.

I want to congratulate the Government of Canada on initiating this fine and useful trade fair. It was truly an historical event, as it was the first time, as far as I know, that such a Canadian fair, sponsored by the federal Government through the Department of Trade and Commerce, has been held in the new nation that has joined our Commonwealth. It was a very worthy undertaking and it will do a great deal to promote the international trade of Canada, especially that of the Atlantic provinces, which have had a long history of commercial relations with the West Indies, going back two or three hundred years.

The fair was held at Sabina Park on the outskirts of Kingston, Jamaica, which, as we know, is a very fine city. Our Government spent considerable money in supporting the undertaking, and I may say it was money well spent, in preparing the grounds and buildings the fair would need.

The manufacturers, industrialists, exporters, importers and businessmen of our eastern provinces took a keen interest in the project and gave it their practical support. The Honourable J. Angus MacLean, Minister of Fisheries, who represented the Canadian Government, gave the speech opening the fair, and he made a very fine impression, as several Jamaicans spoke to me about how well his address had been received by the thousands of people in attendance. Sir Grantley Adams, Prime Minister of the new nation of the commonwealth, known as the West Indies, cut the ribbon that opened the fair. He was accompanied by the Premier of Jamaica, the Honourable Norman Manley, and several other notables. In fact the political leaders of the West Indies took a great interest in the fair, visited the grounds nearly every day and contributed greatly toward its success and from what I saw it was a great success. Sir Alexander Bustamente, Leader of the Opposition in Jamaica, was a frequent visitor, as was Sir Kenneth Blackburne, Governor of the Island. The executives of all the leading import and export houses of Jamaica paid visits to Sabina Park where the fair was held daily.

Scores of Canadian manufacturers and producers shipped their goods and products down from Canada and exhibited them in very appropriate booths. Large crowds of citizens not only from Kingston but from the surrounding country visited the fair each day and were greatly interested in the fine products Canadian exhibitors had to show them. The provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland all had excellent display booths. Many inquiries were received at all the respective displays from prospective importers and consumers about purchasing from Canada the goods that were shown.

The people of Jamaica greatly appreciated what the Canadian Government had done in sponsoring the fair and extended their co-operation to the utmost; in fact, there was no limit to their courtesy and generosity.

The daily press of Jamaica gave the fair excellent support. I have here clippings from the front pages of the Daily Gleaner and other papers which carried some fine advertisements every day the fair was on.

Those who came from Canada to the fair were very graciously entertained by the Governor, the banks, the shipping companies, the import and export houses, the clubs and many others; in fact, no day passed but there was excellent entertainment of some kind provided for the visitors from Canada.

One thing we were told was that shipping facilities between Canada and the Islands are not as good now as when the Canadian National Steamships were going back and forth between Canada and the West Indies. We were advised that a great deal of West Indies trade that should come to Canada is going to the United States on account of a faster steamship service; and, though Canada has a substantial preference in the West Indies market, there are often times when importers have to have their goods promptly to fill orders and are willing to pay a higher duty on such goods from the United States when needed quickly. I was asked several times what was going to be done with the Canadian National boats which were supposed to have been sold to Cuba but are still tied up at Halifax. They are also very anxious to get a direct line for air express from eastern Canada to the West Indies. I was surprised to see so much air express—such items as refrigerators and machinery—coming from the United States, but at certain times they cannot wait for orders to come by steamship from Canada.

It is self-evident the West Indies have a wonderful future and we should keep in closest contact with them. They are going ahead by leaps and bounds. Their citizens are very loyal to the commonwealth. They have very fine gentlemen as heads of their political parties. They are men of great ability and integrity, and of course their Governments are very stable.

Canadians, or anyone else investing in the development of the West Indies, can make a safe and profitable investment. The business concerns of the West Indies are among the best in the world, and I know from experience what fine and upright people they are to trade with.

Jamaica has a wonderful climate. It is much more sunny than Florida. It is an island of great natural resources, mostly awaiting development. New hotels to accommodate tourists are being built every year, and I know that within the next ten years the tourist traffic of the island will be enormous. In fact the hotels were all well filled with tourists when I was there. Canadian tourists, travelling in the United States in the winter season, are spending tens of millions of dollars in California, Florida, Arizona, Nevada and other states, and very little of this money comes back to us; whereas Canadian tourist dollars spent in the West Indies will all, or nearly all, return to Canada, as the West Indies are large buyers of Canadian products and want to buy more, but they have been short of dollars from time to time.

I often think it is unfortunate that Canada has not a tropical province. However, if an economic union could be arranged between Canada and the West Indies I am sure it would be of great benefit to this country; in fact, it would be mutually beneficial, as their products are absolutely complementary to ours, and vice versa.

There does not seem to be any need to have tariffs at all against West Indies products. As far as we both are concerned, a customs union would be of great benefit. In more ways than one it would bring us closer together economically and more Canadian capital would flow to the West Indies for profitable investment. Such capital is needed there now, and could do a lot of good for the people of the Island toward helping them finance the development of their natural resources.

The Islands are very scenic. They are a wonderful place in which to spend a winter vacation, as stated. Their tourist trade is growing very rapidly. Tourists need entertainment. To take care of the future tourist traffic the islands are going to need more hotels and motels, more golf courses, more developed beaches and more improved roads, for, as I said, the islands are very scenic and contain many historical sights, such as Nelson's Shipyard and Spanish Town, which is the old capital of Jamaica that was under the Spaniards.

To sum up, I desire to give great credit to those who conceived the fine idea of initiating this fair. It means extending a welcome hand to our new commonwealth nation in a practical way. It made the citizens of the islands feel all the more that they were one with us in the Commonwealth. Great credit goes to the federal Government officials who played a large part in putting the fair over in a big way. Major Douglas, of the Department of Commerce, had charge of the fair grounds and did a splendid job. Canada's Trade Commissioner in Kingston, Jamaica, Mr. H. E. Campbell, rendered great aid in many ways toward the success of the fair; and as I stated previously, the visit of our Minister of Fisheries made a very fine impression indeed. After his speech he received great applause.

The visit of the Canadian navy boats to Kingston at the time of the fair was another event that increased the prestige of the fair very much. I might say the commander of one of the boats was a son of the late Senator Donald MacLennan of Cape Breton, whom many of us knew so well. Captain MacLennan entertained on his boat—I think it was the Buckingham—for the political leaders and businessmen of Jamaica, along with the Canadians, and it was a very fine party indeed. Mr. O'Brien, Secretary-Manager of the Fisheries Council of Canada, was at the fair every day. He was there doing everything he could to make the fair interesting.

Now that our Government has taken the initial step in holding trade fairs in the West Indies—and I know it was a wise undertaking, which was appreciated by all the exhibitors who took part and doubly appreciated by the citizens of these fine islands—I feel that every encouragement should be given the Government to continue its good work in supporting similar fairs in the future, for I don't know of anything that will stimulate the foreign trade of Canada to better advantage.

In closing, may I say I believe that, as Canadians and citizens of one of the leading nations of the commonwealth or of the world, our full co-operation should be extended to the people of the West Indies in every way we can. It will be one of the best investments we could ever make, not only from a material standpoint but in the good will that will be established on a solid foundation. Their citizens are extremely grateful for what we have done already, and what we do for them now and in the future to help them get fully on their feet as a nation of our commonwealth will never be forgotten by the fine people of these islands. They know that Canada is their great and good friend and neighbour; and I know that we, as a country and a good neighbour, are not going to let them down.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Baird, debate adjourned.

CANADA-NEW BRUNSWICK INDIAN RESERVES AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to confirm an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this legislation is to ratify and confirm an agreement which was made on March 25, 1958, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick, having to do with lands forming part of the Indian reserves in that province.

Prior to Confederation, lands in the province of New Brunswick were set aside as reserves for the various bands of Indians located in that province; and the titles to these lands remained vested in the Crown, subject to the Indians' right of use and occupation. After Confederation took place, some of these reserves or portions of them were from time to time surrendered by the Indians to the Government of Canada for sale; and the officials of the Government of Canada who were charged with the administration of Indian affairs under and by virtue of section 91, subsection 24 of the British North America Act came to the conclusion that any of these lands which were surrendered belonged to the Crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada. Accordingly some of the portions which were surrendered were sold, and the purchasers were given title by a grant by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada. The money obtained from the sale of these lands was used by the Government of Canada to contribute to the welfare of the Indians concerned.

However, after a number of years one or two cases of a similar nature arose in Ontario and Quebec, and these ended up in the Privy Council of Great Britain, where decision was given to the effect that subsection 24 of section 91 of the British North America Act did not give the Government of Canada any right to these lands, but that they remained in the right of the Crown in the province. That being the case, the question of the validity of the grants which were made by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada to the purchasers was very much in doubt, and the law officers of the Crown are of that opinion. It is therefore necessary to do something with respect to these grants, which, if the decision of the Privy Council is correct, are void. This is why, for a number of years, the Government of Canada has been negotiating with the province of New Brunswick for an agreement in respect to the lands in its reserves. I understand that negotiations have been going on since 1950, and more than one agreement has been drafted and signed and then changed at the request of one side or the other.

The effect of ratification and confirmation of this agreement by Parliament and by the legislature of the province of New Brunswick will be to validate these defective grants.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will the honourable senator give the references to the two cases he mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They are very old cases. Probably I can get the references. I was saying that the effect of ratification and confirmation of this agreement will be to validate these defective grants and enable the Government of Canada, which is responsible for the administration of Indian affairs, to deal effectively in the future with Indian lands in the province of New Brunswick which may subsequently be surrendered and offered for sale.

That is a general explanation of the necessity for the agreement and what it purports to do. A little later I shall go in more detail into the agreement itself. It was ratified by the legislature of New Brunswick by an act of that province passed on April 18, 1958, being chapter 4 of the Statutes of New Brunswick of that year.

I have said that the agreement was entered into in March 1958. It was signed on behalf of Canada by the Acting Minister of Immigration and Citizenship, Hon. Mr. Fulton, and on behalf of New Brunswick by Mr. Norman Buchanan, Minister of Lands and Mines. The preamble sets out substantially what I have already said.

Paragraph 1 is the definition clause.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does not the preamble go very much further than the honourable leader has stated?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. I will explain it when I deal with the clauses.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It states that the purpose is to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves. That is a pretty big order.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As you will see when I go on a little further, there are agreements with regard to the transfer of Indian lands to the federal Government,—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, I appreciate that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: —subject to certain mineral exemptions and that kind of thing. I agree that this goes further than I have already stated.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Very much.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Section 1 of this agreement has to do with definitions: the province is the province of New Brunswick, and "reserve lands" are those lands referred to in the appendix where all of the reserves in New Brunswick are enumerated. Then we have definitions of "patented lands" and "minerals". "Indian Act" is defined as meaning the Indian Act, Revised Statutes of Canada 1952. Next is the definition of "surrender", which means the surrender for sale of reserve lands or a portion thereof pursuant to the Indian Act but does not include a surrender of rights and interests in reserve lands for purposes other than sale. The last term defined is "public highways", which means roads and bridges in reserve lands, constructed for public use.

Section 2 validates the grants of land made by Canada after Confederation, while reserving to the Crown of the province any mineral rights that Canada purported to transfer in such grants. The principle established here is that the province is not prepared to see mineral rights underlying reserve lands transferred to private ownership. Section 3 of the agreement transfers to Canada the province's rights in the reserve lands, subject to a reservation of all lands covered by public roads and the mineral rights underlying those reserve lands.

Section 4 provides for termination of the federal Government's right to manage all reserve lands on behalf of Indian bands in the event that any band for which a reserve has been set aside becomes extinct. But this does not cover the case where a band becomes enfranchised, for a band becoming enfranchised does not come under the definition of a band which becomes extinct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is no definition of "enfranchised" in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If a band is enfranchised it is still in existence.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But there is no definition in this agreement as to what "enfranchised" means.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, I do not see any. With respect to section 5, I wish to say that under section 3 the province reserved to itself the mineral rights underlying all reserve lands. Section 5, however, provides that Canada may manage such mineral rights and use the proceeds thereof for the benefit of the Indians, so long as the land is not surrendered for sale.

The last section in the agreement is section 6. In connection with Indian lands bordering rivers, the province has expressed some fear that the surrender and sale of reserve lands to individuals might prove to be against public interest. The wording of this section, while it does not prevent sales of surrendered lands to individuals, provides that the province is to be informed of any intention to sell, and it gives the province an opportunity to consider whether the purchase of the land by the province is desirable.

The section furnishes various safeguards to ensure that the province through inaction cannot block a sale, and provisions are made to ensure that if the province decides to purchase, it will pay a fair purchase price for the land.

That, honourable senators, is a brief explanation of the agreement which has been made. As I said before, it has already been approved by the Legislature of New Brunswick, but it will not go into full force and effect until such time as the Parliament of Canada ratifies it by the passing of this bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government whether lands in any other province than New Brunswick are affected? For instance, some lands were abandoned in British Columbia, and I am wondering if this bill would cover them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This situation does not exist in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia but it does exist in Nova Scotia, where a similar agreement is now under negotiation and which, I am informed, may be completed in the near future. The situation also exists to a small extent in Prince Edward Island, and it may exist in Quebec and Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is it intended to send the bill to committee?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot see any real object in sending it to committee, for the reason that we cannot change it at all. We have either to reject it in its entirety or accept it. The Government of the province of New Brunswick has been negotiating the agreement for the last eight or nine years and has approved it by an act of the Legislature, so I do not see that there is much we can do with it.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, first I would like to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on his clear explanation of the bill before us. My attention was particularly drawn to the bill when I noticed it had to do with the lands of Indians in my province. Anything that deals with Indians in New Brunswick is always of considerable interest to me, for through my work as Director of Family Allowances for New Brunswick I came to know a great many Indian mothers.

In 1957, the last year for which I have statistics, there were only about 2,600 Indians in New Brunswick, but more than 1,000 of those were under the age of 16 and family allowance payments were being made for them. I know from my own experience that these payments proved to be a very great boon both to the children and their homes. As I said, through my work I came to know a large number of Indian mothers—and some Indian fathers too—and I frequently receive requests for advice and assistance. I find it most interesting to work with them. Very near to my home in the city of Fredericton there are two reserves, the Devon Reserve and the Kingsclear Reserve. When I resided far up the Saint John River, which I did for more than 20 years, I lived very close to the Tobique Reserve, and if honourable senators will bear with me, I should like to tell how progressive the Tobique Indian Council is. Quite recently the council erected a $20,000 recreation centre, completed a modern water system and paved many of their streets.

The purpose of the present bill does not directly, perhaps, affect the welfare of the Indians, although without doubt it will be of great benefit to them to know that when they surrender reserve land, on the understanding that it is going to be sold or disposed of in some way, the Government to which they surrendered it and which will subsequently deal with it is constitutionally entitled to do so.

Considerable property in New Brunswick which before Confederation was reserved for different tribes or for the use of those tribes, has since Confederation been surrendered, as the Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has mentioned, and in interpreting section 91 of the British North America Act, which gave to the Government of Canada exclusive jurisdiction over Indians and Indian lands, I think it is quite understandable that the Government of Canada, after selling some lands that were surrendered, confirmed the sales, as the leader said, by grants by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada.

There have been two Privy Council cases which decided that the rights in this surrendered land belonged to the province, and not to the Crown in the right of the Dominion. If the honourable leader does not mind I will give the citations of the two cases for the benefit of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). The first is The St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Company v. The Queen, on information of the Attorney General of Ontario (1888), 14 Appeal Cases, 46; the other is, The Attorney General for the Province of Quebec v. The Attorney General for the Dominion of Canada (1921), 1 Appeal Case, 401. Both cases gave reason to believe that on surrender by the Indians of these lands they actually reverted to the Crown in the right of the province, and that of course, as honourable senators will realize, leaves a real blot on the title of those who received their title through the Crown in the right of Canada.

It is only right and fair that the matter should be clarified and that those defective titles to land which has already been conveyed should be made good. The bill before us will enable this to be done. And under section 3 of the agreement, in future when any reserve lands are surrendered by the Indians the Government of Canada will be able to deal with them in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act.

Honourable senators, this agreement was approved by the New Brunswick Legislature at its last session. If this bill is passed it will be of value to persons who may buy land, or who have already bought land, in New Brunswick in cases where the property formed part of the original Indian Reserves, and I believe it will help the administration of the Indian Act in New Brunswick. I fully approve of it and give it my support.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I am very much interested in this proposed legislation, and I agree with my colleague, the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) that it is a step in the right direction and we welcome it. I have had some experience with these cases in connection with reservations in my section of New Brunswick. The honourable senator speaks about some reservations in other parts of the province. She should come over and see our three famous reservations on the Miramichi, and then she wouldn't talk so much about the Tobique, I am sure. I have known of several cases where lands have been surrendered and there has been some serious question about the title. This proposed legislation will remove all difficulties in that respect, I hope, in the future.

In respect to the word "surrender" I notice that section 1 of the agreement says, under (f):

> "Surrender" means the surrender for sale of reserve lands or a portion thereof pursuant to the Indian Act—

I wonder if the honourable Leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) could tell us what the necessary procedure is?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not look that up, but I will give that on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: The reason I mention the matter is that I have known of great disputes among the Indians themselves in connection with the surrender of lands, and there has been quite a lot of difficulty there. I would like to know what procedure is necessary before lands can be surrendered.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall be pleased to give that information on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Wall: If the honourable Leader of the Government is going to answer questions on third reading, and this bill does not go to committee, would he indicate to us what section 2 means, and whether there is or is not a retroactive factor in it? It deals with grants of patented lands, and I gather those lands have already been granted; how, I do not know. It confirms and then it seems to take away; there is an apparent retroactive factor.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would like to raise one question before the bill receives second reading—and I am not opposing the second reading of the bill. My question relates to the main body of the agreement immediately after the preamble. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) raised the point a few minutes ago as to certain words in the first clause, which read as follows:

> Now this agreement witnesseth that the parties hereto, in order to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick—

I do not know what all the outstanding problems were at the time this agreement was entered into, and if this agreement settles all of them it seems to me we should know what they were. Are all the problems referred to in this agreement or are there problems which are settled by this agreement but are not referred to therein? That is a question which gives me some concern in approving of this bill today. Now one reason why I raise this question, honourable senators, is that the Leader of the Government has stated there will be further agreements.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not say that. I do not know. I understand they are negotiating other agreements.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Leader of the Government has intimated that there are lands affected in the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not in Quebec. I made a mistake there.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then in three provinces. If there are lands which have been conveyed in this manner in these three provinces it is altogether likely that further agreements will come to this house for ratification. I therefore think that this agreement will be a basic one on which future agreements will be drawn. Now, is it right to set forth in the first clause that by this agreement all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves in New-Brunswick are settled?

Honourable senators, those words give me some concern. I am bringing the matter to the attention of the Leader of the Government, and I think he should inform the department at least that we are very much concerned about the inclusion of those words in the agreement. I suggest the leader should also find out if it is intended to have those words in further agreements which may come before us.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would like to give a legal opinion on that point. I am of the opinion that, in spite of what the section says, the only questions that are settled are the ones that are specifically set out in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then why have the words in there?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know. I did not draft the agreement. But it is my opinion that the matters that are set out in this agreement are the ones that are settled, not a whole lot of other matters which might arise because they could not be settled in this way.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I direct a question to the leader? My question has to do with the wording of section 4 of the agreement. Subparagraph 2 of the section says that for the purposes of subparagraph 1 a band does not become extinct by enfranchisement. Now, honourable senators, this is the first time I have ever heard of a transfer of land in which the word enfranchisement has been used. Is there any explanation to be given for the use of that phrase?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not understand what the honourable senator has in mind. It says that if a band becomes extinct the property is dealt with in a certain way but that the tribe does not become extinct by being enfranchised. I cannot see any difficulty about that.

Hon. Mr. Reid: After all, I have had some experience in dealing with the problems of Indians, because I was on the Indian Affairs Committee for some time—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I remember that.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I was just wondering what is the meaning of that subparagraph, because in the province of British Columbia we have endeavoured to get as many reserve Indians as possible to become enfranchised.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, this does not take any rights away from them.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, may I say a few words with regard to the remarks made by the honourable senator from Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), and which were brought to light by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) as to what is contained in this agreement at page 2?

This agreement provides:

—that the parties hereto, in order to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick . . . have mutually agreed etc.

Now, surely the agreement does not declare all the problems to be settled. In the phraseology there is an indication that it may provide a base for settling all the problems, but what is settled by the agreement is only what is indicated in the various paragraphs thereof. Therefore I do not see any need for having a list of all the problems that exist in the province of New Brunswick in relation to Indians. It simply says that it is the intention of the parties to the agreement that it will facilitate settling all the problems in relation to Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I rather agree with the last speaker that the interpretation that would be given in a court of law to this phrase would not include all problems that exist. This phrase is very broad. It does not say between whom the problems may exist. I very seldom am satisfied or happy with legislation in the form of an agreement, drawn as a result of negotiations between parties, sometimes without even the presence of a solicitor and frequently by solicitors who are not schooled in the drafting of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand, honourable senators, that this is the third New Brunswick agreement that has been asked for since 1950.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, I can fancy it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Some solicitors must have taken part.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The agreement shows that it has been mulled over by negotiators and concessions made pro and con. It comes to us with a phraseology that is not very happy, such as the words:

In order to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves—

No competent lawyer drawing up legislation would use such a phrase as that.

Then, take section 2. It says:

All grants of patented lands are hereby confirmed—

That is restricted by the definition of patented lands, but it does not say all grants now made or to be made in the future, nor does it actually say all grants by the dominion Parliament, which of course is intended. The agreement is in loose language and bad phraseology, when judged by the standards of draftsmanship with the intention of making the agreement into law. I suppose it will accomplish the good purpose which two speakers who preceded me have mentioned, and it is not our desire to deny the good results that may come from this agreement, but I don't think it has been well considered from our standpoint as legislators. It is perhaps all right from the standpoint of negotiators, but not of legislators.

Furthermore, apparently the province of Ontario is involved in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot say to what extent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Nor can I. I think that is a very good reason why the bill should go to a committee where we may ask questions. The province of Ontario has evidently been involved in something of this kind, because one of the cases cited is an Ontario case. The title to these Crown lands has evidently been raised in the province of Ontario. I wish to know more from the officials concerned as to the situation in Ontario. Therefore, I would like to see this bill referred to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to add a few words?

It seems passing strange that the two cases which were decided, and on account of the decisions in which it has been deemed advisable to pass this legislation, were decided many years ago. The first case was tried in 1888, some 71 years ago; and the second one was in 1921, about 38 years ago. Has it not been deemed advisable or necessary through all those years to present a bill of this kind? Why have all those years been allowed to intervene before bringing this legislation before the house?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I asked the same question of the officials, because I knew the honourable leader opposite would ask it of me. They told me that nothing was done; the matter was allowed to stand. It was the Parliament of Canada that brought the issue into focus around about the year 1950, in order to clear up all the defective titles, and this agreement has been under negotiation ever since that time. If a good job has not been done in drafting it, I am afraid I can't help it.

Hon. Mr. Campbell: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government a question? Under paragraph 2 of the agreement, can he say whether or not the grants made previously under patents contained grants of mineral rights, and if so whether they have been acted upon in any way by the purchaser? I notice that there is a reservation of the mineral rights to the province.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I also took that question up with the officials, because I noticed the same thing. I was told that if there was any difficulty about the mineral rights in these patented grants, that is a matter between the purchaser from Canada and the Canadian Government, and cannot be settled by this agreement.

Hon. Mr. Campbell: Surely that is not the case. The man who purchases the lands gets the mineral rights, and acts upon them, should have his title confirmed in the same way as anyone else.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, before the bill goes to a committee would somebody look at the grammatical construction of paragraph 3 of the agreement with respect to the words "and minerals", which are left hanging in mid-air?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It seems to be the wish of honourable senators that this bill be referred to a committee. That being the case, I am wondering what would be the appropriate committee—the Standing Committee on Natural Resources?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is satisfactory.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, bill referred to Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

PRIVATE BILL

GORE DISTRICT MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. W. D. Euler moved the second reading of Bill S-7, respecting Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not like the last one?

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think it is simple enough not to provoke debate among the legal lights of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It will give us a chance.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Never be too sure.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am never too sure about anything.

The sole purpose of the bill is that the company known as Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company shall become Gore Mutual Insurance Company. That means the deletion from its title of two words, "district" and "fire". These two words indicate a limitation of the activities of the company to a certain district and to fire insurance, when in fact, I understand, it carries on business throughout the country and in many other lines of business in addition to fire.

The company, organized more than a hundred years ago, is one of the oldest fire insurance companies in Canada. It was organized in a part of Ontario known as the "Gore District", of which the city of Galt is the centre. Honourable senators know very well that Galt is situated about 12 miles from the great city of Kitchener. The activities of the company have now gone far beyond the limits of Gore District; in fact, as I mentioned, I think it operates in every province in Canada, even as far west as British Columbia. It has expanded far beyond what were its original limits.

There are similar circumstances with respect to the word "fire". In olden days, the company operated only as a fire insurance company, as did many of the mutual companies, but now it is in several other lines, such as automobile, casualty and the rest of them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Has the company had an amendment to its constitution allowing it to carry those classes of insurance?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Under its charter it can carry them. I noted in a bill which I sponsored the other day that the various lines of business the company could transact went from A to Z, some 26 lines. The Gore company can transact the same lines.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under the word "fire" it transacts other types of insurance business.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes, and it wants to delete the word "fire".

A few years ago I was associated with the Economical Fire Insurance Company in the sponsoring of a bill to delete the word "fire" because its activities had gone far beyond fire insurance. For the same reason the present company wishes to have the word deleted from its name.

This company has a long and unblemished record in the insurance field. I might mention casually that it is so patriotic that at the outset of the First World War it made a gift of $100,000 to the federal Government for war purposes. I know the officers and directors of the company, and I am quite sure that they will carry on its activities in the same manner as has been done in the past.

As I have said, the bill is very simple. While ordinarily such a measure would be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, I would almost suggest that this bill does not require consideration by the committee. However, I am in the hands of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The rules require that it must go to committee.

Hon. Mr. Monette: We have a great respect for the company, and are in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. But the change of name would not change the powers of the company.

Hon. Mr. Euler: There is no change except in the name.

Hon. Mr. Monette: But if the company already has the power to deal not only in fire insurance but in other types of insurance business, to strike out the word "fire" would not add anything to nor take anything from the company's existing powers. For this reason I would not object to the change of name. On the same ground I would not object to the elimination of the word "fire" in order to make the designation general. As I say, there will be no change effected in what, by letters patent or act of Parliament, was originally granted to the company.

Hon. Mr. Euler: None at all.

Hon. Mr. Monette: So I repeat that I favour the bill, because it does not change the company's powers.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It changes none of the powers at all. If I may illustrate: suppose it is suggested to a man who wants automobile insurance, "Here is Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance"; he might say, "That is a fire insurance company; it does not handle automobile insurance". The title no longer covers the activities of the company, because it has many other lines besides fire.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Has the change of name been approved by the Superintendent of Insurance?

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am sure it has.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, I understand that it is the rule in such cases to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and although I think that in the present instance this is unnecessary, I move that it be done.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATE PROCEDURE

The Hon. the Speaker: Before the adjournment: As a matter of decorum I would like to say that when the Speaker has started to put the question to the house, if any honourable senator has additional remarks to make in a debate he should priorly seek the Speaker's permission. Personally I do not mind being interrupted as I start to put the question—I am a married man and I am accustomed to interruptions! But I believe our proceedings should be conducted in this manner: I shall insist in future that it be done this way. This is no reflection on any honourable senator. Thank you.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the following notices of inquiries and motion by Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

Inquiries:

No. 1.

1. Who are the producers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present on strike, and what amount was paid to each of them by the C.B.C., and for what programs?

2. What was the total cost of these programs on television?

No. 2.

What salary was paid to each artist of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958?

No. 3.

What amount was paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by each sponsor on television, from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958, and for what programs?

Motion for:

Copy of the form of contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the producers.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Stand.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to these questions. I appreciate the diligence of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in doing, I am sure, his best to secure answers. They are urgent questions and, as I pointed out the other day, I put my confidence in him to secure proper answers, and I would like to have them rather different from those that were given in the House of Commons on February 2, as shown on page 617 of the Commons Hansard. Those answers are unsatisfactory. I give full credit to two members of the Government, the honourable Minister of National Revenue and the honourable Minister of Labour, for not having been impressed by the blackmail of the C.B.C. producers. Naturally, I express my own personal views, and I have always considered that it is the duty of members of the Senate to show some degree of independence. I give the devil his due, whether the devil is red or blue. But everybody will understand that, that being said, I give the benefit of the doubt to my party, the Liberal party.

But in this case I want to have those answers, and if they are given the Government will be relieved from the strike. It would be a shame to pay a cent to those who have been refusing to work since the end of December.

Moreover, I have two other things to say to the honourable Leader of the Government. The C.B.C. producers were under the impression that their strike would create a big bang in the province of Quebec and that everybody would be impressed by their strike. It fell flat. People are indifferent to them; all they want to know is how much they get; and the Government has the best possible opportunity to secure control over all expenditures. As a member of one of the Houses of Parliament I would like to know how much has been paid to the producers and to the artists; and the more so, because one producer was bold enough to write to a Montreal daily that he was objecting to the kind of information that I was asking for. That is one reason for giving it. To show my earnestness to the Leader of the Government I will send him not only copies of an article that appeared in Le Devoir of Montreal—which, because it is too long, I shall not read—but I will send the original copy of that article, with two supplementary copies in order that he may read them.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Send a translation.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It can easily be translated.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I can read French.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: That is all right; thank you; and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister reads French. I will ask that the honourable Leader of the Government be kind enough to send one of the copies or—as he wishes—the original copy to the Prime Minister in order to make him more familiar with this famous strike.

There is something else that I want to say. It is that one of the artists, whom I like personally—I do not know him but I have a soft spot for him and he is superior to the average—has written a letter to the same paper to the effect—it was a kind of SOS appeal—that the Government has been trying to destroy the French network. Those who are doing their worst to destroy the French network are precisely the strikers, whether they are producers or artists. I will remind the honourable gentleman that they themselves were boasting of the huge salaries they got, and it is time to know how much they were paid.

Thank you, honourable colleagues.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 5, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Baird: I do not wish to reflect on anybody's judgment, but I think it would have been better for honourable members to have waited to hear what I have to say before applauding me in that manner.

Honourable senators, I would like to welcome the last three gentleman who were summoned to this chamber, and one in particular, who comes from my home town, St. John's, Newfoundland, the Honourable John Higgins. He is known to us as a scholar, learned in the law—and, what is more, he is known as a good fellow. He is, as honourable senators know, filling the vacancy caused by the death of Dr. Vincent Burke. Those senators who were privileged to be in the Senate during the time that Dr. Burke was here must have known him as having a personality and a charm which were distinctive; he was so greatly admired by others that he seemed to be in a class by himself. Jack Higgins, in coming to this chamber, has something to live up to. I feel that he will do that and I wish him well.

I wish to compliment both the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) on their speeches on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was particularly impressed by the remarks of the mover, describing the early days of the west—the pioneer days, as he termed them. I knew a certain amount about the west in the years from about 1909 to 1911. The clarion call of those years was, "Go west, young man, go west." I happened to be one of those that went west, but I purchased a return ticket.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: But why?

Hon. Mr. Baird: Well, when I look around and see all these prosperous westerners, I feel that I may have made a mistake.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Baird: All honourable senators who were privileged to be in this chamber last week and heard the speech made by the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) must have been, as I was, very much impressed. I thought that his speech had not only all and everything that was necessary in it, but it had the power even to stop the clock. That probably has never been done in this chamber before, but the honourable senator's speech did just that—it stopped the clock in this chamber. I hope the Government of the day will take something out of that.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The clock stopped before he started.

Hon. Mr. Baird: I hope that they will stop this squandermania, that they will stop these terrible extravagances and the stupidity which are going on today.

Honourable senators, it has been a complaint that the Speech from the Throne is carefully contrived to conceal more than it reveals. This session's Speech from the Throne is obviously a stop-gap of many words designed rather to confuse the reader or listener than to be a reasonable outline of the Government's real intentions. Obviously some forty pieces of proposed legislation plus the regular routine work of Parliament are more than can be accomplished in a single session, while the contradictory nature of some of the proposals suggests that the Government's proposals are still in a state of flux. For instance, the speech emphasizes the Government's concern over inflation and the preserving of the stability and purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. This concern does not fit in very neatly with the raising of freight rates, with deficit spending, raising unemployment insurance payments and undertaking additional public works—a luxury in themselves. Yet the speech does not even suggest in any way how the Government proposes to beat inflation and at the same time to countenance rising costs, including wages and higher interest rates on the national bond issue, as already arranged through the conversion of the national War Bonds.

Now, honourable senators, rising costs in themselves force inflation. Here in Canada we face a serious unemployment situation in a brand new setting. It has been an economic law in the past that falling costs accompany rising unemployment. In Canada today, as in other western countries, this law is no longer true. Costs continue to rise whatever the employment figure. The lessons of the past may throw a little light on the subject but certainly cannot solve the problem.

The Government will do well to make sure that its actions do not swell the inflationary tide, for each and every rise in costs is a definite inflationary factor. And the Government will be well advised to proceed with its proposed task of reconciling anti-inflationary moves. With the factor of rising prices of any kind we must avoid any contributory action in favour of the inflationary forces now at work.

The heavy legislative program suggested foreshadows heavy additional expenses, and we must presume that the Government plans to continue its deficit spending in the hopes of lifting the economy of the nation "by its own bootstraps".

It is only fair that the Government should take heed of the minority Opposition, for it cannot be expected that this Opposition should confine its concern and discussion to its numerical strength in Parliament.

In the Speech from the Throne, the statement that "my Government welcomes the evidence of recovery from the recession" does not quite jibe with the almost simultaneous announcement by the Department of Agriculture that "the decline in business investment and the offsetting Government spending are likely to continue in 1959." We may presume that the Minister of Agriculture has already heard from the Prime Minister in this regard.

The Speech suggests a massive effort to meet the problems of unemployment, but as usual neglects to even hint at the magic process to be used to combat this returning evil.

Frankly, honourable senators, I find that the Speech from the Throne is composed of many words, nicely written indeed, but with so little meat that it must be considered as entirely "evasive tactics" to keep Parliament from having any sound basis on what really to expect in the current session. So I fear, honourable senators, we must all be on our toes during the present session to help the Government keep in a straight line by adequate debate on each and every subject of discussion.

I have firm opinions on waste and inefficiency in any phase of our administration, and in my opinion the very vague information provided in the Speech defeats the very purpose of the ritual that is designed to give Parliament some hint of what to expect from the Government in the session. I feel that more could have been said in fewer words.

Sincere consideration and examination of operations of the Government and its buildings here in Ottawa could find great opportunities for decreasing Government expense and for improving the effective use of our staffs. Personally I would like to see a great many man- and woman-hours put to more effective use than providing almost unlimited "coffee breaks" for the staff. However, I suppose a Government without a program has to be vague, but it is unsatisfactory.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson) for his interesting words about the west when moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would also like to congratulate the seconder, the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette). I envy him his ability to speak so fluently in both the French and the English language. I too am bilingual, but I do not find much opportunity to speak Blackfoot while I am here in Ottawa.

I was particularly interested in Senator Pearson's fitting tribute to the pioneers of the west and those from Saskatchewan who made it possible for that province to become the greatest grain producer in the west. As next-door neighbour to the honourable senator from Saskatchewan, I cannot help but mention that we too are proud of our western heritage. In southern Alberta, we have a great history as a ranching country, and as a grain producer we have become famous for the quality of our products. This is shown by the many World Wheat Kings, Barley Kings and Oat Kings who come from Alberta.

Also, honourable senators, I would like to mention my own province again for the great strides it has made in the field of industry. Its industrial progress started in 1914 with the discovery of oil at Turner Valley and took on national importance when the Leduc field was discovered in 1947. Land once used for farming is now dotted with oil wells, refineries and many allied industries. At Pincher Creek, in my own area, we have a large field of natural gas, and, as a result of this, a sulphur extraction plant has been built about 25 miles west of my ranch.

This was the land where my people hunted buffalo only 80 years ago. During the passing years we have seen the buffalo disappear and the ranches—such as the Cochrane and the Waldron—come in with their big herds. We have seen the railroads built and the settlers arrive from all parts of the world.

In recent years, canals and dams have been built on the St. Mary and Belly Rivers, so that thousands of acres in the Lethbridge district have become irrigated. With irrigation we have become producers of sugar beets, vegetable crops and other food products. These lands are supporting thousands of people where once there was only dry buffalo grass.

Honourable senators, in what I have said I have been expressing a natural pride in the region and province in which I was born and raised, and in which, I hope, I have grown to maturity. On the other hand, I am quite aware of the fact that by virtue of my appointment, at the instance of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, I am now representing all of the Indian population in this great country. This is my simple duty and I propose to discharge it to the limit of my ability to do so. In point of fact, I have by invitation since my appointment met with large Indian gatherings in most parts of Canada. It is my hope and expectation in the ensuing weeks, so far as my parliamentary duties permit, to meet with representative Indian gatherings in those parts of Canada which I have not yet been able to visit.

In the interests of all my own people I was happy to see, in the Speech from the Throne, that the Government intends to put forward a resolution to establish a joint committee of both houses to review the Indian Act and the administration of Indian affairs.

In 1946 the Government established a similar committee to examine the Indian Act and to make suggestions as to the amendments they felt were needed. They were given eight matters to consider in particular. These were: treaty rights and obligations, band membership, liability of Indians to pay taxes, enfranchisement of Indians, eligibility of Indians to vote at dominion elections, encroachment of white persons on Indian reserves, operation of day and residential schools, and any matters relating to the social and economic status of the Indians. I believe there are five or six of the honourable senators among our present number who served on this committee.

In 1947, I was invited to appear before the committee on behalf of the Indian Association of Alberta. Our group, like many others in Canada, presented our views to the committee and received a sympathetic hearing from them. We, from Alberta, left Ottawa with the feeling that this was the dawn of a new life for our people. We were happy to think that the Government would, at last, do something with respect to the social and economic problems of our reserves.

After calling over a hundred meetings, interviewing many witnesses and reviewing over four hundred written briefs, the joint committee, in 1948 made a number of recommendations to the Government concerning changes in the Indian Act.

They noted that—and I quote:

> Many contradictions and divergencies were found in the Act.

A number of recommendations were accordingly made which were designed—and again I quote from the Journals:

> —to make possible the gradual transition of Indians from wardship to citizenship and to help them to advance themselves.

Imagine our surprise in 1950 when Bill 267 was introduced! In our opinion it took away almost everything that was good about the old Indian Act and replaced it with provisions which would be much better designed for concentration camps rather than for Indian reserves. A further fraction of our freedom was taken away and we were left in a position worse than it was before. It was the general feeling that not only the specific recommendations but the spirit in which they were made by the joint committee had been ignored in drawing up Bill 267. Letters and telegrams of protest came from all parts of Canada—not just from Indians, but from public-spirited citizens who were equally alarmed by the proposed act. In our own province protests were sent by farm organizations, women's associations, and many other groups. As a result, the bill was shelved and the Indian peoples everywhere began to review it clause by clause to recommend changes. In Alberta, we held two meetings in Calgary and two at the Hobbema Reserve, to give all Indians a chance to make their suggestions.

In 1951 I was again summoned to Ottawa, and again it was with a feeling of confidence that the Honourable the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would give serious consideration to our suggestions and take steps to revise the objectionable parts of the bill. However, when we arrived we found that Bill 79, which was to replace Bill 267, was already printed and we were apparently expected to give our approval. We made further recommendations, but these seem to have been ignored.

Bill 79 was some improvement over Bill 267, but in many ways it was worse than the original Indian Act. The major exceptions were health and education. In these two fields, in all fairness, the Government has progressively done an excellent job, although there is still much more to be done.

Nevertheless, Bill 79 became the new Indian Act, and from it resulted such persecutions as those which occurred at the Hobbema Indian Reserve in 1955. Some sections of the new act turned neighbour against neighbour and resulted in the attempted expulsion from treaty rights of over a hundred Indians who had spent all their lives on the reserve. This was one of the first clauses removed by the present Government.

However, we are still being subjected to other hardships as the result of the present act. Many of our problems are caused by the sudden transfer of powers to local Indian councils, who have had neither the education nor the experience to administer their economic and financial affairs. It is well and good that such powers should be in the hands of our own people, but only when we have gained the kind of training which will make us capable of doing these things. We have been wards of the Government for so long that we have forgotten how to administer our own affairs.

This experience does not come from going to school. When an Indian is sent to an Indian school and mixes only with people of his own race, he does not get the training necessary for him to compete in the world around him. It is my belief that no schools—particularly for high school pupils—should be built on the reserves, but that Indians should be encouraged and assisted in mixing with non-Indians so that they may receive a better understanding of the country in which they live.

Honourable senators, I hope you will forgive me for going into such details about the previous joint committee, but I want you to know how the Indians felt about it. We are happy that the meetings were held, but felt that we had wasted our time by coming to Ottawa in 1951. The two bills which were brought forward by the Government in general did not follow the suggestions either of the Indian peoples or of the joint committee.

We are happy to see that the new Government now proposes to review the present Indian Act. We hope that on this occasion the suggestions of the Indians will be considered more seriously. We Indians are the ones who live under the shadow of this act, and we know from experience the good and bad points of it. While we cannot expect a complete solution to all our problems, we do hope that relief will be given from the more offensive or unjust aspects of the present act.

As in 1947, I again look forward to the dawn of a new life for the Indian people of Canada. In 1947 the sun did not rise above the horizon, but plunged us into greater darkness. I hope that as a result of this proposed joint committee we will now be assisted in making the slow and difficult transition from our native life to that of the people around us, which is our only hope.

Honourable senators, the native population of Canada is conservative with a small "c". Our Indian brothers, with good reason, are suspicious of change, for fear that what little they have left may be taken away or impaired. They demand the assurance that nothing that may be done by the Parliament or Government of Canada will diminish or impair the guaranteed rights which have hitherto been conceded to them. They are understandably fearful of any encroachment and will want to be reassured in this regard. At the same time our Indians are not unaware that there are basic human rights and freedoms not now assured to them. At present they need the protection hitherto accorded them but they do not regard themselves in any way as a subject or a servile race. They are now thriving and looking forward to a better life. May I invite my fellow-Canadians to do everything in their power not only to safeguard the historic rights of our native Canadians, but to improve their status and lot in life so that they may in future contribute materially to the welfare and glory of this great country of Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Higgins, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill S-8, respecting The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill provides amendments to the original act of incorporation of The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada, which was incorporated by act of Parliament in 1875. This company has its head office at the city of Toronto, and it is the oldest company in Canada specializing in the field of boiler and machinery insurance.

Under this bill the company seeks four things: first, an extension of the classes of business that it may write; second, an increase in its authorized capital; third, a reduction in the par value of its shares from $100 to $10 each; and finally, certain other amendments of a rather technical nature.

The company was originally incorporated under the name of The Canadian Steam-Users' Insurance Association, which was changed by acts of Parliament passed in 1889 and in 1892. The original capital of the company consisted of $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each.

The bill now before this house provides for an extension of the classes of business the company would be authorized to transact. It will be seen from the explanatory notes that the previous objects clauses as contained in the original act of incorporation and in the two amending acts, the first passed in 1889 and the second in 1892, are rather cumbersome and do not give to the company the power to extend its operations throughout the field of fire and casualty insurance which, at the present time, is essential to a company of this type. In coming to Parliament the company seeks power to transact all the usual classes of business except life insurance. These classes are set out in detail in clause 1 of the bill, and they fall in one or other of two classifications: either as fire insurance or casualty insurance. I might state that the company does not intend to alter the nature of its main business, namely, the writing of boiler and machinery insurance, but it does feel that it should have the right to write these additional classes of insurance if it is to progress with Canada.

This bill, in addition to changing or extending the classes of insurance which the company can write, will increase the authorized capital of the company to $1 million, to be divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $10 each. Further, it will authorize the company to increase, by by-law, its capital to an amount not exceeding $2 million upon approval first having been obtained in the usual way, by two-thirds of the votes cast at a special general meeting of the shareholders of the company called for the purpose of considering the same.

At the present time this company has outstanding 3,000 shares of a par value of $100 each. These shares will be subdivided into 30,000 shares, so that each shareholder will receive 10 shares for each share now held by him.

The par value of these shares will then be reduced from $100 to $10. The increase, as the explanatory notes to section 2 indicate, is sought as a result of the extraordinary growth of the company's business and the size of its surplus, and the reduction in the par value of its shares is sought on the ground that such reduction would give the capital stock of the company a greater marketability and popularity with the investing public. The officers of the company have advised me that it is not the company's present intention to make a public offering of its shares, but they feel that the par value of the shares should be reduced in view of the possibility of this taking place at a future time.

The next change that should be noted concerns clause 4 of the bill, which amends section 8 of the original act of incorporation. This latter section is set out in full in the explanatory notes, and provides that notice of shareholders' meetings shall be given in accordance with section 6 of the 1875 act, which called for 15 days' continuous notice in a daily newspaper at or near the head office of the company. Not only is such extended notice unnecessary, but its cost has become extremely high; and the suggested amendment would require that only one insertion of the notice of shareholders' meetings be carried in at least two newspapers—which requirement, I believe, is in line with the present provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

The last and final amendment sought by this bill concerns section 18 of the act of incorporation, which limits dividends paid in any one year to 20 per cent of the paid capital of the company. In view of the present surplus of the company this limitation means that dividends of less than 2½ per cent of the entire working capital of the company can be paid, and it is now felt that this situation is unduly restrictive and could well be eliminated.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my honourable friend a question? I think he has stated that the company does not intend to make any public offering of its stock.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does that mean it is going to issue stock in any other way?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It is quite possible the company may give the present shareholders the right to subscribe for additional shares.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask the honourable senator a question on an interesting point, in respect to subsection (3) of section 1, which appears on page 2 of the bill? If a company is to engage in any of these additional coverages, does this mean that the paid-up capital, together with the surplus for each of these additional services, has to be increased by the sums indicated so that the income from the $300,000 paid-up capital, if the company engaged in all these various lines of insurance, could well become, on a quick guess, about $1 million?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am not quite sure of the answer to that, and I would prefer not to try to give it. When the bill goes to committee I will have the proper officers of the company there to explain and give the answer to the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: If I remember correctly the honourable gentleman from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) stated that under the act of 1875 the company was supposed to give 15 days' notice of shareholders' meetings.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Continuous notice.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What do you propose under this present legislation?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It is proposed to have one insertion in two newspapers located at or near the head office of the company.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That can only happen after the shareholders have a meeting, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask what other notice a company must give in addition to the two insertions?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The usual notice to the shareholders. This is something additional. In 1875 advertising costs were very small and 15 days' continuous advertising did not amount to very much.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do you have to insert anything in the Canada Gazette?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act does not require anything to be inserted in the Canada Gazette, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It seems to me that nowadays when shareholders in these big institutions reside in all parts of the country, from one end of Canada to the other, that the publication in one newspaper or two newspapers—perhaps two newspapers in the one locality—without any provision with regard to how much circulation they have or whether they are national papers is inadequate and we might well dispense with any such publication whatsoever. I think the time is coming for that.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am inclined to agree with the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Would it not be much more effective, instead of requiring the notice of the annual meeting to be given in a couple of newspapers 15 days beforehand, to insert the usual provision, which is far more effective, that notice should be sent by registered mail to the address of each shareholder before the meeting?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that is provided for under the bylaws of the company, and this amendment in question is to get away from the great expense of publishing for 15 continuous days in a daily newspaper.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRIES AND ANSWERS

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

No. 1.

1. Who are the producers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present on strike, and what amount was paid to each of them by the C.B.C., and for what programs?

2. What was the total cost of these programs on television?

No 2.

What salary was paid to each artist of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958?

No. 3.

What amount was paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by each sponsor on television, from January 1, 1958 until December 31, 1958, and for what programs?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have the following answers to the honourable gentleman's inquiries:

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

No. 1

(1) A list of producers at present on strike is attached as Appendix I. (See below.)

It would be detrimental to the position of the corporation in negotiating for the services of producers to make public the amounts paid to individuals for services.

Unless a limited period were specified it would be difficult if not impossible to list the programs produced by this group of producers.

No. 2

Artists are not paid a salary but are engaged on a per occasion basis. Statements of payments to individuals have been held to be not in the public interest as being detrimental to the position of the corporation in negotiating for such services for broadcasting.

No. 3

As the corporation is engaged in a competitive business it would be disadvantageous and in the view of the corporation unethical to make public amounts paid to the corporation by commercial sponsors.

MOTION

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot moved, pursuant to notice, for:

Copy of the form of contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the producers.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have several copies of the agreement, in both English and French, and I will table one set. I shall be able to furnish the honourable senator with several copies for his own information. Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable gentleman. I am very anxious to look at the text of the agreement.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

OFFICIAL OPENING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, a few moments ago in the House of Commons the Right Honourable the Prime Minister made an announcement to the effect that on June 26 the President of the United States, accompanied by Madam Eisenhower, will join with Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip to officiate at the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. I was in the gallery at the time, and I noticed that from all corners of the house there was an obvious feeling of happiness at that news.

I would like you, honourable senators to know that the people of Montreal, in a few minutes from now, will certainly be happy to hear this news.

I think it is in order to congratulate the Government of Canada on having successfully arranged for this visit of the President of the United States to our country and although perhaps I am not authorized to speak on behalf of the population of Canada, I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that the whole of the Canadian people will be delighted and honoured by the visit.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, a few moments ago the Right Honourable the Prime Minister made an announcement in the House Commons to the effect that on June 26 the President of the United States, accompanied by Mrs. Eisenhower, will join with Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness Prince Phillip to officiate at the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway in Montreal.

I noticed with deep satisfaction that, from all sides of the house, the news was greeted with pleasure and enthusiasm, as it will no doubt be greeted by all Canadians, in a few hours, and especially by the people of Canada's metropolis.

I think it is in order to offer cordial congratulations to the Government of Canada for having successfully carried out its arrangements with the President.

The visit of our Queen and of the head of the great republic to the south on this occasion will rank as one of the most important events of this century in Canada, in North America and in the Commonwealth.

The seaway is one of the greatest shipping projects ever undertaken on the face of the earth. It was made possible by the friendship, understanding and mutual trust of the two great peoples who traditionally live in peace and look to the future with confidence. It also testifies to the economic strength of Canada which will ever continue to increase.

For us Montrealers it is surely the event of the century and, as mayor of the metropolis, I am most happy to take this opportunity of wishing in advance a most cordial welcome to our illustrious and royal guests.

I may also add that, if it pleases honourable senators to honour us with their presence on that day, they are invited to come and share the royal welcome which will be extended by our people.

Honourable senators, may I be allowed to point out that we have today the pleasure and honour of welcoming in our country's capital a large delegation of civic employees from the City of Montreal.

(Text):

We hope that on this occasion a large delegation from the Canadian Senate will attend the big ceremony in Montreal. I would like to let you know, honourable senators, that each and every one of you will be especially welcome in that city, the more so because it happens fortunately that one of your humble colleagues is at this time mayor of Montreal. As mayor, I will be in a position to extend to you a most hearty and, I hope, as royal a welcome as I shall try to extend to Her Majesty the Queen.

MONTREAL CIVIC EMPLOYEES—VISIT TO PARLIAMENT

I wish now to refer to an event that is taking place in Ottawa today. Parliament is being visited by a delegation from the civil employees of Montreal. Those employees, who number 15,000 have organized themselves into study groups and attend various courses at the university, as well as visiting various places of interest with a view to becoming more competent to handle their duties.

(Translation):

Our public servants have organized themselves in study groups, with a view to improving their minds and fulfilling their duties more efficiently. They understand that municipal government is the closest one to the people and that all over Canada civic employees are the public servants closest to our citizens; it is their duty to receive them, to speak and to listen to them in an effort to understand them and to satisfy their needs. They are doing that task with ability and friendliness.

And there is not a week that passes but that visitors from abroad, who have come to inquire into the workings of our various municipal services, write us, upon returning to their own city or country, give the kindest and well-deserved praise for the quality of our services.

For those reasons, honourable senators, may I repeat that I am most happy to see them here and I hope they will retain the most useful and pleasant memories of their visit to Ottawa.

HON. ARTHUR L. BEAUBIEN

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate in your name one of our colleagues, on this the anniversary of his birth, for his wisdom and his contribution in a large measure to the good administration of the Senate of Canada. I speak of our good friend Senator Arthur Beaubien.

It is said in the Book that the elders are nearest to the Throne because of their wisdom. Well, because of our honourable colleague's wisdom, his four score years "and less" do not show on him.

Senator Beaubien was born on a farm, near the land of his ancestors, and as a farmer he was better able perhaps than many others born in other circumstances to become a wise man even in his younger days. He proved his early wisdom when in 1921 the electors of Provencher decided to send him to Ottawa as a member of the House of Commons under the banner of the National Progressive Party. He was one of the first members of Parliament to show independence, and he came here with an open mind to study public life in this country. In his wisdom and at the appropriate time he decided to change his affiliation, but neither going too much to the left with the revolutionaries, nor too much to the right with the reactionaries, he rather went straight ahead with those who favoured progress without revolution nor reaction, and so he joined the ranks of the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The history of Canada, as it will be told in the future, might well have been different had our good friend not left his earlier party and joined the Liberal party as he did.

Without making what may be regarded as a partisan speech, may I conclude by saying we owe much to our honourable colleague Senator Beaubien, and we wish him another score of good and wise years to come.

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I wish to thank my honourable friend the senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) for the kind words he has spoken on my behalf.

It is true, I am up in years. Nevertheless I hope Providence will be kind enough to give me a few more years, so that I may continue to enjoy the privilege of being associated with my colleagues in the Senate, a body that I think no other in the world can compete with for kindness, wisdom and all the other good qualities. Once again, I thank you.

Mr. Speaker, as long as Providence gives me strength you will from time to time see me cross over to the other side of the chamber, but I hope I may not do so when Your Honour is on your feet. I have been told that I have transgressed in that respect. But you can rest assured, Sir, that as I grow older I will correct all my sins.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, from force of habit I almost committed a breach of the rules of this house. If I had done so, I suppose I would have been thrust into outer darkness, for which there would have been no gnashing of teeth on your part but a great deal of weeping on my part. If in the future I commit a blunder—and I am apt to do so—I would ask you to consider and accept the precept of equity which decrees that that is done which ought to have been done; and if at any time I say anything unforeseen, please do not consider what I said, but what I ought to have said. Then everything will be well: you will be right, I shall be put right, and you shall be giving me the charity of the doubt.

I suppose there comes in the life of every man the time when he makes his maiden speech, whether it be in an institution, organization, association, or the Senate of Canada. This is my maiden speech in the Senate. To you, honorable senators, it is like an axiom, the truth of which is so apparent as to be instantly admitted. It is rather incongruous to apply the word "maiden" to middle age. Of course there is no such thing as old age. Many people hover on the fringe of old age, never reach it, and die in middle age. The Scripture's three score years and ten has been discarded and has no application under modern conditions. We all live in the serenity, culture and pleasantness of middle age.

I first saw the Senate many years ago when a flippant friend was showing me around Ottawa in my youthful days. Naturally, we came to the Senate chamber. He said, "This is the Senate. 'Senate', as you know, comes from the Latin senex, and that means 'old'. This is a forum of old men." The implication never struck me until the other day. On the Thursday when I was sworn in I took it as a personal insult. When I look around and see such fine-looking, young-looking and bright-looking senators—including myself, of course—I would like to say, but I cannot say it, because, I understand it has been declared unparliamentary in the other house, that that friend's remark was a fabrication, but I will adopt a remark of the Speaker of another house—the same house to which I was referring—that probably the word "invention" will do. So I say that probably it was an invention. Speaking seriously now, this young man is, I suppose, today of my vintage, and as he grows older he will no doubt realize the value of maturity of judgement and wisdom. The leaders in peace and war of today are looked upon by young men as old.

The second time I saw the Senate was in 1949, when I was returning from the Canadian Bar Association meeting in Banff. I stopped off here in order to see the opening of Parliament. It was in September. I remember well that afternoon; the memory is vivid, the scene is ever before me. The lobby outside was crowded; the galleries were filled with beautiful women in dresses of variegated colours. The judges, in bright-coloured robes, were balancing themselves on the Woolsack. The red carpet was ablaze, the lights lit up the ceiling and walls. It was a scene of riotous colour, as though the pomp of autumn had entered the council chamber. But where is the Woolsack? I suppose one might as well ask, "Where are the snows of yesteryear?" No doubt some changes are necessary and, as for the Woolsack, I do not suppose it was the most comfortable seat in the world, and there was always the possibility that one of the judges might fall off, which would be very undignified.

The third time I look on the Senate is now when I come here during my maturer days to take part in the deliberations of one of the great Parliaments of the world.

I come from St. John's, Newfoundland. I was born and bred there, and by the grace of God I shall die there and be buried among my forebears. I say that publicly because I have received letters from real estate agents telling me that they understood I intended to make my permanent home here and offering me good houses in the vicinity.

St. John's, the capital city of Newfoundland, with a population of 60,000, is the oldest inhabited portion of this side of the world, apart of course from its occupancy by the red Indians, who were there before we came. It was discovered in 1497 by John Cabot, who annexed it in the name of the King of England. Cape Breton makes the same claim, but if Cape Breton was discovered first, and so has the right of priority, why did so many fishermen come to the waters around Newfoundland rather than to Cape Breton? I would not try to strain your credulity by suggesting that one evening in 1497 John Cabot, looking at the radar on board his little schooner and seeing a black mass, said: "Heavens, I have discovered Newfoundland. I was told to discover Cape Breton." He gave the order "Hard a port, south by west," and that night he went down the coast of Newfoundland until he came to Cape Race and, turning west, sailed on mile after mile until he landed at Cape Breton. If anyone wants to challenge that I would reply as did the virago who, turning on her henpecked husband, said: "That is my opinion. Let me have your weak rejoinder."

Within a few years after St. John's was founded thousands of fishermen from all parts of Europe arrived, and St. John's was well inhabited by the year 1500. Of course other places on the island besides St. John's became populated. There are many small bays and coves in which Newfoundlanders settled to carry on their vocation of fishing. In fact, there are so many of these big bays and small bays and little coves that the coastline of Newfoundland has the enormous extent of nearly 5,000 miles.

The early history of Newfoundland is, then, the history of the North American continent. It was the cornerstone of civilization on this side of the world. By its formal annexation by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in 1583, it became the cornerstone of the British Empire. There is evidence that Vikings landed in Newfoundland in the tenth century, and there is a story that St. Brendan and some Irish monks arrived there. According to legend St. Brendan, looking toward the west in search of the famous Isles of the Blest, set out with other monks from Ireland and came first to Iceland, from Iceland to Greenland, and from Greenland to Newfoundland—so mapping out the future course of the aeroplanes. When Cabot landed at Newfoundland, in 1497, he met nobody who could speak anything but the language of the aborigines. It is, however, an historical fact that when the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, in 1620, they were welcomed in their own tongue —English—by an Indian named Squantum, who learned the English language in Newfoundland. Let me here remark that if, because of something which happened in 1620, some Bostonians and others regard themselves as having blue blood in their veins, there must be a large number of Newfoundlanders going around with golden, or rather purple, blood, making them the aristocrats of this part of the world, although of course the real aristocrats are the red Indians who first occupied this place and whose ancient background may make even blue-blooded Bostonians blush.

The fishermen of Newfoundland built up the commerce of the west of England. It is said that for nearly two hundred years half the wealth of England came from the ocean around Newfoundland. Lord Bacon declared that the fisheries of Newfoundland were richer and more important than the famed Peruvian mines; and Pitt, the great Englishman, said that if Napoleon took London he, Pitt, would still fight on to preserve the fisheries of Newfoundland.

The fisheries were, and still are, carried on in two ways. We have the shore fishing around the bays and coves, where men go out in the evening from their little hamlets and villages to set their traps or trawls, and in the morning draw their traps or trawls. The other type is called the bank fishery, where the fishing is carried on at the big plateau, the Grand Banks, some 90 to 120 miles from Newfoundland. There schooners stay two or three weeks, and when they get a load of fish they come into Newfoundland. The shore fisheries of Newfoundland have deteriorated in the last few years.

I do not think the Premier of Newfoundland has much sympathy with shore fishing. He seems to look at the same ocean and see only the water.

Well, I came in with Cabot and went out with Pitt, 300 years later, and now I am going to pass the next 150 years, except for referring to one point. In Placentia Bay there is a place called Placentia, which is the old capital of the region occupied by the French around the year 1662. And there on the borders of Placentia Bay, near Placentia, Roosevelt and Churchill drafted the terms of the Atlantic Union on a warship which was anchored there.

There is a charming collection of place names in Newfoundland and a large number of those go back to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Some are in the French language, some in the English language and some in other languages, and of course many of them have become Anglicized either by translation or phonetically. For instance, Havre de Grace became Harbour Grace, Cape de Raz became Cape Race. A particularly outstanding example of phonetic change is a place outside St. John's called Bay Bulls. The real name was Baie des Boules, the Bay of Rocks. Many old French names still remain in their original form: Notre Dame Bay, Baie d'Espoir, which in Newfoundland is called Bay Despair—a terrible phonetic change—Franchois, Bay de Vieux, Chaleur Bay, Cinq Cerf Bay, Benbois, L'Anse a l'eau, La Hune, La Manche, Bonne Esperance, Bay de Verde, and then the Basque name which has such a familiar but such an embarrassing sound in some circles around here, Port aux Basques. There are other delightful happy names, such as Seldom-Come-By, Blow-Me-Down, Luchs's Bight, Heart's Desire, Heart's Content, Heart's Delight, and Little Heart's Ease, and that most poignant one of all, Breakheart Point.

I have some maps starting with Ramusio's of 1556 and going on through the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, with the same names existing now, the names being in French, English, Italian or Dutch, according to the country in which the maps were made. One thing, I trust, is that the Postmaster General will leave these names alone and make no changes in them.

I said that Newfoundland was first inhabited in 1500, one hundred years before the mainland was inhabited. Yet we talk of the baby province—a baby 100 years older than the mother. If you can explain that you can explain creation, and then you are in the realm of the supernatural, and I do not think it is within the jurisdiction or province of this Senate to deal with supernatural matters.

Newfoundland has been painted by many people who never saw the place. It has often been spoken of in such a way that one would think we Newfoundlanders live near the North Pole. In reality we are almost as far south as Paris, France, and by latitude we lie between Seattle and Vancouver. In the last few years the temperature has rarely gone below zero. We do not get the heat of the summer that is so oppressive on most parts of the mainland. We have no earthquakes to terrify us. We have no tornadoes or floods to disturb the peaceful serenity of our lives. We may live wrapped in the solitude of our isolation, but it is the solitude of peaceful ways, and the isolation leaves us our own customs and our own form of speech still intact.

Honourable senators, a couple of days before I came to Ottawa a friend of mine with classical knowledge told me that he knew I would enjoy myself in the Senate, where I would have otium cum dignitate—ease with dignity. Now, the ease is understandable but the dignity is doubtful. You know, it is hardly dignifying for a senator to wander around the halls of this mammoth building not knowing where he is and whither tending, till finally he gains enough of courage to ask some attendant for directions. He seems more like a character walking out of Mark Twain's Innocents Abroad. I well remember one time trying to find the chambers of the Speaker of the House of Commons, an old friend of mine. Somehow I found myself on the proper floor after directions had been given me. I certainly saw the same Gothic arches there but I still didn't know where I was, so I went to an attendant at a desk and asked him where the Speaker's chambers were. He asked, "Have you got an appointment?" and I said, "No". He said, "Then I had better phone" and I said; "No, it isn't necessary. I just want to leave a note at his office." He still wanted to phone and I said, "I just happen to be a senator and I am sure nobody will object to my going to the office without being announced beforehand." Well, his whole attitude changed then and he led me to the door. I guess he was afraid I would lose myself again.

Probably if I had the navigational gifts of the sea captains of Newfoundland who prowl along the bays and coves and shores of Newfoundland in all kinds of stormy weather, of the captains who could have given expert advice regarding the William Carson and could have told about the harbour of Port aux Basques, I am sure I would have got my bearings and arrived at my port expeditiously and in safety.

The first moment of my appearance in the Senate was one which will be ever impressed on my mind. I came up to the Senate door on the Thursday morning of the day when I was installed here. There was a bright young looking man at the desk and I said to him, "Can you tell me where Senator Aseltine's room is?" He replied: "I will phone. What is your name?" I said, "My name is John Higgins" and he took the phone down and started to phone. After talking for a short while he put the phone back on the hook and turned to me and said, "Senator Higgins, I congratulate you, and welcome." Somehow I went up the stairs with my head held higher and my shoulders thrown back, and my whole being exhilarated. That was my first welcome to the Senate. But it was the forerunner of many other welcomes kindly given me by the honourable senators and the members of the staff and those who look after our peace and security. These, I say, will be pleasant memories. They form the touch of nature which makes the whole world kin. I began to realize I was in a friendly atmosphere. I saw friendly faces and I heard friendly voices. The handclasps were friendly. I had come to a place which heretofore had not been part or parcel of my life and I felt I was not a stranger in the land. The words of Belloc haunt me:

> From quiet homes and first beginning,
> Out to the undiscovered ends,
> There's nothing worth the wear of winning
> But laughter and the love of friends.

When I came to Ottawa in 1949 I was a husky man, carrying 200 pounds of good Newfoundland beef and brawn. Now, behold me, a mere 160 pounds. I have gone from the heavyweight division to the welterweight class. I have gone through many vicissitudes since Confederation took place between Newfoundland and Canada. In 1950, when I was crossing the Cabot Strait, a terrible storm arose. I was thrown around my cabin and I had five ribs on one side broken. I landed at North Sydney, Cape Breton, where I spent some weeks in hospital. Two months later I got ulcers on the eyeballs and that was a terribly painful experience. That summer I attended a joint meeting of the Canadian and American Bar Associations at Washington, and on my way home I got my arm caught in a subway car in New York. I fell on the ice shortly after and got that modern disease called bursitis, which laid me up a long time. I thought everything was finished. But a little less than three years ago I fell over my basement stairs and tore the main tendon on my leg, and I was in hospital some weeks in Halifax and then went around in a cast for some time. I seem to have been appointed by the Lord to atone for the sin of my country for entering Confederation, and the sin must be a very grievous one. I know the good Lord will not give me any more than I can bear, but I wish He didn't have such a high opinion of me.

Now, with all that in view, I pray that I shall always walk these corridors with circumspection, and slide along those slippery floors with ease and dignity, so that I shall be spared the terrible embarrassment of being found prone in some hallway, an attitude that might give rise to some grave suspicion, so that I might not receive either the benefit or the charity of the doubt.

Quod dixi, dixi. What I have said I have said. But what have I said? Some may think I do not know what I am talking about, and some may think that they do not know what I am talking about. Some may say it is only hodge-podge without law, order or co-ordination in it, and others may say it is no speech at all for the Senate. I know that some people let their minds wander and eventually lose them. I still have a grasp of my mind. That is my opinion, but it may not be yours.

I could have thanked the speakers who spoke so kindly of the three new senators—les Trois Mousquetaires who have joined the ranks of Gascony. I wish to rectify the omission. It is done. I do thank them from the bottom of my heart for the kind words that have been said. I also want to thank my senatorial parents—I don't think I should say godparents, but whatever the term is—who led me with all due decorum into this chamber, brought me to the inner sanctum and provided for my baptismal moments here, until I attained my majority on coming to my chair here.

I could have thanked the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the motion for an Address, who started this debate. From what I heard of their speeches from those who have already spoken, and from others, I understand they were of a high order, models of their class and worth while hearing. Unfortunately, I did not have the opportunity or the pleasure of listening. It is heartening to realize that one of the speakers is the gentleman—pardon me, please consider I said the honourable senator—on my left (Hon. Mr. Choquette), the great bilinguist, who has given me some good advice, and will I am sure be "my guide, philosopher and friend" whenever the necessity arises.

I could have spoken of the Bill of Rights and I could have mentioned the United Nations. I could have talked of the natural resources of this great country and of the necessity for the preservation of our forests and the conservation of our wild life. I could have spoken of the wonderful railway services west of Montreal and the comparatively poor services east of Montreal. I could have discussed the means to exorcize the evil of inflation. I could have spoken of the advisability of converting bonds into longer-term issues at higher rates of interest, and about short-term loans and the possibility of borrowing from one's self—a healthy, lovely, pleasant thought. I could have debated other matters, but not too well. I know only one side of the question and have not had time to learn the other side. If I spoke about those things, you might realize I was speaking as a special pleader, and what is worse I myself would think that I was acting as such.

Eben Holden, in the famous book Eben Holden, said:

> If everyone knew what he was going to talk about, there would be a heap more silence in the world.

As a corollary to that I would add that it is better for a man who has been asked to speak to keep sitting down and let his audience think he is a fool, rather than that he should get to his feet and talk a lot without saying anything and make his hearers sure he is a fool.

With that in view, I would think it presumptuous on my part, with my infantile senatorial experience, to speak on matters I am not thoroughly conversant with. Consequently, I took the two subjects about which I can speak, if not with expert knowledge, at least with more knowledge than all of you or at least most of you possess —that is, my country and myself. As to the former, there cannot be much doubt, but as to the latter perhaps I am wrong, because it may be a truism that if we knew as much about ourselves as others know about us we would be more careful and circumspect. Anyway, I did not say much about myself —modesty prohibits that—and what I did say was not controversial and it certainly was not flattering. No matter what I said—it may not be prose, and it certainly is not poetry, but whatever it is you can take it for what it is worth, and in all humility I say that may be nothing.

If my speech was not what was expected, if I did not give the information and treat of the subjects that are usually spoken about in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, or if there is too much levity in it, then all I can do is to remind you of the sign over the piano in the saloon in the days of the lawless west, which read: "Don't shoot the piano player, he is only doing his best." Give me that chance.

In the days of my youth I used to read the speeches of the great orators of the British Houses of Parliament, particularly men like Chatham, Erskine and Mansfield, who spoke in the House of Lords. Now, I am not trying to push myself into the realm of oratory or to mix my humble name with those mighty ones, but I noticed that they always finished their speeches by saying, "My lords, I have done." I would not dare to say, "Honourable senators, I have done", because someone might ask, "Done what?" And then I would have to start all over again. So to avoid such a contingency I shall say, "Honourable senators, I conclude."

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, in rising to participate in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I want to preface my remarks first by concurrence in the many complimentary words that have already been said by the former speakers in this debate about certain of our honourable colleagues. In some places, under some other circumstances, further compliments might be considered to be overdoing it or to be repetitious, but as one of our colleagues said here a few months ago:

> Pleasant duties are so rare that it is no burden to repeat these compliments.

I think under the circumstances that is right. The traditional custom of freely expressing admiration and respect for colleagues is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the Senate—just as a hallmark distinguishes sterling from plate. And so, honourable senators, it is without hesitation that I repeat, at this time, sincere congratulations to the Honourable the Speaker, the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) on their continuance in their respective offices. All have distinguished themselves by their dignified and faithful fulfilment of their duties in the past.

I also wish to extend my congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. These honourable senators, who are among the newer members of this house, displayed a quality that marks them for distinguished careers in this place.

To our three new colleagues who have just recently responded to the summons to serve in the Senate, I extend a warm welcome. But first I would like to pay a special compliment to the honourable senator who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Higgins) and I think I can say that he treated us to a most refreshing and masterly speech. As a junior senator myself, I want to tell our new colleagues that the unanimous and friendly welcome which I received here two years ago has continued to grow in warmth and helpfulness as I have become better acquainted. I am sure they too will find their membership here the most inspiring experience of their lives.

Speaking now on the motion before us, I want to say that I made a very careful study and analysis of the Speech from the Throne and I found about forty separate subjects for consideration. Many of these subjects were presented in some detail, while others were rather obscured by the brevity of the reference to them. I wish to refer to Canada-United States relations, and I am encouraged to do so by the fact that the United States was mentioned once in the Speech from the Throne and Canada-United States relations were mentioned by the mover of the motion which we are debating. However, my main purpose in speaking on this subject now is to give my endorsation to the excellent report we heard from the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt). I first wish to congratulate him upon the accurate detail with which he reviewed the meeting in Washington, D.C., on January 8, 9 and 10 last and, secondly, I wish to thank him for his kindly reference to my humble contribution to the meeting. I can assure honourable senators that the honourable Deputy-Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Brunt) leaned to modesty in his report. I want to associate myself with his complimentary remarks about the leadership given to the Canadian section of the Inter-Parliamentary group by the honourable Speaker of this house, in which he was ably assisted by the honourable Speaker of the other place. I hope I shall be excused for saying that the Canadian delegation as a body, including the ladies, made a worthy impression on the people whom we met—an impression that I am satisfied will contribute to making the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group a continuing and fruitful agency in fulfilling a need that has long been recognized.

We got away to a good start, and that start was not confined to the Washington meeting. That meeting was what I would call the last phase of the beginning of this important innovation. I am not going to thresh over old straw by reviewing in detail the various steps that led up to a renewed and vigorous interest in this subject within the last year. However, in order to furnish a background for what has happened just recently I want to say that, in my opinion, no other single incident did so much to push this proposal along to finality as the debate that took place in this house last session. The debate was inspired by a resolution put forward by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who, in an excellent supporting address, reviewed efforts that had been made over a long period of time to promote an inter-parliamentary committee. Honourable senators will recall that the debate was marked by many brilliant addresses that reflected the intense interest of the Senate in the matter of Canada-United States relations. But much concern was expressed by several of the speakers who referred to many previous attempts that had died on the vine for lack of sustained interest and effort.

During the time the debate that I refer to was going on in this house, President Eisenhower paid a visit to Ottawa and addressed the two Houses of Parliament. The President's visit and his address contributed much to the cause of an inter-parliamentary committee. That is borne out by the fact that shortly after his visit the United States House of Representatives sent to Canada two distinguished gentlemen in the persons of Congressman Brooks Hays, of Arkansas, and Congressman Frank M. Coffin, of Maine. Their first visit to Canada, last spring, resulted in a report being released on May 5, 1958. On their second visit, which was in the fall of 1958, and, as I have already said, followed the visit of the President of the United States and also the unanimous passing by our Senate of the resolution supporting the Prime Minister's recommendation for an inter-parliamentary committee, these gentlemen travelled over 7,000 miles and visited many parts of Canada. They met many leading Canadians with whom they discussed Canada-United States relations. The report on their second visit was released on December 19 last. This report indicates that they made a very exhaustive study and submitted several recommendations to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. For your information, and the record, I quote the first of their fourteen recommendations, which is headed "Inter-Parliamentary Understanding":

> We heartily endorse the proposed meeting between representatives of the Canadian Parliament and the United States Congress. We sincerely believe that meetings between the two groups of parliamentarians will, because of the differences between the Canadian and the United States parliamentary systems, facilitate better understanding of mutual problems. In Canada the executive leadership is identical with legislative leadership. In the United States, even when the executive and legislative branches are controlled by the same party, there is no guarantee of legislation to carry out administration policies. Because of the separation of powers of the executive and the legislative branches in the United States, information flowing to the executive does not necessarily reach the Congress and, consequently, action may be taken in ignorance of that information. Since Congress has responsibility for so many matters in the field of economic relations and trade, it is vital that these matters be brought to the attention of the Congress and that a forum be provided for discussion of these matters with our counterparts across the border.
> Although this inter-parliamentary working group is informal in both structure and procedure, we hope that it will develop an agenda, hold well-planned periodic meetings, and will gradually involve a large number of parliamentarians of both countries.

This recommendation was closely followed by appointment of a United States committee consisting of eight members, four from the United States Senate and four from the House of Representatives. This committee is under the chairmanship of Senator George D. Aiken, of Vermont, who is known to many honourable senators here, and Representative Edna Kelly of New York, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. Our Canadian Parliament responded by appointing a committee of nine, made up of three members from this house and six from the House of Commons. I had the distinct honour of being appointed to this committee, along with the Honourable the Speaker and the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, the honourable senator from Hanover.

Honourable senators, I want to repeat that I am satisfied that the new Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary group is now away to a good start, and I am sure that it will continue to function in a manner that will fulfil the fondest hopes of all those people in both of our countries who have displayed a genuine interest in its need. In saying this I am not suggesting that we of the present group are any smarter, or any more sincere and diligent, than those honourable senators and others who have made attempts in the past to accomplish what has been attained in recent months. There is an element of timing about all such efforts. I think it is a just conclusion that the timing of this most recent effort was more suitable than that of former attempts. We were more fortunate in catching the public mind, and the attitude of legislators in the United States and, I might say in Canada too, was more receptive for a proposal to do something to improve Canada-United States relations.

I want to refer to a matter which has already been quite well covered by my colleague from Hanover but which is so important that I believe it warrants further reference. I refer to the sensational reception that our committee received when we were introduced on the floor of the United States Senate. I have no doubt that before we were introduced, and while we were waiting on the floor, there were individual senators who lacked a full appreciation of what the whole affair was about. This attitude applied more to the senators from points distant from the Canadian border, for we found as a general thing that our friends were those congressmen and congresswomen who represent constituencies not far removed from the border. It was that class of speaker who participated to a great extent in the reception we received. However, I can assure you that after listening to sixteen speeches of welcome given by their colleagues, the silent senators had a greater appreciation of the object of our visit. What we accomplished within an hour in this instance was well worth the whole trip.

We are much indebted to my committee colleague the honourable senator from Hanover for having requested permission for publication of the addresses of welcome made in the United States Senate as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate for Thursday, January 29th. If any honourable senators have not read the appendix I would seriously suggest that they do so. The fine spirit of welcome will do something to you. It will make you very proud of Canada.

Before concluding my remarks about the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary group I wish to concur in the words of praise of the honourable senator from Hanover for our Chargé d'Affaires at Washington and his staff. From the time we landed at the airport until we waved fond farewells three days later, Mr. and Mrs. Ritchie and members of the Canadian Embassy staff and their wives were constantly on the job to look after our needs and our comforts. Nothing was left undone that would help make our visit enjoyable, fruitful and effective.

So much for the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary group; it will provide an international clearing house where we can discuss our differences, but it will not be a cure-all and end-all of our differences. We must look on it as a new auxiliary in our efforts to apply our resourcefulness and genius to a satisfactory solution of our Canada-United States problems.

One of our more serious problems is related to our imbalance of trade with the United States. In recent years we have had a deficit of approximately $1 billion per year on our merchandise trade account with the United States. The intertwining of trade and investment between our countries has created a very complex problem, and one difficult to correct. However, there is one field of international trade that we can do something about, and that is the relatively modern field of trade and commerce, commonly referred to as the tourist trade.

In recent years Canadian tourists in the United States have been spending about $75 million a year more than American tourists have been spending in Canada. Think of it, honourable senators; 17 million Canadians have been spending $75 million more in the United States of America than 170 million Americans have been spending in Canada. The ratio of population is just about 10 to 1, and if we visited one another on a parity basis and spent our money on that basis, Americans would spend ten times as much in Canada as Canadians spend in the United States. The latest figures I could get on this trade were for the year 1957. I find that in that year Americans spent $328 million, or $1.90 per capita, in Canada, compared with $403 million, or $23.50 per capita, spent by our citizens in their country. Had our tourist industry been on an equitable basis in that year our deficit of $75 million on tourist account would have been converted into a favourable balance of more than $3½ billion. A surplus on tourist account of that amount would have offset the billion dollar deficit on merchandise account and left us $2½ billion to the good. That represents a lot of money—half our budget, as it used to be, and in the neighbourhood of $150 per head of our population.

I suggest, honourable senators, that it is much easier to improve our tourist trade position than it is to improve our merchandise trade position. It is a selling job which of recent years, I believe, has not been as well done as it might have been. I am not blaming the various agencies engaged in tourist trade promotion. I believe that the Canadian Government Travel Bureau, the Canadian Tourist Association, the provincial tourist promotion agencies, as well as those operated by the railway and steamship lines and hotel companies, and many others, have done a good job with what they had to work with. But this is a business which has been expanding, and in many respects our competitors—and it is a competitive matter—have been extending themselves a little more than we have. Of recent years we have been outbid in many other parts of the world: for instance, Europe, Mexico, Hawaii and Jamaica. Our unfavourable position is evident when we trace where American and Canadian tourist dollars are going, because this spending is influenced by the efforts which are being made by foreign tourist promotion agencies.

To give a clearer idea of the relative position we are in, I am going to cite a few figures, for 1957, which are the latest figures available for comparative purposes. In that year Canada's appropriation for the Canadian Government Travel Bureau was about $2 million. The estimate for 1959-60 is $2,319,-342, or 13 cents per capita, for tourist trade promotion. In 1957 a group of foreign governments maintained 50 tourist and information offices throughout the United States, at a cost of $7,314,520. One group of 10 states of the United States carried on a joint program at a cost of $17 million. To mention certain areas which are in this business in a big way: in 1957 the state of Florida alone spent $4,180,000; Nassau, $1,300,000; Bermuda, over $1 million; Hawaii, $500,000; and Mexico, whose program in this respect is rapidly expanding but whose total expenditures are hard to ascertain because the work is financed through different agencies, is believed by those competent to judge to pay out at least $5 million a year.

There is one proposal that I commend to your earnest consideration. I endorse wholeheartedly the suggestion of the Canadian Tourist Association and kindred bodies that Canada start immediately on plans for a National Centennial celebration in 1967. This is not a new or original idea. Many people have put forth for quite a few years the suggestion that there should be a Canadian Confederation Centennial celebration, but usually all appeals of this kind have fallen on deaf ears, because five, eight or ten years is a very long time in the planning habits of a lot of people. It takes imagination and experience to appreciate that to stage the kind of celebration that will be successful calls for a lot of planning and preparation.

We have had many such functions in Canada. I recall, as I believe some honourable senators will recall, the wonderfully successful Quebec Tercentenary in 1908. In the intervening 50 years there have been a great many celebrations to mark historic anniversaries. The most recent with which I am familiar was British Columbia's 100th birthday party held last year in my own province, which was a tremendous success. Many have learned from experience with these functions that time, and lots of time, is the first ingredient for success.

As I say, many have suggested a celebration in 1967, but it remained for a well-known business executive, Mr. George C. Metcalf, of Toronto, to spark the suggestion with an appropriate appeal for immediate action. At the last annual convention of the Canadian Tourist Association, held in the Chateau Frontenac, in Quebec, last September, Mr. Metcalf emphasized the urgent need for immediate planning for Canada's centennial in 1967, in a most inspiring address entitled, "Horizons Unlimited". To fulfil requests for a transcript of Mr. Metcalf's address, a very beautiful brochure has been prepared. I received a copy of it two or three weeks ago and no doubt it has come to the attention of some honourable senators. I hope it will come to the attention of many people and that it will inspire them to do something about it—and to do it soon.

I do not propose to quote at any great length from this presentation, but one highlight is worthy of special mention. Mr. Metcalf said:

> Organize all across Canada, not just for 1967, but for every year, leading up to a climax in the centennial year.

During the next seven or eight years there will be many historic anniversaries in many parts of Canada that will provide opportunities to build up to the climax in 1967. For instance, in my own home town of Kamloops, British Columbia, in 1962, we will celebrate the 150th anniversary of the founding of our community in 1812 by the Hudson's Bay Company as a trading post, known as Fort Kamloops. The year 1962 will also mark the 100th anniversary of the arrival of the "Overlanders of '62". This was a hardy band of Canadians, men and women, who set out from Huntingdon, Quebec, on an overland journey to the famous gold fields of the Cariboo. West of Edmonton the party split up. One group travelled down the Fraser to the Cariboo country, while the other group travelled down the North Thompson River to Fort Kamloops, where they founded the first farming community. They were an adventurous people and they experienced hardships, tragedy, and finally victory. These two anniversaries provide, for Kamloops, a wealth of material with which to carry out a successful celebration, and I suggest that similar opportunities are numerous throughout Canada. The benefits will be both cultural and commercial. They will educate our people, both young and old. They will promote a pride in our country that is noticeably lacking and, as has been suggested by Mr. Metcalf, they will build up interest to a climax for our centennial year, 1967.

Such a project would also have a very important effect on our economy for many reasons, but I will only take time to refer briefly to a few of them. I have already pointed out that we have in the United States, a potential tourist market that could be worth, not millions, but billions of dollars. It is an easy market for us to develop for the reason that Americans like Canada and Canadians. Why shouldn't they? After all, nearly 10 per cent of the population of the United States is made up of ex-Canadians and their offspring. Over a period of about 100 years some 6 or 7 million Canadians moved to the U.S.A. And we must realize that this migration was not all one-sided. Statistics show that about 1½ million Americans have become residents of Canada. In each of the last five to ten years some 40,000 Canadians have gone to the United States to live and about 10,000 Americans have settled in Canada. If only some of these former Canadians would visit their old homeland each year, it would give our tourist trade a tremendous boost. If we made it inviting for friends and relatives of these ex-Americans to come and holiday in Canada, we would have another sizeable and profitable contingent of tourists.

Let's get behind this proposal for an immediate start on planning our centennial celebration in 1967 and many other minor celebrations in the years between now and then. Nature has provided us with the finest scenery in all the world. Geography has provided us with the most fun-loving, travel-minded neighbours in all the world. They have the time, the money, and the inclination to enjoy our hospitality. It only remains for us to bestir ourselves and take advantage of the incomparable opportunity that is ours. By so doing we would make a tremendous contribution toward correcting the present state of imbalance of trade between Canada and the United States.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bradette, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DOCUMENT TABLED

REPORT OF TARIFF BOARD ON TEXTILES

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following document:

Report of the Tariff Board, dated December 3, 1958, Volumes 1 and 2, relative to the investigation ordered by the Minister of Finance respecting cotton and cotton products, being Reference No. 125 (Textiles) (English and French texts); together with a copy of the transcript of the evidence presented at Public Hearings, (English text), pursuant to section 6 of the Tariff Board Act, Chapter 261, R.S. 1952.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if a copy of the report of the Tariff Board will be supplied to each honourable senator?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is on the Table.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is that all, one copy?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand the document on the table comprises the report of the Tariff Board and the evidence taken before the board. What the honourable senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) has asked for is a copy of the report itself.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know whether copies will be distributed, but I will inquire into the matter.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I understand they have been distributed through the mail. I received one this morning.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I believe honourable senators have received copies. I received one in the mail. However, I will inquire into the matter.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I understand that members of the House of Commons have received copies.

Report adopted.

Hon. W. D. Euler: With leave, I move the third reading of the bill now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CONVERSION LOAN

INQUIRY

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I wish to direct an inquiry to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), as follows:

Has his attention been drawn to a written answer produced in the other place last week by the Minister of Finance, from which it appears that the total cost of the conversion loan of last summer, including cash adjustments paid to converting bond holders, issuing fees, commissions, advertising, costs of printing and other expenses, was the enormous sum of $113,741,000?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: May I ask the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) if the figure he has just given is not the same one that he gave in the house during his speech last week?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No, honourable senators. I assumed and I said in my speech that I thought that perhaps the amount of the actual cost of the conversion loan had been of the order of $50 million to $100 million. It was after I made my speech and made that estimate that the actual figure was given in the House of Commons.

CANADA-NEW BRUNSWICK INDIAN RESERVES AGREEMENT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved the third reading of Bill S-6, to confirm an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Honourable senators, before this bill is read the third time I would like to secure some information from the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I was told, and I gather from reading the bill, that it is the result of an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of New Brunswick. If the matter had already been decided upon by both Governments, I am at a loss to understand why this bill went to a committee, where we studied it clause by clause.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I brought up that point when I explained the bill on the motion for second reading. At that time I informed honourable members of the Senate that the bill was in such form that we had either to accept it or reject it. However, as certain honourable senators asked quite a number of questions it was suggested that the bill be referred to a committee so that those questions could be answered.

I may say that at the committee meeting, at which the honourable senator was present, we discussed for an hour or more various provisions of the agreement, and then a motion to report the bill was carried.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, perhaps I can take some responsibility for the fact that the bill was referred to a committee. I wanted to get certain information. I could not attend the meeting, but quite a few honourable senators were there.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) can now answer one of the questions I asked, namely, what is the situation in the province of Ontario, which was evidently affected by court decisions with regard to the titles to certain lands granted by the dominion Government? Are titles in the province of Ontario affected similarly to those in the west, and if so is anything being done to look after them?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We were informed that Ontario already had an agreement, and that the clause in the New Brunswick agreement stating that the agreement was made in order to settle all outstanding problems relating to Indian reserves in that province was copied from the Ontario agreement. Evidence was also given that that situation does not exist at all in the western provinces.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, that is not the way I understood the evidence. I understood that at present some lands in Ontario which were Indian lands are affected by the two cases mentioned last week by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). I also understood that an agreement was being negotiated between the dominion Government and the province of Ontario respecting Indian lands.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: The province of Nova Scotia has not put through its bill yet.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not believe that either the province of Ontario or the province of Nova Scotia has enacted legislation with respect to these lands.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I may be incorrect, but I understood the witness to say that this particular clause was copied out of the Ontario agreement, so I presumed that the agreement with Ontario had been completed some time ago.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understood the witness to say an agreement had been negotiated, but not that it had been enacted. If legislation respecting such an agreement has been enacted it must have been some years ago; at least, I do not recall such a measure being put through this house since I came here, in 1953.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I understand from the remarks already made that some reference was made in the committee, in the presence of the officials of the department, to the inadequacy of this language from the standpoint of the law of the Dominion of Canada. I presume now from what has been said that the explanation for the language was that it had been copied from some other agreement. Am I right in assuming there was some criticism directed to the officials with regard to the language, and that it was impressed upon them that that kind of language is not very suitable for this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That matter was fully discussed. It was explained that the wording was more or less surplusage and that the agreement itself—that is paragraphs 1 to 6—determined what matters the agreement covered.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette: Honourable senators, in my schooldays I read several times in our primary reader that "Kind words are the music of the world." I saw that axiom put fully into effect here at the beginning of the session because it was found possible, and rightly so, to compliment the mover and the seconder of the motion for an Address and also other senators who deserve this recognition. I am entirely at ease at this time in doing the same thing, and I do it very sincerely. I want to present my compliments and my felicitations to the mover, the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson). He made a very, very fine speech. As one who has been living in the clay belt of northern Ontario for 52 years, I was interested in his references to pioneer life on the Prairies, an area which, except for fewer woodlands and three disastrous forest fires, may be said to resemble ours. I wish to congratulate him very much indeed.

(Translation):

I should like also to offer my most sincere congratulations to the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette), the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. He has shown real eloquence, as well as a genuine mastery of both our official languages. I also wish to pay tribute to his brilliant talents as a lawyer; I know he will always maintain the high reputation of that profession, and that this national forum will appreciate his talents more and more. My esteem for the honourable senator from Ottawa East is enhanced by the fact that I had the honour to be his wife's witness at their wedding in the Ottawa cathedral.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to congratulate you most sincerely. During our short session in the spring of 1957 you represented us abroad and we know you did so with real dignity. We all appreciate your courtesy and your competence in parliamentary matters. You are a credit both to us and to your fellow-citizens of the old city of Quebec. That is why we often hear it said that you may be called to an even higher office. There is no doubt that you have not yet reached the climax of your brilliant career.

(Text):

I would also extend my felicitations to the new senators. I know they are going to enjoy the work which they will accomplish in this house. I can say to them, "You have not been chosen purely by accident; you have been chosen because you have given distinguished services in the sections of the country where you live, and you will find your activities here and the work of the Senate very fruitful indeed."

I would particularly pay my tribute to the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt). He wrote an article only a few days ago in which he mentioned the work that a senator has to accomplish. Although at times a senator may enjoy some pleasure, if he wants to spend his time in doing useful parliamentary work he has plenty of latitude to do so.

I am very glad indeed to see again in his place the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig). I am sure I voice the sentiments of every senator here in saying how pleased we are to see him looking so well, and that we hope for him, many, many more years of good health and useful work.

I wish also to felicitate the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). He is doing a good job. He has the experience to do it. I have often admired his wit, his good humour, and his industry. Whatever he has taken in hand he has done well.

One wish to which I should like to give voice at this time, and which I expressed last year, is that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should be a member of the Privy Council. I believe it is both just and absolutely necessary, and I would point out that it would not be creating a precedent, because for many years, with several Governments, it was the established practice that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should also belong to the cabinet. He would bring something to the Privy Council which they do not have at the present time. He could furnish them with first-hand information and our parliamentary institutions would benefit thereby. Our leader's association with the Privy Council would also be beneficial to the Senate, for he would come here with full information on many problems. So I repeat the declaration I made last year, and I believe public opinion is behind it and strongly desires it.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition, the honourable senator from Brantford (Hon. Mr. Ross Macdonald). For many years, I was in a position to appreciate the competence of the honourable senator, when we both sat in the House of Commons. There also, he made his mark as a member and as Speaker, and since he has been here, he has won the esteem of all his colleagues. When he was Leader of the Government in this chamber he fulfilled his task with dignity, and we all appreciated his great talents as well as his courtesy.

I should now like to deal with a very serious matter: the appointment of a new Governor General of Canada.

(Text):

The present occupant of that exalted office has for eight successive years set very high standards in the discharge of his heavy responsibilities. It is difficult to discuss the question of his successor, but I feel it is my duty to do so because the people in my section of northern Ontario and, I believe, in the whole of Canada, are intensely interested in this very important matter. As I say, the present Governor General has set very high standards in the discharge of his heavy responsibilities and it will be universally regretted when he retires. I hope that he will be spared for many, many years so that our country will continue to enjoy the benefits of his experience, his great talents and his high culture.

When His Excellency was appointed, in February 1952, it was the first time in our history that a Canadian had been elevated to that high office. The precedent was wonderfully well received by the large majority of the Canadian people, and also by people in every part of the commonwealth. Great Britain was well pleased with the appointment. Some Canadians seem to feel that British people do not like our taking such action, but I have made several trips to Great Britain and whenever I have talked to people there about it they have said: "You should encourage that type of thing. It doesn't hurt the commonwealth or the empire. We are pleased that you took such action." This is really the outlook Britain has taken for several centuries with regard to many similar actions. Now, after seven fruitful years in office, His Excellency has shown his desire to retire, and there has been a great deal of discussion by the Canadian public and newspapers as to who the next appointee will be.

I have in mind three great personages of the British Isles, persons of outstanding quality and known the world over, each of whom would undoubtedly make an excellent Governor General of this country. In this regard I would like to quote a brief article which appeared in the Vancouver Province, under date of January 24, 1959:

> In the past the governor-generalship has represented only one commonwealth link—that with Britain; today it symbolizes, if anything, the emergence of Canadian nationalism.

I do not like that phrase "emergence of Canadian nationalism". I don't know why they call it an emergence, because there is nothing emergent about it. It is something absolutely natural. Anyway, the article continues:

> But the bonds which are the most important today lie elsewhere. They have been underlined by the welcome given to Prime Minister Diefenbaker—and, through it, the admission of a degree of Canadian leadership in the commonwealth—on a tour which took him to all the continents.
> Beyond that, the outstanding usefulness of the commonwealth not only to its own members but to the world at large lies in its nature as a meeting place for people of different creeds, different political concepts and, in particular, different colours of skin.
> There is nowhere else that black, white, yellow and brown can sit down together free of the barriers of rancour and self-consciousness. And, in a world in which power and decision are no longer white monopolies, it is of outstanding importance that such sitting-down-together should remain possible.
> The appointment of a Governor General of another race would greatly strengthen that process. And it would have a psychological impact reaching into Asia and Africa beyond the boundaries of the commonwealth itself.

Honourable senators, no one could be offended by such an article. We are all members of the commonwealth and we have no racial prejudices so far as we are concerned in this country. Perhaps we have not always acted toward the Indians in this country the way we should towards one another, but there is really no reason to criticize this article. It is well that it has been written. A few days ago I read an article in the Winnipeg Free Press to the effect that the next Governor General might be appointed from Nigeria. We would have no objection at all if the appointment came from Nigeria, Pakistan or some place else in the commonwealth, but at the same time I believe the precedent created in 1952 should be maintained.

I listened very attentively to a television commentary last fall during the last stages of the Prime Minister's commonwealth tour. Incidentally, there is no doubt that his tour will go far toward bringing the members of the commonwealth closer together. He spoke in Australia and it is reported that he expressed the wish that the next Governor General of Canada might come from some part of the commonwealth. Now, I do not think anybody should criticize such a suggestion but I still say that, in my opinion, the precedent set in 1952 should be maintained. The precedent was created without any commotion at that time and it showed we were becoming of age. Why should we retrogress at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: If a Canadian is appointed to succeed the present Governor General of Canada there will not be a single word of criticism from any part of the commonwealth.

Honourable senators, I must speak openly and with all my heart on this subject. For nearly 28 years I had the great honour and privilege to represent in the House of Commons one of the finest sections of Canada, that of northern Ontario, which was rich in farm lands, gold mining and the production of pulp and paper. The majority of my constituents were English-speaking and Protestant and I never heard a single word of criticism about my own race and creed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: I will never forget those people as long as I live, and I shall always cherish the way they treated me. Whenever I go back to my native province of Quebec I tell them how broadminded the English-speaking people are. I can pay the same tribute to the people of Quebec. During the last war quite a number of trained workers and C.N.R. trainmen exiled themselves from their homes in northern Ontario to go to Arvida and the Lake St. John district to work. Most of them were English-speaking and Protestant and when they got to their destination they found little provision for English-speaking school children. However, the local school boards soon remedied the situation and it was not long before English-speaking classes were provided and the children were studying under practically the same curriculum they had had in their own schools back in northern Ontario. After the war many of these people returned to Cochrane and they took much pride in talking about the wonderful province of Quebec. This is the kind of spirit that links our Canadian people.

Since the time of Confederation the offices of the Speaker of the Senate and of the House of Commons have been held alternately by English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians. I must pay special tribute to the English-speaking people in this regard. At the time of Confederation Canada's French and English populations were about equal, but now the French-speaking population is in the minority by about two-fifths or perhaps more. However, through the generosity and the broadmindedness of English-speaking Canadians, that principle of alternating the Speakers in Parliament has been maintained. I hope the same principle will be applied with regard to the appointment of Governors General in Canada.

We have read comments in our newspapers that the next Governor General should not be one who has been in politics. Well, there is nothing sinister about politics. Like many of my colleagues I was, as I mentioned a few moments ago, a member of the House of Commons for many years. I have been in the Senate now for six years. My constituents believe me when I tell them that 99½ per cent of all parliamentarians are sincere and have the welfare of the country at heart. If they were not they would not remain long in public life. All good citizens, all good Canadians, must of necessity have politics of some kind, no matter what they are. There should be no bar to the appointment of a Canadian as Governor General on that score. Except that I do not want to offend against the sense of humility of any honourable member of this chamber, I could name three or four senators who are well qualified for the position; there is no doubt that they have the requisite personality and ability.

I am pleading sincerely for the principle that the office of Governor General should be held alternately by English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, because I think it would be a marvellous thing for the unity of this country. This might require some sacrifices on the part of the English-speaking Canadians, but it is easier for a majority to be magnanimous. Believe me when I say that a friendly gesture made on the part of the English-speaking majority to the French-speaking minority is always greatly appreciated. French-speaking Canadians do not expect all English-speaking Canadians to be able to speak French, but if an English-speaking compatriot says Bonjour, monsieur, he is immediately persona grata. A friendly gesture of that kind goes very deeply.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to dwell on this point, but I felt it my duty to mention it.

Now I want to say a few words about the present Canadian-American relations. I may be partial on that score for the reason that I belong to a section of northern Ontario, one of the wealthiest in Canada, where every cent of capital investment has been made by our neighbours to the south. I was glad last year when the present Prime Minister visited the fine town of Kapuskasing, where the New York Times has spent nearly $40 million. When the Times went there, in 1923, it was a very modest rural community, whereas now it has grown to a large industrial community.

In 1912 the Honourable G. Howard Ferguson, then minister of Lands and Forests for Ontario and later Premier of the Province, stood on a pile of stump, on the site of what is now the town of Iroquois Falls, and spoke to a gathering of 500 people. He told them that $9 million of American capital had been invested there and he was glad of that. There is nothing sinister about that. It simply meant that the American investor had faith in our people and our country. There are many parts of the world where Americans will not invest a single dollar, because they have no faith in the people there. We have good relations with Americans, and there is no reason why they should be otherwise. The same is true of the attitude of the United States toward Canada. Without American capital many of our enterprises would have been unable to get started or to expand. Americans have not always made a profit on their investments in Canada, they have sometimes lost money, but their capital has been responsible for opening up our mines and the forest industry, and even helped in the development of our land. Fortunately, a certain feeling that has sometimes existed between the two countries has eased somewhat. Statesmen have tried to bring about better relations between us. Of course, there is no perfection in this world. In the last two elections some statements were made which I could hardly believe. The Ottawa Journal and other papers seemed to be scandalized by a type of criticism which they thought was unfair and uncalled for—as, for instance, that Canada had been sold down the Hudson River! Who could believe such utter nonsense?

I wish now to refer to a paragraph from the Speech from the Throne, in which the Governor General stated:

> My ministers are concerned over recent developments in the Berlin situation. They deplore the attempt by the Soviet Union to abrogate unilaterally the inter-allied agreements relating to Berlin, and they believe that the freedom of West Berlin must be assured pending agreement on the establishment of a united and free Germany.

The Government has taken a proper attitude, I think, on the Berlin situation, and we must stand closely together. Unity is vital at the present time, particularly on this problem. Perhaps some listeners may think that I am presumptuous in speaking on this matter. I do not pretend to be an expert in external affairs, but for eight consecutive years I had the great honour to sit as the first chairman of the Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs. I saw to it that Mr. Gordon Graydon, at that time Conservative member for Peel, Ontario, was vice-chairman. He gave me wonderful co-operation. We kept politics out as much as we could, because we thought that, with the questions involved, we could not afford to be partisan.

The thing that surprises me on the question of West Berlin is the fear that is expressed by some nations about a restored Germany. It is true that my old motherland suffered grievously in 1870, as did all our allies in World Wars I and II, but that is past history. There is no doubt that great leadership has been given by the present Prime Minister of West Germany. For centuries the history of France and England was always troublous and the English channel formed a wall between two armed camps. The countries went to war against one another on land and sea, and overseas possessions were destroyed on both sides, and so on. Then came Edward the Seventh, who was the originator, or at least a very influential promoter of the Entente Cordiale, and it was a great thing for the civilized world when the peoples of those two great nations, divided only by a small arm of the sea, could visit each other, shake hands, talk peace and common defence, and so on. There is no doubt that the Entente Cordiale was the main cause of victory in the war of 1914-1918, and also in the last great war.

The wonderful work that has been accomplished by the Prime Minister of West Germany is little short of miraculous. There are splendid qualities in the German people; they are willing to work and they have developed great industries. I believe that the Prime Minister is leading his nation to democracy and freedom. Let us, therefore, keep away from the spirit of fear, and take a chance, if there is a chance to take, so that we may be sure that Russia will not eventually pulverize not only East Germany but West Germany as well.

Honourable senators, I want to say a few words, not by way of criticism but out of a sense of duty, because it seems to me that in the United Nations, Canada appears to be losing in leadership. We acquired a great name in the world for what we did in two world wars. We fought for democracy, for freedom, for the cause of religion, and for free elections, because we felt those things were in danger. We did this of our own free will and we made heavy sacrifices, but after the war we did not want our pound of flesh or any territorial aggrandizement. We were merely satisfied to have done our duty. I hope we get again the type of leadership we had then.

There is another problem which baffles me a bit. Last fall a minister of the Government made the statement that China should belong to the United Nations. The Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, on his trip of a few years ago through Asia, said that eventually China might become a member of the United Nations. The recent statement of the minister was very definite but the Prime Minister practically denied it. I would like to see more co-ordination on this important question.

Now, honourable senators, I want to say a few words about trade and tariff wars. I use these words deliberately because tariffs poison the amity that should exist in the whole world. I can speak openly on this matter, since I belong to a section of Ontario where nearly all of the things we produce, and which are not affected by tariffs, are immediately after fabrication sent to the American market. Naturally I do not believe in free trade; I am more practical than that, but I say it is a dangerous situation when so much that we buy abroad is subject to a high tariff. It is not a martial war we are engaged in, but a tariff war, and a tariff war may eventually lead to a martial war. That has happened in the past and nobody can tell me what might happen again. Inter-allied trade relations are bedevilled by some very high barriers which hamper the commerce of the world and trouble the people. Some countries limit their imports by strict quotas; others pay subsidies to their own manufacturers; still others, lacking dollars, gladly engage in trade which brings in dollars, but they refuse to trade their merchandise for less desirable currencies. This means that many nations resort to simple barter. In addition, cartels restrain trade, as do state monopolies and embargoes. Red tape snarls everything.

Anyone who seeks to master the intricacies of tariff laws, dumping duties, and so on, will soon find that they require many years of study. Most people do not realize what these laws actually contain, and I would urge that we acquire a better understanding of them. Friction exists between France and Great Britain over the European trade market, but I hope it will eventually be smoothed out. Personally, I believe that the creation of a common market is a good move that will turn out to be successful and if it does it may spread to the whole of Europe on this side of the iron curtain. I also hope that it will work its way into South America and, on this continent, between the United States and Canada.

May I say, honourable senators, that Iceland was nearly thrown into the Russian orbit through a dispute over her fishing trade.

Also may I say that trade relations between the United States and Great Britain have not always been on the level, nor very pleasant, either. I am going to refer to a matter that occurred only a few weeks ago and to which reference was made in this house last week by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). That incident had to do with English Electric Company's bid on hydraulic turbines for installation on an army project in Arkansas. The English Electric Company underbid the American companies by some $3000,000 but in spite of that this firm did not receive the contract. The United States used the argument of so-called "national security interests", as she had a right to do, for she must be master of her own activities, including commercial ones.

But I am going to go a little further in explanation of that. Ever since the war, as all honourable senators must know, Washington has been preaching to its allies the blessings of competition. I am now talking of inter-allied relations. The United States urged these other countries to make their industries more competitive, to get their prices down and to go out in the world and compete in price and quality and regain their economic health by trade, not aid. The British have done their best to respond to this constant prodding and pleading, and at the risk of damaging their own economy they have stabilized the pound and kept wages down. The British, I must say, are very realistic. They do not buy from Canada or any other country where the price is higher than competitive prices.

Remember, manufacturers in other countries were invited to submit bids on these hydro-electric machinery installations. In fact, they were urged to do so by Washington. This British firm went to a great deal of expense to survey the project, which in itself required a great deal of technical ability, and it proceeded to prepare plans and estimates of costs. When the manufacturers were invited to bid there was no hint of "national security interests" of the United States or that the Government would urge the awarding of the contract to a domestic bidder. In any event, the British managed to do what they have been so often urged to do—they presented a competitive bid. It actually turned out that they were the lowest bidder by some $300,000; and, honourable senators, only after the British bid turned out to be the lowest did Washington suddenly discover that "national security interests" forced the awarding of the contract to a higher United States bidder. Naturally, the British resented this and protested. It must be remembered that the British were encouraged to bid on the machinery and they incurred substantial expenses in making their lowest bid. Only after the bids were opened were they informed that they would not have a chance to secure the contract. A large number of the American people did not like such action on the part of their Government in taking this contract away from the English company and awarding it to a firm in Philadelphia. If Washington had wanted to do that before calling for bids it could have limited the bids to American companies. But no, this English company was invited to submit a bid, and I say once more it was only after the British bid was found to be the lowest that Washington ordered the contract to be given to a Philadelphia company. Such methods may be expected to originate in the Kremlin but they are unworthy of a nation like the United States.

Now, I want to say a few words about our economy, in which we are all highly interested. At the present time I am somewhat critical. I do not want to be too critical, but as a Canadian, one who wants our country to expand and progress, there are one or two things that I feel I must refer to. I am going to quote from an article by Mr. Blair Fraser, a prominent and excellent writer, which appeared in Maclean's Magazine of December 22, 1956. I will read only the first and last paragraphs. The first paragraph is as follows:

> This Christmas Ottawa is a frustrated Santa Claus. With something more than six hundred million goodies in his pack—the expected budget surplus for the current fiscal year—Santa can't find nearly enough stockings to put them in.

The article goes on for several columns about the Government trying to give away to the Maritime provinces $600 million they did not know what to do with, and there were no takers. The article concludes with this paragraph:

> These are some of the reasons why the Ottawa Santa Claus is so frustrated. The stockings he can find are already bulging. The people who need his help seem to go barefoot, and to live in houses with no chimneys for him to come down.

I do not know exactly what is meant, as it is expressed poorly. Why try to create an impression that in 1956 the federal Government had $600 million for which it had no use? Was the Government to throw the money into the Ottawa River or burn it in a furnace? That is hardly a true account of the facts. Why would the writer make such a statement when he knew that this country had a national debt of more than $12 billion, a debt that is on our shoulders, and will perhaps be on the shoulders of your children for generations to come. Why not speak the truth and say that the carrying charges of such a debt would amount to at least half a billion dollars a year? We don't find this kind of money on the street; it has to come from the pockets of the Canadian people. I do not think that kind of writing should be tolerated. Writers, politicians and those aspiring to public life have a primary duty to be true to the people and to present the facts as they really exist.

I have in my hand a brief article from the Ottawa Journal of January 24 last. This refers to the occasion on which the Canadian Congress of Labour presented a brief to the federal Government. The article is headed "How long, Oh Lord, how long?". On that occasion the Prime Minister was fairly courageous, and I recognize courage when it exists. He told the delegation:

> You cannot have export markets if you price yourself out of them.

That is true and we can't get away from it. Later he said:

> Remember that the communists don't measure their returns on exports by the profits, but by the degree that those exports undermine the economy of other nations so as to bring them under subjection.

That statement also is true. But labour must ask for better conditions for workers. I know labour, I have belonged to a labour union myself, and I recognize that most of the leadership in labour is good; but I could give you the names of some leaders who are communists. What can be done about it I don't know, but we should always be on the lookout for those who adhere to communism. The Prime Minister during the last two elections practically promised that there would be no labour problems, no increase in the cost of living and no inflation. Those promises were practically thrown aside, or very little was done about them, and the labour organizations had the right to present their briefs and ask the Prime Minister to rectify certain conditions. These are matters that must be remembered at the present time, as well as during elections.

Honourable senators, I shall complete my remarks in about five or ten minutes, and I hope I shall not weary you.

I find in the Speech from the Throne these words:

> My government will recommend an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for another year the increase made last year in the provincial share of personal income tax revenue.

This also was a good statement, but the people have been disappointed with what has happened. I am not going into details, but both the provinces and the municipalities have been disappointed. I do not say this in any partisan sense. I am speaking as a Canadian, and in a way in which my people expect me to speak, even in this forum.

With respect to federal-provincial fiscal relations, I wish to refer to an article that appeared in the Toronto Board of Trade publication of February 4, 1957. The present Prime Minister, in a speech at the annual dinner of the Toronto Board of Trade on that date, said this:

> I believe too that government must insure that the public interest shall be preserved, and that all —the strong and the weak—shall have equal opportunities, which is another way of saying that no sector of our country should have special privileges.

He went on to say:

> Take the provinces, and the municipalities—

I call attention to the fact that this applied to the municipalities as well as to the provinces.

> —they have responsibilities in development, and must be assured of revenue and a more equitable share of tax yields being provided for them, in order to take their part in our development.

I refer next to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 25, 1957, reporting a meeting held during the election campaign, at which Mr. Frost appeared on the platform with the present Prime Minister. The article reads:

> Mr. Frost, whose appearance on the platform with Mr. Diefenbaker gave the rally a significant air of party solidarity, hit hard at the tax-sharing deal which the Liberal Government offered the provinces.

That is the late Liberal Government.

> These agreements, which had led to a double corporate tax in Ontario, he declared, were completely "unrealistic and unsatisfactory".

The Premier of the province of Ontario completed his remarks on that occasion with these words, and they are worthy of your attention:

> We cannot face complacently the fact that we have rising tax bills, rising debt both provincially and municipally, while we have the federal Government paying everything in cash—

That is the Liberal Government.

> —hiding away money and even paying the Canada Council $100 million in advance—

Why the Premier of the banner province of Canada would make such a statement deploring the spending of money for the arts in general which Canadians cherish and try hard to develop, I don't know.

> —paying off debt and still ending up the year with a surplus of $500 million, to a very large extent derived from tax sources which belong to the provinces.

Even there the Premier did not mention the national debt, then more than $11 billion, which is our responsibility, guaranteed by us all, and which will eventually have to be paid off.

This is the answer the present Prime Minister gave before that big rally of about 20,000 people, held in Toronto on April 27, 1957, as reported by the Globe and Mail:

We believe there can be no national unity in this nation until there is a realization that the federal-provincial matters have handcuffed the provinces of this nation; have denied the municipalities adequate sources of revenue—

And take note that the word "municipalities" appears several times.

—have placed the provinces and the municipalities in a position where they cannot discharge their constitutional responsibilities or permit the necessary development in their own territorial confines of the natural resources that there are. We believe the provinces and municipalities must have the financial resources to carry out those responsibilities. We believe in the federal system of Government. We believe that its preservation is essential to Canadian unity. We believe the federal system is today being challenged by the centralization complex of the St. Laurent Government and that a healthy division and balance of revenues as between the federal and provincial Governments must be assured.

I have quoted the whole of that text so that nothing will be taken from it. The present Prime Minister concluded his remarks with these words:

We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference—

One was held, but it was not very fruitful.

—to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination—

Why would the word "arrogant" have a place there? If there ever was a humble man, it was the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, the Prime Minister of that day.

—as displayed by the present Government, but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

Now, honourable senators, I will not elaborate on dominion-provincial conferences. Municipalities all over Canada sent delegates to Ottawa last fall to visit the Prime Minister. They were well received, but after their briefs had been presented the Prime Minister told them, and rightly so, that the federal Government had nothing to do with the administration of municipalities. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition both knew well that under the Canadian Constitution the jurisdiction over municipalities belongs to the provinces. But the Prime Minister knew right along that the federal Government could not deal directly with the municipalities, and so those people left Ottawa sadly disappointed because after what had been said by the now Prime Minister they had the right to expect better treatment. They thought the federal Government could give them the help promised in 1957 and 1958, and they had the right to expect the fulfilment of that promise.

I will terminate my remarks by saying this. We have a wonderful country, where the climate, though hard, is healthy. Our country contains a great amount of natural resources—not unlimited, though, as is sometimes said. I know the north country; for 14 years I was the agent there for a large corporation. Much of it will be a land of open spaces for all time to come, but it is a marvellous country with some promise. It is not easy to develop, but I am in agreement with the determination of the Hon. Mr. Hamilton, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to go ahead with this great work. It will bring huge dividends and a lasting prosperity, but at the price of hard work. I do not believe in the "pie in the sky" philosophy. I have no faith in the principle of getting something for nothing. I hope and pray that all parties, whether at national, provincial or municipal levels, will find it possible to avoid appeals to mere self-interest. We cannot afford election appeals which would try to make people believe that there is no bottom to the national treasury and that you can get from it anything you want. That is the way to defeat democracy and to bring its roof down over our heads. It is not the kind of appeal which should come from either my party or any other party, and I hope that at the next election the truth will be told to the electors.

With my own eyes I saw, in the great city of Moscow, from 22 to 24 trainloads of young Russians, mostly young boys, with a few girls, ready to self-exile themselves in the national interests and being sent by the Government to work on the submarginal land close to Siberia. It would have been good for all to see the spirit which animated these girls and boys. They were going away to work hard in a remote section of the country. But they were singing the praise of Mother Russia, showing their devotion to their beloved country. We, too, must have some of that spirit, and the leadership in that direction must be given by the political parties and by the Government, because nobody in this world, as far as I know, ever got something for nothing. If we take the right course in this matter we will not need to worry about the future, because Canada is one of the finest and greatest countries in the world.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

NORTH AMERICAN ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill S-9, respecting The North American Accident Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill. It seeks to change the corporate name of the company, now known as "The North American Accident Insurance Company," to "The North American General Insurance Company," the reason being that the types of insurance in which this company now engages are more extensive than would be normally expected from the use of the word "accident".

I am informed that the Superintendent of Insurance has no objection to this bill. I am further informed that all the other companies which have somewhat similar names —that is, with the word "General" in them— have expressed their feeling that they have no objection to the proposed change of name.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

BALOISE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Sydney J. Smith moved the second reading of Bill S-10, respecting Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, there is not much I can add to the explanatory notes included in the copy of the bill which you have before you. You will note, as an unusual feature, that one of the terms of the sale and purchase agreement is that the purchaser shall change the company's name. It is rather interesting to note that this is the case of a conversion of a foreign investment into a Canadian investment. This company was purchased by Canadian interests from a Swiss company.

I intend, if the bill is given second reading at this time, to move that it be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Kamloops), bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

LAND USE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) the following motion:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report on land use in Canada and what should be done to ensure that our land resources are most effectively utilized for the benefit of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people and, in particular, to increase both agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it;

That the committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Barbour, Basha, Bois, Buchanan, Boucher, Bradette, Cameron, Crerar, Emerson, Gladstone, Golding, Higgins, Horner, Inman, Leger, Leonard, MacDonald, McDonald, McGrand, Methot, Molson, Pearson, Power, Smith (Kamloops), Stambaugh, Taylor (Norfolk), Taylor (Westmorland), Turgeon, Vaillancourt, Wall and White.

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the three preceding sessions be referred to the committee.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, during the last three sessions of Parliament a number of briefs were presented to the Committee on Land Use and an interim report was brought in at the end of each session. Seven briefs were received by the committee from departmental officials in the federal Department of Agriculture, three from the Ontario Department of Agriculture, and one each from the Departments of Agriculture of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Four special agencies presented briefs to the committee, one being from McGill University. We received eight briefs from farm organizations such as the Farm Federation, the Farmers' Union, and so forth. Nine briefs on forestry were presented and two on the subject of land survey, one having been given by a private corporation who told us what they were doing in the northern part of Canada for the federal Government in regard to survey work. In all, 35 briefs were presented to the committee.

I have discussed the matter of where we were getting with our land use inquiry and what we were going to report in the way of something substantial that we could get our teeth into. As a result of the conversations that I have had it has been decided, and I have agreed, that what we will do this session is to take one phase of land use—we will study the small farm as a unit right across Canada, and work out the problems facing it.

Honourable senators will note that the object of the committee, as set out in the motion, is to, —ensure that our land resources are most effectively utilized for the benefit of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people and, in particular, to increase both agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it.

I am sure every honourable senator, regardless of the province or part of Canada from which he comes, knows that today the small farmer, whether he is engaged in growing vegetables, fruit, or grain, or raising stock, faces the problem that the small farm is not an economic unit. This problem confronts governments at all levels. The committee will of course discuss the subject thoroughly before it delves into what can be done about it. But I feel sure that we can come up with an answer to at least some of the problems which affect the various branches of farming today.

It is also suggested that, rather than delay the work of the committee in order to allow each provincial Department of Agriculture to make a personal presentation of its brief, it be asked to forward a brief to the committee with its recommendations and suggestions as to how we should meet the problems facing the small farmer. We have with us now a permanent secretary, who has been supplied by the Department of Agriculture. These briefs will be read to the committee and their value will be discussed from the point of view of each member of the committee. By this method I believe we can get more quickly to the root of the problems. We can probably take two or three provinces at a time and discuss their briefs without waiting for each province to come forward and make an individual presentation to us.

That is all I have to say on this subject tonight, honourable senators.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am seconding this motion, but from the remarks of the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson) it appears the committee has already been established and what will be done has been decided. There must be some misunderstanding.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I don't think the honourable senator intended that. He was putting forward his own suggestions.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Lumsden stated that it had been decided to inquire into the subject of small farm holdings. I do not know how that decision could have been made in connection with this committee, for the committee has not been set up. The motion is to set up a Special Committee on Land Use, to consist of the honourable senators whose names appear in the notice of motion. I am in favour of the setting up of the committee or I would not have consented to second the motion, but I am not willing to approve or disapprove of anything that some committee has decided this year. So, I second this motion on the understanding that the motion is to set up a committee to consider land use, with the powers assigned to the committee in the notice of motion, including the right to consider evidence which has already been given. That is as far as I am prepared to go.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: I am afraid that I did not make myself quite clear in this matter. As far as the Land Use Committee is concerned, I would say that we are dealing with one phase of land use, of small units, rather than taking up water conservation and forestry and trying to delve into each of these subjects. I entirely agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that our intention is to proceed in accordance with the motion which is now before the Senate; but, rather than take up forestry and two or three other items at the same time, we shall deal at present with one phase of the subject. The briefs which have already been presented will be taken into consideration together with anything we may receive and decide to work upon later.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I agree, honourable senators, that it will be up to the committee to decide its course of action, whether to look into the question of small farms or water conservation or what not. These decisions will be made by the committee when it has been set up and organized, a chairman selected, and all preliminaries attended to.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I am very pleased that the Government has decided to reconstitute the committee. This will be the fourth session in which a committee on land use will have been sitting and I for one do not believe that we have accomplished too much. True, as the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson) has said, some 35 briefs have been presented, but we have barely touched what is a very great national problem; and, to be frank, I do not think that we can give it adequate treatment merely by sitting down and listening to briefs, although of course that is part of our work. But it would be my conception that this committee might be divided into a number of subcommittees which could hold sessions in some of the agricultural areas where land use is a very important economic problem today. Some honourable senators may have read recently the 810 page Royal Commission report on the tree fruits industry of British Columbia. While that report is a very thorough and detailed document and applies mainly to the tree fruits industry, many of the things it has to say about small units in the fruit industry apply right across Canada as far as small farms generally are concerned. I would seriously suggest to the chairman of the committee that when the committee meets for the first time it consider settingup subcommittees to hold sessions in specialized areas and on specialized problems.

The honourable senator from Lumsden has said that the economics of the small farm today are of vital concern, for that is an area in which the greatest changes are taking place. There is a feature which I think is of equal importance and that is the rapid taking over of good agricultural land for industrial use in such places as the Niagara Peninsula and around some of our large urban centres. That too presents a problem, and I think it would be very rewarding and satisfactory and a very useful procedure to have subcommittees go out and make inquiries on the spot, as well as have the main committee accept all the authoritative material that is available to it in written form.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the motion for third reading is put may I ask the honourable Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce whether he can inform us at this time how many petitions have been filed, how many have been presented to the Senate, how many have been heard and how many recommended or rejected? Can he also inform the house as to the last date for filing petitions and, in general, give us any information he can regarding the work which this committee has done up to date?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I think I can answer sufficiently at the moment the inquiry which my honourable Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has so kindly made. The members of the Divorce Committee always like to know of the interest of fellow-members in the work that we are carrying on, and I for one am glad to make a report whenever one is requested.

At the present time 297 petitions have actually been presented and received by the Senate. In the committee we have heard and recommended 110 petitions. We have partly heard two more petitions and they will be taken care of in due season. So far we have not rejected any petitions we have heard. Four petitions have been withdrawn and the fees refunded, less $25 for printing costs. The number of petitions for which hearings have been fixed up to March 20, 1959, is 72. The petitions I have referred to total 188, which number subtracted from 297 leaves 109 petitions pending, if the docket as it stands now is carried out to March 20. However, there are 24 petitions which have been filed but not yet presented, so that the total number filed is 321, and the total of petitions pending is 109 plus 24, that is 133.

I would point out that that is about the usual number of petitions for a session. They were slow in coming in at first, and in one of my earlier reports this session I pointed out that we were down about 25 per cent. That, however, was merely because of delay.

My honourable friend asked me about the time limit for filing petitions. The limit expires in both houses on Wednesday, next, February 25. I am glad to be able to call attention to this fact so that those who have petitions which have not yet been filed had better take notice of the date. I may recall to honourable senators that we have persistently refused to extend the filing date, although there are always applications from those who have delayed for some reason or another. Some of them may have a very good case, but after February 25 no further petitions may be filed for this session; any received after that date will be held over for the next session.

Of the 110 petitions recommended, five were permitted to proceed without naming and/or serving the co-respondent. I thought I should give this information because it is interesting in view of our history of reforming the rules of the Divorce Committee. Prior to our making it necessary to name the co-respondents we were told that these people simply could not be named, that their names could not be ascertained, and so on, and it became a practice to claim that they were not known because it was easier to put divorces through without naming the co-respondents. It was obvious that this was pure sham. At the present time it is one of our practices to require the petitioner who does not name and/or serve the co-respondent to get permission in my office to proceed in that way. Before permission is given a good case must be shown by affidavit that the co-respondent actually is not known and cannot be found.

In four cases the parliamentary fees have been remitted in part. That is interesting to me, for it shows that we have some heart in these matters. I recall one case this session where a young woman, who had very good reason I thought to get rid of her husband, was making the princely salary of $45 a week, and she was supporting the only child of the union. I asked her who was paying for the divorce and she said that she was paying for it herself, that she had been saving up for the past five years to do so and had gathered up $400, of which $210 had been paid to the Parliament of Canada. She still had $500 to pay, but said she would be able to save that amount in the course of time. She was very grateful to those who were allowing her to proceed without cash down on the line. We did what we could, of course, and recommended remission of a portion of those fees. I think perhaps the whole amount might have been remitted, but at least it was on our own initiative that the situation was eased for her, and we allowed her to proceed with the payment of just half the full amount, that is, $110, and gave her back $100 which she had already paid.

The other three cases were somewhat comparable—poor people, usually poor women, who are earning their living by their work, and saving up for this rather expensive procedure of having a divorce by Act of Parliament.

Incidentally, there were 25 petitions opposed by respondents, and one that was opposed by both respondent and co-respondent.

It may interest honourable senators to compare the figures up to the present with those of past sessions. The numbers of petitions filed one month after the opening of the 1957, 1958 and 1959 sessions were as follows:

1957 session	322
1959 session	321

The number in the 1958 session was abnormally high; otherwise the number of petitions filed from year to year does not vary very much.

I have already mentioned that this session there has been some delay in the filing of petitions. I think this is due to economic conditions. People are evidently finding a good deal of trouble in getting surplus money for a luxury of this kind at this time, and for that reason we have had greater difficulty in getting cases to trial than in the past. However, we are right up to the docket. We have not had cases prepared ready for trial for the last two sittings but we have a long docket for next Friday. Up to the moment we have been scraping the bottom of the barrel of the cases ready for trial and we have made fair progress. All cases that have been ready for trial have been heard, and that position will be maintained until we have cleaned up the entire docket.

I thank my honourable leader for asking the question.

Motion agreed to and bills read third time and passed, on division.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 12, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, when I arrived in Ottawa on January 26 for the present session of Parliament I had given some thought to making a speech dealing with some international matters and some national matters which I considered to be serious and believed I should discuss on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, after the speech made by the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), when he suggested that I tell to the Senate the story of the great salmon run of the Fraser River, I felt it was my duty to tell the story of the sockeye salmon in order to explain my long absence from the Senate last session.

Before commencing the story may I take a moment to draw your attention to the fact that a former Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable Robert Mayhew, did me the honour to come along this evening to hear my speech on the sockeye salmon of the Fraser River and is sitting in the gallery. I realize that quite a number of senators have heard me speak on the subject before, but before relating the wonderful story of 1958 I thought perhaps I had better lay a foundation of information on the subject for the new senators. For those senators who are hearing this for the first time may I say that the Fraser River is the greatest salmon river in the world.

There are five species that frequent those waters, and each of those five species have different life cycles. The species are sockeye, pinks, cohoe, chum and springs. One species has a two-year life cycle, another a three-year life cycle, the sockeye and the chum have a four-year life cycle and the spring has a five- or six-year life cycle. Now, what is meant by the life cycle is the period from the time when the salmon are born until they return to the spawning grounds. In the case of pinks it will be two years; in the case of sockeye, four years. All the salmon have one characteristic, namely, that when they lay their eggs in the gravel bars they die. The sockeye salmon has a rather peculiar characteristic, differing again from each of the other known species or varieties, in that sockeye salmon will not lay their eggs on any gravel bar other than the one from whence they came.

In the year 1913 a disaster occurred at the place in the Fraser River called Hells Gate Canyon, a narrow gorge through which the waters of the Fraser pass at the rate of about 22 miles per hour. In that year contractors were engaged in building the Canadian Northern Railway, now the Canadian National, and were blasting the sides of the mountain to make a roadbed for the railway. As a result of the loosened rocks falling into the canyon a change took place in the currents of the canyon, and the sockeye salmon heading upstream that year through the canyon to spawn were unable to do so and were almost wiped out. It is almost unbelievable, but we learn from very reliable sources that in that year close to 10 million sockeye salmon were heading up the river to spawn in the upper regions of the Fraser, but 80 per cent or so of them did not get through Hells Gate Canyon and so died without spawning.

The question is often asked why there was a long delay in constructing some facility in the canyon to enable the salmon to pass through. Fishways have since been built in the canyon to provide a passage for the sockeye at certain heights of water. The reason for the delay is that we were on the receiving end of the salmon while the Americans were on the catching end, and to bring about any equality in the division of the catch a treaty between Canada and the United States had to be entered into; it could not be a one-sided arrangement because the fish heading for the Fraser River from the ocean passed through American waters and therefore the Americans had the first chance at catching these fish. It was not until the year 1937 that the treaty became effective between the two countries which set up the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission. Canada had passed the treaty in 1930 but the United States did not finally pass it until 1937.

In that year six commissioners were appointed, three from the United States and three from Canada, and I have the honour—and I am proud of it—to be one of the remaining original members who were appointed to that commission in 1937 and at present I am Chairman. It was laid down in the treaty that our duties were to preserve, extend and rehabilitate the once great runs of the Fraser River, and one other requirement was that we divide the catch equally as near as practicable between the two countries, Canada and the United States. May I say that the division of the catch between the United States and Canada, and the increasing size of recent runs has attracted world wide attention. How close we have come to a fifty-fifty division of the catch can be better shown, I think, when I tell you that last year the Canadians caught 5,241,617 and the Americans 5,527,316. Over the years we believe that we have done a marvellous job in dividing the catch almost equally, when one considers that there are three or four different types of fishing on each side of the boundary line.

The fishery regulations put into effect by the International Commission are designed to permit a bulk of escapement from the first or the peak of the spawning migration. We have found over the years that the late fish, the ones that are delayed, are of no use on the spawning bed. I will illustrate that later as to just what effect that has, the fact of allowing late-comers to go up and spawn.

In 1958 the sockeye salmon were from 10 to 12 days late. Over the years we know the time of arrival off shore, either off Juan de Fuca or the Fraser River. The reason for their being late that year was given to us by those men whose duty it is to test the ocean waters. They told us that the Pacific Ocean last year was from two to four degrees warmer than in previous years, and we regarded that rise in temperature as the reason for the delay of the fish in arriving.

We were forced to change fishing regulations, shall I say, almost every day. You must realize that there are two countries fishing, and with the requirement to divide the catch equally between the nations we naturally have to keep a very close eye on the numbers and quantities of fish caught so that if one country is going ahead too fast we close it down and allow the other side to catch up. Over the years the equality of division has not varied more than about 3 per cent of the total of the catch, which I think is a wonderful record.

Now, I come to what took place in 1958. To begin with, we had an unprecedented catch. We did expect to have such a large run of fish. Our director, Mr. Royal, who I claim is one of the most able biologists in the country, and is aided by a very able staff, forecast at a meeting with our Advisory Board late in December 1957 that we would have around 12 or 14 million. You may well ask how can anyone forecast in advance what the run may be. We cannot fully explain why, but there are certain signs which reveal to us what is likely to happen the following year. With every school of fish that comes up the river to spawn there are a number of three-year old salmon, or "jacks", as they are called. Why they come in their third year, we don't know. But our director and his staff are able to tell the industry what can be expected the following year by counting the number of "jacks" that come in the current year's run. Surprising as it may be, it has worked out successfully so far.

In 1957 there were in the Adams River many thousands of "jacks", or three-year olds, which came up to spawn with the usual four-year olds. So, the director and his staff predicted for the industry that they could expect a big run of salmon the next year, namely 1958.

Well, the catch was larger even than we predicted. But one of the difficulties in 1958 was that the salmon stayed away up north of Vancouver Island, and later in great numbers began to take a new route down the mainland through Johnstone Strait. They came through in such great numbers that many of the Canadian canneries could hardly keep pace with the catch. I recall one week-end hearing that the canneries would have liked to have the fishing closed because they could not handle the numbers of salmon that were caught which came that way, heading of course for the Fraser River.

In round numbers, more than four million sockeye salmon passed through the waters of Johnstone Strait, which is outside the treaty. If all the sockeye salmon came down through the Johnstone Strait there would be no need for a treaty at all, because they would all be caught in Canadian waters. When this large number—4,260,000-odd—came through the Johnstone Strait, naturally the American fishermen were very jealous of what the Canadians were catching of Fraser River fish, but of course Johnstone Strait is not under the treaty. In the Canadian convention waters some five million fish were caught; and I have given the figure of more than five million having been caught in the United States convention waters.

There was also an Indian catch of 120,000 fish, which are caught in the interior and dried by the Indians for winter food.

Further, there was a total escapement of 3,816,114. There is quite a story to that, with its tragedy and benefits in the story of the great catch of sockeye salmon which we had last year.

In addition to these figures which I have given, some 300,000 fish were unable to make the spawning beds, and it would have been too late anyway had they reached them. You will hear a very interesting story of what we had to do to prevent some two million fish from going on to the spawning beds, which we did not want there; the spawning beds at Adams River had all they could take care of, without detriment to the 1962 run.

All told, the sockeye salmon caught, canned, and escaped to the spawning ground reached a grand total of 19 million, each sockeye weighing from six to seven pounds. Honourable senators, 19 million is a lot of fish.

At the opening of the season, the fishermen and the fishermen's union met with the canneries and agreed upon a price of 28 cents a pound for canned salmon. At that time the canneries had no idea where the product would be marketed. As a matter of fact, the banks had been carrying the industry for the past number of years to the extent of many millions of dollars and the outlook for the canneries was indeed black. And here was a big catch coming up with no sign of where it could be sold.

Then, like a bolt from the blue, the regulations in Great Britain were changed overnight and the British buyers said "We will buy all the salmon you have." No indication or notice was given for the sudden change. One smart buyer was tipped off and flew from London to Vancouver to buy up most of the canned salmon before the other British buyers could get here. The industry kept back a considerable number of cases for home consumption, but most of the 1958 pack went to Great Britain at something like, I believe, $37 a case.

This meant that through the Adams River to the Fraser River sockeye salmon meant a gross take of almost $50 million this past year. There are various values given out: sometimes they represent the landed value, which is what the fisherman gets, but I am giving you the cost at which the product is sold wholesale. As I have pointed out, one does not count the value of an apple crop by taking the number of apples on the trees or in the boxes in the warehouse; rather, one takes the value of the apples in the stores. So, as I have said, the value of the sockeye salmon catch to the Fraser River area this past year has meant $50 million to the province of British Columbia. I intend to speak a little later about those who would wipe out the whole salmon fishing industry by building dams.

Just a word more about the counting of the escapement. I do not intend to explain it in detail, except to say that it is done scientifically and is a fairly accurate count. Many may ask how one can count 1,700,000 fish. It so happens that the spawning beds in the Adams River can hold no more than 1,700,000 fish.

Following the 1,700,000 already on the spawning grounds were two million more. It may be asked, why were they allowed to go up? I began to explain that the canneries offered 28 cents a pound, and then, about the time the British Government bought the output, they notified the fishermen's union, "After a certain date we are not buying any more fish at this figure; we will not pay 28 cents for the balance of the catch; but if you are prepared to take less we may dicker with you." Some American canners offered 14 cents, and at one time I thought the offer would be accepted. And may I say, honourable senators, that had the fishermen been allowed by the heads of their union to fish at that time and accept 14 cents, their takings per fisherman would have been worth anything from $500 to $1,000 a day, because at that time the Fraser River was alive with sockeye salmon; over two million were on their way up the river. So when the Canadian canners refused to buy the fish at 28 cents, and the union would not take 14 cents a pound, great hordes of salmon which were not wanted on the spawning beds started upstream, and the commission was placed in a rather ticklish position. Both the industry and the men tried to drag us into the dispute, but we kept aloof from anything of the kind. Under the provisions of the treaty we have no power to interfere with questions of price and the handling of the sockeye salmon. However, we knew how disastrous could be the consequences if these two million fish were permitted to go up to the spawning beds, already occupied by 1,700,000. We knew that the result could be disaster four years later. I may be asked why this would follow. Well, the commission has been investigating this subject for 20 years. We know something about the industry—there would be something wrong if we did not. We are amply supplied with funds from both the Canadian and United States Governments and have the services of a splendid staff under a very competent director.

Back in 1946 more than a million and a half salmon were allowed in the spawning beds, with results that almost wrecked the salmon fisheries four years later. The late fish are weak, and if they go on to the spawning beds where other salmon have laid their eggs they dig up the nests of the good spawners and lay eggs which are weak or inferior. Our experienced biologists have tested the amount of fat in the body of the salmon before it heads up the river, and how much oil is left in the fish after it spawns. They have found that just before the fish enters the Fraser River it has about 14 per cent oil fat, and after its eggs are laid practically no oil fat is left. So if the fish are delayed they deteriorate. Consequently we were faced with the great problem of what to do with the two million salmon which at the time were heading up to the spawning beds, with the beds already occupied by 1,700,000, and this through no fault of ours.

The Americans, of course, have an advantage over us in that they could use these fish, canning them under another name and selling them in the southern states. The price of 14 cents a pound would have paid the industry very well, but our canners are very touchy, and naturally so, about possible bad effects on the good name of first-class, number one sockeye salmon, which has made a great name throughout the world and is held in very high esteem by overseas buyers and the Canadian people. However, the matter may possibly rise again, and I hope that by that time steps will have been taken to mark this lower grade product even as secondary fish. It seems most unfortunate that some use should not be made of that great host of salmon, a large percentage of which was first-class food for human beings. I do not speak without some knowledge, because the commission put out test drifts in the river, caught some of the fish, and had it canned and tested by Government inspectors. Later we opened and examined the cans.

Hon. Mr. Euler: How did you solve that problem?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am glad the honourable senator asked that question. Over the years we have been experimenting with electrical gadgets, endeavouring to find a method whereby we could get fingerlings of salmon over or round the dam without injury. We placed across the mouths of these rivers electric rods about 18 inches apart, and when the fish came between the rods they backed up; very few if any passed through. We cannot justly be accused of killing them, because we didn't, though I, as chairman, was rather worried about a story which might have got around that we had destroyed good food. In fact all that we did was to divert the fish; we prevented them, by means of these rods, from getting to the already seeded spawning beds. I can show honourable senators photographs of the waters outside the rods absolutely solid, black, with sockeye salmon which had tried and failed to pass through the rods. When they felt the current of electricity they backed up.

Hon. Mr. Wall: What happened to the two million salmon that were not permitted to pass up the river? Where did they complete their life cycle?

Hon. Mr. Reid: When they came to the mouth of the spawning beds and found themselves up against these electrified rods they milled around the lake. Many of them spawned on the bars of the lakes. We are not sure what will happen, whether success will attend their spawning on the lakeshore, but we doubt it. Many spawned on the lakeshore, but many died without spawning.

We are of the opinion that the original productivity can be exceeded through further research and increased knowledge of the life of the salmon. The big production year was 1913 and we have now reached more than 60 per cent of that production. I must hasten to inform honourable senators that every fourth year there is a big production of salmon, and when the disaster took place in 1913 the five great areas in the Fraser

River for sockeye salmon had their big year in that uneven year of 1913. After we built the fishways at Hells Gate some of the runs started to have their big year in the even years. The Adams River run is one run that changed back from the uneven years to the even years. For instance, they had a big year in 1948. It will be a great step forward when we find out why nature produces only one large run of salmon in the four-year cycle. Sockeye salmon fry is practically the only variety that moves into a lake where it lives from 12 to 18 months before heading out to sea. This makes sockeye salmon distinct from all other varieties.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I would like to refer back to your comment about the two million fish that tried to get up or past the electrical bars. You said that very few got through. Where did the rest go? Did they go back to the ocean?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No, they swam around the lake and some spawned on the lakeshore and eventually died.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Would that be Adams Lake?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No, Shuswap Lake. Thousands never reached the spawning beds because they were too weak. They stayed too long in the open sea and lost their oil or fat and deteriorated to the extent they could not make the 300 mile journey up the Fraser River.

Honourable senators, we believe that the major lake feeding pastures are at the present time greatly under-cropped. Twenty years have now elapsed since the commission started its investigations, and we feel that our research management and requirements are sound and very successful. I want at this time to give particular credit to our director, Mr. Royal, and his staff. We are dependent on the commission's director and staff for their advice and the work they have carried out, and I feel that the success we have achieved in the past number of years is due largely to their efficiency. I would be remiss indeed in my duty if I did not say so at this time.

As I pointed out, it used to be that the odd years, such as 1905, 1909, 1913 produced the big runs. The object of the treaty was to restore those great runs, and, as I have said, over 60 per cent of that productivity has now been reached. It should not be overlooked that for the first eight years of the treaty's existence we were not allowed to regulate at all. Our instructions under the treaty were to investigate, and we did investigate, using competent biologists and engineers. Then after a period of eight years we started to regulate, and it is owing to the regulations put into effect by the commission, together with the information as to the life of the salmon during its journey from one end of the river to the other, that the great success which is now enjoyed has been brought about. I am pleased to say we are now close to the former peak runs and we expect soon to surpass them.

There are two species of salmon we have to deal with under the treaty. I believe I can say without boasting that the success we enjoyed with the sockeye salmon brought about the demand, particularly by Americans, that another variety or species be placed under our jurisdiction. So we have two species now, the sockeye and the pink. I would point out that from the time the eggs of the pink salmon are laid to the time the fry go out to sea and return covers a span of two years, and there is only a catch of pink salmon every two years. The responsibility of looking after the pink salmon was given to us in 1957, in which year some 300,000 spawned above Hells Gate. After the disaster of 1913 occurred not a single pink salmon went through Hells Gate Canyon until 1945-46, after the fishways were built. With the proper management of these fisheries a catch of 15 million to 20 million pink salmon can be expected by American and Canadian fishermen.

I do not want to take up too much time on this subject, but my story would not be complete if I did not refer to one of the great problems confronting us, the proposed construction of dams in the Fraser River. There is a group of engineers going around British Columbia and we do not seem to be able to get it through their heads—I suppose they are receiving large salaries from engineering companies—that what you can do with one species of salmon you cannot do with another. In so far as sockeye salmon are concerned, we claim there is no solution as to their survival if dams are built on the Fraser River. Authorities in both Canada and the United States have spent millions of dollars endeavouring to find the solution. The fact is that when the ordinary citizen or engineer speaks about dams and fish he always thinks of taking fish up over a dam or around it. You may take sockeye salmon up over a dam all right but the undue delays caused will wipe out their run. If it is decided to divert the waters of the Columbia River into the Fraser River it will mean the construction of ten dams, and we have conclusive proof that the greatest delay the sockeye salmon can endure and still survive to lay their eggs is 12 days. They have a destiny with time. The fat is being used up after they enter the river and when the fish come up against an obstruction, no matter what type it is, they swim around for two days. We have endeavoured to point out to the Government and those interested in building the dams that a diversion of the waters of the Columbia River to the Fraser will mean completely wiping out the sockeye salmon in the Fraser River. Having to get over or around ten dams will prove fatal.

I repeat my statement about the loss of fat. Engineer's minds are closed to these facts regarding sockeye. We have pointed out that we are not against hydro-electric power. We have tried to show them that power could be developed in certain upper sections of the Fraser River without interfering with the salmon. Only recently a report was placed before both Houses of Parliament from the Fraser River Basin Board. I do not know how many honourable members have troubled to look at that report. The board is supporting what we have long contended, that 1,300,000 horsepower can be developed on the Fraser or its tributaries far enough up so that the sockeye salmon would not be interfered with. These dam engineers talk about hatcheries and rearing ponds. Well, the long history of the Columbia River since they built the dams there shows that the fishery has gone down some 80 per cent since the year 1910, from which time they have been endeavouring to maintain it with 19 or 20 hatcheries. Yet in spite of the 20 hatcheries it is going down and down and down. The sockeye of course has been wiped out.

Listen to this interesting statement—and I hope some dam engineers are present: The present crop of 1958 came from eggs of 1954. They produced 19 million salmon. There were four years ago some 1,700,000 spawners on the Adams River spawning beds. If that is multiplied by 3,000, which is the number of eggs that the female salmon has, it will be found that if you endeavoured to handle that great number artificially it would take more than all the hatcheries in the entire world to handle 5 billion eggs. I am giving accurate figures, and I hope that those who are advocating dams will take note of what Mother Nature is doing without artificial hatcheries and without any expense. As I say, the fish came up and laid their eggs in the gravel beds, and they were looked after by God and nature, without the cost of hatcheries or rearing ponds. And remember—it would require 16,000 rearing ponds, plus a staff of 25,000 to manage these hatcheries and rearing ponds.

Honourable senators, this is a factual picture. These are not figures of imagination, they have been carefully worked out. I am placing this before the members of the Senate and trust that the dam engineers will take note and understand some of the facts I have been giving this evening.

Now I come to my last point, and I must apologize for being so long. I am glad I did not have another subject to speak on this evening.

I was very pleased to see in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the Columbia River. However, may I point out that there can be no final settlement of the Columbia River question without the concurrence of the provincial Government, and I contend that so far the province of British Columbia has been ignored. Before any agreement is made, I maintain that the province should and must be consulted. They certainly could not carry out General McNaughton's brain scheme of diverting the waters of the Columbia to the Fraser without authority from the province, and it has been stated flatly by the provincial cabinet ministers and the Premier that there will be no dams on the Fraser until the salmon situation is solved. We will keep an eye on them just the same in case there is a change in their views. General McNaughton's attitude all the way along has been as if he were the sole party concerned. After all, a province has some rights.

I have here an article which quotes the Minister of Lands and Forests of British Columbia, the Honourable Ray Williston, as saying that General McNaughton's attitude "was in direct conflict with the wishes of the people of B.C.". The article goes on to say:

> He was so "alarmed" by the general's outline of Columbia proposals, he said, that he wired Resources Minister Alvin Hamilton, asking if McNaughton was "speaking for the Canadian Government".

He had to wait six weeks before he got an answer. He thought he was never going to get one. Speaking on behalf of the Government of British Columbia, Williston said:

> The federal Government had no policy whatsoever on the Columbia until recently.

He added that the engineering studies on the Columbia are so incomplete that "we still don't know if a dam site can be placed at Mica Creek."

May I point out, honourable senators, that on some of the sites they suggested building a dam—they proposed to do it quietly, they didn't tell the public—they later found out they could not do so because the rocks had cracked—had crevices in them, and it was unsafe to build there. No information has come forth from General McNaughton as to whether a dam could be built at Mica Creek or not. Williston claims the Peace River power will be ready long before that of the Columbia, and that it will be just as cheap. The provincial Government are using another club now. They sanctioned a new company formerly called Wenner Gren, which now is under a new name. Now the Premier has a club in each hand. He says this company will build a power plant in the Peace River with power just as cheap as from the Columbia River. He says now he does not care if they ever reach an agreement on the Columbia. It is going to be very interesting to see how this thing is going to be solved ultimately.

I think a lot of the blame for the delay can be placed on General McNaughton. I am not entirely satisfied with the Wenner Gren project, because I think they are getting away with an empire; they are going to build a dam which will produce 4 million horsepower in the lake formed by the dam, which will probably be the largest artificial lake in the world when they get through, and which will bring the power to Vancouver. But here you have the B.C. Electric handling all the power there, and the B.C. Power Commission delivering power to the outlandish parts of the province. Then we will have two private companies competing for power, plus a power commission. Personally I would like to see the power from the Columbia being handled by a public commission like the B.C. Power Commission. So far it has been a one-man battle, and it is my opinion that if the Columbia River is diverted to the Fraser it may strain our relations with the United States, at a time when our relations should be closer in face of the Soviet threat to finish off the Western nations now by economic means or trade.

I hold no brief for the Americans, but I do not like their being threatened. The Honourable Mr. Green in his statement supports General McNaughton when he says that they are going to keep the plans for diverting the Columbia in cold storage for 25 to 30 years. I would like to quote what the Honourable Mr. Green said to a House of Commons committee in 1955. At that time he was a strong advocate for provincial rights, but evidently he has since changed. The Honourable Mr. Green said the other day that power from the Columbia would be delivered to Vancouver cheaper than from any other place. Well, if we get cheaper power by doing that I will be the first to commend it, but I have my doubts, even though cheap power is delivered. It is a well-known fact that consumers in Vancouver and district are paying twice as much for electric power as consumers in most cities in Canada. Ottawa pays less than half of what we do. Toronto, Winnipeg, and even Saskatchewan cities pay half the rates that we in Vancouver and district are called upon to pay.

It must be remembered that the proposal to divert the waters of the Columbia into the Fraser will mean the construction of ten dams. We have advocated the building of a dam at Mica Creek under an agreement by which 50 per cent of the power developed will be allotted to benefit downstream interests. Such a development would supply British Columbia for a long, long time. A project of this kind would be accomplished much more quickly if General McNaughton would only realize he is not in battle, that he is not actually at war with the Americans. My opinion is that his attitude all the way along has been the wielding of a big club to further this great scheme of his, the diversion of the Columbia, and I must say that I am surprised to find the Honourable the Minister of Public Works supporting the scheme and saying that he will put it in cold storage. May I say that I am going to do all I can as long as I have strength in my body to prevent diversion of the Columbia River to the Fraser, for this would destroy and wipe out one of God's great gifts of food and one of Canada's great natural heritages.

Honourable senators, I have just one more statement to make. I believe the reason for optimism that a settlement will be reached this year is not that any of the major problems have been solved, but simply that the way seems open now for the inevitable bargaining and there is every reason to believe it will be realistic and tough. Canada has little to gain, however, by playing dog in the manger. Canada, of course, has the absolute right to develop the upper Columbia as it likes or not at all, or to let its flow run unregulated across the border, or to divert it. Our unusual position of dominance imposes on us an obligation. Canada should not take unfair advantage of the situation. This is the time to be scrupulously fair, even generous. We should offer the United States a fair deal according to the pattern of previous agreements. This pattern is remarkably consistent. It is an equal sharing of the costs and benefits, 50 per cent to each. And let the province be taken into consultation.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Wall, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, permit me to append my sincere congratulations to those already directed to the mover and the seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Their introductory statements, in substance and delivery, set the tone for the very many fine addresses which have followed.

I share in our mutual satisfaction and pride that our forces have been augmented by three new members. Your attention has already been drawn to the significance and the representative and meritorious nature of these appointments, and I need not dwell upon this any further. We all look forward to the significant contributions which each of these newly-appointed senators will be making to the legislative work of this honourable house. I join in extending to them my warm congratulations, and an assurance of sincere friendship and good fellowship, with which dual heritage I have been endowed so munificiently from the first days of my privileged membership in this house.

Let me begin in a kind of minor-key motif. Specifically, I wish to register a complaint against what I think is the unwarranted exercise of ministerial discretion to withhold information which can hardly be regarded as confidential or secret, especially when it concerns legislation being presented to Parliament. Why is it, when a bill is before Parliament and we should have all the pertinent information, we are often kept in the dark, but when the legislation is passed this information may then be given public circulation? And I am not, honourable senators, referring now to the aide memoire of the United States Government concerning its serious criticisms of the amendments to the Customs Act, which unique development differed considerably from the action taken by the Department of State when it received the aide memoire of the Canadian Government at the time the United States Senate was considering legislation dealing with pilotage in the Great Lakes Basin.

Not long ago the honourable Minister of Transport indicated that the Government has a program of development at the lakehead which is far-sighted, comprehensive and adequate because it will do a first-class job for the lakehead. Please note the "judgemental" adjectives: far-sighted, comprehensive, adequate and first-class.

During the last session of Parliament we had under consideration the problem of harbour facilities development at the lakehead. At that time I wanted to know something about the existing facilities, the kind and volume of trade through the lakehead at present, the best estimate of the kind and volume of trade we might expect there during, say, the next ten years, and the kind of loading and freight-handling facilities which might be needed for this new traffic.

My purpose in raising this point is to register this query: Why should a member of the Senate be denied the opportunity to study the pertinent findings of a survey made by publicly-paid officials of a Government department—in this case, two departments—at public expense, in a problem area of wide public concern? Specifically, a survey report of lakehead harbour facilities was prepared by an interdepartmental group of senior officials of the Departments of Public Works and Transport. Although I had already read the Manitoba Government report prepared back in 1955, and a further analysis by an independent expert, a Dr. Harold M. Mayer, of Chicago, I wanted to know how our federal officials had appraised the situation in 1958. So I had requested access to this report, first by telephone and then by letter to the appropriate minister, which I sent in June, 1958. And I was given the usual answer that such reports are basically for the information of the departments concerned, although I must, in fairness, admit that the minister's letter, because of my supposed particular and unique interest, did contain a few broad and highly generalized statements of survey conclusions: to wit, that existing package freight facilities were obsolete, that there was no provision for handling truck traffic, and that early reconsideration was called for in the nature of a common terminal. Not much food for analytical thought there, I assure you.

In this context, imagine my interest in a news dispatch dealing with the joint conference of representatives of the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan held in Winnipeg on February 2. In it I find that an official of the Public Works Department did give specific details concerning the proposed $5½ million package-freight terminal at the lakehead, together with supporting economic data. I do not know how much of this specific data was based upon the findings of the survey to which I have already referred, but I must ask: At what point does ministerial discretion to withhold information collected by public servants at public expense transgress the norms of free access by members of the Senate to factual knowledge which certainly cannot be regarded as secret?

If I am to be in a knowledgeable position vis-à-vis important public problems, I must have free access to available information—a freedom which is merely an extension of the people's right to know about their legislatures, about their executives, about their judicial proceedings. For there is a basic relationship between freedom and secrecy, and an increase in trends or tendencies to secrecy is a curtailment of knowledge and therefore a curtailment of the freedom of Parliament.

In the general framework of questions which may be asked the Government concerning what may be termed "casualties" of announced public policy before assuming office—and here I am thinking of such things as the rebuilding of Canada's merchant marine, national budgets ostensibly swollen by waste, high interest rates, an honest non-inflated dollar, among others—I must draw the attention of honourable senators to the problem of a policy conference to deal with dominion-provincial tax sharing.

I shall not speak at length about the still unresolved problem of dominion-provincial tax sharing, although I am mischievously tempted to refer to the criticisms of the Conservative spokesmen in which they criticized, nay, veritably belaboured the former Liberal Government for not giving the provinces a large enough share of federal taxes, and for its supposed high-handed "take it or leave it" attitude. I seem to remember that in his opening campaign speech in Toronto in April 1957, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker implied that this problem would be settled soon in a spirit of unity and amity, and with mutual tolerance and respect, as opposed to the arrogant domination and stiff-necked attitude of the Liberal Government.

True, there was a conference with the provinces in November 1958, and I attended the open session, but it was a "listening-type conference," with the representatives of the federal Government listening to the problems of the provinces. Then the conference was adjourned, and the next thing we knew was that the present administration unilaterally adjusted the formula previously evolved—true, keeping its basic principles of equalization and stabilization. How? Simply by increasing the provincial take-home payments from 10 per cent to 13 per cent of the individual income tax revenue.

Honourable senators know something about the chorus of provincial disapproval directed both at the amount of the adjustment and at its unilateral character. Now the Government announces a unilateral one-year extension of this widely unacceptable unilateral decision, with a promise to study this problem co-operatively through the existing machinery of the federal-provincial continuing committee.

My province of Manitoba continues to express its dissatisfaction with this state of affairs, and Premier Roblin openly voiced his "disappointment".

In the Ontario Legislature, in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, Premier Frost intimated that he has retreated "not one-quarter of an inch" from the position he took when the Liberals were in power in Ottawa. This means that although the Premier agrees to accept for this year the extra 3 per cent on personal income tax he is looking for a realistic, enduring and just settlement whose price tag he openly admits would be the same additional $100 million that he insisted on a couple of years ago, plus an upward revision to cover current price increases. Now, if we keep in mind that a formula providing Ontario with an additional $100 million would roughly double Ontario's transfer payments, which last year were $96,722,000, then we can see that the increased federal tax sharing of this order for all provinces could involve an upward revision of the relative burden of the national tax structure.

I presume that these provincial expectations are tempered by the cold realism of what these will mean, for even with sizeable increases in national revenues because of a rise in our gross national product through accelerated economic activity, additional payments to provinces could and would undoubtedly be a causative factor in the upward revision of our federal tax structure. I hope that we are not anticipating to find some relief from this unavoidable and necessary step by the increases in national revenues which would come from a stiff dose of inflation.

Now, although I appreciate that the Government has not ruled out the possibility of a conference, perhaps in 1960, and although I accept the need of what I may term technical studies of tax-sharing problems to which the Speech from the Throne refers—and they have been going on all the time—the fact remains that what the country was led to believe and expect was that there would be an immediate policy-making conference, a promise repeated at the conclusion of what I termed the "listening-type conference" held in November 1957. The fact remains that provincial Premiers continue to demand such a conference, and their insistence is not diluted by their mounting financial problems because of higher interest rates and the more pressing needs of municipalities. Surely we are not going to have in this aspect still another casualty of unfolding federal policy.

Honourable senators, I feel that I should now bring to your attention the emerging problem of federal Government participation in the public projects which are needed to solve some of Manitoba's problems connected with the control of waters flowing into Lakes Manitoba and Winnipeg and the lake levels of these two bodies of water. Our biggest problem is flood control, but there are important hydro-electric power considerations, especially on the Nelson River.

I have in my hand a report on Measures for the Control of the Waters of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba, dated June 30, 1958. This report gives the recommendations of a joint survey made by representatives of the Governments of Canada and Manitoba. Its terms of reference included the determination of the physical, engineering and cost practicabilities of further developments in the control of these water resources with particular reference to (a) flood control—because of the flooding of lands in and around the two lakes and its river tributaries; (b) hydro-electric power—because of the effects of the lake levels on the power potential of Nelson River power sites.

Its recommended findings, which we find on pages 9 to 11 of the report, suggest the following: (1) In the Lake Winnipeg area the reservation of Crown lands and the public acquisition of lands privately held to enable the regulation of lake levels between certain recommended elevations; (2) Lake Manitoba regulation for flood control between elevations 811 and 813.

There is a cost estimate of about $1.5 million for Lake Manitoba regulation. There is no cost estimate which we could pin down for the acquisition of lands privately held.

Several days ago the Province of Manitoba's Royal Commission on Flood-Cost Benefit released its findings. Briefly, this report discusses flooding frequencies from a historical perspective and analyzes the financial costs to the people of Manitoba of floods which did occur and which could and probably will occur again. These costs are adjudicated at the level of $14 million per year, distributed thus: $12.8 million for metropolitan Winnipeg; $700,000 for the Red River Valley; $500,000 for the Assiniboine River Valley. And these, honourable senators are annual costs.

The report goes on to reject as not practicable or feasible the idea of a self-sustaining flood insurance plan, however it may be conceived. The report recommends three major projects to give these areas the required flood protection: (1) a floodway round greater Winnipeg; (2) a canal-type diversion of the Assiniboine River into Lake Manitoba at Portage La Prairie; (3) a control reservoir on the Assiniboine River at Russell, Manitoba. The total cost of these three projects is estimated at $72.5 million.

It may be significant if I tell you that if we calculate the capital fund amortization on the basis of an interest charge of 4 per cent and a term of 50 years, the annual cost of these projects is estimated at $4 million. Compare that with the $14 million that the people of Manitoba are estimated to be paying annually for flood damages and flood fear costs. When we compare this with the present financial costs to Manitoba of annual flood and threat costs, we find that for every dollar spent on these projects the estimated economic benefit is $2.73. The report, therefore, states that there is no doubt about the fact that the costs of protection through these projects are substantially less than the estimated costs of flooding to which the people of Manitoba are being subjected on a painful and recurring basis.

My purpose in bringing this problem to the attention of honourable senators is to underscore that there exists some reasonable measure of national responsibility in the successful implementation of the projects recommended in both reports. If the federal Government assumed its adjudicated share of responsibility in launching the Saskatchewan River Dam project, then this same precedential level of participation will undoubtedly be accorded to the Manitoba control projects. And I am sure that Manitoba will soon be searching for this amount of participation by the national government.

But I am perturbed by what I read in the press concerning a statement of the Honourable Alvin Hamilton, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. As reported by the Winnipeg Free Press, on Friday, February 13, the minister > —could not say whether the federal Government will be prepared to assist financially in carrying out recommendations of the Manitoba royal commission on flood protection.

And why? He goes on to say, well, he has not seen the report, Manitoba has not asked him, and so on and so on.

The article further states:

> The minister said that there was one way the federal Government might assist if it decided to participate and that was through the Water Conservation Act—

But, why on this basis? How does this square with the federal Government participation in the Saskatchewan Dam project?

I leave that problem on this point.

I want to turn to the question of national scholarships, bursaries and loans for university and college students. I do not now propose to document the continuing and ever more pressing need for an increase in the number of scholarships, bursaries and loans for university students. This I have done on former occasions.

For example, I have explained that in 1956-57 we had a grand total of 18,000 scholarships for a university enrolment of 85,000. Roughly one student out of three was in receipt of some aid. This compared poorly with Australia, where 50 per cent of all university students had national scholarships and bursaries; and with the United Kingdom and the United States, where approximately 75 per cent of all university students receive aid.

There is another problem which merits our attention. In amount our scholarship and bursary aid is poor. We average about $325 per recipient, and we range from $25 to $1,000 or over for post-graduate students. This amount must be compared with the mounting costs of university training, which are now beginning to average around $1,500 per year and up.

Putting this problem in another way: a study lately completed indicates that by working summers or during the school term, and through scholarships and loans, the following percentages of students are able to be independent of family financial assistance—and I submit that these figures are very interesting and significant: Of graduate students—that is our top level students—only 32 per cent are financially independent of parents. For under-graduate the percentages have become rather alarming: engineering, 18 per cent; arts and sciences, 15 per cent; education, 12 per cent; law—I would like to make a mischievous comment, but I won't—9 per cent; medicine, 4 per cent.

Now let us remember that the balance of the students—that is, graduates, 68 per cent; engineering, 82 per cent; arts and sciences, 85 per cent; education, 88 per cent; law, 91 per cent; medicine, 96 per cent—must get finances from their parents. Let us further remember that in 1956, the last year for which we can get figures, there were in Canada 3.9 million income tax payers, and of those 2.7 million earned $4,000 or less. I venture to suggest that a taxpayer earning less than $4,000 is hardly in a position to finance one or two children at a university.

Accordingly, I must ask, what has happened to what I would regard as an election promise to do something about the national scholarship program? Was it a pro tem antidote to the Liberal party's promise to institute a scheme of national scholarships, bursaries and loans to provide for a maximum of 40,000 new scholarships, at an estimated maximum annual cost of $25 million? Is it to be still another casuality of the Government's policy in practice?

I refer honourable senators to statements made by a cabinet minister of this Government, the Honourable Sidney Smith, as reported by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 4, 1958, the Vancouver Province of March 22, and the Winnipeg Tribune of March 11. I have the clippings here. What did those statements say? They outlined a stepped-up program embracing urgent increases in fellowships, bursaries and scholarships. Mr. Smith's plan, interestingly enough, forecast that the federal Government would allocate $6,250,000 to first-year students during the first year of operation, which was to be 1958-59; $12,500,000 to first- and second-year students in the second year of the plan, and levelling off in the fourth year at $25 million, to be divided among 40,000 students in all years, at an average of $600 apiece.

What has happened to this important concept in the program of Canada's national development? The plain fact is that there is a deep and studied silence on the part of the Government vis-à-vis this pressing public problem.

At this point I should like to give the estimate that I have made of the net additional charges on the public treasury for the conversion loan operation. My calculations show that the net additional charges on the public treasury until 1966, when the last Victory Loan would have matured, will be no less than $249,821,000, including the cash adjustment payments. I am confirmed in the conservatism of my estimate by a statement of the Minister of Finance which we find at page 748 of Hansard of the other house:

> Estimated per annum interest of the new conversion loan issues plus unmatured and unconverted Victory Loan issues for calendar year 1959 is $250,888,250. Per annum interest of Victory Loan issues in 1958, assuming that no issue had been refunded prior to maturity, would have been $192,476,410.50.

Now, if we subtract these two figures we get an annual additional interest charge of $58,411,839.50. Some of the issues were to run for another eight years, to 1966, and some for another five years, and so on; and, guessing that the average overall term was four years, if we multiply the additional annual interest charge of $58 million-odd by four we get a total amount of $233,644,358, and by adding the cash adjustments of $42,400,000 we see that the indicated net additional charges on the public treasury are $276,044,538. Dividing that sum by $25 million for 40,000 annual scholarships would have given us more than 425,000 scholarships for the next 11 years.

I would like to turn now to the problem of intercommonwealth scholarships and fellowships. At the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference held in Montreal last September the Canadian Government, through the Honourable Sidney Smith, proposed a scheme of intercommonwealth scholarships and fellowships, a proposal which was welcomed by most other commonwealth countries represented. I quote the following from the Montreal Star of September 19, 1958:

> Canada's offer to provide $1,000,000 a year for 1,000 commonwealth educational scholarships won unanimous approval at the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference today.

One million dollars, divided among 1,000 students, gives us an average scholarship level of $1,000; and I ask how many boys and girls from families in modest circumstances, whether in the United Kingdom, South Africa, or any other commonwealth nation—or here in Canada, if they wanted to go to some place else for study—would be helped to any considerable degree by an overseas-type scholarship of approximately $1,000 per student. In all humility I ask: "Is that enough? Are we raising our sights high enough?" I may not understand some of the details, but those details have not been given to us.

This proposal is very interesting, but it will be extremely complicated to put into effect and very careful planning will be needed. I understand that the Government hopes to have the first awards under this scheme made for the university session of 1960-61, but this will depend on a lot of preparatory work and intercommonwealth negotiation. It would be encouraging, I think, to those interested in the scheme if the Government gave some assurance that this preliminary planning is taking place and that the scheme as a whole will be pushed forward with the vigour necessary to get it into operation by the fall of 1960.

I should like now to touch upon the problem of federal grants to universities and, especially, their distribution. Honourable senators are aware that the national Government's responsibility for supporting higher education was accorded practical realization by a per capita support formula, at present $1.50. One is tempted to pay a tribute—a warm tribute—to the wisdom and the foresight of the previous administration for what will prove to be an important transitional move in the unfolding drama of increased federal support for one of the most important national services. Credit must also be given to the present administration for raising the level of support from $1 to $1.50 per capita.

I wish to comment briefly on the adequacy of this support formula, an adequacy which we must assess as we think of the changes in our total Canadian population and compare these to the greater proportionate increases in university enrolments. The problem revolves around the basic fact that university enrolments are increasing at a faster rate than our total population, upon which the level of support is based. In other words, the average per student grant is being continually diluted. For example, in 1956 the previous $1 formula, based on a population of 16,049,288, provided $16,049,288 in federal grants to universities. Dividing this sum by the number of students eligible for these grants gave an average per student grant of $221. Significantly, this same $1 formula, based upon a population of 16,558,000 in 1957 and resulting in total federal grants of $16,558,000, produced in that year an average per student grant of only $205, because of a relatively more rapid increase in university enrolments. Had the same $1 level of support been continued in 1958 the per student grant would have dropped to something like $192.

Fortunately—and I give credit to the Government—the level of support was increased to $1.50 per capita of population, and the 1958-59 per student grant is $289. But if present trends continue, if our population increases by approximately half a million per year, and if our university enrolment does no more than increase by the current figure of approximately 9,000 per year, the federal grants to universities will continue to be diluted year by year.

In Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimates received last night we were given figures for the increase of population effective January 1, 1959. I have asked for an estimate as of June 1, 1959, which the Bureau has graciously supplied. Although only an estimate, it is important because upon the June population estimate the $1.50 formula is calculated. The forecast for June is that at that time the population of Canada will be 17,445,000. On the basis of the $1.50 per capita grant, the total amount receivable will be $26,167,500. The National Council of Canadian Universities estimates that, if all goes well, the number of eligible students for next year to whom this grant will be applicable will be 96,000, an increase of 8,000 over this year. Dividing the recipients into the estimated grant gives an average for next year of $273, which is $16 per student less than the figure for this year. So I come back to the same point, that the federal grant will be continually diluted. The two things do not flow at the same rate.

Therefore I ask whether the time has not arrived for the Government to consider the feasibility of establishing a university support formula on a fair and equitable figure of so many dollars per student. We might begin with the very modest sum of $300. This year it is only $289; let us move ahead to $300, although what seems a reasonable improvement in the level of support prompts me to suggest the figure of $350. To arrive at the total of the federal grant one need only multiply this per student support level by the number of students entitled to it.

There is another problem which I feel I must bring to your attention, namely, the results of the distribution formula at present being used by the National Council of Canadian Universities, the body responsible for the distribution, which formula is apparently statutorily mandatory. I am not passing judgment, but it seems important for us to know that the distribution formula results in great variations of per student grant as between the various provinces. This arises from the simple fact that the National Council of Canadian Universities allocates the funds to the provinces on their provincial population figures, and these have no mathematical relationship to the number of students enrolled in the universities and colleges of the said provinces.

Although the average of federal grants per student in 1958-59 totalled $289, the per capita student grant in each of the provinces was as follows:

British Columbia	$223
Alberta	354
Saskatchewan	301
Manitoba	247
Ontario	363
Quebec	250
New Brunswick	259
Nova Scotia	215
Prince Edward Island	363
Newfoundland	608

There is a problem here which could be made less onerous if, for example, the federal Government were to use the national average as a floor, so that no university or college would get less than this national average as computed annually on the present support and division formula. I appreciate this would mean that the federal Government would have to provide additional sums of money over and above the amount arrived at on our $1.50 per capita support formula, but the sum total would not be very large. I present the following figures representing the additional expenditures on such a floor-grant formula for 1958-59:

	Students	Per Student Additional Payment	Total Cost
British Columbia	10,393	$66	$ 751,938
Manitoba	5,277	42	221,634
Quebec	29,320	39	1,143,480
New Brunswick	3,340	30	100,200
Nova Scotia	4,946	74	366,004
			$2,583,256

Honourable senators, that would be money well spent.

I had intended to discuss the still unresolved and evermore pressing problem of federal assistance for the construction of student residences at our rapidly-expanding colleges and universities, but because this form of assistance might best be rendered through the medium of the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, and because we shall soon have before us a bill amending the National Housing Act, I shall leave the discussion on this topic to a more propitious occasion.

I am grateful to all honourable senators for their courteous attention.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Inman, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Aseltine, for Hon. Mr. Brunt, moved the third reading of Bill S-8, respecting The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BALOISE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. Sydney J. Smith moved the third reading of Bill S-10, respecting Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, before the bill is given third reading, and with great respect to all concerned, I feel that I must make a few observations.

As I understand it, the main purpose of the bill is to give statutory validation to a change in the company's name, as the name Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada conflicts with the name Baloise Marine Insurance Company, or something like that. There is therefore no criticism of the reason impelling the change.

I have some difficulty in reconciling myself, however, to the proposed new name that has been chosen, and it is to this aspect I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators. The name "Elite" is stated to have been chosen to conform with the so-called élite plan of financing being carried on by the parent company, which has bought out the Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada. I understand that the main business of this parent company, whose name is not "Elite", is apparently automobile purchase financing. I do not know whether the term "élite" as applied to automobile financing has any other significant relative merit but that of its publicity and salesmanship connotations. Nor can I tell whether this assessment may also apply to the kind of insurance which will be issued by this newly-named company.

I recognize that the Parliament of Canada cannot exercise what may be termed discriminatory or censorship functions in the field of company names being freely chosen by those who are applying for statutory validation to such names, but I hasten to add that it also does not seem to me to be the duty of Parliament to give statutory confirmation to names which have rather unique and special connotation, and I regret sincerely that we are being called upon to do so.

This point I shall not pursue any further, except to point out that I concur in the mild criticism of the Superintendent of Insurance, that a happier choice of name could have been made by those who are requesting the passing of this legislation.

I regret sincerely, honourable senators, that I feel obligated to voice my dissent in this form.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, as sponsor of the bill I feel called upon to comment on the remarks of the honourable senator who has just spoken.

It will be noted that the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills went into this bill very thoroughly. It listened to evidence from the Superintendent of Insurance, who did point out that there might be some criticism of this proposed name, on the ground that he personally did not like superlatives used in the names of companies, but he registered no objection to it and the bill was reported without amendment. I do not think it is fit and proper for us to consider an amendment of that report on the grounds just outlined. The people who have applied for this change of name are a finance company which discounts time sales paper, and in connection with that they have an insurance service to protect the interests of the dealer and others involved. It was made clear that the principals in this case did not insist on insurance being placed in this company but they purchased the insurance company and operate it for the added service it can render in connection with this business, which is a highly competitive one.

There are many national companies in the discount field that operate wholly-owned or controlled insurance companies in order to be in a position to render insurance service within their own organization. This company, like many companies in the finance business have a registered name which they use in referring to their plan, which they call the "Elite" Plan. Other competing companies have what they call the "Merit" Plan, and so on. They desire to use the name "Elite" for their insurance company so it will tie in with their advertising and the registered name of the plan they are selling.

I think it would come close to trespassing on personal freedom and privilege of a free enterprise competitive business to tell these people that they cannot use a name which they of their own choosing submit. I do not think it is for us to criticize them for having chosen that name. I might not choose that name if I were in that business, but if the name hurts anybody it hurts them. If they chose to call themselves The Mickey Mouse Company I do not think we should quarrel with them about it. So I submit, honourable senators, we should not trespass on the freedom of these people by objecting to the proposed change of name, in the light of the fact that the bill has been passed without amendment by the committee.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I was not at the meeting of the committee and I know very little about the circumstances of this company, but I must say I differ with my honourable friend who has just spoken when he says that we ought not interfere with the choice of name by a private company. These people are applicants for permission to use a certain name, and they come here as suppliants, not as masters. It is for us to decide whether or not we should give them the right to use that name. There is a rule I think, of practice only, with regard to names. We refuse to allow companies to monopolize ordinary words in the English language. For instance, a company cannot take some well-known adjective and make a name of it, thus getting a proprietary interest in the word. Now, the word "Elite" is open to some objection, but personally I do not think it is open to enough objection for us to refuse permission for use of that word by this company. However, I repeat that we have a perfect right to refuse or grant the company's request.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTH AMERICAN ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the third reading of Bill S-9, an act respecting North American Accident Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did the Superintendent of Insurance approve this bill?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Not only did the Superintendent of Insurance approve it, but it has been approved by all the other companies having names in any way similar to this company's new name.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate the honourable senator from Lumsden, (Hon. Mr. Pearson), mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette), the seconder, upon the very excellent speeches delivered by them.

It is a pleasure to extend a sincere welcome to the three recently summoned senators and to wish them many years of usefulness and happiness as members of the Senate of Canada. We are also glad to see the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) back with us.

At this time I would also pay tribute to the memory of those senators who answered the summons to a greater reward and extend deep sympathy to their bereaved loved ones.

Also I wish to express our national concern and sympathy for the town of Springhill, Nova Scotia. Its citizens seem to have had more than their share of trouble and sorrow in recent years.

Almost ninety-five years ago a group of representative public men met in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, in an historic conference and discussed the opportunities for the development and growth of this great country. After a goodwill tour of the eastern and Atlantic areas these men went to Quebec for a further meeting and there laid the foundations for Confederation. That they did right the years have confirmed, for the country they dreamed of has become Canada, one of the world's great nations.

However, greatness in a nation or in any part of it can only flourish if the people realize and stress the need to overcome economic problems, and to exploit and profit by economic advantages.

There is in Canada an area called the Maritime provinces. To people from the larger provinces this area is often regarded as a collection of small provinces out of the way, down by the sea, when actually it is one of the major regions of Canada. The four Atlantic provinces together are three times the size of New England. These provinces are among the oldest in Canada. Their people were establishing homes and overcoming the hardships of pioneering, and at the same time building parliamentary institutions, when our newer provinces were still unchartered wildernesses. They helped bring the faiths and traditions of the Old Country to this land, and they sent their sons and daughters to help settle and develop the western and northern regions of Canada. The resourcefulness and initiative of Maritimers, as we call ourselves, have played a major role in all walks of Canadian life.

But with the expansion of Canada moving toward the central provinces and west, as the wheels of progress kept turning, the east, down by the sea, was left out of the picture. Its present position reminds me of the little boy who always inherited his brother's outgrown clothes. One day he asked his mother, in all seriousness: "Mother, will I have to marry John's widow when he dies?"

That past is now behind us, but the future lies ahead. This future we in the Atlantic provinces must study and prepare for.

The chief economic factor in Atlantic enterprises has been the difficulty of large-scale economic development. The provinces themselves individually are not large; the growing season is short; farms are small; many raw materials are readily available in small quantities but transportation is difficult. All these conditions have been obstacles in the development of the Atlantic area.

The ice age did not help any either. Newfoundland is mostly rock, with little soil; Prince Edward Island mostly soil, with little rock. It put most of Nova Scotia's coal out under the sea where it is hard to get and, while New Brunswick is an extension of the Appalachian Highlands, it made the hills a little too low for cheap and efficient water-power development on a large scale. Then as a climax, so to speak, the ice age gouged out the St. Lawrence as a back door behind the Maritimes, so that the Atlantic provinces are not the gateway to the interior of Canada.

These peculiar geographic features, with their economic consequences, have also affected our political picture. Each province has its own parliament, with a full system of government, and all the obligations that go with it, because, so far, no good way has been evolved to have one seat of government for all of this area—unless we go back to the good old days when all a government did was govern.

However, these pioneer people overcame their political and economic difficulties, and by the mid-eighteen-hundreds had a thriving maritime economy based on shipbuilding and commerce which took the products of soil and sea all over the world. Indeed, Confederation did not appear too attractive to Maritimers when it was first mooted, as they were getting along so much better than the rest of Canada.

Now what has happened to this prosperity? Why did it go? What made it vanish from these provinces? The answer is of course that political and economic revolutions, coming at the same time, made it difficult to cope with the situation that these conditions created. Responsible government was established in 1840, and a few years later came Confederation, and both required a great deal of adjustment. Right about this period too the commercial world changed from the sailing ship to the steamship. And that change did not help the Atlantic provinces.

Now let us look at the other side of the picture. It is true that life soon teaches us that economic factors do not make up all of the standard of living. They are only a part. Happiness, a most important part of living, bears little relation to wealth; and if you stay awhile or live in the Atlantic provinces you soon realize this, for they have many advantages which make living there happy and worth while. Nature has given us vast expanses of beautiful country, beautiful beaches, fruitful fishing streams, lakes and rivers for boating and other sports. Here people can get to work and home again in a very short time; they can play golf or go fishing without having to drive many miles and contend with traffic jams and other annoyances of highway travel. Also all these things are less costly and more accessible than they are to those who live in big cities. I am reminded of a story of a small town newspaper editor being offered a position on the editorial staff of a large newspaper in New York. His answer was that he would much prefer to stay in his own little town. However, the big newspaper wanted him very badly and extended him a second invitation. Still he was adamant in his stand. Finally he said, "Where in New York can I go into my back yard and dig worms to go fishing?"

During the past decade the people in the Atlantic region of Canada have realized that something must be done, some means provided, to bring back prosperity to the Maritime provinces, which now include Newfoundland. Regional effort and co-operation would be a big factor in solving this problem. They have much in common, should work together as a team and speak together as one voice.

Realizing this, the Premiers of the four Atlantic provinces held a conference in Moncton in 1953 to discuss the possibilities of this region of Canada and decide what further steps might be taken to co-operate in matters of common concern. This meeting was historic because it was the first meeting of the four Atlantic Premiers since the famous Charlottetown Conference of 1864 when Confederation was considered. At that time, however, Newfoundland did not participate in the meeting.

A great deal of correspondence and discussion took place for several months after the Moncton Conference, and the whole movement came to a head with the setting up of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. In other words, "A.P.E.C." was born. It is a non-political, non-profit and voluntary association of industrial, business and professional organizations, and individuals whose purpose is to encourage the development of economic enterprises in this region.

The three main functions of the council are:

1. To survey and study the factors affecting the economic development of the Atlantic region.

2. To stimulate united action on matters of common concern, matters vital to the economic welfare of the Atlantic region, and matters of particular interest to the council.

3. To act as a co-ordinating body for all organizations, agencies or individuals interested in the general economic and social welfare of the Atlantic region, or in any province or part therein.

The council has set up committees on agriculture, power, tourism and trade. These committees comprise persons well qualified to speak on these subjects and deal with the problems encountered.

In short, A.P.E.C., as a permanent institution, hopes to aid and assist in every way the people of the Atlantic provinces to develop their own resources and skills through co-operative effort. We want to help ourselves. With co-operation, enterprise and courage the four eastern provinces can, I feel assured, bring back the prosperity that they once enjoyed. Assistance will be required, but we should get to work ourselves. We should take more chances as regard business, industrial and regional development. If we are going to develop economically we must be willing to experiment.

We have excellent products but we experience some difficulty with the marketing angle. We should be selling our products all over Canada, instead of buying canned goods, fruits, et cetera from central Canada. There is no reason at all why our products, foods and other things, cannot get into most markets. Tariffs and transportation costs do not bother some industries in the eastern area. A brush company in Saint John sells nationally and internationally in competition with others in the same line of business. Stoves from Sackville are sold all across Canada, despite transportation costs and stiff competition. Shoes from Fredericton are in shoe stores in every Canadian city. The answer of course is initiative and leadership, and the production of a high quality article.

Another valuable asset that is being wasted in our land. There are 2,500 vacant farms in Prince Edward Island alone. I cannot give the figures for the other provinces, but no doubt they are high. This is indeed a deplorable situation. Agriculture is an industry upon which every other industry depends: as agriculture goes down so will our economy lag. What can be done about it?

Farming, as honourable senators know, is one of the major natural resources in three of our Atlantic provinces, and we must be sure that we do not neglect our responsibility to the rich productive soil that Providence has provided for us. Newfoundland is not, nor can it be, an agricultural province. It has other very valuable resources waiting to be developed.

There does not seem to be any good reason why a good living cannot be made from a farm and why all our vacant farm lands cannot be taken up again and used with profit. Farming means work but it is a good life. Methods of farming are changing and before many years the small farm units may be out of date and obsolete, but we hope the family farm will survive in a new and better form. One-fourth of a family's budget is spent on food, and this is a big slice. Much of this food, or at least a very good part of it, comes from farms. Some of the best men and women the world has ever produced have come from farms, and farms, if given a chance, will still provide us with men and women of this high type.

Our Governments must do something about providing financial assistance to young people wishing to go back on the farms, and supplying more credit, when necessary, to those already engaged in agriculture, in order to enable them to continue farming operations with improved methods. Our farmers do not receive as much support in the way of subsidies and deficiency payments as do those in the western provinces. Why? To those who live in the east, this is an interesting question. If the western provinces are as prosperous as was indicated in the newspaper reports read recently here by the honourable senator from Rosetown, the Leader of the Government in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), why do those provinces receive so much financial assistance? That is my question number 2.

However, some means must be found to induce our young people to go back to the farms, and I believe the present Government will study this problem. There is a great difference between knowing what to do and knowing how to do it; so perhaps our army of economists can work out some plan. It may be, though, that we could do with fewer economists and more economizers in this country at the present time.

A farm is a good investment for anyone who is willing and able to work. A good wife is a big help also. One economic expert valued a good wife at $69,000 to a farmer.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: How much are the others worth?

Hon. Mrs. Inman: We hope this is considered to be a gilt-edged investment. I do not want to set the amount so high as to discourage the bachelors.

Optimism tempered with realism is what we need down in the Maritime provinces, that beautiful corner of Canada whose shores are washed by the spume and spray of the ocean waves. We can dream, we can plan, but action is what talks. The plain truth is this: we can prosper only if we have co-operation among our provinces, in an all-out effort to regain what we have lost, perhaps through attempting to gain as individual provinces.

It is of no use for a group of people such as A.P.E.C. or similar groups to organize and put over a few good publicity stunts and then sit back and wait for a miracle to happen, because the whole effort will be lost. Miracles, so far as dollars are concerned, seldom happen in this day and age, except perhaps in oil and we in the Maritimes do not have oil resources. It takes unanimity, co-operation, and a sincere desire to help each other. A good economy can be effected only by the determination to achieve the goal desired, the development of our resources in this Atlantic region.

Where do we go from here? There is no easy solution, but I would suggest that an excellent place to start any program of profitable value would be to develop those industries best suited to the areas. I can think of no subject more deserving of attention in the Atlantic provinces at this time, for the benefit of the people and the economy of this area, than the tourist industry.

As honourable senators are aware, today there is quite a different attitude toward tourism than existed in earlier days, when fewer people were in the business and fewer tourists came to Canada. The travel pattern also is changing, as everything is changing. Forty years ago it required only 100 horsepower to keep a plane in the air. Today it takes 250 horsepower to carry a 110-pound woman to the grocery store. The question now arises, how far and how fast can we go in the development of our tourist potentialities? History has dealt harshly with doubters, but progress must be demonstrated. Thought is the pioneer and the awakening that spells progress need not be painful. There is no law that requires invention to be nine-tenths perspiration and one-tenth inspiration. Great discoveries and inventions have only needed recognition and the use of unsuspected powers and possibilities. Who wants to put a limit to the possibilities of the Maritimes as a tourist Eden?

"What man can imagine man can do" is an old saying; and it is imperative that the Atlantic provinces get on with the job or we shall be on the moon or at least Mars before any tangible results will be forthcoming. Let us not get too involved with committees, commissions and briefs which take up a lot of valuable time and often defeat their purposes, cause delays, and finally disintegrate or get interred somewhere where their graves cannot be located.

We have come to know tourism as an industry, and a valuable one, for the Maritimes. It came unwanted, perhaps, in the earlier days. The tourists came to us first and have continued to arrive in ever-increasing numbers. With Maritime people the responsibility for the welfare of a guest is deeply indoctrinated early in life, and always seriously accepted. We have slowly—too slowly—learned that our greatest tourist attractions have been the sight of a simple, wholesome way of life, where people have a deep understanding of fundamental values and virtues, where they can smile without laughing, work without toiling, serve without servility, respect without revering; be a little bit dishonest without being corrupt, pious without being too sanctimonious, and profane, when necessary, without repetition.

This, then, is the Maritime provinces. These people know the meaning of loyalty, the importance of obedience, the shame of anger, and the greatness of forgiveness.

"Tourism" is the name of the industry whereby the man who came to dinner willingly became a paying guest. He finds, in sharing the Maritime way of life, an experience satisfying an inner yearning, and he enjoys also, of course, an endless variety of culinary excellence. Each and every community in these provinces has something, if it is looked for and developed, that is different and appealing to tourists. Those special attractions must be concentrated upon and well advertised. Many people do not see or realize just what is around this corner of Canada, and they must be educated to know and appreciate the value of this hospitality business as practised in the Maritimes.

Tourism is becoming for us an important industry, but here, as elsewhere in Canada, we are only at its beginnings. With proper management and good advertising it can be made to increase by leaps and bounds. Many of our visitors to the Maritimes come from the United States. We wish also to encourage travel in Canada by Canadians, for it is good for us to get to know each other.

One matter which should be carefully looked into and considered is the entry procedure on the border between the United States and Canada. Some action should be taken by our Government concerning the method of examining visitors coming, as they say, "across the line". We ask them to visit us as paying guests, but when they come to enter we put them through delays and sometimes subject them to indignities. I do not think this happens often, but it does happen, and those isolated cases are bad advertising and do a great deal of harm. Some way must be found to better our border relations.

Every province, every community in the country, is greatly excited and exhilarated if a manufacturing concern large or small announces it will locate in its area. That is good. Industry should be welcomed and encouraged. Industrialists are wined and dined, often given tax concessions; it is big news. But remember, attracting tourists—or paying guests, as they used to be called—is also big business and demands our close attention. It also is an industry. It asks for no special concessions. It costs the community little, but it brings in a large income and the buyers come right to the door to spend their money. It is a business that involves no freight rates and no tariffs. If any community can attract twelve visitors a day —a day, mind you—it amounts to the equivalent of establishing a manufacturing plant with a hundred thousand dollars annual payroll. That is a lot of money. At least, in our province of Prince Edward Island it seems a goodly sum. So let us be opportunists. We have the resources to make this a great vacation land, second to none.

Here I wish to pay tribute to Mr. John Fisher, Executive Director of the Canadian Tourist Association, for his untiring energy and interest in the promotion of tourism in Canada. He has done a wonderful job.

You know, an opportunist is a man who, finding himself in hot water, decides he needs a bath anyway. That is exactly our position in the Maritimes today. We have been in hot water as far as development of our resources is concerned, and now the time has arrived when we must make use of all our resources to better ourselves and bring back what we have lost. We must offer attractive information to induce people to come. We realize too that nothing is free. We must have help, certainly, and here I would ask the Government to give every consideration possible to the Atlantic provinces, but we must stand on our own feet too.

The Atlantic provinces are famous for many things, and each province, as I have already said, has its own particular appeal and charm, but all have the common background of the sea. To many this is a super attraction. Each province has its own type of scenery, but all are beautiful. Here are found magnificent beaches with splendid swimming and bathing facilities, and fishing, boating, hunting and a delightful summer climate. And over all is an old-world atmosphere and old-world traditions which appeal so strongly to tourists and visitors.

Tourism and agriculture are closely related. If we can increase the volume of our tourist industry, then our farmers will prosper accordingly. Visitors must be fed, and more of our farm crops could be used at home with satisfaction to the producer and consumer. It could be that by using more of their products in this way the Atlantic provinces would get rid of some of the tariff and freight-rate headaches which seem to be so prevalent these days.

And now, honourable senators, before concluding I wish to make a few special remarks in regard to matters affecting my native province, Prince Edward Island. We are small and insular and we have some problems that pertain solely to this smallest province of Canada. One of the biggest problems we have to contend with is transportation. By the terms of Confederation we were promised continuous communication to and from the mainland. But through the years that clause in the document seems to have lost its potency. I will not say we have been the forgotten corner of Canada, for we refuse to be forgotten, but certainly we have been brushed aside in respect to transportation. And that annoys us greatly. Apart from the increased freight rates which affect our food and commodity prices so much, there have been recent increases on ferry rates, trucks, automobiles, and also on passenger tickets. This is much to be deplored. When the previous Government was in power we had decreases in these rates, and I would suggest that the present Government might look into this with the view to having the increases rescinded, if possible. We need to encourage traffic to us instead of making transportation to and from the island more difficult.

The Canadian National Railway does not seem to think that it owes Prince Edward Island any consideration with regard to passenger traffic. For the past several years we had a pullman service to and from Montreal and Charlottetown. This was a much-needed improvement over the old system with all the changes—getting on the train, off the train and on the train again—and was a convenience to travellers. One could get into the pullman at Charlottetown and not have to change until reaching Montreal. True, this pullman was not one of the more modern types, but the porters gave good service and the trip could be made in comfort. This past year that accommodation has been discontinued. Now we sit in a coach car from Charlottetown to Moncton, arriving there about three hours before the Ocean Limited from Halifax brings along the pullman. As many honourable senators know, the C.N.R. station at Moncton is not the most comfortable place in the world to wait three hours. The benches are hard; it is dark and grimy looking and a most uninviting place to spend an afternoon. It is difficult to find a good reason for this discrimination in taking the pullman from this area, especially in the winter.

The need for a new icebreaker is immediate and very necessary. Our present ferry services are inadequate and have been so for several years, but the fire on the Prince Edward Island last year, along with lay-ups for repairs to the Abegweit, greatly aggravated the transportation problem. We need a third ferry boat very badly. This need not be a boat of the same palatial type as the Abegweit, for the crossing is only nine or ten miles and takes from three-quarters of an hour to one hour. It does not even have to be a train ferry, but the need for a large truck and automobile ferry is immediate and we hope and look for improved transportation services for next summer. I have stressed this need each time I have spoken here and the need is still evident.

Some day we may have a causeway. I sincerely hope so, but that will not come for a long time, at least for several years or more. Ice conditions have to be closely studied. Ice-tides and winds will constitute a difficult problem in the construction of a causeway. This winter the Abegweit is fighting the most strenuous ice conditions for many years on the crossing between Borden in Prince Edward Island and Tormentine in New Brunswick. It is fighting through "pan ice" in the strait up to 11 feet in thickness. In March and April conditions could well get worse, when ice from the Gulf of St. Lawrence is driven into the strait by strong winds and tides. We should not suffer transportation inadequacies while waiting for a causeway to be built.

Tourism is becoming to Prince Edward Island what wheat has been to the west, one of its biggest industries. In fact, tourism ranks second. The province is becoming famous as a summer playground. Even a United States weather machine dropped down on one of the farms and stayed there. It was picked up by a farmer on one of his fields in the Cape Traverse area. There are incomparable resources in scenery, historic attractions and recreational facilities in this sea-girt, sun-kissed island. To those who like to spend their holidays in restful, quiet surroundings, undisturbed by the rush and roar of the big resorts, Prince Edward Island has peculiar charms. Its cultivated farms and the rolling sea that breaks upon its long reaches of magnificent beaches offer abundant enjoyment to visitors in summer. Here you can congregate with crowds or you can, if you wish, have twenty miles of perfect beach to yourself. Where can you duplicate this?

We also have many historic sites, since our history is old. Our historic society, in co-operation with the provincial and federal Governments, is having those sites marked and developed. In Montague, my home town, a provincial museum was opened last year by His Excellency, the Governor General, and here can be viewed many items of interest pertaining to the life and development of the Island.

At Cape Wolfe there is a large rock, and legend has it that General Wolfe stopped to eat his breakfast here one morning on the way to Quebec. Perhaps he had fresh lobsters.

Our Government House is always a tourist attraction, and our Lieutenant-Governors have been most gracious in allowing parties to look over the grounds and residences. The provincial building, with its stone floor hollowed out by many footsteps over the last hundred years, receives thousands of guests each summer who visit the Confederation Chamber. Green Gables is internationally known and needs no introduction. These are only a few of our historical sites; there are many others.

We have our ghosts too. I saw them when I was young. Of course, my imagination has faded over the years and now the ghosts do not impress me so much.

We must utilize our hisory. More should be done to develop our historic sites, for this little island is an historical shrine. Here Canada was born, and here, too, prohibition was fathered. This was the first place in the world to prohibit the public sale of liquor. We also prohibited automobiles for some years. Islanders are firm in their convictions.

The economy of Prince Edward Island is dependant largely on agriculture, tourism and fishing, in the order in which I have named them. We have very little in the way of other industries, although it is the dream of our people that some industries may be established that would provide employment and revenue for our citizens.

Potatoes are the big crop in this eastern province, since the soil and climate seem to be particularly adapted for this purpose. There is usually a surplus crop, and means should be found to utilize this. Tariffs and freight rates affect the marketing of potatoes to some extent. So if this surplus could be processed and used at home some of the potato growers problems would be solved. Starch factories would be a good thing; they would provide an outlet for some of the surplus, besides providing extra employment. Processing plants to convert lower grades and culls of potatoes into food for livestock could be useful. Potatoes are high in energy and very nutritious and produce excellent meat in dressed carcasses.

Prince Edward Island is famous for its sea foods—especially oysters and lobsters—as well as potatoes, and more processing plants for fish would help the economy of the province. Our farmers can grow small vegetables and fruits, such as peas, beans, tomatoes, berries, et cetera, to good advantage, and more canning plants should be established to take care of these crops.

Prince Edward Island, besides being small in area, is also small in population, so it is essential that government aid would have to be forthcoming to assist in getting these industries established and underway. And why not? Subsides and bonuses to aid industry are not new to any of our governments.

There are peat bogs on the Island, to what extent is unknown at the present time, but they could be explored and surveyed, with industrial requirement in mind. Dried peat is also an excellent fuel for fireplaces.

This province was the cradle of fur farming. Fox fur is coming into its own again, and mink is always in demand. These two high-priced furs can be produced very successfully in Prince Edward Island. Fur farming should be encouraged, and there is no good reason why pelts could not be processed and made up into garments in the province where they are produced.

Perhaps in Prince Edward Island we do not climb to the heights, nor do we sink to the depths. We ride—to speak in the parlance of the sea—on an even keel. We enjoy the simple pleasures of life and do not live too dangerously. This perhaps is the reason why we have so many centenarians. The story is told of a curious tourist inquiring of one of these very elderly citizens, who was sunning himself in front of a general store, "Just how old are you?" The old man said he was just 100. The tourist said, "Well, you will not likely see another 100." To which the centenarian replied dryly: "I ain't so sure about that. I'm stronger now than I was when I started the first 100."

The honurable senator from Rosetown, the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), has very graciously extended an invitation to all honourable senators to visit Saskatchewan. I wish to follow his example and invite all or any honourable senators to come to Prince Edward Island. We will not be able to show you tremendous areas of waving, golden wheat, but we can show you, in the months of July and August, large fields of dark green potato plants, topped with pink and mauve blossoms. And that, honourable senators, is a very beautiful sight, I assure you. Our province is not called "Spud Island" for nothing. Sometimes our potatoes may be a bit short in weight. According to some newspaper reports this is due to water loss and shrinkage, but we are never down in quality.

We will show you beautiful scenery and the best to be had in hospitality. In short, we will show you a land where the grass is greener, the soil is redder, the water warmer, than any to be found elsewhere in Canada.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, in taking part in this debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, may I add my felicitations to those who have already spoken. I also would like to congratulate the newly summoned members of the Senate, and say how particularly pleasant it is to see my home-town colleague from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Buchanan) sitting opposite me.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: It may not be inappropriate at this time, when the debate on the Address offers considerable latitude in subject-matter, to discuss briefly the subjects of education and government. Education and government in a democratic society are two sides of the same coin. Good government depends on good education, and good education depends on enlightened government. In fact, it can be argued that the first steps in the development of modern democracy were taken when the people established the public schools to do for all of the people what no other agency could do. Thus, in the first instance, we delegated to the public schools the responsibility for teaching our children how to fit into contemporary society, how to make a living for themselves and finally how to govern themselves.

The election of free parliaments is, in simple terms, simply a continuation of the voluntary process of delegating to some of our peers the responsibility of governing in the best interests of all of us. In the one hundred years of the Pax Britannica, from 1813 to 1914, government was a relatively simple thing. It did not involve directly the lives of the vast majority, and the governing was done in most instances through the agency of an elite aristocracy who legislated for the many, sometimes wisely, sometimes ill, but in the main with a certain sense of responsibility. At the very heart and centre of the advance in democratic thinking were the British Empire and the British Parliament —"the Mother of free institutions".

To those who can remember back to the summer of 1914 it must appear as remote as another age. As a matter of fact, it was. World War I marked the end of an era. It not only marked the end of the Austro-Hungarian and German empires, but the beginning of the decline of the British Empire as well. World War II and its aftermath, as well as accelerating the decline of influence and power of the British Empire, brought about the rise of new giants in Russia, China, India, and the United States of America. Parallel to these upheavals has come the annihilation of time and space through modern transport and communications.

Gone with the empires of yesteryear are the old aristocratic feudal forms of government. The power and the responsibility for making the decisions which determine peace or war, depression or prosperity now rest in the hands of millions of enfranchised people who by their ballots determine the kind of governments we shall have and give to those governments a mandate to legislate in a complicated maze of conflicting national and international interests. In the years since 1872, when Britain first introduced universal suffrage, we have made it our boast that prince and pauper were equal at the ballot box. And no one would have it otherwise.

In the gradual development of our democratic forms of government we have evolved a free society which, up until the present time, has given the people who follow and believe in that form of government the highest standard of living the world has ever seen—a standard far higher than that enjoyed by peoples who have remained under feudal or authoritarian conditions. The success of this form of free society, in the last 75 years in particular, has created in the minds of our peoples certain basic assumptions. Among these are: (1) that the democratic way of life is superior to any other; (2) that that superiority was proven in two world wars in the space of 25 years; (3) that the only serious challenge to the democratic way of life comes from something called communism.

These are complacent assumptions which can only be accepted in part today. Certainly the democratic way of life, with its emphasis on freedom and the rights of the individual, is the only assumption that offers hope in a world increasingly and rapidly succumbing to state authority. But saying this, or believing this alone, will not make it survive. If this assumption is to survive in the climate of today it must become a living, fighting conviction, not just on the part of a literate few, but on the part of all who have the right and the responsibility to use the franchise. And if there is one malaise in our society today that is more dangerous than any other it is the preoccupation with rights and the denial of responsibility, the overconcern with getting and the unconcern about giving.

In an excellent recent article in Maclean's magazine, Bruce Hutchison put our position rather well when he said:

> For the first time in our history "the paramountcy of the West has been lost, and in its familiar form can never be regained in our lifetime, if ever."

The Sputniks and the Luniks of the Russians and the colossal achievements of the Chinese in building the Ming Tomb Dam are but a symbol of the new challenge to our way of life. These achievements and the dedication and purpose of those peoples are but symbols of a new challenge. They are the outward manifestation of the secret weapon of the communist powers. That secret weapon is education—education spelled in capital letters a mile high for all the world to see. From almost a standing start the Russians have, through a concentrated and selective type of education, accomplished the same industrial revolution in forty years that took us one hundred. To say that they had the advantage of our experience and technology does not detract from their achievement. More significant still is the estimate that the Chinese will do in twenty-five years, and possibly in fifteen, what the Russians did in forty.

Coupled with the rapidly developing technological achievement of these people is the tremendous impact of population. Every hour of the day, seven days a week, 1,500 to 1,600 little Chinese are born. There are already 650 million Chinese. There are at present 220 million Russians. And while it is true that the people of India, Pakistan and Indonesia are as yet uncommitted, they represent an additional 571 million which could easily fall into the communist orbit. If those 571 million people, through some mischance, were to go over to the communist side, it would mean that we would have 1,441 million people allied against our approximately 500 million. In short, we would be outnumbered in the days of the future by at least three to one.

The Chinese, the Indians and all the others, like the Russians, are using education as their secret weapon, and we Canadians would be less than realistic if we did not do something about it.

I am one of those optimists who believe that the suicide of another World War will be averted. Why should these powers risk the holocaust of another World War in which there could be no winners when, through a highly selective and concentrated program of education, they can increase their productive power many times over and flood world markets with goods at a price so much lower than ours that we could not begin to compete with them?

Make no mistake about it, what the Russians have done, through education, in developing and improving their national production, has made more of an impact on the nations of Asia and Africa than all the propaganda that has ever been turned out. What the Russians have done and what the Chinese are now doing has given the people of the so-called underdeveloped countries new hope and confidence that they too can accomplish these ends. People who fail to realize this are failing to grasp one of the fundamental facts of our present-day life.

Fortunately, there are signs in nearly all Western countries of what Mr. Dulles in another context referred to as "an agonizing reappraisal" of our educational systems, and that reappraisal is a critical examination of the educational systems of the Western world. Honourable senators will recall that in the United States somewhat over a year ago President Eisenhower called what is known as the President's Conference on education at the White House. You will recall too that just one year ago in the city of Ottawa there was held for the first time in Canada a National Conference on Education.

Going back to the year 1945, the Province of Ontario appointed the Hope Commission on Education, the first of a series of provincial royal commissions. That commission spent five years and brought out what is known as the Hope Report, a document of 943 pages, which reviewed the history of the public schools in Canada from the very beginning to the present day. That report is a vast compendium of information on Canadian education, although its main concern was with the special problems of education in Ontario. The Province of Nova Scotia conducted a much more modest inquiry in 1954. In 1957 the Province of Manitoba appointed a Royal Commission to report upon education in that province. In December 1957 the Province of Alberta appointed a Royal Commission on Education, and it is my privilege to be Chairman of that commission. In February 1958 the Province of British Columbia also appointed a Royal Commission on Education. It will be seen, therefore, that at the present time in Canada there are three provincial royal commissions on education studying the problems of education in Western Canada in particular. In addition to that, the continuing committee of the National Conference on Education is engaged in the process of setting up provincial committees to carry on as a continuous program the study of education on a Canada-wide basis.

Business and industry too have pooled their resources and have set up the Industrial Foundation on Education, and this agency has been delving into a number of educational problems in a very practical way, particularly as they apply to business.

In Great Britain, while they have not gone so far as to appoint a royal commission to study education, the Ministry of Education in that country is presently engaged in a searching re-examination of the whole educational program. Thus it can be said that today in the whole Anglo-Saxon world the people are engaged in a searching examination of our current needs and assessing just how we are meeting the requirements for today and tomorrow.

So much for the general picture.

It may be interesting if I pass on to you a brief summary of what Alberta people are telling our commission is wrong with education in that part of Canada. I understand from my colleagues in British Columbia and Manitoba that the people there are telling them the same things. And I expect that the people in eastern Canada have a similar story to tell today. The Alberta, British Columbia and Manitoba commissioners have had a number of joint sessions to compare notes. As a matter of fact, I am going out to Alberta next week for another joint session with these commissions. I suggest that the findings of these commissions will apply in some degree to eastern Canada also.

Our commission held public hearings in 23 centres in Alberta. We received 186 briefs and 35 private submissions. I say "briefs", but that is a misnomer, because many of them ran to more than 200 pages of typewritten copy. I think we have received more than 5,000 individual recommendations as to what is wrong with education and what should be done about it. The encouraging thing to me is that hundreds of people, members of home and school groups, members of school boards, chambers of commerce, manufacturers, associations, university faculties and teachers' associations have spent hundreds of hours in examining their school system as never before. This is healthy and good.

Here may I say that when you ask a person today what he considers to be the aims of education, too often he will express himself in vague, philosophical terms that do not mean much. In this respect I think the Americans have been smarter than we we have been, in talking as they do about the "tasks of the public schools". My impression has been that when you ask people what they consider to be the tasks of their public schools, you will get a much clearer answer than you will when you ask what should be the aims of education.

It would not be appropriate for me to anticipate at this time what the recommendations of my own or the other commissions will be, but I hope that when the reports are written they will be interesting and adequate to the needs of our time. I think, however, without committing a breach of propriety, I can give you a sample of the things people have been saying to us in our public hearings.

First, they have said that in the elementary school there does not seem to be too much wrong that more, better trained, teachers and more drill in the fundamentals would not cure.

Second, that the junior high school—that is grades VII, VIII and IX— represents one of the most critical and criticized areas in our school system. Between 40 and 60 per cent of the school population leave school with an educational standing of less than grade X. This means that the only school experience the great majority of people in non-professional and unskilled occupations have is what they have received in grades VI, VII, VIII or IX, a pretty inadequate base for an efficient democratic society.

Third, businessmen in commenting on the deficiencies of this group were almost unanimously of the opinion that students are deficient in the communicative skills of reading, writing, speaking and understanding. They are also deficient in their ability to use numbers or computing skills.

Fourth, it has been stressed that more attention must be paid to the development of proper attitudes with respect to responsibility, tidiness, punctuality, and a greater sense of mental and physical self-discipline. Too many of the products of our schools today have no pride of workmanship nor sense of responsibility in giving an honest day's work for an honest day's pay.

Fifth, in the high school program more emphasis must be placed on the communicative skills—on English, mathematics, history, geography and on the teaching of Latin and French. In the latter field we in our part of the world are doing a lamentably poor job.

Sixth, the areas most frequently under criticism were the present subjects of health and personal development, and social studies. There was repeated emphasis on the importance of teaching history and geography as separate subjects and in sequential order.

Seventh, there were strong demands for the institution of some form of external testing of students at the grades X and XI levels. I don't know how true it is in the other provinces, but in Alberta we have examinations in grades IX and XII, and the slaughter at grade XII is terrific. I think honourable senators can remember back to their own school days when, if you were taking two subjects, in one of which there was an examination and in the other there was not, it did not take much deduction to realize which subject would get the more attention—obviously, the one in which there was some form of testing.

Eighth, there were strong representations that gifted students should be given more attention, challenge and opportunity, either through enriched programs of study, acceleration, or a combination of both.

In criticizing education to responsible officials, I have had this answer given to me: "Isn't this a democracy?" You say that it is. Then an official will point out that if only 15 per cent of our school population is going to complete a high school program and go to university—actually the percentage is lower than that—then our main concern must be with the 85 per cent, because they are the majority. My reply to that observation, and I am sure it would be yours too, is that one of the fundamental principles of democracy is to preserve the rights of the minority.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would the honourable senator allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Have the conventions that you have attended ever had brought before them the question of the advisability or otherwise of taking the time of a student in school to teach him to drive a car? This in my view does not come under education at all.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I may say to my honourable friend that that suggestion has been made, and, I am sorry to say, seriously, by a number of groups who appeared before us, but the suggestion did not receive very warm reception from the commission. While I would be out of order in saying what stand we will take in that respect, I can say I do not think you need worry too much about the subject being included in school time.

Ninth, representations were made that it was essential that greater efforts be made to decrease the high drop-out rate in the lower grades of school and to encourage more students to proceed to matriculation.

Tenth, there was also a demand that we establish some yardstick other than matriculation as the basic requirement for employment. Some businessmen admitted that they required matriculation standing for their truck drivers, because they did not want to take anybody into their organization who was not capable of being moved up in the organization. Strangely, we had this kind of representation made to us by one of the large employing companies in Alberta.

Eleventh, it was pointed out to us that there seemed to be need to give the high school-leaving diploma more status in the business world and to make known exactly what it stands for. In that case those companies which were requiring matriculant students for truck drivers would not necessarily do so and might accept another school-leaving diploma.

Twelfth, it was argued that the greatest single problem in education in our part of the world, and I suspect in other parts, is that of attracting to and retaining in the teaching profession more and better qualified teachers. There seemed to be general agreement that where adequately trained teachers were operating in the schools the method of teaching was not so important. A good teacher could get excellent results with the enterprise system or any other system, but with less well trained and less experienced teachers a more prescriptive method of teaching and a more prescriptive course content may be desirable.

Thirteenth, in the realm of school organization and administration, the "little old red school house" of nostalgic memory to many has almost disappeared and the centralized school has come in its stead. The centralized school has made it possible for more students in the rural areas to obtain a higher standard of education and one more comparable to that obtained in the city schools. If we remember that when the boys and girls born on the farm in Canada today go into the employment market, 20 years from now, four out of five of them will have to find their work in cities or towns, we realize it is absolutely necessary that the young people of the rural areas have equal educational opportunities with those of the cities and towns.

However, in those areas where centralized schools are in operation the problem of vanning the students long distances—in some cases 25, 40 and even up to 70 miles a day—has given some concern on the grounds of its effect on the health of the children and the high cost of this phase of school operation. Strangely enough, when parents were asked what their choice would be between the alternatives, first, of vanning their children long distances to school while they lived at home, even though they might receive an inferior education; secondly, of sending them away to live in a school dormitory and return home each week-end, and, thirdly, of sending them away to board in a large centre while attending a high school where they would obtain a first-class education, the choice was almost unanimous in favour of keeping the children at home and receiving an inferior education. It is possible to understand the emotional feeling in this case, but our people must face the fact that if we are going to be fair to the young boys and girls who are growing up in the rural areas today, and who must find their occupational outlets in urban surroundings in the years to come, they must have the same opportunities of education as those in our city schools.

As might be expected, wherever the commission went there was an insistent demand for more and better-trained teachers. A careful study of the 9,600 teachers in Alberta schools in 1958 revealed that 50 per cent had only one year or less of professional training, and 3.9 per cent had less than one year.

In looking for the reasons why these teachers have not had more professional training, why the teaching profession has not been able to attract and to retain more people of higher qualifications, an examination of the financial situation may, in part, show the reason. According to a survey made in Alberta in 1957-58 the median salary for Alberta teachers was $3,679. Only 53 enjoyed salaries in excess of $8,000. The largest number, 3,800, were in the $3,100 to $4,000 per year bracket. Looking at it another way, and comparing the average earnings of the Canadian labour force and the average salaries of Alberta teachers in the 30-year period 1926-1956, in dollars of 1956 value, the average earnings of the Canadian labour force in 1956 were $3,260, while the average teacher's salary in that year was $3,270, just $10 more. However, in all the 30 years before 1956 teachers' salaries averaged from $200 to $300 per year lower than the average earnings per year of the Canadian labour force. These figures speak for themselves, and, I think, supply one of the reasons why more and better-trained people have not been attracted to the profession.

I am not going to say any more about education at this time. I started out to discuss education in relation to government. I have presented these ideas as a sample and a fair expression of the views of hundreds of people in my own province, and I believe they reflect the opinions of people in some of the other provinces as well. I do not agree that the primary challenge to our way of life today comes from communism, or anything like it. Certainly it is there. But our most serious menace, in my view at least, comes from within. It results from the unwillingness of the people and the politicians to face the major issues. Our people, like the little boy at the candy bar, have got in the habit of asking for more and more, and our politicians, of all political faiths, have been competing with each other in bidding higher and higher. This competition in bidding for votes, this unwillingness to face the facts, must inevitably have one of two consequences: either a colossal financial crisis or the evolution of some new form of financial management—and to this last I have no objection, provided it can be worked out on a sound basis. If anyone has doubts about the direction in which we are going, let him examine what has been happening in the United States during the last 10 years—a time of unprecedented prosperity, and yet a time of unprecedented budgetary deficits. Deficits are not unknown in Canada, and we may be facing deficits for a period of time. Of course no one wants to abdicate the responsibility of making provision for people who are without employment, even though it results in deficits. But I suggest to you, honourable senators, that we have to look carefully where we are going, and that one of the qualities which governments must develop to a greater extent than they have been doing in recent years is the faculty to say "No" to appeals by narrow sectional interests, to say "No" to the strongly-organized groups which are ever present and pressing for particular concessions.

No government at any level can function effectively if the majority of the people who put it in power have less than a grade 9 education, nor even if a substantial percentage of those who exercise their responsibilities at the polls have lower than a grade 10 education. In today's world, government is one of the most complex and difficult tasks that can be discharged by any group of individuals. Unless the people who elect governments have some realization of the needs and responsibilities of citizenship, they cannot make the kind of decisions which are an inherent obligation of a free society. Those who leave school at grade 8 or 9 or less, at 15 years of age, have had little formal instruction in citizenship. We must provide more opportunity for this large section of our population to continue training at a later time, or face the unpleasant truth that Abraham Lincoln's "Government of the people, for the people, by the people" may be translated into something very different—"Government of the people, for the people, by illiterates". The resultant situation would bring an end to democracy. So I say that education and government are two faces of the same coin, and we separate them at our peril.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

EVANGELICAL MENNONITE CONFERENCE—SECOND READING

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved the second reading of Bill S-11, to incorporate The Evangelical Mennonite Conference.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to make a short explanation of this bill. It is in the form generally used for the incorporation of religious bodies. The head office of the Evangelical Mennonite Conference will be at Steinbach, Manitoba, which is one of our most prosperous towns, and all that the petitioners are seeking under this bill is what has been granted on many previous occasions to corporations of this kind.

The objects of the corporation are: to promote, maintain, superintend and carry on its work in accordance with and for the diffusion of the Christian faith; to organize, maintain and carry on churches and missions and to erect and maintain and conduct therein churches, seminaries, schools, colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, orphanages and homes for the aged; to promote the erection and purchase of houses of worship and parsonages; to administer the property, business and other temporal affairs of the corporation; to establish, support and maintain a publishing house for the purpose of printing and disseminating Gospel literature for the support of the doctrines and faith of the corporation; to promote the spiritual welfare of all the congregations and mission fields of the corporation.

The corporation seeks to acquire and administer property. It also seeks the right to invest all or any of its funds or moneys in proper securities, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of State for Canada.

Honourable senators, I could go through this bill clause by clause, but if it is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, where detailed examination of the various clauses can be made. I think this can be better done in committee than on the floor of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I am not sure if I read the bill correctly but is there sufficient provision for the continued life of the corporation? In other words, will it become extinct upon the death of the last survivor of the three incorporators? The work of this corporation appears to be important and I understand the idea is to make the corporation one of long existence.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: There is no doubt that the corporation is being organized under the three names set out in clause 1 of the bill. These three persons will be the first directors of the corporation. I would refer my honourable friend to section 2 of the bill which reads:

> The persons named in section 1 of this act shall be the first directors of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Monette: But what will happen when they die? Is there anything provided for their succession, for their replacement?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: The bylaws of the corporation will take care of that situation by authorizing the appointment of directors when necessary. That will ensure the continuance of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Is that power given in the bill before the house?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Section 5 deals with the bylaws.

Hon. Mr. Monette: This can be discussed in committee, but I thought I should raise the point at this time for it seems to me there is no clear provision in the bill for the continued life of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I think section 6 makes such provision.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Sections 5 and 6 of the bill will take care of the question raised by the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette). Section 5 of the bill commences:

> The corporation may from time to time make bylaws, not contrary to law, for > (a) the administration, management and control of the property, business and other temporal affairs of the corporation;
> (b) the appointment, functions, duties and remuneration of all officers, agents and servants of the corporation;

Then you come to section 6, which reads:

> Subject to and in accordance with the bylaws enacted by the corporation under section 5, an executive committee consisting of such persons as the corporation may from time to time elect or appoint thereto shall manage all the temporal affairs of the corporation.

If my honourable friend has any further objections—

Hon. Mr. Monette: I did not raise the question with any idea of opposing the bill at all. I merely thought it could be looked into.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It will be.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, no doubt these are very good people with a splendid purpose in mind. Glancing over the bill I see one phrase which seems to me to be most unusual and I think it is open to a good deal of question. I would refer the mover (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) to section 14 of the bill, which reads:

> Any deed or other instrument relating to real estate vested in the corporation or to any interest in such real estate shall, if executed within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, be deemed to be duly executed if there is affixed thereto the seal of the corporation and there is thereon the signature of any two officers of the corporation duly authorized for such purpose,—

That is the usual phrase, and then to that is pinned on this tail, as it were:

> —or of his lawful attorney.

I think that is most unusual. If I were the solicitor for the corporation I would never have in the incorporating statute a clause such as that, giving the authorized officer of the organization power to sign such documents as instruments transferring real estate, and then allowing that person to appoint a lawful attorney to exercise that power. It might be all right if the person was specially authorized to sign some particular document, but do not forget that the officers of this corporation will have attorneys for all sorts of purposes. Attorneys of a general character are appointed sometimes and they might exercise this power on occasion without any authority directly from the corporation itself. I would think that is a dangerous clause to be allowed in.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Your objection is to the words "or of his lawful attorney"?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. I think those words should be struck out. I probably will not be at the committee meeting but I trust the committee will inquire into this matter.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: No doubt the remarks of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and those of the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) will be brought to the attention of the committee when it is dealing with the bill clause by clause.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I trust that my remarks will not be wrongly interpreted. I am in favour of giving any class of people such as this an opportunity to incorporate and to continue their life. It was in that spirit I queried whether sufficient provision is contained in the bill for the continuity of the life of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I can assure the honourable senator that his remarks, like those of the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity, will be brought to the attention of the committee. The committee will also have the benefit of the presence of the Law Clerk of the Senate, who is very efficient, and he will be able to guide us in our deliberations.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following document:

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 1959-122 of February 3, 1959, approving the capital budget of the National Harbours Board for the calendar year 1959, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter 116, R.S. 1952.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 111 to 125, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, in the report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada dated December last there is one paragraph about the classification of positions within the Civil Service. The report asks that the classifications should be left with the Civil Service Commission. I remember that, 21 years ago, the number of classifications was astounding; it was 2,500. I have this question to ask:

What was the total number of classifications in the Civil Service of Canada in 1918, 1938 and 1958, respectively?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRODUCERS' STRIKE

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, with regard to an answer which was given by the honourable and genial Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). As reported in Hansard of February 11, page 139, he mentions the names of 73 producers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who were on strike. All the newspapers have mentioned the number of 74. There is one missing and I would like to know who is the shadow in the picture.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time ?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill C-24, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has been sent to us for the purpose of having authorized certain supplementary estimates of expenditures required to be paid between now and March 31, 1959. These supplementary estimates were distributed to honourable senators on the 30th day of January 1959, and I presume you have made a complete study of them. They have also been considered in the other house, and that is the reason we have this bill before us. The total amount of these supplementary estimates is $27,954,667. It was necessary to introduce these supplementary estimates primarily to provide for the municipal winter works program and certain other federal works programs to provide employment during the winter months. In addition, there are certain other estimates that have been included, because certain amounts will have to be paid on them before the end of the fiscal year.

I think it might be of information to honourable senators if I dealt with these supplementary estimates one by one, giving a brief explanation of each as I go along. The first,

Vote No. 695, for $375,000, has to do with the construction of a forest biology laboratory at Laval University in Quebec City. The construction of it is a part of the forest protective program of the federal Government. The reason for the amount of $375,000 is as follows. In the main estimates $500,000 was set aside for this building. That was only a part of the cost, of course, but the contractor was so ambitious that he did a lot more of the work than was expected to be done, leaving some of his other work in abeyance. The $500,000 which was furnished by the main estimates is not sufficient to take care of what has to be paid between now and the end of the fiscal year, so this further amount of $375,000 is being asked for.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? I think he said that $375,000 is for Laval University, Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: For the forest biology laboratory at Laval University.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: And Laval University accepts the money?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, no; this is for the building.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Yes, for the building, but—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not intend to say it was a grant to Laval University. This is on account of the cost of erection of a building.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For Laval University?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, it is built at Laval University.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does it not belong to the university, then?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot answer that question. I do not know whether it does or not. I don't think it does. I think it belongs to the federal Government.

The next item is Vote No. 696, which has to do with the health of animals. It provides $400,000 for compensation for animals slaughtered. The amount is required to make certain payments under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act by way of compensation for diseased animals which must be slaughtered. In that way the spread of contagious diseases amongst animals is controlled. Honourable senators will remember that last session the act was amended to provide for a payment of from $40 to $70 for grade animals and $100 to $140 for purebred animals that had to be slaughtered. In 1958 the program for eradication of tuberculosis and brucellosis was stepped up considerably. Certain regulations had been made in the United States, and if we were to protect our position with respect to the export of cattle to that country it was necessary for the federal Government to increase its inspection program. That is what this money is for. The total expected cost for the year is $811,000, of which $411,000 has already been paid, leaving a balance of $400,000.

The next item is Vote No. 697: freight assistance on western feed grains. This is for the purpose of providing assistance in the form of payment of freight charges on western feed grains shipped to Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces, and also from Alberta to British Columbia. Last year the volume of feed grain moved was greatly in excess of the volume in the preceding two or three years. To the end of December the volume was 2,029,000 tons, whereas in the previous year it was 1,815,000 tons. That is the first reason why this extra amount is required. The second reason is the necessity to compensate for the 17 per cent increase in freight charges which went into effect not long ago and which would have thrown out of balance the payment of assistance on feed grains.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Could my honourable friend tell us what is the total amount expended under this item?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The total amount spent on freight rate assistance since the beginning in 1941 is, roughly, $293 million.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: How much this year?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This year it will approximate $20 million. A total of 45 million tons has been shipped since 1941. The amount of this vote is $2,500,000. The $2 million is for freight rate assistance on the increased quantity being shipped, and $500,000 is to cover the increase in freight rates.

I now come to Vote 698. This provides for additional payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre, up to a maximum of $200 per farm. Honourable senators will remember that last session $40 million was set aside in the supplementary estimates for this purpose, and it was thought that that would be sufficient to take care of these payments. Each holder of a permit book became entitled to receive the money, and the average amount paid was $175.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend if it is intended to continue these payments next year?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am afraid I would not be able to deal with that question at this time, because it is a matter of Government policy. I feel quite sure that my honourable friend knows just as much about it as I do.

When the payments started to go out it was found that many people who were entitled to permit books had not applied for them and had not received them. Up to November 14 last, 214,194 payments had been made, to a total of $37,712,156; and on January 29, 1959 payments had been made to 227,919 permit holders, to an amount of $39,887,459. The additional applicants number about 8,000, and they are now being looked into by the Canadian Wheat Board. It is expected that possibly 6,000 to 8,000 more permits will be granted, which will require the additional sum of $1,300,000.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: May I ask my honourable friend a question? If my information is right, these payments would apply to people who had delivery permits by the first of September, and people who did not have permits by that date would not come under the appropriation? Is there any way of adjusting that situation?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Several thousand permits have been serviced since that time, and everybody who was entitled to a permit has been or will be able to come under the appropriation and receive $1 an acre, up to $200 per farm.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Those farmers who did not have a permit when this arrangement came into being can still be provided with a permit to come under it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They will be provided with a permit if they are entitled to one.

Vote No. 699 has to do with the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Honourable senators know that in 1958 there was such widespread drought in the three Prairie provinces that at one time it looked as if here would be no crop at all. Many municipalities made application to have areas which were suffering from drought inspected under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Even though the situation improved greatly, and in many areas where applications had been made it was not necessary to pay any money under the act, nevertheless as applications had been made the officials of the department were obliged to make their inspection. On that account there was required some $225,000 more than was set out in the estimates which we passed last fall.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Can my honourable friend tell the house the total amount spent under the Prairie Farm Assistance program in the present fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The main estimates provided $550,446, the total amount required will be $775,446, and the $225,000 in this bill is the difference between those two amounts. It is expected that the total amount paid this year will be $20 million, of which about one-half will be paid by the one per cent levy that the farmer pays.

I now come to Vote No. 700, which has to do with the salaries and expenses of the Board of Broadcast Governors, in the amount of $72,000. This item is to provide for salaries of three full-time members of the board and the per diem allowances of the other members, including travelling expenses, from November 20, 1958 to March 31, 1959. It also covers some supplies, equipment and office rental.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask a question of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), who we know was in his youth an outstanding and brilliant hockey player? Can he tell us if the strike of C.B.C. producers has been settled and if we can feel assured of seeing the Canadiens play next Saturday night?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have been watching the broadcast of the games every Saturday night from Toronto. I understand, although I have no official knowledge, that the strike has been settled, and it is quite possible that this week we will see our Montreal Canadiens win another game.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the honourable leader give us the salaries of the broadcasting officials, where the salaries have been fixed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The total of salaries and wages is $92,000, and there are travelling expenses of $133,000, making a total of $225,000. The total provided in the main estimates was $550,446. That makes a total amount required for 1958 and up to March 31, 1959, of $775,446. But I do not appear to have the salaries paid to individuals.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will the honourable leader get them for us? We are entitled to know. It would appear to be $30,000 apiece or more, if $92,000 is paid to the three members of the board.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The amount covers more than those. There are three full-time members, and the others receive a per diem allowance. There are also travelling expenses. I will try to get that information for the honourable senator before the afternoon is over.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask whether the other figure of three-quarters of a million dollars applies to the new Board of Broadcast Governors alone?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, this supplementary estimate is required to provide for increased salaries and wages payments and higher travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: This is item 700.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, I beg your pardon, I am looking at the wrong page. This item is only $72,000 altogether.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: As I recall the newspaper story, the chairman receives $20,000, the second member, $16,000, the third $14,500, and the other members $100 per sitting day, plus their travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This is the explanation. This amount is required to meet the various expenditures of the Board of Broadcast Governors between November 20, 1958 and March 31, 1959. It covers the salaries of the full-time members of the board, per diem, travel and other expenses of the members of the board for their meetings, and salaries of 13 members of the staff, authorized as an interim establishment by Treasury Board minute TB543523 of January 2, 1959. It also covers such other items as supplies, equipment and office rental. As I said before, I was referring to another item. I am sorry I made the mistake.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Strike it out.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I come now to Vote 701. This has to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and it provides for a deficit of $2,193,552.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask what is the total cost of the service for the year, including the amount appropriated here?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not appear to have the total in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps the honourable gentleman can get the information before we pass the item?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Probably I can.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would like to know the total cost of operating the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, together with the total deficit.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will try to obtain that information. When the operating budget was drawn up for 1958-59 it was thought that $12 million would come from excise tax. When the new act was proclaimed, in November, further receipts under the Excise Tax Act were cancelled. At that time $9,806,448 had been collected. The $2,193,552 being asked for now is simply the difference between $12 million and the amount that had been collected when the act came into force. That is all this item has to do with. I will try to obtain the other information.

Vote 702 is the one-dollar item referred to in the estimates. I would like to make some remarks with regard to it. The Department of Fisheries is arranging to take over from the Government of the province of Quebec certain responsibilities under the Fish Inspection Act, in so far as it applies to the fisheries products under the Meat and Canned Foods Act. In arranging to take over these responsibilities it has been agreed that some 30 provincial employees engaged in fish inspection operations would be transferred to federal employment. The Public Service Superannuation Act, in section 28, provides for the transference of pension credits under reciprocal transfer agreements. The purpose of this vote is to authorize the transfer of pension credits of the specific group of provincial civil servants who have been working on fish inspection.

Vote 703 has to do with the contribution of $100,000 made in 1958 by the Government of Canada to the Springhill Disaster Relief Fund. I do not suppose that any further explanation of this item is required. The money has already been paid.

I come now to Vote 704, which has to do with field services construction in the Fisheries Department. The amount of the vote is $55,000. The purpose of this is to construct a spawning channel in Robson Creek, in the great central area of British Columbia, to help replace spawning areas lost by dam construction. The total estimate of this work is $115,000, and the department expects to start work this winter. This sum of $55,000 will be required before March 31. It comprises part of the winter works program.

Vote 705 is a little more complicated. The amount required under this item for departmental administration in the Department of Justice, is $15,200. It is to cover the expenses of the Correctional Planning Committee set up to advise as to implementation of the Fauteux Report. An amount of $12,000 is required for travelling expenses, $1,500 for professional help, $1,000 for office equipment, and $700 for sundries, making a total of $15,200.

Vote 706 has to do with remission service, and the amount required under this vote is $28,000. Honourable senators will remember that last session an act was passed doing away with the Remission Service and providing for a Parole Board. This supplementary estimate is to provide for the new Parole Board now being set up to administer the Parole Act, which became effective on February 15, 1959.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Who are the members of the Parole Board, or have they not yet been appointed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Chairman of the Parole Board is Magistrate T. G. Street of Welland, Ontario, who, I understand, was appointed recently.

I think I should deal with Votes 707 and 708 together. An amount of $218,914 is required for these two items, $151,394 being for operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, and $67,520 being for construction, improvement and equipment. These funds are required for the acquisition, operation, maintenance and equipment of installations for the accommodation of prisoners at William Head, British Columbia, and Valleyfield, Quebec, until March 31, 1959. Perhaps honourable senators are not aware that in British Columbia the penitentiary has been greatly overcrowded as a result of an increasing intake in the last few months. It was considered imperative to find additional accommodation to take care of the overflow, and arrangements have accordingly been made to take over a portion of the quarantine station operated by the Department of National Health and Welfare at William Head, B.C., which will accommodate up to 100 additional prisoners. Similarly, in Quebec all available accommodation is filled to capacity at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, and there are some 150 prisoners in provincial jails waiting transfer to the penitentiary. The department has been able to make arrangements with the Department of National Defence to take over the army camp at Valleyfield, Quebec, for accommodation of selected prisoners.

I now come to quite a large item, Vote 709. This has to do with the provision of $15 million to be paid to the provinces in connection with the winter work program undertaken in conjunction with the municipalities from December 1, 1958, to April 30, 1959. The federal Government agreed to pay one-half the cost of the labour incurred. There are many different kinds of work involved and perhaps I might give the house a few of them: construction and major reconstruction of streets, sidewalks or roads other than arterial roads; construction or reconstruction of bridges or culverts; clearing brush from road allowances to improve visibility or prevent snow blocking; gravelling or regravelling roads; stockpiling gravel or crushing rock for gravelling; demolition of buildings in connection with park development; reallocation of telephone lines in connection with construction or major reconstruction of a road; construction and major reconstruction of roads for which the municipality assumes the principal responsibility for construction and maintenance; clearing of drainage ditches or channels where it is mainly for the drainage of roads, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Has the honourable leader any information as to allocation of the $15 million among the various provinces?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have an extensive table here that gives that information, and with permission of honourable members I would have it printed in Hansard at this point. It deals with the number of applications in the ten provinces, and gives the estimated cost of projects, and that kind of thing.

N.B.—Cost figures shown in thousands of dollars.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: The honourable leader mentioned stockpiling of gravel. Would this item allow a paving contractor who was not working in the winter to stockpile gravel?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, this is for assistance of the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Well, municipalities do some paving too. Would it allow the contractors to stockpile gravel?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It just covers one-half the labour cost involved by the municipalities in doing this kind of work. It would not cover private contractors, as far as I know.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: May I ask the honourable leader one question, please? Has he got the list of the number of unemployed who were put to work by this scheme?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, I have not that information.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I be permitted a question? Is this $15 million a supplementary amount or the total?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is the total up to April 1.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: And it is for the purpose of relieving winter unemployment?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The purpose being to relieve winter unemployment, that is correct.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Will my honourable friend try to get me that list of the number of unemployed people who were put to work under the scheme covered by this item of $15 million? I think we are entitled to the information.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know if that information is available or not; I haven't it now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The information was given in the House of Commons last weekend—25,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We should have more information than that, we should have a breakdown by provinces and municipalities. Just to say 25,000 means very little.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will see if any information along that line can be obtained.

The next item is Vote No. 710, in the amount of $630,000, required for the Dominion Coal Board. The main reason for requiring additional funds is the increase in the tonnage of Nova Scotia coal movements and the increased rate of subvention per ton because of higher pithead costs. Approval of the extra tonnage at higher costs was given by the Government in order to maintain a reasonable level of employment in the Nova Scotia mines.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Has this only to do with the Nova Scotia mines, or does it affect western mines also? I know at one time there used to be subsidies on the shipment of coal from Alberta to Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have a lot of information as to what has happened over the year, but I understand that this has principally to do with assistance to the coal industry of Nova Scotia, though some will be given to the industry in other provinces, including western provinces. The assistance given in Nova Scotia will be $8,061,670; in New Brunswick, $110,681; in Saskatchewan, $250,297; in Alberta, $692,888; and in British Columbia, $90,776, making a total of $9,206,312. The previous estimate was $8,580,250, so there is required a further amount of $626,062, or roughly $630,000.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Could the honourable leader enlarge on that? Last session I made an inquiry in connection with this particular item—and was told that the information would be forthcoming at a later date, but I am still waiting for the information. Vote 710 reads as follows:

> Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council—Further amount required, $630,000.

What is the meaning of the words "prescribed by the Governor in Council", and what are those conditions as they affect the unemployment situation in the mines of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: During the early part of the fiscal year the Government approved increases in the rates of subvention to allow Nova Scotia coal to move farther west of Montreal. This has increased the tonnage moved by water and also increased the tonnage of and rate on coal trans-shipped. In the previous estimates no provision was made to cover the additional costs. The pithead cost of the Nova Scotia coal increased throughout the year, which increased cost was reflected in the competitive prices in the subvention area and required a higher rate of assistance. That is all the information I have.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question? I take it that many of these sums have already been expended. Is that the case? I was just wondering, so far as parliamentary authority is concerned, by what method the authority to spend is given. Is it given by orders in council, now ratified, or by what means?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The main vote was $8,580,250, and I presume that has been spent. The amount of $630,000 is in addition to that.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But has some of this been spent?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, I presume so, because we have only about another month to go before we come to April 1.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What was the total again?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The total in the estimates was $8,580,250.

Hon. Mr. Farris: How much did Nova Scotia get?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Nova Scotia, $8,061,770

Hon. Mr. Farris: Almost all of it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Nearly all the $630,000 was for Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: How much for New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Farris: They are not as hard up as Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not as vocal.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am sure many honourable senators will recall that last year I rose on a question of coal assistance for the mining area of Cape Breton, and referred to the pile of something like 600,000 tons there for which a market could not be found, and I predicted that it would likely be a million tons the following year. Well, it has not only reached the million-tons mark, but it has gone to 1,200,000 tons. What is more important is the fact that notwithstanding this $630,000 that is asked for, unemployment in the Cape Breton area today is worse than it has been for many, many years. I think the all-important question is not so much approval of this vote, or the conditions under which the Government pays it, but rather the effect it is having on the unemployment situation in the Cape Breton area. I do not want to overstress it at this point, but we are in a very, very desperate position in the Cape Breton area. I do not come from that area, particularly, but as a Nova Scotian I am naturally interested, because the unemployment has an effect on the economy of the whole province. I feel that the Leader of the Government should be in a position to tell us just what the unemployment figures are today, as compared with those of last year and perhaps the year before, so that we may see what the Government is doing in respect to employment in the coal mines in the Cape Breton area. Perhaps the honourable leader would be good enough to give us that information.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know whether that information is available or not.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I think it should be. Will the honourable leader be good enough to inquire whether it is available?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will do my best to get the information.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I think there is no doubt that it is available. Perhaps you had better put it on record for a future date not too far distant.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: In connection with payments made by the Dominion Coal Board, may I ask a question? Were the amounts that you have mentioned paid on shipments of coal by railway to competitive markets in other provinces, or were they also spread among shipments by vessel, as for example on shipments of coal from Cape Breton to Newfoundland?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: From Nova Scotia 631,124 tons were shipped by railway, 1,867,375 tons were shipped by water and 792,112 tons were trans-shipped. Then there is an item, railway use, 101,069 tons; Springhill, 71,317 tons. The total was 2,670,885 tons. Similar information is given for each of the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: The honourable leader says the shipments were made by vessel and by rail. What I would like to know is how the payments mentioned were spread among all the various avenues of trade. Were they mostly on shipments by rail to competitive markets in the other provinces?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: $1,610,236 was paid in Nova Scotia in connection with shipments by all rail.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: To whom were these payments made? Were they made to the mining companies or to the railways for carrying the coal?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: My information is lacking in that respect. I thought the honourable senator, coming as he does from Nova Scotia, where this legislation has been in force for so many years, would know all about it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Oh, yes, but you spent the money, you see.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am trying to clarify the position as far as the question asked by the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot answer that question.

I will go on with the next item, with leave of the Senate. That is Vote 711, and it has to do with national parks, $2,850,000. This item provides for an estimated expenditure during the balance of the fiscal year on a number of winter works projects commencing in November 1958. Generally, these items represent normal park activities on which the work can be speeded up in the interest of providing employment. For example, cutting and clearing of trunk highways, roads and trails through the parks. This is an example of the Government's program to provide winter work to meet unemployment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would the honourable senator tell us what parks?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Following are the estimates by parks, according to their geographical location.

Historic Sites	$ 157,000
National Parks trunk highways	1,113,500
Banff Park	310,500
Cape Breton Highlands Park	120,500
Elk Island Park	120,500
Fundy Park	45,000
Kootenay Park	6,000
Mount Revelstoke Park	31,000
Prince Albert Park	150,000
Prince Edward Island Park	92,500
Riding Mountain Park	217,000
Terra Nova Park	55,000
Waterton Lakes Park	378,000
Yoho Park	54,000
	$2,850,000

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable leader be good enough to break down the second item, namely, National Parks Trunk Highways, $1,113,500, and let us know what each province, and what each park in the province, received.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I gave the locations of the parks and the amount set aside for each one.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: You gave the names of the parks and the amounts of so many thousand and so on. What I am asking for is a breakdown of the second item, namely, $1,113,500, which was the total amount expended in connection with the trunk highways in the parks. Will you break that down and let us know what amount was spent in each of the parks?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The breakdown of these trunk highway expenditures of $1,113,500 is as follows:

Continuation of reconstruction of Banff-Jasper Highway, mile 22-70, and completion of clearing of right-of-way mile 70-80, Banff section, and mile 80-120, Jasper section, $75,000.

Sanitation Cutting, Banff—Windermere Highway mile 7-32 and mile 46 (Clearing of insect killed timber and windfalls), $190,000.

Clearing right-of-way and stumping along No. 10 Highway (15 miles), $170,000.

Fringe Clearing, Banff-Jasper Highway, $128,000.

Clearing right-of-way Chief Mountain Highway, $127,000.

Clearing Cabot Trail between Pleasant Bay and Cape North in Ingonish area, $107,000.

Clearing right-of-way along the Waskesiu Highway, $105,000.

Complete clearing, widening shoulder and deepening ditches No. 14 Highway, $75,000.

Clearing Jasper—East Gate Road, $75,000.

Trans-Canada Highway fringe clearing Eisenhower to Great Divide, Banff Park, $34,000.

Fringe clearing Trans-Canada Highway, Yoho Park, $27,500.

Making a total of $1,113,500.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: In so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, out of $1,113,500 an amount of only $107,000 was spent in that province.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: On item No. 711, I wonder if the leader could give us some information, or perhaps obtain it, as to how many people were provided with employment as a result of the expenditure of this money which this bill would provide? Secondly, is it work which would have been done in any event, and was only done during the winter season to relieve unemployment? The third question I wish to ask is this: were any portions of this expenditure in relation to the various sections of what may be described as the Trans-Canada Highway?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The federal Government is responsible for the building of the Trans-Canada Highway through the parks. I will do my best to get the information for which you have asked.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My question was not as to who was responsible. It was as to whether or not any of the work covered by this vote was work on some part of the Trans-Canada Highway.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Vote 712 is in connection with forestry operations.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Before the honourable leader leaves the previous item, I was waiting to get an opportunity to say a word or two in regard to the questions asked by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). I would doubt if any of this vote of $2,850,000 is in any way associated with the building of the Trans-Canada Highway through the parks.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You may be right.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The description of the item is:

Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required $2,850,000.

In the main estimates at the beginning of the fiscal year the total amount voted for parks under this heading was $14,899,000.

This addition of $2,850,000 will bring the total up to something more than $17½ million.

It might also be interesting for the house to note that the total vote under the heading of National Parks last year was $21,940,000. And, if it is of interest to honourable senators—I say "if" because I think we have largely lost our perspective so far as economy in administration is concerned—I would point out that the total vote for National Parks in the estimates for the next fiscal year is almost $26½ million.

It does seem to me that is a pretty heavy expenditure. It may all be justified, but I very much suspect that this additional vote of $2,850,000 is in some way related to the relief of unemployment. How valuable that may be, I don't know. I know it is pretty difficult to do winter work efficiently and economically in National Parks.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have here some information for honourable senators with regard to the number of persons estimated to be employed on the winter work program. It is as follows:

British Columbia	2,200
Alberta	3,700
Saskatchewan	1,700
Manitoba	1,200
Ontario	9,000
Quebec	3,200
New Brunswick	2,000
Nova Scotia	3,600
Newfoundland	200
Total	26,800

Hon. Mr. Hayden: None in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: None.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Has the honourable leader any information as to the length of time these people were employed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think that would be impossible to find out.

I have some information that honourable senators might like to have with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's operating budget for 1958-59. Total operating expenses, $81,911,000, less commercial reserve of $30,420,000, making a difference of $51,491,000. The excise tax statutory item was estimated at $12 million. We voted in the main estimates and supplementaries $39,491,000, making the total which I gave previously of $51,491,000.

Vote 701, as I have explained, merely votes the balance of the amount expected from excise tax collections but which was not received on account of the fact that the act was amended. All capital expenditures are provided through votes of Parliament and they total $8,649,000 for 1958-59.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Certain salaries were fixed by order in council, and I think we are entitled to know what those are.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Vote 712 has to do with another winter works program approved by the department, and includes provision of federal assistance to the provinces for forest access roads and trails. The amount requested represents the estimated requirements of this program for the period November 1, 1958 to March 31, 1959, based on anticipated provincial participation in the program.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Does that mean that the amount has not been separated with respect to any province, based on what the participation will be, or is it based on anticipated provincial participation?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have the details per province. This item is required for federal contributions toward expenditure made by the Governments of the provinces on forest access roads and trails during 1958-59 under a federal assistance program approved by the cabinet. The additional amounts required are as follow: Newfoundland, $31,000; Nova Scotia, $21,000; New Brunswick, $9,000; Quebec, no item; Ontario, $750,000; Manitoba, $197,000; Saskatchewan, $100,000; Alberta, $94,000; British Columbia, $400,000, and an amount of $80,000 owing under a previous agreement, which makes the total of this vote $1,682,000.

Hon. Mr. Grant: I notice that Prince Edward Island is not considered at all. Are we yet a province of the dominion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Apparently Prince Edward Island made no agreement with the federal Government as far as this program is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is the honourable leader able to say what proportion of the contribution to this work is paid by the provincial Governments, and what part by the federal Government; and can figures be produced later as to the number of people who have been employed in this work, and for how long?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: My information does not go that far.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The leader has had a lot of $64,000 questions today.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: A lot more than were asked in the other place.

I now have figures of the salaries of the Board of Broadcast Governors. They are as follow: chairman, $20,000; vice-chairman, $18,000; the member, $17,000; a total of $55,000; and there is $16,000 in supplementary estimates to provide for them for the period November 20, 1958 to March 31, 1959.

The next reply is supposed to be an answer to a question asked by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). I do not know whether it will satisfy him. I believe he asked how many persons were employed in respect of work under Vote 711. The answer is that this work is done by contract and the figures are not immediately available.

The second question was, is the work done work which would have had to be done in any event? The work in the parks has been accelerated for purposes of combatting unemployment; and the amount of Vote 711 constitutes approximately the expenditure on this acceleration.

Another question was, is any of this money for the Trans-Canada Highway? The answer is that work on the Trans-Canada highway in the parks is provided for by estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Vote 713, honourable senators, has to do with the explosion in Ottawa. It provides for $200,000 which it is expected will be required up to March 31 next in connection with the repair of the Jackson building.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Has my honourable friend an estimate of what will be the total cost of repairing the Jackson building?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The estimate is $898,281.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is it likely that there will be any reimbursement?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The honourable senator knows as much about that as I do. I understand that certain court actions have been taken. Just how they will come out I don't know. At any rate, the amount contained in this item is money which the Government expects to have to spend up to March 31 of this year on repairs to this building which was damaged by the explosion.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: On the question of reimbursement, I had in mind not only actions in the courts but the possibility that there may have been insurance. I was wondering whether there was insurance and what the proceeds will be.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The last item, Vote 714, of $110,000, has to do with the expenses of the visit of Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret to Canada.

Hon. Mr. Power: Is this a balance or the whole amount?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This is the total amount.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I think the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has answered our questions exceptionally well. He has had a very difficult day. He has dealt with and has been questioned on the expenditures of ten Government departments. I do not think we could expect any honourable senator to have complete knowledge of all these expenditures. I found in my experience in the House of Commons that it was only an exceptionally capable minister who had a good understanding of the expenditures of even his own department.

It occurred to me while all this questioning was taking place that His Honour the Speaker was patient indeed to allow it. I am going to suggest to the house that in the future it might be more helpful when dealing with supply bills if the Leader of the Government were to make a general statement first, followed by any remarks honourable senators might wish to make. All this would take place, of course, with His Honour the Speaker in the Chair. Then His Honour could leave the Chair and the house could be resolved into Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is a good idea.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At that stage the Leader of the Government could have with him in the chamber a Government official well informed as to the work of all departments, for the purpose of assisting the leader in giving the house the information it desired. The honourable Leader of the Government might perhaps consider this proposal before another supply bill comes to us.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that this afternoon we have been considering a lot of details which are more or less of minor importance. It is similar to not being able to see the forest for the trees, and the forest in this case represents a very large amount. However, the items which we are passing today are infinitesimal in size compared with the total amount which the Government is spending this year, which in turn is a greater amount than the Government spent last year. In fact, it is a greater amount than any Government of Canada has ever spent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In war or in peace.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, in war or in peace. If we go back to the fiscal year 1957-58 we find that the main estimates amounted to $4,826,600,000, but the amount actually spent that year was $5,088,800,000. The amount spent in excess of the estimates that were tabled for the fiscal year 1957-58, the supplementary estimates, totalled in all $261,200,000.

Honourable senators will recall that an election took place on June 10, 1957. At that time the expenditures were put in the neighbourhood of $4,800,000,000. The new Government came in and from the time it took over in July, to the end of March, 1958, it had increased these expenditures by $261 million. However, that was last year and so it is past history. But what do we find this year? The main estimates introduced by this Government for the current fiscal year amounted to $5,178,800,000, which was an increase over the total expenditures of the previous year. But the Government did not settle for $5,178,800,000. Before this house adjourned last September the Government brought down supplementary estimates to the extent of $116,800,000. We thought that was the end of it but now we are getting near the end of February and we find further supplementary estimates being considered by us in the amount of $28 million. You may say, "Well, $28 million doesn't amount to very much." But it comes to a very large sum when we add it to the previous supplementary estimates and to the main estimates. It means that the Government will have spent this year a record sum of $5,326,600,000. That is a very large sum of money for a country with a population of 17 million people, especially when you realize that it is not the total governmental expenses of this country but only those of the federal Government. I have not had time to get the information regarding the expenditures of each province, but if we took into consideration the expenditures of the federal Government and those of each provincial Government we would find that Canada has probably one of the most expensive governmental systems in the world.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Plus the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, if the expenditures of the municipalities were added to the total it would be an even much more staggering one. Although we are not just now considering the estimates for next year we must remember that the present administration does not propose to cut down on its expenditures. The estimates that were tabled in this house just a few days ago for the fiscal year which will end on March 31, 1960 amount to $5,595,800,000. Those main estimates reach a sum which is $417 million higher than the actual expenditures for the full fiscal year of 1958-59. We can therefore take it for granted that there will be added to that sum of $5,595,800,000 a further sum of between $200 million and $400 million.

I mention these facts to point out that although we are considering the relatively small sum of $28 million today, we cannot lose sight of the fact that it is only part of a much larger figure. Expenditures for this year have reached a record high in the history of our dominion, with the prospect of breaking this record next year. At the same time there is a record high in the number of unemployed persons.

The honourable leader mentioned work which from time to time was being undertaken at this unseasonable time of the year in order to create employment. We have had many figures as to the number of unemployed people at the present time. They are not contradictory statements, but one branch of Government gives one figure, and another branch gives a different figure. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics gives the number of unemployed as of January this year as 538,000, but that is not a complete figure, because the bureau's statement starts off by stating that 538,000 are completely unemployed, but there are also 379,000 who are partly unemployed. So at any time there are more than 538,000 unemployed, because at the same time some of the 379,000 are unemployed. Some people say that all the 379,000 are at times unemployed. If that were so there would be 917,000, or nearly a million, unemployed in Canada at times.

The National Employment Service, another department of Government, gives a different figure. It states that the number registered for work is 775,658. If to that figure is added the people who are employed part time, some of whom are out of employment all the time, we have 1,154,658 people who might be unemployed in Canada at any given time during the month of January. I am not saying that one million people are always out of work in Canada. From the figures I have received from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and from the National Employment Service, it would be fair to say that there were probably 800,000 people unemployed in Canada every day during the month of January. I do not think that is an exaggeration; I think it is a fair statement when we consider that some people were not out of work all the time, whereas many were employed just a few days of the week, but 800,000 people out of work is a high percentage when it is considered that the total labour force of Canada is approximately 6 million people. It is a serious problem, and I hope the Government is giving grave consideration to it. Of course, added to the figures I have given there is also the number who have been thrown out of work on account of the cancellation of the Avro Aircraft contract. Just how many that involves, I cannot say, because again different figures have been given. The Canadian Press gives the figure at 9,100 at Avro, plus 5,000 at Orenda Engines, a total of 14,100. Added to that—and this is a Canadian Press report:

A. V. Roe's suppliers employ an additional 15,000 persons. Thus the sudden development could put as many as 30,000 breadwinners into the ranks of the unemployed.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Is that the actual number of unemployed at Avro suppliers, or is it just a surmise?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, this is an estimate given in a Canadian Press dispatch from Toronto; that is why I quoted it. I do not think there is any more reliable news service in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Buchanan: Did the honourable senator hear, though, that they had already taken on some more the following day?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I did read that, but that would probably reduce the numbers which I gave from 30,000 to 28,000. It is still a very large number, and to whatever the number is there should be added the number of unemployed I have already mentioned.

I have another statement before me, made by union leaders, which I took from the Globe and Mail of February 21, 1958. I think honourable senators will agree that that is a very reliable newspaper. The statement says:

The end project will affect 47,000 workers in 50 communities—

Honourable senators, my point is that the closing down of this plant has resulted in a great increase in the already tremendous number of people unemployed in Canada. While all this unemployment exists we are approving the expenditure of very large sums of money. I hope at lot of it will find its way into the pockets of the unemployed. At this time the Government has a very serious problem to face and we in this house have a serious responsibility. Before us are the last supplementary estimates for this year, and by passing this bill, honourable senators, we take the responsibility—because this is the last house it will have to pass—for spending this year by the federal Government, over and above the amounts which will be spent by the other governments in Canada, of a record amount of $5,326,600,000. That is our responsibility.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, in this debate on the supply measure I want to talk particularly about unemployment and to indicate to the house that there is a steadily rising unemployment in this country. On January 17, 1959—this has already been stated here—the Dominion Bureau of Statistics gave the number of unemployed as 538,000. It arrived at this figure by taking a sample of 30,000 people across the country. On January 15 there were registered with the National Employment Service 775,658. Now, somewhere between the two figures lies the truth, and it is not comforting, because in these figures no account is taken of the part-time workers, the workers who work less than 35 hours, or those who have exhausted their benefits. So my honourable leader, in saying that there are probably 800,000, unemployed at one time or another, is nearer to the truth.

That is a larger figure than we had in the unforgettable 1930's. There are more people unemployed now and for a longer time than there have been at any one time before in the history of this country. The reason for it—there are a lot of reasons. I came across an item the other day that I think will strike you as interesting: General Motors and Ford Motors built last year 60,000 more cars than they did in 1957, with 33,400 less workers. Now you can appreciate what is happening: automation is here. And it is being felt.

I think one of the things this house should consider and give serious consideration to, is the making of a recommendation that the matter of automation be studied, its effect and what it will likely do in the future.

One of the things that is happening, and one we have to take notice of, is that the older workers are being re-employed last, and the cuts that were made during the recession are not being restored. I know that the Government is struggling with the problem and the Government says that it has undertaken a winter program in 1,511 municipalities which has been able to employ 25,000 workers. In the light of what happened last Friday to A.V. Roe, it seems that the 25,000 for whom jobs were found almost fade into insignificance—when you consider the wire to A.V. Roe, which I paraphrase to say that the development of the Arrow should be terminated now. That put on the street, by most estimates, nearly 50,000 people. Here we are today going through a supply bill, and we find that the Government is attempting to deal with winter employment in the national parks, there is a vote for Fisheries, a vote for Labour, a vote for the Forestry Branch. Yet we find by one thoughtless hurried action 15,000 people at the A.V. Roe plant in Toronto, 15,000 people who supply the A.V. Roe plant in the Toronto area, and suppliers through the whole Dominion of Canada to the extent of 20,000 workers, have had their jobs jeopardized. The best figure is approximately 47,000.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not all these suppliers have lost their jobs. How many of them have?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The suppliers have to let off a couple of hundred here and a couple of hundred there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Have they laid them off?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Of course they have.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: How do you know?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I know. I know what happens in Toronto; I live in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But these suppliers are not located in Toronto only, they are all over the country.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is true, and these people in Toronto who have had to lay off now and are continuing to lay off—they don't amount to 47,000, but that is the estimate of those who will be laid off across the country. If the honourable leader has a better estimate let us hear it.

And so, honourable senators, when we get to the matter of unemployment we cannot be above the battle. Here are men—whether it is a hundred or 1,500 or 50,000—who are fighting for a livelihood. I have heard it said on many occasions by people who should know better. "Oh, all these workers are interested in is unemployment insurance." But I say here are men and women who want work. They feel that they and their industry have been abandoned and they are out of jobs in the most rugged winter we have had in this country in a very long time. So I speak today as an angry young man. You can question my youth but you cannot question my anger.

I can understand what was done with respect to A.V. Roe but I cannot understand how or why it was done. The Diefenbaker vision of a greater Canada has become a nightmare to thousands of Canadians, and the one who once claimed that no employable Canadian would be without a job has thrown thousands of them out of work without adequate warning and without the slightest vestige of planning for their reabsorption into the economy. At one stroke the Government has swept away the livelihood of possibly 50,000 people, destroyed the aircraft industry which has existed from crisis to crisis, paved the way for the mass exodus of skilled Canadian workmen to the United States.

And there was no attempt to cushion the impact of the Arrow cancellation. There was no prior consultation with the company, and none with the Ontario Government. There were no plans, no matter how tentative, to replace the cancelled contracts with other work. In making the announcement the Prime Minister took pains to point out there was nothing in the Arrow's place. He said so in the House of Commons. He told the 14,000 odd Arrow workmen, in effect: "It is too bad, but you are out of a job. If you are skilled workers, and I think you are, you should be able to get jobs in the United States."

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Who said that?

Hon. Mr. Croll: There was no alternative plan; none was formulated because none was sought. The company did present a plan with six alternative proposals, but the Government just would not hear of it. And thus begins the great exodus to the United States. A single telegram of a few words pronounced the death knell of more than thousands of jobs. It did more than that, it pronounced the death knell of the last vestige of Canadian autonomy in the realm of military defence.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That started a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Well, it has been helped a great deal by the recent action.

No wire sent by any government in Canada was pregnant with so much significance. If we are to take the Prime Minister at his word—and I see no reason why we shouldn't—from now on the military planes that will man our defence line will be American planes, and the nuclear warheads will come from across the border and will be guarded by United States forces.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask from what the honourable senator is reading?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not reading, but referring to notes which I carefully prepared.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I thought it was a humourous essay he was reading.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I would not think you would appreciate humour, after hearing you a couple of times.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do you think this is funny?

Hon. Mr. Croll: In other words, we can no longer kid ourselves that we are partners, junior grade, with the United States in the defence of North America. We are about to be integrated into the gigantic military complex of the United States. And unless the technical know-how of the A.V. Roe staff is quickly utilized before it is dispersed, the plant at Malton, and other plants as well, will stand empty and silent, monuments to futility.

We have been told that we now have the Bomarc, which belongs to the missile family.

I now reassert what I have previously said in this house, that the Bomarc is as outdated in the missile field as the Sabre is in the jet field, and for our purposes they are both useless. When the Arrow goes the Bomarc should not be far behind.

Hon. Mr. Horner: About as out of date as the honourable senator who is speaking.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I rise on a point of order. That is an offensive remark that should not be made in this house.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I take no offence from it. May I say this: The past is past; it is useless to thresh over old straw as to whether the Arrow was archaic or still had a role to play in military defence. That question will be argued by the experts for years. It is equally futile to open up old controversies as to whether Canada with its limited resources should have embarked upon such a costly undertaking at all.

I think what is important is this: Where do we go from here? What does the future hold, if anything? Can a partnership be restored that will give Canada a reasonable share of defence procurement? What is going to happen to A.V. Roe? If Mr. Crawford Gordon, President of A.V. Roe, was correctly reported, the Government declined to listen to a half-dozen alternative proposals put forward by Mr. Gordon and his officials. The press this morning reports it would appear that Crawford Gordon suffers from political B.O. There is no reason why the industry and the workers should be punished, because I am told it is not an inherited disease.

Yet the Prime Minister said yesterday in the house that consultations would be held, and they were held today. The question that arises in my mind, and should arise in the mind of everyone, is why were not these consultations held weeks and months ago? Why were they not held at a time when something could have come out of them, instead of leaving them until this late hour? It is not too late yet, for it is quite possible something might come out of them. But there was a time for these consultations.

The Government did not even wait for the March deadline that the Prime Minister himself imposed. What happened to cause him to act so quickly is hard to understand. Did he ask Washington for a share of the defence orders that would fill the gap if the Arrow were cancelled, and did Washington refuse? I think the Canadian people are entitled to know a great deal more than we have been told.

It has been rumoured that Canadair was to receive a portion of a contract on the DEW Line from its American principals, and that A.V. Roe would build a replacement for the Sabre. Both of these appear to have gone sour.

The gap could have been filled by meeting our needs in Europe where we have 12 squadrons, and where we need nearly 300 planes of some kind or another. Surely A.V. Roe could do that work under some sort of license, rather than have the Americans build and provide a substitute for the Sabre. It is admitted we have the know-how. We can do the job. It is just that we do not have the know-how to obtain agreement to supply the procurement that is necessary.

It is very well for the Minister of Defence Production to speak of Canadian companies tendering for American military procurement. They have been trying to do it for years. Surely now the Government and the minister must realize that in order for a Canadian contractor to succeed he must first penetrate the labyrinth of the Pentagon and by-pass the Buy American Act. He has got to outlobby the United States aviation and electronic lobby; he has to overcome politicians who are interested in the fact that there are five or six million unemployed in the United States. As I indicated in this house last week, a bid made by a British company, although almost 23 per cent lower than that of its nearest American competitor, was rejected because of the serious state of unemployment in Pennsylvania.

I think I have the right to remind the Government and honourable senators that another Government in another day, immediately after a war, had to meet the challenge of adjusting to a peacetime economy, and did so successfully. There is still time and opportunity here to undo the damage that has been done.

The statement indicates that the contract was cancelled for economic reasons. The company have persisted in this statement and they also assert that the Government has a letter from them to the effect that they would build the first hundred Arrows for $3½ million apiece and reduce the price of the second hundred. The Prime Minister quoted a figure of $7.8 million for each Arrow. I do not know where he got that figure. He may have very good grounds, but I think we are entitled to know where the figure came from. We remember that it was not so long ago when the Prime Minister spoke of diverting to Britain 15 per cent of the trade of the United States, and at the same time he was going to stand up and be counted in the matter of defending the autonomy of Canada. Grandiose words from a man who saw visions! We were told that Canada would be a partner, an integral link in the chain of western hemisphere defence. The reality, whether or not we are prepared to admit it, is that we have been swallowed up by the giant to the south. Cancellation of the Arrow is a symbol of our reduced stature. The abysmal failure of the Ottawa Government to plan for the continued employment of thousands of Canadian workers, and the heartless way in which it has thrown A. V. Roe employees out of work, constitute a dismal page in Canadian history.

There are those who say that the Government showed real political courage in facing up to the situation in the manner it did. If that be political courage, I favour political cowardice, if it means a proper regard for the welfare of Canadians and a refusal to sacrifice them until all other means of avoiding disaster has been fully explored.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask whether the honourable senator is arguing that the Arrow program should have been continued?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not argue that. I said that this was a decision made by the Government, that the method by which the program was discontinued is atrocious. I assert further that the plant is there, the people are there, and ample work could be provided for these people in the construction of a substitute for the Sabre, rather than to have the Americans provide it. We can do it, because we have the know-how. We might have to do it under licence, but the matter could be arranged. That is what I am saying.

Even Premier Frost of Ontario has joined in the chorus and asked for a consultation of those concerned, to take up the slack, as a result of this action. Today, I think, Canadian-United States relations have reached a new all-time low.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You are the only one who thinks so.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The honourable senator may think they are at an all-time high. My view is the contrary, because, for the purposes of defence, Canada is as important as the United States; perhaps, because of our geographical position, even more important. Yet in the field of military production we are to have little or no voice. We are entitled to a fair share of the military orders for defence procurement. Our skilled workers should not be forced into leaving Canada for the States.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable senator this question: when the Government he supported was in power, why did he not insist on that policy when the DEW line was being built? Why did he not demand for Canada a fair share in the construction of those various lines in the north?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I understood that Canadians had a fair share of employment in the construction of the DEW line; that, while American money was being spent, our people were being hired.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You, as a Canadian, were not even allowed to visit the line.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not for a moment suggest that, under those circumstances, the situation was perfect, or that much could not have been said on our behalf at that time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the condition today.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Unfortunately, conditions have been aggravated and are becoming worse. That is what I am getting at. I said that our skilled workers should not be forced into leaving Canada for the United States; their contribution toward the defence of America should be made here, on Canadian soil.

When it was suggested, some time ago, by public men in this country that Canada's role in the scheme of things was that of hewers of wood and drawers of water, there was a great hue and cry from many people, including the present Prime Minister. That observation, regrettable as it may be, has even more validity today than when it was made some years ago.

I do not minimize the vital and expanding role of the United States in the Western Alliance. On the shoulders of our neighbour rests much of the responsibility for the maintenance of world peace, uneasy though it may be. But that should not mean that the national interest of Canada has to be sacrificed. The much-vaunted western military unity is, as far as Canada is concerned, non-existent. We are hog-tied to the Americans.

The Arrow has passed into history. So have our hopes. The great dispersal will now begin to the United States. Those who cannot get across, or do not want to go, may be among the people who will be looking for this winter employment the Government is endeavouring to provide.

The Prime Minister in his statement has indicated that we should rely on the United States for defence. He has intimated that the United States has as much concern for our defence as we have ourselves, and he believes, in submitting this view, that we can retain our sovereignty.

I am deeply concerned with the harsh brutality of the announcement as it affects my neighbours who have been working at A. V. Roe. The decision not to proceed with the Arrow is the Government's to make, but why did it have to mean that without warning men walked home with tragedy in their eyes and women became fearful of the future? Why could not this dire news have been spread over months so that men and women could plan? Why could the contract not have been gracefully terminated? I think the answer lies in the Government's detachment from the people and in its arrogance. There could be no doubt that the outraged voices of the people came as a shock to the Prime Minister this past weekend. No Government can still fulfil its role as the spokesman for the people and possibly be ignorant of the people's sentiments or, knowing, not care. That is where the arrogance showed. Puffed with the pride derived from electoral landslides the Prime Minister has shown a tendency—and some of his colleagues have shared it—to forget who it was who created those landslides for him, and to forget that the final importance is that of the common people.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, this is the first time I have risen to speak this session. I feel I may not be as physically strong as I would like to be but I want to say just a few words.

I have listened this afternoon to the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). I don't know what their remarks meant to the rest of the house, but here is what they meant to me. The honourable Leader of the Opposition said there were large numbers of unemployed, but he also said and emphasized very strongly that tremendous sums of money were being expended in this country. He said that it was the greatest amount ever spent by any Government of Canada, or words to that effect. Well, I read the speech made yesterday in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister, and I want to say to the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina that he could never read a better speech on any subject. Anybody who has read that speech knows why John Diefenbaker was elected Prime Minister of Canada. I read the speeches made by other members in the House of Commons yesterday, and there was no comparison between their speeches and that of the Prime Minister.

The fact is that we were spending millions of dollars a year building an instrument of war that would be of no use in modern warfare, and yet these members were asking the Government to continue with this program. If we were to continue with this project it would eventually mean a breakage for this country. It is true that we are all sorry to see men in Toronto or in any other place put out of a job. Each one of us is sorry. We were not brought up under such conditions that we could feel otherwise. But I want to say that the Canadian public at large is disturbed about the demands that some people are making day after day to the effect they have got to be taken care of by the Government. This sort of thing is disturbing to the people who have to pay taxes all the time and who are struggling hard to do so.

We have reached a crossroads. Our problem is to sell our goods on the world market, but we can't do so now because the cost of producing our goods is greater than production costs in Germany, Japan and other countries in Europe and Asia. We just can't compete with their exports at the present time and under present conditions.

My honourable friend opposite says that the United States will do something. Well, the United States has got to do everything, whether she wants to or not. It is not a question of whether she will do it. She has got to do it. If you are sitting in your house and you hear a gang of 50 hoodlums attacking your next-door neighbour and you expect them to attack you next, you telephone the police or all the friends you can get to come to your assistance. You don't just sit there and let the hoodlums thrash the fellow next door and then come over to thrash you. The United States is in that position. That is why it put up all the money for the DEW line, and that is why it is going to put up money every time. It is for its own protection. So would you and so would I. Not for one moment do I stand up in Winnipeg and tell the people to stop paying taxes because I don't think we need to spend any more money preparing for war. This is not because I am a Winnipeger, but because I am a Canadian and I want all Canadians to have the same protection as I want for myself. I know if we don't get it we will go down. That is the situation we face.

The Prime Minister was absolutely right in his speech yesterday. Every person in this house has known for the last six months —and if he has not known he has been stupid—that the contract with the A. V. Roe Company was going to be terminated, that the Arrow was getting out of date and not keeping up with world armament developments. They knew there was going to be a second-class show. We all knew it. It was only a question of time. The Prime Minister said on two or three occasions, "I will let you know sometime." Neither the Prime Minister nor anybody else in authority would say that if he were not thinking seriously about it.

Honourable senators, I am disappointed that a man of the ability of the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Spadina would get up and suggest what he has suggested today. We are truly sorry for the hardships these people may encounter and we have pity for them, but the honourable senator did not suggest any alternative. Neither did the honourable Leader of the Opposition. He deplored the spending of some $5 billion by the federal Government, but he did not make any suggestion as to what we could do to meet the situation. We are living in a world that is changing every hour and every minute, and we have got to meet the changing conditions. But we are only a country of 17 million people living in a vast territory lying next to the greatest nation in the world, Russia, the one that we are afraid of.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable member a question? He stated that I did not suggest any way to meet the problem of these great expenditures.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I think you ought to.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Do you think it is the duty of the Opposition to govern the country?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, I think the Opposition should tell the people of Canada what it would do if it were in power. I think the Opposition should state this every day in the Senate and the House of Commons and every place else.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: You wouldn't when you were in opposition.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Everybody knew—and if they didn't they were deaf and dumb—what John Diefenbaker would do if he got into power. It was made clear during the last seven or eight years that he was going to carry out a certain policy. We all knew it. We were not a bit surprised at what happened in the election of 1957. I had a little surprise in the 1958 election, but my forecast was only four seats out for the whole of Canada. I even gave my forecast to the president of the Monarch Life Assurance Company in Winnipeg, and he has that record.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You knew then that the Arrow contract would be cancelled?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I was sure when I heard the matter being discussed six months ago that the Arrow would go down, for I felt that the inventions the Russians were producing would compel the United States to produce similar ones, and those weapons were making the Arrow obsolete. If you can fire a missile in the United States a distance of 300 miles with a high degree of accuracy, your aeroplane is useless. We have got to do what the Russians are doing. They keep making inventions from time to time to meet these situations. The United States is doing the same thing. That country does not want to protect Canada, but it is obliged to do so in order to protect itself. Do you mean to tell me that if the Russians, with the military and other forces they say they have, could land on the Prairies in Canada they could not get to the United States and annihilate its people? The United States is aware of the danger. I am no American, I am a Canadian. My grandparents came to this country from Scotland 126 years ago and our family has been here ever since. We are proud to be Canadians, but I also hope that I am sensible enough to realize what other people will do under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Should we rely one hundred per cent on the United States and do nothing ourselves?

Hon. Mr. Haig: If I were in the United States I would be talking as hard as I could to get into Canada to protect this country and to stop the Russians from coming here, because if they get to Canada they will also get to the United States. It is human nature to protect yourself.

Honourable senators, I am disturbed by the argument put up about the cost of defence. That the Government is spending too much money may or may not be true. The point is this, as far as I am concerned, that I know what the Prairie provinces need in the way of help to meet the unemployment situation, and when the Government does its best to meet the situation I am not going to object. I realize we are getting to the end of the road and that we all have to stand together to try to meet the problem. However, it will never be met by speeches like that of the honourable Leader of the Opposition or of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina. All one has to do is to read the speech made by the Prime Minister to realize, whether we like it or not, that he earnestly believes that what he is doing is right, and I am convinced that the people of this country believe that he is trying to pull us out of the difficulty. He may not succeed, and I am not saying that he will, but he is trying to do so, and I feel that the less we tantalize and protest against the Government about things we cannot put right ourselves, and unless we in the Senate can suggest something better—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Just do away with the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I don't care about the Opposition, it does not worry me a bit. As far as the House of Commons is concerned, the people did a pretty good job last spring. And they will do it again, don't worry. I know my town. The city of Winnipeg is an ordinary city with ordinary people in it, but I find that those people have the same thoughts on the matter, and I am not afraid of that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is one who is very extraordinary, and I say that with all sincerity.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not interrupt my honourable friend: I was very careful not to say a word. I sat in the seat that the present Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) occupies longer than any other man who ever sat in the Senate chamber.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You will be back.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I know all about it, what a cold and dismal place it is. I used to look across here and say, "I should like to be over on that side", but I had to sit over there year after year, election after election. I say to the Leader of the Opposition, it is a hard dose to take, but you will get used to it.

Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition on one question. I think he should have gone further in his suggestion about consideration of the main estimates when they come down. I think we shall have to urge on the House of Commons that it get the supply bill through at an earlier date for us to consider, not in the last week or ten days of the session. Under those conditions it is pretty nearly impossible to give proper consideration to the bill. If the budget is brought down in March, it can be debated in April in the other place, the estimates can be passed and sent to us, and then we would be given an opportunity to study them. I have no objection to the Opposition saying what should be done and how certain things could be handled better. That is its duty. I merely want to say that we are doing the best we can.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You have a hard job.

Hon. Mr. Haig: All of us should be given an opportunity to express our opinions on the estimates. That is most important. Some of us may want to talk about wheat. If I were even to mention wheat the Leader of the Government here (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) would banish me from the party. Senators from Prince Edward Island know all about fish, as do senators from Newfoundland. Senators from British Columbia know about fruit and vegetables, the tourist trade, and also about fish. The senators from every province are specialists on certain subjects. The point I am making at the moment is that I go along with the Leader of the Opposition in his suggestion that a longer period of time be given to us to consider the estimates. I would like to see the estimates here by May 1, and then we would have lots of time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You are an optimist.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, I am not an optimist; I think the Government can do it.

Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak this afternoon, but I wish to say that I am very disturbed. I do not see how honourable members of this house could try to dispute what the Prime Minister did the other day. I think it was as hard a decision as a minister could make. You could read it in his words, and see it in his actions, but he knew that the decision had to be made. The former Minister of Trade and Commerce, in an interview in Toronto, admitted that that thing was always possible. For these reasons I think that this matter should not be brought up in this house, but if it is we are ready to talk about it. All we have to do is to read the Prime Minister's speech, and we shall know all about it.

In conclusion, let us as senators suggest to the Government things that can be done as we see it, within reason, according to our knowledge of life, and not for some political reason. Let us cut out the political part. I have had a great deal to do with elections, and I followed the election of last year with a great deal of interest. I do not think the view of the Senate, or even of the House of Commons, had very much to do with the election. Other things seemed to guide it. However, this house can guide opinion in great matters. Among the great contributions made by the Senate was the work done some years ago by the special committee on the Income Tax Act. It was one of the high marks of legislation passed in this dominion. Let us forget our politics, and sit down and make great contributions of that kind. I suggest that that is the spirit in which we should work on the estimates, when they come to us.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, as a red-blooded Canadian I disagree entirely with the statement that has just been made by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haig) that the Russians are the greatest people in the world.

Hon. Mr. Horner: He did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: He said it, I heard it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, no, he didn't.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What I want to say in reply is that the greatest people in the world are the Canadian people, of whom the honourable gentleman is one.

Now I must say, whether he believes it or not, the honourable gentleman is much more impressive when he smiles than when he frowns, so I will give him an explanation of the delay in sending the estimates to the Senate. We did not receive the supplementary estimates before now because the Prime Minister of Canada was busy, from the beginning of the session, preparing the most magnificent speech that he has ever delivered, about the Avro plane. That took all his time and he did not have a single minute to spend on the supplementary estimates. His speech was beautiful but the estimates were late, so the honourable senator cannot complain on that score.

The honourable gentleman was for a moment in a smiling mood, just as the sun sometimes shines briefly between the passing clouds. I wonder whether if the Prime Minister had made a speech in favour of maintaining the Avro contract the honourable gentleman would not have found it still more beautiful. Then he would have shown what a strong supporter he is of his party, by approving his chief for saying yes, just as he has approved him now for saying no. That is fidelity to the party.

I have something further to say and I wonder if I should continue now or adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would like to go on with second reading of the bill. I think we shall be sitting tonight.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I am always ready to comply.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If the honourable senator wants to say anything on the bill he can do so on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No, I will say it now. It won't take long.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why not adjourn the debate now and finish your speech tonight?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No, I can finish it now. We are late—it is a quarter to six—in discussing this bill. It is not the fault of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) nor of the Opposition, it is because of the kind of supplementary estimates that have been sent to us. As a rule there is attached to the estimates a schedule showing the details of each item. So careless was the preparation of these estimates that the honourable Leader of the Government had to give from his seat all the detail that we should have found in a schedule to the bill. I wonder if the honourable Leader of the Government will convey that constructive criticism to whom it may concern, in order that when the future estimates are prepared they will be more in accordance with good parliamentary practice. It was impossible to understand anything in those estimates before having the explanation by the honourable Leader of the Government. That is ridiculous, it is absurd. If the details had been shown in a schedule as part of the bill we could have seen immediately how the money was to be spent and we would have saved a lot of time in debate. I may say there was a similar situation in the House of Commons.

Moreover, honourable senators, I do not understand the rush to pass this bill. Three weeks ago the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, in reply to a question from the Opposition, said that the Government was not in a hurry to have the bill passed. They went at it as with an eye dropper, they took their time, and yet when it comes before the Senate we have to rush everything because there is a hurry for it. I protest against this.

Honourable senators, I have some other things to say but rather than adjourn the debate I will wait until third reading to say them.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could call it 6 o'clock. I have some extended remarks which I would like to make on Vote 697 this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: It being six o'clock, I will leave the chair until 7.30.

The Senate adjourned until 7.30 p.m.

At 7.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, my chief reason for speaking at this time is to say something about Vote 697, for freight assistance on western feed grains. I rise particularly on this occasion, following the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) when he spoke last in the debate, and quite extensively, in regard to the Crowsnest Pass rates. Seeing that there are many new senators who probably have not heard the story, I thought I had better keep the record clear and bright as to what really happened, and point out the great injustice we have suffered right from the passing of the Crowsnest Pass legislation.

British Columbia has long been fighting this case. Although nothing has been done up to the present time to cure the injustice, I take some heart after having read the life of a former member of Parliament in Britain who for 40 years persisted in his struggle to prove a point and ultimately won out. His name was Plimsoll, and he advocated that all deep-sea ships, especially during the winter, should be so marked that when being loaded they would not go below a certain line. The practice of marking ships for that purpose has now become very common, and on all ocean-going vessels today one will see what is called the Plimsoll line. The point is it took that member of Parliament 40 years to bring his idea into effect. So, after I read the Life of Plimsoll I said: We in British Columbia have suffered about the same length of time; perhaps if we keep up our struggle we may yet receive some of the justice we believe should be ours.

Generally speaking, when some persons speak of the Crowsnest Pass rates they talk about the mountain differential. Let me say to honourable senators, especially to those who are new in the Senate, that the mountain differential applies to only one railway, the Canadian Pacific. After the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway the Canadian National, first known as the Canadian Northern, was built. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the railway line from Edmonton to Vancouver via the C.N.R. route is the most reasonable grade in the whole of Canada. There is no mountain differential on that line. Its grade, being a half of one per cent right through from Edmonton, is an easier grade than that on the line going into Fort William, or on most sections of the Prairies, or in many areas of the province of Quebec. So I wish people would cease thinking and talking about the mountain differential to British Columbia, thereby giving the idea that before the railway gets into that province it goes up over the mountain and then down; as well as the idea that it was very costly to build and that therefore the people in the coast area should pay a higher freight rate.

In regard to railway building costs, I may say it was more expensive to build the C.P.R. into Fort William and certain parts of Quebec than to build the C.N.R. into British Columbia.

May I also say this—and I am not being boastful in any way—that I know whereof I speak. Back in 1933 I had the honour and privilege to appear on behalf of the Province of British Columbia—even though I am not a lawyer—before the Board of Transport Commissioners. As the late Prime Minister Bennett said in the House of Commons in answer to the late Senator Gerry McGeer: Reid, the Member of Parliament, obtained a better judgment for one-fiftieth of the cost paid by the Province of British Columbia to Gerry McGeer.

So when I begin to speak about freight rates I think I should let honourable senators know that I have some knowledge about the freight-rates question. One thing that is part and parcel of the old record, and stands out clearly today is that the C.N.R. has a lower grade into British Columbia than anywhere in the whole of Canada. But of course the C.P.R. has always been used as the yardstick for rate setting.

I have before me figures showing the difference in costs. What we greatly object to is that the railroads charge entirely different rates on wheat and grain of all kinds according to whether they are brought into the province for the farmers of British Columbia or are destined for export. If the grain is to be exported the charge per hundred pounds is 20 cents; if it is for local use the present charge is 78 cents per hundred pounds by one railroad, from Edmonton, and 70 cents per hundred pounds via the C.P.R., from Calgary.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What are the mileages?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Roughly the mileage via the C.P.R. is, I believe, 750, or 140 miles shorter than the Canadian National. The first route through the mountains which was chosen was via what is called the Yellowhead Pass. The C.P.R., however, chose instead the Kicking Horse Pass, which was some 140 miles longer. Later, when the Canadian National came into the picture, it adopted the Yellowhead route, which, even though longer, has a grade of only a half of one per cent, whereas that through the Kicking Horse Pass is 2.2 per cent. As a matter of fact, whereas it may require two or three locomotives to move a certain number of cars through a section of the Canadian Pacific route, on the Canadian National grade a train of the same size and weight can be drawn by one locomotive. It cannot, I think, be too often reiterated that no undue difficulties or expenses were involved in building the Canadian National to the coast. In fact, the outlay on the construction of the road to Churchill was much heavier than that of the Canadian National through the mountains.

I see an honourable senator opposite smiling. Well, he may smile, but he cannot dispute what I have said. Perhaps we shall welcome some remarks from him later on. But to illustrate the strange way this thing works, let us suppose that, of two cars in the same train, one contains wheat for export and the other contains grain for the use of our farmers in British Columbia. For the grain in the first car the railroad charges 20 cents per hundred pounds, and for the contents of the following car the charge is 78 cents per hundred pounds. An organization to which I belong, the Surrey Co-Operative Association, which buys every year some five to six million dollars' worth of grain from the Prairies, often has the experience of being compelled to pay, for part of the wheat taken out of a car in Vancouver the contents of which were carried for 20 cents per hundred pounds, an added difference of 50 cents or 78 cents per hundred; and until recently even for screenings which had been removed from cars of wheat for export on which 20 cents per hundred pounds was paid because it was destined for abroad, 78 cents per hundred pounds. If there is any sense or justice in exacting as much as that for wheat or cleanings I should like to hear someone get up and champion that kind of thing. It is a practice from which we have been suffering for the last 40 years.

What I say may not please some honourable senators, but I realize that we have made no headway in this matter because there have not been enough members of Parliament and senators from British Columbia to plead our cause. Let me add, though, that I am not blaming this Government in particular for what has been going on for 40 years. But it is a well-known fact that the three Prairie provinces have a great number of members in Parliament—and numbers of members count these days. I might warn the present Government about what happened in past years to the Liberal Government. There were some years when we almost gave the three Prairie provinces the entire exchequer, but this didn't bring back very many Liberal members. It seems that you just can't buy votes on the Prairies. You may think you can, but in the last few years the Liberal Government proved otherwise, for although we gave the three Prairie provinces millions of dollars in subsidies we didn't get too many Liberal candidates elected from there. As a matter of fact, at one time we had only one Liberal member from Saskatchewan, in spite of all the money grants we gave them.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: They won't stay bought.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Apparently not.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: How about wheat grain assistance?

Hon. Mr. Reid: We come now to the assistance that the Government has given. It has been fairly generous in regard to freight rate assistance. It has given all provinces freight assistance. The assistance given us now on the C.N.R. amounts to this. On 100 pounds we pay 78 cents and the Government pays 43 cents. On the Calgary route we pay 70 cents per 100 pounds and the Government pays 43 cents by way of assistance. Over the years this has amounted to considerable sums of money, but we are always afraid that some Government some day will cut this off. We would rather see the rate adjusted to the rate for export. We maintain we ought not to be penalized. If what we are paying is a reasonable sum for the railways to charge, which is 78 cents per 100 pounds, then I maintain we are subsidizing the Prairie farmers to the extent of almost $100 million a year in freight assistance due to losses incurred by the railways. That argument is fairly sound. If this rate of 78 cents per 100 pounds is a fair rate to enable the railways to transport our wheat profitably, and they are only charging 20 cents per 100 pounds from the Prairies to points in British Columbia—and we exported something like 290 million bushels last year—then it seems logical, although it has not been pointed out too often, that the people on the Prairies are being subsidized to the tune of nearly $100 million a year with respect to freight rates on grain grown for sale outside those provinces.

I draw the attention of the Government to this fact and I am hoping that some day something will be done about it. The railways have never been able to prove exactly how much it costs to haul any commodity. They have been asked this many times when appearing before the Board of Transport Commissioners but their experts have been unable to say exactly what it costs to haul grain. The Province of British Columbia has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal fees and on other assistance in coming to Ottawa to appear before the Board of Transport Commissioners and, formerly, the Board of Railway Commissioners. We have appealed to these boards without making any headway in regard to the inequity I have just pointed out of 20 cents on export shipments as against 78 cents that we are called upon to pay on local shipments.

British Columbia has long been the best customer for Ontario and Quebec, particularly Ontario. We have bought more from Ontario than any other province in Canada, yet Ontario and Quebec have never interested themselves one bit in our appeals. If only we could get them to join with us when we go before the board and before the Government I think we might get somewhere. But, no, they remain aloof. They tell us, "Oh, we are not much interested; freight rates don't interest us; we have water transportation, and we have trucks, and trucks keep the fares or rates down." So they do not come near, with the result that the battle has been carried on principally by British Columbia and Alberta. At times Saskatchewan has joined in, but this has just been the odd time. Manitoba, of course, is too far east, so it just looks on. Personally, I should like to see all the provinces join in an appeal. When the two main provinces keep out, the Government is liable to say, "Oh, there are only 21 members in British Columbia, and if we don't elect them all it does not matter very much."

Hon. Mr. McDonald: What volume of feed is involved?

Hon. Mr. Reid: It came to British Columbia at the 20 cent rate last year. It is roughly 130 million bushels—18½ million bushels went through Churchill and 120.8 million bushels went through the St. Lawrence. Those are the latest figures I have.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Has my honourable friend any information about the increase in the price of grains, which I think amounts to $2 a ton? Will that affect our freight rate on feed grains?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I believe it will affect it, especially since intimation was given the other day that the Wheat Board had raised the price by 5⅞ cents a bushel, with the price of flour per 100 pounds, according to the National Council of Baking Industry. In some places bread went up one cent a loaf owing, it was stated, to the increase in the price of flour. The spokesmen for the industry tell me that the increase of 5⅞ cents a bushel, if applied to the domestic market price, would increase the cost of flour by only 13.6 cents per 100 pounds, and the increase reflected in the price of bread would amount to one-tenth of a cent a loaf. This increase in the cost of flour cost would amount to $2 million for the baking industry as a whole, but a one-cent increase in the price of bread would yield the bakers $12 million. I trust the Government will keep its eye on this, in view of the small increase of 5⅞ cents per bushel. Already we hear of the price of flour and bread going up.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: What does the honourable member mean by the subsidy of 78 cents to which he has referred? Does the Government pay 43 cents?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Even if the Government pays the 43 cents it is subsidizing both the east and the west, Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Do you mean everything carried on the railways?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Everything in grain is subsidized by the Government, and all the provinces receive help toward the purchase of grain.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: We in Newfoundland get no subsidy, although we buy about $100 million of commodities yearly from Ontario alone, and we have to pay extra freight rates on account of distance. The further east you go the higher is the rate, and we, being the farthest east, pay very much, more than the people in Ontario or Quebec, or in the nearer places. I am wondering how you in the west came to have such great influence as to be able to get so large a subsidy.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Oh, but you receive as much. Wait a moment and I will show you what Newfoundland and the other provinces are getting. If you sit down I will tell you, but I cannot tell you while you are on your feet speaking.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: You said British Columbia has only a few members at Ottawa, and that if you had more members you would have better prospects. I was wondering how many members you have.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The official railway charge for hauling grain to British Columbia is 78 cents. We are getting subsidized to the extent of 43 cents. You will be surprised to hear what Newfoundland is getting in subsidies —it is getting much more. Here are the figures per ton: Ontario, the average is $4.91 to $5 per ton; Quebec, $6.53 to $8.81; New Brunswick, $9.21 to $15.70; Nova Scotia, $10.22 to $17.10. The amount of $17.10 is the latest figure I have. Prince Edward Island, $10.08 to $17.10. Now, listen to this—Newfoundland, $21.37.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Oh, you are referring to feed grains only? I should like to hear figures on other items.

Hon. Mr. Reid: For British Columbia it was $6.99 per ton and it is now $8.44. Those are the average figures of assistance. Since 1941 it has cost the Government or the people of Canada something like $290 million for freight assistance. We, however, are somewhat afraid of where our economy is going, and that there might well be a cutting down on freight assistance. Even with the freight assistance we are getting it works out at a much higher cost than the 20 cents per 100 pounds—it costs us 34 cents to bring our wheat and our grain in from the Prairie provinces. We have suffered a great injustice, and I am hoping that some day we may be able to clear this thing up for the benefit of all concerned. We are great purchasers of grain from the Prairies, and considering the way our markets are going we had better look to see if within our own country we can use more of our home-grown grain, rather than pile it up on the Prairies.

Honourable senators, I make no apology for bringing this matter before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): Honourable senators, referring to Vote No. 697 may I ask the honourable Leader of the Government for further information in connection with the amount of $2,500,000? If I understood the honourable leader correctly, $2 million of that amount was to cover the increased amount of grain being shipped to the various provinces and $500,000 was to cover the increase in freight charges, I presume, resulting from the 17 per cent increase in freight rates allotted the railways. The question I would like to ask is this: Does the $500,000 cover the total increase or only a certain proportion, and if so what proportion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The information that I have here deals with the final result. If a 100-pound bag of feed was shipped it would cost approximately the same price whether delivered in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, or the Maritimes. The Government has set aside this $500,000 to take care of the increase in the freight charges. That is all the information I have.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): You are not sure whether that covers the total increase or only a proportion of it? Is it your understanding that it covers the total increase?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I don't think I have information on that point. The purpose of this $500,000 is, as I said, to equalize things so that the people in the Maritimes don't pay any more than the people in British Columbia for a 100-pound bag of feed.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): I wonder if the honourable leader might get that information.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will try to give you that information on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Kamloops): Honourable senators, I wonder if the honourable leader could give me some information in regard to Vote No. 698, which makes provision for a fund to make payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre, up to a maximum of 200 acres. In some places throughout the Prairie provinces there are community operations where for the purpose of marketing they are operated as one farm, with one marketing book, and when it comes to this assistance they have been broken down. Does that account for some of the increase of 8,000 additional farmers?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Every farm unit, if it qualifies, is entitled to a quota for that unit. In order to qualify as a complete unit a farmer must have his farm machinery and equipment and all that kind of thing, but in this case a great number of individuals have not yet applied for their quotas, and other farmers who are entitled to quota permit books had not applied either, because they had fed their grain. The purpose of this provision is to equalize the whole situation and give everyone who has a right to a permit book the right to the $1 an acre, up to $200. Every case is scrutinized very carefully. That is the cause of the delay and the real reason why a number of farmers have not yet received their money.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Perhaps I may be out of order in saying so, but if the honourable Leader of the Government had answered an inquiry which I have had on the Order Paper for about 10 days he would have been able to answer the honourable senator from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Taylor).

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I may inform the honourable senator that after we adjourned this evening at 6 o'clock I received the answers to his inquiry, and I shall be glad to give them to him tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Could the honourable leader place them on the record this evening, so that the question asked by the honourable senator might be answered now?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not have the answers here.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I think those answers will give a pretty clear picture of the situation as it affects the Atlantic provinces. After having placed the questions on the Order Paper I did a little figuring myself, and I am wondering how close I have come to the answer to the last question. I would say that the total increase in cost to the people of the Atlantic provinces will be close to $400,000.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Tomorrow.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 19, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, my first words will be for the Queen, to whom I wish a long life and a happy reign. Every year our gracious sovereign broadcasts a message to her kingdom and to all the peoples of the commonwealth. These last few years especially, she has always concluded her remarks with an appeal to harmony in the home, for she knows full well that there can be no peace and happiness in the nation without love and harmony in the home. That is why in the message she broadcast on December 25, 1958, she said:

—it seems to me that Christmas is just the time to be grateful to those who add fullness to our lives.

And she added:

Even so, we need something more. We all need the kind of security that one gets from a happy and united family.

What nobility, what highness of purpose! Let us hope that the Queen's wish will come true, not only within the homes and in the great commonwealth family, but also in the whole world. When she comes to Canada, in a few months, for the official opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, how happy we will be to welcome her!

Mr. Speaker, over the last twelve months, you have had several times the honour of representing Canada. You have always done it with dignity and, in Brussels, I am told, with splendour. If you have been so honoured it is no doubt because you are an honour to us.

The honourable senator who proposed the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Hon. Mr. Pearson) was most interesting when he gave us the history of his province. Other senators after him also talked of their provinces, of their particular areas, of their bailiwicks, whether in the West or in the East. I do not need to describe my province of Quebec. Just the same, when you travel from East to West or from West to East, you should stop at the place where East and West meet, Quebec, and you will see that, though the people who live there have a culture which differs from the Anglo-Saxon culture, this other culture only makes for greater harmony within Canada. In both East and West there are marvellous landscapes to see; but if you stop in Quebec you will find that, there, nature has been most lavish.

What can I add to the congratulations already offered the honourable senator from Ottawa East, who seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Hon. Mr. Choquette)? I heard my colleagues expressing their admiration upon hearing the senator for Ottawa East speak in both languages with equal fluency. Personally, while listening to his speech, without any feeling of jealousy, I could not help envying his eloquence.

I want to welcome our new colleagues. I am sure that by their talents each, in his own field, will help to clarify or specify many a point of law.

(Text):

And, I would like to say to you, Mr. Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), I hope you will continue to have your broad smile.

(Translation):

To the leader of this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) I wish a long life. I also want to assure him that it is a pleasure to co-operate with him and to help him.

There is a short sentence in the Speech from the Throne which has already been quoted by several senators. This short paragraph, which is about inflation and the recession reads as follows:

(Text):

They believe that as recovery proceeds there will be increasing need for care to preserve the stability and purchasing power of our currency.

(Translation):

I do not intend to discuss economic inflation as such, for the subject has already been dealt with often by economic experts, especially by the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). Moreover, there will perhaps be other opportunities for discussing the problem during this session. But I would like to call attention to one particular case. The Government is voting millions to further encourage housing construction. Unfortunately, however, construction costs have increased nearly 20 per cent over the last two years, which means that the $250,000,000 voted this year are worth no more than $200,000,000 two years ago.

In order to remedy the very high cost of housing construction, construction co-operatives have been and are being set up in some sections of the country. I have more particularly in mind what is being done in Quebec, because I know the picture there. To make a success of their work, housing co-operatives in Quebec need money and, with the help of the caisses populaires, (credit unions), they find the neecssary funds without applying for help from the Government. The Quebec caisses populaires have loaned $300 million for building purposes.

It is therefore the Government's duty to help these co-operatives as much as possible and to protect them against the envious who, although they may not want to see them disappear altogether, would like to prevent their growth and development, even at the expense of progress.

Besides economic inflation, there is another kind of inflation which is just as serious if not more, because it affects the whole human being: it is the inflation, spreading throughout the world, of criminality and immorality. Speaking in the other house recently, the honourable Minister of Justice wondered how he could, in short order, settle the problem of lack of space in our penitentiaries. It will cost hundreds of millions to build the necessary premises to house our criminals. And this is the atomic century which has produced the most extraordinary things! Unfortunately, notwithstanding our discoveries, we seem to have forgotten a basic truth: that man is composed of body and soul. We have too often forgotten the soul, that God-given source of life which human science is incapable of producing.

I have engaged in social welfare work in my district, helping the best I can the existing social services, and particularly the family service. Every day, fathers and mothers say to us: "I don't know what is going on; I have a 14-year old boy, a 16-year old girl, and I cannot do anything with them; they will not obey and they have disturbing ideas, although we do not know where they get them." After investigating, we find that in 98 per cent of cases those children read obscene magazines, cheap, unwholesome publications which stress sex, describe crime and glorify immorality. In addition, they go to shows, seeking those pictures which teach immorality, describe in detail organizations of gangsters, of murderers, where adultery is almost placed on a pedestal and where intimacies of the bed-chamber are shamelessly exposed, etc., etc. Then there is the wife whose husband is unfaithful because she does not understand him or because she is not sexually adapted as she should be, while his mistress possesses all the charms in the world. Do you know what I heard some youth say after seeing a film on TV: "It is a good thing that the husband killed his wife." That is the situation nowadays. Murder, prostitution, immorality are condoned. People seem to think that they are necessary, almost normal. Little by little our moral sense which enables us to distinguish between good and evil is being warped. And yet our human society is based on that very principle.

It is high time that we should act if we do not want the fate which befell Sodom and Gomorrha, if we do not want to disappear from the face of the earth.

I have just spoken of films shown on TV. Responsibility for the present situation does not belong to obscene and unwholesome newspapers alone. There are also motion pictures and the films which are televised and which insidiously enter our homes and which, I repeat, condone every vice. During the last few weeks some very good films have been shown on the French network, but on the other hand there are some which are revolting from a moral standpoint. I had been urged to see a film called Chasse à l'homme. Those who allow such a film to be shown on TV, before hundreds of thousands of viewers, have no sense of morality and no respect for the family.

I was gratified when I read in the Speech from the Throne a passage announcing that the Criminal Code would be amended so as to define more clearly the term: "Obscene literature". I shall congratulate the Government and the Minister of Justice when they have defined obscenity in such a way as to permit honest people to prosecute the guilty parties.

But what use will such a definition be if no penalties are provided? What does it matter to the publishers and to the distributors of such literature if they have to pay a $50 or $100 fine when they make profits amounting to thousands of dollars? Why do they publish such trash, for that matter, if not because it is a profitable trade? Worship of the golden calf—nay, our money is no longer guaranteed by gold—worship of the mighty dollar comes before worship of God. Those people who publish such trash, who sell such crime sheets, should be put away so that they could no longer be a menace to society.

It is not only the sexual literature that is bad; there is also the kind which teaches how to kill, rape or steal and which is just as harmful as the other. It has come to the point where women are no longer safe in our cities when they go out on the street, especially at night.

We are sometimes told that the tales we hear are just police court facts. But what need is there to publish them abroad? No one is brought to court for acts of virtue. Our young people want to enjoy carnal pleasure without having to pay for it in money; in reading all these tales they find how to obtain the money without having to work for it, but these abnormal cases violently upset their mind and nervous system and incite them to do likewise.

Apart from cheap weeklies being sold in too many newsstands, there are pocket books which are just as immoral as the newspapers I have just spoken of and the cover of which is enough to give ideas to any young people.

It was Churchill who said: "If you want to sell a book, place a woman's picture on the cover, and no cover on the woman."

Last week, more than 600 parents met in Quebec to discuss the problem of salacious literature. Public opinion is awakening and it is a good thing because, even with the best laws, if the reasonable people who have their children's happiness at heart take no interest in the problem, it will never be solved. The law provides for punishment, but not for rehabilitation. It is the individual's conscience that must be moulded. It therefore behooves serious men and women, those who love their family, their children and their country, to attend to this problem of education and to begin solving it by bringing up their children properly and by leading a normal life. That is my constant experience: if the father would become his son's companion, and take the trouble to chat with him, if the mother would do likewise with her daughter, instead of going out to earn a few more dollars, if she would stay at home to bring up her children, it would be a great deal better for home and country.

But there are some people who have become so perverted that they cannot be made to listen except through imprisonment. Those who print, sell or distribute pornographic magazines and newspapers should be locked up and I hope the law will provide for it. When some people reach a certain age, they are no longer able to reason; they no longer understand common sense; let us then separate them from society so as to prevent them from contributing to its destruction.

I want to pay tribute to the railway companies which, in a general way, have stopped selling this filthy literature in station newsstands. In some places, unfortunately, vendors still spread out this kind of literature on the counter. In Three Rivers, for instance, I saw some of it last Thursday, notwithstanding definite orders from the President of the C.P.R. I am sorry to say, however, that in some transportation companies terminals this stuff is being sold freely. At the Provincial Transport Company terminal in Montreal, for instance, I found all these filthy sheets being offered to all, young and old. We are told that the space was rented and that no control whatever is exercised. That means that the space was rented to sell this immoral stuff and that they are taking money for it. That is the ultimate. No one should be kept to a contract when the lessee behaves in that way. In such cases, there should be some means of bringing him into line.

I hope the responsible authorities will heed the appeal I am now making. In the past those authorities have turned a deaf ear, stating that the display and sale of such filth would cease only if the law required it. If you want to avoid evil, you should not always wait for the law to force you; there is such a thing as conscience.

I heard, in the past few days, all kinds of arguments on the word obscenity. It is difficult to define obscenity, some claimed, and you must not infringe upon the people's freedom; for some people, a certain writing will be obscene, while for others, it will not. A book is obscene when it is written for smutty purposes; the same holds for a magazine or any other writing. In museums, we are told, nudes are on display, and people go to see them. That is true, but if you go to see the Venus of Milo, for instance, you are seeing a work of art, whereas if you distribute hundreds of thousands of copies of a reproduction of the Venus of Milo, in a 5- or 10-cent sheet, the results will not be the same. This goes to show that a thing becomes obscene when it is used for obscene purposes. That is why all those filthy little sheets are obscene from cover to cover, because they are designed specifically for that purpose, as a means of promoting sales and increasing profits.

If we control inflation in the field of immorality, we can also exercise a good influence on the economic and monetary inflation, because one of the factors of inflation is that too many people begrudge work, but want to get the most out of life; they think happiness is the pleasure found at the street corner, in a house of ill repute, in a taxi or any other place. Carnal pleasure may be found on a street corner; you do not find happiness and true love in the gutter. True happiness and love are found at home.

I referred a moment ago to a meeting held last week in Quebec City, which was attended by many hundreds of fathers and mothers. Those people considered not only the problem of pernicious literature being distributed, but especially the vital matter of replacing that filthy literature by healthy magazines and books; they want a healthy and suitable literature which will be of moral and cultural help to our youth. The small 10-cent sheets and 25-cent pocket books, are very badly written; they will not teach our youths the fine points of literature. That is why these fathers and mothers demand that a healthy and suitable literature be distributed; that is, healthy from a moral point of view and suitable from a literary point of view. That is something positive.

In closing my remarks, I would urge the Government to propose, as soon as possible, an amendment to this act, an amendment that would provide sanctions, so that those who are working for the destruction of our society may be apprehended.

May all people of good will take into their own hands the defence of their homes.

Let the motion picture houses and TV stations stop presenting such filth, those Western films showing bandits' or murderers' exploits.

I wonder why today it is impossible to have stories in which virtue is respected and shown in all its beauty and grandeur, where good is taught and where happiness is found in good deeds well done. In former times, when I was young, we were given Perrault's stories, the Countess of Segur's novels and letters of Madame de Sévigné to read; now we are told that those things are but rose-water productions. Perhaps it is so, but at least, roses smell good, and since we only wished then to smell good perfume, gangsters, murderers, robbers and all those who do away with morals were much less numerous than they are today.

Let us therefore go back to those good old days and give our children good literature. Our children did not ask to be born. Have we the right, as heads of families, to let them go astray? No, we had them in order that they may be happy. And it is our responsibility to rear them and protect them, giving them good examples and creating a healthy social climate where they will live happily, so that when we are gone they may recall those who sincerely wished their happiness. Our good deeds will survive when we are no longer here.

I call upon everyone to promote as soon as possible a great campaign of morality and healthy reading. Such a campaign is already under way; but it must be carried on more intensely if possible, so that the youth of tomorrow may be better than that of today, and even better than that of our generation. We are often told, in regard to our forefathers: let us be worthy sons of our fathers. Well, let us be more realistic still: let us be worthy fathers to our sons.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Euler, debate adjourned.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I would like to make a correction in what I said yesterday. Every time I consider that I am wrong I hasten to say so. It does not happen very often, but each time I am quite scrupulous about it. I stated that the supply bill did not contain a schedule of detailed information with regard to the supplementary estimates. That is true, but, on the other hand, the details were in a separate small leaflet. I would suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that when we are dealing with a supplementary supply bill he should have the estimates filed alongside the bill for our perusal. I offer that suggestion for what it is worth.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES

SHIPPING COSTS—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Did all sections of Canada contribute to the cost of developing the St. Lawrence Seaway?
2. Was the purpose of constructing the St. Lawrence Seaway to serve as a new artery of commerce, and to reduce shipping costs to all sections of Canada?
3. Since the first of January, 1959, has there been an increase in the price of wheat at the Lakehead? If so, what was this increase?
4. As per D.B.S., what was the per capita consumption per annum of flour in 1956?
5. What was 1956 Census population of the four Atlantic Provinces?
6. At the increase mentioned in Question 3, and the answers to Questions 4 and 5, what would be the total increased cost to the Atlantic Provinces?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have the following answers to the honourable gentleman's questions:

1. The cost of the St. Lawrence Seaway is being financed by loans from the Canadian treasury, to be amortized by the charging of tolls.
2. The purpose was to modernize and improve the means of transportation by water, thereby strengthening Canada's economy as a whole.
3. Yes. 5⅝ cents per bushel.
4. 144.3 lbs. in 1956.
5. The population of the four Atlantic Provinces per the 1956 Census was:

Newfoundland	415,074
Prince Edward Island	99,285
Nova Scotia	694,717
New Brunswick	554,616
Total	1,763,692

6. Since a substantial part of the increase of 5⅝ cents per bushel in the price of wheat at the Lakehead will be covered by a reduction in the cost of the shipment of wheat from the Lakehead to Montreal, it is not possible at this time to estimate the total increased cost of flour to the Atlantic Provinces resulting from the change in Canadian Wheat Board pricing policy.

INFLATION

On the notice of motion by Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, may I ask that this motion be postponed until after the third reading of the supply bill?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the third reading of Bill C-24, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before this bill is read the third time I have a few remarks to make, to relieve my honourable colleagues of any inferiority complex. What I intend to establish is that the Senate has an unlimited power, provided there is some co-operation among all of us. The total amount asked for in the bill is quite large; it is for over $27,900,000. It covers all that expenditure. It covers also the salaries of all the civil servants who will have to deal with any of the items therein mentioned.

With your permission, honourable senators, I will establish, I hope to your satisfaction, that very good results have been achieved by the answers that have been given in reply to some questions. If each one is considered separately you will have no idea of the information that is conveyed by all of them put together. I was really surprised at the outcome.

I may criticize the Government when I find that the Government is in the wrong, but on the other hand I am in a position to give it full credit when I am convinced that it is doing things the right way, as in the matter that we are dealing with.

We will have to go backwards and consider the information that has been given on three different matters. In the first place, there is the National Gallery. Its expenditure was very high for the purchase of paintings and so-called works of art. What is quite astonishing is that a few years ago a journalist wrote in a daily paper that there was no picture by Chardin hanging in the National Gallery. Chardin was a well-gifted French painter. On account of that write-up the National Gallery bought two pictures by Chardin, and one by Reubens. They also bought another picture by an Italian artist —it was a painting of Saint Catherine, who looks to be in a rather sad mood.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Don't make us cry.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Would the honourable gentleman care to look at this picture of the painting of Saint Catherine?

There was no painting by Chardin in the Gallery. What did the Gallery do? They bought four paintings at the enormous cost of $800,000, in order to have two by Chardin. It is quite unbelievable. In order to have two paintings from one painter they wasted $800,000. Now they have the pictures, and they are quite proud of themselves; but the Canadian taxpayers have paid more than $800,000 to give them satisfaction. It is pure nonsense!

Then I asked a question as to how much was paid for each painting and the name of the dealer who supplied them to the National Gallery. I received a very impudent answer from the Director, which reads as follows:

> However, it is the considered opinion of the trustees that it is not in the public interest to disclose from whom works were purchased and they point out that to treat such information as private is the standard practice with all art galleries and museums.

There was an order from Parliament to the Gallery to supply that information, and on that I had the unanimous support of my honourable colleagues. The Senate, as one of the houses of Parliament, told the National Gallery to supply that information and, like the devil, the trustees said, "No, we will not supply that information; it is not our practice." I repeat, that was an order from the Parliament of Canada, conveyed by the Government of this country. The minister concerned apprised them of the request to supply that information, but they boldly refused.

We were asking for that information as to a limited period. Then we decided to go further, and the same question was asked as to the period from the time the present director was placed in charge of the National Gallery. In the meantime he had abused me over the radio, and I was asked by the C.B.C. radio station in Toronto to be on a panel with him to discuss it. I told them that I would gladly do so in due course, but that at the time I was not ready because I did not have enough information. I then got in touch with the minister concerned and told him this was an insult to the Senate and to Parliament. He probably gave definite instructions, because not long afterwards I had the full information, telling us from where each work of art came and the price paid. However, the rebuke in that second instance was not to Parliament, but to the civil servant concerned. We got results. This year, with your assent, honourable colleagues, the information has been completed to date.

Therefore, we have got some information we are entitled to have, in spite of the reluctance on the part of the civil servants concerned to give it to us. This is an example of what Parliament can do with regard to civil servants. That is my first point.

No. 2 has to do with the Dominion Archivist. In the United States the word is pronounced "arch'-ivist", and in England "archi'-vist". You understand whom I mean, and as I am not from across the border I will use the English pronunciation. Here is a gentleman who occupies a high position in the service; as a matter of fact, not only one, but two positions: he is in charge of all the public records of Canada and he is ex officio the gentleman who is supposed to destroy them. You may find here a contradiction, and it appears to be rather strange.

Recently, as President of the Canadian Historical Society, he went to Edmonton and made a speech there. I wanted to know the tenor of this speech, because his trip was probably made at the expense of the country. I am not sure of this, but it is very probable that when an official of this importance leaves Ottawa to go as far west as Edmonton he sees to it that his transportation expenses are provided for. In the course of his speech he made the following remarks:

> The number of biographies of Canadians that are in any real sense definitive can be numbered on the fingers of one hand.

I do not say that he was wrong, nor that he was right; but if he was right, it is because the sources of history have been destroyed by the public records committee, a proceeding to which I object most strongly. Each one of the public files is the property of Canada, and no one can destroy any of those files without at the same time destroying a source of history. This is my point. But tons and tons of public paper have been destroyed under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State, whose acting chairman is the Dominion Archivist. Do you not think that this is pure nonsense? If, as the archivist has said, we have only a very limited number of good Canadian biographies —so few that they can be counted on the fingers of one hand—there is something wrong.

It is very difficult indeed to write history in this country, because access to public papers is not easy. So many private papers, too, which are in the archives cannot be studied by anyone before many years have elapsed. Further, Canada is very unfortunate in that so large a mass of historical data which was kept in the tower of the old Parliament buildings was destroyed by fire in 1916. These papers have gone for ever.

When we pay a lot of money to send people to copy parts of the archives in France or in England, it is absurd that the papers we have here are unnecessarily destroyed.

All this information I have obtained by your assent and with your help; for if, when I asked these questions, the Senate had rejected them I would never have had an answer. I give credit to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and to my colleagues on both sides of the house for having understood the importance of these inquiries, which were directed to enabling the Canadian people to be familiar with their traditions. I do not thank you, honourable colleagues, I congratulate you upon having understood the importance of the matter. It would not astonish me if someone outside the Senate said, "What have you got? You have got only a few papers." But those papers are most valuable.

I hope that at the earliest possible opportunity the Government will change its policy in respect of its records. The Government owns countless buildings; there is plenty of space for storage of documents. It would not be expensive to keep these historic papers; indeed it would be less costly to keep them than to destroy them. In making this plea I speak as the Dominion Archivist himself should have spoken. What is important is to make a classification of these papers so that, when a question is asked about any important historical fact, the answer of the Government will not be "No information", but will be as complete as many replies have been which I have had from the honourable Leader of the Government in this house.

During the war the Government became overcrowded with all sorts of files, covering every soldier in the army, and so forth. Some files may have been put aside, but nine files have been destroyed to one which has been kept—representing tons of paper which have gone into the incinerator. One is reminded of the character in The Mikado, Ko-Ko, the well-known executioner, the man in charge of the destruction of all public papers. It would be a sight to go out and see this performance.

Now, having got this information, it seems to me absurd that the same official who is entrusted with the duty of keeping the papers which belong to Canada is also responsible for destroying them. He is there as an image. He is there to give the prestige of his name and of his decision to all the civil servants who put "Destroy" on the files. How can one man fulfil his official duties and supervise the destruction of those papers? It is humanly and physically impossible. I think it is important, perhaps not as much for now as for future generations and for students of history, to see to it that that wrong practice is stopped as soon as possible. Thank you, honourable colleagues.

My third point is the C.B.C. strike. As one of the big Montreal newspapers has said so wisely, it was an absurd strike that amounted only to blackmail. It was my duty to felicitate the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Labour for not having been impressed by the blackmail of the producers, who thought that they were indispensable, that the earth would stop turning as soon as they went on strike. They went on strike and the earth continued to turn. More interesting programs were given over TV.

Here is another important suggestion, one that I have received from many people and which I am conveying now to the Government. It is that the C.B.C. employees who have been faithful and loyal to the corporation should be adequately rewarded. They should be given a kind of priority over all those who went on the picket line to prevent the artists from performing their plays. Let us hope that this will be taken into consideration, and I thank you, honourable colleagues, for your support. I give full credit to the honourable Leader of the Government for answering the inquiries as satisfactorily as he did.

It is said that the strike is about to finish, but one would be sorry to see all the poor devils who have been led into error by the producers suffer any longer over it, provided that they resume their work, upon the conditions set by the corporation itself.

Here we come to labour matters. I had to deal with trade unions as long as I was a member of the House of Commons and most of the time I had to fight the union leaders in order to get good results for the men who belonged to those unions. Once I told a Minister of Labour that the best thing to do when there is labour trouble is to speak to the men over the head of their leaders. He did not reply to this, but six months afterwards he repeated the very same suggestion to me, asking what I thought of it. I said to him: "It is a very good idea. Do it and you will have no trouble."

At the present time the Government must be satisfied—not happy, because it is a sad case, but satisfied—with what it has done in this matter to have the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada respected throughout the land. Is it not essential to convey to the Civil Service the notion that Parliament has the responsibility to control all expenditures? Here, in the Senate, we do not have to vote each estimate separately. They come to us in bulk, but we have the right and the duty to scrutinize the expenditures. Each one of us represents the whole people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, in that regard. I know that no one of my colleagues will be remiss in his or her duty. In these troubled years the Senate is often the goat for public complaints. This is a manner in which we can show the people of Canada that the members of the Senate are their true friends.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, I would like to tell the honourable gentleman from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) that it is a wise man who knows when he is wrong but it is an honest man who admits it. I would also like to tell him not to bother about pronunciation. Ask some of the English-speaking senators here to pronounce any word in French. I would hate to be put to the test. Moreover, English pronunciations change and some words of today would not be known by people of yesterday. When I was a boy the word "laboratory" was pronounced "lab'-oratory" but today the pronunciation is "la-bor'-atory". The word "interesting" used to be pronounced "interest'-ing" but now it is "in'-teresting". Moreover, there are various pronunciations for the same English word. Perhaps honourable senators know the story about the two gentlemen who were arguing over the word "either". Happening to meet an Irishman, they asked him whether the correct pronunciation was "eether" or "eye-ther". He replied "'Ayther' will do." He was a learned and also a wise and diplomatic man.

Honourable senators, I am a newcomer here and I was astonished to learn from the honourable senator from De la Durantaye that such a thing could happen as the destruction of public documents by a small body of men. The knowledge of history might be changed thereby. Never has history been written from contemporaneous letters and documents so much as today. Scholars go to every library of the world where it is possible to get old documents and old letters in order to write authoritatively about former periods. In a young country like Canada—and Canada is a comparatively young country—it is strange that public documents should be destroyed so quickly. I quite agree with the honourable gentleman that something should be done to stop this practice, and I think the Senate will be doing a great and worthy task if it undertakes to see that the history of this country is properly written—that is, from contemporaneous documents. If we want to write the history of the Riel Rebellion or the Papineau Rebellion we must get information from letters and documents that were written at that time, and not depend entirely on tradition, which though often reliable is apt to become garbled in the process of being related from mouth to mouth down through the years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, yesterday I was able to answer a great many questions in connection with the supplementary estimates. I must apologize for not having been able to answer four or five of the questions that were asked, but quite a number of departments are involved. As soon as I was able to obtain yesterday's Hansard I sent for the information, but any information I have now is not complete. I ask the consent of the house to accept these four or five or six questions as notice, and tomorrow or during the early part of next week I shall give complete answers. I think that would be much more satisfactory to everyone concerned.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Wall moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

He said: Honourable senators, during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne last summer I had taken the liberty to express my fears about the potential inflationary pressures which were then becoming apparent. At that time I had urged the need of a comprehensive and organized study of this important national program in these words, as reported in the Senate Hansard of June 4, 1958, at page 133:

Now, who is to give national leadership to this crusade against inflation? I regard this problem of inflation to be of such overriding and cardinal importance that I venture to suggest the need of either a special debate on this subject by honourable senators or the setting up of a special Senate committee to study inflation, a suggestion already advanced by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). I would go farther and suggest to the Government the desirability of a special joint committee of both Houses of Parliament on inflation.

I propose this afternoon to repeat and to re-document my urgent plea for this comprehensive and organized study of the problem of inflation. This urgency becomes increasingly apparent to me with the tabling of the main estimates for 1959-60, which involve an overall increase in budgetary expenditures alone of $300 million. The relationship of current fiscal and monetary policies to the problem of inflation may well be accentuated when we consider that the raising of this $300 million increase in the main estimates alone will necessitate a rise in our gross national product of some 6 per cent in real terms, if relative tax levels remain the same and if the gross national product is not inflated by further price increases.

I have prepared a table to indicate the extent of annual price increases in our gross national product when related to constant 1949 dollars. Beginning with 1949 the table gives the annual gross national product in current dollars, the gross national product in 1949 dollars, and the total amount of price increase or inflation year by year. May I have the consent of the house to have this table put on record in Hansard?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Where do the figures come from? Do they come from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

Hon. Mr. Wall: These are all based on Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures.

Year	G.N.P. in current $	G.N.P. in constant 1949 dollars	Amount of price increase in G.N.P.
	(in millions of dollars)
1949	$16,343	$16,343
1950	$18,006	$17,471	$ 535
1951	21,170	18,547	2,623
1952	23,995	20,027	3,968
1953	25,020	20,794	4,226
1954	24,871	20,186	4,685
1955	27,070	21,961	5,109
1956	30,182	23,594	6,588
1957	31,443	23,558	7,885
1958	32,900*	23,746*	9,154*
Nine-year total:			$44,773,000,000.00
Average annual price increase in G.N.P.			$ 4,974,777,777.77

*Preliminary estimate based on 11 months' data.

Honourable senators will see that based on current dollars our 1958 gross national product is presently being forecast at a total of $32.9 billion, an estimate which may prove to be too high. However, if we translate this $32.9 billion into constant 1949 dollars, which is the basis of our consumers price index, our gross national product for 1958 amounts to only $23 billion 746 million. By subtracting these two figures we get a startling price cost increase in our estimated 1958 gross national product of $9 billion 154 million. If we add these inflation cost differentials for the past nine years we get the staggering sum of almost $45 billion, and an average annual price increase figure in our gross national product of almost $5 billion.

This very pertinent question plagues all of us: Who has been shouldering the major part of the cost burden of this amount of relative inflation in our gross national product? And if not the Parliament of Canada, then who is to attempt to locate the answers and to give direction to controlling this most insidious of all taxes—inflation? It is insidious because although it actually puts more dollars into some, though not all, hands, it stealthily dilutes the value of each dollar; it is insidious because everybody has not shared in these extra dollars. It is an insidious technique of literally stealing money without the embarrassment of identifying the victims or too closely pointing out the beneficiaries. Holders of savings accounts, bonds, pensions, annuities and insurance policies are being systematically and inexorably victimized. Only the organized, the influential and the knowledgeable, and governments, are able to benefit from these extra dollars, and they do so, wittingly or unwittingly, at the expense of their weaker fellow citizens who are not in a position to enforce their just demands for an equitable share of this inflated national product.

We are indebted to the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt)—and I regret he is not here today—for placing on Hansard what he considers to be an authoritative and unusual statement on inflation made by the President of the United States. Honourable senators will recall that it dealt mainly with the iniquitous distribution of these hidden taxes. Please note the President's final two sentences. I quote:

> Inflation can be prevented. But this demands statesmanship on the part of business and labour leaders and of Government at all levels.

Furthermore, as we think of the perils and inequities of inflation we must think of the effects of changing relationships in our Canadian price levels to the price levels in the countries to whom we sell and from whom we buy.

I have read sober warnings of very responsible Canadians who are being increasingly alarmed at what appears to be our propensity to become a still higher cost economy. Is our situation vis-à-vis inflation not far more dangerous than that of the United States, simply because of Canada's greater dependence upon external trade with other countries. It seems pertinent at this time for us to remember that the percentage relationship to the gross national product of imports and exports in the United States is only 8 per cent, while in Canada the similar relationship is 30 per cent. Common sense tells us that an internal high-cost economy would provide us with a double-headed dilemma, which I will summarize in these two basic questions:

(1) Because we sell so much of our production in markets abroad how are we going to make our selling prices competitive?

I could refer to the sale of our eggs in Venezuela not along ago.

(2) How are we going to retain our domestic markets in the face of strong competition from our trading partners whose lower selling costs to us may reflect a different level of productivity, living standards and prices?

Let us remember too that inflation bears more heavily upon those sectors in Canada which are specially and specifically dependent upon our export trade—the Maritime provinces and western Canada, for example.

Surely these perils of inflation in their distributive aspects and in their effects upon our import and export trade should become a matter of deep concern and wide knowledge among all the Canadian people. I believe that our sense of public stewardship should order us to ascertain all the facts of the case, to the extent that it is possible for us so to do.

Now we come to the problem of unemployment or inflation. Which do we tackle first? Subject to correction, it appears to me that the Government's main thesis has been that unemployment problems demanded priority and that inflation would have to be tackled later. I would welcome guidance upon this problem, and this could conceivably come from the findings of the study I am suggesting, for personally I am not convinced that inflation is a so-called secondary problem which has to await its sequential turn, by which time it may be too late to deal with inflation effectively.

I am haunted by the historical verdict to this question: If prices have continued to rise despite the business recession, unemployment and unused industrial capacity, and if they have traditionally persisted to increase during what we term a period of higher economic activity, pray then when will prices not rise?

What about the contention that unemployment problems and employment-producing policies are Canada's number one problem which must be solved first before we tackle seriously the problem of inflation? Is this true or is this basic assumption subject to very serious doubt? Perhaps a study will throw much needed light upon this subject. I have in my hand the News Letter issued by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which came to my desk just this morning, and I shall permit myself to read the first few lines:

> Inflation was termed Canada's number one problem by a thirty-one man delegation of community and business leaders who presented the annual policy of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to the federal Cabinet in Ottawa on January 9.
> The Chamber delegation, headed by President A. C. Ashforth, called on the Government to face up to the present situation in which inflation is steadily eroding away the value of the dollar.

Then the statement goes on to examine the factors of inflation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why not read the next sentence or two?

Hon. Mr. Wall: I can read the whole letter. I will continue:

> Among factors contributing to the kind of inflation which we are experiencing today are the wage-price spiral, taxation, and the very high levels of government spending.

Shall I continue to read?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I will.

> Chamber delegates from all parts of Canada asked the Government to consider implementation of Chamber policies which called for every possible effort to contain spending.

However, it is apparent that there is in Canada, honourable senators, a wide body of informed opinion which appears to accept this apparently unresolveable dilemma or dichotomy between unemployment or rising prices and inflation. If the Government also accepts this hypothesis, then am I not correct in assuming that we may logically infer an attendant admission that the Government appears not to have an answer to this ostensible dilemma either, be it in the form of fiscal or monetary policies? If that assumption is valid, and I would welcome its contradiction with its sequential statement of Government policies to avoid inflation, then I have a right to maintain that the Government should show how it proposes to distribute the burden of this iniquitous, hidden inflation tax, so that all Canadians should benefit equitably from its so-called elusive economic blessing; or so that all Canadians should bear their fair share of the burdens, as is not now the case.

At the risk of being labelled a political idealist, I contend that the average Canadian believes that it would be more courageous and more ethical to pay for the costs of employment and for employment-producing projects through revenue-producing practices, other than those which erode the value of the Canadian dollar, and thus shoulder an excessive proportion of the cost on the trapped and defenceless creditors and fixed-annual-income receivers, to whom I have already referred.

Perhaps, honourable senators, there would be no real dilemma between unemployment and rising prices if we tackled both with more effective policies and practices in both the public and the private sectors of our economy. This brings to my mind a very illuminating book entitled Prosperity Without Inflation, whose author is Professor Arthur Burns, former adviser to the President of the United States.

I have in my hand a book written by Roy Herrod, an economist in Great Britain. It is entitled Policy Against Inflation. Here is one more timely contribution to the literature about recession and recovery, which indicates the possibilities and remedies for the control of inflation through governmental leadership. I would refer honourable senators especially to the last chapter of the book, entitled "Fundamental Principles of Policy".

Now the question: How much inflation, when and why? This question brings us to the very crux of the problem. If we are to help in locating sensible solutions for inflation, we must know more about inflationary trends past and present; and if we can locate and assess the effect of causative factors in inflation we shall have achieved much indeed.

No one, honourable senators, would wish to profess that inflation is a new phenomenon, as a brief analysis of post-war price movements can readily show. But it is very important to assess the reasons for these post-war consumer price changes, to understand what was happening to the various components, and why.

This same assessment is needed for the price changes during the most recent recession period which has carried the consumer price index to a high of 126.3, with the latest index showing at 126.1.

What is the significance of this element of inflation in our economy during 1958, which were months of slower economic activity? Why did our prices rise approximately 2½ per cent? Prices during this period should really have dropped. What factors caused them to rise?

Are wage increases to blame? If so, how much?

Now we get into a wide range of opinions, and I am going to quote from one opinion at the one extreme, one in the middle, and one at the other extreme.

Dr. Jules Backman, Professor of Economics at New York University, speaking to the Industrial Relations Conference of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, appears to put the blame for inflation in Canada more or less directly on the sharp increases in unit labour costs. Mr. Graham Towers, speaking to an underwriters' meeting, stressed the importance of not placing too large a blame upon labour for the lower value of money because of the cost-push effect of wage increases which are greater than the increases in output per man hour. Mr. Towers further claimed that we are all responsible.

Then we have the other extreme position being taken by Mr. Stanley Knowles, Executive Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress, speaking to the Engineering Institute of Canada, at Sarnia. Mr. Knowles admits that theoretically free collective bargaining has a price-raising tendency, but he claims that there is no evidence that wage increases have in fact been a serious factor in inflation in Canada since World War II. He criticizes the fallacy of the notion that wage increases caused price increases, hence inflation, hence recession.

I submit: surely this aspect of the problem merits judicial investigation.

Is it the level of profits and other returns in private enterprise that has caused inflation? Is inflation being caused by the kind of returns being gained in the field of private enterprise by entrepreneurs, by management and by capital?

Perhaps the agricultural sector of our economy is responsible for price increases? If so, we should find out whether farm incomes are too high and above parity as compared with the parity received by organized labour or capital. Perhaps the findings of the Price Spreads Commission will be significant in this regard.

Are capital and management getting more than parity, whatever parity may mean? Although it is argued that the level of corporation profits and other financial returns to management and entrepreneurs has been somewhat lower in 1958, could it be that capital and management are still getting more than their share, and that further redistribution of our national wealth is necessary if we are to achieve in greater measure the democratic fruits of distributive justice?

In this context one must question—and I do so rather strongly—the validity of the argument that wage increases must never exceed increases in productivity. For then, honourable senators, we would be accepting the premise that the present distribution of national wealth as among labour, agriculture, shareholders, management, entrepreneurs, etc., is basically satisfactory and just.

Surely our consideration of the causes of inflation must include the levels of returns to private enterprise as one more field for investigation.

Is it the kind of Government spending and financing that is the problem? Could it be, honourable senators, that the kind of deficit financing now being undertaken by our three levels of Government is one of the hidden culprits responsible for inflation? Being in a primary and most responsible position, what has been the effect upon inflation of the current federal fiscal and monetary policies?

What is the significance of this challenge as issued by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, speaking on January 26, 1959, on the program "The Nation's Business"? He said:

> There is no doubt that we are going to have a big deficit this year, and that the Government is going to raise perhaps a billion and a half dollars. If the Government cannot raise that money by extra taxes, by selling Government bonds to people who will pay for them out of their savings, it will take it out of the banking system, and that is inflation.

It is not difficult, honourable senators, tc prove that the banking system took most of the $1,111,000,000 of additional market debt of Canada from the end of July, 1957 to January 7, 1959, the last data available to us from the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada. It is true that the general public has begun lately to buy a little more of this debt, but what is the significance of the non-bank or general public disinvestment in Canada's money contract securities? Why did the private investors and institutions with genuine savings not buy? Because, on balance, the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks absorbed (1), the increase in gross debt; (2), the disinvestment by Government accounts, and (3), the disinvestment by the non-bank public.

I should like at this point to have permission to include in Hansard a statistical summary dealing with this problem of non-bank disinvestment. The source is the Bank of Canada financial supplement, 1957, and the latest statistical summary, which appeared for December, 1958. With your permission I will now place it on the record.

What is the meaning, honourable senators, of this absorption of Government bonds by the banking system, that is, by those able to create new deposits and cause a further enlargement of our money supply?

Everybody, including the Prime Minister himself, admits that the investors outside the banking system have largely lost the habit of buying Government bonds, and that to convince them that they should do so is a major task which will take time. At this point I venture to suggest that this convincing must be substantiated by some kind of commitment that inflation will not in effect dilute the value of the money which Canadians will one day receive in settlement for the bonds they are being encouraged and exhorted to buy now. Canadians are far shrewder than that.

Let us review briefly the story of federal Government finance from March 31, 1946 to March 31, 1958. We have had budgets with nine surpluses and three modest deficits. The surpluses exceeded the deficits by approximately $2¼ billion, which net credit was used to reduce our debt from $16¾ billion to approximately $14¼ billion.

In one year, for current deficits alone, we have spent over one-fourth of this total net surplus. If we take into consideration our overall deficit in the fiscal year 1958-59—which is a much more valid measure—in one year we have spent over one-half of the total net surplus which we had husbanded so patiently during the preceding 12 years. In one year our deficit exceeds the net surpluses of the preceding eight years. In one single year we have reached budgetary expenditures approximately 14 per cent higher than the anticipated revenues, and with no end in sight.

Does Canada's newest spending program, for 1959-60, have other than these financial implications: (1), another huge budgetary deficit; (2), more borrowings at a time when the loss of public confidence in Government bonds is reflected in high interest rates;

Freely admitting that the fiscal policies of the Government are reflections of the wishes of the Canadian people as interpreted and encouraged by political leaders, we must however admit that we are probably faced with (1), record peacetime deficits, and no signs of reduction in federal spending; and (2), further monetary expansion, because of our unwillingness or inability to finance these record peacetime deficits through the current savings of the non-bank public.

How are we planning to neutralize the inflationary effects of the already swollen money supply, if our potential deficit financing will probably increase this money supply still more?

So I must join the melancholy and painful chorus of those who are seriously concerned with the inflationary effects of the order and the kind of deficit financing we now have and can foresee in the future. For, although deficit financing through the non-bank investment public has a neutral effect on money supply, because it transfers money from the private to the public sector, bank-type financing "artificially" increases money supply, permitting the bank system to use the bonds as deposits or reserves to create additional bank deposits, on the well-known principle of multiple expansion".

Does not this American analogy describe rather neatly our present fiscal and monetary situation vis-à-vis inflationary presesures? I quote from an article entitled "The Treasury's Windfall" in the Wall Street Journal of August 5, 1958:

> If the Treasury is unable to meet its needs in an eroding bond market—and that, as the statistics show, is the situation today—it has only one choice. The Government's Treasury must turn to the central bank, the Federal Reserve System. But the Federal Reserve System can supply funds of this magnitude by, in effect, manufacturing it out of nothing. In bald terms, the money must be printed.
> So this is what we are fast coming to. Because of inflation the Treasury cannot borrow from the public. Unable to get dollars from the public it must get them from the central bank. The central bank produces them by inflation. Then the new inflation proceeds to erode even more the source of public funds, forcing the Treasury next time to get still more of its dollars from the central bank. And so on ad infinitum.

At this point I should again like to have permission to have included in Hansard a rather lengthy table which I have prepared to indicate the relationships of our money supply to the gross national product after World War II, that is from 1946 to 1958. I recognize that the choice of 1946 as a baseline for comparisons presents some statistical problems, because it focuses our analysis at a point of time when our money supply was already seriously inflated by wartime financing. I believe, however, that this table may have value for reference purposes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is this based, may I ask, on Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Hon. Mr. Wall: Yes, it is. The table is as follows:

Now, if it is already true that the Government's fiscal arrangements for financing its public policies and projects involving, as they do, spending of a "locked-in-long-term" type have been almost exclusively through bank financing, is it equally true that we have already built up a great reserve of spending power with banks in a highly liquid position with enormous holdings of Government bonds that they can turn into cash in order to accommodate demands for credit? Why are so many responsible men warning us about the dangers of this situation which apparently presents us with alarming prospects of accelerated inflationary pressures? I would like to know whether these dangers are already very real without the further complication of the newest spending program I have mentioned. And, if they are, what can the Government do to contend with and to restrain the probable inflationary effects? Does this so-called potentially explosive situation mean that the Bank of Canada will be called upon to impose upon the private sector of the economy restraining controls perhaps in the form of higher interest rates and a smaller or directed volume of borrowings? Are these restraints to apply also to the public sector of our economy?

What have we done in the past, and how have these measures worked out? Are we facing an imperative need not only for higher taxes but for tighter money? At this point I have to digress and pursue these concepts of tight money and easy money, for I have found them difficult to pin down, even from a definitional point of view.

I need hardly stress what sport there has been during the past few years in what I may term the semantical manipulation of the concept of tight money, and I confess that I am not sure what exactly we do mean by it.

Do we mean administrative intervening in or regulation of the flow of borrowed funds to certain sectors of our economy, thereby interfering, if you will, with the freely-operating forces of supply and demand?

I ask this question in the light of sharp criticisms made by the Minister of Finance about the unjust distribution of the effects of former tight money policy. As reported on page 1163 of Hansard of the other house on November 14, 1957, the minister said:

> The tight money policy made its effects felt more severely with respect to house construction than perhaps in any other sector of the Canadian economy, unless it be in its effect on small business and credit to the agriculturalist.

I ask this question in the light of sharp 1956 Report of the Bank of Canada, pages 33 to 36, recounts efforts made by the Bank of Canada to alter the distribution of credit from the channels in which the market was disposed to carry it, following the dictates of supply and demand.

Perhaps by tight money we mean an insufficiency in the total amount of money available to our private and public economy. In this particular context, I am mindful of the rather striking feature of the 1957 Report of the Bank of Canada which gave data to show that as economic conditions softened after mid-August, 1957, "the money supply was expanded rapidly" with "total currency and chartered bank deposits" rising by $486 million or approximately 4 per cent. There appears, also, to be an implication in this 1957 report that the supply of money is an important determinant of interest rates and that this increase in the supply of money helped the then decline in interest rates.

If, therefore, easy money means a greater plentifulness of total currency and chartered bank deposits—and I am now thinking of the very great increase in our money supply in 1958—then I must confess that I am at a loss concerning the steady rise in our interest rates during the latter part of 1958.

Or do we mean by tight money high interest rates, that is dearer or more expensive money? If so, one could also ask who or what is responsible for higher interest rates or dearer money?

We immediately face this basic question; Are our interest rates not the result of the interplay of basic economic factors of supply and demand, plus the effects of interest rates in the United States, the United Kingdom and elsewhere, wherever large amounts of Canadian fixed securities are held?

Be that as it may, it may be of some significance if I point out that the relative levels of interest rates back at the time when tight money was the subject of public debate, say. August or November, 1957, and now are strangely comparable. If we had tight money then in the high-interest sense, what have we now when, for example, the latest issue of the City of Montreal 20-year debentures was floated at a net cost of 5.73 per cent; when, for example, short-term 13-month and 21½-month Government of Canada bonds are being issued at prices to yield respectively 4.76 per cent and 4.94 per cent? And who is now to blame?

I submit for your consideration the following bid prices of sample Canadian and provincial bonds:

	Aug. 2, 1957	Nov. 1, 1957	Feb. 25, 1958
Canada 3¼% 1976	$86.00	$89.75	$83.75
C.N.R. 3% 1966	87.00	90.50	90.00
Ontario 3% 1970	81.25	81.50	84.00
Ontario Hydro 4% 1976	87.00	81.00	88.50

I also submit for your consideration the fact that the current interest rate on the 91-day treasury bill borrowings is 3.78 per cent, just about the highest since the fall of 1957. Less than a year ago 91-day treasury bills were sold at an interest rate of 1.12 per cent. So in seven months this rate has more than tripled. The current Bank of Canada interest rate is 4.03 per cent, as compared with its record high, in August 1957, of 4.33 per cent.

Incidentally, the present American treasury bill rate is 2.80 per cent, and the Federal Reserve Bank interest rate is 2.5 per cent; and I wonder whether this differential may mean increased Canadian borrowings in the United States.

Honourable senators will understand why I am perturbed by this question: What degree of tighter money in this interest-rate sense are we likely to experience in the days that lie ahead? I shall not pursue this point any further, except to add that it seems important for our study of inflation to deal with the definitions and the problems of "tight" and "easy" money, and to establish their relationships to this overall problem of price increases or inflation.

Could it be that the Canadian public is anticipating still higher interest rates and more monetary inflation? For why has the equity-stocks market really loosed its moorings from all reasonable price-earnings ratios? What does the unexplainable bullish behaviour of the stock market really show? Are we to infer that the Canadian investors, be they individual or institutional, really expect such a tremendous upsurge in earnings, profits and dividends? Or does the behaviour of the market mean that Canadian investors are literally scrambling for equity securities because their psychology is alarmingly inflation-conscious? Now that the main estimates are known, have their fears been assuaged concerning further large scale deficit financing—perhaps for many years? And how? They wonder! Will there be further monetary expansion of the kind we have experienced since August 1957? If so, who is going to pay the greater part of the burden of this hidden, iniquitous tax?

May I remind honourable senators once again of the thousands of imprisoned creditors with their real savings in pension funds, annuities, insurance policies, savings certificates; and of the thousands on other fixed salaries and payments, be they from governments or from their former savings?

I commend to the attention of honourable senators these pertinent questions asked of the United States Government by a Mr. Henry Hazlitt in Newsweek, August 18, 1958:

> It is time to ask some blunt questions of the Congress and the Administration. Do you expect the debt to be paid off? Do you ever intend even to reduce it? If so, at what rate? Under what conditions? Are the conditions likely to be realized? Do you intend to pay off either principal or interest of even present (48 per cent) purchasing power, or do you mean to keep short-changing the Government's creditors by further depreciation?

I am nearing the end of my argumentation through which I wish to register in unequivocal terms my sincere and urgent plea or proposition that the Senate of Canada institute a comprehensive, organized inquiry into inflation and all its relative and attendant problems. And when we have the findings, both in their historical retrospect and in their current manifestations, let us give them wide circulation so that every Canadian will know.

For I believe that Canadians do not willingly subscribe to a fatalistic, psychological attitude that inflation is inevitable. Rather do I believe that Canadians reject the basic notion that creeping inflation is desirable or even acceptable. I venture to guess that the average Canadian, knowing something about technological advances and improvements in our productive capacities, believes that real growth and sustained employment can be attained minus a rising price level and plus a declining price level. I believe that the average Canadian expects that the forces of competition and the responsible restraint in price and wage policies by industry and by labour should prevent prices from rising, and that if these prove inadequate, then the full force of public attention must be directed on policies which would achieve this desirable end, so that all may share in our gains of productivity, and so that all may carry the burden of losses in productivity, whenever these may occur, on an equitable basis. I believe that Canadians do not live by the misguided illusion that we can get more out of our economy than we put into it, or that we can consume more than we can produce. I believe that Canadians will realistically face monetary and fiscal policies wedded to the principle that we should at least pay our current day-to-day expenditures out of current revenues, rather than live beyond our means on the kind of credit arrangements whose burdens are inequitably shared because they involve inflation.

I am reinforced in my conviction that in the most realistic and most productive manner possible the Parliament of Canada should proceed immediately on a comprehensive study of inflation and its attendant problems by what has taken place in the United Kingdom, where industrial production also has greatly increased, where the relative level of unemployment has been lower than ours, but where there has also been one great failure, the failure to keep prices from rising. There, in 1957, the United Kingdom Government appointed an independent and permanent body called the Council on Prices, Productivity and Incomes. What to me is most significant is the fact that the United Kingdom Government recognized the existence of the basic problem of inflation, and proceeded to set up the kind of machinery it deemed best suited to its needs, to find out what are the facts and what are the possible avenues through which a just solution could be achieved.

I am advised that by an executive order dated January 22, 1959 the President of the United States created a cabinet committee on activities affecting prices and costs. In establishing the committee the President said:

> Although the Government has many programs that affect prices and costs including, of course, procurement, there is now no central mechanism for following their current operation to see whether they are being conducted in so far as possible in line with the need for reasonable stability of prices and costs. This newly established committee will provide such a mechanism.

And further:

> We need to make sure that we are not contributing to the nation's inflationary problem by the way in which we run our Government business.

In the context of these interesting developments in the United Kingdom and in the United States, and because we in Canada are also widely disturbed and perturbed by current inflationary pressures, I am convinced that we should initiate this comprehensive and organized inquiry into this national problem. We should attempt to seek out and to collate the best informed opinions concerning this present problem. These opinions should and must be supported by valid economic data. I believe that the Senate of Canada could and would render an important service to the people of Canada if it were to initiate and carry out this type of an inquiry with its own resources, which are not inconsiderable.

For all these reasons, perhaps imperfectly and inadequately expressed, I respectfully move, seconded by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard):

> That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada:
> That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, in rising to second the resolution that has been so ably moved by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) I may say at the outset that he has covered the subject-matter of the resolution so comprehensively and so well that my remarks can be comparatively brief. But there are two points that I should like to stress. The first of them is that this is a subject not only of importance but of deep public concern throughout Canada at the present time. My second point is that I know of no better forum for the study of this important subject than a committee of this house of Parliament.

Now, dealing with my first point, that is the importance of the subject and the great concern being felt about it: All of us have been reading in the press statements by persons in responsible positions warning us of the dangers of inflation. In a previous debate the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) quoted this remark made by Mr. James Muir, the Chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada, at the bank's annual meeting:

> I believe chronic inflation is the greatest single threat to Canada's economic development.

I think it is only right that we should add the voice of the Bank of Montreal to that of the Royal Bank. At the annual meeting of the Bank of Montreal its President, Mr. Gordon R. Ball, referred to the "treadmill of inflation". He said:

> Let us resolve and work together, then, to stop this treadmill of inflation, for it is a race in which one must run to keep even, and a race that nobody wins.

In addition to the bankers, life insurance executives have dealt with inflation at their annual meetings. The honourable senator from Inkerman quoted also Mr. E. C. Gill, President of the Canada Life Assurance Company. May I add this remark made by Mr. A. S. Upton, President of Dominion Life Insurance Company of the city of Waterloo, Ontario, at the company's annual meeting on February 17:

> A national crusade must be started to defeat inflation.

And turning to the industrial field, one of our leading industrials, Rhys M. Sale, President of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, speaking to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce at Fort William, said:

> Inflation is a mighty problem. It is the termite that can bring our economic house down around our ears. Nothing short of war could pose a greater threat to Canada's future.

Now, those are very serious words, and I quote them as illustrations of the deep concern that is being felt throughout Canada. Obviously these gentlemen are not referring to some theoretical or abstract proposition; they are dealing with the practical realities of our economic situation today. Such statements must cause every thinking person to stop, to ponder and to ask, "Are these opinions valid, and if so what should we do about it?"

It is true that there are others who are not so alarmed as those whose opinions I have quoted. There are always some individuals who stand to gain during a period of inflation regardless of what may be the overall effect upon our economy. Then there are others who, although they may dislike inflation, have come to believe that what they call a mild inflation or a creeping inflation may be a lesser evil than adoption of measures necessary to combat inflation, which might have some obnoxious results, and in particular might cause unemployment. Such thinking has been evidenced to some extent in the United States.

Then there are others who believe that an expanding economy such as ours must almost inevitably have some inflation, and they point to the fact that for over 20 years or more we have had some inflation in Canada. As to the last group, those who believe that some inflation is inevitable, I would like to put on the record some remarks made by a gentleman who has one of the finest minds in Canada, one of the men whose opinion we respect the most, Mr. Graham Towers. Speaking not apropos of the present situation, but dealing generally with the subject of inflation, in an address he gave in November, 1957, he said this:

> Nowadays, when so many people seem to have the impression that the value of money has been going down in war and in peace for many generations and that there is something inevitable about the process, I think it is worth while to remember that this has not in fact been the case in countries which have any claim to fiscal and monetary responsibility except as an adjustment to the financial consequences of war.

Then he quoted from the London Economist these words:

> The proposition that inflation is inevitable is not an acknowledgement of economic determinism, but a political judgment that the will to control it has disappeared.

Dealing with the group who prefer a mild inflation rather than the possibility of unemployment, which, they fear, might come from measures taken to combat inflation, I would like to emphasize the remarks made by my honourable colleague, that in Canada, where so much of our national production is for export purposes, it is difficult to see how we can reconcile any policy of mild inflation with a goal of full employment. Our export trade is dependent upon stability of prices. So a gradually rising level of internal prices makes it difficult for us to compete in world markets, and therefore to the extent that internal inflation prices us out of world markets we are bound to create unemployment.

It is not only our Canadian businessmen who have spoken of their concern on this subject of inflation in Canada. Competent observers outside Canada, men who are free from the influences and possible biases to which we who are in the midst of our own difficulties may be subject, have also expressed concern about our situation. I have two quotations to illustrate that point. The first is from the London Times, an editorial comment on its financial page, wherein it said:

> The recent retreat of the Canadian dollar would therefore seem to reflect the rather pessimistic view being taken in New York and elsewhere of Canada's inflationary economy.

The other quotation is from the Manchester Guardian, a well-known English paper. An editorial in its issue of February 14 had this to say:

> Canada has been since the war one of the most rapidly developing free countries in the world, and her natural resources make her future economic potential almost boundless. But she is approaching a dangerous cross-roads. Too few of her leaders seem to appreciate, or to be willing to give public warning of her growing monetary and financial problems.

The editorial concludes with these serious words:

> A devaluation of the Canadian dollar may be one part of the solution, much though it will hurt Canadian pride. But the only real step forward will be to stop Canadian internal inflation.

Those are strong words. We must all be concerned when responsible opinions at home and abroad voice such sentiments. It is not relevant to this motion whether you or I agree with those opinions, either in part or in whole. The point is they add up to a weight and volume of evidence that makes a case that must be heard.

That brings me to my second point, that a committee of this house of Parliament provides, in my opinion, the best forum for hearing evidence and advice from all sections of the Canadian public on this threat of inflation and for the study and consideration of such evidence and reporting thereon. It is one of the functions of Parliament to inquire into such matters of importance, and this house is, I think, particularly well equipped in its personnel and from its experience to undertake the work.

It is true, of course, that the Bank of Canada and the Executive of our Government have their responsibilities in this matter, and so have our provincial and municipal Governments; and indeed, if inflation really threatens, so have Canadian businessmen, and so have all of us. But it requires some focal point, some such body as a committee of this Senate, to be a forum where the opinions and facts can be gathered together, considered, weighed and sifted, where public understanding and appreciation of the problem can be created, and, if necessary, where public support can be enlisted for whatever steps are required to combat any inflation that may threaten us.

Traditionally, committees of the Senate have a reputation for hearings where important matters are studied with care and deliberation, with open minds, without prejudice or partisanship, where witnesses are heard with courtesy and attention, and where the interests of the country as a whole are the paramount consideration. We have in this chamber men and women from all parts of Canada and from all walks of life, experienced in public affairs and in business, and competent to consider and to deal with this problem.

I believe that in adopting this resolution and in carrying out the work of the committee we can make a very worth-while contribution to the economic well-being of Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. L. Beaubien: With leave, I move the third reading now.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, this is a bill to which I raised some objection. I am not objecting to passage of the bill and I have no special reason to take a personal interest in it, but honourable senators will remember that before the bill was given second reading I called attention to section 14, which provides that documents for the transfer of real estate may be signed by the lawful attorney of an authorized officer of the corporation. I said I thought it was pretty bad conveyancing to allow an officer of a corporation, who is authorized to sign such deeds, to have it done by his lawful attorney. I understand that the bill came before the committee this morning and the committee decided to take no action in this matter. It appears that the same section has been used in a number of incorporations of a similar character over the years, and so I shall make no objection to the passing of this bill. The provision is not too important, although I think it is not good legislation. That was my only reason for speaking to it.

I understand there is before us a similar bill of which the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) is the sponsor. I shall raise no objection if he wishes to have it passed in this form, although I think he would be well advised to strike out the provision for signature by the attorney of an authorized officer of the corporation.

I think a good many honourable senators agree with the point I am making, and I shall not withdraw my objection if a bill is presented in this form in the future. However, I rather fancy that the officers of the Senate who are charged with the duty of scrutinizing legislation as it comes before us will in future take care of the matter. On that understanding I am satisfied to let this bill pass.

Hon. Gustave Monette: Honourable senators, when the bill was before the house on second reading I asked whether its powers were sufficient to provide for continuity of life of the corporation, or whether it would become extinct upon the death of the last survivor of the three incorporators. Since that time I have satisfied myself that the bill as presented, together with the general law, provides sufficiently for the continuity of this corporation. I am now in favour of passage of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I make one further explanation?

The bill gives authority to the corporation and its officers to execute documents transferring land. That of course is ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the provinces and we have no business whatever to legislate along those lines. So, objection was raised to it. However, it has been explained to me by our own officers that section 14, which authorizes the execution of documents, contains the words "if executed within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada". The reference, therefore, must be only to the Northwest Territories and to the Yukon, and the law in the provinces is not affected. That is sufficient explanation of a section which would otherwise be highly objectionable. Hence, I have no objection on that ground either.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 3, 1959, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 24, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, a few days ago one of my colleagues who sits not too far from me expressed the opinion that speeches on the Address were a waste of time, because nobody paid any attention to them. I think he might have said the same thing about almost all other speeches that are made in the Senate—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Except yours.

Hon. Mr. Euler: —because in a rather long experience I have found that very little attention is paid by the powers that be, including Governments past and present, to what senators have to say. In fact, I think I could count on the fingers of one hand—not including the thumb—pieces of legislation of public importance—I refer to public bills—initiated in the Senate which have reached the state of law and been incorporated into our statutes. It may be that the conception of the Senate as a body merely for examination of legislation that comes from the other house, and the introduction of private bills such as those to incorporate insurance companies and trust companies, and bills of divorce, is the right one, and that this should be its whole function. But if that is not so, and if members of the Senate desire to make an impact on the Government, they can do so only by influencing public opinion; and it seems to me, since I think that not one person out of a thousand reads the Senate Hansard, that the influencing of public opinion can be done only through the press. That, I submit, is pretty nearly a hopeless situation. For example, about three weeks ago Senator Hugessen made a notable and excellent speech on the finances of this country. Not one word of it appeared in a self-styled great national newspaper. The same is true of the speeches made by Senator Thorvaldson and Senator Robertson some time ago, and the outstanding address made yesterday by Senator Wall received exactly four lines in the morning paper.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A great deal of attention was paid to a speech you made on margarine not too long ago.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That was because my motion was defeated, I think.

The chief problems concerning the Canadian people at this time include those of unemployment, strikes, the cancellation of the Arrow, which is a temporary one, the huge deficits which the country is experiencing and which bid fair to continue for perhaps a good many years, and finally the problem of inflation.

I am not going to discuss inflation. One of my reasons for not doing so is that I do not feel I am quite qualified to discuss it in the same way as Senator Wall did yesterday. I fully approve of his suggestion that the subject-matter be referred to a committee. He discussed what the various causes of inflation might be, and if I were to say anything about it at all I would say that the fundamental cause of most of our trouble, including inflation and the high cost of living, is the fact that we have gone through two world wars and are preparing for still another. It seems to me it is an anomaly that a country is prosperous when it is either fighting a war or preparing to fight one, for what it is making or producing is for purposes of destruction, and in the end this cannot be good for the country itself.

I would like to speak for a moment about Canada's deficit. It is now calculated to be some $600 million to $800 million, but the amount will vary according to the statements that may be presented. How should we deal with the deficit? Three suggestions have been offered. One is to increase taxes. Another is to increase the national debt by deficit financing. The third suggestion, which to me is the most reasonable one, is to try to live within our means and not spend as much as we have been spending, for we definitely cannot afford it.

I will discuss briefly the idea of increasing taxes. I said last year or the year before that to increase taxes further seemed to me a very objectionable way of raising money, for if they were raised much higher we would soon reach the point of diminishing returns. Suppose you increase corporation taxes, for example. They are high now, being something like 50 per cent. Any increase in them, unless absorbed by the corporations themselves—and I am not here to argue on their behalf—would of necessity add to the cost and sale prices of their products. To some extent this sort of thing is destroying our foreign markets, which are so necessary for Canada. On the other hand, if the corporations absorbed the added tax burden it would decrease their profits and they would pay a smaller profits tax to the Government. Likewise, if they decreased the dividends to their shareholders, the shareholders would have less money with which to pay income tax. So it seems to me that if the tax were increased it would very soon lead, as I have said, to the point of diminishing returns.

Now I come to the suggestion to increase the national debt. I read that one prominent Canadian the other day described the proposal as a very simple one. He said: "You increase the taxes or you increase the debt or both. It is just as simple as that." Well, to increase the debt now is a pretty difficult proposition. As my friend the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) said yesterday, it seems to be impossible now to get ordinary men and women who have small savings to put their money into Government bonds. I believe it is a fact that on the occasion of the conversion of the $6 billion of Victory bonds a good many of the bonds remained in the hands of the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and such investing institutions as insurance companies. We know that, as I think was mentioned yesterday, these bonds are obtainable on the market at a discount of something like 5 or 6 per cent. As to the latest issue, which was for only a short period, the Government of Canada must sell them at such a price as to give a yield of nearly 5 per cent. This is an unfortunate situation. I am inclined to feel sorry for the person or Government that has to deal with it. Even now the interest on our bonded indebtedness is $680 million, which is more than twice what we spent for all purposes before the first war. According to the estimates, the budget this year will be in excess of $6,000 million. I put it that way because it is more striking than if you say $6 billion. The defence expenditures are estimated at $1,700 million, which again is an increase of $100 million over last year. And this is in peacetime. Since the last war we have spent enough money for defence purposes to pay off the national debt, build perhaps 100,000 houses and do far more than has been done on the Trans-Canada Highway and other worth-while projects. I am reminded of a discussion that took place when I was a member of the House of Commons and Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, with the Conservatives in office. We were talking about the national debt, which at that time was only about $4 billion. We thought the burden was a crushing one and that we could not bear any more, and I suggested, not in jest but not very seriously, that the big taxpayers of Canada might like to pay off the national debt by a capital levy. I felt that way myself. The only difficulty is that if you paid off the national debt the Government, as in the past, would probably start another one.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Not many persons who have spoken about our national problems have suggested reducing expenditures. An editorial that appeared some days ago in the Ottawa Journal criticized those who suggested reducing expenditures. In effect, it said, "Not one of those persons suggesting the reduction of expenditures has suggested in what manner this should be done". A list was given of expenditures on a number of items, including: defence, $1,700 million; public debt charges, $680 million; old age pensions, $577 million; family allowances, $495 million; and old age assistance, $32 million. I was rather surprised at that last item, because I thought the amount was a good deal higher. The article more or less castigated those who suggested making reductions without saying where they should be made, and it challenged anyone to say where they could be made. I should like to make a few comments on this.

Take, for instance, old age assistance. I am in favour of that. I am receiving it myself, so why wouldn't I be in favour of it? But why in the world should anyone who does not need old age assistance receive it? The same comment holds good of family allowances, which amount to a large sum, $495 million. I am not going to express any opinion at present on the merits of family allowances, but I will say this, that in the olden days when a man produced a family he pretty well expected to take care of it himself, and not have it cared for by the taxpayer. While I am not trying for one moment to make a case against family allowances, I cannot see why parents who are able to take care of their own children should not do so, or why both rich and poor should be paid $5 to $8 a month for every child, whether the money is needed or not.

As to public debt charges, I admit that a government cannot do very much about them. We cannot very well repudiate our indebtedness, though some day we might come to that. If we continue to increase our debt charges, it might mean that the Government will ask the holders of bonds to take a lower interest rate. I hope that will not happen, for it would be rather unfortunate.

Now I come to the largest item of all, defence, which amounts to $1 billion 700 million. I think this is where we could effect a very great saving, for the simple reason that the weapons and so on for which we are voting the money could not defend us. I will deal with that a little later. I merely say now that a great deal is wasted.

I will revert to the Arrow for a moment. While the present situation is a temporary one and everyone must regret the effect upon those who have lost their jobs, I hope we never adopt the philosophy that will permit or promote the spending of Government money for purposes of destruction, or for useless or wasteful purposes, merely for the sake of providing employment. I support the Prime Minister in the action that he took. As a matter of fact, I wrote him a letter approving his action. I think he did the right thing, and it must have been a difficult thing to do. The only criticism I have—and perhaps it is not a strong one—is that he might have made it clear last fall that the Arrow was going to be dropped, and so have relieved us of all uncertainty with regard to the matter.

Now I am going to come back to the one item of defence expenditure which I say is in a great measure a waste. My reason for saying so is that the whole aspect of war and defence has changed since the coming of the intercontinental missile, against which there is no defence. I could produce a great deal of evidence in the form of statements by officers, public men and others, who know that is the fact. I think it is generally acknowledged. I will not take up much time in trying to prove it, but will read from an article dealing with a statement made by General Simonds on November 3, 1958, at Montreal. The article says:

> He expressed the belief that Canada's projected defence expenditures outlined in the federal budget are more than the country can afford.

That is what interested me from the first.

The article goes on to say:

> "I don't believe," he said, "there is any sense in expending large sums of money on a defence which cannot be really effective in any event."
> The combination of radar detection lines—

I see the Americans are now generously offering to take over those radar lines, which I think were a waste of money, in the first place.

> —and interceptor fighters had a reasonable chance of offering defence in the period of the atomic bomb. But it lost its validity the day the H-bomb became a reality.

In the letter I wrote to the Prime Minister some time ago I urged him not to go on with the Arrow, as we call it. I thought it would be just throwing good money after bad, as the Arrow could not discharge the purpose for which it was intended, of intercepting the intercontinental bomb. The bomb could come from Russia in a period of 20 minutes and no one could stop it. After General Norstad, head of NATO in Europe, completed his address to a joint sitting of members of both chambers last year, I had the privilege of speaking to him for a few minutes. It was just about the time that the first Russian Sputnik had been put into orbit. I said to him: "Apparently the Russians have proved that they have the power to send a missile practically anywhere in the world, certainly anywhere in North America. Now, if they have the number of intercontinental missiles they claim to have, and are able to pinpoint targets and hit any place in North America, say any large city, what defence is there against the missiles?" The General's reply was, "There is no defence."

Honourable senators, it is not necessary to describe what another war would do, but I would like to read the opening sentence of a dispatch from Washington:

> Washington: Some 160,000,000 persons—almost 90 per cent of the total U.S. population—could be killed in an effective hydrogen bomb attack on 150 major American cities, it was estimated in testimony made public by a congressional committee.

That estimate may seem like an exaggeration, but apparently it is more or less authoritative.

I have some hesitation in reading an article from the Financial Post, but I will do so. This is from the issue of August 16, 1958:

> In a world filled with fatuous nonsense and double-talk, it is tragic that the subject of defence brings out the most foolishness.

I assure the house there is no party politics in this.

> Last week Canada's Defence Minister told the House of Commons: "We have an adequate defence to meet the possible attack of today."
> That just isn't so. Such a statement blandly ignores the fact that it requires only one plane, carrying a thermonuclear bomb, to get through our defences and wipe out any one of our major cities.

The writer goes on to say how it would be possible for a Russian bomb, or a number of Russian bombs, to come across to America and wipe out American cities. In addition to that, we are told that the Russians have something like 500 submarines, and they can approach our coasts, remain submerged and fire their missiles from beneath the water. I think there is no doubt about it that they could destroy all the cities on the Atlantic coast, and that intercontinental missiles could wipe out the rest of the American cities, and of course Canadian cities as well. What the Russians would do with America if they destroyed its cities, I do not know.

On the other hand, while NATO, and we will say the Americans, have not the long-range bomb that the Russians have, they do have a bomb with a sufficiently long range to destroy the Russian cities. Surrounding Russia, and especially in Western Europe, NATO has something like 400 airfields supplied with bombers and the atomic bomb, from which they could reach and destroy any part of Russia.

The point I want to make is simply this: If it is possible for both sides to destroy each other, is it not suicidal for us to continue to try to defend ourselves against something that is indefensible? Another war would mean world suicide.

We say that we will never start a war. President Eisenhower says he will never start a war. I do not know whether he can count on his Secretary of State to say the same thing. Prime Minister Khrushchev has said repeatedly that the Soviets will never start a war. You may say we cannot trust Mr. Khrushchev. Perhaps we cannot, but I will say that he is not altogether foolish. Realizing, as he must, that Russia itself would be destroyed if he started a war, he surely has the common sense not to do it.

If the world would get over its war hysteria—I almost said mass insanity—what would be the common sense thing to do? Would it not be to get together and decide there shall not be, and must not be, another war. As I have said before, we must have co-existence or else there will be no existence.

I am glad to see that the Prime Minister of Great Britain is at present in Russia conferring with the Russian Prime Minister. He may not have any success. We have read in the press recently something to the effect they are not getting along any too well. I do not attach too much importance to what the newspapers say with regard to that. He has at least started something that may lead to tangible results, and I wish him well. This getting together is the first logical and sensible thing that has been done by our side. I have no hesitation in saying that the foreign policy of the United States has been not only stupid but dangerous to a high degree.

Why should we not live in peace with Russia? We did it before, when Russia had an autocratic government. Russia belongs to the United Nations, and China also should belong, in my opinion. We have a socialist Government in western Canada, and we are gradually becoming socialistic. The federal Government owns the Canadian National Railways, runs the post office, pays mothers' allowances, old age pensions, and so on. Ontario owns a great hydro-electric power system, operated as a socialistic undertaking, and some of the provinces own their telephone and telegraph systems. They all run a liquor business. Municipalities own most of their public utilities. So, we are going pretty far in the direction of socialism.

I have never been able to understand entirely the difference between socialism and communism. It used to be said that the socialist was willing to bring about socialism by persuasion, but that the communist was ready to fight for communism. We hear now that Mr. Khrushchev is objecting to the speed with which China is heading into communism. Karl Marx said that socialism was the first step toward communism. Well, if it is just a step toward communism they must certainly be of the same nature.

There is another reason, in my opinion, why the Russians would be very foolish to go to war: they are winning the cold war now; they are expanding all the time. As long as we carry on the cold war we shall be wasting our substance in producing useless weapons, because we could not defend ourselves against the intercontinental bomb. To my mind, the great peril from Russia now is not an atomic war, but an industrial war, and it will be pretty hard for the Western nations to fight Russia under the circumstances. She has tremendous natural resources, her scientists are probably just as good as ours, and wages and production costs are not as high in Russia as in Canada and the United States. What Mr. Khrushchev is saying now is: "We are going to compete with you, we are going to attack you on the lines of industry." So, instead of wasting our substance in useless expenditures, let us prepare to meet the danger which may very soon become a real one—competition in the industrial field from Russia and probably China.

Now, honourable senators, I have almost completed my remarks, but I want to leave with you one suggestion: I believe it to be true of the Western nations that Canada stands higher in point of influence than any other country with the exception of the United States and Great Britain, and perhaps France and Western Germany. Sometimes we may have a rather exaggerated idea of our importance, but perhaps in many ways that is not a bad thing in these days, if not carried to extremes.

During the recent election campaign the present Prime Minister called upon the people of Canada to catch a vision of what her future might be, especially in the development of our great northland, and his eloquence and fervor made an impression on the Canadian people. I wish that Mr. Diefenbaker would catch a still greater vision, a vision of a world of enduring peace, a vision of what he as Prime Minister of Canada could do if he took the initiative in urging a meeting at the Summit, perhaps with the assistance of the United Nations, a gathering of the heads of nations, for the making of an agreement that will outlaw war, for the suppression of the suicidal bomb, for an agreement to live and let live, for an agreement for co-existence, lest there be no existence at all.

The opportunity is now. Let the Prime Minister seize it, and he may go down in history as the man who took the lead in preventing annihilation of the human race. That is for him an enviable privilege and a solemn duty.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, debate adjourned.

INFLATION

On the order for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time time.—(Honourable Senator Thorvaldson).

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I move that debate on this motion be further adjourned until Tuesday next, March 3, and that it be the first order for that day.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 3, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thursday next.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill to amend the National Housing Act be placed on the Order Paper for second reading tomorrow and that it appear as the first order thereon. I may say that there is coming to us from the other house a very heavy program of legislation, which will have to be considered before the Easter adjournment—about ten or twelve bills in addition to the four that we have before us now. In view of the possibility that some honourable senators may want this bill to be referred to a committee for consideration I would like to have the second reading stage of the bill commence tomorrow afternoon, in the hope that we will be able to finish with all these measures before the Easter adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Farris: When will the Easter adjournment start?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend if he can give the house any information about the Easter adjournment?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, as far as I can ascertain, the adjournment of the Senate should start between the 20th and the 25th of March, and I am hoping that it will be for at least two weeks or perhaps a little longer.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following document:

Report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada dated December 1958, entitled: "Personnel Administration in the Public Service". (French text).

PRIVATE BILLS

PACIFIC STANDARD LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen presented Bill S-12, to incorporate Pacific Standard Life Insurance Company.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Thursday of this week.

CANADIAN GENERAL COUNCIL OF BOY SCOUTS ASSOCIATION—FIRST READING

Hon. Norman P. Lambert presented Bill S-13, respecting The Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Honourable senators, a word of explanation of this bill at this stage may not be out of order. It is a bill that seeks to amend the act of 1914 respecting the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association, in order that certain monetary limitations on the annual value of real estate held for the use, occupation and benefit of the corporation may be removed. The purpose of the bill will be explained in detail on second reading, which I suggest should be given on Thursday. It is sufficient to say at present that the proposed legislation follows a pattern which has been adopted in bills such as one passed in 1957 relating to the Salvation Army—a pattern which, by the way, is being embodied in new bills of incorporation where expanding values of real estate constitute a problem in determining a correct or more accurate annual increase representing the assets of institutions such as this one. With these preliminary remarks, I move that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF HOLY FAMILY OF BORDEAUX—FIRST READING

Hon. Gustave Monette, for Hon. Leon Méthot, presented Bill S-14, to incorporate the Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Bordeaux.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Monette: Thursday next.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I am raising a question which I will put orally before sending it in writing to the Clerk:

How many grades, classes or classifications of salaries were there in the Civil Service of Canada each year from 1908, the year that the commission was established, until 1918, the date of the reorganization by the Griffenhagens?

I ask this because in reply to an inquiry I was told that before 1918 the Civil Service Commission had no records. I wonder if those records have been incinerated by order of the public records committee. This would be one of so many instances when it was done.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. F. W. Gershaw, for Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 126 to 139, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Bills read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: With leave, next sitting.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have answers to the five questions which were asked of me last week during the debate on the second reading of the Appropriation Bill covering the supplementary estimates. I have copies of the answers for each honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For each honourable senator in the house or for each honourable senator who asked a question?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have copies for the honourable Senator Isnor, who asked two questions, the Honourable Senator Taylor (Westmorland), the Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), the Honourable Senator Pratt and the Honourable Senator Hugessen.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Do I understand that these answers will appear in Hansard?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Apparently the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has not an answer to the question I asked during that debate. He might look it up sometime.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I read through the debate carefully and I am sorry if I missed the honourable senator's question. I will look into the matter.

With permission of the house I will place these questions and answers on Hansard:

Question by the Honourable Senator Isnor, page 207 of Hansard:

Question: Vote 710 reads as follows:

"Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council—Further amount required, $630,000".

What is the meaning of the words "prescribed by the Governor in Council", and what are those conditions as they affect the unemployment situation in Nova Scotia?

Answer: The words "under conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council" indicate that formal Regulations of the Governor in Council exist which set out the conditions under which payments may be made and the rates of payment.

The Regulations presently in effect are set out in P.C. 1958-516; P.C. 1958-518; P.C. 1958-519; P.C. 1958-20 and P.C. 1958-21.

With regard to the second part of the question (as to what effect those conditions have on the unemployment situation in Nova Scotia) changes in the regulations which have the effect of enlarging the market for Nova Scotia coal obviously have a beneficial effect on the unemployment situation in the Nova Scotia Mining Industry. Early in this fiscal year, the Government approved new regulations providing for increases in the rates of subventions to allow Nova Scotia coal to move further west of Montreal. The cost of this additional assistance gives rise to this item in these Supplementary Estimates.

Question by the Honourable Senators Isnor and Pratt, page 208 of Hansard:

Question: With regard to Vote 710—

"To whom were these payments (of coal assistance) made? Were they made to mining companies or to the railways for carrying the coal?"

Answer: The payments of subventions for the movements of coal are paid to the transportation companies. These are mainly the railway companies except the subvention for water borne coal which is paid to the Dominion Coal Company which is the charterer of the ships.

Question by the Honourable Senator Isnor, page 208 of Hansard:

Question: On the question of coal assistance for the mining area of Cape Breton:

"What are the unemployment figures today, as compared with those of last year and perhaps the year before . . . in the Cape Breton area."

Answer: The following figures represent the number of persons in receipt of Unemployment Insurance benefits and those registered as seeking employment at the Sydney and Inverness offices of the National Employment Service:

	Feb. 12, 1959	Feb. 13,1958	Feb. 14, 1957
Sydney	11,217*	6,198	4,779
Inverness	1,448	1,520	1,300
	12,665*	7,718	6,079

*Includes 4,000-5,000 coal miners on temporary lay-off during February. This one month lay-off was ordered at the end of January due to the surplus level of coal banks at that time.

Question by the Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), page 210 of Hansard:

Question: With regard to Vote 712 (Federal assistance to the provinces on forest access roads and trails):

"What proportion of the contribution to this work is paid by the provincial governments and what part by the federal government; and can the figures be produced later as to the number of people who have been employed in this work, and for how long?"

Answer: As specified in the Vote title of Item 712, the formula of assistance for this program is that the federal government pays "amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the Provinces as having been spent by them in establishing forest access roads and trails, etc."

With regard to the number of people employed in this work, it is estimated that the work involves 5,762 man-months of labour during the five month period (Nov. 1958-March 1959).

Question by the Honourable Senator Taylor (Westmorland), page 223 of Hansard:

Question: With regard to Vote 697 (Freight Assistance on Western Feed Grains) which provides a total of $2,500,000 of which $2,000,000 represents an increased amount on grain shipped and $500,000 required to meet the recent increase in freight rates:

"Does the $500,000 cover the total increase (in freight rates) or only a portion, and if so what portion?"

Answer: An amount of $500,000 was included in Vote 697 to cover all but $1 per ton of the increased price of delivered grain resulting from the 17 per cent freight rate increase. The increased freight rates took effect on December 1, 1958, and therefore affect payments made during the last four months of the present fiscal year.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I am sure we were all intensely interested in the speeches of the honourable the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) and of the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) on the subject of inflation. I wish to compliment both senators upon their excellent and well-documented speeches, although they were to some extent theoretical treatises on the subject of the inimical results of a rising commodity price level. Indeed, there are few, if any, of the statements made in those speeches dealing with the nature of the subject of inflation or of the possible bad effects of a runaway inflation that I would care to dispute. Most of the questions posed were, indeed, ones which economists have, with more or less success, been attempting to answer for a hundred years or more. Indeed, the subject-matter of price levels is a basic problem in the science of economics.

For purposes of the record, may I describe briefly the facts of our rising commodity price levels in Canada since 1939? During the six years of war the cost-of-living index went up about 10 percentage points. Between 1946 and 1948, as price controls were in the process of being removed, it shot up another 20 points. The increases then became moderate, but soon the Korean war set off another burst and the index went up again, 14 points in a year and a half; but that again was war. In the four years 1952-1955 the index was stationary, but began to move up in 1956. In that year it rose slightly less than 2 percentage points; in 1957, nearly 4 points; and in 1958, as the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg mentioned in his speech, 2½ points. So the most recent spiral began in 1956, carried on through 1957 and 1958, and according to present Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures is now reasonably stable. So in the result since 1939, a period of 20 years, the Canadian price index has risen by about 60 points, or an average of 3 percentage points per year.

It is, of course, well known that the rise in the commodity price index figures in the United States is practically identical with our own, and at the identical periods of time. In other words, their price index went up or remained stationary, as the case may be, during exactly the same periods as in Canada, and to a similar extent in each case. I think we should fully understand to begin with, therefore, that although this matter of inflation is with us a Canadian problem, it is also a continental one, where our economy appears to react in identically the same manner as the economy of the United States.

Another preliminary fact which I would like to note at this point is that there are economists and others who advocate a mild or so-called "creeping" inflation, namely, a "gently-rising price level", as a beneficial way of life. I am sure that we have all heard of Professor Sumner Slichter, of Harvard university, who is a leader of this school of thought.

I mention this fact merely to indicate the breadth and complexity of the subject of inflation itself, and the fact that there is not even agreement on the point which the mover and seconder of the motion take for granted, namely, that all or any inflation is a bad thing.

Now, surely the first thought that emerges from figures which I have recited is that if a committee of the Senate is an appropriate forum for the study of the problem of the commodity price index or the value of the dollar—both of which are included in the economic concept known as inflation—then perhaps we should have begun the study at least fourteen years ago, namely, at the close of the war. However, I would now like to give you the reasons why such a task was not even thought of as being appropriate for study by a committee of the Senate, and why such action is inappropriate now.

May I repeat the first quotation made by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall), where he quoted the President of the United States as follows:

> Inflation can be prevented. But this demands statesmanship on the part of business and labour leaders and of Government at all levels.

I agree with this statement, and I wish to amplify it in the following manner. President Eisenhower says in effect that inflation can be controlled: (1) if statesmanship is exercised by business—presumably business leaders; (2) if statesmanship is exercised by labour—presumably labour leaders; and (3) if statesmanship is exercised by Government at all levels.

The trouble is, of course, that the type or kind of statesmanship on the part of all these sections of the economy is not defined, and indeed for a very good reason. The reason is this, that although perhaps a majority of people hold the view that inflation is a bad thing, nevertheless very few economists or business leaders or labour leaders, or indeed political leaders, are agreed upon the courses that should and that can feasibly be taken to change the course of events in this sphere of the economy. For instance, many economists and bankers are convinced that deficit budgeting is an inflationary factor in our economy. These people say you must tax more, or spend less, or do both. These are problems that are dealt with in the Committee of Ways and Means in the other place, and we have of course no such procedure in this house.

I have looked at a statement of the revenues and expenditures for each fiscal year since 1867. In that year the Dominion of Canada commenced its operations with a capital expenditure which meant a deficit of $75 million. This arose from agreement with the provinces to surrender the revenue that they had previously obtained from customs, in return for which the new Dominion assumed their debts. In the years 1867 to 1902 there were only three years in which there was a surplus, and a small surplus at that in each year. Up to and including the year 1911, from the time of Confederation, there were only six years in which there was a surplus: in all other years there was a deficit, ranging as high as $45 million.

It is to be remembered also that not until the year 1900 did the total revenues of Canada reach $50 million. In 1909 the total revenue was $85½ million, and the deficit $45 million—that is the deficit of which I spoke a moment ago—which was more than half the total revenue. In 1913, under the Government of Sir Robert Borden, there was a surplus of $26.5 million, which was by far the largest surplus we had up to that time.

Then, of course, we had deficits throughout the First World War. In 1919 there was a deficit of more than $382.5 million, which was in excess of the total revenue collected in that fiscal year. In 1920, with the revenues still less than $350 million, the deficit was more than $390 million. In 1921 the deficit was more than $92 million. In 1922, under the new administration, the deficit was more than $81 million.

Then it tapered off for a number of buoyant years and we had surpluses. Next we had the depression years, the period of world-wide depression which Canada alone was helpless to correct. I find that in 1933 we had a deficit of $220.5 million, and in that year our total revenue was a little more than $311.5 million. These deficits tapered off, but in 1936 we still had a deficit of almost $160 million. Then came the war years, which need not be dealt with because the deficits, for reasons known to all of us, reached the proportions of one-half the budget. Indeed, you will recall that the deficits for some of those war years were of the order of $2.5 billion per year.

For the current fiscal year the Government has budgeted for a total revenue, excluding the Old Age Security Fund, of more than $5 billion, and it is thought that our deficit will range in the vicinity of, say $700 million. This, on a percentage basis, would be approximately 14 per cent of revenue.

In the 1930's, at the time of the world-wide depression, the deficit ran as high, as I said, as $200.5 million, against a total revenue of somewhat more than $311.5 million, or a percentage of 70 per cent of revenue. Yet, it is to be noted that at the end of the depression and despite the large budget deficits of those years, Canada's credit was maintained at the highest level it ever enjoyed.

Now, how is it that this country has taken these deficits in its stride and its credit has at all times remained high? The reason is, I think, obvious: it is because of our growing resources, the expansion of our industry and the continuous growth of our gross national product.

I have given these figures of previous deficits, not with an air of complacency, but so that we should remember that the deficit we are facing today, in view of the gross national product, is not colossal on a percentage basis and should be no cause for undue alarm. Consequently, I suggest to honourable senators that upon any investigation of the problem of inflation there is bound to be very considerable disagreement among witnesses, be they economists, bankers, businessmen or others, in regard to the overall effect of the deficit budgeting being done under present circumstances. If you have any doubt as to the validity of that statement I would refer you to the content of the book that I hold in my hand. It is a compendium of papers submitted before the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress of the United States by 47 leading economists of that country. It is dated March 31, 1958. The subject of the study is the relationship of prices to economic stability and the growth. In other words, it is a study on the subject of inflation.

I will be referring again to the work of the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress, but in any event the problem of deficit or surplus financing, or that of a balanced budget in present circumstances in this country is a political problem for which the Government of the day must assume full responsibility. Furthermore, the only people of Canada who are really competent to testify in regard to this budgetary problem are the senior officials of the Department of Finance and of the Bank of Canada, as well, perhaps, as senior economists who have made a study of this particular question. I will try to indicate in due course why it would be inappropriate to ask these officials to testify before a committee of the Senate on an inquiry of this kind.

The honourable mover (Hon. Mr. Wall) referred to the problem of, as he called it, unemployment or inflation. I quote from his remarks:

—unemployment or inflation—which do we tackle first?

He continues:

I would welcome guidance upon this point.

And he then adds:

—and this could conceivably come from the study I am suggesting—.

My answer to this is that if there should be at present prior emphasis laid on either of these elements, namely, unemployment or inflation, then such is a matter for Government consideration and decision. The fact is that the problem of price stability and employment are inseparable. And consequently, in the United States the studies made by the Joint Economic Committee of the United States Congress, which I referred to a moment ago, have been studies not in regard to inflation alone, but of inflation in relation to other factors in the economy, such as unemployment.

The honourable senator then proceeds to ask the question—the answers to which he says should be discovered by the Finance Committee—as to what factors are most to blame for inflation. He asks:

Are wage increases to blame?

Then he says:

Now, we get into a wide range of opinions.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the committee could be hearing evidence on this point till doomsday. There will certainly be ample disagreement.

The honourable senator further asks:

Is it the level of profits and other returns in private enterprise that has caused inflation?

And now let me quote the next question. Honourable senators, when I refer to these questions I am not suggesting that they are the very questions to be asked, but I am reading this next paragraph to indicate the tremendous magnitude of the problem involved in this whole matter, and to indicate the basic problem that it is suggested should be examined by the Finance Committee. I quote now from the honourable senator's speech:

Perhaps the agricultural sector of our economy is responsible for price increases? If so, we should find out whether farm incomes are too high and above parity as compared to the parity received by organized labour or capital. Perhaps the findings of the Price Spreads Commission will be significant in this regard.

Are capital and management getting more than parity, whatever parity may mean? Although it is argued that the level of corporation profits and other financial returns to management and entrepreneurs has been somewhat lower in 1958, could it be that capital and management are still getting more than their share, and that further redistribution of our national wealth is necessary if we are to achieve in greater measure the democratic fruits of distributive justice?

I repeat, I have set these questions out at length for one main purpose, namely, to indicate their vast scope. I think we would have to have a high level royal commission sitting not for a month or two, as this committee would, but over a period of from one to three years, to come to grips with these broad and fundamental questions.

Now, let me come to the next question:

Is it the kind of Government spending and financing that is the problem? Could it be, honourable senators, that the kind of deficit financing now being undertaken by our three levels of Government is one of the hidden culprits responsible for inflation? Being in a primary and most responsible position, what has been the effect upon inflation of the current federal fiscal and monetary policies?

What witnesses are going to be summoned before the committee to answer this budgetary problem? The Governor of the Bank of Canada? The Deputy Minister of Finance or his officials?

Let me refer especially to the latter part of the question asked, namely,

—what has been the effect upon inflation of the current federal fiscal and monetary policies?

I believe we should recognize immediately that no minister of finance in present circumstances could allow the servants of his department to appear before a parliamentary committee and give opinions on matters of a highly confidential nature which cannot be disclosed until the night that the budget is brought down. Who then would be the witnesses to appear before us to deal with these questions? Naturally, they would be presidents of banks, of life insurance companies and other institutions, who, we all know, have a very biased view on these questions. Did you ever hear them, in their annual reports, talk about unemployment? Let us remember that the persons who are responsible for the government of this country are responsible to the people as a whole and not to any special group of financial interests in the country.

The honourable senator then delves into the technical subject of tight and easy money, high and low interest rates, the possibility of the imposition of restraining controls by the Bank of Canada upon the private sector of the economy, and then follows with this key question:

What degree of tighter money in this interest rate sense are we likely to experience in the days that lie ahead? I shall not pursue this point any further, except to add that it seems important for our study of inflation to deal with the definitions and the problems of "tight" and "easy" money, and to establish their relationships to this overall problem of price increases or inflation.

Then there follows this question, involving as it does either Government policy or that of the Bank of Canada or both:

> Will there be further monetary expansion of the kind we have experienced since August, 1957? If so, who is going to pay the greater part of the burden of this hidden, iniquitous tax?

Now, honourable senators, surely I have gone far enough in cataloguing these questions to indicate that the problems posed and the questions asked by the honourable mover of this motion are all matters of Government fiscal policy at the highest level. In this time of what we often refer to as a controlled economy there is one facet which above everything else must lie exclusively in the hands of the Government of the day, and that is the problem of monetary and fiscal policy. It may be very well to suggest that the Finance Committee of the Senate should become helpful and become an advisor to the Government in overall budgetary and fiscal matters. But as far as I am able to find out, never before in the history of this country has action been taken by the Senate such as is contemplated in this resolution.

I have referred to the work of the Joint Economic Committee of the United States Congress, which was set up many years ago to study economic and budgetary problems in that country. But, as we all know, in the United States ways and means are not the prerogative of the Government, as under our parliamentary system, but of Congress, and by tradition and practice it lies largely in the hands of the House of Representatives. Consequently, in that country it is quite appropriate and common practice that the Committee on Ways and Means in Congress should have these broad economic problems examined in any manner that it desires. By the same token, under our system only the Government of Canada is the appropriate agency to order an investigation as contemplated in this motion, if it saw fit to do so, for the reason that only the Government is responsible for ways and means.

While I am saying that the subject-matter of this resolution is not a proper one for an inquiry or investigation by a committee of the Senate, I don't suggest for a moment that the subject-matter of it should not be debated, and debated thoroughly in this chamber at the appropriate occasion. However, I think it is somewhat significant that throughout all the financial crises that this country has faced, both in peace and war, never, as far as I have been able to find out has the Canadian Senate presumed to take action as now contemplated, involving as it does a committee investigation into high Government budgetary, monetary and fiscal policy.

You may say that I can show no rule or law to substantiate my contention. But I shall reply that the proposed action is in any event wholly outside the spirit which governs the functioning of our parliamentary institutions. I have before me four typewritten pages containing a list of all Senate committee activities from the year 1917 to the present. In no case can I find evidence of any Senate investigation into any subject-matter other than a specific piece of legislation or a specific and well defined problem of Government.

Before closing, let me ask this question: Can any one conceive of the House of Lords of England, either without reference to or collaboration with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, proceeding to an investigation by a committee of the house of financial and budgetary policy, when such matter, both by law and tradition, is too deeply rooted in the House of Commons?

In my opinion the passing of this resolution would mean a futile and unproductive incursion of this house into matters which, from our beginnings as a nation, have been regarded, politically at least, as outside the normal deliberations of this house. I am unalterably opposed to the motion and I am going to vote against it.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable senator who has just taken his seat, to whose remarks I have listened with great interest?

I failed to hear any reference in connection with the problem of inflation to the action that has taken place by the Macmillan Government in Great Britain dealing with the problem of increased prices and inflation in that country. I think if the honourable senator had some material or information with respect to that matter it would be very pertinent to the proposed inquiry.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, in common with the Senate I have heard some excellent speeches on this motion. The junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) gave a most painstaking and well documented speech. The senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) gave us a speech in which he made a case, chapter and verse. The senator from Winnipeg South, who has just spoken, (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), who saw the problem from another point of view, documented his case well. A couple of weeks ago the senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) gave us a very lucid and potent argument on the subject.

To be quite honest, I cannot define inflation. I share their mutual confusion. The honourable senator who has just taken his seat made a great deal of the fact that the Senate had never before taken such action as is proposed. There has been some talk of reforming the Senate. The reformation has just started. In any event, that is not a good reason for not undertaking this action. He said the problem of inflation has been with us for some time, and his words, as I recall them, were that it is inappropriate to study it now. Well, if not now, when? The fact that no study of it has been made for a great number of years is no reason why it should not be begun at this time. It seems to me that—excepting only myself—nobody in Canada is better qualified or more competent to examine this very vexing problem than the members of the Senate. When the honourable senator asks who might be called as witnesses, my answer is that any number of qualified people could be found. The honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) presented a list as long as one's arm; so also did the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall). I must also point out to the honourable senator who had just spoken that it is not quite cricket to suggest that presidents of banks and insurance companies and men in similar positions have not done any talking about unemployment and related problems and are not interested in them.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I said, in their annual reports.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Speaking from memory, and subject to correction, in reading a few of the highlights of their annual reports I found that they frequently discuss unemployment, inflation and related problems. From what I know of some of them, it is my experience that they are community-minded people who are very much concerned with such matters. I can assure the honourable senator that, if the Senate requests their presence, any number of them will attend and give evidence, and some honourable senators will have the opportunity to cross-examine them, to try to prove they are wrong, while some others will try to prove they are right in their views. Nevertheless, I repeat, there are people who possess the necessary qualifications and knowledge to testify before the committee. From my acquaintance with the Civil Service, I have always felt that we are very fortunate in the kind of public officials who serve the national interests. I place them second only to the Civil Service of Britain. In my opinion, they are superior to those of the United States. But I do not suppose for a moment that all the brains in Canada are contained in the East Block or the West Block of the Parliament Buildings, or The Bank of Canada building. Many other persons have sound views, views that are worth listening to. In the final analysis, whatever opinions are put forward, politicians must make up their own minds.

Although the speech of the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) was well thought out, I could not entirely follow his reasoning. When he mentions conditions in the 'thirties, and refers to a then deficit of, I think he said, $220 million, I could not relate his remarks to the present situation. The 'thirties were a period of deflation, and the problem, at any rate for the first five years, was one of poverty amid plenty, whereas today we have an unprecedented inflation, reflecting prosperity amid plenty, and the problem is one of distribution and price.

While I support the motion, I do so for reasons entirely different from those stated by the honourable senator who introduced it. I have a few questions to ask about it. I am not quite satisfied as to what should be done, nor am I sure that the right people are being blamed for whatever inflationary tendencies exist. So I would like to put forward a few queries which have particularly concerned me since this resolution appeared on the Order Paper.

One of them is: Is inflation an obsession? Have we been making an undue outcry to the effect that the Government bond market is near chaos, with our people buying stocks and selling bonds? At this particular stage is it wise to legislate in respect of an inflation which may be almost spent? Will restrictive fiscal and monetary policies prevent us from using our productive resources for the tasks that lie immediately ahead of us?

I also ask myself, as others have asked: Is the choice between unemployment and inflation? To some minds, full employment, adequate economic growth, and a stable price level are incompatible. Well, cannot the committee find out if it is possible to reconcile these factors, and in what fashion? As for myself, if the choice is between unemployment and inflation, I will take inflation, because I am certain that the effects of unemployment would be a lower rate of growth and a poorer standard of living. I know what unemployment does to people, but I have never experienced an inflation that really hurt. I will take the devil I don't know as against the devil I know. A policy aimed at inflation can, in some ways, be self-defeating. All must know that retrenchment slows business, reduces tax revenues, and produces deficits.

Covering deficits with short-term bonds encourages inflation. In the past years inflation has in the main been blamed on Government spending. To some extent that is true today, but big business is looking for a new scapegoat in order to shift attention, and from all appearances it looks as though labour is it. Labour is opposed to inflation. It looks upon it as a real danger. Labour recognizes that the unhappy business of trying to raise wages in order to catch up with prices is a losing effort. Labour, in the end, is victimized by inflation.

So we ask ourselves more questions. Is it higher wages or is it management's determination to hold the line that has lifted and maintained high prices in the midst of widespread unemployment? It is true other factors come into the picture. The long-term trend of technological advances, with a trend to automation, with some speeding up as a result of the recession, contributed to unemployment, but these should be producing price reductions. Increased prices today cannot be justified on the basis of unit labour costs. Supply has caught up with demand, yet prices have continued to rise. Much of the blame falls on the great corporations which find that competition no longer is an effective restraining force. Let me give the house an example, one of which most honourable senators will be aware. It was to me of considerable interest the other day when a huge oil company found that circumstances forced it to raise the price of its fuel oil by one cent a gallon. Somehow the company found next day that it needed to raise it only half a cent. The company's competitor in the interim had announced a half-cent increase. Somehow along the line the signals had got crossed, but the fact of the price increase was striking. There had been no general increase in wages in the industry. Supplies of the product were abundant, but the unprecedented cold weather and the consequent heavy demand for fuel oil had quite obviously indicated the traffic could bear a heavier price, and so it was imposed.

Honourable senators, we have got to find some way of reconciling full employment, economic growth and price stability, and we have got to have a national policy which is consistent with price stability. This may require some public mechanism. It needs to be simple and it needs to safeguard vital democratic interests. Let me give the house the view of a man who is considered in the first rank of economists in the United States, if not in the world, Mr. John Kenneth Galbraith, who gave evidence before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress in the United States chaired by, I believe, Senator Douglas. Mr. Galbraith is the author of a book entitled The Affluent Society, which I hope honourable senators will read. He maintains that given full employment or any close approach to it, wages and prices are subject to large discretionary movements. The only preventive is some public restraint of this discretion. He suggests a system of collective controls:

> —where, on the basis of past behaviour, prices and wages do interact to bring about persistent price advances, wage increases that are held to require a price increase might be subject to ratification by a public tribunal or one in which representatives of management, labour and the public participated. It is not inappropriate that the public should intervene when it is the public that pays.

It is very hard to fathom the Canadian public's reaction to inflation. I think it is a sort of defeatist attitude that Canadians have. We have so long lived under conditions of fluctuating prices and rising living costs that we have seriously begun to wonder whether it isn't much like the climate, a natural state of affairs over which neither man nor Government has any control.

It has not been proved in any of the hearings that have taken place in Britain or the United States that full employment and price stability are mutually incompatible. From all the statements that I have read so far there are far too many in our country who are prepared to sacrifice employment on the altar of inflation, even at the price of a little recession. We have got to realize what is the truth, that we have reached a point close to monopoly, that prices today are scarcely competitive amongst the great producers. The competitive field has been restricted to selling, packaging, advertising, and the search for new markets. I think the time has come—and this is one of the things we could study in committee—when we shall have to have some clear understanding in order to distinguish carefully between the great corporations operating in a non-competitive environment and the ordinary manufacturing companies which continue to operate within the traditional bounds of supply and demand.

The labour movement in this country has fought against inflation in the past and is opposed to it today. Far from profiting as a result of this inflation, labour has actually not shared fully in the growth of our economy, and the increase in prices cannot be explained or justified on the basis of increased unit labour costs.

Honourable senators, let me give you a couple of significant quotations. The first is from a speech made by Mr. H. W. Lush, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, speaking at their 87th annual general meeting in Montreal on June 4, 1958. He said:

> We have got to establish in the minds of all consumers that their own individual well-being, for the most part, is indivisible from that of manufacturing industry and that no one in this country can hope for personal prosperity if all do not work for national prosperity.

There is another group of people which should be particularly concerned—I refer to the wholesalers and retailers. I know they must stock the goods their customers want, but surely they cannot imagine that they are any less dependent upon national prosperity than anybody else. Where will the Canadian women who frequent their stores get the money to buy their goods if Canadian men are out of work? And how can Canadian men remain employed if the goods they make are not sold?

There is still a lot more to this problem. We, as manufacturers, cannot ignore our own responsibilities. What right have we to demand that people buy our products and do nothing more about it? We are on weak ground if we hope to persuade customers to buy second-rate goods or to pay exorbitant prices. The responsibility of price and quality is ours.

We can meet it. Canadian craftsmen are just as good as those of other countries at producing quality goods. Canadian technicians and techniques are equal to competing in efficiency with any in the world.

Then he goes on to say:

We cannot afford to have it otherwise—and neither can labour. What is more, I believe, many ordinary Canadians, who depend for their bread and butter on manufacturing industry, know this to be true. They now know that only disaster can come from forcing wage increases unjustified by productivity improvement—increases that inevitably mean higher prices, consumer resistance and rising unemployment. Labour's desire for a square deal—with which I have every sympathy—must take full account of the cost factor. It must face up to the economic reality that there is no such thing as a captive market.

That is the speech of the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

I will now read from the submission made by the Canadian Labour Congress to the Government of Canada, dated January 22, 1959. I am reading from page 9:

Much has been said about inflation, and efforts have been made to pin the responsibility for it on labour. The facts do not support the charge. Real wage rates since the war have just about kept pace with increases in productivity. We are much more concerned about the slowness of recovery (the latest seasonally adjusted index of industrial production is still lower than it was last spring) and the persistence of high unemployment than about the risk of a new inflation. We are, accordingly, not impressed by exhortations to "hold the line". In our opinion there is no line to be held. We believe that increased wage-earner purchasing power is essential to lift us out of the recession. We believe that free collective bargaining is one way to get it. It is better to court some risk of inflation than to let our economy stagnate for lack of action.

The words following are, I think, very significant:

In this connection, we would urge an immediate public investigation into the wage-price-profit relationships in the auto, steel, farm implement and other basic industries. We cite these industries because we believe their pricing policies exert a decisive influence on the Canadian economy.

That was followed by a very significant statement made on March 2, 1959, in the Montreal Gazette:

The big United Steelworkers of America (CLC) have offered, provisionally, to have steel wages pegged to labor productivity and called on the Government for an immediate investigation of steel prices—

Canadian director William Mahoney of Toronto pledged on behalf of the Steelworkers that "if price stability can be assured, the union will not need to seek wage increases to compensate for inflation losses."

Union wage objectives would be "restricted to productivity improvements," Mr. Mahoney said.

Further he said the steelworkers would not insist on getting the full benefits of productivity improvements. These should be shared by investors and consumers as well.

Mahoney said organized labor is "tired of being made the scapegoat for all the ills of our economy.

"Government and business should stop blaming inflation on wages and start now to work with the unions in order to determine the real causes and to obtain agreement on how to prevent inflation through a co-operative plan of action," he declared in his submission.

I hope this house realizes the significance of these statements that I have just read. Here for the first time labour has opened a very wide door. I think that management should seize this heaven-sent opportunity. One of the ways in which we can help is by giving them a forum in the Senate, one that is not biased. In that committee the twin problems of unemployment and inflation can be assessed. Labour has already publicly offered to respond to the consumer interest. Speaking as a consumer, I am sure that the policy of passing on agreed-upon cost has gone too far. If labour is the cause of this inflation, here is a chance for a thorough consideration by management, trade unions, and Government, before a body that will understand what they are talking about. I think it is the opportunity of a lifetime for this body to make it possible to welcome the consumer to the labour management process.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In the past few years, as I have already said, supply has caught up with and exceeded demand in our economy. Prices have continued to rise, and I think that the major share of the responsibility must be borne by the big corporations. We have had high profits. We have had rising productivity. But they have not shared the increased fruits of technology with the consumers by lowering the prices. More and more people of this country are beginning to realize that unless the large corporations which control so large a share of the economy in this country can be persuaded to act with greater consideration for the public interest our economic life will be subjected to continuing inflationary pressures from now on. We relied on competition. Today competition is no longer an effective restraining force in many sectors of our economy.

Let me read from an article in the Ottawa Citizen of February 25, 1959:

> The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission said today Canadian Industries Limited has a restrictive hold on the wholesale distribution of ammunition in Canada and advised the Government to break it.
>
> The report cited cases including one where Peterborough Guns Limited of Peterborough couldn't get CIL ammunition, though such other firms as the T. Eaton Company of Canada and Simpson-Sears could. During the 1952-56 period, CIL had rejected bids from 46 firms.

And here is the important part:

> The company maintained it should be the best judge of distribution methods, but the commission disagreed. This might be all right where there is competition but not where a company has a monopoly in production and is protected by tariffs.

In the public utilities industries, such as transportation, gas, and telephone, it was recognized long ago that, in the absence of competition, something had to be done to keep selfish interests in restraint. Today the effect of monopolistic influence on the public welfare of steel, oil, auto and other industries is like that of public utilities.

Direct Government regulation, except in times of emergency, has little popular support. There is a need for some public mechanism in addition to that which now exists in the Combines Act, the Criminal Code and related acts, and my suggestion is that this is a matter that the committee can deal with, that it recommend to the Government, after hearing the evidence, the appointment of a consumers' fair price council composed of representative and competent people principled in democracy, to hold public hearings on the pricing policies of the great corporations. It would require advance notice and justification of price increases to be put into effect by any corporation which accounts for more than a specified percentage of the total sales of an industry.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would you include the distillers? That industry is a good example of a monopoly, but it hasn't anything to say about the prices it charges, as they are fixed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If the Government takes the responsibility, I am not complaining about that. I had not thought of that commodity particularly as being in short supply or being over-priced.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Maybe the spirit is needed there.

Hon. Mr. Reid: There is no complaint when the price of that article goes up.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What I have in mind is that a consumer fair price council would be established for the purpose of holding public hearings on the merits of a proposed price increase. After the hearings the agency could publish a summary of the material presented both for and against the increase. No compulsion would be involved.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Would you include legal fees?

Hon. Mr. Croll: By all means, but I warn you we are very competitive.

The corporation would be free to raise prices if it so desired, but the public would at least be in a better position to judge whether the increases were justified or not.

My proposal would impose no compulsion, but is designed to bring about a greater understanding and responsiveness in the public interest in those areas where corporate economic power has become so enormously concentrated. Today there is a no man's land between competition and public controls that is now occupied by monopoly which makes the decision. But society, rather than monopoly, should make that decision. That is the purpose of my argument.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: How would this commission function where the price of an article was fixed in the export market—for instance, in the case of wheat? Would the commission set a price at which farmers had to sell wheat, regardless of the price in the export market, or would you have two prices, one for the domestic market and one for the export market?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The honourable gentleman has not been following me. I am assuming that the complaint is that the cost of labour is a very large part of the cost of the commodity. That was my theme.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is 80 per cent of the cost of a commodity.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I was thinking of manufactured commodities.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Well, take the case of flour.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not think labour as such is an important item in farm commodities. I was thinking more of manufacturing and of monopoly control. The farmer is not a monopolist. I said what I was aiming at was workable competition. I assume that there is that competition in the primary products.

I think the ultimate test is: Is the consumer given the benefit of lower costs and greater efficiency in the form of lower prices and higher quality?

As I have already said, I am in favour of this motion. I am in favour of the committee holding hearings and listening to some advice from people who ought to know the score. We would not be bound to take their advice—we have been known to turn aside some very good advice. On the other hand, I think we owe it to the people of this country to try to throw some light on this perplexing problem about which they know very little. They may know even less when we finish, but we should at least give it a try. Since we have the facilities here, and the capabilities, and the eager beavers who want to work, let us authorize the Finance Committee to make a study of inflation, as proposed in this motion.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, more than once I have expressed the opinion in the Senate that speeches should be made here only after careful preparation. On this occasion I must plead guilty of not living up to that. After listening to the speeches of the mover and the seconder of this resolution, it seemed to me that the proposal made was perfectly clear and sensible, and I never dreamed there was going to be any opposition to it. As far as inflation is concerned, I am reminded of a story about the late President Coolidge. One Sunday when he came home from church his wife asked him what the sermon was about. He said, "Sin". She then asked what the preacher said about it, and Mr. Coolidge replied, "Well, he was agin it". Until I heard my honourable friend from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) tonight, I would have assumed that was the unanimous opinion of this house about inflation.

Honourable senators, I am a little concerned for the moment about this question of inflation. It has been with us for a long time, and I have not the faith to believe that even the distinguished thinkers in this Senate could find a solution. What concerns me is the attitude of my honourable friend from Winnipeg South, who I rather suspect has had support in advance for what he has said here tonight.

Again, to refer to myself and my speeches, I have, perhaps not so much in the Senate as in private conversations with members of the cabinet in the old days, urged that new blood be brought into the Senate. Only last session I had the great privilege of congratulating these new honourable senators on their appointments, which I hoped and expected would bring new blood and new ideas here. I have been disturbed that one of the brightest and newest of our senators should express his views about the functioning of this Senate, of which he is now a member, in the way he did. I am reminded of an old definition of a Conservative. I am sorry my honourable friend is out of the chamber at the moment—he could not have known I was going to speak or he would have been here.

An Hon. Senator: Maybe he did.

Hon. Mr. Farris: You remember he said he had gone over the figures and had learned that such an inquiry as is now proposed had never before been made by the Senate. As I say, it reminds me of a well-known definition of a Conservative: one who believes that nothing should ever be done for the first time.

Now, honourable senators, whether such an inquiry has been made before is not the most important question we have to consider, but it is one of the questions. We know what the press has had to say about the Senate, and what other people have said about it—that we are a bunch of tottering old fellows who just put in their time. I am wondering what will be thought of this Senate when even the newest and youngest blood in the house holds up his hands and says, "No, we must not touch this for two reasons; first, it has never been done before, and secondly, we ought to leave it to the Government."

Perhaps my honourable friend has really got that much faith in the present Government at this time. But I have never seen a Government yet, including the present one, that could not or should not benefit by intelligent investigation and honest advice.

Honourable senators, there is no expectation that this Senate is going to solve the question of inflation. I think in my mind of the speech of the honourable senator who moved the motion (Hon. Mr. Wall), and of the honourable senator who seconded it (Hon. Mr. Leonard). I think also of my honourable colleague who was admitted to the Senate at the same time I was and who now occupies the seat in front of me, but who is not here tonight (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), and that wonderful speech he made before the Senate about a month ago. I think of other speeches in this house. I challenge anyone in either house to say that the Government has any group of better thinkers than we have in this house.

I put it to honourable senators, not in any boastful way, but as common sense, practical thinking, that a devoted study on this great problem of inflation by members of this house would benefit even the omniscience of the present Government.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, as the Canada Shipping Bill has been before the committee for almost a month and considerable evidence has been heard on it, may I with the consent of the House, ask that this order be now proceeded with?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move that the amendments presented by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill S-3 be now concurred in.

The honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), Chairman of the committee, unfortunately is unable to be here tonight and has asked me if I would make a few remarks to summarize the work done by his committee in connection with the Canada Shipping Act.

In the first instance, I think I should report that this was a very good committee. It sat on six different days, on two of which it held both morning and evening sittings, and was in session for a total of more than 19 hours. It heard evidence from officials of the Department of Transport—and very good and painstaking evidence it was—and from officials of the Department of External Affairs. The committee also heard evidence from the Shipping Federation of Canada, the Canadian Shipowners Association, the Great Lakes Pilots Association of Canada, the Association of Pilots for the Harbour of Quebec and below, the United Montreal Pilots Association, the Corporation of the Montreal Harbour Pilots, Corporation of the St. Lawrence-Kingston-Ottawa Pilots, the Canada Merchants Service Guil Incorporated, the Dominion Marine Association, and the United Montreal Pilots. For a time during the hearings there was standing room only in the committee room. We also had the benefit of very expert evidence from Mr. Jean Brisset, Q.C., representing the Shipping Federation of Canada, Mr. Paul Gerin-Lajoie, Q.C., representing one branch of the pilots organizations, and Mr. Leopold Langlois, on behalf of the pilots in the Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

Honourable senators, the committee made a number of relatively minor amendments to the bill, which were designed to assist in the administration of the act. In all of these short and relatively minor amendments the industry concurred, and I think I need not refer specifically to them here. The principal amendments were to clauses 8 and 9 of the bill.

Perhaps I should say that the revision of the act was required principally in anticipation of new developments in shipping which will take place in the Great Lakes—St. Lawrence basin after the opening of navigation this year, because of the fact that the Seaway project is now in being and will then come into operation. One point that was stressed to us by all those who appeared was the importance of safety of navigation in those waters.

Let me say something here about the position of the pilots. Some of the pilots have an affiliation with trade unions. In one case particularly their affiliation is with an international trade union, which involves mainly the pilots in the narrow stretches in the upper part of the Great Lakes basin. But for the most part the river pilots are autonomous. I think it is proper to call them a professional guild, who have rules of competency and apprenticeship which, I believe, make them a very important adjunct to the shipping industry in this country, in the relatively narrow waters where they operate, especially in the pilotage districts of Montreal and Quebec.

In the second place, let me say that, under the proposed legislation and regulations which are to be made pursuant thereto, all foreign-going ships will be required to pay pilotage dues. For practical purposes, this means, as regards foreign-going ships, that the rule in these waters is compulsory pilotage. For the coasting trade, that is to say the lakers and the tankers which operate in those waters, the question of the payment of compulsory pilotage dues in future as a result of the greater amount of traffic which can be expected in those waters presented a problem.

I can epitomize the problem by putting it this way, that there will be many lake ships, Canadian and American, which will be plying those waters many times—perhaps hundreds of times—every year, and that a certain amount of familiarity with those waters will be developed by the master and the mates of those ships. The question arises, I think quite properly, in the minds of the owners, whether they should be compelled to pay pilotage dues. The pilots on their part say, "We are the people who are best qualified; we are the people who have done the labour and carried the burden of the day in the past, and we should not be deprived of the position we have built for ourselves". Well, I think it was demonstrated to the satisfaction of most members of the committee in the first place that, from a legal point of view, the pilots have really no foundation for a claim they originally made, that in law they had a built-in right to the payment of compulsory pilotage dues on practically all classes of vessel in those waters. Obviously a new era is coming to the St. Lawrence basin; and I believe that in a general way the committee felt it should not be in the discretion of either the owners or the pilots to say whether the compulsory payment of pilotage dues on practically all craft should continue to be enforced. It was felt generally, I would say, that the responsibility for the proper operation of the facilities of the Seaway was that of the Government rather than of either one of the parties who are, perhaps, most interested in the shipping business in the area.

I do not want it to go out, as it would not be fair if it did, that the committee was indifferent to the fate of the pilots. I think the committee felt that the pilots have performed and will continue to perform a very important function in these waters; and assurances were given by the Deputy Minister on behalf of the Minister to the committee that no radical or immediate change would be made in the rules respecting pilotage in the early days of the Seaway. He would give no commitment for the future, and it seems to me that we could not ask him to give any. But I believe, in the result, we all felt that the responsibility for dealing with the situation with a certain amount of elasticity and discretion as it arose, and as the business of the shipping in the Seaway developed, should be vested in the people who were most likely to be able to make a right decision, namely, the Government of the day and the department.

One point which was particularly urged upon us was that we should amend the bill in the manner proposed in section 9 to remove certain existing flag discriminations. As honourable senators well know, a good many American coasting vessels will be operating in those waters, and there will have to be a certain amount of give and take, of bargaining, between the Canadian authorities and the American authorities with reference to these pilotage matters, particularly in the river. So it was felt that some flexibility should be available to the Canadian authorities in the interests of liberalizing the shipping facilities in the area.

I would say further, in connection with the problem which was discussed arising from the fact that more and more coasters flying the flag of the United States will be operating there, that while the Canadian practice is to have a special group—namely, these pilots—available for the navigation of ships in the narrower stretches of the waterway, the American practice is not to do so. What they do is to commission, authorize, or "certificate", as they describe it, masters and mates to operate in certain waters. One of the requested amendments was that the department should have a latitude in being able to make reciprocal arrangements with the Americans; because, while Americans will be navigating at times in Canadian waters, it is equally true that in certain sections of the waterway there will be Canadian ships, carrying Canadian officers and perhaps pilots, operating in American waters. So there had to be a certain amount of give and take in working out a mutually satisfactory arrangement. The committee did make this amendment to the proposed section, that the department should be empowered to "certificate" certain of these American navigators and other operators of ships for operation in Canadian waters, provided the American legislation will not discriminate against the piloting of craft by Canadians in American waters.

There was one other clause which gave the committee some concern. I refer to section 8. That clause has been deleted from the bill as the result of the action taken by the committee. It was a proposed amendment of section 324 of the Canada Shipping Act. The two previous sections have to be read with section 324. Section 322 defines the limits of the pilotage district of Quebec. Section 323 defines the limits of the pilotage district of Montreal. These two pilotage districts have been in existence since shipping began on the St. Lawrence River and, indeed, we were told that they date back to the days of the French régime. The proposed amendment to section 324 seemed, at least to the lawyers on the committee, to be in conflict with the clear provisions of sections 322 and 323, for it proposed that by regulation the Governor in Council could change the limits of a district or even rescind an order made with reference to the determination of those limits.

In response to representations made to us by the pilots we struck out clause 8 of the bill. We thought it would not be helpful to them and it might be misleading to the administrative authority. I believe that section 8 of the bill was deleted by unanimous consent of the committee, and certainly with the approval of the officials of the Department of Transport.

Honourable senators, the committee also amended clause 12 of the bill, to provide that steamships which carry 12 passengers, even ships under five tons, will be subject to annual inspection. This is an important safety measure, and I feel we made a good amendment.

In conclusion, may I say that the evidence given in this committee was most interesting. The committee functioned in the best traditions of the Senate and I do not think there was any indication of "old crocks" sitting around doing nothing while the hearings were in progress. We had an excellent chairman. I believe we have improved the legislation. Certainly the "sea lawyers" on the committee had a field day, although they may have exhausted the patience of the laymen on the committee. All in all I feel it was an excellent piece of work.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Next sitting.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lionel Choquette moved the second reading of Bill C-25, to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in 1951 both houses of Parliament passed legislation entitled the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. Certain amendments were made to this act in 1954, 1955 and in June and August of 1956. I have read these amendments and can say they are not pertinent to section 13 of the act which we are now seeking to amend.

There is no consolidation of the present act, but the three pertinent sections are 13, 16 and 25, and I shall deal with them as I reach them in my exposé.

The present section 13 reads as follows:

> The Authority, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may, from time to time, borrow money from Her Majesty or otherwise for the purposes for which it is incorporated, but the aggregate of the amounts borrowed under this Act and outstanding shall not at any time exceed three hundred million dollars.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to increase from $300 million to $335 million the limit on amounts that may be borrowed by the Authority. In other words, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 13 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act (1951) for the purposes of increasing the statutory limit of the borrowing power of the Authority from $300 million to $335 million. The amendment has to do solely with the limiting of borrowing power.

The capital expenditures of the Seaway are financed by loans which the Minister of Finance is authorized to make under the powers contained in section 25 of the act, to which I will refer later and which I will read in extenso. Such loans may not be made in any fiscal year, except to the extent that Parliament has authorized them. A vote is necessary each year to authorize loans.

In the ordinary sense this is not a money bill; it merely increases borrowing power. It does not of itself authorize the expenditure or loan of public money. Such authorization is reserved to Parliament by section 25, which reads:

> (1) The Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may, from time to time,
> (a) make loans to the Authority out of money in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or > (b) guarantee repayment of the principal of and interest on money borrowed by the Authority, > but no such loans or guarantees shall be made or given in any fiscal year except to the extent that Parliament has authorized such loans and guarantees to be made or given in that year.
> (2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may, from time to time,
> (a) make loans to the Authority out of money in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or
> (b) guarantee repayment of the principal of and interest on money borrowed by the Authority, for the purpose of repaying money that has been borrowed under this Act.
> (3) A loan or guarantee under this section shall be made or given in such manner and subject to such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council approves.

Honourable senators, my instructions are, and my information is, that up to the present time the Government has not guaranteed repayment of the principal and interest on money borrowed by the Authority but did make loans to the Authority out of money in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. This means that authority is sought annually in the estimates for the loan of money to the Authority by the Minister of Finance with the approval of the Governor in Council. The ceiling of $300 million which the Authority may borrow from the Government was considered sufficient until the most recent budgetary calculations of the Authority. It is now clear that up to this date a minimum of $329 million will be required, which is in excess of the limitation as provided by section 13 of the act by the amount of $29 million. The present bill amends the original section 13 by raising the ceiling to $335 million, leaving a cushion of $6 million to cover any unexpected eventuality. The Seaway Authority assures me that this will be an ample cushion.

Perhaps I should add that I am informed that from the commencement of operation of the act, until the commencement of navigation, all expenditures on behalf of the Seaway are capital expenditures taken care of in the manner envisaged in this bill, namely, by Government loans to the corporation.

The statement presented last year for approval by Parliament of the capital budget for 1958, in compliance with section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, in addition to showing the requirements for 1958, indicated that the aggregate capital expenditure was then estimated at $322,062,800. It then became apparent that it would be necessary to increase the borrowing limit.

It is expected that disbursements under parliamentary appropriations authorized to date will by March 31 next have amounted to about $270 million, leaving an unexhausted borrowing power of $30 million for future requirements.

The 1959 capital budget, which has not yet been tabled, will show an estimated expenditure in the year of $52,500,000, reduced for the time being to $30 million so as not to exceed the present statutory borrowing limit. Vote No. 482 of the main estimates for 1959-60 contains a loan appropriation for the latter amount. A revised estimate has been made of total expenditure, which is now placed at $329,025,700. It is not possible, even at this date, to make a close estimate of final costs, because of such contingencies as contractors' claims and the unsettled matter of any contribution which the Governor in Council may assess against the Authority in connection with the Canadian National Railways' Victoria bridge diversion. It is therefore considered that in increasing the borrowing power from $300 million to $335 million, the latter figure being about $6 million in excess of the official budget figure, reasonable provision would be made for undetermined requirements.

The following statement—and I quote figures from 1955 to 1959, at this time when we need an extension of the borrowing power limit—indicates the progressive increase in the estimated total expenditure, as exhibited from year to year in the approved capital budget:

Year	Estimated over-all total expenditure
1955	$205,535,000
1956	213,156,750
1957	284,675,000
1958	322,062,800
1959	329,025,700

As I have indicated, honourable senators, the cost to Canada of the Seaway was estimated in the 1955 capital budget at $205,500,000, as compared with the present total estimated expenditure of $329 million. The first-mentioned estimate was made before most of the large contracts were let, and also before some major decisions as to the scope of the work were made, including, for instance, the division of responsibility for dredging in the International Rapids section.

The difference between the 1955 and the 1959 estimated total cost is $123,500,000. I am advised by the Seaway Authority that important subsequent changes in the scope of the work and other items not provided for resulted in increasing the estimates in round figures by $104,500,000.

I might point out to honourable senators at this stage that all estimates have been approved to date without protest. Secondly, the interest charge is at the going or current rate from year to year. Thirdly, it is envisaged in the act that the total expenditures will be paid back out of revenues derived from the operations within a period of 50 years. That is provided for by section 16 of the act, as follows:

> The tolls that may be charged by the Authority shall be fair and reasonable and designed to provide a revenue sufficient to defray the cost to the Authority of its operations in carrying out the purposes for which it is incorporated, which costs shall include
> (a) payments in respect of the interest on amounts borrowed by the Authority to carry out such purposes;
> (b) amounts sufficient to amortize the principal of amounts so borrowed over a period not exceeding fifty years; and
> (c) the cost of operating and maintaining the canals and works under the administration of the Authority, including all operating costs of the Authority and such reserves as may be approved by the Minister.

Honourable senators, that, in a few words, is the purpose of the proposed amendment. I must say that in the other house there was no discussion on the first, second and third readings of the bill, though when it was about to be passed there was debate on some expenditure regarding that part of the Seaway around the Welland canal, but that discussion was not pertinent to the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators as a representative of one of the Maritime provinces I would like to ask one question. May I ask my honourable friend to tell the house just how much the St. Lawrence Seaway is going to cost Canada?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would like to be clairvoyant or to have prescience, but I am not endowed with that advantage. However, we now have the figures for 1959. I cannot foresee how much the Seaway is going to cost. However, in anticipation of questions being asked, I have figures which show that the United States also increased its estimates. For instance, as of June 30, 1955, according to the report of the St. Lawrence Development Corporation, the estimated total cost in the United States was shown as $87 million, but the present estimated cost is $122 million. The honourable gentleman's question could probably be answered more fully if the bill were referred to committee.

Hon. Harold Connolly: Honourable senators, may I have your indulgence for not more than ten minutes?

I was rather intrigued a moment ago when the honourable senator who moved second reading of this bill (Hon. Mr. Choquette) expressed the pious hope, by inference at any rate, that there would be no discussion on it in this chamber, since there had been no discussion on it in the other place. I am sorry to disappoint him, but I have a view that I want to express. And, incidentally, I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for bringing this measure before us tonight.

I have here a copy of the bill so well explained a few moments ago. It appears a very harmless looking document, of less than one full page, proposing an increase in borrowing power from $300 million to $335 million. We just learned that while the original estimate for this great project was $205 million, the present estimate is $329 million. It is a fair guess, therefore, that while, as has been stated, this is not a money bill in the ordinary sense, it does make provision for the possible borrowing of an extra $35 million, and in view of the fact that every one of the earlier estimates has been exceeded, all of the $35 million provided for will undoubtedly be used.

May I say how very happy I am that this bill came up for consideration tonight, following the splendid presentation by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. John J. Connolly) of the hearings of the Transport and Communications Committee on the Canada Shipping bill, and more especially the information he gave us on the vast potential foreseen in the operation of the St. Lawrence waterway. This is one of the very things that concern me at the moment.

In a press release I have from the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority I find illustration after illustration of dredging here, there and everywhere in the central part of this country, with costs running, of course, into the hundreds of millions of dollars. When reading this I think of the great ports of Canada on the eastern coast, completely ice-free twelve months of the year, where never a five-cent piece has been spent for dredging, because none is required. I think also of the extra $35 million of borrowing power asked for in this bill, and I say to myself: What wonders could be accomplished in the neglected Atlantic region of this country if those 35 million dollars were to be spent there in industrial research and development!

Well, honourable senators, you have probably guessed that my purpose in speaking is to oppose this bill, and I say to this house that I intend to vote against it. I have no doubt that there will be many interpretations of my action in so doing. No doubt some people will declare it to be another illustration of Maritime weeping and wailing. Possibly the more seriously-minded will question the utility of opposing a measure which is already virtually an accomplished fact; and there will perhaps be another group who will think that I am being unduly pessimistic in saying the things I am about to say.

With the first group I have no concern whatever. As to the latter group, I am conscious of the fact that most human beings do not like truths if they are unpalatable, so I am not much concerned with their reaction. To the second group, whom I characterize as the more thoughtful, may I say that I am moved to protest against this bill because of my absolute conviction that eventually and ultimately the operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway will destroy the great eastern Canadian ports of Saint John and Halifax and thereby strike another blow against the economy of the Atlantic region.

It is difficult, I know, for Canadians living elsewhere in this country to appreciate how the section of Canada in which we so-called Maritimers live has reached the point where it is the poorest section of Canada. A few days ago, speaking in the Throne Speech debate, and speaking excellently, the honourable senator from Murray Harbour, Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mrs. Inman), in making an analysis of our people in the Atlantic region, said that we have our faults and our deficiencies. That, of course, is absolutely correct and it would be ridiculous for anybody to argue to the contrary, just as it would be equally ridiculous for anyone in any other province of Canada or in any other section of the globe to argue that their people have no faults and no deficiencies. But what I want to say to this chamber and to all to whom the message may be carried is that we in the Atlantic region are the victims of Canada's fiscal policy, and if we are to survive, even in the most mundane economic sense, we must cling tenaciously to such assets as we now possess, and outstanding among those assets are the two great national ports of Saint John and Halifax.

It has been said that no harm will come to those ports as a result of the operation of this great project. Well, one would have to be very naïve indeed to accept a statement of that kind. I put it to you this way: What good can possibly come to the ports of Saint John and Halifax when the St. Lawrence waterway is in full operation? I suggest the answer is, none.

The intent, or part of the intent, of this great project is to enable shipping from the seven seas to sail right into the heart of this continent. If that were to apply only during the summer months we in the Atlantic region would not have too much complaint. But who is to say what the ultimate objective of this great scheme will be and how much damage may be caused us in the east when the full potential of the waterway is achieved? We had an example this winter of a score or more of ocean-going freighters being frozen solid in certain channels of the St. Lawrence in and near this section of Canada, and we witnessed the spectacle of the Government of Canada spending tremendous sums of money—estimated, I believe, by a spokesman of the Government, to be in the vicinity of $500,000—to release these ships from the ice surrounding them to allow them to proceed to the open sea.

May I remind honourable senators that we are living in an atomic age, an age when tremendous things are happening all around us, an age when almost anything is possible. Who is to say that perhaps within the lifetime of some of us now in this chamber there may not be found a reasonably inexpensive way of keeping ice out of the waters of the St. Lawrence River, and even out of the Great Lakes? If that happens—and I suggest it would be a very courageous man who would argue that it will not be possible—it will mean the end of the so-called great national ports of Halifax and Saint John.

I know that the St. Lawrence Seaway will be of benefit to a great part of Canada, and that there may be some listening to me who will accuse me of not being a good Canadian because I presume—I use the word advisedly, having heard it earlier this evening—to say what I have to say. If there be such people, there is nothing I can do about their accusations. But I ask honourable senators to look back over the years and think of the sacrifices that the people of the Atlantic regions have made. I ask you, as citizens of Canada, is it fair that in order to be a good Canadian one should agree that it must always be the people of the Atlantic region who make sacrifices and lay their heads upon the block?

I wonder how many people are acutely aware of what has happened to the economy of the region in which I live. Do honourable senators realize, for example, that we are sitting ducks for the manufacturers of Quebec and Ontario? Do you know that if you go into any home in the four provinces to which I am referring you will find the housewife's shelves loaded with canned products shipped from the central section of the country? Do you know that it is impossible, except in rare instances, for any Maritime manufacturer to compete with manufacturers elsewhere in Canada who, because they are so well entrenched, can undersell our people to the point of ruin, and have done so?

Some years ago a shrewd psychologist coined a very appetizing phrase. He dreamed a great dream and announced to all and sundry who wanted to listen that the little province from which I come was the great exporter of brains. Well, you know, we liked that; we revelled in it, and many of us believed it. It actually solaced us for the lack of economic opportunity. But as a matter of fact—and I want to be completely candid—we probably do not export any more brains per square inch of flesh than does any other province of Canada. The one thing we do export is dollars; in fact, we export nine and a half out of every ten dollars we have. And where do we export them? We export them into the heart of this country. Our trouble is not in respect to any brains which we may have exported, but rather to the dollars we must send away from our native heath into another section of the country to support its economy, thereby depriving ourselves of many of the living standards that the people of our provinces ought to have.

In pre-Confederation days a great Father of Confederation visited Halifax, at a time when we were very much disturbed about our possible entry into Confederation. There he made a tremendous speech: he visualized Halifax as a great city of the future. He saw it as the terminus of great transcontinental rail lines that would start somewhere else, go to Halifax, turn around, and start out again from the Nova Scotian capital. He saw great ocean-going liners of that day beating a service between Halifax and Liverpool, and the other great ports of the Old World. To use his own words, he said it would be "almost like a ferry service". His rolling oratory was so convincing that strong men wept for joy at the prospect of things that were to come.

But, honourable senators, none of his predictions have been realized.

I say to you now, and I am sure you must agree, that if it were possible to bring ocean-going shipping as far as Montreal, and farther into the heart of this country, in the winter months, the ports of Halifax and Saint John will become mere marks on the map. That is a situation that this chamber, this Government and all Governments should take cognizance of.

Honourable senators, I speak thus even though I know I cannot stop the passage of this bill. I say what I have said because one of the saddest and most poignant experiences I know of is to stroll the Halifax waterfront during the summer months and see those vast, empty piers playing host to pigeons and seagulls, when they should be utilized for the benefit of the Canadian economy and the people of Canada, especially those of the Atlantic region.

Yes, the Atlantic region may be the forgotten part of Canada, but so long as there is one voice left to make itself heard on the part of that underprivileged section of the country, a little hope will remain.

One final thought. There is in this chamber, for the first time in Canadian history a legislative body with a majority of representatives from the geographic division of the Atlantic provinces. We have in this house 30 senators from the Atlantic division, compared with 24 from each of the other three divisions of Canada. I do not for one second suggest that this group of 30 senators could out-vote the rest of the house, but they can at least make themselves heard. I am appealing to that group now to raise their voices against this latest inequity and great potential injustice, and to vote solidly against this measure. I repeat what I said at the beginning, that in its eventuality the St. Lawrence Seaway will mean the end of the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

These views and such action as I suggest will no doubt be decried as sectionalism, but we need not fear name calling. Sticks and stones in the forms of economic injustices have already broken our bones, and names can only ruffle our feelings.

Now I am finished. But before I sit down let me say again to the senators from the Atlantic region that we should remind our critics that Canada will never be truly a great nation so long as 40 per cent of its provinces, represented by the Atlantic region, remain in the underprivileged class. I suppose by reason of our lack of a majority representation we cannot prevent the passage of fiscal legislation that is enacted here against us, but at least we can continue to protest against the substandard conditions which such legislation has created in the Atlantic region. It is for that reason that I speak against, and will vote against, this bill.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt for Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

RIGHT HON. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

PRESENTATION OF PORTRAIT TO HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before we commence business today I would like to inform the house that this afternoon, at 6 o'clock, a portrait of the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, former Prime Minister of Canada, is to be presented to the House of Commons. The presentation will take place in the proximity of the entrance to that chamber and every member of the Senate is invited to be present. I think it would be a very nice gesture on our part if as many as possible were present on the occasion.

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, I think it would be appreciated if I added a few words to stress the presence in Ottawa today, as already mentioned by the Leader of the Government, of the former Prime Minister, and my friend, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, whose portrait is to be presented to the House of Commons. It is like old times to have him again in our midst, and I am sure that all honourable senators will join me in welcoming him, and in paying homage to a great statesman, and wishing him good health and long life.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following documents:

The Canada Gazette, Part II, Statutory Orders and Regulations, 1959, of Wednesday, February 25, 1959, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, Chapter 235, R.S. 1952. (English and French texts).

First report of the Royal Commission on Energy, dated October, 1958. (English and French texts).

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 1959-121 of February 3, 1959, approving the Capital Budget of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the calendar year 1959, thereto appended, pursuant to section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter 116, R.S. 1952. (English text).

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill S-2, to amend the Public Lands Grants Act.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (S-2) intituled: "An Act to amend the Public Lands Grants Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of January 28, 1959, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendment:

Page 1, line 9:—after "lands" insert "not required for public purposes".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that the amendment be concurred in now.

Honourable senators, perhaps a word of explanation should be given at this time, although the committee met on three or four occasions and sat for a total of some six hours, and there is a stenographic report of its proceedings.

The amendment which has been made is simple but necessary. It provides for adding to this amending section of the Public Lands Grants Act the words "not required for public purposes". I should explain that under the law as it stands the Governor in Council may sell or lease or otherwise dispose of lands of Her Majesty in the right of Canada not required for public purposes. The amendment which has been introduced and which was considered by the committee deals with a question of procedure as to the manner in which such a transfer may be made in cases where Her Majesty in the right of the federal authority is proposing to make such a transfer to Her Majesty in any right other than the federal authority; and on the theory that the Crown is indivisible the legal opinion was that you could not do this by an ordinary grant. The method that has been followed for many years has been by Order in Council transferring the administration and control of the land that may have been in question from Her Majesty in the right of Canada to Her Majesty in any other right. In the amendment which was presented here the limitation was not inserted in respect of land which might be dealt with as in the main section 4. The limitation there is that the land must not otherwise be required for public purposes. So what we did was to insert the same limiting provision in the amending section.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I feel that I should remind the house that this bill was introduced here, if my memory serves me correctly, about a month ago. At that time it was explained to the house that it was a very simple bill; in fact it was supposed to be so simple that it was doubtful whether it was necessary to have it sent to a committee. The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) then raised the question whether under this bill the Government would be enabled to transfer land to the United States. Of course, the bill had nothing to do with the United States and His Honour the Speaker properly ruled that the question was out of order. Honourable senators, I would remind you that we were all being misled, and I think that includes His Honour the Speaker as well.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not intentionally.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, I am not suggesting it was intentional, but we were misled. We thought this was a simple bill to enable the Government of Canada to do what it has always been able to do. Upon perusing the bill a little more carefully, if memory again serves me correctly, the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) pointed out that it would enable Her Majesty in right of Canada to transfer land from Canada to Her Majesty in right of the Commonwealth of Australia, for instance. We then realized that it was not such simple legislation, and, although I do not say the Government opposed us, we on this side of the house insisted that the bill be referred to committee. There the bill was perused even more carefully and we found it involved a most difficult constitutional question, which the expert constitutional lawyers on the committee studied for the last three or four weeks.

I mention this in order to impress upon the Government that it should not give honourable members the impression that a bill which it introduces in this house is a simple one when it is not. I repeat, I am not saying we were deliberately misled about this bill. My point is that when any Government bill is introduced here the sponsor should know all the facts concerning it, and we should be told all the facts. I also take this opportunity to stress the point that no bill should go through this house without the most careful explanation and scrutiny.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I am very pleased by the stand that has been taken by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) with regard to this bill. Every time the Government is empowered to do by order in council what should be done by legislation it is an encroachment upon the rights of Parliament. I distinctly remember that when certain natural resources that belonged to, at that time, His Majesty in right of Canada, were transferred to the Prairie provinces, there was a separate bill for the transfer to each province. This morning in committee I asked the Deputy Minister of Justice if by virtue of this legislation it would be possible —although such action is not probable—for the Government of Canada to sell these Parliament Buildings to the Government of Cyprus, a Government that is now led by Archbishop Makarios. The deputy minister replied yes. This illustrates how far the bill goes. It empowers the Canadian Government to transfer—the words "sale" and "lease" have not been used—for ever or for any lesser term any public land which belongs to Canada to somebody else, whether to a province or another part of the commonwealth.

I find it a dangerous piece of legislation. I said that this morning before the committee, and I repeat it now before you, honourable colleagues, and I wonder what you will decide to do about it. But also I suggested an amendment, that a transfer should be possible only within the boundaries of each province, meaning by that that the Government of Canada would not be empowered to sell any part of the territory to any other Government of the commonwealth and would be unable to sell any part of one province to another province I was not successful but that did not change my view about it. I had the support of a handful of friends, which are enough to prove to one that he is not alone in having certain views.

I repeat my conclusion that this bill is a dangerous one. In my opinion no parcel of Canadian territory should be transferred by order in council to another sovereign power; it should remain the property of the Canadian people.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaubien, that this amendment be now concurred in. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Reid: On division.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Next sitting.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL, 1954

SECOND READING

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson moved the second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

He said: Honourable senators, probably I should say at the outset that if, as and when this bill receives second reading in this chamber I will propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Honourable senators, as you are all aware, in the last session of Parliament the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, namely, the report for the year 1957, was referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Finance for investigation and report. That committee, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Hawkins, held a comprehensive inquiry into the National Housing Acts and into the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It held eight meetings, at which it heard many witnesses, including the President of C.M.H.C. and other of its officers, and it also heard from some of the national house building associations in this country.

The committee reported on August 7, 1958, in what I will refer to as a most comprehensive report, and indeed an excellent report. The then chairman of the Finance Committee was, as I have mentioned, the late Senator Hawkins, and this report was one of the last acts of that great gentleman in the Senate.

As a prelude to my remarks and explanation of Bill C-28 I would like to quote a few excerpts from that report. I am reading from the Debates of the Senate for 1958, page 501:

> A study of the evidence given by the President of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and after witnesses shows that the position of the Corporation is one of major importance to the economy of this country. Your committee feels that the creation of conditions which will encourage a vigorous house-building program is one of the prime duties of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. At the present time, this duty is, in the opinion of the committee, being fully discharged.

I would like to read also a paragraph from page 502, to indicate, as I will try to show when I explain the amendments, that they follow very closely the recommendations made in this report.

> From the evidence presented, it is apparent that the flow of mortgage funds during the last few years has been both insufficient and erratic. Concern has been expressed by various witnesses about the future supply of mortgage funds. It is evident that there is a need for a close study of the problem of increasing the supply of mortgage funds and stimulating the sale of insured mortgages.
> Your Committee recommends, therefore, that an organization be set up under the leadership of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to carry out a close study of this problem. This body would contain representatives of the Bank of Canada, the Department of Finance, chartered banks, life companies and other approved lenders. Its terms of reference should be confined to two aspects:—
> (b) Stimulating the sale of insured mortgages and encouraging the resultant sale funds back into the mortgage market.

In regard to the recommendation that an organization be set up under the leadership of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and that that body should consist of representatives of the Bank of Canada, of the Department of Finance, of the chartered banks, life insurance companies and others, I want to say, as I am informed, that although the investigation did not result exactly in the creation of an organization of the agencies referred to, nevertheless Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been in close contact with the Department of Finance, with the Bank of Canada, with various lending institutions, the Canadian Housebuilders Association and other people who are interested in housing in Canada. And it is as a result of those investigations that the present bill comes in in its present form.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask the honourable senator a question? In the context of his references to the Finance Committee report on the National Housing Act would he indicate whether any consideration is being given by the Government to a recommendation dealing with the provision of mortgages for homes that are not newly built? There was a recommendation to that effect. There was also a minor recommendation concerning the mortgage insurance fund. There was a recommendation, if I remember correctly, that an actuarial study be made of that fund, which is growing rather rapidly—I believe it is now about $45 million—to see if there is not a point coming where a reduction might be made in the payments into Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I am going to make a suggestion, in regard to the question of the mortgage insurance fund and the proposal for an actuarial study of it. There was some discussion on this point in committee of the other house, and I would suggest to the honourable senator that it would be preferable if there was a discussion on this point in committee rather than here. I think it would be better if I proceeded with my explanation of the bill. I would say the same in regard to the question as to mortgages on homes that are not new, namely that the matter could better be discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. Wall: That will be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, it has been said from time to time that we had in Canada during 1958 the biggest housing boom in our history. I will be giving figures in regard to housing starts and completions during 1958, and we should all remember that those figures should be translated into terms of better living standards for Canadians. Figures themselves are cold as steel, but we should recall that so many thousands of housing completions mean that number of new homes for Canadian people.

The bill amends the National Housing Act, 1954, in four main particulars. First, it authorizes a further advance from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to C.M.H.C. of $250 million. This has the effect of increasing the funds which may be advanced by the Government to C.M.H.C. from $750 million to $1 billion.

Secondly, the bill contains an amendment providing that the corporation be empowered to sell insured mortgages to any purchaser who is willing to buy, provided that either C.M.H.C. or an authorized lending institution administers the loan. As honourable senators may recall, C.M.H.C. in its sale of insured mortgages has been restricted to only authorized lending institutions. This amendment would do away with that restriction and entitle the corporation to sell to any person. I may say that the purpose of this amendment is to help in the creation of a fluid mortgage market in this country. It is hoped that many investing organizations which now do not buy mortgages may enter the field of mortgage investment, and it is for that purpose that this amendment is proposed.

The third amendment provides that the insurance fund will guarantee 100 per cent of the face value of an insured mortgage, instead of 98 per cent as at present. I do not intend to go into the reasons why the fund guarantees only 98 per cent of the mortgage at the present time, but such is the fact. I must say that I see no reason why the law should be so, but I am informed there is a long explanation behind it. Passage of this amendment would remove that limitation, and henceforth anyone who purchased a National Housing Act mortgage would have insurance coverage by the C.M.H.C. insurance fund up to 100 per cent of the value of that mortgage. The reason for this amendment is that certain companies, such as trust and loan companies, are restricted to the purchase of securities authorized by the provisions of the British and Canadian Insurance Companies Act, and consequently require a 100 per cent Government guarantee. The proposed 100 per cent guarantee under this amendment will enable organizations which are so restricted in their investment powers to purchase C.M.H.C. mortgages and comply with their powers of investment.

The fourth amendment is this: Under the present act, C.M.H.C.'s purchase of mortgages from authorized lenders is limited to $25 million. This bill proposes that this limit be removed.

Honourable senators, I have reviewed briefly the four proposed amendments to the National Housing Act. I should like now to review briefly the operations of C.M.H.C. in the housing field during the year 1958.

As I said previously, I am sure we are all aware of the great buoyancy in the house building industry during the past year. Indeed, I think it fair to say that house building has played an important part in arresting the recession in this country. For instance, housing construction in 1958 comprised 6 per cent of the gross national product of Canada, and 20 per cent of the capital spending in this country during that year.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask the honourable senator whether the figures he has just given apply only to houses or to all types of buildings?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Six per cent of the gross national product and 20 per cent of all capital spending refer only to houses. Those are the figures I get from the corporation.

I should like to give some comparative figures which will indicate the extent of the building that took place in 1958. In that year there was a record number of housing starts, 163,000 units, and 146,000 completions. In 1957 there were 122,340 starts and 117,283 completions.

In the year 1958 approved lending institutions under the act committed $520 million for housing loans; whereas, in 1957 the corresponding figure was $278 million. That is, in 1958 approved lenders almost doubled their investment in housing in Canada. When we speak of the part played by C.M.H.C., which is the Government agency in the housing field, I do not think we should forget that private companies of this country played a still larger part in the financing of housing development.

I should like to say a word or two about what has been referred to as the small home loans program. About a year or a year and a half ago it was determined that an effort should be made to build smaller homes in order to provide housing accommodation for people of lower incomes. As a result, the total number of small homes which were built in 1958 was 28,600. Of these, 15,600 were Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans, and 13,600 were financed through approved lenders, but with C.M.H.C. funds; they were so-called agency loans. In the same year C.M.H.C. contributed $388 million to the home building industry, representing approximately 40,000 homes.

Most of us, I suppose, have heard of another phase of C.M.H.C. activity, namely, what is known as limited dividend housing. In 1958 7,000 units were built under section 16 of the National Housing Act, 1954, as compared with 4,200 in 1957. The construction which takes place under this division of the housing act is for low-income families and old people. The development is largely done by private interests and non-profit organizations.

If I may, I will mention a personal experience in this field, and I do so to indicate the very important part which this division of the act can and should play in housing in this country, particularly in what we refer to as the low-cost field, namely, housing of people who, including old folk, although perhaps not in urgent need of subsidized housing, require and benefit from such facilities. It is a method whereby low-cost housing is being developed and can be expanded to a very much greater extent. A couple of years ago the City Council of Winnipeg was considering going into the subsidized housing field. The council, with the Council of Social Agencies, approached C.M.H.C. with a view to creating an experimental development in low-cost housing. In the result C.M.H.C. arranged with the architectural department of the University of Manitoba to prepare plans of such a development on land owned by the city. This having been done, the mayor approached the president of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce and said, "We would like you people to take hold of this thing and see what can be done." The chairman of the chamber of commerce approached me and asked if I would help in the completion of this project. We called a meeting of 30 heads of local business firms, explained the proposition, and told them that we would like them to provide $30,000 as equity capital. Thus 10 per cent of the money required would be provided by business, and the other 90 per cent would come from the C.M.H.C. Within two or three days 26 companies had their cheques, each for $1,000, in my office. We proceeded with this development, and in the result five buildings were erected, at a cost of $250,000, having a total of 30 dwelling units. As I have stated, $26,000 of this amount was provided by private capital, through these 26 businesses, whose subscriptions were made, not as an investment, but to help forward the experiment. The balance of $224,000 was the amount of the C.M.H.C. mortgage. The 30 apartments thus provided ranged from two-bedroom units renting for $52.50 to four-bedroom units renting at $76 per month. The directors of the enterprise included a representative each of the chamber of commerce, the business people who put up money, the Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council, and the Council of Social Agencies of the city of Winnipeg. All the tenants were selected by the Council of Social Agencies, and they were people who, probably, had been paying more for living in what might be called slums and hovels than they later paid for the excellent housing which was provided under this scheme.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: May I ask the honourable senator what rate of interest is charged?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: The rate of interest was 4¼ per cent. It is now slightly higher —I believe, 4⅜. The point I want to make is that we took 30 people out of very poor housing and put them in much better accommodation in these newly-constructed buildings. I visited the buildings during their construction and after the present tenants took possession. I have never known happier people, because here they had good housing for which they probably paid no more or even in some cases, less than they had to pay in the places where they previously lived.

One other point I want to make in this connection is that the venture, from a financial point of view, is eminently successful. The City Council is now about to determine whether it would like to use some of the information which we have been able to acquire from this little experiment.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: In the allotment of apartments was any priority given to senior citizens?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: No. As a matter of fact a great number of requests came from older people, but we had only 30 units, and it was decided that they should be filled entirely upon the decision of the Council of Social Agencies, which took people out of poor housing and transferred them into the first-class accommodation which was provided in this way.

Honourable senators, another activity of C.M.H.C. that I would like to refer to is what is called public housing for families of low income. Those are cases where C.M.H.C. enters into a partnership with a province for the construction of housing units, with C.M.H.C. providing 75 per cent of the money and the province, in some cases aided by municipalities, providing 25 per cent of the money. In 1958 1,632 housing units were provided under this plan.

As a further activity during the year, C.M.H.C. gave financial aid to municipalities to help them study problems of housing blight with a view to redevelopment. Under this scheme urban redevelopment projects were undertaken in the cities of St. John's, Newfoundland, Toronto, Ontario, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax, Nova Scotia.

There is one other phase I think honourable senators would be interested in as regards the housing boom in 1958. I believe we all recognize there is no purpose in creating housing unless the houses are purchased. I am sure honourable senators will be glad to hear that the housing demand throughout 1958 was remarkably strong, and that the number of houses completed and unoccupied did not rise over the 1957 level. The number of completed houses that remain unoccupied is surprisingly low. As a matter of fact, I am informed that the number for all Canada as at the end of last week was about 3,000. That is quite infinitesimal, considering the number of housing completions that there were last year.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Could the honourable senator tell the house how many houses were constructed in 1956 and in 1957?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I have not those figures with me but I am sure we can get them in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: There were 135,700 housing units constructed in 1956, which was the all-time high prior to last year.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That number is greater than the numbers given for each of the years 1957 and 1958.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: No, the 1958 figure was 146,000. The previous high was in 1956, when 135,700 housing units were constructed.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I am sure we all recognize that the more houses completed and sold in this country the more active our industries become. Industries like lumbering and brick-making benefit, as do the manufacturers of electrical appliances, stoves, furnaces, carpets, furniture and other products that go into the furnishing of houses. This is another reason why, as I mentioned before, the housing industry in 1958 undoubtedly played a large part in helping to relieve the recession through which we were going. I am also informed there is a good basis for optimism in the housing field for 1959.

Honourable senators, in conclusion I would like to pay tribute to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the lending institutions in this country. C.H.M.C. has played a leading part in housing development and will no doubt continue to do so in the future. According to the figures I have given this afternoon, the lending institutions of Canada are also to be highly commended for the part that they have played in our housing development.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) has given us a clear explanation of this bill. If it were not for this fact and that he has assured us he will recommend that the bill be sent to committee, my remarks would be quite extensive at this time. Under the circumstances, they will be comparatively brief.

I do wish to join with the honourable senator from Winnipeg South in paying tribute to the work of the Senate Finance Committee last year under the distinguished chairmanship of our late friend Senator Hawkins. We were pleased to hear the tribute paid to his memory in connection with the work he performed on that committee. I may add that during all the years he was in this chamber Senator Hawkins was faithful to any task he undertook. Last year the Finance Committee performed a difficult task most devotedly, thereby contributing much to the work of the Senate. I am sure that any task the Finance Committee may undertake this year will be carried out just as carefully and faithfully under the distinguished chairmanship of the honourable gentleman from Saint John-Albert (Hon. Mr. Emerson).

I also join with the honourable senator from Winnipeg South in paying tribute to the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They appeared before the Finance Committee last year and were always forthright in their answers and in giving the committee their views on what the future holds in store for Canada in so far as housing is concerned. I am glad to know that this legislation is going to be referred to committee, where no doubt these officials will be present again.

I agree with what was said by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South regarding the value of homes to a community. There is no greater asset that any country can have than happy homes, and I feel that homes are always happier if those who reside in them are the owners or under agreement to become the owners.

This is indeed a very important piece of legislation, and I am sure it will receive the unanimous support of this honourable body.

One matter in connection with housing which concerns me greatly is whether or not it is still necessary to build houses in such large numbers as we have done in the past. Honourable senators will recall, and I think the Government admitted it, that this housing program was brought down in the first instance to relieve unemployment. One of the main purposes was to create work, help industries and factories, and keep our lumber yards busy. That is one of the reasons why we were asked last year and the year before to support this legislation. But is it still necessary to use those means to create employment? Are the houses still required? I feel that at this time we should consider whether or not there is need for more houses, and not so much whether building them would relieve employment.

The honourable senator from Winnipeg South quoted some figures. He stated that in 1957 there were 117,000 homes completed and in 1958, 146,000 completed, making a total of 253,000. The honourable senator from Saskatoon (Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn) informed the house that in 1956 there were more homes completed than in 1957.

Now, what amount of money has been invested in these homes by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? The corporation's capacity to make loans in 1956 was $250 million; that was the amount of money that was voted. In 1957 an additional $150 million was voted. So up to the end of 1957 we had provided Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with the sum of $400 million for the building of homes in Canada. In 1958 we approved an additional amount of $350 million, which means that up to the present time we have given the corporation power to make loans in the gross amount of $750 million. The corporation has on hand now approximately $100 million. This bill will enable it to make additional amounts to the extent of $250 million, so that from 1956 to 1959, inclusive, the corporation will have been enabled to make loans to the extent of $1 billion. With the $100 million the corporation has on hand now and the additional grant of $250 million, the corporation will be enabled during the present year to make loans to the extent of $350 million.

Honourable senators, that is a lot of money for the Government to put out into homes. I have no objection to it if the homes are needed, but I think we should consider very carefully whether we are advancing this money mainly for the purpose of building homes or creating employment. Have we been building houses for the past three or four years in order to create employment? It is a very serious matter indeed if we are encouraging the building of more homes than are required, because if so the people who buy such homes, particularly those who pay a high price, will find later on that the value of their property has fallen. This is a very difficult question, and when the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation comes before the committee we should ask for his opinion as to the future need for homes in Canada. Are we going to continue indefinitely over the years to advance $250 million to $300 million annually for the building of homes?

I will say no more on the subject now than that if homes are being built in order to lessen unemployment, I feel the time has come for us to seek some alternative way of creating employment.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, I have read with deep interest the debates in the other place on the resolution to introduce amendments to the National Housing Act and on Bill C-28 itself.

The Government's intention is to increase operational capital by $250 million, which intention is shown in clause 6 of the bill, and to make other beneficial amendments, which I shall not enter upon at length. All these amendments are going to be beneficial, and I intend to support them, with reservations which I shall discuss briefly in the hope that we may see our way clear to suggesting additional beneficial amendments in the act proper, or in its sequential administration.

The really basic amendment is contained in clause 6, which increases from $750 million to $1,000 million the amount which may be advanced out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund—and please note these words:

—upon terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council.

This clause brings us to the need of a careful and judicious reappraisal of the basic purpose of the National Housing Act, which I would term simply "to help Canadians with their housing problems".

I would refer honourable senators to the House of Commons Hansard of February 27, 1959 and point out respectfully that the minister's interpretation of the purposes of the National Housing Act hinges on the definition of housing. I contend that this definition is narrow in its conceptual and operational framework and it is high time we made some changes in it.

I would refer you to the act itself, Chapter 23 of the 1953-54 statutes, and to the definitions which are contained in it. If you consult section 2, the interpretation section, you will find the definition of family housing unit, family of low income, house, and housing project, and in all those definitions we are limited to what I would call individual family units, that is a self-contained house, or a semi-detached unit, or a self-contained unit in a multiple dwelling building.

On page 1446 of the Commons Hansard the minister is reported as saying:

> The National Housing Act confines activities of the corporation to individual housing units.

I quote further from the same page. Dealing with the request for assistance in building university student residences, the minister said:

> Here again we would not be building houses; and if we were to go into giving assistance in the construction of residences for universities, we would also be asked to take similar action for nurses and many other groups in the country.

The emphasis, therefore, in the act, and in its administration is on self-contained units.

What about housing other than detached, semi-detached, or self-contained units? Is this form of housing or living accommodation not needed for many of our Canadian citizens who may not and perhaps should not be expected to live in self-contained living units? Why not take the definition of housing out of its present operational strait-jacket and include into this concept boarding-type residences for our senior citizens, for our university students, for nurses, internes and operational staffs of hospitals, for the chronically sick and for other deserving Canadian citizens? Are we to judge exactly what kind of housing has the greatest social value, and are we absolutely convinced that boarding-type residential accommodation is not needed, not meritorious, and not equally desirable for the common good? Is it not the purpose of the act to help all Canadians with their housing problems? Why are we so concerned with its type or character, and why do we delimit its scope to "self-contained unit" type of living accommodation? Are we sure?

We appear to be so concerned with "employment-producing" reasoning. I cannot quarrel with that—indeed, I congratulate the Government upon the evidence given by the Minister of Public Works that so many thousands of man-year jobs were provided by the accelerated program of house building starts in 1958. I am not convinced however, that an equal number of man-year jobs might not have resulted had our operational concept of "housing" been amended or enlarged to include other housing projects than those of the individual detached, semi-detached, or self-contained unit type.

This relaxation of our definitional concept of housing, as it presently operates in the framework of rising costs and the numbers and the kind of homes presently being built for the kind of Canadians who are able to qualify, becomes increasingly urgent as we assess the implications of a breakdown of cumulative totals, say for the preceding eight years.

Annual figures tell us something, but they do not provide the full impact of the story, which is basic, namely, that the National Housing Act does build many homes for many Canadians, it does provide employment, it has helped to counteract the current slowdown in our economy, but it has not provided in adequate amounts the kind of housing, and I am using this word in a wider sense, that so many Canadians need, especially those whose low incomes preclude their adequate participation but whose needs are perhaps at least equally pressing and equally meritorious from a national social standpoint. I know that this basic concern is shared by many other Canadian citizens and by the responsible and exceedingly able and conscientious officers of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This plea was reinforced indirectly this afternoon by the encouraging and eloquent statement of the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson). The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) raised the question, "Are the homes needed?" I would follow that up with this question: If they are, and I think they are, what kind and what amounts of housing accommodation are needed?

Let me give you some statistics: The tota. number of dwelling units for which mortgage loans were approved under the National Housing Act from 1950 to October 1958 is 413,902. I was not able to get the total figures for 1958 because they are not yet released.

I refer you to the 1957 fourth-quarter Report of Canadian Housing Statistics, table 34, page 29. That table relates family income to families borrowing under the National Housing Act, and I want you to watch these figures:

In 1951, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, 47.4 per cent of families were earning $3,000 or less. To these 47.4 per cent of families went 13.2 per cent of loans made under the National Housing Act. The disparity is already great.

In 1954, because of rising income, 34.9 per cent of families were earning $3,000 or less and in that year the loans made to this 34.9 per cent of our population were five-tenths of 1 per cent of all loans made under the National Housing Act.

In 1951, families earning $3,000 or less were calculated at 31 per cent. What percentage of the loans did they get? Three-tenths of 1 per cent.

For 1956 we have no data of the percentage of families earning $3,000 or less per annum, so we have to refer back to 1955, which was roughly 31 per cent. Loans to those people amounted to two-tenths of 1 per cent.

In 1957, no loans. No loans to people earning $3,000 or less per annum, according to that table.

Let us take the case of families earning up to $4,000 per year: In 1951, 70.9 per cent of families fell into this income bracket. The percentage of loans made to them: 55.3. It looks very respectable.

In 1954, 57.3 per cent of the Canadian population with family income of $4,000 or less received 15.7 per cent of the loans. Slowly the relative number of loans dropped until, in 1957, about 53.9 per cent of Canadian families in that income bracket received merely 7.6 per cent of the loans.

Honourable senators, these figures perturb me, and it is for that reason I am bringing them to your attention.

Let us put it in another sense: according to table 35 of the 1957 statistics, .2 of 1 per cent of all National Housing Act loans went to families who earned an annual income of $3,000 or less; 17.3 per cent of the loans went to families whose incomes ranged between $3,000 and $4,000. So the total is 17.5 per cent, which was supposed to take care of more than 50 per cent of Canadian families earning less than $4,000. Putting it in another context: in 1957 the average income of National Housing Act applicants was $5,857 for non-agency loans and $5,026 for agency loans. I ask, what story does this tell us?

Perhaps, honourable senators, we are providing these thousands of low income Canadian families with rental accommodation. From January to October, 1958, according to the Canadian Housing Statistics, third quarter, 1958, we built 28,945 self-contained units in rental apartment type living accommodation. I need not describe the kind of apartments being built, nor who is likely to live in them. During the same period—and I refer you to page 17 of this report—we built under the limited dividends provisions of the act 4,650 self-contained units out of a grand total of 64,586, or roughly 7.2 per cent. We appear to be making some improvement, and I am delighted, encouraged and hopeful that we may do still better.

So, although I may accept the significance to Canadian employment of this very fine effort in home construction, I am pointing out that the National Housing Act as presently operated—for reasons which are not necessary for me to document in any greater length at the present time—simply does not build houses or other dwelling units for the lower income groups in numbers which could be construed in any sense of the word as adequate.

The minister's own evidence confirms our continuing failure in this regard. He tells us that only 500 units of so-called low-cost homes, with a unit cost with land of between $9,000 and $10,000, were completed and sold under the National Housing Act; and that loans were made for nearly 7,000 rental units under the limited dividend section of the act, also for low income groups. This means there was a total of 7,500 units for low income families out of a grand total of 146,686 completions in 1958. The percentage relationship is obviously and woefully inadequate.

Taxation statistics, 1958, tell us that for 1956, 49.75 per cent of our Canadian taxpayers earned incomes of $4,000 or less, and 25.2 per cent earned incomes under $3,000. Even this rough gauge tells us that we are simply not building under the National Housing Act homes for the kind of people for which the act was originally planned.

Please note that the minister tells us that the average income for people benefiting under the small home loan plan is $5,146, and that the average income for people benefiting from the National Housing Act under insured loans is $6,115.

The cumulative total of small homes and units built under the limited dividend section, when compared to 413,902 units built under the National Housing Act from 1950 to October 1958, is simply tragic, if we honestly assess its full implications. We built 11,598 out of a total of 413,902, or 2.8 per cent.

I would respectfully suggest that the time has come when serious consideration should be given to changes in the statute, or in the terms and conditions arrived at by the Governor in Council, which would simply allocate—and I underline that word—the capital funds which are being provided at public expense. We are increasing the capital structure by $250 million. Why can't we say that $100 million of this new money will be allocated for slum clearance projects, for low-cost housing, and for limited dividend rental housing? In the context of the need for university students' residences—which I shall document later—why can't we say that $25 million of this new money will be reserved for loans to universities and colleges, at least on the limited dividend basis? That leaves the sum of $125 million, plus whatever is still left in the "kitty", or a total of $225 million, for the type of houses now being constructed in such overwhelming numbers. When this general fund of $225 million is exhausted, as it may well be, perhaps the construction industry will show greater interest in the public funds available in the other important housing construction sectors, also of great socio-economic import.

Now, I want to talk briefly about the need for residential accommodation for university students, and I shall document a little bit my plea that $25 million of this $250 million be allocated under the National Housing Act for residential accommodation for university students.

At this point I should like to ask: What happened to the promises of one of the members of the present Government, the Honourable Sidney Smith, who spoke at great length in Vancouver about the need for residences at all Canadian universities, when he indicated that he knew of areas that had never sent students to the university because of financial inability to pay boarding fees and when he intimated that very few students are able to attend without summer work, etc.? Then he said that an amendment of the National Housing Act to make loan terms more favourable for universities building residences would be recommended by him to the Government of the day. What happened to this interesting promise?

For what is the problem, stated in round figures? Our current enrolment in universities and colleges is 94,400 students. Our residences can accommodate 13,000 students, or roughly 15 per cent. In the United Kingdom university residential accommodation is provided for 27 per cent of the students, and strenuous efforts are being made to increase the proportion housed.

I want to remind you of the brief presented to the Senate Standing Committee on Finance in July of 1958 by the representatives of the National Conference of Canadian Universities, in which they stated:

> Even if the universities do no more than maintain the present capacity in relation to enrolment, i.e. 15 per cent, an additional 7,000 units will be required by 1964. Assuming that enrolment will reach at least 133,000 by 1964-65 (six years from now) and that 25 per cent should be provided with adequate residence on the campus—

I must depart now from the script and say that that is the figure recommended by competent educational leaders.

> —then the present capacity of residences must be increased by 20,000, i.e. from the present 13,000 to 33,000.

What is this going to cost? If one assumes that construction of residences will cost, on the average $5,000 per student accommodated, the minimal 7,000 units required by 1964-65 to house only 15 per cent of students would cost $35 million. If capacity were increased to 25 per cent, as is thought desirable, the 20,000 additional units required would cost $100 million.

It is evident that university residences of the desired standard cannot be self-liquidating unless interest rates on loans are much lower than those now in effect, or unless rentals charged to students are exorbitantly high. But if National Housing loans were available for the construction of residences, especially under the limited dividend provisions, the task would be easier although, even then, universities would have to seek grants or donations for construction, and maybe for operation. But the task of financing would be made much easier.

What is the current situation? I think it is important for us to remember that the reports from universities received early in February indicate that there are 11 residential projects under construction in universities and colleges from the Maritimes to the West Coast. These projects will provide accommodation for an additional 1,962 students by 1960. The total cost will be $9,842,258; the cost per student will average $5,016. If, by 1960, our university enrolments do no more than increase by the current 8,000 per year, we shall have accommodation for roughly 15,000 students, as compared to a total enrolment of over 100,000 students. In other words we shall be maintaining roughly a 15 per cent rate relationship—which is not good enough.

How are we to encourage and assist this construction of university and college residences so that we may catch up on the existing backlog and accommodate, not the present 15 per cent, but the 25 per cent which is a minimal desirable standard recommended by responsible and competent educational leadership?

I want to end by pointing out that, in the other place, when this problem of university residences was raised, the honourable Minister of Public Works had this to say:

> In the last year there has been considerable alleviation of this problem, because the Canada Council has made grants to various universities to assist them with the construction of residences.

That is true. But it is important to assess the amount of this assistance and relate it to the need.

First, let us remember that the $50 million available to Canada Council for capital grants is to cover the whole national field—in the humanities, the arts, and the social sciences; for classroom buildings, libraries, and other instructional-type facilities, and for residences. The sum-total of these funds is small as compared to the sum-total of pressing needs.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Was it not intended that the residences would be for professors, not for scholars?

Hon. Mr. Wall: You mean—

Hon. Mr. Reid: The grant from the Canada Council.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I would not think so. I believe that the moneys which have been allocated from Canada Council funds are for student residences. Some units in these residences may be for resident deans, supervisors, and the like, but that was not the main purpose.

Fortunately the Canada Council has recognized the urgent need for university residences, and out of total appropriations of $11.6 million more than 50 per cent, or $6.5 million, has been authorized for university residences to the 11 colleges and universities which I have already named. At a modest $5,000 per student, this will provide for, roughly, 1,300 students. It helps, but we must understand that it helps only so much. The needs still exist, and are ever more pressing. Hence my plea to the Government, in line with the promissory commitments of the honourable Minister for External Affairs, that amendments are needed to the National Housing Act to make loan terms more favourable for universities building residences.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my contribution to the discussion of this bill will be brief. I find myself somewhat out of harmony with my good colleague who has just spoken, the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall). It is significant that we are proposing an addition of $250 million to the national housing fund. The junior senator from Winnipeg advocates that a substantial amount of this should be earmarked for university residence.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Ten per cent.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I sometimes think I have lingered on the stage too long—

Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —but I cannot grow enthusiastic over the ardent desires of sob-sisters, good-doers and uplifters to benefit humanity in all its aspects. I distrust them. It is not a good nor wise thing to make conditions too easy for young men and women starting out in life. There is such a thing as discipline, which we used to have in the early years and which is of incalculable benefit to people later on.

Some fifteen years ago, when we instituted family allowances in Canada, what was the argument used for creating them? What was the proposition put forth by their advocates? It was said they would help to raise better families, better young men and women. What has been the result? Last year we spent $470 million on family allowances and this year we will spend $495 million, an additional $25 million. Since the inauguration of family allowances we have paid out of the public treasury for this purpose probably over $3½ billion. What for: to raise better families and to give parents an opportunity to provide their children with the necessaries of life? I do not deny that in certain cases family allowances have been beneficial, but I have grave doubt as to whether on the whole we have thereby improved the social structure of this country. After spending $3½ billion on family allowances over the past 15 years we find today that juvenile delinquency in this country is at the highest level it has ever been. That is common knowledge. If you can solve these problems by spending money, why should juvenile delinquency be so prevalent as it is today?

Honourable senators, the fallacy that enters into our thinking on these matters—and this applies to some honourable senators—is that you can solve any social problem by spending money. You cannot do it.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If you remove incentives to initiative and make things easy for people so that they do not experience the natural disciplines of life, you fail in your objective. That is precisely what is happening in a widespread area in this country today.

There is another observation in connection with this measure that I wish to make. I am not at all sure it is wise to go on building houses at the rate we have been doing. In the last few years we must have voted at least $500 million for housing development, and it has been admitted that one of the primary reasons for spending all this money has been to relieve unemployment. There have been collateral reasons too, of course. There is no doubt that improved housing has been beneficial to some people, but are we not reaching the point where another class of home owner will be adversely affected? I always respect the opinion of the honourable the senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig), and I think he will confirm my contention that some house-builders are finding it more difficult to sell houses than was once the case. What effect is this going to have on those who own two- and three-storey houses? In recent years there has been quite a desire on the part of the owners of such homes to move into modern, well-insulated bungalows possessing the latest gadgets. What will happen to these two- and three-storey houses? They may still be good but they will depreciate in value. So, while we gain supposed benefits by building new houses all over the place, at the same time we are adversely affecting a number of home owners who are unable to sell except at a substantial loss. These factors are of some consequence.

When Governments get into this type of thing they are treading on very doubtful ground. I know there are some in this house who do not agree with me at all, those who are full-blown advocates of the welfare state philosophy. Incidentally, it might be a good idea on some occasion to have a debate in this chamber on the implications of the welfare state philosophy and where it is going to lead. In my humble judgment, if we follow a policy of social security, welfare and ease for all our people, we shall travel straight down the road to some form of authoritarianism.

I grew up on the western Prairies, where the air blew freely day and night, in both winter and in summer, and perhaps it instilled in me some appreciation and understanding of the value of freedom. I want to say with all the force at my command that in the end there is nothing—whether it be security, housing, family allowances or anything else—that will match the freedom we enjoy today. More and more as I grow older—sometimes, no doubt, many people think I am lingering too long on the scene—I find myself desiring to test these measures not by their superficial worth, but by their ultimate effect, in 10, 15, 25 or 50 years from now, on the freedom we enjoy today.

Hon. Mr. Reid: We have lost a lot already.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My good friend the senator from New Westminster says we have lost a lot of freedom already. I am quite conscious of that. I find myself "cabin'd, cribb'd, confined" in a multitude of ways, and I resent it. I am quite willing to paddle my own canoe, and a great many other people feel the same way; but the trouble is, as I said earlier, the do-gooders, the uplifters and sob-sisters, take great compassion on me and want to paddle my canoe for me and to direct me where I shall go. I don't like it, honourable senators.

I want to say one word on this measure. In the extension of housing—this building and building and building of new housing—I am afraid that we may do a disservice to another class of house owners who are going to be adversely affected by all this increased building.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourale senators, when the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) was speaking, it seemed to me that his argument for various services, such as residences for university students, was not altogether pertinent to this bill.

In connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the administration of the National Housing Act, I have always felt that the public money spent for that purpose has provided a service of very great value to Canada. I am not much impressed with the thought that seems to prevail in some quarters that the financial outlay is beyond the needs. Of course, I know that things can be overdone, that the best things in the world can be spoiled by excesses. Personally, I do not feel that this particular operation has reached that stage. The returns that are coming in, showing the progress made in collections, and so forth, will indicate whether there are excesses or not.

I was rather surprised that the honourable senator referred to these funds as a Government expense. He may not have meant to do so. Certainly I do not regard this use of public funds in that light. The funds as they are administered under this act by the corporation are really in the nature of secured loans for the welfare of people. The money flows back, so the original outlay cannot be regarded as a public expense.

I do not take second place to anyone in advocating the need of student residences, for we do need them. Certainly also we need quarters for elderly people, and services for slum clearance and such like. However, I think such needs have to be met by measures that are specifically set up for them by arrangement between the federal and provincial Governments and with municipalities. I am all for it. If, however, by a change in the act Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be dispensing public money that cannot be expected to flow back, then it will become an entirely new type of organization with a new function.

Honourable senators, in spite of the good will I feel for, and the support which I would give to, many of the ideas put forward by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg, I think it would be very detrimental to the successful functioning of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation if it were to include such widespread projects as mentioned. Those projects call for an entirely separate organization and should be the subject of special legislation.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: May I ask the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) a question? In advocating that moneys be made available for dormitories, why does he not suggest that the universities apply to the provinces rather than to the federal Government? My impression is that the provinces today are in a much better financial position than the federal Government. I do not believe there is a single province that is not budgeting for a surplus next year, with no increase in taxation. Before we get through with this it may become necessary to call a Dominion-Provincial conference at which the federal Government will be asking for financial assistance from the provinces.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I did not intend to get into this debate, but it took a new turn here today when the question of sufficiency or insufficiency of housing in Canada became an issue. I sent a note over to the sponsor of the bill asking him to give me the figures on the backlog of housing, and the kind of housing. He has not been able to get it, or at least I have not had an answer, so I will move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps the honourable senator could get the information on third reading, or in committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, in committee.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I know I can get the information in committee, and I know I can speak on third reading; but there comes a time when you want information you want it. There are officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation sitting in the gallery, and if the sponsor had sent them a note they would have given the information in a second. I did not want to ask them for it, of course, because that is not my prerogative. I move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend will permit me—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Certainly, but you had better move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The information may come in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If it does, I shall have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I have two reasons for rising to say a few words on this bill. The first is that the senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) explained some project in Winnipeg to build many houses, and so on. In Quebec we are not using money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation so largely as is done in the other provinces, because we have another plan to help the people. Last year our Caisse Populaire loaned more than $60 million for new housing. Secondly, the provincial Government paid 3 per cent to reduce the interest, because, especially at the beginning, when young couples build a house they require also some money for furniture and so on. The 3 per cent pays insurance, taxes, and many other things, and there is insurance on the life of the borrower. For the past 25 years this has been a good thing for the Government.

We have lent more than $1 billion, and we have not lost more than ⅛ of one per cent. The money has not been lent for the sole purpose of providing employment, it has been lent to help families establish themselves in their own homes. We realize that young married couples, with three or four children, are at a disadvantage if they live in a tenement house containing eight or ten dwellings, because sometimes it takes only one bad family to destroy the good standing of all the other families in a tenement, so we try to supply self-contained homes for individual families in open spaces. In doing that we provide, I think, a better social environment.

My honourable friend seems to have fears about the future. I am not afraid of what may happen. We are trying to develop these private organizations which will allow the family to work for its own betterment. As I have said, last year our organization lent more than $60 million for the building of some thousands of houses. These loans are made to the individual family heads. Many of these people now are working on their own houses, and in so doing they come to love their homes the better. They love their little pieces of land, no matter in what part of the country.

All this is of great benefit to the country as a whole, for it means better living for large numbers of families, a better environment for their children, and so on. In borrowing this money and lending it out to individuals this private organization is developing a social spirit among the people, for they are working to save themselves, and if each family can save itself the country will be saved.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

Later:

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has received the information he desired with respect to this bill and is quite willing to withdraw his motion to adjourn the debate. Therefore, it may be possible to give the second reading to the bill now so that it may be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I would therefore move that we revert to the order for the second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the motion now before the house is for the second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. In this connection I would like to announce that the chairman of this committee is ready to convene a meeting tomorrow morning at 10.30 o'clock for the purpose of considering this bill.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved the third reading of Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, before the bill receives third reading I wish to make a few remarks. Let me say at the outset that I do not oppose third reading of the bill, because with my approval it was returned from the Standing Committee to the Senate in its present form.

The honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) last evening explained its chief purpose and he put it better than I can when he said, as reported in Hansard, at page 266:

> Perhaps I should say that the revision of the act was required principally in anticipation of new developments in shipping which will take place in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin after the opening of navigation this year, because of the fact that the Seaway project is now in being and will then come into operation.

There is, however, one particular feature of the bill that is not related to the principal purpose of it, which I believe should be brought to the attention of the Senate, and I do this for the purpose of focusing our attention on international treaties and agreements which deal with present day marine problems.

Under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act for many years various descriptions of ships, provided they were registered in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, were exempted from compulsory payment of pilotage dues. Included among these British ships were those employed in salvage operations, in coastal shipping, ships of not more than 250 tons registered tonnage and ships engaged in fishing, regardless of their size. All of these classes of ships could be exempted from payment of pilotage dues, provided they were registered in one of Her Majesty's dominions.

Now it has developed that the legal experts of the Department of External Affairs have been doing their homework very thoroughly, and in the course of doing that homework they discovered that such exemptions as I mentioned were discriminatory against ships of other than commonwealth countries, in violation of long-standing treaties with those nations. This phase of the situation was touched on by the honourable senator from Ottawa West last evening. Amendments to the Shipping Act were therefore, on the advice of the Department of External Affairs, included in the bill, which would, by their inclusion, enable Canada to honour these treaty obligations to the letter. Some of these treaties, dealing with navigation matters, are indeed of long standing, and it may be of some interest if I just referred to several of them. For example, various editions of the Treaty of Peace and Commerce between the United Kingdom and Sweden were signed in 1654, 1661, 1766; and two editions of the Treaty of Peace of Commerce between the United Kingdom and Denmark were signed in 1660, 1670.

I believe it is unnecessary for me to add that the obligations imposed by such treaties, as well as others that followed until Canada obtained the complete status of independent nationhood, were inherited from the mother Government of the United Kingdom.

Many other treaties were cited to the committee, with signature dates through the 19th century and into this century, the latest being a Convention of Commerce between Canada and Poland, signed in Ottawa, July 3, 1935.

It was also drawn to the attention of the committee that treaties of great importance have been entered into between Canada and the United States. These include the Ashburton-Webster Treaty of 1842, the Treaty of Washington of 1871, and the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, all dealing with equal freedom of navigation on international boundary waters. These are the treaties which have attracted my particular attention at this time.

As an example of the type of treaties these were I should like to quote in part article I of the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, which will give us a good idea of their nature. It reads:

> The High Contracting Parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.

I think it was because of this particular article that changes in the legislation were sought by the Department of External Affairs, although there were other treaties which I have mentioned and which had some bearing on the amendments sought by the bill.

With the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway the provisions of these treaties, and particularly the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 to which I have just referred, have assumed an increased measure of importance to both countries. In so far as the free access and navigation of boundary waters are concerned, both countries will continue to gain from the provisions of these treaties. It does seem, however, to be beyond the intentions of the provisions of these treaties that we now discover that we are compelled to alter our own shipping legislation to facilitate voyages to Canadian deep-sea ports of certain classes of United States ships, namely, United States ships employed in salvage operations, United States ships of not more than 250 tons, and United States fishing ships engaged in fishing, regardless of size. These ships can now be exempt, and will be exempt by our own statute, from the payment of compulsory pilotage dues.

As well, the bill extends this exemption to other foreign countries, even those which may be considered to be unfriendly nations. Under another section of the act the effect of this provision can be nullified by order in council, but the fact remains that this beneficial provision will become part of the Canadian shipping legislation. In doing so it does present an irritating reminder that while our Government appears to provide a benefit to United States vessels—the honourable senator from Ottawa West pointed out yesterday, there would be a liberalizing of the shipping facilities in the area—no reciprocal action is forthcoming from the United States regarding a solution of a problem of great importance to Canada's fishermen on the east coast.

It will be recalled that for many years the Canadian Government has been trying through direct representation to the United States and other countries, and through United Nations action, to extend the limits of our territorial waters for purpose of control of the fisheries, from three miles to 12 miles outside the headlands. The only action so far resulting has been a delaying action.

In order to assure the east coast fishermen that the Government is playing all the cards in the international game of negotiation, I wonder if this is not the time, when we are extending benefits, to remind our United States friends of the great benefits that have flowed, and continue to flow, to that nation from the fair and friendly way in which we entered into and have honoured agreements, whether they be historic or contemporary. Is this not the time, then, to press for a favourable solution to our important and serious problem of Canadian control of fisheries to a 12-mile limit?

Since the new Government took office, despite the pre-election prospects of a solution to this problem, there are signs of hopelessness in obtaining such a solution. Among the signs is a recent public expression that indicates that since the Americans appear to be firmly entrenched in their position of being able to fish up to three miles of the coastline, we might as well let our own draggers in on these grounds, an area from which large Canadian draggers have been banned by Canadian regulations. If such came to pass, and all the Canadian draggers were allowed on these grounds with those of foreign countries, and without restrictions of any kind, I believe the end of the small boat inshore fishermen would be in sight.

I am very well aware that this is an era of automation and mass production. I also know that orderly steps have been taken in these fields by the fishing industry, assisted in recent years, and in quite a large measure, by federal Government legislation. Any action, however, to improve the economics of the fishing industry, which in so doing may endanger the fish resources available to the small boat fishermen, would be unwise indeed. The result could be the final destruction of a way of life which has brought with it the satisfaction and happiness that is always associated with individual enterprise and ownership.

There is a danger that such steps leading to the abandonment of the small boat fishery will bring with it a system of "vertical integration", a term which may be new to the fishermen, but with which the farmers in certain sections of Canada have already had unfortunate experiences, experiences which would be equally unfortunate for the fishermen.

Canada should, therefore, continue to press our United States friends for a satisfactory solution of this international problem to which I have referred, in order that Canadian control and regulation of the fisheries of an extended territorial limit could result in an orderly eploitation of those resources beneficial to all.

With Canadian control and regulation of the fisheries within this extended area, the way would be open to allocate to the draggers only those areas where there would be a minimum of interference with the small boat fishery, thus allowing for a modern approach, on a basis fair to all, to the exploitation and conservation of this valuable natural resource, of which we in the Atlantic provinces have comparatively few.

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak on this bill, but since the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) has brought up the question of the reciprocal arrangement between Canada and the United States and we feel we have to change our coastal laws to make sure that we are giving them a fair break, there is some information about coastal shipping between these two countries which I feel I should put on the record.

At the present time, according to the coastal laws, we have equal rights with their customs regulations, but they get around them in another way. In Canada an American vessel cannot go on the coasting trade; neither can a Canadian ship do coastal trading on the American coast. But an American company can come into Canada and form a Canadian company, wholly owned by Americans, and engage freely in coastal trading in Canada. On the other hand, if a Canadian goes into the United States and attempts to form a company there, he cannot have more than a 25 per cent interest in that shipping company; he cannot take any part in the management of it, and he may not be an officer or director of the company; he cannot make a loan to that company to have a greater beneficial interest in it than 25 per cent. In other words, such a company must be truly 75 per cent American owned. This is just a method of getting around the provisions for equal treatment as between Canadians and Americans.

The Americans go still further: in the case where goods are being carried from an American port say in Alaska to, for instance, Prince Rupert in Canada, a Canadian vessel is not allowed to handle that shipment, if its eventual destination is, say, New York or some other port in the United States. On the other hand, if a Canadian shipment goes through a port in the United States, the Americans insist that the movement between the American ports be by an American vessel, or, if by a Canadian vessel, it must discharge in a Canadian port and reload the cargo on to another vessel before being taken into an American port.

I believe this question has been under discussion with the State Department of the United States for many years, but so far no action has been taken. As the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne has said, this is one of the things that should be taken up at a time when the Americans are getting some benefits from Canada.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask the honourable senator whether the law which prevents a Canadian company from operating in the United States unless it has 75 per cent American ownership is a state law or a federal law?

Hon. Mr. McKeen: It is the Jones Act, a federal law.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, when this bill was before us for second reading, I was the only one, except the honourable senator who introduced it, to speak on it. Since then we had a very interesting time studying the bill in committee. It created a great deal of interest; pilots came from all over the country, and ship owners appeared before the committee, and as my friend the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has said, the lawyers had a good time analysing the fine points.

There are two parts to the bill. One has to do with negotiations and arrangements for the purpose of operation in the St. Lawrence waterway when it is completed. I thought the matter had been arranged reasonably; in fact we were, with the exception of one or two amendments, unanimous on all points. The bill provides for a degree of reciprocity for pilots, and reciprocity we must have if we are to operate successfully on the St. Lawrence waterway. But, as was pointed out by the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith), and the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen), some sections relating to operations on the coast disturbed some of us on the committee.

Section 9 is the principal clause. It sets out certain exemptions in connection with pilotage dues for ships entering and leaving Canadian ports. As the act stands, the reference is simply to "British" ships, which term includes Canadian ships. As amended, the expression is "ships", which naturally includes all ships. That is a substantive section, and I as a layman would expect to find in it the law in all its clarity, so that when you read it you would know what the enactment pertaining to pilotage exemptions is. But we found, after some consideration, that to know what ships are exempt one had to look at another section, which stated that Canadian and British ships would be exempt. This caused some confusion, and brought to my mind the thought; why not restrict the exemption to Canadian ships? It is our coastal trade. It is as much a Canadian industry as is Eaton's or Simpson's or any Canadian factory. The coasting trade of Canada, I claim, has always belonged and should still belong to Canadians. But with the passing of the Statute of Westminster we consented to the passing of the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement, which gave equal rights to ships from all parts of the commonwealth.

Another point which has troubled me is that, notwithstanding this act, the Governor in Council may do almost anything he likes so far as arrangement for pilotage is concerned. I do not like that provision, because it seems to me that it disturbs the stability of the industry. You cannot run a business if you do not know what may be done to it the next day, and here we have a situation which is subject to order in council and can be changed at any time. The world is going ahead; a statute may prove too static to meet certain emergencies, so some flexibility may be necessary. But one must bear in mind that, if the Governor in Council permits ships from other nations to be exempted from pilotage dues, it is the Canadian merchant marine that will lose this preference.

It was mentioned that about 20 treaties relating to pilotage were made in days gone by. We trafficked with the rights of Canadian seamen and our Canadian merchant marine by making trade agreements for the benefit of interests abroad. In order to sell more goods to other countries, certain interests were willing that the ships of those countries should carry our goods overseas. That might be a good thing, but if so, it represents a national policy which the Government and the people of Canada should pay for. All the costs should not be borne by the Maritime provinces, which are mainly interested in their merchant marine. It is now provided that, in the lake waters, which are landlocked and protected, our lake ships will be subject to outside competition in the future; so then we will have more friends for the merchant marine.

As to two clauses at the end of the bill, we were told they were necessary—although clarification can only be had by referring from one to the other—for the purpose of preventing flag discrimination. I do not know what flag discrimination has to do with the Canadian fleet, because the Canadian fleet has practically disappeared. I am not speaking in this connection about the present Government, because other Governments over the years have taken the same line. However, it seems that we have at least saved the flag, that is the flag of the Canadian merchant marine; and I am glad that it has an honoured place today. It flies on the Peace Tower. The Premier of Ontario has raised it over the provincial institutions at Queen's Park. We in the Maritimes like it, because we have been familiar with it for so many years. It flies on our ships at sea; we fly it on land. It always signalled to us that our friends were coming home from sea. It carried us to foreign lands in the days when the Maritime Provinces were great upon the sea. So we are happy to know that it has its place, by order in council of the federal Government, over the Parliament Buildings here, and it looks as though it will remain for some time, because I noticed that the other day the Canadian Legion authorized the flying of the Red Ensign as their flag instead of the Union Jack.

When I came into the chamber this afternoon I did not intend to speak on this subject, but I do so because I have a proposal to make. We know that we are dealing with countries in Europe which have a merchant marine and whose standard of living is lower than ours. Our friends talk of free trade. I have heard a lot said about it here, along the lines of opening up to us the European area so that Canadians may share in that market. I have not given this question much thought, but to my mind we on this continent should have some degree of free trade with our next neighbour. Now would be the opportune time to propose reciprocity with the United States in the coastal trade of this continent. I say this because of the moving appeal made last night by my friend the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly) when he asked that more consideration be given to the Maritime provinces, especially since the ports of St. John's and Halifax are in commercial peril as a result of the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. I hate to think this is true, and I still have some doubts about it. In the east part of Canada the Atlantic provinces stick out like a wedge into the ocean, and the coastal trade would move from Florida to the Great Lakes, circling around Nova Scotia in order to get into the St. Lawrence River.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: May I interrupt the honourable senator to ask him whether he is speaking on Bill S-3, to amend the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Yes, but I am asking for a little latitude in view of the speech made by the honourable senator from Halifax North last night. The point is that a reciprocal agreement with United States on coastal shipping would result in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland becoming rendezvous for American coastal shipping. I believe it would also stimulate the Canadian shipping trade. The long trade route from the Gulf of Mexico up through the St. Lawrence to the head of Lake Superior would facilitate a shipping trade which the men of Nova Scotia would be eminently fitted to share in and carry on.

We have been told that Canada cannot have a successful merchant navy because of our high labour costs. Well, it is a fact that we do pay higher wages to seamen than do such countries as England and Greece, but I contend that the men who work upon the sea should receive wages equal to those received by men who work upon the land. It would not be difficult to get Canadian men to work upon the sea if this were so. Seamen work an eight-hour day. They stand by for 16 hours and the nature of their employment keeps them away from their families for long periods of time. They are skilled workmen, and what skilled workman in Canada works for less than $1 an hour? Wages paid to Canadian seamen are not excessive when one considers the economy of Canada.

Canada is a country which follows protectionist policies. Every industry except the shipping industry is protected by tariffs, and so on, but our merchant marine must compete on the world market with countries having a much lower standard of living than our own. I would ask the honourable Leader of the Government in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to bring to the attention of his associates the fact that many people in Canada feel we should have a reciprocal coastal trade agreement with the United States.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will do that.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The United States is the only country in the world with a high standard of living like our own. We are closely associated and must deal with that country on the St. Lawrence River. The ship owners of Canada and the United States have united in declaring that the shipping trade on the St. Lawrence Seaway should be restricted to Canadians and Americans. I am not going to embark upon a discussion of that subject now, but I do say the moment is opportune to have a reciprocal agreement in coastal trade with the United States. The honourable senator from Halifax North made a fervent appeal to us last night not to betray the Maritime provinces or leave them alone, and a reciprocal coastal trade agreement with the United States would certainly benefit the Maritime provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is getting quite late and as the presentation of a portrait to the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent is to take place at six o'clock perhaps the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) might consider this an opportune time to move adjournment of the house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is it the wish of the house to postpone the remaining items on the Order Paper until tomorrow afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On the understanding that these items will stand on the Order Paper in the same order as they now appear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak at any length. I haste to make that statement in the beginning, because while this is a very important subject I expect that at some stage in the proceedings the resolution will be carried and that an extensive study of the subject will be made by the Finance Committee. If I were going to discuss the subject-matter of inflation in any particular way I would prefer to do so after we have had the benefit of whatever evidence may be developed before the committee and when we have the committee's report before us. Having regard to the nature of this subject-matter and how it cuts across the lives of the people in Canada and—judging from some of the things that have already been said in this house—may even cut across political viewpoints, I would conclude that when the report stage is reached there will be plenty of discussion, and I hope it would be possible to deal with the matter more intelligently at that time.

But there are a few things that I want to say today in a general sort of way. First, I want to commend the mover of the resolution (Hon. Mr. Wall) for the well documented statement which he delivered to us on this subject and for the restrained tone of his address. Of course, so far as the seconder (Hon. Mr. Leonard) is concerned, past experience has led me to expect that in any presentation he makes he will be concise and thorough, and I need only say that he did not disappoint me in supporting the resolution.

Then I come to the next speaker, my friend the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson). While I cannot make a sweeping commendation of what he said, I certainly can say that he made two things abundantly clear: (1), that he was opposed to the resolution; (2), that he thought the Senate should not touch or even come near or approach, let alone think about, this subject of inflation because it was over and above and beyond the sphere of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is not right. I made a reservation as to that in my speech.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I will come to the reservation. I think the reservation is like the fine print in contracts.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Still, it should be read.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And unless you read very closely and listened with your ear phones plugged in you might have missed the reservation. However, we will come to that. I will give my friend full credit marks whereever they come in the course of my remarks. As he was speaking it occurred to me that rather quickly he was doing the best he could to circumscribe the scope of the work of the Senate. I remember that on one occasion last session when we were considering a Government bill he laid down what I might call rule No. 1, which was that we should not pass certain amendments to the bill because they were not acceptable to the Government. I find that rule difficult to swallow. Now we have a further rule laid down by my friend, which is that the Senate should not consider any subject-matter other than a specific piece of legislation or a well-defined problem of Government. There are two ways of looking at that. First, I disagree completely with his suggestion that the scope of the Senate in considering any question is limited at all. But as to specific pieces of legislation, I agree that it is part of our duty to consider them, for specific pieces of legislation cannot become law unless we consider them, approve of them and pass them. Secondly, as to a well defined problem of Government—well, I think my friend meant a little more than that, because I could not imagine any problem of Government at the present time that would outweigh in importance the problem of inflation. What the significance was in my friend's use of the words "well defined problem of Government" I have difficulty in understanding, unless he meant some particular problem which the Government asks us to inquire into. I rather lean to the conclusion that that was the view he was attempting to present. So, that is his rule No. 2 on the limitations of the scope of the Senate.

My view is, and I am sure it is the view of the majority of senators, that there is no limitation upon the scope of our authority to study any problem relating to Canadian or international affairs. There is no limit on our right, and there should not be on our responsibility, to study important questions of the day so as to develop some body of informed opinion on the subject. When my friend suggests these limitations, and urges as a reason why we should not consider this question of inflation that it does not come within the category of being a specific piece of legislation or a well defined Government problem, it is simply a matter of writing a rule to suit the occasion. I think my friend reached his conclusion first and developed his reasons for that conclusion afterwards, doing the best he could with the available material which might be given the title of reasons.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is the way judges write their judgments: they give a judgment and then give the reasons for it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have never been close enough to judges to know how they write their judgments. I would like to know a little more about it, and if my friend can assure me that his view as expressed is an informed view I would like to sit down and talk to him.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I gathered that view from reading the law reports.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Sometimes I wonder how judges come to write the judgments or the reasons they do.

However, to get back to the subject: my friend urged two reasons why the Senate should not deal with the question of inflation. First, he said inflation is a matter of policy, and the Government of Canada is the only body that should be concerned with this matter of policy. Well, if that is my friend's view, then I say we are excluding ourselves from practically every item that comes under the heading of Government business, because the Government must formulate policy in relation to every item in the administration of the affairs of the country. That applies in the case of national defence, taxation and fiscal policy. My friend is saying that because Government policy is involved here we must not look at inflation. By doing so he is reducing the Senate to even something less than an ordinary debating society—possibly down to the status of an ordinary church social gathering.

I am not prepared to subscribe to that view at all. I would point out to my friend by way of illustration the National Housing Bill, which we had before this house yesterday and today. I would remind him that last year a committee of the Senate examined the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, made a very thorough study of the housing situation, and presented a report to this house. Now we find in amending legislation before us that many of the recommendations made by the Senate committee have been adopted. There must have been some merit in those recommendations or the Government would not have accepted them.

I say when you attempt to put the right of the Senate to consider any question on the basis of the fact that Government policy is involved, you shut the Senate out from considering everything except the weather and a few exchanges of a social nature.

In proposing a study of inflation by a committee we are not seeking the role which my friend suggests we are, that of advisers to the Government. I should think the Government has many advisers now—maybe too many, I don't know—and all I can say is that if we consider this question and present a report on it, and there is some value in the report, I hope it will be recognized, whether the Government feels that it weakens its position in regarding us as a body of advisers or not.

On a question of this kind, as on any other question with which the Government is concerned, I feel that opinion should be solicited wherever it may be gathered, with a view to getting a complete assessment of opinion on the question. That is the ordinary way in which these things are done.

Now we are told in this instance that the Senate is the one place that must not, through its committee, consider the question of inflation. The proposed reference to the committee is a very simple one: it is to study the threat of inflation in Canada. Now I know that inflation is an element which the Government should—and, I expect, would—take into consideration when it is considering matters of fiscal policy, taxation and monetary questions. But to say that inflation itself is Government policy is rather astounding to me, because I would have thought no Government would want to adopt inflation as a matter of Government policy.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Strangely enough, bankers can talk and write about this subject, labour leaders can speak and write about it, industrial leaders can discuss the aspects of it, welfare organizations can study it and submit briefs to the Government, economists and financial editors can talk and write about it; but the one place where it must be taboo, according to my friend, is here in the Senate. Well, I am sure senators also can talk about inflation, and can bring to bear on it at least as much intelligence as can any of the other groups I have enumerated.

My friend raised a question as to where the witnesses were to come from, as though there were not witnesses standing all round Canada and elsewhere just waiting for an opportunity to get into the limelight and expound their economic theories and principles. My own view is that the problem would not be to find witnesses, but to sift them to make sure that we heard only the good ones and did not waste our time. I see no great difficulty in obtaining witnesses. My friend is concerned because we might call departmental officers and officials of the Bank of Canada while they are working on budgetary matters. He fears that in this event some embarrassment might develop and the Government might instruct them not to appear. To me, there is no such difficulty at all. If I were permitted to suggest an order of procedure, the last witnesses I would call would be Government officers and officials of the Bank of Canada. I would first like to gather as far as possible a reflection of opinion on inflation from all these other organizations and people I mentioned, and learn what ideas they have about it, to the extent to which they see it in their operations. Having got all that background material I would then sit down with Government officers and officials of the Bank of Canada and ask them to comment upon the situation. I see no embarrassment to the Government, except the embarrassment my friend suggests might happen. Indeed, I should think such an inquiry would be welcome.

With respect to getting permission to hold such an inquiry, I recall that some years ago we set up a special committee of the Senate to study income tax law in Canada. We did not go to the Government and say, "Please, may we do this?" We set up a committee, we summoned officials, we sat during two sessions of Parliament, and we prepared a report. I believe that if you examine some of the provisions of the income tax law—I will not say all of them, because I would not have it said that our committee made recommendations which led to some of the things in the present act—you will agree that beneficial provisions of the present law were recommended by the Senate and incorporated in the statute. I recall also that some years ago, when our party was sitting in the seats of the mighty at present occupied by my friend and his associates, although they are a minority in this chamber—

Hon. Mr. Pearson: No chance for it to grow?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I would say that for a while there is a better chance for it to grow than for us on this side to grow. The advantages are with my honourable friends; I do not need to argue that point. I was about to say that some year ago, when the topic under discussion was gold mining and the policy in relation to it in Canada, our side did not need permission to consider it. A resolution to appoint a committee on the subject was introduced in the Senate and passed. The committee then sat, heard a number of witnesses, and prepared a report, which was presented to this house. I do not attempt to correlate the committee's conclusions with the fact that the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was subsequently passed, but the report pointed out the difficulties of the problem, and I am sure that at some stage or other the Government felt grateful to the Senate for what it did. There was no suggestion that in so doing the Senate interfered with fiscal or taxation policy or monetary problems. The principle is an entirely different one.

We are not trying to formulate any policy; all we wish to do is to inquire into the threat of inflation in Canada. That is the proposal, and nothing but good can come out of it, because the more light that is thrown upon a question of this kind, the more you produce, through the length and breadth of the land, understanding of the problem and how it affects every phase of life in Canada, the more the Government will profit in dealing with the problem and the more readily will the public accept anything that may be done to control the situation. So it seems to me that the Government should look with favour upon the projected appointment by the Senate of a committee with instructions from this house to study the question, and I am sure that it will be properly considered, notwithstanding the assertion of my friend that we are thereby encroaching upon the functions of the Government and embarassing it. To my mind that is an idle and completely unfounded statement.

In effect, my friend's contention is that inflation is an element entering into the consideration of the Government in connection with fiscal matters, and fiscal matters pertain to Government policy, therefore inflation is a matter of Government policy. Well, that is a strange kind of syllogistic argument. It might as well be assumed that, because I have two arms, and arms are instruments of war, my arms are instruments of war. Syllogisms can be reduced to an absurdity. There is a complete non sequitur in my friend's assumption that, because inflation relates to monetary matters, and because in its policies and legislation the Government deals with fiscal and monetary matters, inflation itself is part of policy.

Inflation is an element or a disease which from time to time engrafts itself upon our financial structure as a result of our doing things we should not do or our refraining from doing things we should do. To say that, by issuing a warning against something which has engrafted itself on our financial structure, and having the Senate consider this danger and counsel the Government in its financial legislation to proceed on a basis which will restrict or destroy that condition, we are encroaching on Government policy, is in my submission ridiculous. Indeed, we are doing no such thing. We want to offer our contribution through the best study we can make of the subject. The Government would be under no obligation to accept our conclusions. I am sure that, if the Senate sets itself to make a report, instead of such utterances on this subject as have been heard—for instance, from some labour leaders, that if they had to choose between inflation and unemployment they would accept inflation to maintain employment; and extreme statements in the contrary sense—there can be produced a more temperate, reasonable and rational report than has emanated from any of the sources from which up to the present we have heard views on inflation. My honourable friend seemed to think that because the subject is a complex one and disagreements will arise, it is a waste of time to explore it. I would answer that objection by saying that if there were no disagreements, no differing viewpoints as to how to approach the problem, there would be no need to consider it. I would say that if there are complex arguments and differences of opinion it is about time we got down to a basis where we can give intelligent consideration to the problem.

My friend says, in effect, that to do this would be an exercise in futility and a waste of time. He is entitled to his view, and I to mine. He has said that the only body which could properly consider this matter is the House of Commons. I warn my friend that this subject was considered by a committee approved by the House of Commons when the price spreads inquiry was set up by a Conservative Government, in 1934—and look what happened to the Government when the committee's report went out. So if such is to be the fate of Governments that deal with problems relating to financial policy through a committee of the other house, it may be better for the Government to have this subject of inflation examined in somebody else's backyard. Therefore the resolution should make my friend happy.

I was amazed at my friend's statement that it was not proper for us to consider this question because, as, he said, we have never done so before. I would hate ever to get into a condition where I could not try something new; I would then be getting really old. But to assert that such action would be improper is equivalent to denying to the Senate the discharge of the responsibilities it enjoys; it is tantamount to demanding a renunciation of our independence. In the ultimate result it would be an abrogation of the functions, duties and rights of the Senate. Government policies can never be sanctioned by way of legislation without the co-operation and support of this house. That is just how important is the position of the Senate.

My friend did not like the witnesses that might be available so I managed to pick one or two he might approve of. He implied that bankers and institutional leaders might be biased witnesses. Fortunately I just read a newspaper report of a recent speech by the chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, Mr. James S. Duncan. Incidentally, I doubt very much that my friend would use the term "biased witness" in referring to Mr. Duncan. At any rate, Mr. Duncan was addressing the annual convention of the Ontario Good Roads Association, at Toronto, and he made this statement:

> In national affairs, the problem that dwarfs all others is inflation.

Speaking about the Canadian way of life, he said:

> That way of life can only be preserved by a burning faith and willingness to preserve and defend it.

He is also reported to have said:

> The Canadian way of life was being menaced by inflation.

I am not sure that my friend would agree with the solutions Mr. Duncan mentions for dealing with the problem, and I would think that our Senate committee might go a little further. Mr. Duncan said that the means for dealing with inflation are available to every person, and he suggested:

> Let us read some of the good editorials instead of devoting so much time to the funnies.

He also said:

> Let us watch fewer TV westerns and more of the excellent discussion panels.

I am not taking Mr. Duncan as meaning that inflation would end if we were to reduce our consumption of TV westerns and our reading of the funnies, but what I have just read does indicate that the chairman of a great public utility in Ontario, who does not come in the category of bankers or institutional leaders in the sense in which my honourable friend used the term, is very much concerned about the menace of inflation. He feels we should be working harder toward achieving a solution to this problem.

Perhaps my honourable friend might find the Montreal Gazette more acceptable for daily reading than some other Canadian newspapers, so I can tell him that on March 4 the financial editor of the Gazette, Mr. John Meyer, had a few things to write about the seriousness of inflation. He said:

> Inflation will be contained only when there is leadership in that direction. There is only one agency of leadership and that is the Government. Only the Government has the means to adopt an anti-inflation policy, and make it stick.

In the course of this editorial the writer goes on to give a quotation from the Economist, as follows:

> The proposition that inflation is inevitable is not an acknowledgement of economic determinism, but a political judgment that the will to control it had disappeared.

Honourable senators, dealing briefly with inflation, I believe every person who considers the question at all realizes that inflation is with us and that it is a serious and menacing thing in so far as Canada is concerned. In his speech my friend referred to "creeping inflation" and rather suggested that a little bit of inflation—which would come within the description of "creeping inflation"—would be all right and we could get along with it. But the fact that "creeping inflation" can very quickly become "galloping inflation" is the real essence of the problem. My honourable friend referred to a Professor Slichter of Harvard University, and he has argued himself into the position that a little inflation is not a bad thing. He started out by arguing that because labour unions are so powerful in the United States they will keep on demanding rounds and rounds of wage increases, with the result that you have inflation whether you will it or not. He said that since there did not seem to be any authority that would stand up against the continual rounds of inflation in the United States, you just had to live with the situation.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I interrupt to ask the honourable senator a question? Is he suggesting that I gave Professor Slichter's views as my views? If so, he is not right. If he examines my speech he will see that I did not say I agreed with Professor Slichter's theories. I merely gave them to the house.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I was not quoting what my friend from Winnipeg South said in his speech. I was merely explaining how Professor Slichter arrived at the conclusion that a little bit of creeping inflation was all right. I was not attributing that to my honourable friend from Winnipeg South. However, since my friend has given us Professor Slichter's opinion, I suggest that if he would look at some answering statements made by Dr. Marcus Nadler of New York University and Dean G. Roland Collins of the same university, he would see that they present the other side of the picture in a very forceful way. The conclusion they arrived at was that the way to stop a future depression is to prevent the inflationary boom that precedes it.

I do not intend to argue the pros and cons of inflation, for that is the very subject-matter which the mover and seconder of this motion wish to have referred to committee. I merely wish to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that inflation is with us and it is a serious problem. How serious a problem it is I am not in a position to estimate, although I have my own views. I feel it has reached proportions where it should engage the attention of the Government. I must conclude it has engaged the attention of the Government, because my friend suggested as a reason for our not dealing with the subject the fact that it involves Government policy and he said that we should not interfere in anything the Government may propose to do about it. Therefore, my friend and I finally get onto common ground, that the problem of inflation is serious enough to have engaged the attention of the Government. Where we disagree is on the question of whether the Senate should have a look at the problem. We really disagree badly here, for I cannot conceive a better place than a Senate committee where a full, fair and impartial consideration and study could be made of this problem and its ramifications, and where some steps might be determined for correcting and lessening its seriousness. I say with all humility that the Senate has the necessary intelligence and ability to consider this question. We are not motivated by the self-interest that some groups might have in presenting their viewpoints on inflation. I am sure we have enough intelligence to sift through the statements and evidence presented to us and to determine what are the realities and what is simply froth and an expression activated by personal interest or the desire to support one's own side of the case. We are in an excellent, independent position to consider and weigh all those things and prepare a report that might add something to the general knowledge on inflation.

Honourable senators, I said that I would not speak at length, and if I do not sit down very soon I shall violate the instruction which I imposed upon myself. However, I want to say one or two other things, and I will say them briefly.

In anything I have said, I am sure my friend will appreciate that I was addressing it to what he said, and not to him personally.

I respect him too highly to get off the rails to the extent of attempting to address my remarks to him rather than to what he said. When I remarked that my friend said this or that I referred to the gentleman from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) who stood up in his place and voiced certain opinions and gave his reasons for them; and I was endeavouring in the best way I could to tell him, for his own future benefit, and perhaps for his education, that I did not think his reasons support the opinions and conclusions which he stated so forcefully. I have tried to point out why I think they don't. I have also tried to make an impartial rationalization, without developing fits of temper or flights of oratory.

In a very summary way I say this, that when any person states in my presence, or within my hearing or reading, that the Senate of Canada must accept limitations on its capacity in matters of this kind I am going to object, and as strongly as I can, because in such matters the Senate of Canada has no limitation on its capacity, other than any limitation which it might decide to impose upon itself. We certainly have the capacity to make a study of this problem of inflation, and I think we would be failing in our duty if we did not do so. There is no conflict between our approach and consideration of this question at this level and anything that the Government might be considering on the way to a determination of what its fiscal policy shall be, what its budgetary requirements are going to be, or what measures and methods of taxation shall be imposed in the current year for the purpose of restraining or containing inflation. Those are matters that concern the Government. As and when they get to the stage of legislation we shall consider them as legislation, and we shall be in a better position to consider them more intelligently if we seek to inform and educate ourselves as broadly as possible on this subject.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, we have heard some excellent speeches in the debate on this motion. The mover (Hon. Mr. Wall), a colleague of mine from Winnipeg, evidently devoted a great deal of study to the motion he put before us, and of course it was to be expected that the seconder (Hon. Mr. Leonard) would make a worthy contribution. While I am bound to say that I did not agree with the speech of the senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), nevertheless, he delivered a very interesting speech, although not to my way of thinking a very convincing one, as I shall presently attempt to show—if that has not already been demonstrated by my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden).

Honourable senators, we ask ourselves. What is inflation? I think it is impossible to find a clear definition. We know the effect of it. This is a case where doctors differ. I think probably that from a dozen economists who are supposed to be informed upon these matters you would probably obtain a dozen conflicting opinions. However, we do know that inflation produces certain inevitable results, and it is with those results that I feel we should be very much concerned.

Let me say a word on the point of the right or propriety of the Senate to inquire into a matter of this kind. I agree wholly with the remarks of my honourable friend from Toronto that there is no limitation on the power of the Senate and the right of the Senate, if it chooses to exercise it, to inquire into any matter of public concern.

It might be interesting to the house to take a brief review of the progress of inflation in this country—because we do have it, let us be clear upon that. Before World War I, prices, or the cost of living, remained fairly stable. It is true that prices had their ups and downs. But war always generates inflation, that is, generates a rise in the price level, and I think the reasons for that are quite easily understood.

We come, then, to World War II. By the late thirties we had reached a fairly stable price level. With the outbreak of World War II, however, these inflationary forces commenced again to operate, and for the same reason that they operate every time a war breaks out. My honourable friend from Winnipeg South gave the increase in the price levels commencing with 1939, if I recall correctly, but I think he related those to the new index that was devised and accepted in 1949. As a matter of fact, between the outbreak of war in September 1939 and November 1941 the cost of living index, as it was then called, rose by 19 points. That fact gave the Government a very great deal of concern. I happen to know this because I was a member of the Government at the time. It was the concern over this increase and the possibility of other rapid increases in the cost of living index that led to the establishment of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. Those who recall those days will remember that the board was given very sweeping powers. There was, in fact, nothing in Canada of any consequence that was not put under controls—wages, salaries, prices of commodities, all were frozen at the certain level on the day in November when that control measure came into effect. Now that continued until the conclusion of the war, and during that period of four years our price level remained steady. It remained steady because it was under definite and stringent control.

We could have maintained that position after the war if we had maintained the controls, but they irked people who were accustomed to freedom, and consequently after the war there was a mounting resistance to the continuation of the controls.

Here it is interesting to draw a comparison. In a country like Russia, for instance, where the central governing power has absolute authority in every field of activity, authorities can hold their people down, they can determine wages, salaries, prices, and everything else. That, honourable senators, is one of the differences between an authoritarian state and a free democracy.

The Wartime Prices and Trade Board regulations were rescinded in 1946, but the Government was given certain other emergency powers, not over prices but over things like exchange, for instance, and they continued in effect for a few years longer. In 1946 the consumers' price index, as we know it now, was at 75.0, and that rose by steady progression until 1948. In 1949 it was 100.0.

There is no disputing the fact that a certain amount of inflation was permitted from 1945 to 1949. How far that was justified I will not attempt to say, but the next boost in the cost of living index came with the outbreak of the Korean War, when again we had wartime conditions that promote inflationary pressures. I was not in the Government at that time and consequently I do not know what discussion, if any, took place as to control of prices resulting from the outbreak of the Korean War; but there is no doubt of the results. In 1950 the index stood at 102.9, so in the preceding year it had gone up a little over two points. In 1951, however, it had increased to 113.7, and the following year, when we were still feeling the effect of the Korean War, it increased to 116.5. After that it remained fairly stable. In fact, it declined a little in 1954, when it stood at 116.2. That figure continued into 1955.

But in 1956 we were again entering a period of booming economy, which was apparent all over the country. That year the index rose to 118.1. In 1957 the boom continued, and the index stood at 121.9.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? I understood the cost of living index in 1949 stood at 190.0 and that the Government brought it back to a new base of 100.0. Since then it has climbed to the figures you mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In 1957 it had increased to 121.9.

Now here we are entering a field of controversy. We know that two years ago at this very time there was a great deal of discussion about rising unemployment and the need for doing something about it. But the inflationary pressures were still active. The Finance Minister at that time, the Honourable Mr. Harris, believing this to be the fact, budgeted for a surplus and refused to reduce taxes against a mounting demand that they should be reduced. For what reason? For the very reason that he and his advisors felt that these inflationary pressures were still dangerous to the economy and if possible they were going to check them. They checked them by a rise in the interest rates, which brought a great deal of criticism, and by budgeting for a surplus. I did not always agree with the Honourable Walter Harris, but I do say this, and I have said it before in this house, that his budget in 1957 was one of the most courageous budgets that have ever been brought down in Canada, and that on the eve of an election and in the face of heavy criticism throughout the country.

The new Government came in, and it raised old age pensions to $55 a month. I am not criticizing the Government. As a matter of fact, as I said once before in this house, if pensions had been raised to $48 a month they would have balanced within a fine fraction of a point the increase in the cost of living that had taken place between 1951 and 1957. But there was a feeling that we had to deal with unemployment, and consequently money was spent to provide work to relieve unemployment. By January 1 of this year the cost of living index stood at 126.1, the highest point we have reached.

Now what about the future? It is uncertain. But I think it must be a matter of concern that these inflationary pressures are building up. That brings me to another point with which I wish to deal.

When considering matters of this kind there are always what may be called the imponderables. Let me illustrate what I mean. A year ago it was notorious that the American motor industry was unable to market anything like the number of cars it could produce. Apparently they were good cars, people had the money to buy them, but for some mysterious reason the public decided, in a very widespread way, that they were not going to buy motor cars. That illustrates what I mean by an imponderable. While the economists may chart courses, there are always other forces that may come into play and may interfere with their calculations.

What are the causes of inflation? That brings me more directly to the motion before us. Various causes have been given. One is when wages increase more rapidly than production we are bound to have a built-in inflation of prices. We had an illustration of that just last autumn—and this is not said in criticism of labour—when certain operating trades or unions on the railways said they wanted an increase in wages. Negotiations failed, and there was a possibility of a strike, a tie-up of our whole railway facilities. The railways said they could not afford the increase, but if the Board of Transport Commissioners would give an increase in freight rates, the railways would meet the demands of the unions. So, the railways appeared before the Board of Transport Commissioners and were given an increase in freight rates of 17 per cent, which they claimed was yet insufficient to meet the increased wage demands, but which went a very long distance towards meeting them.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Within 2 per cent, I think.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What was the effect of this increase in freight rates? It advanced the price of practically every commodity in Canada, and we have not yet felt the full impact of it. That is an increase that again is built into the cost-of-living, and no one can escape that conclusion.

Another reason that is sometimes given is that we are living beyond our means; that is, there is too much Government spending. When I say too much Government spending, I am not speaking alone of Ottawa, but of governments at all levels, from the federal authority down to the municipalities. People, or certain classes of them, generate pressure for the spending by governments, and very often governments respond, often unwisely.

That of course leads to another point, unbalanced budgets. Do unbalanced budgets contribute to inflation? The theory of the economists, or most of them, is that they do. It may be that we cannot avoid unbalanced budgets for a time, but it is a factor in this very important question of inflation.

It is argued that high taxation is another factor that contributes to inflation.

Now, I do submit that these aspects of the problem could very profitably be considered by a committee of this house which went at its work objectively, as Senate committees have done on various occasions in the past.

I should like also to comment on the effects of inflation. Here we speak with a little more knowledge. I would say that, broadly speaking, there are two effects produced by inflation; first, there is the economic effect, which is a rise in prices, and its impact on certain classes in our community. The Canadian people are about as fine a people as can be found anywhere in the world. We have here people who have worked and saved against the day when they can no longer work, people who have bought life insurance policies and annuities and like benefits in an effort to protect themselves when their working days are over. What is the economic effect of inflation on them? It robs them very definitely, no question about it. Inflation is like a stealthy thief that comes at us unawares, and takes away something of what we had saved against future needs.

Secondly, there is the political effect of inflation, by which I mean the disturbance of a sense of balance in the people generally, that is necessary, if good government is to be had. I will give one illustration of that effect. In Germany after the First World War, there is no question at all—and it is now recognized by historians—that the most effective force in producing Hitler was the mounting inflation generated in that country for several years after the end of that war. When people found the cost of living mounting in all directions they asked, "Is there no one who can save us from this?" Hitler was the man who said, "I can do the trick."

Let me take another illustration. France, for years after the recent war, was disturbed by political instability, caused largely by inflation. Prices were rising and the franc was devalued more than once. This was the most fruitful source for the development of a strong communist party in France in the years following the war. The same thing happened in Italy. But Italy was successful in stabilizing its government and reaching a measure of stability in the purchasing power of its currency. As that was accomplished and people became accustomed to it, the communist influence declined steadily in that country. The same will be true of France.

I was never an admirer of Lenin, but I do think he was a very able man. He made a pronouncement that should be written in large letters across every free democracy. He said the surest way to destroy a democratic form of government is to undermine the value of its currency, because if you do that you create the political unrest that favours the development of extreme communist theories.

I mention these things, honourable senators, because I think they are very pertinent to the discussion of this motion.

Without covering the same ground as the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has done, I wish to deal with some of the points advanced by my good friend the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson).

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) whether he can find at any place in my speech that I challenged the right of inquiry by the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I did not question the right of the Senate to explore these questions. I questioned the appropriateness of the proposed study, and that, not the right of the Senate to make the study, was the sum and substance of my argument.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I apologize to my honourable friend if anything I said left a wrong impression, but I think he did argue that it is inadvisable for the Senate to conduct such an inquiry as is proposed here.

Let us go back a little. Take, first, the illustration used by my honourable friend from Toronto, the inquiry made by the Senate into income tax administration. It was not an investigation as to whether income tax was too high or too low, it was to ascertain how Government departments administered the law. That inquiry, I may inform my honourable friends opposite, was not very welcome to the Government of the day. Government departments naturally think that nothing in their administration can be improved. The Department of National Revenue at that time possibly thought that we were moving into a sphere wherein we had no right to be. Notwithstanding this, the Senate set up a committee of inquiry, which heard witnesses, some of whom were rather critical of the administration. That did not please the Government too much either. What was the result? The committee brought in several recommendations, one of which was of peculiar value, that an Income Tax Appeal Board be set up, and gave reasons for its conclusions. As a matter of fact the Income Tax Appeal Board was set up as a result of that inquiry, and it has proven of very great value to income tax payers in every part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Was not the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) a very important witness at that inquiry?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Now that I think of it, I believe he did give evidence before that inquiry, and, as he usually does, made a very valuable contribution.

I would like to give another illustration. In 1946 the Government of the day, because the regulations of the Wartime Prices and Trades Board ceased to be operative, decided to bring in legislation to set up a foreign Exchange Control Board. Some honourable senators here who were members at that time will remember the discussion which then took place. The act establishing the Foreign Exchange Control Board gave it extraordinary powers, and a good many honourable senators on both sides of the house believed that those powers were far too arbitrary. We debated the subject in this chamber. We sent the bill to committee, which called witnesses, one of whom was Mr. Graham Towers, Governor of the Bank of Canada at that time. I recall that his evidence continued for two days. The result of the inquiry by the committee into the proposed Foreign Exchange Control Bill was that over 50 amendments were made and, as I recall, two sections were entirely deleted. Would my honourable friend from Winnipeg South argue for a moment that, because the Government of the day did not altogether like that inquiry, we should not have proposed it?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Was that not done by the Government of the day in the Senate? It was not the Opposition that did these things.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: No, it was not. I introduced the legislation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would like to assure my honourable friend that the Opposition in the Senate is not bringing up this matter. This is a motion by a member of this house who happens to be a supporter of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I recall that I made a speech on that bill, and I had the satisfaction—if indeed it can be called a satisfaction—of seeing it reprinted almost verbatim in the Toronto Globe. But I use this as an illustration of what the Senate can do, and, on occasion, should do.

Again, one of the Senate committees, namely, the Finance Committee, undertook during several sessions to study the main estimates; and that activity, may I say, was not too palatable to some departments of the late Government. However, the committee went to work, and two of its members were the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig), and my honourable friend who is now leading the Government forces in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). We questioned some of the items in the estimates. Not only that, but we called deputy ministers before the committee. Let me remark at this point that there is one type of question which should never be asked of a public servant who appears before a committee: he should not be placed in the position of passing an opinion on something his minister or the Government has done. That principle should apply, of course, if the proposed inquiry gets under way. But what I am endeavouring to point out is that this is no new idea; we have had inquiries before.

I do not know that my honourable friend fully realized the implication of his statement that inflation is a matter of Government policy.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Before the honourable senator continues, may I ask, was not the then Minister of Finance invited to appear before the committee dealing with foreign exchange?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think he was. I have just forgotten, but I do know that we had the Governor of the Bank of Canada before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But you do not know who asked the minister the question?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I cannot recall at the moment. The record will disclose that information. At any rate, this has been common practice with the Senate. All we are proposing in the motion before us is simply that the Finance Committee be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada. Where on earth can there be any exception taken to having the committee make such an inquiry? I cannot conceive that the inquiry could be of any harm to the Government at all, and I would indeed be very loath to think that the Government had any opposition to it. It would not be a partisan inquiry any more than the inquiries I have mentioned were partisan inquiries. Here is a subject we might conceivably be able to shed some light upon. We might be able to establish some facts or views that would be of value to the Government in the consideration of this problem. I do think it would be most unfortunate if the idea developed that this was intended to be anything but an objective inquiry. I for one will be no party to any other kind of inquiry. It should and could be an objective study, and I am confident it would produce some very useful results.

How serious this threat of inflation may be I do not know, but I do fear we may be facing possible dangers. Quite frankly, one of the things that concerns me at the present moment is the fact that we are developing a very high cost economy in this country. This has been proceeding for the past ten years, but what will be the effect of it? Bear in mind that somewhere between 20 and 25 per cent of our gross national product is derived from foreign trade. If we keep our cost of production too high, do we not run the danger of pricing ourselves out of foreign markets for the various products we have available for export? If that happens, the result will be unemployment and greater stagnation. Frankly, I do not think that any more important question than inflation is facing us today. I do feel that we should study the effects of inflation upon the increasing costs in our economy.

For all these reasons, I hope that my honourable friend from Winnipeg South will give full consideration, as I am sure he will, to this matter and withdraw his objections to passage of the motion. In my judgment this motion is essentially one that should be approached in a wholly objective way.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And in a nonpartisan manner.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes. We did not conduct those former inquiries in a partisan fashion. I know that I was very critical, as were other Liberal senators, of some of the things that the Liberal Government of the day was doing. Let us go at this thing objectively and in a nonpartisan way, not with any idea of embarrassing anyone but solely with the purpose of trying to bring out some factors that may be useful to the Government in reaching a decision with respect to whatever policies it finally decides to adopt in regard to this problem.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If he cannot answer me now perhaps he will do so later. I gather that he does not agree there was a settlement by the Government in 1939 that the basis for the cost of living index would be taken at 100 and that it would remain so from then on. I contend there was a settlement on that basis, and I also contend that in 1949 the index had reached 190 and the Government then cut it back to 100. When the Liberal Government left office it was about 122. I suggest those are the facts, and I would ask my honourable friend if he disputes my statement.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have not got the facts before me.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: However, my impression is that the honourable senator is incorrect. Prior to 1909 we had what was known as the cost of living index. My memory is very clear that between 1941, when the price controls were put on, and the time they were taken off, the cost of living advanced 19 points.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We will see.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It remained stationary at that point, and in 1949 a new index—the consumer's price index—was set up that brought in some other factors. I will check up on the point raised by the honourable senator.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, debate adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 26, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, allow me to join with all those who have preceded me in extending my congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I did not have the opportunity of hearing the speeches because I was not in the house when they were made. However, I have read their speeches carefully and I have had the pleasure of having heard both the mover and seconder speak on previous occasions. I only regret that I missed their eloquence in this house on that occasion. As a matter of fact, I have known the mover for a great many years, and I count it an honour to have him as a very close friend of mine during all that time. I have found him to be of great assistance to me since I have been in this house.

Honourable senators, I would like to offer my heartfelt thanks for the kind words of welcome expressed by the various honourable senators in welcoming me to this house and for the courtesy and friendliness shown by all honourable senators. I count it a privilege to be associated with the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), whom I also consider a friend of mine for some 25 years or more. He has always been of assistance, courteous, and devoted to his duty, as he has been in all matters relating to his own practice.

It has also been a privilege since coming to this house to have had the opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), because throughout the years I have watched and admired the important part he has played in the other house, as well as in this chamber. He has been most courteous and kind to me since I have come here.

My memory goes back to my boyhood days, in the early 1920's, when the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the Honourable Robert Forke and the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) played such an important part in the affairs of Canada. I know that these men have made a contribution that will live in the minds of Canadians as long as Canadian history is read. The honourable senator from Churchill has made, and is still making, an important contribution to western Canada.

I also recall the important part played by the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) during the war years, and previous to that, dating back to 1921. I know that he will always be regarded with respect and affection by all Canadians.

Many more in this house have made contributions to make this nation great, but time does not permit me to mention them all.

I count it an honour and a privilege to have the opportunity to sit in this chamber, and I only hope that in the future I can in some little way, at least, be of value to this house.

Mention was made by some honourable senators that I am the first senator to sit in this house from the city of Saskatoon. Naturally, I am proud that I come from Saskatoon, as I think it is one of the most beautiful cities in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: I would like to invite any honourable senators who have not visited western Canada, and Saskatoon in particular, to do so at the first chance they have. Some of the most enjoyable moments I have had in my life were in visiting various parts of Canada, and there are very few parts that I have not had an opportunity to visit. One exception is our newest province. It has been my privilege since coming to this house to share an office with the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins). If the people of his province are as friendly and kind as he and other senators from this province are, then I will not delay long in visiting the province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Saskatoon is not a large city as far as population is concerned, for it has just over 82,000 people. However, we are exceptionally proud of our university, and think, compared to any university in Canada, it has the most beautiful buildings and campus. Our university hospital associated with the medical college, consisting of some 525 beds, has attracted the best medical men from all over the world, and gives promise of being one of the great health centres in Canada—we hope in the future comparable to the Mayo Clinic in the United States of America.

Saskatoon is not only an agricultural centre and a railway centre, but has shown a steady increase in industrial expansion. We have one of the largest potash plants in Canada, and a multitude of smaller industries, numbering in all some 265. We have a very active Board of Trade which, along with other groups, has worked hard to attract industries to the city and to Saskatchewan.

It is only a few years back that our province was engaged almost exclusively in agriculture, but that is not true now. Agriculture is still one of our main occupations, and due to our excellent land, agriculture in our province will always be of the utmost importance. Our wheat production is around $300 million annually, and livestock and similar products, around $200 million annually. This gives agriculture a total of $500 million—or half a billion. However, manufacturing totals reached about $327 million in 1958, construction amounted to some $383 million, and tourists accounted for another $15 million.

In the past five years Saswatchewan's mineral production has risen to a point where the province now stands fourth in Canada. Ontario leads with 37.7 per cent; Quebec, 17.4 per cent; Alberta, 15.9 per cent. Saskatchewan has 10 per cent of the total mineral production in Canada. Our mineral production has risen from $24,550,584 in 1946 to $213,721,000 in 1958.

In 1958 residents of Saskatchewan paid out more than $41 million in income tax, and 63 per cent of the wage earners reported a taxable income.

Retail sales in Saskatchewan were up 5.3 per cent in 1958, compared with a national increase of 2.1 per cent. Retail sales reached an all time high in 1958, amounting to $883,-392,876, compared to $848 million in round figures in 1957. Purchases per person increased by approximately $43. Automobile dealers had sales in 1958 amounting to $181 million, compared to $177 million in 1957. I could go on citing other increases.

The only decrease I am aware of is that of service station operators, whose income went down from about $2 million to $50,600. This could be accounted for by the fact that we had more new automobiles in 1958.

Mention was made in this debate of some statements made by James Muir, Chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada. I notice at page 10 of the annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada—being a report of the annual meeting of shareholders at Montreal, January 8, 1959—that the profits for the year for the Royal Bank after providing for depreciation and income tax are given in the amount of $15,868,329. This compares to something just over $13 million in 1957.

I would like to refer to page 11 of the Royal Bank of Canada Review of conditions, which is a supplement to the Report of the Proceedings of January 8, 1959.

Other developments on the prairies during 1958 which are of great economic interest include the possibilities for developing the northern parts of Manitoba, two major projects planned for Saskatchewan, and an irrigation project in Alberta.

Then further, on the same page:

Of considerable interest to Saskatchewan was the decision reached during the year to go ahead with the South Saskatchewan River dam. It is estimated that the project, the largest of its kind ever undertaken in Canada, will take anywhere from six to eight years to complete. Another important development in Saskatchewan concerns the establishment of a $15 million steel plant in Regina.

I would like to stress the importance of the South Saskatchewan River dam. I do not do this from a narrow provincial viewpoint as I sincerely believe that it is a nation-building project in the same sense that the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway is not beneficial to only one part of Canada, but to all of Canada.

I can do no better than refer to a pamphlet just issued by the federal Department of Agriculture on the South Saskatchewan River dam. It lists the purpose of the dam as follows:

1. Stabilize agriculture in the region through irrigation and provision of more dependable water supplies.
2. Provide hydro-electric power.
3. Provide a more abundant supply of good water for domestic and industrial purposes.
4. Reduce flood hazards on the river through better regulation.
5. Create greater facilities for recreation and other amenities of pleasurable living.

Then the pamphlet goes on, and under the heading South Saskatchewan River Dam highlights it says:

1. The South Saskatchewan River Dam will be the largest rolled-earth dam ever built in Canada and one of the larger dams of its kind in the world.
2. The amount of excavation required to build the dam would make a hole in the ground a city block square 1½ miles deep.
3. The dam will rise above the bed of the River 210 feet, or equivalent in height to a 17 storey office building.
4. Enough steel will be used in the dam to make a ⅜ inch steel rod long enough to stretch around the earth.
5. The cement needed would fill to capacity 3,000 freight cars.
6. The concrete used would build a 2 lane super highway from Regina to Prince Albert in Saskatchewan a distance of approximately 225 miles.
7. The diversion tunnels will be large enough for trains to pass through.

Saskatchewan has emerged as a community with character and confidence flushed with the wholesome pride of standing achievement in social and economic affairs.

The population is of varied racial origin with less than 50 per cent with Anglo-Saxon background. Fifty per cent have their origin in Germany, the Ukraine, Scandinavia, French Canada, Holland, Russia, Hungary and Poland. All these people have become fused in common effort, in common environment and in common outlook. I think that the good traditions for the old lands have blended in the new environment to give the people of Saskatchewan vigour and individuality.

I believe, honourable senators, that not only in Saskatchewan but in all of Canada, we are all Canadians—not English, or French, or German, or Ukrainian—each contributing to this nation the best from our varied backgrounds. My opinion is that only as Canadians in that sense can we ensure the prosperity of this great country and the prosperity and safety of the Commonwealth.

It has been mentioned in this house and in the press that I am the first senator that was born in the Ukraine. My father came to Canada in the fall of 1906 and my mother waited for me to be born, in January of 1907. I arrived in Canada with my mother in March 1907, at the mature age of two months. It may be proper for me at this point to make brief mention of Canadians of Ukrainian descent. While people from the Ukraine migrated to the United States of America from 1870 on, there was no migration to Canada until the year 1891. Before that time the Ukrainians remained rooted in their ancestral soil, the region north of the Black Sea.

In the Ukraine over 40 million people speak Ukrainian, a distinctive Slavic language. While the area of settlement and occupation has changed at different times the Ukrainians now inhabit the same region in Europe which their ancestors have held for over a thousand years. The city of Kiev is the ancient capital and traditional centre of cultural life.

Today, as always in the past, the Ukraine is an important factor in the European situation because of the size of its population, the extent of the territory, the richness of its resources and its strategic position with reference to the Black Sea and the constant battle of Ukrainians in Europe for freedom. For centuries in the past the Ukrainians in Europe have resisted exploitation and conquest from their immediate neighbours. The various upheavals in Europe impelled individuals and groups from the Ukraine to migrate beyond their homelands.

There are now over 600,000 settled in the United States and there are over 400,000 Canadians of Ukrainian descent in Canada, the vast majority of them having been born in Canada.

There are only a couple of other items I would like to deal with. The Speech from the Throne, amongst other important subjects that it deals with has this to say:

> My ministers have been gratified to see the all-time record in house construction which has been made possible by Government loans under the National Housing Act. They will recommend to you further amendments to that act to continue this program and to encourage the flow of private funds into mortgages.

Housing is the best way to build this nation. It is most encouraging to see the Government taking a strong stand in regard to housing.

At first $250 million was made available for the construction of small houses. Twice after that the amount was increased, first by $150 million and then by $350 million, and this year the Government proposes to increase the amount by a further $250 million. As the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) said yesterday, the situation today is that house building is now the most important industry. This program not only provides employment but, even more important, it gives young Canadians a chance to own their own homes and raise their families under favourable conditions.

As was also pointed out yesterday, there is today an excellent market for houses, and it is significant that banks and lending institutions have informed C.M.H.C. that there will be about the same amount of money put up by these companies for mortgage lending in 1959. I believe that in its housing policy the Government is building Canada. I cannot leave this subject without expressing my admiration for the efficient and far-sighted manner in which C.M.H.C. has handled the housing policy. Only a few days ago I had the opportunity of being shown through the main offices of C.M.H.C. in this city, and I was happy to learn and see that they are doing a much bigger job than I realized from reading the news in making this a great country.

May I be permitted to say a word in connection with the cancellation of the Arrow production, about which there appears to be so much controversy. My feeling is that many issues are being dragged in that only make things more difficult as far as this problem is concerned. The fact is that the Arrow production was cancelled because, on the best advice the Government obtained, the Arrow would have been obsolete by the time it was completed. The Government had to make a decision whether it should commit itself to the expenditure of perhaps $1 billion of the taxpayers' money for an airplane which, on the word of its defence experts, would have little defence value when two or three years from now it came off the line or, whether it should have the courage to cancel the Arrow production.

I agree with what the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) said, that the Government made the right decision and showed courage in doing it. I feel that the concern shown by the opposition in the other house and in this house about the 13,800 workers of the A. V. Roe company is justified, but it is only fair to say that the Government is as much concerned about this problem as anyone else and is doing its utmost to see that employment is found for these workers. If there is any foundation for a news item contained in last night's newspaper, things may not be as bad as we thought for these unfortunate people who find themselves without a job.

However, there have been other issues dragged into this matter that do not concern the main issue at all. There have been wild statements made in the other house about the United States of America having designs on Canadian sovereignty. Even wilder statements have been made outside of both houses.

Last Tuesday, if I read the Senate Hansard correctly, the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) stated in the second column on page 214, as follows:

> A single telegram of a few words pronounced the death knell of more than thousands of jobs. It did more than that, it pronounced the death knell of the last vestige of Canadian autonomy in the realm of military defence.

Further, in the same column towards the end, he stated as follows:

> In other words, we can no longer kid ourselves that we are partners, junior grade, with the United States in the defence of North America. We are about to be integrated into the gigantic military complex of the United States.

Then, on page 216 in the first column, we find this sentence in the honourable senator's speech:

> Today, I think, Canadian-United States relations have reached a new all-time low.

Then, in the second column on page 216, the Senate Hansard reports my honourable friend as follows:

> The much-vaunted western military unity is, as far as Canada is concerned, non-existent. We are hog-tied to the Americans.

It is true that the statements I have referred to above are not as strong as some made in the other house and some made outside of both houses. But, in the first place, I cannot agree with the statements referred to above made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina, and, secondly, I feel that these statements add fuel to the irresponsible statements made elsewhere regarding Canadian sovereignty.

Now, what is the situation that arrests the attention of the nations of the west in regard to mutual defence?

If we canvass in our hearts the situation in the world today, we cannot help but see that a division of international sentiment into two camps has taken place. In the main, those peoples of the world who love the institutions of democracy as we have built them throughout centuries are feeling as one and are seeking to act as one for the purpose of preserving our way of life which we value even more than our lives; and against these, or contrasted with them, there is one country, and one country alone, who, while doing lip service to peace, has revived that worship of the kingdom of might and the horror of war which, not so long ago, almost crushed our civilization.

Throughout these difficult years we have been proud to witness the United States, Great Britain, France and Canada standing together as one, exerting their every ingenuity and power to hold fast the fabric of world civilization and to prevent the outbreak of another war, which too often has seemed impending. Even this day we are living through the Berlin crisis. Is this the time to be raising doubt and apprehension and acting as if we were afraid that the United States might conquer Canada? For over 100 years our leaders have not quarrelled, and we have lived as independent nations but on friendly terms and with much in common in our way of life.

If, in this time of crisis, when we really should co-operate as free nations of the world, we raise suspicion instead of doing something to be of help to each other, what chance has democracy to survive?

If we are partners for the purpose of preserving our freedoms and our very existence, then let us behave the way partners behave when they have a common purpose and when they know that purpose is right. Let us, at least in these matters of mutual defence, act in a spirit of common interest and not in a spirit of suspicion that our great and friendly neighbour to the south of us has designs to interfere with our sovereignty.

It is perhaps worth recording in part the editorial of the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, February 24. I quote:

> A sovereign nation is a nation which, within its own territories, makes and administers its own laws, which within its own legislatures and courts, and without external interference, deals with the fortunes, the property, the civil rights of its citizens.
>
> Does Canada, by ceasing to build this Arrow plane, by integrating her defence with that of the U.S., lose these rights?
> For an answer, let us look at Britain. Did Britain lose her sovereignty, cease to be a sovereign state, when throughout most of World War II she had a million U.S. troops on her soil?
>
> And is Britain compounding her loss of sovereignty when, in peacetime, right at this hour, she permits her island to be dotted with U.S. air bases and her skies to be used by U.S. planes?

Further on it says:

> What our hysterical people are doing is confusing loss of sovereignty with interdependence.

The editorial concludes thus:

But, seeing and rightly discussing these things, let us not lose sight of the clear fact that all we have done with respect to the Arrow plane is to stop spending money which we couldn't afford for a weapon we didn't need—and above all let's not start making fools of ourselves over having "lost our sovereignty".

For the last is just plain hysteria,—that plus the gibberish of the demagogues or fools.

I wish to refer to only one more item. Recently I noticed in Saturday Night of January 31, 1959, under the heading of "Comment of the Day", the first paragraph, which has another sub-heading, "Cut the Opening", and then, this:

Does the opening of the Canadian Parliament need all the folderol that now goes with it? Does the Governor General really need to drive through the icy streets of Ottawa in such a pretentiously obsolete vehicle as a "closed landau"? And does Black Rod have to tramp down all those long corridors to bring the Commons jostling into the Senate to hear a speech written by one of the Commons' own members?

Surely we in Canada have not come to the stage when we want to abolish the few shreds of tradition that we have. To me that would be equal to erasing the memory of our parents, and the memory of our ancestors, because they do not belong to the rock and roll age. Today there seems to be in certain quarters some feeling that it is almost a sin to value tradition and to value things that are worth while in the past. This article concludes in this manner:

Parliament is in fact a vigorous, vital and essential part of our democratic system.

Now I cannot disagree with that. But the writer comes to this startling conclusion.

If it appears quaint and archaic to people across the country—particularly those people who have no Anglo-Saxon background—then its vitality will be sapped.

Surely whoever wrote that article does not realize that all Canadians owe something to their history, and they all value tradition; and let us hope that we do not, as suggested by this article, wipe out all traditions.

In conclusion, I would like again to express my appreciation to all the members of this chamber for the particularly warm, courteous and sincere welcome to myself, as a newcomer in this house.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Dessureault, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

PACIFIC STANDARD LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to incorporate Pacific Standard Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, a company called the British Pacific Casualty Company was founded by a private act of the Legislature of British Columbia on March 1, 1913. World War I intervened and the company did not get under way and do any business. In 1921 the name of the company was changed to British Pacific Insurance Company. Again the company ran into difficulties and did not do any business. On April 1, 1945, the company was taken over by a group of British Columbia businessmen and it started doing business. From 1945 to December 1949 the company engaged principally in fire and casualty insurance, though its charter permitted the sale of all classes of insurance. During this period the company's experience was adverse in fire and casualty insurance, so it reinsured all such business on January 1, 1950, and majored in accident and health insurance. This business turned out to be profitable.

The company is now licensed to do business in the five provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

The company has enjoyed a very substantial increase in premium income since 1950 and now feels that it would be in its best interests to enter the field of life insurance. This decision came about because the company was losing a great many of its salesmen to life insurance companies which offered the facilities of life, accident and health insurance. Another reason for the company wanting to get into this line of insurance was that provincial agencies and institutions were cutting in on the accident and health insurance field. However, the company found it was required to have a dominion charter before some of the provinces would give it a licence to go into business. The company is now requesting such a charter by way of this legislation.

Before getting into the life insurance business the company had to raise additional capital. It was unsuccessful in its attempts to do so through brokerage houses in this country and a local group in British Columbia. However, an American company located in Los Angeles, the Beneficial Standard Life Insurance Company, offered to purchase all the shares of the British Pacific Insurance Company; this proposition was accepted by 100 per cent of the shareholders of the latter company, and the sale was consummated. At the same time the company offered options which are being held by the officers of the present company. In fact, all the shareholders may participate in the company through buying shares in the parent company. The Pacific Standard Life Insurance Company will be a wholly-owned subsidiary of the American company and the shares that are bought by the present shareholders of this company will be held in the parent company.

If this bill is approved, the board of directors of the company will be Harry J. Seed, President of British Pacific Insurance Company; J. M. Burnett, Executive Vice-President, British Pacific Insurance Company; C. T. Ruddell, Vice-President and Director of Agencies, British Pacific Insurance Company, and Esmond Lando, barrister and solicitor, all Canadians. The American directors will be: E. D. Mitchell, Chairman of the Board of the Beneficial Standard Life Insurance Company of Los Angeles, J. N. Mitchell, Executive Vice-President, of the same company, and Henry Attias, Vice-President and General Counsel for the same company.

Honourable senators, this company is asking for a charter which will take over all the business of the present company. The name of the company seeking to be incorporated is Pacific Standard Life Insurance Company. The reason for this change in name from British Pacific Insurance Company is that the company intends to do business in the northwest United States, the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Minnesota, and perhaps some bordering states. The company thinks it is a good idea to have the names of the present companies incorporated so that it will be using the name "Standard" from the "Beneficial Standard Life Insurance Company", and the name "Pacific" from the company presently doing business.

As I have said, the Pacific Standard Life Insurance Company will be a wholly-owned subsidiary. The new owners have expressed their intention to expand the operations of the company. They have agreed that when this company is chartered they will put forward $1 million, and later sufficient capital to carry on any extension of their operations. At the present time there is no home office of a life insurance company in British Columbia. The home office of this company will be in Vancouver. The company expects to make a very substantial investment in the province; it expects to employ several hundreds of people as clerks, agents and brokers in that province, and to extend further across the dominion as business increases.

This company obtained a charter on two former occasions, but did not operate. I wanted to be sure, therefore, that these people were not just brokers trying to get a charter and intending to peddle it later. I have before me a telegram from the company, stating in effect that if this bill passes they will put up $1 million in order to carry on. The company can then go into business immediately. There is already an existing business in operation, and the new company would take over that business. I understand the premium income at the present time is in the neighbourhood of $2½ million to $3 million. This is the basis on which it would start. However, a life insurance business is required to have a very substantial reserve. This matter has been discussed with the Superintendent of Insurance.

If this bill is given second reading I will suggest that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce before which the Superintendent of Insurance, as well as one of the principal officers of the company, could be called to answer any questions put by honourable senators. They could answer them far better than I can, since I am not in the insurance business. I have no interest in this company, and know only what I have been told.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask a question, in a very friendly spirit? Is it not very unusual for a company to start business in this way? Section 8 reads as follows:

> The act shall come into force on a date to be specified by the Superintendent of Insurance in a notice in the Canada Gazette.

When bills, either private or public, do not come into effect when they are signed, it is usual to have them brought into effect by order in council. Section 8 goes on to say:

> Such notice shall not be given until this act has been approved by resolution adopted by at least two-thirds of the votes of the members of the provincial company present or represented by proxy at a meeting duly called for that purpose,...

I believe it is usual to have that resolution passed before an application for incorporation is even lodged, and not to wait until after the act has been passed before the shareholders consent. The section further says:

> ...nor until the Superintendent of Insurance has been satisfied by such evidence as he may require that such approval has been given...

I think we ought to know that now, before we pass this bill.

> ...and that the provincial company has ceased to transact the business...

Hon. Mr. McKeen: As far as I know, those steps have already been taken, the Superintendent of Insurance has approved them, and the resolutions have been passed. I cannot give a complete guarantee of that, but I have been assured that all the preliminaries have been attended to. The Chief Clerk of Committees of the Senate has checked the petition and says that it is in order.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Mr. McKeen, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN GENERAL COUNCIL OF BOY SCOUTS ASSOCIATION— SECOND READING

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved the second reading of Bill S-13, respecting The Canadian General Council of The Boy Scouts Association.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill seeks an amendment to section 8 of chapter 130 of the statutes of 1914 respecting the Canadian General Council of The Boy Scouts Association. The sole purpose of the amendment is to remove for the future and retroactively the monetary limitations on the annual value of the real estate held for the use, occupation and benefit of the corporation. That limitation is included in section 8 of the original act of 1914.

The body corporate of the Boys Scouts Association in Canada is the Canadian General Council which, as I have said, was incorporated in 1914. Among other things, this act gave the corporation power to set up provincial and other councils and to make regulations under which they should operate. In the earlier years of this century an attempt was made to record centrally all property as it was acquired, but as the movement grew this became an impossibility. Scout groups, in some cases, now own their own premises, and most districts, particularly those employing a staff, have acquired offices and campsites of their own. Most provinces have their own central offices and campsites, and the Canadian General Council, which is located here in the Capital city of Ottawa, owns its present headquarters on Metcalfe street, and also property on which a new headquarters building is to be erected in the near future. In addition, it owns a property in the Gatineau woods, which is rented each year to provide income.

It is interesting and worth while noting that up until this time this body has not made a national public appeal for funds; it has shared in the proceeds of the annual campaigns for the Community Chests in various localities, and also has received many private bequests from individual citizens.

Honourable senators, I have in my hand a list of places where property is located, the character of the property, and its estimated value. With the consent of the Senate, I should like to have this list placed on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Incidentally, the total value of the property listed is nearly $2 million. The list, which is by no means complete, serves to show the extent to which property is held and the need for amending the act of incorporation to bring it in line with the realities of the existing organization.

I think it is opportune to say a word about the character and work of the Boy Scouts Association, although I am sure most of us are pretty intimately acquainted with the value of the services rendered by this organization in every part of this country. I suppose it is not going too far to say that representatives of the Boy Scouts movement appear in nearly every circle of any consequence in the senior phases of our national life, as well as among the younger generation.

It is now 45 years since the Boy Scouts Association became an incorporated body by act of Parliament of Canada, an event which occurred very soon after that romantic figure General Lord Baden-Powell had inaugurated the Scout movement in Britain. The remarkable growth of this movement in Canada to its present membership of nearly 256,000 is ample proof of the effective interest it has provided for the youth of this country. Unlike so many youth training organizations, the Boy Scouts Association does not confine its activities to urban centres but has reached out to remote hamlets in every part of this country, even to the Eskimos and Indians in our Northwest Territories.

The movement has been adopted by diverse racial and religious groups. Its ranks are open to boys of any faith and any racial background. Its watchword, "Be Prepared", seeks to emphasize two things, duty to God and loyalty to country. Its appeal is even wider than diverse racial and religious groups, for it also serves afflicted youth among the blind, the deaf, and the crippled.

The Boy Scouts program is offered to organizations interested in the development of good citizenship in this country, so that more than 50 other different organizations adopt the Scout program for use as their own program of character building. Sixty per cent of nearly 4,800 Scout groups in Canada are sponsored by churches of a dozen different denominations. Service clubs, schools, home and school associations and many fraternal and civic organizations also sponsor this movement. Today more than a quarter of a million boys are receiving this training under more than 25,000 dedicated leaders.

I think it is worth noting that at the time when much is said and printed about juvenile delinquency, the Boy Scouts movement stands out as a strikingly helpful and wholesome influence. The Boy Scouts Association, because of its system of sponsorship and its ability to take its program to the smallest communities in Canada, is today the outstanding agency in Canada in youth training and character building.

Because of these great objects, I have pleasure in moving the second reading of this bill, which is designed to encourage and extend the work that has been so well performed during the past 45 years. I shall be pleased, with the consent of the Senate, to move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further enlightenment, if so desired.

Hon. Mr. Power: May I be permitted to ask a question? Will the honourable senator sponsoring this bill say whether or not the increase in the value of the assets—now amounting to some $2,500,000 in comparison with the limit of $50,000 provided for in its act of incorporation—is due to inflation?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I think possibly the open-end feature of this association has brought about that increase and provides the answer to my friend. I might point out that precedents for the passage of this bill have been established during the past two or three years. One bill that we put through last year amended the act of incorporation of the Salvation Army; a similar bill dealt with the value of real estate owned by the Red Cross Association. So there is nothing unusual in this amendment, particularly as it brings the operation of the Boy Scouts Association into line with its charter.

Hon. Mr. Power: It makes the law meet the case, not the case meet the law.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lambert, bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

PRIVATE BILL

CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF HOLY FAMILY OF BORDEAUX— SECOND READING

Hon. Gustave Monette, for Hon. Léon Méthot, moved the second reading of Bill S-14, to incorporate the Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Bordeaux.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is promoted by the Congrégation des Sœurs de la Sainte-Famille au Canada. This is an existing unincorporated religious body. It is a Roman Catholic Order, a contemplative, religious and missionary organization in character. It petitions now to be incorporated to pursue social, welfare, educational, hospital and medical services. Incorporation is asked for by a number of petitioners, all of whom are sisters in the religious sense, and who call themselves "mothers" in that sense, under the name of "Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Bordeaux", and the French translation follows.

Section 2 of the bill provides that the persons named in section 1 shall be the first directors and constitute the first Board of Directors of the corporation.

Section 3 (1) provides that:

> The head office of the corporation shall be in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, or at such other place in Canada as may be designated by the Corporation.

The objects of the corporation are set out in section 4. May I point out to honourable senators that these powers are to be granted subject to the laws in force in Canada, which include the federal laws and the laws of any province in which the corporation operates. It seeks to do its work throughout Canada. The objects are enumerated as follows:

> (a) to provide educational facilities;
> (b) to establish and maintain orphanages;
> (c) to promote the contemplative life;
> (d) to care for and treat sick, wounded, indigent and other persons requiring such care;
> (e) to carry on missionary work;
> (f) to create, erect, organize, maintain, enlarge and operate, or direct and administer, within Canada, monasteries, hospitals with medical, surgical, pharmaceutical, clinical, laboratory, examination, research and experimental services, premises for patients under observation, homes for the convalescent and quarters for physicians, dispensaries, orphanages, homes for the aged, institutes, sanatoriums, schools or institutions for nurses and assistant-nurses, maternal care assistants, male nurses and assistant male nurses,—

I mention male nurses in passing, not because they are more important than others.

> —and to award such persons efficiency certificates under such terms and conditions as may be determined by the corporation;
> (g) to create, erect, organize, maintain, enlarge and operate or direct and administer, within Canada, teaching and educational institutions, such as colleges, schools, academies and institutes and to award pupils such certificates on such conditions as are determined by the corporation.

I think in fairness I should call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that the powers asked for with respect to the creation and erection of institutions, and for the direction of them, is not restricted to the general purposes. This question may be discussed in committee, if necessary, although I do not invite discussion. The enumeration of the objects continues:

> (h) to create, erect, organize, maintain, enlarge and operate or direct and administer within Canada, rest and retreat houses, social services, homes for young girls and other persons and other similar undertakings;

(i) to promote the development of medical and surgical science in general;

(j) to create, maintain, administer and develop institutions for the teaching of medical technology and to maintain therein laboratories, clinics, museums and such other facilities as may be required or useful for the establishment, maintenance and advancement of the teaching of hygiene and of medical techniques;

(k) to establish and organize medical bureaus consisting of physicians and surgeons attached to hospitals established and administered by the corporation;

Section 5 contains additional powers which I think are incidental to those already mentioned. They are as follows:

5. Subject to the laws in force in Canada, the corporation may:

(a) enter into agreements with members of medical and surgical colleges, universities and other recognized medical centers, with school commissions, associations of teachers, governmental institutions and others;

(b) establish and organize, in hospitals and in the teaching and other institutions administered by the corporation, boards or governors or benefactors, the members of which shall act in an advisory capacity and in conformity with the rules and regulations of the corporation;

(c) acquire the real or personal property of any other corporation having objects similar to those of the corporation on the assumption of all the obligations of such corporation.

Section 6 would provide the following powers with respect to the acquisition and holding of property:

6. (1) The corporation may purchase, take, have, hold, receive, possess, retain and enjoy property, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal, and any or every estate or interest whatsoever given, granted, devised, mortgaged or bequeathed to it, or appropriated, purchased or acquired by it in any manner or way whatsoever, to, for or in favour of the uses and purposes of the corporation or to, for or in favour of any religious, education, eleemosynary or other institution established or intended to be established by, under the management of, or in connection with, the uses or purposes of the corporation.

(2) The corporation may also hold such real property or estate therein as is bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts or judgments recovered.

Section 7 provides for investment in and disposal of property, and it is expressed in general terms.

Section 8 deals with the application of mortmain laws, and reads as follows:

8. In regard to any real property which, by reason of its situation or otherwise, is subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, a licence in mortmain shall not be necessary for the exercise of the powers granted by this Act, but otherwise the exercise of the said powers shall in any province of Canada be subject to the laws of such province as to the acquisition and holding of lands by religious corporations in so far as this Act applies to the corporation.

Section 9 provides for the creation of a Board of Directors which shall control and administer the business and affairs of the corporation. Subsection 3 of that section provides that the board may, —make, amend and repeal such by-laws, rules, orders and regulations, not contrary to law, as the Board may deem appropriate for the conduct and government of the Corporation and its members—

Subsection 4 reads:

In particular, without limiting the generality of subsection (3), the board may make, amend and repeal by-laws, rules, orders and regulations concerning

(a) the requirements for admission to and continuance in membership of the corporation, and the rights and duties of such members.

Therefore, the continuity of the corporation is assured by this subsection. It continues:

(b) the duration of the tenure and the mode of appointment of the members of the board and the filling of any vacancy occurring on the board, whether such vacancy is caused by death, resignation or otherwise;

(c) the calling and holding of meetings of the board and fixing the quorum thereof.

Section 10 contains this important provision:

In so far as authorization by the Parliament of Canada is necessary, any person or corporation in whose name any property, real or personal, is held in trust or otherwise for the use and purposes of the corporation, or any such person or corporation to whom any such property devolves, may, subject always to the terms and conditions of any trust relating to such property, transfer such property, or any part thereof, to the corporation.

Section 11 deals with the disposition of property by gift or loan. It provides that:

The corporation may make a gift of or lend any of its property, whether real or personal, for or to assist in the erection or maintenance of any building or buildings deemed necessary or useful for any church, college, school or hospital or for any other religious, charitable, educational, congregational or social purpose upon such terms and conditions as it may deem expedient.

Section 12 deals with the investment of funds, and its provisions are expressed in general terms.

Section 13 has to do with borrowing powers. It empowers the corporation to borrow money on the credit of the corporation and make, draw, accept, endorse or become party to promissory notes and bills of exchange; every such note or bill made, drawn, accepted or endorsed by the party thereto shall be presumed to have been properly authorized.

The corporation would also be empowered to issue bonds, and mortgage, hypothecate or pledge any property.

Subsection 2 is important:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the corporation to issue any note or bill payable to bearer thereof, or any promissory note intended to be circulated as money or as the note or bill of a bank, or to engage in the business of banking or insurance.

One might not expect that the corporation would issue notes or engage in business; but anyhow, that power is there.

Section 14 gives in general terms the powers incidental to the other powers; and the last paragraph, which is important, states that the corporation may pursue its objects and exercise its rights and powers in any part of Canada.

It may be desirable to send this bill to a committee, and if so, I would ask that it be referred to the Miscellaneous Private Bills committee.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Before the bill receives second reading may I say to the sponsor that the objects set forth in it are very worth while indeed, and I wish to commend all those who are going to carry out these objects. I think it is some time since we have had in this house a bill whose purpose is to enable an organization to do generally such worth while work. I gather from what the sponsor has said that much of it will be in connection with the establishment of homes and of hospitals. He has told the house that an unincorporated organization is doing this at the present time and that the purpose of the bill is to incorporate this organization. Can the honourable gentleman inform us if there are similar institutions operating throughout Canada?

Hon. Mr. Monette: The organization which desires to be incorporated exists as a religious congregation carrying on social welfare services and especially hospital and medical services. That is, I believe it is doing so, though I am unable to make a definite statement on the point. I am not the original sponsor of the bill; I was asked to sponsor it in the absence of the honourable senator from Shawinigan (Hon. Mr. Méthot). I will obtain the information and have it ready for the committee. My honourable friend inquired if there are similar organizations throughout Canada. There are many that are co-operating with hospitals, universities and doctors and furnishing, under charitable control, if I may say so, social services, which are performed by qualified persons.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I may mention that the Sisters of Mercy have the only women's university in Canada, Mount St. Vincent, at Halifax, and they are also active with hospitals and a large number of primary schools.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators have probably heard of the Sisters of Providence in Montreal, who are almost a state by themselves, if a small one. They have a great asylum for insane people. They have all the services that one can expect. I have just been reminded that they are in Quebec City too. It has been a privilege of our province to have had the services of nuns, for which we do not pay too much. They are devoted to charitable institutions of this kind and have made possible the development of many institutions of social welfare in the province.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Has the congregation been established for some years? Is it an old institution?

Hon. Mr. Monette: That, again, I could not answer definitely.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: May I ask one or two questions of the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette)? I know that he is very well informed on constitutional matters. As a matter of fact, I first met him, many years ago, in a constitutional battle before the Privy Council, in England.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Were we not met on that occasion by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris)?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, the three of us were there at that time.

I see in this bill a number of items which just give me a pause—that is all—as to the constitutionality of the incorporation which is proposed. In section 4 it is stated that, subject to the laws in force in Canada, the corporation has the power to provide educational facilities. But by the British North American Act education is reserved to the provinces. It is also provided that the corporation shall "promote the development of medical and surgical science in general," which is entirely within provincial control. Also I see, in section 6, that the corporation is given power to possess property "in favour of any religious, educational, eleemosynary or other institution established or intended to be established".

Now, eleemosynary institutions are expressly reserved to the jurisdiction of the provinces under the British North American Act. Section 11 of the bill authorizes the corporation to make gifts to educational institutions, colleges, schools and so on. I am just wondering whether we are trespassing on the rights of the provinces and whether we have complete authority to incorporate a company for such purposes. I am not saying we have not such authority, but I would like to have the opinion of the honourable senator from Mille Isles on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Monette: If I am not mistaken, I believe the question as to whether the powers granted under this legislation are sufficient to satisfy any particular province could be solved by recourse to the rights of the two Authorities, that is, the province and the dominion. A corporation created by the federal Authority would have certain powers but, to exercise those powers in a particular province, the corporation would have to apply to that province to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it not the practice of the Companies Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State not to grant incorporations to companies whose purpose is educational? I think I have run into that sort of thing in the course of my practice.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Surely there are religious institutions which receive similar powers. The question whether there are many such institutions which obtain their incorporation from the federal Authority, I am unable to answer. I think an incorporation from the federal Authority under section 91 of the British North American Act could exercise its powers created by the federal Authority, but, if in a province, it would need to go to the second or provincial Authority. I do not believe that one Authority could create a company and give it powers which it could exercise in another jurisdiction, where the authority of the other jurisdiction is needed.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, as my name has been mentioned I think I should join in this discussion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Decidedly.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The remarks of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) would seem to raise some serious question about federal companies, for most powers that are given to federal companies could be said to come under property and civil rights. I am inclined to think that the honourable gentleman who explained this bill (Hon. Mr. Monette) is right in the distinction he has made, but I would point out that, if there is any doubt about it, we cannot settle it here today. Now that the question has been raised it may provide for some interesting discussion when the bill is in committee.

Hon. Mr. Monette: What if we reversed the position? Suppose we incorporated a company here without giving it certain powers and it went before the Legislature in, say, Quebec, to ask for the right to exercise those certain powers in that province? The Legislature could say: "Well, you have not got those powers in your own act of incorporation. We would be willing to grant you the right to excercise the powers in this province if they had been given to the company by the federal Parliament".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to emphasize that I did not attack the bill in any way, nor did I express any firm opinion. I merely asked for the opinion of my honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette). I do know that our Companies Branch declines to authorize the incorporation of companies whose objectives are educational. Nevertheless, I am satisfied to vote for this bill on second reading and to have it referred to committee, where I am sure great care will be taken to solve the question and to assure honourable senators that we are not overstepping our rights.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

PRIVATE BILL

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—COMMONS AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-8, an Act respecting The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendment was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

Page 3, lines 28 to 35, inclusive. Delete clause 3 and substitute therefor the following:

"3. Each of the three thousand shares of the company issued and outstanding and having a par value of one hundred dollars is hereby subdivided into ten shares having a par value of ten dollars each, so that the capital stock of the company now issued and outstanding shall consist of thirty thousand shares having a total par value of three hundred thousand dollars."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Next sitting.

BRITISH WEST INDIES

ECONOMIC MISSION OF CANADIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will draw the attention of the Senate to the Economic Mission of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to the British West Indies, and will place before the Senate information obtained in the discussions with representatives of industry and government in Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados and British Guiana which has a relation to policy of the Government of Canada in that area.

He said: Honourable senators, I feel it will be of interest for me to bring to your attention a recent Canadian Economic Mission to the British West Indies. It was my privilege to be a member of that Mission, which was under the sponsorship of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. The main objective was to assist in the development of increased trade between Canada and the British West Indies. In the Canadian membership there were eight representatives of commercial organizations of national importance, seven of banks, eleven of leading manufacturing industries, six of distributing companies and seven representing transportation, insurance and communication services. It was fortunate that the Mission had accompanying it the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. J. A. Roberts, and also Mr. C. R. Stollmeyer, Commissioner to Canada from the Federated West Indies, British Guiana and British Honduras. The President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Mr. A. C. Ashforth, was the head of the mission and rendered outstanding service. The Canadian organization's counterpart, the Incorporated Chamber of Commerce of the British Caribbean, led by their President, Mr. A. C. Hale, was most co-operative, as were the chambers of commerce and heads of government in each of the meeting places. The meetings were held over a period of nearly three weeks in Jamaica, Trinidad, British Guiana and Barbados. It was very appropriate that the arrival of the Mission in Jamaica was timed for the opening of the Canadian Trade Fair at Kingston. That was a most impressive event, and it has already been described very fully by the honourable senator from Southern New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McLean) in this house.

In each of the places visited discussions were held by joint committees of representatives from Canada and the West Indies on specific subjects. The subjects discussed were exports from Canada to the West Indies, imports from West Indies to Canada, tourist development, exchange problems, investment and technical assistance, transportation and communications. There was a full and very frank exchange of views on what is required to build up trade in the mutual interest. No punches were held at any time in pointing out the neglects and failures by either side. The viewpoint punches were sometimes softened by the free-for-all rum punches hospitably passed out by our friendly hosts.

The discussions resulted in the gathering of much information and in an exchange of views which, it is hoped, will be helpful in influencing sound trade policy as directly applicable to business and governments in both areas.

In the words of the President, Mr. Ashforth, the purpose of the Mission was:

—to develop closer relations between Canada and the West Indies and to determine at first hand the problems involved in expanding and developing trade between the two countries.

To continue with his statement:

Canadian businessmen realize the new Federation needs to earn more dollars, needs more investment and also technical assistance to build up its economy—the more prosperous this economy, the more attaractive is the market for Canadian goods.

It is apropos also to refer to a statement in the Barbados Advocate to the effect:

That the Mission was the result of an invitation extended to Canadians when representatives of Canada attended the inauguration of the federal Parliament last year in Port of Spain, Trinidad.

It was also a logical following up of the discussions of the Commonwealth Trade Conference of 1958, which dealt with the development of West Indies trade.

As I mentioned a moment ago, the welcome given to our delegation was very warm and meaningful; and, to use the words of the Prime Minister, Sir Grantley Adams:

As close as relationship is between us, still closer ties are desirable.

It was also expressed that next to the United Kingdom, Canada has the closest traditional trading relations with the British West Indies. That began in the trading of lumber and flour in the early period of settlement in eastern Canada and was preceded in the still earlier years by salted codfish shipped from Newfoundland, which was paid for chiefly by sugar, rum and molasses.

As a matter of general background of what I want to deal with, I shall refer for a moment to the Federation itself. As you know, British Guiana and British Honduras have so far remained outside of the Federation. While the other colonies have entered into union with each other, that union in some practical aspects is still very indefinite and indecisive as we in Canada consider federation of provinces. Each of the colonies has its own advantages and disadvantages in relation to the other. The normal differences in the economy and outlook in the colonies still results in customs tariffs and immigration laws being maintained between the various units. While these trade and population restrictive movements still exist, an over-all Canadian trade policy as between governments is somewhat difficult.

Currency matters were brought up for discussion everywhere we went. There are two currencies: the sterling of Jamaica, and the West Indies dollar for the other areas. That in itself does not create difficulty, because the relative values are fixed. The over-all decisions regarding currency clearances for imports requiring dollar payments are made in England. The administration, as far as Canada is concerned, is the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I ask a question? Is there any difference in currency payments as between purchases in Canada and purchases in the United States?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes, there is a very marked difference. West Indies purchases from the United States can be made with far less strings attached for payment than can purchases from Canada. In Canada, except for some basic products, exporters have to arrange for allocation of dollars before shipping, which means actually before the orders can be confirmed.

I will summarize it in this way. A salesman goes to the West Indies from the United States and when he books his orders he or the customer can go to a Government department in Jamaica, Barbados or wherever it is and arrange for the dollar payment. A salesman goes in there from Canada and except for a limited number of articles, as I have said, the sale cannot be confirmed to the customer until the order is reported to the appropriate officials in Ottawa and, after consideration of many factors involved in the policy of currency clearance arrangements, a decision for or against is arrived at. With United States orders the clearance is almost automatic; with Canadian orders it is complex and delayed.

Shipments of Canadians goods with a few commodity exceptions are still on an allocation basis. What is known as the British West Indies Trade Liberalization Plan came into effect in January, 1950, when the sterling area was severely affected by a shortage of hard currency. The Plan could be more correctly identified by calling it the Dollar Liberalization Plan of a token nature. In 1952 the list of products that might be imported from Canada was extended and quotas increased. In recent months some further concessions have been made. What are in effect import permits into the British West Indies are issued to individual Canadian firms and many of them still have a relation to each importer's average annual sales over a base period of 1946 to 1948. There are some essential products, such as flour and fish, which are on Open General Licence and do not require an import permit. In 1957 there were 700 Canadian firms participating in the so-called Trade Liberalization Plan. They were all subject to the scrutiny and complex considerations arising out of preferences for certain commodities and having regard to past records of volume each firm may have shipped. No matter how efficient the administration may be, no one can think up a more frustrating procedure for an exporter who wants to get out and sell more goods. With Canada's imports from the British West Indies being nearly 60 per cent more than exports—as in 1957—it is hard to understand why that system is allowed to exist. How can there be enterprise to sell under such a system? There should be a very firm approach to the United Kingdom authorities to have this corrected.

At joint meetings of the Canadian Mission and the West Indies delegations a motion was passed to the effect that the British West Indies Trade Liberalization Plan has outlived its usefulness, and to meet the present-day requirements the Plan should be terminated, and that in respect of currency provisions there should be complete freedom of trade. Our West Indies counterparts were very strongly in favour of this termination and they are making official representation to their Governments to that effect. There were very definite statements of opinion that trade with Canada should be outside of the general application of sterling contractual agreements. I feel very certain that if that one correction alone in the trading relations could be brought about as a result of these representations, then the Mission will have been of tremendous value.

Another matter on the inter-Governmental level to which I would refer now is the tariff agreements between Canada and the British West Indies. Back in 1898 Canada provided the first tariff preferences. The first Canada-British West Indies Trade Agreement came into effect in 1912. In 1926 there was an agreement whereby the Canadian duties on British West Indies products, excluding alcoholic liquors, should not be more than 50 per cent of duties imposed on similar goods under general tariff rates. The West Indies in turn agreed that their custom duties on Canadian goods should not be more than 50 per cent to 75 per cent on similar products from a foreign country. In 1927 the agreement was tied in with the most-favoured-nation rates. It is a natural conclusion that there was more progressive policy action in Canada in those days in respect to the British West Indies than in recent years. It was in 1926 that the Canadian West Indies Steamship service was set up to augment the mutual tariff arrangements and other mutual concessions, while it was in 1957 that the Canadian National Steamship service was abandoned. It does seem that as and when Federation comes into more practical operation there will be opportunities for further improvement in policy for the extension of our two-way trade with the West Indies.

There have been many public references in our country favouring a customs union between Canada and the West Indies. That unquestionably has to wait for practical consideration until there is internal free trade, a common tariff and uniform customs laws and administration within the Federation itself.

The Commission of Investigation under the leadership of Sir William Croft, which functioned after the London Conference of 1956, recommended a graduated customs union and suggested a transitional period of five years. A great many conflicting interests have to be reconciled before it can be brought into effect. The Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference in Montreal called for a revision of the existing Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement. The full extent of a revision will depend on the progress that will be made toward customs union within the West Indies.

Economic progress of great importance is under way in some of the islands and is far beyond what is generally realized. As an illustration of that progress I would cite the per capita earnings in Jamaica, which have more than doubled in six years. It was stated recently in the Kingston Gleaner that the gross national product of the island had increased 221 per cent from 1950 to 1956. Investment capital from the United States and Canada is contributing greatly to this improvement in the island's economy. Tourist traffic also adds greatly to its progress. The number of tourists to Jamaica, as reported, was 105,000 in 1952, 160,000 in 1957 and about 180,000 in 1958.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Were these Canadians?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Five per cent were Canadians; 95 per cent were from other countries.

Jamaica is served by eight international air lines. In 1954—I mention this just to put on record and bring our minds to bear on the progress which is being made, because it ties in with the opportunities for Canada to do business there—Jamaica had 13 shipping lines using the ports. Now there are 20. With about half the population of the Federated West Indies living in Jamaica, these facts can be taken as indicative of progress generally in the area.

It may be of interest here to mention that while we were in Barbados the Minister of Finance announced that a loan of 2½ million pounds which was put on the London market was taken up immediately; in fact, the applications for subscritpions totalled 50 million pounds, or twenty times the amount of the issue.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What was the interest rate?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I don't know. But what impressed us was the fact that the international credit of that colony was so good as to have an oversubscription of that size.

Some parts of the British Caribbean are gearing up mainly to industrial development, and other parts more to tourist trade. There is a margin of economic safety in that a good balance as between industry and tourist trade is being established. A distinctive mark of progressive policy is the industrial development laws, which lighten taxation for newly-established industries and assist in the education of industrial personnel. I would mention as a further example of progressive outlook that Trinidad, through its Industrial Development Corporation, is now proceeding with a $6 million allocation to lay out an industrial site for future leasing to manufacturers. Jamaica also has a widely operating industrial development organization. The Association of Sugar Estates of British Guiana has a very up-to-date plan in operation for the improvement of educational and general welfare services of its employees.

In the whole of the British West Indies there is a vast extension of educational facilities for the children. A mark of mutual helpfulness which I am sure everyone of us warmly welcomes is that one thousand students of the British West Indies are at present enrolled in Canadian universities.

For many years I had been a frequent visitor to all parts of the West Indies in connection with the Newfoundland-West Indies trade, and it is most interesting to see in recent times the great changes that are taking place in economic and social life in the islands. It is true that, by Western comparisons, there is a tremendous lot yet to be done, but undoubtedly great progress is under way. Don't misunderstand me, I am not trying to show that there is any evidence of an "Eldorado" down there. British Guiana has 20 per cent of its working force unemployed. All I am saying is that a progressive movement of great importance is under way and in our relationship with the West Indies we should keep in line with it.

I have spoken in somewhat general terms on conditions as one observes them in the West Indies. Now I would like to revert more specifically to some of the aspects of Canada-West Indies trade.

Canada's imports from the British Caribbean area in 1957 were of the value of $80 million, and its exports $51 million. Our principal items of import were sugar and molasses, valued at $39 million, and bauxite and aluminum, $32 million. Our exports were far more diversified, the leading items being wheat flour, $8 million; salted and pickled fish, $6 million; textiles, $2½ million.

Canadian exporters are regarded by the West Indies trade as lacking in sales enterprise. I feel sure that the procedure of currency clearances and quota system to which I referred has a lot to do with that. In our discussions, comparisons between the sales promotional efforts of the other countries and Canada were often made. At one conference meeting it was expressed this way: "Our mail boxes are crammed full of catalogues and price lists and offerings from the United States, but practically nothing comes in from Canada. Commercial travellers from the United States are everywhere offering their goods, but we see very few Canadian salesmen."

Perhaps the best illustration one can give of the confusing procedure required for shipment of most lines of goods from Canada to the British West Indies is the fact that, of 96 Canadian firms exhibiting at the Trade Fair, letters of indemnity had to be given for the release of 50 shipments. It would appear that 50 of the exporters who wished to develop trade there did not know the normal requirements, or I should say abnormal requirements, for the entry of goods from Canada into Jamaica. As I said, the free flow of trade is hampered by the continuation of the outdated currency regulations.

The United Kingdom is now doing 25 per cent more import and export trade with the British West Indies than the United States and Canada combined and 2½ times more than that of Canada alone. That may not be too significant, but what does impress one is that between 1949 and 1957 Canada's share of the trade in the Federated territory only has been declining steadily year by year and in those eight years fell from 15 per cent to 10 per cent of their total imports.

A still more impressive fact is the greater decline of Canadian exports to the whole British Caribbean area. In the sum total of imports into the British Caribbean, Canada's percentage of drop-off is alarming. I shall use the period of 1948 to 1956 for the comparisons. During those years Canada's share of total imports fell from about 21 per cent in 1948 to 11 per cent in 1956, a drop of nearly 50 per cent. The United States' share declined from 18 per cent to 16½ per cent, a drop of only 1½ per cent. Imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling areas rose from 44 per cent to 48 per cent, and from foreign countries generally they went up from 17 per cent, to 24½ per cent.

This is really something to think about, when we recall the tremendous increase in the purchasing power of the West Indies in which Canada is not participating. It is ironical that the share of exports to the West Indies should drop off so drastically in a period when Canada's percentage of purchases from these colonies was well maintained.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: May I interrupt to ask the honourable senator a question? Has he any idea on what commodities the purchases fell off?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I was referring to the percentage of fall-off in relation to the sum total of imports in that area and not to a sum total of difference in the yearly sales from Canada. I was remarking on the increased purchasing power of the area, and pointing out that in relation to the growing importations our percentage fell off.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In other words, we did not get our share of the increase?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: That is just the point I am trying to make.

A matter of grave implication came to our attention. It has to do with the fall-off in shipments of wheat flour from Canada to the British West Indies, caused by wheat export subsidies paid by the Government of the United States. The exports of Canadian flour to the area dropped from a value of $9,700,000 in 1956 to $8,200,000 in 1957, a drop of $1½ million in one year. Flour from the United States in the same year increased from a value of $6 million to $7,600,000, almost an exact pick-up of the drop from Canada. A policy had been adopted in the United States to pay exporters a subsidy for the express purpose of outbidding Canadian competition. This subsidy is separate and apart from the usual assistance paid to grain growers. Unquestionably, Canada had to do something about it, and has recently applied an export allowance on flour to meet the American subsidy. About 25 per cent of the drop was recovered in 1958. To regain the export value of 1956 the export allowance might run well over $1 million. The imponderable thing, however, is where this will stop. Will the United States hit back by further increasing its subsidy?

To have Canada and the United States outbidding each other in export subsidies, and particularly on products that are nationally controlled, is a hopeless situation. Surely this calls for some high-level talks and, indeed, some trumpet blasting.

Transportation between Canada and the West Indies was constantly referred to by our West Indies friends at the conferences. The cessation of the Canadian National Steamship services seemed to be a matter of general regret, notwithstanding that there are some very progressive and up-to-date services from Canada to the West Indies. What is not provided is a service to develop an industrial traffic that has great potential value, but which is frustrated and prevented by lack of transportation facilities. In this connection I refer to the need for refrigerated cargo space. To get this important traffic started some public assistance in one form or another should be forthcoming. The development of such an essential industry in these times of modern development should not be retarded just because it may be uneconomic at present for private capital to institute the service.

Supermarkets and cold storage retailing services are spreading everywhere down there. Some American airlines are flying refrigerated cargo planes to the islands every day. The greatest supply source of Atlantic fish—Newfoundland—has no regular direct service, not even for dry cargo, and this is so notwithstanding that fish is the second largest item of exports from Canada. Frozen fillets of fish, packed in Canada and sold to the United States, are shipped to the British West Indies. It definitely requires some public support in order that such a service between Canada and the West Indies may be brought into being to speed up a promising development.

We heard very appreciative comments on the Canadian Government announcement of a grant of $10 million out of which two ships are to be built for the inter-island service in the Caribbean. This grant was referred to by a leading official in the Caribbean as "a gift from a fairy godmother". That fanciful approach can be avoided by working into that "generous gesture" a connecting service for specialized industry, including frozen food products between east coast ports of Canada and the West Indies. Just to give two ships and say "Here, these are a present," is sheer nonsense. To say "We are giving you two ships and we are laying plans to have them used to the mutual advantage of both countries," would be good common sense. That common sense might be best displayed by organizing a connecting service from Canada of a specialized nature. I can say our friends in the West indies would appreciate something properly planned in our mutual interest more than a mere handout.

There are many other matters to which I would like to refer, but I shall use future opportunities for dealing with them from time to time.

In reviewing the matters arising out of the Mission I have frequently expressed opinions as to policy. I want to say that the opinions and views I have expressed are my own and are not to be construed as being the official stand of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce on any such matters. I am not speaking officially for the Chamber, by any means, although I feel quite sure there would be no great objection to anything I have said.

Honourable senators, notwithstanding all the emphasis I have placed on the Canada-West Indies trade, and the strong commonwealth sentiment in which we all share, we must keep a properly balanced outlook on our trading relations elsewhere. I wonder, at times, if the extent of the preference we give on sugar from the British West Indies is fully appreciated by our friends in the West Indies. Canada imports from the British Caribbean 200,000 to 300,000 tons of raw sugar annually. By reason of the preferential duty the price to the refineries in Canada is lower than elsewhere. The price to refineries in New York is 30 per cent higher than in Canada, and in London, England, it is 8 per cent to 10 per cent higher than here. This preferential duty, which does not apply to other areas in the Caribbean, presents the equivalent of a subsidy from Canada of about $5 million a year.

The larger populated areas in the Caribbean, such as Cuba, Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic, Haiti and other places are also very vital to our Canadian trade.

Without lessening our interest in the British West Indies, which I would not suggest for one moment, I say, however, that we should keep a balanced outlook on the opportunity to trade through the whole area. There are areas down there where both large population and purchasing power give us greater opportunities for mutual trade than we are availing ourselves of. I do think that industry and government should collaborate and work very closely together to make much fuller use of the natural trading opportunities that exist for Canada, not only in the British West Indies, as important as they are, but in the whole Caribbean area.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, we have listened to a very interesting address by the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt). In fact, as he was speaking, I felt that if for no other reason than the climate of West Indies at the present time, we would all like to be there just now. However, that is not our good fortune. It is, however, the good fortune of one honourable member from this house, who is very much interested in trade with the West Indies. Honourable senators will recall that on February 5 last the honourable senator from Southern New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McLean) also delivered a very interesting speech on the Canadian Government Trade Fair in Kingston, Jamaica. While the honourable senator from St. John's West was speaking, it occurred to me that the honourable senator from Southern New Brunswick would probably be able to add to the remarks which were made tonight. I have here a card from him, in which he states, among other things:

> The Canadian Trade Fair opened Friday, and so far has been a great success. There are about 100 Canadian exhibitors at the fair.

Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate tonight for the honourable senator from Southern New Brunswick.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. McLean, debate adjourned.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of honourable Mr. Choquette for the second reading of Bill C-25, to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators will recall that on Tuesday last the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) delivered a very comprehensive and informative outline of this bill. I will not go into it in great detail, but he pointed out that the purpose of the bill was to increase the amount which could be borrowed by the Seaway Authority from $300 million to $335 million. He further pointed out that this project is a gigantic one, and that it not only involves the construction of a channel which will lead from the Great Lakes to the ocean, but that there is also connected with it a great development for the production of power.

Honourable senators, the production of power along the St. Lawrence is being undertaken by the provinces and by the states. I mention that to point out that it is not a federal undertaking. The production of power is a very important feature of this development and it will mean a great deal toward the increase of manufacturing facilities throughout the province of Ontario. Power has been developed at the present time to a very large extent and is already being delivered.

The seaway is one of the greatest of its type in the world, and I think that Canadians can take great pride in the fact that it is being constructed because, honourable senators, if it had not been for Canada it is doubtful if the seaway would ever have been started, and it is certain that it would not have been completed at the present time.

I have no idea who first conceived of this seaway, and I do not intend to make this a political speech in any way whatsoever. In the first instance I am not very good at making political speeches, anyway. But this one has no political import. It was certainly before 1920 that someone thought of this project. How many years before 1920 I cannot say, but in that year it was referred by Canada and the United States of America to the International Joint Commission. So, honourable senators, this project has been studied for the last thirty years, and probably for the last fifty years, not only by engineering experts recognized for their skill in our two adjoining nations, Canada and the United States, but also by engineers of world renown. The fact also is that it has been studied by outstanding economists of the world, and by experts in constitutional matters.

As I said, in 1920 the project was referred both by Canada and by the United States to the International Joint Commission. Then in 1932 Canada and the United States signed the Treaty of Washington. This treaty provided for a 27-foot waterway from Montreal to the head of the lakes and was known as the two-state development. I am not going into these details to any great length. In fact, not being an engineer, I know it would be impossible for me to explain the engineering features to this house, where we have a number of those who are well informed on engineering projects. I refer especially to one of our new senators, the honourable senator from Edmonton, (Hon. Mr. Buchanan), who, I understand, has had great experience in problems probably not so vast as this one, but nevertheless very important projects in northern Alberta.

The treaty, as I say, was entered into in 1932 but great progress was not made for the reason that the treaty was not ratified by the United States Senate. As honourable senators are aware, in the country to the south of us the Senate does not always do what is done by the House of Representatives.

In 1941, the Treaty of 1932, not having been ratified, Canadians were becoming slightly impatient with the delay and approached the United States Government again. So in 1941 another agreement was entered into, known as the Great Lakes Agreement. This covered a deep waterway from Montreal to the head of the lakes.

Well, honourable senators, that agreement was never ratified either. I do not say that it was refused ratification by the Congress of the United States, because I doubt if it ever reached the Congress, but in any event no action was taken on it officially by the Government of the United States in their Congress, so Canada then decided that if it were possible this country would construct the seaway itself. And that is why I say that if it were not for Canada this Seaway would not be opened on June 26 of this year.

On December 21, 1951, an act to establish the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, which had been passed by both houses of Parliament, was assented to. I have not looked up the debates, but I am satisfied that it was not a party issue. That act provided for an all-Canadian seaway from Montreal to Lake Erie. So you see, honourable senators, that after all those years it was finally decided that if necessary Canada would go it alone. But when the United States found that Canada was about to go it alone, it took a sober second thought and decided to come along with Canada. The Congress of the United States decided by an act passed in 1954, known as the Wiley-Dondero Act, to set up an American agency to build all the navigational facilities in the International Rapids section lying in the American territory. Later that year representatives of the two countries met and agreed that the United States would build a canal and two locks in the international section, and Canada a canal and one lock in the same section. That is, they would divide the work in the international area.

So, honourable senators, the two countries finally agreed to go ahead with the St. Lawrence Seaway, a project to consist of a 2,000-mile channel, 27 feet in depth, enabling 25-foot craft to move up the Great Lakes, and also of course to allow Great Lakes freighters to come down to the Maritimes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I thought the channel was to have a 30-foot depth?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It has a depth of 30 feet at certain places in canals, because it was felt that a craft with a 25-foot draught would require more than a depth of just 25 feet. I am not a sailor, and so am not familiar with all these matters, but my honourable friends from the east coast and from the west coast, including the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), will understand what I am trying to say.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to let this occasion go by without paying tribute to a Canadian who has taken a very great interest in the building of the seaway, a young man who came into Parliament, as I did, in the year 1935, and became a minister of the Crown. I am referring to the Honourable Lionel Chevrier. He resigned from Parliament to take on the very difficult and onerous task of President of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, and from 1954 until 1957 he gave of his time and talents unselfishly to the development of this great project, which is going to mean so much to Canada and to the world. I feel, honourable senators, that we should recognize the effort which any one puts into a work of merit. Now that the seaway is about to be completed, I would recommend to the Authority that it would not be amiss to show recognition in this instance by naming some part of the seaway—one of its canals, locks or channels—Chevrier Lock or Chevrier Channel, as the case may be. I believe it would be an excellent way of recognizing what the Honourable Mr. Chevrier has done for Canada in this great undertaking.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, Hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as with all things that are worth while in a country like Canada, there is always a part of the country where the people cannot be enthusiastic about what is taking place in another part. In a far-flung country like ours where there are so many different interests, there is bound to be some concern in certain parts of the country as to what effect the seaway will have on the economy of that particular section.

I would remind honourable senators of the very able speech made a few nights ago by the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly), in which he expressed alarm as to what effect the seaway might have on the Maritime provinces. I think perhaps most of us share his concern to a certain extent. As reported at page 270 of the Senate Hansard, he expressed fear that the seaway might destroy certain ports on Canada's east coast. We all hope that will not be a result of the building of the seaway. Indeed, we will be deeply disappointed if it results in destroying the economy of the ports in any part of Canada. I am sure I speak for all honourable senators when I say we will do everything in our power to see that such a result does not come about. Such a result would grieve us who come from other parts of Canada just as much as it would our friends from eastern Canada. Indeed, I am sure that those who live on the west coast and those who live on the east coast are equally concerned about each other's welfare.

Now, honourable senators, not all those who live on the east coast are as disturbed about the possible effect of the seaway as is the honourable senator from Halifax North. I have in my hand a copy of the Halifax Chronicle Herald of March 3, which carries this headline in large type on the front page:

See Seaway Boost to Port Trade.

That is contrary to the opinion expressed by the senator from Halifax North. I may say I am not entering into this discussion or taking sides on it. I merely mention it to show that there are different opinions.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire as to what ports the headline refers to?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will read the article, if my friend wishes. It goes on to say:

The St. Lawrence Seaway project, which will be officially opened in June, will be a boost to cargo tonnages passing through the port of Halifax, in the opinion of Captain Harold Tuzo, Halifax harbour master.

I could read the whole statement, but as I say, I am not arguing the point.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Does he support it by reasons?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, he does support it by reasons, and I would be glad to read them.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: There are of course differences of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, there are.

I am not saying that the building of the seaway will help the port of Halifax, nor am I saying it will harm it. I do not know. I am hopeful that it will not harm that port. Before I conclude my remarks I hope to make a suggestion, in keeping with the suggestion made by the senator from Halifax North, to ensure that the port of Halifax is not hurt. At the moment I am merely pointing to the difference of opinion between two experts.

I would also point out that the seaway will not be open for navigation for more than eight months, any more than the lakes and canals are now open for that period; and that after the completion of the seaway ships will be able to carry their grain and wares from the head of the lakes for not more than eight months of the year, and for the remaining four months any shipments from the west or from Ontario and Quebec would have to go by rail to the Maritimes, as they do at the present time.

Honourable senators will say "Oh yes, in future there will be year-round sailings on the St. Lawrence". I believe the honourable senator from Halifax North said that, with the coming of the atomic age, the ice will be blown out of the St. Lawrence and ships will sail to Montreal throughout the winter. Well, if ice can be blown out of the St. Lawrence it can also be melted in the canals, and throughout the seaway, and indeed up to Fort William. So, with or without a seaway, in the atomic age, even with the waterway in its present condition, it will be possible to sail from Fort William down through the Great Lakes and the canals. Therefore I cannot see that the atomic age, if and when it comes about, will make any difference to shipping along the St. Lawrence, whether the seaway is constructed or not.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I suggest that, whatever is done, the atomic age will make things very difficult for shipping on the St. Lawrence, because it will be possible to use Churchill the year round.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so. I do not suppose we can tell what the future has in store for us, but that should not prevent us from going ahead and making use of what we have, hoping that things will be easier for all of us in the days to come.

Another matter which I should bring to the attention of honourable senators from the Maritimes is that the ore shipped from Sept Iles is not going to smelters in the Maritime provinces, and I doubt that it will ever go there. The centres of population and the great manufacturing concerns of Canada and the United States are located in the central areas. It does not seem likely that it will ever be feasible to divert ore shipments from Sept Iles to Nova Scotia, where the coal is, and transport iron and steel fabricated there into the Middle States. If that be so, the building of the canal would not facilitate the treating of iron ore in Nova Scotia for use in the central parts of Canada.

However, honourable senators, having said this, and having listened to the honourable senator from Halifax North, I am not so sure that some loss will not be suffered by the Maritime provinces, and if that should be so, we should do all in our power to compensate them for the consequences of the building of this waterway. I am sure every honourable senator will associate himself with that statement. The other evening the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenberg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) suggested that the Government should consider the desirability of a reciprocal agreement with respect to coastal shipping between Canada and the United States. I believe the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen) intimated at one of our committee meetings the desirability of a similar arrangement affecting shipping on the Pacific coast. To my mind the suggestion of the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenberg is a very good one. I hope the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will bring it to the attention of the Government of the day.

In his speech here on March 3 the honourable senator from Halifax North spoke in part as follows, as reported in Hansard at page 270:

> I think also of the extra $35 million of borrowing power asked for in this bill, and I say to myself: What wonders could be accomplished in the neglected Atlantic region of this country if those 35 million dollars were to be spent there in industrial research and development!

Honourable senators, if the Maritimes can be helped in this way, surely we can spare an additional $35 million for that purpose, and see what can be accomplished in industrial research and development. I am satisfied that if the Government decided so to allot $35 million it would receive the hearty endorsation of this house.

I return now to the subject of the seaway. I would like to point out that it will be a great advantage not only to Canada, but to other countries, and not least to the Mother Country. Do we realize that 35 per cent of the total population of the United States lives in the eight states which border the Great Lakes and this waterway? At the present time Great Britain sells to the United States goods of the value of $3.90 per head of the population of the United States, while the United States sells to Great Britain goods of the value of $19.60 per head of the population of Britain. At the present time the United States, although it takes only 8 per cent of all Britain's exports, is her greatest customer. By the building of the seaway we shall open a new potential market for Britain in the United States.

In building this seaway we are not only doing something for ourselves but we are also doing something for other countries of the world. We are creating trade, and trade always creates more trade. If there is increased trade in one part of our country the rest of the country will benefit. In other words, if the people in any area of Canada —say, the west coast or the Atlantic coast or the central provinces—are given greater prosperity, then the people in the rest of Canada benefit from that prosperity. That is what I hope the St. Lawrence Seaway is going to do, bring greater prosperity.

Honourable senators, on June 26 this seaway is to be opened. In 1956 the Prime Minister of that day extended, through the Governor General of Canada, an invitation to Her Majesty the Queen to come to Canada to open the seaway. More recently, the Prime Minister of the present administration sent an invitation to the President of the United States to come to Canada to join with Her Majesty in opening the seaway. I am sure we are all happy that both invitations have been accepted. On June 26 a great historic event will take place in this country. It will probably mark the first time in world history that a President of a great republic and the Monarch of a great democracy will have met, not at the seat of government of either of those countries but in another country, to join together in opening a great project. The opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway by Her Majesty the Queen and the President of the United States should serve as an example to all the world that the peoples of different nations can live in harmony and work together not only for their own benefit but for the benefit of all mankind.

Hon. Austin C. Taylor: Honourable senators, it was not my original intention to speak on this bill but, after listening to the eloquent, masterly and impressive speech made a few days ago by the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly), I felt I should express some of my own thoughts and observations in connection with the bill. I hasten to admit that I cannot match his fluency and impressiveness, but I do maintain that I am just as sincere in my analysis of the situation.

I had intended discussing some of the matters dealt with by the honourable senator from Halifax North, but they have already been covered most eloquently and completely by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). However, there is another aspect about the St. Lawrence Seaway to which I would like to make reference. My main purpose in speaking on this bill is to urge upon the Government of the day, through the Leader of the Government in, this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), to start work immediately on the eastern terminus of the seaway by constructing the Chignecto canal. There are some who may doubt the advisability of beginning this project without further engineering investigation and surveys but, honourable senators, let it be remembered that the Chignecto Canal project has been under study and investigation since 1686. It was even then recommended by Jacques de Meulles, administrator of New France, and down through the decades, even centuries, to the present time, between 10 and 12 actual surveys have been made. It is significant to note that every one of them recommended the project as feasible and of great economic value, not only to Canada as a whole but more particularly to the Atlantic region. It may also be of interest that at one time, I believe it was in 1871, tenders were called for the construction of the Chignecto Canal but no contracts were awarded.

In the report of the Royal Commission headed by Sir Hugh Allan, in 1871, there appears some very interesting data. I do not intend to go into it in detail but I should like to place on the record one or two references. I quote:

> A steamer laden with flour destined for Saint John N.B., now goes down the Gulf as far as Shediac, where the cargo is transported by rail to its destination. The total distance by water from Shediac through the Gut of Canso and around the coast of Nova Scotia to the Bay of Fundy as far as the commercial capital of New Brunswick—which was Saint John at that time—

> —is about 600 miles and the consequence is that there is little or no direct communication between the Bay of Fundy ports and those on the River St. Lawrence.

I might point out that the first railway built in the Maritime provinces ran from Saint John to Shediac. That is why Shediac has been referred to there.

> Via canal through the Isthmus the distance from Shediac to Saint John will be not more than 100 miles.

Therefore, once the Chignecto Canal is built it will reduce by 500 miles the journey from the St. Lawrence River down to the eastern seaboard of Canada and the eastern United States.

In concluding their report the Allan Commission said:

> In urging this policy of canal enlargement and expansion upon the favourable consideration of the Government, the commissioners feel that it is the one which will best stimulate the commercial development of the whole dominion, and bind all sections together in the bonds of mutual amity and interest.
> The expense of these improvements will be insignificant to the direct benefit Canadian commerce will receive, and will be immediately met by larger revenue that must accrue from the tolls of a vastly increased traffic.

Speaking before the Women's Atlantic Council in Saint John, New Brunswick, on May 8, 1958, Mr. Per Hall, President of Foundation of Canada Engineering Corporation Limited, Montreal, who incidentally has made a close study of all reports, said, and I quote:

> What Sir Hugh Allan said in 1871 holds true today. The key to development of the industrial economy of the Atlantic provinces is low cost transportation and, I should like to add, power, and there can be little doubt but that the provision of the facilities suggested above would have a very favourable impact on the economy of the Atlantic provinces. Therefore, in studying the Chignecto Canal scheme we should not think simply in terms of what portion of present traffic could be diverted through the canal but rather we should base the studies on increased traffic which would be generated by new industrial developments in the whole region which would follow in the tracks of the construction of such a waterway and power producing facilities.

In conclusion, I submit that the conditions for the construction of a deep sea navigation channel through the Chignecto Isthmus are as favourable at the present time as they ever will be. The time has come to take a good, hard look both at the costs and at the benefits to the country of this development.

Honourable senators, I realize I am not an engineering authority. At the same time I have studied many of the reports, and I am personally convinced that the project is a sound one, and that if constructed it will further enhance the value of the St. Lawrence Seaway for all of Canada, and more particularly for the Atlantic region. If I may be permitted to say so, I am firmly convinced that it is just as economical a project as the building of the South Saskatchewan dam, when one takes into consideration that the Chignecto Canal project, even as late as 1958, was estimated to cost between $80 million and $100 million, compared to an estimated cost of the South Saskatchewan dam of over $200 million—the building of which will only benefit a part of the population in that province; whereas the Chignecto Canal project will benefit every citizen of Canada indirectly and will benefit directly all citizens of the Atlantic region, which comprises some 100,000 square miles with a present population of approximately two million.

Honourable senators, if by any stretch of the imagination the Government of the day is not convinced that sufficient data is available to determine the feasibility of this project, then I would urge the Government, in the strongest possible language at my command, to authorize and set in motion at once a thorough and complete survey and investigation regarding its potential in transportation advantages, as well as the electric power possibilities, and by so doing settle once and for all its economic possibilities. If after this is done and the report indicates that the project is feasible, then I urge that no time be lost and that construction start immediately.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that a survey is underway at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Taylor: Yes, I believe there is; but I do hope this survey will determine definitely the feasibility and practicability of building the Chignecto Canal.

Honourable senators, there is one phase of the St. Lawrence Seaway I would like to mention before I sit down. I think we are all agreed that the life blood of Canada is in her export trade. I think it is agreed also that we have reached a time when competition is becoming very keen and it is more difficult to sell in those countries to which we have sold traditionally. One other purpose, and I believe the whole purpose, of the St. Lawrence Seaway project was to provide cheaper transportation, not only in the export field, but in the domestic field as well. The honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly), in speaking the other day, referred to the fact that on the shelves of every home in the Atlantic provinces would be found goods manufactured in central Canada. I am one of those individuals who believe in the greatest liberalization as possible of trade, not only between one country and another, but domestically as well, and while I hope it may be that we can produce and manufacture more of those goods in the Atlantic provinces, I hope the time will not come that it will be said in the Atlantic region, or in any other region, "We don't want to trade with any other part of Canada."

Honourable senators, in concluding, I wish to summarize my remarks by saying that I wish first to state that I am wholly in accord with this bill before us. This bill has been supported by over 500 elected representatives of Canada, including all the representatives from the Atlantic region. We have already spent $270 million on this project. Surely we are not going to stop now. And I am not minimizing the influence that it is possible that my honourable friend, with his fluency and impressiveness, might exert upon many in this chamber to vote against the bill, but I think this bill should be supported unanimously.

Secondly, may I point out that my main purpose in speaking to this bill is to urge in the strongest possible manner upon honourable members, as well as the Government, the necessity for the economic development of the Maritime and Atlantic provinces. Nothing could do more for trade for that part of the country than the construction of the Chignecto Canal.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I have no voice tonight, and I had not intended to make any remarks. However, I should like to add something to what my colleague from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Taylor) has said. I think he perhaps overlooked something that he probably meant to say, namely, that in the province of New Brunswick we have a great citizen in the person of Mr. K. C. Irving. I doubt if there is any industrialist in Canada who has done more for his province than Mr. Irving has done for New Brunswick. Among the many projects for which he has been responsible is the building of a large oil refinery in the city of Saint John. My honourable friend on the opposite side, from Saint John-Albert (Hon. Mr. Emerson), representing the city of Saint John, will, I am quite sure, vouch for everything I am saying. If any of us have had any doubt as to the soundness of the Chignecto Canal project, it has been eliminated, to my mind, by the fact of Mr. Irving's enterprise in the construction of this oil refinery. The construction of the Chignecto Canal goes along with and is most important in respect to the establishment of that oil refinery. I heartily endorse everything that my colleague has said, and I wanted to point out how much the oil refinery project depends upon the construction of the Chignecto Canal.

Before I sit down, I wish to say that I was highly impressed, as we all must have been, by the marvellous speech made in this house last Tuesday evening by the honourable gentleman from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly). I am sorry that only a quarter of the members were present on that occasion to hear what I consider to be one of the ablest speeches ever made in this house, certainly since I became a member. As a Maritimer, I was thrilled, and what he said was absolutely correct.

Honourable senators, this is the point that I think we should bear in mind: We in the Maritime provinces go right along with the rest of Canada in the St. Lawrence Seaway project. We know that it is one of those big projects which go with the development of our great country as a whole, and we heartily endorse it. However, some of us have misgivings whether Canada is justified in spending millions of dollars to keep the ice out of the St. Lawrence River in order to keep it open for navigation in the winter time, to the detriment of the great ports of Saint John and Halifax. That is what we take issue with. We realize that this is a summer project and in line with the development of our great country, but we feel that these huge expenditures to keep the river open in the winter time is a blow at the great national ports of Saint John and Halifax.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, the hour is late, and I shall not be long. I was on my feet a few minutes ago to say some of the things that have since been more ably said, particularly by the honourable gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I certainly would not want to lose the opportunity of saying that I am heartily in accord with the thoughts expressed by the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly), who in such eloquent terms placed before the Senate the problem in so far as it affects the Maritimes. I can appreciate the point raised by the last speaker (Hon. Mr. Burchill) that we in the Maritimes have no objection to anything that is going to help all of Canada, but to some of us here, and to a great many in the Maritimes, the question in our minds is whether the seaway development is not just one more effort on the part of central Canada to take away from the Maritimes what was promised us at the time of Confederation. At that time a very fine picture was painted: steel rails stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific were going to be carrying goods from the east to the west. Well, the only thing that those rails have done so far for us is perhaps to take away from the Maritimes some of its very best men and carry them to central Canada and to the extreme west. Men such as the distinguished gentleman on my left (Hon. Mr. Farris) and many others with a Maritime background have gone to the west and central Canada and built up those parts of the country.

It is true that the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway will not only develop central Canada with its large population—35 per cent of Canada's population, roughly speaking—but it will also open up trade channels for the states bordering on the Great Lakes. I was rather surprised that the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) stressed that point, that this great development resulting from the spending of $300 million or more as Canada's share of the St. Lawrence development would help to increase trade with the United States. I should think that all interested Canadians would be very much concerned about how they could help the extreme east, with its smaller population and fewer industries, by perhaps assisting us in the development of a steel industry to process some of the large volume of iron ore from Labrador which under present plans will be carried up the St. Lawrence to find its way to the American steel mills. The honourable Leader of the Opposition said that we should be pleased that so much is being done for Canada. I would change that just a little and say that perhaps, as Canadians, we should be pleased to think so much is being done for central Canada. That is the slight difference I would make in his statement.

I asked a few simple questions from the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a short time ago as to the cost of icebreaking operations, and his answers were quite revealing. In two months, or during the period when 13 freighters were frozen hard in the lakes, it cost something like $600,000 to get them free, whereas these ships could have gone into the port of Saint John or Halifax without a cent being spent on icebreaking operations. In addition to that, another ice-breaker was used for a shorter period to free ships on the St. Lawrence, and the cost ran into an additional $113,000 roughly speaking. But there is still another feature to this, and that is that while those ice-breakers were in the St. Lawrence trying to break the ice—in a rather useless effort, I think, at that time of the year—we were deprived of those ice-breakers in Pictou, Sydney and other places which had need of them to maintain our ferry services connecting one part of the province with the other.

These are some of the things we are just a little fearful about the future. The St. Lawrence Seaway will give immense power to central Canada, with its huge population —when you add the population of Quebec and Ontario together you have about two-thirds of the total population of Canada, and as you think of the population so you think of its wealth. Within a radius of 100 miles of Toronto there are 4.5 million people, and that is where the market is and where wealth is created. I think it has been the tendency in recent years to concentrate nearly everything in central Canada.

As honourable senators will see, I have not referred to any notes. I was a little upset at the manner of approach by our distinguished Leader of the Opposition to this question.

I know that the Minister of Transport must be in accord with the Cabinet in assigning this ice breaker to the St. Lawrence. I am now suggesting to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that the Government seriously consider setting a deadline for navigation on the St. Lawrence, perhaps November 15, and give us a full four- or five-months' trade in the Atlantic ports, even if this would require payment of a bonus, as the late Honourable Mr. Fielding paid many years ago, when he gave a 10 per cent preference on goods being shipped in and out of Atlantic ports.

I mentioned a few moments ago that the hour was late. I had no thought of making any remarks, but I cannot sit silent when central Canada is once again being boosted as the hub of Canada, which it is in a sense, and further expenditures are proposed which will take away from the ice-free ports of the Maritimes the trade to which I believe they have a right.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

I must say that the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) must have misunderstood the purport of my remarks. I was not advocating winter traffic in the St. Lawrence River and I have no intention of doing so.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: You mentioned what might develop in the atomic age.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I may have mentioned the atomic age, but I merely suggested what might take place in the future, and I do not think we can hold it back. I had no intention of advocating that the Government spend money at the present time on breaking up ice in the St. Lawrence River, and I tried to make it perfectly clear that I would go to full length in doing anything possible to develop the Maritime provinces.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, the senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) referred apparently to Washington Irving. The name brought me back to the days of Rip Van Winkle, to 1609. Well, at that time Rip Van Winkle was asleep, but he woke up. I think many others have been asleep since. Construction of the Chignecto Canal would save 500 miles of sailing. I would like to inform honourable senators from central Canada and those from the west that 500 miles in my country, Newfoundland, is a tremendous distance indeed. It may not seem much in the great provinces of central Canada and the west, but it means a lot down east. I will give support to any measure for the construction of this canal, and I say it is high time it is built. When the canal is finished Rip Van Winkle will be there, and he will say "I was asleep for only forty years, but you have been asleep for more than three hundred years."

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, we were all greatly impressed by the speech delivered last week by the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly), and we have heard the echo of that speech here tonight. It has been refreshing to feel the breeze of the Maritimes in this chamber tonight. The remarks made by our distinguished colleagues this evening from the Maritimes are but the echo of what was said last week by the honourable senator from Halifax North.

The Maritimer senators who have spoken tonight do not do so as burghers but as Canadians who have a right to what has been mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to a claim for damages that they could eventually suffer from the operation of the seaway.

I have never been enthusiastic about the seaway. I do not know what will happen as a result of that tremendous work: it may be good, it may be bad. I stand with the party on it, because I have decided to give my party the benefit of the doubt. But what seemed most reasonable to say was that the Maritimers are entitled to compensation by way of the construction of the Chignecto

Canal, which has been asked for over many years. We are told that those well informed about navigation recommend that important work be done at the earliest possible opportunity. The Maritimes are entitled to it.

So, I see no reason why the Government should not start at once the construction of the Chignecto Canal, to show that it is able to do for the Maritimes just as much as the St. Laurent Government did by the building of the Canso Causeway. It is an opportunity for the present Government to show that it has the same good disposition for the Maritimes as the previous Government had.

My honourable colleagues have mentioned visions of fantastic work that brings roars of laughter to this country. If this Government has as much vision as fair play, the Chignecto Canal will be started before the end of the present session, and will show that the Government recognizes the justice of the claim of the Maritime provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I remind honourable senators that the Banking and Commerce Committee will meet tomorrow morning at 10.30.

NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George S. White moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the National Defence Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill amends the National Defence Act. While the bill is brief, containing only four main amendments, the amendments are of considerable importance because they deal with Canadians serving in the armed forces.

The amendments are as follows:

The first amendment is related to the integration of certain aspects of service functions.

The second amendment is designed to make it possible to introduce a new code of evidence for use at courts martial.

The third amendment will afford added protection to persons accused of capital crimes before courts martial.

The fourth amendment establishes a new court to hear appeals from sentences of courts martial and provides for an enlarged right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The fifth amendment has to do with the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force in the French language.

I would like to indicate at this time, honourable senators, that when the bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

I would like to deal briefly with the four main proposed amendments.

Section 1 of the bill will make the integrated service organizations that have been established legal entities to which units, officers and men of the three services may be attached. The medical, legal and chaplain services are now integrated. Other functions or operations of the services that are conducted on a unified basis are dental and postal services. This amendment will make it easier to establish similar organizations in the future.

Section 2 of the bill provides for the repeal of subsection 3 of section 121 of the act, which, by clause 4 of the bill will become subsection 6 of section 162. This amendment is simply for the purpose of improving the provisions respecting voting by members of courts martial.

Section 3 of the bill provides that the rules of evidence at a trial by court martial shall be such as are established by regulations made by the Governor in Council. I need hardly point out to honourable senators who are members of the bar that the law of evidence is one of the most difficult branches of the law. At the present time the law of evidence that is adopted in a court martial proceeding is the law of evidence of the province in which the home of the accused is located. As honourable senators who are members of the legal profession also know, there is no uniform law of evidence that applies in all the provinces; each province has its own evidence act, which is subject to change by the provincial legislatures, and from time to time different interpretations have been given by the various provincial courts.

Members of a court martial, having powers to decide questions relating to the law of evidence, in some instances have not had the benefit of legal qualifications. Of course, in peace time the members of a court martial are advised on questions of law by a Judge Advocate, but this is not necessarily so in time of war. The need for clarification and simplification of this branch of the law for courts martial is shown by the fact that out of 20 cases in which appeals have been allowed by the Court Martial Appeal Board, six were allowed solely because of the misapplication of the law of evidence, and four more for this and other reasons. That is to say, in exactly one-half of the cases of successful appeals the law of evidence was held to have been misapplied.

About five years ago certain professors at Dalhousie University were engaged to prepare, in consultation with the Judge Advocate General, rules of evidence that would be suitable for courts martial, but which would preserve all the fundamental protection afforded to persons charged with offences in the civil courts. These rules have been drafted; for some time they have been under study by the Judge Advocate General and they are now practically ready for adoption. The amendment proposed will make adoption possible. The new rules are in effect a code of the basic principles of the law of evidence. Perhaps it will interest honourable senators to know that a number of fields in which the law is obscure have been clarified by laying down precise rules. For example, the rules relating to the admission of documents, which are to be found in various statutes and in decisions of the courts, are now embodied in eight rules. Obscure rules relating to the burden of proof in criminal law have been clarified and set out in four rules. In some cases the law has been slightly changed. For example, it is now provided that counsel for the accused shall always have the right to address the court last. As honourable senators who are members of the bar know, that has not always been the case in criminal trials. I would stress the fact that these rules do not in any way interfere with the fundamental rights of accused persons which are contained in the present law.

Some may ask why these new rules regarding the law of evidence are not included in the bill. I am advised that it is not considered appropriate to do this, as they will cover some 50 printed pages, and as the law of evidence is a constantly developing subject minor amendments will be desirable from time to time.

This section will not come into force until a date fixed by proclamation by the Governor in Council. This provision is designed to give time for approval, printing, distribution and study of the rules before they are made effective.

Section 4 provides additional safeguards on the imposition of the penalty of death by courts martial. These safeguards will be similar to those in effect under the civil law.

As honourable senators who have served in the army are no doubt aware, a court martial decides on both the conviction and the sentence. But there are two types of cases. One is where a sentence of death is mandatory upon conviction of an offence. That means that if a man is found guilty the court martial has no option but to impose the death sentence. Under the act as it stands, a simple majority vote is sufficient to convict and to impose the death penalty. Under the new subsection 162, subsection 5, this provision has been changed by making a unanimous vote necessary. If the court martial should be divided in opinion and the majority does not agree to conviction on a lesser charge, it would be deemed to be dissolved and a new trial might be ordered. That is in accordance with the present practice in criminal cases.

Where a sentence of death is not mandatory upon conviction, but merely permissive, it is provided that for the imposition of the death penalty a unanimous vote will be required. Of course, there are other safeguards for the protection of persons sentenced to death by courts martial. Any such penalty may be commuted to a lesser punishment by an officer commanding a command, a chief of staff of the service concerned, or the minister. If it is not commuted by one of these authorities it must, under section 170, subsection 1, be approved by the Governor in Council before it can be carried out.

Perhaps it is of interest to note that since the beginning of World War II there have been only seven cases in which the death sentence was passed, and six of these were commuted to life imprisonment: only one sentence was carried out.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): What was the charge?

Hon. Mr. White: For which the man was executed? It was a case in Italy of a soldier, a deserter, who was with a band of other soldier deserters, and murdered another soldier.

The offences for which the death penalty is mandatory or permissive have not been changed. They are set out in sections 64 to 71 inclusive of the act, and they are different from the sections of the Criminal Code which provide the death penalty for three offences, namely, treason, piracy and murder.

Clause 5 provides regulations respecting the carrying out of the death sentence. It is not feasible to set out in the bill, as is done in the criminal code, the method of carrying out the sentence, because, as you will readily understand, the conditions under which criminals are held in various parts of the world vary so greatly that it seems desirable to leave it to the Governor in Council to determine in each case the most appropriate method of carrrying out this sentence.

Clause 6 provides for the change of name of the court martial appeal board to the court martial appeal court, and would reconstitute it, to be composed of judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada and of Superior Courts of criminal jurisdiction. This section also provides certain amendments regarding appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada.

After World War I the authorities of the United Kingdom set up certain courts for appeal, and in 1951 Canada took the same step by establishing a tribunal, independent of military authorities, to which persons convicted by courts martial might appeal. At that time it was thought prudent, as a first step, to set up an appeal court with some but not all the characteristics of a court of appeal. Now, after seven years' experience with appeals from courts martial, it is considered that there is no reason on military grounds why service offenders should not have the right to have their appeals heard by a tribunal comparable to a provincial court of appeal.

The National Defence Act contains a provision for an appeal from the Court Martial Appeal Board to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is not desirable that the Supreme Court of Canada should be required to concern itself with appeals in criminal matters from courts that do not have the same relative standing as provincial courts of appeal composed entirely of judges. It is felt that military appeals will be dealt with more expeditiously under this new set-up. The new court will be a court of record and it will have a status that is not now held and powers not now exercisable by the Court Martial Appeal Board.

While the Court Martial Appeal Court would normally sit in Ottawa, provision is made for it to sit elsewhere in the country. In this connection provision is made for the payment of judges.

Subsections 11 and 12 of section 190 of the bill provide for the appointment of military advisers whose function it would be to advise the court on the nature and purpose of particular service orders and regulations, service customs, and things of that nature.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Before the honourable gentleman continues, would he mind answering a question? Did I understand him to say there will be an appeal from the new Court Martial Appeal Court to provincial courts of appeal or to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Mr. White: To the Supreme Court of Canada. I will deal with that in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. White: The procedure for anyone convicted by court martial to appeal to the new Court Martial Appeal Court is very simple. The accused is served with a copy of the proceedings of the court martial, together with a form on which he may enter an appeal. He has 14 days within which to file the appeal, and all he has to do in filing is to give the completed copy of the statement of appeal to any superior officer or to the person who holds him in custody. The statement of appeal must be forwarded by the person to whom it is given to the Judge Advocate General.

If the appeal relates to severity of sentence only, the Judge Advocate General refers it to the appropriate Chief of Staff. If it relates to legality and the Judge Advocate General considers that the conviction should be quashed, he so recommends to the appropriate Chief of Staff. If he does not consider that the conviction should be quashed, he must forward the statement of appeal to the Court Martial Appeal Court. It is then placed on the list for hearing at the earliest possible moment. The record in the years 1952 to 1956 inclusive indicates that the Court Martial Appeal Board has operated in a very efficient manner and has probably had a better record than the average court in civil and criminal matters.

Sections 191 to 195 inclusive provide only for the change of name from "board" to "court".

Section 196 deals with an appeal from the Court Martial Appeal Court to the Supreme Court of Canada against the decision of the Court Martial Appeal Court. It has been felt that persons serving in the military forces should have the same right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada as have civilians. Under the present laws, however, a person wishing to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada has two hurdles to surmount. First of all, there must have been dissent in the Court Martial Appeal Board and he must obtain the leave of the Attorney-General of Canada. Under the amendment, an appeal will be permitted if there was dissent in the Court Martial Appeal Court or if a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada grants leave to appeal. It is interesting to note that in the past seven years only two persons indicated they wished to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but they were unable to proceed with their appeal because there had been no dissent in the Court Martial Appeal Court.

A further amendment provides that for the first time the Crown also will have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. This provision is similar to the right now held by the provincial Attorneys General. The reason for this amendment is that the Crown may wish to obtain a decision from the Supreme Court of Canada respecting some important legal principle upon which the Court Martial Appeal Court may have appeared to have decided wrongly.

Honourable senators, I hope I have given a satisfactory brief outline of the important functions of these amendments to the National Defence Act. I am sure that when the bill goes before the Banking and Commerce Committee the Judge Advocate General and members of his staff will be present to give further necessary information that anyone may require.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, I do not propose to follow the honourable gentleman from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) in dealing with the details of this bill, which he has explained admirably. However, there are certain sections of the legislation to which I wish to draw attention. The first section of the bill deals with the authority given to the minister, which I had understood he already had, but probably this is to further clarify his authority, to carry on certain integration between elements of the forces which already exist. In dealing with this kind of integration, as opposed to that to which I may refer a moment or two later, may I say that I heartily commend the minister for carrying on the work which he has been doing up to the present to abolish a distinction which had been made in the establishment of an Air Force medical corps. Incidentally, I am sorry to say that this distinction was created by myself in one of my not too infrequent mistakes, and I commend the present minister for correcting it. He has decided that there should be one medical corps for all three services. There might have been reasons for justifying the establishment of an Air Force medical corps during the war. There were questions of diet, nervous tension, blackouts, and that kind of thing, but I believe they have pretty well disappeared now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You don't mean that the Air Force had better food than the poor bally infantry, do you?

Hon. Mr. Power: No, but unfortunately the kind of food that was served to the infantry was heavy and was not suited to the high intellectual calibre of the people who served in the air force. As a matter of fact, to be quite serious, we were obliged to ask the Army Service Corps to give to our pupils in the training schools a lighter diet than was normally given to the foot-slogging infantry.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Who worked so hard.

Hon. Mr. Power: Worked so hard intellectually.

Another advance which the minister has made in the way of integration of service elements is in the chaplain service. I do not know just how it came about that the air force had a separate chaplain service; I assume that it was largely due to the fact that the force was expanding very rapidly and on account of that expansion took in chaplains among its number and found they might just as well put them in air force uniform. But if I commend the minister heartily on that particular phase of integration, I wonder if he would not consider further, if he has already considered the matter, that other branches of the service, namely, the air force and the army, should follow the example of the navy in a custom which has been in existence, as far as I know, ever since the Royal Canadian Navy was established, that of having the chaplains without any rank at all, without being called lieutenants, lieutenant-commanders, or captains. I understand—and this accords with the little experience I have had—that these godly people in the chaplain service are not at all impervious to the lure of rank badges and red tabs, and possibly there may have been considerable opposition to the idea of having equal rank all through the chaplain service. Perhaps there are reasons for it, but it seems to me that the ordinary soldier, sailor, or seaman of the lowest rank would probably be better prepared and better able to discuss his personal problems, and perhaps his family problems and other matters which concern him, with a person who did not wear red tabs and did not have rank badges. For that reason I would be prepared to commend the minister very highly if he would endeavour to follow out his integration by placing all chaplains on an equal basis and without any rank tabs whatsoever.

I understand there is a fertile field for progress in this direction. There is no reason in the world why the pay corps should not be common to all the services, and let us get away from the tremendous overhead. There is no reason, either, why the provost corps should not be integrated; and though there may be some difficulty there, I am convinced that with a little effort the supply corps also could be integrated. For instance, there seems to be no reason for tremendous warehouses for each one of the different forces. Certainly a very large number of items—underwear, socks, boots, and a hundred other things—are common to all the services and could be looked after with far less overhead; and I could imagine that even technical things, such as engines for the navy, wings for the air force, and so on, could be housed and warehoused in such a way that there would be a great deal of economy.

So much for the question of integration.

The next point I would like to raise—and I would like to have some explanation given when the bill reaches committee—is the provision that the Court Martial Appeal Court, as honourable senators will have learned from the senator who explained the bill, will consist of judges of the Exchequer court and judges of superior courts.

Under subsection 11 of section 190 it is provided that:

> The Governor in Council may appoint and prescribe the duties of one or more military advisers to the Court Martial Appeal Court, and they shall be paid such fees or other remuneration—

It seems to me that this is like appointing a legal adviser to a judge, and I am just wondering whether it is entirely justified. Most of the cases which come before the appeal courts are really questions of criminal law. I presume that this addition of a military adviser to the court is possibly in order to make the court comparable to admiralty courts, where assessors are appointed to advise the court on rules of the road, navigation laws, and such matters. But it seems to me that it is hardly necessary to have an adviser for the rules of the road on the cases which would be most commonly before this court, namely, cases such as rape and murder, and I hardly think there is any necessity for this appointment.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would the advisers not be of assistance to the appeal court to advise them on matters relating to offences that might relate only to the armed services? That is where I think they would be very useful.

Hon. Mr. Power: Even so, I hardly think there would be many offences, or even any, of such a nature that the ordinary judge of the Exchequer Court or of a superior court, accustomed to criminal law and to all kinds of law, would not be quite competent to judge. In any event, by the time any case has reached the appeal court it will have been pleaded on the one side by the prisoner's friend, and by the prisoner's attorney, whom he is entitled to have, and on the other side by the Advocate General on behalf of the Crown, and it is entirely likely there will not be many difficult cases to clear up.

Generally speaking, this bill indicates a great improvement in our thinking and in the humanitarian tendencies of the armed services. It is notorious that historically the military law was harsh, almost to the point of brutality. For many years the Parliament of Britain had before it measures to do away with or to alleviate punishment such as flogging. There was even a time when there was almost a constitutional crisis because a near relative of the sovereign was opposed to the abolition of flogging, and this almost brought the sovereign into conflict with the government of the day. As to punishment by death—execution—there were numerous crimes in the old days, military crimes, which were punished by execution. I understand at the moment they are limited to very few, and the practice of carrying out of executions also has been considerably restricted. I took the trouble to look it up the other day because I had a sort of a dimming recollection that back in the First World War the Australian Government had reserved to itself the carrying out of sentences of execution and that as a result no Australians were shot during World War I. I inquired as to what had happened in the case of Canadian soldiers and I was advised that, though there are no accurate figures on the matter, at least 26, and possibly 31 or 32, Canadian soldiers were executed for military crimes during World War I. It was, perhaps, as a result of this that early in World War II the Canadian Government, following the example of Australia, decided that sentences of court martials carrying with it punishment by execution would not be effective before appeal was taken to the Governor in Council in Canada. I was not aware that so many as seven had come back to Canada for confirmation. The case referred to by my honourable friend from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) was one that I heard about at that time and was, as he said, the case of a deserter who not only had committed many military crimes but had committed a civil crime and had actually murdered one of his companions. For that reason I believe the bill is to be commended, because it does carry out this humanitarian trend that has been in force and effect, that has been going on for many years.

There is one more section in the bill, and in this connection, with all due respect and admiration which I have for the courage of the honourable and gallant gentleman who is the Minister of National Defence, I wonder why he has risked his reputation in the realm of semantics. This is a question which probably would have been better left to the Société du Bon Parler Français rather than to the officers of the department. I am not prepared at the moment to discuss the translation which has been made, but I would like to call the attention of honourable senators to this fact. In section 7 of the bill the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force in French is changed to Forces aériennes royales du Canada. We are accustomed in dealing with matters of this kind to, for instance, call the R.A.F. "RAFF". If honourable senators will just look at the initials F.A.R.C. and add on a small "e", or simply intone the "c" softly, and examine the result, I think they will agree that if this section is passed the minister might never dare to show his face in an R.C.A.F. Mess. In the light of recent events and with the uncertainty which seems to exist among members of the Royal Canadian Air Force today, I suggest to my honourable friend who introduced the bill, and I suggest to the minister himself, that in committee that if I move that this clause be stricken from the bill we carry that amendment unanimously.

Honourable senators, I have some other observations to make in connection with this bill. I understand there are other senators who wish to say a word or two on it and we therefore will not have the opportunity of referring this bill to committee this evening, so I would ask permission, if there is no objection, to adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the Banking and Commerce Committee will be meeting in the morning and also later on in the day, and it is very anxious to get at these bills, together with another one which I have in hand for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Power: I have no great objection, but I was advised that other senators wish to have a word on this bill. As I say, I have no objection to carrying on.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, if I may rise to a point of order, I would remind the house that there is not a great deal on the Order Paper to engage the attention of the Senate from now until Easter unless we get a good deal of legislation from the other house. I was rather impressed with the suggestion of the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) that we adjourn this debate tonight, and probably put it first on the Order Paper tomorrow, so it would get to the committee the following day.

Hon. Mr. Power: My only reason for suggesting adjournment of the debate was that I was under the impression that we would not finish the debate tonight. If there are no other senators wishing to speak I will go ahead right now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I wish to say something on it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am afraid we cannot avoid the situation. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) knows, I think, that I wish to get on with the bill which I have in my hand, a bill which I intended to deal with tonight, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act. I have another one here also which I would like to advance, an act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act. Those bills, I understand, have to go to committee and it is going to take a lot of time to deal with them. It is for that reason that I wanted to get ahead tonight.

I would point out that the order for second reading of the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act is preceded by the order for resuming debate on the motion proposed by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) regarding inflation, and by the order for resuming debate on the Address. I don't know when we will reach this bill if we have to proceed with these two orders first.

Hon. Mr. Power: Well, I will go ahead.

The change proposed by section 7 does bring up another question of considerable importance, particularly to people who have been associated with the Royal Canadian Air Force. As a result of what is happening by way of scientific development in the missile field, the question is, what is to be the future of the Royal Canadian Air Force? I am not here to enter into any discussion on the cancellation of the Arrow contract, nor do I propose to discuss the confused and complicated question of national sovereignty; nor do I think I have sufficient technical knowledge to discuss whether or not the time has come when manned aircraft should be set aside as obsolete and unnecessary, and when the country should take on the responsibility of dealing with intercontinental missiles; nor am I proposing to suggest any criticism of the minister. I know perfectly well that the circumstances are such, what with scientific development, obsolescence, and the tremendous cost of weapons, that his task is one of the most difficult which has ever faced a minister.

With respect to the Prime Minister, I think I would be less than fair if I did not say that when his was the role of critic and mine was the role of administrator, he was fair and constructive in his criticisms, even when sometimes he was right and I was wrong. It would be ungrateful on my part if I were to make of this particular difficulty, which I think exists, a reason for an attack on the Prime Minister. And I do not want to be thought of either as being a Colonel Blimp, shedding alcoholic tears into his brandy and soda at the unhorsing of his favourite brigade of cavalry.

I am moved to discuss this matter largely by affection for the people with whom I was associated for some years, and who showed me the most loyal and steadfast support. What brings this all about largely are articles in the Montreal Gazette and other newspapers. I refer first to a dispatch from Ottawa, in the Montreal Gazette of March 6, headed, "R.C.A.F. Wings Clipped." The article goes on to say:

A new concept of Canadian air defence has emerged since the Government's February 20 announcement of cancellation of the Arrow jet interceptor program.

By and large, it is this: The R.C.A.F. will handle the ground duties and the United States Air Force the flying.

Further on it says:

The assumption is that when the CF-100 is retired the R.C.A.F. will be out of the interceptor business for good, in Canada if not in Europe.

I refer to an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, and I shall make my quotation as brief as possible:

All this gives the impression that Canadian military aviation, with outstanding accomplishments in two world wars, is about to be grounded. The facts are considerably less extreme than this.

The article further says:

It is still true that the thought of all home air defence being flown by the U.S.A.F. while Canadians man the ground control stations and missile bases only is a sad one.

That is quite true. I haven't any doubt that throughout the ranks of the present R.C.A.F. and elsewhere, there is a feeling of uneasiness and anxiety. It has not as yet been alleviated by any definite or positive statement of Government policy with respect to the future status of the R.C.A.F., unless I am to take it that the Gazette is formulating and not explaining Government policy, which I doubt to be true.

Under those circumstances I should like to put a number of questions to the ministry in order that people interested in this branch of the service would know just what they might expect. Those questions would be something like this:

Does the minister's statement mean, as the newspaper implies, the clipping of the wings of the R.C.A.F. and the grounding of its flyers? What will be the function of the Canadian fighter and interceptor squadrons of the future? Will they be abolished?

Will ground crews and mechanics of these wings of the air force be used to service United States fighter squadrons?

Is there still a role for the R.C.A.F. to play in military transportation? It is suggested in the editorial in this morning's Gazette that there is, and it could become a very important role. However, what I fear is that this role in military transport may soon be claimed by the army as being connected with its function and responsibilities.

There is also a suggestion that the R.C.A.F., now charged with the duty of combatting the submarine, including nuclear submarines, might not continue to have that duty, but it would be transferred to the navy, which has, as honourable senators know, a fleet air arm of its own. It may be that, unless there is a clear and definite policy, we in Canada will be witnesses to unseemly and rather nasty sorts of quarrels which have become quite common in the United States as between different branches of service.

Another question which comes to my mind is, what will become of our trained fighter pilots, now in Canada and in Europe? Will any equipment be provided for our fighter squadrons during the time lag which is bound to occur between today and the day when both enemy bombers and allied fighters will become obsolete, and the intercontinental missiles will definitely take over as the weapon of war.

After hearing discussions and reading the debates of the other house, I ask myself whether we have not laid a greater emphasis on production than on procurement. There has been a great deal of talk with respect to production, brought on very largely, I suppose, by the fact that there is unemployment in this country and a desire to see allied dollars spent in Canada for production rather than procurement. But I am most concerned for the future of this arm of the service which has rendered great service to Canada.

Another matter, which perhaps is not so intimately concerned with late occurences but which is of great interest to me, is, what steps have been taken in the matter of integration of the Canadian forces, or the partnership or whatever you like to call it, with the United States forces, to preserve and protect the identification and distinctiveness of the Canadians who are to serve in these partnership forces?

That moves me to relate, from experience in the past war, some of the difficulties which arose between ourselves and a force more closely related by allegiance and common interest to the Royal Canadian Air Force—that is, the Royal Air Force—than the United States forces could possibly be. Early in the war, when a British commission came to Canada to lay the foundations of what became known as the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, matters, largely connected with the financial implications, which were very heavy, were discussed quietly and peacefully enough, but towards the very end the conferees struck what was a real snag. The snag consisted in ascertaining what would be the status of Canada and other commonwealth flyers after they were graduated from the air training plan. The British, very naturally, supposed these men on graduation would join the Royal Air Force, and that was all there was to it. The Canadian Government, particularly the late

Mr. King, Mr. Ralston and Mr. Rogers, felt that there should be some way of keeping track of our own people when they joined the forces overseas. They asked for an interpretation of an article in the air training plan agreement, part of which read:

> The United Kingdom undertakes that pupils of Canada, Australia and New Zealand shall, after training is completed, be identified with their respective dominions, either by the method of organizing dominion units and formations or in some other way . . . The United Kingdom will initiate intergovernmental discussions to this end.

The debate on this question of interpreting what appears to be a very simple clause became so contentious and so acrimonious that on the very night the agreement was to be signed the plan almost fell through. There were cables to and from Great Britain; there were telephone messages between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Great Britain; there were excursions to Rideau Hall and despairing, last-hope conferences. Finally, very late in the evening, or the early morning, an agreement was reached which permitted the Canadian authorities to pursue in after days what was called the process of Canadianization of the former Canadian units in the Royal Air Force by congregating together members of the Royal Canadian Air Force and naming them a Canadian squadron. As a matter of fact, there had to be an agreement on that matter between the Honourable Mr. Ralston and Right Honourable Archibald Sinclair, the British Minister of Air. The agreement provided for the formation of Canadian squadrons, and we did form squadrons in the bomber group, in the fighter group and in the coastal command, all composed of Canadian flyers, to which we added our own Canadian ground crew, and for which afterwards we also provided our own Canadian aircraft. But the difficulty—and that difficulty is one which I think might possibly arise in connection with our new partners—was in connection with individuals spread, as our men were, all over the Royal Air Force. There were thousands more Canadians who served with units of the Royal Air Force than there were with units known as Canadian squadrons, because we had not enough squadrons, and could not possibly have had enough squadrons, to place therein all the graduate pilots and others that were sent from Canada. I am free to say that in many instances our own boys were quite happy to serve with the Royal Air Force. They liked the partnership, and they had no objection. But difficulties arose in questions of commissioning, welfare, pay, leave, number of sorties, and, generally speaking, the interpretation of duties and responsibilities of airmen in the Royal Air Force as compared to the somewhat freer interpretation of duties and responsibilities which perhaps we gave them. For instance, if a boy ran himself into debt in Glasgow, or contracted a hurried marriage in Edinburgh, the fond papa and mama did not talk to the Air Minister of Great Britain, they talked to the Minister of Air in Canada, who found he was the target and the one eventually held most responsible, no matter how imperialist in his early stages the parent may have been.

The result was that Canadian public opinion felt that an organization in Canada should be fully responsible for all our boys, and that it was not sufficient for Canada to turn over to any other nation the bodies of fully-trained flyers and let it go at that; the men had to be followed up wherever they were; and that was one of the most difficult tasks during the course of the war.

In passing, may I say that this difficulty did not arise so much on the higher level, that of the minister or representatives here in Canada, such as Sir Gerald Campbell, Malcolm MacDonald and Harold Balfour, but rather in the lower echelons which still felt that possibly our people were colonial auxiliaries serving with the forces of a dominant partner. I might add that the United States has not often shown itself to be more understanding of Canadian susceptibilities than have the British. It became clear to us that we had to establish means to keep in contact with our men. I am sure that the same thing, although it may not have been thought out yet, will occur with respect to any partnership which we have with the United States.

Honourable senators, it took nearly four years of discussion, some of it not very amicable, before the British Air Ministry issued to all its commands the following circular:

> Canada is a dominion and as such is no less entitled to a separate and autonomous air force than is the United Kingdom. There is complete agreement between the two air forces on the importance of this policy. It is administratively sound, for the differences in discipline, pay, promotion and welfare which exist between the two present less difficulties when Canadians are grouped together in their own squadrons. Psychologically it is valuable, for however efficiently a mixed R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. crew may work together, the understanding bred of a common background and a common nationality is necessarily lacking.

This to us is a somewhat naïve and commonplace statement, but it may have its bearing in our relations with another nation which could not be said to have the same common interests and common allegiance as we have. However, we never deviated from our central policy. We entered the war as Canadians and we fought as Canadians and our people throughout the war were proud to carry the Canada badge so proudly and so gallantly on their shoulders.

In connection with the dispersion of our air crew throughout the squadrons of other nations, the story was told at the time, which I have every reason to believe, that in one of the Royal Air Forces—not the Royal Canadian Air Force—there was a sign in the pilots' mess saying, "Canadian spoken, English understood".

Hon. Mr. Brunt: They at least had a sense of humour.

Hon. Mr. Power: I wonder if there will be a sign, "Americans fly, Canadians serve"?

As units, our men served all over the world—In Iceland, Italy, Egypt, Ceylon and Greenland. In connection with a discussion of sovereignty, may I say that our men were in Alaska, defending American soil, long before the American nation had recovered from the shock of Pearl Harbour and within a few days after that said catastrophe. Our men served all over the world as Canadians in Canadian squadrons. With respect to those who were not grouped together there was no sphere of activity of the Royal Air Force from Greenland to Burma, and from the Hebrides to South Africa, where Canadians did not serve. Canadians were in every raid over Germany and every raid on Berlin. All the while we were able, through one small clause in the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan Agreement, which called for identification, to see that those boys carried on their duties in Canadian uniforms and wearing Canadian badges.

The success, if any, of the British Commonwealth Training Plan and of the Canadian air force overseas was due to the loyalty and enthusiasm of the people of Canada, but in a large measure it was due to the young men who joined the air force. They came from every section in Canada, from every walk of life, rich and poor, from the school, the college, the university. They represented a cross-section of a democracy. They were the least professional of soldiers and the most gallant of citizens. In Canada they spent their lives under varying conditions in a different atmosphere, but they were all imbued with a common purpose and in a common cause. It is to them that we owe whatever successes and whatever came by way of glamour and glory to Canada.

I say all this in order that the Government may take certain action. I am glad to know that within the ranks of the Government, in the Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable J. Angus MacLean, there is one of these young men who formed part of this force and who will, I am sure, be the last to neglect anything that can be done for those with whom he served.

I am asking the Government, in its arrangements which are bound to come at some period or other with the American air force, to bear in mind the difficulties which we have had with another service, and to make agreements and arrangements so that there will be no question as to the identification of our people, and their protection from the standpoint of Canadian custom, Canadian law, Canadian court martial proceedings and amenities such as chaplain service, and so on, which may or may not be observed in other forces in the same way as they are in our own.

Honourable senators, I have only one more comment to make.

I gather, in so far as I have been able to comprehend, that it is admitted that for some period to come, be it two, three, four or five years, the manned aircraft which we have might be reasonably reliable weapons of war for our defence. In any case, as long as this kind of equipment is valid, necessary and useful, I would urge upon the Government to see to it that we procure that kind of aircraft. If we haven't got it in Canada, let us procure it somewhere, so that Canadian boys will be flying in Canadian planes over Canadian soil for the defence of Canada.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, it is with diffidence that I rise to say anything with regard to this bill, first, because of the inspiring address that we have just heard, which I suppose has rung a chord in the breast of everyone who listened to it, and, secondly, because of the lateness of the hour.

The very fact of the interest we have shown in what the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) has said leads me to suggest that we do not overlook another section of this bill. I do not propose to say anything at all with regard to military matters. That subject has been dealt with by the honourable senator from Gulf far more effectively than I could possibly do. However, I call to the attention of honourable senators that we are considering an amendment, not to the Criminal Code but to criminal law, and as such it is vastly important.

A few years ago the Minister of Justice came to this chamber and presented us with a revised Criminal Code. He told us that the new work had been drawn by most eminent men, and gave us to understand that he thought it was a perfect document, and that all we had to do was pass it. Well, we referred the matter to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which in turn referred it to a smaller committee. It took this house two sessions to revise that bill. In one session we made no less than 80 amendments. In all, more than 100 amendments were passed. The minister became a little impatient at first, but by the time we were through he thanked us for what we had done, for we had greatly improved that measure.

It is just possible that in the shadow of the military thoughts that have been expressed, with all their appeal and interest, we have overlooked the other features and sections of this bill and not given them the attention they deserve. I point, for instance, to the section which allows the Governor General to formulate regulations with regard to the rules of evidence—a complete change from the former law. I very much doubt the ability of anyone to make rules on a subject of this nature. The rules of evidence are the development of many, many years of experience, and their chief benefit and use is the protection of the individual, the bringing out of the truth and the clarity of procedure, and so on. My friend from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) says that a new code of rules of evidence has been developed, I think he said by some professors. It is quite lengthy. Before we pass this bill I think the rules should be laid on the table, and I should like to read them. At all events, we should not pass this amendment until those rules have been presented to the Banking and Commerce Committee, thoroughly studied, and perhaps referred to a smaller committee.

My friend said that evidence was one of the most difficult branches of law. That is true. There are many different branches of law, and evidence is certainly one of them. He pointed out, if I understood him rightly, that under the present rules the law of evidence in that province in which the proceedings take place applies to the proceedings. There is a little uncertainty, perhaps, in the minds of those who administer it, but may I point out that there is a general law of evidence. There is the Canada Evidence Act which applies in all our provinces. For instance, my friend said something about the admission of documents. That is very fully dealt with in the Canada Evidence Act. It may be that all the law with regard to the admission of documents is not to be found in that statute, and certainly it is supplemented to some degree by the provincial Evidence Acts, but in the main that law is universal throughout the whole dominion of Canada. There is this distinction, of course, as between the common law provinces and the civil law provinces in the matter of the rules of evidence, that a court martial carried out in the province of Quebec, for instance, involves persons from that province, and they would be much more familiar with the rules of evidence in Quebec than with the rules of evidence of Ontario, or, indeed, with rules devised by a very learned board of professors.

I very much question the granting of power through order in council. Lay down rules, certainly. But I would hesitate to vote for a bill that gave permission to the executive to establish new orders that I have never read. It may be that it can improve matters very greatly, but it is our duty to see that it is an improvement before we pass it.

I presume this bill will go to the Banking and Commerce Committee, perhaps tomorrow. I for one will not be there, because I have other duties to perform. I hope there will be no haste with regard to the features of criminal law in this bill, but that they will be given very serious study, and by men who know something about that branch of law.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators will remember that the Yukon Act deals with the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories Act deals with the Northwest Territories, and that these acts have been amended from time to time. For example, last year, by chapter 9 of the Statutes of 1958, the Yukon Act was amended with respect to borrowing and lending powers, deputy police magistrates, the power of the Governor in Council to appoint clerks of court, sheriffs and other officers, and with respect to the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors. The purpose of that bill was to meet changing conditions in the Yukon, and the amending legislation was a step toward more democratic carrying out of local Government in that territory.

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Northwest Territories Act in a somewhat similar way for the purpose of meeting changing conditions in the Northwest Territories and to provide for the more orderly and effective administration of affairs in the territories. It is a further step toward responsible Government. The Northwest Territories Act is to be found in chapter 331 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. It was amended in the 1953-54 session, again in 1955, and again in 1957-58, each time for the purpose of giving the territories more control over their affairs.

Honourable senators will remember that the amendments made in 1957-58 had to do first with giving borrowing and lending power to the Commissioner in Council. It also dealt with territorial revenue and the appointment of police magistrates. This bill, C-26, is for the purpose of replacing subsections 2 to 7 of section 8 of the act by certain new subsections. The present provisions are shown in the explanatory notes on the right-hand page of the bill. Honourable senators will note that section 1 of the bill repeals subsections 2 to 7 of section 8 and substitutes therefor subsection 2, which provides for three changes. In the first place, it provides a fixed term of three years for the council; secondly it gives the Governor in Council power at any time to dissolve the council; and thirdly, subsections 4, 5, and 6 are not re-enacted. The Canada Elections Act applies, and therefore by-elections are provided for. The present subsection 2 of section 8 is re-enacted as subsection 3.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): How does the Canada Elections Act affect the section in question?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will come to that a little later.

Honourable senators know that under subsection 1 of section 8 of the act provision is made for four elected members of the council, and for the appointment of five councillors by the Government, one of whom is the Deputy Minister of the Department. The present subsection 3 provides that elected members of the council shall hold office for three years from the date of the return of their individual writs of election. On account of the time involved in getting the writs returned from the different districts each member's term now commences and ends at a different date. After the passage of this bill the term of council will continue for three years from the date of the return of the writs for the general election. That is the procedure laid down in the Canada Elections Act.

The present subsection 7 provides that the Governor in Council may, after two years from the return of the election writs, dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

Subsection 2 changes that provision and brings dissolution in the territories into line with the principles followed in provincial legislatures and the dominion Parliament. A similar change was made in the Yukon Act several years ago. With the repeal of subsections 4, 5 and 6 the provisions of the Canada Elections Act apply in respect to by-elections following an elected member's death or resignation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): What sections of the Canada Elections Act apply? If the honourable leader does not have that information, perhaps we can get it in committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will further explain that as I go along. I said that a similar change was made in the Yukon Act several years ago and that the repeal of these subsections 4, 5 and 6 bring into effect certain provisions of the Canada Elections Act. Therefore, honourable senators, it can be seen that although there are no specific provisions for by-elections in the act, such by-elections will be held as provided for in the Canada Elections Act, and will give full effect to the right of the people to elect their own representatives, which has been done in the Yukon for some time.

Section 2 of the bill repeals subsection 2 of section 11 of the act and provides that one session of the council shall be held each year at a place fixed by the commissioner on the recommendation of the council, but that all other sessions will be held at the seat of Government of the territories, as at present.

Section 3 of the bill repeals section 37 of the act and substitutes therefor a new section in which is inserted the words "judicial and" and "for the appointment of whom there is no other provision in this act". The reason for the change is that it was found necessary to appoint presiding officers for small debt tribunals established under the Judicature Ordinance of the territories. It was thought the present subsection 37 is not wide enough.

The Yukon Act was similarly amended last session by chapter 9 of the Statutes of 1958.

Section 4(1) of the bill repeals subsection 1 of the present section 42 and re-enacts the subsection by adding the words, "or a person authorized by him". This change is brought about by reason of the fact that the commissioner may from time to time be absent or unavailable, and permission to import intoxicants can be delegated to a person authorized by the commissioner. That same provision is in the Yukon Act.

Section 4(2) adds a new subsection 5 to section 42 of the act. The reason for this change is that section 42 adequately controls the importation of liquor into the territories, but a federal statute known as the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act also applies, and, according to the officials of the department, this is a duplication. The new subsection 5 merely states that the federal act does not apply.

Section 5 of the bill respecting archaeological sites, is self-explanatory.

Honourable senators, I have some general remarks to make with respect to the power of the Governor in Council to dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

I have already stated that the council consists of five appointed members and four elected members. One can visualize difficulties arising between the five appointed and the four elected members. Therefore, the section of the act which I explained previously keeps the power of dissolving council and holding a new election in the hands of the Governor in Council. So, if there is a difference between the elected members and the appointed members—and remembering that the appointed members are in the majority—the Governor in Council can move in. If a wish were expressed in open council to dissolve council, the Governor would have power to dissolve it and hold a new election, just the same as is done in provincial legislatures or in the federal Parliament where dissolution is effected by the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor, as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is a great difference, is there not?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am going to deal with that point.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, that is a brief explanation of the bill. I propose, when it receives second reading, that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration and explanation by the officials of the department.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the proposed amendments to the Northwest Territories Act enlarge slightly the autonomy of the Northwest Territories Council. It might be of interest to the house to know that, according to information supplied to me, the total population of the Northwest Territories at the present time is approximately 20,000. In the past year or 18 months there has been an increase of 5,000. The total white population is roughly 7,000, Indians 4,500, and Eskimos from 8,000 to 9,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In which group is there an increase?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have given the analysis of the population as it stands at the present time. The increase has come about, I suspect, through mining developments in the Yellowknife country, and possibly oil developments elsewhere in the Northwest Territories.

As I said a moment ago, generally speaking the bill increases the autonomy of the Northwest Territories Council, but there is in it one retrograde step and the justification for it as offered by the honourable Leader of the Government, to me at any rate, is not very convincing.

Under the legislation as it stands at present, the elected members of the council cannot be dissolved by the Governor in Council under two years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Correct.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Perhaps I should have said that the council consists of nine members, four of whom are elective four of whom are appointive by the Governor in Council, and the Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs is the Commissioner for the Northwest Territories and makes the fifth Government appointment. So, in reality, of the council four are elected and five are appointed by the Governor in Council.

Now if we are to give increased autonomy—and I think that is the wise thing to do with the Northwest Territories administration—then we should not, I submit, take a backward step. This follows pretty closely the development that took place in the old North west Territories of 80 years ago—I am not just sure of the date; perhaps it was a little later—when the first step prior to the inauguration of Saskatchewan and Alberta was to establish the Northwest Territories Council. But under the proposed amendment the Governor in Council can dissolve at any time the four elected members. Bear in my mind that under the law as it is at present this cannot be done under two years.

I do not think that the argument advanced by my good friend the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is particularly convincing, because here there is no parallel with the position of the provinces. The provinces are autonomous. It is true that the federal Government can, if it wishes to do so, have Parliament dissolved tomorrow. But if my honourable friend's argument is sound, he is seeking to impose the authority of the federal Government upon a council governing an area, outside of the provinces, that is becoming more and more autonomous.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If there was a dispute, would my honourable friend want it to continue for two years before anything could be done about it?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I would answer, yes, if there was a dispute. But it is not likely that one will arise, because there are four appointive members as against five elective members, so the appointive members are in a majority. But if the purpose is to nurse this administration along, I submit that it is unwise to have the overriding authority in the Governor in Council to send the elective members packing home and call a new election. While I do not suppose this is likely to happen, I submit that the question is one which, when the bill goes to committee, we could very well look carefully into.

I wish to make only one other comment, and that is with regard to section 3. Here again, I think, we are making an advance. The provision for appeals from a decision of a local court in the Northwest Territories as provided in the Northwest Territories Act leaves a good deal to be desired. If my memory serves me aright, in similar cases in the Yukon territory an appeal, as there is no appeal court there, lies to the court in British Columbia. But, as I understand the Northwest Territories Act, if, for instance, a company chartered in Ontario, engaged in mining in the Northwest Territories, had some litigation with local interests, and the case went against it in the local courts, it could appeal, not to an authority within the territories but to the appeal authority in Ontario. Similarly, a New Brunswick company, and one chartered in Nova Scotia or Newfoundland, could appeal to the courts of their respective provinces. Here, it seems to me, is a point which might be cleared up. It might be possible to find a way to create some appeal body within the territories to whom such appeals could be taken.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Does the point about appeals which the honourable senator is now discussing arise out of the provisions of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No. I merely raise it as something touching the administration of justice which might be considered in committee and provided for by an amendment. If my information is correct, the present Minister of Justice and the Government are now considering this very question. If that is so, my objection for the moment would fall to the ground, because the matter is one which requires careful thought, and it may be that the Government have in contemplation to bring in further amendments, perhaps at the next session of Parliament.

Since the hour is very late—it is almost midnight—I shall not deal with the other sections of the amending legislation. To these, I think, no reasonable exception can be taken; and the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate has explained them very clearly and fully.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

Third reading of Bill C-28, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954."

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand that the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) wishes to speak.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not received a copy of the evidence which was taken when this bill was before the committee. I do not know whether the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) has received a copy.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I understand that the last proceedings have not yet been distributed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If they have not been received, I do not see how we can discuss the bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, it is now eight minutes to 12 o'clock and I think we have put in a full day.

The Hon. the Speaker: We would get much more publicity if we sat until midnight.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The next item of business on the Order Paper stands in the name of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). He is not in the chamber to proceed, and in any event I think it is time to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Let's sit until 12 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We would like to handle the divorce bills remaining on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that we adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: What is the feeling of the Government?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If we adjourn at this stage what would be the first order of business tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The first order of business would be the resuming of the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Wall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Leonard, to have the subject of inflation referred to the Standing Committee on Finance. I would point out that the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) will not be here after tomorrow. If he does not speak tomorrow I do not know when he will have an opportunity to do so. I would further point out that the only other remaining items on the Order Paper are the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, a bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act and certain divorce bills. We are not likely to receive further legislation from the House of Commons tomorrow. I have looked over the Order Paper of that house and the only legislation that can possibly come to us is a bill for the appointment of parliamentary assistants. I see no reason for all the urgency.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am quite agreeable to what the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said. I just thought we might give second reading to the divorce bills. I concur in the motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald):

That for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out in the motion for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

I would like to say just a word. This is the usual motion that is presented every session prior to an expected recess. As we are approaching the Easter adjournment it is desired to have this motion passed, so that if any emergency should arise while we are absent from Ottawa we could be called back to work.

I think I should also make a brief announcement at this time. Owing to the fact that we are making quite good progress with the business on the Order Paper—excellent progress, I would say—it is expected that we shall be able to adjourn for the Easter recess on the 25th of March.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Until when?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We expect to be back on the 14th of April.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, before the motion carries, may I say I do not know why we should remain sitting until March 25, if the Government can get the interim supply measure before us the week previous. There seems no reason why that should not be done.

As to the business before this house, it appears to me that within a few days we shall have an almost blank Order Paper. I do not relish sitting here until March 25 with nothing to do.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think I can assure honourable senators that we shall have plenty of work between now and that date. I have made inquiries, and I expect the interim supply bill will reach us some time toward the end of next week.

Hon. Mr. Power: Good; we will guarantee to pass it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is up to you.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I suggest that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) qualify his announcement of a few minutes ago by saying that we may be called upon to remain in session until Wednesday, March 25.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the date fixed for the adjournment of the other place.

Hon. Mr. Power: But they don't work as late at night as we do.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We have to pass the interim supply bill, and it is expected that the royal assent will be given to certain bills on that day.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, in order to assist in clearing the Order Paper it has been suggested that we should deal with Order No. 5 now, for the second reading of a number of divorce bills. Accordingly, I move the second reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-121, an Act for the relief of Bernard Fourcade.

Bill SD-122, an Act for the relief of Sylvia Mary Mefrige Makad.

Bill SD-123, an Act for the relief of Marjorie Seymour Hammond Pearson.

Bill SD-124, an Act for the relief of Helene Dagenais Roy.

Bill SD-125, an Act for the relief of Violet Winnifred Kean Newton Armstrong.

Bill SD-126, an Act for the relief of Marlene Marle Korn.

Bill SD-127, an Act for the relief of Elaine Shirley Dorfman Moscovitch.

Bill SD-128, an Act for the relief of Eric Alexander McConnell.

Bill SD-129, an Act for the relief of Etta Rose Palevsky Lerman.

Bill SD-130, an Act for the relief of Edward Bruce Bonneville.

Bill SD-131, an Act for the relief of Pamela Margaret Clark Creber.

Bill SD-132, an Act for the relief of June Bernice Rath O'Hanley.

Bill SD-133, an Act for the relief of Michael Zuk.

Bill SD-134, an Act for the relief of George Frederick Davies.

Motion agreed to and bills read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I would now like to deal with item No. 6 on the Order Paper, for consideration of a simple amendment made by the other house to a private bill.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill S-8, respecting The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the amendment be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What is the nature of the amendment?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will give a short explanation of it.

Honourable senators will recall that this bill was passed by this chamber some time ago. When the bill was in committee of the other place it was felt that clause 3 should be amended.

Clause 3 of the bill as passed by us was as follows:

> The three thousand shares of the company issued and outstanding prior to the passing of this act and having a par value of one hundred dollars each shall be subdivided into thirty thousand of the aforesaid shares having a par value of ten dollars each on the basis of ten shares for one. The said thirty thousand ordinary shares shall constitute the total issued capital of the company at the date of the coming into force of this act.

It will be noted that this clause contains the following words: "The said thirty thousand shares". This appears in line 33 on page 3 of the bill. The feeling in the other place was that the use of these words was not quite accurate and was capable of causing confusion, and it was suggested that the entire section be redrafted. This was done by the Parliamentary Counsel and the Assistant Clerk of the other place. Clause 3, by this proposed amendment, would now read as follows:

> Each of the three thousand shares of the company issued and outstanding and having a par value of one hundred dollars is hereby subdivided into ten shares having a par value of ten dollars each, so that the capital stock of the company now issued and outstanding shall consist of thirty thousand shares having a total par value of three hundred thousand dollars.

I have been advised that this amendment has been brought to the attention of the parliamentary agent, the Toronto solicitor who acted for the company, the Superintendent of Insurance, and the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Commerce in the other place, and that all have approved of this amendment.

In my opinion the amendment arose because certain persons draft clauses in a bill such as this in one way and other persons have a different method of drafting the same clause. To me the new clause is every bit as satisfactory as the old one, and in addition it is somewhat shorter and the meaning is a bit clearer.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the third reading of Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I regret that I was called out of the chamber when this bill was given second reading, for I had intended to speak on it at that time. I would like to make a few remarks now, although I will not go into the matter as deeply as I had intended to.

I am fully in accord with the principle of this bill, which was explained so very well by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson). Adequate housing is a social necessity and I highly approve of increasing from $750 million to $1 billion the amount that can be advanced from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for this purpose. It certainly will be of advantage if we can create a fluid market for mortgages. I am in favour, too, of the corporation being able to sell insured mortgages to any purchaser who is willing to buy under the conditions that are set out in the amendment.

Regarding the amendment providing that the insurance fund may guarantee 100 per cent of the value of insured mortgages, I think that is a very excellent amendment and I do not understand why this provision has not always been in the act. I agree with all the amendments in the bill and I only wish there had been more. I read with the greatest interest the remarks of the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) regarding the urgent need for student residences for universities. Many universities had hoped that the Government this year would introduce an amendment to the National Housing Act making it possible for universities to borrow from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at low rates and on long terms for the purpose of building student residences. Despite the fact that grants are being made by the Canada Council for such residences at the present time, as the figures quoted by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg show, the amount available from this source is far too small to meet the rapidly growing need of our universities.

I had intended to discuss this matter more thoroughly but the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg has covered the subject more adequately than I could hope to, and I will say nothing further along that line except that I, together with many people throughout Canada, am deeply disappointed. I hope that sometime in the future the Government may find it possible to change its policy in this regard.

I should like to refer for a few minutes to the matter of housing for older citizens and the Government assistance that is required to meet this need.

In many European countries and in the United States, and in Canada to a lesser degree, there are current country-wide crusades taking place to provide for a better life for older citizens. One of the requirements for that better life is adequate and suitable housing.

Honourable senators, owing to progress in medical science, the increase in the number of older citizens in Canada's population has been really spectacular. For example, in Canada in 1951 the number of people of 70 years and older numbered 653,000, which was more than double the number in that age category in 1921.

Another figure that might interest honourable senators is that between 1881 and 1951 there was an increase of 154 per cent in the number of Canadians, but in the group of those over 70 there was an increase of 477 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask what period those figures cover?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: 1881 to 1951. That means there were a very great many more older people in our population in 1951 than in 1881, and the number is increasing. This increase, together with the trend in this country toward urbanization which results in smaller homes in which there is room for only the immediate family and no space for older relatives, is causing a real demand for low-rental housing for older people, which housing at the present time is in especially short supply. The incomes of people in Canada over 65 are not high. This is borne out by a survey made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in 1955 showing the income of single persons over 65 and heads of families over 65. I have a copy of the report of this survey and I think honourable senators would be interested in reading it. With the permission of the house I will place it on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Thank you.

Percentage distribution of families and unattached individuals, age 65 and over, by income groups, 1955

Income group

Median income	$1,740

Because of the relatively low incomes of people over 65 years of age there is very little financial inducement to private enterprise to build the greatly needed low-rental accommodation. The federal Government has already assumed a considerable share of responsibility for facilitating housing for large sections of the population, but special provision should be made for older people who perhaps in the matter of shelter are more in need of help than is any other group in our country. It is my belief that accommodation or shelter for older people should include not only housing as it is defined in the National Housing Act, but also hostels where well older people, who cannot any longer look after their household chores, can live in a room and be provided with meals and other necessary help to carry on.

Assistance should also be given for building boarding homes where those who have become too feeble or too ill to care for themselves could be looked after when they do not need the care that they would have to be given, perhaps, in nursing homes.

I am aware that in the other place, when the minister was speaking on this subject, he said that under the terms of the act the Government is not able to go into these projects. But my suggestion is that the terms of the act could be changed if we have a great need, and I believe we have such a need.

Hostels and homes, which would provide some accommodation for older people who greatly need it, could be built if the act were amended to facilitate the borrowing of money at lower rates of interest, and for long terms—and, honourable senators, such buildings are urgently needed.

May I point out that one of the objects of the act accepted by everyone is to provide employment, and constructing buildings to take care of older citizens, or even constructing university residences, which I mentioned before, would provide employment equally as well as constructing housing units themselves.

Although there is no special provision in the Housing Act for housing of older people, there are at least two sections under which such housing can be built. One of these is section 36, whereby a housing project can be arranged through federal, provincial and municipal partnership. This project could include a certain number of self-contained units for senior citizens, along with housing for other families with children.

Many people who have studied the matter would like to see the corporation encourage and make it worth while for municipalities starting housing projects to include in them units for older people. These units could be put into their regular housing program, and reserved for older people.

Another section under which senior-citizen housing can be built—but it is not limited to senior-citizen housing—is section 16, which the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) described as being in operation in Winnipeg, and in which he has been very much interested. This section makes it possible for companies which are limited as to the dividends they may receive from a project to borrow up to 90 per cent of the lending value and to have a period of amortization up to the useful life of the project, but in no case to exceed 50 years. This assistance, as honourable senators know, is made by way of loan, and the full amount of the loan, plus interest—at a lower rate than can be secured on the open market—is eventually returned to the Treasury. Many service clubs, charitable foundations, church groups, business leaders, labour organizations, fraternal associations and others I have not mentioned, in various parts of Canada, have formed such limited-dividend companies to look after the housing needs of our older citizens, and with the particular idea of providing houses for people who are dependent entirely on the old age pension or on some other very limited income.

Honourable senators, the act was set up to provide reasonable housing, but, even with a limited dividend, the increase in the cost of construction of buildings has meant that the rents that must be charged to bring in even a 5 per cent dividend is in many cases too high for those with a limited income, and many people who have to depend entirely on their pensions are not able to consider living in this type of housing.

I have visited a number of senior citizens who are living in dwellings which have been built under this section, and have found that they are very happy and are provided with excellent housing. However, I think I should point out that other countries, particularly those with wider experience than Canada has had in providing housing for older citizens, have found that in general it is not a good idea to place these people in remote or segregated areas, as is so often done for purposes of economy. Sweden, Denmark and the United States, for example, which have gone into this on a much bigger scale than we, at first provided housing for older citizens away from the centre of the community, but later they changed this practice. Proximity to the centre of community activities has been found to be much better for older citizens in every way. They are happier when living where they can talk to younger people and children, where they can attend the churches they attended in earlier years, and where they can visit the shops they have always known, but in Canada land prices are such that building for older citizens under the act usually takes place in areas remote from the centre of a town or city.

One of the things our Government might do would be to provide for making land available in more central places. At the present time the price of land in cities is usually considered prohibitive. But just to illustrate what is being done in the United States, I might say that in Detroit, for example, the downtown Park avenue Hotel, which has 240 rooms, has been taken over and turned into a residence for older people. Also in Detroit a hotel of 750 rooms in the centre of the city was acquired and used for the same purpose. In a number of other cities the same kind of thing has been done.

May I point out, honourable senators, that the largest amount of limited-dividend housing for older citizens in Canada has been built in four provinces where provincial grants are made to assist in the construction of these limited-dividend housing projects. Those provinces, as honourable senators probably know, are British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. There is no limited-dividend housing, particularly for older persons, in my province of New Brunswick and I believe there are none in any of the Atlantic provinces. The proportion of older citizens in the Atlantic provinces is equally as high as in any other part of Canada. I have secured figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on this point, and I will say very briefly that in the Atlantic provinces the number of people over 60 represents 10.9 per cent of the population, and in Canada as a whole the percentage is 11.0, which is very close. In the Atlantic provinces the number of people over 65 represents 7.8 per cent of our population, and for Canada as a whole the percentage is 7.7, so we have a little higher proportion in that group. The group over 70 constitutes 5.1 per cent of the population of the Atlantic provinces, as against 4.8 per cent of the population of Canada. So the groups over 65 and 70 represent a higher proportion of the population of the Atlantic provinces than of the total population of Canada, and housing for senior citizens is certainly needed as urgently in those provinces as in any other part of the country.

I do not know if this is another instance where federal legislation works out to the disadvantage of our people in the eastern provinces. One such instance was strikingly outlined by the senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly) in this chamber on March 3, and like him I am prepared to protest event a hint of such discrimination. I only regret that I am not able to voice my protests against the lack of consideration given to the needs of the eastern provinces in as eloquent a manner as he did, but my feelings on the subject are just as strong.

It may be, however, that the reason why we do not have such housing for our senior citizens in my own province and in the other Atlantic provinces is that our provincial Governments have not passed legislation enabling provincial grants to be given for this purpose as four other provinces have done. I am sure we are just as concerned as other provinces are about this matter, but probably owing to our smaller resources our Governments have felt they could not afford such grants.

In an article in the Community Planning Review, the magazine of the Community Planning Association of Canada, September 1956, P.R.U. Stratton, Past President of the Vancouver Housing Association, says:

> At present federal financial assistance to such societies—

He was referring to limited dividend companies.

> —is limited to long-term loans at a low rate of interest. Local levels of Government, however, should not be expected to provide the whole of the relatively heavy subsidy required by such societies. In Europe, central Government subsidies are made available to private housing societies in the form of grants, as well as loans, to build housing for special groups.

In our province we do not even have subsidies from our own provincial Governments, and that is all the more reason why we should give federal grants.

Quite possibly if federal grants were made for these projects, in addition to the long-term loans allowed under the act, despite the lack of provincial grants our Atlantic provinces might find it possible to participate in the building of low-cost houses for senior citizens, under the provisions regarding limited-dividend companies.

Again, it may be that the reason why we in the Atlantic provinces have not made use of the provisions of the act which permit us to borrow in order to build low-cost housing for our older citizens is that we have not been aware of the possibilities that are provided under the act. For some time the Canadian Welfare Council, through its Committee on Aging, has tried to make information about housing for older citizens, as well as other services and projects for older people, known to those who are interested in providing for the needs of this class of people. Now, although through the many requests and inquiries sent to it from all over Canada the committee is well aware of the interest and desire of the people to learn about these projects, the Welfare Council, which as you probably know, is a voluntary organization, has been unable through lack of finances to assign sufficient staff to meet adequately the need of supplying information and help to people who want it.

On reading the debates in the other house I was struck with the suggestion of the honourable member from Vancouver South, as reported on page 696 of the Commons Hansard, that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might:

> —establish a promotional or development section of the organization which could advise service clubs, church groups and others how they could participate in the limited dividend type of housing.

From my work with the Canadian Welfare Councils Committee on Aging I know there is a need for someone to do such work. Now, honourable senators, I am very well aware that the branch managers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation throughout Canada are charged with giving publicity to the type of housing that can be built under the act, including limited-dividend housing for older citizens, but with their other responsibilities I do not see how they can do this on as wide a scale as would be required to give a fair opportunity to people in different parts of Canada, especially in the Atlantic provinces, to participate in the advantages that are possible under the act.

Honourable senators, the National Housing Act is a wonderful piece of legislation, and those charged with administering it deserve our highest commendation. I have no criticism of the act or of its administration—in fact, I have only the highest praise—but in addition to a continuation of the projects now authorized under the act I would like to see legislation passed that would make loans available for university residences and for shelter other than housing units for older persons. I would also like to see changes made in the National Housing Act whereby the Government would enable housing for old people to be erected in central locations where cost under normal conditions would be prohibitive.

Furthermore, I think federal grants should be made to limited-dividend companies, besides the long-term loans now available, particularly if the limited-dividend company is a charitable or philanthropic one and willing to forgo the limited-dividend permitted. If the shareholders are sufficiently interested to put their money into such an operation and forgo even any dividend on their money I think they should be able to receive federal grants.

Despite the fact that under the act there is provision for long-terms and relatively low interest rates, and despite the restriction on the amount of dividend permitted, because of the increased costs the rents of many housing units are set too high for older people of limited income—many of them dependent on pensions alone—to take advantage of some of the projects that have been built. Federal grants to these limited-dividend companies I am sure would help people in the Atlantic provinces who are interested in providing this type of housing but at present are unable to do so.

I read with interest the report of the remarks of the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt), at page 284 of Hansard, from which remarks I gathered that to give grants is contrary to the spirit of the act, which provides for secured loans for the welfare of people. May I point out that in certain cases under section 36 of the act outright grants are made, which the Government does not recover. So, to ask for grants such as those given to limited-dividend projects is not in any way violating the spirit of the act.

Finally, I would like to see a department or section set up in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which could be devoted entirely to giving advice, help and perhaps encouragement to clubs, church groups and others as to how they can participate in providing housing in suitable locations at rents set low enough so that our rapidly increasing population of senior citizens may with their modest income take advantage of Government housing assistance.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I was absent last week when this legislation was brought in, but I would like to take a few moments now to support very warmly the remarks of the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson).

Before doing so, I wish to commend the Government for the large amount of money it has made available during the past 18 months to encourage house building. Some spectacular things have been done, but, as the honourable senator from Fredericton has so well pointed out, there is still a segment of the population which has not benefitted to the extent that it should have, namely, the people who are retired and living on pensions.

Some of us know what has been happening in the province from which I have recently returned. There the provincial Government embarked on a five-year plan to provide houses for older people. I would suggest to the federal Government, if it wants a very popular and vote-getting program, this type is hard to beat. But politics aside, this is a great need. The older people have not as yet had the benefit they should have from this legislation.

Some years ago I had the privilege of visiting the old peoples' homes in Denmark and Sweden, where they have done just what the honourable senator from Fredericton has suggested. They established what they call "old peoples' towns", complete with self-contained units where older people live, where they have their own little garden plots, their own theatres, churches and dining rooms. They are very happy places indeed. I would like to see something like that done here.

I should like to mention another area of very great need, namely, that of university housing, which the honourable senator from Fredericton referred to. From various estimates we have we know that the university attendance in Canada will double in the next ten years, and as yet there is no sign of any intention of meeting the need for university residences. I hope that steps may be taken to bring the university residence needs within the scope of this act, and it would not be very difficult to do.

Unfortunately, in the last year or so interest rates have risen tremendously, with the result that it is now more difficult to provide housing on a self-liquidating basis than it was when costs were originally worked out; but they can still be provided at reasonable cost on a self-liquidating basis over a period of 30 to 35 years at the outside.

If the Government embarked on a program of university housing, it might well provide loans for that purpose. I suggested in a former address to this house that a 10-year program involving an expenditure of $100 million might be undertaken. That is not a heavy program, $10 million a year. First of all, it would provide a certain measure of employment and, secondly, it would provide a type of housing that is badly needed. Further, it would be a self-liquidating project. Finally, anyone who is familiar with student-residence life knows that it has no substitute for what it can do by way of character building, since the student lives in a community which has as one of its main motivations the prime factor of consideration for others.

So I sincerely hope, honourable senators, that the Government will take the opportunity at this time when the National Housing Act is being amended to broaden its scope in a more imaginative way, to make further provision for older people on small incomes, and to get into the field of university housing, which is one of the saddest aspects of our whole university picture today. The demand for financing of university buildings to provide classrooms and laboratory needs over the next ten years is so heavy that unless some access to additional funds is made available the universities are not likely to be able to do any better than they have done so far. There are some provinces which have not built a new residence on the campus since 1923.

Under the Canada Council program provision was made for allocating a certain amount of money for university residences and buildings of that kind, but the total is so small that it cannot begin to fill the need.

Therefore, honourable senators, I hope that the entire house will support the suggestion made by my colleague from Fredericton, because this is important and valuable legislation.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, it is not my purpose to speak again on this bill, but to explain my point of view which was referred to by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson).

I stated that I thought the National Housing Act, in as far as it affects the functions and purposes of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, should remain as it is. I do not think we should introduce amendments which would bring about drastic changes in the basic principles on which the corporation is founded and operates.

I am all in favour of assistance being given to meet the needs referred to, such as housing accommodation for older people and residences for students. But I pointed out that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is designed to administer repayable loans; in other words, if the corporation is to fulfil its functions properly, the money paid out must earn interest and be repaid. If we introduced some radical changes in the function of the corporation we might cause a confusion which would so interfere with its administration as to bring about a weakening in its primary operation.

The only point I wanted to make was that, instead of introducing the very commendable projects through an amendment of the National Housing Act, which would affect the present policy and operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, these projects should be a subject of special legislation.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I correct a possible misapprehension of my honourable colleague from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt)? Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I only meant that for some of the purposes I mentioned money should be obtainable on long terms and at low interest, as is possible under the housing plan. I do not know why it could not be done for the purposes of this type of building as it is done in the matter of housing. I did mention grants in another connection, when I said I thought we might have them to assist low-dividend housing projects, and I still think that this would be an excellent thing. When I referred to the honourable senator from St. John's West, I meant that to make such grants would not be contrary to the act, because under certain sections of the act grants are made.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: It was chiefly the matter of administration to which I was referring.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I did not intend to take any part in this debate. I was in the chamber the other day when it began, and one or two remarks which have been made this afternoon are a repetition of what was said then. First, let me say that I agree with the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) that housing is a specialized business. I know something about it. I was engaged for ten years in the city of Winnipeg in the house-building business. It cannot be mixed with other things. If residential properties are to be built for older people the project should be dealt with by a separate organization. If housing is needed for the universities there, again, a separate organization should be set up.

Some emphasis has been placed on the building of residential accommodation at universities for students. All the provinces which have been heard from this year have produced very healthy budgets—much better, in fact, than will be shown in the report of the dominion Government which will be issued in a few days. Expenditures by the federal Government for various purposes have added very greatly to the national expenditures, and the question arises whether the dominion is to be asked to continue to provide money for provincial uses or whether the provinces should put up their own money. A university is a provincial matter.

Regarding the point raised by the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), may I say that I know something about universities. I am not a professor, but I have been on the board of management of the University of Manitoba for a long time. I can recall with certainty a period of only 37 years, but I believe I served longer ago than that. I was a student at Manitoba College and I am a graduate of Manitoba University. Perhaps these personal references may be pardoned. The first year I came to college a month late. I did the same the second year. The reason was that I was working as a teacher. In the first year I earned the big salary of $35 per month, and paid $10 for my board. Next year showed an improvement; I received $35 a month and paid only $9 for my board. I went to the university a month late because I had to earn money, having none of my own, and my dad had a lot of other children who, quite properly, had to share his small means. Some students lived in the college dormitories at a very low rate; the rest of us poor suckers, having hardly one dollar to rub against another, had to hunt a cheap rooming house and stay there. But who were the top men at the end of the year? The boys in the college or the boys outside? Look at the record. The moral applies right down through the years. Today similar conditions produce the same results.

Why in the world should a man or a woman receive education in a university at the expense of the public, other than as far as the maintenance of the university itself is concerned? A yearly fee, of course, is required. In my day a student paid $45; now, I understand, he pays about $200. That fee was for college tuition, but no rooms were provided. It is now proposed that houses shall be built which students will occupy for five, six, or seven months in a year; the rest of the time the accommodation will be vacant. I do not believe that the people of Manitoba or any other province should be called upon to build houses for this purpose, and I do not think it would be good for the students if they did. These boys and girls should learn that life in a country like Canada is a hard struggle. We are a new country; we are trying to develop under very difficult circumstances. Today the world is in chaos. We do not know whether another war will break out tomorrow, or the day after, or never. We do know that a gigantic struggle for power is going on, that great forces are directed against world freedom, and ours is one of the nations which must try to hold the line.

Speaking personally, I would prefer to employ a young male student or young woman stenographer who has gone through university and graduated after a hard fight, to someone who has been coddled during his or her academic life. Dozens of people nowadays are having a hard time. Some little while ago a young woman came into my office with tears in her eyes. She was born in Canada of Polish parents; she could not get a job because she spoke broken English. I asked her, "Can you take shorthand?" She said, "Yes, Mr. Haig." I then asked, "Can you be here at 9 o'clock in the morning?" She said she could. I said, "And are you sick every other afternoon?" "No," she replied. That was six months ago. We engaged her, and she is one of the best girls we ever had. She knew that she was up against difficulties, and she was trained to struggle against them. On inquiry from the college where she graduated I was told that she was one of the best girls in the class. I am opposed to mollycoddling university students. It hurts, not me, not you, but them. It hurts them because it makes them unfit to go out into the world and fight the battle of life.

When I was attending college I was able to go home to the little town where I lived. I used to consult my mother about matters—a boy generally goes to his mother—and I learned things from her which have served me all my life. I wouldn't have learned those same lessons had I been mollycoddled at college. I wouldn't have made much progress at all. I had just so much money and I knew I had to pay my university fees in the spring, and I saved every nickel I had in order to pay them. You may not believe this, but with the exception of my Christmas vacation at home I was out of my room just one weekday in the whole school term from the beginning of November to the end of May. And I was not the only such student. The students who won medals did the same thing. They were not mollycoddled, but I remember the ones in our class who were. They were not in the same category as the rest. A man in politics tries to keep track of his old university acquaintances, and I know that years later I felt sorry for those who had not had proper training during their university years. They had not had to stand up against the gun and fight.

I don't think the people of this country would stand for the Government spending large sums of money to finance student housing. It is easy to suggest we should do it. It may sound good as a political platform, but when you got the result from the poll box you would find out differently. And I think I can speak with some authority on elections.

As to supplying housing for older people, I entirely agree with what the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) has said. There is nothing so sad as old parents whose families have let them drift aside. They have a real problem, but it has to be handled separately. I know that in Manitoba, which is an ordinary province, many churches are building homes for the aged. This plan is working out very well indeed, but it is welfare work and should not come under a business set-up. You can't mix welfare and business. Some people will invest money in business and not in welfare, and vice versa, and the tax approach with respect to welfare organizations and business organizations is different.

Last year the Senate Finance Committee made a thorough study of housing problems, but it did not recommend that anything be done to carry out suggestions made to it about student housing.

The present Government has done a great deal—and this is true also to some extent of the old Government—through housing programs to provide employment for our workers and houses for our people. A family can be brought up better in a single house than in an apartment or any other type of dwelling. A person will always remember the old family home where he or she lived with his or her father and mother and brothers and sisters. It is better if they do not live under the same roof with members of other families. Perhaps I have lived in a wrong period, but in my earlier days we didn't have all these teenage, juvenile delinquency problems. I don't know why we didn't, but we didn't. It has only been in the last 25 years or so that juvenile courts have been set up to handle these problems. I am persuaded that mollycoddling of children has produced these results.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: National housing was introduced by the Liberal Government. I give it full credit for this and I commend the present Government for continuing the policy. But let us not ruin the good work by introducing these other matters. If the honourable the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) and others want the Government to finance university residences, then let them go out to Winnipeg, Edmonton and other places and campaign for it in the name of the Liberal party. They will find they won't get any more members elected than they have now.

I have been in the Senate for quite a few years and I don't want to see people suggest things that will adversely affect policies that have been proving successful. I wouldn't want to see anything done to cause young couples to suggest to their aged parents: "There's a house for you over there. You stick to yourselves over there". My own parents are gone, but I remember everything my mother told me about business affairs and everything else. I could always depend on her advice. Hundreds of other people could say the same about their parents. We have no right to put false ideas in the heads of our young men and women.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I really don't think the people of Canada would stand for Government financing of university residences. I am all for building housing accommodation for the old people, but even that has to be done in its proper time and place. By introducing national housing development the Liberal party took the first step to help our children to be brought up under proper living conditions. The present Government has quite properly carried on this policy, and in these last two years it has spent vast sums on housing. But this is a project that gives employment to many people across the country.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to say more. I hope the Senate will not amend the present bill. I agree entirely with the comment of the honourable senator from St. John's West that if people want the Government to help finance university housing, let them bring in a separate bill to this effect. The same comment applies to housing for the aged. Let them bring in the bills and we will discuss them on their merits.

I congratulate the people of Canada on having had two Governments which realized that economical housing is a prime necessity in this country, and that the family tie is the foundation of our national life.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I took advantage of the opportunity to address you on this general subject of money at the last session of this house, and I do not intend to repeat the statements I made on that occasion. However, the subject is so important, and the necessity for clarity of thought so great that I could not allow this motion on inflation to pass without at least some few comments.

In addressing myself to the motion, I wish first to compliment the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) and the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) on bringing to the attention of the house a matter of great and pressing importance. In my humble opinion, both senators, by their excellent speeches, demonstrated most successfully the desirability of—I quote their words—a "comprehensive inquiry" into Canada's monetary policies, and also the need for immediate action.

In his masterly address, with its wealth of detail, the mover of the resolution (Hon. Mr. Wall) gave evidence of a most painstaking preparation that must have earned the approval, and no doubt the admiration, of all of us who are his colleagues. The studious senator justified his request for an "organized study", as he called it, of the subject of inflation by measuring the growth of the gross national product of Canada since 1949, first, in constant dollars, and then in the present currency, inflated as it has been, during those years. He told us that the difference between these figures was about $9,000 million. That impressive sum of money is the amount by which the purchasing power of our money has fallen since 1949 as applied to the gross national product of our country. I do not suppose anything further need be said to establish the desirability of a study and an understanding of the forces that brought about that change in our economy. I know that statistics are not necessary to demonstrate to people living on fixed incomes the disaster of rising prices, and of course the corollary to rising prices is falling money.

I do not propose to waste time in discussing the meaning of words, but in my vocabulary—in my terminology—the rise in prices due to the fall in value of money is inflation. Let me follow that by saying that not all increases in prices are due to that cause of falling money, and thus the necessity of distinguishing between the two causes of increase in prices. Take those increases that are not due to the change in the purchasing power of the dollar. First, you have increases in the intrinsic value of goods. The mousetrap of today may be better built than that of a few years ago, and therefore it costs more money to make and is a little more expensive to buy. Second, commodities may include materials which have gone into short supply. Third, increased wages will certainly affect prices, as will higher profits, tariffs and excise, sales taxes, gasoline taxes, and municipal taxes upon buildings and improvements on property. There are quite a number of others, but the greatest to be considered at the moment are the increase in land values and high rents. My friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) spoke a few minutes ago about the value of land in Canada being so high in the centres of population as to make it impossible for us to provide proper housing for old people. All these things add to the cost of commodities and therefore necessarily increase prices. Then it is always possible that mounting demand for some commodity may outrun the existing means of production and thus create a seller's market. All these things may at times increase prices.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Are they not a factor in inflation?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If inflation means just increasing prices, yes, they are a factor. That is what I have been saying, that not all increases in prices are due to the fall in the value of the dollar, and I have tried to enumerate those things which are not to be debited against the currency factor. Of course they are factors.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Don't they assist in the falling of the value of the dollar, by contributing to it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not think they are an element in the falling of the value of the dollar. They are an element in the increase in the cost of, and therefore the price of, commodities. That is a different thing, and should be distinguished in our thinking, from the change in the purchasing power of the dollar which is due to other causes to which I will refer.

All these things that I have enumerated, I submit to you, are not sufficient to account for the billions of dollars of increases in prices mentioned by the junior senator from Winnipeg. Certainly none of them, nor all of them together, will account for what we have seen in other countries, that is, runaway inflation, or, as it has been called on some occasions, "galloping inflation," an inflation with which I submit we are at present threatened.

Take wages to begin with, to discuss these items that I have mentioned.

Measured in dollars, wages have risen, but, measured in the commodities which wages will purchase I submit that they have risen very little. Or again, gauged in that percentage of the gross national product which goes to wages, in my opinion they have actually fallen.

Let me illustrate. Just last week I stood beside a railway track and saw a great freight train roll by. It was over a mile in length; it was composed of more than 100 cars and was drawn by a three-unit diesel locomotive. It was immensely heavier, it was longer, and it was travelling at a much greater rate of speed than did trains of years gone by, and not very many years ago at that. And note the point: it was operated by one man less than the number that comprised the crews of freight trains a few years ago. Now, if there was any increase in the real wages—there was in the money wages—of that crew, the increase was infinitesimal as compared with the increased productive power of that train. The slight increase in real wages, if there was one, is not an element to any appreciable extent in the increase in prices of the commodities which that train might carry.

Speaking of railroading, we have still to take into consideration the disappearance of roundhouses due to substitution of the diesel locomotive for steam traction.

I am emphasizing that, while wages may play some part in increasing prices, they have played a minor part in the tremendous increase to which the junior senator from Winnipeg referred.

Sometimes—oh, I should not say I am annoyed, but I cannot help wondering just why it is that those who seek to blame organized labour for rising prices persistently close their eyes to the fantastically magnified land values and high rents which now characterize the dominion of Canada. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), speaking in this same debate, mentioned an increase in railway wages, and as a result of that increase the prospective advance in freight rates, which of course will probably result in some increase in prices. With that logic, of course, I can have no quarrel. It is perfectly sound. But it does not affect very greatly the problem before us at this moment. The honourable senator for Churchill might have gone a little further and told us how much of the increase in wages to which he referred was based upon the increase in such items as rent which the worker has been required to pay.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would the honourable senator permit me a question? Are you contending in your argument that wages paid today to artisans and workmen have no relation at all to the cost of living? Is that your argument?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did I say that? I said the reverse. I have been arguing clearly, at least I thought I was arguing clearly that one of the factors in the increase in prices may be wages, but what I object to is the effort to blame all increases in prices on organized labour, which is an entirely different thing, and of course in doing so I have been pointing out that there are many factors to be considered in connection with the increase in prices.

Now, in a class with the monopolization of the earth and the high prices that attach to it, but of vastly less importance in magnitude, are price increases effected by patent monopolies, cartels, conspiracies for the elimination of competition and so on. All these things may increase the selling price of goods, but all of them, I submit to you, are of lesser importance in the problem of inflation, whatever your definition of that word may be. I do not wish to spend time arguing over the meaning of words, but, in my terminology, when I speak of inflation, I refer to the decrease in the purchasing power of money rather than to the increase in the intrinsic value of goods or the artificial scarcity, the non-accessability and so forth of the goods themselves. Inflation occurs when the prices of goods go up because the value of money goes down. There is my definition.

Then why does money go down? There is a classic phrase used by economists and very often heard from the platform and the press, and I have heard it in this chamber: money goes down when too much money chases too few goods. Too few goods I have referred to already, and that factor may not be wholly controllable; but the factor of too much money, I submit, is controllable.

Now observe this: money consists of two things, currency, which is certainly under Government control and is in fact produced by the Government printing press, and bank credits. The amount on deposit in the chartered banks, including Government deposits, is the measure of credits available to the public for the cashing of cheques. A cheque is the equivalent of so many dollar bills, because it has that much purchasing power.

The honourable junior senator from Winnipeg gave us figures with respect to these two items, namely, currency and bank credits, which have almost doubled since 1946. As I have said, the issue of currency is directly within Government control, and I submit bank credits are very largely in the same category. The excess of credit available for the purchase of commodities is both directly and indirectly within Government control. Indirectly by reason, for instance, of purchases on time of cars, appliances, and so on, and loans including building loans, which furnish purchasing power to deplete our too few goods, without immediate replacement of them; and directly, by way of Government borrowings, including the issue of Government bonds, which in public possession are like dollar bills for they are Government promises to pay and are negotiable.

The junior senator from Winnipeg gave most useful figures which show that from July 31, 1957 to January 7, 1959 the debt of Canada increased by $1,111 million. In a year and a half—and that not in wartime—the Government loaded the investment portfolios of investors in Canada with this huge amount, in addition to what had already been absorbed. There is every indication of a continuance of this high-flying finance in the coming year, in the budget that will come down in a few days, and quite likely there will be a similar indication in budgets in the years to come. Is this not sufficient explanation of the results of too much money in relation to too few goods?

That the public senses unsound financing on the part of our dominion authorities is shown first in the increased demand for common stocks, which are not repayable in fixed numbers of dollars, and secondly, in the decrease in demand for bonds repayable in a fixed number of dollars. Nor, indeed, does this tell the whole story.

It is an open secret, honourable senators, that a considerable portion of the huge amount of debts in the form of the bonds to which I have referred have been sold to the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks, and that the banks were unable to resell a considerable portion of those bonds to the public. I do not have the exact figures—perhaps the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg has them—but the amount is very large.

Let us examine that transaction. In the first instance the federal Department of Finance prints the bonds and delivers them to the banks. They are of course in the form of Government promises to pay at some future date. Secondly, the banks credit the full amount of the purchase price to the Government. Thirdly, the Government proceeds to issue cheques to the full amount of its bank credit, with which the recipients of the cheques may purchase goods, thus putting that additional purchasing power in the hands of the buying public. Then the banks, being unable to sell the bonds, put them in their vaults.

You now have printed bonds hidden away in bank vaults, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, you have Government cheques in the hands of the public to the amount the banks paid the Government for the bonds. It is a transaction that is tantamount to the printing of money for the payment of Government debts. In its essence that is "funny money". That is chiefly why our dollar has been falling in value as measured by commodities. That is inflation, pure and simple. That is why, to some considerable extent, the cost of living has been advancing, and for this, the Government authorities, in my submission, are solely responsible.

By husbanding its resources and by careful money management since the close of the recent war, the previous administration reduced the national debt of Canada by $2¼ billion. In a single year, the present administration has overspent its revenue by half that amount. Need I tell you why the buying public shies clear of Government bonds, at least to some extent, and why the Government controlled money is falling in value? The public is not attracted to Government bonds because it has reason to fear that reckless spenders will redeem their promises to pay in depreciated money.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: When did the greatest increase in the cost of living take place?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It has been going on for some time. We have had a fairly steady increase for the past 20 years.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But in what years did the greatest increase take place?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Somebody at my hand says, during the past two years. My friend will no doubt speak on the matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was between 1939 and 1949.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, and the index increased considerably during the war.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: One hundred points.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not brought the figures with me. My friends wish to rush to the defence of the present administration, but why take the increase in the price of goods, or the fall in value of the dollar, in years gone by? That is a thing of the past. Consider what is happening this year.

Hon. Mr. Haig: One more question. The railroad men asked the board for an increase of wages, and got it. Then the railroads asked for an increase of rates. Why was that?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not know what significance an answer would have. The men wanted more wages, I suppose; that was why they asked for them; and increases were granted. The board allowed an increase in freight rates, and to some extent that increase has been reflected in prices.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It raised the price of grain.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, it increased the price of goods. But please differentiate these things from what I am talking about, which is the depreciation of our currency, the lowering of the value of our money.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it is not the same thing. The honourable senator had better think it over.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Has not our money a higher value than United States currency?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What has that got to do with it?

Hon. Mr. Haig: It has not depreciated.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I cannot see the point of the question. In the matter of money the United States has been following a policy similar to ours. I have been trying to clarify some of the principles underlying this problem of money, the increase of prices, and the possibility of a runaway inflation. Please think about it, rather than trying to stop thought on lines, which are not acceptable to the Government—a Government which has contributed to the depreciation of our currency at a greater rate and more recklessly than any Government in my memory has done. If you want to know why I say that, I will repeat that it is officially admitted that we have spent $700 million more this past year than has been raised in revenue, and this without including expenditures on capital account.

I am not a prophet; I cannot foretell the future, and I do not wish to try. But I can say this, that if an unsound financial policy of that kind is continued at the magnitude of one billion dollars deficit in a single year, the end is inevitable. I do not say this will occur, because I believe that commonsense in the administration and the effects of public opinion will prevent it from taking place. But if the disbalance between revenue and expenditure goes on as it has in the current fiscal year, it will ruin the currency of this country.

In this matter, we are not without experience drawn from the world at large. I understand that during the intense inflation in Germany the price of a postage stamp was several thousand million marks. Our currency is not different from that of countries which have passed through severe monetary crises. I do not say that this will happen to us; I do not think it will. But I repeat by way of warning that if unsound policies of finance are continued, if the process continues far enough, the time can come when our currency could be ruined as were the currencies of Germany, France and other nations at various periods of their history. We too might reach the point where the city of Toronto could pay off its debt with a postage stamp, and the national debt could be liquidated with two postage stamps. I repeat that I believe the commonsense of all good men will prevent this outcome, but I issue the warning that the Government had better be careful, and that it is time we discussed this problem among ourselves and thought about it with all the clarity and candour that is within our power. I am entirely in favour of this resolution.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burchill, debate adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 5, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, I would like to join those who have preceded me in complimenting the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on their splendid speeches.

I was deeply impressed especially by the Honourable Senator Choquette's facility in both English and French. I may say I was also a bit envious. One of the characteristics of our great country is its bilingualism.

I can add but little to the eloquent words of welcome addressed to the three new senators who have come to sit with us in this chamber, but my welcome is none the less sincere. Permit me also to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and my chief, the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), on their fine speeches and also on the manner in which they discharge their responsibilities and conduct the proceedings of this chamber. It is most gratifying to find the integrity of the Senate so admirably maintained. It is evident that the speech made by the late Senator Dandurand in this chamber in 1922, which has been referred to, is still vivid and that we all strive as much as possible to set partisanship aside from our deliberations. Periodically the Senate is attacked, but our strength lies in unity above party.

At this point I particularly wish to support the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate should be appointed a member of the cabinet.

(Translation):

Now, it gives me particular pleasure to present my respects to our distinguished Speaker. Although we both come from Quebec City and I have always considered him as a good friend, this is the first opportunity I have had since the great disturbance in 1957 of expressing in public my most sincere appreciation for his ability, his courtesy and for the dignity with which he fulfils his high functions.

(Text):

I had a few subjects in mind that I would have liked to refer to, one of which, inflation, interested me particularly, but the masterly analysis of the honourable senator for Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) left nothing for me to add. Moreover, inflation has been discussed and will be discussed at length on the motion of the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall).

Almost all the subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne have been fully covered by my predecessors.

(Translation):

I would like to say a few words about the current scourge of unemployment. Every honourable senator is aware that the province of Quebec is the most deeply affected, and particularly my own city of Quebec, where there is no heavy industry.

I would especially call the Government's attention to this fact and urge it to undertake remedial measures to alleviate the hardship suffered in a large number of homes.

For several years the people of Quebec have been clamouring that the Government should see to the dredging and drainage of the Lairet river and should provide locks on the St. Charles river. All such works and improvements are closely connected with the development of the city of Quebec and would, moreover, help to alleviate unemployment in a large measure.

I have long been interested in these projects but had been led to believe that, as they came under municipal and provincial Governments, the federal Government could do nothing about them except at the time of a national emergency, in order to procure work and remedy unemployment.

It is evident that we are at this time faced with unemployment on a national scale, and it is the Government's duty to give help to the large number of our Quebec people who are at present out of work.

The City of Quebec has, it is true, undertaken with federal help some projects, to the tune of several hundred thousand dollars, in order to alleviate unemployment, but those works provide employment for a very limited number of people and the city cannot afford to do any more.

As I said a moment ago, the works on the Lairet and St. Charles rivers have long and loudly been called for. To these should also be added the construction of the new post office, which was decided upon more than three years ago. These projects have given rise to bitter discussion and during the last electoral campaigns were the favorite subjects of Conservative candidates who officially promised that they would be undertaken at an early date if the Conservatives were elected.

The Quebec electors took those promises seriously. Three Conservative members were elected in Quebec City and a Conservative Government took over in Ottawa. As a consolation, I had hoped that these promises at least would be fulfilled and the projects undertaken immediately, especially in view of the serious unemployment problem which has arisen. But what happened? Exactly nothing, none of the promises were kept, none of the works undertaken and Quebec is still waiting for action.

(Text):

You may remember, honourable senators, that a short time ago I mentioned to you that I would give a report on my recent trip to Rio de Janeiro, where I was delegated by the Canadian Government as an observer to the 47th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held there from July 24 to August 1. Mr. E. J. Broome, member of the House of Commons for Vancouver South, was the other Canadian observer. We both were accompanied by our wives.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union is international in scope and of semi-official character. It consists of national groups formed within the various parliaments.

Article 1 of its statutes is as follows:

The aim of the Inter-Parliamentary Union is to promote personal contacts between members of all parliaments, constituted into national groups and to unite them in common action to secure and maintain the full participation of their respective states in the firm establishment and development of democratic institutions and in the advancement of the work of international peace and co-operation, particularly by means of a universal organization of nations. With this object in view, the Inter-Parliamentary Union will also study and seek solutions for all questions of an international character suitable for settlement by parliamentary action, and shall make suggestions, for the development of parliamentary institutions, with a view to improving the working of those institutions and increasing their prestige.

Since its inception in 1888, in Europe, the organization has grown to include representation from 54 countries. Some 50 countries attended the Rio Conference.

The Union usually accepts observers from international organizations only, such as the United Nations, UNESCO and others, but its council welcomed Canada's renewed interest by taking a unanimous decision in favour of granting the status of "Official Observer" to both Mr. Broome and myself.

The Rio Conference was the first to be held in Latin America, and the reason for this choice was the hope that greater Latin American participation in the Union would be effected. As a result, most of the Latin American countries are now members of the Union.

The following agenda was presented to all delegates in advance of the meeting:

1. Election of the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference.
2. General debate.
3. Principles governing the investment of foreign capital in countries in process of economic development.
4. The strengthening of peace.
(a) The problem of atomic weapons and nuclear tests.
(b) The possibility of establishing an international police force.
5. Cultural relations between countries and freedom of information.
6. Development of representative assemblies in non-selfgoverning territories.
7. Election of one member of Executive Committee.
8. Composition of the Inter-Parliamentary Council for the period from the 47th to the 48th Conference.

The debates were conducted in strict accordance with parliamentary rules of procedure. It is understandable that not all items on the agenda could be covered thoroughly, but No. 3 —"Principles governing the investment of foreign capital in countries in process of economic development"—took up most of the time. Resolutions adopted at the general conference are binding only in so far as they can be approved and furthered in the members' own national parliaments. The resolution on foreign investment, which advocated multilateral as opposed to bilateral financing of long-term development projects, and the conclusion of "an International Code of investments" defining equitable treatment of both lenders and borrowers, was unanimously adopted, to the obvious satisfaction of the Latin American delegates.

All delegations declared themselves pleased with the two resolutions adopted under the heading of "The strengthening of peace". One appeals urgently for the resumption of disarmament negotiations, preferably within the United Nations, and for the cessation under control, of nuclear weapons tests. The second recommends establishment of an "International Police Force on a permanent basis". During the debate on this sub-resolution, the chief Norwegian delegate paid high tribute to the Honourable Lester B. Pearson.

The Soviet delegation, supported by their satellite representatives, made a determined attempt, at the opening of the conference, to force a general debate of the Middle East situation. The president insisted, however, that the Soviet draft resolution be first submitted to the council. At the meeting of council, which I was privileged to attend, an Austrian-Luxembourg counter-draft resolution was introduced, which the Soviets proposed to amend to their advantage, at the same time dropping their own resolution. The problem was neatly resolved in the council, when the Austrian-Luxembourg delegations withdrew their draft resolution, and hence the Soviet amendment.

Further Soviet protests were quashed by the council president, who declared the debate closed.

To a considerable extent the initiative was taken by the West, with a brilliant general debate speech by the Right Honourable Herbert Morrison, of the United Kingdom. His advice to the communist delegations, to introduce criticism into their own parliaments, kept the Soviet speakers busy with fruitless rebuttal.

I can assure honourable senators that it was most interesting to rub elbows with so many different citizens of this world, which is growing smaller each day. Every race and colour was represented, and I was amazed and gratified to find that most of the delegates spoke excellent French.

There were facilities for simultaneous translation, and all languages were spoken at one time or another, but the majority of the addresses were made in French.

The excellent conference arrangements and generous hospitality of the Brazilian Inter-Parliamentary group and Government were warmly applauded by all delegates. The conference was held in the Chamber of Deputies, which is equivalent to our House of Commons. The President of Brazil and the Foreign Minister, as well as the Brazilian group, offered numerous receptions for delegates. An extensive program was arranged for the wives of delegates.

Here I wish to pay special homage to our competent ambassador, Mr. Arthur Irwin, and his charming wife, who gave a brilliant reception and dinner in our honour to enable us to meet Brazilian parliamentarians, local officials and Canadian residents.

As a result of Canadian participation in the Rio conference, the question of Canadian membership in the Union was naturally raised. During the conference the British, American, Australian, Pakistani and other delegates, urged that Canada join. Both Br. Broome and myself are convinced that Canadian participation would add to Canada's stature as an adult and responsible nation.

The union expressed the hope that all American countries be represented at the 48th conference, in Warsaw. The Union constitutes an international forum which will certainly be used by our opponents, and our friends feel that our voice should be added to theirs in this international field. These conferences can only result in increased understanding, increased respect and greater tolerance.

For these reasons, Mr. Broome and myself recommend that a Canadian inter-parliamentary group be formed, and accordingly I would humbly suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we meet, together with the Speaker of the House of Commons, at your convenience.

Before concluding, I would like to give a few highlights of our trip to Brazil, that beautiful South American country. Brazil is the second largest country on the American continent, coming immediately after Canada, and has a population of 65 million people, composed of whites, mostly of Portuguese descent, and Indians and Negroes. It is without colour or racial distinction, segregation or religious prejudices. Catholics are dominant.

Brazil was originally a Portuguese possession, but in 1882 independence was proclaimed, with Dom Petro the First, son of the King of Portugal, as emperor. In 1889, through a bloodless revolution, the country, became a democratic republic, called the United States of Brazil, comprising 21 districts or states, including the federal district, Rio de Janeiro, which is the capital.

Each state has a state government, whose head is the Governor. Parliament is composed of an elective federal Senate and House of Deputies. The Senate comprises 63 members, three elected for each district. Deputies, numbering about 300, are elected for four years, while senators are elected for eight years. General elections are held on October 3 for all senators and deputies, with one-third or two-thirds of the senators elected every four years in rotation. A general election was held in 1958.

The President and Vice-President, who is also the President of the Senate, are elected for a term of five years and are not immediately re-electable. 1960 will bring a new election for President and Vice-President.

Brazil now has a coalition government of two or three major parties, out of 15 or 16 different political parties, with proportionate representation for deputies, whereas senators are elected by majority.

President Juscelino Kubitschek, a remarkable man, leads the largest group, the P.S.D. Party—Parti Social Democrate.

The Vice-President, or President of the Senate, leads the P.T.B. Party—Parti Travailliste Bresilien.

Coastal Brazil is most highly populated, as the interior is practically unexplored and impenetrable. The country is about 80 per cent illiterate, but is being rapidly developed and industrialized.

As honourable senators know, Brazil yields the greater part of the world's supply of coffee. Other major products are sugar, cotton, timber, tobacco, rice and fruits. Gold is found in Brazil, as well as diamonds and semi-precious stones.

Rio de Janeiro, seat of the government, has a population of over three million. It used to be the largest city of Brazil and the second largest of South America, immediately after Buenos Aires, but since 1957 Sao Paulo has forged ahead and is said to be the fastest growing city in the world. In 1960 the capital will be removed to Brazilia, a new city being built about 500 miles inland, which is the realized dream of President Kubitschek. Rio used to be one of the largest trading centres for slaves, but slavery was abolished in 1888. In Rio extreme wealth and poverty live side by side, and all wealth is said to be in the hands of about 200,000 people, while about a million live in favellas. Favella is a Portuguese name for a miserable shack built of cardboard or flattened cans. Thousands of these huts cling to the slopes of the beautiful hills in and around Rio, some in the very heart of the city, all without water or even rudimentary plumbing. The occupants of most of them must walk great distances for the precious water, which must be carried in cans or pitchers, often atop their heads. Numerous fountains and hydrants are installed on main thoroughfares as sources of supply. It is a pitiful sight to see a barefoot native, White, Indian or Negro, struggling up a steep slope, or across an intricate mosaic boulevard, balancing a jug of water on top of his head.

Brazilian Traction, known as the Light Company, is the largest industrial organization in the country with an investment of several hundred million dollars, and is Canadian owned. It controls traction, light, heat, power and telephone. It has a huge power plant at Lages, inside of a mountain, about 50 miles outside of Rio, and an entire town for its workers on top of a high peak. The flow of a river was diverted and huge pumps are used to raise the water to a higher level. When visiting this plant I was deeply impressed to learn that it was designed and supervised by the same engineers who are responsible for the Kitimat development in British Columbia. We were entertained there by the officials of the company.

Rio is a city of incomparable beauty and one of the most fascinating in the world. There is a saying that God made the world in seven days, but He spent two on Rio. It is built on the Atlantic coast and around Guanabara Bay. They say that the mastery of this name designates one as a real Carioca, a status which I have not quite achieved. This beautiful city is the seat of the Government, as I have already mentioned, and is divided into 35 districts. Until recently the mayor was appointed by the president, but is now elected at large by the Cariocas themselves. Carioca is an Indian term meaning "House of the White Man", but it has come to designate the residents of Rio.

When we arrived in Rio winter was in full swing, but the air was warm and the country lavish with a riot of flowers, trees, ferns, and greenery in full bloom. The city abounds in government and public buildings, palaces, monuments, statues, parks and fine residences. Many of the palaces and public buildings still retain the soft pink colour used by the royal family in Portugal. The monuments and stately buildings give an atmosphere of importance to Rio, bearing witness to the city's natural culture and historic past.

The world-famous "Sugar Loaf" peak forms a bottleneck entrance to the Guanabara Bay port, and is accessible only by cable-car.

Corcovado peak is the most famous landmark of South America, from which the 110-foot-high statue of Christ the Redeemer overlooks the city of Rio, with arms outspread as if in benediction over the entire city. The head alone measures 20 feet in height. The mountain road leading to the statue is a triumph of engineering skill. From the observation platform atop the mountain, at the foot of the statue, the most grandiose and fantastic panorama unfolds in all directions. The city spreads like a jewelled necklace hugging the bays through the hills and peaks, streets and boulevards.

Friendship, cordiality, warmth and genuine good will come naturally to the people of Brazil, and we shall never forget our warm welcome there. We arrived for a stay of about 10 days, but just as we were preparing for our return, my wife was taken to hospital, seriously ill, and we stayed five weeks instead.

In closing, permit me once more to pay special tribute to our ambassador and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Irwin, the embassy officials and personnel, and their wives, who surrounded us with hospitality, kindness and real friendship. We may well be proud of our representatives in this Latin American country, for they have made the name of Canada respected and admired.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, debate adjourned.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hayden presented a further report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill C-27.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (C-27) intituled: "An Act to amend the National Defence Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of March 9, 1959, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1: After subclause (1) of clause 3, insert the following:

"(2) No regulation made under this section is effective until it has been published in the Canada Gazette and every such regulation shall be laid before Parliament within fifteen days after it is made or, if Parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session."

2. Page 4: Strike out lines 5 to 9 both inclusive.

3. Page 4, line 13: After "'belongs" strike out "and a Military Adviser is entitled to be paid reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in the performance of his duties while away from his ordinary place of residence."

4. Page 7, lines 32 and 33: Strike out clause 7.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Choquette): Honourable senators, when shall the amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I was going to ask that the amendments be considered now. I will give a short explanation of them, and the house can then decide whether it wishes to adopt the report now.

These amendments may sound a little mysterious in the form in which they appear in the report, but there is nothing mysterious about them.

Honourable senators will recall that the bill proposes to establish a code of rules of evidence which will apply in all proceedings before military courts. This portion of the bill was approved in committee. Heretofore the rules of evidence applicable in military trials were those of the province from which the accused came. However, we did feel that, as and when the rules of evidence were settled and codified, they should become a matter of public knowledge as soon as possible. For that reason we have proposed an amendment to add a further subsection to section 152 of the act. The amendment, which was read a few moments ago, requires that the rules of evidence when settled, must be published in the Canada Gazette and become effective only on publication in the Canada Gazette; and if Parliament is sitting they must be tabled, or if Parliament is not sitting they must be tabled within 15 days after the next session commences.

The next amendment is to section 6 of the bill, striking out all of subsection 11 and part of subsection 12 of the new section 190. The purpose of the provisions in subsection 11 of the new section 190, which is brought in by section 6 of the bill, deals with the appointment of military advisers to the Court Martial Appeal Court. The feeling of the committee was that while advisers may be necessary, and in practice in our courts they are used, as the rules permit, for the assistance of a trial judge who is hearing the evidence in the first instance, a military appeal tribunal was an entirely different situation. The evidence would already have been taken and be before the appeal Court, and surely judges who are trained in weighing evidence in all kinds of cases should be able to weigh and have a proper appreciation of the evidence at that stage of an appeal. The committee also felt that such a military advisor—assuming he would be as fair as one could be—would still be in the position where he might give to the members of the appeal court advice which would not be known to the accused and which he would not have an opportunity to meet. We felt that if the court wanted some assistance at that stage the experts should be called, and there would be an opportunity for cross-examination. In any event, we struck out this portion of the bill for that reason, and I may say there were no protests from the departmental representatives.

Finally, we struck out section 7 of the bill. Honourable senators who heard the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Bower) speak last evening in the house, and in committee today, will understand the very forceful objection he took to the proposed new designation in French of the Royal Canadian Air Force. The Committee, so far as the vote on this amendment was concerned, was unanimous—and I might point out that a number of French-speaking senators were present—in voting to strike out section 7 and to retain the present name in French of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

That is a brief explanation of the amendments.

I move that the amendments be taken into consideration now, subject to what other senators may have to say.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, it is true there were a large number of us in committee today, but I do not think it would be fair to ask senators who were not there to vote on these amendments until they have read the record. I suggest that consideration be deferred until next sitting.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Choquette): Consideration next sitting.

What I actually said was, as reported in Hansard of yesterday, page 324:

> The Chignecto Canal project, even as late as 1958, was estimated to cost between $80 million and $100 million.

I would like to have that correction made.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gustave Monette: With leave, I move the third reading now.

Honourable senators may I add a word or two?

At the meeting of the committee this morning the legal question as to the relative powers of the provinces in regard to the matter of education was discussed. Honourable senators will note that the bill asks for powers in the realm of education, to be exercised in all provinces. The question came up whether this corporation as incorporated could legally exercise those powers of education in every province. References were made to some cases in this connection. I just wanted to refer to the principal decision given by the Privy Council in 1916 in the Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company Limited versus The King, where the matter was particularly discussed. There it was said:

Their Lordships, however, take the view that this principle amounts to no more than that the words employed to which a corporation owes its legal existence must have their natural meaning, whatever that may be. The words of the British Companies Act were construed as importing that a company incorporated by the statutory memorandum of association which the act prescribes could have no legal existence beyond such as was required for the particular objects of incorporation to which that memorandum limited it. A similar rule has been laid down as regards companies created by special act.

So it was concluded that the powers of education are within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that even with the permission of the provinces the corporation could not exercise those powers if in its memorandum of association or in its special act it was not given the right to exercise such powers. I think I should say this now, although this morning in the committee honourable senators took my word as well as the comments of others learned in the law who were there.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit item No. 5 on the Order Paper, for the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act, to be proceeded with at this time. Is this agreeable to honourable senators?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no objection to this procedure. However, after the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has made his statement on second reading it might be advisable to have the debate adjourned until tomorrow. In the meantime we could have an opportunity to study his statement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That would be agreeable. I have certain tables that I will ask to have placed on Hansard and they could be studied before the next sitting.

I now move the second reading of this bill. Honourable senators will remember that the Speech from the Throne contained the following reference to this legislation:

My ministers will recommend an increase in the total funds that may be expended under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

This bill has been sent to us in consequence of that announcement in the Speech from the Throne.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should make a general statement in connection with Trans-Canada Highway matters, in order to familiarize the house with what has taken place in the past. The first organized effort was the formation of the Canada Highway Association, as far back as 1910. The object of that association was the construction of a highway all across Canada.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Was that a private organization?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was an ordinary private association. Honourable senators will remember that certain automobile associations and good roads associations in different parts of Canada made demands for a trans-Canada highway. After World War I there was a great increase in motor traffic in all parts of this country. Roads were then a municipal responsibility, and from time to time the provincial Governments made grants to the municipalities for trunk highway systems which were set up in most of the provinces. However, in the years 1919 to 1928 certain grants were made by the Parliament of Canada to the provinces for highway improvements for interprovincial connections, but they had nothing to do with the Trans-Canada Highway.

In the years 1930 to 1938 unemployment relief grants were made by the federal Government to the provinces, with specific reference to Trans-Canada highway, and 50 per cent of those grants had to be spent on the highway as then designated. During World War II, as honourable senators are aware, there was no capital available for highway construction; consequently, there was a lull in that work. It was not until 1949, when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed by Parliament, that any machinery was set up for the building of a transcontinental highway. In 1950 agreements, authorized by the act, were made with the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, and in 1952 an agreement was made with the province of Nova Scotia. These agreements provided that Canada would contribute 50 per cent of the cost of new construction and 50 per cent of the cost of construction which had been done previously and which could be incorporated into the highway system.

The contribution to be made by the federal Parliament was fixed at that time at $150 million, and the date set for completion was December 1956. However, the project turned out to be larger and more expensive than originally estimated, and after the first four years it became apparent that the highway could not be completed by 1956. In November 1955 there was a federal-provincial conference, which resulted in amendments to the act in 1956, extending the construction period to December 1960 and increasing the amount of the federal contribution from $150 million to $250 million. New agreements were then made with nine provinces providing for conformity with general specifications, standard of paved highway, elimination of requirement for reconstruction by provinces of sections then paved to a satisfactory standard, and things of that nature; and providing also that Canada contribute, in addition to the 50 per cent already agreed upon, 90 per cent of the construction cost of 10 per cent of the mileage in each province.

Since that time much progress has been made in the nine provinces which signed these agreements. As I stated some time earlier this session, Saskatchewan completed its 406 miles in 1957. Of course, construction across the Prairies is considerably easier than it is through mountain passes in British Columbia and in the area along the north shore of Lake Superior. The other provinces, except Newfoundland, expect to complete their portion of the highway some time in December 1960. However, construction costs have gone up and it is necessary for Canada to increase the aggregate of funds provided by the 1956 statute. This amendment provides for another $100 million in addition to the $250 million already authorized.

Hon. Mr. Baird: Is it expected that $100 million will be enough to complete the job up to 1960?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall come to that later on and give the total cost.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): May I ask if the 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the mileage is authorized by legislation or by agreement between the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand it is authorized by the act.

I have already stated that considerable progress has been made since 1956. At the present time, of the total 4,470 miles in the nine provinces and through the national parks, 3,090 miles of grading have been approved for construction, with 2,781 miles completed. Also, 2,196 miles of paving have been approved, with 2,101 miles completed. In addition to the mileage paved to Trans-Canada Highway standards there are approximately 950 miles of paved surface along the route which was constructed by the provinces prior to 1949.

The highway traverses five national parks, as follows:

Park	Miles
Terra Nova, Newfoundland ...	26
Banff	51
Glacier	29
Yoho	29
Revelstoke	8
Total,	143

Construction through the national parks is the responsibility of the federal Parliament.

The distribution among the provinces of the cost of the highway in the national parks is as follows:

Park	Millions of dollars
Terra Nova, Newfoundland .	9.2
Banff, Alberta	19.9
Yoho, B.C.	13.9
Glacier, B.C.	14.5
Revelstoke, B.C.	3.5

The figures of the money actually spent in Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia should be increased by the amount that is to be expended on the national parks program in those provinces.

Honourable senators, I wish to give now a brief summary of the final figures in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway. I am informed that 69 per cent of the total mileage has been approved for grading, and that 40 per cent of the total mileage has been paved to standard. If you include the 950 miles, approximately 68 per cent of the total mileage has been paved. It is expected that by the end of the coming summer 85 per cent of the highway will be paved.

It is estimated that by the time the highway has been completed there will have been spent by the federal Government the following amounts:

In province of	Millions of dollars
Prince Edward Island	6.5
Nova Scotia	19.5
New Brunswick	38
Ontario	87
Manitoba	20
Saskatchewan	50.5
Alberta	22.5
British Columbia	97
Newfoundland	20

These are the estimated costs, and they include the expenditures to the completion of the highway. In addition, of course, is the cost of constructing the highway through the national parks, which cost is being paid for by the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Will the honourable leader permit a question? Are these amounts only the cost to the federal treasury or do they include the total cost of construction?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Just the cost to the federal treasury.

Hon. Mr. Vien: These are the payments by the federal treasury toward the cost of construction?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask a question? Is the policy of the Government to the effect that the amounts that would have been granted to Quebec are set aside for future expenditures by that province?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot tell you what the policy of the Government is. Quebec, I understand, refused to sign any agreement and there has been no construction of the Trans-Canada Highway, as such, in that province. If an agreement were reached with Quebec, the amount required to be paid by the federal Government on that project would be additional to the amounts I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Do I understand that in addition to the amounts the honourable senator has put on the record the provinces in each case have contributed a similar amount on a 50-50 basis?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not exactly. They have contributed 50 per cent, but the federal Government has contributed 40 per cent more on 10 per cent of the mileage in each province. Figures will be given in a table which I will file later on.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Will the honourable gentleman give us also the mileage of the highway in each province?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will file a table showing that.

The road will cost Canada, aside from provincial contributions, approximately $400 million. In so far as the highways through the parks is concerned, there had been expended, up to March 31, 1958, about $31 million.

Honourable senators, I have here a number of tables which I think will be found very interesting and informative.

Table 1 shows the length of highway by provinces; table 2, grading construction from December 10, 1949 to January 31, 1959; table 3, paving construction for the same period; table 4, the structures, such as bridges and that kind of thing also for the same period; table 5 is a summary of contractual commitments between December 10, 1949 and February 14, 1959, and table 6, is a summary of Canada's commitments for additional 40 per cent contributions and payments made from December 10, 1949 to January 24, 1959.

Honourable senators, with leave I will place these six tables on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable gentleman give us also a map showing the location of the highway from one end of the country to the other.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have a good deal of information here, with maps, but not enough maps for distribution to every senator.

Honourable senators, I have now given you a farily clear summary of the Trans-Canada Highway matters up to the present. I believe that the completion of this highway within the next two years will be a feat of which we will all be proud and that it will be of great commercial and scenic value to the people of this country and to visitors here from other countries. When it is completed it will be possible to travel from one coast to the other by highway without leaving Canada.

Hon. Mr. Farris: How are we going to get across Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There are rather good highways through Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Once you get to Quebec you will want to stay there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I presume when any agreement is reached with the province of Quebec another Trans-Canada Highway Bill will be passed to provide more money for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. Vien: May I ask the honourable leader if this bill will be referred to committee?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have no objection to that. The reason why I asked for leave to make these preliminary remarks this afternoon was that we might be able to have second reading by the end of this week. If that is done, the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce may consider the matter in more detail on Tuesday morning next.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Kamloops), debate adjourned.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I do not intend to make any extended remarks this afternoon, but, having listened to my good friend the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) speak to the house on this subject, I felt I would not be honest with myself if I did not place upon the record some figures which do not entirely substantiate some of the statements the honourable senator made.

Before I launch into that discussion, I should like to take this opportunity, the first I have had, to extend a very warm welcome, to our new colleagues in this chamber, and to express the hope that they will enjoy many years of service to Canada. I can assure them that in the Senate there are many opportunities for service to our country.

The statements made by my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina to which I wish to refer, are these:

> —big business is looking for a new scapegoat in order to shift attention, and from all appearances it looks as though labour is it.
> —much of the blame falls on the great corporations which find that competition no longer is an effective restraining force.

The blame, I take it, is for the high cost of living.

Now, honourable senators, I hold no brief for the big corporations, but I think the honourable senator was a bit unkind when he made those statements. I have some knowledge of one company, with which I am quite familiar, and I think perhaps it may be regarded as a pattern for corporations, big and small, across Canada. I believe the honourable gentlemen might consider this organization in the category of a big corporation, since its volume of annual sales is in the order of $34 million.

Let me give some figures on annual increases in wages paid by this company, starting with 1953:

Year	Percentage of Wage increase
1953-54	5.9
1954-55	3.8
1955-56	6.4
1956-57	5.7
1957-58	3.3

The last-mentioned percentage is based on a contract for two years.

The cost of living index as published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the same period is as follows:

Year	Index	Percentage of increase
1953	115.5
1954	116.2	.6
1955	116.4	.2
1956	118.1	1.5
1957	121.9	3.2
1958	125.1	2.6

In 1958 the cost of the increase to the company amounted to approximately $500,000.

In the years under review the only price change was in 1956, when one commodity of the company was increased by approximately 7.5 per cent, and another within a range of from 5 to 10 per cent. In all the other years there was no change in the prices of the company's products. When the company assumed the extra cost involved in these wage increases it meant that the common stockholders received no dividend on their stock in 1958.

The company of which I have been speaking is a manufacturer of box boards and container boards, and I offer its record in support of my contention that manufacturers are exerting every effort, not only to hold the line and keep prices stable, but, in the case of this particular company, to reduce prices to the consumer. As a result of an application by this company to the Canadian Freight Association an amendment to the Canadian freight classification was secured which enabled consumers to enjoy the advantages gained through introduction by the company of a stronger, lighter-weight craft liner board, which advantages meant a saving to customers of from 6 to 7 per cent in the cost of that particular type of container.

My honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina suggested that there should be a "public mechanism" in addition to that which now exists in the Combines Act, the Criminal Code, and related acts; and he suggested the "appointment of a consumers' fair price council . . . to hold public hearings on the pricing policies of the great corporations". I take it he has reference to a body similar to the Board of Transport Commissioners, or, in the provinces, the Public Utilities Commissions.

So let us examine a public utility company whose rates are regulated by a public commission which reviews and studies through cost accountants and consultants all the evidence submitted to it, before passing on an application for increased rates. The capital structure and all operations of the company are examined, and on the basis of the report made to the commission the application is considered and judged.

Let me refer to the record of a telephone company. In the ten-year period from 1948 to 1958 the number of telephones almost doubled and the number of messages increased by 64 per cent. One would have expected the increased revenue would carry the additional expense load, but the expenses increased faster than the revenue. The number of company employees increased by 28 per cent, while the payroll during the same period increased by 150 per cent. Because of that and other increased expenses, such as higher cost of materials, taxes, etc., the company was obliged to go before the Board of Public Utilities and ask for higher rates. After a thorough examination, the application was granted. I am not proud of those rates for telephone service, for they are extremely high, but what other recourse had the company than to ask for higher rates?

The constant demand for telephone service by new customers and the introduction of television and the micro-wave call for new capital money, which can be obtained only if the companies are operating profitably; and, of course, the stockholders are entitled to a reasonable dividend. All of which means that the public have to pay more money for their telephones.

Now, I think I have said enough to convince the chamber that my honourable friend was not quite generous when he made the statement that companies must accept the greater share of the blame for the high cost of living. My remarks are not to be taken as assuming that labour is receiving too much. That is not my object at all. I simply want to place before the house the almost impossible position in which many companies find themselves. Companies, you must remember, are the trustees of their shareholders, whose interests must be considered as well as those of the employees.

In addition to the disastrous effect of inflation on fixed incomes, pensions and the happiness and well-being of a large percentage of our people, several speakers have mentioned its utterly destructive impact on our export business, and one quite frequently hears the expression that we are pricing ourselves out of export markets.

I want to give you an example of what is happening to one commodity in that respect at the present time. The eastern lumber industry is dependent on the United Kingdom market. Today there is no United Kingdom market, and consequently the eastern lumber business is disappearing. The United Kingdom market is still using its customary quantity of lumber, but it is not buying it from Canada; the supplies are coming from Russia, Poland and Scandinavia. Here is a traditional market for our Canadian wood where, within the last year, the price has been reduced from £73 per standard to £67 by the Russians, and £66 by the Poles—all since last season's shipments.

The cost of producing eastern Canadian lumber leaves no choice for manufacturers but to try to find means of disposing of their goods on this continent. Competition with the Europeans is out of the question. But when we turn to markets on this continent, what are we faced with? The level of railway rates makes it impossible for eastern goods to reach the markets of Montreal and Toronto and the United States. So down in my part of the country, with the ships gliding by the coast to enjoy the advantages of the St. Lawrence Seaway, with our traditional market in Britain gone, and fenced off from the west as we are by an impossible rail rate, what can we do? Talk of deficiency payments, honourable senators! Our friends from the west should keep going on right to the Maritimes, for that is the place where deficiency payments are needed.

When I came first to this house I had the great honour of being a room-mate of the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) and the honourable senator from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Hardy) in the room now occupied by them and the honourable senator from St. John's (Hon. Mr. Baird). I learned a lot from both these gentlemen. The Honourable Mr. Euler is an old and experienced parliamentarian. He warned me, "Never attempt to tell a story in Parliament; it doesn't 'go' ". But I am going to try to tell one this afternoon, because something comes to my mind as I speak about present conditions in the lumber industry in New Brunswick and generally in the Maritimes. Last spring, on my first trip to the little seaport village where I have the pleasure of owning a summer cottage, I visited the village store. The storekeeper was sitting there with his friend—just the two of them. I asked, "How are things in Bay du Vin?" The storekeeper looked up at me and replied: "No good. No improvement economically, no improvement financially, and no improvement morally". His neighbour sitting there, added, "I guess we are at a standstill." That pretty well tells the story of the eastern Canadian lumber business: we are at a standstill at the present time.

To turn from lumber to newsprint—we are all familiar with the fact that our purchases from abroad over the years have been balanced largely by our exports of newsprint. Newsprint is by far the major item in balancing Canada's financial accounts with the United States. Fifteen per cent of this country's foreign exchange is obtained by the sale of newsprint, and 80 per cent of the payroll of a Canadian newsprint company comes from the dollars we get by selling newsprint and pulp in foreign markets. But today our newsprint industry is threatened by lower-cost production in other countries. It is menaced too by the industry in the southern United States, which over the last few years has been rapidly increasing. Technologists have learned how to make satisfactory newsprint from southern pine, and Canada's waterpower costs are no longer substantially lower than steam power costs in the south, while wood costs in this country are not always lower than those in the southern United States.

No statement I could make this afternoon is more soundly based than this, that Canada cannot live without a vigorous and healthy export trade. So I say that this matter of inflation is so vital, so urgent for so many Canadians in so many different ways, that I can think of no question which could be better made the subject of study by a Senate committee. I feel that this might be productive of good results. Certainly I cannot see any damage it could do; and there is always the possibility, aye the hope, that much good would come of our efforts.

Therefore I welcome the motion. I hope it will be carried and that the Finance Committee will tackle the job with the proper approach and accomplish as good results as have been achieved on similar assignments during the past few years.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by my honourable colleague from Bruce (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh), that the motion now before the house be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

The members of this committee shall be those who have already spoken in this debate on the subject of inflation, and those who have spoken on the subject of inflation in any other debate during this session of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable senator from Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn), that the debate be now adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haig, seconded by the Honourable Senator Quinn, that this debate be now adjourned. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I introduced an amendment to the motion before the house and I would like it to be taken up at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would inform the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) that the motion for the adjournment of the debate has already been carried. I would ask the honourable gentleman to submit his motion in writing and I will put the question on his amendment to the house tomorrow.

WORLD AMATEUR HOCKEY TOURNAMENT

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have a very important announcement to make. A memo has just been handed to me to the effect that it has been announced over the radio that Belleville McFarlands, Canada's representatives in the world amateur hockey tournament in Prague, Czechoslovakia, have defeated the Russian team by a score of 3 to 1.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Choquette, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, it is not unusual to see me rise to take part in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Every session, notwithstanding that a number of good speeches are made during the debate on the Address, it always seems to me there is something left that I want to say.

First of all, may I congratulate the mover (Hon. Mr. Pearson) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Choquette) of the Address. As one who may be considered somewhat of a prehistoric relic in this chamber, I also wish to extend a hearty welcome to our three newly-appointed senators. I have known the honourable gentleman from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn) for a great number of years.

During this session there has been a lot of discussion about the seriousness of the threat of inflation, so I am going to take the present opportunity to deal with this subject. I believe I am in order in doing so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I would like to congratulate some honourable senators on the speeches they have made here this session. Although we have not always agreed, I would like to commend the honourable the senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) for his most vigorous remarks of yesterday. I would also like to congratulate the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) upon the excellent non-political speech he made during the debate on the Address. It was a speech that was typical of him. I heartily concurred in most of the views he expressed, and wish more such speeches were made in this chamber. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) made a fine contribution to the debate on the motion to have the subject of inflation referred to the Standing Committee on Finance. I make particular reference to these three honourable senators in view of a nonsensical idea that senators should be forced to retire upon reaching a certain age. I do not think there could be any greater refutation of such an argument than the able speeches delivered by those three elderly and distinguished gentlemen.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) also made a very fine address on inflation. But I disagree with the last part of his speech, where he advocated the making of an investigation into the whole subject. I have been a member of this body too long to not be aware that honourable senators object to being told they cannot undertake certain work or inquiries, and I am one of the most strenuous objectors to that sort of restriction. Still, there is always the question of the wisdom of doing certain things. A wide-open discussion on inflation, and the summoning and examining of witnesses before the committee, would do much harm to the very condition we hope to cure. The people in this country today need confidence and courage; they don't want to be made to fear and tremble.

I regret that the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) is not in the chamber, for I intend to discuss his speech on inflation. He spoke about placing the cart before the horse. Well, I would say that in dealing with values he was placing the cart before the horse. One of the greatest evils in this country today is that so many people consider their chief purpose on this earth is to acquire wealth. We cannot blame certain of our western friends for having a similar idea in mind when we find it is so prevalent throughout Canada. Money is not the only wealth. The honourable senator from Churchill said the wealth of this country was to be found in the character of its people. This will always be so. It is true of every country. I am always alarmed when people in countries like the United States boast of their high standard of living and keep making demands for this and that. We should not forget that the Roman Empire boasted of its high standard of living, of the freedom of its citizens from the necessity to work hard, and of its sympathy for the benighted people in other lands; but that empire fell and disappeared.

I do not know why we have suddenly become alarmed about the question of inflation. Honourable senators know very well that inflation has been with us for the past 20 years, and during some years to a far greater an extent than now. The honourable senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) was perfectly right in stating that in 1949 the cost of living index stood at 190; but the Government of that day could not score a goal, so it moved the goalposts up closer and said, "Let's start from here." Can we not do the same thing today?

In the west the great difficulty in selling our products is due to the fact that the Canadian dollar is too good. It stands at a premium of 3⅛ per cent today.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Higher than the American dollar.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes, it stands higher than the American dollar; and that has the effect of reducing the price of every bushel of grain and every animal we sell.

Honourable senators, I have been looking over a great speech which I delivered in this chamber on February 1, 1956.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Are you sure it was good?

Hon. Mr. Horner: At that time I was endeavouring to get the Government to take warning, when the honourable senator from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) referred to a suggestion he had made about the appointment of a Senate committee to inquire into the factors leading to increased cost of production. I will read what I said, as appears on page 91 of Hansard for 1956:

> —I could not see what would be the object of your suggestion, because strikes certainly add to the cost of producing our goods, and we are at a point where it will become more serious; for if our cost of production is still to go up, how are we going to sell our goods in competition with other countries in the world market?
> I would like to refer honourable senators to an article in the Ottawa Journal reporting the warning given to the Gordon Economic Commission by no less a person than James S. Duncan. The heading reads:
>
> MAY PRICE CANADA OUT OF MARKETS
> He develops the very argument I am discussing, that we will arrive at that position because of our fewer hours of work and shorter work week. Yet we persist in imagining that we are going to continue to compete in world markets.

That was in 1956, and I was concerned about that matter then as I am now. The drift has been continually in that direction.

Honourable senators, on that point, may I read from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 23 of this year, under the caption "Mr. Crump Looks at The 'Hard Realities' ":

> Last week was apparently railway president week in Canada. First Mr. Donald Gordon left us with wisdom and eloquence and a touch of inspiration. No sooner had he returned to the affairs of the Canadian National Railway, when Mr. N. R. Crump left his company, the multitudinous Canadian Pacific Railway—in truth much more than a railway—and came bringing sagacity to a joint meeting of the Canadian and United States Chambers of Commerce.

Mr. Crump uttered some economic facts of life which nicely complement Mr. Gordon's words and which deserve a wide forum. He reminded his Canadian and American audience that this continent is not an exclusive depository for the world's wisdom, that there are other nations with just as many brains and perhaps more ambition.

Here is the core of his advice:

"We must be ready to accept wage levels that are consistent with the hard realities of our position in highly competitive world markets. We must be prepared to embrace every technological advance that will enable us to achieve lower production costs. We must be unrelenting in our search for new skills. We must recognize that there is no place for feather-bedding in the kind of world in which we live."

Hard realities here indeed and courageously spoken. In this new world about to be born there are nations who will, nay are, accepting low wages, low standards of living as the down-payment on a future full of better days.

If we do not bring the same ingenuity and imagination to our skills, if we do not acquire new markets with the greatest diligence, even sacrifice, our future will already be behind us.

I think those are very wise words. We know of the hard realities, and we know exactly what the costs are. The honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill), who has had wide experience with many companies, told us very bluntly of the problems which face big business. Some years ago I had experience with the railroad companies. They published statistics to show that the cost of labour to the railroads was 83 per cent of their expenses. That gives some idea of the high cost that has to be borne by a large company. I do not know how the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina can advocate investigation of companies that are not able to compete successfully, when he can see what is going on in the way of competition throughout the world. For instance, look at the shipbuilding trade. At one time Britain, with its yards on the Clyde, led the world in shipbuilding, but it has fallen to third or fourth place. Japan and West Germany undersell Britain to a great extent. That is competition. The honourable senator was talking about competition in Canada, but it is competition from abroad that I am concerned with. In these days, more than ever, we cannot live unto ourselves. We must expect to trade with both Japan and Germany.

I am reminded that when the NATO Parliamentary Association visited Europe last December, in France and Germany for instance, its members got first-hand knowledge of the hard work and enterprise of the people, of how they—men, women and children—work from daylight until after dark. One man who was visited had a fine show of beautiful horses, and he was driving a Volkswagen. He said that he had ordered the car a year before but had not been able to get delivery until the time of which I am speaking. But he was not complaining. On the contrary he said he was proud of the fact that these cars were built for export first. The people over there are willing to dig in and build up their respective countries.

Honourable senators, let me give another reason for the position that we are now in. It will be remembered that after the First Great War Canada had markets for all her produce, and good markets they were too, because this country had escaped the devastation that Europe suffered. But by 1929 the European countries had restored all their facilities, their production was in full swing again and their trade began to compete with ours. As the late Honourable Charles Dunning said on one of his trips out west, the only market left to Canada was the British market. Now, my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen)—I repeat that I am sorry he is not present today—said this was because the Conservatives were in power, and he accused my leader of not providing the opportunity of talking politics. Anyway the honourable senator sailed in, and by implication at least he blamed the Conservatives for the disappearance of the markets. But no matter what was said about it, the markets were gone.

Before the present Conservative Government came into power one of my neighbours, who takes pride in forecasting the results of elections, told me that the present Prime Minister would form the Government, and I said I hoped not. Then he said, "I know it is pretty tough on fellows who are running against him". I replied: "We must remember that we are heading for difficult times. The build-up of our industries after the last war, by which we were able to sell our goods in export markets, created a false economy in this country, because we were supplying a devastated Europe. Today their factories are running, their farms are producing, and they are turning out things that we turn out and would like to sell. For instance, they are in competition with our car manufacturers." My neighbour then told me, "Yes, but he is not going to do what R. B. Bennett did, he is not going to pay strict attention to balancing the budget", and I said, "I hope not."

The honourable senator from Inkerman was disappointed. He referred to the slippery hill that the honourable senator from Waterloo had in mind when he said we were showing a socialistic tendency. The senator from Inkerman would like us to sand that hill or put ashes on it and try to climb up again.

There has been some talk of our losing our sovereignty to the United States because of certain trading restrictions that have been put on, and some people have declared that eventually we shall be controlled by that country. It amused me to hear the honourable senator saying that, because in the past the Liberals used to accuse us of encouraging that very thing, and that goes as far back as I can remember. So you can take that to the back forty and shoot it, as far as I personally am concerned. The people on the other side of the border are similar to us, and we both have a similar way of life. To me it is perfectly useless to talk about watching and guarding an unnecessary and uneconomic border. Personally, I feel like Sir Winston Churchill did when a question came up as to American troops. He said, "Let it roll." As far as I can see, there is no need for us to worry simply because King George and a few politicians made errors some years ago and divided the North American continent by an unnatural boundary, and an uneconomic one.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): "No truck nor trade with the Yankees."

Hon. Mr. Horner: You have that horse now, and you can have him.

Now, honourable senators, here is another difficult position that we got ourselves into, as I see it. Where we went wrong was with the present-day idea that the Government must take you by the hand, give you an education and lead you up to a job. Well, if that had been the situation in the Canada of 50 years ago perhaps the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and I would have been no good, either.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am very grateful to you for saying that.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It alarms me somewhat when I think back to the days when I was a young man in the west. Honourable senators heard the honourable gentleman from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson) describe the hardships that the people out there went through in those earlier days. He referred particularly to conditions that existed in the southern half of the prairie provinces, an area that is today becoming parklands since the prairie fires have been stopped. My experience, however, was in the northern part of the prairie, and there the hardships that we went through were perhaps even greater than those in the southern part. But there was not a word, not a word, about government help at that time.

I would like to mention just a few of my experiences. In the year 1907 I had just come to Elk Hill, and the winter that year was the worst that the west has ever known. On December 7, 1907, the temperature was 70 degrees below zero. I was with a party engaged in laying out landings on the river bank and, believe me, I had to fight hard to keep from freezing. It was so cold that a number of the men returned to the camp, not wanting to work in that temperature. Well, the foreman over the party was a pretty tough Irishman, and when he saw his men going back to camp he turned to me and said, "I wonder what they'll do when winter comes."

Later we left there to go homesteading. We went up from Star City to a place about where Nipawin is today, and the railroad had just been laid. I was with my brother, who is the father of the present member for Blaine Lake in the other house, and we started out with a team to go north. The team became mired, and we decided we would make a lot better time and save money if we left the team and driver behind. So we started to walk north to where the two rivers joined. The people living in the bush in that area lived in camps made of logs. The immigrants who came from Europe were expert with the broad axe and they made a good job of these log cabins. They cut the logs in just the way that a lot of Ottawa valley people did in the early days in this area.

We looked around for homesteads, and just about that time a tremendous rain came down. That was in June. The ladies had set up a tent for us and we went under it. We had nothing to eat, and the people around there did not have very much to eat, because there was no means of transportation that could be depended on, and any food they had they needed for themselves and their children. Anyhow, we decided that we would not eat any of their food. Eventually we came along to the flats down by the two rivers, and we saw a stove-pipe sticking up out of the brush and we could smell pork frying. I remarked that it was getting dark and we had better camp here somewhere, because we had walked eighteen miles that day, and then we went over to the place where we saw the stove-pipe to see if we could get some food. The man there told us that he was sorry, but all he had left was a little bit for breakfast and that he would have to get out and get some more grub. I was thirsty and asked him if he had some water, and he said, "Just four miles along there you will come to a place on the hill and there you will be able to get a drink." I think that is somewhere near where Nipawin is now. But we didn't find any water there. We went on down by the river, and although it was on in June there were cakes of ice floating about almost as large as ships.

A woman we spoke to on the way brought us out a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press, in which there was an announcement of land being offered in the Blaine Lake area. That land had been given to the Dukhobors in 1900. They had been given permission to live in a village and cultivate the land, on the understanding that they would not take part in any war and in order to prove up their homesteads they were required to take the oath of allegiance, as other people did. Of course, there were strong political protests at the time, but it was left that way. It had been announced that a township of land was going each day at Prince Albert, and we thought we had to be there that day. The Homestead Inspector started us off on the blazed line which, he said, would take us to Star City, a beautiful area today, but one in which we then saw great hardship. On the blazed trail we encountered many lakes which have since been drained. We had difficulty following the blaze, and in order to get out we had to cross the lakes—I did a little swimming myself. The ice was still floating about, but there was good footing in the bottom of the sloughs.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. Horner: 1907.

After we got out of each lake we sat down and emptied the water out of our driving boots.

Then we came to Carrot River, which was in flood. There we met a fellow who had almost lost his horses in the stream, and had to cut the traces to save them. He let us use one of his horses to get across the stream, and we went on into Star City and up to Prince Albert. There was a great jam of people there waiting to file claims on land. The old policemen had to read the riot act. They had built a chute up to the door, where we had to wait until 10 o'clock to file.

Honourable senators, I have given all this background, to show the type of people who settled and built this country in the early years. They were hard-working, self-reliant people.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Some of the farmers now visiting Ottawa have talked to me about the vacated farms in western Canada. I tell them the farms are vacated, not because of adversity, but of prosperity. The oil companies are paying young men $17 a day, and of course they have no interest in staying on the farm. I always have said it takes a good man to work for himself: he has to decide between whether he will take in every picnic and ball game, or stay home and do the work. Some people are more successful working for themselves, while others do better working for strangers.

Furthermore, we have labour breathing down our necks these days. Surely there are lots of European immigrants who would take up our abandoned farms, make a good living on them and become useful Canadian citizens. But no, we are told they will take jobs away from Canadian labour. As a matter of fact, I don't know that there is any need at the present time for unemployment in Canada.

When the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced I dared to warn of the harm it might do to our young men. We all have had the experience of being told that So-and-so does not want to work because he is drawing unemployment insurance and doing nothing. Indeed, some people are drawing insurance and working at the same time. These are things which will not make Canada a great country.

Let me read from a recent newspaper article headed "Attacks on Immigrants Scored by Ford Chief", dated at Toronto, February 17 last:

> Rhys M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, lashed out tonight at ultra-nationalists who masquerade as patriots to attack the country's 1,800,000 post-war immigrants.
>
> "Ultra-nationalism is something I have no use for, in any of its forms," he told the Toronto Junior Board of Trade in a Brotherhood Week speech.
> He said history offered lessons as to what happens when super patriots run wild—Germany under the Nazis was one and Italy under Fascism was another. Ultra-nationalism invariably was "the tool of the power-seeker and the tyrant, who perverts honest patriotism into madness.
> "It can be wielded alike against other nations or against minorities within a country."
> "We occasionally see a sample of ultra-nationalism at work in certain speeches, statements, or in letters-to-the-editor attacking immigrants who have come to our country in the post-war period. I think you know the kind of tripe I mean—a snide and cowardly attempt to stir up feeling against new Canadians".

Perhaps a good many honourable senators read the letter which appeared recently in the Ottawa Citizen under the heading "Canada-U.S. Labour Links", in which is described the control exercised over Canadian labour by unions located in the United States. I don't know of any surer way to fight the root of this thing than by what is taking place right now.

Let me refer to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 24 last, which reads as follows:

> In sanity's name let us not betray Canada into such monstrous nonsense!
> We must deplore thousands added to our unemployed. We may wonder whether in the process of discontinuing the Arrow we used the right timing and techniques. We must try to see to it within reason that help or other employment is found for those who have lost their jobs. Most of all the Government has the duty of trying to see to it that in this latest integration of defence with the U.S. this country gets the share of production and work to which she is entitled.

But, seeing and rightly discussing these things, let us not lose sight of the clear fact that all we have done with respect to the Arrow plane is to stop spending money which we couldn't afford for a weapon we didn't need—and above all let's not start making fools of ourselves over having "lost our sovereignty".

For the last is just plain hysteria—that plus the gibberish of demagogues or fools.

That is pretty strong language.

The honourable senator from Inkerman spoke of his experiences at Stony Plain, west of Edmonton. I believe if he had remained in that part of the country instead of returning to Montreal his outlook on values would have been somewhat different from what it is today.

I spent Christmas at Stony Plain with my daughter, and met some of the wonderful people who came from all over Europe and now live in that area. I was driven out to the home of a Danish farmer who had won the $1,000 award for the best farm. He had been a tall, striking looking man, who had worked right up until he went to bed last summer, and later died, at the age of 87 years. There I saw a beautiful farm, with a modern dairy barn and up-to-date cooling equipment for the milk that was trucked into Edmonton. I met the daughter and son of the old gentleman, who I believe are carrying on the farm. One of this man's sons was a doctor. The old man had the same trouble as a lot of other farmers, in trying to keep his children on the farm. The son came from Edmonton and wanted to move his father into the hospital, but the prospect made the old gentleman so restless that he called his daughter into the room and made her promise that he should stay where he was. For the sake of his peace of mind he wanted to remain at home.

I strongly object to alarmist talk about inflation. An honourable senator spoke of losses on life insurance. I wonder whether he knows that last year the Sun Life Company increased its business by $72 million, and a life insurance company in Winnipeg wrote an additional $19 million of insurance. How are we to encourage public confidence if we lay so much stress on conditions which may seem unfavourable and discuss them at great length? I fail to see it. The fact of the matter is that people will continue to buy life insurance, and naturally so, because there is no way by which a young man can so surely build up an asset. Take my own case. When I bought straight life insurance there was no baby bonus in sight and no old age pension. I did not believe there ever would be, and I thought it was my duty to protect my wife in case anything should happen to me and my estate. So I took a substantial amount of life insurance, and it served its purpose. True, the dollars I paid will not purchase all that I then hoped they would, but it is not necessary that they should. An old age pension has been provided; my family are educated and grown up. People will continue to take insurance for the same reasons that I did. In no way can they acquire an asset which could be of greater benefit to them. I take it to be my duty as a member of this chamber, and I believe it is the duty of us all, to inspire our people with greater endeavour for their own future and the good of the country, and I bemoan the lack of that pioneering spirit which was shown in the early days when we settled the west.

Time is passing, and I will omit some of the things I intended to say. But a word with regard to the position of the wheat farmer. His storage should be in his own granary. There was a time when one could reasonably argue for putting wheat in a forward position. Those were the days of ox transport and the shovelling of grain by hand. Today, when grain can be moved by machinery, and moved fast, it is better to keep it on the farm, and the buyer who wants a particular grade of wheat or feed knows where to notify farmers of his requirements.

Another matter I wanted to mention was the conversion loan. The honourable senator from Inkerman made a great deal of the cost of the conversion. It is my sincere belief that it is impossible to estimate the cost or to prove that over the years there will be any greater public expenditure through conversion than if the Government had refrained from refunding the loans. All depends on what would have happened as each issue became due. So far from an additional cost of $50 million, as assumed by the honourable senator, this action may result in great savings to the country. There is no doubt that the Government obtained what is supposed to be the best advice available, or the conversion would not have been undertaken. It was highly regarded throughout the country and, I maintain, justifiably so. The opinion of a bank president was quoted and we were asked to assume that his views are those of an eminent authority, a distinguished expert. Like a certain professor of whom I have read, I would like to know what an "expert" is. I will quote an incident which we all remember. In 1929, when the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool had not been in existence very long and those who directed it could not be expected to have gained world knowledge, the president of one of our big banks issued a lengthy statement, in the course of which he declared that the policy of the pool in holding wheat for a rise was the right one, because the price of wheat would go to $1.50 a bushel. His opinion, no doubt, was supposed to be just as good as that of the bank president quoted by the honourable senator from Inkerman. But the price of wheat did not do a thing but fall to 40 cents a bushel, and the pool, which had made an advance payment of 75 cents a bushel to the growers, soon discovered that it had overpaid them, and had to go to the provincial Government to borrow several million dollars. Since, as I have said, the pool's action was taken on the advice of the president of one of our great banks, you may understand how much attention I pay to statements by these gentlemen on inflation, or anything else.

I have detained you, honourable senators, longer than I should have. I may say more at some other time. Thank you.

On motion of Hon. Mr. MacDonald, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CO-OPERATIVE FIRE AND CASUALTY COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill S-15, respecting Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple amendment. The Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company was established by a special Act of Parliament in 1951, chapter 68 of the statutes of that year. This bill does not involve any change of principle in the Act.

The funds for the co-operative were advanced in the regular way, mainly from other co-operatives. The organization has continued to grow and prosper. It had its best year in 1958, when it wrote some $2,600,000 worth of insurance, mostly in the western provinces, but it is doing business right across Canada.

At the time the original act was passed the directors were restricted to paying interest at rates up to a maximum of 3 per cent on funds advanced to the company. The purport of this bill is to authorize the directors to pay up to a maximum of 6 per cent. The likelihood is that they will pay the usual amount of 5 per cent but they have asked for authority to pay up to 6 per cent.

Honourable senators, that is about all there is to the bill. As I said at the outset, the bill would make no change in the principle of the legislation. The amendment would simply bring the permissible interest rates more into line with current rates.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Does this company pay income tax?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I cannot answer that right now, but I do not believe so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That information can be obtained in committee.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Yes. If the bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

FOOTHILLS PIPE LINES LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill S-16, to incorporate Foothills Pipe Lines Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-16 is an act to incorporate a Dominion company under the title of Foothills Pipe Lines Limited.

In my opening remarks, I think it advisable to point out to honourable senators that the Foothills area in the province of Alberta, as well as certain other areas in that province, contain huge amounts of natural gas, and as a result of the existing markets for such products a number of companies have been incorporated in Canada for the purpose of transporting and transmitting this gas by means of pipe lines to various markets in eastern and western Canada and the United States.

It now appears that the transportation and exportation of substantial volumes of natural gas which is being carried and which is contemplated by the several major trunk lines will result in very substantial surpluses of propane, butane, distillates, hydrogen sulphide and carbon dioxide, which are the by-products of natural gas and which must also seek their own markets both here in Canada, and, if it is warranted, as export products to the United States or any other countries willing to buy them. These products, as mentioned, can be divided into two general classifications as follows: liquid hydrocarbons and hydrogensulphide. These products are produced and separated from the natural gas as the gas is sold. The best known methods for separating these by-products bring down the hydrocarbons and hydrosulphides as separate entities.

On the relatively small scale of gas operations carried on in the past, each producer has operated his own extraction plants for the hydrocarbons and either operated his own sulphur extraction and reducing processes or contracted out the matter of sulphur extraction to one of the commercial sulphur companies.

As long as the gas operations within the province of Alberta remained relatively small these methods were perfectly sound and reasonably economic, but the situation in Alberta has now reached the point or stage where, because of the enormous volume of gas production and the potential production of the presently existing or contemplated pipe lines, the aforementioned by-products of natural gas will be so large as to demand markets outside the province of Alberta. The problem as it now exists is to find markets outside the province of Alberta and to determine the most economic and practical method of transporting these products to the now existing or future potential markets.

In brief, after a great deal of research and consideration, there would appear to be no question that if these products are to find a market elsewhere, the first problem will be to determine and decide upon and use an economical method of transporting the products to the new markets.

I would now like to deal briefly with the markets for some of the products, and the first product I will consider is sulphur.

From present information and research it appears that the market for sulphur in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba will be small. When I deal with the market for sulphur I am not going to include the market in Alberta, but rather with all the markets outside Alberta, because this bill refers to markets outside the province. The market in Saskatchewan and Alberta will be relatively small and confined to such sulphuric acid producers as uranium mills and fertilizer plants. The states of Montana and North Dakota have their own production sources in Wyoming and there is no foreseeable large market for sulphur in this particular area.

The market in British Columbia and the Pacific Northwest United States has been estimated by competent authorities to be about 300,000 tons per year. With respect to the offshore markets to the west and in the countries bordering on the Pacific Ocean, it has been roughly estimated that there will be a market for approximately 1 million tons per year.

In the northern mid-continent area and the eastern United States and eastern Canada a market from 1½ million to 2 million tons a year is estimated. However, this latter market is at present supplied by other sulphur sources and it is apparent that co-operative marketing will be required. Such sulphur markets in both the Pacific and eastern North America will have to face competition from sulphur produced on the Gulf of Mexico.

It is the opinion of experts that such sulphur as is produced as a by-product of natural gas can seek an equilibrium in these markets, provided of course an economical method of transportation to deliver sulphur to the existing and potential markets is used.

Finally, as far as sulphur is concerned, indications at present are that there will be a larger outlet for sulphur on the Great Lakes, and that this outlet will be greater than the outlet on the Pacific Coast.

With respect to the natural gas liquid, which is a by-product which comes out of this gas, it appears that there will be a market for such light hydrocarbons as natural gasoline, butanes, isobutanes, propanes, etc., on the Pacific coast. The market there does not appear to be of such a size as will completely absorb all this type of product which will be available as by-products of natural gas to be exported from the province of Alberta. It is the opinion of experts that it will be necessary to look beyond the local west coast market for a considerable market to absorb these particular products.

To the east a larger market exists for this type of product. There are substantial markets in the Chicago and St. Paul areas of the United States which are now being supplied by product pipe lines from the states of Texas and Oklahoma. However, a market in the mid-continent area has been established and fortunately it is growing rapidly, with the result it will be easier to move into the market in this area.

In conclusion, I might state that there are potential markets both in eastern and western Canada and the United States, but these markets will have to be thoroughly explored and be met on a competitive basis as to price, if we hope to get into them with these by-products that come from the natural gas in Alberta.

And now, having found that we have all these products and that there are markets available, the question arises: What is the best method of transporting the products?

The first method I would like to mention, honourable senators, has to do with the possibility of these products being shipped by rail. It has been found that numerous problems exist as far as railway shipping of these products is concerned. First, the railways would have to provide a very favourable freight rate if we hope to get into any of these markets. Extensive research has shown that the cost of rail transportation of these natural gas products to the proper markets would be substantially higher than the cost of transporting the same products by means of a pipe line.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does that include sulphur?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, that includes sulphur.

This is a statement that has been made many, many times. I would call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that in the past freight rates have increased from time to time, and in all probability they are going to increase in the future, so there is no degree of stability as far as freight rates go.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is that a prediction or a statement of fact?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will make it a prediction, but I think you may take it as almost a statement of fact.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That comes from your crystal ball?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Experience in the country to the south of us, the United States, has shown that it is not economical to ship sulphur or liquefied petroleum gases by rail. Past experience has shown that pipe lines have a tariff for transporting their products and that this tariff remains relatively static.

Further, in connection with the transportation of these by-products by rail another problem arises. It is that the railroads would have to make large capital investments in order to purchase a particular type of rolling stock which would be necessary to carry these products in large quantities to the proper markets. It has been estimated by reliable authorities that in the case of the westward movement, that is the movement from Alberta to British Columbia, the initial capital outlay to a railway company would be in the neighbourhood of between $30 million and $40 million, in order to acquire the proper equipment to move the by-products in the quantities that will be available to be moved. This outlay, of course, would have to reflect itself in increased freight rates. In addition, there is always the problem in connection with this particular type of transportation of products that railroads would have to deadhead their rolling stock back to Alberta, since it would be practically impossible to find a suitable cargo on the west coast to put into these cars when they were shipped back to Alberta. These problems as to transportation by rail appear to be such that they cannot be overcome and the opinion is that it is practically impossible to move any of these products in large quantities by rail on a competitive basis.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Has that been the experience up to date?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, in the United States.

Then we come to the question: Can we use existing pipe lines to transport these by-products?

With respect to existing pipe lines, you cannot use the gas pipe line for transporting these products because they are taken out of what is known as sour gas, which is unsuitable for use in home and industry. If these by-products were shipped in the gas pipe line they would contaminate it.

That leaves only the oil pipe lines to be used for transportation. We find that the pipe lines as they now exist and as used for the transportation of crude oil, were built with only that purpose in mind, and if we attempt to add these natural gas by-products they would greatly increase the vapour pressure of the material to be transported; and the best engineering advice that the sponsors of the bill have been able to obtain is to the effect that there would be an excessive loss from evaporation, as a result of this considerable increase in vapour pressure.

Furthermore, I would call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if you attempted to use the present oil lines to transport these by-products you would have to adopt one of two methods: you would either have to blend the by-products with oil and transport them in the oil pipe lines or you would have to transport the by-products separately.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You could change over from carrying sulphur to carrying oil?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is what I mean when I say one method would be that of separating the two products. The other method would be by mixing the by-products with oil.

Honourable senators will realize that if the blending procedure is followed it will be necessary to provide very expensive facilities at all terminals in order to separate the products when they arrive there. For instance, if you were to use the Interprovincial Pipe Line and ship these products to Sarnia, very expensive facilities would be required at that end in order to separate the oil from the natural gas by-products. In addition to these expensive separating facilities you would also require storage facilities to store the by-products, which equipment is very expensive. The general view, from an engineering standpoint, appears to be that it is impractical to move these by-products through the present pipe line facilities; and furthermore, from a profit point of view, it appears most uneconomical.

Finally, a study has been carried out and it does not appear that any modification can be made to existing crude oil pipe lines for the movement of large quantities of the by-products of natural gas.

I do not think there is any doubt that the most satisfactory means of moving these natural gas products to the markets—whether the movement be to the east, west, or south—is by pipe line transportation and transmission. Presently existing freight rates for sulphur and natural gas liquids are much too high to compete economically in long-distance movements to markets, and pipe line transportation costs in general would appear to be less than one-half that of railway transportation costs.

Product pipe lines—and that is what the pipe line is known as, the one proposed in this bill—have been built in the United States since World War II, and through these pipe lines natural gas liquids are supplied to both Chicago and Denver from the gas fields located in Texas and Oklahoma. I make that statement to show that it is economic to use these pipe lines over long distances.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Can sulphur be moved by pipe in liquid form?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It would be in semi-liquid form.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would like to ask my friend this question. Are there not sulphur plants now in the Peace River area, and how is the product being handled from that area?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: There are plants, but they are not going to be able to handle the quantity of sulphur products.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Can you put sulphur through a pipe line?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In liquid form?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In semi-liquid form.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With reference to the question asked by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), if I may be permitted, I do not think the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) understood the question. I understand there are large quantities of sulphur produced at Fort St. John, in the Peace River district. I refer to Taylor Flats. There are also very large quantities of sulphur produced at Pincher Creek, in southern Alberta, which I think is now being moved both ways by rail.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I don't think they are beginning to move all of the product.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I don't know that.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is one of the troubles.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Rail is the only form of transportation there is for it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is all that is available at the present time.

Finally, as it appears that such products can be moved more cheaply by a pipe line, and must be moved in a separate line, such a separate pipe line is certainly going to be necessary in view of the great development of natural gas now taking place in the province of Alberta, and which will continue to take place.

I am sure most honourable senators know that we have in Alberta today the largest producing gas well in the world. It is a British-American well, capable of producing 1½ billion cubic feet of gas per day. That well is capped at the present time, because there is no market for the gas, but in time there will be a market for it, and all the by-products from that well will then be available to be marketed throughout the North American continent.

The sponsors of this bill have given consideration to the problems of whether liquefiable petroleum gases and liquid hydrogensulphide should be moved separately to their respective markets, or whether they should be carried in a co-mingled stream in one pipe line. In connection with the proposed pipe line, the present feeling is that a double pipe line is the most satisfactory method of transporting these two different products. However, I think it only fair to point out that this is a subject to which further consideration and research will have to be given before a final decision is made as to whether the pipe line should be double or single.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Could the honourable senator say what the American experience has been in this respect?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I do not have that information with me, but I can assure the honourable senator that when this bill goes to committee I will have experts there who can give the details of the experience of our friends to the south.

The next question that arises is: What route is the line going to take?

In regard to the proposed routes of transportation, the sponsors of the bill feel that in connection with the movement of the by-products to the west coast they might follow a route approximately paralleling the Trans-Mountain Pipe Line route, that is along the Yellowhead highway to Hope, British Columbia, and finally on to the city of Vancouver. Of course this would be an all-Canada route. However, consideration is also being given to a route which would take a section of the pipe line south of the border between Canada and the United States.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would an export permit be required?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: There would not have to be one. I will explain why. The reason for considering this route is that the land, from a technical and construction aspect, is more suitable for the building of a pipe line. However, the terminus of the pipe line would be the same as with an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable gentleman say what pass in the United States an all-Canada line would go through?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, I cannot tell the honourable senator that.

With respect to the movement easterly, there appear to be three possibilities. The first is a line to Fort William which would parallel the present Trans-Canada pipe line and would end at Fort William. The second alternative which is being considered by the sponsors is the movement of the products to Superior, Wisconsin. This would be a route which would cross into the United States at a point near the boundary between Saskatchewan and Manitoba, where the terrain is relatively flat and well suited to the construction of such a pipe line. Yesterday I received a phone call from the solicitor for the sponsors, who told me that there was some possibility that the pipe line might go into Milwaukee or to St. Paul. They had made a futher study of markets, and it appears that there may be a good market in Milwaukee or St. Paul. But these are mere possibilities.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would that depend on the obtaining of an export permit?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, yes; everything is based on the question of the export permit. You could not move out any of the by-products without such a permit. However, I think it should be pointed out that the route which is finally chosen will be dependent upon the wishes and desires of the producers, the sulphur company, the markets and the Governments which are involved in this matter. At the present time no final decision has been made.

The main trunk gathering line would probably originate near the Pinecreek structure west of the city of Edmonton, and would be fed by similar lines extending southward through the foothills and continue down to somewhere in southern Alberta, from whence the exports of these gas products would commence. This would be a gathering line and it would be brought into southern Alberta, from where the products would start on their way to the export markets.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Is there any suggestion that, in the western line going from Edmonton, the sulphur might be picked up which comes from Taylor, British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am sure that consideration will be given to that matter, provided the line is close enough to the source of supply for the product to be handled on an economic basis and that the sulphur is in a form that can be transported in a pipe line. The decision will depend on those two considerations.

It is proposed that this by-product pipe line project be operated in the name of Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd., which will be a company sponsored by Pembina Pipelines Limited. This latter company is a public company with assets in excess of $26 million.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is it a company incorporated by Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I am coming to that. Its stock is listed on the Toronto Exchange. Pembrina Pipelines Limited is incorporated under the laws of the province of Alberta; and what to me is most important is that the company is operated, owned, financed and controlled by Canadians. And that is the company which will control the Foothills company. It already operates extensive gathering transmission facilities in Alberta, and accordingly it brings competent management and experience to this particular project.

It is proposed that the company be incorporated with five million shares of common stock of par value of $5 each. The construction of this particular type of line will of course be the first of its kind in Canada, and one of a very limited number on the North American continent. It has been unquestionably established, by the operation of similar pipe line projects in the United States, where there are great quantities of natural gas such as now exist in the province of Alberta, that the marketing of the by-products, which are such by-products as are obtained from natural gas, must be done through a separate by-products pipe line such as is proposed by the promoters of the Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is there an estimate of the cost of construction?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That will be submitted to the committee. I could have gathered up no end of figures on this subject, but I thought it much better to have the experts furnish that data to the committee to which the bill, of course, will have to go.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Are there any existing companies with which this one would be in competition?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In Canada? No. This will be the first one of its kind.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It may be the first one of this particular type.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Right.

Hon. Mr. Farris: But are there any other companies that this company would be in competition with?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Not as far as I know.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are other companies which are now selling sulphur.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, but this company would not be selling sulphur, it would be transporting sulphur and by-products. That is what it is for; and there is today no similar company in Canada.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: This is a products line; the other is pipe line gas or natural gas. I think the statement is correct, no products line has been built on the west coast.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I believe that about two years ago we incorporated such a company. I certainly remember a bill before the Banking and Commerce committee for incorporation of a products line to Winnipeg; I think it was called "Hydrocarbons Pipeline". If it is in existence, this company would be a competitor.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Is it intended that these products shall be refined in Alberta?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Not necessarily. The products are taken out of the gas.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: How can they be taken out without a refinery?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: With a separator.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: You cannot take sulphur out that way.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Under section 6 of the bill the company is seeking authority from the federal Government to subdivide land into building lots, streets and sites for residential purposes. I think this is something new in a pipe line bill. Is this not a provincial matter?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, not any more than the matter of education, which came before the house recently.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You are asking for a lot of power in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I have taken up a lot of time in giving a general statement with respect to this particular bill. I do not propose to go over the bill clause by clause, as I feel that this will be done very effectively in the appropriate committee to which the bill will be referred. I might mention that arrangements have been made for the company's solicitor and for experts to appear before the committee, where no doubt the bill will be discussed clause by clause and any questions which honourable members have will be answered much more effectively and better than I could possibly answer them today.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask just one question which the honourable gentleman from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) will undoubtedly be able to inform the house on? It refers to the prospect of crossing into the United States at a certain point near the boundary of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Has the honourable senator from Hanover any idea as to the connection that will be made with an American pipe line company on the other side of the boundary if the Foothills pipe line reaches that point? This recalls the problem that arose when the Trans-Canada Pipe Line wanted to join up with the Northwestern Natural Gas at Emerson, and then the competing company in the United States sought to obtain control of the situation. As a result the matter was tied up before the Federal Petroleum Board at Washington and nothing came of it. Is there any prospect in that connection?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No arrangements have been made with any American company yet. I presume the sponsors of the bill are carrying on negotiations and discussions, but I can definitely tell you that at the present time no arrangements have been made. Possibly the Foothills Pipe Line Company could incorporate a subsidiary American company to handle its by-products from the Canadian-American border right into the American market.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I am sure that the people of Alberta will be delighted if these prospects come to fruition. There is no doubt that an abundant supply of natural gas exists in that area, and large quantities of by-products are now being extracted at the Pincher Creek plant by the refinery of the British American Company. There is no doubt either that a pipe line would be the easiest way to transport these by-products. However, what concerns me is that this whole project looks to be pretty visionary. As one honourable senator has already inquired, how are we going to get these products into the American market? For years we have been trying to get natural gas into the United States market and, as has been said, there has been vigorous opposition to it. There will be the same opposition to these by-products, because they would be competing with by-products already in use in the United States.

I would like to know what relationship the Foothills Pipe Lines company will have with companies already producing gas and which have a tremendous amount of gas in reserve. When is construction of the pipe line likely to begin? Is there any hope of it beginning in the near future? There are many obstacles to overcome, and to this extent I think the project is visionary. At the same time, I do feel it would be a great boon to the people of Alberta and to the whole of Canada if these products which are obtained in such tremendous quantities could be made use of.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would it be satisfactory to the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) if I treated his comments as notice of inquiry and arranged to have the answers given when the bill is discussed in committee?

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Certainly.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we are all indebted to the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) for the comprehensive and clear explanation he has given of this bill. It is very interesting to learn that it might be possible to transport by pipe line the very valuable by-products of the natural gas of Alberta into North American markets, east, west and south. We all like to remember that the more markets which are made available for these by-products the greater will be the exploratory activities in Alberta and other western provinces and the greater will be the resources found. As the honourable senator has said himself, a good many of these natural resources are known to exist. They have been located and their quantities have been measured but they are locked up in the ground and cannot be used, principally because markets cannot be found for them.

For quite a few years now Parliament has been discussing all manners and varieties of oil pipe lines and gas pipe lines, and some of the discussions have not been without political implications. There may be a difficulty in connection with this bill in addition to the one mentioned by the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw). I have in mind that the line going into the United States will probably be subject to scrutiny by the Federal Power Commission in the United States in the same way as are any gas lines that might run into that country for the purpose of delivering natural gas. This is something which I think we might well inquire about in committee.

Another problem came to my mind as the honourable senator from Hanover was speaking. I am wondering whether we can expect a change in policy as a result of some of the things he said, for I am sure he is very close to the inner councils of the party to which he belongs. No doubt honourable senators can recall when the idea of a gas pipe line originated a few years ago. The rule laid down for its construction was not dictated by engineering, economics or terrain, but rather by a policy of nationalism, if I may use that term. This is not a political speech, for both parties in the other place at that time accepted the policy that gas pipe lines and oil pipe lines, with one exception, were to be built entirely within Canada. I know of one project that was proposed to take gas from Alberta to Vancouver, but in order to take it out of Alberta, from the southwestern extremity of that province, it was necessary to carry it through the United States and then back into British Columbia, to Vancouver. That project failed, although the terrain was as good as the terrain the honourable gentleman refers to. Perhaps the economics were bad, perhaps the engineering was bad, but it was determined at that time that these gas pipe lines would have to be built within the boundaries of Canada. I think it was Government policy, a policy advocated on both sides of the other place, that every gas pipe line from then on had to be built in Canada. That was for gas lines and oil lines. But now you have a new development coming, and perhaps one of considerable magnitude, that is, the transportation by pipe line of products, and these products are going to be very valuable.

Now, it may be that the honourable gentleman has the right idea. Perhaps these lines should be built with an eye first on economics, on engineering and on terrain, and on everything that that involves, but if so we may find a change in the policy that has been applied to this business of the building of pipe lines, and particularly of gas pipe lines.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Unless anyone else wishes to speak, I would just like to say—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I point out that if the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) speaks again on this bill, he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, may I add a few words? I am glad to see this bill come in. The men behind it represent a group of one of the smartest businessmen we have in this country; and in view of what has been happening recently as the result of policies imposed upon us by American restrictions, anything we can do to develop pipe lines or our natural resources in this respect should, I think, be supported with all the power that we have at our disposal.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman one question. Under section 6 it would appear that the powers given this company are not limited to by-products. That section provides that the company may:

> within or outside Canada construct, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire and hold, develop, operate, maintain, control, lease, mortgage,— and so on:

> —turn to account any and all interprovincial, extra-provincial and/or international pipelines and all appurtenances relative thereto for the gathering, transmitting, transporting, storing and delivering of any natural or artificial gas or oil or any products or by-products thereof—

So I take it that this line would have all the powers given to any of the other companies which have been incorporated by Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It would have.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think that the wording "within or outside Canada" should be looked into when the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, I think it should.

I would like to point out to the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) that last year we had an amendment, I believe to the Mid-Continent Pipelines Bill, under which that company was given the right to export gas to the United States. The amendment was passed by the Senate, and then went to the House of Commons and was passed there. Now, I cannot say to honourable senators that the policy of the Government has changed. All I can tell them is that last year we had an amendment to a pipe line bill under which a pipe line company was given power to export gas to the United States.

Honourable senators, in closing I would like to re-state what I said in connection with the route of the pipe line. The re-statement is as follows: I think it should be pointed out that the route which is finally chosen will be dependent upon the wishes and desires of the producers, the sulphur company, the markets and the Governments concerned.

I think that is where the final decision will be made in connection with the route.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): By the Board of Transport Commissioners?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I would like to have the bill referred to the appropriate Senate committee, which I believe is the Transport and Communications Committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt, bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John G. Higgins moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is brought forward for the purpose of amending an act called the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, which was assented to on July 11, 1955, and was to be effective for three years from the date on which it came into force, namely December 12, 1955. Accordingly, it expired on December 11, 1958. The main purpose of the bill is to extend the life of the act for a further period until June 30, 1962, and to make the period retroactive to December 12 last.

The purposes for which the loans will be granted are as follows:

1. construction of a fishing vessel;
2. financing the major repair of a fishing vessel on its hull, superstructure or engine, the cost being at least $200 and amounting to at least 20 per cent of the market value of the property required to be repaired;
3. construction of fishing equipment;
4. financing the purchase or construction of a shore installation, namely, structures other than buildings, as for instance, piers, skidways, stages and wharves;
5. financing the purchase, construction, repair or alteration or making additions to any building used in connection with fishing.

Application for a loan may be made to a chartered bank, a credit union, designated by the minister as a lender for the purpose of the act, or a caisse populaire, also designated by the minister as a lender under the act. Put in a nutshell, it means that a chartered bank, a credit union, a co-operative society or a parochial bank is to be regarded as a lender by the minister.

The amount of the loan to any individual is limited to $4,000 and the interest is to be 5 per cent simple interest. The repayment periods are from one to eight years, depending on the amount borrowed and the purpose for which the loan is obtained.

I may say that the periods of repayment are set out in the regulations, and are to be found on page 9 thereof. For instance, loans not exceeding $400 are to be repayable in 12 months, loans not exceeding $750 to be repayable in two years and six months, and so on, up to $4,000, repayable in eight years. There are two exceptions to these periods: (1), in the case of fishing equipment, where the repayment period is three years; and (2), in the case of a loan to make major repairs, where the period is also three years.

There is one other factor I might mention about repayment, and that is in connection with the revision of the terms of the loan. If a person finds that he cannot pay back the loan within the period set out in the regulations, the minister can extend it under certain circumstances.

Under the original act of 1955, the act which we are seeking to amend, only a fisherman could obtain a loan, but not every fisherman could do so. A fisherman is defined in the interpretation section of the act as a person who has a legal or equitable interest or proprietary share in a fishing vessel or a weir or similar fish catching device and who gains or intends to gain all or part of his livelihood during a fishing season from the catching or trapping of fish for sale. Under this definition a person who desired to start fishing was prevented from obtaining a loan. A man may once have been a fisherman and given up that calling temporarily, perhaps he sold his boat and fishing equipment, or perhaps through disuse his boat became in bad condition. He could not obtain a loan to buy a boat or equipment.

The bill makes a change in this regard. It will allow a loan to a person who at one time had an interest in a fishing vessel but no longer has such an interest, or to a person who desires to acquire an interest in a fishing vessel for the first time. There must have been many people who wanted a loan but could not qualify under the ownership clause; and there must have been many people who worked on fishing vessels and wanted to branch out on their own but could not qualify for assistance.

Take the province of Newfoundland where, because of this definition, only three loans since the inception of the act in 1955 have been granted to fishermen, and these three total only $1,240. Fishermen in Prince Edward Island, which has a smaller fishing industry than Newfoundland, received under the act $141,166.

Probably honourable senators would like to know how much money has been loaned during the term of the act, up to December 31, 1958. The amount, classified as to provinces are:

Province	No. of Loans	Amount
New Brunswick	125	$ 78,187
Prince Edward Island	174	141,166
Nova Scotia	69	73,157
Newfoundland	3	1,240
British Columbia	115	246,279
Total	539	$599,152

As I have said, the primary purpose of this bill is to extend the period of operation of the act for another three and a half years, that is, from December 12, 1958, to June 30, 1962. The bill also enlarges the definition of "fisherman", which I mentioned a few moments ago. The amendment opens the door to quite a number of fishermen who might want to branch out for the first time, or perhaps who had a vessel once before and wish to re-enter the fishing business.

Honourable senators, I understand there was no opposition to the bill in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would the honourable senator permit one question? Does this bill apply to fishermen on the Great Lakes or is it confined to fishermen on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I presume it applies to fishermen anywhere, because the act is not confined to fishermen on the two coasts.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, if I might be allowed to assist the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins), I would say the bill does apply to all fishermen in Canada. At least, there is no reference in the act to a fisherman's geographic location. Section 2 of the act, the interpretation section, sets out in paragraph (f) the definition of a fisherman who can qualify. As amended by this bill, paragraph (f) will read:

> (f) "fisherman" means
> (i) a person who has or intends to acquire a prescribed interest in a fishing vessel or a proprietary share in a fishing vessel, or
> (ii) a person who has a prescribed interest in a weir, or similar fish catching or trapping device, that is affixed to the ground, or a proprietary share in such a weir or similar fish catching or trapping device, > and whose principal occupation is participation in a primary fishing enterprise.

May I say a few words on this bill, honourable senators? First, I am sure that the Honourable Senator Higgins has made a worthy contribution very early in his career in the Senate in connection with a measure which has an important relation to the province from which he comes. It was such qualities possessed by him that I referred to earlier in the session.

I always welcome an opportunity to have something to say on a bill such as this, which does have a lot to do with the economy of that part of Canada from which I come.

It will be helpful to recount to honourable senators a little more of the background that preceded the introduction of the original act in 1955. You may recall that the original purpose of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was to provide credit facilities which would be equal to those provided for farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. It guaranteed loans by banks and credit unions to qualified fishermen and, because these loans were guaranteed, it was found possible to lend the money at 5 per cent interest. Now, before such a system of credit could be put into effect for fishermen, a system of Government-administered insurance had to precede the measure. This made possible insurance on boats and equipment at the relatively low rate of 1 per cent, in order that there would be some measure of protection for the guarantors of the loans. Up until this time there had been three sources of credit, or a combination of the three. First, there were the credit unions, which had played and continue to play an important part in the provision of credit facilities for the small boat fishermen. Secondly, there were the provincial loan boards, whose function was to provide loans for larger boats and to administer subsidies provided for their construction by the federal Government. Then there was the third source of credit, and it was a very important source, and that was the fish buyers. This source has always been and will continue to be a rather important source of credit.

It is within my personal knowledge that the great majority of small boat fishermen who were considered to be reliable had little difficulty in that part of the country from which I come in obtaining credit from those whom they were in the habit of selling their fish to. In providing such credit the buyers themselves have always performed a most useful function. There have been suggestions, however, that this type of relationship in the matter of credit between fish buyers and fishermen had within it the danger of compelling the fisherman to undertake to sell all his catch to the buyer who had provided him with the credit. It has also been suggested that because of these circumstances the fisherman had no opportunity to bargain as to the price he might receive for his catch. The act of 1955 therefore did provide an alternative source of credit.

When the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was introduced in Parliament, in 1955, it was forecast that there would likely be a slow rate of acceptance of the system of guaranteed bank loans. This had been the experience in the first few years following the enactment of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. In the first year of the operation of that act the total amount of loans was $3 million. Now the annual loans are in the amount of approximately $100 million.

It seemed to be the experience that the bank managers themselves required education in the matter of judging the credit rating of applicants for these guaranteed loans, and it seemed also that there was a hesitancy on the part of the farmers to approach the bank managers.

The forecast with respect to the acceptance of the guaranteed bank loans for the fishermen has been borne out. I know it is unnecessary to quote many figures to honourable senators, but I do wish to point out that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, which was the first full year of operation of the act, there were 203 loans to a total amount of $236,000; and in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958 there were 136 loans, to the amount of $150,000. In the Atlantic provinces, during the whole period since the system has been in effect, I understand there have been only about 275 loans, to a total of $225,000. The figures for Newfoundland emphasize the differences that exist with respect to that province in this and many other fields, which we have to learn more about, particularly in view of the difficulties it is now experiencing. With respect to loans, Newfoundland has had only three loans granted to a total amount of $1,240.

As the honourable senator from St. John's East said, the amendments proposed by this bill do two things. First, they extend the legislation for another period of three years, and secondly, they change the definition of a fisherman who can qualify for a guaranteed loan to include one who does not now own a fishing boat or equipment. In extending the life of the legislation, an opportunity will be provided to determine whether these loans, both in numbers and amounts, will increase, as has been the experience in loans for farmers. The change in the definition of a fisherman who can qualify will take care of an occasional case of a worthy borrower not at present qualifying, but will likely not have any appreciable effect on the volume of loans made.

Honourable senators, I wish to offer several suggestions affecting the subject of credit for fishermen. It does seem to me that joint consideration with the provinces to the whole problem of credit facilities for fishermen should be given. So many aspects of the matter of credit are common to both fishermen and farmers.

Honourable senators will remember this paragraph in the Speech from the Throne:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

It does seem to me that if it is felt by the Government that adequate credit facilities are important in obtaining a prosperous agricultural economy and require a special consideration, the same should hold true for the attainment of a prosperous fishery.

I am reminded at this point of a statement made by the Honourable Lester Pearson to the delegation of western farmers, representatives of whom we all welcomed at our offices yesterday. He pointed out to the delegation that there was no doubt theirs was a national problem. But he also reminded them that, serious as their problem was, that of the Atlantic fishermen with respect to average net incomes was even more serious, and was also a national and not a regional problem.

With respect to credit for fishermen, we have the participation both of provincial and federal Governments, each playing its separate part. We also find the provincial Fishermens Loan Boards administering long-liner and dragger subsidies provided by the federal Government, along with associated loans requiring provincial funds. I am convinced that the provincial authorities, being closer to the needs of the fishermen, are in a better position to administer any loan system than the federal authorities. In these days of high interest rates I believe it should be possible to work out a system of loans which would be jointly guaranteed by the two levels of government, and which would make possible loans at lower rates of interest.

Any investigation of the matter of credit for fishermen should also include the related subject of subsidies to improve and modernize the fishing industry. I am sure we have all read comments within recent months to the effect that perhaps this is the time when the federal subsidy program should be extended to include benefits for the owners and operators of large fishing trawlers and draggers. I am not one who has yet been convinced that the arguments which have been made in this connection are good enough; my mind is still open on the matter. However, I think we all should remind ourselves that the original intention of the subsidy program which was initiated by the federal Government was to encourage the smaller fishermen to get out of the small-boat operation and get into the long-liners and draggers of the medium size, so that their income would be increased through methods by which they would be able to make larger catches of fish. As I say, up to the present time I am not impressed with the arguments advanced for extending subsidies for large-sized trawlers and draggers.

Honourable senators, my second suggestion is in another field entirely. The credit position of the fisherman is, like that of the farmer, closely tied to good and sufficient markets. The fishery, as is agriculture, but perhaps to a greater extent, is an export industry depending on the foreign trade policies of both Canada and the countries with which we do business. Like farming, the domestic market for the fishing industry is also an important one. Both segments of the market for fish can be largely affected by action on the part of our own Government. In the first place, the Government should do everything within its power to promote the sale of salt fish in the Caribbean countries. This is a subject on which others, particularly the senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) and the senator from Southern New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McLean), are much better qualified to speak than I am.

Another field in which Government action would be very helpful is one to which I have already made reference in the Throne Speech debate, that of the advertising field. Since that time it has been brought to my attention that the federal Government is planning to embark on an advertising campaign to promote the sale of apples. I suggest that, since the enlargement of the domestic market for fish carries with it an element of greater national importance, an advertising campaign to promote the consumption of fish entered into and financially supported jointly by the industry and the Government would be a valuable contribution to the economy of the Atlantic provinces. Such a campaign should be one of large dimensions and include coverage both in Canada and in the United States, where I understand that 75 per cent of our fish production is presently sold.

I conclude by saying that good markets in all branches of our economy provide the answer to the problem of availability of credit and, in fact, most other problems.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I was hoping this bill would be referred to a committee, as is usually done with a bill of this type.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Higgins, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mr. Brunt, for the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, the very fine presentation of the bill made by the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) yesterday leaves me with little to say,—but there is in my opinion, one notable exception. I want to speak briefly on a phase which I am not too happy about. I followed very carefully the honourable leader's exposition, in the hope that something would be said by way of a definite assurance that the program of this national enterprise would be completed before the termination of the present agreements. I was disappointed that his remarks contained no such undertaking. The closest to it that I can find is his statement, reported in Hansard, page 362, that:

> The other provinces, except Newfoundland, expect to complete their portion of the highway some time in December 1960.

I then looked through the reports of the Commons debates to see if anything more definite was said at the time the bill was before that house, and it appears that the only statement made in that connection was by the honourable Minister of Public Works, whose reference is in much the same terms as those used by our honourable leader. He said, as reported in House of Commons Hansard, page 1245:

> Physical progress to date is generally satisfactory and during the next two construction seasons, which will bring us to the termination date of December 31, 1960, we expect to see a further acceleration in the construction rate.

Much the same terminology was used as to the expectation of the completion date in 1949, when the bill was passed. At that time it was expected that the project would be completed by 1956. We heard yesterday the reasons assigned for the extension of the time, and with these I have no quarrel.

Circumstances change in connection with such things and necessitate alterations in plans. But we have now reached a definitely serious stage in this Trans-Canada highway program, in that, according to figures which have been given, it is expected that a contribution from the federal Government of about $400 million will be required; and of that, about $250 million has been already invested in this project. So that, apart from what has been invested by the various provinces who are parties to the agreements, about five-eighths of the outlay required from the people of Canada has been made. It is not unreasonable to expect that during the next two years new circumstances will develop which will compel us to face, a few years from now, another extension of these agreements and possibly the contribution of further funds to complete the unfinished gaps.

This project, either as a dream or as a plan, has long occupied the minds of many Canadians. As the honourable leader pointed out yesterday, it goes back about half a century, to 1910, when many organizations, particularly the Canadian Highways Association, were organized by outstanding Canadians across the country to promote an all-Canada highway. I recall with some pleasure meetings in which I took part in those early days, with such outstanding leaders in motor club work and highway association work as the late Dr. Doolittle of Toronto. Another personality prominent in this matter was the late Ace Emmett of Winnipeg. These men were typical of those who, in every part of Canada, dedicated their efforts to the promotion of this highway, foreseeing that the motor car would become an important means of travel.

For various reasons that are quite excusable, the intervention of war and other things, nothing definite was done about the project until the Trans-Canada Highway legislation was enacted, in 1949. That was 10 years ago. During the intervening years the idea of a Trans-Canada highway has lost some of its glamour and intrigue for Canadians. Those of us who are familiar with transcontinental motor travel are aware that the majority of Canadian motorists who motor from eastern Canada and the central provinces to the Pacific coast, or vice versa, invariably travel over American routes. I know that motorists intending to journey from the Pacific coast to eastern Canada usually go to a Canadian travel bureau to seek information as to roads, and so on, and it is a sad state of affairs that invariably they are advised to go via Spokane or Seattle in the United States. By the same token, those who leave eastern Canada for the west are usually told they can avoid trouble and have a more pleasant trip if they skip out of Canada to Detroit or Port Huron or the Sault and circle around through the United States.

Here is another important thing. We in British Columbia, particularly those like myself who are associated with travel and the motor business, find that easterners motoring to the west coast often get detoured by way of Spokane and become intrigued with the idea of continuing on down to San Francisco or Los Angeles. As a result, many who had the best intentions of going to British Columbia wind up in the southwestern states.

Honourable senators may recall some of the things I had to say not long ago in this chamber about the serious imbalance in tourist trade between Canada and the United States, and the fact that the last available statistics disclosed that Canadian tourists in the United States have been spending $75 million a year more than American tourists have been spending in Canada. This is a serious situation and one that we should do everything possible to correct.

Canadian motorists travel over American routes for the simple reason that this idea has become established as the thing to do. It is a fact that you can motor across Canada over an all-Canadian route, but this is not generally known. Canadians and Americans avoid motoring over the all-Canadian route, considering it to be too hazardous an undertaking. No single factor could correct this situation more effectively than completion of the Trans-Canada Highway. It is true that relatively satisfactory progress has been made in the building of this highway, particularly since the extension of the agreements, but it is still just a start and will remain so until somebody snips the ribbon at the opening of the final connecting link of highway that will join one end of Canada to the other. It may be said that very few motorists will wish to travel from one coast to the other on the transcontinental highway, but that is not the important thing. It is the psychological effect that counts. To put it briefly, I would hope that within two years' time—in other words, by 1961—this highway will have been completed, so that the creative geniuses in the publicity business will be able to rekindle interest and enthusiasm and restore the glamour and intrigue attached to the idea of an all-Canadian route. That kind of publicity would have a terrific psychological impact on all motorists, not only those who contemplate making transcontinental trips.

As I have said, the federal Government has invested $250 million in this highway, and each of the nine provinces which have signed the agreements have substantially invested in it. But until it is completed, the provinces cannot possibly hope to reap the full benefits of their investment.

Another fact is that the present highway program is not geared to meet the tremendous increase in both commercial and pleasure motor vehicle traffic. In fact, it has been stated on good authority that the Trans-Canada Highway should be a four-lane route instead of a two-lane route, for even now it cannot take care of the motor traffic that is seeking the facilities of a good highway. We should not consider that this service is being provided at public expense just for those who have an urge to travel by motor car, for I am reminded that in the intervening years while the planning and piecemeal construction has been going on with respect to this project the motor vehicle business has become one of the greatest factors, if not the greatest, in our national economy. At least one-quarter—I am inclined to think it is closer to one-third —of all tax revenue collected by municipalities, provinces and the federal Government is derived directly or indirectly from motor vehicles. So this is a matter that demands serious consideration on an economic basis, for it is a source of income that we cannot afford to discourage.

I know that some persons close to the project are enthusiastic about its completion, but, as I have said, unforeseen circumstances might arise to prevent some provinces taking care of their part of the agreement during the next two years. No doubt there is reason to believe they will fulfil their agreements, but the provinces have other financial responsibilities than the building of the Trans-Canada highway through the province, and they are not all finding it easy to finance their budgets for public services of all kinds. I would suggest that the federal authorities approach the completion of the agreements with the provinces in a spirit of co-operation. I do not suggest the wielding of a big stick, but when a federal investment of this kind is going to amount to the sum of $400 million I think the representatives of the Canadian people as a whole are justified in exerting some degree of pressure to get this project completed, so that all concerned, the federal Government and the provincial Governments, will be able to enjoy a return from the huge investment.

Provincial Governements should not be permitted to let the matter drift along. Goodness knows, they are subject to pressures of all kinds to spend money on the completion of other projects. I know there is hope in the minds of some people that if this thing coasts along long enough Ottawa will come to the rescue and complete the job. That happened once before. However, that would be most unfair to at least one province, Saskatchewan, which was the first to complete its agreement. Other provinces are close to the completion of their agreements, and their investment is almost complete. In the interests of fairness and equity, the agreements must be carried out and completed on the basis of the present terms.

Honourable senators, I hope representations will be made and every influence exerted and equitable co-operation extended to the end that this money, which I am sure will be made available to complete this project, will be put to work as soon as possible. The sooner it goes to work, the sooner it will solve, to some extent, the unemployment problem. The project is declared to be a part of the national development program, and I hope it will not be sidetracked in favour of some other project which is not of so widespread national importance to Canada.

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, this is a bill whereby the federal Government contracts with the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis, and when the work is completed it backs out and leaves the maintenance and everything else to the provinces. After spending several hundred million dollars on this Trans-Canada Highway, the federal Department of Public Works should at least see to its maintenance. Last session I wrote to the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Green, and asked if he had thought of making any provisions for the maintenance of the highway by paying the provinces one-half the cost of maintenance, or on a mileage basis.

If one travels through the United States from one state to another it will be seen that some of the best highways are maintained better in some states than others. I recall that in the state of New Hampshire, in particular, the grass was well cut. I saw no empty cigarette boxes or pieces of paper lying around. Someone is charged with the duty of clearing away debris of that kind.

The Trans-Canada Highway is of great importance to Canada, and I think it should have the same markings from coast to coast, so that people would recognize it, regardless of the province through which they were travelling. I also think that the grass should be kept cut, the highway looked after, and refuse cleared away regularly, with the same care that is shown in the state of New Hampshire.

In the report of the proceedings on the Trans-Canada Highway in Prince Edward Island, the starting point is given at Wood Islands, and the end at Borden. Then, in referring to New Brunswick, the report says:

New Brunswick starts from the intersection of provincial highway No. 2 and the Nova Scotia-New Brunswick boundary westerly to Aulac, then easterly by way of provincial highway No. 16 to Cape Tormentine.

That is the terminal of the ferry service going to Prince Edward Island. I am sure that in my province everyone is very grateful to the Government of New Brunswick for extending that highway to Cape Tormentine. I think it is a distance of about 35 miles from Aulac to Cape Tormentine, then there is a gap of 9 miles between Cape Tormentine and Borden.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if it is the intention of the Department of Public Works to complete that link between Cape Tormentine and Borden, which is a distance of only nine miles. It is proposed to build a causeway there, and for some two years they have been investigating that possibility. Not long ago I read that the Minister of Public Works hoped very soon to have a report on the causeway.

May I turn now to the Department of Transport, and point out that the ferries running between the Island and the mainland are not new. In fact, one is well over 40 years old. This winter has been an extremely bad one down there, and the ice has been heavier than usual. Last evening I read in the paper that on one occasion the best boat there took an hour and thirty minutes to make the crossing, and yesterday it did not make one crossing, because it was thought it could not meet the boat train in time. The boards of trade in Summerside and Charlottetown, and the local government, are very anxious about this ferry service. Last autumn both boards of trade sent strong resolutions to the Minister of Transport asking him to provide another ice-breaker for this service.

Sometime ago, perhaps a month or more, the old ferry had to be sent to Halifax for repairs, and coming back towards Borden the ice was so heavy that she could not make any headway, and she ran out of fuel oil and ended up at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. She was there for perhaps two weeks before ice conditions allowed her to come back, and she managed to do that only by the assistance of an ice-breaker.

As nothing has been heard from the Minister of Transport since the resolutions were forwarded, I wrote and told him of the uneasiness of the people on account of this bad service. During Old Home Week there was a ferry breakdown and we had a pile-up of cars a mile and a quarter long.

Hon. Harold Connolly: Did the minister mention the causeway, by any chance?

Hon. Mr. Barbour: No. I did not ask him about the causeway, but I received a nice letter back from him, in which he said he was going to have the thing looked into. Well, ten days ago, the Charlottetown Guardian, a newspaper that is always friendly to the Government, carried a scorching editorial, stating they just hated to pick up Hansard because there was never anything in it about the car ferry.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Nor the causeway either?

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Nor the causeway either. I cut the editorial out of the paper and sent it to the minister. At that time the other car ferry was still icebound off Souris. Since sending the editorial to the minister I have not heard anything from him, so I am wondering if the Government is thinking of building a causeway there or providing a boat for the service.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will bring your complaint to the attention of the minister immediately.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: That is fine.

Honourable senators, I repeat that I think that the dominion should pay the provinces some of the maintenance costs of the Trans-Canada Highway and see that the road is maintained to a high standard, so that people traveling on this road will not encounter any potholes along the route. I think if that were done it would be a great credit to the Government.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, the object of this bill is to increase the amount that may be spent on the Trans-Canada Highway from $250 million to $350 million. I would say that by the time the highway is completed the expenditure will have reached $400 million. But such an increase is not very unusual. Away back when the Panama Canal was undertaken it was estimated that it could be built for $160 million, but it actually cost $375 million. The Chicago Sanitary Ship Canal was estimated to cost $16 million, but when completed it had cost $53 million. In the days when a dollar was a dollar it was thought that the Suez Canal could be built for $30 million, but the cost worked up to $80 million.

So, honourable senators, there is nothing exceptional when the amount of money actually expended on an undertaking exceeds the original estimated cost.

The act providing for the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway was passed on December 10, 1949, and by its terms the dominion undertook to pay half its cost up to $150 million. Each province was to choose the most practical route through its territory, to get the lowest possible gradients and gentle curves, and particularly to avoid level crossings wherever possible, the object there being to lessen the number of people killed annually at level crossings.

But there were other difficulties. As time went on difficulties arose because costs of construction were getting higher and the provinces were unable to meet them. Thus, gaps were left in the highway, and the dominion Government agreed that where a gap was not longer than one-tenth of the mileage through the province the dominion would pay 90 per cent toward completion, instead of 50 per cent, of that 10 per cent of the mileage.

Difficulties also arose on the routes through the mountainous regions. For instance, the paved road was to be 24 feet wide with a 10-foot shoulder on each side, and that was to be maintained through the mountains wherever possible. Sometimes the width was cut down to 22 feet. It was found necessary to put in guard rails and to install some 3,000 feet of protection so that snowslides would not destroy the highway. As a matter of fact, these snowslides caused a lot of worry and the Government sent over to Switzerland for mountaineers who were expert in the handling of glaciers and snowslides. These men came over to Canada and some of them are here yet. The advice they gave was very good. They arranged to blow up some of the glaciers by gunpowder. They put the powder in place and attached electric wires to it. Well, bears in that area had a great liking for the saltpetre in powder, and as they came along they found the holes where the powder was placed, reached in and licked up all the gunpowder, so when the electric current was sent through the wires to blow up the glacier nothing happened.

I may say that this highway, started by the Liberal Government, is one of the great accomplishments of that party when it was in power. As time goes by it will be more and more appreciated. As honourable senators know, people nowadays get two or three weeks' holidays with pay every year, and there are excellent motor cars in use today. People like to take their families for a trip, and we hope that more and more of them will use this highway. We hope tourists will come to Canada to enjoy travelling on that highway. And why? Honourable senators know that more than a thousand farm people came to Ottawa this week to tell the Government of the surplus food supplies in the west. Well, tourists coming here will create a market for a lot of that food, and its consumption would be very desirable.

This highway is laid around the large cities that are growing so fast. It runs through the provinces down by the sea, through areas that are rich in historic monuments and historic sites. There tourists can see the Land of Evangeline; there they can see Port Royal, where, away back in 1605, a few people started to cultivate the land, grew a few vegetables and even some wheat—back in the time of Champlain.

In Ontario the highway provides an easy route to numerous scenic areas, notably Niagara Falls.

This broad highway leads also into the west, where there are vast plains "for which the speech of England hath no name—the Prairie". Out there you can drive for hours and not see a single tree. You can, of course, at times see fields of waving grain and great herds of white-faced cattle. Then the highway winds on through the Rockies, where you see spectacular peaks and passes, the minor mountains and major mountain ranges, dashing rivers and foaming cascades, tree-clothed slopes—scenery which is nowhere else in the world to be found. The highway carries on to the Pacific Ocean.

I do hope that this route will be used as a tourist route so that the greatness and the vastness and the great potentialities of this country will be seen by many. Someone has said that, on travelling from the Atlantic to the Pacific:

> There is a thousand miles of forest,
> A thousand miles of plain,
> A thousand miles of mountains,
> And then the sea again.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to delay much longer the second reading of this bill and its reference to a committee, but there is one particular matter that has not been touched on and which to my mind is particularly important.

The primary purpose of building the Trans-Canada Highway was, I think, so that Canadians from east and west would be able to travel across their own country on a highway of which they can be proud, and not have to go part way through the United States.

Now, the federal Government is spending millions of dollars in the city of Ottawa, not so that the people who live here can have a beautiful city, but so that Canada will have a beautiful capital, and one of which the Canadian people will be proud. We are now coming toward the completion of a trans-Canada highway, which will bring tourists to this city from all parts of Canada for the purpose of seeing the Parliament buildings. And what are we doing for the tourists when they get here? I understand an order has been given that permission for tourists to park on certain portions of Parliament Hill is to be done away with.

I would also point out that before long the great Queen Elizabeth Highway which passes about a mile and a half south of here will be completed. Anyone who walks up Bank Street in this city any morning or evening will realize that thousands of motorists visit this city. Where they are going to find parking spaces while visiting the Parliament buildings, I do not know. Certainly they are not going to park two or three miles from here and walk to Parliament Hill. The visitors who come to Ottawa by train or plane to see the Parliament buildings are very few; the vast number come by automobile.

As honourable senators know, any one who visits the city of Washington for the first time goes directly to see the great public buildings in that city. The American tourists to whom I have spoken have been enthusiastic about our great Canadian Parliament buildings; they are lavish in their praise of what they see here, notwithstanding the many millions of dollars which have been spent on the American capital buildings. So honourable senators, I am grieved to hear that there is a movement on foot to remove the parking privileges for tourists on Parliament Hill.

My suggestion is that one answer to the problem would be to build a garage at the foot of the hill at the west gate to take care of the cars of civil servants who work on Parliament Hill. Space should of course be provided for the cars of senators, members of the cabinet and members of the House of Commons, but the remainder of the space should be left for tourist parking.

I repeat, honourable senators, we go to great expense to build a highway so that tourists from as far away as British Columbia can come to see the capital city of Ottawa. But what do we do for them by way of parking arrangements at the end of their 3,000-mile trip? I know that the Federal District driveways in the city are beautiful and there are other attractive buildings, but the big attraction is Parliament Hill. I protest as strongly as I can the removal of the tourist parking space from the Parliament grounds. As I have said, provision can be made for parking the cars of the staffs who work in these buildings. I understand that people who work down in the Hunter Building have been parking their cars near the West Block. They see the space there, and decide to slip their cars in when nobody is watching. However, I am told that some checking-up in that regard is now being done. But the problem is to provide parking accommodation for visitors to the capital during the tourist season so as to give every possible encouragement to people to come and see these wonderful buildings.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay at any length the passage of this bill. However, I do wish to make a few remarks on it.

The honourable Leader of the Government who introduced the bill explained it quite fully yesterday, and we have had further explanations on it today. The honourable leader tabled certain documents, which will require some study. I trust, therefore, there will be no question about having the bill considered in committee, where we can make a detailed examination of the tables that were placed on Hansard.

As was pointed out by the Leader of the Government, and by several other speakers this afternoon, the act which established the right of the Government to spend money on a trans-Canada highway was passed in 1949. At that time the undertaking was to be on what was called a fifty-fifty basis, with the provinces and the dominion Government each paying half of the cost. But in 1955 a federal-provincial highway conference was held in Ottawa, as a result of which new legislation was brought down. That legislation provided that the federal Government would contribute 90 per cent of the construction cost of 10 per cent of the mileage in each province; it also altered the date of completion of the highway, which is now supposed to be December 31, 1960.

Honourable senators, during the last few years there has been great development in the whole concept of transportation: trains are running faster, and airplanes are extending their lines across the country. I believe railway developments and extensions have been made in almost every province of Canada, with the possible exception of what we know as the four Maritime provinces. Down there, I understand, in the past 10 years railway extensions have taken place only in the province of New Brunswick, and that was only an eleven-mile stretch between Bartibog and Heath Steel Mine, and I doubt if very many trains are running on that line today.

Large sums of money have been spent on railway construction in other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Monette: May I ask the honourable leader if he has the figures for the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not have the figures for Quebec, but I recall that quite an important and lengthy line was recently built into the Chibougamau area, which was a very costly undertaking. I think the first half of the line went into a rich mining district, and the balance went through a country which is only now being developed. So, I think it can reasonably be said that, outside the Maritime provinces, there have been many railway extensions in Canada.

Now, honourable senators, I have a suggestion to make to the Leader of the Government. Although this suggestion was made at the last National Liberal Convention, I am sure the Government won't condemn it right off. The Government, I hope, will accept good suggestions no matter from where they come. At that convention it was suggested that the federal Government should undertake to pay 90 per cent of the total cost of the building of the Trans-Canada Highway in the Maritime provinces. If that were done it would provide a kind of equalization of the cost of transportation facilities in the four Atlantic provinces compared to what has been done in the other provinces. I make this suggestion very seriously to the Government, and I am sure that people in all parts of Canada would agree that it would be a very fair thing to do.

With respect to other matters concerning this railway, I might say that it was my very good fortune this summer to travel throughout Canada by rail. I saw the road to which the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) has referred being built in northern Ontario, and also some road construction across the Prairies, and I travelled on a part of the highway in British Columbia. There are wonderful tourist spots in all parts of Canada. In days gone by it was my privilege to visit a number of such places in the Maritime provinces. I do not care to think how many years ago it was—probably over 50—that I made a memorable visit to New Brunswick; but I have never forgotten the beauties of the little towns of Shediac and Buctouche and the beaches along the Miramichi and the Restigouche. A few years ago I was in Prince Edward Island. I arrived there by air, and I shall never forget the scenery of that part of the country as I then saw it. The land appears to be red, and there are green spots along with red spots. I recall vividly such beautiful views as the honourable senator from Murray Harbour (Hon. Mrs. Inman) described a few days ago. In Nova Scotia it was my privilege to visit a very attractive little place, somewhere west of Halifax I believe, known as Peggy's Cove; I also travelled down the Annapolis Valley, in the Evangeline country which has been referred to today. It was not my privilege to see Cape Breton, but I hope to visit there at no distant time, and also the island of Newfoundland, which has, no doubt, very attractive towns, with most intriguing names such as those which were mentioned a few days ago by the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins).

In all parts of Canada one may find scenic beauty. Last summer it was my privilege to go to British Columbia. I travelled along the highway, not yet completed, from Calgary to Banff. As one approaches Banff one is surrounded by mountains. From there I went to Lake Louise, which possesses a beauty unsurpassed in the world. On my return I stayed for a number of days in Banff, and while there visited the School of Fine Arts. It amazed me. I had heard of it, but I supposed it to be a comparatively small affair. In fact, honourable senators, it is now a university in itself. It is directed by one of our own colleagues, the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron). He started it in 1933 with a grant from the Carnegie Foundation of $10,000, which was made for three years. The purpose was to encourage an appreciation of the arts. At that time the school had no buildings. Its activity was carried on in local school halls, private houses, and tents; in other words, through a mobilization of local resources. The school continued during the trying years of 1933 to 1937, and throughout the war years, 1939 to 1945, but even then it had no buildings. At that time the length of the courses was about six weeks. In 1946 permission was given by the Board of Governors of the University of Alberta to raise funds for the school by private contributions, and from that year until 1958 two and a half million dollars have been contributed by private donors, provincial Governments, the provincial university, and the Canada Council.

Today, honourable senators, this fine arts establishment, if not completed, can take pride in having one of the most beautiful campuses in the dominion—one which would compare favourably with that of any university. There are classrooms which will hold 150 persons; there is also a large school classroom with accommodation for 500; and a fine dining hall, which holds 600, where it was my good fortune to have a meal—which is possibly why I appreciate it so much. There is sleeping accommodation for 350 in the winter and 325 in the summer. Today the operating budget of the Banff school amounts to $400,000, and honourable senators will be interested to know that, with the exception of a $10,000 grant from the University of Alberta, the entire sum is earned by the school. It now operates the year-round: for 12 weeks, as a school of fine arts; for 24 weeks, as a school of business administration. As an education centre it is carried on for 12 months in the year.

May I say, before Mr. Speaker calls me to order, that I appreciate that he has followed my remarks with interest. I knew he would, as he himself is such a great patron of the arts. However, I am not out of order. I may have appeared to have been getting off the highway, probably on the soft shoulders, but there was a reason for my reference to this school other than to pay a tribute to the honourable senator from Banff. I might point out that in 1958 73 groups took courses at the school and over 7,000 people spent from three days to twelve weeks in attendance there. Now, honourable senators, with 7,000 people going to that school, there must be some means of transportation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Now you are back on the highway!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I am on the highway again.

The Hon. the Speaker: After a long detour!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably most honourable senators, including His Honour the Speaker, did not take a detour but went directly to Banff via the Trans-Canada Highway.

The highway is not only serving western Canada to the benefit of our tourist traffic and ordinary business, but it is also helping to attract men and women to the Banff School of Fine Arts, which is growing year by year. In 1958 students from every Canadian province and at least 20 American states took courses at the school.

I think honourable senators will agree that the magnificent development of the Banff School of Fine Arts could not have been brought about without the enthusiasm and the organizing ability of the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) and his love for the arts, humanities and social sciences. It must be a great source of satisfaction, not only to him but to his colleagues in the Senate, that today this school is a truly international centre for fine arts and adult education.

Honourable senators, we have in Canada the Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is amongst the best air lines in the world. We also have two great transcontinental railways, which are amongst the best railways in the world. When the Trans-Canada Highway is completed we shall have one of the best transcontinental highways in the world.

Hon. Harold Connolly: Honourable senators, this Irish heart of mine which overflows with love for all humanity prompts me to move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, March 16, at 8 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following documents.

Report of the Bank of Canada for the calendar year 1958, pursuant to section 27(3) of the Bank of Canada Act, Chapter 13, R.S. 1952. (French text).

Further Supplementary Estimates (3) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959.

Copy of an exchange of Notes between Canada and the United States of America, dated March 9, 1959, constituting the Agreement respecting the St. Lawrence Seaway Tariff of Tolls. (English) and French texts).

R.C.M.P. DOCUMENTS REQUESTED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, in the House of Commons this afternoon the Minister of Justice tabled a letter dated March 12, 1959, addressed to him from Commissioner Nicholson, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and also a copy of his reply to Commissioner Nicholson. Would the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) be kind enough to have copies of those letters tabled in our house?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will attend to that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: While I am on my feet, and speaking to this subject, may I say that I noticed that on February 16 the Minister of Justice tabled in the other house a copy of the Newfoundland-Canada police contract. Would the Leader of the Government also table a copy of that contract in this house?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think it has been tabled yet. I will be glad to include it with the other documents the honourable leader opposite has requested.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Would the Leader of the Government be good enough to table also the agreement between the Province of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada with respect to the R.C.M.P.?

Hon. David A. Croll: In view of the request made by the honourable senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Isnor) for a copy of the agreement between the Government of Nova Scotia and the dominion Government, having reference to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I think it would be well, and I so request, that all the federal-provincial agreements—I believe there are eight of them—now in existence in relation to this matter be laid on the table. Otherwise we shall be having them in "dribs and drabs" and it will be difficult to understand them.

UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER

VISIT TO OTTAWA

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I noticed in this afternoon's paper plans for the visit by the Right Honourable Harold Macmillan to Ottawa tomorrow, and I was disappointed to see no provision for members of the Senate and House of Commons to hear what he will have to say here. I wonder if the newspaper report is correct. At a time like this, when there is so much interest in what is happening on the world scene, it would be extremely valuable if members of both houses had an opportunity to hear from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. I realize that his schedule is a very heavy one. May I ask if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has any other information on this matter?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand that the Prime Minister of Great Britain will be here only some three hours. It will be impossible for him to address both houses.

CONVENTION ON NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next I will move:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament approve the convention on the Nationality of Married Women done at New York on February 20, 1957, and that this house do approve the same.

In this connection I may say I have some 50 copies of the convention which I would like to lay on the Table, so that any honourable senator who requires a copy may obtain one.

DOMINION CURLING CHAMPIONS AND SCOTCH CUP CHAMPIONS

TRIBUTE TO VICTORIOUS RICHARDSON RINK

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I hesitate to do a little boasting, but before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I would like to draw the attention of the house to the recent splendid curling performance of the Richardson rink of Regina, Saskatchewan. Recently in Quebec City they did a magnificent job, representing the province of Saskatchewan, by winning the MacDonald's Briar Tankard, symbolic of the Dominion Curling Championships. Then the four brothers flew to Scotland, where they defeated the Scots at their own game, winning the Scotch Cup in three straight games.

By way of further boasting, may I say that the grandfather of those boys was a first cousin of mine. I would like to say also that of all the great men who left eastern Canada to go west there was none better than he, the grandfather of those boys. He lived in Radford, Quebec. As a boy I helped him with work around his barn and house on his lovely farm. When others were taking it easy, he would be digging out stumps. The neighbours all said he was a fine fellow but that he was just killing himself working. Later he moved west, and out there he went through the same performance. While other men took time off from work occasionally he had no time to spare. If he had ever found time to curl, which I doubt, he would have given a perfect performance. His neighbours in western Canada warned him in the same way as his neighbours in the east had done, that he would kill himself working. Well, honourable senators, perhaps he did, but it took him 87 years to do it. All the five-day-week men and eight-hour-day men died long before he did.

PUBLIC SERVANTS INVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Public Servants Inventions Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-33 is entitled "An act to amend the Public Servants Inventions Act".

Before dealing with this particular bill, I feel that I should give to this honourable body a short explanation in connection with the act which is now being amended, and also make reference to the National Research Council Act, which is also related to this particular amendment.

The latter act was originally passed in 1916, and under it a research corporation or body was set up and created and put to work. Naturally, as a result of the work that was done by the National Research Council of Canada inventions came about which had to be processed, patented and marketed. Hence, under and pursuant to the powers contained in section 17 of the National Research Council of Canada Act there was set up and incorporated a Crown corporation under the name of Canadian Patents and Development Limited. The objects and powers of this company were to look after the matter of patenting, processing and marketing of all inventions created by the employees and servants of the National Research Council of Canada.

In addition to inventions which were created by the employees of the National Research Council of Canada, civil servants in other Government departments and in Crown corporations were creating inventions from time to time. No legislation existed or was on the statute books of Canada to deal with these inventions. Under these circumstances, and accordingly to cover this situation, there was passed during June of 1954 an act known as the Public Servants Inventions Act. In this particular act one finds:

first, the definition of a civil servant; next, the matter of inventions which are vested in the Crown is defined; then there is set out in detail the procedure which must be followed by the inventor in conjunction with the Crown in order that his particular invention will be processed, patented and marketed. In addition, there is procedure for protection of the inventor as well as of the Crown.

The act further gives to the appropriate minister—and by appropriate minister I mean the minister of the department in which is employed the civil servant who has made an invention—the right to refer the matter of the invention and patent to the appropriate Crown corporation, which in this case is Canadian Patents and Development Limited. It is in connection with the reference of these matters to Canadian Patents and Development Limited that part of the amendment as proposed by the present bill arises.

The amendment in this particular bill deals with section 9 of the original act. This section of the original act gives the appropriate minister authority to refer the matter of an invention and patenting thereof and all other matters relating to the processing, patenting and exploiting thereof to the Crown corporation which I have referred to before and which operates under the name of Canadian Patents and Development Limited.

In due course it was found that section 9 in its present form presented certain difficulties, in that royalties received on the patents were payable into the consolidated revenue fund, yet the Crown corporation had to pay all the costs in connection with the processing and marketing of patents. Hence an amendment was necessary so that this Crown corporation could carry on, on a sound financial basis.

This amendment to the Public Servants Invention Act, as senators will well realize, does not change the purpose of the original act, and it is being passed only for the purpose of making it possible for the Crown company to operate in a more efficient manner, so that inventions which are referred to it by other departments can be handled efficiently.

The purpose of the amendment is to permit the corporation to which the administration of inventions or patents has been transferred to retain the moneys received therefrom and to require that these moneys be used for the purposes of this act and for the purposes for which the Crown corporation was established.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Will the honourable senator permit a question? How has the Crown company that has been administering these patents been financed up to the present?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will come to that. They have money on hand, and that is another reason why they want this amendment. Also, that is the reason for the amendment being made retroactive.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You mean they have been holding royalties instead of paying them into the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right. I will come to that in due course.

The purpose of the act is indeed an admirable one: It is to establish a fair and uniform approach for the processing of any invention made by a civil servant.

In order to elaborate, I think I should point out the purposes for which Canadian Patents and Development Limited was established under the Research Council Act, and these briefly are as follows:

(1) To receive, examine and evaluate any invention referred to it not only by the National Research Council but by any other Government Department.

(2) To determine if the invention is new, and decide as to the possibility of securing a patent of such invention.

(3) To determine if the development might have any commercial value or beneficial value to the general public.

After careful examination, if it is decided that the invention is new and that it has a commercial value or would be beneficial to the general public and it is considered that the invention is patentable, then consideration is given to having it patented.

If a patent issues, Canadian Patents and Development Limited proceeds to exploit the patent with industry, and to complete all the arrangements necessary to sell it to industry on a proper basis.

Costs of all of the above mentioned items are paid for by Canadian Patents and Development Limited, which they paid originally on the distinct understanding that they would recover such costs from the royalties or moneys realized from the outright sale of a patent.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With whom did they have that arrangement, with the inventor?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, with the inventor.

Under the act as it stands at present, the royalties are payable into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and as the Crown corporation known as Canadian Patents and Development Limited receives no funds from Parliament, it is becoming impossible for it to operate. However, if it keeps the money it has on hand it can operate for a certain length of time, but eventually it will be unable to operate because of a lack of funds.

Under these circumstances all the royalties and other payments made by industry in connection with patents, as I have outlined above, will be made payable to the Crown corporation, and not be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The moneys so paid to the Crown corporation are to be retained and used by it to cover any expenses incurred by the corporation in order to process, complete and market a patent. If this proposed amendment to the act is not made, it simply means that the Crown corporation in due time will have to discontinue its work of obtaining and marketing patents for other departments, since eventually it would have no funds available for this particular work.

Now I come to the point raised by my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). On May 9, 1958, the Auditor General made a report to the effect that the moneys then on hand and held by the Crown corporation should have been paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and the securities which it holds should be turned over. Once this was brought to the attention of the corporation, they set about to have the act amended, and it is this amendment that I am now presenting to this honourable chamber.

Hon. Mr. Power: How much money did they start out with?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Nothing.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is my friend suggesting that Parliament set up a Crown company, gave it work to do and gave it no money?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: As far as I know, that is so.

Hon. Mr. Power: There was no estimate for it?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I know of no estimate for it. Of course, I was not here when it was done, and I was not a member of the Government, but I am sure we can get definite information on that when the bill goes to a committee. As I say, my information is that nothing was voted.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator does intend that the bill should go to a committee?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: By all means.

In addition to the above, by this proposed amendment the Canadian Patents and Development Limited would be authorized to make awards to the inventors concerned, in accordance with section 11(1) of the regulations passed pursuant to the Public Servants Inventions Act. I have those regulations here, and if any honourable senator would like to see them, I would be glad to lend them to him. All such awards, of course, could only be made on the recommendation of the appropriate minister.

What I would like to point out, honourable senators, and to reiterate and emphasize, is that the amendment does not in any way affect the purpose of the act as it was originally passed. However, the first amendment in the bill does make it possible for the Crown corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, to operate in a proper and efficient manner.

Honourable senators will note that clause 2 provides a second amendment, as follows:

> This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of June, 1955.

Honourable senators, this is retroactive legislation, and I am sure everyone looks upon that type of legislation with a suspicious eye. However, in this case I think the amendment has to be retroactive.

In this respect it should be pointed out that the proposed amendment, when passed, will come into force on the 1st day of June, 1955, which is the day that the original act came into force, the reason being that assignments of inventions under the original act were made to Canadian Patents and Development Limited shortly after June 1, 1955; and, under this bill it is intended that all assignments in the past shall be ratified and in order, as well as all future assignments.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And payments shall be made too?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am coming to that.

Finally, it is intended that Canadian Patents and Development Limited should retain and use all moneys and securities it now has on hand for the purposes and benefits that I have outlined previously. In other words, they will be able to retain everything they have, and all the assignments which have been made subsequent to June 1, 1955 will be ratified.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would the honourable senator permit a further question? I notice under the statute the authority is given to the appropriate minister, being the minister who under the Financial Administration Act is the minister in charge of the department in which the inventor is working. So, the scheme of the statute as originally passed provided for a direct administration by the ministers of various departments; but it also provided for an agency to which the administration and control of the invention might be transferred.

I noticed the significant language that is used in that case, and I am wondering what authority there is for the legal opinion of the Auditor General that the money should go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I just wanted to refer my friend to the basis of this whole question. I notice by section 9(3) of the statute—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is the original act?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, as passed in 1953-54—this provision:

> Notwithstanding anything in its charter or act of incorporation, an agency to which the administration and control of any invention or patent is transferred under this section has the capacity and power to receive, hold, administer, control, develop and exploit the invention or patent—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have always been brought up with the idea that if you are given the authority to exploit an invention or a patent, it means exactly that you may negotiate for the use of and are entitled to receive the benefits.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am sure my honourable friend knows that I am not in a position to tell him on what authority the Auditor General has come to this conclusion. But if he so desires, I will be glad to have the Auditor General come before the committee, and we shall all learn on what authority he came to his opinion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Or he can send his lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: On that point—to go a little further—I wonder whether the honourable senator would be good enough to explain the meaning of the word "exploit" as used here.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I believe the word has been inserted as a "catch-all". Anything which is not covered by the previous words is supposed to be covered by the word "exploit".

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It has a well-defined meaning.

Hon. Mr. Wall: In view of the fact that the agency to which this amendment refers began its operations ostensibly with no funds at all, and now has funds, may I ask whether the purpose of this amendment is such that if, as could happen, this agency made a tremendous amount of money and some day had a large sum at its disposal, a change would be required in the act in order that money could go into the Consolidated fund?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is quite possible. It is not by any means a broken-down corporation. Its assets as of March 31, 1958, were $535,178. That is the total of its assets. As against this, of course, there are liabilities which, if honourable senators do not mind, I will put in round figures, as follows: accounts payable, $47,000; outstanding stock, $296,000; and there is a surplus of $191,023. However, it is only fair, I think, to point out that for the year ending March 31, 1957, this corporation reported a loss of $5,191, and that its loss in the year ending March 31, 1958 was $3,825. The company does not always make money, and I think it is only right and proper that it should have some substantial assets with which to pay losses.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I noticed that one of the items mentioned by the honourable senator was outstanding stock. That is the outstanding stock of this Crown agency?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, who bought it? The Crown, I would assume. That is where it got its money.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, put in a nutshell, the purpose of this legislation is to legalize a technical embezzlement by Canadian Patents and Development Limited. The purpose of that corporation was to look after patents from the National Research bureau and other patents referred to it by the deputy ministers concerned—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: By the ministers.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: —in some cases. There was a lengthly discussion as to whether Canadian Patents and Development Limited was the only agency that looked after patents for inventions made by civil servants, and one is not to be deceived by the title of the bill, which is "the Public Servants Invention Act". The public servants have nothing to do with it. A public servant invents something, and he has no right to it; it belongs to the Crown; and, according to the law in force at the present time, all the proceeds of such inventions or patents go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and the revenue from each agency goes to the same fund. At the present time an exception is made, upon the pretext that no money has been voted for Canadian Patents and Development Limited, and therefore, in order to subsist, it must have revenue derived from the inventions of public servants. That point was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he sponsored the bill, and the same statement has just been made by the honourable senator who sponsored the legislation in this chamber. There were numerous complaints about the drafting of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Is that the original bill?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The meaning of the bill is that the agencies—I use the plural intentionally, because there is not one agency—will have to make a deal with the Department of Finance in order to recover from the Consolidated Revenue Fund all the revenue which it has received from patents which have been "exploited"—to use the language of the bill. But in virtue of this legislation, the one that has been exploited is not at all the invention, it is the public servant, because he had no benefit whatever from his discovery or invention.

But there is more to be said. I referred to section 9, the first subsections of which appear in the explanatory notes and are the heart of the bill. It mentions what is done by a civil servant who makes an invention. By virtue of the act he has to report to his own deputy minister who decides—I am speaking of what happens outside the National Research Council—whether the invention shall be submitted to the Canadian Patents and Development Limited or to any other Government agency. There were complaints about the possible laziness of some deputy ministers—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would the honourable gentleman permit me to ask a question? Who made the complaints?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Those objections were made in the other house. I do not quote verbatim what was said there, but I can surely refer to it. There were no answers given to the questions, which were very appropriate and pertinent to this bill. For instance, it is well known that the patents in the hands of the various agencies of the Government are most valuable and some of them have been exploited and some others have not. It is impossible to discuss intelligently a bill like this unless one knows how many applications for pay have been sent, how many have been refused, what are the patents which are actually held by the Government, what is their value, what is their revenue, what is the amount of the royalties and what awards have been granted to civil servants.

Sometimes we see that a civil servant has made an invention which is most helpful to a department. He has been awarded $100. What is that compared to the value of the invention itself? If we are to discuss this bill there must be somebody in committee who will be in a position to answer those questions to the satisfaction of my honourable friend who has piloted the bill in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Brunt) as well as to the satisfaction of all our honourable colleagues. Now we are in a fog. This is a kind of legislation that is most unsatisfactory. In the other place, as the House of Commons is called, no answer was given by the minister and he promised to satisfy those who were asking most pertinent questions. There was no answer and apparently the bill has not been sent to a special committee there, but I hope that this bill will be sent to a committee here where we will have witnesses who will be in a position to reply to those questions, not only about Canadian Patents and Development Limited but also about the agencies that are in possession of those patents which are common property and which are national property.

Subsection (1) of section 9 of the present act reads as follows:

> The administration and control of any invention vested in Her Majesty by this act and any patent issued with respect thereto are vested in the appropriate minister, and the appropriate minister may transfer such administration and control to any other minister or to any corporate agency of Her Majesty.

Subsection (2) reads:

> The appropriate minister or other minister or agency referred to in subsection (1) may develop and exploit any invention under the administration and control of such minister or agency, as the case may be, and may on behalf of Her Majesty enter into any agreement with any person for such purpose.

I wonder how many inventions have been exploited by any department? What are they and what has been the success or failure of the administration in each case? This is important to know.

Subsection (3) is as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in its charter or act of incorporation, an agency to which the administration and control of any invention or patent is transferred under this section has the capacity and power to receive, hold, administer, control, develop and exploit—

Again we have the word "exploit".

> —the invention or patent and generally to carry out the provisions of this Act with respect thereto.

The fourth subsection, which is provided in the present bill, reads:

> (4) Where pursuant to this section the administration and control of any invention or patent has been transferred to a corporate agency—

It says "a corporate agency", not "the corporate agency".

> —of Her Majesty, any money received by the corporate agency in the course of the administration and control of the invention or patent may be retained by that corporate agency, and shall be used for the purposes of this act and the objects and purposes for which the agency was established.

This is the full section 9, but there is more to the bill.

Section 2 of the bill says:

> This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of June, 1955.

That means that the money which has been paid for royalties to the Consolidated Revenue Fund shall be given back to the Crown agencies. There is no other possible way of interpreting section 2. My honourable friend shakes his head negatively, but I repeat that is the only possible interpretation of this piece of legislation. If it is not, why does the bill have a retroactive clause? If the honourable senator wants to answer, he may do so.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I can assure the honourable senator that when the bill goes before a committee I will do my utmost to see that the appropriate civil servants are there to answer his question. I would like to point out to him, however,—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask if the honourable gentleman is closing the debate?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No, he is answering a question of mine to give me information, and then I will proceed. Otherwise I would not have paused. It was just a matter of courtesy.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: On the other point, I would like to say that the Crown corporation known as Canadian Patents and Development Limited does not have to get this money from anybody; it already has the money, and, wants to regularize and legalize its rights to retain it.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: That is a confirmation of what I said. It is a technical amendment, because the money was supposed to go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and the corporation has had it. It is precisely to correct that situation that this legislation is brought in.

May I ask the honourable gentleman, if this bill is sent to a committee tomorrow, will it be the Banking and Commerce committee?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I think that would be the appropriate committee to refer the bill to.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I would like to have the information that I have mentioned about the patents that are in the hands not only of Canadian Patents and Development Limited, but about the patents that are in the hands of the agencies of the government—for this very reason, that some of them may have been disposed of and the rights transferred to some other corporation, and the royalties are paid to the Crown, but some other patents are left there that are very valuable. Moreover, if some patents have been transferred to some countries in Europe and Asia it would have meant more for them than the moneys or goods that they have received. Also, I would like to know what amounts have been paid as awards to civil servants who have made inventions. I hope all that information will be given tomorrow, and that we shall have satisfactory witnesses before the committee.

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, I want to add a few words in the form of questions. I am wondering if this practice of a corporate body having the right and the benefit of an invention also applies to departments of the Government. I understand that large companies reward an employee who invents something of value to the business, and I wonder if that should not be the case when a civil servant invents something useful to the Government. Secondly, I would like to know if the salary of a civil servant is increased if he submits a new idea or invention that is proved to be of use, such as certain machinery, or anything of that kind, and also whether such an employee is given the time and means necessary to enable him to perfect and put his new idea or invention into a proper form to be useful. I understand that large companies, like the automobile companies in Michigan, Ontario, and elsewhere, give employes time off and all the tools necessary to perfect new ideas or inventions, and that compensation is paid in money when the company derives benefit from an invention. I would very much like to know if the departments of Government offer similar privileges to employees. Perhaps I could have this answered by an official, if this bill goes to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: If no other senator wishes to speak, I will close the debate. First, however, may I point out the senator who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) that it is the custom and practice, not only in Government departments and Crown corporations, but also in private industries, that where a person is employed and creates an invention on the time of his employer, the invention belongs to the employer. That is a well-recognized principle.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is the law.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, of course it is.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Such an employee gets fairly high awards.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am coming to that. It is also recognized that private industry pays extra sums of money to people who create useful inventions. I refer honourable senators once again to section 11, subsection (1) of the regulations passed pursuant to the Public Servants Invention Act, in which are set out the awards that can be made to civil servants. I am not going to read all of them, but they start as low as $1,500 and go as high as $6,700, plus two per cent on any amount that is realized in excess of $80,000 for a patent. So under the regulations there is provision for treating civil servants in exactly the same manner that employees are treated in industry.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

SECOND READING

The senate resumed from Thursday, March 12, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mr. Brunt, for the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Hon. Harold Connolly: Honourable senators, you see before you a humble though unrepentant, if somewhat overwhelmed, citizen of the Atlantic region—humble, because all citizens from that part of Canada are humble; unrepentant, because possibly there flows in my veins the blood of Irish forebears who died on the gallows rather than submit to the yoke of the tyrant; and somewhat overwhelmed, of course, because of the suggestion made in this chamber on Thursday last by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) when he proposed to the Government that they should make a very special concession to the Atlantic provinces in the matter of the Trans-Canada Highway.

With your permission I would like to repeat the suggestion which was offered on that afternoon. The honourable leader said this:

> Now, honourable senators, I have a suggestion to make to the Leader of the Government. Although this suggestion was made at the last National Liberal Convention, I am sure the Government won't condemn it right off. The Government, I hope, will accept good suggestions no matter from where they come. At that convention it was suggested that the federal Government should undertake to pay 90 per cent of the total cost of the building of the Trans-Canada Highway in the Maritime provinces. If that were done it would provide a kind of equalization of the cost of transportation facilities in the four Atlantic provinces compared to what has been done in the other provinces. I make this suggestion very seriously to the Government, and I am sure that people in all parts of Canada would agree that it would be a very fair thing to do.

I want to extend my personal thanks, and the thanks of all those people I speak for in the Atlantic provinces, to the honourable Leader of the Opposition for what he has suggested, because the economic fact is, as I endeavoured to point out a few days ago, that in that underprivileged section of Canada it is almost a complete impossibility to take on any greater capital expenditures than now confront those provinces. And while I do not for one split second agree that subventions or a little extra financial aid will cure the economic conditions of that section of Canada, I must confess that they are of some help. I think of them in terms of aspirin tablets that relieve while they do not cure. But because our position is desperate we do require whatever assistance can be given by the rest of the people of Canada.

Now to illustrate what I say, may I just give some figures. They are not my own but are the work of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and I accept them at their face value.

For example, in January, in the province of Nova Scotia, 42,500 people were applicants for unemployment insurance. I remind you that the population of that province is approximately only 700,000, and that figure of 42,500 is more than 5 per cent of the total population of the province—not the working population, but the total population of the province. And exactly the same situation prevails in the next largest Atlantic province, New Brunswick, where in January 40,500 people were unemployed. I mention these figures because surely they are evidence of this fact, so well understood by the Leader of the Opposition, in the Chamber, that extra financial aid is necessary in the Atlantic region if the economy is even to maintain its present momentum.

Let me give you one other set of statistics: I have before me the financial report of the Province of Nova Scotia for the year ending March 31, 1958. Now, honourable senators, the total revenues of that province in 1958 amounted, in round figures, to $66,757,000. How were they made up? From three principal sources of revenue, the largest being the sum of $28,784,000, in round figures, which came to the province from the federal treasury as the result of the dominion-provincial tax agreement. The next largest was the approximate sum of $19 million, from motor vehicle and gasoline revenues. The third item, an amount in excess of $11 million, was profit from the sale of liquor. In other words, from those three sources of revenue the province received more than 88 per cent of its total revenue. Could anything, I ask you, indicate more clearly the plight in which that province finds itself than those figures which, I remind you, are not my figures but are the figures of the auditor of that province, accredited by independent auditors who annually make an audit of the accounts of the province.

What I said about Nova Scotia applies with equal force to New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. If, therefore, I appear to lay undue emphasis upon the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate that the Government of Canada take on an extra liability in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway, perhaps you will not think me remiss.

I listened the other day when the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) referred with some pride—and, I say, understandable pride—to the fact that Saskatchewan had completed its portion of the Trans-Canada Highway. Now, I do not wish to make any reflection, but I merely point out this fact, that the little province of Nova Scotia had almost completed its vast network of highways; then, because of its desire to acquiesce with the dominion in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway, it involved itself in further expenditures. As a matter of simple fact, we had to spend originally 50 per cent of the cost to extend the roads already built so as to have them conform with Trans-Canada Highway standards. In the province of Saskatchewan the network never did begin to compare with the highway system of Nova Scotia, and the benefits from Trans-Canada Highway expeditures in favour of the province of Saskatchewan as compared with those in favour of Nova Scotia, were such as to defy comparison.

This chamber has always been tolerant with its members who want to divert slightly from the matter at issue. So, I ask for the tolerance of the chamber tonight, to permit me to do that very thing. For example, I want to talk very briefly about the St. Lawrence Seaway. Originally I thought I might try to argue the right to do so on the thesis that the St. Lawrence Seaway is in effect a trans-continental highway of a sort. But I was afraid I would be trespassing on the credulity of members of this chamber, and I thought I would prefer to trade on their magnanimity.

I am a little surprised, honourable senators, to note that some of the western members of this chamber—having regard to the $335 million already spent on the St. Lawrence Seaway, and to the $30 million being spent to deepen the Welland Canal—have not advanced the hope that another canal should be built commencing at the head of the lakes and running across the Prairies, through and over the Rockies into the port of Vancouver. After all, we are passing dollars around as if they were so much confetti at a wedding. If we had this extended canal from the head of the lakes westward we would have what the writers have described so eloquently on many occasions as the "Prairie Schooner" operating in fact.

However, I do not propose to labour that point. I am an easterner and am not supposed to know too much about the problems of the west. But I do want to say that in late years, and in quite recent times, we have heard much talk about a Bill of Rights. Honourable senators, will you permit me to enunciate my own personal bill of rights in the political sense?

I am a Liberal; I was born into a Liberal family, and it is quite unlikely that I will be ever anything but a liberal.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: There is plently of time to repent.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): You will forgive the licence I take, this being the eve of St. Patrick's Day, but because I subscribe to the philosophy of Liberalism I have never been convinced that there is an aura of infallibility attaching itself to the action of every Liberal Government, any more than I believe a similar aura of infallibility attaches itself to any other Government.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think you are off the highway.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): If I were compelled to make a choice, I would have to say that certainly the tinge of infallibility attaches itself more closely to the former than to the latter. But I shall not say that; I merely throw it out as sort of inherent thinking. What I really want to say is that I do not believe there is any perfection in any human society or organization, and I reserve unto myself the right to present in this or any other public assembly such views as I may have on any public action, no matter from what source that action emanates, and I shall continue to persevere in that right no matter what may be the opinion of those who surround me.

Having said that, may I say another word about the St. Lawrence Seaway? I do not think for one split second that I influenced many votes in the things that I had to say a week ago about the St. Lawrence Seaway bill. The mere fact that the bill went through in its entirety without the change of even a single preposition would delude me of any possible vanity I might have. But I did notice this—and I say it with all respect—that the senators from Quebec, although they were most gracious in their compliments, were not disturbed to the point where they were prevailed upon to vote against the seaway bill. It was perhaps a common sense opinion that they should say to themselves, "No doubt this is already a fait accompli, so why should we waste our time voting against it?"

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: The seaway will allow us to have distinguished visitors too.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): I accept that.

I read in a recent issue of the Montreal Gazette that the Port Council of Montreal held a meeting. That great newspaper deemed the meeting to be so important that it gave its report on it front page prominence. The heading stated:

New rate may hit harbour.

The report, which is more than a half column long, deals first with rank discrimination against the city in a new ocean rate tariff that prefers Toronto. It goes on to say:

The move, said the council, may eventually mean the loss of all United Kingdom through freight destined for Toronto and Hamilton, "that Montreal has enjoyed for the last 50 years or so".

So when I talk about the menace of the St. Lawrence Seaway to the eastern section of Canada, I am not parochial in the sense that I refer only to the Atlantic provinces, because obviously people who know the port business in Montreal are similarly concerned.

In that connection I have a proposal to make. This is nothing about discriminatory freight rates; in so far as the Maritimes are concerned, it is an old story.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I think the honourable senator should confine himself to the bill before the house dealing with the Trans-Canada Highway, and not discuss the seaway.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): I will get back to the highway. I consider the St. Lawrence Seaway, if I may, to be a highway of sorts; althought it is not a highway on which automobile traffic flows, it certainly is a highway that will absorb ocean-going traffic and bring it into the heart of this country. I would ask honourable senators to bear with me in the premise I have submitted; however, I will cut short what I have to say.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The shipping may compete with the trucking.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): I believe there is a very real prospect that eventually Toronto will be the major port in Canada, the major terminus of that highway, the St. Lawrence Seaway. Now, if that is to be so, I want to make this proposal to the Senate and to the Government.

There is in being in this country a Government board known as the National Harbours Board. All the ports of eastern Canada are under the jurisdiction of this board, but not the port of Toronto. The ports under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board are unable to compete with one another, but the port of Toronto is left in a position where it can move when and as it likes in competition with all these other ports which are strangulated by the National Harbours Board Act. Now, if the National Harbours Board is a good thing, then I submit all the ports of Canada should be under its administration. If it is not a good thing, then I suggest that all the ports should be free, and the National Harbours Board should be disbanded.

Two further proposals, and I will have finished with the subject, after having thanked the chamber for its courtesy and magnanimity in allowing me to stray.

If the Government of the day, unlike, let me say, the Governments which preceded it, is willing and anxious to give autonomy to the Atlantic region of this country, and is willing to give that region an opportunity to improve its own economy, I make this suggestion. Let the Government of the day, as a Government of vision, release us from the tyranny of the Canadian fiscal policy by setting up a free-trade zone within the Atlantic region which will enable us at least to buy from people who will sell to us more cheaply, and so leave us more money for other purposes. Or, if that suggestion is not acceptable because, some will say, it is impracticable, may I argue that it is no more impracticable than so to arrange the tariffs of this country that two provinces benefit and eight suffer. My final proposal, and the last word I have to say, is that if these proposals are not acceptable, the Government of Canada should create an industrial fund of $100 million, to be administered by a federally-appointed board, sitting permanently at a central spot in the Atlantic region, whose duty it will be to utilize those moneys for the investigation and development of mercantile and manufacturing industry, so that we may have the opportunity to at least approach the present standards of the rest of the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INFLATION

MOTION TO INSTRUCT FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I intend to speak for a few minutes and to then adjourn the debate. I assume that at this hour of the evening it is about time to adjourn, anyway, and there will be lots of time tomorrow.

Hon. Ross Macdonald: May I make a suggestion? If the honourable senator does not intend to speak now, the honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) is ready to continue the debate this evening, and the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) can speak at a later sitting.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In that event, I should like to speak early at tomorrow's sitting. I thought this order would be the first on today's Order Paper, but apparently somebody shuffles the items around. When we adjourned it was understood that this would be the first subject to be dealt with. Tonight we found two items ahead of it and it has taken some time to deal with them. The situation is a little disappointing when one is prepared to speak on the subject. However, under the rules the leader can change the order of the items if he chooses to.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I moved at the last sitting that the two bills we have dealt with should have priority.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I will say quite candidly that I did not understand that these bills would have precedence over the present order. I was not here when the honourable leader made the motion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure that, if the honourable Leader of the Government would consent, the house would approve that the present item be placed first on the Order Paper for tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Somebody might object then to my speaking first.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We could agree that, if the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg does not speak now, this item will be the first on the Order Paper tomorrow, under his name.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think that will be acceptable to all honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, tonight I shall speak in French and English, beginning in French.

(Translation):

Inflation is an insidious disease which develops somewhat like cancer: at first it causes no pain, but by the time it does, it has become incurable.

Several senators have discussed this subject and given striking examples of inflation. But we must try to find a solution for this problem. It is certainly not by blaming the causes of inflation on others that we will apply the necessary remedies. The disease of inflation is all the more dangerous because it attacks the people when it develops and because the people are annoyed when remedial measures are taken to reduce the disease or prevent it from making any headway. We found that out at the time of the last election. The disease is still with us, it has become more acute, and it is high time to take action unless we want to be faced with the kind of disaster we had in 1929.

In 1929, everything was going along beautifully: everybody was playing the market, stocks were going up and we all hoped to get rich quick. But the bubble burst and there was a general collapse. Today, all those who are associated with high finance or the different insurance companies, experienced economists whether they are called Cameron or Hutchison, or by any other name, even our economists in the house, are giving warning and telling us how worried they are, and that is exactly what happened in 1929.

I remember that in June 1929 I had gone to New York on business, to finance the sale of our maple products. It was then that I met an official of the Chase National Bank. After having settled my own affairs, I asked him: "You who are a great financier, are you not worried about present conditions? What makes me uneasy is that in our Quebec caisses populaires there seems to be something unusual. I can't put my finger on it, but our people seem restless and are beginning to take out their deposits. How about your people?" And this expert replied: "In my opinion we are suffering from extraordinary inflation; in a short while we will be in the midst of a terrible depression and I am advising our people to stop speculating."

Back in Quebec, a man came to ask my advice about a financial scheme. I repeated to him the words of this expert and advised him to wait a year before launching into such a business, in the hope that things might have cleared by then. He followed my advice. And the depression came with all its dire results and consequences.

We must endeavour by all the means at our disposal to prevent such a calamity. The people who have it in for us, beyond the iron curtain, are counting on this economic crisis. They are saying to one another that there is no need to use shells or atomic bombs because the depression will do the work for them. Let us be more vigilant, in order to foresee and prevent such a crisis.

Someone said to me last week: you are talking about inflation but it seems to me that we are better off with inflation than deflation. I replied by finding fault with his argument: "If you are bitten by a dog, does it really matter if it was a male or a female dog?" That is no way to reason. We must try to find a way of avoiding both extremes, in order to arrive at an economic, reasonable way of life and to ensure prosperity and well being.

It was the president of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. G. R. Ball, who said in his year-end report: "Inflation is everybody's business", which made me write in an article: "It is everybody's business; therefore it is nobody's business, for when a problem is everyone's concern you rarely find anyone who will attempt to correct what is wrong because everyone is always counting on the other fellow." In such a case, there is only one solution left. The state must take over the problem and apply the necessary remedies. That is unpleasant, especially under a democracy, because the people have no use for remedies requiring any sacrifices or any discipline.

In England the Government had enough courage to take strong measures even though they caused discontent among the citizens. What will happen at the next elections in England? Whatever happens, one thing is certain: England is recovering, its finances are sounder and she can look to the future with more confidence than a few years ago.

France is faced with the same dilemma, and the French Government is presently taking strong measures. In some places it is hurting badly. But even so, I think these measures will continue to be applied. We have cause to rejoice and be confident because according to a report received last week French economy is recovering and on the way to stability.

Inflation is a generalized ailment which affects the whole nation because inflation depreciates our currency, undermines its value, reduces the purchasing power of the consumer and, at the same time, discourages and hampers saving. When a country stops saving, nothing can survive for very long because it is savings that make up capital and allow the industry and economy of a nation to develop. When people lose confidence in their currency they lose confidence in savings and the next step is disaster.

It is useless to say now: let us prevent inflation. We are in the midst of inflation. But we must prevent it from running away and at the same time try to reduce it. A few weeks ago the railway freight rates increased by 17 per cent. The whole country was affected. The price of every possible kind of goods immediately went up. Let us take, for instance, the case of the eastern farmers in the Maritime provinces, where the railway boost represents an increase of $2 a ton on shipments of wheat. That means that beef, pork, eggs, etc., will sell for more. In other words, this is a first step toward an increased cost of living. The railways have asked for another increase in rates. They alleged increased wages. It is a vicious circle. The workers want more money because the cost of living has increased and, as the salaries increase, the price of goods increases. There is no end to it and our currency loses its value because higher prices have left our production unchanged. Goods sell for more but are not manufactured in greater quantities.

Inflation is harmful for Canada because we are an exporting country, especially of raw material. The price we ask for goods will be so high, compared with the price of the same goods in other countries, that we will no longer be able to export them. We have the figures to support this argument. These last few months we have seen our exports decreasing. If it goes on it will be very serious. We will have to meet increasing competition from Russia, China and other countries behind the iron curtain and even elsewhere—from Japan, for instance, where the people work ten hours a day at much lower salaries than here.

Here is a table based on various statistical documents published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and compiled by our statistician, Mr. Charron. These figures, which I will not inflict upon you but which I would like to see published, deal with national production, personal income, personal savings, consumers' indebtedness and the price index in Canada. They are arranged in such a way as to facilitate an analysis of Canada's economic position over the last twenty years.

Year	Population	National product (estimated at market price)	Available personal revenue	Personal savings	Consumers' price index	Consumers' indebtedness

I said that inflation devalues the dollar. Here are some figures prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board which show the extent to which the workers' salaries should have gone up (after deduction of taxes) in the last twenty years to offset the loss of purchasing power resulting from price increases:

Income, 1939	Income, 1958 for equal purchasing power
$ 3,000	$ 6,457
5,000	11,140
10,000	23,568
25,000	69,991

The above figures show that those who, in 1939, were receiving $3,000 (after deduction of taxes) were just as well off as they would be today with an available personal income of $6,457. However, the average worker's salary is far from reaching $6,457. It is a well-known fact that the average worker's salary ranges from $70 to $72 per week, or $3,640 to $3,744 per year.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Will the honourable senator allow me a question? Do rising salaries increase production?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: No, that is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. Monette: It is uncontrolled inflation.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Quite right. It is necessary to impress upon the people that each and everyone is directly concerned and threatened, and that each must man his own defences.

(Text):

We have voted an amount of $250 million at the disposal of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Owing to inflation, this $250 million is worth only $225 million now, compared with two years ago. In our province we have endeavoured to ward off this inflationary trend to a certain extent by organizing housing co-operatives. For instance, at Lévis, a house which two years ago cost $10,900 to build would cost today $13,000 with the same materials. The price of the land is still the same as two years ago, and the rate of interest has increased by only one-half of one per cent, which amounts to $5 on a $1,000 loan. But wages and costs of building materials have increased, while, on the other hand, the number of working hours has decreased. Once more, we are experiencing a vicious circle. Those who have set aside $2,000 to build a house in the spring can no longer do so, because their savings have decreased owing to the rise in prices. Some housing co-operatives have endeavoured to get around this difficulty by asking everyone to supply some working hours to compensate for this loss. For instance, in a certain co-operative, a person who intends to build a house must furnish 500 working hours; in another, 800 hours. Because of co-operation, which permits the building of several houses at the same time, costs can be reduced by digging several cellars at once with the same machinery, which does not have to be moved to the spot every time it is required for excavation purposes. Windows and doors are mass-produced. The houses, however, are not uniform: changes are effected in the lay-out of openings, partitions, and so on. The members of the co-operative supply labour; some assist bricklayers, others mix cement, etc. They learn to perform work they have never done before, they realize the value of thrift, they learn how to solve their problems. Those who have helped to build their own houses take great care of them; they like them all the more on account of the personal work they have put into them.

Such a system exists in Quebec, in the Maritimes and in a few other provinces. However, it can not be applied everywhere, because in some districts the required capital is not available. In Quebec this capital is made available through our caisses populaires, thus proving the importance and beneficence of this co-operative movement. I beg the Government to protect these savings organizations. To use the picturesque words of one of my friends, since the caisses populaires were created, 58 years ago, they have brought up chickens, which have become hens and laid eggs. The financial institutions which envy us do not do the same. That is one way of reducing or overcoming inflation.

Inflation does not consist merely in the ever-increasing cost of goods and services; it also stems from the fact that everyone wishes to accumulate the greatest possible volume of profits. Funds which are already invested in safe securities bearing a reasonable interest are used for speculative purposes. Would it not be desirable to set a ceiling on such speculation, particularly on excessive increase of profits? It seems reasonable that an interest rate of 6 to 8 per cent be paid on capital invested in any enterprise. But some seek profits ranging between 20 and 25 per cent. In my opinion, all this seems to be inflation.

It may be a delicate matter to cite an example taken from a neighbour, but I may be allowed to mention what happened some time ago when several billion dollars' worth of bonds matured in the United States. The bonds were renewed because the Government of that country did not have the money to redeem them. The holders of those securities were asked to exchange them for new bonds, with different dates of maturity and bearing a higher rate of interest. Do you know that more than two billion dollars worth of such bonds were not exchanged, because the holders thereof requested to be paid in cash? Will this money be invested in speculative securities? I do not know.

I would point out also that people whose only income is a pension are experiencing hardships due to inflation. The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) gave an instance of what is happening in France. In Canada, for the people who bought insurance policies some 20 or 25 years ago, in order that they might retire now at the age of 65, with a monthly income of, let us say, $100, what is the $100 worth today? People who buy these insurance policies will tend to lose faith in them, because the real value of their pension will greatly decrease if the value of our money continues to be destroyed through inflation. That is why, in a recent speech, the president of a large life insurance firm expressed his fears and appealed to the good will of governments and citizens alike to check inflation. One cannot normally live above his means. He who spends more than he earns will be bankrupt some day or other. There is no alternative. Only some spectulators can benefit from inflation, which is a source of injustice, since it is detrimental to those who lead a moderate and industrious life and save for the future.

It is hard to apply the necessary remedial measures, particularly in a democratic country, but if the nation is to be saved such measures must be applied. The examples I have just cited are based on facts, and those who remember the 1929 crisis know what will happen if we do not control inflation.

A few weeks ago I read a study on inflation and devaluation written by an economist shortly after the Civil War, when the cost of living was very high in the United States. He wrote:

> Before the war one left with money in his pockets and returned home with a large basket full of supplies.
> Today, one leaves with a large basket full of money and returns with supplies in his pockets.

The same thing will happen here if we do not solve this problem.

That is why I am convinced that not only will the proposed study of inflation by the Senate Standing Committee on Finance be useful but that it is necessary and indispensable if we wish to find a solution to this problem. The committee will not conduct its inquiry in a partisan way; it will endeavour to assist the Government in bringing about measures to check inflation.

A few months ago William McC. Martin, Jr., Chairman of the Board of Governors of the United States Federal Reserve System, stated in an address delivered at Chicago that the fight against inflation has now reached a crucial stage, that a set-back in the American economy would also have serious consequences on the whole economy of the free world, and that the Federal Reserve System would spare no efforts to safeguard the value of the American currency.

Several of our colleagues say that the proposed study of inflation would not have any effective results, but that it would probably create difficulties, a psychosis of the fear of inflation. It reminds me of the argument about sick people: we cannot tell them they are sick because if we do so it will cause them to seek medical care, and they will be frightened to such an extent that it would be preferable for them to die. Such an argument does not convince me. I always believed that we must inform sick people of their state of health; we must tell them that they can be cured on condition they have medical care, otherwise their condition will become worse and worse.

But responsibility for inflation must not be imputed to one factor only. For example, when we are told that an increase in wages does not contribute to an increase of prices, I cannot understand that argument. Statistics published for the last ten years show that the wages of workmen have increased in a greater proportion than the returns on corporation bonds.

There is now a tendency to automation in order to reduce labour costs and at the same time obtain with machinery faster production than by labour, and arrive finally at a lower cost of production.

In the latest report of the Bank of Canada Mr. Coyne said that it was not necessary to have inflation to increase employment; on the contrary, inflation, he said, causes more unemployment. He added that it is certainly possible to find means to assure a sound economic expansion and to guard against depreciation of the dollar.

In the same report it is said that in Canada personal savings deposits in the chartered banks increased, in 1958, by $736 million to an unprecedented summit of $6,844 million. It is to be pointed out that in spite of this increase of personal savings deposits in the banks, loans to corporations have been reduced by hundreds of millions dollars.

These are abnormal conditions that need to be corrected. In studying the problems it will be possible to arrive at a solution of same.

I would like to quote here what President Eisenhower said, two weeks ago, in a speech to the United States Savings Bond Conference:

> Inflation weakens the economy. It brings serious hardships to those of our citizens who are living on pensions or other fixed incomes, and works against those who are unable to bargain effectively for higher wages. Most dangerous of all, inflation weakens the incentive to save. It gives rise to a fear that the dollar will continue to decline in value and that speculation will be the only way to keep ahead of the game.

Commenting on these remarks, Mr. David Lawrence, an eminent American journalist, said:

> What is the answer? It is to be found in one word, self-restraint. Business must restrain itself on prices. Labor must restrain itself on wages. The spenders in Congress must restrain themselves on appropriations for "social welfare". Steady growth and a stable dollar are certain to result from such restraint. But what must be borne in mind above all else is that profits derived from private business are necessary to support the Government. We must never "kill the goose that lays the golden egg!"

(Translation):

It is the grave problem with which we are faced today. Let us protect our dollar, for communist countries would be too happy if they saw our currency lose all its purchasing power, which would bring on an acute economic crisis and would paralyze things generally. The very future of our nation depends on the solution to this problem. Let us rise above petty politics, in order to protect our people; let us forget our own interests for the well-being of the country at large.

DEATH OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have a very sad announcement to make. We have just learned of the sudden death of a very prominent minister in the other house, the Honourable Sidney Earle Smith, Secretary of State for External Affairs. I understand that that house has adjourned until tomorrow; and with the consent of the Senate I would move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), that the Senate also do adjourn until tomorrow.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all deeply shocked, as the people of Canada will be, by the sudden passing of the Honourable Sidney Earle Smith, Secretary of State for External Affairs. During the short time that he was in Parliament he had a very strenuous time. He served his country well, and we all regret that it was not possible for him to give longer service. The Honourable Sidney Smith had been President of the University of Toronto, and those of us who graduated from that university probably feel his loss more keenly than do those who come from other parts of Canada. I quite agree with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that we cannot do less by way of tribute to the memory of the late minister than to adjourn our deliberations until tomorrow.

On the motion to adjourn:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we adjourn may I suggest we stand for 30 seconds in silent prayer for the soul of the Honourable Sidney Smith.

Honourable senators thereupon rose and stood in silence.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

R.C.M.P. DOCUMENTS REQUESTED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, at Monday's sitting I asked the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if he would be kind enough to table copies of correspondence between the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Minister of Justice, and also a copy of the Newfoundland-Canada police contract. Has the honourable leader been able to get those documents yet?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, just before I came into the chamber I received a large envelope. I understand, though I did not have time to examine the contents, that it contains the correspondence the honourable Leader of the Opposition has mentioned. The contracts have not been made available to me yet, but I have an assurance that they will be just as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (C-26) intituled: "An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of March 9, 1959, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1: after line 14 insert the following:
"(4) Writs for the election of elected members of the Council shall be issued on the instructions of the Commissioner."

2. Page 2: strike out lines 3 to 7 both inclusive and substitute the following therefor:

"42. (1) No intoxicant shall be manufactured, compounded or made in the Territories except by permission of the Commissioner, and no intoxicant shall be imported or brought into the Territories from any place outside the Territories, whether it is in Canada or elsewhere, except by permission of the Commissioner or a person authorized by him."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave of the Senate, I move that they be concurred in now. It might be appropriate to say a word of explanation.

As to the first amendment, perhaps honourable senators will recall that when the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) was explaining the measure here a question was raised as to whether there was a legal connection between the provisions of the Northwest Territories Act and the Canada Elections Act. The committee considered that problem. It felt there was a gap in the law in that there was no statutory provision for the calling of a by-election. After consulting with the law officers of the Crown and hearing the minister—who, I may add, had the same misgivings about it when the legislation was placed before him prior to its being introduced in Parliament—the committee made this amendment No. 1. I think I can say it was the unanimous view of the committee that the amendment should be made. I should also mention that the committee appointed a special subcommittee to study the matter, and the subcommittee recommended the amendment.

The second amendment to the bill deals with importation of alcoholic beverages into the Territories. As originally drafted, the intention of the amendment was to provide that a person authorized by the Commissioner, as well as the Commissioner himself, could grant permission for importation of liquor into the Territories. It was felt that it should not be necessary to apply to the Commissioner each time it was desired to import even one bottle of liquor. That seemed to be a sensible proposal, in view of the fact that presumably some of the people going into the Territories would require this kind of stimulant. However, the amendment as drafted provided that the person so authorized by the Commissioner would also be in a position to authorize the manufacturing or compounding of alcoholic beverages within the Territories. This was not the intention of the amendment, of the department or minister. Therefore, the section was redrafted to make that clear.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would move that these amendments be concurred in now. If that is agreeable, the bill might well be given the royal assent before the Easter recess.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In view of the fact that these amendments will have to be considered in the other house, I would move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

How many grades, classes, or classifications of salaries were there in the Civil Service of Canada each year from 1908 to 1918 inclusive?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the following answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry has been received from the Civil Service Commission:

Prior to 1918, no document existed which was comparable to the Directory of Classification now maintained by the Civil Service Commission. There is, therefore, no official list of classes available for the years 1908 to 1918.

While the Civil Service Act at that time provided for the classification of the Inside and Outside Services into broad categories with respect to responsibilities and salaries, a great many class titles were in use throughout the service. Some indication of the large number and variety of titles may be obtained by an examination of the "Civil Service List of Employees" published annually from 1908 to 1918. These lists may be obtained in the Parliamentary Library in the Sessional Papers.

PORTRAITS OF PRIME MINISTERS —COMMONS COLLECTION

NOTICE OF INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the notice of inquiry by Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

Referring to the collection of paintings of former Prime Ministers of Canada since Confederation, which is in the House of Commons,

1. Is it complete?
2. If not, who is missing?

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, with leave, I will withdraw this inquiry. It has been answered personally.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

DEBATE POSTPONED

On the notice by Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West):

That he will draw to the attention of the Senate the importance of the European Economic Community, known as the Common Market, to the export trade of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would ask whether the house would be agreable to allowing this order to stand until later this day.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

CANADA COUNCIL

REPORT REFERRED TO FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved, pursuant to notice:

That the report of the Canada Council for the year ended March 31, 1958, laid before the house on July 15, 1958, and the Auditor General's Report of the Balance Sheet for the Canada Council, as at March 31, 1958, laid before the house on August 20, 1958, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, in order to provide a review thereof pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to give a brief explanation of this motion. Section 22 of the Canada Council Act, chapter 3 of the statutes of 1956-57, has to do with the auditing of the accounts and financial transactions of the Council. The section reads:

The accounts and financial transactions of the council shall be audited annually by the Auditor General, and a report of the audit shall be made to the council and to the member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada designated under section 23.

Section 23 requires that an annual report on the activities of the Council be made to Parliament, which includes this chamber, of course. Section 23 reads:

The chairman of the council shall, within three months after the termination of each fiscal year, submit to the member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada designated by the Governor in Council for the purpose a report of all proceedings under this act for that fiscal year, including the financial statements of the council, and the Auditor General's report thereon, and the member so designated shall cause such reports to be laid before Parliament within fifteen days after the receipt thereof or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting and provision shall be made for a review thereof by Parliament.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the motion is that the reports which have been submitted to us in compliance with this section shall be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, money bills which come to this house from the other place are referred to the Banking and Commerce committee. However, this is a report, not a piece of legislation, and I think it would be appropriate to refer it to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF STATE FUNERAL

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to make an important announcement. I have just received information, which I had been trying to obtain all day, with respect to the funeral of the late Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Sidney Earle Smith. As honourable senators are aware, yesterday the Senate adjourned until today. We paid a brief tribute to his memory by so doing, and by some remarks that were made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and by myself. There will be a state funeral at 4 p.m. tomorrow in Chalmers United church. I hope that as many honourable senators as possible will attend.

A question now arises as to the advisability of this house sitting tomorrow afternoon. In view of the fact that the other house will adjourn until 8 o'clock tomorrow evening, I will move later on, or now if it is agreeable to honourable senators, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until 8 o'clock tomorrow evening.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I second the motion.

Motion agreed to.

INFLATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FINANCE COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be instructed to study the threat of inflation in Canada;

That the committee have the authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I hope I shall not delay the house too long. This motion has been on the Order Paper for some time. I am partly to blame, because a short time ago I adjourned the debate and was not quite well enough to speak when the order to resume the debate was called. Other delays occurred as well.

I do not intend to take up any great time of the house in discussing this issue, but there are a few remarks I wish to make.

First, I am sorry that the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) is not present, as I should have liked to settle with him the question of the cost of living, the details on which I have before me now. However, I will put them on record.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I say that the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has a very heavy cold. That is the only reason why he is not here.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I presumed so. I am not a bit uneasy because he is away. I am sure that he likes to be present at all sittings, and that he enjoys a fight as much as anybody I know.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Like yourself.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am genuinely sorry that he is not here. I think we have known each other longer than any other two senators have known each other. In fact, I cannot remember when I didn't know him, nor can I remember when he didn't know me.

Honourable members, I want to say that I think it was a mistake—and I say this with all respect to the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall)—to have a motion of this kind debated in the house, since he is himself a member of the Finance Committee. In the past the practice has always been that when such matters come up by way of motion before the committee, if any member wants any matter discussed the request has never been turned down; at least, though I have attended practically all sittings of the committee, I have yet to see such a request turned down. However, I recall that a year or two year ago, when the National Housing Bill came to this house, the honourable Leader of the Government of that day agreed that all questions regarding the bill should go to committee, but a special resolution was not made referring it to committee.

Members of this house will remember that some years ago we were puzzled as to how to deal with the estimates which came from the House of Commons, usually so late in the session that we had not time to study them item by item, and therefore were not in a position to give them adequate attention. I believe it was the late Senator King, from Vancouver, who, when he was Leader of the Government in the Senate first proposed the idea of referring the estimates to the Standing Committee on Finance. The idea was adopted unanimously and has been carried out ever since. The honourable senator from Churchill was chairman of the committee for several years, and the committee did a great work. He was succeeded by the late Senator Hawkins, under whose chairmanship the committee studied the whole question of housing and made an outstanding contribution, not only to this house but to the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, I cannot understand why the question of inflation should have to come before this house by way of this motion. It is not to be compared with a motion to refer the estimates to the Finance Committee. On the question of inflation, my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) said to me recently that we have had inflation almost since the beginning of the world. Well, I can't go back as far as he can, but as far back as my memory goes, we have had inflation, I admit that.

In this debate there has been some discussion of the cost of living. I admire the ingenuity of the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) in trying to make the point that labour has had nothing to do with increases in the prices of goods. The public seems to think that everything enters into inflation—the cost of labour, interest on borrowed money, the cost of raw materials, transportation charges, and price increases put into effect by some manufacturers for the pure delight of making more money out of their products.

I say quite candidly to you, I have never met anybody who could tell me what is the fundamental cause of inflation. To my mind the fundamental cause appears to be the general demand for a higher standard of living. If that is so, the question arises, who is going to pay for that higher standard? Well, sometimes the fellow who ought to pay for it gets away without paying it.

I am a lawyer, but let me say to my legal friends on both sides of the house that I am not in their class; I am not one of the great lawyers of Canada, but just an ordinary lawyer whom the people know, a lawyer who draws up their wills and settles their family disputes, who runs for Parliament and always gets elected because the people like him. As a lawyer I am reminded that we used to charge $3 for drawing a partial discharge of a mortgage, and the client paid $1 for registering it in the registry office. Well, a few years ago I was sitting in my office one day when a fellow entered and said to me, "I am paying off that mortgage I owe to Mr. Brown, whom you are acting for, and I paid the bookkeeper $2 for registration and $5 for drawing up the discharge." Then he started in to tell me: "Because you are now a senator you are charging higher fees than you did before. You had better get that senator business out of your head, remember that you are an ordinary lawyer, and get back down to earth." Of course, I explained that the Government of Manitoba had raised the registration charge to $2 and that all the lawyers of Manitoba had held a meeting and recommended that the fee for drawing a discharge be raised to $5, and that the judges had accepted the recommendation. I told him that another factor was the cost of living, which was going up. I tried to explain how that came about. I told him that the rent of my office, which in 1929 was $103 a month, had gone up in 1950 to $360 per month; that the ordinary stenographers in my office used to be paid $75 a month and the crackerjacks $100, but their salaries had risen respectively to $200 and $230. On top of that, it must be remembered that in those days they worked five and a half days a week, and this had been reduced to five days a week, out of which they took 20 minutes off every morning and afternoon to go for a drink of water. Some say it is coffee, but I doubt that. Well, my client went away saying that sure enough the cost of living was going up.

That kind of thing is true all across the country. I am wearing a pair of boots such as I used to buy for $12 a pair. One day I went into the boot store that I had gone to for years and told the clerk that I wanted a pair of the same old kind of boots. "Well, Mr. Haig," he said, "the price has gone up a little". I asked why. He said, "I don't know why, but they are now $24 a pair." I said, "Whupper, whupper!"

Now, it goes further than that. We ourselves are keeping pace with the cost of living. At one time we were paid an indemnity of $4,000 a year, and now we get $10,000. That causes some inflation. Every time salaries and wages, are boosted, a little more inflation takes place, and as long as that condition persists we are not going to be able to sell our goods on the world markets. For instance, we have to compete with Russia in selling goods on the world markets, and Russia has not got the problem of rising wages; neither has China, nor Germany, nor Japan. That problem is very much with us in Canada and with the United States too. And remember, Russia knows what we are facing and that is why she is challenging us on the commercial front. She says to every man and woman working in the factories of Russia that they must work for what they are paid or be banished to Siberia.

I read that the Chamber of Commerce in Toronto suggested that the Government should cut taxes, or maybe it was to increase taxation—I don't know which it was. Well, they are the only people in Canada who ever suggested increasing taxation, but I know a lot of people are suggesting that we should spend more money. My opinion is that we are spending enough, but there are many people right here in this house who urge increased spending.

I believe that the people of Canada do not realize that we are in a world struggle, and that one of the issues in the struggle is our capacity to sell our goods in the world market. If we cannot meet competition, ultimately our people are going to be unemployed.

Let me tell you a story. In the last bad times that we had, a man walking down Portage Avenue in Winipeg broke a store window, picked up two loaves of bread and started toward his home. In the Legislature somebody suggested that that man should have been arrested for stealing. I urged that we should get the facts of the case. We did, and here they are: the man had a wife and six children at home and he was unemployed. Somebody may ask what I would have done. Well, I would have smashed two windows to get food for my children. I think he was right.

At the present time we are trying to give the unemployed money to live on, but we can stand that for only so long. Our national debt will increase to the point where we will not be able to manufacture goods economically. Even now the Government takes 50 per cent of a company's profit and the company is left with the balance to carry on its competition with Russia and other countries. Remember that in Russia the company gets 100 per cent profit—it all goes to the factory.

Since I came into this house the income tax on corporations has gone up to 47 per cent—say 50 per cent, in round figures. To show you how that works out, let me give you an illustration. The Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company started a mining venture in Manitoba. When the company got the ore out of the ground they could not separate copper, lead and zinc from the silver and gold because there was no formula in the world for doing so. Representatives of the company approached members of the Manitoba Legislature and told us they could not go any further without spending $1 million on research work. When we told the company the Legislature could not vote any money they asked the individual members to put up some funds. So we put up some, and the New York principals put up the rest. That money was spent and eventually they came up with a process that made it possible for them to continue their enterprise. That was away back in 1929, when the shares of that company could be bought for $3 each. Well, that company paid dividends of about $10 over the next twenty years on all shares outstanding. An then what happened? The Dominion of Canada stepped in and took half of the profit. What did the Government give for it? Nothing. The Province of Manitoba charged only a small rent for the ground, and paid for building the railroad; it could legitimately have taken some of that profit, but it did not.

So long as that sort of thing goes on we cannot continue to have the present large production. The time is coming when it will not pay to produce those minerals. People cannot carry on under those conditions. Who is going to invest money in a company if they know that 50 per cent of the profit goes to the Government? People prefer to invest in something where the Government does not take it all away. Maybe the Government will get it anyway, but at least you have a chance.

Inflation is a combination of many things. Some people are saying that the banks encourage inflation. Well, I don't own any bank stock, and I can speak quite candidly about it, but I don't think banks cause inflation. I think inflation occurs particularly in respect to a new commodity or invention that meets the demand of the people who can afford to spend money freely on it. I remember when a Ford car cost only $1,000.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: $650.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My friend took a second-hand car, and it cost him $650; I took a new one, and it cost $700. Then they got up to $1,000 each. As recently as a year ago I bought a Ford car. I asked my son who looked after the buying, "How much did it cost?" He said, "Dad, it isn't bad, just $3,500." Now, that was just for a Ford car, with a Ford engine in it. True, the style and the set-up were better than they used to be, and those things entered into the cost picture. But I say the day will come when we won't be able to keep up with these costs.

The difficulty with inflation is that it feeds on itself. My children come to me and say: "Dad, Mr. So-and-so, a lawyer like you, has two cars, one for himself and one for his wife. Why don't you have two cars?" What can I tell them. I can only say that I can't afford to buy a second car. They reply, "Well, you should be able to afford a second car if this other man can, because you are always saying he is not very smart, and you are."

Going back a few years, I find that the Government fixed the cost of living index, on the basis of the prices from 1935 to 1939, at 100 points. From 1939 to 1949 the index jumped to about 160, or a rise of 60 per cent in about 10 years. I should mention that there are two formulas: one is called the consumer price index and the other the cost of living index. The cost of living index is based on what the ordinary family spends on a list of specified items. Then in 1949 the Government decided to set the index at the figure of 100 again. When the Liberal Government went out of power, in 1957, the index stood at 122, and since the present Government came into power the index has gone up only about three points. The fact is, honourable senators, that today we are paying about twice as much for goods all along the line as we paid less than 30 years ago. I would like to see a committee of this house or some other house go into the problem and find out what causes these things to happen.

Recently the employees of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways came along and said they wanted an increase in pay or they would strike. I do not criticize them; in their place, I would likely have done what they did. The railways went to the Board of Transport Commissioners and contended they needed a 20 per cent boost in freight rates to meet labour's demand. The commissioners gave them their 20 per cent boost in freight rates, and it is now being paid for by the farmers and city people right across Canada. That is not hearsay—that happened, and it will happen again.

The question is, how are we going to control this thing? What are we going to say to the farmer who used to pay $250 for a binder and now has to pay $5,000 for a combine? Those are problems we face.

Some people claim the solution lies in increased taxation, that is, by taking the money away from the people. Others say that taxes should be cut. I would point out that at the time of the general election in 1957 the Liberal Government knew they were being hard pressed. If they did not know it, they were stupid, and I don't think they were stupid. Again at election time in 1958 they knew they were hard pressed. But did they offer to cut taxes? In 1957 they had control, and in March of that year they could have brought in a budget that would have cut taxes, if they had wished to do so. They must have known—certainly everybody else did—that the feeling was running against the Government. To what extent, we did not not know, but we knew it was against them. So I say, why did the Liberal Government at that time not cut taxes in order to hold down the cost of living? They didn't think it would reduce living costs, and that is why they did not do it. Mr. Howe was then Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I note that the report I have in my hand was addressed to him. He had that report before him and he knew prices were climbing. He is a very smart man, but in spite of the fact that living costs were climbing rapidly the Government deliberately chose to go before the people without changing the taxation picture. All they did was discontinue one formula and substitute another to fool the people. I say that if the present Government tries to do that, the same results will follow.

We have to find out the basic cause of inflation. If we are spending too much money for the goods we can produce and sell to the world, we have to cut our expenditures and make goods at a price at which we can sell them. For instance, I notice that the Ford company is now proposing to make and sell a small car in competition with the British and German manufacturers who are outselling the American and Canadian manufacturers in that field. What is going to happen to those parts of Ontario where larger cars are now being manufactured? They are going to have to produce a car that will sell in competition with the British and German small car.

At the end of the Second World War Germany was a defeated and strangled nation; yet, she has come back, through the efforts of her people who knew they had to take low wages and work long hours in order to get on their feet. It is not only labour that has to make the sacrifice; the change has to take place all along the line. Everyone of us must realize that we are partially responsible for this inflationary trend, and we have to do our part in meeting the situation. Otherwise we shall be fooling ourselves and nobody else.

Honourable senators, I was hopeful that the question of inflation would go directly to a committee, where we could call experts who could advise us of what the situation is and how we could deal with it. I do not think there is any one problem that is bothering the people of Canada more than inflation. The farmers of the west, 1,000 strong, were in Ottawa a few days ago, and six of them did me the honour of coming to my room. They were not from my province of Manitoba, but from Saskatchewan. I said to them, "What is the matter?" They replied that the cost of living had gone so high they could not get by and meet the cost of production. They never asked for any money, and never even mentioned it. I asked them what was the fundamental problem, and what would help the situation. I pointed out that I did not intend to vote to give them any more money, because a few years ago they had sold their wheat at too low a price, or because they refused to sell to the world market and insisted on the new marketing formula. Their answer to me was to this effect: the goods we use cost too much. We can't carry on and make any money, and the world won't pay higher prices for our wheat. Honourable senators, there is the problem among the farmers of the western provinces.

I received a letter just today asking me about this inflation situation, and I know that when I go home they will ask me what stand I took on it. I will say that I recognize that inflation is here and we have to find a cure for it. The only cure is to cut our costs to meet competition. Until we are ready to do that, there can be little hope of a solution.

Some people say the Government is spending too much money. My answer is that if the Government is spending too much the people will soon catch up with it and correct the situation. True, it took 22 years to catch up with the former Government. Although sometimes it takes a little while, the people always catch up to the Government. The electors, no matter what opinion my honourable friends may have about them, are pretty intelligent in these matters. That was made evident in the last election. In four western provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, all of which have a pretty fine class of citizen, one Liberal was elected—just one west of the Great Lakes; and I don't know how that rascal got in. I guess they thought he was a Conservative!

The problem of inflation is met with, and presents no doubt exactly the same difficulties, in my own province and every other part of Canada. I do not know intimately many people in Quebec and Ontario, but I am sure that this subject is paramount in their thoughts: they wonder when costs will begin to come down. But the topic is not, in my opinion, one which should be introduced here. It would be far better to have brought it up in committee, where it could be usefully discussed. It was as a result of a suggestion made last year by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that we took up the subject of housing in committee, and I believe we were able to make one of the best contributions to a solution that has been made anywhere.

I have spoken long enough. All I wish to add is that I believe the procedure we are asked to follow here is wrong, and if the resolution goes to a vote I shall vote against it.

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) whether he does not see a connection between the resolution before us, moved by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall), and the report made by the Senate Committee on Finance in 1956. If I remember rightly, the last two honourable senators who have spoken in this debate were members of the steering committee of the Finance Committee at that time. One of the recommendations of the committee's sessional report, as printed in Hansard of 1956, pages 756 and 757, is as follows:

8. Inflation and Export Markets.

Your committee gave some consideration to the danger to Canadian export markets inherent in the inflationary trend, with its higher costs of production.

The danger inherent in this trend is immediately obvious. The ability to compete successfully in foreign markets is based, to a large extent, on the domestic cost of production, and increases in the latter cannot help but have damaging effects on the former.

Your committee feel that a study of all production costs should be made if these inflationary trends are to be curbed and if Canada's valuable export market is to be safeguarded. An exhaustive inquiry into this subject at the next session of Parliament is strongly recommended.

That report was made to this chamber when another Government was in power; and I see in the resolution of the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg a direct acceptance of this recommendation, and a sincere effort to carry it out.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I have no objection to the discussion of this matter in committee, but my point is that I do not think it is of any use to have a debate on it in this chamber, because I do not believe it will get us anywhere.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: But the committee recommended in 1956 that there be parliamentary action.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but no action was taken. I was not one of the supporters of the Government then in office.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: It was a report of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The honourable senator has not got my point. I say that I do not think that we need a discussion in this house on inflation in order to have a committee take it up.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: But in the report of 1956 we recommended that it be discussed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

IMPORTANCE TO EXPORT TRADE OF CANADA —DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West) rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will draw to the attention of the Senate the importance of the European Economic Community, known as the Common Market, to the export trade of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, on the first day of January, 1959, an organization came into being in Europe called the European Economic Community, more commonly known as "The Common Market" and sometimes referred to as "The Six", because its membership consists of the countries of Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg. The question has been asked here and, indeed, in other countries, "Should Canada be a member of that common market?" There are varying views. The problem is not a simple one, and I thought for that reason, and because Canada, as I propose to emphasize a little later, has a very important interest in trade in that area, this was a proper type of subject for the Senate to consider. I should like to add that the idea of discussing it in this chamber came to me originally as the result of a speech made on the Address by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson). In addition, a number of other honourable senators with whom I have discussed the question were kind enough to give me some encouragement to do this. They have also given me a considerable amount of help.

In approaching the problem I think it is important to consider first of all the background in which the European Economic Community or the Common Market was established. Honourable senators will remember that after World War II, Europe was completely disorganized. Its defences were destroyed. Its political and social organization was in a shambles and its economic organization was really prostrated. Its currencies were inflated. Transport was demoralized and, generally, economic conditions there were in a perilous condition. This problem was recognized, particularly, in the United States. In June, 1947, the then great Secretary of State, General Marshall, speaking at Harvard University, proposed that America, in looking to the economic build-up of Europe—and I am not going to discuss the political re-establishment of Europe nor the question of establishing a defence organization there—said that economic help might well come from America, but that the organization of the work should be done by the Europeans themselves. As a result, in 1948, under the presidency of Harry S. Truman, the Economic Co-operation Act was passed and Mr. Paul Hoffman was appointed to see to the administration of what then became known as Marshall Aid.

I think it appropriate to say here that in total the amount of Marshall Aid given to the world by the United States came to some $42 billion. The amount given to the free countries of Western Europe amounted to some $25 billion, and the amount given to the six countries who are now members of the Common Market totaled nearly $14 billion. Canada was not behind in this business of providing economic aid, for our reconstruction loans totalled over $68 million to Belgium over $253 million to France, $123 million to The Netherlands, and $1,185,000,000 to the United Kingdom.

This was the kind of help provided by America in the hope of re-establishing the economies of Western Europe. The reaction in Europe was the establishment of an organization known as the Organization for European Economic Co-operation. Like so many such organizations, it is referred to by its initials, being called the O.E.E.C. Its purpose was primarily to allocate Marshall Aid and to bring common thought to the economic re-organization of Western Europe. There were 17 countries involved in the O.E.E.C., as follows: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Turkey, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom.

As a result of the establishment of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation many things were done to help re-integrate the economies of that part of the world. Arrangements were made for inter-country payments. The old Benelux customs union between Belgium and Luxembourg was enlarged to include The Netherlands. There was success in achieving liberalization of inter-country trade. Plans were made for the increase in the national production of all of these 17 countries, and the target for each was 5 per cent per annum. Co-operation led to the establishment of the Coal and Steel Community, and honourable senators, I am sure, are familiar with what that was able to accomplish. They also established an Energy Commission in 1955, and then they began to study the idea of the Common Market. They also considered the establishment of a free trade area, which is a different kind of idea, and which I will touch upon a little later.

Finally, in March 1957, there was signed at Rome a treaty called the Treaty of Rome for the establishment of the European Economic Community or the Common Market. As I have said, the countries which are signatory to that treaty were Italy, France, Germany, Belgium, The Netherlands, and Luxembourg,—six out of the 17 countries which belonged to the O.E.E.C.

I think it is logical at this time to consider the relative importance of Western Europe as a market for Canadian exports. It is not the biggest area into which Canada sells her goods. We sell, for example, nearly 60 per cent of our exports to the United States. In 1955 the total of our sales in that market was over $2½ billion. In 1955 we sold 18 per cent of our exports in the United Kingdom market, to a total value of $769 million. To Western Europe in that same year we sold 9.2 per cent, just under 10 per cent, of our exports, to a total of $393 million.

Honourable senators, I have here a table which might be helpful in considering this problem. While I do not intend to read it, I would like to refer to some of the principal parts of it, and I would ask permission of the house to have it placed on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

December 1955 and 1957 (Exports)

Honourable senators, the table I have just referred to shows the volume of Canadian export trade with the United States, with the 17 countries of Western Europe and with the Six countries of the Common Market between the years 1954 and 1957. During that period Canada's world export trade increased 25 per cent, our export trade with the United States increased 24 per cent, our export trade with the United Kingdom increased 13 per cent, and our export trade with the 17 countries of Western Europe increased 33 per cent. But in that same period our export trade with these Six countries increased 68 per cent. In 1957, 26 per cent of our total export trade was with the 17 countries of Western Europe; and 8.2 per cent of our total export trade was with the Six countries of the Common Market. In 1954 we sold $240 million worth of goods in the Common Market. In 1957 we sold $402 million worth of goods to those same countries.

Honourable senators, I have another table showing the value, in percentages, of Canadian exports by categories to these Six countries in 1957. With permission of the house, I will place this table on Hansard as well.

This table shows that in 1957 Canada's agriculture exports to the Common Market area were $175 million, and 43 per cent of all our exports to that area were for agricultural products. Our industrial raw materials which went to the Common Market area had a value of $143 million, and they constituted 36 per cent of our exports to that area. The chemicals and other manufactured goods which we sent there in 1957 were to a value of $60 million, and they constituted 15 per cent of our exports to the area.

Honourable senators, figures are tiresome, and I apologize for placing them before the house in this way, but some of them are rather startling. In 1957 about 30 per cent of all Canadian wheat sales were made to these Six countries, to a value of $113½ million. Nearly 10 per cent of our iron ore went to these countries, and the value to us was over $15 million. Over 8 per cent of our aluminum went to these countries. Four per cent of our pulp went there. These figures will, I think, indicate that the Common Market, is and has been a substantial outlet, a traditional outlet, for a great many Canadian exports of considerable value.

This market is also valuable to the United States, which sells $1 billion 525 million worth of goods in that market, or nearly 12 per cent of its foreign sales.

Now, what does the Common Market mean? First of all, let me try to assess its size in a comparative way. In 1956 the population of the United States was 174 million. The population of Canada was 17 million. In that year the population of these Six countries was 166 million,—nearly as large as the population of the United States. The gross national product of the United States in that year was $430 billion. In Canada, it was $32 billion. In the Common Market countries the gross national product in that year was $150 billion. Perhaps I should say that the industrial production in the Common Market from 1953 to 1957 increased at the rate of 10 per cent par annum. The annual increase in the United States in that period was 4 per cent per annum; and the annual increase in Canada in that period was 6 per cent per annum.

These figures do indicate, I think, the fact that O.E.E.C. had a great deal to do of a beneficial character in raising the productive capacity of the countries to which Marshall Aid was supplied.

The European Economic Community, or the Common Market, is not a customs union only. It is not a commercial agreement between the Six countries only. It is all of that, but it is a political, social, and economic organization, and might well result in the establishment of a United States of Western Europe. The political and social side of the Treaty of Rome provides for the political integration of these countries, based on a historical association. It provides for the free movement not only of goods between these six different countries, but of peoples as well. They are to have a common marketing policy; they are to have—and this is important to Canada—a common farm policy; they are to have a common transport policy; they are to provide mutual aid for each other not only for their domestic development, but as well, for the development of the overseas dependencies of the member nations. Then there is in the treaty, and in the explanatory material that is available about it, the use of the word "harmonization" of their economies. I will simply leave that at the moment, as I may have an opportunity to come back to it later.

Let me say a word now about the formal machinery that is to be provided in order to make the Common Market run. They are to have a legislative assembly of 142 delegates, but the delegations are not loaded in favour of any one country; three are going to have 36 members; two are going to have 14 members, and Luxembourg will have six members. There is to be a judicial organization, consisting of seven members, to settle disputes arising out of the operation of the treaty. There is to be an executive organization, consisting of a minister from each of the countries; and there is to be a Common Market Commission. They are to have an advisory group of 101 members, and an operating level which would consist of an investment bank and a fund for the development of the economic work that is to be done in the countries, and the like.

As a result of the establishment of this rather formidable organization it is expected that plants will be modernized, that production within the area will be specialized. That will lead to an improvement in the variety and quality of goods. They will make arrangements for the location of production units in the best areas. There will be a free circulation of capital between the countries. Right within the area itself new mass markets will be established. Costs, it is expected, will be cut. The dependent overseas areas of the member nations will be developed, and their social and economic laws are to be modified so that they will reach some kind of common denominator. This presents a problem for France.

I think perhaps the most talked-of item in the Common Market idea is the approach to tariffs and quotas. It is planned that between the member nations, within a period of fifteen years from January 1, 1959, there will be complete free trade—no tariff protection one against the other. In fact, they have already started this process, because on January 1 of this year they all reduced their tariffs against each other by a flat rate of ten per cent. Within three years the reduction will be 30 per cent, within seven years, 60 per cent, and it is expected that within a 14-year period the tariff between the Six countries will be completely eliminated.

They are also, however, to have a common tariff wall for their protection against the world. The way this is to be done is that they are to take the national tariffs for each item and average them.

Now, all these countries, like Canada, are GATT nations, and while they can reduce tariff items within the GATT organization they cannot increase them without renegotiating. The process of the GATT renegotiations for the establishment of the common external tariff for the Common Market is now proceeding.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Have you any information as to the number of member countries in GATT?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I have not that figure with me, so I cannot give the honourable gentlemen that information, but most of these 17 countries of the O.E.E.C. are members of GATT, as are Canada and the United States.

Now, tariffs are one thing of course, but quotas are another, and reducing tariffs is not going to help the free flow of trade if quotas exist. So under the Rome Treaty it is provided that the quotas between the Six countries will be removed completely within a period of five years, and in the meantime any existing quotas will be open to all the member countries.

Perhaps I should here say a word, if I am not speaking too long, about the so-called Free Trade area among the seventeen nations in O.E.E.C. This was a proposal initiated, I understand, by Great Britain after the Common Market idea was discussed originally. This was a purely commercial plan, not political, not social. It was directed mainly toward industrial production. It excluded agricultural products, and one of the reasons for this was of course the Commonwealth Agreements. It proposed that tariffs be reduced to extinction as between the 17 members of the O.E.E.C. But it had this difference between it and the Common Market arrangement, that under the Free Trade idea, within the Free Trade area each member would be free to negotiate tariff reductions outside the Free Trade area with countries like Canada and the United States. It is also proposed that the preferences, like the Commonwealth preferences, be not disturbed. It did not contemplate a harmonization of economic or social establishments within the Free Trade area. It did not propose any surrender of sovereignty for the nations who joined to the same extent as is proposed under the Rome Treaty. I may say that a White Paper issued in the United Kingdom in January of this year disclosed that the discussions leading to the establishment of the Free Trade area had broken down.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: May I interject a question here? Was not the United Kingdom invited to come into this union originally?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would think it might have been. However, the invitation was probably one that in the circumstances, and because of the character of the organization that was proposed, Britain could not have accepted at that time. I should say this, and I thank the honourable gentleman for his question, that apparently to get into the Common Market arrangement you have to take all or nothing, you cannot make any changes, you take all of the terms provided in the Rome Treaty, or you cannot join.

Now, the Common Market, honourable senators, is not a plan. It exists. These countries which are comprised in it are a thickly populated area. They have a population of 166 million, as against 175 million in the United States. Their gross national product is low still—it is $150 billion, as against $440 billion in the United States. But as the economic activity of the Six rises, the market opportunities are bound to increase. There is an opportunity there for Canada too. But I should point out that the Gordon report predicts that, with Canada's high-cost economy, we cannot expect too much of an increase in our sales of manufactured goods in Western Europe, and certainly not within the Six countries of this group.

One of the great problems for a country like Canada will be the competition we can expect to find within that area from the productive capacity which is bound to be developed as a result of the working out of the Common Market arrangement. I think it can be said, however, they will always need raw materials, because their industrial activity is not only high now but it will increase. Just what will happen to our agricultural output, however, once they begin to specialize in the production of foodstuffs, and also once they begin to develop their overseas underdeveloped dependencies, is another question.

A good deal of consideration, a good deal of concern, has been expressed by other countries as to the effect the establishment of the Common Market is going to have on their trade in the area. The New York Times, on February 15, reported that Scandinavia, Austria and Switzerland were getting concerned about the possibility of a loss of trade with the countries of the Common Market, and in the London Times of February 16, GATT countries in South and Central America, expressed great apprehension that the Common Market will develop overseas raw products and dislocate the normal trade in Europe enjoyed by South and Central American countries. There is, too, the possibility that if cost of production remains at a low level in the Common Market the production from that area is bound to provide competition for Canada's goods in third-party markets as well.

Now, how is Canada to meet this new situation? Without attempting to be dogmatic about it, I think there are a few things which should be kept in mind.

First of all, I think Canadian exporters, Canadian producers, must know the rules which have been established for the operation of the Common Market.

In the second place, I think Canada must be careful about her renegotiations under GATT, when the Six seek to increase, as is bound to happen, some of the tariff items which now apply to Canadian goods going into those Six countries.

Canadian firms too might consider investing in business enterprises in the Common Market. That has already started in some of the countries. Certainly the Americans are doing it. In other words, our industrial and commercial people might find it of advantage to locate branches there, or subsidiaries. This might prove to be a very profitable type of venture for the Canadian organization interested in foreign trade, as an outlet for partly finished goods. I say no more about the matter, although honourable senators can see that this subject alone is one which can be discussed at great length.

But I think this point is more important than anything else to be said, that the Six themselves must be encouraged to place their external tariffs on the lowest possible basis. The yardstick for them, as well as for us, should be the liberalization of trade in the Western world, and not discrimination or dislocation of trade.
