A SCOTTISH TRADITIONARY STORY.

ABOUT the year 1309 Robert Bruce, though invested three years before with the crown of Scotland, was only able to maintain a kind of outlaw's independence against the officers of the English king, and frequently roamed, with a small band of attendants, through the wilds of Galloway. In that remote corner of the kingdom, on the banks of the Urr, lived Mark Sprotte a Shepherd and a busbahdman but also, when occasion required it, a warrior. It was the good fortune of this obscure peasant to be united to a woman possessing an affectionate character, and no small share of good sense and activity. One morning Bruce, in the course of his wanderings, was attacked near Mark's cottage by one of the English intruders—Sir Walter Selby:

Bruce was not the man to yield to one or even more opponents. The contest was force and dishear the followers on each decimal the course of the kill, ran up the roof, and flashed red from between the contest was force and dishear the followers on each dishears.

The flowers being cut off as they appeared on the plants, the number produced was much greater than were the blossoms had remained untouched. Early in October, the stems of the plant which had not borne flowers were strong and green; the other yellow, and in a state of decay. The plants which had been stripped of flowers produced (on the same space of ground) about four times the weight of large politics, very few small ones being found. Those on which flowers were left, produced but a small numberlof middle sized politics, with a great number of little ones, from the size of s common fibert to that of a walnut. New Genesee Farmer.
