The Attorney General in his place, declared that the bill had been certified by Mr. Landry, the late Provincial Secretary, which Mr. Hanington denied, and there the matter rested for that day. It was brought up again on Thursday, by Mr. Hanington, who in the meantime bad communicated with Mr. Landry by telegraph, to Ottaws. The subsequent proceedings we give below in our report of Mr. Hanington's remarks, and we leave the public to judge if Mr. Blair was not guilty of gross misconduct.

A sudden thought came into Sir George Fabian's mind. He would go to America;

to Liverpool. The boat was to start on the following morning and just before leaving he penned a letter to Mr. Hamil-"I start in an hour for America, and must say a few words to you before I go.

Two months had elapsed since Henrietta was left standing in that brightly lighted agony, the torment of being loathed, despised, forsaken by the man for whom she had foregone all the reputation, the position it had cost her so much to build up. And she did not even know what loved you, that I was false, from first to had become of him—whether he was per-last and only played my part to make a palse? De Garnier was in too great a hurry position it had cost her so much to build up. And she did not even know what had become of him—whether he was perhaps welcomed with rejoicings and forgiveness to the home he had outraged, while she was an outcast, a pariah, whom no one sought to bring back, whose existence might have been utterly forgotton or heard to the contrary. She was in London now, racking her tortured brain to find some means of living in the fature.
