House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, May 3, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE WALLACE REGINALD McDONALD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, members of all parties in the house were I am sure much pained to learn last night of the passing yesterday afternoon of one of our number, Mr. Wallace R. McDonald, who for over ten years past has represented the constituency of Pontiac in this House of Commons.

Those of us who sit on this side and with whom Mr. McDonald was more closely associated were aware that he had been suffering a severe illness, but only a week or two ago, on telephoning the hospital to inquire as to his condition I learned that he had returned to his home. It appears that the strain of his illness had been too great. He evidently left the hospital with the desire of ending his days amid familiar scenes and surrounded by those whom he most loved.

Mr. McDonald was in his 70th year. Like several members of the parliament of Canada, he received his early education at the University of Ottawa in this city. He spent the early part of his life developing a profitable business in the county of Pontiac as a general merchant, and later on when engaged also in lumbering operations he was able so to establish his business as to give himself a solid foundation for public life.

What will most be remembered of Mr. McDonald, and it is an honourable record indeed, is the fact that his life for the greater part was devoted to public service, and public service given in a wholehearted and generous way in ever widening fields of influence. He began by serving as mayor of Chapeau, the community in which he lived, and subsequently became warden of Pontiac county. He then went into provincial politics and was a member of the Quebec legislature from 1919 to 1935, having contested successfully altogether some four provincial elections. He then was elected to this house in 1935, and was re-elected in 1940 and 1945.

We who knew him here over the years will recall that he was one of the most faithful of the members of the house in his attendance on its proceedings. He was most active in the work of its committees and on frequent occasions participated actively in the debates. When he did so, and on the platform where he was most effective, he was equally fluent in either of the official languages. He was essentially of a modest and retiring disposition and for that reason did not take as prominent a part as his talents, wide reading and sound judgment entitled him to take. He will be deeply missed in the constituency he served so well, in his native province, and indeed as one who was a true representative of all Canada. Especially will his loss be felt by those of us who have been with him in this parliament for some few years past.

If I were asked what were Mr. McDonald's outstanding qualities I would say that they were his fine personal integrity, his great moderation, his broad tolerance, and above all else his unswerving loyalty to his friends, to his party, its principles and its policies, and may I add to its leader. I do not believe that among the members of the house I had a truer supporter, and a more loyal and constant friend than I had in our late member. As a member of the Liberal party, he was strong in his advocacy of liberal ideas and ideals. He was fearless in expressing his views, and he believed strictly in cooperation with his fellow members. He realized that it is only through cooperation with others of like aims that any principle or policy can be made to prevail, and that it was as a member of a political party, no less than as an individual, that he owed his success in public life.

I can only say that irrespective of the party to which we belong, all of us who had the privilege of knowing Mr. McDonald will always cherish a memory of him as a man, and a trusted public servant that is of the highest and best.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. McDonald has left to mourn his loss a widow and a large number of members of his family. I am sure it will be the wish of every member of this house that you would express on behalf of the House of Commons to Mrs. McDonald the deep sympathy which we have for her and for the members of her family in their great bereavement.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to have more than a passing acquaintance with the hon. member whose decease we mourn, but all of my colleagues who had come to know him well held him in high regard. One of the satisfying things in public life, and I have noticed it quite as much in the House of Commons as in any previous legislative body with which I have been associated, is that while we may have differences of opinion on public questions we still maintain our respect for those whose views we do not always share. Speaking for the members of this group as well as for myself we desire to be associated with the Prime Minister and other hon. members in the expression of sympathy to those who have been bereaved.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This is one of those sad occasions on which members of the house join together in mourning the loss of one of their colleagues; and we too of this group wish to extend our deepest sympathy to those whom the late W. R. McDonald has left behind him. I came here in 1935, the year in which Mr. McDonald also became a member. I have had contact with him throughout these years as a member of the house and its committees, and I was always impressed by his friendliness and his courtesy and kindliness. Although our views differed from his, he commanded our respect, and we sincerely mourn his passing.

Mr. SOLON LOW (Peace River): It was not my good fortune to know personally the deceased hon. member for Pontiac, but those of my party who did know him have expressed themselves as happy in their association with him as recognizing in him a man of public service who was always ready to face realities honestly. We pay respect to his memory, and we join with the other hon. members in mourning his loss and extending to his family our deepest sympathy.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, for more than twenty-five years Mr. McDonald was a close friend of mine. I became acquainted with him when he was a member of the Chapeau school board and I was a school inspector. We therefore cooperated in increasing the efficiency of teaching in his district. Later, we became assocated in the campaigns of the party we were representing in the western part of the province.

The distinctive qualities of Mr. McDonald were his straightforwardness and his sincerity of purpose. No one will leave, in that part of the province of Quebec, a greater reputation of honesty in public life. The late lamented member always showed a thorough understanding of the needs of the people and his greatest desire was to help those who had few opportunities in life.

It is with a feeling of deep grief that we bow to-day before the grave of a man whose loss we sincerely lament and whom we shall never forget.

(Text):

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to join with others in paying my tribute to the one we knew as "Wally" McDonald, because I was Protestant, he was Roman Catholic; because after coming to this house we were close neighbours; because we agreed on the essentials of the Christian life. I found that he had little patience with those who would raise religious or race prejudice. Time and again when we discussed the question of religion we were at one in the view that if we Protestants and Roman Catholic but agreed on the great essentials there would be a far greater approach to unity in Canada. He also assured me that the closer we all get to Him who is the source of truth the closer we shall get to each other. I would pay my tribute to him as a Christian. As he also told me, we grow like our parents, and very much depends on who our parents or our early guardians were as to which branch of the church gets us into the kingdom of heaven. I am sure we think to-day of Wally McDonald not as dead but as living, because he placed his trust in Him who can keep him alive.

PRIVILEGE

LABOUR RELATIONS—REFERENCE TO SPEECH OF MR. COLDWELL IN TORONTO

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I notice that my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in addressing a large audience at Toronto last evening, was taking a shot in a number of directions—

Mr. COLDWELL: Several shots.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Among these, my hon. friend made a statement which I think, if not corrected by him, ought to be exposed, and I would therefore draw the attention of the house to what he said. Speaking of the recent meeting with the government of a delegation of the Canadian Congress of Labour my hon. friend said:

At a recent meeting between Prime Minister Mackenzie King and his cabinet and representatives of the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Prime Minister and the cabinet—

And these words are in quotation marks:

—walked out on delegates representing some 300,000 Canadian workers and their families.

If that is a correct quotation, may I say to my hon. friend that the statement itself is not correct. The last thing that was done was to walk out on the delegation. Statements were made in the representations of the delegation which I felt were untrue and the representations themselves were not expressed in the manner in which they should have been expressed, and which for this reason I thought were doing harm to the cause of labour itself. I therefore spoke plainly to the delegation on these particular aspects of their representations. But may I say to my hon. friend that after I had concluded speaking I and my colleagues waited until the secretary of the delegation, who wished to have the last word, made quite a lengthy reply, and then, bowing in a cordial manner to all present, I and my colleagues left the gathering. I hope my hon. friend will not try to create the impression that some 300,000 Canadian workers and their families were offended by my action in speaking in a kindly and fatherly way to that particular group.

RADIO BROADCASTING

POLICY RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF RADIO STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction. Press reports indicate that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is about to take over two radio stations owned by the Manitoba government. If this be so, in view of the refusal of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to issue a licence to the Saskatchewan government for a radio station, what change if any has taken place in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's policy in regard to ownership of radios, and for what reason?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): This question relates to broadcasting policy and should more properly be answered by the Minister of National Revenue. However, I can say the government has decided that, since broadcasting is the sole responsibility of the dominion government, broadcasting licences shall not be issued to other governments or corporations owned by other governments. In regard to the two stations in Manitoba, discussions are taking place with the government of that province which we hope will lead to the purchase of these two stations by the dominion government.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Thursday, May 2, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The committee was considering section 21. Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

Section 22 agreed to.

On section 23—Citizenship of spouse or minor children.

Mr. FLEMING: In line 31, subsection 2, the power conferred on the governor in council is purely enabling. Is there any reason why the section should not be made mandatory instead of enabling or permissive?

Mr. MARTIN: There is no change in substance in this section and it is thought, in view of the experience we have had in the department, and the practice of other countries, that this is the best way to leave the matter.

Mr. GREEN: If this section passes what will the law be in regard to minor children? If the father loses Canadian citizenship, will the minor children also lose theirs? There seems to be some uncertainty in the wording of the section.

Mr. MARTIN: It is a question of discretion. There is a distinction, as regards the position of the wife or children, in cases where a second nationality is acquired and cases of automatic loss or revocation. Greater consideration is given in the latter case because there is a greater possibility that the child may not acquire any other nationality. Also, revocation and loss are in the form of punishment which should not be automatically visited upon the children, whereas a deliberate change of nationality is now in the nature of a voluntary transfer of allegiance.

Section agreed to.

Section 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Saving of obligations incurred before loss of citizenship.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the purport of section 25, and what particular circumstances does it contemplate?

Mr. MARTIN: It would cover the case where a person commits treason. He does not thereby become discharged from any obligation, duty or liability in respect of anything done or omitted before he ceased to be a Canadian subject. It means exactly what it says. Mere loss does not interfere with other obligations he may have incurred.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Canadian citizen a British subject.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to refer to a news item which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of April 6 having reference to the second reading in the British House of Commons of a bill with respect to British nationals. The article refers to this measure as the surrender of a small measure of sovereignty to the world peace organization. I quote:

> The bill, which Philip Noel-Baker, minister of state, characterized as a modest step toward "effective machinery to stop aggression," empowers the government to impose on British subjects the duty of abiding by the rulings of the council involving severance of diplomatic and economic relations with other countries.
> The measure thus gives effect to provisions of Article 41 of the charter signed by Britain which reads:
> "The security council may decide what measures, not involving the use of armed forces, are to be employed to give effect to its decisions and it may call upon members of the united nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio and other means of communications and severance of diplomatic relations."

We have arrogated to ourselves the right to decide who shall or shall not be British subjects, and I should like to know first of all whether this new British legislation affects us under section 26 of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN: The answer is no.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Then that is settled. I do not know, however, whether this country has the right to state who shall be a British subject. I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I think we would have the right to decide as regards citizens in Canada only. I should like to know what the status of these citizens would be when they left Canada for a holiday or for business or for any other reason. Would they still be called British subjects? I doubt very much whether this government could legislate in that regard. In other words, I think the clause is ultra vires of the House of Commons, and so I intend to offer an amendment.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. MARTIN: At the imperial conference of 1930 it was agreed that each dominion should have the right to do the very thing that we have done here.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): We have the right to do that?

Mr. MARTIN: No doubt about it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Even so, I wish to move that section 26 be amended by striking out the words "British subject" and substituting therefor the words "subject of His Majesty as the sovereign of Canada." I do not wish to imply thereby that we are in any sense a nation inferior or subservient to the United Kingdom. Of course we are not; I do not think there is very much of the tinge of colonialism left in Canada as a whole. Nevertheless this would give stronger recognition to a fact which we have ourselves admitted for some time, that the king is indeed the king of Canada. In the past it has been agreed that in matters relating to the dominion the king acts separately for Canada. Indeed it was a Canadian order in council which gave consent, so far as we in Canada were concerned, to the British abdication act. Afterwards a special Canadian act was passed validating the change of succession, pointing out that we were dealing with the king as king in Canada. Most significant of all is that when we declared war in our own right on September 10, we did it by sending to the king of Canada a telegram containing the order in council and the king of Canada proclaimed that a state of war existed. Because of that I see no reason why we cannot recognize that fact in this bill. Therefore I strongly suggest to the committee that it accept the proposed amendment.

Mr. REID: If this amendment is carried, how will it affect the status of persons coming to this country from Great Britain as British subjects?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): They would still be British subjects. It would not affect them one iota.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to me that when we are discussing the status of British subject we are unduly restricting the meaning of the term. As a Canadian citizen I am a British subject. If this bill is passed I hope I shall in no way be subservient to Great Britain. I believe that this bill implies that I as a Canadian citizen would have British subject rights not only in Canada but also in every other part of the British commonwealth, which is what is implied in the term "British subject." If that is so I do not see why we should limit our own rights in other parts of the British commonwealth, as I am inclined to think we should do if the bill were amended in the way suggested. I am not sure, but that is the way it appears to me.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask the minister if there is the limitation that the hon. member for Vancouver East suggests. Is it not a fact that we are all subects of His Majesty the King, and that under the statute of Westminster and the development of our constitutional position the king is regarded as the king of the United Kingdom, a person; the king of Canada, a person; the king of South Africa, a person, and so on. In other words, there is a divisibility of the crown in that respect; but in the commonwealth we are all subjects of a common king. Therefore when we receive a passport, for example, it is His Majesty or his representative in Canada who prays another country or another government that we may be afforded all the privileges which the possession of such a passport gives to the holder of it. We have not the right, if I may put it that way, to say who shall be a British subject, but we have the right to say who shall be a subject of His Majesty the King, who is also king of the United Kingdom and of other parts of the British commonwealth. I am not wedded to any particular phraseology; none of us is. But I should like to see this bill worded in such a way as to indicate clearly the position which Canada occupies among the nations of the world, and the exact relationship that a Canadian citizen has to His Majesty the King. It seems to me that the phraseology suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North takes nothing from us as British subjects, takes nothing from us as subjects of His Majesty the King who is the common sovereign of all the people of all the nations of the British commonwealth, but on the other hand does confer something, because it confers upon a Canadian citizen the right of citizenship, and expresses his exact relationship to His Majesty the King and to the commonwealth of which the king is the common head.

Mr. HANSELL: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is correct in his interpretation, then I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North that he leave section 26 as it is and insert another section 27 and move the others on. I suggest that his amendment become section 27, which will read:

A Canadian citizen is a subject of His Majesty as the sovereign of Canada.

Does my suggestion meet with his approval? Does he want the term "British subject" cut out?

Mr. PINARD: I think there is another way—

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member should answer my question. If it is all right, go ahead.

Mr. PINARD: There is another way to solve the problem, namely, by giving a definition in this bill to a British subject. I have already on second reading of this bill given the reason why I cannot accept the principle contained in this section. I said then that this provision should be changed because we do not find anywhere in our statutes a definition of a British subject. It is true that we still have that definition contained in subsection (i) of section 2 of the Naturalization Act; but this act is to be repealed by section 45 of the bill, and with it the only definition we ever possessed of a British subject will disappear from our statutes. Moreover, that definition of a British subject was introduced in our legislation in 1914, when we adopted the Naturalization Act. Such a definition could not be accepted to-day in Canada because it is not in accordance with our evolution and the progress we have made as a nation.

If that definition as it is were incorporated of the imperial conferences and the statute ignore the rights we have acquired as a result in the present citizenship bill it would simply of Westminster. It would be a definition which would render our legislation on citizenship retrogressive. Here is the definition in the Naturalization Act. It is contained in subsection (d):

"British subject" means a person who is a natural born British subject, or a person to whom a certificate of naturalization has been granted; or a person who has become a subject of His Majesty by reason of any annexation of territory.

We cannot be satisfied to-day with such an incomplete definition. I do not think that it is within the power of this parliament to define a British subject unless we define a British subject in Canada. Such definition could have been included in section 2 of this bill, and if this had been done I would have had no objection to section 26 as it is now drafted. Here is the way in which a British subject in Canada could have been defined for the purposes of this measure: "In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, a British subject means a subject of His Majesty in the right of Canada." In view of the fact, however, that in the present bill we have not been given any definition of a British subject and since our statutes do not contain any such definition, I feel I must oppose section 26 as it now reads, because it seems to me illogical, useless, and, as was said before, ultra vires. This section should disappear or should be modified, as already suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and for this reason I will support his amendment.

Mr. BELZILE: I wish to support the amendment presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Firstly: It is to conform to every document pertaining to the constitution of this country. I have tried very hard to find in the constitutional acts of Canada any reference to the words "British subject" and I must say I have not been able to do so. I do not mean that my search was necessarily complete, but I found that such a person as a British subject did not exist before 1914. As a matter of fact the very first reference to the status of a subject in Canada was made in the capitulation of Montreal in 1760. All my references to the documents concerning the Canadian constitution are from the work by Mr. W. P. M. Kennedy, published by the Oxford Press in 1928. Here is what I find in article XLI of the capitulation of Montreal. The Marquis de Vaudreuil asked that: "The French, Canadians and Acadians, of what state soever, who shall remain in the colony, shall not be forced to take arms against His Most Christian Majesty, or his allies, directly or indirectly, on any occasion whatsoever; the British government shall only require of them an exact neutrality."

In reply to that request, General Murray said: "They become subjects of the king." This is the first mention in a very long series of texts in the same terms. In article IV of the Treaty of Paris in February, 1763, which appears at page 15 of the volume already mentioned, I find this:

> Moreover, His Most Christian Majesty cedes and guarantees to his said Britannic Majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies . . . and all rights acquired by treaty, . . . over the said countries, lands, islands, places, coasts, and their inhabitants . . . His Britannic Majesty on his side agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, in consequence, give the most precise and most effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion . . .

and so on. Later, on October 7, 1763, in the royal proclamation delivered to the inhabitants of Canada, I find this, appearing at page 19 of this volume:

> And whereas it will greatly contribute to the speedy settling our said new government, that our loving subjects should be informed of our paternal care . . .

Then in the ordinance establishing civil courts, in 1764, here is what is said:

> Whereas it is highly expedient and necessary, for the well governing of His Majesty's good subjects of the province of Quebec . . .

In a judgment rendered in the case of Campbell v. Hall, on November 20, 1774, Lord Mansfield stated the status in the following manner:

> 1. A country conquered by the British arms becomes a dominion of the king in the right of his crown, and therefore necessarily subject to the legislative power of the parliament of Great Britain.
> 2. The conquered inhabitants once received into the conqueror's protection become subjects, and are universally to be considered in that light, not as enemies or aliens.
> 3. Articles of capitulation, upon which the country is surrendered, and treaties of peace by which it is ceded, are sacred and inviolate, according to their true intent and meaning.

So it was right after the cession. In the Quebec act of 1774 I find another mention in Article V:

> And, for the more perfect security . . . it is hereby declared that His Majesty's subjects . . .

There is the word again; and in Article VIII:

> . . . all His Majesty's Canadian subjects, within the province of Quebec . . .

In the instructions to Carleton by the king in 1775 I find this; that he should proceed to the establishment of courts, and so on—

> . . . that our Canadian subjects should have the benefit and use of their own laws . . .

I come now to the constitutional act of 1791, which is at page 208 of this volume, referring to the constitution of the legislative council, and here is what it says:

> Provided always . . . that no person shall be summoned . . . who shall not be of the full age of twenty-one years, and a natural born subject of His Majesty, or a subject of His Majesty naturalized by act of the British parliament, or a subject of His Majesty having become such by the conquest and cession of the province of Canada.

So the words "subject of His Majesty" come up again. Then in the union act of 1840, which is at page 538 of the volume, dealing with the qualifications of legislative councillors, I find this:

> Provided always that no person shall be summoned to the said legislative council . . . who shall not be of the full age of twenty-one years, and a natural born subject of Her Majesty, or a subject of Her Majesty naturalized by act of the parliament of Great Britain, or by act of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or by an act of the legislature of either of the provinces of Upper or Lower Canada, or by an act of the legislature of the province of Canada.

Last, but not least, comes the British North America Act. There is no special definition, of course, of "British subject" in that act. But looking at the qualifications for a senator, I find that a senator shall be a natural-born subject of the queen, or a subject of the queen naturalized by act of parliament of Great Britain, or the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and so on. So I can say there is no reference to "British subject" in any of the acts which have gone to form a constitution of Canada.

Secondly: It gives a clear definition of Canadian citizenship. After listening to the many speeches delivered by hon. members since the beginning of this discussion, I came to the conclusion that many of the members were not speaking of exactly the same thing when they referred to a British subject. For instance, the hon. member for Vancouver South, as reported at page 615 of Hansard, spoke of "commonwealth citizenship". Then the hon. member for Broadview, as reported at page 599 of Hansard said:

> I am a Canadian, but I also am a British subject. They are both the same and always have been.

The same hon. member at page 600:

> We all owe allegiance to one sovereign and one empire.

That means empire citizenship. Later the hon. member for Kamloops is reported in this way at page 625 of Hansard, when he referred to what he considered a misconception of what is involved in the expression "British subject":

> Being a British subject . . . means nothing more or less than being a citizen of the British empire.

And at page 626 he adds:

> It simply means that we have all the advantages of citizenship in a larger and more widespread organization as well. We are citizens of Canada, subjects of His Majesty, and we are citizens of the British commonwealth.

And I could agree with that opinion.

And again at page 628:

> At present we have an empire citizenship.

So after speaking about British commonwealth citizenship he returns to empire citizenship.

A third expression of opinion makes reference to "our kith and kin", the exponents of which obviously have in mind the inhabitants of the British isles, and their racial descendants, and no other species of the king's subjects whatsoever. It is the type of reference mentioned in Saturday Night of April 20. A fourth kind of citizenship was made abundantly clear to me during the debate on the Japanese problem, and the deportation of Canadian citizens of Japanese descent.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask a question? Does the hon. member not think that in addition to a Canadian citizenship there is some value in having a commonwealth citizenship?

Mr. BELZILE: Of course. I have just said I could agree with the hon. member for Kamloops when he said that we are citizens of Canada, subjects of His Majesty and citizens of the British commonwealth. But as we cannot get the real meaning of the words "British subject", which are not defined in the act, I do not agree with anybody, yet. I think we must first have a complete definition of all the advantages and obligations entailed in that status.

It is a well established principle in all British institutions that there should be no rights without corresponding obligations, no privileges without equal duties, and no advantages without equal ties. Canada as a nation has always refused to recognize any imperial ties, any commonwealth obligations, and this has been confirmed by the statute of Westminster. I am afraid that the retention of the status of "British subject" might impose certain obligations with respect to the commonwealth, and form certain ties with the empire. I humbly submit that our only obligation should be an allegiance to the crown. For these reasons I shall support the amendment.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I answer the hon. member for Macleod? I am as jealous as anyone of the status of "British subject", but I do not think my amendment takes away from that position. Rather it adds to it, in the sense that, as well as British subjects, we shall be subjects of His Majesty as the King of Canada. And if the minister's contention is correct, namely that section 26 is intra vires of the parliament of Canada, then I should be quite willing to have my amendment moved as a new section.

Mr. MICHAUD: I rise to support this amendment, which meets with my entire approval. I thought of it myself before discussing the matter with the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

To my mind the term "British subject" is somewhat misleading. It is true that many hon. members, including the Secretary of State, take the view that it simply means "subject of His Majesty". My knowledge of constitutional law is so limited that I would not dare disagree with my friend of the bar. On the other hand for the man on the street the term 'British subject" means a subject of Great Britain, just as surely the term Italian means a subject of Italy, and the term Belgian a subject of Belgium. I dare say that the mass of Canadians, and particularly those who are not of Anglo-Saxon stock, take the view that a British subject means a subject of Great Britain. The fact that this view was challenged in the house by the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Eglinton establishes conclusively that the interpretation of the man on the street must be held by a number of people. The fact that another interpretation has been given by those hon. members will not, I feel, affect public thinking very materially.

Why not, then, when this bill it before the committee, take advantage of the opportunity to clear up any possible misunderstanding? If the term "British subject" means simply a subject of His Majesty the King, what possible injury can there be to stating it clearly? Why not call a spade a spade?

I am not going to attempt to make a legal argument at this time. After the rebuke the legal profession got yesterday from the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and in the other place from the premier of Prince Edward Island, one would be well advised to tread other ground. I am going to follow another line of reasoning which I hope will appeal to hon. members.

My two boys, aged five and seven, are proud to wear suits made from my old clothes. I presume most boys who are not too sophisticated feel the same way about this time-honoured custom. I anticipate however that before many years they will take the view that they are too old to be subject to such practice, and no doubt they will suggest that the old clothes be used by the younger brothers. Whether or not the other countries of the commonwealth have grown enough to wear new clothes of their own is for them, and them alone, to decide. Personally, I feel that this country is old enough and has sufficiently proved its maturity during two wars to justify its position and insist on wearing distinctive garments in the matter of a distinctive Canadian citizenship and a thoroughly distinctive Canadian flag. Just as the father, whose grown up son wants to wear new clothes, will admit the fairness of his son's request, and refuse to interpret his action as a decrease of filial love, in like manner Great Britain, I am sure, does and will recognize the reasonableness of our point of view as a young nation and refuse to interpret our gesture as irreverential.

I have always understood that the Anglo-Saxon people are practical business men, possibly the shrewdest in the world. Those of my cultural group are considered more sentimental. I do not mean that the Anglo-Saxons are not emotional, and that the French have no business acumen. The fact remains, however, that Great Britain understands particularly well the language of dollars and cents, and judging by what we did for ourselves during the last session, even members of parliament understand the language of dollars and cents. All this, Mr. Chairman, leads to the point which I wish to make, in all earnestness, seriousness and good faith, namely, that Great Britain is much more vitally concerned about the loans from Canada and the United States, and quite correctly so, than about nationalist bills of small consequence, as referred to by the Ottawa Journal. Assuming that we adopt this amendment, and adopt a truly distinctive flag, and make the loan of one billion and a quarter dollars to Great Britain, the sum total, in my opinion, will be a considerable strengthening of our ties to Great Britain, and this will prevail for the next fifty-five years whether we want it or not. I do not believe that there is anybody in this house, even among the young ultra-nationalists, who does not wish the fullest measure of cooperation with Great Britain, and the other really democratic countries of the world.

May I avail myself of this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to make an appeal to those who seem unduly concerned about the nature of our relationship with Great Britain and other countries of the commonwealth?

Shortly after parliament convened in March an hon. member of the group opposite, for whom I have a great deal of consideration but who is particularly concerned about the fate of Great Britain, asked me what would be the attitude of the Quebec members on the loan to Great Britain. When I assured him that not more than five or six members would oppose the measure from this side of the house, he appeared to be greatly relieved and personally, I was pleased to have so easily allayed his fears. I mention this incident en passant to point out that very often some members opposite—probably as a result of reading a press that is not always too sympathetic—get unduly concerned about the attitude of Quebec. I feel that I know that province far better than hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wish to assure them that they need fear nothing sinister on the part of Quebec.

In the course of the present and past session numerous appeals have come, mostly from the Progressive Conservative members, urging a greater degree of national unity in this country. It was apparent to me that those appeals were directed mostly to the Quebec people through their duly elected representatives in this house. A foreigner listening to such appeals might very easily come to the conclusion that this country is handicapped by a very serious lack of national unity, particularly along cultural lines—and I use the word "cultural" purposely. There is hardly any difference between the members of this house over racial matters; our differences are mostly cultural.

Frankly, I do not believe this country is more divided along any line of thought than any other country in the world. At the same time, one must admit there are a number of matters of national interest about which there exists a wide divergence of views. We have an example of that right in the senate to-day. There is also a great divergence of opinion, for instance, on the amount of controls we should retain in this post-war period; on the attitude of the government towards labour and labour relations; on monetary policies; on the extent of government interference with private enterprise; on external affairs; on the extent to which we should assert our sovereignty.

On all but the last mentioned of these matters on which public opinion is divided, the cleavage is definitely not along cultural lines. On this latter issue, however, it would seem that my compatriots of French descent, together with members of the C.C.F. party, are prepared to go somewhat farther than most of the Progressive Conservatives and the Social Crediters. Every time the so-called ultra-nationalist group take a stand towards a more distinctive Canadian attitude on public matters, there are some members of the house who take the view that somebody is endeavouring to weaken our ties with Great Britain and the other countries of the commonwealth. This talk of weakening our ties with the countries of the commonwealth does not come from this side of the house, and for that reason one may be justified in wondering which group is more likely to contribute to the weakening of the ties. Frankly I feel that if those gentlemen were to remain silent on this matter they would help their own cause a good deal more. There is nothing more likely to create doubt in a person's mind than to be constantly talking about the problems which constitute the subject of such doubts.

During the short time in which I have been in this house it has struck me whenever a measure such as the one now before the committee happens to meet with the approval of the Quebec members, some hon. members opposite come to the conclusion that there must be some sinister design behind it and that it should be systematically opposed. I hope that my hon. friends opposite will recognize that there was no sinister anti-British design in the minds of my Quebec ancestors when they refused to listen to Lafayette, Franklin, and others at the time of the American revolution; that there was no sinister design in their minds when they defended this country against the Americans during the war of 1812-14. Which group was trying to weaken the ties, and where were the sinister designs, when in 1849 a move was made for annexation of this country to the United States? I shall not take up time by giving the quotation I had intended to give at this point.

If I refer to those historical facts it is not with the view of recalling incidents which may be pleasant or unpleasant to one group or another. It is only to reassure some of our friends on the other side about the position of the so-called ultra-nationalists so kindly referred to in an article of the Ottawa Journal of April 16, which I quote:

Young Men in a Hurry

Why are our young ultra-nationalists, so influential with the present government, in such an infernal hurry with their ultra-nationalist schemes? In a single session of parliament we have measures to change "Dominion day" to "Canada day," to make Canadian citizenship more narrowly Canadian, and to create a "distinctive Canadian flag."

I shall dispense with reading another paragraph which I intended to read. The editorial establishes clearly that in some quarters there is a great deal of suspicion as to the loyalty of a group of Canadians in this country. May I quote from a letter published in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday over the signature of J. H. Bender, of Montreal:

Once more the Conservative party has resolved to try to regain the support it once commanded in this small conservative-thinking old province of Quebec.

The writer says in substance there is a suspicion about the loyalty of the French Canadians in some parts of Canada. I intended to quote a few paragraphs but that is the substance of it, and I do not want to take up too much time so I shall dispense with reading it. But I wish to bring this well-timed letter to the attention of the committee.

Let us be realistic for a moment, and ask ourselves what Quebec could possibly do to weaken its ties to the commonwealth. I see but two alternatives: annexation to the United States, and separatism. Hon. members who have studied the history of this country must have learned that the greatest opposition to annexation has come from Quebec. As to the suggestion sometimes lightly advanced of an independent Quebec state, it is simply preposterous. Some people, and Canadians of French culture are no exception to the rule, have a peculiar sense of humour. There are a few in Quebec who, in an academic frame of mind, choose once in awhile to talk separatism. In my opinion they do so primarily to tease credulous people like some of our friends opposite. Nobody in Quebec takes them seriously, let alone the recognized leaders or leaders of the so-called "nationalist" movement in that province, who declared publicly and in no uncertain terms that they were definitely opposed to separatism. I am sure that the supposedly "ultra-nationalist" members of this house would express the same opinion if they were asked to give their views on this much abused question.

I believe a false impression is sometimes created outside of Quebec over the fact that the people of that province have to complain at times about certain alleged grievances. This government has been accused by extremists of catering to Quebec, and in a recent Gallup poll some two per cent of the people interviewed stated that they adhered to the Progressive Conservative party because the Liberals were favouring Quebec too much. The conclusive answer to this ridiculous contention is to be found in the memorable speech of the Prime Minister in the course of the short session during the autumn of 1944.

In my opinion, people of French descent, who have made an immense contribution to the upbuilding of this country, have been forced to accept a great many concessions and unpleasant situations in order that this common venture of confederation may be made a real success. Despite the fact that dark clouds may accumulate on the horizon at times, I honestly believe that this confederation has been an outstanding success, and had it not taken place, this country could not have developed and progressed to a point where it commands the admiration of the whole world. I am very frank in stating that in this common venture, it is the minority which has been forced to take most of the bumps. I do not begrudge the situation too much, as I realize that our lot is not uncommon with that of other minorities. I do not suggest for one moment that it would be better if we had to deal with a majority of another race and culture. It is possibly far better. But because the Anglo-Saxon people are reputed to be fair, broad and tolerant, as I believe the vast majority of them are, the minority group may reasonably expect from them a more liberal treatment than that generally accorded to other minorities in other parts of the world.

In my opinion if the amendment proposed should be accepted it would go a long way towards promoting a better understanding between the different groups of this country. I take the view that there cannot be any serious reason for refusing to accept the amendment. I know that objection has been raised by the Secretary of State, to the effect that it would necessitate the amendment of a great many federal and provincial laws. Well, I have a suggested amendment which would cover that if it were accepted. I have no experience of drafting legislation, but I suggest that section 26 should be amended by adding to it a subsection 2 as follows, or substantially as follows:

(2) Whenever, by virtue of any law now in force in Canada, or any regulation made thereunder, the rights and privileges of any person shall depend upon his status as a British subject, or whenever said law or regulation shall impose duties and obligations upon a British subject, then any Canadian citizen shall enjoy all such rights and privileges, and shall be bound by said duties and obligations in the same manner as if he were a British subject.

I humbly suggest that that amendment would cover the objection raised by the Secretary of State.

Mr. REID: Is the hon. member moving that as an amendment?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, I cannot move another amendment.

Mr. REID: Good.

Mr. MICHAUD: I appeal to my compatriots. They have themselves accepted many sacrifices for the common cause, and they will again—not with any great degree of enthusiasm—accept another measure which is before the house for the benefit of Great Britain. I honestly believe that they are being asked more often than their turn to forget their point of view in order to concur in the views of the majority.

As members of parliament we are in a position to wield considerable influence with our constituents, and we ought to assume that responsibility courageously. The vast majority of our electors have not the time to study the very complex problems which confront us. They depend on us to a great extent to give them the cue. The vast majority of our electors are intelligent people—otherwise we would not be here—and because they are intelligent they are likely to listen to us, provided we play the game with them and endeavour to enlighten them.

As far as the Quebec members are concerned, hon. members know that there is considerable opposition in their province concerning a certain bill presently before the house. What would they do about it? The Minister of Justice took the lead, gave the cue and most of the other members in their turn followed suit, with the result that the opposition has practically waned out. On this point I too did my share almost a month ago, although with no great degree of enthusiasm, but I felt it was my duty to take my stand and support the measure.

If hon. gentlemen who oppose this amendment would be kind enough to make a step in our direction and take it upon themselves to defend the amendment, I feel sure that they would easily rally the opinion of the majority of Canadians if it were properly explained.

Let me say that it is futile to expect to reach a much larger degree of national unity in this country if the minority is always asked to yield to the views of the majority. I shall conclude with a sentence from Lord Acton, as follows:

> The most certain test by which we judge whether a country is really free is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities.

Amendment (Mr. Alistair Stewart) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Rights and obligations.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to say a word or two in connection with this section. I need not apologize for taking up any of the time of the committee, because so far I have not taken part in the debate on this bill on any of the stages it has gone through. There are, however, a number of observations which I feel it my duty to make to the committee. But before doing so I wish to join with those who at other stages of the discussion have complimented the Secretary of State on having brought the bill before the house. I would remind the minister as well as other hon. members that, speaking in this house several years ago, I called attention to the desirability of something of this kind, and also pointed out the unfortunate position in which many of our people found themselves when the census official came around, because they were at a loss to understand why they could not call themselves Canadian citizens.

This section provides that a Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of the act, be entitled to all the rights, powers and privileges and be subject to all the obligations, duties and liabilities to which a natural-born Canadian citizen is entitled. That is something on which the Secretary of State should be congratulated. In another section of the bill provision is made for a certain amount of education along these lines. But this, I would point out, is something that has been long overdue. When we are talking about rights and privileges I rather feel that we all, in years gone by, have been too negligent in impressing upon those who take upon themselves the citizenship of this country that the rights and privileges went along with corresponding duties and obligations.

Too often in the past have interests in this country, too often have different people, for their own purposes, made use of those who were brought in from other lands. They treated them well, no doubt, so long as it suited their purposes to do so, and then cast them aside and made light of their entry into Canada.

I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that many people came to the country from foreign lands with an honest and sincere desire to establish homes here for themselves, their children and their children's children for generations to come. While it is quite true—I am sorry I have to admit the fact—that occasionally some, a small number compared to the total number of those who came in, have not shown themselves worthy of the benefits, rights and privileges conferred upon them in the citizenship granted to them at that time, nevertheless the vast majority of those who came from other lands and assumed their duties and responsibilities, together with the rights and privileges that were conferred upon them, were sincere, and have endeavoured to live up to their responsibilities throughout the years. Too often have we in one way or another led them to believe that so far as the rest of us were concerned we were only too eager, when occasion arose, to treat their citizenship documents as a mere scrap of paper to be torn up at somebody's pleasure. On two occasions within our memory we have had people in this country who fulfilled every duty and obligation imposed upon them by their citizenship, and then we have found those people treated in a way unbecoming to citizens of Canada.

I regret to have to draw attention to this, but right in the constituency I have the honour to represent there were dozens and dozens of people, at whom I defy anyone to point the finger of suspicion or scorn, who had to go to the mounted police and have their fingerprints recorded. They had to report regularly—people who had sons in the active services—people with sons overseas in defence of their country of adoption. And yet someone has been responsible for having these people report regularly to the mounted police over a period of time, incurring the stigma attached to having their fingerprints taken. Do you call that doing something, with respect to people coming from foreign lands in order to take out citizenship papers here, to make them fully conscious of the privileges conferred upon them? Does treatment of this kind encourage them?

I suggest to the Secretary of State that when this bill becomes the law of the land and we confer on these people the rights and privileges, the duties and responsibilities of citizens, we and those succeeding us as a government must also consider that there is a duty, a responsibility upon us to see that those rights and privileges are not violated. I say that with all the power at my command.

I have throughout these years constantly endeavoured to impress upon the people I meet the fact that we all have our duties and responsibilities, and I have placed greater emphasis on the duties and responsibilities than on the rights and privileges. I appeal for assistance to get this message across, assistance to have it recognized that as a government we also have duties and responsibilities.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I ask the Secretary of State why, in line 9, a change has been made from the previous legislation, the word "political" having been left out? Previously the section read: "A Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all political rights, powers and privileges."

Mr. MARTIN: The reason is that it was misleading. Many people who were naturalized thought that because the word was there it gave them the right to vote at once in any province, municipality, and so on, and the department was flooded with letters, on occasions of provincial elections, from people wanting to know why they had not the right to vote. They had become naturalized citizens, and they could vote provincially when they had acquired the right by having complied with the requirements of the provincial act. There was objection also that the word "political" tended to be used, not by anyone in this house but by some people, as a sort of stick over the heads of prospective citizens of Canada. Individuals hear that someone is going to apply for naturalization and they go to him and say: "If you do not, you are going to be deported," and so on. We have given consideration to the matter and believe it would be more desirable and less misleading to leave the term out.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not the proper word "all"? Delete the words "political rights" and so on and say "all".

Mr. MARTIN: All rights.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that would be wider.

Mr. MARTIN: But political rights do not include all rights. All this section says is that once a person becomes naturalized in this country he has all the rights of a natural born citizen. That is strong and in a proper sense less misleading.

With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Humboldt, I thank him in the name of the government for what he said about the measure. It is desirable that a measure of this kind should have wide support in the country and in the house. This bill has received the kind of support from all parties which will ensure its being a useful instrument in our national life. I fully concur in what he said about naturalized Canadians and I expressed that concurrence in the statements I made on first and second readings and in my reply on second reading. I have pointed out that the people who come to this country from other lands, regardless of their ethnical origin, must be received by us as equals once they are taken into the Canadian family. They are part of this community, helping to build it up, and they must be treated as such. At the same time we must call to their attention the fact that there are obligations which all of us, naturalized and natural born, must assume. There are also privileges and rights which are sacred and powerful, and which we want these people to enjoy. Therefore I fully concur in what the hon. gentleman has said, and I join with him again in paying a tribute to the people of his constituency and the constituencies of all hon. members. Certainly in my own constituency I have many excellent people who have come from other lands, Europe and elsewhere; who have merged themselves into Canadian life, and whose sons and daughters are a great credit to the country. I always think of a certain young girl as a good example. Before I became Secretary of State, and when I first became a member of parliament, I took from my own community as my secretary a young Polish girl who now has an important position with UNRRA. She was not born in this country, but she went to the schools in Windsor. Her father and mother had been born in Poland. She won prizes at the high school. She lived in this vicinity for eight years and many here knew her. She was an outstanding person. She is simply one of many such people throughout this country who are a great credit to Canada, and everything that we can do to see that the status they have acquired is recognized by all groups will be done by this government in the administration of this act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This section makes a profound declaration. It declares that—

A Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all rights, powers and privileges and be subject to all obligations, duties and liabilities to which a natural-born Canadian citizen is entitled . . .

I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member for Humboldt. He spoke with feeling, great wisdom and with a full realization of a situation which prevailed, as he said, twice in the lifetime of many people, particularly in western Canada. I think of my own constituency and of one particular part of it where 175 people, whose fathers came from Germany, served overseas in the late war in the armed forces of this country. That is why I pressed so strongly the other day, but without success, to have done away with once and for all this regulation under which at each succeeding census those who are Canadians are required to register on the basis of race. That is why I introduced the amendment, which was defeated, to do away once and for all with the one thing which in my judgment and in the judgment of many others does not contribute to the unity of Canada.

The Secretary of State has just made the statement that so far as this section is concerned, regardless of ethnical origin, once a person becomes a Canadian citizen he has all the rights, powers and privileges of a natural-born Canadian citizen. Is that strictly true? Last night just before adjournment I brought up the situation respecting the Japanese, which comes directly within the ambit of this section. I shall read the section again:

A Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all rights, powers and privileges . . .

Not subject to the provisions of orders in council that were passed last fall. After this bill becomes law, and I reiterate what I said last evening more strongly now after listening to the explanation of the Secretary of State—so far as section 27 is concerned, any Canadian citizen other than natural-born, regardless, to use the Secretary of State's own words, of ethnical origin, is entitled to all rights, powers and privileges of a natural-born Canadian citizen. What are these rights? They are clear. They certainly do not permit of deportation except under paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 21. I point out to the Minister of Veterans Affairs that this section is much stronger in support of the contention I raised last night than was the section to which I referred earlier. Section 21 provides that a person can only lose his citizenship under paragraph (a) if he is disloyal. In other words he has:

—during any war in which Canada is or has been engaged, unlawfully traded or communicated with the enemy; (b) has obtained a certificate of naturalization or of Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud, or concealment . . .

He has committed a crime or has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty. There is one other provision that has no application at all. May I make myself clear? I agree with the Secretary of State when he says that Canadian citizenship does mean something. I ask him how by any stretch of the imagination he can argue that these orders in council passed in October last can be effectual as against section 27 when it is passed? I repeat: subject to the provisions of this bill any Canadian citizen other than natural-born is entitled to all rights. Does the Secretary of State suggest now that any law officer of the crown will give the opinion that an order in council passed before this bill is passed can have any effect as against section 27; or is this a means of affording a fortuitous circumstance whereby the government will not be forced to continue with its policy?

Mr. MARTIN: This section is now the law and has been the law for thirty-three years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is all right; it has been the law, but not as far as a citizenship act is concerned. You see, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend takes two or three different positions. One day he says there is nothing in this, that it has been the law for thirty years. In the next breath he says we are creating a new citizenship in this country, with new rights and new responsibilities. He cannot have it both ways. I am not going to carry on that argument; my hon. friends may continue it, but I am pointing out plain words which do not require any lawyer or any judge for their interpretation. A Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of this bill, be entitled to all rights, powers and privileges. To interpret those words does not require any of the special knowledge that the hon. member for Cape Breton South suggested was possessed by the legal fraternity; and let me say that I have often thought what a wonderful lawyer he would have made, because even without that training he is able to argue as few lawyers can. But it does not require any legal interpretation; it does not require any splitting of hairs. There are the words; and I ask now not only that the Secretary of State place before the committee the general legal opinion that was given by the Department of Justice, but also in what way plain words are to be interpreted differently from their plain import and meaning.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 27 carry? Carried.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Chairman, I want an answer.

Mr. MARTIN: What answer does my hon. friend want? I told him I would put the question to the Department of Justice and when that legal opinion is prepared it will be given to the committee, but I am not the Minister of Justice.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver East, for a change, because to my way of thinking one does not need to be a lawyer to understand what this means. If you give a man all the rights of citizenship you cannot move him from one province to another or do anything at all with him; and why should you? I will go this far; why should you, even if he is a Jap or anybody else? If he is a Canadian citizen he is entitled to every right as a Canadian citizen as far as I am concerned. The hon. member for Vancouver East did not expect me to say that. I do not think there are any ifs, ands or buts about the matter. I am no lawyer; if I were I would rather hope to be a defeated candidate and be made a judge.

Mr. MacINNIS: That would be another poor judge.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I just agreed with you, and I expected something a little kinder than that. I think the minister should give us something definite on this matter, or he should not bring in such a section. Why are we going to all the expense of taking the matter to the privy council? I never saw a lawyer work for nothing yet.

Mr. FULTON: What are we doing in this house?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are just wasting our time talking about that, without knowing if this is to be the law. Will the minister definitely say that the Department of Justice, or whoever passes upon these things, has stated that these orders in council will stand?

Mr. MARTIN: I can only repeat what I have said already, that I am not the Minister of Justice. Last night the hon. member for Lake Centre asked if I would request the law officers of the crown to give an opinion, and I have done so. They will give their opinion to the Minister of Justice at the first opportunity, I presume, but I am not the minister of that department, and it would be wholly presumptuous on my part to give an opinion. We have to rely upon the law officers of the crown, and their opinion will come in due course.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then will the minister hold over this section for the time being? I do not think he had any right to bring it in before obtaining an opinion from the Department of Justice. Will he hold this over until we know where we stand legally? Apparently the Minister of Justice has no knowledge whether or not it is legal, and I think the minister should have found that out before proceeding with the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot agree to hold over this section, because it has nothing to do with the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman. This section stands by itself, and this has been the law of the land for over thirty years. It is not introducing anything new, and has nothing to do with these deportation orders.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member for Lake Centre says it has.

Mr. MARTIN: Surely the hon. gentleman will not always rely upon what the hon. member for Lake Centre says.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would rely on the legal advice of the hon. member for Lake Centre as against any legal advice you have in your department, when you bring in this sort of thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can we not get away for a few minutes from the matter which seems to be bothering a few of the hon. members from British Columbia? It seems to me we have before us a statute we are being asked to pass. I am entirely out of sympathy with the point of view that has been expressed. I believe anyone, of whatever colour, race or creed, who is a citizen of this country should be accorded all the rights of citizenship that every other citizen enjoys, and that there should be no discrimination whatsoever. We have had a long discussion about the Japanese in British Columbia. We have before us a bill by which we are trying to establish the rights of Canadian citizens, whether they are of this colour or that, of this religion or that, of this tongue or that. Why not consider it quite apart from the question of whether it will affect a particular group in a particular section of this country, and then, if necessary, let the courts decide that issue, as we do in connection with other legislation? I am no lawyer, but personally I hope this will give equal rights to all people in our country when we accept them as citizens in our midst. I say that because we are trying to practise what we preach. The other day I was delighted to learn something I did not know before, that in Saskatchewan, where we have a C.C.F. government, that policy has prevailed and we have two outstanding young Canadians of Japanese origin, one a doctor and the other a lawyer, serving that province in their professional capacities.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am always glad to answer a question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then can the hon. member tell me why the premier of Saskatchewan and his C.C.F. government are going against the very principle which the hon. member for Vancouver East and I have preached, that if you are a Canadian citizen you should have every right of the country. Why does the premier of Saskatchewan say he will take only a certain number of Japanese in his province? Does he not believe in Canadian rights?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not the case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But that is what he said.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not going to try to answer for the premier of Saskatchewan. I know him pretty well, and I know his view, which is that Saskatchewan is prepared to take Japanese citizens—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Up to 1,200.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not up to a limited number; that it is prepared to take citizens, not Japanese citizens, which is a different matter, but Canadians of Japanese origin.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not what he said.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what he said.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Pardon me, but it is not.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This discussion is not relevant to this section. I hope hon. members will confine their remarks to the section with which we are dealing.

Mr. REID: Following what has been said by the leader of the C.C.F., may I say that my objection to the section is that it does not give equal status. The minister has admitted that it does not. That was my objection last night, and I still object. We talk too glibly about equal status. Yet the minister admits it does not give that. What status does it give the naturalized citizen? It does not give equal status with the natural-born, and I am objecting on this ground. If we are to give them equal status, then let us say so. But do not be fooled by it; do not say one thing and think another. Make no mistake about it; it does not give equal status to the man who is naturalized.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. GREEN: The situation is just not as simple as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar seems to think. Last December, through the Prime Minister, the government announced its policy with respect to Japanese in Canada.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member is out of order when he discusses that matter on this section.

Mr. GREEN: I think you will find in a minute or two, Mr. Chairman, that I am very much in order. Other hon. members have been allowed to discuss it.

Mr. CASSELMAN: And he is not reading his speech, either.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, I was ruled out of order last night when I tried to speak to another section. If the debate is open on this section, then I have a long deferred speech I should like to make.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We will answer it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Vancouver East was ruled out of order because it was decided that sections 16 and 17 should stand. I think he should have had an opportunity to speak, but the committee decided to let those sections stand. There will still be an opportunity for the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is open now.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. GREEN: I wish to deal with section 27 of the bill. As I said a minute ago, the government announced a policy on December 15 of last year.

Mr. MARTIN: On what subject?

Mr. GREEN: The Japanese problem.

Mr. MARTIN: On a point of order, this section deals simply with the proposition that naturalized Canadian citizens will have the same rights as natural-born Canadians, subject to the provisions of the bill. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, surely that is the only issue involved.

Then, on the point the hon. member has in mind, there will be opportunity in the discussion of suggested amendments to section 17. Surely, however, this discussion should be in the proper place.

Mr. GREEN: On that point, the hon. member for Lake Centre contended that section 27, if passed, would override the orders in council passed last December, and he was quite in order in making that submission. There has been no suggestion that he was out of order, and several other hon. members have spoken on the same subject. It is on that point I wish to speak. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee, that I have a perfect right to do so.

This section purports to confer certain rights, and I propose to deal with the question of—

Mr. MARTIN: It does not deal with rights, at all.

Mr. GREEN: —whether or not it overrides the orders in council.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I believe the hon. member is out of order in discussing government policy in connection with the Japanese when this section is before the committee. I believe he will agree with that.

Mr. GREEN: I certainly do not.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it not within the right of a member to discuss the effect of this section? That is all the hon. member is asking to do. His argument is that if this section be passed one of its effects will be to annul what we call an order in council, or legislation now existing. With great respect I submit that is one of the elementary purposes of discussion, namely to find out the effect of legislation to be enacted.

Mr. COLDWELL: Other hon. members having been allowed to discuss this problem, and having in mind the manner in which the matter has been raised, I think in all probability the hon. member might be in order in discussing it now. But may I respectfully submit to him and to other hon. members that there is bound to be a discussion when the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre is before us. It seems to me we would save a great deal of time if we tried to discuss this matter at one time.

No doubt the hon. member for Vancouver East and Vancouver South will make fairly lengthy speeches, and I can see something coming over the face of the hon. member for New Westminster which might indicate that he will have something to say.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. REID: The hon. member is right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And Fraser Valley.

Mr. STEWART: And Winnipeg North.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can we have those speeches on the section where there would be no doubt as to their being in order.

Mr. MARTIN: On section 17.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I have no desire to curtail debate, but I believe it is the duty of the Chair to have members deal with the sections under discussion. There was a lengthy debate on the principle of the bill before we went into committee. The question now introduced has been discussed repeatedly, not only in connection with this bill, but at other times. However, I am in the hands of the committee, and it must decide whether the hon. member for Vancouver South shall discuss the matter now, or wait until the committee discusses the amendment offered by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Either procedure would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. MARTIN: Last night we held over two sections so that this very matter could be discussed. Section 17 was set aside particularly for that purpose. The same procedure was taken in connection with section 16, although I thought it had no relevance. When we come to that I shall have something to say by way of some additions. In view of these facts I suggest that is the way we ought to leave it.

Mr. GREEN: May we have section 27 stand?

Mr. MARTIN: No, we cannot let every section stand. We left two standing last night, so that this matter could be discussed, and so that I could give consideration to a matter mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South. There will be ample opportunity for discussion, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said. I would suggest with great respect that we pass this section, and later come to the others before the close of the day.

Mr. GREEN: I have a suggestion to make to the minister respecting an amendment which I think would meet the situation.

Mr. MARTIN: In connection with section 27?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member is about to move an amendment to the section, he is in order.

Mr. GREEN: No. I am not. But I am suggesting to the minister that there is a possibility here of conflict between two governmental policies, one of which was announced last December and implemented by order in council, and the second of which is found in the citizenship bill. Would it not meet the difficulty if an amendment were inserted—

Mr. MARTIN: In this section, or this measure?

Mr. GREEN: I do not care where it is put. It would state that nothing in this act shall override the provisions of orders in council 7355, 7356 and 7357, passed on December 15, 1945, and would make it dead clear that the policy adopted last December by the government is to be carried through.

If something of that sort is not done, we may be met with a situation wherein, once the citizenship bill is passed without any amendment of this kind, it would be said, "Oh, well, it is too bad. We had our Japanese policy; but now that this bill has gone through it takes away our power to carry out that policy. It is just too bad. The Japanese may go back to British Columbia. Of course we feel very sorry for you, but we cannot do anything about it." I suggest that the government give consideration to inserting an amendment along the line I have suggested.

Mr. MARTIN: I have given consideration to it, but my mind is not made up. We have now before the officials a proposed amendment which would properly come under section 46. I am not saying now that we shall accept it, but that is the section under which it should be considered. I may have an opportunity to consider it during the dinner recess.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely we have had sufficient reason shown for the minister to hold over section 27. Reference has been made to the fact that there has been considerable debate on this bill. I was not the only one on second reading to ask the government to make its statement to bring us up to date on the question of its Japanese policy. The subject was reintroduced last evening on sections 16 and 17, and they were allowed to stand. But we are now discussing section 27, and the hon. member for Lake Centre calls attention to the fact that in his view there is a conflict between section 27 and the government's policy as announced.

Mr. MARTIN: Cannot we deal with that when we consider the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver South? I think he has suggested the proper course to deal effectively with the matter. I am not saying that we shall accept it, but if we do, the place to do it is under section 46.

Mr. STIRLING: Then the only course for us is to hold over section 27 until the minister makes up his mind. The hon. member for Lake Centre raises the question of conflict between this section and the government's policy. The Secretary of State says that he is not prepared to answer him now but that the matter has been submitted to the Minister of Justice and in due course an expression of opinion by the Department of Justice will be forthcoming. Then I say most certainly this section should stand until this committee has received that opinion. It is just as much worthy of standing as sections 16 and 17. They are all linked together, and now the minister links this section with section 46.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Vancouver South has proposed an amendment which it would be proper to consider on section 46; that is the place to deal with it. I am sure he will agree with me that if the amendment is something along the lines we expect, it will meet the point. I do not want to hold over section after section. All that this section does is simply to say that the naturalized person has the same rights as the natural-born.

Mr. REID: He has not.

Mr. MARTIN: Subject to the provisions of this bill. We can deal with the matter under the proper section, which is section 46. The mere fact that one hon. member says that this is the section to deal with it does not make it so. It is obvious that section 46 is the place. The hon. member will be fully safeguarded. I urge the committee to allow this section to pass now in the in the interest of progress.

Mr. STIRLING: If the minister would say that when we come to section 46 he is going to amend it in such and such a way we should have no reason for asking that this section stand, but all he says is that the matter is still under consideration by his officials. We have no intimation as to the intention of the government with respect to section 46 and most certainly therefore the course for us is to have section 27 stand.

Mr. MARTIN: I have been as frank as I could. I said that I have been considering this matter but hon. gentlemen will appreciate that this is a complicated measure. We are considering an amendment somewhat along the lines which the hon. member for Vancouver South has mentioned, but I have not yet had a chance to see that amendment, and I do not want to say to the committee that it will be accepted. I think I have gone as far as I could. It certainly will not affect section 27.

Mr STIRLING: It certainly does in our view.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—British subjects under the laws of other countries of the British commonwealth.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I ask for elucidation of one point? The hon. member for Eglinton has one idea with respect to a British subject and I have another. A British subject is one who was born in the British dominions or British possessions. Section 2(g) provides that "country of the British commonwealth" means:

For the purposes of this act a country listed in the first schedule to this act.

In the first schedule the United Kingdom appears. Does that include crown colonies and dependencies and India?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. There is no doubt about that. The hon. member for Swift Current asked a question on that last night.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether Ireland which is mentioned in the first schedule includes Eire as well as Northern Ireland?

Mr. REID: That is a $64 question.

Mr. MARTIN: Northern Ireland comes under the United Kingdom.

Mr. GREEN: Would a person born in India who has come to Canada and been here the necessary time to acquire Canadian domicile be considered a Canadian citizen under the terms of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Even though India is not mentioned in the schedule?

Mr. MARTIN: India is not a country with nationality laws of her own. These matters are determined for India by United Kingdom statutes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yesterday afternoon and evening the hon. member for Eglinton corrected the statement I made about some of these people. The Secretary of State has now corrected him and shown that my statement was correct.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is just for the record.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Martin.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the committee should return to section 21. I must apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North for neglecting to bring his amendment before the committee. Just before eleven o'clock last night he had proposed to amend section 21 by deleting subsection 1(d) and substituting the following therefor:

has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Section 21(1)(d) reads:

(d) has, since becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, been for a period of not less than six years ordinarily resident out of Canada and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada.

The amendment proposed is:

has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Is the committee in favour of the amendment?

Mr. GREEN: I wish to ask the minister a question with regard to this section.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This is section 21, subsection 1 (d). This is the clause we renumbered. The clause reads as follows:

has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty.

The amendment reads:

has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to support the government in connection with this amendment.

Mr. MARTIN: May I thank the hon. gentleman? It is a relief.

Mr. GREEN: It is a terrible thing to have to agree with the minister, but I think he is quite right in this case. This provision has stood in our naturalization law for at least thirty years, and I believe it is necessary, to deal with exactly the type of cases to which the minister referred last night. I would point out to members of the committee that a new provision has been added in this section under which the minister and the governor in council cannot act to deprive a person of his citizenship without first giving him notice and without the appointment of a commission to inquire into all the facts. In other words, the person whose citizenship is under attack is given a very wide power of making his case, and I do not think there is the slightest chance of his losing his citizenship unfairly. I suggest that the government be supported in maintaining the clause as it appears in the bill.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not follow the reasoning of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He says that a person whose citizenship was under attack would have every opportunity, by appearing before a competent commission, to prove his innocence. By what line of reasoning would he not agree that it would be better to have the person formally charged and enabled to prove his innocence before a competent court of law?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has put his finger on the reason why I think the subsection should stay as it is. Most of the revocations have to do with people who have left the country. I would say that 90 per cent—my deputy puts it at more that—are cases of people who have left Canada. Obviously we cannot deal with them in our courts. As the hon. member for Vancouver South has mentioned, I was not content merely to be able to revoke it on the declaration and the pen of the minister. No revocation will take place unless a commission which has been appointed—it is a continuing commission headed by a judge—has an opportunity of going into all the facts alleged by the department, and due notice has been given to the party concerned. For instance, my officials are now in the process of dealing with many hundreds of cases of people—the kind of group I mentioned last night—who have left Canada. In many cases we do not know where they are, so that obviously the amendment which the hon. gentleman has in mind would not meet the objective about which we are really concerned. We deal largely with people outside Canada, and the words used are classic words; they are used throughout the Naturalization Act; they will be found in naturalization acts throughout the commonwealth, and, except for the reference to His Majesty, the language is substantially the same as will be found in the United States act. But the point I wish to make is, first of all, that if we accepted the amendment we could not deal with the cases we have to deal with, and, second, such case is not being dealt with through any bureaucratic method, but is dealt with following proper notice to the party concerned, who is given a full chance, through representation by counsel and the like, to show whether or not the revocation should take place.

Mr. BENTLEY: The explanation is reasonable and clear. I am not going to argue about it, because I can quite see that you cannot bring an absentee before a court of law. The minister, however, just stated that this condition applies to the large majority of cases, 90 or 95 per cent, but there might be a small percentage which would be left here, and I do not see why this amendment could not be accepted and applied to the case of those who may not be absent. Is there not some way that the minister could give an assurance that those who are in the country and can be formally brought and charged before a court will be dealt with in that way?

Mr. MARTIN: The cases are so infinitesimally insignificant in number that there is not much point to be concerned about. If a man is in the country he has his rights in the courts. Nobody can deprive him of them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am very much interested in the last few words of the Secretary of State. This is the first time I have ever heard it enunciated that a person had any rights in the courts under a section such as this, once a decision has been made on the part of this commission or committee. I should be interested to hear of one case where a decision made by a bureaucratic body—or an administrative body, if you would sooner have it in that way—could, under a section such as this—

Mr. MARTIN: Do not misunderstand me. What I mean is that this commission we have is headed by a judge, and one holding a high judicial office, usually in the supreme court. The last judge who headed the commission was the chief justice of Manitoba; and he has two people associated with him. I did not mean "the courts" in the sense of police courts or anything of that sort.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the suggestion made by the hon. member for Swift Current is a good one. It may be that the number of cases wherein it is proposed to revoke the citizenship of someone living in this country is very small; but, however small, the persons concerned have the right to be protected under our law, and I am hesitating very much indeed to allow in our acts of parliament the setting up of commissions, even when headed by a judge, who can assume powers which ought to be exercised only by the courts.

I am not going to discuss that further this afternoon, but on another occasion I intend to have something to say about the manner in which our judicial processes have been set aside and commissions—composed of very worthy and reliable judges—have been set up to act in a manner contrary to every fundamental of British and Canadian justice. I am not disposed to support in any bill the setting up of commissions of this description which have to decide anything as important as whether a man should be deprived of his citizenship. It may be that it is impossible to bring action in a court against a man who is absent. I am not a lawyer and I do not follow the law cases, but I seem to have hazy recollections of cases of persons who have been ordered to appear before courts of law and who have not appeared because they could not appear, and have been tried and sentenced in their absence. Even if the number of cases is infinitesimal, as the minister says, I am not disposed to allow this kind of thing to continue. We have had in recent days what I consider an abuse of this kind of thing. I want to see a citizen, even if it is only one citizen, adequately protected under the law. The hon. member for Swift Current suggested a way out and I would ask the minister to give consideration to it.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot say I am not impressed. I think we had better let the section stand. There is a strong case for the suggestion.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not meet the objection if we provided that the inquiry should be by the court? The minister already has power in the section to refer the matter to a court or commissioner, who must be a judge. Why not make the reference solely to the court? That would meet the objection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In some particulars I agree with what the leader of the C.C.F. has stated. I think we have come to the point where the setting up of these commissions should be an earnest study on the part of parliament with a view to doing away with them. The Secretary of State speaks about the fact that a judge will be placed in charge—

Mr. MARTIN: Has been.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —has been in charge of this commission. I know of one commission which has recently been sitting which has set aside all the principles and all the traditions of British law and justice, and it has made a horrible mistake in one case we know of. They were two of the most eminent judges in this country operating under the commission system, which in its very essence can be a denial of British justice.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would that be the first time a court has made a mistake, the first time human beings have made a mistake?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No. The Minister of Labour speaks with such experience on the question of making mistakes that I can understand the present question.

Mr. MITCHELL: One thing about it, I am frank to admit it.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: However, he is an affable fellow and we never have real disagreements. At any rate, this is a case that deserves the attention of parliament. A royal commission sat and tried people—one person, we will say; I will not deal with the others because they are before the courts. They tried him and found him guilty—two high court judges—and a magistrate said there was no evidence whatsoever against him sufficient to commit him. I refer to their report relating to the provisions for the setting up of the commission, at page 20, from which I quote:

> Therefore, there would seem to be no answer on the evidence before us, to a charge of conspiring to communicate secret information to an agent of the U.S.S.R.

That is an example of what happens under commissions. I did not know we were back to section 21, but we are in the position here of approving the setting up of commissions. I am glad my hon. friend, a member of the government, has learned of the importance of having counsel representing the accused—

Mr. MARTIN: I am learning every day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —because he pointed out that in this case counsel would be permitted to be present. But I suggest that while this section may have been here for a long time—

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to agree with the amendment if I can get a chance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, you are?

Mr. MARTIN: I said so a long time ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. MARTIN: I did.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, he did.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He must have been conducting a conversation.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman was engaged in other things when I said I was impressed by the argument to which I had listened, and I was impressed, because it has troubled me. I would therefore ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to move now that paragraph (e), which as amended is now (d), be amended by inserting after the word "has" the words "if out of Canada", and after "His Majesty" the words "or, if in Canada, has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction".

Mr. GLEN: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 29—Rights of aliens.

Mr. MacNICOL: In subsection 2 (b) there are the words "qualify an alien to be the owner of a Canadian ship". Can the alien be the captain or master of a ship he owns trading between Canada and some foreign country, and if qualified as captain or master of a Canadian ship while he himself is an alien, can he carry on intercoastal trade in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: That would be governed by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1934, which I think provides that the captain has to be a British subject.

Mr. MacNICOL: In paragraph (d), in line 3, there are the words "mediately or immediately." I interpret the word "mediately" to mean any time in the future, or some time later. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN: This had to be put in because, under the common law, an alien could not hold property.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have I interpreted the word "mediately" correctly?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. That goes back to 1881 and was put in by Sir John A. Macdonald. I quote from the House of Commons debates of 1881, at page 1369:

> But, notwithstanding, it is absolutely necessary that there should be concurrent legislation and that parliament should intervene and have power to deal with this alienage question as well. I believe in all the provinces, by provincial laws, aliens have the right to hold property. But the question of an alien is a matter altogether belonging to the crown or parliament. An alien cannot of course stay in the country except by special permission of the crown—he can only stay on sufferance. By the law of nations now settled, and the concurrence of many treaties between civilized nations, he has a right to trade between nations at peace. An alien can trade and hold property under statute; but he cannot for reasons of state, connected with the existence of the empire, become a permanent occupier or owner of the soil, and liable to all the duties and responsibilities attaching to such ownership. There is no clearer position than that the crown is not bound by an act unless the crown is specially mentioned in it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister give an explanation of the significance of the year 1883?

Mr. MARTIN: That is the date when the act came into force.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the minister mentioned 1881.

Mr. MARTIN: That was when the act was passed. It was proclaimed in 1883.

Mr. SHAW: Subsection 2 of section 29 states:

> This section shall not operate so as to > (a) qualify an alien for any office or for any municipal, parliamentary or other franchise.

It is assumed that the reverse is not true, that it disqualifies him; but what I find confusing is the reference to municipal franchise. It seems to me that the provincial governments determine who shall or shall not vote in the municipality. The same argument applies with respect to the holding of any office in the municipality. It comes to my mind that I had occasion three years ago to talk with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to determine the eligibility of an alien to hold office in a municipal council. It was determined that he could. We checked the War Measures Act which stated specifically that an alien was not disqualified from holding municipal office. Why is specific reference made to municipal franchise, when that falls properly within the jurisdiction of the provinces?

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend will remember that under subsection 25 enumerated head, section 91 of the British North America Act, the power over aliens is given to the parliament of Canada. It is for that reason that we deal with this situation; we are the only body that can. Many hon. members must have had the experience of meeting with individuals who have been in the country for a long time and who perhaps are not aware of what they must do in order to become naturalized citizens and so on. There have been occasions where they have run for office and so on without being British subjects, and wilthout having become naturalized. The dominion government is the only body that can deal with the matter.

Mr. REID: In view of the fact that property rights, under the British North America Act, come under the jurisdiction and authority of the various provinces, if a province passed a law denying an alien the right to hold property, would that affect this section? Which law would prevail?

Mr. MARTIN: I can only repeat what I said, under enumerated head subsection 25 of section 91, the federal parliament is given power over aliens, and the judicial committee has construed that particular section in question as being within our competence.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—Trial of alien.

Mr. SHAW: May I again refer to the matter that I brought up a moment ago? It is still a bit confusing to me. Am I correct in concluding that a provincial government has no right to state whether an alien can or cannot vote in a municipal election or hold office? In other words, if a province asserts in its municipal act by mistake that an alien is qualified, does it take that action contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act?

Mr. MARTIN: No. This section merely says that it shall not have the effect of qualifying any such person to hold municipal office.

Mr. SHAW: It does not disqualify them?

Mr. MARTIN: This section does not qualify anyone.

Mr. COLDWELL: It does not prevent a provincial government from saying in its municipal act that a man need not be a Canadian citizen or a British subject. We know that for years in western Canada, particularly in the newer sections when we had large numbers coming in, they were not there long enough to qualify as citizens. Yet we had to establish school boards or something of that kind, and the result was that under the property rights the qualification to vote and to hold office was there in spite of the fact that a man may not be a citizen. As I take this section, and as I think the minister intends it, it does not prevent the province from allowing that kind of thing.

Mr. MARTIN: This section is not to be construed as giving any qualifications.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or disqualifications.

Mr. REID: With reference to section 30, would the minister explain why in a bill of this kind a section is inserted which states:

An alien shall be triable at law in the same manner as if he were a natural-born Canadian citizen.

I would have thought a section of this kind would appear in the criminal code or in some other law.

Mr. MARTIN: Under the common law an alien had the right to be tried by people who understood his own language; this section was inserted just to remove the doubt.

Section agreed to.

On section 31—Application, where made.

Mr. MacNICOL: How will section 31 conform with the amendment that the minister has proposed to section 10, which has to do with British subjects coming into Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: The amendment which is proposed to section 10 excludes British subjects from the obligation of going into court. This does not affect them.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. GREEN: I think it is not quite as clear at that. Several of the sections deal with court procedure. The minister should consider whether or not, in view of his proposed amendment to section 10, he will have to make a change here. For example, take the manner in which an application is to be made. Is it to be made to the court or to the minister direct?

Mr. MARTIN: Direct to the Secretary of State.

Mr. GREEN: Under section 31 every application would have to be made to the court.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. GREEN: That is the way it reads. It says:

An application for a certificate of citizenship shall be made to the court in the judicial district in which the applicant resides or as otherwise prescribed by regulation.

Mr. MARTIN: This refers to an application to a court, and my amendment refers to a declaration which goes to the minister—two different things.

Mr. GREEN: Should not some words be put in after the word "application", an application to the court?

Mr. MARTIN: That is what it says; an application for citizenship shall be made to the court.

Mr. GREEN: I read it as though every application must be made to the court.

Mr. MARTIN: The other one is not an application; it is a declaration on the part of the British subject. That is the way the amendment reads.

Section agreed to.

Sections 32 and 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Production of evidence.

Mr. GREEN: What about this section? Surely an applicant who is a British subject must make an application to someone. He does not simply file a declaration; he makes an application. Section 34 reads as though he must personally appear in court.

Mr. MARTIN: No, he does not file an application; he simply makes a declaration to the minister. I call attention to my proposed amendment which appears on page 1145 of Hansard:

. . . the minister may grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is a British subject and who makes to the minister a declaration that he desires such certificate . . .

We carefully considered it and used the word "declaration" there; it is not an application; it is a declaration which he makes.

Mr. FLEMING: Would it not help to clarify the matter to provide in this section that it shall be subject to the provisions of section 10? That would remove all question about it and establish clearly that the amendment which the minister proposes to introduce to section 10 shall override any possible contradiction in section 34.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think there is any need for it. We have gone into it carefully. We are quite satisfied. One is a declaration and the other is an application. We want to keep that distinction.

Mr. FLEMING: The concluding words of section 34 deal with personal appearance.

Mr. MARTIN: That is with regard to the applicant for a certificate. A British subject is not an applicant for a certificate; he merely makes a declaration which comes to us.

Mr. FLEMING: I ask the minister what harm there could be in clarifying this position. There could be no objection, I suggest, to the sort of action I have mentioned. It is simply clarifying the procedure, to put it beyond all question.

Mr. MARTIN: We have gone over that, and we think it is quite clear.

Mr. FULTON: Surely a British subject, though he is only required to complete a declaration, eventually will be an applicant for a certificate.

Mr. MARTIN: It will go to him automatically, pursuant to the declaration.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like some information from the minister. There appears to be an anomaly in this clause, in that although a natural-born Canadian is a Canadian citizen and is entitled to a certificate as of right, he must make application therefor to a court under sections 34 and 35, and the onus is upon such applicant to satisfy the court by evidence that he is a fit and proper person to be granted such certificate and that he possesses the required qualifications. As I see it, the possible effect might be that although the natural-born Canadian citizen is entitled to all the rights, privileges and so on of a citizen, he may be refused a certificate of citizenship on the ground that the court did not believe he was entitled to be a Canadian citizen, a status which in my opinion cannot be taken away from him. It seems to me it should not be within the power of any person to refuse a certificate to a Canadian citizen who has not lost his status by establishing domicile in another country.

Mr. MARTIN: I must say I do not get the point of my hon. friend's remarks. To which section is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. HERRIDGE: Section 34, and it also covers section 35. He might be refused a certificate of citizenship on the ground that the court did not believe he was entitled to be a Canadian citizen. In my opinion that is a status which cannot be taken away from him.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not understand the hon. gentleman. This only applies to aliens.

Section agreed to.

Sections 35 and 36 agreed to.

On section 37—Instruction in the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. FLEMINIG: I attach a great deal of importance to sections 37 and 38, as I am sure all other hon. members do, because much of the lack of a sense of citizenship in this country may be ascribed to the fact that there has not been adequate instruction of the type contemplated by section 37. I do not wish to prolong debate on this subject, because we have had some indication already from the minister as to the emphasis which he places upon this section. I am concerned, however, about the method by which the education of adult immigrants may be carried on. I cannot conceive that it is something which should be confined entirely to efforts on the part of the dominion, because it would be very easy for the dominion to run afoul of the rights of the provinces in the field of education.

Mr. MARTIN: We intend to elicit their help.

Mr. FLEMING: That is what I wanted to get at. I should like the minister, if he will, to make a statement as to the thoughts of the administration in regard to bringing about the type of education contemplated by section 37, in cooperation with the provinces, because it seems to me that without the fullest cooperation between the dominion and the provinces in this respect we shall not succeed in fully carrying out the intention set forth in section 37.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman is quite correct, and I think I may as well make a statement on our general plans now. First of all, we intend to encourage all existing bodies who are now and have been for some time engaged in trying to impress upon new citizens the nature of the Canadian scene, something about its history, something about their rights, privileges and obligations, and so on. The work of Canadian clubs in many communities has been so great that I should pay public tribute to them to-day. There has been splendid work by the Daughters of the Empire in many communities, particularly in Ontario. In my own community they have done an exceptional job. Last night I mentioned the work of Mrs. Hamilton whose textbooks for new Canadians, prepared at her own expense, are now being used by the Daughters of the Empire throughout the province. We are going to encourage organizations of this kind to continue that work, and try to persuade other organizations in different communities to take an interest in it as well. In many communities teachers, and others than teachers, conduct night classes at their own expense. There is one in the city of Toronto; there are two in Ottawa, and there are a number in my own city. These people spend many evenings during the year in giving these people instruction in history and that sort of thing, and we shall encourage that. I have already had talks with some ministers of education, and I hope to have talks with all of them, to enlist their cooperation, to get their help and to obtain their point of view so that we can do something along these lines in a very worth-while way. We are giving consideration to the publication of some historical material which we shall ask educational bodies to use. I do not think we should do that work alone; we would rather escape any suggestion that it is done by a government. I believe it should be done by people outside the government. This covers simple facts which perhaps many of us who are natural-born citizens have forgotten.

Mr. FLEMING: What about instruction in languages, too? I think that is highly important. What are the plans for working in cooperation with the provincial educational authorities?

Mr. MARTIN: What does the hon. member mean about languages?

Mr. FLEMING: To assist the adult immigrants in languages.

Mr. MARTIN: In their own languages?

Mr. FLEMING: No; in either English or French.

Mr. MARTIN: There will be instruction in history, in literature and so on. For instance, in some of these classes in my own city actual instruction is given in both French and English. That is also done here in Ottawa. I do not know about Toronto; that is very likely the case there as well, but it is certainly intended to do that sort of thing.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. FLEMING: The minister made it quite clear that he intends to encourage the efforts of these public-spirited bodies and groups in the work they are carrying on. I was wondering if he had something more concrete in the way of plans for assisting provincial educational authorities to carry on the education of adult immigrants in history, languages and so on, in an official way, rather than simply leaving it to the efforts of public-spirited citizens and groups.

Mr. REID: Similar to the United States.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: What kind of assistance, beyond what I have indicated? Does the hon. gentleman mean financial assistance?

Mr. FLEMING: I wondered if the minister had any plans. Might I just elaborate on that; it may assist the minister in his reply. We have a dominion-provincial conference going on, in connection with which we hear nothing except about taxation agreements. Many things in the way of co-operation between the dominion and the provinces should be discussed at such a meeting. We do not know whether or not they have been discussed. The field of education is the exclusive prerogative of the provinces, and I think we are all in agreement that it should remain so. The matter of education is properly a matter for provincial jurisdiction; but here we are talking of education which will be available to adult immigrants to qualify them for something the dominion offers, namely citizenship. Has the government in mind any type of cooperation with provincial educational authorities? I am not speaking now of these worthy groups of public-spirited citizens. Their efforts are commendable, but I think they should be supplemented by something in the way of public efforts to assist adult immigrants to obtain the necessary education. Speaking from experience, I have known a number of most worthy adult immigrants from European countries to whom little or no opportunity has been given to learn the languages or the history of this country or how our institutions work, and I am thinking principally of our political institutions. There has been a sad lack of consideration given to the need for education among adult immigrants coming to this country. I think there is a great field there that has not been adequately tapped yet, and I hope that when this bill becomes law it will not simply be left to the efforts of worthy public-spirited citizens, and that there will be a genuine and vigorous effort on the part of the educational authorities, with the assistance of the department administered by the Secretary of State, to give these people the full opportunity they need to equip themselves for everything that will make them good citizens; because this country, when they do become citizens, will be the better for it.

Mr. MARTIN: I agree; and I thought I had said that we intend to do that. I pointed out that we have already discussed the matter with several of the provincial ministers of education. The act has not been proclaimed. The new citizenship branch has just come over to my department, and we are trying to establish the work along solid lines.

Education is a matter for the provinces, and we would not want to do anything which would interfere with their prerogatives as determined by the constitution. We intend in each province to work in cooperation, doing all we can to give information to potential Canadians along lines that will receive not only the understanding and approval but also the full and hearty cooperation of provincial governments. We have had some discussion with several of these, and I hope before too long the officers of the department and I will be able to continue the discussions with other provinces.

Mr. MacINNIS: After the explanation given by the minister, may I add something to what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton? I do not believe anyone who has given thought or study to the matter of immigration in the past could but be appalled at the exploitation of immigrants who have come to this country. No attempt whatsoever was made to teach them their duties or to inform them of their duties, obligations and rights. Advantage was taken of their lack of understanding of our customs and institutions.

I believe the intentions of the minister are good, because he is interested in education and the great need for it. But the vagueness of the proposals for meeting these needs would serve to show the inadequacy of anything already done. Something positive must be done so that provincial governments will make this part of their duties. These immigrants are children, in the sense that they must be instructed in the knowledge of the constitution of our country. They must be told about their rights and duties as citizens and their relationship to the rest of the community, so that they will have a clear understanding of such matters

I believe it would have the greatest psychological effect in making good citizens of these people if, immediately upon their coming to this country, they were told or if they were made aware that the state had an interest in them, and was interested in seeing that they had an opportunity to do what was best for themselves and for their adopted country. I hope the minister does not leave this matter with the Imperial Order, Daughters of the Empire, or any other organization. It is too important for that.

Mr. MARTIN: I agree with what the hon. member has said. He and the committee at large may be assured that I have a definite interest in this problem. I have felt that there has been a great lack of interest in these proceedings. We want to help these new Canadians, and to inform them, when coming into this national community, that in addition to duties they will have certain privileges.

I have tried to indicate my position. I do not make this as a personal observation, but simply to indicate the spirit in which we are trying to approach this problem. I should point out that as Secretary of State I have written to every person who has been naturalized since I have become minister, extending to each one a welcome, telling something of Canada and pointing out that now they are here they can consider this their country, just as do those of us who were born here, and inviting them to help in every possible way.

Although we have not yet had full opportunity to discuss the matter with the provinces, we have had discussions with Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and have moved through their adult educational branches. I am on the advisory board of the adult educational association of Canada, having held that office before I became minister. It is our hope that we may use agencies such as that, as well as provincial departments of education, to carry out a systematic programme of work which will be both instructive and helpful, and in an effort not to leave new Canadians in the lurch. We have no desire to say, "Well, we have accepted you, but with reservations." We want to avoid that kind of impression with its results.

Let me assure the committee that my approach to this problem will not be the result of any vague plan. But before one can have a plan he must have the cooperation of the provincial departments of education. We are proceeding with that preliminary, and when we have succeeded we hope to be in a position to enlist not only the cooperation of departments of education, with our citizenship branch, but the cooperation of agencies and organizations such as the workers' educational association, the adult education movement and many other worthwhile bodies in Canada who are doing so much good and who are conducted by people who have at heart only the welfare of this country.

I can assure my hon. friend that I shall carry on, on this front, an offensive which, I trust, will meet with the approval of all hon. members.

Mr. REID: Following up what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East, let me say I agree that there is no more appropriate section before us than the present one. Speaking for the people of British Columbia, I can say they have felt for a long time that something more should be done than has been done in the past. So far as my opinion goes, there is no section in the bill concerning which the minister has been more vague. Certainly he has not taken the members of this committee into his confidence at all, but has spoken only in generalities.

He has painted a very nice picture. He will do certain things for these people, and then there will be an appropriate and beautiful ceremony. Everything will be fine. That is all very well, of course, and they are most pleasing generalities. But after this measure passes, the House of Commons will not have much chance to know what takes place. It will rest with the minister and his officials.

The minister has not taken members sufficiently into his confidence. He should tell us what he has in mind, because, knowing him as I do, I have no doubt he has given some thought to what type of ceremony, what kind of education and what kind of test will be given these people, so that they will know more about the country before they are given certificates.

People come to Canada from thirty-six different countries, the political philosophies of many of which are entirely different from those held by hon. members. Has the minister given any thought to what is done in the United States? Over there they outline what a man must know before he is given a certificate of naturalization.

Mr. MARTIN: I have tried to explain that, and I have said we are going to carry out the same procedure; if not, better.

Mr. REID: In the United States it is in their act.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. REID: We are only giving the minister power to do what he likes.

Mr. MARTIN: No; the hon. member made that statement earlier, and it is not correct.

[Mr. Martin.]

Those regulations were not included in the act when it was passed. They were supplemented years later.

PRIVATE BILLS

MOTION FOR SECOND READING OF CERTAIN DIVORCE BILLS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre)—(for Mr. Boucher) moved the second reading of bill No. 37 for the relief of Marie Evelyn Dormer.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are two other bills of the same sort if you desire to take them at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Maybank moves the second reading also of bill No. 48, for the relief of Margaret Ruth Weir Allan, and of bill No. 18, for the relief of Juliana Edmonda Isabella Ferdinanda Becquaert de Beaujeu.

Mr. MAYBANK: I desire to say a few words with reference to these bills before they are given a second reading. So far as I am concerned I am in favour of a general divorce law and I am in favour also of these particular laws being passed at this time. But I am not favourable to the procedure which we have followed since, I think, time immemorial and, speaking on the second reading of these bills, I desire to place on record my views.

As every person knows we have substantially the same divorce law across Canada except in one province, and it is the same divorce law that is administered in the senate of this parliament when these matters are considered there. There is no general divorce law in the province of Quebec. It has developed since some time past that whenever adultery is committed in the province of Quebec and the outraged husband or the outraged wife wants to do anything about it, he or she comes to the parliament of Canada and asks the parliament of Canada to pass a special law, among all the other statutes with which it has to deal, giving her relief as it is called, in the event of a female spouse coming forward, from continued association with her adulterous husband. That occurs one hundred times, two hundred times, three hundred times a year—not the adultery, may I say in reply to a query from behind me, but the application for a law of divorce. It seems to me, sir, that it is not a proper part of the duties of the parliament of this nation to be continually considering, in the midst of its important business, these trivialities. I do not think we should continue to invite petitions of this sort and deal with laws of this sort. If the people of the province of Quebec want a divorce law to be applicable there and do not want to set up divorce courts their views should be respected. I am not suggesting for a moment that any person should even attempt to foist divorce jurisdiction on an unwilling province, whether it be Quebec or any other province. But so far as John Doe and Richard Roe and their spouses are concerned, when they went to Quebec they knew there was no divorce law in that province, and if infidelity occurs on the part of the spouses of either of these men I do not think they should come to this parliament and ask us to pass a special statute to declare unmarried those who theretofore had been married. I believe that we shall never get away from this sort of legislation, improper for this parliament to be dealing with at all, until we make some sort of declaration that this sort of petition will not hereafter be entertained and that petitions of this sort cannot be received by this parliament with any chance of being acted upon.

I would not be in favour in the given case before us of saying no, we will not pass this law, because, after all, we have, by our past practice, been inviting these people to file these petitions, and by the time such a bill reaches a second reading in this chamber the individual concerned has probably spent a great deal of money, and to throw out a case then would be a great hardship to the petitioner. But if some declaration were made in this parliament, that it was improper that these laws should hereafter be passed these petitions would not come forward thereafter. People would be warned, and they would thereafter be advised not to file a petition with the parliament of Canada because in all probability it would not succeed.

When this matter came up last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who was then leading the house, having heard the statements made by different members of the house against passing these bills, said in effect: That is all very well, but the same complaint comes up year after year, when some member rises and declaims against divorce in general and some against divorce in particular but nobody has ever offered any concrete proposal to the government as to what it should do except to follow the course that is being followed. Probably there is merit in that sort of objection by the Minister of Finance. Therefore I should like to suggest that what this parliament should do if it wants to give relief to the minority in the province of Quebec which desires to have a divorce law is to set up an organization which, for want of a better name, we shall call a court sitting here perhaps in the city of Ottawa or somewhere on the right bank of the Ottawa river; and this court could deal with these cases in the same fashion and under the same procedure as they are dealt with in any court in any other part of Canada. It might not, perhaps, pronounce divorce. It might be objectionable to have a court in Ontario pronouncing divorce on people in another province; it might be so; I am not sure that that is the fact. But at any rate that court could proceed as though it had power to decree divorce; it could hear the evidence; it could have at its command the usual officers of a court who might be able to check up where any checking up was necessary; and perhaps, at the conclusion of its hearing, instead of passing a divorce decree it could recommend that there should be a divorce declared. Upon that sort of inquiry, and where that sort of recommendation was given respecting whatever number of cases might come before it, in such a case as that, this parliament could act and not take up time in the same way as has been the case hitherto. That court could have a certain number of officers; it could have the usual court machinery.

Any person who has been reading the divorce proceedings which come before this parliament year in and year out—if anyone were stalwart enough to stay with it year in and year out—would be bound to declare that these divorces in large measure are probably not what they seem, not what they purport to be. In all these cases, for example, the usual declaration in this sort of law is made, that there is not any collusion between the parties Well, in the provinces where there is divorce jurisdiction, when there is a suggestion of collusion the judge acts on it and refers the case to the attorney general of the province, and there is some chance of investigation. But in the way we are now dealing with the matter there is no chance of investigation. Once the declaration is made, that settles the matter. Moreover, there is not any waiting period; when the decree of divorce is granted here it is both original and final at the very time of the declaration. As a matter of fact, I believe the only sort of thing that could be done in a case where a fraud was perpetrated upon what we might term our parliamentary court would be an action in the nature of a perjury charge.

But where there is a court, with the usual court machinery, and where there is an attorney general to whom matters of this sort can be referred in his capacity of king's proctor, as it is called, there is some chance of seeing that there is not a fraud on the procedure.

I should not like to charge any particular person who has secured a divorce from the parliament of Canada, but these cases are so similar, peas in a pod not being more similar than these cases, that it is very difficult for any person to believe that there is not collusion between the parties. As a matter of fact, you get the records of evidence of these divorce cases sent to you and they are fastened with a little wire staple. If that wire staple were ever to come out and the pages got lost you would not need to worry about it; you could put in any of the pages out of any one of the other books.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did you read the Montgomery case?

Mr. MAYBANK: The one the hon. gentleman refers to is distinguished by a few characteristics which are not common to most of them. I do not know to what case he is referring but I know what he said about it is correct. You can shuffle these pages around; you can take page 18 out of book 95, insert it into book 96 and then read book 96, and you will not even notice that you have the two cases mixed up. They are all just the same.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to stop the hon. member, but I wish to raise a point of order. The hon. member is discussing divorce cases in general. What we have before us is a particular divorce case or divorce cases. Supposing we had a bill here for the building of a bridge; I do not think it would be in order to discuss bridges all over the world as something pertaining to this bill. I suggest to you that all this discussion is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. MacINNIS: We are not here to be amused. May I have your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MAYBANK: I had desired—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to speak on the point of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do they have divorces in Japan?

Mr. MacINNIS: We will send the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) there to find out.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, no; you people already have your expenses paid there. That will hold you for a while. You had all expenses paid over there. Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. member for Vancouver will permit me—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Vancouver East.

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. member for Vancouver East will permit an interruption of the discussion on Japan, I wish to say just a word on the point of order which he has raised. I submit, sir, that the particular bill which is before the house—

An hon. MEMBER: "Bill"?

Mr. MAYBANK: The particular bill for the relief of this person who ought to be a litigant is based upon certain principles, and it is those principles I am discussing. He raises the question that if we were discussing the building of a bridge one should not be permitted to talk about the general principles of bridge building all over the world or in some place away from the particular situs of the bridge to be built. I submit he is quite wrong in that, because after all even such a type of discussion as that could easily come within the four corners of the matters to be considered in connection with the particular bill itself. It seems to me that surely in discussing whether or not we shall pass a bill, shall make a law which is a divorce, which is a particular divorce, it is germane to that subject to discuss the general principles of divorce itself and the procedure whereby divorce is obtained. I submit, sir, that I am entirely in order, but of course I shall bow to your ruling upon the point.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to say one word with your permission, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order. I suggest that if the hon. gentleman wants to prevent divorce bills from coming before this parliament he has every right to bring in such a bill, but the bill before us now is to give relief to a certain petitioner. I wonder if he is in favour of the relief or not. That is what he should be talking about. But what he is talking about is whether parliament has the right to discuss such a bill as this.

Mr. LOUIS RENE BEAUDOIN (Vaudreuil-Soulanges) (Translation): Mr. Speaker if I remember rightly, during the last session the leader of the party with which is associated the hon. member who has just raised a point of order did himself raise an objection, at the very moment when the house was called upon to vote on a large number of divorce bills. The same thing is happening to-day. At that time, as I recollect it—and I ask the hon. members to correct me if I am wrong—the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) in raising objections about the divorce bills that had been introduced, did not limit his remarks to the bills placed on the orders of the day, but he also discussed the procedure and all the circumstances which surround the introduction of such bills, as well as their passage in the senate, in the divorce bills committee and in the house of commons. That is why I have risen to speak on that point of order. My purpose is to remind my hon. friend that he should merely follow the course taken by his leader in this connection. To my mind, the hon. member who has the floor does not transgress the rules of the house in discussing the matter the way he does.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is perfectly in order in discussing the principle of divorce in connection with these bills. He is drawing the attention of the house to the fact that a number of divorce bills come from the province of Quebec, the only province in which there is not a divorce court, and he is discussing the question whether it would be wise to take steps to correct a situation which may need to be corrected. These remarks are relevant to the bills actually before the house.

Mr. MAYBANK: I have noted, Mr. Speaker, your remarks to the effect that nearly all these bills come from the province of Quebec. I think I should hasten to say that this large number of divorce cases that have been coming to parliament for the last two or three years do not come exactly from the province of Quebec in the sense of being scattered throughout that province. They come, almost all of them, from one part of Quebec, the large city of Montreal, and it would seem that the general level of virtue of other parts of the province of Quebec than the city of Montreal is very much higher.

Mr. ABBOTT: A wholly unjustified conclusion.

Mr. MAYBANK: The Minister of National Defence appears to take umbrage at what I have said. I am willing to tell him that a member from another part of Quebec to whom I made a similar statement, said, "Oh, no. I think your conclusion is unjustified. The fact of the matter is that, in the community in which I live, we just don't bother about that." They are more touchy in Montreal.

I was saying, at the time the point of order was raised, that there is so great a similarity in these cases that there would appear to me to be collusion, and that, I submit, is due to the very nature of the system itself, the plan we are following. If you take the evidence from one case and insert it into the book giving the evidence of another you will not find any difference. It reminds me of what G. K. Chesterton said of the writings of Charles Dickens, that he had not written a series of novels but a mythology, because you could take any one of his characters from any one of his books and put him into another book and he would be perfectly at home. Those who are devotees of Dickens would agree, I believe, that Micawber could have been just as well in "Bleak House" as in "David Copperfield," and various other characters could be taken from their present settings and put somewhere else.

However that may be, that is something of the general nature of the cases as we have them before us under the system we are following. Therefore in moving bills for the relief of the persons concerned, I make a representation to the government that it should now give consideration to a different method of handling this particular problem. I suggest that we might have a court set up here, or something in the nature of a commission, to deal with these cases, and it could submit its report to parliament and that report be acted upon.

So far as the particular cases are concerned, I do not think it would be fair to rule them out, and for that reason, as chairman of the committee that handled these matters, I am moving the second reading of these bills. If we were to throw out particular cases by reason of the general objection to this way of handling divorce it would work a hardship, and I should not desire to see that. I desire, however, to see the government try to find a different way of handling the problem so that we might get away from what is, I suggest, becoming farcical—the method by which we have so far been handling the divorce problem.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): Personally, Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to divorce, but I am opposed to the two bills we are considering for second reading, in common with all the bills of the same nature that come before this parliament. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) inasmuch as I believe that the method employed is wrong. I feel, if my hon. friend who is sponsoring the bills would cease interrupting me—

Mr. MAYBANK: I rise to a point of order. I have never at any time interrupted the hon. gentleman. I am the sponsor and I never interrupted him at all.

Mr. CASE: The name of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) is associated with two of these bills on the order paper, and I did not intend that the member for Winnipeg South Centre should receive the rebuke, so to speak, implied in what I said. I was looking at the bills and the name of my hon. friend and deskmate was associated with two of them.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if anyone wishes to inform himself on this question, if he will take the forty-seventh report of the senate of Canada with reference to the petition of Edward Mortin Montgomery for a bill of divorce from Edna Maud Wolfrey Montgomery he cannot help feeling that there must be, as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, some degree of collusion, because here you have a man who admits he is the co-respondent and who stands up and brazenly admits facts before a committee of the senate.

An hon. MEMBER: Quote the evidence.

Mr. CASE: I would, naturally, hesitate to repeat the evidence. I am not familiar with the method employed in securing such evidence but I make this suggestion. I am not going to join with my hon. friend in suggesting that there is more virtue in other parts of Quebec than there is in the city of Montreal, but I feel that there is some concern about the disposition which is made of the children of a union, and as I read the evidence from the senate committee, I have yet to find any place where, in the past, there has been any disposition made, any security offered for the children. I understand that this feature of the application is settled before they appear before the senate committee; that there has been a bill of separation under which certain payments are required to be paid by the applicant, and that in all probability he is seeking not only relief in the matter of dissolution of his marriage but relief from these payments which he has been required to make.

As a newcomer I would not wish to present my views in parliament in a dogmatic way, but I have said before there must be some more practical method employed which will seek to secure the evidence, place it on record in a proper court where disposition of the case can be made, where security can be guaranteed for the children, thereby raising the whole divorce problem to a higher level. I feel that I should make these observations with respect to the bills we now have before us. When the bills come up for second reading, instead of an ordinary doormat being made of the House of Commons, we should be completely informed of all the circumstances. These bills should not be run through as if in a mill, because we may be doing something wrong. I feel rather conscious about this. I hope when the time arrives that I have to make my decision I shall be able to make it intelligently. I make these observations for the consideration of the House of Commons, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, in order that parliament may give consideration to some method to set up a national divorce court, not necessarily along the banks of the Ottawa river but somewhere where people can go to obtain relief and a sense of security for the children.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Since it is in order to discuss whether or not we should have divorce bills brought before this parliament I wish to say a word. Twenty years ago I was very much interested in this question—

An hon. MEMBER: You are older now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I amuse the house unwittingly, but I can assure the hon. gentlemen that from the point of view of what is in their minds I am still interested. The records will show—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: I still say, sir, that the records of this house will show that the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth put up a strenuous fight, and I helped him the best way I could, to have all divorce bills removed from parliament, because the whole procedure was a travesty of justice. This parliament is not organized to consider properly and thoroughly the cases that come before it in that way. There is no provision made for the care of the children who may be involved. The courts of the provinces are the proper places to which to discuss these cases. I still hold the view I held twenty years ago. The fact that I raised no objection to the bill does not mean that I am satisfied that this is the best place to discuss divorce bills. We managed to have the divorce cases of all provinces except those of Quebec taken out of parliament. This parliament must take the responsibility for not removing these cases also. I suggest to you, sir, that it is high time that all divorce cases be removed from parliament. Hon. members who decided to discuss the procedure of this house in matters of divorce, instead of discussing the actual bill before us, should bring in a bill or resolution to deal with this matter separately and have it finally removed from parliament.

When that bill or resolution is brought down I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will vote against it.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word on this matter and to make myself understood by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). One of the things the people of my riding cannot understand is how I take advice from him. Another thing they cannot understand is why we have no time to discuss such vital things as subsidies on milk and—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The price of strawberries.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, and such vital things as—

Mr. BOUCHER: The red curtain over peaches.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We can take time in and out—but I have only twenty minutes to fill in—to discuss divorce bills. I am getting a lot of assistance around here. We can take all this time to discuss divorce bills but we cannot find time to discuss other vital matters. I want the hon. member for Cariboo to know that I was not elected to come here and discuss divorce bills. I am neither competent nor have I the time to do that.

An hon. MEMBER: You are not competent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My hon. friend here says I am not competent. Probably the reason I am not competent is that I come from the most beautiful spot in the Dominion of Canada. Hon. members may have heard of Atlantic City; they also may have heard that once a year a competition is held to discover Miss America. I wish to explain to you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you to the House of Commons, that each and every fair girl in the Fraser Valley is a Miss Fraser Valley far surpassing any Miss America in Atlantic City. We do not have to worry about anything like that.

Some time ago this government, of which I am a supporter, brought in legislation not to encourage divorce but to discourage it. They did everything they could to promote family life. Of course I am speaking of family allowances. Why should we have divorces? May I say that at any time I will vote to prevent divorce bills from being brought before the House of Commons.

Having had some experience with lawyers, which always cost me money because they generally lost my cases, I can understand their point of view. I can understand the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) because I sympathize with anyone who has to live in Carleton. I was coming down town on the street-car this morning. As hon. members know, the street-cars are crowded in Ottawa. I left around half-past seven o'clock to get down to my office at eight o'clock. The street-cars are old. What I have to say has some connection with these divorce cases. As I entered the car I noticed a dear old lady with grey hair sitting in a comfortable seat. She saw me get on and that I had no seat, so she got up and gave me hers. It was one of the old cars they got from Toronto; and any time you get anything given you from Toronto you can be sure it is old. Any hon. members who travel on the Bank street-cars know they are old; this particular seat was worn out, and there was a hollow in the middle. When this very dear old grey-haired lady got up to give me the seat I noticed that in the other half of the seat there was a very pretty girl; and I had to slide into the seat. According to the evidence I read in one of these cases from Montreal, that could have been grounds for divorce. That is why I think every one of these cases should be explained, because they are not all the same.

What I started to say was this. I can understand lawyers doing a lot of things, because if I were a lawyer I would do them myself. If you are a lawyer you get $50 for the first hour; after that there is a discount and the client is charged only $37.50 for the next half-hour. But I cannot understand the names of hon. members appearing on the order paper in this connection. I see after bill No. 37 the name "Mr. Boucher" and the initials "E. F."; I do not know what that means. I understand the hon. member for Carleton sponsored this bill. I can never understand why a member should sponsor a divorce bill in this house, because to me it is a very serious thing to sponsor anything. For instance, I am sponsoring higher prices for everything the farmer produces, but I do not get a chance to say so here; I am called out of order if I say we should increase the subsidies on milk and strawberries and peaches, and so on. This is very much in connection with divorce, because at the time I happened to mention peaches I had a letter from a farmer in Ontario. In this province they put a little gauze over the peaches, and this producer in writing to me said that this gauze reminded me of much of the evidence in these divorce bills.

That reminds me that I came through Alberta the other day. I have often wondered as to the grounds for divorce. I have been to Toronto; I have even been through Saskatchewan, so that I can understand why there should be divorces in some parts of Canada, but I can never understand why there should be any suggestion of divorce in Alberta. Next to the Fraser valley Alberta is one of the finest districts you could ever see, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will visit it some time. Out in Alberta you are right under the foothills.

I wish to speak about the McGregor case; perhaps I should go into the details of it. It was always my understanding that bills coming before this house were supposed to be studied and read by all hon. members. For instance, I am perfectly well aware of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver East and the Secretary of State never read that section of the bill we were discussing this afternoon before it was brought in here. If they had read it before they would have realized that something was wrong, and could have come to me to have it fixed up. In my opinion, every bill that comes into this house should be studied and read. I have not had a chance to study this bill No. 37 introduced by the hon. member for Carleton, but I did have time to read the McGregor case, and I want to suggest that this case should be read by every hon. member. The McGregor case, or maybe it is the Montgomery case—I know it was a Scotch name—was a wonderful case. I have read all these bills, for the reason that I am interested in this matter. For two years I represented the riding of Vancouver North, in addition to my own riding, while my good friend and room-mate was overseas. Those hon. members who have been overseas, particularly those who have been in Sicily or in Africa, know how desolate it is out there in the desert, with nothing to do but watch the sand drift by. In order to keep my hon. friend well informed I would send him copies of Hansard, so that he might have something to read to his fellow members of the air force. But I knew Hansard was not very interesting, because so often it contained the remarks of the C.C.F. members, so that I used to send him these divorce bills. On them I always marked, "With the compliments of George Cruickshank", and my name became so familiar overseas that when these men returned home they automatically voted for me.

Speaking particularly to bill No. 37, I should like to ask the hon. member for Carleton a few questions. Are there any children in this case? If so, how many? How old are they? Are they under proper supervision and care if this divorce should be granted? How long has the hon. member known them?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have allowed the hon. gentleman a great deal of latitude to make his point and discuss the divorce bills which are before the house, but I think he is pretty far away from them now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was just coming to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENTLEY: If I may ask the hon. gentleman a question, I was just wondering if in the few minutes left at his disposal he would be disposed to make a recommendation that a divorce be arranged between the Canadian wheat board and the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That question is out of order, but I will answer it when I am through asking these questions. Perhaps, however, after the hon. member for Carleton has given me this information, it will be possible for the hon. member who asked me the question to tell me when there will be a divorce between the Labour Progressives and the C.C.F. party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, I should like to ask the hon. member this question in connection with this divorce.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is to be permitted deliberately to obstruct the business of the house. Some time ago he admitted that he had only twenty minutes to speak, to waste. I wish to speak on this divorce matter, not in the foolish manner we are now listening to but seriously, and I find I am not going to be able to take a few moments to express myself.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I object to the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Through you, Mr. Speaker, I am asking if an hon. member is to be permitted deliberately to obstruct the business of the house, as the hon. member is doing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of privilege, I am accused of deliberately doing something.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Has the hon. member finished stating his point of order?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. gentleman is a very good friend; as a matter of fact he belongs to the same faith that I do, and I forgive him a lot. He imputes things to me which I know he will regret to-morrow. I am sure he would not want to deprive either the member for Fraser Valley of the opportunity to ask a few questions, or the hon. member for Carleton of the right to give the answers. I have already given an answer to my good friend. Long before you were even nominated, years before you were elected, I was speaking in this house and opposing the principle of divorce bills. So far as I am concerned, I have given an assurance of what I will do, if this ever comes to a vote.

If the house will just let me alone for a little while, I will return to a discussion of the point raised by the hon. member for Carleton. If my good friend had been elected when I was—and I have been here for years and years and years—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the hon. member should address himself to the Chair. I would ask him to confine his remarks to the bills before the house.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I rise to a point of order, and ask for a ruling on my question. If an hon. member in the house is permitted deliberately to obstruct the business of the house, as the hon. member is now doing—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not given proof that the hon. member speaking has been trying to obstruct the business of the house. The fact that the hon. member said that he had twenty or twenty-five minutes ahead of him is no indication that he is trying to obstruct. But I would say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that it is his duty to discuss the bill, and only that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I apologise, again. What I meant when I referred to twenty minutes, when I made that observation, through you, sir, to some of the uninformed members, was that private bills go on only until nine o'clock. I am sorry, but Your Honour has probably not had experience enough to understand me.

However, I should like to address the Chair, and the hon. member for Carleton, through you, sir. How many children are there in this family? How old are they? Has proper provision been made for their care in the future? Are they boys and girls?

An hon. MEMBER: Boys "and" girls?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are there any immediate relatives? That is all I have to say.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is customary when a member sponsors a bill of this kind for him, before doing so, to verify the propriety of the bill and the regularity of the procedure.

As the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) may know, it is customary to have divorce bills introduced in the senate and to have them reviewed by a committee of the senate. Evidence is taken by that committee, and it is available to any member of the House of Commons who wishes to look at it After a divorce bill has been passed by the Senate, it comes to the House of Commons, at which time a member of the house on behalf of the solicitor or the applicant, is asked to sponsor the bill

When the hon. member for Fraser Valley was speaking, perhaps he had in mind those fine-looking girls from the Fraser Valley, and was confusing them with the peaches concealed behind the red veils on peach baskets. Perhaps he got lost behind the veil, when he has been thinking of those good-looking girls from the Fraser Valley. It will be noted that the hon. member used the expression "came from", and because of that I would judge he has not been able to see any other good-looking girls who have remained in the Fraser Valley.

I do not think it would be wise at this time to discuss the principle of divorce bills. Rather, I would refer the hon. member to evidence taken in the senate. I do not think we would be enhancing the prestige of parliament if we were to discuss the impropriety of bringing divorce bills before the house in this fashion. The fact of the matter is that Quebec does not have divorce courts, although I believe if they wanted to they could have them. Further, I believe it is the wish of Quebec that this parliament, not the local legislature, should handle their divorce bills. I believe, too, that if divorce is possible in some communities we should not make it impossible in others. To those hon. members who object to the procedure in this chamber, a procedure which they may wish to describe as slip-shod, let me say that the facts of these cases have already been considered thoroughly by the senate committee, a committee composed of competent members of that house, who have recommended certain action to the House of Commons.

Each year since I have come to the house, and I believe for many years before that, the same argument has been raised by way of criticism of the manner in which we pass divorce bills. Those very members who are loudest in their criticism are the ones who are most guilty of delay; neither have they brought before the house any constructive or acceptable suggestion as to a better method of proceeding. I would recommend, therefore, that in future those members who wish to criticize procedure in connection with divorce bills in this house should rise in their places and recommend a better one. Let us have the details of any such plan, because in these critical times I do not think the people of Canada like to see their members of parliament repeat year after year almost the same objections, while at the same time failing to offer any cure.

I believe we may very well rely upon the senate committee to use good discretion in deciding whether or not divorces should be granted. Some hon. members say that a reading of divorce bills leads one to the belief that there is collusion in all of them. That, of course, is a reflection upon anyone who recommends that they come before this chamber. It is an aspersion cast upon the other house, which has approved the bills that are now before us. It casts a reflection not only upon the members involved, but also upon the solicitors.

If hon. members will reflect upon the very narrow grounds for divorce permitted in this country, they will realize that, of necessity, the evidence in each case is of a most limited nature. I do not think we as members of the House of Commons would be well advised to cast reflections upon applicants in divorce cases by offering the opinion that they are guilty of collusion, when we do not know the facts, and have no just reason for being suspicious. If there is collusion, that is sufficient to nullify any application for divorce, and there is punishment provided for those who are guilty. But let us not leave this chamber with the idea that in the majority of divorce cases there is collusion.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing section 37.

Mr. REID: We were discussing the kind of ceremonies which would be held, and the questionnaires and examinations which would prevail when those applying for citizenship would appear before the courts. I had asked the minister if he had studied the United States scheme, and I had reminded him that people from about thirty-six countries were now citizens over there, a condition similar to that obtaining in Canada. My opinion was that in no country comparable with either the United States or Canada was it more important that we should educate peoples coming from other countries.

I wish to go on record in this matter because, once this bill goes through—it is not parliament that will have anything to do with the matter but the regulations, and everything pertaining to the measure will come under officials and under the hand of the minister. I would remind the minister that, despite all the good assurances and promises he might give to the committee, a minister's term of office expires at some time or another and a new minister takes his place, and then all that is said, all the promises made here are gone. It is what is in the statute that governs.

I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the practice which has been followed for many years in the United States and which over the years has worked to good advantage. They have what are known as educational schools; they set a uniform examination all over the country, so that no matter what the state in which the applicant resides the examinations and answers are along the same lines from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I quote from section 356 (3) of the nationality act of 1940 of the United States:

> The purpose of the educational examination shall be to determine whether the petitioner has a fair knowledge of the fundamental principles of the constitution and is qualified to assume the duties and responsibilities of a citizen of the United States. To this end the petitioner may be questioned as to (1) the principal historical facts concerning the development of the United States as a republic; (2) the organization and principal functions of the government of the United States, and of the states and local units of government, and (3) the relation of the individual in the United States to government—national, state, and local, the rights and privileges growing from that relationship, and the duties and responsibilities which result from it.

To guard against the examination being too difficult there is this proviso:

> Every care shall be exercised to avoid abstruse, technical, irrelevant, and extreme questions. The language level of the questions shall be suited to the particular petitioner having regard to his educational background and the extent of his knowledge of the English language.

I bring that to the attention of the minister and the committee because I believe there is a great deal of merit in it. I think every hon. member must have had representations made to him by our own people who have criticized the method of handing out naturalization papers in the past. I have attended many courts on behalf of applicants for naturalization and have heard them being asked three or four questions: Who is your sponsor? How long have you been in this country? Are you married or single? Do you owe any money? The last is usually one of the questions asked. When these are answered the recommendation for granting papers goes forward to Ottawa. It is all very well to talk about a beautiful ceremony and a big crowd of people turning out on the day the certificate is granted. That is all very nice, but I maintain that there should be some preparation of the applicant for citizenship, the very fact that he has to do a little studying will make him cherish his certificate more when he gets it than he does under the present system. I am keen about this matter and I would ask the minister to consider this suggestion seriously. He should at least tell the committee what the questions are likely to be because he must have given this matter some study. I am just afraid that the questions may vary from one province to another. But if we are looking for one citizenship all the applicants should be treated alike and there should be one system in effect from one end of the country to the other. I hope the minister will give this suggestion serious consideration.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was interested in the statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton just before the dinner recess. I agree with him very largely. I wondered as he spoke whether he believes that the possession of a certain standard of education should be a condition of the acquisition of citizenship in this country by those whom I think we term "new Canadians"?

Mr. FLEMING: I did not say "new Canadians"; I said "adult immigrants".

Mr. KNIGHT: I think that is a much better term. I was going to observe that the term "new Canadian", if it had been used by the hon. gentleman, which it was not, is an unfortunate name for them, because the term is liked least by those to whom it best applies. I would point out to my hon. friend and to the hon. member for Vancouver East that it is very difficult indeed to make adult education available to all newcomers because most of them get out into the remote parts of the country and are not economically very well off. They spend their time on homesteads and marginal farms, where they have to make their living far removed from the educational advantages enjoyed by those living in the cities. It may be easy enough in large cities like Toronto where people live closer together to have this type of instruction. Such a class I know was conducted in my own city for many years by a very fine and talented lady who unfortunately has been called from amongst us. But such voluntary efforts, as someone has said, will not fully solve the problem.

I know the minister is in a difficult position when somebody asks him for a sort of standard school for citizenship throughout the dominion. I would point out to the hon. member for New Westminster that there is a danger in that type of standardization because the questions or an approximation of them are sometimes likely to be known beforehand, so that an ability to answer such questions does not necessarily mean very much.

May I say in passing that we are apt to overlook the cultural background and the cultural contribution that is made by a great many of these newcomers. When we do not understand another person's language we are apt to misunderstand him and I am afraid that in the past we have even been inclined to despise him. These newcomers have much to offer. We have, for instance, in this country many of the finest medical men and surgeons who have come to us in recent years from Europe but to whom we deny the right to practise their profession. I shall not go into the reasons for that, but it is not a good example of how democracy works.

In talking about democracy, I wish to make it clear that I do not want to be objectionable or give offence to any member of the house or anybody else but when an hon. member, a member on the government side or on any side of this house, rises up to speak for the purpose of blocking a private member's resolution saying, and I quote—

I have only twenty minutes to waste.

—may I suggest that the people of this country, looking down upon such a scene from the galleries of this house—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member must confine his remarks to the section.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am talking, sir, about adult education, which is more than the hon. gentleman did. May I suggest that the people of this country, on reading the debates recording such a scene in this House of Commons, must feel that it is not only the newcomers in this country who are in need of adult education. I would blush for shame if some of these newcomers could look in here and see democracy at work in this way. Now, sir, in order or out of order, I am as sincere as any man can be in this regard, and I say to you that there is something wrong with the procedure in this house. I am only a newcomer, but I come here from the constituency of Saskatoon City—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member is entirely out of order in dealing with a matter of this kind under this section, and I hope he will not persist.

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall merely say this about adult education, that we are in need of it, and that we are grown men and not children, and this house and this country can judge the things that I would have said had I not been declared out of order here to-night.

Mr. HLYNKA: I am in wholehearted agreement with section 37. I desire, however, to make a suggestion or two. I should like to say something on this section from the point of view of one who was naturalized. I believe that those who have spoken in this debate thus far, or most of them, are those who have extended the privilege of naturalization to others. I happen to be one of those who was naturalized through his father.

I entirely agree that the procedure of naturalization should be improved as the minister intends to do under this bill, and that it should no longer be just a matter of routine business to grant naturalization certificates to applicants. But it seems to me that the texts which have been prepared and suggested to the minister, although prepared in all sincerity, are perhaps somewhat too advanced. I have a copy of one of the suggested texts, and I picked out a number of questions to indicate what type of questions may be put to applicants for naturalization. Here are a few:

1. Do you believe in the separation of powers as outlined in the constitution?

2. What are some of the principles of the British North America Act?

3. Mention some kinds of property that are free from taxation.

I wonder what they are.

4. If a grand jury does not bring an indictment can the accused person be held for trial?

5. What are the three kinds of work to be done in governing of a country?

After listening to the dominion-provincial conference discussions, I wonder whether some people in this chamber would know how to answer that question.

6. Explain how a bill becomes a law in Ontario.

7. How is the Speaker of the house chosen?

8. In what way is the number of members in the House of Commons determined?

9. What must a good government have?

Mr. MacNICOL: A Conservative majority.

Mr. HLYNKA: And the last question:

10. What are the divisions of power given by the British North America Act?

[Mr. Knight.]

Those ten questions, Mr. Chairman, have been picked out from this text, and I personally wish to congratulate the women of the Independent Order of the Daughters of the Empire for having prepared it. It is a good text. But it has been prepared from the point of view of a person who already speaks the English language; and we must also remember that a number of our newcomers will settle in western Canada where, perhaps, they will not have the same facilities to learn the language quickly as people who live in cities.

I am afraid that if one of these texts is authorized as a text for the preparation of these applicants, and if it is made too difficult, a number of people may find it too advanced. So I suggest to the minister that great care be taken to simplify this material. As far as the questions are concerned which are embodied in this text and in another one, presented by the Canadian club of Winnipeg —I have a copy of it also—I suggest that these texts be simplified. So long as the principles of democracy are embodied in them, so long as we give these prospective citizens an understanding of our aims and the fundamental principles of Christian democracy, I believe that should be sufficient.

I should like to draw a comparison between the questions which appear in this text and some questions which I have picked at random from the Gallup polls. According to several surveys conducted in 1945 in Canada by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion, known as the Gallup poll surveys, for the purpose of gauging a knowledge of public affairs of Canadian citizens of voting age, the following facts were revealed:

1. That 5 per cent could not name the capital city of Canada. These are our own citizens of voting age, and 5 per cent could not name our capital city.

2. That 33 per cent could not name their own M.P. sitting in this house. And I understand that in the United States almost 50 per cent of the people could not name their local representative.

3. That 33 per cent could not name a single cabinet minister excluding the Prime Minister. It is hard to believe that the other ministers are so unimportant as not to be remembered. Among those who could name some of the ministers the Minister of Finance was best known, because he touches their pockets more often.

4. That 50 per cent do not know what is the population of Canada.

5. That 33 per cent could not name three of the Ten Commandments.

6. That 38 per cent could not explain what is meant by "socialism". To some socialism meant "banquets", or "parties", or "social gatherings".

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Could be.

Mr. HLYNKA: Well, 38 per cent did not know it, and that after the campaign which our hon. friends to our right have carried on for so many years.

7. That 25 per cent of the people of Canada did not know what communism stood for. Some defined it as "privacy"; others defined it as "a form of religion". It goes to show that there is something wrong even with our own people, because they have not the information which they should have.

An hon. MEMBER: How do the Social Crediters fare?

Mr. HLYNKA: There is no break-down of parties here.

Mr. MacINNIS: The questioner did not know social credit.

Mr. HLYNKA:

8. That 23 per cent could not define "capitalism". Some defined it as "too much money".

9. That 56 per cent could not define bureaucracy. Some defined it as "bedroom furniture".

10. That 40 per cent could not explain what is meant by free enterprise. I presume many of these people have been listening to speeches delivered by our C.C.F. friends; and yet, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian people are among the greatest readers of books and newspapers in the world. How can we account then for the Gallup poll findings?

It is my personal opinion that there is nothing wrong with the intelligence of the Canadian people or, for that matter, any other people. The truth is that we do not discuss these things often enough and for that reason they do not remain in the minds of the people. Our educational system has not exactly dealt with these subjects properly either. We still teach geometry and trigonometry to girls who take up nursing. Then our radio programmes should be called upon to assist in giving the people some of the necessary information.

In view of these facts, I maintain that the various citizenship guides which have been prepared by a number of organizations should be simplified. They should be put in as simple a form as possible. It must be kept in mind that many of these people have families and it will take much of their time and energy to provide for those families.

A great number of the people we have can learn to speak a language in two or three years, but we need people whose purpose and intentions are good and whose hearts are in the right place. Take the newly settled rural districts. The settler must devote his time to clearing and developing the land and to the building of his home and the educating of his children. That is his primary responsibility and not learning constitutional law or memorizing economic theories. We may be certain that these people will learn all about the different political parties during elections. They will get this information free from the candidates. Some of them perhaps will even be brought to meetings by cars. The various candidates will see to that.

I appreciate the efforts that are being made by the minister in this regard to institute a system of educating these applicants and acquainting them with the principles of democracy and assisting them in the learning one of the two languages of the country. Many of them will learn the language very quickly.

I wish to point out, too, that if anyone of us happened to find himself in one of the other countries, in a country where he would have to learn the language, he would realize the difficulties. How many of us would be able to learn the language in less than five years and be able to understand, in that language, the simple elements of the constitution and also the economic principles and various matters in connection with local politics and civic affairs?

I urge it upon the government not only to invite various organizations to present these texts for this purpose but actually to assign competent individuals to review these texts so that we may be able to give these new applicants, the prospective citizens of Canada, in the shortest possible time, the most essential material which they need. I would also appeal to the minister not to forget western Canada in particular, because I have found in my experience that the people in the cities can learn the language much more quickly than those in the rural districts. A person living in the city can go to night school or get a student to assist him in learning a language, but such is not the case in the country. Out on the farms or in the bush where the nearest school may be ten, fifteen or twenty miles. It is impossible to expect those people both to learn a language and to earn a living for their families.

I have made these few observations in good faith and I would appreciate it very much, as I know the people in the west will appreciate it, if the minister would take this text as it is and simplify it a bit so as to enable these people to absorb this material. I am sure that the people we will get to come to Canada to become Canadian citizens would be of the type of whom we could be proud.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The hon. member read to the committee ten questions which apparently have been asked of immigrants to this country who intend to take out citizenship. Worded as they are, there are questions which I have no doubt would present some difficulty to some members of the House of Commons. However, I am supremely glad that the hon. member did not include an eleventh question, "What is Christian democracy?" I am still awaiting a definition of that term.

It is interesting to note that he said that, according to the Gallup poll, only 25 per cent knew what communism was. I cannot help thinking of his leader who on one occasion said that McGill university was a hotbed of communism. I can only assume that the leader of the Social Credit party is one of the 75 per cent. I do not wish, however, to discuss the illusions of the Social Credit party; I want to get my teeth into something more solid.

The minister did make a statement to the committee about what the government intends to do in instructing, in the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship, those who come to Canada to be accepted into the Canadian family. I wish he would tell us what his intentions are as regards the use to which he intends to put the citizenship branch, a branch over which he presides.

Mr. GREEN: I think the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville was very helpful. He always makes helpful speeches, particularly on this question.

I should like to ask the minister why it is not possible to enter into an arrangement with the provinces similar to the arrangement under which youth training and vocational training are given. Let us put this thing on a proper business basis where the dominion pays its fair share of the cost of getting the teachers out in the smaller districts to take charge of this instruction. I hope that some arrangement of that kind has been made. I realize that the minister is very much in earnest about carrying out the provisions of this section. I do not wish to question the intention at all, but I thought he was indefinite this afternoon as to what plans he had made and that he was relying on voluntary groups. I am sure that they will do their part, but if this is to be done properly some financial arrangement must be made with the provinces.

I should like to know why it is not possible to do that on much the same basis as is the carrying on of youth training.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I believe that what I have to say can be better said before the minister answers. On the second reading of this bill I made a few suggestions to the minister along the lines of the suggestions that have been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Vegreville. I should like to enlarge on them for a moment or two. I wonder whether the minister has considered that the difficulty of adult education in the rural areas can be easily overcome by making full use of the rural schools. I do not know of any other organization that is so well situated or strategically placed as the rural school, which is right in the community where the people are to be found. There is another reason why it can be done better there than anywhere else, namely, that these are the same institutions that the children of immigrant parents will be attending. When the children come from school a great deal of interest is shown, especially when they are beginning to learn a new language and begin to tell the parents about it. There is a far greater carryover from the school to the home in those instances than where the parents already know the language and therefore do not show as much interest and curiosity.

I would suggest to the minister that in setting up facilities he call in a delegation from the various teachers' associations in the provinces. Each province has a teachers' federation or a union. It has a different name in each province. I am sure that the officers of such an organization would be very happy to cooperate with the minister's department in advising on the best possible method of going about adult education. A great deal of it has been done in a haphazard way on a voluntary basis. I have done some of it myself, but we were always handicapped by the fact that not enough money was provided by the provincial departments and that therefore it was not possible to carry on the work to any great extent. If the minister's department could provide some assistance I am sure that the teachers' organizations of the various provinces would have a plan ready in a very short time showing the best way it could be done.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was quite interested in this section because I am heartily in accord with it. Like the hon. member for Vegreville and others I wish it could be made retroactive. He was commended by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, indicating that they approved his speech, as I do. However, he might have been a little fairer and might have gone a little farther when he was speaking of the small percentage that knew what socialism was. He also said that it reflected somewhat on this group. I think I can best answer that part of his remarks by reading the first paragraph of an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 29, 1946, which reads as follows:

The Ignorance of the Voter

Out of every ten voters in Canada, seven cannot tell the difference between the two long-established political parties, the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives.

I hope that the Secretary of State will take this editorial to heart, and if he cannot go back and train this 70 per cent in the historical development of these two old parties in Canada, the rise and the fall of them, he should at least start from here on the new ones and proceed to enlighten them, so that in the course of the new generations possibly a smaller percentage of the population will be unenlightened.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the difference between the new ones and the old ones?

Mr. MARTIN: Hon. Members who have spoken have obviously expected me to say something in addition to what I have already said on this subject. As the hon. member for Vancouver South has indicated, it is not by any means as simple a task as it looks. If we had had some machinery set up long ago by which this sort of thing could be done one could state more definitely not only what one's plans are, but something about the carrying of them out. This is a new project. The citizenship branch has been only recently transferred to the Department of the Secretary of State. That branch was set up during the war for the purpose of carrying out certain incidents connected with the prosecution of the war, and it did a grand job.

Almost as soon as I had been made Secretary of State I got in touch with the citizenship branch with the consent of the then Minister of National War Services, and suggested that it might assist us in some way in respect of the operations of the Naturalization Act. Then, when the transfer took place I was able to get more help from that section by having them devote themselves exclusively to the particular assignment which we are discussing to-night.

The situation in the United States is by no means unknown to us. I myself have gone to twenty different places in the United States in the past seven months to see what kind of ceremonies they conduct over there, regarding not only the ceremonies but what kind of training and information is given to potential United States citizens. In addition to that, we have had officials come from the United States who have been kind enough to sit in with us; and when I was in England recently I had the chance of discussing the question and seeing what they did through the home office there.

With regard to the United States the situation is by no means as uniform as it would appear to be. In most of the United States cities by no means is the ritual carried out on uniform lines. In the cities of New York, Chicago, Seattle, Detroit and New Jersey one finds more impressive ceremonies than perhaps in other communities of the United States. But to say that the practice is uniform throughout the United States is to say something that is not true. First of all, their regulations came into being not with the passage of the act, but they have been added to from time to time, as ours undoubtedly will be in the light of experience. They have drafted and printed manuals, two of which I have on my desk to-night. I believe the manual that has been prepared by the Daughters of the Empire in Ontario is as good as anything in the United States. The Canadian educational and citizenship council and other organizations have sent in suggested texts which it is proposed we might use. All in all, from Canadian bodies generally I believe we have something like ninety-six suggested manuals with varying measures of acceptability, indicating what kind of questions and what kind of training should be given to these citizens. The government of the province of Quebec has opened evening classes for potential Canadian citizens. It is, I believe, the only province to have done so thus far.

As I said this afternoon, one of the first things we did was get in touch with the provincial ministers of education. So far we have got in touch with those of the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and we hope to be able to get in touch with the others as quickly as possible, in order to enlist their help. We cannot do this ourselves, because it must be remembered that education is a matter coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and it must be approached with that in mind. However, if the matter is approached in the proper spirit I am sure we can expect the fullest cooperation. I quite agree with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South, that we should not simply rely on the provinces but should do something ourselves on a contributory basis, and I hope that when I come to present my requests for money with which to do this very thing I may be able to get the full support of the house, because one cannot carry on work of this kind without the necessary financial support.

Mr. GREEN: Are you going to ask for that money this year?

Mr. MARTIN: Well, we have a programme which has to go before the Minister of Finance, and it will come here, I trust, in due course. I am now warning in a friendly way the committee and my colleagues here that I am counting upon their support.

Mr. FLEMING: More supplementary estimates!

Mr. MARTIN: We cannot bring in any such estimates until this bill is passed. With regard to the sort of questions to be asked and the kind of treatment to be given, I have here one of the best of the proposed manuals. I do not want to go into it in detail, but it deals with the history of the commonwealth, the history of the royal family, the history of the leading political figures of this country; men who have been prime ministers, men who have been provincial premiers, leading poets, leading musicians and so on. It asks and answers questions about our provincial governments, our federal government, the nature of the constitution, the duties of a citizen, the general history of our country, and so on. Last week I asked several of the leading historians of Canada, French, English and others, to meet with me to see if we could not get their help. All these things take time; they will not be done in a year or in several years. Anyone who thinks this is going to be done overnight, on the basis of the ambitious scheme we have in mind, I do not think appreciates exactly what we have to do. In regard to the simplification of questions, I think that is a real problem. It is not easy to reduce questions to a common denominator, where they will not be readily understood by all groups. As far as we can posibly make them, with the assistance of these agencies, the questions will be as understandable as possible, having in mind the various kinds of groups with which we shall have to deal.

I would not want anything I say to-night in any way to discount the work of voluntary organizations, because I believe that work is of tremendous importance. The number of teachers in this country who spend their free time teaching classes at night is simply amazing. The number of voluntary organizations doing work of that kind is such, and the work is so effective, that I would not want anything I say to-night to belittle what is being done. The hon. member for Vegreville spoke strongly in favour of a manual on the pattern of the United States manual. I may tell him that the manuals on which we are working are based on six different manuals issued by the United States. We have the advantage of those. We have the great advantage of the work done by the wartime information board in Britain and in Canada. All these manuals are before us and our officers are studying them. Through the citizenship branch we have contacts with all the newspapers of the country, particularly those in languages other than English or French, and serve them constantly with material about Canada. This information gets out to these people, and this is another way of laying before potential and Canadian citizens the sort of thing we would like them to know. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver East who said to-day that we should do something about the immigrants when they first come to this country, and I was very much impressed with his remarks. That is, in a sense, outside the scope of the Department of the Secretary of State, but I think the suggestion is well worth bearing in mind and certainly I shall discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. GREEN: Does that not come under the minister's nationality branch?

Mr. MARTIN: No; these are people who are not citizens at all. The hon. gentleman had in mind the people when they first land here. The suggestion was that when they first enter this country they should be got in touch with at once, perhaps by means of a letter or something of that sort; that they should be given a warm welcome and told something about Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not right in line with the work of the minister's nationality or citizenship branch?

Mr. MARTIN: It is in one sense, but obviously when they first come here they are under the direction of the Minister of Mines and Resources. There may be some overlapping there, and I would not want to proceed without full consultation with him.

Here are the sort of questions that are asked: What are the duties of the executive council? What is the executive council? Then the name is spelled out, and a full explanation is given. How many members are in the legislature or parliament? Who is the Speaker? What is the Speaker of the house? What is the term of office of the Premier or Prime Minister? One could go on with these questions ad infinitum, but I merely mention them to show that the department is fully aware of the nature of the problem, and I can only repeat that we shall do our utmost to deal with it in a satisfactory manner. I was glad to hear hon. members express themselves as they did to-day, because I will count on them to support the department when it seeks to make more effective the operations of a branch of our work which we all admit to be of tremendous importance.

Mr. POULIOT: What the minister has said is sound, and he deserves to be congratulated upon having said it. The book that is put into the hands of the immigrants must be simply written and not too long. It should be in several languages, so that the information it contains may be easily accessible to those who will read it. The book should be attractive, also, and should contain a few pictures.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Of whom?

Mr. POULIOT: Of the dead, because the living may be seen in person, and there is no flattery when we praise the dead. I do not know at all the publication issued by the I.O.D.E., but I know one book which has been published by a distinguished journalist, Mr. George Hambleton. I do not remember the title, but it was published by the information board, and was one of the few excellent publications coming from that source. It is a small booklet containing all information about the government. Then the province of Ontario has gone to the expense of publishing an excellent manual to inform students about the fundamentals of Canadian governments, all Canadian governments. It is more complete than Mr. Hambleton's book, and is very well done. We have already a publication that is not very big, but gives a great deal of interesting information. It is called "Canada, 1946", and is published every year. But I would warn the minister, when I think of the discussion that has taken place in the house in the last few days, that the writing of the history of Canada must be unbiased and must not be inflammatory; and that that will be a difficult task.

There are many ways of writing the history of a country. One method is followed in the United States, where they put aside all the dirty spots. I challenge anyone to find in the textbooks which contain the history of the United States any reference to the assassination of de Jumonville by Washington. It is not recorded, because Washington was the father of his country, and could not commit any error.

We have two schools of thought in Quebec. One expresses the opinion that French-speaking Canadians have always been persecuted, and the other expresses the contrary view that every liberty we have in this country has been graciously offered to us on a silver platter. Both opinions are untrue; and if there are some writers who contend that all our liberties were offered to our ancestors on a silver platter, it means that those who fought for responsible government had no reason for doing so because everything was given to them without their even asking for it.

There is another thing to which I would direct the attention of the Secretary of State, and this would affect, not the immigrants, but those who have been here with their families for a long time, and who intend to stay here and to be informed on Canadian history. Most historians are commentators, and could be compared with those we hear over the radio in the evenings. Some are interesting; others are not. But the minister is well read, having achieved success not only in the universities on this continent, but also in those in Europe. He will probably agree with me that the man who has done the most for the history of Canada in this country is my old friend Sir Arthur Doughty, dominion archivist. He wrote many books of history, one of which was "Canada and its Provinces". He published many of those books, with Sir Adam Shortt and others. They were very fine publications. He also published some books for children, one of which was called "The Lily and the Rose", along with some others He was a real savant, and a pleasant man.

But his greatest work was to begin, with Sir Adam Shortt, the publication of constitutional documents. Two or three of those books have been published at various intervals. They contain the texts of all official publications and are available to all scholars or students who wish to do some work or to throw some light on a certain period of history.

How can any man come here to work in our library? It is a very fine library, but there is the noise of the wooden floor. Then the librarians have to go up into the galleries, like birds on the branches of a tree. When they get there the light is bad. Then, when they need another book they must descend two or three flights of stairs or ladders. It is a continual process of climbing and going down, all the time. The most precious collection of newspapers we have in this country is down in the cellar, alongside the pipes which heat the building. It is impossible to go there in the winter time, and in the summer it is filled with that moisture which destroys the pages of the papers.

Who could work there? It is not available to us. When we have those books, then anyone who wishes to study a certain period could have at his disposal two or three books in his office or his room, and could do some intelligent work. For many years there was no excuse for stopping that publication, and I find I can say that to the minister because he was not in charge of the department at the time.

There was complete darkness concerning the past. Now, however, we have small reports which mean nothing, and which are interested in little stories or fairy tales which come from the archives. The dress worn by the queen has been exhibited over there, but when we want information we have to fight for it. I must thank the minister, however, because sometimes I get it through him.

When Sir Arthur Doughty was alive the archives meant something; light came from there. Many people will not appreciate that. However, I urge upon the minister to have in the supplementary estimates an amount for the continuation of the publication of those constitutional documents, not for the immigrants, but for those who will be ready to do some voluntary teaching. The teacher must know more than his pupil. Perhaps this will be a means of enlarging and broadening the views of some of our fellow citizens, when they realize what our common ancestors, English as well as French-speaking, had to undergo in obtaining responsible government.

The Durham report has not yet been published. The selection of papers to be published in the constitutional documents should be made by one who is not a fanatic, one who is not bigoted, one who knows his history well. If it is to be partial, I do not want it; it must be complete. It is only by being complete that it will open the minds of those who are of good faith, who have been wrongly informed until now, but who are ready to listen to the true facts about the past.

History repeats itself. We may reach times when similar difficulties may arise, as they did in the past, and then the light from the past may come, provided that it is not obliterated in any way. The minister has proven that he is a great man in understanding the importance of the matter and being willing to do something in regard to what he has said. I shall not insist further. I consider it of the utmost importance, and since its importance has been realized I am thankful to the minister for having promised something in the supplementary estimates.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Proceedings in court.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. GREEN: This deals with appropriate ceremonies for welcoming new citizens into citizenship. Has any consideration been given to inviting natural-born Canadians who have reached the age of twenty-one to participate in these ceremonies? I realize that that could not be made compulsory, that the dominion government would have no power to make such a provision, but I think it would be very helpful if young native-born Canadians were invited to take part in the ceremony.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, I have attended eleven of these ceremonies and at three of them it was suggested to the officers of the department that that very thing should be done. It was done at a ceremony in Toronto, at one in Montreal and at one in my own city. In one place there were over three hundred of these young Canadians present.

Section agreed to.

On section 39—Regulations.

Mr. FLEMING: I have an amendment to propose as subsection 2. It will be observed that section 39 makes provision for regulations to be made by the governor in council in regard to a number of subjects, but no provision is made in the section for tabling in parliament the regulations so made, and my amendment would provide:

That section 39 be amended by adding thereto as subsection 2 the following:

All such regulations shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sititng, or if parliament is not then sitting, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps Mr. Chairman, you would take that as notice of an amendment to be moved in just a moment because I have an amendment to add a new subsection 2.

Mr. FLEMING: I am glad to let mine stand as notice of an amendment to be moved later, after the minister's.

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources to move that section 39 be amended by adding as subsection 2:

(2) The governor in council may

(a) authorize the issue of a proclamation declaring that any part of His Majesty's dominions not listed in the first schedule to this act, is a country of the British commonwealth for the purposes of this act;

(b) designate persons in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon territory who shall constitute courts for the purposes of this act.

Mr. GLEN: I move accordingly.

Mr. FLEMING: Will that be capable of extension if—

Mr. MARTIN: It is a small "d".

Mr. FLEMING: That would include any part of the empire? You are not confining it to the self-governing nations?

Mr. MARTIN: Not if others are added. This gives power to add them.

Mr. FLEMING: I am a little concerned about the significance of "dominions" with a small "d." After all, the scheme of the bill in the light of section 2 (g) and the first schedule is to confine the measure in those respects to the self-governing member nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. MARTIN: I am told by the law officers that this is the proper way to designate it.

Mr. FLEMING: Is it still the intention as I have described it that it shall be confined to the self-governing nations of the commonwealth?

Mr. MARTIN: Countries with their own nationality legislation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the Chairman please read paragraph (b) of the amendment relating to persons in the Northwest Territories?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It reads:

(b) designate persons in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon Territory who shall constitute courts for the purposes of this act.

Mr. MARTIN: The reason for that is that there are no judges in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and we have to designate somebody.

Mr. GREEN: Is not paragraph (a) of the amendment covered by section 2(g), which reads:

(g) "country of the British commonwealth" means for the purposes of this act a country listed in the first schedule to this act or a country declared for the purposes of this act to be a country of the British commonwealth of nations by proclamation issued under this act, and includes, in the case of any such country, all colonies, dependencies or territories thereof.

Mr. MARTIN: That was put in because of the argument my hon. friend opposite made the other night which I thought had merit in it, that there was no enabling power in the bill itself with regard to paragraph (g).

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton of which he gave notice if he will move it now as subsection 3.

Mr. FLEMING: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID: Would the minister explain why in some sections it is provided that "The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, shall take" certain measures, as appears in section 37, and then in other sections it is simply provided that "The governor in council may make regulations". What is the distinction between the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, and the governor in council acting?

Mr. MARTIN: In section 37 it is a matter of taking measures, and in section 39 it is a matter of issuing regulations. In the one case it is thought desirable that it should be left to the department.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to take one or two minutes on section 39 (h). What I have to say is an important matter to those citizens who have been naturalized. I should like to deal briefly with a matter and, perhaps, seek information on the advisability of setting up a branch of the minister's department to deal with it, or of assigning it to the Department of External Affairs. It is a matter having to do with birth certificates. As hon. members know, birth certificates are issued by vital statistics bureaux in each of the provinces. In my experience with vital statistics bureaux I have found that they can handle the problems of Canadian-born citizens well enough, and that is their job, but when it comes to the matter of birth certificates of persons who were born outside of Canada, the people have to go to foreign legations and are subjected to questioning.

To take myself as an example, I was about three years old when I was brought to Canada by my father, and the births of all the members of our family who were born on the other side of the ocean happen to have been recorded on one birth certificate, in Latin. If I want to go to the United States or if I require a birth certificate I would have to go to-day to the Soviet legation and be subjected to questioning, in spite of the fact that I never in my life had anything to do with the Soviet Union. At the time I was born there was no Soviet Union, but during this war the Soviet Union annexed the territory in which I was born. It seems to me that something should be done about cases of this kind, because I receive a good number of letters from Canadian citizens from all parts of the country, some of whom have been here for twenty years and more, asking me to assist them in obtaining their birth certificates. What can be done in this matter? It is very important. Could not the Secretary of State, consulting perhaps with the Department of External Affairs, undertake a service to provide birth certificates to persons who want them, so that either the Secretary of State's Department or the Department of External Affairs would make proper investigation, search immigration and naturalization records and so forth, and establish what the age of the particular person may be. I desire to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I hope that he will take it up with the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN: Thank you very much. I will have that matter taken up.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 40—Evidence of declarations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just by way of suggestion, I am wondering whether or not it would facilitate proof in both sections 40 and 41 if a provision were made that it is unnecessary to produce the authority of the delegated officer to grant the certificate: in other words, if in section 40, after the word "behalf" in line 14, there were added these words, "without proof of such authorization."

Mr. MARTIN: Thank you. I accept that.

Mr. REID: Will there be any difference between the new naturalization certificates issued to the new Canadians as compared with the old naturalization certificates which have been issued, some by the provinces and some by the federal government?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. The exact form has not been determined, but we hope to have them a little more convenient in size, too.

Mr. REID: Will facilities be provided by which those who have been in the country for years, such as myself, will be able to obtain the certificate?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I explained that the other night.

Mr. REID: By application to the minister?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, to the Secretary of State.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 40 is carried.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As amended.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There is no amendment to section 40.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move:

[Mr. Hlynka.]

That there be added after the word "behalf" in line 14 the words "without proof of such authorization."

Mr. MARTIN: That amendment is acceptable.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 41—Evidence of certificate.

Mr. MARTIN: I move, following the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre:

That after the words "in that behalf" there be added the words "without proof of such authorization."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 42 agreed to.

On section 43—Question of domicile, how determined.

Mr. FLEMING: Just a question. I take it that it is the desire of the minister to have in this statute when it becomes law as complete a code as possible in relation to the whole question of citizenship, nationality and naturalization. Does he think it is wise to introduce some important provisions of the Immigration Act by reference in this way? Would it not be simpler to set forth these provisions in this section? After all, the Immigration Act may be changed; and there was an improvement made in this bill, in my humble opinion, as compared with the version which the minister introduced in the fall session last year, when in section 2, subparagraph (j) he brought into this bill a definition instead of trying to incorporate a reference to another statute. Would not the same proceeding be advisable here?

Mr. MARTIN: This is purely transitional and its provocations will soon disappear. It was thought this was the best way to deal with this situation; otherwise it would be highly complicated.

Section agreed to.

Section 44 agreed to.

On section 45—Acts repealed.

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to move:

That clause 45 of Bill 7 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection, as subsection (2):

"(2) Where, in any act of the parliament of Canada or any order or regulation made thereunder, any provision is made applicable in respect of

(a) a "natural-born British subject" it shall apply in respect of a "natural-born Canadian citizen," or

(b) a "naturalized British subject" it shall apply in respect of a "Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen" or

(c) a "Canadian national" it shall apply in respect of a "Canadian citizen," under this act and where in any act, order or regulation aforesaid any provision is made in respect of the status of any such person as a Canadian national or British subject it shall apply in respect of his status as a Canadian citizen or British subject under this act.

I am prepared to give the explanation now.

Mr. FULTON: Explain it and let it stand.

Mr. MARTIN: Before the house rose at six o'clock I said that when we came to this section I would deal with an amendment to set at rest any fears there might be as to the possible effect of the present bill upon the orders in council concerning the Japanese in Canada.

Let me say, first of all, that there was no intention whatever that this bill should be connected with or affect in any way the operating of the policy with respect to the orders in question. That is a distinct and separate matter. A permanent measure with regard to the general status of citizenship should not be related in any way to such temporary provisions that affect only a small and restricted class. Moreover, so far as the actual effect of the bill as now drafted is concerned, we are convinced, after careful consideration, that it would not affect in any way the effectiveness of the deportation orders.

The matter has been most carefuly examined and I am certain that this is so. However, I can see what is disturbing some hon. members. The point that they have in mind is that the orders in council were passed in respect of persons who had a certain status—in actual fact, in respect of persons who had three different types of status; for some were natural-born in this country, some were naturalized and some were aliens.

The last group we can forget about. They are clearly and unmistakably not affected by the bill in any way. I am not admitting that orders of deportation are affected by this bill, but certainly this last group are clearly not affected. Thus, it is really two groups of persons about whom some hon. members are concerned: Japanese persons born in Canada and Japanese persons who were naturalized here. At the time the orders in council were passed these persons were respectively natural-born British subjects and naturalized British subjects. After the bill is passed, these groups of people will be respectively natural-born Canadian citizens and naturalized Canadian citizens.

The question is: Will the new status affect in any way the operation of the earlier orders? That is the point which hon. members have in mind. With regard to this matter, let me say that I think the merits of the policy should not enter into the consideration of this question in any way. The problem is a general problem—for there are some other acts and orders now in existence which deal with persons as "British subjects" or "Canadian nationals", and the same questions can arise in respect of them.

In other words, the amendment will deal not only with the particular situation but with any other situation that may possibly be in existence. Does this bill by changing the status of such people affect in any way the operation of such acts or orders? It is perfectly clear that this bill could not alter the operation of such acts or orders. If such alterations were to occur, we would create an unplanned and totally unpredictable effect on a totally unknown number of acts and orders. What we want is that their effect shall not be disturbed. In the light of the points that have been raised and of the considerations which I have mentioned, I think the situation as it now stands leaves a measure of doubt that should not exist, so that I have suggested the amendment which I have brought forward, which I think takes care of the situation completely.

The effect of the amendment which I have asked my colleague to move will be to provide that where an act or order now in force refers to a group of persons it shall continue to refer to the same group under their new status. For example, people who were born in Canada and who are now natural-born British subjects will hereafter be natural-born Canadian citizens. If an act now refers to natural-born British subjects it should hereafter include application to natural-born Canadian citizens. In other words, the amendment will provide for a parallel adaptation of existing acts and orders to the new classes of status that will result from the present bill.

The amendment is one that deals with an extremely complicated situation, but it has been carefully drafted and considered and it is, I think, the soundest way of doing what we have in mind. The section will stand.

Section stands.

On section 46—Saving.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I was surprised and gratified to hear what the Secretary of State said in regard to the amendment to section 45 and, since he has allowed it to stand, we can examine it more carefully. It has not been carried?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): To assist the minister with the two clauses that he has allowed to stand, 16 and 17, I should like to move the following clause to be added to section 46. It would be subsection 3:

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, for a period of twenty years from the proclamation thereof, no person of Japanese ancestry, whether natural born, naturalized or Japanese alien, shall be allowed to reside in that section of British Columbia presently known as the coastal security zone.

I hear some hon. members say that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. FULTON: Pay no attention.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I feel that should the government be unwilling to accept this proposal I would be justified in believing that they never had any intention of trying to carry out the undertaking which I believe the Minister of Veterans Affairs made in good faith in the recent election in British Columbia and that his colleagues have not supported him in his sincere and honest statement that no Japanese would be allowed from the Rockies to the sea in British Columbia and—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment should be read to the committee before it is debated. We cannot discuss the amendment until it is before the committee.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There is an amendment before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: Not to this section.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I shall read the amendment as proposed by the hon. member. Mr. Gibson moves that:

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, for a period of twenty years from the proclamation thereof, no person of Japanese ancestry, whether natural-born, naturalized or Japanese alien, shall be allowed to reside in that section of British Columbia presently known as the coastal security zone.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the Chairman give an opinion now as to whether or not the amendment is in order? My opinion is that the amendment cannot be in order; that it is not related in any way to naturalization or to any provision of this bill, and consequently it must be out of order.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): May I be permitted to speak on the point of order? The explanatory note of section 46 is "saving". I understand that earlier in the debate the hon. member for New Westminster raised the case of a natural-born Canadian of Japanese ancestry who announced that he had no faith in Canada; that his patriotism was to Japan. Yet he could return to this country and assume the full rights of a Canadian citizen because, as the Secretary of State pointed out, there is no place to which to deport him since he was a natural-born Canadian. On the other hand, this saving section, 46, has an association with these orders in council passed last fall which put certain restrictions on people who were natural-born Canadians and naturalized Canadians. There was a further order in council passed dealing with certain Canadians, which restricted them from living in the coastal zone. That was passed in 1942. I followed the Secretary of State's argument and explanation as carefully as I could, and with what knowledge of the English language I have, it sounded like double talk to me. Along with this saving section, 46, there should certainly be such a provision as this amendment to support, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, the promises made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the only minister from British Columbia in the government. He promised that the Japanese would not return to the coastal zone. At the present time there is an order in council which says that, but we want to go farther than that since the provisions of this bill give full Canadian rights to natural-born Japanese.

Mr. MARTIN: The amendment is not an easy one; neither is the subject itself. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman will give it the great consideration which I know he will, he will see that it refers inter alia to the three orders. I want to suggest to my very good friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who is one of the most diligent members in this house, that this bill is a measure dealing with nationality, citizenship and status of aliens. I would suggest to him that the amendment as offered certainly has no place in this bill. I do not know whether it is out of order or not, but I would certainly suggest to the hon. member that it is so clearly irrelevant that I would not think he would require much more persuasion to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I dislike not reacting properly to the kindly words that the Secretary of State has applied to me. It makes me feel very humble. However, with my very great lack of parliamentary experience I must say that I have been looking for quite some time for an opportunity to see what the government intended to do with regard to the Japanese on the coast. I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs is particularly concerned with how he is going to keep the promise he made that assisted him in garnering the support of his colleagues to the proposition which he sold to the people of British Columbia, certainly to Vancouver Centre. I think this is a marvellous opportunity for the government of Canada to give tangible evidence to the people of British Columbia of their good faith in the last election. It just occurs to me that this is the only opportunity they have yet had to carry out that promise.

I know that British Columbia members have been bringing up this matter in the house for many years. The man whom I have the honour to succeed took this matter up faithfully for twenty-five years, and we can look around the house and see many hon. members from British Columbia who have been carrying on yeoman service in this regard despite, shall I say, the handicap of having to put up with the anti-Canadian resolutions of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. MacINNIS: They did not vote exclusion when I gave them the chance; they voted against it.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The people of Vancouver East are not very well informed—

Mr. MacINNIS: Let the hon. member tell that to the people of Vancouver.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I believe this is an opportlunity for the members of the house to listen to what has been told them for the past forty years by the members from British Columbia. In days gone by we did not have the C.C.F. party. It used to be unanimous out there, but it would appear to me our people have fallen into the ways of error. I would not advise this house to listen too carefully to the five members who represent the C.C.F. party here with regard to what has been going on.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is the hon. member speaking to the point of order?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): A point of order was raised. We have to deal with that.

Mr. GREEN: On the point of order, may I point out that in other sections of this bill reference is made to rights and obligations. For example, in section 27 there is a reference to the rights of the Canadian citizen other than a natural-born citizen. In section 29 there is a reference to the rights of aliens. I submit that the amendment which has been offered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni deals with rights and is entirely in order.

Mr. GLEN: May I be allowed to say a word? The amendment states:

> Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, for a period of twenty years from the proclamation thereof, no person of Japanese ancestry, whether natural-born naturalized or Japanese alien, shall be allowed to reside in that section of British Columbia presently known as the coastal security zone.

Any amendment that is moved must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is moved. In this bill we are dealing with the question of nationality of citizenship and all the rights and privileges that pertain thereto. In this amendment we are denying to a citizen of Canada the right to reside in a certain place. It is not relevant to the bill because it introduces another matter altogther foreign to and has no bearing on the section of the bill with which we are now dealing. In my judgment it is entirely out of order to introduce a subject so irrelevant and so foreign to the very purpose of the bill. I suggest that the Chairman consider citation 344 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, volume 3, which reads:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.
> The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto. The exceptions to this rule are amendments on the question of going into supply or ways and means.

I am submitting to the Chair that this amendment is foreign to the section now before the committee and that, as a matter of fact, it contains a prohibition denying to an individual who might under the bill become a citizen of this country his rights and obligations, and that therefore it is out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I had intended to quote the citation which has been quoted by the Minister of Mines and Resources. I think there is no question in the world that this amendment is clearly out of order. If such an amendment were accepted any other hon. member could rise up and move a motion or an amendment to deal with some other class in the same way, and so it could go on and on. I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Neither the hon. member for Comox-Alberni nor myself being a lawyer, we had thought section 46 had to do with certain saving restrictions. I may not be in order now in asking this, but I waited for this section in order to do so. Perhaps the minister will give me and my colleague the assurance that this bill which we are almost through will not give to these natural-born Canadian Japanese or naturalized Canadian Japanese rights which they do not have at the moment. For instance, in British Columbia they do not vote. In British Columbia at present, because of an order in council, they do not live in the coastal security zone. We should like to know if this bill does give them the right to vote in British Columbia and the right to live in the coastal zone.

Mr. MARTIN: The amendment I have offered covers all existing acts and orders.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Including that one about not living in the coastal zone?

Mr. MARTIN: I said it covers all existing acts and orders.

Mr. FULTON: On an earlier occasion when I asked the minister a question with regard to the effect of the repeal of this act which was common to all the empire countries, as I understood it he said he would explain when we came to section 46. Has he that explanation to offer now?

Mr. MARTIN: Hitherto the status of British subjects has been established by having virtually identical definitions in the naturalization acts of the different countries of the commonwealth. Each act described what persons were born to the status of British subjects and what persons could be naturalized to it, and each act did this in the same way. However, as long as this system was retained it meant that we were not able to eliminate double definitions: definition on the one hand of national status and on the other hand of the status of British subject. The result in Canada was that we fell into the serious difficulties that we now have with British subjects, Canadian nationals and Canadian citizens. Moreover, the retention of the identical definition basis imposed a severe limitation upon the capacity of individual countries of the commonwealth to establish their own citizenship as a basic consideration for purposes of their own law.

The hitherto existing approach might be called the system of "identical definition." The other possible approach is for each country of the commonwealth to establish its own citizenship definition in accordance with its own needs, and for the other countries to recognize that definition as according the status of British subjects for purposes of their law. This new basis might be contrasted with that of "identical definition" by calling it, perhaps, the principle of "mutual recognition." The principle is seen in the present bill. We have defined Canadian citizens, and we have said that we regard them as having the status of British subjects. We have then gone on to say that for the purposes of our law we recognize as British subjects persons who are such under the law of any other country of the commonwealth, no matter how that country may define the status. There is advantage in maintaining as high a degree of similarity in definition as is consistent with the special needs of the various countries. This we have tried to keep in mind in the present bill, and hon. members will have noticed that the basic definitions and qualifications here are not substantially different from those in the present Naturalization Act. In short, we have tried to achieve what we thought was necessary in the new situation without discarding what seemed to be of value in the old.

Mr. FULTON: That is a very clear explanation. Can the minister say whether this principle of mutual recognition has been discussed with the other commonwealth countries?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, the bill was sent to the other commonwealth countries.

Mr. FULTON: And were they prepared to make similar concessions?

Mr. MARTIN: There was no negative reply.

Mr. FULTON: All of them?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 47—Coming into force.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wonder if the minister could tell us, assuming this bill is passed by next week, when the probable date of proclamation would be. I should like to think this bill might be proclaimed by the end of May, in view of the quinquennial census which is to take place on the prairies next month. I emphasize that strongly, because the citizens out there would then be able to say, when asked what is their citizenship, "I am a Canadian." That may not be possible, because in all probability the forms are already printed, but if it should not be possible I would suggest that the bill be proclaimed on July 1.

Mr. MARTIN: I may assure my hon. friend that it will be proclaimed at the earliest possible moment. We have to give notice of the establishment of the registers abroad to many people, and as soon as we can effect that item particularly we hope to proclaim it. At the moment it is difficult to say exactly when that will be, though I can assure the hon. gentleman it will be done as quickly as possible.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just in that connection, if I may add one word, the other day when I brought up an amendment with regard to the question that hereafter it should be unnecessary, except in the case of naturalized citizens, to refer in the census to racial origin, or even to answer the question of racial origin, the minister stated that he could give the assurance that hereafter this would not be required in the census. Does that assurance apply to the census about to be taken in the western provinces?

Mr. MARTIN: Of course I can only say that this bill is not yet law. As soon as it becomes law the answer to one's national status will be as provided in section 3 of the bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, that still does not answer the question.

Mr. POULIOT: One thing at a time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right; one thing at a time, as the hon. member for Temiscouata says. The question I am asking is simply this. Will natural-born Canadians, provided that this bill is promulgated and brought into effect before the cenus takes place in the western provinces, be required to state their racial origin?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The section under discussion reads as follows:

This act shall come into force upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

Shall this section carry?

Mr. FLEMING: Will the bill be proclaimed in time for the celebration of Canadian citizenship day?

Mr. MARTIN: Carried.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I submit that the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Lake Centre are connected with this section, because it deals with the date of proclamation and that has a bearing on whether or not the people of the prairie provinces will have the legal right under this bill to call themselves Canadian citizens, and whether or not that will be a good and sufficient answer as provided in section 3. I think we are entitled to a reply to that.

Mr. MARTIN: I have given the reply. Section 3 is quite clear, that if a person is asked as to his national status, hereafter he will not have to say anything other than, "I am a Canadian citizen."

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Would the minister add to that statement, "regardless of what is on the printed census form"?

Mr. MARTIN: The bill is clear.

Section agreed to.

On schedule 1.

Mr. FLEMING: A question has been asked about the inclusion within the scope of the commonwealth of Australia of the territory of Papua and Norfolk islands. Would the minister explain that?

Mr. MARTIN: It is carried over from the old act.

Mr. POULIOT: They are British subjects.

Mr. FLEMING: Could the minister clarify the situation?

Mr. MARTIN: It is the schedule suggested by the Department of External Affairs, and carries out provisions in the old act. Australia would want it, too.

Mr. FLEMING: The question was asked by some hon. members as to whether this involved the granting of citizenship privileges in certain cases to persons who might not be white, or be familiar with the English language.

Mr. MARTIN: It does. The point arises in connection with section 28. It is to be noted that section 28 does not say that we recognize as a British subject a person born in a country in the schedule, or a person resident in a country in the schedule. That would limit the status to a person from one of the scheduled countries. There is no such limitation. The status is recognized for anyone who gets that status under the laws of any of the scheduled countries. The United Kingdom is a scheduled country, and all colonials get the status of British subject by force of the United Kingdom law. Thus, the effect of section 28 is to recognize all British subjects, and not just a portion of them.

Mr. FLEMING: Another point might be clarified, namely the significance of the word "Ireland". What is the relevance of that geographical expression to the nation which now calls itself Eire. I take it that the reference in this schedule applies to the whole geographical island known as Ireland, including the northern six counties and Eire.

Mr. MARTIN: Northern Ireland comes under the United Kingdom.

Mr. FLEMING: And Ireland includes Eire.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not believe in the discrimination of races. The commonwealth of Australia includes all the aborigines of the commonwealth. The Maoris of New Zealand, the Hottentots and the Zulus of South Africa are all British subjects. I am sure they will send a letter of appreciation to the hon. member for Eglinton for his fine speeches in that regard.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

On section 10—Grant of a certificate of Canadian citizenship.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There is an amendment to this section.

Mr. GLEN: I move:

That section 10 be amended.

1. By inserting a new subsection (2), as follows:

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection one of this section, the minister may grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is a British subject and who makes to the minister a declaration that he desires such certificate and who satisfies the minister that he possesses the qualifications prescribed by paragraphs (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) of subsection one of this section; provided that in any case where, in the opinion of the minister, there is doubt as to whether the applicant possesses the said qualifications, the minister before granting such a certificate may refer the declaration and the material in support thereof to the court in the judicial district in which the declarant resides, and the declaration shall thereupon be dealt with as an application under subsection one of this section."

2. By renumbering the present subsection (2) as subsection (3).

3. By renumbering the present subsection (3) as subsection (4) and inserting after the words "subsection one" in line six thereof the words "and subsection two."

4. By renumbering the present subsection (4) as subsection (5) and substituting for the words "for the purpose of subsection one of this section" in line five thereof the words "for the purposes of subsection one and subsection two of this section."

Mr. FLEMING: As one who introduced an amendment to section 10 (1), may I commend the amendment which the minister has introduced. It recognizes the principle for which I contended in my amendment, although the minister's amendment does not go as far as mine did.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move:

That the following words be added to the section as subsection 6: "Such certificate of citizenship shall be deemed to include a Bill of Rights as follows:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.

2. Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.

3. No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards."

Some few minutes ago the minister made reference to the fact that some hon. members were disturbed regarding the effect of this bill on outstanding orders in council. I was one of those hon. members. I now refer to it for the purpose of clarifying the situation, and not because of any sympathy with views which might be expressed to the effect that under our citizenship, such citizenship should not be equal, without regard to race, colour or creed. I make that perfectly clear, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

I have expressed my views in regard to those orders in council before, and I express them again now by saying that if citizenship is to mean anything it must mean the equality of all.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN WINNIPEG TRIBUNE

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In an article in the Winnipeg Tribune dated May 1 of this year, questionable and unfair motives were imputed to me, and I wish now to deny them emphatically. I want to make it clear that the appreciation of my responsibility as a representative of the people, and that alone, is the motive that prompted me to expose the numerous adverse and detrimental effects that bill No. 5 would have on the Canadian wheat board and, ultimately, on the farmers of western Canada.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I gave you notice of my intention to speak on that bill at the last session, but that the time expired before my turn came. Any suggestion that I took the floor last Tuesday to talk out Bill No. 5 is totally unfounded, untrue and unfair. I still have six minutes to go when this debate is resumed, and I propose to avail myself of those few minutes to make my position perfectly clear. I hope Mr. Dick Sanburn will then be in the gallery to listen.

WAR EXPENDITURES

CHANGE OF PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Murphy be substituted for that of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) on the special committee on war expenditures and economies.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN ACCEPTANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce) moved the first reading of bill No. 59 (from the senate) to incorporate Canadian Acceptance company.

He said: Under the Small Loans Act of 1939 licences may be granted for the carrying on of the business of lending up to $500 on personal notes and the like. The act is administered by the superintendent of insurance, and, apparently a dominion corporation is required to form another company if they wish to carry on that type of business. This application is by some of the officers of the Canadian Acceptance Corporation Limited—well known, I think, to most hon. members—and the purpose is to incorporate a company which will carry on small loans under this act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RUPERT'S LAND TRADING COMPANY

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the first reading of bill No. 60 (from the senate) respecting Rupert's Land Trading company.

He said: This is an amendment to a charter which was granted by the parliament of Canada some few years ago, to clarify certain rights which had been believed until recently the company already possessed, the company owning land in various places. It is, I may say, a successor to the company which has been in existence for a great many years known as Révillon Frères, well known fur trading organization. But some question within perhaps the last year has arisen about the right of the company to own land. It is not clearly enough stated in the charter, and it is to clarify the position in that respect that these amendments to the charter are now being introduced.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. ISNOR:

1. When reopened, will the Royal Military College at Kingston be conducted on a basis similar to that existing in 1938-39?

2. What provision is being made (a) to conduct officers training courses for university graduates; (b) to include men from the ranks of the active army who have been recommended for commissions?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The basis on which the Royal Military College will be reopened has not yet been decided. The system by which officers for Canada's post-war army will be provided, the educational standards required, and the manner in which the necessary military and educational training should be carried out will depend to some extent on the recommendations to be made by a committee, under the chairmanship of Brigadier Sherwood Lett of Vancouver, presently inquiring into these matters.

3. What salaries do they receive?
4. What are their duties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. A commission, created by a treaty signed at Washington, January 11, 1909, to be composed of six commissioners, (three on the part of Canada and three on the part of the United States of America) having jurisdiction in questions relating to the use, obstruction or diversion of certain boundary waters or waters crossing the boundary and in matters of difference arising between Canada and United States interests along the common frontier. Only two commissioners have been appointed on each side.

2. A. Canadian personnel: two commissioners, a secretary, an assistant-secretary and the secretary to the chairman. B. United States personnel: two commissioners, a secretary, and a staff appointed by the government of the United States.

3. A. Salaries of the Canadian personnel are as follows: (a) Hon. Charles Stewart, Commissioner (Chairman), $7,500; (b) J. E. Perrault, Commissioner, $7,500; (c) Lawrence J. Burpee, Secretary, $4,620; (d) Miss E. M. Sutherland, Assistant Secretary, $2,358.12; (e) Mrs. J. L. Montgomery, Secretary to the Chairman, $2,178.12.

*TIMBER CONTROLLER—SHIPMENT OF LUMBER BEYOND PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. BURTON:

1. Has the timber controller offered special inducements to the saw mills operating in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and southern British Columbia to ship lumber beyond the prairie provinces?
2. If so, what are such inducements?
3. Have further concessions in this respect been recently made by said controller?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, with respect to two by eight and wider rough-dimension lumber, which is not produced in any quantity in Ontario.

2. The inducements are the same as for lumber shipped to any point on the prairies, namely, that for two cars of lumber shipped to Ontario one carload is permitted to be exported.

3. No.

4. No special provisions are necessary. Lumber of this particular class is generally surplus in most prairie yards. I may say that Saskatchewan, more than any other province, is dependent upon lumber shipped from other provinces, and it would be unfortunate for that province if each province were dependent on its own internal economy so far as lumber is concerned.

WAR GRAVES COMMISSION—VISITING OF GRAVES SERVICEMEN

Mr. FRASER:

Have any plans been made by the War Graves Commission in regard to the relatives visiting the graves of servicemen who have been killed during service, and buried in foreign countries?

Mr. ABBOTT: The imperial war graves commission has always assisted visitors arriving in Great Britain with guidance and advice. Transportation from Canada or other facilities would be outside its purview. The present is a time of reorganization and new cemetery construction and it is not known what means for the comfort and convenience of travellers are available or likely to be so in the near future.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDIAN AFFAIRS—KOOTENAY INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, ST. EUGENE MISSION, B.C.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East):

For a copy of all correspondence between the Department of Indian Affairs and the inspector of construction of Kootenay Industrial School, St. Eugene Mission, British Columbia, during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, regarding the construction of the said school.

Mr. GLEN: The records branch advise me that, acting under authority of the minutes of a meeting of the treasury board held on March 16, 1944 (T-260350 B), the files containing the above correspondence were destroyed and consequently it is not possible to comply with the hon. member's motion.

Motion dropped.

HOUSING—APPLICATION OF ACT TO FARMERS AND RESIDENTS OF TOWNS AND VILLAGES

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Perhaps the house will permit me to answer a question asked the other day by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross):

I would like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction a question. Will he indicate to the house the arrangements which have been made to enable farmers and residents of towns and villages to take advantage of part 3 of the National Housing Act.

The answer is that lending institutions are authorized to operate under part 3 of the National Housing Act and will accept applications for loans from farmers. Part 3 of the act does not apply to loans to residents of towns and villages. Such loans fall under part 1 of the National Housing Act and the lending institutions are authorized to accept applications for these loans.

It is recognized that administrative difficulties and problems of inspection and appraisal have tended to make the lending institutions reluctant to enter outlying areas, and consequently coverage under the National Housing Act has not been all that could be desired. Recently the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has secured agreement from the major lending institutions for better coverage and it now appears that the fullest cooperation will be forthcoming from the lending institutions to ensure a complete coverage in these areas.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS ON AND AFTER MAY 8

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 8th May to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays over all business except introductions of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: I have put this motion on the order paper largely to allow hon. members to express their own views if they so desire, but primarily for the purpose of meeting what I believe is the general wish of the house to get on with its business as rapidly as possible. I recall that when I introduced the motion with respect to taking Mondays the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) suggested that when we considered Wednesdays again the government should perhaps give a little more latitude than it otherwise would. No doubt that was my hon. friend's feeling at the time. But I am sure that hon. members will realize that we are getting on into the months of the session now and I would say that in regard to practically all the questions that come up on private members' motions there are other opportunities during the session where hon. members can discuss these particular questions, as for example, on the estimates, in connection with some of the public bills that come before the house, and the like.

The experience thus far this session has not shown that discussions on private members' resolutions on Wednesdays have led us very far. I do not wish to press this motion at the moment, if there is any strong objection to it. I shall be prepared to modify its wording to accord with what appears to be the wish of the house; but I hope hon. members see the wisdom of getting on with government business if they really are concerned about not having the work of the session run too far into the months of this year.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking for this party I may say we shall be glad to support the motion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): We decided last week that we would support a similar motion, but I should like to add this word, that we did that before last Friday evening. Between eight and nine o'clock last Friday evening I think we all felt that the time of the house was not being occupied in the manner in which it should be. I make this mild protest in that regard, but we are anxious to facilitate the business of the house.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): The house surely has the support of this group in facilitating the business. Having in mind, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has, the way in which private members' hours have degenerated until they are practically useless, I suggest we support the motion.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am the first private member to rise to speak on this motion. The Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition are certainly not back-benchers; neither is the leader of the C.C.F., nor the leader of the Social Credit party.

It is not easy for a government supporter to oppose a government measure, and it is especially difficult when the measure is personally sponsored by the Prime Minister. I should like to be regarded, however, not as a private member differing from his leader, but rather as a private member differing at the moment from government policy.

The standing orders set aside Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays for the first four weeks of the session as private members' days. During the war we gave up that right because government business came first. In the first session after the war we gave up the right completely; and in this session, of the first four Thursdays the first three were devoted to the speech from the throne, which after all was government business. It is quite true that a private member had wide latitude in speaking on the address, but as government business had priority with the consent of the house, it left us only one Thursday for the discussion of private members' business. Shortly afterwards the Prime Minister put a motion on the order paper asking that Wednesday be given up. When the motion came before the house on April 9, the word "Wednesday" was changed to "Monday"; therefore we lost a full day instead of a half day, and once again the members of the house all agreed that government business should have priority. Now we are asked to give up our last effective afternoon, because one hour on Tuesdays and Fridays for private members' bills is not the same as two and a half hours on Wednesday. The argument used, of course, is first of all that government business should have priority. In that we have shown a fair measure of agreement, because we have given our Mondays to government business. The second argument used by the Prime Minister is that there are other opportunities to bring forward the matters we wish to discuss, namely, on going into supply, on the budget, and on the estimates.

Of course the house will note that I am concerned because my resolution will be the first one to be cut off. If I speak on that subject on the budget or on going into supply I shall make my comments on behalf of the three municipalities in my riding which are concerned in the matter referred to in the resolution. The next speaker may speak, and probably will, on some aspect remote from that, and there is no obligation on the minister, either in supply or on the budget, to answer anything I have said.

If I wait for the estimates I can wait until the Ottawa grant of $100,000 in lieu of taxes comes up for discussion; but that will probably be on some steamy, sultry night late next August or early September, when the desire of the house is not to listen to debate but to push the estimates through in order to get home. On the other hand if we do have an afternoon to discuss what to my mind is important—even more important now that the dominion-provincial conference has been temporarily adjourned—the financial relations between the dominion and the municipalities, and certainly the municipalities are the hardest pressed of any of the governments in Canada at the moment, then not only can I state my case on behalf of the hard pressed municipalities of Vancouver North, but other parties can state their case and the government must make a reply. This is public business; it is not just a private member's business.

I wish to give one other illustration of the need of private members' day. Several hon. members have said to us: "Why do you British Columbia members not present a concerted story on the Japanese problem instead of sniping away at the citizenship bill, the labour estimates, and the army estimates?" One of the reasons, of course, is that we lack this opportunity. The other night the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) and myself presented an amendment which was ruled out of order, and one of the ministers sitting near me at the time said: "If you want to deal with that you should have brought in a private bill." Judging from the way things are going, if we had brought in a private bill it would never have seen the light of day.

My resolution was put on the order paper on the third or fourth day of the session. If a resolution which is put on the order paper on the third or fourth day of the session is never discussed in the house, obviously a private bill introduced this week would also fail to be discussed here. The opportunity for logical and coherent discussion of a public measure which is not on the government's program, but is brought forward by a private member, is more important to the government private member than to the opposition. As a matter of fact I envy my colleagues from British Columbia, the young member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and others, in the opportunity they have to speak on government measures. The government speaks particularly on government measures, and we who are in the background must either praise or damn. If we praise too much, we may be called sycophants; if we damn too much we are called rebels; if we do both we may be called inconsistent. Generally we keep silent.

Mr. HOMUTH: Come over here.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am happy where I am. If the government needs more time, as a private member I am prepared to give it to them, but not on Wednesday afternoon. I am quite willing to sit on Wednesday evening and give them three hours instead of two and a half. As a matter of fact the western members are willing to sit on Saturday mornings, because we have to stay here anyway.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Since the Prime Minister has indicated that the reason he has introduced this motion is to give members an opportunity to discuss the matter, may I just take one moment? I am willing to vote in favour of the motion, but I do not like the idea at any time of doing away with private members' day, because I believe if this parliament is to be effective it must function as a democratic parliament, with members sitting here representing their people and not their party.

It is stated also that this motion is made so that we may get on with the business of the house. What are we doing if we are not getting on with the business of the house? Surely that is what we are doing all the time. We have these private members' days, but under our present parliamentary procedure what do they amount to? They amount to just nothing, except to allow the private member to let off steam and enable him to go back and tell his constituents, "See, that is what I said." May I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to hon. members of this house, that it does not amount to a row of pins what a member says here on private members' days, and that goes for all of us; it goes for myself too. Unless there is some revision of our parliamentary procedure by which a private member can present a matter and then have it voted upon, we shall not have a truly democratic parliament. What we require is to have a vote on private members, resolutions and action taken as the result of the vote.

My own impression is that to-day parliament is subservient to the government. In a real democratic parliament the government should be subservient to parliament. But in the ultimate results here, that is not so. I object to a party parliament; I want a real democratic parliament. I believe that the private members' days should be democratically conducted, that decisions should be made on the matters brought before the house and the government told, by those decisions, what the people want.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): As a back-bencher of the official opposition let me say that I agree with the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) when he says that members from distant points would be willing to sit here on Wednesday evenings and Saturday mornings if necessary to expedite the business of the house.

Despite the fact that I have a resolution on the order paper closely following his, I have also to agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who has just taken his seat, that private members' days as they are conducted here are scarcely worth while. When I first came into the house I certainly was concerned over losing private members' days but with all due respect to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) who raised an objecion this afternoon—and I will exempt him because he expressed himself—on many occasions when private members' resolutions were being discussed in the house I have seen a scurrying about to round up members to speak on a certain resolution. As pointed out by the hon. member for Macleod, if we conducted these private members' days efficiently we might accomplish something, but as it is they do not accomplish much, and I should be quite willing to forgo them until we have a more democratic procedure so that we can get on with the essential business of the country.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I rise briefly to support the opposition presented to this resolution by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). I do not quite agree that private members' days are useless. At the present time it is the only opportunity that the back-benchers have to hear both sides of any current issue discussed, and I am sure that up to the present the debates on private members' days have been of advantage to the members and informative to the public at large. That is my experience from listening to the debates themselves and from communications I have received from constituents.

There is no necessity to repeat the arguments presented by the hon. member for Vancouver North, but I think that we can still retain private members' days and sit on Wednesday evenings, which I think a good many members would be willing to do; and as my hon. friend has said, the western members would be willing I think to sit also on Saturday morning. If we did that, and some hon. members would curtail to some extent their excessive language, I am sure that we should make progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to run the risk defeating my own motion when it is on the point of being accepted by all political parties, but I should like to say to my hon. friend the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), who has said that his resolution would be the first to be slaughtered, that there are two resolutions ahead of his on the order paper and if the house took up either of them I am afraid that would mean on each the whole afternoon would be taken up. However, I can sympathize with my hon. friend in his wish to present the subject of his resolution to the house and have it discussed, but I believe there will be other opportunities in the session for him to develop further what he has in mind.

May I say a word to my hon. friend the hon. member for Macleod, the outstanding democrat who spoke of giving a chance to everyone to launch an attack on the government, that I have just given him that opportunity, so he can hardly say that I have tried to take away any right of speech from him this afternoon.

Speaking of democratic government, unless I am entirely mistaken about what is being alleged as to government at Westminster having become more democratic of late, I would point out that during and since the war the government at Westminster has taken away private members' days altogether in order that headway may be made with government business. We have not gone that far. We have allowed several days as private members' days but I would be the last to say that the government at Westminster is not a democratic government.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

EVICTIONS ON MAY 31 FROM LONDON BLOCK, SASKATOON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. He is not in his seat at the moment, but perhaps the question will be conveyed to him. Is it the intention of the minister to evict, on May 31, some sixteen families from the London block in Saskatoon? If so, is the government prepared to take responsibility for finding shelter for these families at that time? The building is being used by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Stand as a notice.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FIRE ON ASSINIBOINE INDIAN RESERVE NO. 76

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, of which I have given him notice. What steps have been taken by the Indian Affairs branch to provide homes and a livelihood for the Indians left destitute by the recent disastrous fire which swept through the Assiniboine Indian reserve No. 76 in Saskatchewan?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The damages incurred by the fire a week ago are being thoroughly investigated by officers of the Indian Affairs branch. When the report of the investigation is received at Ottawa I can assure the hon. member that the necessary steps will be taken to rebuild or repair the property destroyed or damaged and to alleviate any suffering among the Indians affected by the fire.

LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 16, consideration in committee of bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the 6th day of March, 1946—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee last sat it was considering section 4, dealing with the continuation of the interest-free provision of the act of 1942.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, I am now in a position to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Temiscouata when this matter was before the house. I apologize to him for not having had more success in my attempts to answer his questions when the matter was before the house. I did answer some of them, but I must confess my answers were incomplete. To answer his questions completely will of course take some little time.

His first question, I think, related to the credit of the Netherlands East Indies, and was whether that country had been supplied only with money, or with some ammunition and arms; and with whom the Canadian government dealt in making this credit. The answer is that the Netherlands East Indies was not supplied with ammunition and arms but with funds for the purchase of ordinary commercial commodities in Canada. The deal was negotiated with the representative of the government of the Netherlands East Indies, and the agreement was signed by duly authorized representatives of the Bank for the Netherlands East Indies.

The second question referred to my statement that by 1950 the British would have wiped out their deficit and would be getting back to equilibrium, and then asked what about Canadian equilibrium. I referred briefly to this question when the bill was discussed by the house before, and explained what I meant by "deficit" and "equilibrium": The deficit I was referring to was not a budgetary deficit in the sense of an excess of government expenditures over government revenues, but an entirely different thing, namely, deficit or disequilibrium in the United Kingdom's balance of payments on current account. Let me put it a simpler way. During the next few years the United Kingdom is not going to be able to get enough foreign exchange from her exports to other countries, her earnings from shipping, insurance and financial services rendered to other countries, the earnings on her outstanding foreign investments, tourist expenditures in the United Kingdom, etc., to enable her, without borrowing, to pay for the goods and services which she will require from other countries, the interest on her foreign indebtedness and other current account liabilities to other countries. In other words there will be a deficit in her current account balance of payments, which will have to be met primarily by borrowing from foreign countries. This deficit will be huge in the first year or two, but is expected to decline to small proportions in 1949 and be wiped out altogether in 1950. That is what I was trying to say at page 766 of Hansard.

Canada of course has no deficit in that sense. On the contrary Canada is in better than equilibrium to-day, and we expect that over the next two or three years Canada will have surpluses of substantial size in her current account balance of payments. That, indeed, is why we are making these loans or export credits—to enable other countries to buy from Canada goods and services which they would not otherwise be able to buy, at least in the same volume.

I may add that if we do not make it possible to sell our surplus production abroad in the next few years, if we are not able to build up and maintain on a high level that export trade on which so large a proportion of our people depend for a living, then we are likely to be unable to avoid continuing to show very substantial deficits in the other sense of that term—deficits in the budgetary sense.

Another question asked by the hon. member related to the deficit in the British balance of payments not covered by the proposed loans from United States and Canada, and my statement on page 766 of Hansard that this remaining amount would have to be found elsewhere. The question was: "Does 'elsewhere' mean all the other dominions and the other countries of the empire?" I meant "elsewhere" in this connection to cover all other countries—all countries other than the United States and Canada.

The fourth question referred to a quotation I gave from the report of the United States national advisory council to the effect that in the United States-United Kingdom financial agreement of December 6, 1945, the British agreed to the removal of trade restrictions within one year from the effective date of that agreement. It then went on to ask: "Then, what about our British preference in trade?" The hon. member also asked the same question again on page 907 of Hansard in connection with certain other quotations from my own address. The removal of trade restrictions to which the national advisory committee's report referred, did not relate to tariffs but to quantitative import restrictions —that is to say, import quotas and foreign exchange restrictions. The United States-United Kingdom financial agreement does not deal with tariffs, which are what are involved when you speak of preferences.

Again the hon. member asked "What payments did the United Kingdom make to Canada since December, 1940?" Well, if I understand it correctly, it is impossible to answer this question literally because many thousands of transactions would be involved. In other words the United Kingdom—I am speaking, of course, of the country or the people, not just of the government—makes a mass of payments to Canada every day—using for the purchase of Canadian goods or services or the payment of liabilities here the Canadian dollars she receives from her export of goods to Canada, the ocean freights earned by transporting Canadian goods, the interest and dividends paid on her investments in Canada, the earnings from insurance and financial services rendered to Canadians, and the expenditures of Canadians and the Canadian government and armed forces in Britain. Since December, 1940 there has been a myriad of such transactions, and it would be quite impossible to catalogue them. However, what I think my hon. friend had in mind was the statistical information which one finds in a balance of payments statement, including the receipts to United Kingdom of Canadian dollars from exports and other major sources. These Canadian dollars were all spent in Canada, and they had to be supplemented by a very large amount of additional dollars from mutual aid, and so on, to enable Britain to make all the payments she had to make in Canada.

With the permission of the committee I shall place on Hansard a table prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics showing how United Kingdom and other sterling area expenditures in Canada were financed during the period January 1, 1941, to the end of last year. The table is as follow:

[1] Included in this item are currency settlements and other adjustments which were particularly large in 1942, 1943 and 1945.

It will be seen from the table that the United Kingdom's expenditures in Canada totalled $8,365 million, and that in addition to the transfer of gold and United States dollars to Canada amounting to $254 million during the period in question the United Kingdom used $3,775 million for payments in Canada, which dollars were obtained from exports to Canada, interest and dividend payments, freight and shipping services, travel expenditures in the United Kingdom and Canadian war activities overseas and other current items.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The hon. member also asked, as reported on page 907 of Hansard, "What about Canada?" in connection with the statement I made that—

> British policies will influence and largely determine the policies of many other countries, including particularly the countries now in the sterling area and probably the countries of western Europe.

I think my meaning was clear. I was talking particularly of the great influence which British policies inevitably have on the policies and the economic prosperity of other countries, because Britain is the world's greatest importer. I was thinking particularly, as I indicated, of the countries of the sterling area and of western Europe, and I was trying to show that unless Britain were assisted and encouraged to follow a liberal trade and currency policy she would be forced into restrictionist and discriminatory policies which would have an extremely bad effect on Canada, both directly and indirectly—the latter because of the effect which Britain's course of action would have on many other countries which constitute good markets for Canadian goods.

Dealing with the proposed cancellation of the British commonwealth air training plan indebtedness, the hon. member asked, how can we expect any repayment of a new $1,250 million loan if one of our reasons for suggesting cancellation was "the conclusion after much consideration that repayment of this $425 million was beyond the United Kingdom's capacity to pay within any reasonable period." The simple answer to that question is that we could not expect repayment of both the book debt and the new loan within a reasonable period, but we did feel that the United Kingdom would be able to repay the loan—over the long period and on the terms stipulated—and we were convinced that the new loan was necessary if our trade interests were to be protected. Attempting to make the United Kingdom pay off the $425 million debt on top of the $1,250 million loan, we were convinced, would have placed an altogether too heavy burden on Britain's balance of payments.

Another question asked what about "the gradual and orderly repatriation of Canadian securities owned in the United Kingdom". I am not sure that I get the point of this question. In my address—see page 770 of Hansard—I described this process of orderly repatriation of British-owned securities which has been going on and the undertaking given by the United Kingdom that the proceeds therefrom would be used to pay off the interest-free loan. Already repayments had amounted to over $161 million, and if they keep up at levels of the recent past it should not be long before the loan will be entirely paid off. From September 15, 1939, to December 31, 1945, total repatriation of Canadian securities from the United Kingdom aggregated $990 million.

Finally, the hon. member for Temiscouata asked about the detail of the settlement of war claims. This is a very complicated matter, but I shall do the best I can to answer the question, even though the agreement regarding the settlement of war claims is not part of the agreement before the house. It will be recalled that when introducing the legislation which is before the house I pointed out that the agreement on the settlement of war claims is a separate and distinct agreement from the one to which the house is now giving consideration. The agreement does not need to be made under the authority of special legislation; it can be made under the authority of existing legislation. I pointed out that the settlement agreement is essentially a measure to settle promptly and with a finality a large number of outstanding claims between the two governments, an objective which might otherwise take years to achieve.

As the house will no doubt realize, when the armed forces and the procurement departments of two countries have cooperated as closely and fully in the prosecution of total war over a period of six years as have those of Canada and the United Kingdom, there accumulates between them a large number of financial claims of various kinds. Some of these claims are simple in nature and definite in amount. This is true of the largest number of the claims covered by this agreement, and in such cases all that is necessary in order to reach a proper basis of settlement is normal accounting procedure.

On the other hand, many of the claims arising out of the war are more difficult to determine. In some cases, for example, the prices that should be charged for equipment or supplies cannot be settled in advance, and should be based on costs which it may take a considerable time to determine with accuracy. In other cases it is completely impossible to keep records of actual transfers, because they took place during the course of military, air or naval operations and it was not considered wise to interfere with these operations and to tie up the necessary man-power to the extent that would be necessary to keep accurate books. In still other cases, equipment intended for one purpose may be laid aside and replaced by other equipment, and that which is laid aside may be lent or transferred to other armed forces for use by them without waiting for negotiations regarding the terms on which the transfer is made. I cite these merely as general examples of the types of difficulty which one inevitably runs into, and as I go over the list of claims hon. members will see specific cases in which these difficulties have to be faced and surmounted.

There is, therefore, an inevitable lag in settling the financial consequences of all the various operations and transfers that are necessary in conducting war. The working out of these settlements might well have taken years and been the occasion of endless disputes over the nature, magnitude and validity of dozens of claims between Canada and the United Kingdom.

The Canadian government and the United Kingdom government, therefore, came to the conclusion that it was sensible to survey without delay the large number of claims of various types the two governments had against each other as a consequence of the war, and settle them by a payment of a round sum forthwith. The results of such survey convinced both of us that the payment by the United Kingdom to Canada of a sum of $150 million would be a fair and reasonable settlement of the balance of claims outstanding, and that on such payment all the claims as specified in the agreement could then be cancelled against one another.

The United Kingdom has now made this payment, the claims are cancelled, and we are proceeding to reflect these settlements in the various accounts in our books. The public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, when they appear, will give a detailed record of these transactions and there will be ample opportunity for the house to discuss them in detail when the estimates of the departments concerned—army, navy, air, reconstruction and supply, agriculture, fisheries and trade and commerce—are being considered.

I might explain that the method we are following in order to make clear the process in our accounts is to establish what we call a United Kingdom general settlement account, to which are credited the payment made by the United Kingdom and the various amounts that would have been owing by Canada to the United Kingdom but for the settlement agreement. The account is then charged with the amount of the claims which Canada has on the United Kingdom.

The simplest groups of claims covered by this settlement are those in the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Fisheries in respect of supplies furnished to the United Kingdom after September 1, 1945, when Mutual Aid ceased, and up to February 28, 1946, the end of the period covered by the settlement agreement. The amount debited to the settlement by the Department of Trade and Commerce, mainly in respect of wheat and flour, is $147,045,633. Similarly the figure charged by the Department of Fisheries for fishery products provided to the United Kingdom is $12,354,895. In both cases these amounts had been advanced under the authority of section 3 of the War Appropriation Act and the War Expenditures and Demobilization Appropriation Act. Both amounts mentioned, as well as some of the amounts hereafter mentioned, may be subject to some slight revision before the books for last year are closed.

In the Department of Agriculture there were advances made on behalf of the United Kingdom for the procurement of agricultural products, mainly meat, eggs and cheese, of $113,604,894. In addition, there were cancellation charges on contracts for dehydrated vegetables which were cancelled on short notice late last fall, amounting to $350,000. On the other hand, the Department of Agriculture has a credit to make to the United Kingdom account of $2,600,000, on egg contracts.

The Department of National Defence for Air has a claim against the United Kingdom of $12,736,060 in respect of the cost of training R.A.F. personnel subsequent to March 31, 1945. This was calculated on a capitation rate. On the other hand, there was a credit to the United Kingdom for equipment furnished in this training and in training Canadians in the same period, of $14,058,939. There are also credits to this account in respect of air force items of $14,225,873 for equipment purchased in the United States by the British air commission for Canadian account, and of $71,601,871 for the balance owing in respect of reserve stores and stores in pipeline behind R.A.F. squadrons overseas. This last item must be offset by an amount representing the disposal value of these reserve and pipeline stores on hand at the end of hostilities on V-E day. While the amount of such stores is known or can be estimated, it has not yet been possible to determine a proper figure for the value of them, mainly because this value depends on the price at which such stores can be liquidated in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. There is also a charge to the settlement account, now reported at $24,034,421, for equipment originally obtained from the United Kingdom and for which payment was made in the first instance to the United Kingdom, but which in fact originated in other countries to whom payment will finally have to be made when the proper prices are determined. In addition, there is a considerable number of miscellaneous debits and credits on air force account, which result in a net debit to the settlement account of $27,653,358.

The naval accounts, although intricate in detail, present no great problems, and there are no large items still to be determined. The settlement account is to be debited with $12,351,048 for various accounts payable by the admiralty to Canada, mainly for services furnished by the dockyards at Halifax. The account will be credited on the other hand with $6,938,884 by the navy for accounts payable by the navy to the admiralty, mainly for stores and services furnished overseas to Canadian ships.

In the case of the army, the major credits to the settlement account are a balance of $160,236,844 owing to the United Kingdom by the army for the maintenance of Canadian troops in the United Kingdom and in theatres of operations between April 1, 1943, and February 28, 1946. The payments in respect of all the supplies and services obtained by the army from the British army war office and other departments were made on the basis of capitation rates agreed between the two countries. It is impossible to keep records, particularly in the field, of all the equipment, ammunition, rations and other supplies obtained by the army, or to determine accurately rates of wastage and the proper division of costs for the various services provided by the United Kingdom to the army. There is also an amount payable by the army for initial equipment of $43,775,678, and an estimated payment in respect of westbound ocean passages for December, 1945, and January and February, 1946, of $6,000,000. On the other hand, there are debits to the settlement account of $27,037,768 for Canadian ordnance supplies transferred to the United Kingdom in the United Kingdom during the war, and of $91,997,769 for various types of stores supplied by Canada but covered under the general capitation rates for maintenance of the Canadian army, as already described. The account is also to be charged with an estimated amount of $17,800,000 in respect of operating and rental charges for joint facilities in Canada. There are various miscellaneous debits and credits on army account, which add up to a total debit to the settlement account of $16,087,532.

I should draw attention to two large items which were offset one against the other and accordingly it was not necessary to compute a money value for the purpose of the settlement agreement, namely, Canada's obligation to the United Kingdom for reserve stores and stores in pipeline behind the Canadian army formations in Europe and Canada's claim on the United Kingdom in respect of certain ram tanks which, after being taken overseas by the Canadian army, were subsequently turned over to British forces to serve as armoured troop carriers after turrets and guns were removed. When the detailed role of the Canadian formations was decided upon and the types of equipment to be used by other formations were known, it was decided that the Canadian formations should be equipped with the same types of tanks as those used by the American and British forces with whom they were co-operating. The ram tanks were, therefore, left behind, and became obsolete.

The United Kingdom owes the Department of Reconstruction and Supply some well defined amounts for various items furnished to the United Kingdom after V-J day, while the United Kingdom has some quite large potential claims on the department of a general nature very difficult to determine accurately, as they include shares in profits and reserves accumulated on the accounts of the department and its corporations attributable in part to payment by the United Kingdom before mutual aid of prices in excess of the actual cost of goods to the Canadian government. Claims of the department against the United Kingdom for supplies delivered after Mutual Aid had ceased are computed at $33,636,843, including an estimate of accounts still to come for payment.

In addition, the Indian government owes the Department of Reconstruction and Supply $48,813,929 for locomotives provided the Indian government under section 3 of the War Appropriation Act. In reaching agreement for the settlement which has been made between Canada and the United Kingdom, it was arranged that this obligation of India would be assumed by the United Kingdom and form part of the settlement. The claim of the United Kingdom for the balance of equity in the general working capital fund as at August 31, 1943, has been established at $32,795,385. In connection with the United Kingdom claims to reserve accumulated in various pool projects of the department representing prices paid by the United Kingdom on pre-Mutual Aid deliveries in excess of actual cost of production, it is difficult to determine precisely the amount properly attributable to the United Kingdom. We believe, however, that when a final valuation has been reached it will be between fifty and fifty-five million dollars. In addition, there are a number of miscellaneous debits and credits on reconstruction and supply account, including a balance in the United Kingdom cash receipts account which result in a net credit to the United Kingdom of $31,681,248.

I have given some tedious explanation of this because it is probably necessary for the record, but it can all be summarized briefly now in a small table:

	Owing to Canada	Owing by Canada
Loans and advances under section 3..	$343,752,545
National Defence—Air		$ 35,462,845
National Defence—Navy	5,412,164
National Defence—Army		57,089,452
Agriculture		2,250,000
Reconstruction and Supply		107,772,983*
Cash payment by United Kingdom .		150,000,000
Indicated balance in Canada's favour .	3,410,571

*United Kingdom share of reserves included at $55,000,000.

That will give the committee an idea of the complications and extent and the number of transactions which had to be balanced against one another; but the more we go into them the more we think that this was a reasonable settlement so far as Canada was concerned and that $150 million was just about what was due to balance those accounts.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for the information he has just given the Committee. It is pretty difficult to accept it without reading it quietly, but I appreciate what he has said and I am aware of the difficulties that exist. I understand that he has been obliged to wait until to-day to answer the questions I put to him the other day. I have some other questions to ask him, and one of them comes from the Twentieth Century Liberal Club of Ontario. They say their members wish to know whether Canadian National perpetual bonds held by residents of the United Kingdom were surrendered to Canada at the time the gifts of money were made to the United Kingdom.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. All direct government obligations and Canadian National Railway obligations were repatriated and brought back to Canada, including these bonds.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Before asking the questions I referred to, I have here a paper published in Toronto, though it is not listed in the list of Canadian newspapers, and I will not name it because that would give publicity to it. I presume it is read by only a very few people. It was sent to me by a friend in Toronto among my fan mail. It has an article written by Mr. Donald M. Fleming, M.P., the member for Eglinton. I quote:

When the chairman called the fourth section,—

Speaking of the last debate on April 16.

—Mr. Pouliot, the irrepressible Liberal member for Temiscouata, took the floor and delivered a storm of invective against the bill and against Mr. Ilsley and talked out the bill at the eleven o'clock adjournment.

I never used invective with reference to the Minister of Finance, who is an old friend of mine. The only insult that I was responsible for was to compare him to major and minor prophets, and I do not think that is enough to constitute libel. On the other hand, I had a compensation for what was written by the member for Eglinton. I have received a brotherhood card of Comox-Alberni Federal Liberal Association, together with a very fine letter, and I appreciate it the more because that constituency is so well represented in the house.

The minister and the Prime Minister have stated that the committee is the proper place for the discussion of the details of a measure such as the one now before the committee, and I understand that. That is why we have to ask questions, and before asking questions I should like to have the minister understand my point of view. I am not prejudiced about the matter, but I always want some information in order to be able to answer those who come to us or write to us from all parts of the country wishing to know what this is about.

I understand perfectly well the magnitude of these financial transactions, and dealing with billions of dollars is something that is more than most of us will ever do. I am interested in the trade relations of individuals of various countries, but perhaps one question which the minister answered was not properly stated because what I wanted to know was what Canada as a country did for Great Britain, and what Great Britain paid for it, during the war.

Of course, it is a question of supplies and services. Here are two questions I have on to-day's order paper, and I am not satisfied with the answer that has been given to a question of the same trend at page 358 of Hansard. It is a short question but it will establish our position:

40. What amounts have been (a) given; (b) loaned; (c) advanced, in virtue of each act of parliament of the dominion of Canada to any other country from September 1, 1939?

This question seemed to me to be of importance. I thought it was important to know what we have done for other countries.

41. What is the total amount of all payments made each year for war purposes in other countries outside of Canada by the dominion government or any one of its agencies since September 1, 1939?

It seems to me to be of the utmost importance, because last December the minister stated that we are not a creditor country. Therefore we must know what we have spent without receiving anything in return. I appreciate the more the information given because the agreement was signed on March 6, eight days before the opening of the session, and it was made public immediately after its signature. Naturally it was given to the press, and what we had afterwards when we came to Ottawa was just a booklet in which the agreement was published. Therefore the agreement as it stands now binds only those members of both houses of parliament who are members of the cabinet. It does not bind any other member, nor does it bind those who have expressed themselves in favour of it, if they consider later on that they have not sufficient information about it. They have an opportunity to reconsider their opinion in the light of new factors which may be brought to their attention.

To understand the subject matter of the present discussion, its threads should be disentangled because the subject matter of any discussion must be reduced to a formula. In this case it is obvious that the only question is: Shall the Canadian dollar continue to be a blood donor to the pound sterling? The minister spoke of the need of a credit of this magnitude on these terms. Well, have we the right to impose a new mortgage of this magnitude on generations of unborn Canadians until the year 2000? How many of us will be alive then? Perhaps the hon. member for Wood Mountain, who is twenty-five and who in the year 2000 will be seventy-nine and probably a great-grandfather. In that year the minister will be 106 and the Prime Minister 126. I have some birthdays here. The leader of the opposition will be 117; his financial critic will be 116. The leader of the C.C.F. group will be 112. The leader of the Social Credit group will be 100, just a centenarian. The former leader was born on the eve of my own birthday and will be 110. The Minister of National Defence, formerly parliamentary assistant to the minister, will be 101. The Minister of Justice will be 118; the hon. member for St. Paul's, 117.

I now come to the new ginger group, the young men of the Conservative party. The member for Kamloops will be 84; the member for Vancouver-Burrard, 92, and the member for Eglinton 95. I wish them all to live until then so that they will have the satisfaction of seeing the last payment of the loan.

Mr. LOW: How old is the hon. member?

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Lethbridge was born on the eve of my own birthday. I will be the same age less one day, or 110 years old.

The question is not the future of Great Britain or that of the British empire. The paramount and in fact the only question is the future value of the pound sterling or the establishment of the supremacy of the pound sterling over the Canadian and the United States dollar, which may happen, but only later, and incidentally become a question of trade; now first consideration is given to a non-Canadian currency.

This so-called loan will be made in addition to the facilities extended to forty-five countries—including the United Kingdom—by the Bretton Woods agreement to establish the par values of their currency. I shall now ask the minister if he will be kind enough to tell why the Bretton Woods agreement is not used by Great Britain to have some facilities to keep the pound sterling at par, and why we should make the loan in addition to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: All facilities will be needed by the United Kingdom. The borrowing power from Bretton Woods is limited by the constitution of the fund and the constitution of the bank.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his explanation; but if the purpose of the Bretton Woods agreement is to establish par value for currency it cannot be half par; the work should be done completely. I cannot understand how the Bretton Woods agreement would work only fifty per cent of what it is expected to do.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is fair to say that if the two North American loans, the United States loan and the Canadian loan, fail, or if a certain portion of the United States loan fails to go through, the United Kingdom would not remain in Bretton Woods; it could not remain in the Bretton Woods institutions. It would be useless for them to try to live up to the obligations imposed upon them by the constitution of these institutions.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister again, but it shows how unsatisfactory Bretton Woods is. If that should happen, all the other nations will complain that they did not receive enough. If we look at the whole scheme we shall see it was made by the big powers. It was made not only for them but for the whole world. If the big powers are not satisfied with what they get from it, the smaller powers will not be satisfied, and Bretton Woods will mean nothing. I was interested when the matter was discussed in the house last year, but I could not stay in the house, much as I wanted to, because my friends down home were preparing a little celebration for their member. It happened during that time. But I read it all and I was interested in the questions that were put to the minister and also his answers. My reaction was: Let us wait and see what will be accomplished by virtue of the agreement. But I realize now that without being able to get from it all that the lay people expected the United Kingdom and all the other united nations to get, the United Kingdom government has been knocking at the door of Washington and Ottawa to get an additional amount, and it is quite a big amount. I take note of the fact that the Bretton Woods agreement is not working yet.

By this loan Canada would pay to the international stabilization fund much more than the United Kingdom's contribution. The United Kingdom's contribution is only $130 million. I checked it yesterday; it is immaterial whether it is that amount or less, but there was a contribution to bring about parity of a currency which is the pound sterling. The loan is made for exactly the same purpose, which shows that the Bretton Woods agreement is not doing what was expected of it.

On April 13 one of the cabinet ministers, speaking in Montreal, said:

I have heard this loan referred to as charity.

Then he added this:

That is sheer nonsense.

That speech was reported in all newspapers. I heard it twice over the radio. Naturally it was cabled to all of the united nations. As soon as it came over the cables it went on the air and it created a commotion throughout the United Kingdom. The British statesmen were enjoying a well-deserved week-end in the country, and they were deeply perturbed. Their pride was offended. The British intelligence service rang the alarm and Sir Harold Mackintosh was prompted to answer. They could not believe that in the most loyal overseas dominion a cabinet minister had paid enough attention to remarks like that to report them, even if he denied them. Here is what Sir Harold Mackintosh said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of April 15, in the same issue in which the minister's speech was reported:

Savings on Up Grade With British People

London—(Reuters)—Britain's small saver has four times more money than he had before the war, Sir Harold Mackintosh, chairman of the national savings committee, said in a statement.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

"Before the war the people of this country had deposits at the Post Office and trustee savings banks totalling £750,000,000 ($3,375,000,000). To-day deposits are more than three times as large at £2,350,000,000. Savings certificates held before the war were, with interest, worth £500,000,000. To-day the value is £1,850,000,000," the statement said.

During six years the small saver has increased his reserves of national savings from £1,250,000,000 to £5,100,000,000—a fourfold increase.

Sir Harold added, and I am quite sure the minister has seen this:

"But we must remember that these savings are potentially dangerous. If they were spent now they would bring on that inflation which their accumulation limited in the past."

In England the small saver has four times more money than he had before the war and four times more than we Canadians have now; and they do not spend it, for fear of inflation.

The British antidote to the Canadian poison appeared in the same issue of the Montreal Gazette, on Monday, April 15, 1946. The British government and the Canadian government have opposite methods of preventing inflation, something which we already have to a certain extent. They save and we spend, and not only do we spend, but we spend for them.

The £5,100,000,000 which I have already mentioned represents the deposits belonging to the small saver only. The big saver also has his share of what Canada did on behalf of the United Kingdom during the last five years. I had not the time to calculate the total deposits in all British banks and in the countless English banking companies, but it is my duty to inform the committee about at least a fraction of the liquid assets of the big saver in Great Britain.

In the Bankers' Almanac, 1944-45, is given a list of the deposits in twenty-four of the leading British banks. Those deposits amount to $44,972,000,000. They exclude investments in kindred concerns, and the Bank of England is also not in this list. The deposits are as follows:

	£ Million
Midland	993
Lloyd's bank	891
Barclays bank	879
Westminster bank	578
National Provincial bank	568
Royal Bank of Scotland	232
Martin's bank	180
District bank	158
Sixteen other leading banks	550
Total	5,029

In addition there are deposits in Post Office and trustee savings banks of £5,100,000,000, which makes a total of £10,129,000,000, or at $4.44 to the pound, $44,972,000,000.

What is the total amount of the deposits in the Canadian chartered banks in this country? As of February 28, 1946, the deposits in ten chartered banks in Canada were:

	$ Million
Current accounts	1,995
Savings accounts	3,077
Other currencies	56
Outside Canada	734
Total	5,862

What I have mentioned regarding Canadian savings is all that there is in the chartered banks in Canada. But what I have mentioned of deposits in the United Kingdom is only a part of their savings. There are at least eight times the deposits in the United Kingdom that there are in Canada. That is why I ask the minister kindly to tell the committee why we should make a loan of the magnitude of $1,250,000,000 to a country whose savings amount to over $44,000,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to that question is that those deposits in the banks in Great Britain are of no value whatever to the depositors if they wish to use them for the purpose of buying goods outside the United Kingdom. They have no value whatsoever for that purpose. But let us move our consideration over to the Dominion of Canada.

We have increased our deposits here very considerably since the outbreak of the war. The hon. member for Temiscouata gave the figures. They are between five and six billion dollars, I think. But if they were twice that, they would never enable us to buy goods that we want from the United States unless we had in this country a sufficient quantity or accumulation of gold in United States dollars. If we were all out of gold in United States dollars and we had ten billions of dollars of deposits in our banks—that is, if we owed each other that much money in Canada—it would be of no value whatever to us in buying machinery in the United States or in buying cotton or in buying coal or in buying oil or in buying any of those things that are necessary for our economy. That is the reason there have to be loans from other countries to the United Kingdom so that they will have the means of importing. It is very much more important that the United Kingdom have those means of importing than it is for this country because it has such a large population and such limited natural resources that it has to depend very largely upon imports. That is the answer to the hon. gentleman's question. It does not increase the power of the United Kingdom to buy from Canada if the deposits which one resident of the United Kingdom make in the bank of another resident of the United Kingdom go up and up and up. If you multiplied them ever so much, if their gold and United States dollars go down, they are out of the market as an importer.

Mr. LOW: With one exception, and that is if in Canada we had sufficient goods of a type which the people of the United States wanted to pay for the goods we wanted to bring back.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; that is the way we get United States dollars with which to buy goods in the United States. If the United Kingdom can expand its exports to us, and get Canadian dollars by multiplying and increasing those exports, it is then getting something it can use for the purpose of purchasing our goods. But these goods they are multiplying in such dimensions, this large volume of currency in their own country, are of no use to them for the purpose of buying our goods.

Mr. LOW: It is that deficiency of goods in the United Kingdom which makes it impossible for them to get dollars here to buy the things they want.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the deficiency.

Mr. LOW: The deficiency of goods in the United Kingdom to send to us to pay for them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The more their exports are limited, the harder it is for them to make imports.

Mr. LACROIX: I have gone carefully through the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom, and I do not find any section which compels the United Kingdom to spend all that money here in Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is right about that, and there is no such clause in the United States agreement. It probably would be a bad thing for Canada if there were such a clause in the United States agreement. There is no such clause in the Canadian agreement, because we know from the orders which have been placed here, and from the negotiations which have been carried on, that they are going to spend more than that in Canada, and they will have to get some of that surplus from other countries.

Mr. LACROIX: I understood that the agreement between the Canadian government and the English government, so far as the production of food is concerned, expires in 1947 or 1948. I am referring to the buying of food from this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is 1946.

Mr. LACROIX: After that they will be free to buy anywhere they like.

Mr. ILSLEY: We know from the very nature of things that in 1946, 1947 and 1948 they will be requiring great quantities of goods from Canada.

Mr. LACROIX: I am speaking about the agreement which has been signed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LACROIX: Which was made between our Minister of Agriculture and officials of the government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LACROIX: Our minister was speaking in the name of the Canadian government, of course.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LACROIX: And it is clearly indicated that after 1948 they may buy elsewhere. In fact, I understand they are doing that right now.

Mr. ILSLEY: We know that condition will continue into 1948.

Mr. PROBE: I do not wish to be considered as supporting in any way the remarks of my genial orator friend the hon. member of Temiscouata, across the floor; but when the Minister of Finance was explaining to the hon. member why the export credits built up in the United Kingdom, of British currency, were of no help in trasactions on this side of the water, it occurred to me that at no stage in the present deliberations has the Minister of Finance given us a picture of the holdings of Canadian stocks or bonds by English investors.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I did.

Mr. PROBE: For instance, as the minister knows, preferred stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway company is held to the extent of 96·67 per cent by English investors, and in respect of common stock the percentage is 47·24. When we were overseas a couple of years ago some of us well remember having read in the London Times a criticism by English holders of the city of Montreal and city of Moose Jaw bonds. They were critical of the financial arrangements proposed by Canadian cities to get out of their local difficulties with the bondholders.

It seems to me the Minister of Finance is a bit remiss in not considering the holdings by United Kingdom investors of Canadian securities. Would he give us a picture of the present set-up of British-held Canadian securities?

[Mr. Lacroix.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I did that carefully in the speech I delivered in the house. I am now trying to find that part of the speech.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister referred to it in connection with the loan of $700 million, but I do not think he gave us a full account of it.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister told us what the reduction was.

Mr. PROBE: That was only in respect of bonds held by the dominion, and for which the Dominion of Canada was responsible. I am thinking of securities other than those for which the dominion is responsible.

Mr. POULIOT: No list was given.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is estimated on the basis of the various sources of information at present available that the value of British investments in Canada at the present time is approximately $1,500 million. Counterbalancing this it is estimated there are private Canadian investments in Great Britain of $150 million, in addition to the amount owing by Great Britain to Canada under the 1942 loan, which will be approximately $500 million, after recent transactions have been adjusted by repayment of this loan.

Of the total of $1,500 million of British investments in Canada it is estimated that about one-half is the value of securities payable in Canadian dollars in common stocks; about $500 million is the value of securities payable in sterling, and the remainder of roughly $250 million is the value of direct investments in branch plants, subsidiary companies, real estate and so on.

At the end of 1939 British investments in Canada, as estimated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, were approximately $2,500 million. Of these, securities to the value of approximately $1 billion were repatriated or sold to Canada during the war. Of this $700 million represents the value of dominion government securities and Canadian National Railways securities repatriated through official arrangements, and the balance were private sales and sales by the United Kingdom government in the Canadian market early in the war.

The proceeds of $200 million worth of securities that have been sold since 1942 have been used, or will be used, to repay a corresponding amount of the 1942 loan from Canada to the United Kingdom.

The question that is suggested, although not directly raised, is whether Great Britain should not have been forced to sell her securities in Canada to finance—

Mr. PROBE: Well, I would not put it in that way. But I should like to have the minister explain to the committee why these were not used as a method of barter. I would not suggest that we should put the thumb on them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will not ascribe the word "forced" to the hon. member. The question was as to whether Canada should not have required the United Kingdom to sell her securities in Canada in order to finance her purchases here instead of getting this credit from the Canadian government, or as a condition of getting the credit. This matter was most carefully and fully considered by the government after discussion with the United Kingdom representatives, and the government reached the conclusion that if Canada forced the United Kingdom to liquidate her remaining assets in Canada in order to finance her purchases here, other countries would be led to follow Canada's example, and that our action and theirs in this matter would so damage the future balance of payments position of Britain that they would be unable to follow the trade policies which we wish to see them follow and which it is in their interest to follow if these loans are available. Consequently the government considered that the proper course to adopt in regard to these securities was the same as that adopted in 1942, that is, to see that no liquidation of securities would be forced on the United Kingdom but that in so far as United Kingdom residents sold Canadian dollar securities outside the United Kingdom, and in so far as any Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom were redeemed, the proceeds would be used to pay off the 1942 loan made by Canada to the United Kingdom. In this way a gradual, orderly and limited reduction in Canadian investments of the United Kingdom is achieved, and also at the same time and to the same extent, this 1942 loan is repaid.

Britain's overseas investments represent the fruits of the savings of many generations of British people, and the means by which Britain has participated in the development of the resources of many countries. These investments added greatly to the productivity of Canada and of other countries and, indeed, the speedy and effective development of Canada was only possible as a result of the large amounts of savings which Britain invested here. Britain's overseas assets correspond in certain respects to the natural resources of other countries. Britain does not have great resources of her own, and is able to support her own large population only because she has shared in the development of overseas resources of other countries by providing machinery and equipment and skill for the development of these, and in return has obtained an equity or a security from which it derives income.

Before the war the net income of Britain from these overseas investments was approximately $1 billion a year, and this enabled Britain to pay for foodstuffs and raw materials for the British people, since Britain has been unable to export goods to a value as great as the value of her imports. As a result of the war, Britain has had to liquidate $5 billion of her investments, and to incur heavy debts. As a result, her income from her overseas investments after the war will be very greatly reduced. If we reduced it further by forcing her to sell her remaining Canadian securities, we should thereby thrust such a heavy continuing burden on the British exchange situation that she would not be able to follow the trade policies and exchange policies that we wish to see her follow. Perhaps that is not a sufficient answer for the hon. gentleman.

Then the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency asked a question a few minutes ago. This was just a simple question which asked if there was anything in the agreement which obliged the United Kingdom to spend the proceeds of this loan in Canada. That question was raised before by someone, I think the leader of the opposition, and my answer was that the understanding was that Great Britain will use the proceeds of this loan for the purpose of purchasing goods in Canada. The answer I gave was this, as reported on page 931 of Hansard:

It is true that it is not provided in this loan that the $1,250 million must be spent in Canada. It was considered that in the case of Great Britain this restriction was neither necessary nor desirable.

It is not necessary because we know that Britain's purchases in Canada, requiring to be financed by some means other than its current receipts from Canada during the period in which they can use this credit, will exceed substantially the amount of credit. If they use the credit for other purchases, they will need to use other funds for purchasing here, funds derived, for example, from selling to Canada gold or foreign exchange that Canada requires.

It is not desirable because in the agreement, through the operation of article V, we require the United Kingdom to provide Canadian dollars to countries in the sterling area and to other countries in return for sterling which these countries acquire from their trade with Britain, in order that these other countries may be able to trade with Canada. If we are imposing this obligation on Britain to provide Canadian dollars to other countries which need them for buying in Canada, then we should make it possible for Britain to use the Canadian dollars we lend her for this purpose.

I direct the hon. member's attention to the remainder of that column which I do not think it will be necessary for me to read.

Mr. QUELCH: Have we any understanding with Great Britain that Canadian securities held by Britain will not be transferred to the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as the $500 million loan is concerned, until that is paid off the securities held in Great Britain and payable in Canadian dollars must be accounted for. That is, if they go out of the United Kingdom, if they are sold outside the United Kingdom or if they are redeemed, the proceeds must be applied to the liquidation of the loan.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think a good many people in Canada are interested in these Canadian securities because we understand that a large block of them consists of Canadian Pacific stock. We made a loan of $700 million without interest. The minister tells us that that has been reduced to about $500 million. Apparently this large block of Canadian Pacific stock is owned in Great Britain. I am not sure that it amounts to $500 million. A few years ago I did ask a question about this but I have forgotten the answer. I believe it is in the neighbourhood of that figure. When this loan without interest was made we took no securities as collateral against the loan although that was suggested at the time, as the minister will remember.

Now the agreement is that when Canadian securities that are British owned are sold, we get the proceeds. I find it difficult to understand how that is any different in any great degree from asking the British to pledge these securities as a sort of collateral against the loan, so that we may, if we wish, exercise the option, as it were, of bringing these securities back to Canada.

I noticed that the question asked by the hon. member for Acadia was not answered in the affirmative. He asked the direct question, whether these securities could be sold to persons other than Canadian or United Kingdom nationals; or, in other words, whether this large block of stock in which so many Canadians are interested might be transferred to owners in the United States of America. That was the purpose of the question asked by the hon. member for Acadia, and I believe many of us are interested in that.

I think the loan of $700 million was justified, and I think the terms upon which that loan was made were justified. I think that as these securities are tied up to some extent with this loan we should try to see to it that if they pass out of the hands of the owners in Great Britain, they pass into the hands of owners in Canada. As I said before, I should like to have seen them put up more or less as a pledge or collateral against this loan.

I do not want to see these securities pass from the control of Canada—we have a certain measure of control, as it were—to the control of a foreign country. I named the United States because that is the country in which they might possibly be sold; I did not name the United States because I thought that country was more objectionable than any other country. I think that was the point the hon. member for Acadia had in mind and it was not answered by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a much more drastic thing for a government, such as the government of the United Kingdom to requisition securities and then give what they call a positive pledge of those securities to another country than it is to give what they call a negative pledge—that is the term which is used—which leaves much more freedom to the holder of the securities. If the holder of the securities wishes to hold them, he does. If he wishes to sell them, he does. It does not involve that stepping in by the government and taking them at a particular time which the owner may regard as being a bad time for him. As a matter of fact, had there been a requisitioning—

Mr. COLDWELL: It would have been a good time for the railways.

Mr. ILSLEY: Had there been a requisitioning of those securities in 1942 the British holders to-day would have, I think, been bitter beyond expression.

Mr. CASE: When we begin to count noses we are drawing the line pretty close; and after listening to the leader of the C.C.F.-Socialist party it seems to me it is very bad policy indeed to make a loan and then attempt to tie the hands of the borrower. It is not very long ago that we looked to Britain as the champion of the greatest cause which civilization had ever been called upon to defend. We were willing at that time that she should bear the brunt of the battle with what help we could give from our resources, and we poured out our treasure and sacrificed many brave young lives to defend their cause. I think we are overlooking one of the most important features of this loan, namely, that we in Canada should desire to make this loan as much as that Britain should seek to secure it.

The minister has already referred to Britain's wealth in her banks in the nature of deposits and has explained that this, after all, represents only domestic wealth and can be used only as a credit for trade within the confines of the United Kingdom; it cannot be used outside the British isles; if it could, Britain would soon seek to discharge some of her obligations, even within the sterling bloc. Britain during the war became indebted to the sterling bloc to the extent of $14 billion, and this will have to be paid.

But the thing which impresses me most about the proposed loans, particularly the loan they are seeking from the United States, is the undertaking given by Britain that she will seek to make it possible, within a year, to exchange dollars for sterling and sterling will be changed into dollars. In other words, Britain, I believe, could carry on without this loan, even though she had to tighten her belt, but her trade would naturally be developed within the sterling bloc, to which she is already heavily indebted. Britain has already obtained a credit from Argentina by saying in effect to that country, "You can use this credit wherever sterling is acceptable", and if necessary in the post-war period Britain may, as I say, have to tighten her belt and do without things and make certain sacrifices but she will seek to repay her obligations. Not only will she seek within a year to make dollars exchangeable into sterling and sterling exchangeable into dollars; but if we grant this loan and if the proposed loan is granted by the United States of America she will be put in a position where she can go to her sterling creditors and seek to pare down all her debts, which now are top-heavy and have a tendency to depress trade. I do not know whether all hon. members appreciate this, but I have lived long enough to know that the very life blood of a nation depends on trade. This is particularly true of Canada, which produces sufficient goods for from fifty to one hundred million people. If we do not secure some outlet for this production I do not know how we shall be able to keep trading with ourselves very long, because our granaries will soon be bulging again with wheat; our agriculture will languish, and our workshops will be closed. Unquestionably the post-war period offers a tremendous buyer's market. I was interested in noting that there is a great scarcity not only of what we refer to as consumer goods, but even of durable goods of the nature of rolling stock and machine tools. Many factories will have to be retooled for machine work in the post-war period.

Britain is the hub of the trade of the world. One-fifth of the world's trade in the pre-war period moved in and out of British ports. We must seek to maintain that contact because, though Britain is in a rather rigid position to-day, she is very resourceful; and I may remind the hon. member for Temiscouata, in view of the reference made to the United States by some hon. members that when it was suggested that the United States should seek some concessions by way of military bases from Britain, the answer of the British was, either that the loan must be granted according to the terms already laid down, or, no loan at all. Those who can foresee the prospects of the future know that the world would face a grave situation were we to allow this to develop into a vicious trade war, and I see nothing else for it if this line of policy is to be pursued. My answer to the member for Rosetown-Biggar is, if you seek to have Britain pledge her securities that she may at present hold, I think it is a breach of good faith toward Britain; and I say to hon. members that we must be prepared to make this loan in a spirit of fairness, or otherwise we shall forfeit the substance for the shadow.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I did not suggest that we should ask Britain to pledge her securities against this loan. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me completely. I was trying to inquire about the disposition of certain securities held in Britain in relation to other loans. If the hon. gentleman would pay some attention, probably he would not be so frightfully mixed up.

Mr. CASE: My hon. friend is pretty hard to follow, when he tells us that, of all countries in the world he would hesitate to see these securities go to the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that. I said I was not singling out the United States as a country to which I would not wish them to go. Again I say if he would listen he would get the thing straight.

Mr. CASE: I do not know that it is going to help us any if we become too sarcastic in the matter. The fact remains that any effort made to regulate or deal with Britain's securities that she now holds would be a breach of good faith in Britain. We must seek to make the loan in the spirit in which it is sought. I feel that if we can deal conclusively, deliberately and quickly with this loan in the House of Commons of Canada, and with a degree of unanimity, it will have a good psychological effect on the prospects of the loan now pending in the United States. For that reason I believe we should come to grips with this as quickly as we can, dispose of it, and make sure that Britain can trade with us, because in days gone by she has always been one of our best customers.

Mr. POULIOT: This is a most absurd argument, that Canada should serve as a decoy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I merely ask the minister for information. Would it not be possible for the British government to pass legislation forbidding the export of capital from Britain and thereby enable themselves to purchase the securities from British holders when there was danger of those securities going to the United States? As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has expressed himself, I feel unhappy about the fact that Canadian securities held in Britain have gone to the United States. Our difficulties with respect to trade with the United States are sufficient already without having them hold any more of our securities. I wonder if something could not have been done, or could not be done now, to make it possible for the British government to steer the securities our way, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the market for Canadian securities is in Canada, but of course that does not prevent Canadians who buy them from then selling them in the United States. That happens to some extent: It happened with some C.P.R. stocks, though not a very large amount. The United Kingdom controls the export of capital from its own shores and manages that control in its own interests, but hon. gentlemen need have no worry that there will be a substantial direct sale of Canadian securities to any other country than Canada, because the market for those securities is in Canada.

Mr. LACROIX: Is the minister aware of the fact that the South American states, when they receive United States dollars in payment from England, keep those as a guarantee for the issuance of their own paper money? Does he not think they may do the same with Canadian dollars if they receive any from the United Kingdom?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they will be receiving Canadian dollars from the United Kingdom. It is probably true that South American countries accumulate, if they wish and to the extent they can, gold and United States dollars as reserves, just as we do, for that matter, in this country. But I have never heard it suggested that they accumulate Canadian dollars.

[Mr. Case.]

Mr. LACROIX: They may do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just how those Canadian dollars can get there.

Mr. LACROIX: Suppose the United Kingdom sent them Canadian dollars in payment of merchandise purchased from the American states? According to the agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada, there is no provision which compels the United Kingdom to spend the money in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United Kingdom will need most of its Canadian dollars for purchases in Canada. They will need more than the amount we lend them for purchases in Canada. Some Canadian dollars may go to countries that require Canadian dollars for purchases in Canada by themselves; but I cannot see, and I have never heard, that any accumulation by foreign countries of Canadian dollars has taken place as part of their reserve.

Mr. LACROIX: But the minister has heard about United States dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We speak of gold and the United States dollars as the natural form in which to keep our reserves, but not Canadian dollars. Canadian dollars would be used at once for purchases in Canada by any country that obtained them.

Mr. QUELCH: I have the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway company for 1945, and I find that United States holdings of C.P.R. stock increased by seven per cent in the past year, while holdings decreased in the United Kingdom by five per cent and in Canada by two per cent. Are we to understand from the minister's remarks that this is due principally to the fact that Canadians buy Canadian Pacific stock from Great Britain and sell to the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: There is no direct selling?

Mr. ILSLEY: They have not been sold direct to any degree, as far as I know.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope it will be possible to get from the minister a list of Canadian securities that have been pledged against the loan of $700,000,000 at the same time that the gift of $1 billion was made. They are quite well known. There is C.P.R. stock. Canadian Pacific stock is now slipping out of our hands and is in Paris, Amsterdam, London, and if it goes on as it is now perhaps Canada will have only one-tenth of that stock and those securities. It is a subject of speculation. When we see all these Canadian securities over there, we think of those who take advantage of all the benefits that are derived therefrom. These securities cannot be pledged ten times. They have been pledged for a loan of $700,000,000 which we have made, and there is an understanding between the United Kingdom government and the Canadian government that they will not be sold to anyone but Canadians.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are sold the proceeds will be applied to the reduction of the loan.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore the people who own securities in Great Britain can take advantage of that. They derive revenue therefrom and they receive much more than the amount of interest. I am not sure whether the loan has been made with interest. According to the New York Times of February 21, 1946, an interesting report was published by Secretary Fred M. Vinson of the United States treasury with regard to foreign assets held in the United States on June 14, 1941. They totalled $12,739,000,000 of property of all kinds, made up as follows: Great Britain, $3,238,900,000; Canada, $1,700,200,000; other members of the British commonwealth, $415,900,000. The total British was 42 per cent of all foreign assets and 55 per cent liquid. There are other factors that might be discussed in connection with the matter. I wonder if it is not possible for the minister to give a list of Canadian securities which have been pledged against the $700,000,000 loan. Is it possible to have that list?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not that information at all and I do not think we ever had it. This is a negative pledge, not a pledge of positive securities. If the United Kingdom government in 1942 had requisitioned specified securities and vested those securities in themselves and transferred them by way of pledge to the Canadian government we would have known what they were. Instead of that, however, they gave an undertaking that no Canadian securities, payable in Canadian dollars, would be sold or be allowed to go out of the United Kingdom without the proceeds being applied in reduction of the loan. So that we have no list of those securities. Estimates have been made from time to time, I believe, by the bureau of statistics as to the total value of those securities on information they obtain from companies in Canada, but the amounts and values are changing from time to time and I have not a list of them. It is pretty well known that there are certain companies in Canada in which British investors have substantial interests, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, Hudson's Bay and Courtaulds.

Mr. POULIOT: Red Rose tea.

Mr. ILSLEY: Canadian Industries Limited.

Mr. POULIOT: Barclays Bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not only Barclays Bank, but some other bank stocks.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Largely to convince myself that I have not been completely ignorant all these years about these securities, may I ask the minister if it is not true that prior to regulations on exchange securities such as the Canadian Pacific shares could have been bought by anybody in any country who cared to buy them? There is no doubt about that, is there?

Mr ILSLEY: That is so.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then why are we so greatly concerned? Is it the idea to continue controls and say to a company, "Your shares must be owned in Canada"? I am not criticizing the minister; I am trying to agree with him. Why all this fuss now about some United States citizens buying Canadian Pacific shares? I am quite certain that a few years ago many of us would have liked to let the United States citizens have an awful lot of Canadian Pacific shares when we were trying to get rid of them. Exactly what is the point in trying to establish a geographical locus for these shares? Is it suggested that we should put restrictions on them, that they must be held in Canada? If that is not suggested, what is all this conversation about? I hope the minister will clear up my mind at least. If that is the simple truth I should like the minister to confirm it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am inclined to agree with that to a great extent. I cannot think of any respect where I disagree with the hon. gentleman at the moment. I must say that had there been a vast movement I would have given it more consideration than I have, but the movement of Canadian Pacific shares to the United States has been so small when one takes into account control, for example, that it has had no effect. The movement has been what might be called a minor one; therefore I do not think there is anything to be alarmed about. The hon. gentleman's question is, would there ever be anything to be alarmed about? I do not know. I have not got to the place where I have my mind down to the question. There is the broader question, whether it is desirable for Canadian securities to be owned by United States citizens under present conditions, or being in the hands of United States citizens under present conditions.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): At $1.10?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I was not thinking anything about price at all. Of course to the extent that Canadian securities did get into the hands of United States citizens and our United States dollar reserves increased thereby, we are losing money as a nation because our nationals are paying dividends or interest to the United States, while our United States dollars that the foreign exchange control board gets as a result of that movement of securities earn only a small amount of interest.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There is a railway called the Brazilian Traction company which is owned, or at least was owned a few years ago by Canada. Would we not create a considerable roar if the place in which this railroad is located—and I take it that it is Brazil—said to us: "The shares of this company shall only be owned in a given place"?

And hon. MEMBER: They said that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If somebody is asking me a question I wish they would ask it so that I can hear it instead of mumbling in their waistcoat to their friends, so that I cannot hear. Let us take the British shareholder of Canadian Pacific to-day and assume that we passed a law that these shares shall not be sold in countries A, B or C, but in Canada. Then, what have we done? We have destroyed a great part of the value of the shares in the hands of that individual. I am quite certain that the Minister of Finance will never come to the position where he would do that to people living in a friendly country such as the United Kingdom.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. The New York Times said something last year about the transfer of shares of stock in Canadian securities from England to the United States via Toronto, as follows:

Wall Street Topics
Canadian Pacific
(From the New York Times)

The recent heavy trading in the common or ordinary shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway reflects in part heavy liquidation by British investors. These shares, held in the United Kingdom, were not commandeered by the British government at the outbreak of this war, but holders were required to register them with the Bank of England. British investors now are free to sell them upon application to the Bank of England and this usually is granted in a routine manner if sales are to be made in Canada. This usually means a resale by Canadian brokers in New York. Whether the sales here will be sufficient to result in the control of the road passing to United States interest is anyone's guess. Recent figures show that 53·9 per cent of the common shares of Canadian Pacific were held by British subjects in the United Kingdom, 18·2 per cent by Canadians, 21·68 per cent in the United States and 6·1 per cent in other countries. The company has outstanding 13,400,000 ordinary shares.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The hon. member for Calgary West is well versed upon these questions. I give him credit for that, but he must remember that General Smuts repatriated all the South African securities that there were in London. They are now owned by the Dominion of South Africa. He also knows that all the securities of the railways of India have been repatriated by India at the request of British people, not Hindus. Therefore they are the masters of their own destiny. That example comes from a great imperialist, General Jan Smuts and from the British people themselves who have made investments in India.

The question is, what is the difference if the securities are sold to the United States? I do not see any great difference if they are in the United States or in the United Kingdom. To me it is the same thing. I know I would be much more satisfied if they were held in Canada by Canadians instead of being held by non-Canadians. That is a point of view which can be discussed. There is more interest in a company when it is entirely owned by the citizens of a country. There are numerous examples and I quote only a few to my hon. friend, who knows all about the matter. With regard to the Canadian Pacific railway, we have an interest in that and we must have a return of the stock here, of all these assets. They are ours. I do not see why some gentlemen in Great Britain, some lord or somebody else, should get all the profits from those securities.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Buy them from him, and get the profits yourself.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not the means to do that, but I would be delighted if my hon. friend bought them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will back your note and see how we get along.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. The minister must be sorry to see those securities in the United Kingdom and not to be able to tax the revenue from them. It is a large revenue because these are paying securities. What I am surprised at is that the Canadian National securities and dominion securities which carry a small rate of interest have been brought back but the well paying securities have been kept over there, where the revenue from them is enjoyed by some millionaires across the sea. I wanted some investigation of this question last year when one of the reports of the banking committee was before the house, and it raised a furore. The Minister of Veterans Affairs rose and protested and said that I was entirely out of order to suggest that the banking committee of the House of Commons should investigate the dealings of Toronto brokers who had acted as intermediaries for United States financiers in buying Canadian Pacific securities held until then in England. That was on November 28, 1945.

This question of foreign obligations is of great importance. I should like to know just what they are and who owns them and if they will continue to serve as security. Of course, if we are to cancel the debt we do not need any securities pledged. On the other hand, those securities are all the guarantees we have for a loan and if we relieve Great Britain of them and credit them with the amount it will be a most paying proposition; and the people of Canada will be satisfied with it. The minister knows what happened in South Africa and India. Why did the Canadian government not follow the same course?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am delighted that the hon. gentleman has asked that question because we followed exactly the same course. South Africa did not repatriate private securities but the securities of the South African government, and the same is true of India. India did the same thing. Included in that were the securities of the state railways, which are comparable with Canadian National Railways securities in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: That shows the advantage of public ownership.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may have been some movement of South African private securities to South Africa by sale. There were some from the United Kingdom to Canada by sale. But no part of the British commonwealth of nations or the British empire really repatriated any private securities. That is, the United Kingdom did not invest in itself and deliver over to any part of the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations any private securities. It was done in one case that I know of and one case only and that was before the United States came into the war, when the United States was neutral. Britain ran out of gold and United States dollars in 1941 or 1942. Their holdings of gold and United States dollars went down to £3,000,000; they were down to the very bottom of the barrel, and they had to get foreign exchange somewhere to buy what they had to buy to carry on the war. So that they had to deal with the United States on their own terms, and the United States required the requisition and pledging of certain securities for a loan. That loan is being paid off. It is now down to about $250,000,000. But when Great Britain negotiated this new loan with the United States the United States did not require Britain to requisition and pledge securities, although there are many United States securities which they could have requisitioned. I have forgotten the exact figures; they are not as large in amount as they are in the Dominion of Canada, but they run into a good many hundreds of millions of dollars. The dominion government repatriated more securities in dollar value than the United States did. So far as India and South Africa are concerned, Canada followed exactly the same course as they pursued. We repatriated publicly owned securities, the direct obligations of the dominion government and the publicly owned railway system. But we did not require Britain to requisition, vest and hand over private securities. Nor did South Africa.

Mr. SINNOTT: I do not very often ask questions or take up the time of the house in debate but there is one phase of this loan on which I should like enlightenment by the Minister of Finance. I am in total agreement with this loan to Britain and the loans to other countries, but perhaps in common with other members of the house I should like enlightenment on the financing of trade with other countries to which we are extending loans. Would the Minister of Finance explain just how these loans are being made? Are they just a credit on the books of the nations from which we are going to buy our goods, or are the loans financed by the Bank of Canada or by borrowing by the dominion government from the private banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: A line of credit is extended; as requisitioned, we turn over the cash to be put to the credit of the country in question in the Bank of Canada, and they can issue cheques against that credit.

Mr. SINNOTT: Is the financing done through the Bank of Canada or by borrowing from the private banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amounts are not segregated. They are just like any other money which the dominion obtains by taxation or by borrowing from the public or by borrowing from the chartered banks and perhaps to some extent from the Bank of Canada, but that latter is very limited.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will it necessitate borrowing the savings deposits standing to the credit of the people of Canada in order to pay for the goods that flow to England so that the people who make them here can be paid for them in Canadian currency?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: There was a loan of $700 million. Then there were some refunds—$18 million in 1943, $57 million in 1944 and $64 million in 1945. We cannot check those refunds because of the settlement of the accounts. We do not have the whole list of the obligations of Great Britain. We do not have the list of the obligations, assets and liabilities. Perhaps the amount that has been deducted from the loan has been considered as a cancelled debt by the Canadian government. We do not know where we are.

Before proceeding further, I should like to ask if Canadian deposits in the bank are in the same shaps as deposits in English banks, with the exception of the small amount Canadians get to visit in the United States. I should like to know if the deposits are frozen, as deposits in Canadian banks are frozen for international spending, with the exception of the few dollars allowed to tourists who go to the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United Kingdom has a foreign exchange control board which exercises control over the export of capital, just as the foreign exchange control board in Canada exercises that control here. But whether they apply the same rules or not, I cannot say. Probably they are more strict.

Mr. POULIOT: But the principle is the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Is not one of the reasons why the United Kingdom cannot dispose of those large deposits amounting to $44 billion the fact that the savings certificates are attached to those deposits in Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Let us suppose that an exporter of lumber in Canada is prepared to take sterling for his lumber. He can get it all right. Sterling would be deposited to his credit in a bank in London, or somewhere else. What could he do with that sterling? Could he pay his men with it? Could he pay any of his bills with it? He has to pay everything in this country, in Canadian dollars. If he were to take sterling, then, so far as this country is concerned, that sterling would be nothing more or less than an I.O.U., unless our foreign exchange people converted it into Canadian dollars.

The existence of a great mass of pounds, shillings and pence in the United Kingdom owed by certain residents of the United Kingdom to certain other residents of the United Kingdom does not give the people of that country any value for the purpose of obtaining goods from other countries. What they must have is something different altogether. They must have liquid reserves, and we generally sum them up as gold or United States dollars. That gives them an external position. It gives them power to buy from abroad, to import and to live. That is the perilous position in which the United Kingdom is placed, namely the difficulty of keeping herself in a position where she has those liquid reserves. This great mass of internal indebtedness of one United Kingdom citizen to another United Kingdom citizen is not wealth, at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not a fact that it depends upon the ability of the country whose currency one holds to supply goods in return for that currency? Let me illustrate my point. The hon. member for Lethbridge, some other hon. members and myself were in Lisbon several years ago. We had very few United States dollars; but because we went via Newfoundland to Great Britain, most of us had a substantial amount of pounds. We found that when we wanted to get a small amount of Portuguese escudos, we could get a substantial quantity of the Portuguese money for a United States dollar. But when we tried to get something for the pounds we had in our pockets, we found all we could get was the equivalent of about two United States dollars to the pound. Why? Because the people of Portugal could buy United States goods with United States dollars. But they could not buy British goods with British pounds, because no goods were available owing to the war condition. In other words, the amount of sterling they held was so great that they did not want more of it. But they did not care about the amount of dollars they held, because they could get goods in return.

That is the same point we are now discussing. They do not ship sterling pounds; they ship goods. The money in the banks of Great Britain in the form of sterling is no good to that country.

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as purchases abroad are concerned.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where we go wrong, I think, is that we think in terms of money when we should be thinking in terms of goods. If we could only think in terms of goods we would have the key, but if we think in terms of money we become confused.

Mr. POULIOT: It shows that history repeats itself, because we are going back to barter. Money has no value—a condition which I find extraordinary. But if it has no value, how is it that we have to supply some of our own?

I said at the start that the Canadian dollar was a blood donor to the sterling pound. It is just pump-priming now. There stands on the order paper in my name a question which, I suggest, shows the effect of that barter. We shall not be paid by pounds sterling; we shall be paid in British goods. The more we receive, the less we shall send.

This is what was said by the Minister of Finance a few days ago and I shall read it for the benefit of those who may not have read it:

Next year, that is in 1947, the amount of this deficit with Canada—

That is, the United Kingdom deficit.

—will be reduced both because of lower expenditures of Britain here and because British exports to Canada will be at higher levels.

The minister seems to be reluctant to use the word "imports", when he says "lower expenditures of Britain here and because British exports to Canada will be at higher levels."

Because the minister stated at page 763 of Hansard the vital importance to Canada of the reestablishment, expansion and continued development of foreign trade, I asked this question:

Referring to the statement of the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 766 of Hansard of April 11, 1946,

1. On what basis did he arrive at calculating "the lower expenditures of Britain here" in 1947?

That is next year. Naturally some orders have been given. Then my question continues:

2. By "expenditures of Britain here" in 1947, did he mean Canadian exports to Britain?

3. How did he figure out that they will be lower?

4. What will the prospective "expenditures of Britain here" or the Canadian exports to Britain be in 1947?

5. Referring to his following statement how did he calculate "a higher" level of British exports to Canada in 1947?

How did he calculate a higher level of British exports to Canada in 1947 as compared with what they were in 1946? Then, what will cause the 1947 level to be higher than that of 1946? Here is another: What goods are expected to be shipped from Britain to Canada in larger quantity in 1947 than in 1946? What goods are expected to be shipped from Canada to Britain in smaller quantity in 1947 than in 1946?

Those are the crucial points of the whole matter. During the war our shipments to Britain were unpaid for they were a gift. Shipments from Great Britain to Canada were paid for. That makes a great difference. Trade cannot be unilateral; we cannot go on making gifts like that indefinitely.

We are told that if these loans are passed by this parliament and by congress England will have money to buy. But it will be our own money that will be used. It will be a business proposition only when they start to refund the loan. Otherwise it will not be a business proposition; it will be a gift. If you give a boy $10 and he buys something in your store, it will not be a purchase. You will lose money; you will not make a profit on such a transaction.

There is one point in the argument of my hon. friend to which I object most strongly. He says that England was our best customer during last year. We do not have separate statistics for exports that were made as gifts and for exports that were paid for. I asked the minister if it was possible to get them separately and he told me it was not. Therefore the Canadian public's idea of what our trade consists of is a mere illusion.

England is entering a period of reconstruction and reconversion, as are all other countries. It is said that if we continue as we have been doing our imports from Britain will increase and our exports to Britain will decrease. I cannot understand it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Notice was given by the hon. member for Temiscouata of these questions but I am afraid I cannot answer them to-day. I hope he will not make their being answered a condition of agreeing to the present bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Not if the minister could answer broadly.

Mr. ILSLEY: His first question was:

On what basis did he arrive at calculating "the lower expenditures of Britain here" in 1947?

Well, we did not expect them to be nearly as large in 1947 as they had been in 1946. The next question was:

By "expenditures of Britain here" in 1947, did he mean Canadian exports to Britain?

Largely, yes. That is what is meant by "expenditures of Britain here" in 1947.

How did he figure out that they will be lower?

One reason why imports from Canada will not be as high in 1947 is that the United Kingdom is getting back to a civilian economy and will be producing some of the things which otherwise she would be obtaining from the Dominion of Canada.

What will the prospective "expenditures of Britain here" or the Canadian exports to Britain be in 1947?

I shall have to get estimates of those a little later. The next few questions have been answered fairly well by what I have said, and we then come to the last two questions which the hon. gentleman says are the important ones:

What goods are expected to be shipped from Britain to Canada in larger quantity in 1947 than in 1946?

What goods are expected to be shipped from Canada to Britain in smaller quantity in 1947 than in 1946?

We shall have to get information about that. I know that the wartime prices and trade board is continually trying to get supplies from the United Kingdom. There are some things we should like to have them send us in considerably larger volume than we have been able to get them to send us up to the present time. We should not worry under present conditions about our exports going down somewhat and our imports going up somewhat; that should not be a worry of Canadians at the moment. Canada needs many things at the present time; there is a serious shortage of some articles and some diminution in exports would be a good thing for this country under present conditions.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think the minister said that Great Britain must import in order to live.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is because she needs so many things she cannot produce herself?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister should endeavour to correct some of the propaganda in our capitalistic press of Canada when they tell the Canadian people that we have to export or die. There are many things that we need in order to live and there should be some government pronouncements to put over that idea.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to talk out this bill but there are some other observations I should like to make. I want to tell the minister that I sympathize with him in his difficulties, in connection not only with this legislation but with other similar legislation that he has introduced since 1942. We should try to have a Canadian national feeling when we discuss legislation of this kind. It is said that we shall receive more goods from the United Kingdom and that we shall send less over there. We are going to send less goods even when they are being bought with our own money.

The businessmen of this country want markets all over the world, not only in the United Kingdom but in South America and in Europe. One of the best markets in the world is that of South America. I am greatly concerned about this change in policy. The Minister of Reconstruction decided to convert war plants into manufacturing plants, but he had to change his mind a short time afterward and then go back to the manufacture of munitions. That change was made because someone objected.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

PRICE CEILING POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO FARM PRODUCTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a motion to go into supply gives an opportunity to members of the house to raise matters which they regard as of importance either to the house or to the country. I wish, therefore, to raise a question of major importance to the chief primary industry of this country and to the country itself, namely the inequitable position in which agriculture now finds itself and the lessened production as a result of that inequity. For the purpose of bringing this matter to the attention of the house I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), this amendent to the motion:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that the government's price ceiling policies with respect to farm products are discouraging production of needed food and imposing on the food producers of Canada an unfair share of the burden of maintaining the government's price stabilization policies."

I said the question I wished to raise was that of the inequitable position in which agriculture now finds itself and the fact that, for this and other reasons, production of farm products is going down. These are the reasons I am bringing this matter to the attention of the house.

Production in agriculture is lower now than it was last year, in dairy products, in poultry and in hogs, and it is still falling in all these three sections of our agricultural economy. In the beef cattle branch of the industry, while the supply is high, there is a bottle-neck in marketing owing to the price ceilings on beef, and their administration. There are price ceilings on beef but no price ceilings on live cattle or on the different grades of live cattle.

On the United States side of the 49th parallel the price of wheat, if we take into account the recent bonus of thirty cents and the increased value of United States exchange, is now equal to a dollar a bushel more than it is on this side of the line, in Canada. The result is that if that difference in price continues, with a normal crop of wheat in Canada the farmers of this country will contribute to the maintenance of this price structure a sum approaching $200 million a year. I have referred to wheat because it is the largest of our agricultural export commodities. On Saturday last, two days ago, the price of No. 3 northern wheat in the United States just across the boundary from southern Manitoba was $1.68½; the subsidy of thirty cents brings it to $1.98½; then, with the exchange added of twenty cents a bushel, the value of No. 3 northern wheat at that point in the United States amounts to $2.18½ a bushel. At the same time, at Gretna, Manitoba, just on this side of the line, the price of No. 1 northern wheat is $1.08 a bushel, to which of course would be added whatever may be the value of the participation certificate; nobody knows what that will be—possibly fifteen cents. I have compared the price of United States No. 3 northern with Canadian No. 1 northern because those grades are of approximately equal value. If we take the grades having the same name on the two sides of the United States boundary the difference is a little less. These figures go to show that at this moment the price of wheat on this side of the boundary line is nearly a dollar a bushel less than it is on the other side. That means that farmers are paying a disproportionate share of the cost of Canada's price stabilization policy. If we have 200,000,000 bushels or more to sell, and if that difference is maintained, it means a contribution of nearly $200 million by that section of our agricultural economy. My view is that there can be no justification for Canada holding down the price of its chief export commodity, wheat, to a figure almost a dollar a bushel less than the price received by our chief competitors on the other side.

With respect to beef cattle the situation is confusing. It is confused by the absurd method of having a ceiling price on beef but no ceiling price on the different grades of live animals. Since there is no grading of live animals we are finding now with the increased demand that the spreads between the different grades are not sufficient to encourage the production of high quality beef. We find that, while farmers who produce grass-fed cattle are not too much discouraged about the outcome, those—or many of them—who produce grain-fed cattle, who fed them last fall and through the winter are finding it impossible to sell them at a profit.

The commission men in the part of the world where I am acquainted report, as I have said, that producers of grass-fed cattle are not disturbed, but producers of grain-fed cattle cannot carry on except at a loss, and this view is commonly held—I express no personal opinion about it, for I do not know—that the few grain-fed cattle which are reaching that market now are to a considerable extent being shipped east to be absorbed into a black market. As I said, I express no personal opinion on that subject, but that view is commonly held. This policy on the part of the government tends to discourage the production of high quality beef. Those producing beef cattle find that the spread in price between the lower grades and the higher grades is now too small to justify the production of the higher qualities, and there is a growing feeling that if the government is to continue price ceilings there should be a dominion-wide grading system carried right back to the producers so that there will be price ceiling differentials on the different grades of live cattle.

With regard to other products, poultry production is also going down. It is expected that there will be a shortage next winter, not a shortage for Canada but a shortage in the total production The same is true of bacon. The suggestion is that we are not likely to be able to meet the maximum commitments made to Britain.

On the whole, farm production in Canada has been declining since 1944; 1945 was lower than 1944, and 1946 will be lower than 1945. I suggest that, if the farmers were given the necessary stimulus to produce, the situation would be greatly improved. The government should have been watching this situation more closely. It should have raised farm price ceilings in line with increasing costs of labour and other items of production. Not only are farmers' costs increasing, but in the case of farm labour they are finding it difficult to get it at any price. If these things had been done we would not to-day be faced with declining agricultural production.

Those are the two points I wished to lay before the house. The first is the inequity to farmers, with rising costs on one hand, which have not been adequately met by any price adjustments on farm products the government has made. For example, in the case of butter the price increase was too little and came too late On the one hand, I say, we have rising farm costs and, on the other, farm prices not being adequately raised. That produces a condition of inequity. With shortage of farm labour and higher wages in other industries, farm labour is not returning to the farms in the way it might have been expected to do, in the way it did in days gone by; and when it does go back farm wages are twice as high and sometimes more than twice as high as they were.

These conditions combined are resulting in lessened production. In these days what we should be striving for is maximum production, particularly in the field of food products. It is for these two reasons—inequity and decreasing production—that I have brought the matter before the house for discussion to-night.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question which has just been raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) ought, I think, to be replied to at once particularly in relation to agricultural production. The broad statement has been made that agricultural production has been going down because of the prices policy of the government. I am not going to argue the question in regard to the effect of the prices policy on production in Canada, because the leader of the opposition himself has not introduced any proof whatsoever of the statement he has made. But some general statements have been made in relation to wheat and in relation to live stock products which I think should be answered.

The first is to the effect that the price of wheat is higher on the United States side of the line than it is on the Canadian. There is nothing new about that. One can say that the price has been higher on the United States side than it has been on the Canadian side at least ever since the war started. I am not sure how far one could go back and still have that statement true, but the price of wheat has been higher on the United States side of the boundary line than on the Canadian for a considerable time. Nevertheless we had a higher production of wheat in 1942 than we have ever had in this country with the possible exception of one previous year, and certainly the highest production per acre that we have ever had.

The most important phase of the question, however, is that the reason for the present price level in Canada is to try to conform with a matter of a policy which has been advocated by farm organizations, in western Canada at least, ever since I have been in the west, namely, since 1901, and, I believe, for many years before that. As a matter of fact, it was the chief thing that farmers had in mind when the Canada Grain Act was first placed on the statute books of the country, the thought being that some day we should desire to have a stabilized price for the most important commodity which is exported from Canada, and particularly from the west.

The first time we have ever had an opportunity to test out the possibility of having a stabilized price for wheat for the Canadian farmer is the present. To-day we are faced with a situation where Britain, who is the chief consumer of our exported wheat; France, who is perhaps the second greatest consumer of our exported wheat in normal times, and when they are not preparing for wars in Europe; Belgium, who is another large consumer of Canadian wheat; and Holland, are all approaching this government—and we are discussing the matter with them—to set up agreements which will give stability to the sale price to the wheat farmer of western Canada. In order to give an opportunity to have these discussions, we said during the last session of parliament that the ceiling price of wheat to those countries in the meantime will be pegged at $1.55 a bushel No. 1 northern Fort William. We have adhered to that position up to the present time, and during the intervening period these discussions have been going on.

If we are ever to obtain the results we started out to obtain on behalf of agriculture we must stay with our objective sufficiently long at least to prove whether we can carry through to the objective or not. It is, I believe, admitted by all farm organizations that up to the present time neither this government nor the governments of Britain, France, Belgium and Holland, with whom we have been negotiating, have had sufficient time to arrive at a final conclusion in connection with a proposal as far-reaching as this. In the meantime, however, we have been holding the price ceiling at $1.55.

The other side of the question is that while there has been some going up and going down of prices, one commodity that the leader of the opposition speaks of, and has spoken of most often during this session, is hogs. He says that hog production is going down. I suppose he is not aware that in recent weeks, as a matter of fact at the present time, the price of hogs in Canada, all things considered, is higher than can be obtained in the United States, and still the numbers of our hogs, as has been stated, has been going down. In other words, in one case, in the case of wheat, we are told that because the price is higher in the United States than in Canada and the price of wheat is going up in the United States as compared with Canada, that is the reason for our production going down or being down in Canada. On the other hand, in spite of the fact that hogs have been going up in price in Canada and going down in numbers, the price is down on hogs in the United States as compared with Canada.

The fact of the matter is that the weather and other conditions associated with the production of farm crops were quite different in 1945 from conditions in 1942 and 1943 and to a lesser degree in 1944. As I have said in this house before, as a result of that the production of feed grain, or at least the quantities of feed grain stored in this country that are available to farmers with which to feed, have been going down, and farmers themselves have reduced the numbers of live stock to be fed to conform with these facts.

I come now to another question which was raised, namely, that having to do with dairy products. It was suggested that the production of dairy products is going down. As a matter of fact, we are milking more cows in Canada to-day than before. The cow is the source of the supply of dairy products. If we are milking more cows in Canada it is hardly right to state that the production of dairy products is going down as a result of any policy followed in this country at the present time.

The Minister of Agriculture of Ontario misrepresented the position the other night, probably unintentionally. He is reported to have said something in relation to the price of milk, that it had some bearing on the number of cows being exported to the United States, and that these numbers were greater than ever before. I recall that when that question was raised on the floor of this house some two or three years ago I rose in my place and said that so far as I was concerned, irrespective of what other members did, I was not going to advocate the setting up of any policy that would stop the export of cows to the United States. One of the best paying products that the farmers of this country have to sell to the United States is dairy cows. One of the export products upon which there has been no obstruction placed on the boundary line of the United States is dairy cows or breeding stock generally. Farmers who prior to the war knocked their calves on the head the day they were born now feed these calves until they are two years old, breed them and sell them in the United States at profits in order to bring more returns to the farms in different parts of the country.

The records show that to-day we have more dairy cows than ever before in spite of the fact that we are selling more dairy cows to the United States than we sold before, or at least many more than we have sold in recent times. They are being sold at good profits which bring good returns to the farmers. In other words, it requires a great deal more than just a resolution or an amendment of the motion to go into supply to prove that the farming situation it is claimed exists to-day or any reduction in production is due to the price ceiling policies which have been followed by the government in relation to farm products.

The suggestion has been made that we have no ceiling prices on cattle. The leader of the opposition knows, as I know, that there are very few farm organizations anywhere between British Columbia and the Atlantic ocean which have passed resolutions or given support to rail grading of beef or the grading of beef in the manner which was suggested a few moments ago. As a matter of fact, as I recall it, the province from which the leader of the opposition comes—and I think he associated himself with the objections—has been the chief objector to the rail grading of hogs, which has been pretty well accepted in other provinces right across Canada, and is still objected to by Manitoba. Some farmers in that area have objected to the rail grading of hogs, taking the position that it gives the advantage to the packing houses to have the dead hogs hung up in the packing plant before they are actually graded and before the price is set for them. These same farmers in season and out have consistently objected to the grading of cattle upon the rail. I doubt very much whether there is any other way in which cattle can be successfully graded than on the rail.

Let me repeat that farmers right across the country, from British Columbia to the Atlantic have been objecting. It is true that in the Fraser river valley we have been grading cattle on the rail for some considerable time. But that is a restricted area into which beef comes from outside for marketing as well as beef which is produced in it. All of it has to be graded. We have tried out rail grading there as an experiment with the idea that probably some day we may find it possible to have rail grading applied across the country. But when it is said that in setting the price ceiling for live stock the prices board is to be condemned because it did not place a ceiling based upon grading upon cattle, I, for one, am quite prepared to take some responsibility for the board not having done so, and I think every farm organization that knows the situation which existed in this country in 1941 will support me in that contention. The price at which beef sold at retail in 1941 was just as high as the price back in 1928 when the price of cattle was two or three cents higher than the price of cattle in 1941. Those of us who were following the markets in connection with cattle and beef at that time took the position that it would be absolutely unfair to the farm population of this country to have a ceiling put upon cattle as they were being sold in 1941 when ceilings were put on other commodities in this country.

Back in 1928 steak was selling at 48 cents a pound, and cattle were selling at twelve cents a pound. In 1941 the price of steak was 48 cents a pound or some price related to that, and cattle were selling at around nine cents a pound. We took the position that cattle had to go up before any ceiling price could be set upon them.

Let me note that at the present time when retail prices of beef have not been advanced greatly—they have been advanced slightly since 1941—finished cattle are selling or have been selling at around twelve cents a pound, which was the price that was obtained back in 1928 when beef was selling at comparable prices. We took the position back in 1941 that cattle should rise before any attempt was made to put any ceiling upon them. Not only are they selling at twelve cents a pound at the present time—I believe that this morning's price list showed them selling as high as 12·75 and 13·50. Since the decision was taken by the packers a week or so ago that they were not going to pay more than twelve cents a pound, or $10 less per head than they had been paying previously, the price had gone down to twelve cents. It came back to over thirteen cents last week.

I should like to make one criticism of the action that was taken three weeks ago which I hope will be understood by the packing houses. I believe most people were surprised when the president of a packing house came out and said that he was going to pay $10 less per head for cattle right across Canada than he had been paying, and that all the other packing houses were going to do the same thing. I doubt very much whether we expected under controlled prices that any individual in Canada could come out with a statement of that kind. As a matter of fact, I am not altogether sure that the proper price level for cattle, with the ceiling price on beef at its present level, is 12 cents or 13 or 13½ cents in Toronto I do not think anyone can be absolutely certain of it. But there is one way in which it can be determined whether the proper price level is there or not, namely, by having the price levels determined by competition in different areas and enforced wherever they are set. If the price ceilings on beef are enforced and individuals across Canada who have beef to sell are able to place it on the market and make satisfactory profits for themselves in doing so, I doubt very much whether it should be open for any individual or any group of individuals to come out and say that they were going to control the price level by making certain orders in connection with it. I think my contention in that regard has been borne out by what has happened, namely, that when cattle were held off the market prices returned. I am not certain that the contention of the leader of the opposition is correct. He says that the finished cattle are not in the country, that they have not been produced. Well, that is a possibility, but during the last two or three weeks we have been told that men have been ordered to keep their cattle at home.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not say that, Mr. Speaker. I said that with this condition obtaining farmers were not encouraged to produce high quality cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, if they were not encouraged to produce I suppose the assumption would be that production was down, and it was down because of the fact that they had not been encouraged to produce, the result being that beef is not coming on the market at the present time. Beef did come to the market very freely until about three weeks ago, I think, and then this suggestion went out that farmers would be paid $10 a head less for their cattle when they came on the market. After that order was issued the farmers stopped delivering finished cattle to the market; but this morning I heard it announced over the radio that for the first time in three weeks the usual numbers of cattle were coming back on the market. I presume they are coming back because at the end of last week prices were up again to around 13 cents, or 13½ in some cases for the best finished beef, so that cattle are starting to move to the market again.

The point I wish to make is that these difficulties come up not because of the general price policy of the government in relation to farm products but owing to the fact that some persons take actions they are not justified in taking, and possibly something should have been done about the matter. In any event the markets are righting themselves at pretty much the levels of three weeks ago. Production records for this year, however, cannot be judged by what has taken place in the first three months of 1946. As I stated at the beginning of this session, our grain supplies were down when we came into this winter season, and as a result feeding has been down during the winter. But no one knows what the position will be in relation to the feeding of livestock during this summer. It depends entirely upon moisture conditions right across the country and the amount of grass available, as to whether we shall have finished cattle coming off the grass throughout the summer, or whether we shall have more milk coming from our cows during the summer and therefore a greater production of dairy products of one kind or another. If we have good grass, with a greater number of cows than we have ever had before, certainly we shall have a greater production of dairy products than we have ever had before. On the other hand, if we have the usual acreage of wheat—and I assume we have that usual acreage or perhaps more than during the past few years—and if we have good rains during the summer months, we shall have wheat and feed supplies again for the succeeding winter. But if these things fail to happen, in relation to both the amount of grass available and the feed supply, no change in price policy will produce more farm products, in the form of live stock and live stock products, than we have at the present time. This year we fed all the grain that was available in this country. We could not have fed any more no matter what had been the price for live stock products. Therefore I say to the house it was not the price policy that created any existing condition in relation to production.

As to butter, the other product mentioned, on a number of occasions I have said in the house that our production of creamery butter, which is the only butter as to which we have any real records, for the last three years has averaged more than 40,000,000 pounds more than during any previous three-year period in at least recent times. It is not the fact that production is down that makes it difficult to secure butter in certain places; it is the fact that consumption is materially up, and with consumption so much higher we require a certain control over the distribution of butter throughout Canada.

I make this reply, Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid having the suggestion go out that our agricultural production will be so far down this year that we shall not be able to supply the markets which are depending upon us for food this summer and next winter. This country is not going to gain by having any such impression go abroad at the present time. There are people who are absolutely depending upon us. They are relying upon this country to produce their food supplies for next year; but as soon as we convince them that we are not going to have the food supplies available there will be only one thing left for them to do, that is, search around the world to make certain that food supplies will be available to the greatest extent possible. Therefore I suggest that we are not doing this country a service by suggesting, in any speech made here or any resolution moved, that our production is in danger of going down to levels of which we have never dreamed, and that our farmers are entirely dissatisfied with their returns. I know they are dissatisfied to a degree with the returns in certain cases; but in all my experience with agriculture in this country, extending back to 1901, I do not think I have ever known a time when more farmers have expressed themselves as being fairly well satisfied with existing conditions. That would not justify me in saying we should not do anything to try to improve their condition We should be doing that at all times. But to give the impression that we have no prospect of having food in this country with which to supply the markets depending upon us is not going to assist either the farmers of this country or those who in other countries are looking to Canada for food in the months that lie ahead. We shall get better results by supporting the policy which is being followed at the moment of dealing with governments elsewhere for the sale of our farm products at prices which will stabilize the returns to the farmers, and then asking the farmers to produce under the price levels made possible by the arrangements entered into, than by anything else we can do. But if every time we get a stabilized price for any commodity we are going to spend the greater part of our time shooting at that price and saying that for the time being the price realized by someone else is higher, that is the surest way I know of to get rid of what the farmer has been asking for many years.

Those who are telling us to-day to empty our bins to the last bushel in order to do something or another; those who are calling upon the farmers to deliver as they have never delivered before everything they produce on the farms, can create a situation the very opposite to that for which we have been striving by our policies and for which the farmer himself has been striving. For example, suppose we entered into an agreement to deliver an average of 250,000,000 bushels of wheat annually to a group of countries for a period of five years. Suppose, before starting to do so, we had taken every bushel of wheat out of our bins, so that none would be carried over into the succeeding year. Then suppose we had a crop failure. There would be no possibility in the world of carrying out the agreement we had entered into. Experience over the last twenty years has shown that if we carry on as we should in this country and produce 560,000,000 bushels of wheat when we can, under good weather conditions, and produce only 200,000,000 bushels in another year, when weather conditions are poor, our average production will be about 390,000,000 bushels a year. Experience has shown, also, that we can take our own requirements for seed, feed and food out of those 390,000,000 bushels and market about 250,000,000 bushels outside this country every year. But we cannot do that unless we establish something like the ever-normal granary in this country. When we allow anyone, for any purpose whatsoever, to put over propaganda in Canada which takes wheat out of the bins of the farmers, in this or in any other year, and leaves the position such that if we had a crop failure we could not supply the demands of the countries dependent upon us in the years ahead, we would have destroyed forever the possibility of having stabilized farm prices for farm products in this country, and we have established again a situation where the only thing we can rely upon in connection with the sale of farm products is the process of speculation.

It is far more important at the present time that we should be able to establish a stabilized price of, let us say, $1.55 a bushel for five years, than that we should simply look over the United States boundary line and say that, because they were dealing with a special situation in their country under which they pay thirty cents a bushel additional, we should step into the same line of policy in this country, despite the fact that we have not followed the same policy which they followed in connection with price controls throughout the entire period of the war.

If we can have our stabilized price established, and if we can produce the quantity required during the next year or two to supply the market we may agree to supply, then we have gone a long way toward establishing for the farmers of western Canada, in relation to wheat prices and wheat production, stabilized returns over a long period of years. To me, that is far more important than a price of $1.75 or $1.85 for the time being with the possibility of seventy-five cents in a year or two years hence.

We want prices stabilized, if we can do that at all; and we want the situation dealt with so as to assure that that can be done. It is most important that it should be done.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not just follow the procedure of the house. When we moved into supply on the last occasion I tried to raise a grievance. The order paper carried my motion until last Monday, at which time it disappeared from the order paper.

However, I am not complaining about that this evening. I wish to have a few words to say on the motion introduced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). I notice that the motion reads:

> This house is of the opinion that the government's price ceiling policies with respect to farm products are discouraging production of needed food and imposing on the food producers of Canada an unfair share of the burden of maintaining the government's price stabilization policies.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I wish to make it perfectly clear that we have stood wholeheartedly and solidly for the stabilization of prices. I believe with those who accept the same point of view, that the farmer does not want a high, speculative price at one period and a low, depressed price at another period. He wants a price that is not a speculative price, but rather one which is based upon the cost of production, and which bears at least some relationship to the things he has to buy.

I agree with the amendment to this extent, that the farmers in Canada are being discouraged, and that we are imposing an unfair share of the burden of maintaining the government's price policy on their backs.

But I am approaching the matter from an entirely different point of view. I am approaching it from this point of view, that if we are to have stabilization, then let us have stabilization. If we are going to say to the farmer, "The price of wheat in January is to be $1.55, and in May it is to be $1.55", then I say that if in January the manufacturer of agricultural implements states that the price of his binder is to be $281 or $320, or whatever it may be, it should be the same in May. We cannot expect one group in our society to accept a stabilized price for a period, and then have that ceiling broken for some other organization upon which the producer relies for his machinery.

So that I say the policy of the government in this respect is discouraging to the farmer, and it has placed an unfair burden upon the backs of the producers. The other day we had a discussion in this chamber about an increase in the price of agricultural implements. That was an increase to the extent of 12½ per cent, and without warning. That followed in the prairie provinces—and this affected my constituents particularly—an increase of two cents a gallon in the price of gasoline. This has been a serious blow, or, if I may use the plural: These have been very serious blows to the maintenance of our price ceilings; and I regret them exceedingly.

The leader of the opposition has discussed the matter of live stock prices. Well, it has seemed to me that the attempt to keep the ceiling on beef, and to accept no differential between, we will say, fall and spring prices, is unfair again to the agricultural producer. Grass-fed stock which goes on the market in the fall, is fed without either expensive grains or without the same amount of labour. Then, when the grain-fed stock goes on the market in the spring, after the long winter and the hard work involved in looking after that stock, we find the farmers expect a differential in price levels. That, to some extent, accounts for the present situation of discontent in the live stock industry.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but—

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad the minister interrupts, if I am wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: Down to two years ago the situation was just as the hon. member is advocating.

Mr. COLDWELL: Right.

Mr. GARDINER: Then, upon representations being made, and after long discussions, in the interests of establishing stabilized prices throughout the year, for a two-year period that policy has been abolished. I would say that since the change there has not been, up until last week, ten per cent of the criticism in connection with beef prices or meat prices generally, that there was before. I would take that to mean that, with the exception of this last interference, there was pretty general satisfaction.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to have that explanation from the minister. What he says is perfectly true. But I still think that to some extent the dissatisfaction arises from the fact that there is no differential between fall and spring prices.

The Minister of Agriculture mentioned a few minutes ago the attitude of the packers. I think something more than castigation from the Minister of Agriculture should be given to the packers. I do not think any packing industry or any packer in the country should be in a position where he can speak for the entire packing industry. It has always been maintained that there was competition among the packers. The price spreads report, which I have read carefully—and I have no doubt other hon. members have done the same—indicates clearly that the price spreads committee considered there was very little competition among the packers in the packing industry.

Here, again, we have the example at this time of one powerful packer speaking on behalf of the entire packing industry across the country. That looks as though what we have said so often in the house is perfectly true, and that is that the packing industry is a virtual monopoly controlled by one, or at the outside, two, of the great packing companies in this country.

I do not want to see a break in the price ceiling, because I know who would be the first to suffer. The first to suffer would be the pensioner, and other persons on fixed incomes. And hardly less hit—perhaps indeed harder hit eventually—will be the primary producers and the wage and salary earners. Those are the classes which in the final analysis will suffer the most from the breaking of the price ceilings.

As I said a few moments ago, the point of attack as far as the government are concerned is the manner in which they have permitted increases in the cost of farm production without making some adjustments to compensate the farmers. Lately I have been looking at the profits of the Massey-Harris company. The Financial Post indicates that the net profit of the Massey-Harris company for 1944 was $1,800,000. That is a considerable profit; indeed it is 80 per cent higher than the profit of the pre-war years which I admit immediately were low.

Mr. MITCHELL: Did they pay any profits?

Mr. COLDWELL: They paid some. The Cockshutt company more than doubled its profits between 1937 and 1944; the profits in 1937 were $183,044, whereas in 1944 the same company made a net profit of $399,244. If you look at the stock quotations you find that in 1939 the stock of the Massey-Harris company was quoted at from $3.25 to $3.50 a share, whereas to-day it is around $20.

There is another point I wish to draw to the attention of the house because I think it has a direct bearing on the topic we are discussing this evening. I should like to refer to some press reports which I consider are quite reliable. These appeared in the papers run by the Messrs. Sifton in western Canada, and I have here a clipping which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix under the signature of Mr. J. H. Gray. I saw other references to the same matter. This report refers to the questionable procedure which was followed in granting an increase in the price of agricultural implements.

It is stated that on January 9, 1946, certain officers and employees of the Massey-Harris company were permitted to buy 115,250 shares of the company's stock at a price of $14-7/8 a share.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That was in the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was in the Winnipeg Free Press as well. The option to purchase these shares was to run for three years, the beneficiaries being permitted to take up one-third of the stock each year. I have looked up the papers over the week-end and I find that Massey-Harris stock is now selling at around $20 a share. In January, these shares were offered for sale to certain employees at $14-7/8 a share, so that in the past few months, and one would almost think in anticipation of a price rise although I am not suggesting that that is so, there has been that increase in value.

There are hon. gentlemen who are in this house to-day who were on the agricultural implement inquiry committee of 1937. They will remember that that committee reported that prices of farm implements had been too high for the past thirty or forty years. Among other things, that committee reported that in 1937, according to the figures given by the implement companies themselves, there was an unsatisfied backlog of orders to the value of $200,000,000 at the then price levels. The report stated that in the following years the farmers, in order to meet their machinery needs, would require to spend over $50,000,000 a year on agricultural implements.

That report was tabled in the house in 1937. Then war broke out and very few farmers were able to buy implements. There was a period of six years when implements—I was going to say were non-existent— were in exceedingly short supply. Consequently the present backlog of farm implement needs is greater than it ever was in the history of this country. There is good business ahead for the farm implement companies. They have new and improved machinery, some of which was used for the manufacture of munitions but which can now be used to make farm implements. In some cases this machinery was installed by the government and has been no doubt obtained by the companies from the government at a great discount. They have more skilled technical workers; they have a greater demand; they have better machinery, and yet this is the time when we see a 12½ per cent increase in the price of farm implements.

This rise in the value of the stocks from January to May may not have been due to any prior knowledge of a possible increase in the price of implements. I am not saying it was, but I am saying that they could have estimated that they would make more money and therefore that their stocks would be worth more. According to the information I have, they handed out 115,250 shares of stock at virtually $5 a share below what it was worth three months later. The Cockshutt company did much the same thing. They allowed two of their executives to buy 2,000 shares each during the next three years. In this case the option price was $9 a share and this stock also has sold up to approximately $20 a share.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Let us see what this means. Let us suppose that these individuals in the employ of the Massey-Harris company took up their one-third option in January. They could have taken up 38,000 shares. With the present price rise they would have made $190,000 if they had marketed their shares at the present figure.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Which company is that?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the Massey-Harris company. In the case of the Cockshutt company the profit would have been $22,000 on the same basis. That is the kind of thing that makes price stabilization impossible. That is the kind of thing that this house ought to take cognizance of. If I had been moving the resolution I would have moved it in entirely different terms. I would have moved it so that we would have criticized the government for having failed to grant comparable increases when prices of farm machinery and of other commodities that the farmer had to use were permitted to rise.

May I say to the ministers and to the government that when it is found necessary to do something with regard to the removal of price ceilings on a particular commodity or on a group of commodities, there should be no hole-in-the-wall negotiations. All the people concerned in the price rise should be called in. For example, in the case of farm implements the government should be represented; the farmer should be represented; the industrial worker should be represented, and the manufacturer should be represented. Perhaps we could then understand better why certain things are done, or perhaps in the light of day which would be shed upon the matter the proposal would not be accepted and things like this would not happen. If we are to have price stabilization, let us have it.

If I might just consider another point. The other day the minister referred to increases in prices of farm commodities during the past few years and set those up against the increase in the cost of farm machinery. Let me point out again that in 1937 the parliamentary committee tabled in this house a considered report containing voluminous information. It was an excellent report in many respects. That report stated that at that time prices of farm implements were too high and that they had always been too high. We urged that something be done to cause the manufacturers to decrease these prices; in fact we recommended, among other things, that if they did not do so the government of this country should encourage the formation of farmers' coopera-tives for the manufacture and distribution of farm implements. We recommended that in the report.

I believe there are two or three ways in which this problem could be eased to some extent for the producers of this country. A publicly owned farm implement industry would be one way. We have the factories, the machines, and the labour. I know the government will not accept that. Then let me suggest that a thing which might be done is for the government to encourage the devolpment of a real cooperative farm implement industry in this country to give these private corporations some competition. If the government believes in the competitive system that is one way of giving these great organizations some competition. I want to point out that we cannot expect the farmers to accept price stabilization of the commodity they sell if they find that the commodities they buy are not to be stabilized and kept stabilized. There is the bald fact.

This amendment to-night is largely justified. I do not think it tackles the thing from the right end. I do not think it is the price ceiling policies with respect to farm products which are discouraging production, but, on the contrary, it is the permission to puncture price ceilings on the goods that the farmers buy that is the difficulty; and that is the angle from which I would tackle the matter.

Let me say again: in 1937 we reported that farm implement prices were high, that they should come down. The minister's argument the other day that farm prices had risen by so much per cent did not take into account the fact that no one in this house could say that agricultural prices in any year from 1931 to 1941 were high enough, that they covered the cost of production. They did not. As I have told the house before, I have bought eggs at three cents a dozen in western Canada. True, that was not in 1939; that was in the spring of 1934. But in 1939 you could buy them at fifteen and twenty cents a dozen. Wheat was around sixty cents a bushel, and other farm prices were on a somewhat similar level. Let us not compare 1939 farm prices with prices now and say, because there has been an increase in farm prices, therefore the increase in the price of farm implements is justified.

I do not want to say more about this at the moment, other than that if we are to have price ceilings let us have them for everybody, not pick somebody out and provide him with a hole in the ceiling. May I add that I believe we must have price ceilings. But we should receive proper representation from the people who are concerned. Who are the people concerned? Of course the government is concerned, representing, as it should do, this parliament and the people of this country through this parliament; the producer is concerned; the worker is concerned, and I would say that under our present economic system the industrialist, the manufacturer, the owner of the plant is concerned. We should see to it that when we are going to set a stabilized price all the factors involved are studied and all those who have a stake in the price level are consulted.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to say a few words on this subject before the motion is passed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in addressing the house this evening, went to great lengths to prove that the government's policy was a very satisfactory one as far as the farmers are concerned. He did qualify his statement, though, when he said he thought most of the farmers were satisfied, but I do not believe the minister was as far west as I was during the Easter vacation, although he was in his own province. If he had been in Alberta when the announcement came over the air of the increase in the price of farm machinery he would have found that the farmers were not at all satisfied; and I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) hit the nail pretty well on the head, and that the Minister of Agriculture was really dodging the issue.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I did not really say what my hon. friend quoted me as saying. I said that more farmers were satisfied until quite recently than had been satisfied over a long period of time.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Minister of Agriculture is very safe on that ground.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Sore but satisfied.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Of course, if you are starving a man to death and then you give him a piece of bread you can say that he is more satisfied than he was before. When you gave the farmers less than the cost of production for the grains they were raising and the produce they were producing away back in the thirties, and then you increased the return to, we will say, the cost of production, of course they would be more satisfied; and if you raised prices a cent or two cents above the cost of production of course they would be more satisfied. But the thing they are dissatisfied about, and the fight which they have been trying to make down through the years is that they want some consideration accorded to them —as well as to industrialists—for the work which they put into raising these farm products. They are not compensated and never have been for the work which they put into the producing of their articles. It is not unknown to the members of this house that industry has never produced at a loss, or at least, on only a very few occasions. If they did, they were in such a position that they would immediately go into bankruptcy. They would come out all right; they would not lose their shirts, anyway. That was the method they used. But the farmer was in an entirely different position, because when he got to the point where he was producing at less than cost of production and would like to have gone into bankruptcy, he could not afford to, and he was not allowed to. No; he had to stay there. Had he been able to go into bankruptcy he would probably have left the country, but that was not possible. So that when the minister says that agriculture is more satisfied than it has been for a long time, that is a hollow sounding phrase and has not a great deal of meaning, and I do not think it is going to satisfy the farmers a great deal.

Speaking of that subject, I was quite interested in reading the analysis which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave in this house on April 15, in regard to agriculture and agricultural implements. He said, as reported in Hansard at page 893:

But since 1941—and these are figures given by the bureau of statistics—average prices of farm products, including subsidies, in 1945 as compared with average prices for 1941 showed the following increases.

Let me point out that these increases include subsidies; and the minister at this point at least, where it should have been indicated, failed to indicate the real price for agricultural products. It was at that time that prices were below the cost of production, so that it is not fair, in fact it is most unfair to try to show, by giving a percentage of increases, that the farmer was so much better off than the machine companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member permit me to point out that at that point I said:

I am not saying for one minute that price increases over the level of the fall of 1941 were not desirable, because the price level before the war was low, and while it rose somewhat between 1939 and the fall of 1941 it did not rise as high as it should have.

That is how I started my enumeration of the prices.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am glad the minister has called attention to that. I am sure he must have realized that too. But he must have realized also that, despite the fact that he might have stated in that speech that he did not think prices of agricultural commodities were as high as they should be, they were at depression levels then. But this government was in power, and why did it not do something about that situation? That is the complaint of the farmer. It is no use saying now, "I know that the farmer in 1940 and in 1939 did not have as high a price as he should have had," because it was the responsibility of the government then in power, that is to say the Liberals, to devise a policy which would have given a decent cost of production. But let me continue with the quotation:

. . . average prices of farm products, including subsidies, in 1945 as compared with average prices for 1941, showed the following increases: wheat, 67 per cent,—

Anyone seeing that would say, "What are these farmers talking about? My goodness! Think of getting a 67 per cent increase." Well, when you multiply 67 by nothing you still have nothing.

—or, if an estimated participation of fifteen cents be included. 87 per cent; oats, 65 per cent; barley, 62 per cent; hogs, 51 per cent.

My goodness! These farmers were wealthy in 1941!

The recent adjustments in hog prices would increase this to 70 per cent. Cattle, 40 per cent; fluid milk, 28 per cent; butter, 29 per cent; with the recent price increase, 40 per cent; cheese, 53 per cent; eggs, 28 per cent—

He did not mention that they were selling at ten or twelve cents a dozen.

—potatoes, 135 per cent; all farm prices, 48 per cent, and farm machinery—

That poor little outfit had only three per cent.

That is not a fair comparison because, as I pointed out, the farm machinery companies never did sell at a loss, so that when they got three per cent of an increase it added materially to the enhancement of their financial position; whereas when the farmer got a 67 per cent increase that may not even have brought it up to cost of production and certainly did not bring it to that level. So that the comparison is entirely without any foundation.

These are the things the farmers complain about and they have a right to complain. Even now, although the Minister of Agriculture talks about a stabilized price, what is the government doing under its policy to-day? It is continually increasing the cost of production for the farmer. Take the gasoline tax. That is up to such an extent that the farmers are losing in that regard, and not only was the government still not satisfied with allowing that increased cost to remain, but it has seen fit now to increase that cost again by allowing a 12½ per cent increase in farm machinery.

The government says, "Well, now, we did a pretty good job there because, mind you, the machine companies wanted a 25 per cent increase and we gave them only 12½ per cent." Of course, the machine companies never expected 25 per cent; that was a bargaining figure and they cut it to half knowing they were getting an extremely fine proposition at that.

The Minister of Agriculture spoke a moment ago about shooting at a stabilized price. I do not think there are many members here who are not desirous of having a stabilized price, but the government themselves are the ones who have been shooting at this price until now it is riddled, so that they had better put up another target. It is only reasonable to suppose—the government cannot expect anything else—that the farmer must continually shoot at that target, stabilized price. He is forced to do so. The farmer knows from past experience that the government will take no action whatever until it is forced to do so. There is clear evidence of that because in 1943 the farm organizations headed by the Saskatchewan wheat pool and supported by the Alberta and Manitoba wheat pools came to Ottawa and demanded increased prices for agriculture, and they were not received too well at that time. But they put forth strenuous efforts and pressure was put on, because they almost threatened a strike. Consequently they got action and obtained an increase in price from 70 cents to $1 a bushel. We shall not argue over ten cents one way or the other; maybe it was ninety cents.

But when the minister speaks of shooting at a stabilized price, he must take his share of responsibility; and even now the Minister of Agriculture as a member of the cabinet must assume his share of the responsibility, together with the Minister of Finance, for allowing this increased price in agricultural implements of 12½ per cent and the increase of two cents a gallon on gasoline, all of which adds to the cost of production of agricultural commodities. Therefore, if the farmer is shooting continually at a stabilized price, the Minister of Agriculture must, as I say, bear his share of the responsibility as well because he is putting them in an untenable position.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say the farmer was shooting at it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is what the minister meant. If he did not say that I will say it for him.

Mr. GARDINER: I said the leader of the opposition was doing that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You may have something there, because I have always listened with a good deal of amusement when I hear criticisms of the government from people who have no alternative to suggest, and I have never yet heard the leader of the opposition tell the government just where they will get the wherewithal to do the things they are asked to do. Maybe our method is wrong, but—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Take the ceiling off farm prices. Didn't you hear it?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, and I can well remember visiting the dominion-provincial conference and listening to the Conservative financial critic who was suggesting that we cut down expenditures while at the same time he suggested increasing wages, and he did not know what to do with unemployment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think, while the conference is still carrying on—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Where have you been all the time? The conference has been over for quite a while.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know where I have been, but I do not know where you have been.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do know where you have been, but I know where you are going.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. gentleman interrupts me with the remark that he knows where I have been; he is just going there. While the dominion-provincial conference carries on it should not be discussed in this House of Commons.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Just because I happened to tread on the hon. member's toes he—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member's boot is not big enough to tramp on one toe of mine. I raised a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member seems to be a little touchy to-night. In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, when hon. members are offering criticism to the government they should have some constructive alternative to suggest.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us yours.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When we get to that other place I shall explain it. The Minister of Agriculture mentioned the possibility of our having a large acreage this year. It was the general impression that we would have a greater acreage this year than we have ever had before. I hold in my hand the farm budget issued by the wheat pool in January, and it gives the wheat acreage trend in each of the four principal exporting countries since 1935, namely, Canada, the United States, the Argentine and Australia. In 1939 Canada had 26,757,000 acres; the United States, 63,516,000 acres; the Argentine 17,830,000, acres, and Australia, 13,284,000. It will be noticed that in 1940 Canada's wheat acreage went up. In that year Canada had 28,626,000 acres; the United States 61,464,000 acres; the Argentine 17,510,000 acres, and Australia 2,645,-000 acres. In 1941 there was a considerable drop in Canada's wheat acreage. We had 21,882,-000 acres; the United States, 62,404,000 acres; the Argentine, 18,040,000 acres; Australia, 12,063,000 acres. In 1942 we had another drop. Our wheat acreage was 21,586,000 acres; the United States 52,533,000 acres; the Argentine, 16,979,000 acres, and Australia, 9,280,000 acres. In 1943 we dropped to 17,488,000 acres; the United States had 54,159,000 acres; the Argentine, 16,914,000 acres, and Australia 8,300,000 acres. In 1944 we just held our own with 17,488,000 acres; the United States had 68,000,000 acres. There is no figure for the Argentine or Australia in that year. Therefore that total indicates that the acreage is not likely to go up a great deal.

Mr. GARDINER: I was speaking only of Canada's acreage; I made no reference to world acreage.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Of course the figures I have quoted give the trend of wheat acreage in each of these countries named, which included Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year the wheat acreage in Canada was 23,000,000 acres. The last figures the hon. member gave were 17,000,000 acres.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That was in 1944.

Mr. GARDINER: I was speaking of 1945.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It would be interesting to place on record the 1943 price in Canada and compare it with the United States price. The United States average price for wheat was $1.37; the Alberta average was 97 cents. The United States price of oats was 75 cents; the average price in Alberta was 44 cents. The barley price in the United States was $1.03; the average price in Alberta was 57 cents. The price of rye in the United States was $1.02; the average price in Alberta was 76 cents. The price of flax in the United States was $2.84; the average price in Alberta was $2.16. These figures show the difference in fluctuations between the prices that are received in Canada and in the United States. There is another cause for dissatisfaction. When the farmer looks about him and sees that the grain which he has to sell, which is probably a little better than the grain sold in the United States, brings in a great deal less than the same type of grain sold in the United States he becomes dissatisfied. On the other hand, when he looks across the border and sees that the machines which he has to buy to produce these grains to feed the people of Canada are selling for much less over there than the same machine, and often made by the same company, is selling for here in Canada, he becomes dissatisfied. These are the things that are causing the farmers to ask continually for stabilized prices to which the Minister of Agriculture referred a moment ago. I believe the time has come when there must be some form of stabilization throughout the whole price structure, for industry as well as for agriculture, on a basis which will be sound for everyone concerned and which would include the cost of production, plus a fair commission to everyone. Until we get a planned policy such as that there is no doubt that we shall have strikes. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is going to have lots of strikes before long if he continues the policy which is in force at the present time. When he rises to speak he will tell me that we have had less strikes here than anywhere else.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not baloney, either.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is only too evident that when all these other increases are allowed which materially raise prices of agricultural products, we are bound to have farmers insisting on an increased price for their goods, because they have to have it to make ends meet. The government should take the lead in bringing down a price structure which will give some semblance of stabilization and equalization. When that is done I think our difficulties will be closer to a solution.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As I listened to the debate on raising wages and lowering prices I thought we had come into an era of what might be called phony realism. It cannot be done. Grown-up men know it cannot be done. There must be some relationship between prices and wages, whether it be wages of the farmers, wages of the industrial workers or wages in the commercial field of the nation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is what I pointed out.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say this to my hon. friend and to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), that in relation to its price control this nation is the envy of the world.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I knew the minister was going to say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friends laugh. Some of my officials have just returned from a conference in Mexico, at which expressions of that kind were made by all the delegates. Those who have been in Europe in the last two or three years know what is happening there. Why try to kid the people of this country? Ask the men who fought in France and Holland and Germany about uncontrolled prices and inflation. Only to-day I was reading about Hungary where the pengo is quoted at twenty-two million to the dollar. Don't say, "It can't happen here." My hon. friend who has just spoken talks of lots of strikes. Some people like strikes. I do not. I prefer a more reasonable way.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You are asking for them, though.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not; my hon. friend is asking for them. The communists want inflation; of course they do. Then you get the people on the extreme right, who want the price structure lifted. A famous man once said, "Debase the currency and the revolution is here." Personally I think this government has done what I might call a noble job with this very difficult problem, with all the pressures that one feels sitting behind the desk, as I and the other members of the government do. I am sometimes twitted about the big interests. I do not think anyone can say I have been a friend of the big interests. I have always sat on the other side of the table, negotiating wage agreements; but you know you never take any chance in attacking the big interests. That is pie in the sky for the politician. There are not many of them. I have a vivid recollection of when I was a young member of this house, when the then leader of the government, who is known to most of us, was ill. I said to a friend of mine, "Do you think he is going to get well?" He replied, "Gosh, Humphrey, I hope he does. I have been shooting both barrels at him for the last four years, and if he dies I will have to switch to the banks." So that you get this exhibition of trying to please the greatest number, when in my judgment we should be giving them leadership. I agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Let us be fair about it; in a comparative sense this country is a paradise. Perhaps it is not as good as it should be, but you see the difference when you look around the world, or even when you go across the border. The other day I was in a medium-sized city there, and I was amazed. I never thought the food situation and the price situation could ever reach the stage they have reached in the United States.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who was it mentioned baloney?

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, you only have to go there and see. When you walk through the stores you appreciate that inflation is there on a large scale. I think that is generally admitted; they admit it themselves. After all is said and done, the real wealth of a nation is expressed in the unit of production. What we need to do more than anything else, in this and every other country in the world, is to increase the tempo of production. Take the wage situation in the agricultural implement industry. Taking 1939 as 100, to-day the index stands at 155·8, or an increase of 55·8 since 1939. Just now my hon. friend mentioned the increase in the price level of agricultural implements, and in the very nature of things these things must go together. A great deal has been said about the tremendous power of the machine. It is estimated—and it is only an estimation—that the increase in the rate of production is about two per cent a year. You and I know that if these things get out of balance we are headed for trouble, and we are bound to have increased prices.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you mean 2·2 per cent a year?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, just two per cent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is the increase in production, based upon what?

Mr. MITCHELL: On the over-all picture technical production over a period of years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is estimated that machinery has increased production by two per cent?

Mr. MITCHELL: Over a long period. As a matter of fact, it is a little lower than that. I just point out these things because, charged as I am with a very difficult problem, as are the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Agriculture and others, I hope we shall be able to maintain a reasonable price structure. I do not need to tell my farmer friends that I do not know much about agriculture, but I have lived through a couple of depressions and two wars. It is just like throwing a ball into the air; what goes up must come down. We all have a clear recollection of the price of wheat at the end of the last war, when it went up to something over $3 a bushel. We all remember that the price of land in western Canada increased tremendously. We all know what happened in regard to the production of wheat in France and Italy. Speaking from memory, the year before war broke out I believe Italy produced more wheat than Canada did, and that was largely brought about by the tremendous increase in the price level. In France they imposed a high tariff; in Italy they cleared marshland and grew wheat. I was in Paris is 1933, I believe, when the duty on a single bushel of wheat was about $1.25. That is an indication that unless we keep our feet on the ground and meet this very difficult period in a rational way, history is bound to repeat itself as surely as the sun will rise tomorrow morning.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) mentioned the people with fixed incomes. The other day I had an estimation made of the number of people drawing pensions from the state, from railway companies and so on, not including those in receipt of family allowances, and the number was about four hundred thousand, with another two million receiving family allowances. We all know that with every point increase in the price index the purchasing power of the income of what I call this great mass of defenceless people is reduced; and I think it is our duty, as it will always be mine while I am a member of this government, to see to it that this great body of people get the protection they are so richly entitled to and deserve.

I just wanted to say these few simple things, Mr. Speaker, in order that the people of this country might not be fooled by the arguments so often advanced by both sides into believing that there is no relationship between the price structure and the cost of production. We all know there is a relationship and it must be worked out in a rational way. As far as human agencies go, I think it is a fair thing to say that the machinery developed in this country is as good as that in any other country. Following what was said about agricultural conditions, let me say that the wage index is the highest in the history of this country. That did not fall as a gentle rain from heaven. It was brought about by the organization of labour, of course, but also by the policies set in motion by this government.

In conclusion, I hope the people of this country will show the good sense that they have exhibited in the last four or five years, and see to it that we protect the living standards of the great mass of Canadian people which are predicated upon the maintenance of a price and wage stabilization policy.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment may I point out, first of all, that matters connected with agricultural production are divided between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. The former has been responsible for production, and the latter for marketing; and in recent years, especially since 1941, under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and Donald Gordon certain controls have been responsible for the hampering of agricultural production. When I mention these controls, I have said nothing about discriminatory income tax deductions which began to operate in 1942, and are still in existence.

I am sure all hon. members believe in a policy of stabilization. However, we believe it should be on a basis of parity, and I am convinced that many hon. members who rise in their places and support the government every time there is a vote, do not believe we have anything approaching parity under our present price control system.

For instance, speaking in this house on March 20 the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) said:

> The cost of living and the cost of farm production is still 22·6 per cent higher than the farmer receives for his products in this country.

The hon. member is a government supporter, but on that date he put those figures on Hansard.

Then, reference has been made to the increase in the price of gasoline. In the prairie provinces, drawing a line just west of Winnipeg, and including the three provinces, the order permitting the increase of two cents a gallon in the price of gasoline prevailed. When I first heard of this increase I wrote the Minister of Finance as follows, on February 28:

> Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley,
> Minister of Finance,
> Ottawa.
> Dear Sir:
> I wish on behalf of the primary producers of the greater part of the prairie provinces to protest against the proposed increase of two cents per gallon on gasoline to take effect about the middle of March. This would seem very discriminatory and arbitrary. I suggest that proper investigation be made and reasonable explanation given to the public before the increase is allowed.

The minister was out of the country at that time, and as a result I received an acknowledgement of my letter from his secretary. The reply left the impression in my mind that the order was discriminatory. Reference was made in the letter to the oil fields of Montana, which were close to the prairie provinces. The letter went on to point out that the subsidies would be continued from the southern states of Oklahoma and Texas, and that if these were eliminated and other regulations went into effect the price would probably increase by six cents a gallon. That was the reply I received, and certainly it indicates discrimination, and additional cost of production for the farmers of the prairie provinces.

On the matter of income tax deductions, at every session of parliament that I have attended I have tried to get some degree of fairness between the treatment accorded the farmer and his wife, and the man and wife who work in the city or in industry. I believe it was on November 30 of last year, if I remember correctly, that I asked the Minister of Finance if he had found a way of overcoming this discrimination. He explained that in 1942 the government had found it necessary to allow an extra $600 to the wife in industry connected with the war effort, which resulted in an amount of $1,800 for the married couple in industry or in the city as compared with $1,200 for the married couple on the farm. He knew it was wrong, and said that he was giving thought to it, but did not know whether he would be able to bring about a change in 1946.

Let me now deal with the increase of 12½ per cent in the price of farm implements. I was not in the house in the debate respecting farm implements which took place on April 15, but I believe that upon that occasion a large part of the financial statement of the Massey-Harris company was placed upon Hansard. I worked for that company, selling machinery and making collections, in 1929 and 1930, and I know something about the percentage of their costs which go to sales, publicity and collections. None of those items of cost exist to-day, nor did they exist during the war. The company does not have to go out to sell machinery or to make collections, although in other years a large percentage of their cost was set aside and earmarked for that purpose. However, as I say, that does not apply to-day, nor did it apply during the years of war.

Let me give one concrete example of a further aggravation in connection with the implement business, with which the government is becoming entangled. Last fall, during harvest time, a man in my community found he was short of farm equipment. He had always used a certain type of equipment manufactured in the United States. This man wanted a ten-foot power binder, but it was not procurable at that time at any price. He did discover an extra binder in the city of Winnipeg. This was a Canadian type binder, manufactured in Canada. He could have procured the United States power binder delivered at Melita for about $395, had it been available, but had to pay $450 for the Canadian type of power binder. It will be understood that I am giving just round figures. However, the result was that he paid $55 more for the Canadian type of binder which he did not want, had he had a choice between the two types. Then, if we add 12½ per cent to the price of the Canadian binder, we find it would now cost that man approximately $506, making a difference of $111 between the United States and Canadian prices.

Mr. HOWE: Why does he not buy the United States binder? There is no duty.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It was not available then. He had always used the United States binder, but at that time it was not available. The harvest was on, and he had to take what he could get, with an additional $55 in price. Since then, with the increase of 12½ per cent, the difference would be approximately $111.

The minister pointed out that this condition was brought about partly by the exorbitant prices paid at auction sales to-day. That is true; and those machine companies are taking advantage of the situation. With the knowledge that equipment is not available, in short supply, they are getting this increase, knowing that people must have machinery at any price. Surely the increase was most unfair.

At several points in the report of the parliamentary committee which investigated farm implement prices in 1937, the chairman of the committee pointed out that farm machinery manufactured in Canada was altogether too highly priced for the farmers of this country. If that was true then, when they had to pay for publicity, sales, collections and the like, which do not have to be paid to-day, certainly the present price is unwarranted and is a further aggravation of the situation faced by the producer.

I should like now to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on April 16, the day following the discussion on farm implement prices in the house. It says:

> Higher Prices for Farm Implements
> If the Canadian government had gone out deliberately to create a storm of controversy in western Canada it could hardly have chosen a different instrument than the raising of farm implement prices.

The editorial is of considerable length, and the points are well discussed by whoever writes the editorials for that paper. I say that most certainly the increase, when it is added to the costs of agricultural production, will appear wholly unjustified. I do not know what it will lead to in the future.

True, one of the ministers has pointed out that the tariff was reduced in 1944. But will he explain to me, on behalf of the government, what will happen when implement production becomes plentiful, and we have a condition where in Canada a binder will sell for $506, while the same type from the United States would sell for $395?

Mr. ILSLEY: Why would not the purchaser buy the United States article, then?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Certainly he will, when production becomes plentiful. But I am pointing out that the minister will have difficulty with the machinery companies then. To-day there is no choice. The farmers must buy where they can.

During the war the agricultural producers of Canada received less for their products than did the producers in any other of the united nations. As was pointed out this evening, prices of agricultural products in the United States are fifty per cent higher than in Canada on the average, while costs of the implements of production are less in the United States than they are in Canada.

I did not know whether I should burden the house at this time with this matter, but during the Easter recess I drove across to the United States and interviewed several implement dealers. I got quite a list of farm implement prices. When I compared those with prices charged by comparable dealers on our side of the line I found that they were slightly under our prices. This was before the 12½ per cent increase took place.

Some mention has been made of the price of wheat. According to an estimate made by the dominion bureau of statistics and based on the last grain crop, the prairie farmer would have received some $400,000,000 more if he had been allowed to sell at ordinary world prices such as prevailed on the Chicago grain market. The Canadian wheat crop was 305,000,000 bushels and the farmers were losing $170,000,000 on that crop. They were losing $135,000,000 on oats and $110,000,000 on barley. That is the difference between prices that prevail in the United States and what the farmer in Canada has received in one year.

According to a report tabled just a few days ago by Donald Gordon, it has cost this country some $322,000,000 to maintain price controls from December 1941 to date. When we consider the contribution of $400,000,000 which the farmer has made in one year because of reduced prices of grain I think we have proof that the agricultural producer of this country has made altogether too great a contribution in the way of subsidizing the consumers of foodstuffs in Canada. As I say, this whole system has cost the taxpayers of this country many millions of dollars less to maintain since its inception on December 1, 1944 than the farmers have lost in one year.

The agricultural producer its entitled to the same consideration which has been given to to the lumber producer or the general manufacturer. They have been able to export their products at prevailing world market prices. Certainly there should be some basis of parity created in this stabilization system of ours. If that had been done, then many of the difficulties which faced the great dominion-provincial conference that took place in the other place last week would not have existed.

For instance, the budgets of the three prairie provinces amount to $102,000,000 annually. The budget of Manitoba is $22,000,000; Saskatchewan, $52,000,000, and Alberta, $28,000,000. The difference in prices received for grain by the western producer in one year is four times the entire annual budgets of the three prairie provinces. I believe there is some food for thought in those figures. If there had been some basis of parity the premiers of these prairie provinces would not have been so concerned about their future taxation problems.

The Minister of Agriculture said that he did not know how far back you would have to go to discover when the price of wheat was higher in Canada than it was in the United States. It is acknowledged that western Canada produces the finest cereals of any place in the world. I do not know how far back you could go, but I hold in my hand a copy of the chairman's report of the Canadian wheat board which was presented in 1919 by the then chairman, Mr. James Stewart, to the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster, G.C.M.G., who was then Minister of Trade and Commerce. On page 5 of the report it is stated that the instructions given to the board at that time were as follows:

> The instructions given to the Canadian wheat board were very simply stated. The board was instructed to sell the Canadian wheat crop of 1919 at a price which would bring the greatest possible benefit to the dominion as a whole.

That is the same period after the last war as we are now in after the war that has just ended. I think that is a very fair set of instructions. On the next page is given the personnel of the board that was set up. Practically all the principal vocations in Canada were represented on that wheat board, including official organized labour. That representative was satisfied at that time with the operations of this board. On another page it is pointed out that the average price throughout those war years was twenty-five cents a bushel higher in Canada than in the United States. This is a government report. The report refers to one transaction in which wheat was exported from this country at $4.02 a bushel.

The price of wheat was set at $2.15 a bushel with participation certificates which, according to the report, gave another forty-eight cents a bushel to the producer, or a total of $2.63 a bushel. That was a higher price than ever prevailed in the United States at that time.

There is a comparison made of the prices of staple foodstuffs in these two great countries. As was pointed out this evening by my leader, the existing price of wheat to-day, including the thirty cent bonus, was practically $1 a bushel less in Canada than obtained at the point across the boundary in the United States. That is altogether too great a difference.

Mention has been made of beef prices. I have here the Winnipeg Free Press of April 27, which contains the headline, "Miles of St. Boniface pens empty." In one day the marketings amounted to only twenty-five cattle, and these are the greatest yards in the British empire where normally from 1,800 to 2,000 head of cattle are received each day at this time of year, and contain facilities for handling many thousands a day.

Within a few days of the announcement of the increase in implement prices it was stated that they would not buy beef without decreasing the price approximately one cent a pound. Those who were caught with a supply of cattle on the market at that time took a loss of from $10 to $15 a head, but they had to do it. According to another bureau of statistics report, cattle prices on the Chicago market were almost one cent a pound higher at that time than they were one year ago. These two facts are strangely inconsistent. I have pointed out that implement prices did not rise throughout the war in the United States, according to the information I received from the implement dealers. In addition, beef prices were up almost one cent a pound over the previous year. In this country our farmers were faced with a decrease of one cent a pound in beef prices. This situation has greatly aggravated the position of the producer in this country.

I have dealt mainly with this matter from the western point of view, but something can be said for the eastern farmer. These men really have greater production difficulties in some respects than we in western Canada have. I have an account here which states that because of the shortage of farm labour and other difficulties in farm production 100,000 acres in Simcoe county are lying idle. I am sure that other hon. members who are more conversant with conditions in the east will deal more ably with this problem. From what I have witnessed I believe they have many complex problems that even we in western Canada do not have, and everybody knows we have altogether too many. I am convinced that as a result many people are letting up on their production. Remember that the average age of farm operators in the prairie provinces to-day is over fifty-five years. They, their wives and those of their families that happened to be at home have worked long hours and done a magnificent job in producing for the war effort. They rightly think that, with the war over, they are entitled to lie back a bit and have some rest, and they would like to turn over a portion of their farms to the younger people. Strange as it may seem, some 7 per cent of the young people from the prairie provinces who enlisted in the services from farms have signified their intention to return to the farms; the others, the great majority, wish to try some other vocation, and with the difficulties which are arising to-day one connot altogether blame them.

I have never missed an opportunity at any session since coming here in 1940 to ask for a basis of parity for agricultural producers in this country, based on their costs of production and living costs in this nation. At the last session, on September 25, I moved a resolution asking that the government should establish floor prices for all basic agricultural products at not less than 90 per cent of parity, and every supporter of the government rose in his place and voted against that resolution.

As I have pointed out, since then the United States have not altered the price of farm implements; they have added thirty cents a bushel bonus on wheat in recent days, while in the same recent days the Canadian government have increased the cost of farm implements, raised the cost of gasoline in most parts two cents a gallon, and, one would think, they are deliberately going out to make the lot of the agricultural producer in this country more difficult. I do not see how any hon. member who gives proper thought to this matter can oppose this amendment.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I was greatly pleased at hearing the Minister of Agriculturre (Mr. Gardiner), when he was speaking earlier this evening, make the statement that his experiences had proven over the past years that what we needed was stability. I am pleased because eventually he is learning something. He is agreeing with the policy which we of this group through the past number of years have been advocating. I hope that his experiences will also lead him to admit the fallacy of the fire-sale policy which he had here some years ago.

As the representative of a rural constituency in a province that is more dependent upon the net return of agriculture than is any other province in Canada, I shall, of course, speak on behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent. But let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members that I shall also endeavour to keep in mind the entire picture of our national economy, the welfare of our country as a whole.

In my opinion the government have no one to blame but themselves for the position they find themselves in, because they refuse to go to the root of the trouble. Like the Bourbons of old, they forget nothing and learn nothing. They refuse to forget the heyday of their power. Sadder still, they refuse to recognize the fact that the day of so-called free competitive enterprise has long been over. They remind me of an old lady sitting in the glow of the fireplace spinning dreams of the long, long ago and yet refusing to let the younger generation put the house in order.

For a year or more we from this side of the house have been urging the government to prepare plans for the post-war years, but all they have been able to accomplish is to get themselves into one impossible position after another. In fact, they remind me of the chap who got hold of the tail of one of those white-and-black striped pussies: they are afraid to let go and equally afraid to hold on. But this much they can be sure of, that, let go or hold on, the odour will be the same. Sooner or later they must let go. But before they do so, why not put an end to that robber of our national chicken-house, monopoly capitalism? Then, may I suggest to them that they bury that worn-out cloak of Liberalism. I see the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who is always interested in dictionary definitions, so that he knows what I mean. I shall quote to him and for the benefit of the house the definition of "cloak" that I have found in Webster's dictionary:

> 1. A loose outer garment. 2. That which conceals; blinds; disguise; mask. To cover with or as with a cloak; hide; conceal.

I hope the hon. member will understand what I refer to when I suggest to him to cast off the cloak of Liberalism.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but it would be interesting to read the whole definition.

Mr. BURTON: That is the whole definition.

Why should a nation whose people showed such williness to cooperate during wartime, and by that cooperation achieved such wonderful success, now find it impossible to carry on with the same spirit of unity and cooperation in times of peace? My answer to that is, first, I am convinced that those unseen hands which control the economic life of this country are determined to force both farmer and labour back to the position in which we were in 1939; and, second—which in my opinion is even more serious—that in this day and age we have a government in office that not only condones the first, but also fails to recognize the fact that if one group in our national family is allowed to take more than its fair share of the national income, others must be getting less than their fair share.

What this nation needs is a plan of action whereby everyone will be given an opportunity to do his or her best in the winning of the peace and at the same time have the assurance that a fair share of the fruits of his or her labours will be received. To do this, the government must give leadership; they must do away with the old method of pressure-group action and replace it with intelligent planning where representatives of farmer, labour, industry, consumer, in fact every group of our national life can meet in round-table conference, where with the help of facts and figures from our departmental experts we shall be able to plan a proper price structure, so that as nearly as possible everyone will receive a fair share of the national income. But, Mr. Speaker, that will not be possible unless the government are willing to let go of the tail of that so-called free enterprise. Nor will it be possible if they do let go, if they still allow that animal to destroy the last goose that lays the golden eggs.

People are demanding intelligent cooperative action. The time for royal commissions of inquiry is past, and so is the time for inquiries by committees. I say that because I have in my possession some copies of the report made by the committee of the House of Commons which was appointed to inquire into farm implement prices. I have here the conclusions and recommendations by the committee as will be found on pages 1294, 1295 and 1296, dated April 5, 6 and 7 of 1937.

Owing to the fact that many of us are beginning to find it very difficult to get copies of this report, I am going to ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house to place on the record, without the necessity of reading them, the thirty-six points made by the committee in their conclusions and recommendations. May I have that permission?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to place the document on the record?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BURTON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that more perhaps than I can say, especially in view of the fact that many of the younger people are beginning to farm and need implements, and in years gone by they did not have an opportunity really to know what the committee recommended at that time. The conclusions and recommendations by the committee in question are:

Conclusions and Recommendations by the Committee

(1) That the prosperity of the farm implement industry is directly dependent on the prosperity of agriculture.

(2) That, during the recent depression, a backlog of requirements estimated at $200,000,000 has accumulated and will have to be satisfied by the implement companies during the next few years, together with normal annual requirements of agriculture, estimated at $51,700,000.

(3) That, as a result, the price level of farm implements during the next few years is of the greatest importance to agriculture.

(4) That the companies engaged in the industry, over the period of their operations as a whole, have made substantial profits on the capital invested in each company.

(5) That, if in particular instances this was was not so, it was due to reasons other than the price level at which farm implements have sold in Canada throughout the same period.

(6) That the economic condition of agriculture is not satisfactory although the present relatively high prices for farm produce will tend to improve it, provided these continue and coincide with reasonably good crops.

(7) That farmers have a right to expect the price level of farm implements to be based on the most efficient and economical manufacturing and distribution cost.

(8) That from 1931 to 1934 inclusive, when all the companies incurred financial losses, such were due primarily to the inability of the farmer to purchase farm implements coupled with his inability to pay for those he had already purchased, and not to the fact that prices of farm implements were lower than justified by manufacturing or distribution costs.

(9) That the unfavourable factors affecting the financial returns of the farm implement companies in the period 1930 to 1935 have been largely eliminated and therefore the companies can look forward to a period of relative prosperity in the industry.

(10) That, particularly, the abnormal bad debt losses resulting from the depression have been largely absorbed by the implement companies and that this item of cost should not reappear in the next few years.

(11) That freight rate increases have contributed to the increase in the price of farm implements.

(12) That the matter of freight rates is of vital importance to the provinces more distant from the manufacturing centres and this is emphasized by the fact that the three prairie provinces absorb at least two-thirds of all farm implements sold in Canada.

(13) That the matter of freight rates on farm implements should receive immediate attention with a view to restoring lower rates thereon.

(14) That the relative increase in the cost of labour has been one of the important elements in the increase of prices occurring between 1913 and 1936.

(15) That the interest of the farm implement industry and of labour engaged therein is best served by a full recognition of the fact that the prosperity of the industry and the increased and more permanent employment of labour depend on the relative and actual prosperity of the farmer and that all will benefit by lower retail prices, thus encouraging the manufacture and sale of farm implements.

(16) That it is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

(17) That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

(18) That in the farm implement industry there is competition in the matter of sales but little effective competition in the matter of prices.

(19) That the provisions of the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff Act affecting the importation of farm implements should be clarified and simplified.

(20) That regulations of the Department of National Revenue, under the above provisions, have resulted in the inequality of treatment of importers of a like class and that the whole matter should be the subject of survey by the minister of that department.

(21) That these regulations have resulted directly and indirectly in the retention in the United States of profits arising out of the operations in Canada of certain United States companies and that these profits have been subjected to income tax in the United States instead of in Canada.

(22) That indirectly this retention of profits in the United States affected the price level of farm implements in Canada as the true profits arising out of their Canadian operations were not properly appreciated by the United States companies.

(23) That recent reductions in tariff and other trade barriers resulted in the Canadian companies lowering their prices on certain farm implements imported from the United States, but the United States companies manufacturing a full general line in the United States and marketing these in Canada, did not lower their prices generally on importations other than those affected by the price reductions of the Canadian companies, indicating the lack of free price competition in the industry.

(24) That the companies should encourage the further standardization of replacement parts in the same implements manufactured by different companies and in addition standardization of the implements themselves.

(25) That in order to assist the farm implement companies to satisfy the requirements of agriculture in the matter of farm implements in the next few years, the committee is of the opinion that the duty on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements should be removed or that the farm implement companies should be granted a drawback of any duties paid on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements.

(26) That the last recommendation is made on the assumption that any saving to the companies resulting therefrom should be passed on to the purchaser of farm implements in the retail price.

(27) That the cost of credit to the farmer purchasing farm implements on time is excessive and the companies should take immediate steps to reduce these credit charges.

(28) That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

(29) That the increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies insofar as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

(30) That over the period of 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry, during that period.

(31) That recently material and labour costs have advanced, but that this advance should only receive the consideration that it deserves in relationship to all other factors entering into the determination of retail prices.

(32) That after due consideration of all the essential factors, the committee is of the opinion that any suggestion of a further increase is not justified at the present time.

(33) That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

(34) That the companies themselves should make every effort to reduce these costs or farmers should be encouraged to organize for the co-operative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

(35) That some agency of government should carefully analyse and correlate the evidence appearing in the records of this committee and in addition should obtain the results, when available, of the inquiry now proceeding in the United States, and in due course present a report in both matters to the Minister of Agriculture, a copy of such reports to be filed with the records of this committee.

(36) That the Bureau of Statistics be requested to collect, summarize and publish the prices paid by farmers for farm implements in each province from year to year.

Two years later the Saskatchewan legislature also appointed a committee to inquire into prices of farm machinery and the distribution thereof. I have in my hand the report issued by that committee and presented to the legislature, and again I have the findings and recommendations of that committee. Once more, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and with the permission of the house I would appreciate having an opportunity to place this on the records of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just what position the house should take with regard to placing lengthy reports on Hansard. If it is carried too far it obviously can result in great abuse. It is contrary to the rules except by general consent. By the rules the hon. member would have to read it. I did not take exception to the first one, but how many are there?

Mr. BURTON: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I thought possibly I could save time by having it put on the record, but in view of the minister's objection I shall be pleased to read to the house the report of that committee, because these combined will show a good deal of the background of the trouble that we are in. Without further loss of time I may say that the Saskatchewan committee recommended in their findings:

1. That retail prices of farm implements, repair parts and cream separators are too high, and,

2. That the industry itself cannot, or will not, suggest a remedy.

The committee, therefore, recommends:

1. That the government of this province invite the cooperation of the dominion government and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta in the carrying out of any plan to procure substantially lower implement prices.

2. That as the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act of the dominion appear to have been violated by the major companies in the industry, consideration should be given to instituting proceedings under the said act.

3. That dominion legislation be urged to remove all tariffs and other trade barriers on farm implements, repair parts and cream separators.

4. That the dominion government be urged to restore the Crows-Nest pass agreement freight rates on farm implements.

5. The adoption, and support by the farmers of this province, of the cooperative trading movement.

6. That adoption of the plan submitted to the committee by representatives of the cooperative associations on February 24, 1939 and the giving to the said associations by the government of this province, of the support and assistance suggested in that plan.

7. The careful and immediate examination and consideration by the government of this province of the further plan submitted by the said representatives on their further appearance on March 6, 1939.

8. In the event that such examination and consideration is favourable, the giving of the support and assistance suggested in such plan.

9. That the credit union plan among farmers be encouraged.

10. That the university of Saskatchewan be requested to test the relative quality and utility of repair parts being offered for sale in this province.

11. That the dominion experimental farms, the university of Saskatchewan, and the farm implement companies be encouraged to continue their educational courses in the management, care, and operation of farm machinery.

12. That the dominion experimental farms and the university of Saskatchewan be encouraged to test the utility of new implements, to suggest improvements, and, where possible, to encourage standardization of implements and repair parts.

The reason why I wanted these two documents put on the record was that we could discuss the matter from that point of view. In the first place, while I shall not go over all the different points included in the recommendation of the two committees, I should like to take out those that have a bearing on the subject and discuss them briefly.

The first is No. 2, found in the recommendation of this house in 1937:

That, during the recent depression, a backlog of requirements estimated at $200 million has accumulated and will have to be satisfied by the implement companies during the next few years together with normal annual requirements of agriculture, estimated at $51,700,000.

It will be remembered that my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had something to say about this, and I wish to enlarge on it a little further. In that connection, I have here another document and I do not know whether the Minister of Finance will object to having it go on the record. If he does I shall have to read it, but I may say it is from a dominion government publication, the Economic Annalist, dated February 19, 1946, wherein is shown how serious is the need for new implements as indicated by the report of a survey made of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, the results of which appear in that publication for the period from 1945 to 1949. I would appreciate having this put on the record along with the backlog we have had in years gone by.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BURTON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The statement is as follows:

Farm Machinery Needs Range up to 166 per Cent of Implements Now on Farms

Just how serious is the need for new implements is indicated by a dominion Department of Agriculture survey in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, results of which appear in the "Economic Annalist" for February, 1946. For the period 1945-1949, the total number of all kinds of machines wanted amounted to 25 per cent of the number now on the farms in Nova Scotia, 22 per cent in New Brunswick and 12 per cent in Ontario. But for certain types of machines or equipment the percentages were much higher. From a list of 40, the following 25 are selected:

Estimated percentage of machines wanted, 1945-1949, to number now on farms:

	Nova Scotia	New Brunswick	Ontario
Tractor	75·6	109·2	37·9
Tractor plough	38·0	26·1	20·2
Disc harrow	22·8	20·4	17·4
Spring tooth harrow	21·3	23·7	....
Field cultivator	28·7	24·0	15·4
Row crop cultivator	32·3	22·7	11·1
Grain drill plain	18·1	25·8	8·3
Grain drill fertilizer	25·6	31·8	20·8
Potato planter	62·3	39·8	13·7
Mower	26·3	29·6	15·2
Hayrake	44·2	29·9	9·4
Loader	35·5	59·6	27·0
Grain binder	23·1	38·5	14·4
Combine	....	....	59·0
Thresher	15·9	20·1	12·7
Silo filler	14·1	166·3	15·4
Potato digger	32·2	26·0	13·1
Potato grader	4·9	36·1	6·3
Manure spreader	47·0	56·1	27·2
Fertilizer spreader	38·2	50·3	30·6
Potato sprayer	45·6	38·6	5·4
Orchard sprayer	31·6	122·2	27·7
Truck	82·8	102·3	20·8
Car	52·2	14·2	8·3
Milking machine	58·4	65·7	14·2

Since that time the farmers have not had an opportunity to get the machinery to catch up with that backlog; consequently they were low before the war started and this shows that they are still lower.

My time is slipping by, but I have a number of other matters with which I wish to deal. I should now like to quote recommendations 17 and 18 of the federal committee, which read as follows:

That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

That in the farm implement industry there is competition in the matter of sales but little effective competition in the matter of prices.

In that connection, I have a paragraph from the minutes of the special committee on farm implement prices, which appears in the same book to which I referred a moment ago. At page 129 we find the following:

To sum up therefore the committee is of the opinion that the reduction on tariffs should find its full effect in a comparative reduction in price levels unless the element of true competition is lacking. If this element is lacking it nullifies to some extent the natural effect of such reduction. As already suggested in this report the companies deny that any concerted action occurred between the companies in the matter of the maintenance of or change in prices to the consumer.

Further on they have this to say:

The relationship of the United States companies with the Canadian industry is so close that in all likelihood the roots of any concerted action to prevent the operation of true competition would be found in the United States as well as in Canada.

May I add that that, in the opinion of many of us, these roots are the tentacles of a giant octupus which must be crushed if we are to have freedom of trade and a fair price structure.

I should like to quote No. 28 of the federal committee's report, which reads as follows:

That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

In that connection, I have a comparison of the selling price of repair parts and completed machines taken from the statement furnished by the auditors to the 1934 royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. I am not going to take up the time of the house to read the entire list, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been interesting to put it on the record. From these figures one can see that if he bought a machine in repair parts he would pay double the price of the machine in some cases, owing to the higher price that is charged for the repair parts.

I now come to recommendation No. 29, which reads as follows:

That the increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies in so far as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

If they were not justified in receiving an increase at that time it is not fair or just to take the increase that we have had in the prices of farm products in recent years and compare it with the increase in manufactured goods, especially farm machinery, when we know that these companies have been charging more than they should have been.

Recommendation No. 30 reads as follows:

That over the period 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry, during that period.

Then No. 32:

That after due consideration of all the essential factors, the committee is of the opinion that any suggestion of a further increase is not justified at the present time.

I wish that that committee had an opportunity to make a report at this time to see if they would not use a little more severe and stronger language.

Recommendation No. 33 reads as follows:

That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

[Mr. Burton.]

I shall have something to say on that a little later. Therefore I shall go on to the next recommendation, which is No. 35:

That some agency of government should carefully analyse and correlate the evidence appearing in the records of this committee and in addition should obtain the results, when available, of the inquiry now proceeding in the United States, and in due course present a report in both matters to the Minister of Agriculture, a copy of such report to be filed with the records of this committee.

What has been done in the face of that recommendation? To-day when a member of this house asked for a copy of this report he did not know where to go to look for it or where to find it. He was told that it was out of print; that it was no longer in circulation; that there might be a copy in the library. But what about the recommendation of the committee that this work should continue? For a moment I should like to review the findings and recommendations of the Saskatchewan legislative committee that sat two years later. When we dealt with prices of farm implements the committee were in full agreement with the recommendations of the federal committee. They also said:

That the industry itself cannot, or will not, suggest a remedy.

The committee therefore recommended:

That the government of this province invite the cooperation of the dominion government and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta in the carrying out of any plan to procure substantially lower implement prices.

The three prairie provinces did take action. After this committee had made its recommendations, every effort was made to bring into existence a cooperative implement association, to get them going in the business, but no sooner were they in a position to commence operations than we had regulations of one sort or another from the federal government which prevented their going ahead at that time. That was the help we got at that time. The cooperative has been set up chiefly to reduce the high cost of distribution which was mentioned in the federal committee's report and which the Saskatchewan legislature committee also reported. They are now in a position where one can expect them to go into business. In fact, this spring is the first time that they have been able to work out an arrangement whereby they can distribute new implements in the west. But now we have the price boosted, which takes away from the farmers practically all the benefits that they would have obtained from the cooperative which has been formed. That is the extent of the cooperation that we get from the dominion government in spite of the recommendations of their own committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. BURTON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was this cooperative to which the hon. member refers a cooperative for importing machinery and distributing or buying it from Canadian producers and distributing it?

Mr. BURTON: The main idea was to be in the distributing end as much as possible, to buy from the machinery companies wholesale and distribute the machinery among their members in the provinces. Their idea is to import when they cannot obtain the machines they require in this country, and with the assistance of the three prairie governments they have bought and put into operation a small manufacturing plant in Winnipeg. Is that an answer to the question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BURTON: The next recommendation I was going to refer to is:

That, as the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act of the dominion appear to have been violated by the major companies in the industry, consideration should be given to instituting proceedings under the said act.

Again I ask, what has ever been done about that? Yet both committees suggested, one more strongly than the other, that there is every possibility that our combines act has been violated. In spite of that, we let them go on and become an octopus which threatens to strangle the very life out of this nation. The next recommendation is:

That dominion legislation be urged to remove all tariffs and other trade barriers on farm implements, repair parts and cream separators.

Here I wish to thank the Minister of Finance, as we did a year ago, for having removed the tariffs from farm implements.

Mr. SENN: What good did it do?

Mr. BURTON: As someone has just asked, however, what good has been done? According to the findings of that committee it should have done a great deal of good, but the trouble is that in all probability that octopus is preventing us from obtaining the benefit of that tariff reduction.

As I said before, at the outbreak of war the farms of the country were undersupplied with machinery and equipment. During the war, as we all realize, the reduced output of farm machinery and equipment was altogether inadequate to meet the increasing demand. By 1944, as was mentioned on a number of occasions, in different places and in different newspapers, the situation had reached what could be described as an alarming stage. Now, with the acute food shortage throughout the world creating a desperate need for every ounce of agricultural products that can be squeezed out of our Canadian farms, a survey has revealed that this matter of machinery and parts is something critical and urgent, which must be looked after at once. In my opinion, any attempt to withhold existing supplies from the market is criminal. I have here a few figures taken from Moody's "1945 Manual of Investments." On page 2449 appear the net inventories of the International Harvester Company for the years 1939 to 1944 inclusive, as follows:

1941	133,114,427
1942	125,944,000
1943	142,151,000
1944	151,378,000

The net inventories of the Canadian subsidiary are to be found at page 2450, as follows:

1944	7,576,000

Then, on page 2605 of the same manual we find the figures concerning the Massey-Harris company which was referred to by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, as follows:

1943	$15,545,777
1944	20,034,125

Incidentally the net profits of the Massey-Harris company, which are shown on page 2604, were as follows:

1943	$1,322,356
1944	1,413,396

That is not too bad for these poor relations who need all this help.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not from farm machinery.

Mr. BURTON: Well, they are the same shareholders. You can just examine that picture. Let me give one more company, the all-Canadian company. The Cockshutt Plow company had net earnings, as shown on page 2673, as follows:

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the actions of the people who refuse to let these implements go into the trade are nothing short of criminal, and I am satisfied that they have deliberately withheld some of these implements from the market. I could bring to this house people who would tell you that within a few days of the price increase a whole carload of implements came to one town, and there were other towns where the same thing happened, though they had been told previously not to expect any implements before June. Still they appeared on the scene shortly after the ceiling was lifted. In my opinion, those who are responsible for demanding an increase in prices of agricultural implements are nothing but a gang of racketeers with a dog-in-the-manger attitude. They belong to the same group of gentry who refused to let their patriotism work until the five per cent limitation clause was removed from war contracts.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it has been a kind of pleasure to listen to these fellows all night. It puts me in mind of some of the auctions I have conducted in the past six years. They remind me of a group of people bidding from time to time to see who will get a certain machine or a certain animal. The only reason they are bidding here is that they are bidding for power. We are not so much concerned about being in power; we are concerned with the necessities of the producers, and the right of people throughout the world to live. I represent the farmers of Springfield, but do not forget that I also represent the towns in that riding. I can quite appreciate the actions of those who are bidding for power in telling the farmer we should raise prices. Certainly I am in agreement that we should raise prices, but we should be careful to see that those who are going to have to pay these prices are able to do so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Do you believe in parity?

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is a change of attitude since you left the farm.

Mr. SINNOTT: We are travelling in a vicious circle—

Mr. JOHNSTON: It certainly is.

Mr. SINNOTT: This is a vicious circle we are travelling in, and hon. members on the other side of the house are making that circle as much worse as possible.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member is not helping it any.

Mr. SINNOTT: I am a farmer from western Canada, and I have come here and have had to listen to these sob-stories from day to day. We have been listening to sob-stories from western Canada for about a month, and I am not at all convinced by them. They are only bait for the farmers in hon. members' districts. I am considering the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand)?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not the way you used to talk.

Mr. SINNOTT: Wait until I have finished, and then you will have a chance to say something.

Mr. MARSHALL: He said his part.

Mr. SINNOTT: And our hon. friend, Mr. Burton—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SINNOTT: The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), rather, said as reported at page 106 of Hansard on March 19—

Mr. JOHNSTON: You cannot quote that.

Mr. SINNOTT: I quote:

> If I may be so bold, I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SINNOTT: We have one man in the house to call "order" and I will sit down when he says so.

Mr. JOHNSTON: He is not listening to you.

Mr. SINNOTT:

> If I may be so bold, I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the speech he has just made. Regardless of whether a person agrees with him, I think he is always interesting to listen to. While his speech always sounds good when you are sitting here, when you read it next morning in Hansard you begin to wonder just what it was all about. Then, when you get out into the country and hear different versions of it you begin to wonder which speech the minister gave.

I think the hon. member has surely got past the school stage. When he comes here and listens to a speech of the Minister of Agriculture, agrees with it when he is in the house, and agrees with the policy the minister has followed all through the war—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SINNOTT: —and agrees that the farmers of to-day were never so happy in their lives—

Mr. BURTON: I did not object to the hon. member's being out of order, and quoting from a speech which should not have been quoted. But I still did not expect that when we permitted him to proceed he would vary from the facts.

Mr. SINNOTT: I have endeavoured to state the facts, facts which my own people give me.

Mr. WRIGHT: Whom do you call your own people?

An hon. MEMBER: Who are they?

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Do not mind them.

Mr. SINNOTT: Oh, they do not bother me in the least. We have listened to the hon. member for Humboldt when he has been digging into the records of certain machinery companies. While he has quoted certain figures, let me say that the Massey-Harris company has never shown more than a five per cent dividend on farm machinery since it has been in existence.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is not so bad.

An hon. MEMBER: That is more than some of the farmers can say.

Mr. SINNOTT: I would ask the hon. member if he has not received considerably more than five per cent on his investment in the last five years.

Mr. BURTON: Do you want me to tell you how much I lost during the ten years before that?

Mr. SINNOTT: Then, again, the hon. member said that this house reminded him of a black and white pussycat. Well, the people of Canada have had to hold that black and white pussy for a long time, and they intend to keep it. They are afraid of the black one.

As I said before, I represent the farmers in my constituency, and have farmed for a considerable length of time. I believe the hon. members for Souris and Humboldt have had the same experience I have had, and I want to be fair not only to the farmers in my constituency but to the people as a whole. While my hon. friend the member for Souris went back as far as 1919—and I am not going to go back that far—I shall be content with going back to 1939, and take the dollar value in that year, as to what the farmer could buy. In 1940, prices of farm machinery advanced 2·5 per cent; manufactured goods, 8·30 per cent; wages in agricultural industry, 5·1 per cent; farm products, 4·4 per cent. In 1941, agricultural implements increased 5·8 per cent over the 1929 figures; manufactured goods increased 17·9 per cent; wages in agricultural industry increased 17·6 per cent, and farm products increased 10·7 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That does not correspond with the statement by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. SINNOTT: In 1942, agricultural implements increased from the dollar value of 1939 15·4 percent; fully manufactured goods, 22 per cent; wages in agricultural industry, 36·7 per cent. In 1944, agricultural machinery increased 12·4 per cent over the 1939 value; manufactured goods, 24·3 per cent; wages in agricultural machinery, 51·9 per cent, and farm products, 49 per cent.

In 1944, farm implements increased from the dollar value of 1939 15·4 per cent higher; manufactured goods, 24·3 per cent; wages in agricultural industry, 52·5 per cent; and farm products, 60 per cent over the 1939 figure. In 1945, farm implements increased from the dollar value of 1939 only 8·9 per cent over the 1939 figure owing to the reduced tax. Those figures pretty well speak for themselves. The farmers had a pretty fair share of the income.

When it comes down to the talk about prices, and the fellows here are fighting for the strikers to get higher wages, it is all fine and dandy with me. But you people who represent farmers, which you pretend to do, will have to know that the same farmers will have to pay more for it.

Then, going back to the farm figures—and I do not like to disagree with the hon. member for Souris, because he has known me for a long time—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): When you were a Tory.

Mr. SINNOTT: We were on the executive of the union of municipalities, together. However, we do disagree to-night. The Liberals are in power; fine and dandy.

An hon. MEMBER: Not so good.

Mr. SINNOTT: The Conservatives were in power in 1933, and I will give something of what happened in those days.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Tell them, not us.

Mr. SINNOTT: I am going to compare values in 1929 with those of 1933 on farm products. We heard the hon. member for Souris say to-night that some days ago there were only twenty-five cattle on the market. But the price of cattle to-day is around $12 a hundred for top steers. Let us look back to 1933, when the Conservatives were in power, to see how much they could expect for their cattle in those days. Butcher steers were selling in 1929 at $10.16 per hundredweight, and the price in 1933 was $4.47. Hogs were selling in 1929 for $12.27 per hundredweight, and the average price in 1933 was $5.54. I had five or six of them hanging up in my granary and I could not even sell them.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend knows that owing to Mr. Bennett's high tariff butter went down in 1931 to a rock-bottom price of sixteen cents a pound.

Mr. SINNOTT: As the hon. member for Temiscouata knows, in many cases they were using butter for axle grease. We wish we had some on our table to-day. The 1929 price of butter was 39·3 cents a pound, and the average price in 1933 was 21 cents a pound. Eggs in 1929 sold for 48 cents a dozen, with the 1933 price being 28 cents a dozen.

We are now getting into the matter which has taken up a considerable time in this house. Wheat No. 1 northern, basis Fort William, sold at $1.24 a bushel in 1929, while in 1933 it sold at the magnificent price of 54·3 cents a bushel. In 1929 oats sold for 58·8 cents a bushel; in 1933, 26·4 cents a bushel. Barley sold in 1929 for 71·5 cents a bushel and in 1933, 32·2 cents a bushel. The price of flax in 1929 was $2.02 a bushel; in 1933, 90 cents a bushel.

The reason for criticism from the other side is the reason I gave, a bid for power. The only reason I came here was to try to do something for Canada as a whole. I am not interested in power. I contend that the people of Canada were never better off financially in their lives. They would be satisfied to have these prices stabilized over a period of years. I was instrumental in bringing about a stabilized price for wheat, and if we can stabilize prices of everything else we shall be happy for many years to come.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat at the moment because the last words I heard from my husband as I boarded the train at Broadview were not for me but for the minister. I cannot tell him the message I got for him. There were other messages that I got for the minister which I also cannot tell him.

Everyone realizes at this time that there have been increases in the cost of the materials and labour that go into the making of farm implements. A person would have to be very young indeed if he did not recognize this fact, but it is interesting to note that in the breakdown of the cost of a binder, according to the report issued in 1936, out of the price paid by the farmer at Regina of $281 there was only $22.62, or eight per cent, paid out in wages. Out of that $281 paid by the farmer, the cost of materials was only $71.06, or 25 per cent. The combined cost of labour and material came to 33 per cent of the total cost to the farmer.

The other two-thirds of the cost were made up of other items such as overhead, experimental work, freight, commission and profit. What we should be asking now is whether there have been savings made in these other items that would help to compensate or offset the rise in the cost of materials and labour. I submit that there have been considerable savings to the companies on these various items.

Since the table was compiled in 1936, the price of binders has increased steadily. The same report tells us that the price jumped from $281 in 1936 to $324.75 in 1939, or an increase of 15 per cent. In addition to this increase, a new device was adopted for cutting losses on credit sales. This cut out the advantage to the buyer who paid cash and increased the cash price in order to make up for losses through time-payment sales. In other words, the cash customer carried the loss instead of the company.

If this was unfair in 1939, it is doubly unfair now in view of the fact that the pressure of demand at the present time results in cash sales in practically every case. The man who comes to have his name put on the waiting list for a binder, a tractor, a combine or a one-way now comes with cash in his hand, but he is still paying for the risk of the credit purchaser who has disappeared from the field. There has been no announcement that this charge has been removed from the books of the company when adding up costs

In the matter of credit collections, selling and collection expenses are given some attention in the report. The committee found:

> There was a very decided duplication in selling and collection expense, all of which is reflected in the retail price. Each company has its own dealer organization, its own salesmen, its own collection agents, and its own service men which must be taken care of in the price paid by the farmers. The companies are inclined to agree with the above but insist that the industry does not see any way to effect a saving in these items of cost of distribution.

On motion of Mrs. Strum the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 7, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM-NEWFOUNDLAND—DEFENCE AGREEMENT WITH NEWFOUNDLAND

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is unfortunately prevented from being in the house at the moment, I should like to read a statement which had been prepared for him in connection with a defence agreement with Newfoundland.

I wish to table copies of an agreement recently completed between Canada, the United Kingdom and Newfoundland concerning the disposition and post-war use of certain defence installations in Newfoundland.

Before the recent war the defence of Newfoundland was generally deemed the exclusive responsibility of the United Kingdom, but it maintained there no defence installations nor military establishments. At the outbreak of war the United Kingdom had neither trained personnel nor equipment to spare for Newfoundland's defence, and overtures were made to Canada shortly thereafter by the Newfoundland government for equipment and assistance in training a local establishment. At the time, however, little assistance could be rendered because of shortages of equipment here in Canada.

Following the military collapse of western Europe in 1940, a battalion of Canadian troops was promptly dispatched with the full approval of the Newfoundland and the United Kingdom governments to guard the Newfoundland airport at Gander, and this initial force was greatly enlarged within the following year by additional army, air and naval establishments. Arrangements were also made with Newfoundland for the co-ordination of Newfoundland home defence forces and Canadian army forces under an over-all Canadian command. Following the lease of bases in Newfoundland in 1941 to the United States for ninety-nine years, very considerable United States forces were also established in Newfoundland.

Shortly after the despatch of the first Canadian troops to Newfoundland, by agreement with Newfoundland Canada assumed responsibility for the operation and control of Gander, Gleneagles and Botwood air bases for the duration of the war, and later constructed Goose Bay air base in Labrador and Torbay air base near St. John's. By agreement with the United Kingdom and Newfoundland governments, Canada also contructed on British admiralty account a naval base in St. John's. These various bases were available to the United States and United Kingdom throughout the war and were of inestimable importance in the conduct of the war. Without them the task of maintaining supplies to Britain, and of building up there a striking force, would have been immensely more difficult and victory in the desperate battle of the Atlantic would have been much longer delayed.

With the cessation of hostilities the continuance of a large armed establishment in Newfoundland and the maintenance there of most defence installations established during the war have fortunately become unnecessary. The armed services have accordingly been withdrawing their personnel as rapidly as possible consistent with the care of equipment and properties. By now virtually all personnel have been withdrawn except from Goose Bay air base to which Canada has been granted a lease for defence purposes for ninety-nine years.

The strategic importance of Newfoundland for the defence of Canada and North America generally and for the maintenance of communications across the North Atlantic has, however, been greatly enhanced by developments in aerial warfare and aerial navigation. The Newfoundland, United Kingdom and Canadian governments are therefore in agreement that some continuing arrangements for the defence of Newfoundland are essential. The agreement which I have tabled is designed to meet this need, as well as to provide for the disposition of Newfoundland air bases which have been under Canadian control during the war. It provides that control of the air bases at Gander, Gleneagles and Botwood are to be handed back to Newfoundland as of March 31, in accordance with the original understanding between the two governments. In the event of an outbreak of hostilities involving Newfoundland and Canada, Canada may however take over control of Gander airport for the duration of hostilities. Canada will continue to operate Torbay airport as a civil airport for the Newfoundland-Canada service and may use it for military purposes as required. Article 5, which provides for continued cooperation in defence, reads in part: "the governments of Canada and Newfoundland, and as necessary the government of the United Kingdom, will consult with one another from time to time as occasion may require with a view to coordinating defence requirements in Newfoundland." The same article also provides that Canadian and United Kingdom military aircraft may fly over Newfoundland and may use any airport in Newfoundland under Canadian or Newfoundland control.

Since Newfoundland is shortly to hold a constitutional convention with a view to making recommendations as to its future form of government, the present Commission of government in Newfoundland felt that it would be undesirable to make long-term commitments, a view with which the Canadian government concurred. The present agreement, therefore, is for three years certain, but is to remain in force thereafter subject to alteration by agreement or to termination on twelve months' notice by any of the three governments.

At this time when we are winding up our wartime activities in Newfoundland, I think it is fitting to express on behalf of the government our deep appreciation of the splendid cooperation which we have received from the Newfoundland government throughout the war and of the hospitality which the people of Newfoundland have constantly extended to the many Canadian service personnel stationed from time to time in their midst. One advantage of this partnership in the war effort is that mutual understanding between Canada and Newfoundland has undoubtedly been strengthened. Thousands of Canadians have come to know Newfoundlanders personally and to appreciate Newfoundland's problems. And Canada will not forget that a considerable number of her sons lie in Newfoundland graves. Personal ties are bound to strengthen the bonds of friendship through the years.

It is perhaps fitting also that I should take the occasion to pay tribute to Newfoundland's direct war effort. Over 5,200 men raised by voluntary enlistment were sent overseas to the United Kingdom forces, and over 1,700 were enlisted for home defence. I am pleased to say also that over 1,200 male residents of Newfoundland served in the various Canadian armed services, and about 525 women in the various Canadian women's services. In addition, Newfoundland advanced to the United Kingdom in interest free loans, about twelve and a half million dollars. The house, I feel sure, will agree that Newfoundland, though a relatively small country, made a really substantial contribution to the achievement of victory.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a supplementary question, in view of the importance of the agreement between Canada and Newfoundland? Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs send this agreement to the external affairs committee for study? This house should be apprised of the contents of the agreement; therefore it would be of service to have it studied by the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not exactly remember the terms of the reference to the committee on external affairs, but I would imagine they would be sufficiently broad to make available to the committee all papers tabled during this session which have to do with external affairs.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should think so.

PAN-AMERICAN DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMME OF COLLABORATION AMONG AMERICAN COUNTRIES

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs the Minister of Justice has given us a statement with respect to defence establishments in Newfoundland. I am sure the house has listened with interest and, so far as we understand it I should think with approval, to the statement, but it raises another question I had intended to direct to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Justice has indicated that he would answer it and perhaps I may be permitted to ask it at this time. It has to do with the question of collaboration in Pan-American defence.

Incidentally, if I may make an observation here, the statement with respect to defence establishments in Newfoundland raises the question of the political relationship of that island to Canada. The house would welcome a statement either by the Prime Minister or by some other member of the government as to whether there has been any discussion of a closer relationship between that island and Canada.

At the moment I wish to ask two related questions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, both arising out of a dispatch which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Evening Journal respecting a bill which President Truman has sent to both houses of congress. The tenor of the bill is indicated by the first paragraph, which reads as follows:

> President Truman asked congress to-day to authorize a programme of military collaboration between this country and other American republics. Canada was included by the president in his plan.

The questions are: Did any conversations take place between the governments of Canada and the United States on the matter of Pan-American defence prior to the president's message to congress, and has any action been agreed to by the government of Canada which in any way prescribes our present diplomatic freedom in dealing with the various South American republics?

I should judge that the president's message to congress is in the nature of a request for legislation which would enable the United States government to provide technical and other assistance to the governments of other American states under arrangements for defence cooperation which might be concluded. As such, it is primarily domestic legislation, the passage of which must precede the conclusion of such arrangements.

The answers to the questions put by the leader of the opposition are in the negative. The terms of this legislation were not discussed with the Canadian government and no conversations have taken place between the two governments on Pan-American defence. Moreover, I can state definitely that no action has been agreed to by the Canadian government which in any way prescribes our present diplomatic freedom in dealing with the various other American republics.

BUILDING MATERIALS

ASSURANCE OF FAIR SHARE TO SMALL TOWNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, notice of which I sent to him. Will the minister state what steps will be taken to assure small towns of a fair share of building materials?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Small towns are getting their share of building materials under equitable distribution methods or procedures administered by the wartime prices and trade board in the same manner as that in which all other supplies are distributed in Canada. Quotas are based on purchases during base period which is the year 1941. All distribution, whether to large or small towns, is on that basis.

HOUSING

NOTICE OF EVICTION ON MAY 31 FROM LONDON BLOCK, SASKATOON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Saskatoon City put the following questions to the Minister of Public Works, but I was out of the house at the time. I should now like to reply. The questions were:

Is it the intention of the minister to evict, on May 31 some sixteen families from the London block in Saskatoon? If so, is the government prepared to take responsibility for finding shelter for these families at that time?

In 1945 the Department of Public Works took over two floors of that building for the use of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Some months ago, because of the expansion of their activities, they requested more space in the same building. We gave notice of eviction some days ago to take effect on May 31. Since that notice was sent out I have received written complaints, addressed to me personally, from every tenant; therefore I have asked the officers of the department to reconsider the situation and try to find space elsewhere.

KURT MEYER

INCARCERATION IN CANADIAN PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should perhaps preface my question by saying that I have not been able to give notice of it to the Minister of National Defence. There have been many rumours, semi-official press reports, and reports in the press which seemed almost official, in regard to the eventual disposition of General Kurt Meyer, who was brought to Canada last week. I wonder if the Minister of National Defence would consider making an official statement to the house in behalf of his department and the government so that we may know and the public may be informed as to exactly what is going on in connection with this man. I raise the question to-day because some veterans in my own constituency have been somewhat agitated over it, and they are anxious that someone in the house should raise the question in order that the government may have an opportunity of making a statement as soon as possible.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I can answer the question now. The person in question, Brigade Fuehrer Kurt Meyer, is confined in Dorchester penitentiary, as the house is aware from statements that have appeared in the press. The Department of National Defence no longer has anything to do with the matter of his custody, which is now the concern of the Department of Justice. He is incarcerated in Dorchester penitentiary under the same conditions that apply to any other criminal; and whether he stays there or is moved to another penitentiary is a matter which I assume would be dealt with by the Department of Justice in exactly the same way as they would deal with the care and custody of any other prisoner.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it true that the government will build him a mansion?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

The house resumed from Monday, May 6, consideration in committee of bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the 6th day of March, 1946—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee last sat it was considering section 4.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, this morning I did part of the work that should have been done by the Minister of Finance, the leader of the opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. group and the leader of the Social Credit group. For some time we have been discussing trade without having definite data about it. My information comes in the first place from Whitaker, a well known English publication, and in the second place from the official report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended March 31, 1945. It has been said that the United Kingdom is our best customer. That is incorrect and untrue. According to Whitaker, 1944, the total trade of the United Kingdom and Canada in millions of dollars for 1938 was as follows:

(In millions of dollars)

	Exports	Imports	Total
United Kingdom .	2,090	3,813	5,903
Canada	889	678	1,567

This means that the exports of the United Kingdom were two and a quarter times those of Canada, while the imports of the United Kingdom were five and two-thirds times those of Canada. The total trade of the United Kingdom, as I have said, was $5,903 million, while that of Canada was $1,567 million. It would be interesting to know the trade of Canada with the United Kingdom. I do not have that for the year 1939, but I have it for 1938, and there would be only a slight difference in 1939. In 1938 our paid exports to the United Kingdom amounted to $349 million, while our paid imports from the United Kingdom were $104 million. That is a total of $453 million, which was less than one-third of the total Canadian trade for that year. Those figures come from Whitaker. Now I turn to the official report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In 1944 the total Canadian trade, as compared with that of 1939, was as follows:

(In millions of dollars)

1939	924	751	1,675

These figures indicate a surplus difference of $2,515 million as between the two years in regard to exports, and a surplus difference of $1,001 million in regard to imports, or a total surplus difference in 1944, as compared with 1939, of $3,516 million. In other words the surplus difference in our total trade in 1944 was more than twice that of 1939; and it is important to note also that during the war our total trade was nearly as great as the pre-war trade of the United Kingdom. The total trade of the United Kingdom in 1938 was $5,903 million, while our total trade in 1944 was $5,191 million. What is important? The important thing is to compare the 1944 Canadian-United Kingdom trade with that of 1939, and to show the result in millions of dollars. The following table will give that information:

1944 Canadian United Kingdom trade compared with 1939 (in $ million)

	Unpaid exports	Paid imports	Total
1944 ...	1,235	110	1,345
1939 ...	328 (normal)	114	442
	plus 907	minus 4	plus 903

Total Canadian "Exports" to United Kingdom (in $ million)

1942	741
1943	1,032
	$3,994

I hold in my hand the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which is available to every hon. member. This report states that during those five years only once—in 1941—did we export more to the United Kingdom than we did to the United States. Besides that, our exports to the United States in each year were greater than those to Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was that 1939 to 1944?

Mr. POULIOT: In the years 1939, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944. In the same years our imports from the United States were considerably larger than those from the United Kingdom. These are the figures showing our imports from those two countries:

Year	Imports from United States	Imports from United Kingdom
1941	1,004,498	219,419
1942	1,304,680	161,113

There is a very large margin in connection with imports, much larger than applies to exports, because our exports to the United States were paid while those to the United Kingdom were financed. That is altogether different. I say they were unpaid from 1942 to the present time, because the loans sometimes were gifts, or amounted to that. It is unbelievable that a small nation, with one-fourth the population of the United Kingdom, and constituting only a small fraction of the British empire, including the United Kingdom and all the other British possessions, should finance the whole trade of the sterling area.

I have the utmost sympathy for the minister, because others made commitments upon which he had to act. This matter is very deep, and is of considerable importance. However, on March 18, 1942, the minister said that the whole of the sterling area's deficit had been financed by Ottawa out of its own resources. Hon. members who were not in the house at the time may not have read this, but it is of tremendous importance. On that occasion the minister said, in the first instance in connection with financing by Canada of the sterling area's net defiicit of $1,770 million:

> This deficit has been financed in three ways. In increasing order of importance they are: gold payments from the United Kingdom to Canada; redemption of purchase, mainly in advance of maturity of Canadian security obligations held in the United Kingdom; and the accumulation of sterling balances held by the foreign exchange control board on deposit in London.

He said that the whole of the sterling area deficit had been financed by Ottawa, out of its own resources. Then he continued:

> Gold payments by the United Kingdom have amounted to $250 million over this whole period. As the house is aware, the last payment was received in December, 1940, and since that time the whole of the sterling area deficit has been financed by Canada out of its own resources.

International accounts, naturally.

> Over the period as a whole gold payments have covered less than 15 per cent of the sterling area deficit in Canada.
> Not only have gold payments by the United Kingdom been kept to relatively modest proportions, but every ounce of gold we obtained from the United Kingdom was promptly converted into United States funds and used—

For Canada? No.

—to pay for United States goods needed to complete war orders for the United Kingdom.

We did not keep the money that we received. We passed it over to the United States, to credit the account of Great Britain. Then he continued:

> Exact statistics are not available, but there can be no doubt whatever that the amounts we have paid out in United States exchange in connection with British war orders in Canada are very greatly in excess of the amount of hard currency settlement received from the United Kingdom.

That is what was said on that occasion by the Minister of Finance. It was not said by any leader of an opposition group or by any private member who had been accused by the ultra-imperialist press of being isolationist; it was the Minister of Finance himself who declared that the gold payments by the United Kingdom had covered less than fifteen per cent of the sterling area deficit in Canada and commented that they had been kept to relatively modest proportions. The minister said that since December, 1940, we have taken the whole burden on our shoulders. The minister's words were:

> Until December, 1940, the United Kingdom shared with us the burden of providing the necessary hard currency. Since then we have taken the whole burden on our own shoulders. The burden has not been a light one . . .

I admit it. I am sorry for the minister. I know he is honest and I know he is in a very difficult position. If he were not honest I should be speaking to him in a very different manner. As Minister of Finance he must take care of the commitments that have been made by others, and I shall come to that in a moment. I have another reason for respecting the minister. It is because he is a hard worker, and I think everyone will agree with that statement.

The date, December, 1940, is of the utmost importance. It was in that month, first, that Canada received the last gold payment from the United States; second, that the United Kingdom discontinued to share with us the burden of providing the necessary hard currency, and, third, that we took the whole burden on our shoulders. This having been said, the minister then went on to say that the burden had not been a light one. The burden of financing the whole sterling area could not have been a light one. He made other statements which are all included in a book I wrote but never had published. I had intended to have it published in Toronto, and I thought it would be a good idea to read an advance copy to my colleagues. By the way, I had the honour of having it described a long time ago as the great Canadian book of the year.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will be a good book. When it comes out we shall all want copies.

Mr. POULIOT: There will be a word of praise in it for the support I received from my hon. friend in having the public accounts improved. I thank the minister for meeting the request made by the hon. member, the hon. member for Broadview, and myself. Once again we were doing the work of the leader of the opposition of the time, of the leader of the Social Credit group and of the leader of the C.C.F. group. We were trying to reform the public accounts, and after we had made our representations the minister agreed to do it. I quote again from the minister's remarks:

Our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part a direct consequence of our assistance to Great Britain.

Then a most unusual thing occurred. The Minister of Finance went so far as to express deep concern about the result of the financial policies he had been sponsoring. He said:

I warned the house in introducing the budget last April—

1940.

—that the need for United States exchange conservation had not passed; and lest any one should think that the Hyde Park agreement has solved our United States dollar exchange problem, I should like to say that our official reserves of gold and United States dollars fell by $142,000,000, United States dollars, in 1941. Moreover, although the outlook is far from clear, it must be recognized that, failing remedial action, we appear to be faced with another sizable loss of reserves this year. Our United States dollar position is, therefore, still a major cause of concern. I stress this point because our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part a direct consequence of our assistance to Great Britain.

At that point the minister made this remark:

When we are proposing to open a new chapter in our financial relations, the record regarding the past should be made quite clear.

I agree with that. The new chapter in our financial relations with Great Britain was not opened on March 18, 1942, when the minister made that statement on the sterling area financing scheme; it dated back to fifteen months before; it dated back to December, 1940, when Great Britain made its last gold payment and when we took on our own shoulders the whole burden of financing the sterling area deficit.

Mr. ILSLEY: We could not have got any more gold from Great Britain.

Mr. POULIOT: I know, but that was the last time we received gold from Great Britain. Instead of keeping it here for our trade we sent it to the United States for the benefit of Great Britain, as the minister said on March 18, 1942. The Minister of Finance did not try to escape any responsibility, but he did not make the record regarding the past clear enough.

On November 7, 1940, the late Arthur B. Purvis was appointed by the United Kingdom to the new war purchasing commission. A dispatch to that effect appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 8, 1939, but I shall not read it. This board replaced the previous board. The defence purchasing board was set up under the Minister of Finance in July, 1939, a short time before Mr. Dunning's resignation and departure for London. It was under his successor in that capacity, Colonel Ralston, when it was replaced by the war supply board with "extraordinary powers, under the War Measures Act, to mobilize and regulate industry, production and other resources in Canada for a concentrated war effort" and when Mr. Purvis was appointed to it. The news appeared in the press more than eight months before the Prime Minister introduced the Mobilization Act in June, 1940.

On November 15, 1940, Colonel Ralston left for London. The minister of national defence had died in June. At the time the minister of national defence was also acting minister of finance. I was the only member of parliament to protest against this. He was more a minister of international finance than a minister of national defence, because the brass hats ruled the department when he was there.

On June 11, Colonel Ralston recited to the house the details of what he said was his most useful evening with the late Arthur B. Purvis. Colonel Ralston said:

Mr. Purvis was good enough to give me, in the way he can give it quickly, concisely and comprehensively the fullest statement possible with regard to production in United States and with regard to the needs of Britain with regard to munitions and supplies. I do not know when I spent an evening which was more useful in connection with the work that I was doing, and it gave me an idea of how we could integrate our production with that of the United States and our needs with the needs of Britain.

I emphasize those last words:

It gave me an idea of how we could integrate our production with that of the United States and our needs with the needs of Britain.

Colonel Ralston added that he kept that information for his colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Neither of them said any more to the house about Purvis' statement. "The record regarding the past,"

read in the house by the Minister of Finance March 18, 1942, makes it clear beyond doubt that the Purvis "statement" to Colonel Ralston was the suggestion to finance the whole of the sterling area deficit by Ottawa out of its own resources—and we may draw the conclusion that it was because it was so promptly accepted by Colonel Ralston that Mr. Ilsley expressed so much concern about it, and went so far as to state that——our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part—

Note the words:

—are in part a direct consequence of our financial assistance to Great Britain.

He specified that "we have taken the whole burden on our own shoulders" from December 1940, the time when Colonel Ralston spent his most useful evening with Mr. Purvis.

I sympathize with the Minister of Finance because he was responsible for the whole product of that nefarious triumvirate of Purvis, Dunning and Ralston, and I was the only member of parliament to protest against it. And now one of Ralston's chums is acting as political adviser to the leader of the opposition and one of his former law partners is head of the National Liberal Association. It reminds me of an old serial, "The Clutching Hand" which appeared on the screen a long time ago, in which at the end of every episode a hand seemed to reach out to clutch everyone in the audience—just like the octopus of international finance.

I understand that the main argument of the Minister of Finance in favour of this loan is that it is a preparation for the coming international trade conference to be held this summer. Is not that so?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I would say that that was not the main argument in favour of the loan. The lending plans of the United States and Canada and the Bretton Woods arrangements, and the trade arrangements perhaps, are all part of a great plan to extend trade throughout the world. But I would not say that the loan to Britain can mainly be defended on the ground that it is a preparation for the international trade conference.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question, but first I will refer to a statement made in the debate yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary West, who said at page 1239 of Hansard:

Why all this fuss now about some United States citizens buying Canadian Pacific shares? Is it suggested that we should put restrictions on them, that they must be held in Canada?

Just prior to that, I had been asking questions regarding the sale of Canadian Pacific securities in the United States, and I referred to them simply because I had the report at hand; for I feel exactly the same way about all Canadian securities, not merely Canadian Pacific. I think it is definitely detrimental to the welfare of this country to sell Canadian securities outside of Canada, because it means the expansion of our external debt. Surely nobody would argue that the expansion of our external debt would be a good thing for this country. The hon. member for Calgary West said that in the olden days Canadian Pacific shares were sold abroad. That is true, but the situation then was entirely different. We had to sell Canadian securities abroad then to get the capital required to develop this country because we had not the machines we have to-day. But to-day no one would suggest that Canada is not able to finance the development of its own resources without borrowing externally.

If anybody has any doubt on that point, recall what happened in the war. We financed our war effort to the extent of five billion dollars without borrowing one cent externally, and if we could finance our war effort to the extent of five billion dollars without selling Canadian securities abroad, would anybody suggest that it is necessary now to obtain external capital in order to bring about every expansion in this country that is desirable? The undoubted answer is that it is detrimental to the welfare of this country to sell Canadian securities abroad, whether Canadian Pacific or any other securities, public or private.

I wish to refer to a question put by the hon. member for Springfield at page 1241 of Hansard. He asked the Minister of Finance:

Is the financing done through the Bank of Canada or by borrowing from the private banks?

The Minister of Finance answered:

The amounts are not segregated. They are just like any other money which the dominion obtains by taxation or by borrowing from the public or by borrowing from the chartered banks and perhaps to some extent from the Bank of Canada, but that latter is very limited.

Then the member for Rosetown-Biggar asked:

Will it necessitate borrowing the savings deposits standing to the credit of the people of Canada in order to pay for the goods that flow to England so that the people who make them here can be paid for them in Canadian currency?

And the Minister of Finance replied: yes. But over the page he had stated that the money was obtained by the dominion by taxation or by borrowing from the public or by borrowing from the chartered banks and perhaps to some extent the Bank of Canada. So evidently when he gave that answer to the member for Rosetown-Biggar he did not mean to say that we were going to finance entirely by public issues.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. QUELCH: But there is a danger that some people may think that the minister's answer means that the people's deposits will be borrowed by borrowing them from the banks. The minister will agree that it does not mean that, because when you borrow the people's savings you cannot borrow them from the banks. When you borrow from the banks you have an expansion of credit. The banks cannot lend their deposits.

I take it that we shall finance this loan to Britain largely by taxation and secondly by another victory loan, by whatever name it may be called, and there may be a certain amount of borrowing from the chartered banks. I take it that on borrowings from the people the rate will again be three per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not likely. The average rate is less than three per cent at present.

Mr. QUELCH: Not from the people. I know that we are borrowing from the chartered banks for as low a rate as ·78 per cent, less than one per cent, and when you average that rate with three per cent you get of course a lower rate than three per cent. But we are not borrowing from the people at a lower rate than three per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Long-term bonds are at a premium. It would be possible to borrow long-term money at considerably less than three per cent.

Mr. QUELCH: On long-term public issues?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; and the shorter the term the lower the rate.

Mr. QUELCH: From the people of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister mean from the insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: What I mean is this. It would be possible now to borrow from the public of Canada, on long term, bonds at substantially less than three per cent. The price which victory bonds have reached shows that.

Mr. QUELCH: I am glad to hear that, because it helps me to bring out the point I wish to make. I hope that the next victory loan will be sold at one and a half or two per cent. Under the agreement with Britain we are proposing to make a loan without any interest until the year 1951. I understand Britain will not pay interest until 1951 and after that at the rate of two per cent. It is possible that we may float a victory loan at two per cent, so that our only loss would be on the first five years up to 1951. Now I have received a number of letters from people in my constituency saying: "Why is it that we can lend to anybody, apparently, except Canadians, money at two per cent, or even money for a period of five years without interest at all, when we have to charge our own people a rate of three or four per cent?"

I appreciate the reason given by the minister. He said this loan to England was based on ability to pay. We had to reduce the rate of interest to a level that would make it possible for England to repay the loan. I have nothing to criticize in that but if, in order to make certain goods available to people externally, we have to reduce the rate of interest so that those people can repay the loan we make, should not exactly the same principle apply to Canadians in this country? I would say it should apply to civilians, but certainly it should apply to the soldiers who fought the war. Yet what do we find at the present time? In respect of the Veterans Land Act we charge the soldiers three and a half per cent interest. Many applications by soldiers who wish to take advantage of the Veterans Land Act are being turned down on the ground that these veterans will not be able to pay off their loans at the rate of three and a half per cent interest. But if we can say to the British people, "You cannot meet your obligation at three or four per cent and so we will make an agreement with you whereby you can meet it", why can we not do the same thing with our soldiers? If they cannot repay their loan in ten or twenty years at a rate of three and a half per cent, why do we not change the agreement and finance it in such a way that the soldiers will be able to repay their loans? Instead of saying, "You cannot go under the Veterans Land Act because you will be unable to meet the financial conditions," let us adjust the conditions so as to enable the soldiers to meet them. Instead of imposing the present conditions, let us meet the soldiers and discuss the matter with them in order to find out at what rate of interest it would be possible for these boys to buy land and pay off their loans. We might give them the same kind of agreement that we are making with Britain. We might say to them, "We will not charge you any interest until 1951, so that you may have a chance to get on your feet, and from then on we will charge you two and a half per cent and later perhaps three per cent."

There is an old saying that charity begins at home. I cannot see why we are more willing to give a decent agreement to people outside Canada than to our own people.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me answer that at once. If the rate of interest charged on loans to Canadian citizens, whether they be returned soldiers or others, were made at a loss to the Canadian treasury, it would be an additional subsidy or veterans benefit as the case might be. The taxpayers would be assuming just that much greater burden for the benefit of that class of the community who might receive their money at less than market rates of interest.

Mr. QUELCH: Or an expansion of the internal debt.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But you cannot have an indefinite expansion of internal debt.

Mr. QUELCH: Then I would ask this question—

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me finish, please. I have to connect the two thoughts together. In the case of the loan to Great Britain, the extent to which the taxpayer contributes there is a contribution to the people of the dominion of Canada to give them markets, and if you did the same thing over again domestically you would be giving the people of Canada a double benefit. It just depends on how high you want to have your taxes go, or how high you want the internal debt to go. The hon. gentleman perhaps holds the theory that this loan to Great Britain is not designed primarily for the benefit of the Canadian people.

Mr. QUELCH: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I have dealt with that position. I believe the hon. gentleman took that position, and so did one other member of his group, the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). But that position was not shared by the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) or by myself, and I do not think it is shared by the membership of the house as a whole. The object of this loan is to get Great Britain into the position where she can be a dependable, a steady and an expanding market for Canadian goods, and in that way confer benefits upon the constituents of the hon. gentleman, whether they be civilians or veterans. And that is certainly no argument for extending our gratuity policy or our rees-tablishment credit policy. There may be other reasons for extending it, but that is not a reason for doing so. It would be conferring a double benefit instead of a single benefit upon the constituents of the hon. gentleman and the citizens of Canada as a whole.

Before I sit down I wish to deal with one minor point raised by the hon. gentleman, though perhaps I should not take the time of the committee in discussing it. He deplored the fact that our securities are sold abroad, on the ground that that increases the external indebtedness of Canada or of the people of Canada. That is so. It increases the liability of Canadians to other countries. But as against that liability there is a corresponding asset, that asset being the currency of the foreign country, the American currency which we hold; and to the extent that our securities are sold in volume our reserves of American currency are built up. But the loss in the transaction is not an absolute loss; that is a loss to the extent of the additional liabilities incurred by Canadians. The loss is merely of interest, as I explained to the member for Calgary West yesterday. Dividends and interest on securities that are sold abroad are all a charge upon the productive capacity of the Dominion of Canada, while the currency we get for these cannot be employed in such a way as to earn the equivalent amount of interest. That is the loss, and the only loss, as far as loans are concerned.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But industry operates and pays wages here.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: It is a charge on production.

Mr. ILSLEY: The interest we pay abroad?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: We never would have got started if it had not been for external sources of money at that time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Undoubtedly that is true of the past, whatever may be the situation in the future. I wish to deal briefly with two points while I have the floor. The origin of our mutual aid policy is not as stated by the hon. member for Temiscouata. It did not have its origin in any conversations between Colonel Ralston and Mr. Purvis. It was a policy worked out by the government of Canada for which I was primarily responsible and in which responsibility my colleagues shared. The other point made by my hon. friend was that my statement regarding the United Kingdom being our best customer is incorrect. It is borne out by the figures of normal years. My hon. friend took war years, which reflect an abnormal situation. But if one goes back to the years before the war one will find that the exports to the United Kingdom nearly every year were higher than the exports to the United States. For instance in 1939 the figures were slightly in favour of the United States, $336 millions as against $331 millions to the United Kingdom. In 1938 the exports to the United Kingdom were higher, $334 millions as against $261 millions to the United States. In 1937 they were $384 millions to the United Kingdom as against $381 millions to the United States. In 1936 they were $356 millions to the United Kingdom as against $348 millions to the United States. In 1933—I am not skipping anything here; these are the only ones given—they were $211 millions to the United Kingdom as against $168 millions to the United States.

There are years when our exports to the United States are greater than our exports to the United Kingdom; but there are many more years when our exports to the United Kingdom are greater than to the United States. Our exports of agricultural surpluses and other surpluses of natural products are greater to the United Kingdom by a very large margin than are our exports to the United States.

Mr. CASE: What about the trade balances?

Mr. ILSLEY: The balance, of course, is different in the two cases. There is a surplus of exports to Great Britain over imports from Great Britain, and a surplus of imports from the United States over exports to the United States.

Mr. CASE: More frequently we have a favourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom than with the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister said that when we sell securities to the United States we obtain United States currency in exchange. That is true. If that United States exchange were used for the purpose of liquidating debt to the United States I would have no objection. I do not think the minister can argue that that is true. If it is, it does not really alter the situation except to the extent that the rate of interest we pay on the securities we sell may be higher than the rate of interest we pay to the United States at present. If the rate of interest is less, then there is a slight advantage. If the rate of interest is higher, then we are losing. I think it would be true to say that the rate of interest would be higher on Canadian Pacific sales than we are paying at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not gain currently, but the only point I was trying to make was that from the way the hon. gentleman was presenting it I thought he really did have a doubt in his own mind about it—there was one in my mind for a time. That is why I suspected there was one in his. It is thought that you are simply incurring that much additional liability when you sell securities abroad without having anything to show for it, but you have a corresponding asset for every dollar's worth.

Mr. QUELCH: I did not think that for one minute. Before the war we used to hear certain suggestions, and we are going to hear them again. We have heard it from some people to our right. They say that we shall have to bring about favourable conditions in this country to encourage foreign capital. Hon. members have heard that statement time and time again. They have seen it in the Financial Post; they have seen it in practically every financial paper in this country. We do not need a dollar of foreign capital. I quite agree that in the early days we did need it. At that time we did not have the capital to develop our own resources. We had to sell securities abroad to get capital to develop the country, but we do not need it any more. We are fully able to finance the optimum development of the resources of Canada without any foreign capital. If anybody has any doubt about it, all he has to do is to look at what we did during the war. We had a $5 billion war effort without borrowing a dollar abroad.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be an advantage in getting money abroad. If venture capital is not available in your own country and you can get somebody outside of the country to take the risk which you cannot get the people in the country to take, it should be an advantage.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister means to say we should go after some suckers.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not mean that at all. Everybody who ventures his capital is not a sucker. Not everybody who takes a big risk is a sucker, by any means. Venture capital is valuable stuff for a country and sometimes it is pretty hard to find. If you can find people outside who will bring it forth, you are doing quite a lot for the country.

Mr. QUELCH: I recall discussing a bill last year regarding the sale of gold mining stock to the United States. Apparently there was a lot of wildcatting going on. In fact some promoters in this country were looking for suckers in the United States to buy shares in gold mines which were apparently just holes in the ground. If we have any venture capital coming into this country from abroad we shall pay a good price for it. Any time venture capital comes in from abroad it is in the expectancy of making a high profit.

I want to turn to the other argument, namely, that it pays us to make this loan to Britain in order to keep her in good standing so that she will be able to buy our exports in the future. I will admit that indirectly it is to the advantage of Canada to keep Great Britain in a position to help play her part among the great nations of the world. Let me point out that exactly the same argument applies to our own people. If it is to our advantage to make these goods available to England so that she can make a worth-while contribution in the future and take our goods, surely it must be of just as great an advantage to bring about the proper reestablishment of our own soldiers, so that they can become worth-while citizens and contribute to the welfare of this country. Therefore the same argument applies to our own people as to Great Britain in that regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: The difficulty is that we have a great surplus for export. You could never hope to get that market for these exports among your own people.

Mr. QUELCH: While we may have a surplus of certain commodities, we have a great scarcity of others in the country.

Mr. CASE: No.

Mr. QUELCH: We have scarcity of a great many things. We are even being asked to eat less bread, to cut down by two slices on every loaf to leave enough to go round. People are being asked to conserve in many lines. There would be a strong demand in this country for goods if they were available. I am sure that every hon. member in this house is finding it difficult to buy certain commodities at the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true of some commodities because the export demands are great at the present time; but in normal times it is not within any foreseeable future that we shall have a population that will consume all the wheat we produce here, or nickel, or bacon, or newsprint, or copper, or asbestos that we produce here. There is a long list of commodities produced which would have to be cruelly curtailed if we were to rely upon the home market in Canada. It would mean a dislocation of our whole economy and a lower standard of living, because we would be trying to turn our people into different kinds of producers under more expensive and uneconomic conditions and circumstances. Therefore it is of vital and primary interest to pursue a policy that will not make it necessary for the greatest importing nation in the world, a great importer from Canada, to pursue a restrictive policy and a policy of economic nationalism and self-sufficiency to the complete confusion and dislocation of our whole economy. That is the reason that it is of vital importance here.

Mr. QUELCH: I agree with the minister that an export market is very important, and the minister could very easily reassure me and other hon. members if he would guarantee that in the future, whilst we now have a great interest in the export market, we are nevertheless going to look upon it as our major obligation to see that the home market is developed to its full extent. Will the minister guarantee that in the future all the people of Canada will be able to buy all the commodities that we produce, export the surpluses and bring back other goods in exchange? If the minister could do that we would be satisfied. The minister knows very well that that has not been the policy of Canada in the past.

During the depression years, from 1935 to 1939, we had on the average a favourable balance of trade of $219 millions a year, in spite of the fact that one million people were on relief, in spite of the fact that there would have been a strong demand for the imports that could have been brought back to this country in return for the $219 millions of foreign exchange. The minister may say that we had a foreign debt, but at the same time we were only maintaining production at about fifty per cent of our capacity. We could have expanded that production to the full extent, met our foreign obligations and increased the standard of living of our people by several hundred million dollars. Now if the minister is going to guarantee that in future that will not be the policy of this country, that in future we are going to maintain and develop the resources of this country and see that the people get the amount of consumer goods they desire before any are shipped abroad to build up foreign investments—if the minister will give that assurance to the committee we shall be much easier in our minds.

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole purpose of the policy is to maintain as high a standard of living for the people as possible.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think most of this discussion, Mr. Chairman, is purely academic. I do not believe the minister is in a position to give an undertaking that in future the resources of this country will be developed and used to the greatest possible extent for the benefit of the Canadian people; but I believe the people of this country as a whole are in a position to put a government in power that will do that very thing.

My view of the loan is that it helps a world expansionist programme, and for that reason I believe it should be supported. We are still in an international crisis. If we were to adopt an isolationist policy and try to make ourselves self-sufficient within this country, in a way I believe we could assure ourselves a basic standard of living; but I do not think that for a long time we could assure ourselves of as high a standard of living as we can if we are prepared now to accept a lower standard in order to build up the economy of other countries which are in a less fortunate position. As I said in my few remarks the other evening, from my point of view the whole purpose of this loan is to help Great Britain, which is in such a strategic position at the present time if only she is strong enough to assert that position, to build up her economy; and I am satisfied that in future it will help us in this country also to attain a higher standard of living. I see no reason in the world why we should prolong this debate unles some of us are to take the position that we intend to oppose this loan to the very limit. Well, the quickest way to do that is to let the bill come to a division. Those who are against it can oppose it; those who are in favour of it can support it, and then let it go on its merits. We are not serving any useful purpose by all this debate, and in saying this I am not reflecting at all upon the ability of the hon. member for Temiscouata to deal very capably with these matters. But I say we are not serving any useful purpose by continuing this discussion beyond the stage it has now reached.

Mr. POULIOT: My purpose is not at all to delay the adoption of the measure but to inform the house and even inform the minister. The Minister of Finance has said the United Kingdom is our best customer. I hold in my hand a booklet written by Sir Norman Angell and distributed by the United Kingdom information service some years ago. The question is asked, "From whom does the empire buy?" In reply it is stated that in 1938 or 1938-39 Canada bought 17·5 per cent from the United Kingdom and 82·5 per cent from the rest of the world. The next question asked is, "To whom does the empire sell?" The answer is that in 1938 or 1938-39 Canada sold 39·1 per cent to the United Kingdom and 60·9 per cent to the rest of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: To different countries.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, to different countries; but now the United Kingdom is described as the only market for Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes; by the minister; and I will tell the hon. member for Acadia why I say that. The hon. gentleman spoke only of our trade with the United Kingdom, and the minister spoke of economic nationalism. I know the idea in the mind of the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. QUELCH: If the hon. gentleman does not mind my interrupting, the only reason I referred to Great Britain is that this loan is to Great Britain. If the loan had been to some other country I would have mentioned that country.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly. I would do the same. I am not complaining about the hon. member for Acadia; at present I am in agreement with him, but the hon. member referred to our trade with the United Kingdom and the minister shouted "economic nationalism," just as though there were only one road for our goods to travel, that is, the Atlantic ocean east to London. I do not blame the hon. gentleman. I blame the minister, and I blame him for the confusion he displayed in presenting the measure. It took me thirteen or fifteen hours to try to undertsand something in his speech of April 11. Everything was mixed up. Was it deliberate or not? I don't know. I do not like to speak like that, but I was offended when the minister spoke of economic nationalism. We believe Canada is a great country; and it is not a great country only in the mouth of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. It is a great country in fact. The answers the minister gave me the other day were answers to play with. It was not serious. For instance, I asked about the loan to the Netherlands East Indies, amounting to $15,000,000, which was later promised to be increased to $50,000,000. Was it promised to Malcolm MacDonald in order to give him an opportunity to be appointed governor general of that part of the world? We are lending $50,000,000 to a country with which we will have no trade whatever. Last year I denounced Malcolm MacDonald at the same time that I denounced Lord Halifax and I give Mr. Attlee credit for having removed both of them from America.

Mr. ILSLEY: He is not governor general of the Netherlands East Indies.

Mr. POULIOT: He is governor general of Malaya or somewhere out there, and the Sarawak white district is under his jurisdiction now. He is to be far away, and I am glad of it; it is a good thing for Canada that he is far away. By the way, with whom did the minister negotiate? He said he negotiated the loan to the Netherlands East Indies with a representative of the government of that part of the world. He was fortunate, because when the discussion took place there was no government there. With whom was he negotiating?

There was no government; there was civil war in that country. Did he negotiate with one side or the other? Who was it, and for whom was he acting?

Mr. ILSLEY: The man who came here was Doctor Crena de Iongh, representing the government of the Netherlands East Indies and also the bank of the Netherlands East Indies.

Mr. POULIOT: He represented the bank, so now we are in international finance. Then to whom was the promise made of $50,000,000 in addition?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was made to the government and the bank of the Netherlands East Indies.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the guarantee for Canada for that loan and that promise?

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman mean by a guarantee?

Mr. POULIOT: What can we expect in return for that loan and that promise?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an undertaking to repay, just as there is from the other countries to which we have lent money; and there is every expectation that it will be repaid. There is an established government in the Netherlands East Indies at the present time, with great assets and resources, too.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, great resources, which have never been enjoyed by Canada. We had no trade whatever with the Netherlands East Indies. They produce rubber, and now that we are manufacturing synthetic rubber in such quantities in Canada we do not need anything from them.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No, I have something to say about that. I do not want to oppose the measure, but I want to be an eye-opener to my colleagues whom I respect, and to the minister himself. I have never been bulldozed by anybody in connection with what I have to say, because I am sincere. And I believe I am right, until it is proven that I am wrong. I do not agree simply because Mr. So-and-So says something. I will agree when something is sensible, fair, and in accordance with the facts.

There was a civil war in the Netherlands East Indies, but the minister says he did not lend money to those people to buy ammunition and arms. But what he did gave more opportunity to the people to fight each other, although the minister says he did not buy their equipment.

There are some further points I would bring to the attention of the committee. Yesterday the minister said:

> During the next few years the United Kingdom is not going to be able to get enough foreign exchange from her exports to other countries, her earnings from shipping, insurance and financial services rendered to other countries, the earnings on her outstanding foreign investments, tourist expenditures in the United Kingdom, etc., to enable her, without borrowing, to pay for the goods and services which she will require from other countries, the interest on her foreign indebtedness and other current account liabilities to other countries.

Well, she is no worse off than we are, because, as the minister said at page 3238 of Hansard for 1945, we are not a creditor country. But now we are trying to pump up a flat tire, which is the pound sterling. It is just a flat tire, with a puncture in it, and we are going to pump it up. That is what is being done now.

We are not a creditor nation; we do not have some of the things Great Britain still has. But we finance her, just the same. Then, the minister continued with these words:

> We expect that over the next two or three years Canada will have surpluses of substantial size in her current account balance of payments.

The current accounts of Canada are different from the international accounts of Great Britain. It is not the same thing at all. What the minister is now trying to finance are the international accounts, the external trade, the world trade in the sterling area. I wonder if we are in the sterling area.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we are not.

Mr. POULIOT: We are not in the sterling area. But we are financing it, and we maintained it during the war. Our standard of living depends upon our trade, not only with the United Kingdom, but with all nations of the world.

Speaking about financing the United Kingdom last year, the minister said that they would go to countries other than the United States and Canada. I wonder if this will be the last loan by Canada to Great Britain. Will it be? Can the minister say that this will be the last loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not expected that there will be any more.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister's answer is prudent, when he says, "It is not expected". But, as a matter of emergency, we shall have it; we may have another big one next year. And those members who say "Carried, carried" will be the first to swallow it.

Then the minister said, with reference to the British preference:

The removal of trade restrictions to which the national advisory committee's report referred, did not relate to tariffs.

Then at page 767, when summarizing the Bretton Woods agreement, he referred to tariff reductions. That is included with reductions in quotas, and so on. If every hon. member will read what appears at page 1226 of Hansard he will have an idea of the magnitude of what has been done by Canada for the United Kingdom. The minister said:

We could not expect repayment of both the book debt and the new loan within a reasonable period—

When he was referring to the cancellation of the debt of $425 million.

Then he added:

Attempting to make the United Kingdom pay off the $425 million debt on top of the $1,250 million loan, we were convinced, would have placed an altogether too heavy burden on Britain's balance of payments.

It was not the debt that was on top of the loan; it was the loan that was on top of the debt, and there was no reason for it.

Then he referred to interest-free loans. The interest-free loan of $700 million, which has been reduced by the sale of securities, was an absurd thing, because Canada was lending the money. We had to pay the interest on it while, on the other hand, those who have the British loan securities were getting the interest and cutting the coupons. All that time Canada was receiving nothing. It is one of the worst transactions one could possibly think of.

Mr. ILSLEY: All the Canadian dollars Great Britain received she turned right back to Canada, all through the war, including the interest she received on her securities. This balance was made up by mutual aid. And had the interest-free loan borne interest it would have meant just that much more mutual aid.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, always "more". Then, the minister gives some information about simple claims, and some claims difficult to determine. There is something about a transaction with the government of India, and reference to the fact that that government owed $48 million to Canada. Instead of giving them that amount, it was assumed by the United Kingdom, and formed part of the settlement. Our credit was transferred, and became a credit of the United Kingdom. As the minister was in such a generous mood, surely he could have done for India at least part of what he did for the Netherlands East Indies, because India is part of the empire, and there is no reason why there should be discrimination against her.

Mr. ILSLEY: We gave nothing to the Netherlands East Indies.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but we lent a lot.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we lent.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not spoken about France. I shall wait until we discuss export credits before I mention the loan to Mr. Leon Blum—or "Bloom", if you wish. The country, to my mind, is immaterial. I do not consider the United Kingdom, France, or any other country, except Canada. I know that within a short time this sort of legislation will cause a break in the British empire. Canadians will become so indignant at the taxes they have to pay that they will blame the financial policies of the government. This will break our ties to a greater extent than the Boston tea party destroyed the ties between the United States and Great Britain.

Reference has been made to communism. Some people are afraid of communism and they contend that this loan offers a means of defence of our religions against communism. Poverty is the mother of communism. Our people are suffering under heavy burdens of taxation. When they think of the expenditures that have been made they are unhappy and miserable. When that sort of thing continues the people turn to different leaders. As far as I am concerned, there is no piece of propaganda that is so strong for communism as this particular legislation. In his remarks on April 11, as reported on page 763 of Hansard, the minister said:

This agreement is the keystone in the financial measures and arrangements made by this country for international trade and reconstruction.

The minister was mistaken. It will prove a stumbling block in the path of future international trade. Let me explain that to the committee. We have been building up a sterling area which has proved a challenge to all trading nations which do not belong to it. The Bretton Woods conference was held in an effort to improve trading conditions throughout the world without any exception. Here is what the minister said about the Bretton Woods conference, as reported on page 767 of Hansard:

There are, broadly speaking, two alternative types of policy open to Britain at the present time. The first and much the more desirable policy from our point of view—

That is the government's.

—is the type reflected in the Bretton Woods agreements and the proposals for expansion of world trade and employment put forward by the United States government. This type of trade and exchange policy involves a minimum of restrictions on trade, tariff reductions,—

Those are the two words I mentioned a moment ago.

—the elimination of discriminatory import quotas and exchange practices, and the freedom of each country to use any currency that it has obtained through trade with another country in carrying on trade with any third country.

I hope hon. members will read this sentence when they are reading the minister's speech.

This type of policy would make possible not only a high level of trade but freedom in the direction of trade.

That is Bretton Woods, according to the minister.

The alternative type of policy, on the other hand, which is open to the United Kingdom is one of bilaterial arrangements —

It could be multilateral.

—in which Britain would purchase goods on condition that the selling country would take British goods in exchange, one involving discrimination in both importing and exporting and substantial restrictions on the use of currency received by exporting countries. Under this type of policy if Britain were forced to follow it, she would endeavour to make the most of the bargaining power which her huge import markets give her in order to improve the terms on which she trades and to force her exports into the markets of other countries.

Then going to page 1227 of Hansard we find that yesterday the minister said this:

I was thinking particularly, as I indicated, of the countries of the sterling area and of western Europe, and I was trying to show that unless Britain were assisted and encouraged to follow a liberal trade and currency policy she would be forced into restrictionist and discriminatory policies which would have an extremely bad effect on Canada, both directly and indirectly—the latter because of the effect which Britain's course of action would have on many other countries which constitute good markets for Canadian goods.

As yet the Bretton Woods agreement is not in effect. This loan is in addition to that agreement. It is being put through before we know the results of Bretton Woods. The United Kingdom is simply building a trade dugout or shelter into which she can retire if Bretton Woods does not work. It is simply a stumbling block being placed in front of our future international and trade relations.

Probably what I have said is premature. Hon. members may not be disposed to believe in it although they have been good enough to listen to me. I felt it was my duty to inform them. I have no peculiar interest in the matter. I spent many days during the Easter holidays working on this matter in order that I might be able to inform my colleagues. Whether it has been worth it, I do not know. But as long as I have done it my conscience is clear. I have warned hon. members and I shall not be responsible for anything that may happen. Had I not said what I said I would have felt guilty; my conscience would not have been clear and I would have been ashamed to look my colleagues in the eye.

I have another explanation to offer. Yesterday a brilliant journalist asked me why I had not risen to force a vote the other night when some other hon. members rose in their places. My answer is obvious. No hon. member of parliament has tried to praise the new generation of members of parliament more than I have. I am proud to be their colleague and I have great admiration for them. I know that Ottawa is the most tedious place in the world. I know that unless a man works hard it is impossible for him to stay here very long. I said to myself that it was not fair to force a vote at a time when some hon. members had not been notified about the matter; I felt that they should be given time to consider it. On April 16 when the clauses were going through so fast, I rose when we reached the fourth clause for two purposes: first, to give the minister an opportunity to answer my questions and, second, to give my colleagues a chance to think over the matter.

I worked hard yesterday and I placed some information on Hansard, some of which I received from the minister. Some of that is good; some of it is bad and some of it does not mean anything, but it is there and it is up to hon. members to express themselves upon it. I have informed everybody to the best of my ability. I admit that the information I have given is far from complete, but it is supplementary to that which has been given by the Minister of Finance, and it may be clearer. I thank my colleagues and the minister for their patience in listening to me.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—U.K. indebtedness under commonwealth air training plan extinguished.

Mr. DORION: Does the effect of this section constitute a loan or a gift?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the cancellation of the amount of an expenditure which has already been made years ago, and for which the United Kingdom owes us a book debt.

Mr. DORION: I should like to ask why the amount is not mentioned in the section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because it is mentioned in the agreement and the agreement is mentioned in the section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. DORION: On division.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister give us any information on the present state of the United States loan to Britain? Has he any information beyond what has appeared in the press?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not know how it is getting along or what the prospects are, but I am hopeful.

Mr. BRACKEN: The opinion seems to be that the legislation will pass congress and the loan be made. But in the event that it should not pass and the loan not be made, can the minister tell us briefly what the effect would be with respect to our loan?

Mr. ILSLEY: By section 8 our act will not come into force until there is a proclamation, and that may apply to any portion of the act. The result of the defeat of the loan in the United States would in all probability be that we would not proclaim certain sections of this act. Probably it would be well for me to read again the letter that I wrote to the chancellor of the exchequer covering the situation that might arise. It is as follows:

Dear Chancellor of the Exchequer,

On the occasion of the signature of the financial agreement between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada, I should like to place on record our understanding regarding the entry into force and implementation of this agreement in relation to the action by the United States congress on the financial agreement between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of the United States, signed at Washington on December, 1945.

The agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada has been drawn up in the expectation that the Anglo-American agreement will be approved by congress and will enter into force some time during the current year. If, however, congress does not approve the Anglo-American agreement, our understanding is that, in the terms of article 8 of our agreement, a major change would have occurred in the international financial situation, which would materially alter prospective benefits and obligations flowing from our agreement, and that consequently it would be necessary forthwith to consider what changes in the provisions of our agreement the two governments should agree to make, subject to such legislative approval as may be necessary. In these circumstances, it is also our understanding that articles 5, 6 and 7 of our agreement will not be implemented until it is known whether the United States congress has approved the Anglo-American agreement. I agree, however, that these articles are to be implemented immediately congress approves that agreement.

I should appreciate it if you would confirm that the above understanding is in accordance with that of your government.

Yours very truly,

J. L. Ilsley.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Article 5 is the article relating to exchange and import arrangements; article 6 is our agreement to extend the 1942 loan for another five years interest-free; and article 7 is our cancellation of the commonwealth air training plan. These are not going to be brought into force until we know what happens to the loan in the United States.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will this Canadian loan be made regardless of whether or not the United States loan is made?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not certain. It is open to us to draw back on that under article 8. Naturally, purchases are being financed at the present time and some money will be advanced after this legislation goes through, even before we know whether the United States loan will go through or not. But it would be open to us to draw back if the loan in the United States did not go through because the defeat of the loan in the United States would be a major change in the international financial situation which would materially alter prospective benefits and obligations flowing from our agreement. Consequently it would be necessary to consider forthwith what changes in the provisions of our agreement the two governments should agree to make subject to such legislative approval as may be necessary. Legally I do not know just what the position would be should the United Kingdom not agree to make these changes, but I know that the relations between the two governments are such that the legal feature would be immaterial. The United Kingdom government understand, and so state in their confirmation of our understanding in this letter, that we have done all this on the expectation that the loan would go through in the United States. If it does not, there is a major change. The main benefits we can expect to get from this loan are dependent upon the loan going through in the United States, thus putting the United Kingdom in a position to be an expanding and reliable market, something that is of great advantage to the United States as it is to us.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister has explained what the law permits the government to do in the event that the United States loan is not made. My question was simply this, and I do not think the minister is trying to evade it: If the United States loan to Britain is not made, will our loan still be made?

Mr. ILSLEY: We would immediately have to get in touch with the United Kingdom and consider the situation. I cannot say whether the full amount of the loan in that event would be made or not. Quite a lot of money would already have been advanced by that time anyway, and whether we would saw it off then or go the full way is something that would have to be taken up at that time. I cannot commit the government on that.

Mr. BRACKEN: The position, then, is this. Once this measure passes these two houses, the government will be enabled to make a loan of $1,250,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: And will be bound to make it if the United States loan goes through.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the event of the failure of the other loan, you will not be bound to make any part of our loan save what has been already advanced.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know exactly what the legal position is as between us and the United Kingdom because the undertaking is one that must be carefully considered when the situation arises. But, whatever the legal position is, I would say that is substantially the situation, that we would then be free—perhaps not legally as between ourselves and the United Kingdom but we would be free within the spirit of the understanding—to say, "No; a smaller loan is all that we should enter into under the new circumstances".

Mr. BRACKEN: From what the minister says, I gather that the government does not now know what its own attitude would be in that event?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Something would depend on the time. There are things one cannot foresee.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am only trying to understand what the position is. I am not trying to embarrass the minister. I should like to know what powers are given the government and what the government intends to do with those powers when it has them. My understanding is that if the United States loan is made, this loan will be made in full?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: And these other concessions will also be made?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the United States loan fails, then you look at the whole situation again?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: And it is just possible that no further advances might be made—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is possible.

Mr. BRACKEN: —but likely that some adjustment, some loans within the maximum now provided. would be made available?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, with regard to the last few words, we shall have to consider carefully what we should do. Here is this flow of exports going out of the country and the government has to act with great responsibility about shutting that off.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am trying to learn what you will do; that is all. You are a little hesitant about being definite.

Mr. ILSLEY: So I should be.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not a fact that a major change in the international situation might involve something larger than the refusal of congress to approve the United States loan? If that loan to the United Kingdom from the United States does not materialize, is it not quite possible that Great Britain might withdraw from the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: In that event a major change occurs in world trade and commercial arrangements, which would necessitate a reconsideration of the whole of our business with the United Kingdom.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should think that would be the thing, because that certainly would necessitate a review of everything we are talking about to-day. If the United States congress refuses to approve the loan and the Bretton Woods agreement falls down, as far as Britain is concerned, it puts the whole world into a chaotic situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is understandable, and all I want to know is what the government's policy is with respect to the loan to Great Britain in the event of the United States loan failing. I think I understand the situation, although the minister himself is not very specific.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot be.

Mr. BRACKEN: He will look at the whole picture again and determine what policy is best in the interests of Canada, of trade, and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why should the failure of Britain to accept the Bretton Woods agreement influence us in the advancing of this loan? Britain will need the loan in case she withdraws from Bretton Woods just as much as if she does not. Why should her refusal to accept the Bretton Woods agreement, if it is contingent upon the United States ratifying their loan, have an influence on us and necessitate our reconsidering this loan? That needs to be cleared up.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman puts too much stress upon the withdrawal from the Bretton Woods agreement as a factor in the transaction. There will be more serious consequences than those arising from a withdrawal from the Bretton Woods agreement. The United Kingdom would in all probability not be able to reestablish herself as a multilateral trading nation if the United States loan did not go through. This is not simply a question of lending some money to a customer who will turn round and spend that money on your goods. The United States loan and this loan will make it possible for the United Kingdom to get into the way of trading, and this loan by itself cannot accomplish that end. The United States loan is necessary also.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This loan would help.

Mr. ILSLEY: It cannot do the job; it is inadequate. It will take the two of them; and if the other part, the larger part, falls out, then Canada has to consider just what it is in her interests to do. You have then a nation driven into a corner, so to speak, so that it may have to adopt the most restrictive practices; and whether this country would be justified under those circumstances in continuing to advance money to it, having in mind its obligations to its own people, is a question that will have to be considered very carefully at the time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Britain would be just as likely to be able to repay us this loan if she did not accept Bretton Woods as if she did, would she not? In other words, Britain is just as likely to be able to produce the goods that Canada needs if Britain does not accept Bretton Woods, or if Britain withdraws from Bretton Woods, as she would be if she continued under Bretton Woods. Canada is looking at the ability of Great Britain to repay the loan and if Canada's willingness to advance the loan is contingent upon Great Britain's ability to repay the loan, then it requires some explanation to make it clear to the people why we should not go on with the loan, whether the United States ratifies its loan or does not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ability to repay is not the only consideration. It is the ability of Great Britain to buy in volume, and steadily, in Canada and pay for what she buys in a currency that is convertible. That is the important thing, and a course of action wihch will probably lead other nations to follow is something that must be considered. I shall not go over all the arguments here. If Great Britain takes a certain course the probability is that the nations of western Europe will follow Great Britain or do the same as Great Britain, and then you have a very serious situation confronting Canada.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister, earlier in the discussion, emphasized that in all probability we would not altogether accept goods from Britain in payment of our credits, that we would exchange some of our credits for United States dollars, owing to the fact that, under Bretton Woods, sterling would be convertible into United States dollars. If Bretton Woods fails, sterling will not be convertible. In that event we would not be able to convert our credits into United States dollars and we would have to be willing to accept payment in British goods, which in my opinion would be a good thing in the long run.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish to get into an argument on that, but that would upset your plans with somebody else. If you equalize your imports and exports as between Canada and the United Kingdom, are you going to do the same with the United States?

Mr. QUELCH: Why should not the United States be willing to buy a sufficient quantity of goods from Canada to balance trade? There is no reason why we could not have a tripartite agreement. We could point out to the United States that we have a surplus credit in England of so many million dollars and we could trade that with the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few moments ago the minister made some reference to what would happen if the United States loan were not carried. I gathered from what he said that it would affect our supplying of goods to Great Britain under our loan. I have in mind a group of businessmen who are supplying $50 million worth of goods of one kind or another to Great Britain. They will have to make contracts with a lot of other business men in Canada to supply the various parts of the order. From what the minister said I would gather that if the United States loan were defeated the order might be cancelled and that under this loan we would be responsible for a portion of what had already been contracted for in getting the order together for shipment to Great Britain on the understanding that the loan would be ratified. Suppose these business men have spent $10 million on the $50 million order. Am I right in my understanding that if the United States loan is defeated we shall have to cancel the remainder of the order?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is pretty hard to say what would be done in particular situations, or what the effect would be on particular situations. I should not really go farther than reiterate the language which was used in the letter which I wrote to the chancellor of the exchequer, and which he confirmed. I have read it once or twice. I said that this would be a major change; the defeat of the United States loan would be a major change and "it would be necessary forthwith to consider what changes in the provisions of our agreement the two governments should agree to make, subject to such legislative approval as may be necessary". It is difficult to say very much more than that.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am strongly of opinion that any word which might emanate from anyone whomsoever in Canada who has any responsibility behind him that would in any way interfere with our neighbour's affairs and her relations with the United Kingdom and give them an excuse to point to any persons in Canada who were doubtful of this particular loan would not only have a damaging effect on this very necessary world movement in financial circles but give the isolationists in the United States another opportunity—

Mr. DORION: It is always the same.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): A bird by any other name is just as good-looking—to defeat the purposes of this loan. If such a thing happened we must consider where Canada will end up. At the present time we are all right, but this is of such serious moment to us and to the present financial structure that we should do nothing to jeopardize it. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation said that it is of importance to the world trade position that we occupy, and that is right. We should not pry into our neighbour's affairs at this critical time, because, while we are doing so, our own will be sadly neglected. Why? The minister knows, as do all other hon. members, that if anything happens to the present financial arrangements, within half a decade we shall see a split between the two blocs of currency, namely, the dollar bloc and the sterling bloc. I say to my fellow Canadians that if that happens and any stumbling block is put in the way of multilateral trade that will emanate from this financial arrangement which is attracting the attention of the whole commercial world, Canada, in spite of her wealth of natural resources, will find herself in the last position so far as her economy is concerned. Why is that so? It is very simple. We all know the spirit of the British people. They will go hungry, and more hungry; they will tighten their belts and get along within the confines of their own financial orbit. They will suffer and suffer more but they will not quit producing. There is more production in Britain per man to-day than in Canada or the United States. As they gradually fill their own shelves which are bereft of most things now and tighten their belts, what will they get? They have 400 million people in Europe waiting for them to increase production. What else have they in the sterling bloc? They have South Africa, New Zealand, Australia and British India. Every time a British pound sterling goes into those areas it buys a pound and quarter's worth of effort in Australia, New Zealand and in the other depreciated currency countries. Where will our trade be while that trade is going on? Britain is recovering. Millions of pounds sterling are lying idle in London and we cannot use them in this country because they are not exchangeable.

Therefore, in the final analyses, if we tamper with this loan, or if anyone helps to defeat this big loan that is now before the congress of the United States we are going to split the world's two currencies; and when we get through spending the extra money which we have in our pockets now, and when the shelves of our country are filled we shall find ourselves, in spite of our God-given resources, the last on the trading list.

I hesitate to take up much of the time of the committee on this subject, and I hesitated to the last minute for fear that any of my words might be used by any of our neighbours to defeat the purpose of the United States loan. May I close with these words: Let nothing emanate from any Canadian of responsibility which will in any way make our fellow Britons go more hungry, or which will in any way destroy what good might come from this financial arrangement which the nations that think as we do feel is necessary at this time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have no desire to delay proceedings, but I think perhaps a word or two more might be said by way of encouragement. From things I have heard and read I have gathered the impression that a good number of people are quite pessimistic with respect to this loan in case the United States should fail to ratify the loan it is proposing to make. In addition to what was said by the minister a moment ago, I think it must be said that if we advance this loan to Great Britain the pounds which we receive from Britain can be converted into the monetary unit of any one of the nations belonging to the sterling bloc. Therefore it seems to me that our chances of receiving repayment for this loan do not depend entirely upon the productive capacity of Great Britain but rather upon the wide and varied productive capacity of all the members of the sterling bloc. Consequently I believe we can afford to go forward pretty confidently, without worrying too greatly whether or not the United States loan is ratified. I do not mean that we do not want the United States to ratify that loan, but I believe there is in this country and in many other members of the British commonwealth too much of a tendency to worry unduly about what the United States does or does not do. The sooner we begin to appreciate that Providence has placed the peoples of the British commonwealth in a preferred position from the point of view of production and trade, the sooner we shall go forward with much greater confidence than we have had manifest for a long time. So that from what has been said up to the present time I see no reason why Canada should not proceed with her loan, whether or not the United States loan is ratified.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I have listened for days to speeches made in this house on the bill under consideration. In spite of the haste with which some of my colleagues would like to see it adopted, it is to my way of thinking, the most important legislation submitted to us since the close of the war.

There is no reason for doubting that the present bill contemplates a gift of nearly half a billion dollars, and, moreover, in spite of all claims to the contrary, this measure will cost the Canadian taxpayer around 66 million dollars annually for the next five years. This matter deserves our close consideration and there is no need to hurry it through. In this connection, I congratulate the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for his splendid work, for the information he has either given us or obtained for us from the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

When I say that we should not hurry this bill through, I have excellent support, for the newspaper Le Droit of April 2, 1946, reports as follows an interview granted by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), to a labour organization, the CTCC:

Mr. St. Laurent regrets that the CTCC is so definitely opposed to the loan to Great Britain, but he adds that, to a certain extent, he understands the position they are taking on the matter, because he himself was convinced, only after having spent three or four weeks in discussing the subject with the British delegation and the North American experts, that this loan was the best policy to insure us against unemployment, trade stagnation and a recurrence of depression in Canada.

It is therefore understandable, Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. Minister of Justice had to spend three or four weeks in consultation with experts to grasp the full scope of this financial agreement, that the house should consider it carefully and take all the time it needs for doing so, in order to be in a position to adopt or reject it, as the case may be.

Mr. Speaker, the most often repeated argument, in the course of this debate, has been that the present agreement is bound to be helpful to both our trade and our industries. It cannot be denied that if we open credits to foreign countries we shall have no trouble in selling the goods we produce. That brings up the picture of a merchant who, to boost his trade, after having stored a large stock, would one day, tell his customers: "I am opening, for each of you, a credit account of $10,000; all I ask you is to make your purchases at my store." In the few days or weeks following that offer, the business of that merchant would be very brisk; you may be sure of that; however, the state of his business would be pitiable at the end of three or four weeks: he would inevitably be faced with bankruptcy. Who, I ask you, would have benefited from the action of that merchant? The go-betweens, the distributors of the goods, those who, in the case now under consideration, we call the financial organization of the country.

There is no doubt that, having accumulated, as the Minister of Finance pointed out the other day, wealth to the amount of ten billion dollars during the war, the high financiers and trusts wish to keep on doing so; that is the reason why they are unanimous in their support of the loan to England. However, when the interest become due, the annual amount of 66 million dollars will have to be paid out of the public funds, that is to say, the taxpayer will have to pay for the gift we propose to make now.

In the opinion of some—it is right here in the statement made by the right hon. the Minister of Justice which I have just read—this loan is an insurance policy. Considering the premium, the cost of such an insurance policy is prohibitive. Some newspapers and certain hon. members here in the house have used other arguments; those who object to the loan, for instance,—it is the same old story which we have heard so often—are considered as isolationists. Mr. Speaker, the strongest argument in favour of the loan has been put forward by a Quebec newspaperman who reports daily in certain Quebec newspapers; he used two columns of a newspaper to explain an argument based on the following statement: Those who object to the loan are all demagogues. When one can think of no better argument to defend such a measure, it is high time that it be carefully studied, because it cannot be very sound.

This is claimed to be a loan and it is always referred to as such. But the Minister of Finance himself said a moment ago that the bill now before the house calls for a gift to England of half a billion dollars, through cancellation of a debt owed us by that country. When the lender in search of a borrower cannot force his loans on anyone without paying the interest himself, without disbursing his own money, his actions are contrary to all sound economical and financial principles, although I am not very conversant with such matters. I always thought, Mr. Speaker, that lending was supposed to be a profitable business; however, if we have to pay interest ourselves, it cannot be advantageous to us.

It is evident—this has often been stated both in the house and outside—that this agreement is a consequence of the war and of the policies pursued during the last few years. So that if we must as an aftermath of the war, grant a loan which, as I have already said, will cost a lot of the taxpayers' money, whilst during the war some people were allowed to accumulate in excess of ten billion dollars—the Minister of Finance has admitted so himself—would it not be simpler to levy this money from those who have profited from the war? Were this to be the government's policy, I know not a single Canadian who would object to such a course of action in order to help Great Britain. Let the government take the money where it lies, without compelling the soldiers who were overseas for four or five years to pay interest on the capital they fought to preserve. We really took part in that war to safeguard our economic and democratic system, and those who fought the war and are now coming back to Canada will have to contribute their share of interest on those billions. This bill is unfair to them, as well as to all taxpayers. For those reasons, I shall fight it to the last.

(Text):

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this bill, and I have already given my reasons. My opinion is based upon the same grounds at this moment. The pride of Canada will be deeply affected by this legislation.

Our national debt, exclusive of provincial and municipal, is higher than $20 billion. We must be fair toward the taxpayers of this country—toward the municipalities and the provinces. We must give to each and all provinces their own rights of taxation, based upon the constitution. In my humble opinion this legislation is unfair toward everybody, and that is why I shall vote against it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS IN CONNECTION WITH SALE OF WHEAT

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fair for the second reading of bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): I shall sum up in five minutes my main contentions of last Tuesday. First of all, I pointed out that my chief concern with regard to the amendment was with reference to the wheat board and not the grain exchange. As I pointed out before, the grain exchange is not mentioned in the bill. This is simply a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and I was sincerely of the opinion that this amendment would weaken the position of the Canadian wheat board to such an extent that it was my duty to oppose it. I said also that according to my reading of this amendment the effect would be to expropriate most if not all of the country elevators throughout western Canada, because, as I interpret the amendment, the Canadian wheat board, which is the instrument of the government and as such should be considered as the government, has to take over all marketing facilities.

In my home town there is an elevator owned and operated by the farmers, and if a wheat transaction were to take place in that town the Canadian wheat board in Winnipeg would have to send a civil servant, an employee, pay him his salary and expenses and provide him with a car to come to that town for the sole purpose of transacting a wheat sale ranging anywhere from, I can imagine, five or six up to a thousand bushels of wheat, whereas at the present time the Canadian wheat board can simply call the elevator man on the telephone and ask him to carry out the transaction for the wheat board, and the whole thing can be done at the cost of a few cents.

I contend that this amendment is too loose to serve the purpose the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has in mind and it would be unwise to proceed with it. I pointed out the other day that, as regards the contention of the sponsor of the bill that the board was paying for unnecessary services, I was unable to discover from any reports of the wheat board that they were doing so. However, if that is the case—I do not know and I have not been able to find out—the best way in which to vindicate the charge is to bring the whole matter before the committee on agriculture, have the officials come here, question them, and get the necessary information from them. I respectfully suggested on Tuesday last that we submit the whole matter to the committee on agriculture. This amendment, to put it in a nutshell, is purely and simply a form of socialism of a most expensive kind, and I strongly oppose it.

As far as the grain exchange is concerned, and it is extremely incidental in this bill, I for one do not believe that we should to-day return to the old system of marketing as we knew it in the past. I have here a humorous clipping which I shall read to the house, not because it is authentic but because it reflects to some extent the attitude of the farmer and the attitude he had at that time. It gives a definition of wheat.

Wheat, it appears, is a seed that is planted and grown to keep the producer broke and the buyer crazy. It is planted in the spring, mortgaged in the summer, and lost in the fall. Its quality varies according to the amount of rain or frost experienced during the growing season. A man who can guess nearest to this quality is called a wheat grader by the public and a fool by the farmer.

The price of wheat is determined at primary market. It goes down when one has bought, and up when one has sold. All of which reminds us of the story of the buyer working for a group of millers who came west to watch the wheat markets. After a few days he wired his principals to this effect:

"Some think wheat will go down and some think it will go up. I think so, too. Whatever you will do will be wrong. Act at once.

This is not accurate, but those who have known conditions in western Canada during the thirties, and when they had to depend entirely on the supply and demand for the price of wheat, will realize that it reflects to a certain extent the predicament of the farmers at the time. That situation has been relieved by the establishment of the wheat board. I repeat that I feel strongly in regard to the Canadian wheat board, and any amendment that would tend to weaken its position or worsen the situation I feel it my duty to oppose.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I rise to support the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I wish to assure the hon. member who has just taken his seat that this group is wholeheartedly behind the wheat board. The bill introduced by the hon. member for Battle River will strengthen the wheat board.

In 1944 Mr. McIvor appeared before the agriculture committee of the House of Commons. On examining the details of the operation of the board, we found that his hands were tied because he was working under arrangements which were made in 1903. If farmers carried on their business like that I do not know where they would be to-day. To be progressive, business must keep up with the times. One could compare the system which has been laid down for the wheat board to follow with a farmer driving twenty-five miles into town with a horse and buggy or ploughing with oxen. They ploughed with oxen in the west in 1903. The wheat board of to-day operates under arrangements which were followed in 1903.

If this bill were passed it would give the wheat board power to do business the way in which they should do it in a modern world. It would streamline the board instead of tying its hands. To-day the wheat board is following the custom that was in vogue thirty-five or forty years ago. It should be changed. I have great respect for the wheat board. I have told the minister that before and I know he believes me when I say it. They have done a good job. It is unfortunate that they were not given the chance to do with rye what they have done with wheat, namely, stabilize the price. The man who eats rye bread to-day is paying around $2.90 a bushel for it. That is a deplorable state of affairs. The farmers receives one dollar and some odd cents for it and after the operations that it goes through the poor man has to pay $2.80 or $2.90 for it. That sort of thing should not be permitted in a modern world. But because of the way in which the wheat board's hands are tied they have to follow that system.

I have said that this group is in favour of the wheat board. We hope that it will be continued. I should like to see this bill pass to give the board more power than it has ever had because its hands are tied to the old methods that are employed by organizations which to-day are parasites on the backs of the farmers. Anybody who gets paid for a service that is not necessary is a parasite. We have to-day a lot of parasites in the grain trade. Let us hope that the wheat board will be supported in every corner of the house because it is the right and proper way to market grain. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) bucks up one of these days and puts rye in the same category.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I am going to support this measure but not for the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras). I do not agree with him that the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has any great claim to the philosophy of socialism. In this respect he is simply following out what for many years has been in the minds of a great many people in western Canada.

I wish to point out to the house that there is a considered reason why we support this method of selling wheat. I have no hesitation in saying that whether it is in the mind of the mover of the bill or not, it is certainly in my mind, that this will help to do the very thing which the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) mentioned, namely, eliminate completely from the scene of grain marketing in Canada the Winnipeg grain exchange.

The considered opinions of the people who have supported this measure in the west dates back to the years of the first world war when they had their first experience with it. In 1917-18 the government of the day in its wisdom decided to stop the marketing of grain through the futures or speculative system. They set up a commission to handle the buying and they fixed a price at that time. The following year they felt that they could improve on that particular method and they set up the Canada wheat board which operated until August, 1919. They established a new system of marketing grain in this country, one which had not been tried out before, and which few people would have had the temerity to recommend to the people at that time. Although few people might have had it in mind, the government of the day set up the wheat board to operate in such a way that it made an initial payment at the time of delivery by the wheat producer. The board then gave him a participation certificate, and when the grain was sold through the various buying agencies to the buying or importing countries across the sea and the returns were made and the cost of operating the board was deducted the balance was payable at so much a bushel on each grade of grain when the books were closed.

That was something which pleased a great many farmers. I am not going to try to mislead the house or the people from eastern or other parts of Canada by saying that it pleased every farmer. Farmers are much like anybody else; they differ in their opinions on how to do things. Some of them like the idea of speculation; some of them like to be completely separate and alone or away from any particularly close association in the doing of their business with other people.

When I speak at this time I am speaking from an intimate knowledge of the workings of the minds and the thoughts of those farmers who believe in organization for their own protection. No doubt the others I have mentioned will have numerous champions in this house. Of course they have a perfect right to their own point of view.

When the wheat board of the first world war ceased to operate and the speculative market reopened, the price quoted was about $2.78 a bushel. I do not have that old history with me at the moment; if anyone looks it up he may find I am out a fraction of a cent or a cent, but I think that was the figure. I know that within one year after the Winnipeg grain exchange was opened and speculation was in full force again the price of wheat dropped by $1.60. If you can do quick mental arithmetic you can subtract $1.60 from $2.78 and you will have the figure. Furthermore, by the fall of 1923 when the crop came on the market, wheat was selling at just a little over $1 a bushel, while some grades were considerably below that figure.

I am giving the house this history, because it is important to know the background of the demand which as best I can I am helping to urge in this house, as expressed in this bill. This is a bill, not a resolution; sometimes I become confused, because I am new to this sort of procedure. When we in the west found this condition obtaining on the open, speculative market, represented by the grain exchange, we commenced to organize ourselves, after first having asked the government here in Ottawa to reinstitute the wheat board. For its own reasons the government was unable or unwilling to do so. We need not go into that matter. Governments change; minds change. At that time no doubt they felt they were right, but in any event they did not set up the wheat board again, and as a result we had to organize ourselves. In that organization I must admit that we had a great deal to learn. Like this House of Commons here, we did not know everything back in 1923. Neither we nor they know everything yet, but we have all had twenty-three years of experience since that time.

We went on to organize the great farm marketing institutions, the wheat pools, operating on a voluntary basis somewhat along the lines of the wheat board. In the years 1923 to 1929, when Europe was being rebuilt and rehabilitated after the war, the thing worked fairly well; but when the world collapse came in 1929 and 1930 we found that we were not strong enough, organized in one country alone, even though we were well organized, to withstand the impact of world conditions. At the same time we found that the speculative market was much more ineffective than the wheat pools in maintaining and stabilizing prices for the farmers. We all know the history of what was done by the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett at that time. In their own way they tried to maintain what they believed was a free enterprise system in the marketing of grain. They would not interfere with the speculative channels, but they had to do something, and they did perform what were called stabilization operations, which were not very successful but which did help to a certain extent. That gave an indication that these things could be controlled. The farm organizations were continuously pressing for the establishment of a wheat board, with the sole idea of eliminating the grain exchange.

Before getting this far I should have mentioned that there was a certain definite philosophy behind the cooperative grain marketing organizations formed in 1923. On the fly leaf of their handbook you will find, among others, these words:

. . . to eliminate manipulation, speculation and waste and all unnecessary transactions in the marketing of grain, and to preserve for the producer and consumer their proper profits and economies . . .

That word "profits" will indicate that we were not socialists then, and not all of those in the movement are socialists even yet. They were trying to maintain their proper profits and economies. That was the slogan then, and those words are still on the fly-leaf of the handbook of Canadian cooperative wheat producers. After that we got the wheat board. I do not want to recite a whole lot of history, but in getting that wheat board in 1935 one of the things the farm organizations particularly wanted was a committee to assist and advise the wheat board in the marketing of wheat and the fixing of a price for it There was a great deal of controversy and a great deal of opposition from the operators on the Winnipeg grain exchange to the fixing of that price. Again I do not wish to criticize any individuals here. People did and supported what they thought was proper at that time, but again I am speaking from the point of view of the organized farmers, who wanted the price fixed somewhere near the cost of production. At that time the people who sat in this House of Commons were not convinced that this was a very good idea, but if I gauge the temper of this house to-night, a great many hon. members would violently oppose the removal of controls at the present time so that prices would move either upward or downward at the will of speculators. In any event, at that time they wanted stabilization in the matter of farm products, based on something like the actual cost of production to the farm operator.

So we got the wheat board, and ever since that time we have been attempting to have the board cease using any of those agencies whose operations might be included in the "unnecessary transactions" mentioned in the quotation I gave from the fly-leaf of handbook No. 1 of the Canadian cooperative wheat producers. We were not successful; the organizations are still carrying on. But other organizations which at that time had not seen the picture have now learned that this is important. For instance, since that time we have seen the organization of the Canadian federation of agriculture. That federation has a twelve-point programme, and point No. 6 is this:

The establishment of a permanent national wheat marketing policy to give encouragement and leadership to development of an international wheat agreement and work out price arrangements which would prevent wide fluctuations.

That means negotiated prices. It does not mean prices arrived at by speculation on the part of some persons who desire to buy or sell options and put up a margin. Point No. 7 states:

Establishment of the Canadian wheat board as the "sole institution" for the marketing of Canadian cereal crops.

In the early days of this organization many people even in the west did not see this picture clearly. Now it is seen and understood by people all over Canada, because the Canadian federation of agriculture represents farm organizations of all kinds, and they are not all cooperatives. There are some organizations which do not claim to be cooperatives but simply to represent the interests of some particular type of farm industry across this dominion. These people belonging to this organization have joined the wheat pools and the organized farmers of the west in endorsing this policy. Some hon. members were here in the early days of 1942, when a delegation came to Ottawa. They will remember the representations along those lines which were made at that time. Now we have another world-wide organization in connection with which I want to remind hon. members of point No. 6 in the recommendations of the federation of agriculture, having to do with the development of an international world wheat agreement to work out prices. Three years ago we had the Hot Springs food conference, which last fall was crystallized in the united nations food and agriculture organization. One of their plans, as set out in article I of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations Act, said:

The organization shall promote and, where appropriate, shall recommend national and international action with respect to (d) the improvement of the processing, marketing and distribution of food and agricultural products.

There is no question that all are agreed that the organized methods of marketing cereal products or wheat itself, and including oats and barley to the extent to which they are handled, through the wheat board, has been an improvement. Even the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) agreed to-night that the wheat board has done a magnificent job, and we are very proud of our part in the west in helping to promote the work of that board. I agree with the hon. member that it has brought about a vast improvement in the marketing of cereal products. It has brought advantage to the farmer who has produced those cereals, to the nation of which the farmer is a citizen, and to the purchasers of those products.

When we have something working well, why is it not a good thing to improve it as much as possible? We believe that if the wheat board is given authority to set up its own organization, and if it has not to use unnecessary institutions, there will be an improvement in the situation which will be of value to all concerned.

In the early days many organizations had not agreed that this was a good thing. We had our rural municipal associations which were not yet convinced. Now the rural municipal association, in Saskatchewan at least, would endorse this policy. We have another big agricultural association in Saskatchewan, and I should like to emphasize to any who may be listening that the organized agricultural societies of Saskatchewan are not cooperative institutions. They do not bear the name "cooperative"; their philosophy is not based upon the cooperative philosophy in trading. Many of their members believe in it, but the organizations themselves are just as they were when they were created many years ago, namely distinctly local agricultural societies organized and joined together for the purpose of improving production of agricultural products.

They, too, have advanced and learned. They, too, in the past have been the victims of unfortunate circumstances. They, too, are comprised of intelligent men. Indeed, right in this corner of the chamber sits an hon. member, namely the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith) who is a high official in that organization. He can vouch for what I am going to say about them. Some of them may believe in speculation, while others believe in cooperative marketing; but all believe in the improvement of production methods. Last January they held a meeting of the Saskatchewan agricultural association in Saskatoon, and at that meeting passed a resolution containing six points. The first point, considered by them the most important —there are others, but I shall mention only the one because it has reference of the matter before the house to-night—states:

> The Canadian wheat board should be the sole marketing agency for coarse grains as well as wheat.

If they passed a resolution like that it is obvious they are not asking to have the wheat board the sole marketing agency, and then expecting that wheat board to diffuse its responsibility and use unnecessary marketing agencies which would eliminate or to a large extent nullify the meaning of the word "sole" in the resolution.

I make these observations this evening, through you, Mr. Speaker, in order to try to convince the house that the bill before it is an important one and one which has received the support of organized farmers from western Canada, because the experience in past years has convinced them that such action is necessary.

Someone will say, "All these farm organizations do not believe in it." I say that all the big ones do, and that many of the smaller ones do. I cannot vouch for all the smaller ones. However, the ones I have mentioned here this evening have stated their official ideas in the matter, and because of that I do not think there should be any hesitation whatsoever in allowing this bill to come to a vote.

I could give a number of quotations, but if I do not conclude soon I may be accused of having talked out the very thing I wish to support. I hope the house will vote on the bill to-night, and thus give the necessary impetus and encouragement to the producers of western Canada, thereby showing them that the rest of Canada is behind their efforts to improve their own conditions.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the terms of the bill I should like to make it clear that so far as I am concerned I am now, and have been ever since I have been in public life, favourable to the policy of the wheat board handling wheat and coarse grains, and doing so exclusively. There can be no doubt as to my stand on the part of anyone who has followed my speeches in the matter.

In regard to this particular bill, however, there seems to be some confusion as to what it attempts to do. For example, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) said that the hands of the wheat board were tied, and that it was the purpose of the bill to untie them. Then the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr.

Bentley) said that the purpose of the bill was to give the wheat board the right to set up its own agency, so that it would not have to employ private grain agencies to handle wheat, and this would mean that it would not have to employ cooperative agencies for that purpose.

I believe the wise procedure is to look at the terms of the bill. Section 8 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act states the following in paragraph (i):

> In selling and disposing of wheat as by this act provided, to utilize and employ without discrimination such marketing agencies, including commission merchants, brokers, elevator men, exporters and other persons engaged in or operating facilities for the selling and handling of wheat, as the board in its discretion may determine.
> (j) to offer continuously wheat for sale in the markets of the world through the established channels: Provided that the board may, if in its opinion any existing agencies are not operating satisfactorily, take such steps as it deems expedient to establish, utilize and employ its own or other marketing agencies or channels.

The purpose of the bill is to repeal those very sections which give the wheat board power to employ any marketing agencies it sees fit; and if it finds that any of those marketing agencies are not operating satisfactorily, to utilize and employ its own marketing agencies. So that the act as it stands to-day gives the wheat board the full power either to use existing marketing agencies or to set up its own. I cannot see the cogency of any argument which says, "We want to give the wheat board power to set up its own agencies", and then bring in a bill, and support it, which repeals the section which gives that very power.

Among the great marketing agencies operating in western Canada are the great grain marketing pools, the cooperative grain marketing organizations. They are the ones which are handling to a great extent the grain of western Canada. I take it from the bill presented by the hon. member that he would deprive these great cooperative marketing agencies of the right to handle the grain of the farmers for the wheat board.

As far as I am concerned, and as I said at the beginning, while I am in favour of the wheat board having the exclusive right to handle the grain of the western farmer—and in that I include rye; I have made representations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce accordingly—I would much rather see this grain handled by it through the cooperative organizations which have been set up to take it from the farmer, to ship it to the east, to handle it in the terminal elevators and to ship it abroad than by any agency of government, no matter how well it is handled. I have no hesitation in saying that, whenever it is a choice between cooperation and state socialism, I will take cooperation every time.

Mr. IRVINE: In the hon. gentleman's opinion, if this bill is passed will it necessarily eliminate the grain exchange?

Mr. TUCKER: I would say that if this bill passes it will not eliminate the grain exchange at all. They can still go on dealing in futures and so on. The only thing it would do would be to prevent the various cooperative agencies, such as the wheat pool and other agencies, from handling the grain of the farmer at the behest and under the direction of the wheat board.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. TUCKER: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman. I suggest that I be permitted to make my speech. I do not think there is any doubt that what I am saying is correct. The purpose of this bill is to see that the wheat board shall not have a free hand. It definitely provides:

> . . . to employ such methods, consistent with the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section, as will not involve the payment, directly or indirectly, of any commission or other remuneration to commission merchants, brokers or other marketing agencies.

I will ask the hon. member, and he can answer me when he closes this debate, if the wheat pool of Saskatchewan is not a marketing agency. In other words, it would deprive the wheat pool of the right to earn money in the handling of the farmer's grain as a marketing agency. Surely the hon. member could not be serious in asking the house to vote for a bill that would accomplish that purpose. If he wants to do away with the grain exchange let him bring in a bill that will do away with it. Let him be outright and straightforward in his methods instead of striking at the great cooperative marketing agencies, which we in the west, including myself, are so proud of, and which I may say I was one of the first to join when they started to get going.

Mr. FAIR: On a question of privilege, the hon. gentleman is accusing me of something which he knows very well is not in my mind and is not my intention. I have stated definitely that my intention was, indirectly, to do away with the grain exchange.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: I would say to the hon. member who has sponsored this bill that the courts have ruled over and over again that you must judge the intention of legislation by what the law says, not by what is said by the person who introduced it. We are being asked to vote for a bill the purpose of which is to deprive the wheat board of the right to employ the marketing agencies which now exist throughout western Canada and other parts of Canada as well. No matter what the hon. gentleman says he intended to do, that is what this bill will do if it is passed. He has asked the house to endorse that principle. He has really caused a situation to be created whereby anyone who points out these facts is accused of being in favour of the grain exchange. As was pointed out by the hon. member who just asked me a question, the effect of this will not be to close the grain exchange. It will interfere more with the cooperative marketing agencies of western Canada than it will with the grain exchange.

If the hon. member is going to undertake to take up the time of this house by introducing a bill which, if passed, will cripple the great cooperative marketing agencies of western Canada, I will not remain in my seat no matter what charge may be brought against me that I am trying to uphold the grain exchange. I feel justified in rising in my place in this House of Commons and taking this stand, because my view about the upholding of the wheat board and of the cooperative organizations is so well known in Saskatchewan that nobody can dare to say that I would do anything that would harm them or in any way oppose them.

Mr. FAIR: Do not tucker yourself out.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. FAIR: Do not tucker yourself out.

Mr. TUCKER: That is very funny indeed. That is just about as foolish as introducing a bill which does exactly the opposite to what the hon. member says he intended to do. The watchword of every man representing a grain farming constituency in this house should be, in the light of the grand record of the wheat board, "Hands off the wheat board; do not interfere with them; give them a chance to carry out the work they have been doing so well in the past and, if they require it, give them even more power to deal with grain that they have no right to deal with exclusively to-day." In other words, add to their rights; do not interfere with them.

In regard to the policy which is being enforced under the present wheat board act, I would say at this particular stage when there seems to be some doubt as to what the proper policy should be in regard to farm products:

I think the farmer is just as much entitled to a reasonable minimum price for his product as the working man is entitled to a fixed minimum wage. The farmer is just as much entitled to a fair share of the national income consistent with the amount of work he does and the amount he has invested and so on as any other particular group in the community. This government in introducing and having passed by this house the Agricultural Prices Support Act has given its approval to such a policy. I should like to put on the record section 9, subsection 2, of that act which was passed in 1944 and which, I take it, is still the policy of the government as enacted by this parliament. This subsection reads:

> (2) In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

There is a definite pronouncement of a fair deal for the farmers of this country. As far as I am concerned I hope and believe the government will never waiver from its policy of a fair and just deal for the farmer.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When is the act to be proclaimed?

Mr. TUCKER: It has been proclaimed in part already and the chairman of the board is already functioning.

With regard to wheat, I take it that the policy of a minimum price must be carried out by the wheat board. For that reason I should like to see the wheat board continue with full power, or with added powers if those are needed to discharge fully the obligation which this parliament has assumed toward the great agricultural industry of this country.

Some people may ask why the farmer should have fixed prices for his products. One of the first reasons I would suggest—and I can speak with a great deal of feeling because all my life I have been either a farmer or closely in touch with farmers—is that the hazards of farming are enough for a farmer to contend with without having to be faced with a fall in the prices which will wipe out, even though he has a good crop, what he has the right to expect from his months of hard work. In that connection I wish to quote from a speech of the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture to that organization in January, 1945, which I commend to the consideration of the house:

To the people of Canada not engaged in agriculture we say, in all seriousness: If costs of distribution are to be continued at approximately present margins; if capital employed in agriculture is to continue to receive rewards on the same basis as in recent years; and more particularly if the greater part of industry in Canada is to hang on to the protection it has enjoyed, then equality of exchange for agriculture definitely means relatively high prices for agricultural products and correspondingly high retail food prices.

If most other industries and groups persist in clinging to practices and privileges designed to hold their prices or rewards for services on a high level, then in all justice agricultural prices must be placed on the same level.

Please note, agriculture is not choosing that level, nor do we recommend it. But if Canada decides to maintain the greater part of her economy on that higher level, and to pay the farmer on the basis of a cheap food policy, the result will be to exploit the purchasing power and living standards of people living on the land, bring tragedy to agriculture, and eventually the tragedy of unemployment and depression to the nation as a whole. A cheap food policy at the expense of agriculture will be bad business for everybody and a costly blunder for Canada in the end.

What is the policy in regard to wheat? I have heard it said on the floor of this house that a very high price was obtained for wheat following the last war, but in case I have not time to read the quotation I wished to read in regard to this, let me preface what I am going to say by this. The farm leaders of western Canada have upheld the policy of price stabilization and loyally supported it.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. TUCKER: I will read proof of that if I have time. But at the same time if the prices of the things which the farmer has to buy, such as fuel oil and farm implements, are permitted to rise, then an adjustment must be permitted in the prices of the products which the farmer has to sell.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER: That is in accordance with the policy of the government and laid down in the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In this regard, however, I would say this. One of the things that the farmers of western Canada feel most strongly about is that while they are not asking for the last cent they can get for their wheat in the day of need of the consumer of bread, they do say this, that so far as the internal price of wheat is concerned, when you take wheat from the farmer at $1.25 a bushel to make it into bread in Canada and when you are selling the wheat abroad at $1.55 a bushel, you are asking wheat farmers to subsidize the consumer of bread in this country to the extent of thirty cents a bushel on between forty and fifty million bushels of wheat. That amounts to a subsidy by the farmers of this country to the bread-eaters of this country of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000.

The farmer says this, that if the price of his fuel oil and gasoline is to rise two cents a gallon and the price of his farm implements by 12½ per cent, that policy of the farmer subsidizing the bread-eater of this country is one which should be reconsidered. If we are to have cheap bread, to which the farmer has no objection, the nation as a whole should pay that subsidy to provide it and not the farmer.

In order to bear out my statement that the farmers of this country have loyally supported the policy of price stabilization and do not seek to exact the last cent out of the present difficult food situation, I should like to read to the house from a recent broadcast by Mr. Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) to-day make some reference to the amount which the farmer got for his wheat following the last war. Let me first give the figures on that.

The Winnipeg market, in September, 1920, showed an average cash price for that month for wheat of $2.73½ cents a bushel. That is very fine. But by next fall, in November, 1921, the average price had dropped to $1.10⅞ a bushel, and the farmers of western Canada, having been once bitten under that sort of system, are not going, if they can avoid it, to permit themselves to be bitten again. Let me now read what Mr. Wesson said on that point in a broadcast on April 2 of this year:

> There is quite an agitation in some quarters to-day that wheat prices ought to be much higher than they are at the present time because of the acute wheat shortage. No one will disagree that higher prices could be secured under present conditions, but don't be fooled by this dangling bait that is being placed before you, because the advocates who are using so much lip-service to-day have a very different motive. They want to get back to the old order of things. The free and open market system of trading, with high sounding phrases like the inexorable law of supply and demand.
> But, while the exponents of higher prices to-day are very eager in the interests of the farmer that he should get higher prices, you will notice that they go no further than the present time, and you know, and I know, that based on past experience, if we had no protection but the much vaunted open market system, when the supply position changed on the swing of the pendulum to the opposite extreme, we could quite easily get back to the same position as in the black years of the 1930's, when wheat on this same open market went down to less than 40 cents a bushel.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. TUCKER: I have not much time, and wish to finish reading this.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If the hon. member will permit a question—

Mr. TUCKER: It is not that I am afraid to answer questions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A moment ago the hon. member pinned his faith on the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Does he not know that section 2 of that act excludes wheat entirely?

Mr. TUCKER: We can look to the wheat board to apply this policy in regard to wheat. I made that very plain, if the hon. member had been listening.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for public and private bills having been exhausted, the house will now revert to government orders.

Mr. BRACKEN: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosthern said that I had made some reference to the price of wheat following the last war. He must have been in error because I made no such reference.

Mr. TUCKER: I understood the hon. member to refer to the price of wheat after the last war, but if he did not, I am sorry that I said he did it in error.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Friday, May 3, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): When the committee rose the other night the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had moved an amendment which I think I should now read to the committee. The hon. member moved that section 10 be amended as follows:

That the following words be added to the section as subsection 6: "Such certificate of citizenship shall be deemed to include a Bill of Rights as follows:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.
2. Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.
3. No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend this evening to make a formal speech in support of the amendment that you have just read. This amendment is not meant to be all-exclusive, nor is it meant to be all-inclusive. My first suggestion is that if the Secretary of State accepts the principle of the need in this country of a bill of rights signifying what citizenship stands for, then possibly the best means whereby that result could be effected would be to set up a committee of the house. It would not take very long for that committee to meet and it would afford an opportunity to exchange ideas among the various groups in the house and thereby evolve a bill of rights which would be acceptable to all, and one which would carry into effect the highest principles of citizenship.

I realize that there are many who say that all the rights referred to in the amendment are now in effect and that there is no necessity to have a bill of rights in Canada, that the great principles of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, Habeas Corpus and the Bill of Rights are part and parcel of the law of this land and that, except in war time, they have not been interfered with and therefore it is not necessary to have a bill of rights.

But may I point out that during recent years, and particularly since 1914 when the War Measures Act was passed, there has been a trend and tendency in this country to diminish and attenuate rights ordinarily comprised in citizenship, and I proposed the amendment for the purpose of having parliament determine once and for all that a stop be put to the continuance of any such tendency or trend in this land.

The citizenship bill as a whole has received support from all sides of the house, and with the exception of one provision in the bill, there has been almost unanimous support of the need for it and of its terms. I am not going to make this evening anything in the nature of a partisan speech, for I believe that this is a matter which deserves the serious consideration of all members in all parts of the house.

My appeal at the very outset is that the minister, in order to round out the work already begun by him under this citizenship bill, should complete that work now by having parliament declare once and for all the rights that are incident to citizenship in this country. Only recently, all too recently, the people of Canada have become liberty-conscious by reason of what has taken place in connection with the espionage investigation.

While at the beginning of that investigation there were those in Canada who said, "After all, what is being done can do no harm because those against whom the proceedings are being taken belong to a philosophy alien to ours", in recent days Canadians on every hand are saying, "Well, if they can do it in the case of those whose philosophy is antagonistic to ours, is there any reason why the government could not do the same thing under order in council against other minorities?"

It is for that reason that the problem has become of great significance. I believe that a matter of primary importance in parliament is to assure the maximum preservation of civil liberties. We became accustomed to the diminution of those liberties during the war when rights were abridged and terminated in many cases because the survival of the nation was more important than the preservation or survival of democratic symbolism.

This citizenship bill, in order to carry out the hopes of those who have given it their support, must assure that in this country there shall be no superior class of citizenship and that citizenship shall not be based on race, creed or colour, nor shall there be any first or second-class citizenship. Let there be no mistake about this. I am unalterably opposed to any alteration or diminution of the rights of Canadian citizens by order in council independently of parliament; for history shows that if you permit the rights of a citizen to be impinged upon, regardless of who that citizen may be, every other person is a step nearer to the loss of his rights, since infringements upon democratic rights have no limits except in the limitations imposed by the vigilance of the people. History proves, too, that when minority rights are interfered with, or when the prerogative rights of individuals are invaded, it is not long before few dare to conform but to the desires of the majority, and often those who exact oppression on minorities are themselves the first victims. Liberty is not something that can be purchased for all time. There are not several kinds of liberty; there is only one liberty, namely, the liberty based on law and under law.

I have said that lately there has been a definite trend away from the principles of liberty. The War Measures Act remains on the statute books of this country. So long as it is on the statute books there is no reason why governments, if they so choose, might not create emergencies real or apprehended, thereby permitting them to commit arbitrary acts under its powers.

This parliament should endeavour to assure that never again, excepting by parliament, shall the rights of individuals be reduced or entirely done away with. In connection with the order in council which dealt with the espionage problem, the right of habeas corpus was done away with as directly as though the order in council so provided, because that order in council stated that every person held, regardless of the circumstances under which he was held, was deemed to be under lawful arrest. I am going to refer to one or two sections of these great bulwarks of liberty of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, the Habeas Corpus Act and the Bill of Rights, and leave it to the committee to appreciate the extent to which these rights have been interfered with in the recent order in council.

So far as Magna Charta is concerned article 40 states:

> To no one will we sell, to no one will we deny, or delay right or justice.

One has only to recall what took place a few short weeks ago when men were denied the right to present their cases, were held without charge against them and were denied the opportunity of having counsel during the proceedings of the investigation to realize that these rights have been denied.

Then there is the Petition of Right. That petition of 1628 provided one thing more importantly than anything else, namely, that no one should be held unless there was against him a charge known to law. The Habeas Corpus Act of 1679 was entirely removed by the order in council passed in October last, and that removal became part of the law of this land under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act, although in passing that act parliament thought it was passing an act in regard to economic matters instead of matters respecting the liberty of the subject.

Finally there is the Bill of Rights of 1689. It contains certain principles there that are applicable to this discussion. They were condemned at that time, and yet they were adopted in 1945 and 1946. One of them reads as follows:

> That the pretended power of suspending of laws or the execution of laws by regal authority without consent of parliament is illegal.

I have already pointed out what was done in reference to habeas corpus by the executive. The Bill of Rights states in part:

> That the pretended power of dispensing with laws or the execution of laws by regal authority as it hath been assumed and exercised of late is illegal.
> That the commission for erecting the lay court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes and all other commissions and courts of like nature are illegal and pernicious.

Furthermore, it sets out that every man shall receive his right to his day in court and without unnecessary delay.

As I said a moment ago, I did not state that the Bill of Rights as set forth in the amendment is all-exclusive or all-inclusive. In paragraph 7 it asks for a declaration that:

> Freedom of religion, freedom of speech and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.

So long as the government does not see fit to claim the right to change these rights by order in council they are assured in reality.

Paragraph 2 states that:

Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.

Was there any reason why habeas corpus should not have been suspended by parliament instead of by order in council? Never before in British history was habeas corpus ever suspended in the United Kingdom except under statute or under the power contained in a statute. The only times that habeas corpus had been done away with, suspended or abrogated in Great Britain was by parliament or by powers contained in an act of parliament.

I do not wish this to be too technical, but Blackstone in his "Commentaries" had this to say at page 300:

For it is the parliament only, or legislative power, that, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the crown, by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing.

It has been suspended in Great Britain on eight or nine occasions over the years, but on every occasion that it was suspended it was under statute or under the powers contained in a statute. It was suspended in 1696 in connection with the investigation known as the "Plot". It was suspended again in 1794 after the execution of Louis XVI and his wife in France when Britain was stirred up. It was suspended again in 1914 under powers granted by parliament. Nowhere excepting in the Dominion of Canada has there ever been a case of habeas corpus being suspended except by the will of the people as expressed in parliament. That is why I suggest that parliament should now determine once and for all that never again will that right, without which there can be no freedom or liberty under law, be denied except in cases of emergency and by parliament itself.

The third paragraph of the amendment is as follows:

No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

The other day the Minister of Justice said that the Official Secrets Act gives to the commissioners the power to deny counsel to persons giving evidence before that commission. It says it may; but in this case without any reasonable explanation given, the right enjoyed by all people in British countries to be represented by counsel was done away with.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

What other rights were done away with? Rights enunciated by the Canadian bar association were as follows:

The right not to be detained at the mere arbitrary will of the crown or any government or administrative authority.

The right not to be arrested unless under the authority of a magistrate's warrant.

The right, when under suspicion or arrest or sentence, not to be coerced to give any information or evidence against himself, or to testify in one's own case.

These rights were denied under circumstances that would permit their denial again if there should be in power a government willing to do these acts. These are things which ought not to be permitted in a British country. Without regard to party considerations the press of this country have condemned almost unanimously what was actually done during recent weeks. I am not here for the purpose of rehashing what has been said on previous occasions, but I do think we in parliament must have the assurance once and for all that invasions such as these shall no longer be tolerated in this country.

That is the reason for the amendment. Let me point out that while there were many who felt that to raise objection would cause people to hold in contempt those who raised the objection, or would subject them to criticism, almost without exception every newspaper in this country which supported the government and was liberal in its viewpoint condemned what the government did in this case as arbitrary, unjustified and unreasonable. This is not a party question. It is a question that affects the liberties of the people everywhere and the future of every citizen of this country.

I know of no better way to summarize the situation than to refer to a speech delivered by Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university, in 1941. Dealing with the subject of liberty as only a man such as Butler could deal with it, whose whole lifetime has been devoted to ensuring that liberty shall be preserved, these were his words:

It is fundamental that liberty is not a grant of government but that government is a delegation of power by people who have liberty, and that this government must always be subject to their control.

Then he said:

It is the chief business of a free people, and their greatest responsibility, to see to it that the government which they have set up does not, under one pretence or another, invade the reserved field of liberty and restrict it in a manner which the free people themselves have never authorized or contemplated. In a democracy the state and government are wholly distinct. The state is the field of reserved liberty plus the field of government. State and government can only be identical when liberty has wholly disappeared.

Then these pertinent words were uttered in 1941:

The constant struggle of those who are, consciously or unconsciously, enemies of liberty, is to increase, even to multiply the function and authority of government.

This government was no enemy of liberty; I do not want to leave that impression. But in doing what it has done it has created a precedent, unless objection is raised by parliament, that might well be dangerous in future if it should be succeeded by another government that might be an enemy of liberty. In the original constitution of the United States there was no bill of rights. Those who created that constitution believed that the principles of liberty enshrined in British common law would never be interfered with or contravened; nor would they be by any government set up in the United States. But what happened? Within a very few years it became necessary for the United States to establish a bill of rights, because the rights of free men were being interfered with. It is interesting to note that within a very few years after the constitution was adopted an Alien Act was passed whereby non-citizens could be deported or could be imprisoned without trial or hearing. Then a Sedition Act was passed whereby newspaper editors or public speakers could not utter a word which might cast aspersions against the administration. What happened shows the danger of intolerance of the views of others. These great patriots, desirous of upholding democracy as they understood it and believing that they alone were the custodians of what was best for the people, set out inadvertently and involuntarily to destroy those with whom they disagreed. History shows that the preservation of civil liberties is necessary in order to preserve governments that might be intolerant as well as those who might suffer through the exercise of intolerance.

Some say to me, "Why not accept the bill of rights enunciated in the United States?" Under our constitution many of the amendments to the United States constitution would be subject only to provincial jurisdiction. I am going to read that bill of rights, because it epitomizes the situation relative to citizenship. The first amendment provided that there should be no interference with religion, free speech, a free press, or the right to assemble peaceably. The second amendment guaranteed to the people the right to have weapons. The third amendment guaranteed against lodging soldiers in private houses without the consent of the owners. Both of these sections are no longer applicable. The fourth amendment provided that there should be no search or seizure of persons, houses, goods or papers without a search warrant. That is no longer applicable. The fifth amendment declared that there should be no trial for serious offences without a grand jury indictment. That is no longer applicable. The sixth amendment required a speedy and public trial for public offences. We already have that under the criminal law. The eighth amendment prohibits too large bail or fines, and cruel or unusual punishments. We have that under our criminal law. With the exception of the freedoms and the constitutional rights of habeas corpus and the right to constitutional safeguards being preserved, all the other rights covered by the United States bill of rights are omitted from the amendment.

In view of the fact that all across this country newspapers supporting the government have given almost universal support to the need of such a bill of rights; in view of the fact that almost without exception these great newspapers have given the lead in emphasizing that the things which have recently taken place shall never be repeated, I ask the support of the minister in assuring that the rights of Canadian citizenship shall never again be attenuated or diminished. Let the past be gone. Let us assure that as far as the future is concerned citizenship shall mean everything that it means under Magna Charta and the other bulwarks of liberty.

(Translation):

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words to-night in connection with this act defining citizenship. Before I get to the heart of the matter, I would like to say how happy I am to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). We have here a man who has never lost sight of that greatest attribute of true Canadianism which is liberty, and who has never missed an opportunity of defending that very principle with all his might.

It might be well to state, at the very outset, why the certificate of citizenship should grant certain inalienable rights. This bill, as we all know, would create and define a status of Canadian citizenship. Is not liberty the most important condition of such a status? We have though it fit to fight for the defence of our liberty and now we surely think fit to defend that same right in the council of the nation. I say without exaggerating that our new citizens do not fully understand the rights and privileges granted them when they acquire citizenship. Therefore, if we create the Canadian citizenship, would it not be advisable to complete our task by giving a definite meaning to this status, so that a Canadian may not simply say, "I am a Canadian citizen", but also, "I am a free man and here are my rights!"

What worries me, Mr. Chairman, is that not only are Canadian citizens not sufficiently aware of their rights, but a government craving for power has seriously encroached upon them. During the last few years, we have witnessed an ever-growing threat to our liberties and our civil rights. This is more than ever the time when we should unite and eliminate this threat.

Mr. Chairman, with your permission I would like to make the following suggestion to the committee: If the bill under discussion defines the status of Canadian citizens, we should now adopt the measure which is its logical consequence, that of defining, establishing and guaranteeing once and for all the rights which such status implies. And only by the passage of a Bill of Rights determining the rights of the citizens, will this purpose be achieved.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, in speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre it seems to me that one of the first requisites would be to devote some thought to the question of why it is necessary to attach a definition of the rights of citizenship to a certificate conferring citizenship.

Among all the authorities I can do no better than look to the words of the minister who moved the bill, and in whose name it stands. I believe if we compare his statements when he moved the introduction of the bill at the last session with those he made at this session we shall see what might be described as a progression to the point where the minister himself is in support of the position now adopted by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Last fall, in moving for leave to introduce, the minister said as reported at page 1335 of Hansard:

> It should not be concluded from this that the bill in reality makes any sweeping change or that there has not previously been any such thing as Canadian nationality.

Then, again, on the same page:

> It is the intention of the government to undertake an extensive revision of the present Naturalization Act in terms of Canadian citizenship. By this I mean that the bill I am introducing is in reality a comprehensive amendment of the Naturalization Act in which, to avoid the old sources of confusion, all definitions, conditions and qualifications are in terms of a general status of "Canadian citizen."

[Mr. Fulton.]

In other words, in effect what the minister said then was that this bill is really not accomplishing anything new. It is merely the definition of an already existing status. However, at this session the minister has made it clear that the object of the bill is to define the fundamental status on which the rights and duties of Canadians will depend.

At page 504 of Hansard for this session the minister is reported to have said:

> Generally speaking, by this bill we are seeking to make the status of Canadian citizenship the paramount national status of persons who are Canadians.

We have all agreed that one of the reasons this bill should be supported is that we in Canada need a consciousness of citizenship. The minister's second position, the position implied in the words I have just read, seems to be the most logical, and the one which best defines the object we have in mind in moving the amendment, namely that in this bill we intend to create a status. There is no purpose unless that status has some meaning, unless it has some effect and some results.

Canadians must now know what are their rights when they become citizens. Again I turn for authority to the words of the minister when at page 505 of Hansard he said:

> We should want, therefore, to impress upon new Canadians whom we shall welcome and want to share in our national endeavours that they are joining no mean society but a society that will give them freedom and an opportunity perhaps that they have not had in other lands.

We have always regarded ourselves as free men. We have taken it for granted that ours is a heritage of freedom. Ours is the proud attribute of those who can say, "We are free, and no man can impose on our rights unless we consent." That surely is one of the greatest possible attributes of Canadian citizenship. That is one which should be definite and secured to any Canadian when he becomes a citizen.

What we are saying, in effect, is that the time has now come, and that it can no longer be put off, when these rights shall be defined and shall be guaranteed forever. It may be asked why we say that that time has now come. It has been shown by the hon. member for Lake Centre that the reason lies in the fact that Canadians have been losing their freedom. Under the aegis of this Liberal government, whether by accident or by design, freedom has been abrogated steadily over the period of the last few years.

It is not only in the war-time measures that this process has continued; it has been carried on since the termination of both the European and the Japanese wars. A brief examination of this process will suffice to support that statement. But before I review the process there is something else first to be said. Numerous references have been made in this debate to the effect that questions of constitutional principles and freedoms are discussed very generally by lawyers. In fact it has been said that this is nothing but legal quibbling. I am a lawyer and proud of being one, but it is not primarily as a lawyer that I speak to-night. I speak only as one who has been forced by the confusion of circumstances and political tradition to put off the following of the pursuit of law, to take part in what he conceived to be a struggle to preserve his liberty, and to preserve the right to follow that pursuit when and how he might wish. So speaking, there is no suggestion that there should be attributed to him as an individual any particular merit because hundreds of thousands of other Canadians have been in exactly the same position.

It is our belief that now that the struggle is over, now that the men who took part in it have returned to the street, now that Canadian men have returned to the Canadian scene, they should be entitled to speak for liberty. We believe that the average Canadian wishes to know what are his rights, how they are endangered and how he may protect them. We believe he is anxious now, as is shown by the press comments over the past few months, that having fought a war to preserve his liberty, that liberty should not be twitched from his back like a garment under the guise of clothing the federal executive which is already amply enough clothed. It is because we believe that the Canadian people are entitled to have defined for them in simple terms what are their rights and to understand the purpose of those rights that we speak to-night in support of this bill of rights.

As Mr. Winston Churchill said, "this is a war, viewed in its inherent quality, to establish on impregnable rocks the right of the individual, and it is a war to revive the stature of man." It seems to me that we would be found wanting now if, after the war is over, we were not to speak on behalf of liberty.

As I have said, the first reason for our supporting the bill of rights is that we think it is time the rights of Canadian citizens were defined in plain language and, second, that we think it is time that the loss of those rights, that the further whittling away of those rights be made impossible and that they should be restored in full and preserved forever. We feel strongly that the second ground justifies us in the stand we have taken. As I have said, if we review the history of the past few years we find support for our belief that those rights have been jeopardized.

I should like to trace in brief outline the recent growth of the oppression of the individual and the inroads which have been made upon constitutional safeguards. It is necessary to mention only three specific cases, because these three cases provide a compendium of the whole regrettable process.

First we have legislation by order in council instead of by parliament. Parliament was prepared to surrender certain of its prerogative controls over governmental activities during war time for the sake of expedition in carrying out war measures. But it is significant to note how rapidly advantage was taken of that initial surrender to multiply and broaden the controls and to instal controllers and other officials with powers quite as wide and in some cases even wider than those of the cabinet to whom the authority was originally delegated.

I can cite one regulation of the wartime prices and trade board, a regulation not an order in council, in which there are nine consecutive paragraphs where the ancient principle, which is perhaps one of the fundamental safeguards of the Canadian citizen, the principle that an accused man is innocent until he is proved guilty, is reversed. This series of provisions was apparently inserted for no other reason than to make easier the tasks of the board's investigators. As a result, every merchant has become suspect. He has but to have a charge preferred against him; he has but to have the finger of suspicion pointed at him by a government investigator to have the onus placed upon him of proving his innocence and of having it made necessary for him to bring forth details of his every act—it may be as far back as 1939—and to show that that act was an innocent act, was not an act which would involve him in guilt, instead of the position being that the investigator who makes the charge has to prove that some specific act falls within the category of the guilt alleged.

This may not seem to be a serious matter. But what it is doing is taking away from the Canadian citizen the right which he has enjoyed for hundreds of years, and placing him in the position of frequently being found guilty merely because he is suspect; not because a case is proved against him, but because he cannot prove his innocence.

Then we have the second instance of the iniquitous order in council that appointed an investigator to inquire into the Eldorado mines. Could there be any more deliberate attack on personal and property rights than this order in council which gives, not only to the commissioner appointed thereunder but to any investigator to whom he chooses to delegate his power, the right to enter, the right to search, the right to seizure and confinement, the right to force a way into premises in order to confine property, books, accounts and papers. Section 4 of that order in council which was passed on September 5, 1945, after the end of both the Japanese and European wars, reads:

> 4. Any such investigator may authorize in writing under his hand any Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer or constable, or any police officer or constable or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, together with any other person named in such writing, to enter and search, if necessary by force, any building, receptacle or place, for books, records, documents or things which may contain or give information required for the purposes of the said inquiry, and to seize any books, records, documents or things and carry them before the investigator or such other person as any such investigator may direct, to be held for the purposes of the said inquiry.

Then, as though their powers were not wide enough, it was provided that, however erroneous their suspicion, however malicious their interference with persons or property and however damaging might be the consequence, physically or financially, of their activities, nevertheless the commissioner and his delegates were to be preserved above and beyond the reach of that law which, according to the provisions, they were empowered to break. Section 8 reads as follows:

> 8. No such investigator shall be responsible at law for anything done by him in good faith in the performance or purported performance of his duties as such investigator and no action shall be taken against any such investigator in respect of the performance or purported performance or the non-performance of his duties as such investigator.

Reading that order in council it is easy for one to see how the lust for power feeds on power and breeds contempt for ordinary and constitutional processes and for the established courts of the land. It is as though the minister, not satisfied with his own powers, would not rest until all his delegates were made dictators in their own right.

Finally we come to the secret and dread order in council passed on October 6 of last year. It is not necessary for me to dwell at length on this particular order or on the iniquities which followed. That has already been done by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The significant thing for the moment is the spectacle of a government, emboldened by its apparent success with each succeeding breach in the fort of constitutional freedom, indulging in the defence which it has made of its actions in thus gorging itself with power.

It is this feature of the trend which we have been discussing which has determined us in concluding that not another moment can be lost before making this effort to regain the lost ground and to preserve our rights to freedom by putting under it the sure and firm foundation of this bill of rights, defined in terms which the common man can understand and so that the common man may be able to know when those rights are placed in jeopardy. It may be said by some that perhaps such a written bill is not in the British tradition. We may be asked if we would have this government adopt the whole of the United States constitution. These questions can be faced confidently, and to those who may be inclined to raise them we would say it is well to recall that the United States constitution was written and the United States bill of rights adopted, one in the course of, and the other at the close of a long and bitter struggle against a cruel and oppressive tyranny.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought the hon. member was going to speak of something that happened in this country.

Mr. FULTON: I will talk in a few minutes about something that happened in this country if the minister will restrain his impatience. Those words were used, Mr. Chairman, because it is evident on reading the history of the American revolution how the denial by King George III of the constitutional and traditional rights enjoyed by his British subjects in England to his subjects in America did constitute to those lovers of freedom a cruel and bitter tyranny. The same rights were at stake then as are at stake here: the right of the individual to habeas corpus, the right of every man not to be arrested and imprisoned without charge and without benefit of counsel and not to be questioned without a full and fair trial, and not to be transported or molested in his person save as a result of that trial. The denial of these rights is the subject of some of the most bitter and burning documents which form the history of the American colonies' struggle for independence. In fact it was the denial of these rights which led those free men to take a step which so many of them detested and which led them to the final irrevocable act of revolution. This was how they felt about freedom. It was these same men who, fresh from that struggle and still burning with the same intensity which moved them to embark on it, wrote into the pages of history that magnificent bill of rights which was to guarantee for their posterity the continuation of the constitution of freedom which they had founded before they started the struggle. We in Canada have not had that struggle. We have not had to fight for our freedom within the country because as a result of the American revolution those in power in England were fortunately wise enough to see that the denial of civil rights and liberties could never again take place. Surely in this significant fact, lies the great reason why we Canadians have so far allowed this trend of the loss of our liberty to continue unchecked. Not having had the passionate struggle, we are not so quick to appreciate that the fruits of victory are being withdrawn.

I appreciate that the ministers opposite are anxious that we should come to grips with perhaps the crux of this matter, that is, particular features of their own administration wherein they have been guilty of these things that we have alleged against them. It is perhaps strange that a government should be so anxious to receive criticism. I shall not hesitate to point out the significant parallel between the action of the British parliament and British ministers and the action of our own ministers here. But before doing so, inasmuch as I am trying to make a case in support of the adoption in Canada of a bill of rights I am going to ask even this government to listen to some of the arguments which were advanced by those who felt that a bill of rights should form part of the United States constitution.

Very much the same arguments were advanced against the incorporation of the bill of rights into the United States constitution as have been advanced against the incorporation of a bill of rights into a statute of this parliament. I should like to quote from the arguments made by the one who was perhaps more responsible than any other for the declaration of American independence and did more than any other to secure the passage and incorporation of their bill of rights. His arguments are so cogent and so pertinent to the situation which now confronts this country that I am going to ask the house to listen to them. I regret that it is necessary to repeat them at some length, but the ministers will see their pertinence, I think, if they will but listen.

It was argued against the necessity of a bill of rights that the rights in question were reserved by the manner in which the federal powers were granted. Jefferson's answer was this:

> The constitutive act may certainly be framed so as to need no declaration of rights. The act itself has the force of a declaration as far as it goes; and if it goes to all material points, nothing more is wanting. . . . But in a constitutive act, which leaves some precious articles unnoticed and raises implications against others, a declaration of rights becomes necessary by way of supplement. This is the case of our federal constitution.

Secondly, it was argued against a bill of rights that experience proves the inefficiency of a bill of rights. Jefferson's answer was:

> True. But though it is not absolutely efficacious under all circumstances, it is of great potency always, and rarely inefficacious. A brace the more will often keep up the building which would have fallen with that brace the less. There is a remarkable difference in the inconveniencies which attend a declaration of rights, and those that attend the want of it. The inconveniences of the declaration are that it may cramp government in its useful exertions. But the evils of this are short-lived, trivial, and reparable. The inconveniences of a want of a declaration are permanent, afflicting, and irreparable. They are in constant progression from bad to worse. The executive in our government is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal, object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures—

Mark those words:

> The tryanny of the legislatures is the more formidable dread at present, and will be for long years. That of the executive will come in its turn, but it will be at a remote period.

It is surely obvious that that period has arrived and that the tyranny of the executive is now being seen in its most dread form.

In conclusion, I come to the question which the Minister of Labour was most anxious for me to discuss, how this is related to what is going on in this country to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope that my hon. friend is not referring to me as a tyrannical person. Just take a look at me.

Mr. FULTON: I do not think I shall do the Minister of Labour that honour at present, although I am not able to look into the recesses of his mind and I would not guarantee that he has not some such trait.

The parallel to which I referred between the American revolution and the present situation in Canada is significant. The American subjects of the then British parliament did not fail to draw to its attention in strong and dignified terms the denials of freedom that were being imposed, as they thought, in the name of the king by his ministers, nor did they hesitate to disclose what the effect of a continuation of these injustices would be. But the king was obsessed by his own power and his ministers dared not oppose him. His only answer was to repeat his actions and to follow injustice with ignominious contempt for the protestations of its victims. Surely the answers which have been given by our ministers in recent days are in very much the same tradition. Their answer is not only a dismissal of the attack, but a blunt and plain statement that, were the conditions to repeat themselves, so would the actions be repeated. That is what the Minister of Reconstruction said in so many words during the last session with reference to the Eldorado order in council. At page 2260 of Hansard of last session the Minister of Reconstruction, when taxed with the unconstitutional aspect of the procedure, replying to the member for Lake Centre, said:

> My hon. friend can make the most of it; he can be as forensic as he likes. Nevertheless we have done what we believed to-day it was necessary to do.

And again:

> Perhaps the court will agree with the hon. member that we are acting ultra vires; perhaps not; but in any event, if I had to do it again I would do exactly the same thing.

In other words, the minister has stated there, in so many words, that no matter what the courts of the land may say with regard to his actions, he will pay no attention but will repeat his actions as often as the circumstances are repeated. It is in the record, and his words were echoed by the Minister of Justice in the course of this session. I would have preferred, and I believe the people of the country would have preferred, to hear the minister use rather the words of the elder Pitt in dealing with very similar circumstances when a commoner of England was on trial for acts inimical to the country. Pitt said on that occasion:

> My lords, for my own part, I consider this individual merely and indifferently as an English subject, possessed of certain rights which the laws have given him and which the laws alone can take from him. I am moved neither by his private vices, nor by his public merits. In his person, though he were the worst, I contend for the safety and security of the best; and God forbid, my lords, that there should be a power in this country of measuring the civil rights of the subject by his moral character or by any other rule than the fixed laws of the land!

It is because we see that principle departed from, and because we feel so strongly that the rights of individuals must be determined in accordance with the fixed laws of the land, that we have moved this amendment to have the rights of the subject defined and guaranteed for all time in Canada in this bill of rights.

Mr. LESAGE: The premises of the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Kamloops, to which we have listened for over an hour, may be summed up, I think, in a very few words which were spoken the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre at page 1146 of Hansard:

[Mr. Fulton.]

> The British North America Act contains no personal safeguards against unwise or discriminatory legislation that might be passed by federal governments.

I submit that what the hon. member said there is an admission that his amendment is wrongly proposed in a bill concerning Canadian citizenship. If the Canadian constitution does not contain sufficient personal safeguards, I suggest that the right move to be taken by the hon. members for Lake Centre and Kamloops would be to propose necessary amendments to the British North America Act and not to a Canadian citizenship bill.

The bill of rights of the United States, the Petition of Right, the Habeas Corpus Act and the Bill of Rights in England are part of the constitutions, respectively, of those countries. It is true that in England the three acts I have mentioned form a written part of the constitution, which for the most part is unwritten. As I have already said, if the hon. gentlemen consider that the constitution does not give sufficient personal safeguards to the citizens they should introduce an amendment to the British North America Act and not to this citizenship bill. Let us see what is designated by the pompous words "bill of rights" used by my hon. friends. I quote:

> 1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.
> 2. Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.
> 3. No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

They are very pompous words—bill of rights—for these few points. Are these the only rights pertaining to Canadian citizenship? What about all the other rights of Canadian citizenship as guaranteed by the constitution, by our own laws? They will not be deemed to be included in the certificate of citizenship? Why omit them? I will tell you why, Mr. Chairman. It is because this amendment is only a political move to try to embarrass the government with things of the past. Hon. members opposite have not lost an opportunity since this parliament met for the first time last year to talk about orders in council. I should have liked to have them sitting on this side of the house just to see what they would have done in the same circumstances when the safety of the state was in danger. I should have liked to see them here, but the people did not like to have them here, and therefore sent them to the other side.

What about the other rights that are guaranteed to us by our constitution, and what about minority rights? Why should they not be deemed to form part of the certificate of citizenship? What about minorities? It is all very well to talk, as the hon. member for Lake Centre did, about the rights of minorities, but should not a large part of the majority cease ignoring the rights of minorities? It is about time. Last year in a speech I delivered I gave a few examples of the way in which our rights were ignored by the majority. What is the proportion of civil servants of French origin now in the civil service of Canada? That is not only an example, it is ample evidence, of the ignoring of the rights of minorities.

An hon. MEMBER: By your government.

Mr. LESAGE: It is not the government but the heads of the civil service and I should like to have an inquiry made. But it is done by a part of the majority. I do not say that all the majority refuse to recognize the rights of minorities, but too many of them do; and unless all the rights of every citizen in Canada are respected, and particularly those of the minority, there cannot possibly be any unity in Canada. I would ask the hon. member for Kamloops particularly to devote to this question the same amount of effort he gave to the study of French in order to be able not only to deliver an excellent speech in French, no, a speech in excellent French, but to try to convince some of his friends of the rights of the minority, as I know he understands them.

Unity in Canada is much more important than the manner in which some of the rights of citizens were mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre in a political speech. It is much more important to deal with Canadian unity in this house than with party politics and I ask the members of the majority to try to understand the feelings and the convictions of the minority. We are here in Canada the minority, and the general opinion of the minority is that there should be a greater amount of autonomy for Canada in the British commonwealth of nations. That is the general opinion.

We have no sentiment outside Canada. We are simply attached to our beloved country and our king, the king of Canada and not the king of any other country. I do not blame anyone, but I quite understand that a great number of the majority have sentiments toward another country. I do not deny them that right; far from it; but I would ask them, when we are discussing in this house the interests of Canada, to be good enough, for the sake of Canadian unity, not to give us arguments in support of the interests of any other country.

I shall give the committee an example. During the course of the discussion on the financial agreement with Great Britain too many members said that it was going to help Great Britain. I am stating cold facts now. Too many members said that. It had an immediate reaction on a great part of the minority who said: "Oh, they are doing this to help Britain; it is not in the interest of Canada." That is a fact which actually happened. The cause of it was a sentiment expressed by the majority, which brought about another kind of sentiment from the minority, and it was a natural reaction. So long as there is sentimentality on the part either of the majority or of the minority there will never be Canadian unity. There will never be Canadian unity until we get together and talk over matters in terms of Canadian interests only. I think that is our duty. We of the minority are on the dividing line. We ask you to meet us half-way because we are waiting for you with our arms outstretched.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad that your eye was this way, Mr. Chairman, in order that I might follow the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, not that I agree with his speech but I agree with the sentiments that he has expressed, namely, that if we are to have a bill of rights let us have it in the right place. It would be a mistake for the people of Canada to assume that their bill of rights was composed of three small sections hidden away in the citizenship bill. I was simply going to agree with my hon. friend in that respect and say that the time has now come when a real bill of rights should be presented. It could work side by side with the citizenship bill, but that is neither here nor there. If we are to have a citizenship bill let us have a real one and let us put it in its proper place.

Mr. BENTLEY: I wish to ask a question before the amendment is put. I want the committee to understand that I am asking for information on a legal matter. It has no bias or political intent to it, but I want the answer from somebody who may be competent to give it. If this amendment carries and Canada becomes involved in a war, would this amending section prevent the War Measures Act from authorizing the government to act by order in council as it did in connection with the spy cases?

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to deal with his question later. At this time I wish to state the position of the government with regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre. May I first of all say to him that as

I listened to his speech, while I could not agree with all of his conclusions, I could not help feeling that I was justified to-night in telling him that I compliment him in large measure on the spirit which prompted him to make the proposal, although for the reasons stated by the hon. member for Macleod I cannot agree to accept it.

Before dealing with the hon. member, may I say that I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Kamloops who argued to-night that the liberties of citizens are sacred. He protests against certain orders in council which, he says, infringe on the rights of citizenship. He says that this was an awful thing to have done. I wonder if I may suggest to the hon. member that his language to-night is, in the light of his language on other occasions, difficult to understand and hardly consistent, to say the least; for it seems from his statements thus far in this and in other debates that if orders in council suit his purpose he is all in favour of them. I refer to a statement he made at page 624 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> The authorities for the orders in council themselves are contained actually in the War Measures Act and, since the first of this year, in the Emergency Powers Act. Most of the criticisms directed against the government for its policy are that this deportation is proposed to be carried out under order in council. It is represented to us that such a procedure is a horrible state of affairs; that to deprive people of their citizenship—that is the way it is put—by order in council is a hideous crime. I submit to hon. members that this is not a true picture. Most of the people affected are not citizens of Canada; that is the first thing.

And so on. He does not argue the merits of the case at all in the quotation to which I have just made reference. He discharges his conscience with the remark that most of the Japanese are not citizens. His words are clear and must leave upon us the implication that those who are can suffer.

Mr. FULTON: The minister is entitled to draw his own conclusion.

Mr. MARTIN: I refer again to another statement of the hon. member on the same page—

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that he read a little farther on.

Mr. MARTIN: At page 624 the hon. member said:

> That being the case, there is nothing horrible, new or deceitful in passing these orders in council.

Mr. FULTON: The minister should read what came before that.

Mr. MARTIN: I am making my speech now. He continued:

> As I say, I feel that the reason is important to point this matter out is, to some extent, to combat the wave of hysteria and ill-considered agitation which is sweeping the country against these orders in council.

Surely these statements speak for themselves. The hon. member cannot be right to-night and be right on the occasions when he looked upon Canadian citizenship in the manner in which these two quotations suggest.

Mr. MITCHELL: How long ago was that?

Mr. MARTIN: I now come to the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Lake Centre. He has raised a matter that, as the minister responsible for this bill, I could not let pass without making some comment and stating at the outset the reasons why I am going to say I cannot accept it.

It should be pointed out first of all that the substance of the proposed amendment is already the law of this land. The matters to which he refers in abbreviated form are basic in the common law, in Magna Charta and in the Bill of Rights, which are the law of this country. These are basic legal concepts and are part of the law of Canada. They lie in the foundation of our whole legal system.

The amendment would provide no guarantees that do not now exist. No act of parliament can limit the action of future parliaments. The power of the governor in council cannot, under the law as it now stands, infringe any of the rights referred to in the amendment. Therefore any future infringements can only be under authority granted by parliament. We much hope that no such authority will ever be granted, but the point to note—and I call it to the attention of the hon. gentleman—is that no guarantee by action here will add anything to the guarantees that now exist. The only way whereby greater guarantees could be given than we now have would be by an organic law that could not be changed by the Canadian parliament. Let us examine the problem as stated by the hon. member. The type of organic law that would be necessary does not exist in our system, which is the British system. It is true that the United States constitution contains in its initial paragraphs a statement which might be called a bill of rights, but I would point out to the committee—and I am not saying this to be in any way disrespectful to a great and friendly power—that this document is an instrument of revolution. It begins with the following words:

> When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a declaration of independence on the part of the American people, which they rightly regard as an important historical document; but it is, as I repeat, a testament of revolution as well as a statement of grievances and of rights. A bill of rights for the Canadian people, as such, of course must differ widely both in concept and in implementation. It is true that in France they, too, have in their constitution a bill of rights, but it is an act which in no way deals with the matter of national status, but rather with the whole matter of civil liberties as concevied by the law of France. But I point out that only such organic laws which limit the capacity of the legislature or of parliament to act provide protection along the lines contemplated in the amendment. There are these famous words of Tennyson, which I think apply to this situation. Referring to Great Britain he said:

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where freedom slowly broadens down
> From precedent to precedent.

That is the character of our system, the system I had in mind in using the words that appear in section 26 of the bill. That is the system which says it is not possible at any given moment to cover the whole ambit of future civil liberties, or even those liberties as they exist at the moment, in such a way that we may not lose any of their implications or endanger possible future important liberties. The best way to deal with them is the way they have been dealt with in our legal system within the commonwealth, by recognizing that these great unwritten powers are as effective in the implicit understandings of the law, rather than being set down categorically in the form of a completely written constitution. But the methods of protection of the individual under our system, based upon British constitutional tradition, are of a different order. The protection under our system depends upon two things: first, the guarantees provided by the common law and set forth in part in Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights; and second, the fundamental democratic tradition and the British operation of parliament itself. Those are the guarantees relied upon in our system, which the government believes to be the best way of guaranteeing the rights and freedom of the subject; for the fact is that while France, the United States and other countries have embedded in their constitutions specific bills of rights, I do not think we, as countries within the commonwealth, need take second place to any country in the world in the protection that historically and indeed currently is afforded to the subject. This was stated by one of the great French commentators on constitutional law, Professor Boutmy, who in his "Studies in Constitutional Law" at page 48 said:

> The French have sought for securities against change in giving prominence, splendour, and dignity to their constitutional documents. The English have found this security in the vagueness of custom, in the retiring and commonplace character of ordinary law, and in leaving their constitution without a name in the midst of a crowd of statutes. Each system has its theoretical advantages and disadvantages. When the balance is struck between the two, experience seems to pronounce in favour of the English system.

Apart altogether from the merits one way or another of the particular amendment, we cannot easily discard the impressive record of history in favour of the British system, as opposed to the continental system, as it is described by Main in his famous book. So that I say these are the guarantees that are relied upon in our system, which have stood the test of time; and if abuse does exist—I am not saying that it does or does not, because the merits of the particular grievance have nothing to do with this debate—the remedy lies not in adopting a course which other countries have found useful for themselves, but in following the course we have decided is best, by leaving these implicit both in the statute and in the common law. These have proved to be the most lasting and effective guarantees of human liberty the world has ever known, and I do not think we would or could gain anything by changing this basis unless we wish to swing over completely to guarantees through organic legislation of the type relied upon by other countries.

But supposing we do wish to change it. If we wished to go over to the organic law approach, certainly this is not the place to do it, as the hon. member for Macleod has said. In the first place, any such change would be a fundamental constitutional departure which should not be done in a subsection of a section which prescribes conditions for the issue of certificates; for even certificates of naturalization, while they have tremendous value, do not deal with the wide problem suggested in the hon. gentleman's amendment. If this house desired to make this change. should it not be done on the basis of a bill by itself, when all aspects could be considered and all the implications noted, a bill which would be the result of mature and careful judgment? This parliament has ratified the charter of the united nations to which in general form are attached the kind of liberties which civilized men the world over want to see subscribed to and guaranteed in so far as that can be done by the new united nations organization. This parliament and this country are not remiss in their faith and belief in those great principles, only some of which have been outlined in the amendment, which are guaranteed and have been guaranteed for centuries by our courts and our system of government in a manner which I think can stand up against any kind of completely written system in any other part of the world.

Another point that has been forgotten by the hon. gentleman in this amendment is that it raises questions of provincial jurisdiction. The substance of the amendment deals primarily with matters of civil rights. These are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. In certain aspects the points concerned might come into the field of federal jurisdiction, but only to a very limited extent having in mind the particular subjects enumerated. So that there are provincial espects of the question which would have to be considered, and these should be examined with great care before any such action is taken.

But there is another great weakness in the amendment. I would point out that the guarantees contemplated in the hon. gentleman's amendment would attach to certificates of naturalization. In other words, they would go to naturalized persons but not to natural-born Canadians. Surely this is a mistaken approach. Surely a bill of rights, a statement of civil liberties, which deals with only one group of citizens and ignores the vast majority of the Canadian family can hardly be said to be an effective statement of civil liberties.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are being very technical there, are you not?

Mr. MARTIN: I am just dealing with the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But you are being very technical.

Mr. MARTIN: It is a very technical matter.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will you permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am speaking for the sake of accuracy. The minister began by citing what one might call the preamble to the United States constitution. If my memory of history is not altogether off the line, the bill of rights became part of that at least two years later. So that in effect the preamble to the constitution had no effect whatsoever, because the bill of rights was an amendment to that constitution. Is that right, historically.

Mr. MARTIN: I think that is right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes. Then, of course, the preamble had nothing to do with the bill of rights which came in some years later.

Mr. MARTIN: Of course what the hon. member has said is historically true. But I do not see how it affects what I said. What I have said is that there are two techniques in the realm of political science by which civil rights are guaranteed. One is the system which seeks to codify those rights, and the other is the system which leaves them unrecited, in part, and leaves them to the protection of institutions of government, including the judicial process as well as to other arms of government.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister permit another question?

Mr. MARTIN: Our experience has been—by "our" experience, I mean the system in common law countries—in common law countries within the British commonwealth that that system has been more effective in guaranteeing the liberty of the subject than any other system. That is the point I had in mind when I sought to indicate the differences between our technique, the non-written or partly written constitution, one relying upon the effectiveness of parliament, rather than leaving it to those who, at a given moment, seek to cover the whole ambit of human liberties.

I pointed out that the amendment ignores the vast majority of Canadian citizens, in that it deals only with naturalized Canadians, and I suggest, of course, that this is a mistaken approach. But if the clause would add any protection—and I am convinced it would not—then that protection should go to all citizens. It should not be for naturalized citizens only.

I have suggested that the amendment deals with too important a matter to allow it to become a subject for debate in an ad hoc way, with wide possibilities for misunderstanding. I have mentioned several reasons why the amendment should not be attached to the bill, and I would list them as follows:

(1) It simply restates what is already the law of the land.

(2) It would not, in reality, add any new guarantee, nor would it strengthen any existing guarantee.

(3) It would be a fundamental departure from British constitutional approach.

(4) There are aspects of provincial jurisdiction that would have to be given careful consideration in connection with such a matter.

(5) As now presented, the amendment would purport to extend guarantees to naturalized persons over and above those that apply for natural-born Canadians.

(6) Finally, a matter of such fundamental importance calls for specific action and, if desired—which I deny—for special legislation. A subsection in a bill of this nature, admittedly an important bill, is no place, as the hon. member for Macleod has said, to deal with a matter that has to do exclusively with the whole field of civil liberties, and not with the one aspect, namely that of the Canadian national status.

On balance, therefore, I feel that the suggestion, while it has been of value in putting forward what is in the hon. member's mind, and while it points to a matter of which we must continue to be aware, if democracy is to survive, cannot be accepted. It would be a mistake, in my judgment, to press the amendment in its present form.

There is no question that a bill involving national status is not a place to incorporate what the hon. member has proposed. But I would point out to him that, assuming otherwise, does he for a moment think he has dealt with those civil liberties which are now protected by our system? He has enumerated a few. What about the many others? The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet mentioned a minute ago one aspect of the problem of Canadian civil liberties not included in the amendment.

One might mention a whole series of liberties now guaranteed by our courts, now implicit in our constitution in this country and throughout the commonwealth, and in other common law countries. They are not enumerated in the amendment offered by the hon. member.

Therefore I say that while in one respect he has perhaps rendered the committee a service, for which I commend him—although I am not admitting his whole argument was relative to the principle of the bill—I must say for the reasons I have given his amendment cannot be accepted.

If, however, he doubts the power of what I am saying with regard to the force of leaving these rights implicit in the law, rather than trying to incorporate them exclusively in a written document, perhaps the committee will permit me to quote one of the greatest authorities on the constitution of British countries, that great and liberal-minded man, Edmund Burke, who made the following remarks in his famous speech on American Conciliation:

> As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship freedom, they will turn their faces towards you. The more they multiply, the more friends you will have; the more ardently they love liberty, the more perfect will be their obedience. Slavery they can have anywhere. It is a weed that grows in every soil. They may have it from Spain, they may have it from Prussia. But until you become lost to all feeling of your true interest and your natural dignity, freedom they can have from none but you. This is the commodity of price of which you have the monopoly. Deny them this participation of freedom and you break that sole bond which originally made and must still preserve the unity of the empire. Do not entertain so weak an imagination as that your registers and your bonds, your affidavits and your sufferances, your dockets and your clearances are what form the great securities of your commerce. Do not dream that your letters of office, and your instructions, and your suspending clauses are the things that hold together the great contexture of the mysterious whole. These things do not make your government. Dead instruments, passive tools as they are, it is the spirit of the English communion that gives all their life and efficacy to them. It is the spirit of the English constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member.
> Is it not the same virtue which does everything for us here in England? Do you imagine then that it is the Land Tax Act which raises your revenue, that it is the annual vote in the committee of supply which gives you your army? Or that it is the mutiny bill which inspires it with bravery and discipline? No! Surely no! It is the love of the people, it is their attachment to their government, from the sense of the deep stake they have in such a glorious institution, which gives you your army and your navy, and infuses into both that liberal obedience, without which your army would be a base rabble, and your navy nothing but rotten timber.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, Burke has stated the value of our technique, and I think he has given us a reason for continuing it, and for not meeting the proposal of the hon. member.

This bill of ours, to which the hon. gentleman has given such great commendation, about to be adopted by all sides of the house, seeks to establish in this country as the paramount status of Canadians the status of Canadian citizenship. It recognizes at the same time their common attachment to a common king. The bill seeks to deal with one important aspect, that of national status. This is not the kind of bill under which to deal with a matter involving something that is apart from the particular incidents and the particular purposes of the bill.

For this and these other reasons I say to the hon. gentleman I cannot accept the amendment. Assuming the method to be desirable, I do not believe this is the place to incorporate the proposal. I do not for a moment agree that the technique suggested is the way to deal with the matter. I say to the hon. gentleman again that we now have in our own law, and have had for centuries, the most effective means of dealing with the problem he has in mind.

Let us then pass this bill, seeking as it does to create what he and the house agree must be created, a feeling of common unity in this country. Let us deal with first matters first. Let us recognize that the great task before us is in this fundamental act of creating something that will give all of us the right to say with pride and with meaning, "I am a Canadian citizen."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, with much of what my hon. friend has said I am in agreement. He has quoted from Burke and he has told of the traditional liberties of the British peoples. He says that we have safeguards here in Canada which will ensure those liberties without a declaration by parliament at this time. He dealt with the unwritten British constitution and the benefits of an unwritten constitution. However, we in Canada have a written constitution, with the exception of those rights which he has referred to so eloquently this evening. I agree with him that so long as the subject has recourse to the courts, so long freedom and liberty will be maintained.

But have we those rights? Have we the right of recourse to the courts when it is denied under order in council? The right of habeas corpus was denied in 1945 under order in council. Where are those prerogative rights which were gained by centuries of sacrifice on the part of British peoples? Where were they in December, 1945, and January, 1946?

I am not going to enter into an argument with him as to whether this bill is the proper medium to have embodied these rights in order to ensure them, but I assert that oratory does not answer the conditions that have prevailed in this country in recent months. I quote, not from Burke of 1790 but from a Liberal newspaper of May, 1946, in regard to how liberty is being maintained in this country. I bring as witness into this house an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 1, 1946, which deals with the situation and answers my hon. friend in words which I could not hope to equal or emulate.

Mr. MARTIN: That is where I got the quotation from Burke.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All I have to say is that my hon. friend did not quote from the issue of May 1, 1946. The editorial is entitled "Star chamber methods". I am not going to name the individual whose case is referred to, but these are the words:

> These are not methods of obtaining information from persons suspected of a crime which can be in any respect justified under British common law. But they are the methods of a police state. They are the methods of a country where individual liberty and individual rights are denied; where they are subject to the caprice and temper of a state which is prepared to reduce its citizens to slavery in order that its will might prevail.
> They are methods, in short, which are intolerable in Canada, and which must not be employed by the government.

That is the advice of a Liberal newspaper to the government of this country and is an answer to my hon. friend. My hon. friend pointed out how the traditional rights of Magna Charta would protect individuals in this country against acts of the crown. Here is what the Free Press says in that regard:

> The basic legal rights of an individual under Magna Charta must be honoured by a government which, for all its virtues, has been strangely lax in this respect.

Strangely lax. Apparently my hon. friend has not been following some of the orders in council, or he would not have been able to deliver the address which he did this evening as a member of a government that has been so unmindful of personal rights. Let me go on to the next quotation:

> The Minister of Justice must recognize that it is one of his most important duties to defend these rights, rather than to destroy them.

Those are the words of a Liberal press to the Minister of Justice who in his position as Minister of Justice has on occasion gone contrary to the principles which he avowed with such vehemence when he was president of the Canadian bar association.

Mr. FRASER: Let him laugh that off.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is all you can do about it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the attitude; laugh it off. That has been the attitude on the part of the government. That was the attitude of the Minister of Reconstruction when he used the words referred to a while ago by the hon. member for Kamloops. That was the attitude of the government in the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance in regard to the unresponsibility of the executive to parliament. I read on:

> What was true in this case was true in the case of almost all the defendants in the current espionage trials.

My hon. friend spoke of the practice in Great Britain. Did anything like this ever happen in Great Britain? Was there ever a case where rights under the constitution were swept aside as they have been here? The editorial continues:

> Contrary to all practice under British common law, they were held incommunicado to the point where they could contact neither their lawyers nor their families.

Mark these words as an answer to the words uttered this evening by my hon. friend:

> They were subjected to star chamber methods that have been abhorrent to democratic peoples for four hundred years.

If I had used those words they would have been called partisan. Canada owes much to the press of this country. The press, regardless of political persuasion, has said to this government that it has gone too far and a halt must be called.

That is why the amendment was placed before the house. We say to the government in the amendment that it has gone far enough; that it has denied habeas corpus and defied democratic principles. The constitution and the unwritten rights of English common law have not been sufficient to protect the rights of the subject. Therefore parliament must speak.

Finally I quote the last paragraph of this editorial:

> These trials in so far as the preliminary investigations are concerned will be held by future generations as a dark episode in the history of the development of Canadian democracy.

Why did I introduce the amendment? In order to carry out the last two lines of that editorial, which reads:

> The public and parliament must see to it that they do not recur.

That is what parliament is for. Are we forever to sit here and allow invasions to take place of the rights of the subject such as have occurred in recent months and recent years? I am not going into detail, but as my hon. friend has raised the whole question I ask, what about the extradition agreement with the United States? It has not been brought before parliament yet because there were too many members of this parliament who were averse to the attitude taken by the government of making Canadian subjects subject to forty-nine laws in the American union, the laws of forty-eight states and of the federal congress. What about the use of the Emergency Powers Act? Parliament gave those powers to the government for economic reasons and the government used them to keep concealed the order in council of last October. The minister stated that they were passed under a secret order in council.

Mr. ABBOTT: Could we discuss citizenship for a change, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is citizenship, the right to those rights which my hon. friend has described so well, the right of recourse to the courts which has been denied over and over again during recent years. Have deputy ministers the right to govern the courts of this land? Let me quote from a letter that I received while I sat here this evening, in which counsel for the Department of National Revenue, in connection with charges laid in Saskatoon last week for infractions of the Income Tax Act, received instructions as follows:

> The action must not be withdrawn unless on instructions from this office under the conditions imposed at that time, and under no circumstances must a delinquent be committed to gaol unless on written instructions of the deputy minister.

I know that hon. gentlemen opposite say that rights are protected because there is recourse to the courts. But that recourse was taken away under the order in council mentioned. That recourse is taken away under many income tax regulations, and we have finally arrived at the stage in this country where deputy ministers issue instructions to a magistrate: You shall not impose any imprisonment without the consent of the deputy minister. Surely those great principles enunciated by my hon. friend should be lived up to in this country. That is the reason for the introduction of this amendment: to bring to the attention of the house the necessity of mobilizing opinion in this house to the end, in the words of the Winnipeg Free Press, that never again will recur in this country the denial of democratic rights; never again will the right to have counsel be denied; never again will individuals be denied that precious right of habeas corpus, without which there can be no freedom.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 8, 1946.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PROBE—REPORT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF PROCEEDINGS IN SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege affecting the carrying out of the obligations of hon. members who may be acting on special committees appointed by the House of Commons. This morning there appeared in the Ottawa Journal this little screed under the headline: "Answer for member cost $4,000 to get":

The war expenditures committee of the Commons—charged with watching for unnecessary expenses—was told Thursday—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the question of privilege raised by the hon. member based on a report made with respect to something which happened in a committee?

Mr. IRVINE: No.

Mr. PROBE: This is a report of the Ottawa Journal of this morning based on the activities of the special war expenditures committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The proper place for the hon. member to raise his question of privilege is in the committee. We could not hear the hon. member in this house on what happened in committee, because we have before the house no report from the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I speak to a point of order? As I understand it, the hon. member is bringing up a matter affecting the privileges of a member of this house, and whether it appears in a reflection upon a committee set up by this house or not, it seems to me that the hon. member has the right to raise a question of privilege affecting himself at any time. I think the hon. member should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PROBE: May I refer Your Honour to citations 192 and 198 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which cover this point most specifically. I continue:

The war expenditures committee of the Commons—charged with watching for unnecessary expenses—was told Thursday one of its own questions to the army had cost about $4,000 for an answer.

Chairman Gordon Isnor (L-Halifax) gave that estimate as the three-inch thick reply was tabled for Captain John Probe (C.C.F.-Regina City).

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is against the rules of the house to quote from newspapers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. COLDWELL: No, no.

Mr. PROBE: I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Mr. Speaker is on his feet; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the question of privilege is based on an article which appeared in a newspaper, I would ask the hon. member not to quote the article, as it is forbidden by paragraph 306, Beauchesne, second edition, but to state his question of privilege.

Mr. COLDWELL: He has to read the article.

Mr. PROBE: The obvious aspersion in this report is that a committee examining economies is itself asking questions that require huge expenditures of public money to answer. The facts as stated to the committee yesterday by the director of ordnance services, army, are that no additional help was employed by the army to provide the answer then requested, and was in effect—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not see any question of privilege in what the hon. member has said. If there is any conflict between what happened in the special committee and what was reported in the newspaper, I would ask him to make the protest before the committee.

Mr. PROBE: In paragraph 198 of Beauchesne's rules and forms the rule is explicit concerning the special committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but I have given a ruling and the hon. member must accept it.

INCOME TAX

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. DIEFENBAKER IN DEBATE ON MAY 7

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement arising out of some remarks made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as recorded at page 1315 of Hansard. The hon. member quoted from a letter he had received pertaining to charges laid in Saskatchewan last week for infractions of the income tax laws. The quotation was as follows:

The action must not be withdrawn unless on instructions from this office under the conditions imposed at that time, and under no circumstances must a delinquent be committed to gaol unless on written instructions of the deputy minister.

The hon. member has entirely misinterpreted the law. The situation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McCANN: —may be described as follows.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker? The minister has no rights at all.

Mr. McCANN: Taxpayers in various parts of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. A few moments ago we had a ruling from you, Mr. Speaker, and now we have a minister of the crown standing up and violating that very ruling. We want to know whether this is a question of privilege, and what is the question of privilege. The minister has no right to make a speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Listen to it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, I have listened to you so long I am tired.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Speaker, I have not asked permission to speak on a question of privilege. I asked permission to make a statement in order to clarify a situation which in my judgment has been misinterpreted, in order that this matter might be cleared up for the benefit of the public throughout the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just raise this point, so that we may be perfectly in order in respect to a discussion of this kind. With great deference to the minister and to yourself, Mr. Speaker, surely this is a question which must come up in the ordinary debate on the citizenship bill, since the matter was brought up during that debate. The ministerial powers which the government are taking upon themselves to make statements in the house at various times are getting quite beyond the rules, and I do not believe they should be allowed to continue.

Mr. SPEAKER: The ruling I gave a few moments ago on a question of privilege applies to ministers just as it applies to other members of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: —but the house will admit that it has been the practice at the opening of a sitting to hear statements by ministers of the crown.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please. I must hear the minister first in order to see whether or not it is a question of privilege.

Mr. GRAYDON: He says it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Or whether it is a statement which should be allowed. Hon. members will agree that before giving a ruling the Speaker must hear what the minister or member has to say.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to help the Speaker maintain the dignity and decorum of this house. They may be assured that I will give justice to both sides.

Mr. HOMUTH: In order to help you maintain the decorum of this house, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member please to resume his seat.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I have the right to rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have the right to rise to a point of order. May I state my point?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order before the house just now. I have said that I will hear the minister first to see whether or not he is in order in making the statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: I object to any rule which stops me from rising to a point of order during debate in this house. I rise to a point of order, which is my privilege as a member of this house. The minister has stated—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have already told the hon. member that there is no point of order before the house just now. The hon. gentleman may be sure that if he wishes to rise to a point of order later, I shall be very happy to hear him.

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, when the minister has done what he wants to do, when he has his statement in the papers. I rise to a point of order now, as is my privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the cooperation of the hon. member. He will understand that if the rulings of the Speaker are not respected, we shall not have any decorum, dignity or order in this house. I would ask him please to keep his seat, and he may be sure that if the minister is not entitled to make this statement he will be stopped in due course.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, the rulings of the Chair must be supported by the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already said there is no point of order before the house, so no hon. member should rise to a point of order. The minister has the floor.

Mr. McCANN: I have not contended, Mr. Speaker, nor do I now contend, that this is a matter of personal privilege, because my name as minister was not mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre. But it has been the custom of the house when an important matter, such as I contend this is, has to be dealt with, that a minister is allowed to make a statement. As a matter of fact on many occasions the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has been given the opportunity of making a statement. I would say that when I have completed my statement the very people—

Mr. BRACKEN: I was never given the right to answer questions raised during debate in this house, at a time when my statement could not be debated.

Mr. McCANN: I will say this, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion when the statement has been made the very people who have objected to it will be glad it has been made in order to clarify a matter which has been the subject not only of criticism here by the hon. member for Lake Centre but of criticism and objection on the part of many people throughout the country.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Speaker, will anybody be allowed to reply to the minister?

Mr. McCANN: In order that there may be continuity to what I say, I shall start again. The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted from a letter which he had received—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It was announced yesterday by the hon. leader of the house that Bill No. 7 would be considered this afternoon, so I believe the hon. minister will have an opportunity to discuss the matter when that order is called later to-day.

Mr. McCANN: I am quite agreeable to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw the attention of the hon. member who raised a question of privilege a few moments ago to Beauchesne, second edition, paragraph 306, which states:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters, or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I hope both sides of the house will now proceed to business.

Mr. STIRLING: On a point of order, would Your Honour be good enough to tell the house by what rule a minister can rise in his place and make a statement dealing with something pertaining to a debate? It has been stated more than once this afternoon that it has become a custom. I quite agree that it has, but I should like to know under what rule such a custom could have developed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would answer the hon. member by saying that there is a very well known rule to be found in the rules and forms of the house which states that Mr. Speaker should not be consulted from the floor of the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF BUDGET TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1946. By leave of the house I move:

> That the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

QUARTZ MINING

CLAIM STAKING PRIVILEGES—GROUPING OF CLAIMS—NON-FORFEITURE OF CLAIMS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 61, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under the present act the maximum number of claims that a person may stake in the same mining district within a period of twenty days is three. It also prevents the proper grouping of claims and prohibits a prospector from protecting an original discovery from encroachment by others. Many representations have been made to the department that the act be amended to allow, as in the province of British Columbia, a prospector to locate a limit of seven claims personally or by attorney in a twelve month period within a distance of ten miles of the original claim, thus permitting him to locate in all eight mineral claims. Sections 1 and 2 of the bill make provision for this.

Section 3 of the bill provides for the grouping of claims.

Section 4 of the bill adds a new section to provide permanent legislation in the place of the order in council passed under the War Measures Act exempting members of the naval, military or air forces from the provisions of the act respecting forfeiture for non-performance of work or non-payment of assessments or rentals.

Sections 6 and 7 of the bill are changes which are necessary in order that the schedules may agree with the proposed new section 53.

Mr. ADAMSON: Are the claims of the same size?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PLACER MINING

NON-FORFEITURE OF CLAIMS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL—SMUGGLING

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 62, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

He said: It is proposed that section 1 of the bill be added to the act in order to give the governor in council power to make regulations exempting members of His Majesty's air, naval and military forces from the provisions of this act respecting forfeiture for non-performance of work, on claims held by them at the time of their enlistment under this act, instead of having to rely on the authority of the War Measures Act. If this proposed amendment and a similar amendment to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act are passed, order in council P.C. 3136 of October 18, 1939 may be revoked upon the making of regulations under this section.

The necessity for the legislation set out in section 2 of the bill arises by reason of improvement in transportation facilities in the Yukon territory. It is now possible to leave the territory by one of several routes. This fact has increased the chances of successfully smuggling gold out of the territory. During the past three years there have been several instances in which gold has been so smuggled. The controller of the Yukon Territory and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have asked that the act be amended to strengthen their hands in preventing this evasion of the law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARIES IN RESPECT OF CERTAIN SMALL AREAS

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 63, respecting the boundaries of certain national parks.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to make minor adjustments in the boundaries of certain national parks to include small areas that have been acquired for park purposes, and in some instances to exclude small areas which surveys have disclosed are no longer required. The national parks to which areas are being added are Banff park, Riding Mountain park, Point Pelee park, Georgian Bay Islands parks and St. Lawrence Islands parks. In the case of Banff park and Riding Mountain park, two small areas have been excluded.

Provision is also being made for establishment of the legal boundary of Kootenay national park as a result of a legal survey having been made setting up the actual boundary of this park.

Mr. CHURCH: We would like to know about the boundaries of some of the parks in Ontario. We have none there. Ontario has been forgotten.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FEEDING STUFFS ACT

BAGGING OR PACKAGING OF WHOLE GRAINS AT STANDARD CONTENT WEIGHTS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 64, to amend the Feeding Stuffs Act, 1937.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GARDINER: This is an amendment having to do with the establishment of the weight of feed which is in bags when it is sold. This question has been up for some time and people have insisted on the weight of the feed being on the bag.

Mr. CHURCH: In the absence of the hon. member for Temiscouata, who is interested, I hope that this does not mean that there will be any more new poisonous gin put on the market.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPENDITURES OF BRITAIN IN CANADA

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the statement of the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 766 of Hansard of April 11, 1946,

1. On what basis did he arrive at calculating "the lower expenditures of Britain here" in 1947?
2. By "expenditures of Britain here" in 1947, did he mean Canadian exports to Britain?
3. How did he figure out that they will be lower?
4. What will the prospective "expenditures of Britain here" or the Canadian exports to Britain be in 1947?
5. Referring to his following statement, how did he calculate "a higher" level of British exports to Canada in 1947?
6. What will they be (a) in 1946 and; (b) in 1947?
7. What will cause the 1947 level to be higher than that of 1946?
8. What goods are expected to be shipped from Britain to Canada in larger quantity in 1947 than in 1946?
9. What goods are expected to be shipped from Canada to Britain in smaller quantity in 1947 than in 1946?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. By discussion with the British authorities.
2. Yes, chiefly payments for goods exported from Canada to Britain but also payments for certain freight and shipping services, interest and dividends on British investments owned by Canadians, certain war services (in 1946 and earlier years), and certain other minor items such as the cost of British government representation and British travel expenditures in Canada.

3. This conclusion was arrived at by a joint examination by British and Canadian authorities of Britain's probable purchasing programme in Canada and Canada's probable ability to supply what Britain might desire to purchase. It is of course only an estimate.

4. United Kingdom expenditures in Canada during 1946 were estimated at $875 to $925 million, including $750 to $800 million for Canadian goods exported to that country. It is impossible to make a satisfactory estimate beyond the present year, but on the basis of the joint examination by British and Canadian authorities, United Kingdom expenditures in Canada during 1947 may be 10 to 15 per cent less than during 1946.

5. The British authorities stated that as they completed the process of converting their economy from a wartime to a peacetime basis and of diverting their manpower from the production of military goods to the production of civilian goods, they would be able to increase their exports to Canada as well as to other countries. These representations were accepted as reasonable by Canadian authorities. Actually British exports have been increasing encouragingly in recent months. The acute shortages of certain types of commodities in the Canadian as in most other markets should assure a demand for an increased volume of imports from Britain.

6. Imports from the United Kingdom may be of the order of $140,000,000 in 1946. It would seem not unreasonable to assume that they might increase in 1947 by as much as 20 to 30 per cent. In addition Canadians will make payments to the United Kingdom on account of freight, interest and dividends, etc., amounting to approximately $175 million during 1946.

7. Chiefly, an increase in the production of British goods for export purposes, based on the greater utilization of manpower, materials and plant facilities for the production of civilian goods for export; and, on the demand side, a condition of shortage in Canada for many types of commodities.

8. The more important examples will probably be woollen and worsted yarns and fabrics, cotton yarns and fabrics, pottery and chinaware, glass and coal, though the United Kingdom expects to be able to bring about a general increase in volume of exports.

9. Mainly food items. It is reasonable to assume that somewhat smaller quantities of food will be available for export from Canada during 1947 for various reasons, including greater consumption at home, and reduced stocks (for example, of wheat). In addition Canada may ship larger quantities of food to countries other than the United Kingdom as other trade channels are restored.

TRAINING OF TEXTILE OPERATORS

Mr. ISNOR:

Is the government financially assisting by part time pay, or otherwise, in training textile operators such as (a) garment makers; (b) garment cutters; (c) pressmen; (d) leather coat stitchers; (e) machine operators?

Mr. MITCHELL: The dominion government has authorized training-on-the-job for ex-service persons in the following occupations: (a) garment makers; (b) garment cutters; (c) press men; (e) machine operators.

There is no specific record of (d) leather coat stitchers being trained on the job, but there are ex-service persons training under that scheme in the classifications of leather goods workers and leather coat workers.

The plan under which the government is assisting the above mentioned veterans is known as the "training-on-the-job" plan. During the period of training, a wage is agreed on, partly paid by the employer and partly by the dominion government. The proportion paid by each is adjusted from time to time, with the employer increasing his share as the trainee becomes more skilled.

TRADE OR APPRENTICE SCHOOLS

Mr. ISNOR:

Is the government of Canada, through the Department of Labour, conducting any trade or apprentice schools for (a) carpenters; (b) plumbers; (c) bricklayers; (d) electricians; (e) painters; (f) plasterers; (g) glazers; (h) sheet metal workers; (i) steamfitters?

Mr. MITCHELL: The government of Canada, in cooperation with the various provinces, is conducting apprenticeship schools for the following trades: (a) carpenters; (b) plumbers; (c) bricklayers; (d) electricians; (e) painters; (f) plasterers; (g) glaziers (included in painting course); (h) sheet metal workers; (i) steamfitters.

Schools are being conducted in all the above trades in all provinces except Prince Edward Island. In Prince Edward Island, although there is no apprenticeship act, classes are being held for carpenters, electricians, plumbers, steamfitters, and sheet metal workers.

3. What are in each case their (a) duties; (b) salaries; (c) date of appointment?

Mr. MARTIN: I wonder if the hon. member would consider allowing this matter to stand, and perhaps I could discuss it with him? The reason I deal with the matter in this way is that to answer the question will involve a great deal of work. If the question is allowed in this particular case there would be no reason why it should not be extended to others. It may be possible to give the hon. gentleman what he wants in a manner that will not take up so much time of the commission staff which is heavily engaged at the moment.

Question stands.

BRITISH FORCES IN EGYPT

REPORT AS TO WITHDRAWAL—CONTROL OF SUEZ CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with a matter of considerable concern to Canada. It arises out of a discussion yesterday in the House of Commons of Great Britain which centered around the announcement of the withdrawal entirely of all British forces from Egypt, which indirectly might weaken the control over the Suez canal as a commonwealth trade route. During the discussions Prime Minister Attlee is reported to have said that this decision was agreed to by the dominion prime ministers. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Did the Prime Minister and this government agree to this decision and, if so, what were the underlying reasons for doing so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): First of all, let me make it perfectly clear that I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend refers, and anything I say must therefore be based on the assumption that the report is correct. My hon. friend said that during the discussion Prime Minister Attlee is reported to have said that this decision was agreed to by the dominion prime ministers; that the discussion centred around the government announcement which proposed the withdrawal entirely of all British forces from Egypt, which indirectly might weaken the control over the Suez canal as a commonwealth trade route.

If Prime Minister Attlee made the statement that the decision was agreed to by the dominion prime ministers, I presume that the prime ministers to whom Prime Minister Attlee was referring would be the prime ministers of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, all of whom are especially interested in the Suez canal route. So far as Canada is concerned, I should like to say that we have not offered any advice whatever to the United Kingdom government on any aspect of these discussions with the Egyptian government, nor have we been a party to any decision such as the one referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the Prime Minister care to have a copy of the report?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wanted to make the position clear for the record. I am not questioning my hon. friend's point; I am protecting both him and myself in the matter of what has come across as a report. We have not the full text of the Prime Minister's announcement, and it is possible he may have indicated who the prime ministers were to whom he was referring as having approved the decision. My hon. friend's question related to Canada. I say that as far as Canada is concerned, neither have we been asked for nor have we given any advice on that question. We have not been a party to the decision.

Mr. BRACKEN: I can give the Prime Minister the report upon which my question was based, if he desires it. However, I think he has answered the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps this little discussion between my hon. friend and myself will help to illustrate the value of adhering to one of the rules in regard to questions. My hon. friend's question, in part, seems to relate more to the giving of information to the house than to seeking an answer to a question. All my hon. friend needed to have asked was whether it is correct that the Canadian government had agreed to this particular decision. I have just said to my hon. friend that I was trying to protect him and myself; I was not agreeing that Prime Minister Attlee had made the statement or that the statement itself is correct. Someone has been kind enough to hand me this moment a copy of the Ottawa Evening Journal of this afternoon, and the heading in broad type is, "Dominions not asked to agree on Egypt. Attlee apologizes for giving house wrong impression."

Mr. BRACKEN: In order that the record may be further clarified, may I say that what I said was that Prime Minister Attlee was reported to have said that this decision was agreed to by the dominion prime ministers.

Mr. CHURCH: Perhaps the Prime Minister will table all the correspondence on this matter, which I referred to before. Without this base and protectorate we would have lost two wars, and the British empire would be a body without arteries. They are necessary for the protection of our trade with the far east. We should have all the correspondence with Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand on this subject. I had intended to move the adjournment of the house on this question, because it is the most important matter we have had before us this session.

INDIA

INVITATION TO EXCHANGE OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS WITH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is a question I have raised twice before in other sessions but the matter now assumes an urgency which prompts me to raise it again. In view of the fact that decisions of far-reaching consequences to Canada and the empire are being made in India, will the government even at this late date consider accepting at once the long-standing invitation of India to exchange high commissioners, so that the senior dominion in the British Commonwealth may be on the ground to observe and to give every possible help in finding a solution to the problem of self-government for India?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, here again may I draw attention to the rules of the house with respect to questions to be asked. I refer to standing order 44 and the following citation No. 349, which appears there at page 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated; nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets or controversial or ironical expressions.

I think my hon. friend's question contravenes that rule in every particular and detail. May I say to him, however, that the government shares the hope and expectation that there will be an exchange of high commissioners between India and Canada in due course.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister's answer a year ago was just about in the same terms as it is to-day. I would ask him to be more definite with respect to the time. If there is some special reason why this matter cannot be discussed, that is another question; otherwise I think the house is entitled to a more definite statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would rather refrain from being too definite in replying to my hon. friend if for one reason only, that in his question in connection with the exchange of high commissioners between India and Canada he stated that the purpose would be for Canada's high commissioner to "observe and to give every possible help in finding a solution to the problem of self-government of India." When we appoint a high commissioner to India from Canada, I should not think it a part of his duties to enter upon a political issue that is one of the bitterest, in some particulars, as between parties in the United Kingdom and as to which there are some differences of opinion as between Great Britain and India and within India itself.

COAL

PRESENT AND PROSPECTIVE POSITIONS AS TO STOCKS AND SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Reconstruction make a statement to the house, either to-day or at an early day, on the coal situation in Canada? I believe that the matter is developing into what may be a very serious emergency, and a statement would be helpful.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The stoppage of work in the United States bituminous coal fields is having a serious effect upon the Canadian position, but owing to the fact that Canadian coal importers and industry usually carry substantial stocks, the impact of the stoppage is somewhat delayed. Imports of United States bituminous coal from April 1 to May 4 have been only 660,000 tons as against 1,915,000 tons in the same period last year. It is expected that substantial shipments will not be available from the United States for some three weeks after work is resumed in the mines. The supply position with regard to this coal is, therefore, in a serious condition.

Certain measures have already been taken by government to protect Canadian industry as far as possible. It is fortunate that many of our large industrial consumers have substantial stockpiles, and, apart from coke and gas plants, most of these large consumers have sufficient coal for two to three months' operations. Some of these industries, however, which have not established stockpiles, and have depended upon regular supplies from the coal docks, are in difficulties. Wholesalers' stocks on the coal docks are rapidly being depleted, and to protect these, a directive was issued by the coal controller on April 18 restricting supply from these stocks to that quantity sufficient for ten days' operation only.

The position of the coke and gas plants is causing concern, as their operation affects the householder through the supply of both gas and coke for domestic heating. A shortage of coal supply to these plants would reduce the quantity of coke available for house heating next winter. Action has been taken by the coal controller to direct supplies of coking coal from the eastern Canada fields to Hamilton to protect the operation of the coke ovens, and to direct supplies of similar coal from Nova Scotia to Montreal for the same purpose. Further supplies will be made available for this purpose as required. The coke ovens have also been instructed to reduce as much as possible their own consumption of coke for gas-making and thus conserve this coke for domestic use next winter.

Canadian railways are protected; they have over two months' supply of coal on hand in stockpiles. It should be remembered, however, that when these piles are depleted it will be difficult to rebuild them to an adequate position.

Canadian bituminous coal is at present available from western Canada and from Nova Scotia, in some quantity, on an emergency basis, to keep industry in the central provinces in operation on a possibly reduced scale. Coal control is ready to direct shipments of these coals where needed.

In the summer, unless production is resumed in the early future, the Canadian position will be very serious, and many industries will have to restrict the scale of their operations. Canadian coal production will be used to the greatest possible extent to alleviate difficulties as they arise.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do I understand the minister to say that there is no report on the anthracite situation at present?

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend knows, there is at present no strike in the anthracite field, but the deliveries of anthracite last year were far below Canadian requirements.

Mr. LOCKHART: They are worse this year.

Mr. HOWE: And they will be worse this year. I think the house may as well know that the prospects for domestic fuel next winter are more alarming than they have been at any time during the past several years. The coal controller is attempting to meet the situation in every way possible—by increasing shipments from western Canada of coal suitable for domestic use, by conserving, all possible production of coke for domestic use, and by attempting to procure a sufficient supply of substitute fuels. But I may say that, from my own point of view, I have been alarmed about the coal situation in other years at this time of year, but I am much more alarmed this year about the supply of domestic coal for next winter than I was at any time during the war years. All I can say is that the government will bend every effort to obtaining fuel for its citizens next winter.

Mr. STEPHENSON: In view of the fact that all members have received considerable correspondence about the supply of coal in western Canada, and we are given to understand that we can supply all our needs from there, will the minister make a statement as to what is the actual situation?

Mr. HOWE: Western coal production is increasing. New mines are being opened up, some under the sponsorship of the government. Every available miner in western Canada is being employed, and the output there is very substantial. Throughout the war years Canada has never been able to produce 50 per cent of her coal requirements from domestic mines, and will not be able to do so this year, in spite of the increased production in western Canada and in Nova Scotia.

Mr. PEARKES: Only last week I was in the city of Nanaimo and attended a meeting of some of the miners. The great handicap to production of coal in that field is the shortage of miners. Can the—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will understand that there can be questions, but not a debate.

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Mines and Resources whether he has yet received the report of the royal commission on coal, and if not, when he expects to receive it. If he is unable to answer to-day, perhaps he would make inquiries so that he will be in a position to inform the house to-morrow when the report will be received.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): My colleague, the Minister of Reconstruction, will answer the question.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the question and have communicated with the royal commission on coal. I have received a reply from Mr. Justice McLaurin, as follows:

Dear Mr. Howe:

With reference to a prospective inquiry in the house as to when the commission's report may be completed, in the chairman's absence from the city, I am pleased to advise that substantial progress has been made in the last month or two, but some months are bound to elapse before the work nears completion.

As you understand, a review of the coal industry is one of recognized magnitude, and the commission is now doing its best to press the work to its earliest possible conclusion.

LUMBER

EFFECT OF EXPORTS ON DOMESTIC SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I wish to ask the Minister of Reconstruction a question based on reliable information which I have just received, that in the city of Prince George, where lumber is manufactured, there is not sufficient for local use. What action, if any, does the government propose to take with a view to checking the flow of lumber exports so as to retain sufficient in Canada for home use?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The policy of the government has been to maintain the flow of exports to historic markets. Throughout the war years we shipped to the United Kingdom, as we are doing now, the same quantity of lumber that was shipped to England in prewar years. We are doing the same to the United States, to Australia, and one or two other markets which have been our historic outlets for a good many years. The remainder of the lumber is being distributed in Canada. The proportion is about three-fifths for Canadian consumption and about two-fifths for export to historic markets. The distribution of the Canadian portion within Canada is organized on the basis of 1941 consumption, which we think is about as fair a method as can be devised, and every community in Canada is receiving its quota of lumber based on its consumption in 1941.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 7, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering an amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, as follows:

That the following words be added to the section as subsection 6: "Such certificate of citizenship shall be deemed to include a Bill of Rights as follows:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.

2. Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.
3. No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards."

Mr. McCANN: Last evening, when this bill No. 7 was being debated, the hon. member for Lake Centre appeared to convey the impression to the public that the deputy minister or the minister directly or indirectly attempted to interfere with the magistrate in the carrying out of his judicial duty. In order to correct that impression I wish to put on the record what is the procedure with reference to the collection of income tax from delinquents:

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted from a letter which he had received pertaining to charges laid in Saskatchewan last week for an infraction of the income tax law. The quotation is as follows:

> The action must not be withdrawn unless on instructions from this office and the conditions imposed at that time, and under no circumstances must a delinquent be committed to gaol unless on the written authority of the deputy minister.

I submit that the hon. member has entirely misinterpreted the letter. The situation in all these cases might be described as follows: Taxpayers in various parts of Canada, having failed to file their income tax returns at the prescribed statutory period, are advised of that fact by the inspector of income tax through the issuance of a normal letter advising the taxpayer that the return has not been received and that it should be filed and requesting him so to do. If this request does not bring in the return, then a further letter is sent in accordance with section 41 of the Income War Tax Act, which provides:

> If the minister, in order to enable him to make an assessment, desires a return from the taxpayer who has not made a return, he may by registered letter demand from such person such return.

The second letter is therefore registered and becomes a formal demand under the terms of the statute. If the addressee still persists in failing to file his return, then he is informed of his breach of the law and advised that he is liable to prosecution in the courts for failure. If this third letter does not bring the required return, an affidavit is prepared of the demand having been made in accordance with the statute, a legal agent is advised to take charge of the case, and an information is laid in the local magistrate's court wherein the charge of failure to comply with the law is set forth. The case in due course comes on for trial and hearing, and if satisfactorily proved the magistrate imposes a fine. It is not unusual for the magistrate to state, "The fine shall be.... (say $250) and on failure to pay.... (a term of imprisonment)." Thereafter if the delinquent fails to pay the fine imposed by the court he stands in jeopardy of imprisonment. The purpose of the last paragraph quoted from the letter of instructions to our legal agent is to preclude him from taking action by way of securing a committal order to have the delinquent imprisoned without first drawing the matter to the attention of the government through the deputy minister and bringing it under consideration as to whether such action should or should not be taken. Or again, the magistrate may impose a fine and say nothing about imprisonment on failure to pay the fine. If the fine is not paid, then the delinquent stands in contempt of court and the legal agent might, in the carrying out of his duties, move for a committal order in respect of the failure. Here again the paragraph quoted is to preclude the legal agent from taking such action without first drawing the matter to the attention of the government through the deputy minister. Hence the statement that the interpretation given by the hon. member is entirely erroneous.

No right whatsoever is taken away from the delinquent, nor could the letter be interpreted in any way as a direction to a magistrate to do this or that in the exercise of his judicial functions; quite the contrary. Whether the paragraph is worded appropriately or not, it is intended and does function to preclude such drastic action being taken without the matter being carefully considered, all the circumstances weighed, and a determination being made as to whether such action should be taken by a legal agent acting on behalf of the crown.

I think that the hon. member should not convey the impression to the public that any deputy minister, or minister, directly or indirectly, attempts to interfere with the magistrate in the carrying out of his judicial duties. I feel quite sure that the hon. member, in the light of this statement and the explanation back of the paragraph, will be willing to admit that that is so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I presume the minister's statement calls upon me to say a word. Every statement I made has now been confirmed by the minister. The case in question was heard in Saskatchewan, where, as I am informed, a taxpayer had been found guilty and the magistrate imposed the penalty of a fine and costs, and in default imprisonment. The legal agent then produced a letter of instructions advising that under no circumstances must the delinquent be committed to gaol except on the written instructions of the deputy minister. I say, sir, that no deputy minister in this country has a right, once a person is placed in the jurisdiction of a court and a penalty imposed, to decide whether or not there shall be imprisonment without his consent or approbation. To say otherwise is to open the door to the nullifying of the rule of law. The statement I made last night was in accordance with the facts. I am glad to have the corroboration of the minister setting forth these facts. I now ask the minister to see to it that henceforth, once a deputy minister or any official has instructed prosecution, from that moment on the deputy minister or any official of the department shall have no further say in the disposition of the case.

Mr. McCANN: I will admit that perhaps the paragraph has been badly worded, and that it is now—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCANN: Just a moment. Now that it has been brought to my attention and the matter has been given consideration it is intended to reword it to the following effect:

It is inappropriate for you (the legal agent) to take any action through the courts against the delinquent with a view to having him committed to gaol without first drawing the proposed action to the attention of this office so that the circumstances may be reviewed before such action is taken.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfect.

Mr. McCANN: Perhaps that will meet the objection. I want to say to the committee, and to the hon. member for Lake Centre, that we are glad to have the suggestions and the cooperation of all members of the committee in order to carry out a very difficult task and to see that all people are dealt with equally before the law.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank the minister.

Mr. BOUCHER: May I, as one who has had five years' experience on the bench in a magistrate's court, suggest to the minister that he do not even send the letter he has now suggested. When a charge is laid in a magistrate's court based on an infringement of the revenue act, or for failure to pay income tax, the penalty is prescribed. In the course of administering justice the magistrate has authority, and almost invariably acts on that authority, to impose on a person found guilty a fine, and an alternative of imprisonment if the fine is not paid. The usual custom is to exact from the guilty person a fine or to commit him to gaol for failure to pay the fine. It is only on rare occasions that the magistrate will agree to give a convicted person time to accumulate money to pay the fine—to go out into the country and earn the money. The result is the magistrate states that the fine must be paid immediately or a term in prison served.

If an official of the Department of National Revenue, under the instructions of the deputy minister, presents the magistrate a letter at the time of the imposition of the sentence saying that he must not commit the individual to prison without the consent of the deputy minister, he is casting a reflection upon the magistrate in the exercise of his statutory duties. When the deputy minister or any official of the department issues instructions for a prosecution he should leave it to the courts to administer the law without suggestions or interference. If further action is taken because the magistrate has defaulted in his responsibility to collect the fine or impose a term in prison, then the department should interfere; but I do not think it would be proper or the part of discretion to issue amended instructions in this particular case, as the minister suggests. It should be left entirely to those appointed by law to administer justice without any instructions from the department.

Mr. McCANN: These instructions go to the legal agent, not to the magistrate.

Mr. BOUCHER: Or to the legal agent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Now that this incident appears to have been cleared up to the satisfaction at least of most of us, as to the propriety of giving instructions to an agent not to try to have a man committed to gaol for delinquency in paying income tax until the matter has been brought to the attention of the department, I may perhaps be permitted to try to clear up some other misconceptions which appear to have arisen in the course of this debate.

In discussing recently what has been called Canada's spy probe a magazine said that Canadian politics, always notorious for paradox, has lately developed a new one. I think the writer was rather modest and that more than one paradox has been lately developed; perhaps among the most surprising was to hear the minister-of-justice-designate in the Conservative opposition's shadow cabinet preaching so vigorously the principles of liberalism with a small "l", but with big outbursts of oratory and of rhetoric. It sounded strange to hear all the great freedoms for which Liberalism has always stood expounded with such accents of undying devotion: freedom of religion; freedom of assembly; respect for the rights of minorities; free access of lawyers to all possible prospective clients; free speech; free press—even, at one moment, hugging to his throbbing bosom the Winnipeg Free Press.

I am not rising to defend any departure from any of the rights and privileges of free men, but I do wish to clear up briefly some of the misapprehensions which hon. members on the other side of the house have been suggesting more than once in debates in this house, in their efforts to make it appear that this government is offending against the rights of free citizens and the rights of a free parliament. I think the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) put a pertinent question to which the Secretary of State, who had the floor at that time, deferred giving an answer. At page 1309 of Hansard the hon. member said:

> I wish to ask a question before the amendment is put. I want the committee to understand that I am asking for information on a legal matter. It has no bias or political intent to it, but I want the answer from somebody who may be competent to give it. If this amendment carries and Canada becomes involved in a war, would this amending section prevent the War Measures Act from authorizing the government to act by order in council as it did in connection with the spy cases?

I suggest that was a pertinent question; and I suggest that the hon. member for Lake Centre and other hon. members who are lawyers know very well that the answer must be in the negative. The inclusion of this amendment in the citizenship bill would do nothing more for the rights of citizens in this country than has been embedded in the constitution of the country ever since the treaty of Paris. Magna charta, the petition of right, the bill of settlement, habeas corpus—all are part of the common law which is embedded in the constitution of this country; and the writing of a few additional words into the text of this citizenship bill would not, and I do not think would be intended to, interfere with what might have to be done and what parliament might wish to have done by those having responsibility to it—responsibility of office and not just mere shadowy responsibility in a shadow cabinet—for the security of the country.

The War Measures Act was passed in this house in 1914. Hon. members know what party was in the majority in the house at that time, what ministry had real responsibility at that time, and what those who had real responsibility felt it was necessary they should do to discharge their responsibility for the security of the country. As a consequence the War Measures Act was passed in the second session of 1914, and has been left on the statute book ever since that date by parliaments in which there were ministries having real responsibility. I doubt whether any hon. member feeling real responsibility for government would ask that this statute be repealed. I hope, as we all hope, that it will never have to be invoked again; but until we are more certain than we can be at present of the success of the organization set up under the name of united nations, I do not think anyone feeling real responsibility would want to remove it from the statute book.

Those principles resulting from magna charta, from the petition of right, the bill of settlement and the habeas corpus act, are great and glorious privileges; but they are privileges which can be and which unfortunately sometimes have to be interfered with by action of parliament or action under the authority of parliament. It was for the purpose of enabling that to be done that those who had the real responsibility in 1914 proposed and had adopted by parliament the provisions of the War Measures Act. At that time there were those who felt that the act might not perhaps have the broad, sweeping effect it was intended to have. When outcries are made here about the removal of habeas corpus, hon. members seem to forget that habeas corpus was invoked against an order in council made under the War Measures Act; that the question became one of wide national interest, and that the decision given by the Supreme Court of Canada in re George Edwin Gray, reported in the 57th volume of the reports of the Supreme Court of Canada, settled for all time the controversy on that point. Mr. George Edwin Gray was not denied the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, but it was decided on the writ that he was legally detained under the provisions of an order in council.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No one disputes that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This decision goes back to July 18, 1918. No one disputes that decision? No one disputes when it is mentioned that it happened, but many dispute the possibility of doing, without becoming a tyrant, that which was done in another case, namely, declaring that anyone detained under another order in council would be deemed to be in legal custody. Not only does the War Measures Act give authority to the governor in council to do these things which may become necessary, but those who belong to a ministry, having the real and not the shadow responsibility, feel that under that act of parliament they have not only powers but duties to perform, and that responsibility for shirking those duties would be a serious matter. When parliament passed the statute it was not merely to give powers to a government; it was with confidence that the government to which those powers were being given would exercise them in such manner as the safety of the state might require. And had parliament not done that, every member of parliament would have had to feel that he himself, through his actions, had responsibility for doing those things for which, under the War Measures Act, he delegated to the members of the government in which the house had confidence and authority and responsibility of parliament.

It is all very well to say that it is a disregard of the great charters to detain or to interrogate a free man without a charge having been laid against him. I have already cited what parliament determined could be done, what was done, what was challenged, what went before the courts, and what was declared by the courts to be the things which under the statute could and should be done.

But even under the common law; all hon. members know the provisions of the common law with respect to coroners' inquests, when violent deaths are brought to the notice of the coroner. In Quebec we codify our laws. The civil code is a codification of all the private laws resulting from customs, precedents and practices. In Quebec they have codified in what is now chapter 22 of the revised statutes of 1941, section 38, a provision in regard to the exercise by the coroner of the common law power. It states:

> Previous to or during the inquest the coroner shall have full power to order the detention, with or without a warrant, of any person or witness whom he may deem necessary, and who, in his opinion, may fail or refuse to be present at the inquest.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was that power also given to coroners in the rest of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the power exercised by coroners in the rest of Canada. It is the power resulting from the common law, but it does not rest on statute in the common law provinces. However in Quebec, in their effort to bring our practice into line with the practice resulting from the body of common law not codified, this is the way it was expressed. And it is well known with respect, for example, to the contention that no man should be asked before a public officer what his name is, unless he has a lawyer with him to tell him what answer he should make.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is the minister sure he is right in his statement of the law respecting coroners outside Quebec? With great respect, I do not think he is.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to pose as an expert on the law outside Quebec; but I am saying that this was an effort made by the legislature of Quebec to have in statutory form what they conceived to be a common law rule. It is well settled by decisions that the coroner is not bound to allow any lawyer to attend his inquest, and that it is only to the extent to which he feels it would be conducive to the better administration of justice that the presence of lawyers is allowed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The reason is that the coroner cannot condemn anyone.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, the debate has already lasted for some considerable time, and I am sure the hon. member will have plenty of opportunity to make his point. However, I was dealing with the suggestion that to have any free man detained or examined without a charge having first been laid against him was a dastardly disregard of the great charters. I thought the hon. member would recognize that in answering that objection I was answering objections made as to the conduct and course of the investigation by the royal commissioners, who have not, any more than the coroner, the right to condemn.

May I refer to other statutory provisions made by parliament in respect of possible restrictions, restraints or diminutions of the exercise, for reasons of state or for other reasons, of these privileges resulting from the great charters. Some of the matters dealt with in this bill are also dealt with in the Immigration Act. Let us see what is provided in that act, which is set out as chapter 93 of the revised statutes of Canada for 1927. I shall not take the time of the house to read the provisions contained in the Immigration Act. The series of events which took place in 1932 is still sufficiently vivid in the minds of those of us who have reached anything like my age, to make it unnecessary to refer to the dry statutory provisions. I would deem it sufficient to refer only to what was said in the house in May of that year with respect to the detention and whisking away from Winnipeg or North Bay, or other places, to Halifax, for examination before a board of enquiry, of certain persons who had been residents of this country.

I turn to page 2658 of the debates of the House of Commons for 1932 where, under the heading "Deportation Cases" a question was asked when the orders of the day were called.

The question, standing in the name of the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late Mr. Woodsworth, was this:

I should like to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) when he will make a statement with regard to the arrest and threatened deportation of Daniel Holmes, Konrad Cessinger and Orton Wade of Winnipeg. There seems to be something curious about this case; a good deal is being made of it by the Winnipeg papers. I should like to know under whose authority these men were arrested and on what charge and where they are to be tried.

Then the Hon. W. A. Gordon, who was acting minister of immigration and colonization—a real minister, and a minister who was responsible for the administration of public affairs at that time, said:

I assume that the persons to whom reference has been made are persons being investigated under the provisions of the Immigration Act. Under this act a duty devolves upon the minister and the officers of the department to see that people in Canada who have no right to be here are investigated by a board of enquiry and their right to be in Canada reviewed. If it is found that they are undesirable and have no right to be here, or if for other reasons contemplated by the statute it seems that they should be returned to their country of origin, the appropriate steps are taken. There has been no change in the practice or policy of the department since I have had the honour of administering it, and the same practice has been followed for years. The provisions of the statute have not been changed in many years.

Mr. COLDWELL: When was that provision put on the statute book?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it was 1920 that the provision which was then being applied was put on the statute book in the form in which it then stood.

Mr. COLDWELL: After the Winnipeg strike?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. In the same volume there is a further reference to this matter when, on the same day, a further question was put to the Minister of Justice of that time as to why he had signed any orders in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who asked the question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Woodsworth; he referred to this matter again, after the dinner recess. This was his question, at page 2683 of Hansard:

There is another matter about which I should like to ask, which we had up in the house today, that is with regard to men who are threatened with deportation. I think the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned in this matter as well as the Department of Immigration.

He then cited a wire and asked on what authority the then Minister of Justice had signed a warrant which allowed men to be thus picked up or snatched away from their homes and taken to Halifax to appear before a board of inquiry which would determine whether or not they had the right to remain in Canada. Mr. Guthrie, in the course of his reply said:

If, in the opinion of the immigration department, men liable to deportation are not desirable subjects of this country, they may be taken into custody pending an investigation of their case. There have been many such investigations, but it does not follow that in every case deportation has followed. I assume the investigation is fairly conducted under the provisions of the law; I have not heard of any cases of hardship, nor have I had complaints of maladministration of the act. I assume in these cases the law has been complied with. If the men to whom my hon. friend refers have committed acts which render them liable to deportation, I have no doubt the provisions of the law will be carried out. If they have not, I do not think they have much to fear, outside of perhaps being put to some inconvenience.

Then lower down on page 2685 the then minister is reported to have said:

The act gives the department the right to hold boards of inquiry where they see fit, and I gather from what the Minister of Immigration has said that this board is being held in Halifax to suit the convenience—

The then minister finally said that when his intervention was requested it was done as a matter of official procedure. Two weeks later, on May 23, on a question again submitted by Mr. Woodsworth on the orders of the day, the report of which appears on page 3249, the matter was again discussed, Mr. Woodsworth saying:

It seems to me to be very unjust and heartless, especially in the case of those men with families, and perhaps the minister could give some information with reference to this case.

Hon. W. A. Gordon (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have not before me the particulars of the case to which reference has been made, but I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is scarcely stating the position correctly when he suggests that people are being whisked away—if that is what he said—

An hon. Member: Snatched away.

Mr. Gordon: —snatched away from their homes and placed under arrest and tried. That is not the position at all. These sections of the Immigration Act under which officials of the department are functioning have been the subject of very considerable debate in this house on a number of occasions. Hon. members who were here in 1910 will remember the debate that then arose when the section of the act as it presently appears in the statutes was brought into being. And in 1919, as some hon. members will recollect, the act was twice amended, in the one session I believe. These amendments were the subject of a good deal of debate in this chamber on a number of occasions, and I believe amendments to the sections in question were passed twice by this chamber. I do not think the amendments received the approval of the other house. Then in 1928, the section as it presently stands, which is a reenactment of the legislation of 1910, was passed by this house, and it sets out the method to be followed in connection with investigations in the cases of those who may be or may have been guilty of an infraction of this law.

These men are not snatched away from their homes; they are not under arrest, although they are in detention, it is quite true.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand the minister is quoting these cases more or less to justify the present procedure; in other words, with the idea that one wrong justifies another?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; I am quoting these cases to show that this is nothing new, that under the authority granted by parliament there is at times interference with what would be the normal exercise of privileges of individuals resulting from the great charter. I quite admit that every time it is done the matter has to be justified on the basis of the case in which it was done.

Not only does parliament give the governor in council the power to do certain things and thereby, by implication, impose upon them the responsibility of doing what the circumstances may require, there are cases where parliament goes to the length of stating in explicit language that the governor in council shall do such and such a thing. The Immigration Act provides for prohibited classes, and section 3 reads:

> No immigrant, passenger or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to enter or land in Canada, or in the case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein who belongs to any of the following classes, hereinafter called "prohibited classes":—
> (q) Persons guilty of espionage with respect to His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies.

Section 42 provides:

> Upon receiving a complaint from any officer, or from any clerk or secretary or other official of a municipality against any person alleged to belong to any prohibited or undesirable class, the minister or the deputy minister or the commissioner may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigrant station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

The provision imposing a duty upon the governor in council is contained in section 9 of the Naturalization Act which it is also proposed shall be repealed by the provisions of this bill. This section reads:

> Where the governor in council, upon the report of the minister, is satisfied that a certificate of naturalization granted by the minister under this act or granted under any naturalization act heretofore in force in Canada has been obtained by false representation or fraud, or by concealment of material circumstances, or that the person to whom the certificate was granted has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty, the governor in council shall by order revoke the certificate.

That was passed by parliament. Not only does it provide that the governor in council can do it, it provides that in the circumstances related it would be the statutory duty of the governor in council to pass the order required. Then entering another field let us look at the Bankruptcy Act. Sections 127 to 138 provide that if a man becomes bankrupt and his creditors are disappointed at his allowing something to happen that was not intended to happen he can be examined under oath and asked to explain how and why some of his creditors are to be exposed to the loss of some dollars. Section 138 of the Bankruptcy Act provides:

> Any person liable to be examined under the provisions of the ten last preceding sections shall be bound to answer all questions relating to the business or property of the debtor, and as to the causes of his insolvency and the dispostion of his assets, and shall not be excused from answering any question on the ground that the answer may tend to criminate the person so examined.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What statute is that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Bankruptcy Act, section 138.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is not the person who is being examined there entitled to the protection of the Canada Evidence Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Apparently not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Against the use of the evidence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not stating it as my opinion that he would not be treated in the same way, but parliament went to the length of saying that he would not be excused from answering questions about the reasons for his insolvency because he might thereby incriminate himself.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister not tell the committee that these examinations are carried on before a court officer and that the bankrupt always has the benefit of counsel.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it is a benefit, I assume counsel may be present. But the position is that the debtor is called upon to explain why it is that this situation of his which was not supposed to happen and which his creditors did not expect to happen, and which may cause his creditors to lose some one or more dollars did come about. It is not only the Canadian parliament that has made this provision because the Bankruptcy Act of 1914, chapter 59 of the statutes of the parliament of the United Kingdom of that year, provides in section 15 for a similar situation there.

Here we have a civil service; we have civil servants sworn to maintain secrecy about the affairs of the state. We got information that secrets of state which were supposed to be safeguarded by those civil servants had found their way into the posesssion of agents of a foreign country. Should we not have the right to ask those civil servants how that came about? Should we not have the right to ask them to explain how that came about? That is just as unexpected to the employer as the happening of bankruptcy is to the creditors of a trader. That also was provided for by parliament and parliament enacted the Inquiries Act. The Inquiries Act provides when and under what conditions a person being examined may have the benefit of counsel. Those sections which provide that the commissioners appointed under the Inquiries Act to make an investigation may, up to a certain point, allow those being examined to have the assistance of counsel and shall at a certain point afterwards, allow them to have the assistance of counsel, were put upon the statute books of this country by an act which was assented to on the 12th of March, 1912. Perhaps there are some hon. members who will remember which party had a majority in this house in the month of March, 1912, and who were those who had real responsibility at that time.

Mr. BENTLEY: It was not the C.C.F. party.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think the C.C.F. was known under that name at least at that time, but I suppose it does not matter very much what the name is. At all events I do not think it was the friends of the hon. member who made the interjection.

In 1939 there was, I suppose, a shadow government across the floor, but it is those on this side of the house who have to take the responsibility for proposing and having adopted a statute known as the Official Secrets Act. But parliament passed it.

Mr. COCKERAM: What date was that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the month of June, 1939. Parliament passed it. I have not looked up the debates to see if it was passed on division, or on a recorded division, but I find it in the statute books as passed in 1939, providing for the repeal of sections 85 and 86 of the criminal code, which related to spying and which were not felt to be sufficiently workable to suit what appeared then to be something not too far in the offing. Parliament provided by section 10 of that statute, chapter 49 of 1939, as follows:

Any person who is found committing an offence under this act, or who is reasonably suspected of having committed, or having attempted to commit, or being about to commit, such an offence, may be arrested without a warrant and detained by any constable or police officer.

I am not free to discuss at this time what has been called the Spy probe. It is still a matter that is sub judice. The final report of the commissioners appointed to make the investigation has not yet been produced. Following that investigation and while it is still proceeding there are cases pending in the courts against former employees, civil servants, of this government, sworn to secrecy and through whom we suspect that official secrets which we know got into foreign hands did get there. But I can say that this criticism about the conduct of the government in connection with this unfortunate incident is a part of those attempts which have frequently been made here to create the impression that this government is offending against individuals and even against parliament itself, that legislation by order in council is something that should never be countenanced in a country which has the benefit of magna charta and the other great charters.

But when it comes down to some of these orders in council we find several members on the other side of the house supporting them and asking that they be applied and carried out. We find also that there is a wave of hysteria trying to be worked up against the making of such orders. I would commend to all those who deplore this hysteria the able argument made by the hon. member for Kamloops in discussing the orders in council dealing with the deportation of persons of the Japanese race. I do not know anything at all about the Japanese race. My fellow Canadians who have been in British Columbia claim that they know a lot about them, and they claim that because of what they know about them it is undesirable that they should be in this country and that all those who can be removed from this country should be removed, and that done as quickly as possible.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Even if they are citizens.

An hon. MEMBER: You don't know the first thing about it.

Mr. BRYCE: We know as much about it as you do.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But with respect to that I commend the argument made by the hon. member for Kamloops, in which he cited chapter and verse and text of the Immigration Act and the Naturalization Act which provided that this could be done, in some cases should be done, by the governor in council, and called attention particularly to the fact that among the undesirables are those who, by the laws of a country at war with this country, are also subjects of the enemy country, and asserted—and I think he was fully justified in making the assertion—that subjects of the Japanese race naturalized here nevertheless by the laws of Japan remained subjects of the enemy country. Japan, though it has surrendered its armed forces to the allies, is still in the position of an enemy of this country. It is stated that even those born of Japanese parents in Canada are by the laws of Japan, Japanese subjects. There is something which raises a serious question.

It is unfortunate that questions of that kind should arise. It is unfortunate that there should be any civilized nation that cannot carry out to the full the spirit and the letter of articles 55 and 56 of the charter of the united nations:

55. With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the united nations shall promote:

a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

b. solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and

c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

56. All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55.

But human nature for a long time has been what it is to-day. The Samaritans of the days of our Lord were people with whom the Jews had no contact or no relations, and the parable of the good Samaritan gets its point precisely from the fact that the Samaritan was one despised by all Jews. Human nature is such that you cannot in an instant make it over; and it is difficult to conceive that a group of persons of the Japanese race, known as our hon. friends from British Columbia who have lived alongside of them say they know them, can become a part of a united community here which would respect to the letter every tittle of this undertaking we have pledged ourselves to carry out under the terms of the charter of the united nations.

I am not advocating that these people should be deported, but I am calling attention to the fact that there do arise situations where general principles have, for other reasons, to be excepted from, departed from, in some cases. It so happens that the War Measures Act is no longer applicable. Anything which might be feared from the exercise of undue authority under the wide delegation of powers from parliament contained in that act cannot happen now. I hope this country may never be in a position when it can happen again. But those who have real responsibility have to discharge such responsibility as results to them from the statutes in the form in which they are from time to time applicable and from the implied responsibility which they put upon those on whom they confer power.

The other paradox which this journalist, in describing the "spy probe" referred to, I think does pretty well characterize the situation. He says:

Liberals were not merely embarrassed, many of them were deeply distressed by the suspension of habeas corpus and the whole business of detention, interrogation and confession, with its strong odour of tyranny. Regardless of the guilt or innocence of the accused, many Liberals feel that the necessity of these extraordinary measures has not yet been demonstrated. And of the cabinet, they're inclined to blame the Minister of Justice for having hearkened too readily to the R.C.M.P. True, all the government did was carry out the recommendation of a royal commission, but Liberals have a sneaking suspicion that the recommendation might have been a little less drastic if it had met more opposition.

I do not agree, but I am not challenging anyone's right to hold that opinion.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the minister reading from?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From the last issue of Maclean's: "Backstage at Ottawa, by The Man with a Notebook." I do not know who the man with a notebook is, but evidently he has seen what has been going on in the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is because he met the woman with a feather duster.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He concludes in this way:

But don't let all the fuss about this civil liberty issue blind you to the fact that it's a purely parliamentary dispute. All parties in the house know that if, by any wild chance, they could have defeated the government on the question of its spy probe procedure, the government could have gone to the country and won a smashing victory.

This may be one reason why the other parties didn't mention the issue in their amendments to the address in reply.

My hon. colleague suggests I do not agree that habeas corpus was suspended. No; I stated on a previous occasion that habeas corpus was not suspended, but the order in council was such that when it was brought before the court and an order in its terms produced before the court, the result would be what the result was in the Gray case, where the habeas corpus writ issued and where it was quashed when the order in council upon which the man's detention had been made was produced to the court on the return.

I have no quarrel with the Winnipeg Free Press. The Free Press has great traditions. It was my privilege to know and to be for a considerable time in the company of its late editor, that great Liberal, Mr. John Dafoe. I know how keenly he felt about this, and how strict he would have been in applying every tittle of that undertaking in the charter of the united nations. I know the respect which he enjoyed of those who have succeeded him, and I am not surprised that they should persist in that attitude. The respect we have for them does not make it necessary for us to share all their views, and need not blind us to the fact that there can arise situations, such as those which the hon. member for Kamloops dealt with so effectively in his argument, which must be taken into account in administering affairs for which one has any responsibility.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I begin by adding my—

An hon. MEMBER: That's a joke.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I might even try that; you cannot tell. I begin by paying my compliment to the hon. member for Kamloops. He must be in a strange position: praised by the Minister of Justice on Wednesday and damned by his colleague the night before. Thus doth politics strange bedfellows make. When one sees two ministers, one relying greatly on him and the other tearing him apart, one can see to what point certain people have been driven in supporting an impossible proposition.

I do not intend to follow the Minister of Justice seriatim in what he said. I am ready to agree with him that the late John Dafoe was a great man, but just what that has to do with this bill I do not know. Apparently the Winnipeg Free Press has been dexterized, or something of that sort since and it now occasionally takes a different point of view.

The minister read from the Bankruptcy Act, but he did not read from the Evidence Act, which I intend to do. Section 5 provides:

> No witness shall be excused from answering any question upon the ground that the answer to such question may tend to criminate him, or may tend to establish his liability to a civil proceeding at the instance of the crown or of any person.

The section which applies is that famous section 5, with which all lawyers are familiar, and which provides protection for the individual unless it be specifically taken away. It provides for the protection of the individual in giving evidence in other proceedings, and he is liable then only for perjury.

Let me go a step further with respect to the Bankruptcy Act because of some practical experience which I have had with it. Even though no protection has been asked for I know that the criminal courts in my province have refused to accept statements by a bankrupt pertaining to charges which were later laid against him. Therefore in that province at least we give him the usual protection.

The Minister of Justice said that if we can have creditors ask questions of a bankrupt—I am not using his exact words—is it not reasonable to suppose that when we had these employees—"we" being the government of Canada, I take it—and learned that they had given information to a foreign power could we not ask them about the matter? Certainly you could. No one has ever doubted for a moment the right of an employer at all times to ask questions of employees in such circumstances. But take a look at the man by the name of Shugar. This is not sub judice at the moment; it is a matter which has been disposed of. It is not merely a matter of asking questions of a suspected person. I hold in my hand a press clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of April 25. This is what he says:

> Kept in absolute ignorance of the reason for his arrest for the first three days of his incarceration, Dr. Shugar said he was kept under constant guard in a small, stifling hot room measuring nine feet by eight feet and in which a two hundred-watt lamp, completely unshaded, burned continually. This lasted for fifteen of the twenty-eight days he was held at Rockcliffe, he said.

From then on he went on a hunger strike, as we all know, and so on. That man appeared before the royal commission. He was charged. The evidence was all brought before the court and a magistrate of this city found what? He found that there was not even sufficient evidence against him to warrant a commital or being remanded for trial. What does that mean? In the language that a layman can understand it means that the crown did not produce sufficient evidence which, if unanswered, might lead a jury to convict. That in very simple and lay language is the rule which guides magistrates.

The minister then went back some years ago. I am quite sure he had some assistance in making the studies of Hansard when his party occupied the benches over here. I am quite sure he has had that, but it will be observed that in each and every case he mentioned it took place in war time. These things were not done in war time. I believe the Gray case came up in Calgary in 1918.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was not the Gray case that was in Hansard. I referred to Hansard of 1932 and it had to do with a period when the same political party was in power.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I realize that. I am going back to the Gray case. If I remember correctly, that came from my own home city. But these were all detentions under a statute. Let me go a step further. I am going to ask the minister this simple question. I appreciated the difficulty that he had when he spoke before. I appreciated his frankness in saying that it gave him very great concern indeed when he had the order made. In view of what happened since, does the minister not think it would have been infinitely better if the other side of his mind had prevailed and the orders had never been signed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister does not agree. He had to take a grave responsibility, but still feels that it would have been a greater responsibility, in view of the existence of provisions which enabled to be done that which was being recommended to him, to refuse to do it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then why the reluctance to sign the order? The minister never had any doubt about it, apparently.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did give it serious consideration, because in my case at least when a serious matter has to be decided I do not just jump at the decision; I turn over the arguments for and against it and try to come to a reasoned as well as a reasonable decision.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In other words, the minister does the same as everyone else tries to do in coming to a conclusion; he tries to give it some thought.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With the great oration the minister made just now that is how he came to the conclusion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member was giving the impression that I never had any hesitancy about it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I thought the minister used the word "reluctance" some time ago. I believe he did. However, we shall let that part of it pass.

I shall now turn to the bill itself. The impression has been given that here we are doing something contrary to what has been done in the United Kingdom. I wish to clear that up by reading a short extract from the eleventh edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," volume III, page 943. The extract is headed:

Bill of Rights.

On February 13, 1689, the declaration of right was delivered by the lords and commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange, afterwards William III and Mary.

In December, 1689, the rights claimed by the declaration were enacted with some alteration by the bill of rights, next to Magna Charta, the greatest landmark in the constitutional history of England and the nearest approach to the written constitutions of other countries.

The reason I read that is this. We have been told that we have all these rights by common law, and so on; but in the mother of parliaments it is a matter of a statute, and has been so for one hundred and fifty years. I am not suggesting that the British legislation is in the exact form of the amendment moved here, but let us get away from this idea that there is anything wrong in putting in statutory form a bill of rights which, as far as personal liberty is concerned, is all the hon. member for Lake Centre has been trying to do.

I very much enjoyed the address of the Minister of Justice in which he poked fun at the hon. member for Lake Centre. I was glad the minister promoted the hon. member to be Minister of Justice, and I am inclined to think the promotion will become a fact perhaps just a little sooner than many of us anticipate. The minister being at the moment the substance and we the shadow, I am sure he will agree that when the hon. member for Lake Centre becomes the substance he will make a very fine minister indeed. I am sure everyone will agree with that. But all this amusement, which caused great applause from hon. gentlemen opposite; this statement that you are the substance and we the shadow simply amounts to this, that you are in and we are out. We know that, and quite frankly we tried to get in but failed. Is there anything more to be said about it than that? But it does not mean for one moment that, being the shadow, we here do not accept our responsibilities, particularly in public utterances about statutes of this country, just as seriously as anyone on that side of the house. Democracy means, of course, that you must have an opposition. I am sure the Secretary of State is grateful to hon. members on this side for two suggestions which he has adopted by way of amendment to his bill, one coming from this party and one from the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

I do say this, Mr. Chairman, and with it I am going to close. We on this side have constituencies as well as hon. gentlemen opposite. We also try to represent all the people of Canada, just the same as hon. gentlemen opposite do. The newspaper which the hon. gentleman read said they would have won a wonderful or a smashing victory; and public sentiment at that time being uneducated and not knowing the facts, I believe there was some justification for that view.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That may be amusing, but I am just giving you a few facts. I am glad you are laughing over them and not crying; that time has not yet come. With respect, however, I say that we have advanced this suggestion seriously. We had hoped the minister would accept it. I know it is outworn, but we believed that in the so-called spy cases things were disregarded which should not have been disregarded. So that when this bill does pass we say, please believe that we have contributed our share. No citizenship bill should be political, and we here have not approached it in that way.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I always listen to the Minister of Justice with respect and admiration, but to-day he was disappointing. The mountain groaned in the pangs of birth and lo! a mouse was born. The right hon. gentleman gave me the impression of shadow-boxing, but he could not locate the shadow; his footwork was slow. The burden of part of his remarks was to the effect that there was nothing new in the interference by parliament with the citizens. That I concede. As far as these spy cases go, however, we are objecting to the interference with the citizen by the executive, without parliament knowing anything about the matter. However, I shall deal with that a little later on.

There is a confusion of thought among certain hon. members to my right which I should like to see cleared up. The hon. member for Kamloops, to whom I refer again, said yesterday in all sincerity, I take it, as reported at page 1304 of Hansard:

> We have always regarded ourselves as free men. We have taken it for granted that ours is a heritage of freedom. Ours is the proud attribute of those who can say, "We are free, and no man can impose on our rights unless we consent." That surely is one of the greatest possible attributes of Canadian citizenship.

I quite agree, but as far as I am concerned that applies to all Canadian citizens, no matter what their colour, their creed or their sex, and in the mind of the hon. member for Kamloops I do not think that does apply to all Canadian citizens. That is where the confusion of thought arises. In this party to my right are certain members from British Columbia who will wholeheartedly support the hon. member for Lake Centre in his justifiable demand for a bill of rights, and who then will turn around when we get to section 16 or so of the bill and demand that Canadian citizens be deported from this country. How can they reconcile this in their own minds? There is only one way of achieving some sort of reconciliation, and I put it up to the leader of the opposition. I hope this will be drawn to his attention; I do not see him in the house at the moment. I put it up to the leader of the official opposition that it is his responsibility to this parliament and to Canada to state explicitly the policy of his party in regard to the deportation of Canadians of Japanese descent. I want to know where we stand on this business of citizenship, because there has been a lot of hot air about it in this house. I want to know, too, where the Liberal party stands. The Minister of Justice said he was not advocating that the Japanese should be deported. What does the government advocate? We know what the Minister of Veterans Affairs advocates. We do not know what the Minister of Justice advocates. I think we know that the Secretary of State would oppose the deportation of Canadian citizens, if we are to believe his words as they appear in Hansard. All right, then; I think it is the responsibility of the government of Canada to state here definitely what is to happen to Canadian citizens of Japanese descent. Either this act of citizenship means something or it means nothing; and if it means nothing let us tear it up and stop wasting the time of this house and of the country.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I thought he put up an excellent case indeed, and no one could question his sincerity on the matter of fundamental civil rights or the rights of any citizens at all. But when he was asking for this bill of rights thoughts were running through my mind. Was he speaking for his party to-day? Had he forgotten the history of his party, how time after time it has taken away the rights of Canadian citizens? Might I remind him of what happened in 1919, before the Progressive Conservative party had its face lifted. I would remind the hon. gentleman that in that year Mr. Meighen, who was a member of the government and who afterward rose to the prominence of leader of the Conservative party, had to deal with a situation in Winnipeg known as the general strike. On one occasion during that strike ten Canadian citizens were arrested, and what did Mr. Meighen do? He sent a wire to Winnipeg the contents of which were as follows:

> Notwithstanding any doubt I have as to the technical legality of the arrest and detention at Stony Mountain, I feel that rapid deportation is the best course, now that the arrests have been made; and later we can consider ratification.

That was the concept of justice, democracy, citizenship—call it what you like—of Mr. Meighen in 1919. A man would be arrested and thrown into prison; and after that the government would validate these actions. That was the time, may I remind the house, when the founder of the C.C.F., the late Mr. Woodsworth, was arrested. I believe I should tell the house, in the speech he made at Winnipeg, his actual quotation from Isaiah—and for this he was arrested and charged with seditious libel—was: "And they shall build houses, and inhabit them." I think that text ought to be given to the Minister of Reconstruction.

The Minister of Justice dealt with the amendments of 1919 to the Immigration Act. I should like to quote from page 4017 of Hansard for 1926 when my predecessor in the constituency of Winnipeg North, Mr. Heaps, spoke. Might I add that Mr. Heaps was one of those who suffered in 1919. In connection with the amendment to the Immigration Act he said:

> A bill which was introduced in this house which took away from a British subject the right of trial by jury, one of the foundation-stones on which the whole system of British jurisprudence has been built up in the course of many a century. Yet it received all its readings and was passed in the course of twenty minutes. The bill was passed in another house in an equally brief period. Its enactment into law therefore took only the short space of forty minutes. Under that act men in Winnipeg were arrested and were to be deported.

And Mr. Manion, trying to allot the blame fairly, said, as reported on the same page:

> In fairness to the Conservative members in this house, is it not true that in respect to that bill which my hon. friend says passed the house in twenty minutes—I was a member of the house at the time—there was not only no protest from the Conservatives, but no protest from the Liberals or the Progressives at that time?

You were all in it. All parties in the house took away the liberties of citizens in 1919. Have you changed so much in these intervening years? Are the faces so new, or are the names or the labels new? We have no guarantee at all that such a thing will not happen again, given another wave of hysteria in this country. That is why it is essential that, despite our common law, despite magna charta and habeas corpus we must have some protection for Canadian citizens in this country, and a bill of rights might perhaps give some protection additional to that which now exists.

Speaking in the debate yesterday, the Secretary of State quoted Tennyson:

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where freedom slowly broadens down
> From precedent to precedent.

That poem referred to Great Britain. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, suggests that it be brought up to date, amended, and applied to Canada, in which event there might be a slight change:

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where freedom slowly narrows down
> From order in council to order in council.

Mr. MARTIN: Not quite as good poetry as the one the hon. member quoted first.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not quite as good a poet, either.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to deal briefly with this order in council P.C. 6444. Here was a secret order in council under which the government arrested certain Canadian citizens. It has been said in the house that there were no such things as secret orders in council. The Minister of Justice said that he forgot—and I accept his word, without reservation whatsoever. He forgot. But how many lapses of ministerial memory will occur in the future? Furthermore, can we possibly legislate against such lapses, in the hope of securing safety for citizens in Canada? I doubt it very much.

These people were arrested and held in a barracks, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West. Some of them were held in a small room, with a bright light blazing on them all the time, day and night, although this was denied in the house, too. Well, if that is British justice, if that is Canadian fair play, I do not know the meaning of the words, at all.

I should like to remind the committee of what the Minister of Justice said when he was talking about coroners. He said that the Royal Commission had no more right than a coroner to condemn those in custody. But what were the words of those estimable gentlemen who make up this royal commission?

> We were not impressed by the demeanour of Shugar or by his denial, which we do not accept. In our view we think he knows more than he was prepared to disclose.

The magistrate said there was no ground upon which a prosecution could properly be brought, and he very properly rebuked two of our supreme court judges. But these judges had already given their decision against this man whom the magistrate found innocent.

Of course we need some security for people in this country, greater security than I think this government is prepared to give us.

Another statement made last night by the minister was this:

> The protection under our system depends upon two things: first, the guarantees provided by the common law and set forth in part in Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights; and second, the fundamental democratic tradition and the British operation of parliament itself. Those are the guarantees relied upon in our system, which the government believes to be the best way of guaranteeing the rights and freedom of the subject.

That is lovely, but it means nothing. In the first speech I made in the house I directed most of my remarks to the Minister of Mines and Resources, who is responsible for immigration. I said then that the practice of this government so far as immigration was concerned was to have different classifications for citizens coming to this country. You had preferred types; you had non-prefererd types, and even those lower than non-preferred who could come in only under special permits—the Turks, Italians, Armenians and Jews.

When I hear a government espousing a citizenship bill, and asking that the rights and privileges of citizens be observed, while at the same time denying those rights and privileges in such a flagrant way, I have my doubts about the good faith of that government, even though I can accept the word of the minister. As a matter of fact, however, I do not accept the word of the government in this regard, because I believe they will flout democratic principles whenever they feel like it.

The Secretary of State, like the Minister of Justice, spoke of these great freedoms for which Liberalism always stood. Then the minister went on to mention the Japanese question, and showed how Liberalism had desecrated its own principles. I have asked the leader of the official opposition to make a statement of the policy of his party with respect to Japanese-Canadians. I should like to see the leader of the house do the same thing.

Before this debate is concluded I should like to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources tell the house that discrimination in connection with the immigration laws will no longer be permitted—or will this bill be just another pharisaical presentation to the house?

I would refer to a speech I made last September, when I asked that there should be a bill of rights. I had been in the house for only two weeks, and I was optimistic. I thought the Liberal government might possibly see some reason in a bill of rights. Now I admit that the possibility of amending the constitution is something more than remote, so that we shall have to incorporate such a bill of rights in legislation.

When speaking on second reading of this bill I said that we should have a bill of rights. When the hon. member for Lake Centre introduced his amendment I thought it was one I could support. But a more careful consideration of the matter and a more careful reading of his amendment convince me that it is one which I cannot support. It is not because I disagree completely with the principle contained in the words of the amendment, for I find myself in agreement with much of what is said; what I disagree with is the narrowness and restrictiveness of the amendment. A bill of rights surely cannot apply only to a small group of people in the community; a bill of rights should apply to every man, woman and child in the country. This amendment would have the effect of making its principles apply only to those who receive certificates of citizenship and, to my mind, that is too narrow and too restricted. It does not constitute a general bill of rights because of its restrictiveness, and on that basis I shall have to oppose it.

I think the hon. member for Lake Centre and I see eye-to-eye on many things in this bill. It is no secret that I intended to move an amendment to the preamble of the bill, where I thought such an amendment properly belonged. The amendment was to have been as follows:

> Whereas this act establishes Canadian citizenship it is deemed advisable to reaffirm the bases of that citizenship and to assert that the following rights shall belong to every Canadian and shall be held inviolate—the right to civil, religious and political liberty; the right to freedom of the person, of speech and associaton; the right to equal treatment before the law:

I would suggest to the hon. member for Lake Centre that he consider withdrawing his amendment and substituting the one I have just read. There would be nothing unusual in having such an amendment to the preamble. After all, we did a similar thing in connection with the united nations charter which we accepted last year by which we pledged ourselves to reaffirm our faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and the worth of the human person, and in equal rights for mankind. If it were agreed that such a declaration of faith be made to the world, then to that extent we should make the same affirmation of faith to the people of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Reference has been made to the revocation of naturalization certificates which it is provided may be done through the courts or by a commission. I should like to know the position of a British subject by naturalization granted in Great Britain or in Australia or in New Zealand. Have we the right to ask the court here to revoke that naturalization certificate? Have we the right to revoke it ourselves?

Mr. MARTIN: Section 25 provides for their concurrence.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wanted to be clear on that. What we would have to do would be to consult the government of the United Kingdom, for instance, and if they concurred, then this action would be proceeded with?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, while I will support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I should like to point out an important historical fact. Last night the Secretary of State said that it is the law of the land at the present time. It is not the law of the land at the present time. The law regarding freedom is not based on the different charters we have had down through the ages, from the time of the famous man referred to by the hon. member for Davenport, Paul; we have had all these charters and agreements, but they do not mean anything.

The freedom of the world is dependent upon one agency and one agency alone. Modern and the greatest history writers, such as that great man who died the other day, who was a Gifford lecturer at Glasgow university, W. MacNeil Dixon, have acknowledged this fact, also S. L. Gardiner and H. A. L. Fisher. Freedom from fear, freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of the seas are due to one agency alone, God's greatest gift to humanity, the British fleet. That fleet gave, by supremacy of the seas in the days of Philip, Louis XIV, Napoleon and twice during our own generation, these freedoms to the world. That fleet saved us from the awful horrors of the last war that we would have suffered had our land been invaded.

The amendment is a commendable one. The second point raised is that habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament. I have introduced a bill to amend the Judges Act which would prevent judges from acting on these political commissions. I was out of the chamber last night for a couple of minutes when it was called again. In many police and other courts throughout the land soldiers have been tried without having counsel. This has happened notwithstanding what was said last year by the former member for Parry Sound and others about what the various bar associations were doing.

All the protection of the Atlantic charter and other paper freedoms that has been provided by this great agency is being thrown now at the Suez to the four winds of heaven. We are getting ready to give up the greatest base there in the world, a base which saved us in two great wars. The government has no policy. What is the use of talking about the freedoms of the Atlantic charter when the government has no policy of real consultation and cooperation, and is ready to throw these things to the four winds of heaven?

There are certain men in England who from their speeches in and out of parliament have said that the British empire, having fulfilled its mission, should pass away and be liquidated. Men such as Cripps, Morrison, Attlee and all the rest of them want to liquidate the British empire. I viewed with a great deal of alarm the Suez canal statement that was made this afternoon because it means danger for all our freedoms. The members of the Attlee government were wrong before and they are wrong now. There is only one way to protect our freedom, the use and maintenance of the agency which I have named, the freedom of the seas.

These are my views. They are sincere views which I have expressed consistently. I have said what I believe to be the truth. I have said it both in and out of the house. All the charters in the world will not secure our freedoms. This citizenship bill should be consigned to the archives, earth to earth, dust to dust and ashes to ashes, forever and forever, in the sure and certain hope that as far as hon. gentlemen across the chamber are concerned it will never be resurrected again because the people do not believe in it.

After all, citizenship is largely a municipal and provincial matter. Naturalization and immigration are under federal jurisdiction, but true citizenship belongs to the community in which one is raised. While I have respect for the views of other hon. members, these are the views which I have expressed at other times in the house. While I will support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I believe what should be done is to bring in another bill. Here we have this citizenship bill introduced almost in the dying hours of the session, in the ninth week, just to mark time and hold up the important business of the house. This bill amounts to nothing, because nothing plus nothing equals nothing.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that several references have been made this afternoon to my remarks with regard to the Japanese, because it allows a reference to them now to remove from the committee an impression which may have been left as a result of the extraordinary distortion of my statements which was made by the Secretary of State in his speech last night. He said, as reported at page 1310 of Hansard, after having read a statement of my own:

He discharges his conscience with the remark that most of the Japanese are not citizens.

The Secretary of State was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South to read a little farther on, but this the minister refused to do. The purpose of the remarks which the minister quoted was to show that the steps proposed by the government under order in council were not steps against Canadian citizens. That was the whole case. Whether it be right or wrong is a different matter. My whole case was founded on the assumption that the Japanese dealt with are not Canadian citizens. The minister was pressed to continue the quotation but he did not, so that I will now complete the quotation for him by adding the sentences immediately following. After having said that most of the Japanese affected are not citizens of Canada, I went on to say:

They are not being deprived of their citizenship by order in council. I would be among the first to object to such a step.

But when the minister came to those two sentences, instead of reading them, he said, "and so on." I am not going to impute motives. I merely repeat the remarks now and draw attention to the fact also that therein may be found the answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

The second quotation from my speech that was made by the minister was taken from page 624 of Hansard. Again he was pressed by myself to give the whole of the quotation, but this he refused to do, saying "I am making my speech now." I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not strictly acurate, because the minister was making my speech—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Making it over.

Mr. FULTON: —and distorting it, or as my hon. friend, the member for Lake Centre says, making it over. I do not object to the minister reading a passage from my speech if he will read the whole of it.

Mr. HOMUTH: It might do him a lot of good.

Mr. FULTON: The remarks which I made, and which were not quoted by the minister, were based on my thesis that the people sought to be deported are not Canadian citizens. The minister just read those portions which suited his desire, and since he refused to continue the quotation when pressed to do so, I will now read it for him. I said, as reported at page 624 of Hansard:

I think hon. members and the people generally should bear this in mind also when dealing with this matter, that the weight of evidence is to the effect that many of the Japanese evicted by these orders of deportation were certainly not subjects or citizens.

That is the point I was trying to make, and that is the point I repeat here, that the government in these orders in council is not taking a step which affects the status of Canadian citizens. Therefore there can be nothing inconsistent in subsequently saying that the government must not in future take steps by order in council to affect the status of a Canadian citizen.

In case there should be any further doubt in the minister's mind, I should like to read my further words, which were equally available to the minister had he desired to present a fair picture to the committee. I said, as reported at page 1154 of Hansard:

I have asked continually that the members from British Columbia be given a fair opportunity to state their case against the Japanese in order that this parliament of Canada may decide the matter on principles of justice.

Those words speak for themselves and it is not desirable to enter into further controversy over this matter, though it should be said that I restrain myself from doing so only by the rules of the house forbidding me to impute motives to another hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I was hoping that the question of Canadians of Japanese origin would be discussed on another occasion and be decided by the house. I hope that the government will find some way of bringing the matter before the house so that there can be a completely free vote of the house on this question. I know perfectly well that there are hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house who feel that the bill as now redrafted with the amendment confirming certain orders in council will embarrass them perhaps more than they desire to be embarrassed.

I said that I hoped the Japanese question could be discussed on another occasion. My opinion, and I have stated it on a number of occasions, is this, that any person in this country who has been proved by the courts of this land to be guilty of disloyalty or sedition should be dealt with according to Canadian law and that we should not penalize a whole people on account of their racial origin. I state that without fear of being termed anti-democratic, for I believe it is the democratic point of view.

I welcome this citizenship bill, not because I think it will do all that we desire, but because it is a step in the right direction. I am very much in support of the idea of incorporating in the bill something in the nature of an expression of the rights of a Canadian citizen. Like my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I was impressed last evening by the argument that this bill did not cover all classes of our citizenship and that a very large proportion of our citizens are not covered by the proposed amendment; that is to say, the native Canadian born. That, I think, is a grave defect in the amendment, which at first I was prepared to support.

I think the suggestion made this afternoon with regard to the preamble is a good one. The preamble, of course, is not a part of the statute, but none the less it serves to guide those who subsequently interpret the law. However, the difficulty that confronts one is this: If the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre is defeated, can a similar amendment be moved to the preamble? I am not sure as to the procedure. I do not want to risk losing the opportunity to incorporate somewhere in the bill an expression of the rights of a Canadian citizen.

As has been so often stated in the house during the past few days, there have been times when governments have seriously interfered with the rights of Canadian citizenship, and one of the reasons why I am in favour of a certificate being given to all those who come into this country to live here is that I think it is well they should have something to show that they are domiciled in Canada. During the debate to-day I was thinking of an old friend of mine who in 1919 happened to be a resident of Winnipeg. He was not involved in any way in the strike. One day the immigration authorities sent him a registered letter ordering him to appear to show why he should not be deported; he appeared, and he was told that he had been in some way implicated in the strike and that they had decided they were going to deport him. "But", he said, "I am an Englishman; I was born in England." Then he was told, "That makes it all the easier to deport you." Well, he went to a lawyer. The lawyer is still in Winnipeg, and my friend to whom I refer as a good friend is still living in Canada and, as a matter of fact, was a few years ago the highly respected member of a large city school board, an outstanding educationist, and subsequently chairman of that board. The lawyer said, "Have you not forgotten something?" He asked, "What have I forgotten?" "Some years ago", said the lawyer, "you wanted to vote, and they asked you for a birth certificate to prove that you were a British subject, and you could not produce a birth certificate." The reason my friend could not produce a birth certificate was that his parents had been immigrants into Great Britain; he happened to have been born shortly after they arrived and his birth was never registered.

Mr. MARTIN: There are thousands of cases like that.

Mr. COLDWELL: So the lawyer suggested to him that he apply for naturalization; and he got his Canadian naturalization papers. My friend, who has a keen sense of humour, received a notice that on a certain day he was to report at the C.P.R. station in Winnipeg. He did so; he was ordered into a room, and then the commissioner, who at that time I believe was Mr. Jolliffe—

Mr. MARTIN: And still is.

Mr. COLDWELL: —said to him, "You are going to be deported." Another man said to him, "What is your objection to going?" He said, "I happen to be an Englishman, born in England", and this minor official said to him, "Oh, well, we have got one of you Englishmen where we want you. You will go back to England." Then my good friend casually put his hand in his pocket and pulled out his Canadian naturalization papers. It was found that, with these papers, he could not be deported, and he went back home and stayed in Winnipeg.

This afternoon other cases have been mentioned. Another good friend of mine, English-born, was arrested and put in gaol. He even went to the expense of sending his family back to Great Britain. As a matter of fact, if I may divulge this, his son is at present acting as my secretary, and as a little shaver in England saw his father on the screen under arrest in the city of Winnipeg and called out in the theatre, "That's my dad".

I am glad that these certificates are to be issued to all our people. I know there is some objection to the five-year period for those who come from democratic countries with institutions similar to our own. I can sympathize with that feeling. We might perhaps have worded the bill that the application may be made within the five-year period.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or follow the Australian act.

Mr. MARTIN: The Australian act is the same as ours.

Mr. COLDWELL: These certificates will in my opinion, be of great value to people who come here from abroad. As one who was not born in this country but who became domiciled here by long residence, I should be proud, although it is not necessary for me to get such a certificate, that I had been able to get it within five years of having come to this country. I think those of us who were born across the seas in the old land would have been proud to have had something to show that we had been received formally into the Canadian family. To my mind, this objection to some of these clauses is more or less beside the point. It is not anything which reflects on the individual.

Mr. MARTIN: Can we not dispose of this section now?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would much prefer to see whether some solution could not be arrived at regarding the incorporation somewhere in the bill, either through the preamble or an amendment, embodying a statement of rights. I prefer it in the preamble. As I say, I do not want to lose the opportunity of someone being able to move it in the preamble on account of the loss of the proposed amendment, which, if I may guess the tenor of the debate, is certain to be defeated. I would like a little more time to consider the procedure, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, with your permission I should like to call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 9, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MOVEMENT OF FIRST GROUP FROM CANADA TO JAPAN

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, because of the general interest in the matter I thought I should inform hon. members that definite arrangements have now been made for the movement of the first group of Japanese nationals from Canada to Japan. The group being sent consists of those who elected to be repatriated to Japan and who have not asked that their requests be cancelled; in other words the group being dealt with at present are those who have asked for the privilege of returning to Japan, and who are being assisted to go. The details of the arrangement I think are well known to hon. members.

In the class I have been speaking of will be those who are perfectly satisfied to be repatriated to Japan, and it is anticipated there will be approximately 1,500, including men, women and children. Most of them are coming from the settlements in the interior of British Columbia, but a few are coming from Alberta and Manitoba and some who have been in internment camps at Angler, Ontario. All arrangements have been made for the movement to Vancouver, and it is anticipated the first boat will leave Vancouver on May 28, carrying some 680, while the second boat will be leaving about the end of May carrying approximately 900.

While on the subject I might say that we will defer deportation proceedings pending the decision of the privy council, to which authority the case has been appealed. The department is proceeding as rapidly as possible with the dispersal of others to various parts of Canada, seeing to it that only a limited number are sent to each place and emphasizing placement in agriculture or lumbering or logging.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The minister has indicated that about 1,500 are going in these two boats. Would he advise us how many Japanese indicated their willingness or their desire to go, in the survey made some time ago by the government?

Mr. MITCHELL: I was looking at the figures yesterday, and speaking from memory the number is just over 10,300.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31—RULED OUT OF ORDER

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Under standing order 31 I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house, Mr. Speaker, on a matter of urgent public importance. News reports since we adjourned last evening indicate that the Prime Minister is to leave almost immediately for London to confer with Prime Minister Attlee and other commonwealth prime ministers regarding matters of common interest. The failure of the dominion-provincial conference to reach agreement regarding urgent domestic problems, and the immediate necessity of reaching agreement with such provinces as are prepared to accept proposals for the general well-being of Canada, demand an explanation by the Prime Minister and consideration by the house. I therefore ask leave to move the adjournment in order that we may have an opportunity of discussing this matter before the Prime Minister leaves for Great Britain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Having considered the hon. member's motion, I regret to say that I do not see any urgency in the matter, and I therefore declare the motion out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister will be absent from the country, and the necessity of coming to some understanding regarding these matters, if I may so I think a discussion of the subject is urgently necessary. However, if that is Your Honour's ruling, may I suggest to the Prime Minister that a statement be made to the house and an opportunity given for discussion before he leaves for Great Britain. If that is the alternative, then I would suggest it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say at once to my hon. friend—if I am not speaking at the wrong point of proceedings as set out on the order paper—that, as he is aware, the conference with the provinces is adjourned sine die. It is adjourned on the understanding that the Minister of Finance, in the preparation of his budget, upon which he is engaged at the present time, will take full cognizance of the representations made during the course of the conference. He will make a statement to the House of Commons as to the course which, in the light of these discussions, he thinks it most advisable for the government to follow.

I submit it would be prejudicial to the Minister of Finance, in the statement he may wish to make, were I to attempt to review the conference proceedings at this stage, or to indicate what the government is likely to do. I submit it is for the government to exercise its own judgment as to the right time at which to make any statement on conference matters, or a statement of its own position. I suggest further that any discussion in advance would prejudice the situation.

PREPARATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDINGS AND OFFICIAL STATEMENTS

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): In this connection when the matter was brought up some time ago I asked the government if it would see that the proceedings of the conference were published. I should like to know if that has been done. Have copies of the proceedings been distributed to all hon. members? Further, have the official statements at earlier conferences during the last nine months been made available to hon. members? I believe the whole record is to be found in those statements.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When the Leader of the Opposition raised the point of bringing together certain statements under one cover, I gave instructions to have that done as soon as possible. My understanding is that it has been done. Whether copies have as yet been distributed I cannot say. Similarly, with regard to the proceedings of the conference itself, I have given instructions that they should be distributed at once to the members of both houses. I must apologize for not knowing at the moment whether that distribution has been made, but I shall make immediate inquiries.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some have been distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am told they have. I believe that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BRACKEN: And would the Prime Minister see that the official statements from previous conferences are also distributed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

POSSIBILITY OF MAKING AGREEMENTS WITH SEVEN PROVINCES

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, arising from something I said a minute ago, may I ask if the government is giving any consideration to making agreements with the seven provinces which have indicated their willingness to accept the dominion's proposals, with minor adjustments?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's question was addressed to the government. I might explain that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is apparently too modest to reply in respect of what he is contemplating with regard to the budget. I would say on behalf of the government that I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

FARM PRODUCTS

PRICE INCREASES IN THE UNITED STATES—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr Speaker, I should like to ask a question of either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance. I have not given either minister notice of the question, because the matter came to my attention only a few minutes ago. If it is not possible to give an answer to-day, perhaps it may be possible to do so at an early day. Has either of these ministers been informed of the reported authorization by United States government authorities of an increase in the price of agricultural products in that country, to the extent of 25 cents a bushel on corn, 15 cents on wheat, 9 cents on barley and 5 cents on oats? If so, will the government now give consideration to these increases, and announce its general farm price policy in the light of these circumstances and other changed conditions in Canada?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I noticed the news item this morning respecting these price increases in the United States. There has been no opportunity to give consideration to whether those increases should affect the price policy in Canada. As soon as there is anything definite to state with regard to prices, a statement will be made in the house. I do not think the question can be answered any further at the present time, either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not press for an immediate answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand.

INQUIRIES OF MINISTRY

FIELD-MARSHAL MONTGOMERY—JOINT DEFENCE PLAN—EXCHANGE OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS WITH INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): May I say that I wish the Prime Minister a pleasant voyage and a safe return from his proposed journey. I wish him good luck for Canada in the work he proposes to do. There are three questions to which I should like a reply before he goes. I have sent him copies of these questions and I am sorry I was not able to send them earlier.

During his last visit to the United Kingdom I understand that the Prime Minister extended an invitation to Field-Marshal Montgomery to visit Canada. I hope when he is there again he will see if something cannot be done about this invitation.

The second question is with regard to the statement made by President Truman over the radio a week ago in connection with a joint defence plan for the future of America. I should like to know if any such plan has been brought to the attention of the government, and by whom, and what if any action has been taken as to joining what is known as a Pan-American union for defence.

The third question has to do with an exchange of high commissioners between Canada and India. Before any action is taken will an opportunity be afforded on the Prime Minister's return to express my opposition to this innovation?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that his questions should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not asking for answers to-day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me to answer my hon. friend immediately as a matter of courtesy. First, I should like to thank him for his good wishes and for his kindness in sending me copies of the questions he had in mind. The first question referred to a statement made by President Truman over the radio. My hon. friend will find an answer to that question at page 1273 of Hansard of May 7. At that time the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) made a reply on my behalf—I was prevented at the time from being in the house—to a similar question.

My hon. friend's next question was in relation to a possible visit to Canada by Field-Marshal Lord Montgomery. I can tell him immediately that the field-marshal has accepted the government's invitation and at the present time arrangements are being made for the visit of Lord Montgomery toward the latter part of the month of August.

With regard to my hon. friend's third question, wherein he asks if an opportunity will be afforded him to oppose the exchange of high commissioners with India, I promise him that nothing will be done until he has been afforded an appropriate opportunity to speak on that matter.

THE PRIME MINISTER

DEPARTURE FOR LONDON ON MAY 13 TO ATTEND PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house have been interested in the various press reports about the Prime Minister leaving us. I would ask if he could not give us now some idea of just when he plans to leave. Since it seems to be certain that he is going, may I, on behalf of this section of the house, extend to him our best wishes for a safe landing, a satisfactory stay, and a safe return. I think I can assure him that we shall do all in our power to help the government to carry on sanely while he is away.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since the leader of the opposition has said that he is speaking only for one section of the house, I should like to assure the Prime Minister that those who are associated with me in this party also wish him a pleasant voyage and a very fruitful visit to Great Britain. May I suggest also that when he comes home he be a little more communicative on certain matters.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, since the leader of the opposition did not include this group in his remarks I should like to join with him and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in extending to the Prime Minister our best wishes for a fruitful trip to the old country. We hope that he will come back soon and take a lead in trying to get this session over before the hot weather starts.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I express to the leaders of the different parties and those who are supporting them, as well as to hon. members on this side of the house, my very warm appreciation of the kind manner in which they have recognized the necessity of my going overseas for a short time and for the good wishes they have extended for that sojourn abroad.

The leader of the opposition has relieved my mind of one consideration when he assures me that he will see that the government carries on successfully while I am away. To that extent, I shall be tremendously relieved. My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has said that he hoped I would be more communicative. May I say to him that I have found that more public men get into trouble from what they say than from what they do not say. If I am not over-communicative at times it is because from long experience in public affairs I have learned that silence is often golden where speech is merely silvern.

May I say to hon. members that I have been very much of two opinions as to what my duty was at the moment in the matter of going overseas. Early in the year I received from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom a communication saying that he hoped a meeting of all the prime ministers might be held in London, I understood in connection with the approaching peace conference at Paris. It seemed to me that a meeting of prime ministers held at that time would probably bring together the prime ministers from the different parts of the empire, and as I had planned to attend the peace conference in Paris, that seemed to be a suitable time for such a meeting. I therefore said that I would welcome such an arrangement. However, on communications being sent to the different nations of the commonwealth, it was found that Mr. Chifley, Prime Minister of Australia, could be in England only at a certain time; that Mr. Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand, would not find it possible to make the trip himself, and that General Smuts of South Africa could not leave South Africa before a certain time. Early in February I had been a party to the agreement with the provinces that the dominion-provincial conference would meet here at Ottawa at the time it did, so I was obliged to say that I could not possibly think of going over until that conference was concluded.

The result was that the idea of having the prime ministers meet collectively on a particular date was given up, and instead it was suggested that there might be consultations between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and one or more of his ministers and the prime ministers of the dominions arranged in different stages. Hon. members have seen that such has been the procedure that has been followed, that certain consultations have already been held. To permit of my being present there has been a postponement of some of the consultations until next week or the week after.

I wish it were not necessary to go because I feel that my duty just at this time is primarily in Canada. When we have the important questions that have been referred to this afternoon concerning the discussion of relations between the provinces and ourselves, as well as other important matters coming up. I do not see how I or persons holding a similar office in the different dominions can be expected to be in Britain all at the same time. I think a man's first duty is to his own country and to his own parliament. If I had consulted my own feelings at this time I would have remained here, but I realize that there are reasons why consultation in reference to some of the matters that have been mentioned is advisable and I have given my word that I would go across to take part in those consultations. I plan to leave on Monday of next week.

I think it is important to realize that we have in this country and in all parts of the commonwealth a system of consultation which can be effected by means of cable, as was followed out throughout the years of the war, and which I believe is about as perfect as any system could be. It enables a prime minister when sitting in conference to speak with the authority of all his colleagues. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am not going to attempt at any consultation to say what this government's opinion is with regard to questions of defence, questions of trade, preference and the like, because I am not one of those who pretend to speak for the entire cabinet without the opportunity of conferring with its members. I shall be very happy at any conference to give my views in a general way as to opinions that I think this country would wish to have fully considered. But as for presenting at a conference the official view of Canada in great matters of defence, trade and numerous other important questions, without the presence of the ministers who are responsible immediately concerned for the different departments of government and without the presence of their experts as well, I can assure the house that I shall be careful to refrain from committing anyone in a manner that is likely to occasion embarrassment.

Mr. McIVOR: I think the Prime Minister is to be commended for starting out on his journey on Monday and spending the Sabbath day as he ought to spend it.

LUMBER

INQUIRY AS TO THREATENED STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Labour to advise the house what steps his department is taking to avoid a threatened strike in the lumber industry in the province of British Columbia which has been called for May 15.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I learned yesterday that there is likely to be a tie-up in the lumber industry in British Columbia, and I immediately directed my officials to get in touch with the provincial department of labour in Victoria. I understand to-day that the leader of the loggers' trade union organization is going to meet Mr. Pearson, the Minister of Labour of British Columbia, in Victoria. But may I say this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, it is necessary to say these things sometimes to irresponsible people, and I am not saying that in a kindly way either. I do not think that any leader of a labour organization is rendering the service that is due to its membership when, in defiance of the regulations which have been built up in consultation between labour and industry, a strike is threatened in an important industry such as the lumber industry is at the present time. I would appeal for cool counsels to prevail, and I say that in all sincerity, especially in the light of conditions in this country and, more particularly, to assist in the tremendous construction programme for veterans' homes, and generally the necessity of expansion of the industry in the light of conditions throughout the world.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $163,190.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the amount we are asking the house to vote this year for ordinary purposse is $13,692,713; that is an increase of $1,615,444 over the estimates of 1945-46.

In the four years preceding the war we had been following the policy of building up the agriculture estimates from a low in 1935 to the figure at which they had been five years previously and we had just about reached that level when war was declared. After war was declared we cut down the ordinary estimates for agriculture, but during the last two years we have again been building them up so that this year they are $1,615,444 higher than they were last year. The increases have been made up as follows: Scientific services, $913,591; experimental farms, $223,223; production services, $321,225; marketing services, $112,675, or a total of $1,570,714; increase in administration, $44,730, making a total increase of $1,615,444.

The estimates of the department are divided into ordinary and special. Under special we are asking the committee to vote this year, $5,725,000, as against $5,126,700 a year ago. The increased amount of $598,300 is divided between P.F.R.A. and cheese. There is an increase of $1,122,000 in P.F.R.A., with an additional amount not yet determined which will be taken out of the $10,000,000 vote for reconstruction. The increased expenditure on cheese, for the purpose of promoting the production of better cheese, is $200,000, making $1,322,000. The difference between the increase in these two branches and the total increase is accounted for by reductions in prairie farm asistance. That figure has not been finally determined because it depends very much on the weather this year, and there is a possibility that the actual expenditure may go back to what it was a year ago.

The other has to do with wheat acreage reduction. The greater part of the difference is in wheat acreage reduction. During the last two years we have not been carrying on the policy of promoting wheat acreage reduction and for that reason no payments are being made and no vote is necessary for the purpose this year. So while the balance shows an increase of $598,300, there is an actual increase in the operative part of the estimates of $1,322,000.

I wanted to make those explanations before we start upon a consideration of the individual items, and would suggest, Mr. Chairman, subject of course to the opinion of the committee, that we can advance most satisfactorily and obtain the greatest amount of information by dealing with the matters which come under each item as we proceed. I assume that some hon. members will want to make general remarks before we do proceed on this basis, but I hope we can get to that basis as soon as possible.

Mr. HACKETT: Has there been any diminution of the amounts spent to encourage the manufacture of butter? The minister has stated that additional amounts have been spent to encourage the manufacture of cheese.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount spent in connection with cheese is not to encourage increased production, but to encourage better quality. It is the premium we pay for the production of 94 and 93 score cheese, and, together with the assistance we give for putting in storage rooms and other equipment, to make it possible to produce a better product. The promotion of the production of each of these commodities will be dealt with under production, when we come to the votes in connection with production, and we shall be better able to determine at that time the amounts which are spent in various directions in order to promote production.

Mr. HACKETT: As a matter of fact, nothing has been voted to encourage the production of butter?

Mr. GARDINER: As far as I can recall at the moment, there is nothing specifically in the items, although we may come across something as we go through that might be so stated to be estimated; but that kind of expenditure is made out of the different items which provide for publicity, and we do take sums of money for promoting the production of different products from time to time during the year out of those amounts, and run advertisements in the papers and take other action to assist in obtaining higher production.

Mr. HACKETT: I hope the minister will not think that I am trying to ask him a lot of questions at once, but I have to go to the flag committee. Is the minister aware of the great number of dairy cattle that are being exported from eastern Quebec to the United States at the present time? I received a letter this morning which told me of thirty-two carloads of cattle passing through one station in the first two days of this week, and of a great number being taken across the international line by truck. I am anxious to know whether the government deems that a policy which encourages the export of dairy cattle is a good policy, and whether anything is being done to stay the loss to Canada of those herds.

Mr. GARDINER: I repeat that I think we can more satisfactorily discuss that question when we get down to production. But I can give at the moment figures which will, I think, satisfy the hon. member that the problem is not as serious as might be suggested by figures taken from any locality. I will just take the last six years for which I have the records here. I have the records from 1928 down to the present, and could place them on Hansard if it were desired, showing, first, the exports of dairy cattle, and showing the numbers on farms; for every year but the present, the numbers on farms in June; and giving the number on farms in December of 1945.

Beginning at 1941, the number of exports was 13,719. I may say that that is the highest export that we have had since 1929. In 1942 the number was 19,139; in 1943, 37,327; 1944, 36,315; 1945, 47,304; 1946, down to March, 11,572.

The figures which one must put alongside of these are the figures of dairy cattle on farms in June of each year: 1941, 3,623,900; 1942, 3,680,500; 1943, 3,784,700; 1944, 3,929,600; 1945, 3,998,200; and then in December of 1945, 4,012,600. In other words there has been a constant rise year by year down to the present of the number of dairy cattle on farms, until the figure of 3,929,600 in 1944 was the highest figure of any year from 1928 down to 1944, and, I assume, the highest figure right back through the years.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister explain why, if there is this increase in the number of dairy cattle—and I am not denying it—there has not been a corresponding increase in the production of milk?

Mr. GARDINER: There has. We will finish this question first. In 1945, as I indicated, the number went up to within two thousand of four million, which was much higher than any year we ever had; and in June 1945 we were over the four million mark.

The suggestion has been made that we might explain why there has been a lower production of milk, or, to put it in exact terms, I think the question was why there has not been a corresponding increase in the production of milk. Well, I am not in a position to state at the moment whether the increase is proportionate to the increase in the number of cows, although I am under the impression that the increase is greater than the increase in the number of cows. That is my opinion at the moment, unless I get something to the contrary which is not before me, that the production per cow has improved during that period; and it is natural that in times like these, when returns are good, farmers should get better stock and better bred stock on their farms. The actual fact is that last year the milk production was the highest on record. If it was not, the figures I have are not the same as those which my hon. friend has.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister care to have me give the figures I have from the bureau of statistics?

Mr. GARDINER: I have the figures from our own officials, and sometimes I would rather rely upon those than upon the figures from the bureau of statistics because quite often the bureau's figures are made up on a basis a little different from that of the figures in the Department of Agriculture. My information is that our production of milk is up, and if it is not it is only slightly down. In any case, it has been up year by year throughout the years.

Mr. PEARKES: Has the minister figures of the dairy cattle exported overseas in the pre-war days?

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. gentleman wait until I answer this other question? I understand my figures are from the bureau of statistics. I do not wish to have too many on hand. Total milk production in 1940 was 15,999,000,000; in 1941, 16,549,000,000; in 1942, 17,488,000,000; in 1943, 17,518,000,000; in 1944, 17,604,000,000; in 1945, 17,618,000,000. If these figures do not go up exactly proportionately, they do go up every year, and it is on these figures that I base the statement.

What I was going to say in answer to the question asked a few moments ago was this. This increase in the exports of dairy cattle is just as important to the farmer who is milking cows as is the sale of milk itself. The farmer is raising dairy cattle not only to produce milk but to raise breeding stock that he can sell, and if the farmers had four million of dairy stock on their farms in 1945 as against 3,623,000 in 1941, and sold 47,000 head of dairy cattle in 1945 as against 13,719 in 1941, then I think it is only fair to say that they took in at least three times as much; and when you add the increase in price for cows over that period of time, they took in a greater increased amount from the sale of dairy cows as compared with the years from 1941 back. In addition to that, they have been taking in, as I have indicated by the figures with regard to milk, more every year, first because of increased production, and second because of increases in price as compared with 1941 and 1945 from the milking of cows. In the light of those two facts I do not think anyone will contend that the dairy farmer is worse off as a result of anything that happened during those years.

Mr. HACKETT: The point I would like to call to the attention of the minister is the precarious condition in which that branch of the dairy industry which lends itself to the making of butter finds itself to-day. The remarks of the minister referred to the dairy industry as a whole. He has explained on previous occasions what the department headed by himself has been able to do to capture a very desirable British market for cheese, and I think it is beyond dispute that milk converted into cheese yields a much greater return to the milk producer than does milk containing an equal quantity of butterfat converted into butter. The figures the minister has given with regard to exports of cattle and the number of cattle on farms were general. They do not apply to Quebec and southeastern Quebec, to which my remarks on previous days in the house have been specially directed. In that area there is a vastly accelerated disposal of dairy herds to the United States. There is more than one reason for that. The first is that raw milk commands a much higher price in the United States than in Canada, and secondly there appears to be great difficulty in getting labour to perform the work incidental to caring for herds on the farm and conveying the cream to the creamery.

The price of butter in Canada is much lower than in the United States. A quantity of milk converted into cheese gives the producer a much better return than if it were converted into butter. The dairy farmers find that it is not profitable for them to make butter and are therefore selling their herds. I believe the minister will find, if he compares the figures he has given of dairy cattle sold during the first four months of the current year, that the number per month is much greater than it was for the corresponding months last year, and the fear of many people who live in southeastern Quebec is that this most important of agricultural pursuits is going to be irreparably damaged if the price of butter be not raised so that the producers of butter can find enough profit in that pursuit to warrant retention of their herds rather than the sale of them across the line.

I agree with the minister that the dairy farmer in southeastern Quebec has always derived a certain benefit from the raising of dairy cattle of high productive capacity and the sale of them to the United States. In other days there was a very great trade in horses to the United States, and the trade in dairy cattle has been a source of revenue. But it has now reached the point where the sales are so greatly enhanced that the industry itself is jeopardized. Quebec, it is admitted, makes butter in preference to cheese. Canadian cheese commands a respected place in the foreign markets, the minister is to be commended on having secured these foreign markets for a commodity in the production of which we excel. But temperance in this, as in all matters, is a virtue; I ask the minister if he has considered the peril which overhangs the butter-producing industry in southeastern Quebec if he does not take the necessary steps to make one hundred pounds of milk of a given butterfat percentage when converted into butter give the farmer more nearly the return now obtained from one hundred pounds of milk converted into cheese. It seems to me that in order to get into the British market he has encouraged the manufacture of cheese to the detriment of the manufacture of butter, and that in consequence there is a shortage of butter which is accounted for by the disposal of herds and by the fact that the element of the community which manufactures the most butter in Canada does not find it profitable to continue in the manufacture of that commodity.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for Stanstead in regard to the position of that portion of the Canadian dairy industry engaged in the manufacture of butter. We in western Canada find ourselves in very much the same position. The greater part of the dairy industry in the west is concerned with the manufacture of butter, outside of that portion concerned with whole milk. We have very few powdered milk factories; we have comparatively few cheese factories; and the dairy industry there has found itself, together with that of the eastern townships, in an awkward position in comparison with the industry in other parts of Canada, owing to the fact that milk going into the manufacture of butter does not bring the same return as milk used for cheese, powdered milk and whole milk. I do believe the time has come when there should be some levelling out of these prices so that a producer of milk would receive at least approximately equal price for his product, no matter in what portion of the dairy industry it was used. This is quite a sore point in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as in the eastern townships, and I believe something should be done to rectify the matter. Otherwise, as in the eastern townships, I am quite sure the production of butter will continue to decrease.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to report from another province where similar conditions exist, namely the southern portion of Vancouver island, where a great many of the farmers are engaged in the manufacture of butter. We have not a great number of creameries, but they are finding it increasingly difficult to obtain sufficient milk and cream to turn into butter in order that they may be able to cover their overhead expenses. To-day farmers are not only exporting some of their cattle; they are refusing to raise the young heifers unless they have an opportunity of selling whole milk to the cities on the island. Herds are being depleted because farmers are unwilling to run the risk of raising female stock in order to produce butter when the price they receive from the sale of butter does not cover their expenses. Those expenses are quite heavy on Vancouver island because, as we know, a great deal of the feed grain has to be imported from the prairie provinces. In order to complete the picture in regard to the export of dairy cattle I wonder if the minister would be able to give us some indication of the number of cattle exported overseas in pre-war days. There was quite a flourishing trade in the export of dairy cattle from Vancouver island to the orient. That, of course, ceased during the war years, and practically all exports have been to the United States. However, I do know the situation on the island is critical for those dairy farmers who are engaged in the production of butter.

Mr. CHARLTON: Can the minister state whether the production figures he has given include milk to the concentrated milk plants, milk that goes to cheese factories and whole milk, or whether these are split up?

Mr. GARDINER: To answer the last question immediately, the figures I gave on milk are for all milk produced for all purposes. That is the production of milk for butter, for cheese, and everything else, the total production of milk.

On these other questions which have been raised, taking first the question of butter versus cheese in the province of Quebec, I know the statements made in that regard are the generally accepted view, I think largely because we listen to discussions concerning something with which we may be very intimately concerned for the time being. There has been a shortage of butter in Canada recently; people have found it difficult to get butter, so naturally they believe something has happened to the production of butter, and are perhaps inclined to attach greater importance to quoted statistics having to do with the last two or three weeks or the last month than one might be justified in attaching to them. The general position in the province of Quebec is that in most sections where they produce butter and cheese they have what is known as the duplex plan. It is the only place in Canada where that plan is followed to any great extent. They can change over from butter to cheese at any time; and they do so with very little provocation. In other words if they can make more by producing cheese than by producing butter, they produce cheese. If they can make more by producing butter than by producing cheese, they make butter, and it is all done in the very same plant; they just switch over from the one to the other. That is not the practice in most other parts of Canada. Perhaps one can answer the questions raised with regard to Quebec more completely by quoting the figures as to the production of these two commodities in that province. The production of creamery butter in Quebec, in round figures, has been as follows:

1937	74,000,000
1938	79,000,000
1939	80,000,000
1940	74,000,000
1941	76,000,000
1942	73,000,000
1943	85,000,000
1944	81,000,000
1945	88,000,000

They had their highest production, therefore, in 1945, at least since 1933, beyond which I have not the figures here. When we come to cheese for the province of Quebec, the production in round figures is as follows:

	lbs.
1936	25,000,000
1937	30,000,000
1938	28,000,000
1939	27,000,000
1940	35,000,000
1941	39,000,000
1942	64,000,000
1943	49,000,000
1944	61,000,000
1945	59,000,000

If one desires to have an explanation of the variation in the last few years in Quebec—and it will be noted that there is a considerable variation between 1941 and 1942—it is found in the fact that at that time we were promoting the production of cheese for the British market. Not only did we put on premiums just prior to that, but the government of Quebec put a subsidy of two cents a pound on cheese. Yet in the next year we were promoting the production of butter, with the result that cheese production dropped to 49 million pounds. The next year the subsidy was again emphasized. I believe it was off for part of 1943.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Off milk?

Mr. GARDINER: Off cheese, because of the desire to get more butter. There was a shortage of butter. The subsidy was taken off cheese, with the result that cheese production went down. Then, again in 1944 we made a special effort to get cheese for Britain. The minister of agriculture for Quebec came to Ottawa to discuss the matter with me. They reinstated the two-cent subsidy on cheese, with the result that it went back up to 61 million pounds. Then, in 1945 production went down to 59 million pounds.

I believe these figures bear out the contention that there is not a very wide margin of difference between the desire of the people of Quebec to produce cheese and their desire to produce butter. A two-cent subsidy either put on or taken off cheese has resulted in its production either going up or coming down, and in the production of butter going up or coming down. The reason for that is borne out by the fact that the average return in 1945 on milk entering into cheese in Canada was $1.92 per hundred, and the average return on milk entering into the production of butter was $1.68 per hundred, without the skim milk.

Mr. BOUCHER: May we have the same statistics for Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: I can get them, but for the moment I am answering one question in particular.

Mr. HACKETT: That is the average across Canada, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I had better make a full explanation. The cheese price is the same in 1946 as it was in 1945 across Canada. It is down, of course, in Quebec as a result of the fact that the subsidy has been taken off.

Mr. HACKETT: At the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, at the present time. But to give a full explanation, the average return for cheese this year will be about the same. The price has not been changed, to date. But the average return for butter this year—that is, 1946—being four cents higher, is $1.68. The skim milk is estimated to be worth somewhere in the neighbourhood of from 30 to 40 cents.

Mr. SENN: What about whey?

Mr. GARDINER: Whey is worth a little, but it does not enter into the picture to the same extent as skim milk.

Mr. HACKETT: Not quite so much, no.

Mr. GARDINER: I am now dealing with a point that has been raised. If one takes skim milk at 30 cents—or he can make it less than that, if he wishes, and put it down to 24 cents—the return on milk entering into butter is just about the same as on milk entering into cheese. Those are the figures used in making the comparisons. They may be different in one district as compared with another. Perhaps there are areas where there are not very many hogs or calves fed.

Mr. HACKETT: Some allowance should be made for the work incidental to the separating of the milk and the washing of the implements. It is the whole milk that goes to the cheese factory, and the work incidental to getting the milk off the farm and to the point of production is much less when milk is converted into cheese than when it is converted into butter.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I want it understood that I am not arguing that question at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: But would not that have a bearing on the 24 cents, or 30 cents?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not even attempting to prove anything of that kind, and I hope no one will put me in that position. I am not arguing whether milk entering into butter is or is not bringing in enough. I am simply giving statistics to show the position as it now stands. The question as to what final payments are going to be made is, as I indicated the other night, still under consideration. The reason is that a month or six weeks ago those interested in the production of dairy products, particularly milk, interviewed the government and placed their position before us—at least they placed their position before the Department of Agriculture. I might add that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture placed its position before the whole government. Certain suggestions were made as to dealing with the matter. However those suggestions did not receive final consideration, largely because the dominion-provincial conference was being held. As the matter of finance as between the provinces and the dominion was under consideration, questions of this kind were not finally decided. On the last day of April, therefore, I made a report to the house to the effect that until the opportunity came for final consideration of the matter we were going to hold the subsidies exactly where they had been for the last two years. The government has been receiving resolutions—and I am sure hon. members have been receiving them—condemning the government, or at least suggesting to it that it should not have reduced the subsidies as of May 1 this year. We have not reduced the subsidies as of May 1 this year on any milk production. We have made them exactly as they have been in the last two years. And I explained at the time that change was made that final consideration had not yet been given to the question.

I make that explanation in order to emphasize the fact that I do not wish to be considered this afternoon to be arguing the question whether or not the price of milk entering into butter production is high enough. That question is under consideration; I am simply giving the facts. Those facts indicate that, down to the last period for which we have statistics, the production of butter has been quite high in Quebec.

Coming to Saskatchewan, concerning which province a question was asked by the hon. member for Melfort, the figures for butter production are as follows:

	lbs.
1936	24,000,000
1937	23,000,000
1938	23,000,000
1939	25,000,000
1940	28,000,000
1941	37,000,000
1942	41,000,000
1943	47,000,000
1944	48,000,000
1945	41,000,000

It will be noticed that in 1944 they were producing just twice as much as was produced in 1936. While there was a drop in 1945 down to 41,000,000 pounds, the production was still higher than in any year prior to 1942. Anyone who knows what has happened in Saskatchewan during the last year can explain that without any stretch of the imagination. In 1945 we had the poorest crop in Saskatchewan that we had had since 1937. We had a drought almost as serious as the one we had in those years when we used to spend hours in this house talking about it. Now there is no discussion at all. The area affected by the drought is just as great as the area affected back in the thirties. That in itself is sufficient explanation for the fact that the production of milk is down.

My hon. friend asked me for the same figures for Ontario. Beginning with 1936 the butter production in that province was as follows:

1936	86,000,000
1937	81,000,000
1938	87,000,000
1939	88,000,000
1940	87,000,000
1941	86,000,000
1942	81,000,000
1943	82,000,000
1944	74,000,000
1945	77,000,000

In this case the 1945 production is up as compared with 1944.

Mr. LOW: Has the minister the figures for Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: I have them all here and perhaps I had better put these tables on Hansard. I was asked to give the cheese production in Ontario. It will be realized that Ontario and Quebec produce almost 93 per cent of our total cheese production. The figures for factory cheese production are as follows:

	lbs.
1936	88,000,000
1937	93,000,000
1938	87,000,000
1939	89,000,000
1940	100,000,000
1941	103,000,000
1942	128,000,000
1943	106,000,000
1944	105,000,000

Cheese production was up considerably in 1945, there being only one other year in recent times, 1942, when Ontario produced as much cheese as was produced last year. I think it was the hon. member for Stanstead who asked why we were promoting the production of cheese rather than the production of butter. I would not like the impression to go out that we were promoting the production of cheese at the moment as against the production of butter. We promoted the production of cheese as against the production of butter at certain times during the war for certain reasons. The first was that Britain was pressing us for cheese. As hon. members of the committee know, Great Britain stands at the top of the list of cheese eaters in the world, while Canada is at the bottom. The people of Great Britain eat the most cheese per head of population, while we eat the least, according to the records of the sixteen countries in which records are kept. We produce one of the kinds of cheese that the British like best, cheddar cheese. They have been willing to pay a premium for this even in ordinary times. That is the first reason the British wanted it. We tried to give them what they desired. Cheese has stored up in it a certain amount of butterfat in a way that permits it to be kept and therefore it is utilized in time of war.

The second reason is one that I believe most of those who are interested in agriculture are familiar with. There is an area in Canada which begins west of Toronto, perhaps as far west as Ingersoll, and extends down to Ottawa and as far as Kingston, then into Quebec as far as Three Rivers—we see an example of this area as we drive out from the city—where rock is very close to the surface and at times great boulders extend above the surface. But in between there are areas of luscious grass. We believe that if agriculture is to be continued successfully in this great area it is important that the farmers should be encouraged to produce cheese. We believe that if they are going to be encouraged to produce cheese they must have a good market, and we think the only good market is in Great Britain. Therefore we have been trying to supply the best cheese, and I think we are putting out the highest graded cheese we have ever had in Canada, partly because of the premium we have paid for high grade cheese and largely because of the desire of the producers themselves to get the best possible product over in the greatest quantities. So we have been promoting the production of cheese. There is a question as to whether we have overdone it so far as providing sufficient butter for consumption in this country is concerned.

There is a third reason which I think should be mentioned here. We cannot produce butter in competition with New Zealand or Australia, and I do not think I need to go into the reasons. Those countries run their cows out the year around while we have to stable ours about seven months in the year if we are to get much milk. When we attempt to place our butter on the British market in competition with their butter, we are not able to sell at the level they can sell at and still have a profit. What we have been trying to do is to maintain a Canadian market for butter and produce just about what is required by that market. As the opportunities to purchase have increased we have had greater difficulty in supplying the butter that is required in Canada. In spite of the fact that our creamery butter production was up on an average of about 40,000,000 pounds during the last three or four years as compared with the years preceding the war, we are still having difficulty in making the butter go round. For that reason, if for no other, there is some justification in believing that the time has come to promote the production of butter to a greater extent than it is being produced at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: More people are eating it.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Some people who eat very little are eating what they require, while other people who eat more than they really require are having difficulty in getting what they want.

An hon. MEMBER: They cannot get it.

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend says, they cannot get it. That is the position; that is what we are attempting to do, and those are the reasons why we are attempting to do it. For one thing, we want to keep the farmer in cheese production, and I am pleased to be able to say that in 1945 the production of cheese was higher than it has been for a long time, I think as far back as 1942.

Mr. HACKETT: To complete his statement will the minister state what aids are given to the manufacturer of butter as compared with the manufacturer of cheese? I understand, for instance, that Ontario bonuses cheese to the extent of two cents a pound. Then there is a bonus from the dominion government which depends upon quality and flavour. I suggest to the minister that he tell us, if he will, the whole story as regards governmental encouragement to the butter maker and the cheese maker so far as his own department is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: All those facts were taken into consideration in compiling the figures I gave a few moments ago; that is, the provincial subsidy on cheese, the premium that is paid by the dominion government, and the 20 cents a hundred on the milk entering into the production of cheese. All that was included in the figure which gives a return of $1.92 a hundred. The ten cents a pound on butter fat given by way of subsidy is also included in the figure of $1.68 for milk entering into the production of butter.

As to the subsidies on fluid milk, I do not think I need go back to the earlier years but just give the later years.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister give the figures from 1936 on, as he did in the other case?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think I need give all the variations, because there are some areas in which the subsidy went down to 25 cents. But the general subsidies are 35 cents a hundred in summer and 55 cents in winter. That is on whole milk.

Mr. HACKETT: Milk of certain quality?

Mr. GARDINER: On all fluid milk. On creamery butter it is 10 cents per pound butter fat throughout the year, and on milk entering into cheese 20 cents throughout the year; on concentrated milk products, 15 cents in the summer and 20 cents in the winter. Those were the subsidies given, taking everything into consideration, in order to equalize returns.

An hon. MEMBER: Then there is a special subsidy, is there not, on cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there is no special subsidy, just the premium we paid before the war of two cents and three cents depending upon the point score. That has been paid since 1939.

Mr. HACKETT: And Ontario pays two cents a pound on cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and Quebec paid two cents in some years.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, off and on.

Mr. PEARKES: What are the figures for British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: I will put the whole table on Hansard, if I may, in a few moments. But answering first the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo as to the export of cattle to the orient, the figures I gave include all exports, wherever they go, both before the war and after. They include all exports of beef cattle, and the figures show that the exports were very much higher in recent years than in the years prior to the war.

Mr. PEARKES: The point I was raising was that there has been no export of cattle to the orient during the war years.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the minister consent to place the tables on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, I have to leave the house in a few moments, and I should like to ask two questions before I go. One is on the matter we have now under discussion. I had not intended to deal with the subject, but since it has been referred to by other members I would like to ask a question.

The discussion has been largely on butter. The impression abroad, whether correct or not, is that butter has not been receiving a fair price in relation to that of other dairy products and other agricultural products. The minister has explained that the numbers of dairy cattle in Canada have increased over the past nine or ten years and that the production of dairy butter has increased over the same period. That is understandable and is accepted because of increased feed, increased numbers and increased prices.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is any conflict between the figures which the minister is using and figures used by the bureau of statistics. I had some figures extracted from the bureau of statistics reports which I should like to give, and perhaps the minister or some of his officials can tell us if they are wrong.

These summarized figures with respect to butter were given me as having come from the bureau of statistics. Let me quote the round figures. Butter production, according to these figures, in the prairie provinces in 1943 was 120,000,000 pounds; in 1944, 117,000,000 pounds; in 1945, 102,000,000 pounds. That shows a consistent reduction in butter production over the past three years. The summarized figures from the same source show a reduction also in butter production for the whole of Canada. For 1943 the production is shown as 367,000,000 pounds; 1944, 352,000,000 pounds; 1945, 346,000,000 pounds. The figures I am given also show that that trend is continuing.

Mr. GARDINER: Those are the same figures I have.

Mr. BRACKEN: I thought the figures which the minister gave indicated an increase.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave figures for only three provinces. There was an increase shown in Quebec.

Mr. BRACKEN: But with respect to butter alone there has been a continuous drop in production both in the prairie provinces and in all Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: The figures for all Canada are 311,000,000 pounds in 1943. The statement I made a few moments ago was that the average production of creamery butter in recent years was about 40,000,000 pounds above what it was prior to the war. The production in 1938 was 267,000,000 pounds; it rose to 311,000,000 in 1943; then it went down to 298,000,000 pounds in 1944 and 293,000,000 in 1945. I am quoting the figures for creamery butter. I have not used any dairy butter figures, because those are only an estimate that somebody makes without very much upon which to base it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps this discussion has helped to clarify the matter. I thought that the figures which the minister first gave left the impression that butter production had kept on increasing. The only point I wished to make was to be sure that these figures were correct, or to know in what respect they were wrong. They show that in the last three years the production of creamery butter has been going down steadily. My information is that that trend is still continuing. In the prairie provinces, if you compare January of this year with January of last year it is 4·2 million pounds as compared with 4·9 million; in February of this year compared with February of last year, 4·2 million as against 5 million; in March of this year, 5·1 million as compared with 6·7 million in the corresponding month of last year.

For the whole of Canada—comparing the first three months of this year with the first three months of last year—in January this year, 9·6 million pounds were produced as compared with 11·4 million; February, 8·6 million as compared with 10·6 million; and March, 11·8 million as compared with 14·7 million. It is summarized in this way; in the first quarter of 1945 prairie butter production was 2·2 million pounds less than for the first quarter of 1944; in the first quarter of 1946 it was 3 million pounds less than in 1945. In two years, production in the prairie region has declined 28 per cent. The minister has explained, and everybody understands, that the crop was not as good last year as the year before. Nevertheless for the whole of Canada creamery butter production for the first quarter of this year is 18 per cent lower than it was a year ago.

My question has been answered: the minister has explained that the figures he quoted were for ten years; I have been referring only to the tendency of the last three years and particularly the last few months.

The other question I wish to leave with the minister, and it is one he cannot answer to-day, is related to the question asked this afternoon just before the orders of the day were called. Will the minister be good enough to have his officials set down side by side for the members of the house a statement of the prices under comparable conditions in Canada and the United States of all the major products of the farm—dairy products, meat products, poultry products, grains, and any other major farm products, for the information of the house.

I do not suggest for a moment that the prices of these things should all be as high here as they are on the other side. Wages are not the same, and other conditions are different. But I think it would be interesting and informative if we could have the figures—reliable figures—showing a comparison of farm prices in this country and over there; and it would be well if those figures could be prepared showing what the figures on the other side are, or will be on the 13th of this month, when the increases announced to-day in the United States come into effect.

Mr. GARDINER: I can give the information with regard to the product which was discussed the other night; I made a statement with regard to it; and I imagine the other figures could be got on much the same basis. I could probably give them as we go along with the discussion of the estimates.

I mentioned the other night that we have been rapidly overtaking the United States prices on hogs. Here is the position as of May 8, 1946, at Winnipeg and Chicago. On live weight basis the selling price at Chicago is $14.85, plus exchange of $1.48, which is $16.33. The statement I made the other evening was to the effect that our hogs could be sold on this market at a better return at present, or at least from day to day recently, than they could on the United States market. To begin again and repeat the figures: selling price Chicago, $14.85, plus exchange $1.48, $16.33; less shipping costs, $1; less duty, $1; net return Winnipeg $14.32. Winnipeg: market price grade A live basis, $14.03; premium on grade A, $1; return $15.03. The margin of Winnipeg over Chicago is 70 cents. Then the Winnipeg market price of B-1's, live basis, $13.73; premium on grade B-1, 50 cents; making a total of $14.23. The margin of Chicago over Winnipeg on B grade is 10 cents a hundred pounds.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. SENN: Is the minister quoting comparable grades for both markets? There is no grade A over there, is there?

Mr. GARDINER: They have what they call the fat hog. We have the bacon hog. But on the top grades of hogs, grades which are as nearly comparable as you can get them, these are the prices. I can get the others made out on a similar basis and have them produced.

Mr. HARKNESS: Would the minister explain what he means by the dollar duty and why it is added?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the duty a Canadian farmer has to pay if he wishes to market his hogs to-day on the Chicago market. He would not get quite as much for them as if he marketed them on the Winnipeg market.

Mr. SENN: But the United States farmer would get more.

Mr. GARDINER: The United States farmer would get more, yes, but the Canadian farmer is the one being discussed. The United States farmer would pay more for a great many things, even his labour. While I am mentioning that I want to say that I quite agree with what has been said with regard to the increased cost of production of all these products, owing to increased labour costs and the great difficulty of getting labour at all with which to produce them. That is admitted all across the country. I know that because I hire farm labour myself and I know that I am paying as much for farm labour to-day as I have ever paid at any time, even at the end of the last war. There is difficulty in that as it is related to the cost of production of all farm products. The more labour that is involved—there is more labour in producing butter than in producing cheese, more labour in producing hogs than in producing cattle, and so on—whichever one involves the greatest amount of labour in the cost, of course suffers the most in production from time to time under present conditions. The production of that which requires the kind of labour which some people object to doing suffers more greatly at a time of high return than it does at a time of low return.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Following that production of whole milk, added to the figures the minister put on record, I have the current Review of Agricultural Conditions for April, which points out, at page 13, that the production of whole milk shows some decrease for March and April as compared with a year ago. So the production of whole milk is on the downgrade, and as the hon. member for Mel-fort said, when you get west of the Red River valley there is very little cheese production. I am told by dairy officials in Manitoba, where conditions favour us to a far greater extent than in Saskatchewan, that our creamery production is down over 20 per cent. However, the figures which the minister is putting on the record will show exactly what the position is. I should like to couple my request with that of my leader as to the cost on each side of the line, including grain, which of course does not come under the Minister of Agriculture but under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The price of wheat to-day in the United States is a little over double what it is in Canada, not taking into account the participation certificate. But the question I should like to ask the minister is based on his own argument of last Monday and this afternoon. A considerable number of dairy cattle are exported to the United States, and they should be; I do not disagree with him on that point. I have asked repeatedly in the last two or three years that we be allowed to export beef cattle on that basis to the United States market. But if it cannot be done, as it was done at one time on the quota basis that prevailed before the government put on the embargo, then the request of some of the provincial ministers, including the minister in the government of Manitoba, might be given serious consideration. That is to say, when we have a glut on the market in the fall, or a condition such as existed in the yards about the end of April, when the packers took control of things and gave the producers a rather raw deal, permits might be issued for the shipment of a limited number of cattle to the market in the United States. All the ramifications of this suggestion have been pointed out by the provincial ministers. They have shown how the matter might be worked out and the differences pooled, as was done in connection with exports of barley and oats in the case of the Canadian wheat board. Can the minister say whether we may expect some entry into that market to the south of us for our beef cattle on the same basis as for dairy cattle exported at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: The question that has been raised is one that has been discussed a number of times. I think it will be recalled that in 1942, when it was first brought up, there was widespread opposition to the closing of the United States market for the export of beef cattle. That opposition, I believe, was just as strong on this side of the house as on the other. For quite a number of years a battle had been fought to get as free admission as possible into the United States market for our beef cattle, and under the marketing agreements of 1936, renewed in 1939, half of the duty was taken off; it was reduced from three cents a pound, under the normal duty rates, to a cent and a half. Under that arrangement we were sending to the United States 193,000 beef cattle weighing over 700 pounds. We were very much concerned when it was decided that if we were to be able to eat any meat in Canada, when we were sending most of our bacon and ham to Britain, we shall hold our beef in Canada. I do not want to enter into a discussion of the prices policy, but it will be admitted by everyone that if we had left the United States boundary open we would not have had beef cattle at all under the maintenance of price control. If we had had ceilings on products in this country and allowed the free distribution of food into the United States, where higher levels prevailed for such food products, we would have been without food in Canada. But in the early stages, prior to 1942 when the plan of sending meat to Britain was evolved, we were in the war and so was Britain, but the Americans were not, and the policy evolved then on other products was continued with regard to beef. It was felt that the only effective way of handling the situation on the two sides of the line, while still giving pork products to Britain, was to keep beef on this side of the border and to feed beef to our troops in camps on this side while sending ham and bacon overseas. Most people will say that that was all right at that time, and all will be inclined to agree with the policy as then applied.

That brings me to the present position. The present position is that we are sending a very much larger volume of beef to Britain than we have ever sent to the United States at any time. I hesitate to use the figures for 1945, although I have seen them quoted in the press, but it is between 400,000 and 500,000 beef cattle as against 193,000 we sent to the United States under the agreement we had at the beginning of the war. These are not all well-fed cattle; 126,000,000 pounds went out last year in cans. Canned meat comes from the kind of cattle that most farmers are anxious to get rid of and for which they do not find a good market in Canada or in the United States. In the process of improving their herds they ship out canners, and we got rid of between 400,000 and 500,000 head of cattle in that year.

That is the situation which now exists. It will have been noted that in the statement I made to the house after coming back from Britain I did not give figures with regard to the beef contract. The reason was that the British are most anxious to get all the beef we can send them, and they are not dickering in any way about the price. That simply brings us back to this position, that if we are to maintain price controls in order to have any food at all in this country—that is, food of that kind—we must maintain certain levels with respect to it. If we are desirous of raising the prices to where there is no control at all, then I suppose the price in Canada would go as high as the bid from either Britain or the United States for beef. If we permitted that to happen we would consume whatever we desired here; the Americans would get whatever they could at whatever price they might pay, and the British would have to take what was left.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I suggested that the government might consider the permit question. The prices of oats and barley were just as far out of line as the price of beef, but when we had the commodity to spare it was exported under a permit system. The provincial ministers of agriculture have asked the federal authorities to institute such a system so that we might have exports on a permit basis. Is that possible?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a very difficult thing to do. Grades often run all the way from canner cows, up, and much of what we send to Europe consists of canner cows. It would be difficult to carry that out. Of course, it is possible to do almost anything, but I am sure that the administration of a policy of that kind would be almost impossible. With grain, it is a simple matter. All our grain is graded in Winnipeg; there is no difficulty establishing grades and relationships between grades. But it would be difficult to do that in this matter, having regard to the United States position. We have limited the amount of red and blue beef which can go to Britain. We have said that our people are entitled to the top grades, the blue and red brands of beef, and we insist that only a certain proportion shall be shipped out. If you open the United States market wide, that is, to the kind that goes to the United States, the only kind that goes to advantage, which is the very top grades of beef, you introduce a question that must wait for final decision until we are prepared to change our policy with respect to price control.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister mind doing what he did in connection with dairy production, putting on Hansard the figures for cattle production from 1939 to date? It is my belief that beef cattle increased in far greater numbers than dairy cattle throughout the war years. West of the great lakes the increase I believe has been 42 per cent from 1939 to date. If the minister could put those figures on Hansard it would be enlightening.

Mr. GARDINER: I have them here and I will try to get them put on Hansard.

Mr. BRYCE: Have we any agreement with the United States to take up in the post-war period the commitment we had previously, or has Mexico taken over what we lost? As the minister knows, Mexico had a percentage, and we had the rest. Have we lost that entirely now, and shall we have to reestablish that when we return to normal conditions?

Mr. GARDINER: Before the war Canada's quota was 76 per cent of three-quarters of one per cent of the consumption of the United States, which of course is a very small part of their consumption. As I say, 76 per cent of that was allowed to come in from Canada, provided that we produced it, and 24 per cent came from Mexico. When by arrangement between Britain, the United States and ourselves the boundary between Canada and the United States was kept closed, we entered into an arrangement under which we agreed that they should take whatever beef they could get from Mexico, but at the same time it was agreed that when conditions changed and we were desirous of having that market again, the relationship would be reestablished.

Mr. BRYCE: I am pleased to hear that.

Mr. SENN: As I recall the discussion in 1942, I believe the minister indicated that at that time the United States were anxious that we should not send beef over there, even to the amount of our quota. Are they still of the same opinion, or are they willing to take our cattle now?

Mr. GARDINER: That is true, except with regard to the date. In 1942, when we first took this action, I think I said it was merely a matter of protecting our own position and that of Britain in relation to food. But later on, when we were suggesting that the market in the United States might be opened, I believe in the latter part of 1943 or the early part of 1944, when I first went to Washington in connection with it, I took up the matter with the then secretary of agriculture and asked him the direct question, reporting his answer to this house later. He said they preferred that we should send our beef directly to Britain under our own mutual aid plan of financing, rather than allow it to go into the United States, in which case their producers might claim that they were indirectly lease-lending Canadian beef. That was the position taken at the time and maintained right down to the end of the war. I do not know that the Americans would maintain that position at the moment. The situation is a little different now, but I think we should give full consideration to the question of whether or not we are to stop sending beef to Britain at present, when she is in great need of it. I believe we are now the second largest supplier of beef to Britain. For a long time we were right at the bottom of the list. Today, however, we stand right next to the Argentine; and it is a question whether we should attempt to remain in that market. I am not speaking now of a long-term policy but merely for the next three or four years, during which time they would be prepared to take all the beef we could supply. If arrangements can be made under which, by sending beef to Britain we would get returns as good as we could get by retaining our controls and sending beef to the United States the present relationship with the United States, I believe most people would say, well, let us send it to Britain. It is on that basis we are considering the matter at the moment.

Mr. SENN: I do not recall the minister's words exactly, but a moment ago I understood him to say that we were realizing a higher return on beef sent to Britain than on beef sold on our home market. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I did not make that statement. The position is that in connection with red brand beef under the agreement we buy beef to send to Britain only when it is a quarter cent or more under the ceiling, until we get up to a certain level in quantity. If we get up to that level, which we have not reached so far, the spread goes to one-half cent. On the lower grades of beef the margin is $1.25; in other words, we do not purchase it until it is $1.25 below the ceiling. So that they are never paying more for the beef than is paid for it here.

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): It is a well known fact that the price of beef cattle drops in the fall, because it is claimed that grass-fed cattle are not as good as grain-fed cattle. Extensive tests have been made in this connection, and if there is any difference between grass-fed and grain-fed cattle it is in favour of those fed on grass. The beef from grass-fed cattle is of superior quality to the beef from grain-fed cattle, as can be observed by any farmer who raises beef. In the fall the cattle come in from the grass in good flesh. They are in wonderful, healthy condition. Put them in the barns and feed them on dry feed and grain, and no matter how well you may take by the following March, when prices are better. I say prices are lower in the fall, instead of saying they are higher in the spring, because that is true. If anything, however, the price of beef cattle should be highest in the fall. A great many people do not realize that when the packing plants slaughter these animals the meat is not consumed immediately. All during the winter this meat is sold at the same price as grain-fed cattle, and that continues away into the next summer.

When we speak of agriculture I am interested in this subject, for my father and grandfather spent their whole lives in this business. The other day I picked up the Western Producer of April 4 and saw a little paragraph which I should like to read:

> The Farmers Grow Old
> There is a startling and nonetheless disturbing inference to be drawn from a recent report that the average age of farmers in Saskatchewan . . . is 53 years. The Saskatchewan government reports further that 5,000 farmers are over the age of 68. There is no reason to believe that this condition is not reflected in the other prairie provinces and, possibly to a similar extent, in the other areas of this country.
> While the world pleads for food and more food, Canada's agricultural population progressively grows older, and, consequently, weaker and less able to produce. This condition started some years before the war, as the cities drained off the more adventurous and virile of the farm manhood. It was accelerated in pace by the war, as tens of thousands of young men left their plows and harrows to join the services or seek higher pay in the war manufacturing centres. There is little indication that the men are going back in anything near the numbers in which they left; if anything, the depletion continues.
> Figures show that during the last four years of war alone 300,000 persons left rural areas in Canada for the cities. Four-fifths of the migration came from the prairies, half of that from Saskatchewan, where the need for farm labour presently is greatest. Whence comes then the new and strong blood and sinew for the nation's farms? That it must be found is inescapable. How it is to be found is another matter.
> There must be underlying cause for this unhappy and disturbing picture. Is the risk of agriculture, especially specialized agriculture as we practise it in this country, too high and the reward too small? Are the hardships of farm life not compensatory for the basic security which it is designed to provide? Is the wage scale in relation to effort for farm labour too low?
> In 1944, at the general synod of the Church of England in Canada, Rt. Rev. A. H. Sovereign, Bishop of Athabaska, pointed out, in a survey of farm conditions in this country, that, although one-third of the nation's population lived on the land ,it received only one-seventh to one-tenth of the nation's income.
> The Lever Brothers' report of last October showed that only one-third of Canada's farms have inside running water; that only 35 per cent of the farms have inside toilet facilities; that very few have bathtubs or other amenities regarded as normal by the vast proportion of city dwellers. Further, despite the enormous strides made in recent years in the development and distribution of electric power, the proportion of farms with electricity is still relatively low.

There must be a reason for this migration from the farms to the cities. I think I can give that reason by just reading a sentence from a letter I received from my sweetheart—my wife. I had written asking how the boys were getting along. One of those boys I took out of school, the other from college, so that they could work on the farm during the war, sacrificing their education and possibly their future in order to produce food for our boys overseas and our people at home. She said in her letter that the boys work from 5 a.m. to 9 p.m. That is sixteen hours a day. Mind you, my wife got up around half-past three or four o'clock in the morning, because she had to get breakfast for those boys. They do the chores before five o'clock, and are out on the tractors by that hour. They continue steadily, driving those tractors all the time until nine o'clock in the evening.

Now, what about my daughters, my little girls? What are they doing? They are cooking and helping with the chores; they take out the sandwiches and, as the boys go by, they hand the sandwiches to them while they are on the job.

Let us compare the work of my boys with that of an engineer on a railway. I think it is a damnable disgrace that any country like this should compel boys and girls to work sixteen hours a day on the farms, for their ordinary bread and butter. I tell you, it is a damnable disgrace.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I hope the hon. member will not continue to use language of that type.

Mr. ASHBY: Well, that was in the nature of a prayer—but I have not finished yet, and I quote from this letter: "The girls take over, so that the tractors never stop, except for oil and fuel." And these conditions exist in this day and age, in the Dominion of Canada. I wonder what the engineers on our railroads would do if they were compelled to drive their locomotives—a comparatively easy task, when compared with that of driving a tractor and handling the machinery behind it—for twelve solid hours each day, or for sixteen hours as these boys are doing.

The average railway engineer drives his locomotive under conditions of comparative ease, for a matter of four and a half or five hours each trip, and for that they receive about $15 or $20. That is the truth. It is not too much. What about the farm boys? Well, if they began to charge up to the costs of production at the same rates I am sure no one could buy a pound of butter for less than $5 or a pint of milk for less than a dollar. What is the solution? The answer is subsidies.

"Do we need butter to-day? Are we producing? Well, I told my boys to kill off the cows, to take them to town and sell them. I said, Do not milk any more; you are working hard enough." All my dairy herd has gone. Do we want butter? I can get back into the dairy business, but it requires a long time to do that—not just a year. It requires at least ten years to do it properly. A farmer is not one who looks only from one day to the next; he has to plan on and on, years ahead. I am sure no other industry would accept for one moment the financial returns that are found in connection with dairy production. The only reason the farmers accept the prices paid is that, above all else, they want freedom and security. They are willing to make great sacrifices in order to secure this freedom, that natural form of life which the farm can give them.

Just imagine! Young men by the hundreds of thousands leave agriculture, their homes and farms and all that life in the country means, to go to the cities because they have suffered the trials and tribulations on the farm—the debts, the sweat, the tears; yes, and the blood, mind you, because there are more accidents and fatalities suffered on our farms than in any other type of industrial activity. Anyone who doubts that should read the records of the United States.

Why do we have this condition? Because the farmers are overworked, overtired. No other animal, certainly no human being should be expected to keep going on and on for twelve or sixteen hours each day. No wonder that some of the women on the farms go to insane asylums, and that after twenty, thirty and forty years or more of toil, and some of the men become similarly affected. They have too much work and worry.

Surely this is a disgrace. But I did see a ray of sunshine in the speech of the Minister of Labour when he said that we were living in a comparative paradise. Yes, he said that this country is a paradise. True—but at the expense of those who work and toil.

Any hon. member who doubts that we live in this paradise should set his alarm clock for four o'clock in the morning; jump out of bed—don't bother dressing, because there are very few around at that time of the morning. Just run outside as you are, and if you go up or down the street in any city you will see bottles of milk sitting on the doorsteps of almost every house, where the pixies left them during the night. But the majority of people have not for one moment considered where that milk came from. They take all these things for granted. They will say, of course, that the milk man was there early in the morning making deliveries. But those of us from the farm know that before he made his deliveries the farmers were hard at work. The farm men, women and children were milking the cows.

We take too much for granted these days; and that is one reason I disagree with the Minister of Labour when he says that he does not like strikes. I think strikes are a wonderful thing, if for no other reason than that they remind us that there are human beings who work, toil and slave to produce the abundance we are able to enjoy in this comparative paradise.

While it is not true that we are living in an actual paradise, it is true that we do have a paradise, right here; for I believe God's work is always perfection. Most of these trials and troubles are not due to God's stupidity, ignorance or negligence; rather they are due to our own foolishness and stupidity. We can blame our so-called experts. I heard one minister make a reference to "his experts". They are the ones we should hold responsible. They are the ones upon whom we can put our finger and say, "You are responsible. Now, answer a few questions." We have not yet begun to hold our peace-time crime trials; the war-time crime trials are not yet completed. But I believe we should hold a few sittings, when we could call some of these experts to the witness stand and ask them a few questions. We could ask them why there was all this poverty and wretchedness before and since the war. Did we win the war? Have we won? Well, when it was declared that we had won the war hats were thrown in the air and everyone was happy. But we have not won; no, we are still being robbed of our production and hard-earned money. At the same time we are not producing to capacity.

I am a farmer and I should like to go ahead and produce dairy products because I specialized in dairy bacteriology. I should like to have on my farm a good dairy herd and to produce something of real value. Farmers are like gardeners and artists. Now, take this gardener—

An hon. MEMBER: You take him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ASHBY: I mean the gardener outside. Look at the beautiful flowers he has placed at the front of the building for us to look at and enjoy. Why did he not put them over the hill down by the river bank? He did not do that because people would not be able to enjoy them. The farmer is just like that; he likes to produce something that the people can enjoy. Then take our Gardiner, the minister. I was pleased to hear him say that the farmers down through these valleys in Ontario were proud to produce cheese that was enjoyed by the people of Britain.

That is true with us all. The majority of people are proud of their work and want to do their best. But many of these rules and regulations, this orthodox economy and these crackpot ideas prevent us from going ahead. We have the ability; we have the natural resources; we have the need and we should be able to go ahead. But the experts say, "You cannot do this."

There is another matter I should like to deal with—wool. The price of woollen goods indicates to me that wool is a necessity and that it should be produced. Yet on my own farm I have cut the production of wool at a time when after twenty-five years I am in a position to produce it to capacity. Many people take wool for granted and do not stop to think what goes into its production. Considered from a practical point of view the wool grower has an investment in his land equal to that which the average professional man has invested in his business. In addition, he has to buy thousands of fence posts at twenty to twenty-five cents apiece. If he employs someone, say a dentist, to bore holes in the ground and he is charged the same price as would be charged for boring a hole in a tooth and filling it, the added cost of producing wool would be such as to make it impossible for people to buy it, except in very small quantities. Under such circumstances wool would probably be framed in glass or in a glass bowl for people to admire as the marvelous product it is. The risks involved are the same as those involved in any other form of live stock raising, with certain exceptions.

Wool

When I started out in sheep I was advised by agricultural experts not to start with purebreds but to buy a few good range ewes. I bought those range ewes and tried to fence them in. I found I had to go to town to buy some snare wire, not to be used as most hon. members may think, but for the purpose of catching some jack-rabbits. I lived on Jack-rabbit for about three weeks in the hope of building up enough speed to be able to round up the sheep.

When it came to shearing time I did have some difficulty. I remember my little boy looking up into my face with his big brown eyes and asking me what I was going to do. I said, "Daddy is going to shear the sheep." All right, if daddy says he is going to shear the sheep, the sheep will be sheared, thought the child. Was not daddy a big soldier man from the war; was not daddy a redoubtable man? Of course he was. But I had my doubts.

I started forth with a hired man. The hired man was inexperienced and we did have some difficulty. I remember that I was nearly played out catching the first one but I finally got it on its back. Then I found I was faced with a worse job than ever before because there were four sharp feet flying around in all directions. However, I finally managed to get it up on its rump and started in to shear. I am pointing out these things to show the real value of wool and the tremendous real cost of producing it. I have read of similar instances which had occurred in basements of department stores at bargain counters during recent years in which certain members of the fair sex were involved, but I had no experience along this line.

I had no sooner got the wool off one side than the sheep managed to run its front feet up under my shirt and ripped it off my back. My little boy was jumping up and down and shouting, "You are winning, daddy." I got the other side off, but the perspiration was running into my eyes and falling off the end of my nose. I was just about to finish cutting the last little lock off the end of its tail when it got both hind feet up the legs of my pants and after a tremendous struggle it broke loose and we parted company. The sheep staggered off minus its coat while I sat on the ground minus my pants which my little boy retrieved for me. The hired man called it a draw.

These are just some of the trials and tribulations of producing wool. Then to think that all I received for that wool was from twelve to fifteen cents a pound!

An hon. MEMBER: Look at the fun you had.

Mr. ASHBY: Then it was minus the cost of the sacks, minus the twine and freight, minus this and minus that, and by the time I bought a shirt to replace the one that I lost I was in debt. What is the solution?

An hon. MEMBER: Tie up the sheep.

Mr. ASHBY: The solution is really very simple. It is not for us to decide how it shall be done because the minister has indicated that there are experts available. All we need to do is to tell the experts: "Ways and means must be found so that all those employed in agriculture shall receive a just and fair price for"—I was going to say for everything they produce or for all they produce, but it is not my duty simply to produce something and then say that I shall be paid for it, like it or lump it. Somebody should decide what I as a farmer should produce, and the quantity that I should produce. The producer should receive a sufficient return, and, what is more, his dollar should be able to buy one dollar's worth of goods instead of thirty cents worth, which is all it buys to-day. His dollar should have a full dollar's worth of value. The consumer should be able to choose what he wants from our farm production and the farmer should receive a fair and just price for the products the consumer demands from him. That means bonusing, and keep on increasing those bonuses. It can be done without increasing the price to the consumer.

I was ashamed of the Minister of Labour on Monday, a man from Sussex, from Britain, actually saying—and if I had been sitting beside him I would have slapped his wrist—"It cannot be done. Grown-up men know it cannot be done." If that be true, and it is not, then I hope I never become a grown-up man because I assure the minister that it can be done and will be done, and I am certain that it will be done in our life time. It requires only simple adjustments to be made to our present financial system, which is all right, mind you. I do not think there is any financial system ever devised by the mind of man which is equal to ours, with one exception. It is not up to me to say what that exception is or what minor adjustments should be made or how they should be made. They are simple and can be made, and if the experts do not bring about those needed changes there is only one alternative, and that is an ultimate world dictatorship. Then, indeed, we shall all be slaves.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Chairman, I listened with a good deal of pleasure to the hon. member who has just taken his seat but with some trepidation when he got to the point where the sheep appeared to commandeer his trousers. But he did not explain and I should like to know just how he managed to shear the rump of the sheep while it was sitting on it. Perhaps at some later date he will tell us.

At the outset I wish to express my appreciation of the fact that the agriculture estimates are going up and to compliment the minister on his success in being able to do this little trick, because in times like these, when everybody is so anxious to cut down all expenditure, I realize that it is only with the greatest difficulty that any estimate can be boosted upward. Of course, I still feel that these estimates are too low. Our agricultural people have always considered that the amount that was spent on agriculture to improve its methods and do the different jobs that had to be done to that end was very low indeed. The last figures available, those in the "Canada Year Book, 1942" show that $2,136,000,000 odd was realized from the sale of agricultural products of all kinds in the previous year. Two and one-quarter billion dollars is a considerable amount of money, and when we spend only $19,000,000 on trying to boost that figure, it is not very much. However, we must be thankful for small mercies and as an agriculturist I appreciate the fact that attempts are being made to improve the position of the industry.

When I had an opportunity of speaking in this house some time ago I made the statement that a country which could produce at the lowest cost, the highest quality article, would get the world market. The Minister of Agriculture this afternoon referred to that phase when he said that he did not consider it was possible for us to enter into successful competition with New Zealand, for instance, in the dairy industry, because we cannot compete with their climatic conditions. I still believe as I have said before in the house, that in the last analysis we shall find all the nations of the world compelled to grow or produce or manufacture that thing which they can most economically grow or produce or manufacture.

Those countries will be able to capture the world market which can keep down costs of production. Costs of production establish the selling price of any commodity, and I was wondering how we can reduce production costs in agriculture.

There are two things that can be done if and when these production costs are reduced. The manufacturer or producer can secure more profits or, second, he can reduce the price at which he sells his commodity. I think the latter is the more desirable because in that way it will be possible to secure and make sure of a market, if we keep the price down and the quality up. But keeping the price down is a very important factor. With that thought in mind I give it as my opinion that tariffs, quotas and trade restrictions will have to go. I believe, as a matter of fact, they are out. Undoubtedly they have been war-producing. They have been the means of creating more ill will and trouble between nations than any other thing.

How can we cut down costs of production in agriculture? It is said that when Marquis wheat was king we lost one crop in five from a disease which we have all heard of and which is known as rust. That is, twenty per cent of our crop was lost because of this terrible scourge which we experienced for so many years in the western provinces. When eventually our plant breeders and plant pathologists were successful in producing a variety of wheat which was resistant to rust we saved one crop in five, or twenty per cent of our crop. In other words, our production costs were cut twenty per cent by the single factor of producing a variety of wheat resistant to rust. Any time that we conquer a plant disease, and any time that we conquer the effects of insect pests in agriculture, we are reducing our costs of production. This work is being done by our agricultural scientists, and I want to touch briefly on them in passing.

They have done and are still doing an extraordinarily good work in agriculture. It is of the highest importance that we should see to it that the services of these men are retained and encouraged in every way. I wish to acknowledge what the minister has done in this respect and to commend him for having started to raise the salaries of our agricultural scientists. I have in my hand a list of the men whose salaries have been raised, and I notice that the increases range all the way from $60 to $900 and that very few received only a $60 raise. Most of them received liberal raises. I have no doubt that this will be the means of encouraging these men to stay on the job and give us further assistance in our agricultural work.

Recently one of these men has been the means of discovering or originating another variety of wheat which has proved itself resistant to a pest known in the west as sawfly. Every year for a good many years the losses from sawfly in the western provinces were anywhere from $15 to $20 million. So that it does seem as though we could afford to pay a reasonable salary to a man who can provide us with a variety of wheat which is resistant to the attacks of the sawfly. Losses in the western provinces from weeds amount to $70 million per annum. It would be worth a lot of money to us if some of these men could tell us how to avoid these weed losses. Another disease we have in the west is known as smut, and that costs us $20 million a year. If we could get rid of these things our production costs would be cut down and we would have a much better chance to compete in the world market. The agricultural scientist can save us all these losses if he is encouraged to do so, if the money is found for him to work with, in his laboratories and in other ways. These men must never be allowed to ease up on their work; it is never finished. I think I have told the house before, but it will bear repetition, that rust, which cost us so many million dollars a few years ago, and which we think we have conquered, could easily come at us again from another angle. We know there is a considerable number of varieties of rust. We have successfully stopped the attacks of this particular disease in the wheat fields; but there is always a chance of another variety of rust turning up which will immediately knock all our plans galley-west, which will upset all the work that has been done, and we shall immediately run into the difficulty all over again. So that our men must be kept working all the time. They cannot stop when they have succeeded in what they have set out to do, because hazards are always present and must be considered at all times.

One aspect of agriculture about which I should like to talk for a few minutes and which I do not think has been discussed very much in this chamber, is the question of seed. In the last few years there has sprung up in this country, a seed industry the value of which is not appreciated by a great many people. We used to import a tremendous quantity of our seed. The situation is now changed, and we find ourselves with an export trade in seed. It affects not only the prairie west but all the provinces. As a matter of fact some of the eastern provinces are gaining substantially from the growing of vegetable seed, as also is the far western province of British Columbia. Some of these figures might be interesting to the committee.

In 1939 this country produced 104,000 pounds of beans; in 1944 we produced 850,000 pounds of seed. Beet seed in this country increased from 4,000 pounds in 1939 to 80,000 pounds in 1944; cabbage seed, from 55 pounds to 6,500 pounds. Perhaps 6,500 pounds does not seem to be a very large quantity, but all things are relative, and a pound of cabbage seed is really a lot of seed. As a matter of fact—to come to one other kind of seed—in one ounce of tobacco seed there are roughly 90,000 seeds, which will plant ten acres. That is, one ounce of tobacco seed is in this respect the equivalent of fifteen bushels of wheat, for it will plant ten acres of land. The production of carrot seed has advanced from 10,000 to 221,000 pounds. There was no corn seed produced until 1943, and in that year we had 560,000 pounds, and so on all down the line. There is a swede turnip seed which is grown by farmers in the maritimes, the amount having increased from 11,000 pounds in 1941 to 161,000 pounds in 1944; and that, as I have said before, is a tremendous lot of seed.

Tobacco seed is grown principally in Ontario. It is a very difficult thing to secure, because it has to be disease-free, and even the soil in which the tobacco plant is grown has to be sterilized before it can be safely used for this particular seed. Turnip seed is grown in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The Laurentian seed, as it is called, provides hundreds upon hundreds of carloads of turnips grown from Canadian seed. In Nova Scotia, where this seed is being grown, the authorities marked off one area in which no other variety of seed was allowed to be grown except this one particular variety. It is the first time that any such experiment has been made. Beetroot seed is being grown in the maritimes to a great extent. I could name the number of thousands of pounds, but I do not wish to bore hon. members. But an interesting thing happened in this connection. One pound of a very special variety, Detroit dark red, was sent out to a trained grower, who returned the next year, for the one pound which he used, 275 pounds. The five other pounds which constituted the remainder of that particular seed was sent out to untrained men. All this seed was lost; it became mixed with other varieties. Hydrid corn is another strongly entrenched seed product. It takes a long time to get a start. Twenty years are taken in developing the inbreds, and then the matching, as it is called, is done on an Ontario farm and produces a single cross which is used for the seed. There has been a tremendous increase in the amount of corn and a tremendous change in the type of plant which has been grown. It is stated that the type of plant grown from these hybrids has made possible the use of harvesting machinery for corn. Previously this was not possible because of the weakness of the stem; when there was a rain or a wind storm the plant went down; but now it stands up; machinery can be successfully used, and the saving has been tremendous. Vegetable seed is grown particularly in Ontario and British Columbia. There are six strains of onions developed by British Columbia growers and now used all over the world. That is particularly interesting because I have been told that the bulbs which are used to produce this onion seed are sometimes more valuable than the seed itself. Yet the growers continue to use them, and having established their market they have continued to keep it supplied.

In 1943-44 export seeds were as high as 4,500,000 pounds from Canada to the United Kingdom, consisting of carrots, beans, peas, cauliflower, lettuce, parsley, spinach and so on, and it is said that on the basis of average seeding and yields, these seeds produced 2,500,000 tons of food. In other words, that was the quantity of seeds that Canada shipped over in 1943-44 at a time when they were badly needed.

As regards cereals in the western provinces, in 1943 there were sown to wheat seventeen and a half million acres, representing 26,000,000 bushels of seed, and in the same year 15,000,000 acres were sown to oats, requiring 40,000,000 bushels of seed, and 8,500,000 acres of barley requiring 13,000,000 bushels. In fact, in one year, 1940, we sowed 28,750,000 acres to wheat, which required 42,000,000 bushels of seed. That is a lot of seed, and that particular crop produced over $540,000,000 worth of wheat, even at fifty-two cents a bushel.

It can be seen, therefore, that this matter of seed is very important—important as a seed industry, and important as a means of securing good seed for our own country, and because seed plays such a fundamental part in our own production. I often wonder whether hon. members as they sweat over their garden patches pay sufficient attention to the quality of the seed they use, because all those backaches they endure at the end of a spade or shovel handle are wasted if they buy inferior seed. It is important that they should secure seed of the best quality.

There are in this country many agricultural organizations who are doing very good work but who are not known much outside their own orbit. They work in a little district or community and that is the only place in which they are known. There is such an organization, probably new to a great many members of this house, known as the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, or C.S.G.A. to use its initial letters. These people are responsible for taking care of all pure-line seeds.

A point that is not generally recognized is that when a plant breeder has secured what he was after, either a rust-resistant or an insect-resistant seed, he has only a very small quantity of seed, probably only a handful. The important thing is to get this handful out to the farmers in the country who require, in some years, 42,000,000 bushels of seed. But this very small handful is all there is, and if it becomes mixed with anything else, it is useless because all its good qualities are lost. Someone has to take over the job of multiplying this small quantity of seed, and he has to take care in the process that it does not become fouled or mixed with anything else. This work requires training and patience and it takes a great deal of time. That is one of the principal objects of this organization known as the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. The association has not a very large membership, but these special seeds are handed over to the members for production and multiplication purposes, and they are the people who, because of special training and because of their willingness to devote their time to this kind of work, reproduce and multiply this small quantity into larger supplies, so that they may become available to the farmers of the land.

The scientific work is useless until all the farmers who require the seed can get it, and if these trained workers produce a rust-resistant seed all the farmers in the west should be supplied with it. It takes a great deal of time to multiply that seed, and purity is the important factor. Indeed, everything has to be taken into consideration. The land itself in which the seed is to be sown is generally a piece of summer-fallow. But that summer-fallow has to be cleared of all other growth and of all extraneous matter. If animals went across it last year it is absolutely useless for the purpose of growing the new variety of seed. If the machine that is used to do the seeding, the seed drill, is not thoroughly cleaned and every last seed taken out of it, it is of no use and it will spoil the whole set-up. It has to be thoroughly cleaned so that the crop will be absolutely pure. The same is true of every other implement used in the process. The threshing machine is probably the most difficult for the grower of pure-bred seed, because it is a physical impossibility to get every seed out of that piece of machinery. Any hon. members who have had experience with a thresher will realize the difficulties it presents. The result is that a good deal of pure seed will not be threshed in a threshing machine but by hand, with the use of a flail. Older members who were raised on farms will know what a flail is—a long stick with a short stick tied to it, the object being to swing it round the head without hitting the head but, instead, bringing it down on the sheaf of grain. In other words, we have to go back to the old methods because we are afraid of introducing foreign matter into the seed. Again, we have to use a floor that has not been used before because there may be in the cracks some grain from a previous occasion.

It is a terribly tedious job, and all these dangers of impurities getting into the seed are not the only things we have to worry about. There are other things the members of the association have to cope with.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was trying to show the importance of an organization known as the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, and was pointing out the difficulties they encountered and the excellent work they were doing in keeping pure, certain lines of seed. The possibility and danger of mixtures which I described was purely a mechanical matter. I mentioned those which might take place in the ground and those which might take place in the drills, and the machines used by these growers. When mixtures happened for these reasons, that would be purely a mechanical matter. However, other mixtures take place in the natural growth of the plants. You get cross-fertilization between plants of the same family, so that great care has to be exercised; and there is difficulty in differentiating between a cross-bred plant and one of pure strain. The members of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association have trained themselves so that without a great deal of difficulty they can recognize cross-breeding in the different plants, in their fields and plots. They have to keep great distances between those plants which are of pure strain, and those which are not. In the case of corn, for instance, there has to be at least a mile between the pure lines and other lines. A distance of sixty feet is common between ordinary cereal lines in the close pollinated plants and greater distances have to be maintained in regard to those which are open-pollinated.

It is fortunate that all these different types of plants have something which enables the onlooker to distinguish them. The matter of the shape of a plant is very important, and is perhaps the first thing noticed by the breeder or the man going into pure lines. All these different plants have different shapes. Even different varieties of wheat have different shapes. Some varieties are bearded; some are not. So that these different distinguishing characteristics are observed by these members of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, in their special work. There is no great harm in having a plant with a different shape, except that it indicates cross-breeding. There is no great harm in a plant having a glume of a certain shape, any more than there is any great harm in a Holstein cow not having a white splash at the end of its tail. The white tip on its tail is simply an indication of pure breeding, and if an animal does not have that white tip you cannot register it. That is an indication of the breed, and the same thing occurs within limits in plant life.

As I say, these men are trained to detect these different changes. Such variations or off-types are severely dealt with in the examination of the plots by members of the seed branch. That is one thing I have not mentioned. The registration of plants is obtained in exactly the same way that we have registration of animals. Just as we get a registered Clydesdale or a registered Shorthorn, in the same way we get registered varieties of wheat, oats, vegetable seeds and so on. Pure lines are obtained in this way, and certificates are issued. The Canadian Seed Growers' Association has the issuing of all these certificates, but the examination of the plots is done in co-operation with the scientific agriculturists of the Department of Agriculture. These men go around to the fields and examine them, in company with the grower and a representative of the association, and report what they find in the field. If sufficient impurities are in a field the field is not registered, and it is thrown out. Just there it may be of interest to hon. members to learn that a grower is allowed one plant in one hundred thousand slightly off type. In other words, his plot must be 99·999 per cent pure, which is extraordinary purity, reminding me somewhat of the C.C.F. party. Such purity is difficult to attain, as I am sure hon. members will agree.

Another point I should like to make is that somewhere there must be a source of pure seed, in exactly the same way that there must be a source of pure-bred animals. Certain men undertake to breed Hereford cattle. They keep the line pure, and other breeders know where to go if they want a purebred cow or bull. In exactly the same way you must have sources of pure-bred seed, and that source is the membership of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. It must be quite obvious to hon. members that unless someone did carry on this work, very soon our strains would be all mixed up. We would have wheat, and that would be about the only way you could describe it, because it would be so badly mixed that we would not know what kind it was.

I wish to speak about this organization for a short time because I realize that it plays an important part in connection with the crops which are grown from seed in this country. Of the total of $2,146,000,000 I mentioned previously, some $1,120,000,000 represents crops grown from seed; that is, grain, vegetables and plants which have their origin in seed. So that it is quite important that this seed be kept pure. As far as the association is concerned, none of the officers receive any remuneration. The office staff, the secretary and those who are occupied in doing this work are the only ones who receive pay. The organization operates on a grant it has received for a number of years from this government. There was a time when the grant got as high as $25,000 per annum, and it will be noticed that in the estimates for this year the same amount is again being asked.

During the war years, however, it sank down to as low as $18,900. The organization has discovered it is not able to give service to its members on the allowance made to it at the present time. On its behalf I am asking that consideration be given to increasing the amount of this grant. As I have already said, it is being increased in the estimates from $18,900 to $25,000 for 1946. Unfortunately, however, the organization had hoped that it would get that increase in 1945, and it worked on that assumption, with the result that it finished up somewhat in the hole. I am suggesting, therefore, that the minister consider making arrangements for the amount short of $25,000 which was given last year, and that there be included in the supplementary estimates a further grant of $6,100.

I believe that is all I have to say on the point. I feel I have not made too strong a case for the organization. It is of the most extreme importance, however, that it be properly maintained, because if anything happens as a result of which these growers decide that they are not being properly recompensed, or that the time and trouble are too great, and eventually stop growing these pure sources of seeds, the whole economy of the country would be jeopardized. Incidentally, these people are not paid for the work they do.

I hope consideration will be given, by taking care at all times to see that the organization does not suffer from a lack of funds, so that it can carry on the excellent work it is doing. I have already said that only the secretary and the staff are paid. Provision is made for the expenses of officers selected from all parts of the country when they gather in convention. I believe that provision is allowed by the respective provincial governments.

Half of the officers of the organization are appointed by the different provincial departments of agriculture, and those departments take care of incidental expenses. It might be added that the work of the organization is one of the greatest cooperative movements to be found anywhere in the country. The plant breeders and plant pathologists in the scientific branches of the Department of Agriculture work, in turn, with the membership and officials of the association. These latter, in turn, work with the farmer members who actually grow the seed. I would ask that sympathetic consideration be given to the proper maintenance of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association.

Mr. JUTRAS: First of all, I should like to commend the hon. member who has just taken his seat upon his interesting speech. It was most constructive and well poised. I found it a real pleasure to listen to what he had to say.

This afternoon we listened to an interesting debate on the various aspects of agriculture. To complete the picture I should like to say a few words and make a few suggestions to the Minister of Agriculture respecting another branch of that industry, namely the growing of sugar beets. I believe the minister can be of some assistance to us in bringing to the attention of hon. members and the people generally throughout Canada the fact that the process of growing sugar beets is more than just an industry.

At the present time I believe the people generally view the sugar beet industry as just another industry, such as a shoe factory or any other type of manufacturing concern. There is much more to it than that. It is not just a means of employing labour. I believe efforts should be made in the Department of Agriculture to make the production of sugar beets an integral part of the general agricultural programme of the country.

It is my sincere belief that there could be a closer relationship between the agricultural representatives in the government and the field men. May I make it perfectly clear that I am not criticizing agricultural representatives, either provincial or federal, realizing fully that they work under strenuous conditions. There are too few of them, and their districts are much too large. It is impossible for them to devote all their time to all branches of the industry.

Still, from the federal point of view, I believe a somewhat greater effort could be put forth to try, if nothing more, to publicize more generally the benefits of the sugar beet industry to farming as a whole. In those areas in the United States I have visited where sugar beet factories are operating, those factories have been made part of the general agricultural programme of the whole district. Those districts depend greatly upon the sugar beet factories, not only for sugar but for the general development of agriculture.

I believe the department could do much to publicize the various ways the beet tops and molasses can be used in the raising of cattle and in the dairying industry generally. Then, it can be argued that the growing of sugar beets is an effective means of cleaning the land and getting rid of weeds because, as we know, where sugar beets are grown every weed must be pulled by hand. Consequently, even if only fifteen or twenty acres are cultivated in that crop, that much land is clean at the end of the year. If that process is repeated every year the point is soon reached where the whole district surrounding the factory is entirely free of weeds. It is also a most effective crop for those who practise rotating their crops—and I believe we all do that. Certainly that is true in Manitoba.

I speak primarily, of course, for the sugar beet factory in Manitoba, which is relatively new. We had some difficulties, because we had to begin during the war. Labour conditions were hard to contend with and as an additional problem there were practically two total crop failures.

There is one suggestion I should like to make which I think would go a long way toward solving this problem. This industry should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. At the present time it is more or less divided between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance. I believe there are difficulties because of the international complications connected with the cane sugar industry, but I think it would be possible to have the beet sugar industry under the Department of Agriculture.

I wish to make it clear that I am casting no reflection upon the Minister of Finance. I know I am speaking for our association when I say that they have been impressed with the earnestness of the minister and they appreciate the consideration they have always received from him each time they came to Ottawa. This industry should be made part of our general agricultural programme. If we could bring the industry under one roof as it were; if we could bring it under the Department of Agriculture alone it would be a start toward achieving our objectives.

The sugar beet growers of this country have never been given a chance to put their case before the people of the country. I know I speak for the sugar beet growers' association and I believe also for sugar beet growers generally when I say that these people are most desirous of being given an opportunity to lay their case before a committee of this house. If that were done the country would become more conscious of this industry; I was going to say this promising industry. It is a new industry as far as Manitoba is concerned, but it has been in existence for some time in other provinces and, as far as I can see, it is a successful industry.

If that were done it would go a long way toward removing many of the wrong concepts that people have about sugar made from beets. Some people think this sugar is different or is just an imitation of cane sugar. Some growers feel that they have been discriminated against. If they could be allowed to place their case squarely before a committee I am sure that the attention of the country would be directed toward the industry. I realize that there are many committees sitting during this session, for long hours each days and many days in the week. However, I am making this suggestion now in the hope that as the session goes on some of the committees will complete their work and it might be possible to have the committee hear the producers' case as well as that of the various sugar companies. Again I urge the minister to try to bring this sugar beet industry under the jurisdiction of his department. I know such a move would be appreciated by the sugar beet growers of this country.

For a few minutes I should like to deal with the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as it is applied to Manitoba. The administration of this act has resulted in many grievances in our province. It has been the source of misunderstanding. I doubt if there are many people who really understand the P.F.A.A. It is almost impossible to apply its provisions to Manitoba and the result is that all kinds of injustices are created. I know these are not intentional but, while the act may work to some advantage in Saskatchewan, in the wide-open spaces where the township is much smaller than in Manitoba, it has been impossible to apply it along the Red river valley where there have been total crop failures in the last two years.

I am not referring to what is ordinarily known as the Red river valley, I am referring only to the river lots and the first line of quarter-sections on both sides of the river. First of all, the act does not provide for river lots and it is next to impossible to apply it where there are river lots instead of sections. The departmental officials have tried to block off the river lots into something like townships, but when that is done in a country that is rolling and has a definite slant toward the river, the effectiveness of the act is destroyed and it becomes ineffective. I have discussed this matter at great length with dominion and provincial officials in an effort to find a solution. I have tried to find some way to change the act so that it could be made applicable to my province but I have come to the conclusion that that is impossible. As far as I can see, the best thing to do is to cut Manitoba out entirely from the workings of the P.F.A.A.

I have gone to the trouble of compiling some figures from the annual reports of the P.F.A.A. starting with 1939 in an effort to get a comprehensive picture. I have tabulated the money received by the farmers, the money paid out by the farmers, the money paid out by the dominion and the money collected by the dominion for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. With the permission of the committee I could probably table these because I do not wish to read them all. They give a complete picture of what has happened since the inception of the act.

In the case of Manitoba, in 1939 a total of $333,000 was collected and $875,000 was paid out. I am giving only round figures. In 1940 they collected $355,000 and paid out $615,000. So that for those two years we were not losing. But from 1941 to 1945 the picture is entirely different. In 1942 nobody drew anything out of the fund in the three provinces. In 1943 we contributed $779,000 and drew out $30,000; in 1944 we contributed $755,000 and we collected $159,000. In 1945 I do not know exactly what the figure will be, but it would look as if we would contribute in the neighbourhood of $500,000 and draw out about $23,000.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am not talking of P.F.R.A., but of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which was passed primarily, I understand, to assist the drought area in Saskatchewan and applies exclusively to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The farmers are contributing one per cent of their grain sales toward the fund. Out of that fund they draw the moneys they receive. If the fund is not big enough the difference can be made up, I understand, by the dominion borrowing from the consolidated revenue fund.

So far as the dominion is concerned, it paid out in 1939 $10,000,000 and collected $2,000,000; in 1940 it paid out $7,000,000 and collected $2,000,000; in 1941 it paid out $15,000,000 and collected $1,500,000; in 1942 it paid out nothing and collected $2,700,000; in 1943 it paid out $6,500,000 and collected $4,700,000; in 1944 it paid out $6,000,000 and collected $5,385,000.

So that as far as the picture for the three prairie provinces as a whole is concerned I would take it that the act has been beneficial to Saskatchewan and Alberta, but so far as Manitoba is concerned we have contributed to the fund, in 1941, $303,000; in 1942, $482,000; in 1943, $766,000; in 1944 $600,000 and it looks very much as if we would contribute in 1945 between $400,000 and $500,000. Therefore it will be readily understood why I contend that this is not a good measure so far as Manitoba is concerned. There is a good reason for that. As I said at the beginning conditions in Manitoba are quite different from those in Saskatchewan and the township unit is far too big in relation to the average farm in Manitoba.

The picture presented by these figures looks brighter for Manitoba than it actually is because up until 1942 the P.F.A.A., under its provisions, was paying out on the basis of 8 to 12 bushels to the acre when wheat was below eighty cents. If wheat goes over eighty cents the act provides only for payment on 0 to 4 bushels, $2.00, and from 4 to 8 bushels, $1.50.

If that were done, under conditons to-day we would not draw as much as we drew in 1939 and 1940. I respectfully submit to the minister that Manitoba be exempted from the P.F.A.A. because we have given up all hope of ever getting any benefit from it.

I will go one step farther and make a suggestion to the minister, if I may. Keep on collecting the one per cent on grain sales, if not the dominion, then by agreement with the province, to establish some form of crop insurance. I do not think that is the right term because it would not exactly be crop insurance, but I will use that term for lack of a better. If you kept on collecting the one per cent and put it into a fund, it could be made into a real crop insurance fund.

I have here a "Report on Crops, Live Stock, etc. produced in Manitoba in 1945." It was issued by the department of agriculture and immigration of Manitoba. It does not claim to furnish definitely reliable information but it is approximately correct. It gives a very fair picture of the crop and live stock production of the province. It also gives the hail damage done in Manitoba. I have taken the years from 1939 to 1945 and fitted them into this pattern to see how it would work out. I am not going to quote all the figures, but let us take the acreage that was totally lost by hail damage and the acreage partly lost from that cause in those years. I arbitrarily take the figure of $2 an acre for total loss and $1 an acre for partial loss by hail. This would have cost the province, in round figures, $106,500 in 1939; in 1940, $86,000; in 1941, $65,000; in 1942, $128,500; in 1943, $211,000. I have not the figures for 1944 but for 1945 it would be $144,500, making a total of $737,785. A one per cent levy on the crop since 1938 would total $3,043,968.38. That is the total amount that was collected from the one per cent levied on grain. Add to that the actual amount that was paid out to the province, $1,692,736.20, and you find that over that period of years from 1939 to 1945 we could have paid out the same benefits as we have paid, and on top of that we could have paid out $2 and $1 an acre respectively for total and partial loss by hail damage. I do not like the term "insurance"—

Mr. GARDINER: Assistance.

Mr. JUTRAS: I thank the minister. We could under my suggestion have given the farmers who were hailed out some assistance.

I do not know whether this would be feasible, but what I have in mind is that the federal government collect the money and turn it over to the minister of agriculture of Manitoba, or if some arrangement could be made between the two bodies, that the federal government should step out, let the province institute a one per cent levy on grain, lend them the facilities of the Canadian wheat board to collect it, have the province put this money into a fund for the province, and then they could give assistance for damage by hail and floods, I believe it could handle those two. I do not think it would be wise to try to insure the farmers against drought, because in Manitoba, indeed in any province, when there is a drought it is such a general condition that it would be pretty difficult to handle it with any fund of this kind. To be able to do so, the provincial government would no doubt have to raise the levy on all grain, and I doubt if it would be feasible to raise it any higher. But, as I have pointed out, even with this one per cent levy I believe we could give a certain amount of assistance to the farmers against hail and floods to begin with, and then later, if the fund swells, we could provide further assistance to the farmers of the province.

Therefore this is the main suggestion I have to make to the minister. If my memory serves me right, though I was not able to put my hand on the actual speech in which I saw the statement, I believe the minister of agriculture of Manitoba, in the course of the budget debate of last session in that province, said he would like to institute some kind of—as he put it—crop insurance. I take it, therefore, that he would be sympathetic to the suggestion I have made.

I was surprised to find in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act a provision that the advance made by the Minister of Finance under this section shall be repayable out of the fund without interest. So that, even if we do accumulate much of a fund there, we do not stand much chance of getting a great deal out of it, because there is no doubt that this fund has been operating in the red ever since it started. I do not suppose it was ever the intention of the government that it would remain in the black. It was and is, as the title indicates, an assistance for unusual and extraordinary circumstances, and I repeat, as at least my personal opinion, that the people of Manitoba as a whole would welcome a change such as I have just mentioned. I strongly urge the minister to consider it seriously.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two questions which have been raised that I think I should answer before we get too far on with the discussion. The first was raised by the hon. member for North Battleford a few moments ago, to the effect that an amount of, I think $6,100 should be added to the vote to the seed growers. The fact is that when these estimates were first brought up I personally and the members of the department thought the $6,100 was in the vote. I think the mistake came about in this way, that last year an amount was put in which was reduced by $6,100, which brought the amount down to $18,900. This year it was intended that the $6,100 be added to the $25,000, and it was added to the $18,900. The amount is in the supplementaries; at least it has been submitted in the supplementaries. I do not think it was intentionally struck out by the treasury board. I doubt very much if it was understood, at the time it was placed before them. In any event it is being reconsidered and is before the board now in the form of a supplementary estimate which will probably be brought down later in the session.

The other question, which has just been raised by the hon. member for Provencher, is to the effect that some changes should be made in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That act is up for amendment this year; at least I have suggested that it be overhauled and some extensive amendments be made. It is my present intention, if it meets with the approval of the house, to have the bill when it is submitted, if it is submitted—I still have to get it by council—referred to the agriculture committee in order to give opportunity to hon. members to make suggestions, but more particularly in order to get them to understand fully the principle underlying the bill and its operation up to date. I had not in mind personally going as far as has been suggested by the hon. member for Provencher in connection with the amendment as related to Manitoba, the reason being that we did take some responsibility for placing the legislation on the statute books in its present form. There has been very considerable criticism, perhaps justifiable, in Manitoba on the ground just referred to, to the effect that they are paying one per cent into the fund and they do not get nearly as much out as they pay in.

On the other question, as to whether there was ever anything to come out of the fund as a result of what was paid in, if members of the committee will take the trouble to read in Hansard the discussions at the time the legislation was placed on the statute books in 1939, they will find it was contended that the amount collected from farmers would never amount—that is, over a period of years—to more than one-fourth to one-third of the total amount which would be paid out. In other words, it was maintained that it was impossible—and at that time we thought the same idea might apply to Manitoba—to apply a purely insurance principle to payments required in connection with drought in areas so large as those affected in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The question of insurance for crops had been under discussion in the west for many years, and many attempts were made to work out plans which could be based on the insurance principle; in other words, under which you could create a fund based on the payment of fees which at all times would meet the demands that were made upon the fund. But any figuring which was ever done with regard to the matter suggested the impossibility of ever being able to collect sufficient from farmers by way of fees to build up a fund large enough to take care of the losses that farmers incur in a year of serious drought. I think it will be realized that to insure a man against the loss of his crop would be impossible in a year like 1937, for example, when a province which has a long-time average crop of sixteen to seventeen bushels an acre had an average crop of a little over two bushels to the acre. One can see what an enormous amount of money would be required in a fund to take care of a situation of that kind. So that after considerable discussion it was determined that the only way this could be looked after was for someone who had no opportunity ever to draw from the fund to be prepared to pay into the fund.

In view of the importance of wheat particularly and of grains generally to the economic position of the dominion, it was thought advisable, in order to avoid paying out great sums in relief, as was done in the years just preceding that over considerable periods, to have the dominion treasury made responsible for paying in from $3 to $4 for every dollar that would be paid by the farmers themselves. We have had an experience with that measure and are satisfied that a province like Saskatchewan cannot create a fund sufficiently large to make it possible for the province to take care of any losses related to drought.

I think the same is true of Alberta, but I believe it has been proved by the figures just quoted to the committee that there is a possibility that Manitoba could run its own insurance scheme. So that what I did propose to do was to suggest an amendment to the act under which any province that wished to withdraw from both the payment of the one per cent and the benefits would be permitted to do so. If they think they can get along without any insurance plan at all, let them make the decision. If they would rather set up a plan of their own, I am sure no one in this house would object. If they can finance an insurance plan in Manitoba without assistance from anyone else in Canada; if they prefer to do that rather than to be in exactly the same position as the people of Montreal, let them take that view, even if you admit what Manitoba says, that they have no chance of ever drawing out. There is no doubt in the world that Montreal has no chance of drawing out; but Montreal pays in, and on different occasions on which I have had discussions with farm organizations in Manitoba with respect to the matter I have been able to convince them in the meeting where I was to pass a resolution saying that it was all right. But I have never had an opportunity of speaking to all the farmers of Manitoba. The best thing, therefore, is to allow Manitoba to decide the matter for themselves. If I get it by council, and the house agrees to it, they will be able to settle the question for themselves.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Has the Manitoba government asked for that?

Mr. GARDINER: Many people in Manitoba have, and many meetings. I believe that if we make it possible for Manitoba itself to decide, probably the question will be settled and they will say whether they want it or not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not agree with the hon. member for Provencher when he asks that Manitoba be completely eliminated, although he has a vexing problem in the river lots. As the minister said, when the matter was first brought up there were resolutions from Portage la Prairie and along the Red river objecting, because they never had a failure and therefore they objected to a contribution of a cent a bushel. But I am satisfied that the farmers of Manitoba as a whole do not wish to be exempt unless they are sure of some other crop insurance scheme. The prairie provincial governments have had committees investigating different forms of insurance for some years and they want some system such as that. The minister has talked with some people; I do not know whether we should let him talk to everyone; but he has convinced those with whom he has talked of the need of cooperation. Anyone who has passed through the drought periods will be very happy to make a contribution as long as he lives for the sake of those unfortunate people who have had to put up with the drought in the prairie provinces.

Last year I received a return in connection with the setting up of the administration of the act over a period of years. I have not that return by me at the moment, but the minister will agree that the facts therein set out go to prove that there should be some amendments to the act, and I am pleased that he has made the announcement that he will suggest amendments this year so that we may have an opportunity to discuss the act and any proposed amendments in the committee on agriculture, which is only proper. While I sympathize greatly with the hon. member for Provencher, coming as I do from Manitoba, I do not agree with him on this point.

Mr. JUTRAS: So that the record may be clear, I do not want it understood that I ask to have the P.F.A.A. entirely cut out, but I asked that Manitoba be entirely excluded from it. I agree that it is good for Saskatchewan and Alberta—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And many parts of Manitoba.

Mr. JUTRAS: There is a certain part of Manitoba that benefits. I will put it in that way.

Mr. McCUAIG: I rise to speak on the agricultural economy of Canada as it affects the individuals producing the foodstuffs of Canada as a whole. The production of foodstuffs is the world's number one industry to-day and it has always been the country's first industry. It has never been treated fairly by any government at Ottawa but rather has been held in contempt. All Canada has suffered from this treatment and will continue to suffer until agriculture receives the recognition it deserves. I am going to do some straight talking about the treatment the primary producer has received under this private enterprise system from both Liberal and Tory governments.

Full realization by the government of basic fundamentals is long overdue, and I think it is timely that a common dirt farmer should rise to speak in this house. I think I can qualify as one of those who come within that category, for the first twenty years of my life were spent on a farm in Ontario and the last thirty-four years in southwestern Saskatchewan in a part of the drought area.

Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that there are things that you can do in southwestern Saskatchewan and things that you cannot do. If some planning had been done by the government of that day, if settlers had been informed of the soil and weather conditions, and if there had been allotted economic units instead of wholesale half-sections on any kind of land there would have been very little relief needed or destitution in the southwest.

While I am on this question of plans, I should like to say this. I am sorry the government of to-day has not seen fit to use the results of the recent soil survey. Had that been done, there would have been a large increase in the acreage of wheat sowed this spring. Maps could have been got out and posted in Manitoba and the northern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta showing the black soil areas where summer-fallowing is done rather to keep down weeds than to conserve moisture. Thousands of acres of additional land could have been seeded this spring in those areas.

The southwestern part of Saskatchewan where I live, and most of the Palliser triangle where the brown soil runs from four to ten inches deep, is strictly a fifty per cent summer-fallow area; and it is simply tragic to practise anything else. I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture make a statement in the house the other day in connection with this matter. In this area, however, on the basis of half the land summer-fallowed each year—that is ten crops in twenty years—summer-fallowed by the right method, at the right time, early in May, average crops can be obtained. It is just as necessary to know thy land as it is to know thyself; and adaptability to the district is necessary.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak about the position of the farmer in the economy of this country. Canada's producers of food stuffs have never had a fair share of the national economy of Canada, or anything like equitable treatment for the long hours they, with their wives and families, have put in on the farm. I have evidence to support this contention. I have in my hand a card, a duplicate of which is in the bureau of statistics, agricultural branch, in Ottawa. It is dated November 1, 1932, and gives the average price received for farm products on November 15, 1932, as follows:

Wheat, per bushel	24
Oats, per bushel	6
Barley, per bushel	10
Rye, per bushel	11
Flaxseed, per bushel	45
Potatoes, per 100 lbs.	50
Honey, per pound	12
	dollars
Horses, per head	25
Milk cows, per head	20
	cents
Beef cattle, live weight	1¾
Calves, live weight	3½
Sheep, live weight	2¾
Lambs, live weight	4
Hogs, per pound, live weight	1¾-2
Butter made on the farm	15
Chickens, live weight	4
Eggs, per dozen	25
Wool, unwashed	4

It will be observed that eggs sold for 25 cents per dozen in November. Farmers will remember that in June of that year they were selling for six cents. This was after three short crop years in the west and particularly in the southwest. Our national revenue went down to $2,812,902,000 as compared with over $9,000,000,000 in 1944. At that time we had Tory governments in both Ottawa and Regina. The Winnipeg grain exchange was wide open. Free enterprise was going full blast. There were no ceiling prices, and no floor prices either. We had free intercourse with all the world and Bennett was going to blast his way into any market which was not open to us. There was only one country he would not deal with, and that was Russia; no truck or trade with Russia. Mr. Bennett would not even trade meat at 1¾ cents for oil.

That was the kind of thing we had in Canada in the midst of great potential wealth, the great natural heritage God gave his people in Canada. We had deprivation, hunger and want, with our children wandering over the land as bums and tramps, taking shelter in the lee of an elevator filled to the roof with wheat at from twenty to thirty cents; taking shelter in the lee of a warehouse filled with goods, boots, clothing and everything else; waiting for a freight train to come along after having been ordered out of town. Homes were broken up, and there were thousands in the soup kitchens. We had deportations and orders to leave Canada and go back to the old country. There was no place in Canada for immigrants. The other day our friends the Progressive Conservatives put up a vigorous verbal contest to retain Dominion day. I wonder if they were very proud of Dominion day in Regina in 1935.

Mr. FRASER: Why shouldn't they be?

Mr. McCUAIG: Perhaps the hon. member will change his mind in a moment. They were bidding for power that year, and if they had anything better to show it seems natural to me that they would have shown it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCUAIG: This may be rather amusing, but from now on I do not think it will be as funny for my hon. friends I am going to place on record what was done by the champions of private enterprise; what was done for the unemployed at that time. I happened to be in Regina on July 1, 1935, when 3,300 young men were on what they called a trek to Ottawa bearing a humble petition asking for work and wages. They got only as far as Regina, and what happened?

An hon. MEMBER: They should have had something to eat.

Mr. McCUAIG: The hon. member is right; they should. A meeting was called, and this is not very funny; there is a good deal of tragedy in it. Some person or persons called a meeting for eight o'clock on July 1 at Broad street park on Tenth avenue. Bills were posted up all over town saying, "Come to the meeting and help the boys on their way to Ottawa." At eight o'clock there was a big crowd there, including old men, women and people of all classes. I do not think there were over 400 boys there that night. There was a big ball game or football match where a good many of the people were attending at the fair grounds where they were staying.

The chairman of the meeting had just introduced the speaker and immediately following that there was a commotion. People were diving here and there, and I wondered what it was all about. However, I saw what the trouble was, because a tear gas bomb had been pitched right in among the crowd of civilians who were there to attend the meeting. I looked around and I could see men in battle-dress, including tin hats and what looked like soft-ball bats in their hands. These men were rushing from furniture vans and other conveyances pulled up on the outside of the crowd, and they charged the crowd, an absolutely unprovoked assault. A policeman was killed, and a lot of other people were hurt and probably crippled for life. The street-cars were stopped; store windows were smashed. They battled all the way up Eleventh avenue to the post office.

There was nothing very funny about that, I can tell you. Just ask yourselves this: If all the 3,300 boys had been at that meeting, what would have happened? If my imagination serves me correctly, it would have been one of the blackest days in Canadian history. It would have been a black day if those boys had handled themselves the same as the 300 or 400 who were there.

I should be remiss in my duty if I did not say that it would be nothing short of a tragedy if anything like that were to happen again in this Canada of ours, because next time they will not be shirt-sleeved boys with little packs on their backs. They will be boys who have learned to fight. I say it was not the right thing to do. Shortly after that we had a Liberal government in power, both in Ottawa and Regina.

An hon. MEMBER: Progress.

Mr. McCUAIG: Yes, probably this will suit my hon. friends better who sit on my right.

I should like to submit some further evidence of the treatment we received, and in that connection I shall quote from a card from the dominion bureau of statistics, dated Ottawa, July 1, 1940, in which are set out the average prices received for farm products on July 15 at Eastend:

Wheat, per bushel	$0 49
Oats, per bushel	17
Barley, per bushel	17
Rye, per bushel	22
Flax seed, per bushel	1 00
Potatoes, per cwt.	1 50
Honey, per pound	14
Horses ,per head	37 00
Milk cows, per head	25 00
Beef cattle, per lb. live weight	2½

Mr. GRAYDON: What year was that?

Mr. McCUAIG: 1940, the year after the war started. This is documentary evidence. Then the table continues:

	cents
Calves, live weight, per pound	05
Sheep, live weight, per pound	02¾
Lambs, live weight, per pound	05
Hogs, live weight, per pound	06
Butter, made on the farm	11
Chickens, live weight, per pound	04
Eggs, per dozen	06

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. McCUAIG: You will notice that this is July. I was quoting November figures before, when the chickens were all in pinfeathers.

This was after the Liberals had been in office for four years. We had a similarity in prices and conditions. Boys were receiving $5 a month in camps; thousands were lined up at the soup kitchens. In September, 1939, there were 400,000 Canadians unemployed and one million men, women and children on direct relief. For reference I would refer hon. members to the publication "Canada At War", put out by the wartime information board.

Later, farmers, 400 strong, bearing a petition on which there were 185,000 names, asked for increases in the price of wheat to meet the rising cost of production brought about by increases in the prices of things they had to buy. This is not a matter which can be traced only to a Liberal or Tory government at Ottawa. It is the result of the system, the private enterprise system. And Canadians are hogs for punishment if we put up with any more of it.

I will ask any hon. members where we would be to-night if the war had not come along and snapped us out of the private enterprise slump. Further, when this artificial war industry is over, when it is all cleaned up, can any member of the government show me where there will be any improvement? Can he show me any difference in the national economy to-day from what it was then, any difference that would justify our expecting anything better now than we had then?

An hon. MEMBER: More taxes.

Mr. McCUAIG: Yes, one statement was made which we must not forget: We have about $20 billion more on which to pay interest than we had in prewar days.

Let us take another step in the economic history of this country. After agriculture had taken the terrific beating it did take, through low and ruinous prices which would not meet the cost of production, when it faced unpaid interest, worn-out machinery which needed replacements, buildings needing repairs, back taxes, accumulated mortgage indebtedness—when we faced all these things, we got this kind of treatment.

For example, in October, 1944, while the Canadian wheat board price of wheat was $1.43, the United States price was $1.83, indicating a net loss to the Canadian farmer of forty cents a bushel. Then, again, in October, 1945, with the Canadian wheat board price at $1.55, the United States price was $1.94, or a net loss to the Canadian farmer of thirty-nine cents. We will call it forty cents because since that time the price was around $2 in the United States. Our total exports for 1943-44 and 1944-45 were, roughly, 343,000,000 bushels in each year. When compared with what the United States farmer received, the Canadian farmer lost forty cents a bushel on each one of those bushels, or a total of $137,200,000. If Saskatchewan provided 52·2 per cent of that wheat, the loss to the Saskatchewan farmer was $71,344,000. Canada as a whole was able to show great generosity to the people of Europe at the expense of the western farmer. To use Mr. Churchill's formula, never have so few who were so poor given so much to so many.

The Saskatchewan farmer also played Santa Claus to the people of Canada. Canada uses about 50,000,000 bushels of wheat a year to feed her own people. Wheat was sold to the Canadian miller for $1.25 a bushel, f.o.b. Fort William. Then the miller obtained a subsidy or drawback from the government of 47⅝ cents a bushel. This meant that the price to the Canadian people was 77⅜ cents a bushel. Even members of parliament were able to eat cheap bread by being granted charity of sixty cents per bushel by the Canadian wheat grower and 47⅝ cents by the government; but central Canada got cheap bread, so we can see that the wheat growers lost 50 millions at sixty cents, or $30,000,000. And, again, Saskatchewan farmers paid 52·2 per cent of this, or $15,600,000.

Further, wheat used for feed in Canada sold through commercial channels for the same period at $1.25 a bushel—30,000,000 bushels multiplied by 60, or $18,481,400. Again, Saskatchewan farmers paid 52·2 per cent of this, or $9,647,313. Thus it would appear that Saskatchewan made the equivalent of a cash grant to:

(a) People living abroad	$71,344,000
(b) People at home, for bread and feed	25,247,313
Total	$96,591,313

The people of Canada should know these facts because I do not think they are so unfair as to want to perpetuate this injustice borne by the people of one province. At least they should know that the people of Saskatchewan know about it.

In addition, agriculture suffered an imposition of three cents a gallon on the fuel used in tractors, and this at a time when the industry was bankrupt. To add insult to injury, Saskatchewan has had to pay an additional two cents as well as a 12½ per cent increase in the price of farm machinery. Little or no attention was paid when four hundred farmers brought a petition bearing 185,000 names to the government. The price of wheat was not fixed at $1.25 until it had gone above that figure on the open market. Yet we find that the oil companies and the machinery companies which enjoyed good profits in those years were able to sit behind closed doors with the government and receive sympathetic consideration.

Agriculture knew nothing about these increases until they were announced on the floor of this house by the Minister of Finance. Who is governing Canada? The people's representatives in parliament have no say in the laws that govern the economic well-being of the people of Canada. A farce has been made of our economic rights and we live under an economic dictatorship if there ever was one. Let us compare the treatment given to the agricultural industry with the government's treatment of the oil and implement industries.

In 1937 the net profit of Imperial Oil was $26,450,157; in 1938 it was $25,959,530. Those were the years in which we had two of the most disastrous crop failures Saskatchewan ever had. Did the Minister of Finance plead before parliament as he pleaded the case for the oil companies and the machinery companies? No, he did not, but I will tell you what he did. He arranged with the banks for the farmer to sign a blank note for his 1938 seed, which later proved to be $1.42 a bushel. The same wheat which had been delivered by the farmer and which had been sold for as low as sixty cents a bushel was still in the elevators; it was government owned wheat.

The government would not deal directly with the rural municipalities. Private enterprise had to get its toll. First the farmer had to sign a blank note. This was endorsed by the rural municipality, then by the provincial government and then by the federal government. The banks were then prevailed upon to accept the note. They had the security of the man on the farm and everything else in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the wheat was in the pool elevators.

Mr. McCUAIG: I am glad the cooperatives had something to do with it. Just what happened? The trade got the money and delivered government-owned wheat to the farmer for $1.42. On May 16, 1938, before the seed went into the ground, the average price for wheat went down to eighty cents a bushel at Eastend. I have documentary evidence of that from the dominion bureau of statistics, agricultural branch.

Right here let me say that when the Minister of Finance was pleading the case of the machinery companies in this house the other day he made a most ridiculous comparison. He said that wheat had increased 87 per cent, whereas the cost of machinery had increased only three per cent. The Minister of Finance knows very well that prices of machinery do not go up and down like prices of wheat. Those prices are stabilized; it is monopoly control, a law unto itself. Farm machinery prices have always been high or higher, whereas in 1940 the price of wheat was as low as forty cents a bushel. The minister could have improved his argument 100 per cent if he had gone back to 1932 when wheat was nineteen cents a bushel.

I have here a few figures which have been put on Hansard before, but which I should like to repeat because they cannot be repeated too often. In 1942 Massey-Harris made a net profit of $1,564,028, and in 1945, $1,800,000. The Cockshutt Plow company in 1937 made a net profit of $183,091, and in 1944 over twice that, $399,244.

Take six of our leading Canadian industries: Hiram Walker and Sons, Canada Packers, Consolidated Mining and Smelting, Aluminum Limited, Imperial Tobacco and Hudson's Bay company. Their average net profit for 1944 was $8,515,828, according to the Financial Post survey of corporate securities.

The lumbering industry was able to sell a large part of its wares outside Canada at the highest prices, to the detriment of the rest of our people.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Why was that a detriment?

Mr. McCUAIG: All of our banks did well. The manager of the Bank of Toronto, which was established in 1855, in reporting to the bank shareholders said:

> For the first time in the history of the bank total assets crossed the 300 million dollar mark, and at $302,040,000 show an increase of $41,965,000 for the year. It is worthy of note that our assets are now more than double those of 1938.

He was reporting to the bank's shareholders, not to the public. Not too bad a war effort, was it?

The Royal Bank of Canada showed an increase in net earnings for 1945 of $281,154,321, the largest in the bank's history.

Mr. FRASER: Are those profits or assets?

Mr. McCUAIG: Net profits, not assets. The general manager of the Bank of Montreal, in his annual statement for the year ended October 31, 1944, said that the financial results of the year reflected an increase of close to $214,000,000, total assets at $1,526,734,251 having crossed the billion and a half dollar mark for the first time in the 127 years of the bank's history.

Mr. FRASER: How much of that belongs to the public?

Mr. McCUAIG: Have you got much of it? I have not. If this is the kind of economy under which agriculture has to operate, then agriculture should be allowed to receive the highest market price if it has to take the lowest. The farmer of Canada is not fighting for $2 wheat one year and twenty-four cent wheat another year, or for $14 per hundredweight for meat one year and $2 per hundredweight for meat another year. He wants a stabilized price for agricultural products, worked out on an equal valuation basis with all other things in industrial Canada. He wants a floor price put under agricultural products which will ensure a fair standard of living, health services and education, and some of the comforts he is entitled to in this modern world.

Mr. GARDINER: Good Liberal policy.

Mrs. STRUM: Too good to use.

Mr. McCUAIG: There can be no successful agricultural programme without the stabilization of agricultural prices, which will give some encouragement to the young men and women to stay on the land. To-day the young people are leaving the land, and the old people on the land are getting tired. They cannot stick it any more, getting up at five o'clock in the morning and working until late at night. Production is still vital in this hungry world, and the young people must be given some encouragement to stay on the land.

The present agricultural policy and the income tax policy of the government carry with them everything that goes with the decay and death of a nation. Those words are as true as ever will be spoken on the floor of this house.

I sincerely trust that the government will give this most important part of our national economy its most serious consideration before the budget is brought down.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, it gives me much pleasure to say a few words on the agriculture estimates, coming as I do from a rural county. As I look around the house I see more than one member here who was born in Bruce county which I have the honour of representing, and I know that anything I say which will be to the benefit of Bruce county in the future they will support even if their party affiliations will not allow them to say so publicly. We are disappointed that they have strayed a little in the political world, but they are young and will be able to find their way back to the fold.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Maple Creek, who has just taken his seat, that he and I have some things in common, but a lot of things we have not in common. In his speech he back-tracked over a long number of years. That is the way of a pessimist. I like to be optimistic. But maybe the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs likes to capitalize on that kind of propaganda. Being a Progressive Conservative, I do not want to do that. I want to look ahead and not look back too far.

Bruce being a rural county, I feel proud to represent it, but the county has also some very good industries which are known internationally as well as nationally. I will mention a few of them. Keystone brushes are manufactured in Bruce county, and are known the world over. Furniture is manufactured in Bruce county at the Malcolm Furniture factory, and I believe some hon. members have enjoyed sitting on the company's products in this chamber; their furniture goes all over the world. We have in Bruce county knitting mills and dry spinning companies which are known internationally. All in all, I believe I am justified in a feeling of pride in being able to represent these fine agricultural districts of Bruce and Kincardine counties.

At the same time I must point out that circumstances in my riding are such that we are not happy. Centralization is working to our disadvantage. I mean that the farm population is gradually disappearing from our farming areas. The township I come from is a good township, and as I said before, Bruce county is a good county. But within a mile and a quarter of the location of our farm, whereas in times I can remember there were thirteen families living in that area, at the present time we have only five. No doubt there are various reasons for that condition, but the principal reason is the lack of foresight which has been only too evident on the part of not only the present government but all governments which have administered Canada for a great number of years. I am not suggesting that any government has wilfully brought this about; yet it has happened. There is an idea in some quarters that mechanization in the line of farm work has had something to do with the depletion of our farm population. But is this so? Because of this machinery we do not have to work so hard; living conditions have improved, and it would follow that people would be happier to stay on the farms. But that has not been the case: we have lost a great part of our farm population. It cannot be said that mechanization is the cause of people leaving the farms. It will be found that the economic situation has more to do with conditions obtaining in that mile and a quarter in Kincardine township, in Bruce county, than anything else. We see there buildings which have been blown down by the wind; we see vacant houses and outbuildings where the roofs are going and which in a short time will be in an uninhabitable conditions. We have farms in need of reconditioning and farm buildings in need of repair. We have farms which need electrification. We have farms with no running water. I am not trying to paint an unduly dismal picture, but I am describing what is an actual condition in Kincardine township, and which I fear is typical of the average Canadian townships.

Working conditions on our farms are not satisfactory. On this point I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Maple Creek. He referred to the long hours which farm people have to work; I want to make a similar reference. Many of our farm population to-day are working too long for physical health and, in addition they are employing their children to help out. One reads in the newspapers of the exploitation of child labour in industry, but too little attention is paid to the exploitation of child labour on the farms; yet I venture to say that it is only too common, not as a matter of choice but from sheer necessity. The farmer's wife has never yet been able to get remuneration for the long hours and the heavy work which she has put in, in helping her husband on the farm. We have, therefore, this situation at the present time: the boys coming back from overseas who, under proper conditions, would be potential farmers are not going to farm. I know boys from our own district who would make good farmers, but the life is not attractive to them. Young people at the present time, owing to the unsatisfactory conditions they have to endure while being brought up on the farms, get away as soon as they can and try to find some place where they will enjoy better living conditions.

I do not want to take up the few minutes I intend to occupy without offering some suggestions to improve the state of affairs to which I have referred. If I may be pardoned for injecting a personal note I should like to say that Bruce county is a Scotch county.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is all to its credit.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): The hon. gentleman opposite has relatives in our county. I believe it has been in the habit of voting the Liberal ticket, but at the last election I was elected as a farmer Bracken candidate. Scotsmen are at times hard to convince, but on this occasion they saw the light, and I may add that I am not sorry for having been returned under these circumstances. The Progressive Conservative party has an agricultural programme which, in my opinion, when it is brought into effect after the next election, will gradually relieve the conditions which I have truthfully pointed out and which are in effect in our township at the present time; and these benefits will be shared not only by the farmers of Kincardine and Bruce counties but by all the people of Canada. I think hon. members will agree, because I am safe in saying that 99 per cent of them believe that the welfare of the farmer is the most important concern of dominion legislation. I do not need to repeat Mark Twain's saying, so think it over.

We hear a good deal about our great tourist industry and how many million dollars it is going to bring us. The best thing to do would be to put the men back on these farms to make a living for themselves and to get them away from conditions in the large cities which, while I will not describe them as unclean, are anything but joyful. Let them get back on the farms and make a little living for themselves, and that will be better for Canada than all the tourists coming in from neighbouring countries. So that I say to the government in power at the present time and to any government that we may have in the future—and I think I could accurately predict what government it would be—that we should keep in mind the fact that decentralization is of more importance to Canada at present than anything else that is on the agenda of the government to-day.

Before I conclude, I wish to refer to some remarks the Minister of Agriculture made to-day. I have in mind the "Weekly Live Stock Market Review," volume 27, number 18. I am not going to quote from it, but according to the figures given on page 1 the export of dairy cattle is 47½ per cent for the first four months of this year as compared with 1945. I wish to ask the minister a question and I do not doubt he will be able to find words with which to answer it, because he does very well. However, I should be glad if he could answer the question convincingly, if possible. Can he give a layman like myself any reason for such a thing happening in the last four months?

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that percentage more or less?

An hon. MEMBER: More.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will be brief, and for once I am not critical because my first effort has been successful. Hon. members will see who has come to sit beside me. If I speak a little longer I shall probably have the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) over to my left.

Mr. CASE: I did not say anything.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have covered a lot of territory to-day and I want you to understand, Mr. Chairman, that anything I say to-night is fundamental, elemental and spoken in a kindly way. Let us be fair about this. We have heard a good deal to-day about sheep and we heard about the bargain basement. In a kindly way I want to speak too about sheep. When I was a boy going to school one of the chores I had to do was to look after sheep, and if any hon. members listening to me now have ever had to look after sheep they will know what a cantankerous animal a sheep can be. I remember one time when one of these sheep annoyed me and I hauled off and kicked as hard as I could, but instead of hitting the sheep I hit a cement pillar in the barn, and that nearly broke my foot. Ever since then I have made it my life's ambition to be kind to dumb animals. I hope no one will object to this remark.

As I have said, I am not here in a critical mood, but I wish to tell the Minister of Agriculture that his policy is all wrong. Outside of that, however, I think it is all right. The thing I am particularly interested in to-night is this—and I must say that I could not follow my hon. friend the member for Maple Creek because when I get up to $172 million that is as high as I can go. That does not mean anything to him. He can talk about $5 billion without any concern, but $5 billion means quite a bit in the Fraser Valley. He said we are paying interest on $20 billion, but actually, it seems, it is only $15 billion. But $5 billion is neither here nor there to my hon. friend.

The reason I disagree with the Minister of Agriculture is the fact that he is not running agriculture. The wartime prices and trade board has too much to say, and the sooner agriculture is put back under the Department of Agriculture the happier we shall be in Fraser Valley. However, I am not going to be as dismal as some hon. members from Saskatchewan appear to be. My riding is one of the finest in Canada. There are many improvements that can be made, but most of the roofs are still on the houses and barns and on the whole we are very happy. We ought to be, because we produce almost half the berries that are grown in Canada, and they are the finest berries in Canada. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that there is no necessity for us to camouflage our peaches in British Columbia in any way. We produce also seventy-five per cent of the hops produced in the dominion and as we do not know what to do with them we ship them out of the country. Altogether we are proud of that riding.

I thoroughly enjoyed the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Battleford. It was constructive and I was particularly interested in it in view of the fact that in my riding we have an immense production of bulbs. In fact, we pioneered the business in this country. We ship to eastern Canada bulbs not merely by the ton but by the carload. I heard one hon. member this afternoon, when we got away from the bargain basement and sheep, describe the tulips in front of the building here, and he accused the Minister of Agriculture, as I understood him, of being the gardener. Maybe that is the reason you have such teeny-weeny bulbs here. We have immense bulbs in my riding, and we ship them, as I say, by the carload. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to devote a little more money and attention to assist us in finding ways and means of combatting diseases, because even in British Columbia we have had disease in our bulbs. His experts should pay a little more attention to this matter.

I am also interested in the question of milk. You know, Mr. Chairman, these subsidies that are spoken of as subsidies to the farmers are actually subsidies to the consumer. They are not subsidies to the farmers and I believe my friends of the C.C.F. will agree with me on that. In other words, they are not agricultural subsidies but consumer subsidies. I believe the leader of the opposition will agree with me—if he does it is a credit to him—that the subsidy on milk is not high enough. I will not say what the arbitrary figure should be, but the Minister of Agriculture should exert a little more pressure on the treasury board in order that the subsidies be set on farm produce prior to any increases being put, as in the case of machinery, on what we have to buy in order to produce anything on the farm. They started at the wrong end.

We are a little worried in British Columbia about the consistency of some of our hon. friends immediately opposite me. Regina is a small town somewhere in Saskatchewan; I believe they had a convention once, and we have been spending days here discussing a bill of rights. I am sorry that has come from Saskatchewan too, but they have been suggesting a bill of rights, or a new constitution or charter or something. They seem to have a habit in Saskatchewan of doing that sort of thing. At any rate, plank No. 6 in the manifesto of their convention had reference to cooperative institutions. I am not going to read it all because I do not want to give them the benefit of such free advertising, but they speak of encouragement by public authority of both producer and consumer cooperative institutions.

Coming from British Columbia, I cannot understand that, although in that province the C.C.F. and their bad boy Harold Winch want to socialize milk. Can you imagine that? And how do they propose to do this? I would like the hon. member for Regina City to answer that. The board would have power to expropriate all existing plants and equipment, including distribution facilities for crude milk, and operate them. We in the Fraser valley, which includes part of the riding of the hon. member for New Westminster, produce 90 per cent of the milk of the province of British Columbia, and we have the largest dairy cooperative in Canada distributing that milk. But they are going to take us over and socialize us.

Mr. PROBE: Isn't that socialized in that set-up? What are you talking about?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was just hoping the hon. member would say that, because it will get me a thousand C.C.F. votes at the next election. We have this cooperative; they have their charter, and now the C.C.F. are going to do away with cooperatives by socializing the production of milk. There in British Columbia we have forty-eight members—

Mr. ARCHIBALD: And no Liberals.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have a Liberal premier, and we had for a long time—

Mr. KNIGHT: If the hon. member will permit a question, does he know that in the time the C.C.F. government has been in power in Saskatchewan cooperatives have increased at a greater rate than ever before, and with the blessing of the C.C.F. government?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, you are dreaming; it isn't true.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to answer that question. I understand they set up a ministry to encourage cooperatives, and I bless them for that. It is too bad they were not in power before, when horses were selling for $27; they would have canned them. Here is your manifesto. However, I am not talking about Saskatchewan; my dairy farm in my riding is in British Columbia. The C.C.F. party in that province, at their convention on April 29, declared their policy to be the socialization of milk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There is one blessing about it. They will never be in power in British Columbia.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Where are the Liberals in British Columbia now? I licked the last one up in Prince Rupert last fall.

Mrs. STRUM: What about Mr. Hart; is he Conservative or Liberal?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If Mr. Hart ever desires to retire—well, I am modest, and I shall not say what I was going to say.

Mrs. STRUM: He came from the Conservative party.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, no. My hon. friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs sat in a Liberal cabinet with him about twenty years ago, I think.

However, I have brought out my point, and now I shall go on with my story about milk. There are some forty-eight members in the province of British Columbia, only two of whom represent producing areas. You people follow that through, as I hope the producers will follow it through and as I know the producers in the Fraser valley are following it through. I am quoting the very C.C.F. people there, who say, "If they put that in, we are wiped off the map." As I say, of the forty-eight members only two represent producers and forty-six represent the consuming public. No wonder Harold Winch would put that in. How do you suppose they would set the price? They would set it regardless of the welfare of the producers. We would be back in the days of six-cent eggs and twenty-eight cents for butterfat if the price were set by the forty-six members to the detriment of the two members. You cannot laugh that one off, though I do not know where you get this figure of six-cent eggs.

However, I believe in giving the C.C.F. a fair deal in this house, and I refer now to one of the largest and best weekly papers in Canada. I would say it is the best; only I have five in my riding. Here is what the C.C.F. said at the provincial convention, according to this newspaper: "Other delegates charged cooperatives do not consider the consumer." This is the C.C.F.; the cooperatives do not consider the consumer! You must have a different brand of cooperatives in Saskatchewan from what we have in British Columbia.

However, I should like to mention something in which I fully agree with hon. gentlemen opposite. In this debate today I think we have covered every subject except agriculture, though we have missed out on the banks. We used to have a member from Vancouver-Burrard who went over to the holy of holies, and who represented us as far as the banks were concerned. We have covered all these other subjects to-day, but I want to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that I entirely agree, as I believe every other hon. member will, that unless the government stabilize agricultural prices; unless they guarantee the farmer a fair price in relation to the prices of everything he has to buy, the veterans coming back from this war are not going to settle on our farms. That is true in my province, and I think it is true in every other province. Personally I belive the system of subsidies is all wrong. I think the solution of the problem of the farmer is to pay him a fair parity price in comparison with the cost of the things he has to buy in every branch of his production.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is the C.C.F. programme you are quoting now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was in politics long before the C.C.F. were heard of, and perhaps they copied part of my programme. However, I am glad my hon. friends agree with me; some day they might even invite me to lead their party out of the wilderness. I want to say to the minister seriously that I was surprised to find there have been only forty-eight applications for farms in my own riding under the Veterans Land Act. I fully expected there would be many more, but speaking from memory I believe only some seventeen have qualified and been granted farms. When you have a riding which is almost entirely agricultural; when you have from that riding, I say without fear of contradiction, an enlistment of farmers' sons as great as that in any riding in Canada—I do not say "greater" but as great—it is surprising to me that prior to April 15 there should be only forty-eight applications for farms under the act. The remedy is for this government or whatever government is in power—and we are in power at present, so it is our responsibility—to guarantee these men not subsidies but prices which will afford a decent standard of living and which will permit them to carry out their obligations and manage the debt they will be called upon to undertake if they are to settle upon farms. We should not repeat what happened after the last war, when veterans bought $200 cows and had to pay for them with butter-fat at twenty-eight cents a pound. I think it is the duty of this government to see that our returning young men are given this guarantee. This government has gone to this extent, and I am proud to say so. It is the first government to put floor prices under farm products. That is a wonderful step in the right direction, but I think the government should now carry it further and guarantee the farmer prices for his products before it permits any increases of any kind on the things the farmer requires to buy.

I just wish to close by saying that I have nothing to be ashamed of or to apologize for in my riding, like hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have in connection with their ridings. We are proud of the condition of our riding, but we want to make it better. We have every class of citizen there, and we want every class of citizen except one. We shall be glad to give that class to Skeena, if they want them, or to the rest of Canada, but that is the only class we do not want.

Mr. KNIGHT: A true Liberal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, we have never promised them the vote in order to get their financial or other support.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why are not more soldiers anxious to get back to Fraser valley on the farms?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sorry the hon. member for Mackenzie did not get the point before. I do not think a soldier can afford to pay what our land costs unless he has some better guarantee in relation to what he is going to receive for his products, and that is what I am putting to the government. I do not mean a guarantee for this month or six months from now; I mean a guarantee for five or six years from now. Another reason the soldiers are not anxious to get back on the land is that they cannot afford to buy the land for a normal dairy farm, or anything other than a small holding in the Fraser valley, with the present ceiling under the Veterans Land Act. If my hon. friend had led the life some of these young boys have led I believe he would understand this also. I do not think you will find many of these young men, as I am sure the hon. member for Skeena will agree, ready to go away up north, where the pioneers went in the years gone by. I am not knocking that country, but I do not think you will get young men to go up there until such time as transportation, electricity and all the other modern facilities are put through. That is one reason they are not going back to the land. I want to tell the hon. member for Mackenzie that some 75,000 veterans in other parts of Canada have either taken their discharge or want to take their discharge in our fair province. And most of them want to come to the Fraser valley.

An hon. MEMBER: And they are unemployed, remember that.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to make a few remarks at this time. I was pleased to hear the minister tell the committee how the packers made a $10 change in the price of a steer across Canada. I have been arguing that right along, namely that we have no price set on the live animal. He has been doing that right along. The minister never said a more truthful word than he did the other evening.

The question with which we are faced these days is this: Is the packer getting enough? I think he is getting more than enough. I have thought for a long time that he is getting more than enough.

Let us take a 1,000-pound steer—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like about five pounds of it.

Mr. BRYCE: Oh, I have treated you to a good steak before, so keep quiet.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Right.

Mr. BRYCE: If you have a 1,000-pound steer dressing at 56 per cent, that gives 560 pounds of meat. For that 1,000-pound steer the farmer would get $120. I believe the ceiling on beef to-day is 20½ cents. When the packer takes his mark-up of seven cents, he must add what he has coming back on the offal.

You can develop quite an argument about how much the offal is really worth. Some say it is worth $1.75. The department of agriculture of Ontario says it is worth $2.50, and my personal belief is that it is worth $3. When you see the little packer carrying the blood to the big packer, and the little packer claiming that he makes at least $2.35 or $2.50 out of it, and he gets practically nothing for the blood, you can add another three cents a pound to the beef. You would find, then, that he gets for that steer about $168. His profit is $48 on that steer in a very short time. He would not have it around the cooler any more than two weeks. But after the farmer bred the cow he had to feed the steer for two years to get his money out of it.

The packer is making a good profit at present prices, and I do not think he is entitled to an increase. I hope some arrangement will be worked out whereby he will not be able to go on a flooded market and buy for less than an animal is really worth.

The minister has said that steers have been sold at as high as 13½ cents a pound. You can believe me that a packer never paid 13½ cents a pound for any steer, unless it was worth that much, because to-day the packer is one of the shrewdest business men in Canada. He is in business to make a profit, and if he cannot make a profit, he will not buy an animal.

In Britain they value the animal, or put a price on it, on the hoof. That was done during the last war, and repeated during this one. I have before me the rules and regulations setting out what they pay, on the hoof.

The argument has been made here that they could not do that in this country. But the government, or the food board has failed to go into the market to buy in a flooded market. The argument from the Minister of Agriculture has been that as soon as that animal goes below a certain price, to turn it into twenty-cent beef, they will step into the market and buy. They have failed to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BRYCE: Oh, yes, they have failed to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: They are on the market all the time.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes, but they are not on their job, because animals have been selling for eleven cents when they should be twelve cents. The minister has accused me of spending more time around the stockyards than around my farm. Surely he will give me credit for knowing something about the stockyards, if what he has said is true.

That is our big trouble to-day; we have a ceiling on beef. When it comes into the hands of the packer it is protected by the wartime prices and trade board. That is unfair. Let us take that nonsense about lambs last year, when your board agreed to buy up all the surplus lambs at a quarter-cent less than the market. What good did it do to the market?

It did not amount to anything to the farmer, because the packer could buy them from the farmer at whatever price he liked. When a man sends 200 lambs to the market he does not take them back 200 miles because he gets a cent less. He will let them go at the price, and also say a lot of hard things about the Minister of Agriculture.

I am sure the minister understands the situation. I do not know whether he has tried to correct it. At different times I have tried to explain it. I have said it has been the cabinet which has brought about a condition under which the minister cannot meet what the farmer wants. It would seem that the cabinet dominates the Department of Agriculture; if not, the wartime prices and trade board would not have the power it has to-day.

I had some questions to ask the minister about cattle going to the United States. He has assured me that that market has been taken care of and that we shall be able to get it back when we have more cattle to dispose of. The United States market is our best market to-day; we have no better. But I believe we are going to have more cattle than the United States quota will handle, and we shall have to look for further markets.

I am suggesting to the minister that we do some research into the matter of sending live cattle to Great Britain. It would pay the farmers if that were done. Remember, I am maintaining that the United States market is our best market, combined with that here at home. But we shall have extra cattle, and if we can sell them to Great Britain, so much the better. We could land in Great Britain cattle which, in Canadian funds, and less the bonus of five shillings per hundredweight which they are paying at the present time—I am not adding that five shillings—would bring us about $14 per 112 pounds.

Some hon. members might say that there has to be a profit there. There does not need to be any profit. If you can land them there at a price, the farmer is prepared to take them at that price because the manure he gets from the feeding of the animal will pay him in three months for his labour and feeding costs. He will get his expenses and his feeding costs, because he feeds those steers for the sake of the fertilizer he can get.

I repeat that we should have some research done, and that the department should do it. On previous occasions the minister has given me literature dealing with this matter. The more I read about it, the more I see in it. When I was in the old country this year I was convinced that there is a good market over there for good steers. Perhaps we can ship them out through Hudson bay and thus reduce freight costs, which would be a great advantage.

[Mr. Bryce.]

I was going to say something about sugar beets but the hon. member for Provencher has pretty well covered the subject. I agree with what he said but he did not touch upon the labour situation. I hope the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour, who, I notice, is in his seat, have given that matter serious consideration. The production of beets requires more labour than anything else we do on the farm. Huge commitments have been made in order to ensure the success of the sugar beet industry from one end to the other of the Red river valley in Manitoba, and I hope the two ministers will cooperate so that we can get the labour that is necessary.

Last year and the year before I asked the Minister of Agriculture about the payment of the wool bonus to Manitoba, but my pleas fell on deaf ears because the provincial government has not agreed to pay its share. It is contended that if the provincial government will pay two cents, the dominion government will match it. I am going to appeal to the minister not to make a stepchild out of Manitoba. If he is paying two cents to Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia he should pay two cents to Manitoba and shame the provincial government into paying the other two cents. You cannot produce wool cheaper in one province than in another, and the non-payment of this bonus is a detriment to the production of sheep and wool in Manitoba. You have no idea how it is talked about, and if this bonus was paid I am sure it would create a favourable impression toward the Liberal government, if that could be an argument. I have asked this of the minister before and I hope he will give it his consideration. When the dominion government makes this concession to other provinces it is only right that it should make it to Manitoba.

When the minister speaks I should like him to tell me whether the subsidies that will be paid from April 30 are to be paid from money voted in connection with the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BRYCE: When is that act to come into operation?

Mr. GARDINER: It has been declared in effect now.

Mr. BRYCE: There is no money being paid out of it whatever?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BRYCE: In dealing with the milk situation, I can speak only of the Winnipeg area. On the orders of the day there has been some discussion about milk producers asking that the winter subsidy be carried through the summer. I think the minister replied that you would have to even up the price, but I should like to correct that. The milk producers do not want that price evened up, what they want is the winter price carried through and a new price negotiated for next winter. Do not let us have any misunderstanding about that. As someone said a little while ago, the cost of labour has gone up. It may be said that while I am against the packer getting a rise in price, I am asking for an increase for the milk producer. The fact is that the milk producer is working under entirely different conditions to-day. The men who milked cows before they went to war will not milk them now that they have come back. They know that a factory worker works for only eight hours a day and they just do not want the fifteen or fourteen-hour day on the farm.

People in Canada to-day realize that milk is the cheapest food in the world. You cannot get anything as cheap that contains the same amount of nourishment or that gives such a balanced diet. At one time I used to fight in Winnipeg for a milk foundation, but I do not think we are going to need it because the people have been educated to use milk. They are beginning to know what a good thing milk is; they know that in order to be strong in body and mind, the person who drinks lots of milk is well on the way.

Let me show how the demand for milk has increased. In March, 1945, there was shipped into the Winnipeg area a total of 9,900,000 pounds of milk. In March, 1946, those shipments were up to 11,500,000 pounds. In March a year ago there were 910 producers in the Winnipeg area; to-day we have 1,290, an increase of 380. Those additional 380 milk shippers should produce far more milk because they have better cows in the Red river valley to-day than they had ten years ago or even five years ago; the cattle are heavier producers.

The fact is that the big dairy producers, the men who were milking fifty, sixty or seventy cows, found that they could not get help and had to sell out. The cows were purchased by smaller shippers, men who were willing to work and who were willing to have their families work. Surely in a modern world like this we do not need to exploit a man's family in order to produce milk for the nation, but that is what is taking place. You cannot get a hired man to milk cows and the result is that the large dairy farmer is going out of business.

I remember the time in the Winnipeg milk area when there was a struggle to get a quota. Nobody worries about quotas now because you get paid for every pound of milk you send in. The trouble is to get somebody to buy your cows and your milk quota and get rid of them. Reference has been made to the rise in the price of machinery, but that is only a minor thing compared with the help situation. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister, and I want to impress upon him that an adequate price must be paid for milk next winter or we shall have milk rationing in Canada. I hate to think that there will ever be such a thing as milk rationing in Canada; but unless the producer of milk is subsidized or his business is made profitable enough to warrant his staying in business, that is what will happen. I told hon. members that when I was in Britain I saw that children under twelve years of age were getting half a pint of milk a day. We do not want that in this country. If the production of milk is put on a profitable basis it provides a good living. There are plenty of people who like to milk cows but they do not want to milk them for nothing. You just cannot afford to pay factory wages and give factory hours. I heard someone on the other side say that he had offered $100 a month and board but could not find anyone to take it.

These are things we are up against in the Red river valley at this time. I commend these remarks to the minister and I hope he will answer them when he speaks.

Mrs. STRUM: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak in this debate to-night, but I felt someone should answer the hon. gentleman to my right who on numerous occasions has made slighting and insulting references to one of the most distinguished parliamentarians that this country has ever produced, Miss Agnes Macphail. Every once in a while someone to my right who has not the courage to rise in his place and say it, growls some slighting remark about Miss Macphail. It reminds me of the story told of a meeting at which Miss Macphail was heckled by a very little man. Finally he said, "Miss Macphail, don't you wish you were a man?" She replied, "Sure, don't you?"

One of the most shocking attitudes that I find in this house from time to time is this, that when there are people who have the courage and integrity to expose something of which we should all be ashamed, instead of our trying to get to the root of the matter and attack the evil, we attack the person who exposes the evil.

Recently we have been hearing a lot about British traditions. We have several kinds of British traditions, but the finest kind of British tradition that we have is the tradition of establishing new precedents of justice, the tradition of being able to recognize injustice and to make the necessary changes. That is the only British tradition that I am proud to admit, and I must say that all my ancestors were Britishers, but I take no credit for that because I had nothing to do with it.

There are people in this house who seem to think western Canada is the poor relation, and the only time we hear from them is when they want something. I should like to quote some figures given by Doctor F. H. Auld, deputy minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, when speaking of the dominion-provincial conference. He was the deputy minister under the last administration, a man whom we retained because he was valuable. He had this to say about the contribution that western Canada makes to the economy of Canada as a whole:

> Western Canada was well to the fore in the production of foodstuffs, he said, and cited the fact that one-third of the creamery butter and one-half of the hogs produced in the dominion came from the prairie provinces. Other examples cited by Dr. Auld were that the west produced 55 per cent of all cattle, 60 per cent of the sheep, 50 per cent of the sugar beets and 40 per cent of the honey produced in Canada.

For that we from the west do not need to apologize.

I am not going to extend my remarks, but I promise to make a speech every time that anybody laughs about the Regina riots. If anybody thinks civil war is funny they have never witnessed it. We would not have the effrontery to laugh if the name of a man who died overseas were mentioned in this house. We would bow our heads in tribute to one who had died in defence of his country. The men who died because of the Regina riots were just as much casualties, only they were casualties of poverty, unemployment and injustice, and the people who spoke and worked in defence of those unfortunate unemployed boys deserve better than to be ridiculed and scorned by any member of this house.

Mr. DROPE: Mr. Chairman, coming from the agricultural county of Northumberland I am pleased to have an opportunity of saying a few words about agriculture, which is our basic industry in this country.

The farmers of Canada did a big job in feeding this nation through the war years, and they are continuing to do a big job in production. But if that is to be continued it appears to me that it will be necessary to make farm prices attractive in order to assure a supply. We have had ceiling prices on most of our farm products, but the farmers feel that those ceiling prices were put on before prices of other products in this country had reached their peak.

I was interested in hearing the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon speak of the export of our cows and heifers to the United States and of the cow population in this country. But I question very much the accuracy of the figures he gave of our cow population. I do not just see how he arrives at his figures. Of course, we have a bureau of statistics which sends out circulars covering a cross-section of the country, but I would not say that the bureau's cow population figures are the actual figures. I am inclined to believe, judging from our dairy production and the butter shortage and other things, that our cow population is less than the figures given by the minister. We know that we have had a shortage of butter. This can be attributed largely to government policy. The farmers who were producing butterfat and all of us are ready to admit that it was necessary to ship cheese to Britain in view of our commitments during the war, but the war has been over now for some time and the thousands of farmers in this country who are producing cream to be manufactured into butter should not be put at the disadvantage under which they have laboured for the last two years. We are the greatest butter eaters in the world in Canada. We have our home market and we should see to it that the people of this country get sufficient butter. I am satisfied that if the prices of our dairy products were put on a fair basis we should get all the butter we require.

We have heard considerable in this house about the housing shortage. Let me say, coming from one of the rural parts of this country, that we have in the rural parts many, many homes that are empty. Possibly the housing shortage in the cities has been caused in part by people leaving the farm and going into the urban centres. They are not now returning to the farm; the farmers who did stay on the land and have modern machinery have, in many cases, purchased the farm beside them and consequently the house on that farm is empty. It seems to me that if we are to get our people back on the farm to engage in agriculture it will be necessary to make agricultural prices attractive enough to bring them back.

One hon. member to-night mentioned the tourist business and said that it did not make very much difference. I believe the tourist business is something that we should encourage. The county of Northumberland from which I come is bounded on the south by lake Ontario and on the north by Rice lake and the Trent river, and we have many tourists coming there each year. That is true of many other parts of Ontario and, no doubt, of Quebec. These tourists buy a great deal of farm produce, and it certainly means something to agriculture. We should do everything in our power to encourage tourists to visit our country.

It is regrettable that more veterans are not going back on the farms. From the county of Northumberland there are very few; I do not believe they average one to each of the nine townships in the county. There must be some reason why these young men are not returning to agriculture. I strongly suggest that in any policy laid down for agriculture adequate prices be considered. I am satisfied that if fair prices were assured many of our veterans would go in for farming.

We have heard something about the deplorable state of conditions in western Canada where they work from sixteen to seventeen hours a day. I have been operating a farm for a good many years, and I have never found that one could get the best from men or horses from operating that long. I believe better results could be obtained with much shorter hours; and, with the modern machinery we have, I do not believe anything will be gained by painting to our younger men such a picture as that it is necessary to work for sixteen or seventeen hours a day to make a living.

I am pleased, Mr. Chairman, to have had an opportunity of contributing these few remarks to this debate.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): In rising to speak to-night to the committee on the subject of agriculture, I had intended to begin my comments by saying something about the Canadian seed growers' association. I wish to compliment the hon. member for North Battleford on the address which he gave and in which he dealt so fully with that subject. I have compiled a number of figures regarding the work of the association, but I am not going to detain the committee this evening with them.

The hon. member for North Battleford dealt with seeds which are grown and used within Canada. I wish to say a word or two about seeds which are exported, and with which he did not deal so fully. The figures I will quote were supplied by the agricultural supplies board and relate to the crop year ended June 30, 1945. They dealt with alfalfa, red clover, alsike, sweet clover, brome grass, crested wheat grass, timothy, Canada blue grass and creeping red fescue. The total value of these exports amounted to $5,571,289. Along with that were exports of flaxseed to the value of $203,000, flaxseed for commercial use to the value of $3,656,000, potato seed to the value of $5,464,679, and seed grains not otherwise listed, $1,548,000. As I said before, this does not include the value of seed grain sold and used in Canada. So that I think the small appropriation to the Canadian seed growers' association of some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars is an extremely fine investment for the Department of Agriculture to make, and if all the investments of the government brought returns in the same proportion we would be getting somewhere.

I also wish to make a few remarks regarding the agricultural picture as I see it, representing as I do a constituency not entirely rural, but a constituency, as are many others in Canada, dependent upon the farmer for food. May I also emphasize that they are dependent on the farmer for prosperity. Too often in the past we have heard it said, "Give labour high wages and they will buy the farmers' produce." But if you give the farmer a decent price for his product he will buy the articles produced by labour. In the past you have the thing all backwards.

Mr. MacNICOL: They depend on one another.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): Let me refer particularly to the agricultural policy in its relation to the wartime prices and trade board and, in particular, to Mr. Donald Gordon. Agriculture subsidies are an admission on the part of this government that prices were inadequate as of October 20, 1941, when price ceilings were fixed. A simple announcement at that time to the consumer public that if the world wanted to eat they would have to pay a fair price for the food they required, would have setled the matter right then and done away with all agricultural subsidies. I think the government, as is its practice in many other matters, looked around to see what would be politically expedient and then framed its subsidy policy. The present government knows very well and its advertisements and proaganda have shown that it was attempting to channel off purchasing power in consumers' hands.

At the outbreak of war, and ever since, the government has taken the attitude of not taking the public into its confidence. It would sooner wait and see what political advantage could be gained. The very time it was instituting subsidies of all kinds to maintain these so-called price ceilings was a time when people were better able to buy food than ever before because practically everyone employable was working in industry.

Let me at this time direct attention to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture in this house of April 15, and particularly at page 898 of Hansard, wherein he told how well off the farmers apparently were, and he stated that the mortgage indebtedness of farmers to some thirty mortgage companies was reduced by $102 million. I have not gone to the trouble of verifying the minister's statement, but many farmers in my constituency will take me to task for not having done so.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to keep the record right by saying that I said the very opposite to what has been said now.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): It is in Hansard. Read it over again.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not in Hansard in those words.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I shall likely be taken to task for passing it by so lightly. While the Minister of Agriculture claims that farmers' private mortgages are reduced by $102 million, the public debt of every Canadian man, woman and child went up by leaps and bounds until it has now reached the grand total of $16,912 million, or, reduced to figures we can understand, $1,410 for each man, woman and child, and if a farm family consists of five, that is $7,050 for the family. How then can the farmer expect to get ahead while he saves his hard-earned money and the government spends it faster than he can create it?

Furthermore, I find in the report of the Canadian farm loan board for the year ended March 31, 1945, these figures, which may be of interest to the committee:

Loans to farmers, secured by first mortgages:
Principal	$23,732,561 22
Interest due and unpaid	48,005 86
Interest accrued	256,689 78
Other charges	3,813 57
	$24,041,070 43

And from the Canadian farm loan board report for the year ended March 31, 1939, I find these figures:

Loans to farmers, secured by first mortgages:
Principal	$30,054,207 94
Interest due and unpaid	612,484 89
Interest accrued	479,338 18
Other charges	16,545 59
	$31,162,576 60

It will be noticed that Canadian farmers in about the same period referred to by the Minister of Agriculture were able to reduce their indebtedness by only some $6 million. I therefore have grave doubts whether the farmer's condition is as rosy as the minister would like us to believe.

I spoke of Donald Gordon and agricultural subsidies. We hear a great deal of his alleged ability. We shall be better able to judge his ability twenty-five years hence. He should be compelled to reduce the debt of Canada by the amount of all the farm subsidies paid out unnecessarily to maintain a price ceiling that was not maintained. The amount of these subsidies runs into many millions. In 1944 alone it was $104,552,761 on items given in a statement by the dominion bureau of statistics.

I also stated that the price ceiling was not maintained and I make that statement for two reasons. First of all, the quality of practically all farm products has been maintained and, in some lines, improved, while the quality of many things the farmers buy has depreciated considerably. I will mention only a few items: lumber, coal, supplementary farm feeds and clothing. Not only that, but according to the dominion bureau of statistics when dealing with the cost of living index taxes are not considered, and I believe that about 30 per cent of the income of the Canadian people goes in taxes, so that this becomes a considerable item.

Let me quote a few comparisons taken from advertisements of food in the London Free Press of the week of October 16, 1941, and from the same type of advertisements in the same paper from the beginning of this year, and in most cases for the same retail food store advertisements as in 1941. These are some of the prices quoted in the London Free Press of October 16, 1941: prime beef brisket, pot roast, nineteen cents; since January 1, 1946 it has been twenty-three cents; shoulder roast, prime rib roast, twenty-five cents in 1941 and to-day, thirty-nine cents; porterhouse steak, thirty-three cents in 1941 and now forty-three cents; sausages, twenty-seven cents in 1941 and to-day, thirty-five cents.

In these quotations, I would point out that while the ceiling has been pierced as far as these finished products are concerned, the price of farm products the farmer sold has gone up but little in comparison. Hams were selling at that time at twenty-seven cents; to-day they are forty-four cents; veal at that time was twenty-four cents and since January 1, 1946, thirty-five cents in retail stores. With these prices going up in that way, without any increase as far as the farmer is concerned, the farmer is placed in a serious position. I thought I would take this opportunity of bringing these facts to the attention of the minister.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, may we call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the committee desirous of carrying on the general discussion to-morrow, or can we pass item 1 and continue that discussion under the other items?

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are a few questions of a general nature which I should like to ask.

Mr. GARDINER: Many of the speeches which have been made to-day could properly have been made under the appropriate items, as we went along, particularly a speech such as that on seed, because there is an item in connection with seed. It would be better to have such speeches made under the appropriate items because the committee could get more information in regard to the items. I suggest that as soon as possible we would like to get the item through on administration and we could take up the discussion on the four divisions of science, production, marketing and specials. If we can do that at an early opportunity we shall get along more rapidly and the committee will get more information. Could not item 1 be passed to-night? We have not followed the practice of holding members down on any of the subsequent items to the letter of the rules, but it would permit us to get along more expeditiously if the suggestion I make were adopted.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 10, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HARRY LEADER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a week ago to-day, it was my sad duty to remind hon. members of this house of the first loss which death had occasioned in its membership in this new parliament. Hon. members will have seen in this morning's press, the announcement of the passing last night of another of our number, Mr. Harry Leader, the member for the constituency of Portage la Prairie.

It cannot be said that Mr. Leader's death was unexpected. For years past his health had been steadily failing, and before the end of last session he was obliged to give up his duties in parliament and return to his home.

Mr. Leader knew that he was suffering from the dread disease of cancer, but had hoped that the treatment he was receiving might prolong his life. Some time before the last general elections he announced he would not again be a candidate for parliament, but would devote the remainder of his life to furthering cancer research in whatever way he could. In the belief that he had made some progress towards recovery, Mr. Leader yielded to the wish of his friends and again became a candidate and contested the constituency successfully.

It is not without significance that Mr. Leader's death has occurred at a moment when there is under way a nation-wide campaign for the raising of funds to further cancer research and to combat by all known means the spread of this appalling disease.

Mr. Leader's death should speak even more strongly to the nation than any words or efforts he might have been spared to put forth had his life been further prolonged.

Mr. Leader was born in Burnside, Manitoba, sixty-six years ago, in what was to become his home constituency—Portage la Prairie. In point of service he was one of the oldest members of parliament, having first entered the House of Commons at the general election of 1921. There are, I believe, only seven members of the present house who can date their first entry into parliament from 1921 or earlier. Mr. Leader's name gained special prominence in the general elections of 1921, at which election he defeated the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who at the time was prime minister. Mr. Leader himself was defeated by Mr. Meighen in the general elections of 1925. He did not become a candidate again until 1935, when he was reelected for Portage la Prairie. He was again reelected at the general elections of 1940 and 1945.

Mr. Leader was one of the best known of the western members of parliament. He entered this house and sat as a member of the Progressive party in 1921 until his defeat by Mr. Meighen in 1925. He was then absent from the House of Commons for ten years. In that interval of time he had, like the great majority of Manitoba Progressives become associated with the Liberal party, and when returned in 1935 took his seat on this side of the house.

For most of his life Mr. Leader was a farmer and will be remembered for his strong advocacy of policies which he believed would best serve the interests of the farming communities. He was a well-known figure as a breeder of pure bred cattle. A sterling independence and deep sincerity were outstanding qualities of Mr. Leader's character. In his passing the parliament of Canada has lost one who, throughout his life, had faithfully served the public interest in many fields of activity and who, in his death, has left a record of undaunted effort and heroic endurance.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Leader is survived by his widow, one son and two daughters. I know I express the wishes of all parties in the house when I ask that you convey to Mrs. Leader and other members of the family an expression of very sincere sympathy from all hon. members of the House of Commons.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members of this party would wish to be associated with the Prime Minister's remarks. For a quarter of a century, Mr. Leader was a personal friend of mine. He was born, lived his life and died on the Portage plains of Manitoba, one of the most fertile agricultural areas in Canada.

For forty years he was engaged in public life in one form or another, either in the municipal council or here in the House of Commons. During his service here he sought to do two things, among others; first, he tried to secure a better deal for that section of our economy which produces the nation's food; and secondly, in his later years, when suffering from a malady which all too often proves fatal, when he thought he had found in the researches of a medical man in Winnipeg a means by which the prevalence of this disease could in some degree be lessened, he sought to encourage cancer research and to spread the doctrines that improved nutrition might help prevent extension of that malady. His death yesterday is a further indication that this disease still has secrets from medical science. But I am one of those who believe that Mr. Leader's speeches were not made in vain, because in recent years we have learned that improved nutrition has a great deal to do with the prevention of disease and early death.

In the passing of Harry Leader, Manitoba has lost a good citizen and this house has lost a good member. We here are pleased to associate ourselves with the motion of sympathy moved by the Prime Minister.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I associate the members of the C.C.F. party in this house with the expressions of sympathy that have been heard. Like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) I had known Mr. Leader for a number of years. I knew him when we were associated together in the old Progressive party; and while we sat in this parliament on opposite sides of the house Mr. Leader was one of the men for whom I and those associated with me had the very highest regard.

We have lost two members of the house recently through this terrible scourge of cancer. I remember sitting in the gallery of the Saskatchewan legislature when I believe the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was leader of the opposition, and hearing one of his supporters, a doctor, who at the time was speaking of this dread disease make the statement that if that legislature represented an average group of persons in this country, of the sixty-five members thirteen would die of cancer. In the same proportion, forty-nine members of this house might be afflicted with that terrible disease. Harry Leader performed a great service to this country, I believe, when he brought before this house as forcefully as he did the hope that something might be found to meet the menace of cancer. We shall long remember him as a fine son of Canada and as a splendid representative of that great class who produce the food of the country; and those of us who have had personal association with him, in spite of any differences we may have had, will remember him as a fine and true friend.

On behalf of those associated with me, sir, I wish to join in the expressions of sympathy to his wife and family in the great loss which they have sustained.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Leader was honest, sincere, independent, public spirited, and virile. As a member of parliament he was conscientious, industrious and effective. A genuine man of the soil, he was a consistent and progressive representative of men of the soil. Mr. Leader's death has occasioned a distinct loss to this house. The members of the Social Credit party join other hon. members in mourning his death and in extending sympathy to those bereaved by his passing.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I was on my way home for a long week-end when I heard of the death of my deskmate, Mr. Leader. I thought it my duty to return to Ottawa to say, in addition to what has been said of him already, that he believed in the brotherhood of man; that he was a great farmer and a great gentleman, with a big heart. I convey my deepest sympathy to his widow and children.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that Canada has not produced more men of the type of the late hon. member, Harry Leader. His death is not only a loss to parliament but is a great loss to agriculture. His name will be remembered wherever Aberdeen Angus cattle are talked about, long after most of us have passed to the great beyond. Harry was a personal friend of mine for twenty-five years. I met him first as a fellow member of the United Farmers of Manitoba. We all appreciated his fine qualities, his honesty, sincerity and humanity. The greatest single quality which raised Harry in our esteem was his supreme courage. He fought against wrong wherever he found it. He always worked for what he thought was right, and championed the cause of the weak and the poor. He fought on courageously, though stricken with the incurable disease which has now taken him to his last home.

When words fail me in expressing my sentiments at a time like this I naturally turn to the ploughman poet of my native land, Robert Burns, who said:

> An honest man here lies at rest,
> As e'er God with his image blest;
> The friend of man, the friend of truth,
> The friend of age, and guide of youth;
> Few hearts like this, with virtue warm'd,
> Few heads with knowledge so inform'd.

DOMESTIC SUPPLY IN SMALL TOWNS AND RURAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction. On one or two occasions in the past he has answered questions with respect to the supply of lumber, but they do not quite cover the cases which have been brought to my attention in recent weeks from rural Manitoba.

I wish to ask the minister a question arising out of requests I am receiving with respect to supplies of lumber in rural Manitoba, requests which reveal what is said to be the most serious shortage in the history of certain of the towns there. Will the minister tell the house what action the government is taking to meet the situation arising out of the shortages of lumber, particularly in small towns and rural areas in Canada, and what these areas may expect in the way of supplies during the next few months?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, in referring to the most serious shortage of lumber in the history of those areas, is speaking, I presume, in a comparative sense only; because I feel certain that more lumber was used in Manitoba in 1945 than at any previous time in history. However, the supply is short of the demand. March and April are always the low points in the distribution of lumber, because, while the logs have been cut, the lumber has not yet been distributed from sawmills. The cut last winter was the largest in the history of Canada, considerably larger than in the previous winter, and I think that every yard can expect more lumber this year than it received last year. The additional supply is some 400 million feet more than last year.

The amount being retained for domestic purposes will be increased by the full amount of the increased cut, and I feel certain that by midsummer the supply of lumber in all parts of Canada will be much easier than it has been in the past.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has any action been taken to curtail the export of lumber which is so badly needed in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I have answered that question several times. I have said that lumber exports to our historic markets have been and are being maintained at their pre-war levels, and that the increased production in Canada is going into domestic use. I think the house will commend that policy. I think that countries which have relied on Canada in former years as their source of supply for their needs are entitled to receive that supply in post-war years as they did in the war years. We hope they can always depend on that supply. Canada is in a similar position in connection with its imports of commodities such as coal and cotton and a great many others. We rely on those countries which have in the past exported these supplies to Canada to look after the Canadian position in difficult times as well as in ordinary times, and I am happy to say that in general those countries have followed that policy. Canada is only doing for these countries what we wish them to do for us in following out our policy in the export of lumber.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There was a report in this morning's press that owing to shipping conditions in the United States much of the better grades of lumber intended for export to the United States are piling up in this country. I would ask the minister whether the controller could not divert some of this export lumber to lumber dealers in Canada until United States transportation difficulties are ironed out.

Mr. HOWE: The controller is watching the situation very closely, but I would point out that the lumber exported is of different sizes and grades from domestic lumber and I doubt that it could be efficiently distributed in Canada. To distribute it in Canada would have no effect in the long run, because we have an agreement with the United States as to the quantity of lumber to be exported to that country, so nothing would be gained by taking the lumber now awaiting export.

FOOD

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION IN REGARD TO WASTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question of which I have sent him notice. Does he feel that the government has done everything in its power to cut down the waste of food, having regard to the widespread famine conditions in the world and to the great and sometimes shocking waste at the present time in Canada?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I did not receive the notice of the question; had I done so, I would have handed it to some other minister, as it is not a matter under my jurisdiction and any answer I gave would be just an expression of personal opinion, which I assume is not what the hon. gentleman wants.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the matter is one which is dealt with by a committee of which I happen to be chairman. Just before coming into the house I approved an advertisement which is going into the press right across Canada dealing with that very matter. It is not the first but the fourth such advertisement which has been put out. Contact has also been made with organizations of different kinds in order to impress upon the public as much as possible the need for preserving food and seeing that it is distributed in a proper way.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, that is not an answer to the question I asked. I will repeat it, and perhaps the minister will be in a position to answer on another occasion. I asked whether the government had done everything in its power to cut down the waste of food, not whether it had done certain things.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell the house when we may expect the external affairs committee to begin its discussions, and whether that standing committee should not immediately set about the consideration of recent world events which are bound to affect Canada's international position?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend I would remind him that the committees of this house control their own affairs. The committee on external affairs has been appointed. Its chairman is Mr. Bradette, and it is open to any member at any time to ask that the committee meet together. The practice usually followed, is for a member who is desirous of having a committee meet to ask the chairman to call its members together. With regard to the meetings of this committee I would think that that would be the proper course to follow.

As to the second part of my hon. friend's question, which he was kind enough to send to me, namely that the committee should "immediately set about the consideration of recent world events which are bound to affect Canada's international position," that is I think for the committee itself to decide.

I am obliged to my hon. friend for sending me the question. As the house knows, I had hoped that the debate on external affairs and on the work of the department would take place before the estimates were referred to the committee; I promised some time ago that the estimates would go to the committee. I had an understanding with my colleagues that as soon as the debate on the bill with respect to the loan to Great Britain and the debate on the citizenship bill were concluded I would immediately have the right of way to follow with a discussion of external affairs. But up to the moment, while the house has concluded its debate on one of those bills, it has not concluded discussion on the other. However, I am anxious that the committee on external affairs should have the fullest opportunity to proceed forthwith to consider the estimates in committee as they did last year, and if the house would grant me permission so to do, I should be prepared at once to move that the different votes relating to the Department of External Affairs which were referred to the committee of supply on March 26, 1946, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the standing committee on external affairs. Perhaps the house would grant me permission to revert to motions and have this motion put through immediately; it would mean that the estimates would then be referred and that owing to my absence there would be no loss of time in their consideration. May I take it that the house agrees? I move:

That votes Nos. 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55 and 56 inclusive, dealing with external affairs and referred to the committee of supply on March 26, 1946, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am very glad to support the motion. In doing so may I suggest that the chairman proceed at once to call the committee so that it may proceed with its work?

Mr. REID: I am rising to object to the motion, and I am calling the attention of the house to the fact that this is an historic moment. I trust this is not the beginning of sending estimates to committees.

Mr. COLDWELL: We too shall be very glad to support this motion. We have asked for something of this sort for a long time.

Mr. REID: It is an historic moment, whether the house realizes it or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the motion agreed to?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. D. M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, did you read the items referred to as Nos. 41 to 54?

Mr. SPEAKER: Nos. 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56.

Mr. FLEMING: There are two other items, Nos. 39 and 40, when we come to that department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are they? Are they statutory amounts?

Mr. FLEMING: Departmental administration is 39, and passport office administration is 40.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the estimates at hand, but if they are not statutory, certainly I would be only too pleased to have any numbers added, which should have been included.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know that I rightly understand the motion. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to whether these estimates are to be referred to the external affairs committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but according to standing order 38 this motion is not debatable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. member (Mr. Fleming), who has raised a question on the numbers, that I imagine he must have some previous year's copy of estimates, because my attention has just been called to the fact that No. 39 relates to salaries and expenses of the chief electoral officer, and No. 40 to the civil service commission.

Mr. HANSELL: May I ask the Prime Minister whether his motion seeks to refer these estimates to the external affairs committee or to the committee of the whole house? If it is to refer them to the external affairs committee, I do raise a point of order on that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend remembers that last session the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were referred to the committee on External Affairs. This is to give the committee an opportunity to discuss anything that relates to external affairs.

I think my hon. friend the member for New Westminster, in referring to this as an historic moment, has in mind something that has not taken place. He apparently has in mind that the committee that was appointed to deal with the rules has made some recommendation, with respect to referring estimates to committees. That would be the adoption of something wholly new. But that recommendation of the committee has not yet come before the house and has not yet been agreed to. All that I am doing at the moment is to help to make it possible for the committee on external affairs, which is one of the committees of the house, to discuss anything which relates to external affairs. I do not believe its members will be able to think of anything relating to external affairs which it will not be possible to bring up by reference to some particular appropriation.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I observe that when I agreed to support this motion it was on the understanding that this reference to the committee would be only for the committee to study these questions, but not for it to have final disposition of the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, certainly.

Mr. BRACKEN: They will have to come back here and be dealt with in this house, the same as heretofore. But it was hoped by proceeding in this way we might save some of the time of the house while at the same time getting more information for members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to ask whether the Prime Minister would be prepared to make a statement as to the extradition treaty between Canada and the United States, on which the external affairs committee reported last session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MINISTERIAL ARRANGEMENTS DURING PRIME MINISTER'S ABSENCE IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before proceeding to the next order of business, may I inform hon. members that during my absence the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, will be acting in the position of Prime Minister; the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, the Minister of Justice, will be acting Secretary of State for External Affairs; and the Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans Affairs, will be acting President of the Privy Council. Mr. Mackenzie will also continue in cooperation with the whips to exercise supervision over the organization of the business of the house.

To my hon. friend who asked a question a moment ago as to the extradition treaty, may I say that I am pleased that external affairs will for a time be in the hands of the Minister of Justice, who has a special knowledge both of external affairs, and of the legal questions involved in the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $163,190.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, early this year the hon. member for Edmonton East paid a visit to Vancouver island. I hope that when the Minister of Fisheries is presenting his estimates the hon. member for Edmonton East will give us just as graphic a description of how he wrestled with a salmon as he gave us yesterday of how he wrestled with one of his sheep.

I notice that in his remarks he made some references to agricultural experts. Within a few miles of where he was staying this spring there is a dominion experimental farm where there are a number of gentlemen who may well be considered experts in agriculture and horticulture. I want to take up a moment or two to-day to call attention to the difficulties under which these civil servants are working. They are doing an important service for the country and for the farmers and horticulturists who live in the vicinity of their farm.

The hon. member for North Battleford explained in considerable detail yesterday the activities of the Canadian Seed Growers Association. I know that these experts at the experimental farm have rendered very considerable assistance to the bulb growers, fruit growers and dairymen on Vancouver island, and yet one is forced to the conclusion that these experts have in the past received a remuneration hardly commensurate with their ability. I am informed that in the past their salary has been about thirty per cent less than that paid in some nine other professions in which people with similar qualifications are engaged. Naturally these experts have to deal not only with the selection of seeds and the way in which fruit trees, bulbs and so on, are treated and protected against disease and the attacks of insects, but also with marketing conditions and other factors.

If we wish to attract to the agricultural service of the country the best type of our rural youth, we must give to those who enter that profession an opportunity of making a reasonable livelihood, and we must also afford them opportunities adequate to retain them. I feel that in the past, owing perhaps to lack of understanding and appreciation, and to the exceptionally low salaries which have been paid, particularly to the younger men in the agricultural branch of the government service, we have run a serious risk of losing these men and of encouraging them to go elsewhere.

I offer these remarks merely for the purpose of calling the minister's attention to the need for stimulating interest in what I might term the professional agriculturists who have done such excellent work for the farmers.

I desire now to take up the theme of the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I wish to refer to some of the statements he made in his speech yesterday. He said in part:

> I was surprised to find there have been only forty-eight applications for farms in my own riding under the Veterans Land Act. I fully expected there would be many more, but speaking from memory I believe only some seventeen have qualified and been granted farms.

The hon. member went on to explain what an excellent constituency he had.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I still hold to that.

Mr. PEARKES: I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman; I know that constituency, and it is a most attractive part of the country. Then he went on to say:

> It is surprising . . . there should be only forty-eight applications for farms under the act. The remedy is for this government . . . to guarantee these men not subisidies, but prices which will afford a decent standard of living and which will permit them to carry out their obligations and manage the debt they will be called upon to undertake if they are to settle upon farms.

That is the local picture. A few day ago, in answer to some questions of mine, the Secretary of State kindly tabled certain returns giving figures as to the number of men who have settled on the land, having taken advantage of the Veterans Land Act. I asked the questions first of all because I was anxious to find out what would be the effect, on the veterans who were trying to reestablish themselves on farms, of the imposition of the additional twelve and a half per cent on farm machinery, because it seemed to me that that would be placing an additional burden upon veterans who were trying to get reestablished.

One of the first questions I asked was: What percentage of the equipment which these veterans have bought was new equipment, and what was second-hand? The figures given to me, as tabled in the house, were that 79·6 per cent was new equipment; 20·4 second-hand.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that we are now discussing the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, administration. The matter which he is discussing relates to veterans affairs and rehabilitation. I might also observe that yesterday we did allow wide discussion, perhaps quite a bit of it out of order, but I hope hon. members now will confine their remarks to the item under consideration.

Mr. PEARKES: I hope, Mr. Chairman, my build-up will convince you that I am endeavouring to confine my remarks to the item before the committee. I am merely building up my case by quoting figures which I think are pertinent.

The next question I asked had reference to the number of veterans for whom equipment had been purchased. The number given was 1,127. The next question was with reference to the number who had made applications for equipment, and the figure given was 2,101. These figures surprised me; I thought there would have been many more. Then I looked to see how many veterans had been established on the land, and I found, as far as full-time farming is concerned, by March 31, 1946, that 5,132 veterans had been established under the Veterans Land Act throughout the whole of Canada. These figures struck me as amazingly small. I made inquiries as to how many veterans had already been demobilized, as I thought that would give me an indication of the number of veterans who were going back on the land. I found that from May 1, 1945 to March 31, 1946, over 500,000 veterans had been demobilized from the three services, and that prior to May 1, 1945, an additional 400,000 had been demobilized. Admitting that some of those veterans may have had dual discharge, because that is quite possible, the sum total cannot be less than something well over 800,000 men discharged up to March 31, as compared with just over 5,000 who had been rehabilitated on the land. Therefore fewer than one per cent of the veterans who have returned to this country have been established on the land.

Frequently we have heard of the great agricultural resources of Canada. I have always understood that agriculture was one of our basic industries. I have been told many times in the house that we had the most generous and far-reaching scheme for the rehabilitation of veterans that could be found anywhere in the world. Surely there must be something radically wrong with the position of agriculture in the economic set-up of Canada if only slightly more than one-half of one per cent of all the veterans who have been demobilized almost a year since the cessation of hostilities have taken up farming on their own under the generous opportunities which are offered under the Veterans Land Act. I do not know whether it is the fault of the agricultural policy of this country or of the general economic set-up; but it is obvious that these men who had the courage to face the enemy in the air, on the battlefields of Europe, on the high seas or in the merchant marine, for some reason or other think they have not a fighting chance of making both ends meet if they take up agriculture in this great agricultural country.

I do not believe that any amount of propaganda, any amount of explanation which may be given, or any attempt to show increases in exports of this kind or that, can blur the stark tragedy of these figures—one-half of one per cent of our veterans re-established into agriculture under the Veterans Land Act one year after the cessation of hostilities.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to give his earnest consideration to improving agricultural conditions in Canada and the position of agriculturists so that veterans who ran such risks for us during the past war will think it worth while to take up agriculture as their profession, as a means of livelihood, as a means of getting re-established into a satisfactory economic condition.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support the concern shown and the request made by the hon. member for Nanaimo with respect to the future welfare of the settlers from the agricultural point of view. May I say that I was privileged to be one of the members of the committee on the Veterans Land Act which sat in 1942. I do not think it can be said that there is no close connection between the Veterans Land Act and the welfare of agriculture in Canada. They are closely linked up. Speaking on the bill which the committee brought before the house at that time, I said—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I think that matter should be discussed when the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs are before the committee. I ask hon. members to discuss the item now before the committee, which is departmental administration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is just what I am doing. When the motion to set up the veterans affairs committee was before the house I asked the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs if it would preclude a discussion on these matters in the house, and they said that the rules of the house would govern, but so far as they were concerned they would give us wide latitude. I raised that point before allowing the measure to pass without discussion.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member should keep in mind the fact that that suggestion was made to him in connection with veterans affairs. We are not discussing veterans affairs now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does the chairman rule that there is no connection between the future of the settlers under the Veterans Land Act and agriculture in this country?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not want to make any ruling in the matter. We do allow a great deal of latitude in matters of this kind, but I trust hon. members will confine their remarks to the item now before the committee.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am going to confine my remarks entirely to the administration of agriculture, and I shall not be very long on this point.

Speaking on this bill, as reported at page 4386 of Hansard of July 20, 1942, I said:

> May I say at the beginning that if it were not for the fact that I have some faith in the future, and a hope that agricultural parity will eventually be established in Canada, I would not have been able to support the bill even in principle. In the great nation to the south of us, the United States, there has been parity between agricultural and other products for a year now, and under the Washington wheat agreement of June 27, 1942, signed by the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, the representatives of these nations have recognized the basis of a parity price for wheat which will return a fair remuneration to the producers as well as being fair to the consumer. On the basis of these agreements, and having regard to what has been done in the United States, I think we may hope that we are doing these settlers justice by establishing them on the land, because we hope that they will be able to carry on under parity prices, in the future at any rate. As I say, if it were not for that hope I for one could not have supported the bill.

I am prepared to admit to-day how illusory my faith was at that time, because under the increase in wheat prices announced in the United States the day before yesterday, and taking into account the difference in exchange, a farmer delivering his wheat in the United States will receive slightly over $2.50 a bushel, exactly double what the producer receives in Canada to-day. We have pretty well discussed the matter of dairy products, meat and other products. I repeated this declaration when we discussed the amendment to the Veterans Land Act bill last November. Speaking on September 25 last on the resolution asking this government to undertake to guarantee the producers floor prices of at least ninety per cent of parity, I wound up my remarks as follows, as reported at page 464 of Hansard:

> More than that, before many days have passed, when we discuss some of the other ministers' estimates and difficulties that already prevail to-day with respect to the rehabilitation of our service men, and especially those young men who want to settle on farms under the Veterans Land Act, if the government can assure them nothing more than this for the future years they will not be very eager about settling on the land.

I am not raising this point in any spirit of "I told you so", but I think it has been the vital concern of every member of parliament that these men should be rehabilitated on the land. As has been pointed out, one-half of one per cent of those who have been discharged, or some 5,132, have already been passed for settlement on the land. Surely that should be the concern of every public official in Canada. The situation has been progressively aggravated since 1942. From day to day and from week to week it is becoming alarmingly worse.

In a return brought down on April 16, 1946, with regard to the 12½ per cent increase on farm implements, it was asked whether it would be necessary for these settlers to pay that increase, and the reply was, "Yes, certainly, less the deduction in commission allowed to dealers." This comes rightfully under a discussion of agricultural matters, and it is the concern of each one of us. Surely we hope to settle satisfactorily more than 5,000 of those men. Speaking the other night I pointed out that out of the many thousands of enlistments from the farms in the prairie provinces, only seven per cent had signified their intention of returning to those farms. Meantime they have been overseas; they have knocked around and have seen things in other countries. The result is that they want to try some other occupation.

I agree with the Minister of Pensions and National Health that it is in the interests of any nation to have a fair percentage of its population on the land. I agree, too, with what was said a few days ago by the Minister of Agriculture about mortgage indebtedness, and mortgages which have been reduced. If a man could have his land and stock clear of indebtedness, there would not be a better occupation than that of operating a farm, other things being on a parity or a reasonable basis. That is what we should be striving for in Canada, rather than having the matter aggravated as it is to-day. I wish to support the request of the hon. member who has asked that we endeavour to do something about making the future a much happier one, as well as more remunerative for those of our settlers who have sacrificed everything that we might live and enjoy this freedom. Thus far they have been successful in winning the battle for us. During the years they were overseas fighting that battle, on many occasions in this chamber I expressed my fear about properly winning the peace for them. We are in the midst of that great controversy to-day, one about which I have expressed so much doubt. I trust we shall be more successful in the future than we are now.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about the matter under discussion. I do not wish to go into detail, because I agree with what the chairman has said, namely that in discussing this question we are more or less out of order. However there have been some remarks by hon. members to the effect that they come from the best farming constituencies in Canada; and then they proceed to tell us that nobody wants to farm there. My story is somewhat different from that. I think, in view of what has just been said, that I must live in what is really the best farming constituency in Canada, because the first veteran who came back and made application for a farm in that area referred the matter to me. Then, later on, to complete the story, I was informed by the land settlement board that in two years time he had paid back all the money he received from the government, and that he was not even waiting for eight more years to be paid the $2,300 to which he would be entitled under the act, in order to secure clear title. He paid it all back in two years and received his clear title.

I think it is important that when we are discussing matters of this kind we should not discourage men from going on the farms by telling all these hard luck stories. In spite of the fact that I do not believe they are getting all they are entitled to, the farmers to-day are making more on their farms than they have made at any other time in my lifetime. Young men who are going back to the farms under present conditions are not experiencing what has been suggested in the house. They are possibly going back under conditions which will probably make it more difficult rather than less difficult for them in the future—and not because conditions to-day are trying, but because they are a little better than they usually are on farms in Canada or in any other country. That is because there is a greater demand for food to-day than can possibly be supplied by all the farm operators in this and every other country.

This being so, conditions are at least as good as we can expect them to be for a long time for those who are now going on the land. But when the suggestion is made that at this stage young men are not applying to go back on the farms, particularly in western Canada, I think I can suggest a much better reason than the ones which have been offered up to the present. Those of us who have lived in western Canada in the last number of years, and particularly during the ten years preceding the war, can well understand why many young men and women who have served in the armed services or elsewhere are not now going back to the farms. One of them is, of course, the difficulty they experienced in the ten years immediately preceding the war. They may feel that there is a possibility of similar conditions prevailing at some future time, and they possibly feel that they would like to settle themselves somewhere else.

However, I do not think that is the reason which has developed this attitude in the minds of most of them. Most of them know what to expect in western Canada; they were born and reared there. The only people who will ever make a success at farming in western Canada are those who know that for every four or five good years you have, you are going to have four or five poor years. One could not farm in that country were it not for the fact that it is comparatively dry. It is both too far north and too high up to farm under conditions where there would be any more moisture than falls there in an average year. Those who would operate successfully on a farm in western Canada must learn that lesson first. If they have learned that lesson, then it may be possible for them to make a success of farming on the prairies.

The fact is that in the last ten years before the war no one could make a living in western Canada, the reason being that the world was preparing for war. We could not have sold our farm products, even if we had had good crops in those ten years. We would have had a very difficult time. France did not want our wheat; Germany did not want our wheat; Italy did not want our wheat. They would not take it. The reason they would not take it was that in some instances they were preparing food in their own countries, producing it by synthetic processes in order that they might have it there, behind their own fighting lines, in a war which they all knew was coming, but which we would not believe was coming. Because we had those ideas in this country, we had people who were saying, "Oh, we are never going to have another war. Why do you prepare for war in this country? Why do you even think about it? There isn't going to be another world war." In other words, we stuck our heads in the sand and let these people shut our food products out of their countries, thereby making it absolutely impossible for us to sell them. The result was that every boy or girl at home on his or her farm in western Canada just had to stay there. The farmers in this country do not do as the city people do, and I am not going to name any particular class of city people, because they are organized in a different way. In this country the farmer owns his own farm, or at least is trying to own it. He raises his own family on the farm. They are all part and parcel of the operation which is going on there. When their families are out of work because there is no market they do not turn their families out on the street to be kept by the state; they maintain their families themselves. Any person not gainfully employed on farms prior to this war was taken care of by the farmers, not by city councils or municipal councils or provincial governments or the dominion government. Unemployment in that form was taken care of by the farmers themselves, with the result that thousands upon thousands of young men who should have been in universities or given courses to prepare them for life somewhere else off the farms did not have those opportunities. Why, anyone who knows farming in this country knows that only one boy can stay on the family size farm, and one of the neighbour's daughters. They constitute the new family heads who will remain on the farm; and if the farmer raises a family of four or five or half a dozen or ten children, the others have to find a living on some other farms, in business or somewhere else. Someone says it has been that way for a hundred years. It has always been that way where you have family-sized farms, anywhere in the world.

So for ten years before this war began young men and young women were congregated upon the farms of this country because, during that period farming did not make it possible for them to obtain sufficient funds with which to secure the education or training they desired to permit them to go elsewhere when it became necessary for them to do so. As a result, during the war 400,000 of them left the farms and went into the services or the war plants; and with them all gone we produced on our farms forty per cent more food than we produced in the years prior to the war when those people were on the farms. This proves, as conclusively as such things can be proved, that these young men were not gainfully employed on the farms during that period when they were not doing the things they desired to do.

The hon. member for Nanaimo says we have been boasting about the many fine things we are doing for returned men. The very fact that we have done fine things for them; the very fact that I am told that a man with certain qualifications, certain service and a certain family to be maintained can draw under these provisions as much as $10,000 to get himself an education, is the explanation as to why some of them are not applying to do anything else at the present time. That is an explanation of the fact that every university in this country is jammed to the doors with veterans, with as many more clamouring to get in, to take advantage of the provisions made by the government for men coming back from overseas to be trained and educated in the institutions of this country for the life that is ahead of them. Before war broke out other countries were preparing for war, but we did not believe we should prepare for it. Therefore during the five or ten years before the war we did not take these men in and train them the way we had to train them while the war was on. We had to give them an education in order that they could fly as they ought to fly, in order that they might handle equipment as it ought to be handled, in order that they might lay out plans for the battles that had to be fought, and so on. We would not do that before the war, but during the war we had to do it. Then when the war was over we sent thousands upon thousands of them back into the educational institutions of our country to be educated as they should have been educated before the war started; so I am not going to blame any of them for not going back to the farms in the meantime.

On the last trip I made west, last Easter, I think I had a very good indication of why some men do not go back to the farms. I went into the dining car for dinner. A young man, or perhaps not so young either, in airforce uniform, sat down across the table from me. He asked, "Have you an agricultural college in Saskatchewan?" I replied that we had. He asked if it was a good one, to which I replied that it was second to none, as far as I knew. Then he said, "Well, I think I will apply to go there." I asked what he was doing before the war, and he said he was teaching school. I asked how long he had taught school, and he said seventeen years. I asked why he was going back to university now. His reply was, "Well, I got married rather early in life and I did not find it possible to complete a university education under the circumstances, so I had to teach." I asked what family he had; I have forgotten whether he said four or five, but he went on to say that under the provisions which had been put into effect it was possible for him to go and do what he had always wanted to do, that is, complete his education in an agricultural college, so he thought he would apply for admission to the agricultural college at Saskatoon.

There is no doubt in my mind but that thoughts like these are going through the minds of thousands of young men. Some day that man may go back to a farm. He is not so young now—

Mr. REID: Not by the time he is through college.

Mr. GARDINER: He must be in his late thirties; and by the time he is though college, and as my hon. friend the member for New Westminster says, he may find that it is not too easy for a man to get properly started on a farm in a country that is well settled. It was not so difficult when I went west more than forty years ago, when we could get a homestead and start right in. To-day it is just about as difficult for a man to get properly started on a farm as it is to get started in any profession in this country; but a man appreciates being on a farm just a little bit more if he has had the opportunity to get a university education. That should not prevent a man from working with his hands, if he has the right kind of stuff in him. Some of the men who are making a great success in life, particularly in the older countries under systems which sometimes we condemn, and probably properly so, look upon this thing quite differently. I remember that many years ago I was coming down the main line of the C.P.R. when I met an English gentleman who operated a farm in Great Britain. He had two strapping sons sitting one on each side of him, and when we got to Winnipeg they got up and walked down the street. After they had gone I said, "Those are two pretty fine boys." He said, "Yes. They have just completed university over in England, and I took them for a trip around the world before they settled down on their farms. We are just on the way back, and they are going to farm in England." The thought went through my mind that if every young man who was going to be settled on a farm had that opportunity, not very many young men would leave the farm. Perhaps we would all be desirous of living out on a farm if we could start with that kind of background.

Those two young men came back after a while. That was in the days when men were standing on the street corners in Winnipeg. When the boys came back and sat down in the car the father said, "Well, what did you see?" They replied, "We were surprised to see in Winnipeg exactly the same type of men standing in groups on the street corners, apparently unemployed, as we see over in Britain. We can't understand it; they look like the same people." I have forgotten exactly what year that was, but it was the year that we made provision for bringing 3,000 men from Britain to help harvest the crops in western Canada. When they made that remark I said to them: Those are the same men. They are part of the 3,000 men who were brought out from Britain to help with the harvest. We had difficulties with them. Some of them were of the type who were causing trouble in the old country in connection with labour matters, and they raised difficulties with regard to conditions out in the fields of western Canada. They congregated themselves back in the city of Winnipeg. I am not making any criticism of them. I am simply saying that these two young men with their background were able to size up the situation simply by walking for half an hour down the streets of Winnipeg and back. They wondered why in a new country like ours they found exactly the same situation on the street corners in Winnipeg as they had experienced in Great Britain in relation to labour troubles there.

I mention these things only to emphasize that if we want our young men to go on the farms we must first create better conditions than they have had in the past. We believe that for the time being we have better conditions than we had in the past, and we are hopeful that we can establish those better conditions permanently for the whole lifetime of the men who are going on the farm. But however long they remain, we can only persuade young men to go on the farm and remain on the farm by telling them of the opportunities in farming, what the privileges are of living on a farm, what the advantages are—because there are privileges and advantages in living on a farm in a country where you can own your own farm and where conditions are such that, as I said a moment ago, a young man can come back from the war, buy a good farm, pay for it in two years and get on with the job of creating a home that he and his young wife whom he married at the end of the war that he and she will be proud to live in.

I do not think we should be going round, particularly those who never have farmed and never intend to farm, telling people how terrible conditions are on the farm. Why should a young man go on the farm after listening to some of the speeches made in this house yesterday? If he knows anything about it he will say that those fellows do not know what they are talking about. If he does not know anything about it, he will say: I had better go and look somewhere else for a living. The fact of the matter is that in Great Britain only a small percentage of the people are on farms and the people who come here from the British isles are not accustomed to farming. I would say that ninety per cent of the people of Britain do not want to farm and never did. Some of them when they come over here like to make money faster than they can on a farm and even if they settle on a farm are anxious to get away from it for a while.

Within the last forty-eight hours I met a delegation of real farmers who had a complain to make when they came in. Of course, that is what most people come here for, to make complaints and to get wrongs righted. In the conversation which took place a statement something like this was made. Twenty-five years ago we could go down the streets of our cities and towns and hire immigrants who did not mind milking cows, hoeing sugar beets and doing other things that have to be done on a farm. There is no use in anybody going on the farm if he is not willing to hoe sugar beets, if he is not willing to milk cows, if he is not willing to feed pigs, and so on down the line. That is what has driven a large percentage of Anglo-Saxon people away from the farm. That is why so many farms in Canada are being settled by people who came from other than Anglo-Saxon countries.

If we want to keep our boys on the farm we have to preach a different kind of philosophy from what is being preached to-day in this house and elsewhere. We must preach the philosophy that there is nothing better or more worth while than producing food and clothing, the two things that are necessary for all of us. If farming, producing the things we need the most, is not considered one of the best of all professions or trades, or whatever you like to call it, there is something wrong with our way of thinking.

It is all very well to get up here and say what a wonderful class of people our farmers are, how fine they are; but just take your pencils and put down $1,600,000,000, which is the highest cash income the farmers of this country ever took in for three years' work—that was in the last three years—and divide it by 800,000. What do you get? It gives you $2,000 as the average cash return on a farm in Canada in the best three years we ever had in this country.

I go down to Toronto and a man tells me, as he did on one occasion: There is no reason why the farmers should not be the wealthiest people in Canada. I asked him why, and he said that someone had ninety acres just outside Toronto and they took $40,000 off that land every year. I said, "What are you talking about?" He said "They are taking light hogs off the market in Toronto, feeding them out on that land and then turning them back on the market when fit, and they took in $40,000 a year by doing that". He went on to say that there was no reason why every farmer in Canada should not do that. I said to him, "There are two very good reasons why it cannot be done,"—and hon. gentlemen would be surprised to know who this man was. He gives us advice about running this country. I said to him, "There are two very good reasons, and the first one is that if every farmer in this country produced that many hogs every year he would not be able to find a market for them, even at possible Chinese rates of return. The next reason is that there is not enough feed produced in Canada to feed a fraction of that number of hogs if every farmer was producing them." I said to him, "You are not talking about a farmer; you are talking about a feeding lot, where a man takes the hogs, buys the grain, puts the hogs through his feeding plant and turns them back on the market. That is not a farm; that is not farming." Then I know of other cases: these cases are typical. Whenever you go into a certain part of this country and ask somebody to take you out and show you a farm, I know where he will take you. And I know that the man who owns that farm never lived on a farm in his life. I know that he got the first money with which he started his agricultural pursuits running an evangelistic campaign. I know that the next basis of the fortune which went into that farm came from race horses, and that the land was purchased as a result of that. It is a very fine farm, and most people who go to see it come away thinking that the owner is the type of farmer we have in Canada, that those are the type of people we have on farms in western Canada. I hear it said that they go to California every winter, or they go somewhere else in order to enjoy themselves; they do not farm; they work only a few months in the year. I have heard statements something like that since this debate started. These may be very fine people but they are not farmers.

I had the privilege only this morning of having verified something which I thought I had learned when I was in Europe recently. I have heard—I won't use the term I was going to use, but I will say—I have heard a great deal of buncombe about farming in some countries which are a long distance away. I always had the idea that at least fifty per cent what I heard had no basis in fact, but was based on what one is shown by propagandists for a thing. So when I was in Denmark last January I hopped out of the plane and into a car and I said, "Nobody knows I am in this country at all, nobody would know who I am if they did know I was here, so just show me a few farms". A young air force chap ran me around to half a dozen farms and I went in and took a look at them. I was never more surprised in my life than when I went into these farms. I have never seen on any well-run farm in Canada as poor cows as I saw there. I would not have the same kind of horses on my farm as I saw on some of theirs, and the chickens were as mixed as any flock of chickens you ever saw on any farm anywhere in the world. So I thought, well, there may be something wrong with the picture I had drawn for me of farms in Denmark. Only this morning I had the opportunity of having breakfast with a gentleman who made the remark that he had written a book on this matter some years ago, having been sent over by the government to investigate farming conditions in Denmark and elsewhere. I said, "What did you find?" "Well", he said, "I thought what I might see around Copenhagen might not be typical of the rest of the country, so we did not go to Copenhagen first. We just slipped in up over the mainland; we did not say anything to anybody, and we visited a number of farms before they knew we were in the country." "Do you know", he said, "that their farms are not any better than the back concession farms in Ontario? They are much the same type, operated in much the same way"; and he went on to tell me that when he drove into a certain place he was invited to dinner, that the mother of the family was out in the garden or out in the field, down on her knees, weeding sugar beets. He said she was dressed in clothing which looked very much like what we call gunnysacks. "What we had for dinner", he added, "was tapioca and one or two other foods which we would think very common on our tables in this country." I mention this in order to emphasize that this was the picture I found when I was there, but I was not sure of it. But he said that when the officials got hold of him they did not take him to places like that, but to places like the one of which I have been speaking and which you can find in this country too—quite a number of them—outside of Toronto and Montreal and probably Ottawa and other cities. I think we should toot our own horn instead of suggesting that our boys found things so much better elsewhere that they will not farm in Canada.

Too many people in this country do not know the farmers' condition, and too many people who don't know talk about it. As I have indicated, farmers in this country have had in the past three years an average cash income of about $2,000 gross, and out of that they must pay at the present time, if they want to get a man at all, about $100 a month, which is $1,200 a year. If anybody can tell me how a farmer who has to pay that much for help can pay much income tax, I should like to know how he is going to do it.

I thought I had to say that some time, and this is just as good a time as any to say it. We have been talking a lot about general matters, and a considerable number of those who have been on their feet have said that we ought to have more money for agriculture. I think I said at the beginning that we had increased the expenditures in every division, and everyone who has mentioned it at all has said that we ought to have even more. Well, I quite agree, but I have not been able to convince everybody else of that. But if I have convinced the committee of it I should like hon. members to do one thing: let us pass one item and get on with voting the money we have been allowed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure that the members of the committee have listened closely, as they always do, to the Minister of Agriculture. It was a most unusual speech. He scolded all the members of the house for presenting the problems of the farmers in such a light that young men leaving the services might be afraid to take on the responsibilities of farming.

Mr. FRASER: Only those who spoke yesterday.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yet he has stated that the average gross income has been $2,000 per year per farmer, which indicates that if some are getting $40,000 a year a great many are getting very little.

Mr. GARDINER: And it is more than you ever got until you became a member of this house.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That does not happen to be correct.

Mr. GARDINER: Very nearly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, I should be glad to discuss that with the minister, but our personal affairs really have not very much interest for this parliament, and the reference is certainly not in very good taste.

Mr. GARDINER: You can apply it to seventy-five per cent of the people in this country.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Certainly, and I am not ashamed of the fact that my income has held some relationship to that of the people with whom I have worked.

Mr. GARDINER: To make sure that there is no misunderstanding about it, I will say that it is more than I ever had until I was a member of the legislature of Saskatchewan.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That, too, is interesting, but the minister would have done better not to raise the question of what he and I have been accustomed to having.

I think it was also unfortunate that the minister spoke of visiting the people of Denmark and came to the conclusions he did, considering that they were under German occupation and that many of their best breeding herds were completely destroyed. I spent two weeks in Denmark a number of years ago before the country was overrun by the enemy. I admit frankly that every farmer in Denmark has not a perfect herd, but the Danish people have earned a reputation all over the world for excellent breeding stock and producing a high quality dairy product. They have held the British market for years, and I should not be surprised if they made a bid for it again. I do not know how many farms the minister saw during his brief visit, but it is most unfortunate that a Canadian Minister of Agriculture should make comparisons of the kind as a result of such interviews as he had.

Every session I have taken advantage of this item to recommend to the minister that there should be a certain reclassification of salaries for the personnel in his department. But before proceeding with those remarks I should like to pay a tribute to him for a valuable international service which his department has recently rendered. I have a letter from P. S. Quan, who is an engineer attached to the department of irrigation, ministry of agriculture and forestry, in China. He recently spent three weeks in Canada studying irrigation and soil surveys work here. He visited the experimental station at Summerland, the irrigation projects in the Lethbridge district and the P.F.A.A. office in Regina. He writes to me:

> The admirable work done by your department—

I may explain that he was drawing his conclusions entirely from his association with these three branches.

> The admirable work done by your government and the intelligence and diligence of your farmers gave me deep impressions of the battle of food production. My Canadian trip was a most profitable one not only from the point of view of giving me a very good picture of developments in your country but also of giving me much information for our future developments in China.

I suggest that if the minister, from time to time, could find ways and means for promoting that sort of communication it would have a much better effect than the sort of contribution he made this afternoon with reference to Denmark.

I might also express thanks to the minister for a recent appointment that has been very well received in all parts of Canada, particularly the west. I refer to the appointment of Doctor K. W. Neatby as director of scientific services. This gentleman is one of the most distinguished graduates of my own alma mater, the university of Saskatchewan, and I am sure that everyone who knows him and knows the work he has done is glad to have him back in the work he is so well trained to do.

When I was discussing these estimates a year ago I said that in my opinion the personnel in the Department of Agriculture did not receive as adequate compensation as the personnel in other departments, or persons outside the government services. I may have strange ideas in connection with these matters, but it is my opinion that the Department of Agriculture is as important as any other department of government. The minister has referred to the fact that the people who do scientific work in his department are probably as well paid as farmers. That possibly is true; but I think it should be the goal of the minister to see that those who work on farms receive the highest possible income, or at any rate that they have a fair share of the total national income. Likewise, those who work under his supervision in the government service should have a fair share of the amount spent for all services.

I do not think we can solve both problems immediately, but I do not think we should wait, to make adjustments in the civil service, until we have solved all other problems in the wider field of agriculture.

Last year the minister answered a question regarding the number of employees holding the bachelor's degree and receiving certain salaries. One receives less than $1,000; 287 receive less than $2,000; 358 receive less than $3,000; and only 96 receive over $3,000. There are sixty with master's degree reeciving less than $2,000; 113 receiving less than $3,000; and forty-seven receiving over $3,000. With the Ph.D degree there are ten receiving less than $2,000, forty-one receiving less than $3,000, and sixty-two receiving over $3,000.

I have never argued that because a man has a college degree he is entitled to an income that places him in a position of advantage over his fellows, but I imagine that most of the employees in the department holding degrees have come from farms. If one boy stays on the family farm and continues to develop it, even if his income is only the average of $2,000 over the whole nation in good years, while another boy goes to university, spends four years taking the bachelor of science degree, another two years receiving his master's degree, and a total of eight years until he receives his Ph. D., and if the latter has to pay off his debts and maintain a decent standard of living he should receive an income higher than the amounts paid to so many of the personnel of the Department of Agriculture.

Last year the minister argued that in his opinion the salaries in his department compared very well with those in other departments. However, checking over the public accounts, I find that the assistant deputy minister in the Department of Agriculture receives $4,800 a year, whereas the assistant deputy minister in the Department of Munitions and Supply receives $9,000. I am not acquainted with either of these gentlemen, but I assume both have important responsibilities.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the comparison could be made to better advantage with some other department, because the Department of Agriculture is permanent, whereas the other is only temporary, doing a temporary job, and considerations such as go with permanent employment do not go with it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I realize that. I know that what the minister says is quite true, but when you have a man coming in from private industry and working alongside a civil servant who is better qualified and does a more responsible job at half the salary, you are bound to have friction. In the Department of Agriculture we have a relatively short list of men receiving $2,400 a year or more, whereas in the wartime prices and trade board alone I find that there are ten pages giving salaries of more than $2,400, many receiving $5,000, $6,500, $7,000, $8,000, and so on. The same goes for the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I submit that those who have been doing such important work in these scientific fields require a return that is a great deal higher than they have ever received. Last year when these estimates were up I referred to the annual pay of some of my class mates who were in university twenty years ago. Doctor Broadfoot receives $2,880. He was a brilliant student, one of our popular undergraduates. He went to the university of Minnesota and took his doctor's degree and now, after nearly twenty years, he receives a salary of $2,880. There is Mr. Russell, who has done outstanding work in the field of rust, who also receives $2,880; and there is Mr. Mead, who receives $2,400. These are three of my classmates who have all had upwards of twenty years' service and they are getting less than $250 a month. I maintain that this sort of compensation to industrious and capable civil servants is not good enough.

I was interested in an article in the Journal of the Professional Institute of the Civil Service of Canada, and I find that this problem has been agitating the civil service for many years. Back in 1922, shortly after the present Prime Minister took over his responsibilities, he was disturbed by the salaries prevailing in the civil service. However, the wheels of government move slowly, and it was not until 1927 that a special committee of the cabinet finally forwarded a directive to the civil service commission to make a survey of compensation rates paid to professional and scientific employees, with instructions to report their findings to the government. That was in March, 1927. A year later certain recommendations were presented and they involved the spending of aprpoximately $750,000 more than was being spent. Those were the days, I may say in passing, when the question, "Where shall we get the money?" really stopped things. Nothing happened. Then about a year later, on April 16, 1929, a royal commission was established with the late Sir Edward Beatty as chairman and the late Doctor Walter Murray, of the university of Saskatchewan, and Sir George Garneau as members of the commission. They made a careful study and they came to certain conclusions. One of their comments was as follows:

> We have been especially impressed, however, by the slow rate of advancement observable among officers with from eight to twenty years of seniority. Many of these officers at a time of life when financial responsibilties of a growing family are apt to be heavy, have not yet reached a scale of salary which can be regarded as adequate, even for a decent subsistence. If their professional competence is not open to question, then they should be provided with opportunities for advancement which will at least enable them to pass on to their children the same educational advantages which they themselves have had.

But the recommendations they proposed required an additional $750,000 annually. The Minister of Finance of that day, the Hon. Charles Dunning, was completely stumped by this problem. I understand that Mr. Dunning is being honoured by the university of Saskatchewan. When we think of the problem of finding $750,000 in 1930 to meet injustices which had existed in Canada for many years we wonder why we could not find so little money when during the last four or five years we found so much for war purposes.

In this article there is a reference to the sort of treatment we have meted out to civil servants. It referred to Doctor Saunders, the man who gave Canada Marquis wheat. There can be no argument at all that his discovery has meant hundreds of millions of dollars to the people of this country, and yet we are told that in the estimates for the year ended June 30, 1905, the late Doctor Saunders was receiving the princely sum of $1,250, or little over $100 a month.

A good deal of publicity has recently been given to the development of rescue wheat. I understand that the principal work has been done by A. W. Platt, of the Swift Current experimental farm. His discovery is also going to mean millions of dollars to the wheat producers of this country; yet Mr. Platt's name does not even appear in the public accounts among those receiving $2,400 or more. I understand that he is receiving $1,800 a year, to support his wife and four children. I have also been informed that he has been offered a salary of $5,000 to go to the state university in Kansas, but because of his loyalty to this country and his hope that some day a measure of justice will be granted to civil servants like himself he has declined the offer to leave Canada. But I do not think it is fair to expect scientific workers who are doing this kind of work to continue in Canada indefinitely. I cannot see any good reason why this country which has raised so much money to prosecute a war cannot demonstrate now that we can adjust these grievances.

In the December issue of the Institute Journal there is a table showing a comparison of salaries paid to agricultural scientists in Canada, the United States and Great Britain. I am sure this comparison will be of interest to the committee and I shall read it. In the lowest grade Canada compares favourably with Great Britain. In grade 1, our range is $1,800 to $2,400; in the United States, $2,552 to $3,278; in the United Kingdom, $1,210 to $2,200. I might say that in these comparisons the United States dollar was taken at $1.10 and the British pound at $4.40. In grade 2, Canada, $2,400 to $3,000; United States, $3,278 to $4,004; Great Britain, $2,420 to $3,300. In grade 3, Canada, $3,000 to $3,300; United States, $4,004 to $4,730; Great Britain, $3,420 to $4,840. In grade 4, Canada, $3,300 to $3,600; United States, $4,730 to $5,698; Great Britain, $5,280 to $6,160. In grade 5, Canada, $3,600 to $4,200; United States, $5,698 to $6,622; Great Britain, $7,040 to $7,920. Grade 6, Canada, $3,900 to $4,500; United States, $6,853 to $7,777; Great Britain, $8,800. Grade 7, Canada, $4,500 to $5,100; United States, $7,892 to $9,047. Grade 8, Canada, $5,100 to $5,600; United States, $9,625 to $10,780. There is a note appended which states that in the United Kingdom they have various salaries in these high ranges from $9,900 to $11,000. Since this table was prepared I understand that there have been increases in the United States for all those getting less than $1,200. There has been a twenty per cent increase on salaries up to $1,200, a ten per cent increase from $1,200 to $4,600, and a five per cent increase above $4,600. I have also been informed that there was a resolution passed in the house of representatives approving a further flat increase of $400 over the whole service, but the senate was not prepared to go quite that far.

In one of these journals a list is given of the new members who have joined the veterinary group of the institute. Checking over the public accounts, I found that these men who have had a long and costly college course are receiving salaries of $250 a month or less. I hold in my hand a copy of a brief that was prepared for the investigation in connection with health insurance by Doctor J. S. Fulton, director of animal research in the university of Saskatchewan. In his brief Doctor Fulton complains that compensation to graduates of veterinary science has been so low that they have not been able to attract a sufficient number of young men adequately to care for the health of animals and the supervision of meat and milk offered for public consumption. I know that most of the veterinarians listed here are engaged in the health of animals division. I have seen some of these men at work in the abattoirs. I consider that their work is of a responsible nature. It is not easy work. I can see no reason why these university graduates are not as important to the people of Canada as are the salesmen for Canada Packers or the Swift Canadian Company. It casts a serious reflection on our whole economic set-up when graduates in veterinary science find that if they give up the practice of the profession for which they were trained and look after cats, dogs and canaries they make a handsome living; whereas if they go out to the country to look after the health of cattle, horses and sheep they find it difficult to make a living.

In his brief Doctor Fulton points out that at the time it was prepared there were only forty-five qualified veterinary surgeons in the whole of Saskatchewan, which has a horse population of 830,000, a cattle population of 1,602,000; a dairy cow population of 467,700; a swine population of 1,325,400 and a sheep population of 410,000, not to mention a poultry industry with an estimated $20 million involved, returning to the producers $9,976,000. The whole point of my argument is that in my opinion the compensation provided by the Department of Agriculture for those who are well qualified in the various branches has not been comparable with the returns in other departments of government, and certainly not comparable with the returns—

Mr. GARDINER: They are just the best in the permanent service at the present time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then why is it that a man like Doctor Broadfoot, a Ph.D., is not entitled to more than $2,880, after serving for more than twenty years in the Department of Agriculture. Why should Mr. Platt, who is associated with the producing of—

Mr. GARDINER: Well, there is no use in dealing with individual cases. But I can tell my hon. friend that within the last few days I have received a statement from the authorities who deal with these matters stating that they have just now completed a full readjustment of salaries in these classifications in the Department of Agriculture, and that there is not any other department in which, up to date, that has been done.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If they have completed their job of reclassification, then I suggest that they start all over again.

Mr. GARDINER: But you are not an authority on even the men you are talking about.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But possibly I am an authority on balancing budgets and raising families in Canada, where the cost of living has gone up to such a great extent.

Mr. GARDINER: It has not anything to do with this. It was the civil service commission that made the readjustment. They have just written to say that they have practically completed the adjustment in the Department of Agriculture, an adjustment of pay upwards. I repeat that it has been dealt with more completely in this department, up to the present time, than it has been anywhere else.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If that is all we can hope for, then I think it makes the situation all the worse. I believe a great injustice has been done to the producers in Canada, if some hope cannot be held out in the very near future in connection with retaining in this country some of our trained scientists who have had such attractive offers to leave Canada and go to the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the date of the publication from which my hon. friend has been quoting?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have been quoting from the public accounts.

Mr. GARDINER: But when? The adjustments to which I have referred have been made within the last three months.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have a statement of reclassifications in the science service, the divisions of botany, plant pathology and entomology. The hon. member for North Battleford referred to the matter yesterday. These are rates which are comparable.

Mr. GARDINER: But the public accounts are old.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perhaps so, but I do not see in this statement the names of some of the persons with whom I am familiar. Unless something can be done in addition to what has been done I fear we are certain to lose, in the next year or two, some of the better scientists whose departure from Canada would be a serious loss.

Mr. GARDINER: I take no objection to that statement. But when the statement is made that the Department of Agriculture does not compare favourably with other departments, I must object to it, because we have just completed a review of the classifications to which reference has been made, and my understanding is that they are now classified on a basis which is higher than that generally running through other departments. Others have, I believe, still to be adjusted to this.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about reconstruction? The Department of Reconstruction is now a permanent department?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it is not a permanent department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would not the appointment to the position of assistant deputy minister of the Department of Reconstruction be a permanent appointment? Would such an official not receive all the benefits of a permanent member of the civil service?

Mr. GARDINER: There are really no permanent appointments in some of those departments to which reference has been made. The department itself is not necessarily a permanent set-up. Some of the staff in the Department of Munitions and Supply, which operated during the war, have been taken over by the Department of Reconstruction. Some still remain there who will go back to civil life.

I would not attempt to compare salaries in the Department of Agriculture with those in that department, without having all the facts before me. The civil service commission has had that job to do. We submitted all the technical staff in our department, and we were the first department to do so. Those technical staffs were submitted to the commission for review and for adjustment of salaries. I have been signing lists of them, from time to time, and I was informed the other day that the work is practically completed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the minister mean that his department has finished that job, and that individuals in that department cannot expect anything more?

Mr. GARDINER: The work is practically finished, although there may be an occasional one left. I do not know about the gentleman just referred to. I do know, however, that the work is practically all completed, and to an extent more than in any other department.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not wish to prejudice the cases to which I have referred. I just picked them out at random as the information appeared for two years ago and again last year in the public accounts. I happened to know Doctor Broadfoot very well, as we were undergraduates together.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with keen interest to what has been said by the minister. Each time he speaks he treats us to some first-class oratory. However, on this occasion I do not find myself in agreement with him when he appeals to the committee to pass the first item in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, so that we may get along more quickly. There is no one in the committee more anxious to proceed with the business than I am; but when I am convinced we are going in the wrong direction I cannot see any good reason for hurrying. In view of government policies announced in the past few weeks in connection with increases in the price of farm machinery, and an increase of three cents a gallon on gasoline, I am firmly convinced that the decontrol policy of the government respecting agriculture is not a satisfactory one. To my mind it is more important that we place some facts before the government in the hope that it may reconsider its decontrol policy for agriculture.

The Minister of Agriculture has made an appeal that we adopt the philosophy of urging people to go back to the farm. I can agree with him but assure him that my appeal, my philosophy, will be from a different angle. Rather than speak from a capitalist philosophy, I shall speak from the philosophy of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation.

In the past few weeks we have heard from some of the ministers some emotional appeals for rationalization. I, for one, feel the time has come when we should stick to facts, figures and statistical data if we wish to legislate properly for the people of this country.

When the Minister of Finance was making his appeal, in justification of the 12½ per cent increase in the price of farm machinery, he said that we must have faith in the wartime prices and trade board, on the ground of its war-time performance. That is not good enough to-day when we are trying for all-out production to feed the starving peoples of the world, when we are fighting for peace at home, and to establish an economy where we can live in decency in a time of peace, rather than just in a time of war. It is of the utmost importance that we consider carefully all the issues involved in any policy. My contention is that this problem cannot be solved individually.

Agriculture is linked with other problems in the country. The future, the prosperity—yes, and the happiness of the farmers, the workers and the everyday people are indivisible. So, too, are their troubles interdependent. After having sat here last session and so far this session it seems to me that the elephants of monopoly, if I may call them that, are having another party. During the war these people were making tremendous profits; in other words, they had a party, and they came out of that with huge amounts of money. I remember the evening the Minister of Finance announced in the house an increase in the ceiling on farm machinery. I was sitting in my seat, and it seemed to me he was making a purely emotional appeal to this house. For a while I thought he was giving us a real sob-story in behalf of the farm machinery companies of this country; but when I looked down at my desk I saw some financial statistics for a number of companies taken from the Bank of Canada statistical summary, October-November, 1945. I should like to put this table on Hansard without taking time to read it. If I have permission of the committee I shall do so; otherwise I intend to read it into the record. Have I your permission, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place the statement on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The statement is as follows:

Pre-war monopoly rate was about 58·5 per cent higher than general rate; war, about 28·4 per cent higher. (Monopoly and near-monopoly figures from Financial Post survey of corporate securities.) (The 12 monopolies are: Canadian Westinghouse, Canadian General Electric, Canadian Celanese, Canadian Industries Limited, International Nickel, Imperial Tobacco, Aluminium Limited, Imperial Oil, Canada Cement, Consolidated Mining and Smelting, National Breweries, Canadian Breweries.)

I have just tabled reports showing the profits some companies have made during the war. I want to go farther and prove to the Minister of Agriculture, if I can, that this implement price increase at this time is completely unjustifiable. I have here the report of the select special committee on farm implement prices and distribution of the legislature of Saskatchewan, dated March 27, 1939, from which I desire to quote in regard to the price structure. This is what I find at page 10, speaking of farm machinery companies:

Early in 1936 the companies announced an increase of price in farm implements amounting to 4·4 per cent as found by the Ottawa committee. It was this particular increase, announced after a substantial reduction in the tariff from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, that gave rise to the Ottawa inquiry. Despite a further reduction in the tariff to 7½ per cent and despite the findings of the Ottawa committee that this increase was not justified and that the prices of farm implements had been, over the years 1913-36, too high, despite, too, a definite finding that there was an excessive markup over cost on cream separators and repair parts, and that the prices of these should be particularly and substantially reduced, this committee finds that none of these findings were given effect to, and that, in addition, further price increases occurred in 1937.

Further on, the report has this to say in reference to labour costs:

Between 1930 and 1933 the Massey-Harris company put in operation a ten per cent decrease in wages paid in their plants. In 1935 the company restored two and a half per cent of this decrease and since then has restored the balance of seven and a half per cent, thus re-establishing the same scale as was in force in 1929. It can, therefore, be clearly seen that the increase in the price of implements between 1929 and 1939 is not attributable to higher wage costs. In 1929 the I.H.C. binder sold in Regina for $283, and in 1939 for $324.75.

[Mr. McCullough.]

Carrying that a little farther, Mr. Chairman, I find in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1937 tables showing that the cost of an eight-foot binder in 1913 was $84.96. The price to the farmer was $165 and the net sales realization. $123.03, or a profit of a little over 28 per cent. In 1935 the total cost was $128.29; the price to the farmer was $265.50; the net sales realization was $187.23. and the profit was $58.99, or almost 46 per cent. There is an estimated backlog of farm machinery in this country to-day amounting to around $200,000,000. If we take the profit per $100 of cost, according to this table appearing at page 435 of the Journal, we find that these machine companies, in filling their backlog of farm machinery will make a profit of around $140,000,000. The government has allowed certain increases in the price of steel, and it has also been argued that labour is partly responsible for the increased prices of farm machinery. I have here a table showing that profit, not labour, is the cause of high prices for farm machinery. This is taken from The C.I.O. News of September 10, 1945. It refers to a United States federal trade commission report, and has this to say:

The idea, which is common among farmers, that labour costs are the reason for the high price of farm machinery is completely exploded by the study, which shows that labour costs range from only 5·9 to a maximum of 14·6 per cent of the price the farmer pays for his machinery.

It goes on to say that this federal trade commission report takes a combine selling for $638. The labour costs were only $46.43, or 7·3 per cent of the price paid by the farmer. Materials such as wood, steel, iron, fabric, rubber and so on cost $174.27. Counting the work of mining ore, cutting the timber, and so on, plus the factory work, the labour cost was $221. This leaves $417 to be accounted for in factory overhead, manufacturer's and dealer's margin, freight, manufacturer's distribution and dealer's discount. It goes on to say:

> The retail dealer's margin is 19·1 per cent and the manufacturer's margin is 13·4 per cent compared to the manufacturing labour cost of 7·3 per cent.

I could go on, and give more figures showing that this price increase is not justifiable, but I wish to point out here that the government allowed an increase in the price of gasoline. I have here a report by Mr. L. G. Reynolds in relation to the commission on price spreads, which has this to say:

> For many years the Imperial Oil has refined most of the gasoline sold in Canada, and this concern "fixes" prices for the industry. Imperial is the "price leader" and the other companies follow. Each dealer is generally bound by contract to take his gasoline from only one company, and the dealers are controlled by tacit agreement among the companies to withhold supplies from price-cutters.
> The companies have set the price of gasoline at a level that provides a wide profit margin. This has led to limited competition among the companies, not in price but in sales—extremely wasteful sales practices, and serious duplication of personnel, storage facilities, retail outlets, et cetera.
> A survey by the royal commission on coal and gas products in British Columbia, for instance, found that there was one gas station for every 48 cars in Vancouver as compared to one for every 114 cars in Seattle, Washington. The commission concluded that in most towns in British Columbia one-half or more of the stations could be eliminated with no loss in convenience to the public.

There we have the situation of this government allowing price ceilings to rise without thorough investigation of the effect on the Canadian economy and considering whether it is justifiable. I have received a letter from Mr. Brown, president of the Cooperative Implement company in which he says that this policy of the government has accentuated the need for cooperative control of farm implement prices. Since this is reflected in the Canadian economy and is bound to have serious repercussions all across the country I would recommend that the government consider seriously using the Combines Act and that it should not be satisfied until a thorough investigation has been made of the big machine companies in Canada.

I remember distinctly when the Windsor strike was on last year that, according to press reports, General Motors refused to allow government auditors to see their books to ascertain whether labour's demands for wage increases were justified. Therefore I suggest that the government make a thorough investigation of the prices of farm machinery to determine scientifically whether a price increase is justified.

I am in agreement with decontrol but not the type of decontrol which, on the one hand, satisfies the demands of people like these big machine companies and at the same time stabilizes the prices of farm products. The whole subject must be investigated on a scientific basis.

I have listened with interest to the Minister of Agriculture, for whom I have a great regard. I think he knows his department perhaps as well as any minister in the government. I was much interested in hearing him refer the other night to the principle of the ever-normal granary and to stability of prices. We in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have constantly advocated over the past years the ever-normal granary, and unless the minister is just paying lip-service to this principle of the ever-normal granary—

Mr. GARDINER: I advocated it before there ever was any C.C.F. party.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I am glad to hear that. But the remarkable thing is that the minister is advocating the ever-normal granary now when we have no grain and are scraping the bottom of our bins. But you cannot do it in that way. If you are to have the ever-normal granary you must take the good years and the lean years too. I stated in the house last year that we should adopt such a policy in Canada.

A report has been handed in to the provincial government of Saskatchewan by a commission appointed under the former Liberal government in which it is stated that the chemurgic use of farm products in western Canada was not feasible in view of our lean and good years. It is true that we have lean and good years. If we have 500,000,000 or 600,000,000 bushels of wheat to-day, under our present system we call it a surplus, but I say that if we have 1,000,000 bushels properly stored throughout the prairie provinces it should be like money in the bank.

I am a farmer and I do not think I can be classified among those to whom the minister referred as knowing nothing about farming. I feel a responsibility in the matter of what should be done in this crisis which we are facing to win the peace. The minister said that he did not know how the farmers were going to pay income tax out of an income of $2,000, which was the average annual income of Canadian farmers in the best three years in our history. I might say to the minister that I cannot see how the farmers are going to pay 12½ per cent increase in the retail price of farm machinery. There is a nigger in the woodpile in this whole business of farm machinery. When I was home at the Easter recess the local dealers had a meeting in Regina and were told by one of the head men of the implement company that they were lucky to get any machinery at all because the company had overseas commitments which would take them many years to fill. There should be an investigation of this whole question of farm machinery, so that our farmers who during the past five or six years have built up a backlog of requirements during that period of controlled purchasing power on account of the war may be able to get a decent supply of farm machinery. If it is not forthcoming, the government should do something about the matter.

The Minister of Agriculture referred to some of the stories that are going around about people leaving the farm, many of whom are not going back. I am alarmed at the urbanization which is taking place in this country, and if there is anything we can do, and should do, it is to get our people back on the land. This trend of people leaving farms and going to the cities seems to me one of the most disastrous things facing Canada. People who live on the land have a sense of values perhaps lacking in people who do not know the feel of the good earth and have never known what it is to grow something. I am disturbed at the decrease in our rural population. The Canada Year Book says:

> Of the farm land already occupied in Canada, only 39-40 per cent of it is actually in use, and for the past several decades there has been a steady trend towards a smaller farm population. During the relatively prosperous decade of 1921 to 1931 a net total of some 350,000 people shifted from rural to urban areas. During the five-year period 1931-36 the prairie region actually lost population equivalent to 63 per cent of its natural increase, and during 1936-41 it lost all of its natural increase and 16,000 besides. In other words, the prairie provinces have been sending a surplus farm population elsewhere rather than absorbing population from other areas on the land. The rural areas of other provinces have had the same experience to a smaller degree.

There are reasons for that. I was in Fort William recently and spoke there, and in a visit around the city with the mayor of Fort William we went to that very fine building which was erected by the Canadian government to house the girls who were working in the Canada Car factory. The city of Fort William had taken possession of that building and were making it into two and three-room suites, because they had a housing problem. As we went through one portion of that building, which cost around $300,000, and I saw all the bathtubs piled up in a large room—there seemed to be dozens of them there—I remarked that I had seen more bathtubs in that one room than in all the Saskatchewan farms I had visited. That indicates one reason why our boys and girls do not want to go back to the farms. I should like to read to the committee, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will listen, in view of his intimation that groups like ours are going around and spreading propaganda which was frightening people away from the farms, a statement contained in one of the government's own publications introducing Canada to British war brides. The title is "Not luxurious—no, not quite." This is what it says:

> Though usually comfortable, a Canadian farm home is not luxurious. You have only one chance in five of having electric light in a farm home, which means you must use coal oil (paraffin) lamps. You have only eight chances in one hundred of finding any sort of plumbing in a farm home, outside facilities taking its place. Six farm homes out of ten have radio (wireless), three have telephones, and nearly half have motor cars. One-third of Canada's farm homes have none of these conveniences. A considerable number are in need of repairs.

As I said, this is from "Welcome to War Brides", an official publication of the government. So that it is not only members of our group who may be accused of spreading propaganda which will deter people from taking up farming.

I have travelled from here to the province of Saskatchewan a matter of seven times in the last few months, and in doing so I met with a number of veterans. To-day veterans are trying to make up their minds what they are going to do. I feel that I know something about farming, not everything; but at least I have learned the hard way and, as the minister has stated, there is no better life than life on a farm, provided that one can make ends meet and have a decent standard of living and not be loaded down with debt so that mortgage companies and farm implement companies are hounding you day in and day out. But when a veteran speaks to me about going on to a farm and asks me what I think about it, I am afraid that conscientiously I cannot tell him that he has an even break. We find to-day that land values have gone up, and not only so, but there have been increases in prices of farm machinery and gasoline. Right there we have two strikes against the veteran.

Again, in the last year, although the government recognizes the need of some sort of stability for agriculture, there was a ceiling put on wheat for export. It is true that a floor was put under it too, but we never applied a quota to the amount which might be delivered. So that I think we have yet to go a long way to convince the veterans that agriculture in Canada has anything like stability. If in two or three years we in this country return to peak production, and European countries likewise go back to full production, we may be again faced with the problem of having several hundred million bushels of wheat on our hands. Veterans ask me, if that situation should take place, what will happen; are we to return to low prices and perhaps be unable to handle our live stock? Because, Mr. Chairman, we have not as yet any long-term agreements which will ensure decent prices for live stock. When I think that this government has seen fit to give only $6,000 as a maximum for veterans starting on the land, and now has allowed a 12½ per cent increase on machinery, I do not see how, unless these veterans are first rendered unconscious or are forced by exceptional circumstances, they are likely to go back on the farms. Let me point out that to-day you cannot get a small tractor for less than $1,500, and if you go to one of these sales of second-hand implements you will probably pay $2,200 or $2,400 for an old one, as they did in Yorkton. A small combine costs $1,700, and a truck costs $1,200. So that there, for three major pieces of machinery, you have a total outlay of $4,700; yet the veteran is allowed only $1,200 for farm machinery and $4,800 for land. How in the world is he to rehabilitate himself? The fact is, of course, that the veterans are just not going back on the land.

However, in my constituency there are quite a number of boys who have tried to save some extra money during their period in the services, and this is what they have found. When they go to the board they are investigated and inspected to find out if they are physically fit and otherwise capable of going on a farm. Often they find that it takes months for them to get the first interview. Then the property on which they wish to go has to be inspected. I took this matter up with Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan, and I should like to pass this on to the minister and ask him what he can do about this matter. It is in regard to hastening the inspection of the lands of these veterans who want to settle on the land. One person who was in the forces for five years, and has a family of five, was delayed three months before getting an interview with the board. After he was passed he went back to try to have his land inspected; it was in the district where he wanted to farm; the owner was retiring and had this land for sale. The situation was—and it is a typical one—that unless he made a down payment he would probably lose the property. It might be said, well, he could get a farm some other place. But that is not a satisfactory solution, for this reason, that a good many people want to go to the districts in which they lived before; they have their hearts set on a certain piece of land; they want to operate a certain farm. In the particular case I mention the veteran made an initial payment of $480 to hold the land, but when he tried to get it inspected there was nothing he could do about it, as the board advised him, until the following year.

I wish to point out that after men have served for five or six years and have come home and want to start up, something should be done to hasten their rehabilitation. I have heard that under the present set-up, and at the speed with which applicants can be interviewed and the land inspected, it will take years before the veterans are properly established, and it is not satisfactory simply to tell these men that they had better get something temporary. I spoke to the premier of the province asking whether they would be prepared to cooperate with the federal government in expediting the inspection of the land, and Mr. Douglas assured me that he would be ready to use the agricultural representatives of Saskatchewan, of whom there is a considerable number, in this work. I would appeal to the minister to do something about this matter.

There is just one other recommendation I would make to the government. We need to plan scientifically if we are to win the peace. We have had enough of the emotional appeal in this house, and if we are to have in Canada an economy that will be best for all the people it will have to be worked out on a scientific basis.

In conclusion, I would say this. Holding the views I do, I realize quite well the interdependence of the farmer and the common people. Nevertheless I courteously and as strongly as I can urge the minister and his colleagues to set up negotiated prices so that the cost of living and the cost of production as well as all other costs shall bear a fair relationship and that we may thus have production for use rather than for profit as the mainspring of our Canadian economy.

May I in closing quote from the C.C.F. manifesto:

> The future prosperity of the Canadian people requires the fullest development of Canadian agriculture. In the past the Canadian farmer has not received a fair share of the national income. Agriculture, in the main, has accumulated huge deficits because farmers have received less than their cost of production. No modern industrial nation can afford poverty in any section of its people. The farmer is a consumer, as well as a producer. Farm people are entitled to the same standards of health, housing, nutrition and education as other sections of the Canadian people.

I believe the Minister of Agriculture himself, while in Saskatchewan, made a statement to the effect that at the time we went on to rationing of beef we had not shipped any beef out of Canada. That is an important statement, because in the first years of the war we started to put pay checks into the pockets of the workers so that we had a market for beef, butter, pork and cheese. While, therefore, we are concerned about foreign markets I suggest that we should see to it that there are no hungry children in this country and that everyone has all that he wants to eat and has a full stomach.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the discussion that has taken place I should put on the record the actual figures in regard to the number of returned men who have made applications for farms. The number of applications for qualification certificates on March 31, 1946 was 42,856; the number dealt with by the regional advisory committee was 31,763; the number issued with qualification certificates was 24,590. In relation to the remarks just made towards the end of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Assiniboia, this indicates that 42,856 have applied and only 31,763 have so far been dealt with, and of course that would suggest that about 11,000 could say that their cases have not been considered. As to how long those have been delayed I am not in a position to say.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Does the minister mean that their land has been inspected, or does this refer to the first interview?

Mr. GARDINER: This has reference to applications made for qualification certificates. The number dealt with is 31,763 and the number issued with certificates is 24,590, and those are completely qualified to go on farms. The number actually on farms is under 6,000.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): On what date?

Mr. GARDINER: March 31, 1946.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That means that 18,000 have qualified, but the arrangements for them to proceed with spring work have not yet been made and the likelihood of their getting on the land is small.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): That is the important point which I was trying to bring out.

[Mr. McCullough.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would point out to the committee that the discussion is once again getting back to veterans affairs.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): For the sake of the record I would point out that the exact figures for full-time farming as at March 31 were 5,132 according to the returns.

Mr. CASE: I believe I can say what I have to say in the limited time left before six o'clock. I sometimes wonder, when I listen to different speakers, if we are not tending towards too much control. I had a great friend in the late Hon. James Malcolm and I remember one thing he said to me. "The more you interfere with natural laws, the more difficult it will be for government." There is a great deal of truth in that. You do not know where you will end if you start regulating everything.

I wish to direct the committee's attention to something which in my opinion is of current concern and importance. I will read into the record some remarks that have appeared in the Owen Sound Daily Sun-Times, on Wednesday, May 8, signed by W. E. Dickin, operator of an abattoir in that city. In this article he is pleading with people for tolerance and understanding with regard to the price of beef, and some of his remarks are important:

> The whole situation is: Can beef be sold at twenty cents per pound ceiling price? My answer is definitely no. We are paying 12 to 12½ cents per pound for cattle that dress 51 pounds to the hundred. The hide and other saleable parts are worth about $10. So any school child can figure out the loss on every bullock. Of course, if you can use common cattle it might be different, but this district demands and largely gets red ribbon beef.

He discusses other prices that are being offered and then says:

> Bringing this to a close, what do we want or expect:
> 1. Keep the price of all live stock up and encourage the farmer. He needs it badly.
> 2. Compromise, Mr. Gordon and Mr. Gardiner, this once. We can all get together and say: This is our country. If mistakes have been made, let us learn by those mistakes. Again, I say, to one and all, compromise, and quickly.

I am trying to point out the immediate concern we should all have in this matter inasmuch as I believe that the farmers are facing a difficult task. When I listen to the speeches of hon. members and then contemplate the picture painted by the Minister of Agriculture I realize that if we are to encourage people to return to the land the picture will certainly have to be more colourful than the one we are given. We must face facts. In the county of Grey, which is largely an agricultural district, we produce large numbers of live stock. There has been—and I think this is a tragic fact—a shrinkage of two thousand in the rural population of that county since the last census. That means something. We must endeavour to make agriculture more attractive. In the same issue of the Sun-Times of Wednesday, May 8, the following appeared:

Keppel township council, meeting at Oxenden with all members present, instructed clerk Fred Carder to write or wire Donald Gordon demanding that the ceiling price of beef be raised or eliminated and that a copy of this demand be mailed to Hon. John Bracken, Garfield Case, M.P., and Findlay McDonald requesting their assistance.

There is something to justify the removal of the ceiling price from the products of the farm and ranch. You can fix the costs and other details of manufactured products but the farmer has to have some initiative to plant crops. In a moment I shall refer to one of the things that has defeated that objective.

There is another item to which I should like to refer, namely, the position taken by an abattoir with regard to the ceiling price on beef. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the Keppel township council with reference to the ceiling price on beef. It is taken from the same issue of the Sun-Times of Wednesday, May 8, and has to do with the local milk producers. What I am trying to do is to bring before the committee and to the attention of the administration a problem which is of current and immediate concern to agriculturists. This article is headed: "Local milk producers would halt deliveries if price not increased." The resolution is as follows:

Whereas we, the milk producers of Owen Sound district are experiencing increased production costs as never before through increased wages, et cetera and whereas the government has allowed increases to farm machinery manufacturers of 12½ per cent, and whereas daylight saving time in collection of milk has made production more difficult and whereas we know that production costs are higher than ever before while retail price of milk is much lower than at many times in history, be it therefore resolved that all milk producers in this province vigorously protest and demand recognition in the way of increased price and that in the event of increased prices not being forthcoming we recommend that we discontinue supplies until arrangements satisfactory to producers are provided.

I have dealt with two important factors in agricultural operations, namely, the live stock and dairy producers. I come now to a letter which I received from one of my constituents, Mr. Carefoot. I might say that Mr. Carefoot is a well known breeder of short-horn cattle and draught horses and has exhibited his stock in some of the best rings in Canada. This is his story which I wish to convey to the committe so that hon. members will appreciate all the problems to which I have sought to relate my remarks. He says:

We as farmers are certainly getting it rough in the matter of labour. I am nearly sixty years old, have hired men ever since I was sixteen, and this is the worst we ever had. You really cannot get help of any kind.

There are a few novelty farmers who make their money some other way and who can pay $80, $100 per month, get men, but their business from an agriculture standpoint is not paying.

The average farmer throughout the country who is paying for his farm, raising a family and buying equipment is the man we have got to pay attention to, for they are the real backbone of the country.

He goes on to say, and I think this is something that is really tragic when so many people of the world are crying for food:

I could name thirty men in this township who say if they cannot get labour at $50 per month, board and washing, they will simply just live on the farm and let the world go by.

As we know, the trend has been toward governmental paternalism, but it seems to me that it has led to a tendency to rob our people of the incentive to work, to rob them of their initiative.

This afternoon the minister spoke about two fine young Englishmen visiting Winnipeg. I cannot imagine our young men not visualizing the great challenge that this country offers; yet to-day we have young men who are capable of farming but will not do it. At the same time we have men like Mr. Carefoot offering to pay wages as high as $70 to $75 a month but unable to obtain labour. What is happening? About two weeks ago a group of young labour people, who were formerly the young communist group of Canada, interviewed various members of parliament. I had three young people who would be around twenty years of age interview me in my office in the parliament buildings. One young chap was from the farm. He is getting out-of-work pay. I said to him: "Why do you not go back to work on the farm?" He said: "The farm cannot pay me enough." I can say to these young people that while they might get 65 cents or $1 an hour in the cities or towns, the fellow on the farm has less opportunity to spend his money; he is in more healthful employment. I should like to see a great many of these young people return, because we shall live to realize some time that if we cannot make agriculture more attractive, induce our people to return to the land, to the good earth, as the hon. member for Assiniboia said, wages will not be as significant as they are at the present time. In other words, one might earn $1.25 an hour and still starve to death. I wish that labour, the farmers and others would realize that the basic economy of this nation depends upon the purchasing power of the dollar and not on the amount of money that is earned. I believe that agriculture still offers many attractions to young men to engage in that enterprise and feel secure in the days that are to come. I am glad that the Department of Veterans Affairs is making it as attractive as possible for veterans to engage in that type of work, since they are accustomed to the outdoor life.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARIE EVELYN DORMER

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton) moved the second reading of bill No. 37, for the relief of Marie Evelyn Dormer.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, last Friday an interesting debate occurred on this very bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), speaking on the principle of divorce bills in general, suggested the setting up of some sort of organization or special court to handle the divorce cases which came from the province of Quebec. In support of his proposition he put a few facts before the house, and I say that they are true. But I am afraid that some misapprehension prejudicial to the province of Quebec might result if certain other facts were not placed before the house.

The hon. member said, "There is no general divorce law in the province of Quebec." That is a well known fact. Then the hon. member continued, as reported at page 1190 of Hansard:

> It has developed since some time past that whenever adultery is committed in the province of Quebec and the outraged husband or the outraged wife wants to do anything about it, he or she comes to the parliament of Canada and asks the parliament of Canada to pass a special law, among all the other statutes with which it has to deal, giving her relief as it is called, in the event of a female spouse coming forward, from continued association with her adulterous husband.

That statement was also true, but it might be misunderstood or misinterpreted.

It is not a fact that the civil code of the province of Quebec does not provide relief in the case of adultery. On the contrary, the law of Quebec provides for the separation of the consorts; it provides for the settlement of their property; it provides for the custody of the children; it provides for the payment of alimony. It even provides for an ever-possible reconciliation. As a matter of fact, the Quebec legislation has almost the same immediate effect as a divorce bill, the chief difference being, as everybody knows, that neither of the parties legally separated can marry again during the lifetime of his or her consort. That kind of relief the Quebec legislation does not provide.

The immense majority of the population of Quebec on account of its religious belief does not give special consideration to such relief—just sympathy, I should say. The hon. member is very much concerned with his own personal situation as a member of parliament when he says:

> It seems to me, sir, that it is not a proper part of the duties of the parliament of this nation to be continually considering, in the midst of its important business, these trivialities.

He is right again. But in 1867, by the British North America Act, divorce was attributed to the federal jurisdiction because some people believed in it. They insisted on it, and it was so attributed against the opposition of Quebec. It is an historical fact that Quebec refused categorically to accept it, although it was pertaining to civil rights.

The hon. member now finds that he has an ever-growing and almost impossible problem to settle. I really sympathize with him; and all the Quebec members are in the same predicament of dealing with these trivialities.

Respecting his project of the setting up of some extra-territorial organization to deal with divorce, I have no comment to make, except that it will probably come into conflict with every rule of domicile and court jurisdiction extant.

I humbly submit to his consideration that he find himself a practical solution. I would agree with his suggestion that—> . . . we make some sort of declaration that this sort of petition will not hereafter be entertained, and that petitions of this sort cannot be received by this parliament with any chance of being acted upon.

I would agree with that if it would be of any utility. Personally, I almost feel like washing my hands of the whole business. There is a moral to be drawn from the speech of the hon. member, and it is this: Sometimes, just once in a while, somebody should listen to someone from Quebec.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, in spite of what the hon. member has said, seeking to justify the position of the people of Quebec, the situation continues to stand in this house as it has done for many years. I support the suggestion made the other evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) when he sought to suggest some method of relieving this house of parliament of the onerous duty of dealing with divorce. I am satisfied that if proper attention and thought were given the matter by the lawmakers of this land, some equitable disposition of the problem could be found. I do not for one moment believe that it is impossible for the House of Commons to arrive at some position which would be satisfactory to all parties.

I for one object again in this session, as I objected in the last, to the time of parliament being wasted by having to handle such business as this. However, I have noticed that several times in the debate the suggestion has been made that these are trivialities. I take strong objection to the use of that word in this connection. I would say they are tragedies of human life; they are not trivialities by any means. I believe that they are real tragedies, but that they should be settled somewhere outside the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 48, for the relief of Margaret Ruth Weir Allan—Mr. Boucher.

JULIANA EDMONDA ISABELLA FERDINANDA BECQUAERT DE BEAUJEU

Mr. MacLEAN moved the second reading of bill No. 18, for the relief of Juliana Edmonda Isabella Ferdinanda Becquaert de Beaujeu.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I could have spoken on bill No. 37 instead of waiting until this bill was called, but I only wish to amplify what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) has said. This is the same old story. We make an appeal year after year that these bills be handled in some other way. If we were conscientious in passing these bills every hon. member would have to read all the evidence submitted in each case. The only basis of consideration is what has happened and how we can pass a bill if we do not know what it is all about.

We all have stacks of evidence which some of us like to read and which others do not, it being a matter of one's choice. This subject comes up every year and it will have to be brought to a head some time. I am quite certain that this parliament could bring it to a head. More and more of these bills are coming before us each year, and I would not be surprised if before the session ends we have to deal with four or five hundred or perhaps more.

If the members of this house exercised their parliamentary right they could ask that each bill be taken up section by section, for that is the way to pass a bill, and forty or fifty members could speak on each bill. I am not suggesting that such a filibuster take place, but I am quite certain that if it did parliament would have to sit here for many weeks or perhaps many months discussing these bills and then the government would begin to move.

Another way that this matter could be handled would be to take a recorded vote on every one of these bills. Sooner or later the applicants would find that they were paying out a lot of money for nothing. If this parliament would take the bull by the horns, as the fellow said, then these people would say, "What is the use; we pay our money but the bill is either defeated or it dies on the order paper." I am not throwing out any challenge, nor am I going to organize anything along that line, but sooner or later some of us will become a little tired and something like that will be organized.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) have said. To pass these bills without full consideration of the evidence is against my conscience and judgment, so that I am in full support of the two hon. members.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am not in support of what those hon. gentlemen have said. It is quite easy to say that we should not pass this or should not pass that without making some concrete suggestion as to how to cure the evil. It is quite easy to criticize. As I think I mentioned last year, the history is that we have a place called another place. There has been much criticism of some of the individuals who are there, but I have attended various sessions of that committee and I know that its members go into all these matters very carefully.

Mr. REID: I believe as carefully as a court.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Just as carefully as any court, and I have been in many of them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why do they not go to the courts?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think the hon. member knows the answer to that better than I do. The fact is that we are afraid to give the real reason, so we shall just let it go at that. My hon. friend says that he does not want to assent to something without knowing all about it, but all of us in our business and social life accept the word of bodies which have been appointed to do certain jobs. I am not ashamed to accept the judgment of the senate committee, knowing as I do how carefully they go into these matters.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have just one word to say. I find myself in thorough agreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I am also in agreement with the general sentiment of the house that the present procedure as far as divorce bills are concerned is unsatisfactory. Last year we had a committee under Mr. Speaker studying the rules and procedure of the house. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will recall that committee. In its report the committee recommended that certain action should be taken with reference to the procedure in connection with divorce bills, but unfortunately that report did not find favour with the house and it was never adopted. I would suggest that it might be advantageous for the committee now sitting under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker to reconsider the whole question of divorce proceedings and make a recommendation which would have the attention of the government of Canada.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, for the last sixteen years I have listened to discussions of this kind at nearly every session of parliament. It is not a new problem. Divorce comes under federal jurisdiction; but because one or another of the provinces wanted to set up divorce courts of their own, it was done and at the present time there are divorce courts in eight of the provinces. Quebec is the only province with no such court. Hon. members know why that is so. In principle we are against it. Last year when I spoke on this question, the moment I stepped out of the house one of my friends stopped me and said, "You should not have gone that far. Do not try to impose on Quebec something that they do not wish or do not like or do not believe in because there is a minority in Quebec that will want to have divorces as the years go on." I reminded him that when Ontario proposed to establish a divorce court the Catholics protested, but the law was passed.

I am broad-minded on these matters, but in principle I am against divorce and I am going to do my utmost to try to make the getting of divorces as difficult as possible. A complaint has been made in the other place that there are too many petitions for divorce this year, but if you consider the number of cases coming before the other place and this house you will find that it is only about one-fifth of the cases being brought up in this good province of Ontario. I clipped the following report from one of the Ottawa papers on May 8, knowing that this discussion would come up. This is what it says:

> Ontario divorce figures believed to be record
> Provincial authorities said to-day that Ontario had so many divorces in 1945 that they are rechecking the figures to make sure they are correct. Tentative figures show an all-time high of 1,939 compared with 1,510 in 1944 and 960 in 1940.

I have the utmost respect for those who believe in divorce. I do not believe in it myself. If we believe that the future of our country is based on the family, divorce is not the way to bring about the conditions we desire.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You do not keep families together by refusing divorce.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is a matter of opinion, and I respect the hon. member's. What gets under my skin is this. Every session some hon. member says that this procedure is not the right one. But if hon. members would go into the divorce courts in the provinces they would see that the evidence is taken in just the same way as it is in the other place, and I believe that in the other place we have men who are as experienced as any judges in hearing these cases and deciding on the evidence. The evidence is prepared and presented in the same way. If some cases are not prepared well, let me say that I can recall cases right in this capital city in connection with which a man was sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary for fixing up the evidence given before the court to obtain a divorce. We may find the same thing here. But it is tiresome to hear hon. members year after year saying that there is one way out of it, namely to give the provinces jurisdiction in divorce.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Then what would take place in my province? There would be no divorce at all.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They will move out.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is as they wish. I am not in favour of giving jurisdiction to the province because there is a minority in the province of Quebec who do believe in divorce. If we give jurisdiction in divorce to the provinces, the provinces that believe in divorce can have their divorce courts; but in the province of Quebec, where they do not believe in divorce, they would have no divorce court and there would be no divorce at all. I do not think we should impose that on the minority in the province of Quebec.

The other suggestion was to have a court in Ottawa, perhaps the exchequer court, with special jurisdiction in divorce cases. There may be something to be said in favour of that, but so long as parliament has jurisdiction in divorce under the British North America Act, why stand up year after year and say that we should not be granting divorce in this way? The province of Quebec is a part of this country. There are over 3,000,000 people in that province. We want harmony; we want unity; we want respect for other people's opinions; but we also request from this parliament respect for what we believe. I think we are right. Many people think we are wrong. But, after all, we are not asking for more than a few hours of the time of parliament where for sixteen years I have listened to nonsense being talked hour after hour. I think this system should remain. I am convinced that it still is the best system. There may be 300 divorce cases from our province. But if you believe in broken homes and in children being separated from their parents—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nobody believes in that.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am just telling you—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are wrong.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Perhaps I am wrong, but I like to say exactly what we believe in in the province of Quebec. For the last sixteen years I have listened to the same arguments and the same discussion on divorce in this parliament, and now it is narrowed down to the province of Quebec. Always there are the same arguments and the same replies, and what I am saying to-night has been said in this house year after year. The arguments and replies will not change as time goes on. Every new parliament brings in new members who start the same discussion all over again. Why not let us proceed to take an hour once in a while to settle these cases? Your conscience may rest at ease. I have followed these divorce cases for my own satisfaction to see if there was anything in the criticism made against the way in which the inquiry was held in the other place. I have been present at the committee in the other place, and the procedure there is just the same as in the courts. The only argument that might be made here is that we spend too little time in giving our decision on the evidence presented. If you do not wish to read the evidence, you are just taking the recommendation from the other place, and it is not a bad thing at times to base our judgment on what they decide.

I hope I have not said anything that displeases those who do believe in divorce, but I am simply telling the house what I have heard in my own province since I was a boy. I think we should bear with the present system for a while yet.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to agree, like the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), with the position taken by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and also with the members on my left.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) said that he has listened to an awful lot of nonsense spoken in this house.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The hon. member has said the same thing himself many times.

Mr. MacINNIS: If what the minister has said to-night is not nonsense, I am afraid that it is very contradictory. We do not say that we believe in divorce any more than we say that we believe in theft or any other kind of misdemeanour that may bring persons into our courts. But we do recognize the necessity for divorce. Among Roman Catholics I understand that marriage is a sacrament which cannot be dissolved, but the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Belzile) has told us that the procedure for annulments in Quebec is practically the same as divorce in every way except that the parties cannot remarry.

What I rose to say, however, is this. If divorce is within the jurisdiction of this parliament—and that must be true because we have exercised jurisdiction for many years—it cannot be beyond the power of parliament to find a way of providing divorce courts for the people of Canada, no matter where they live. Every civilized country so far as I know has divorce laws. They have ways by which persons, when they find they cannot live together, can separate. That does not contribute to immorality; it diminishes immorality, and I think that is how we should look at the matter. A broken home does not take place with the divorce; the home was broken before the divorce became necessary.

I suggest that we try to find a way of dealing with this important question, and I say again that this parliament having jurisdiction in the matter can create some other way than by this parliament passing divorce bills.

I was really shocked a week ago to-night to note the flippant way in which this vital human problem was dealt with in this house. It certainly did not do parliament any credit, the way we discussed this subject last week.

Mr. REID: It was even more than flippant.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was more than flippant.

Mr. REID: It was vulgar.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope the same thing will never take place in this chamber again.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): I am one who in this house usually speaks only when he is spoken to, and I have endeavoured to adopt that as a policy since I came here as a new member last summer. I rise to agree in some respects with the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I do so by reason of the fact that I have arrived at that conclusion by another route.

If we look into the history of divorce we shall find that the province of New Brunswick had machinery for divorce from as far back as 1791; in the province of Nova Scotia they also had it, although not quite as far back as that, but they had it prior to confederation. It will be remembered that at the time the fathers of confederation met in Quebec and the Quebec resolutions were adopted, it was agreed by the parties that marriage and divorce should come within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament; and again when the London resolutions were framed it was agreed that marriage and divorce should come within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. As a result, the British North America Act was enacted, and since that date marriage and divorce has been under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. We quite realize that in Canada we have different races, different religions, and different nationalities. The church to which the Minister of Public Works belongs happens to be the Roman Catholic church, and for them marriage is one of the seven sacraments. The church to which I belong happens to be the Anglican church, or Church of England, and although marriage is not regarded as a sacrament, divorced couples are not allowed to be remarried by the Church of England in Canada.

It may seem strange that a bachelor should rush in and make some comments on the question of divorce. But my reason for speaking this evening is to say that I have followed these discussions both before I was in the House of Commons and since, and so far as I can see at the present time there is no way that you can get around the present system. I am sure there is no desire on the part of anyone to impose upon the province of Quebec a court which the majority of the people in that province do not want. At the same time it should be remembered that from the days of confederation in 1867 marriage and divorce have been within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and if you will look in your statutes for the year 1868 you will find that the first divorce case came before the Senate and the House of Commons at that time; it was reserved for the Queen's pleasure; it was sent to England; and finally the act divorcing the couple, who were from the city of Montreal, was affirmed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. BRIDGES: Certainly.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That was thought to be true, was it not, down to the case of Beck versus Beck, which went to the privy council and in which it was decided that divorce was within the jurisdiction of the provinces? The minister will remember that the case came from Alberta; it is one of the things we are proud of!

Mr. BRIDGES: I think it came later. But what I wish to point out at this time is that the very first case which came before the Senate and the House of Commons, in 1868, came from the province of Quebec. So we see that since confederation there have been certain persons in that province who desire the right of divorce. Here is the situation: the majority there are definitely opposed to it; the minority, on the other hand, have had that right ever since 1867, and the first case was heard in 1868. From that date on I believe you will find if you check the figures that there was one case each year; then the number gradually increased to ten; and now you all know that the figure this year is 330 or thereabouts.

At the present time we have that situation. We have this committee of the senate dealing with these divorce bills. I have had some experience in divorce courts and, looking over the proceedings as I have seen them carried on here, I feel that the work done by that senate committee is just as careful as it is done in many of our courts.

One of the speakers last week remarked that in many cases there was collusion. That is quite possible, and I do not say that it is not so, but it is also quite possible that there is collusion in many cases which come before the courts of the various provinces.

Therefore as I say, the situation is that the majority of people in the province of Quebec do not wish divorce; a minority in that province have had the right ever since 1867 to come to this parliament for divorces. I am sure there is no desire on the part of anyone in this house to do away with the rights of that minority group, and I can only say that the situation as far as I can see must remain as it is at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister says there are no divorces in the province of Quebec. But there have been a number of annulments. What is the difference between annulment and divorce?

Mr. BRIDGES: I would suggest that the hon. member consult a lawyer from the province of Quebec.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They want to come here and not to the lawyers.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I have several times taken part in discussions of divorce procedure in this house, and I had no intention of taking part in the discussion to-night, but the trend of the debate has more or less compelled me to rise and say that I want to support those who believe that we should find a method different from the one which is now adopted for the consideration of divorces. I think that this is a matter for a court rather than a parliament of this description or the hon. gentlemen who occupy the other place. I think that a judicial body can look into the applications more carefully than they can be looked into at least by this house; and, after all, you and I as members of this house have to take the responsibility for the dissolution of these marriages. That, I suggest, is one of the gravest responsibilities which we have to assume, and one which we ought not to assume unless we know upon what grounds the petitioners request divorce and warrant us to grant the divorce. I doubt very much if there is more than a very small minority in this house who read the proceedings upon which the applications are based and upon which we have to vote.

Like the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) who just preceded me, I happen to be a member of the Anglican communion. While it is true that the church to which we belong does not believe in divorce, in the last few years there has been a liberalizing of the views regarding divorce until to-day in Great Britain the Anglican church will remarry the innocent party in a divorce case.

Mr. BRIDGES: Not in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: That, I think, is something which might be remembered in this house. But what I was going to say is this, that with the large number of unhappy marriages, my personal view is that it is the greater crime to keep two people tied together living in what has often been described as a hell, than it is to dissolve that marriage. I think it is worse for the children who are brought up in such a home than it is to allow those children to be looked after by, we will say, the innocent party, upon direction of a judge in a proper court of law where all the evidence has been submitted and reviewed. I think, too, that to keep a man or woman tied indefinitely to a chronic alcoholic is to make life a hell, and that cannot lead to a higher morality in any country. I believe that where there is venereal disease on one side it is again a hell to keep the innocent party tied in such circumstances.

To-day we are at the conclusion of a great war, and I remember what a padre told some of us—I believe the Minister of Public Works was one of the party—who rode with us from Glasgow to Edinburgh, of the condition which he found in 1941 among a percentage, small it is true but still a percentage, of the men overseas. He told us on that occasion that when the war ended we would be faced with a problem. Well, this parliament is faced with a problem and we are not doing anything in particular to cope with it.

Those of us who know something about the conditions to which some of the men who served overseas have returned realize that this parliament is faced with a problem. It is true my hon. friends in the province of Quebec who belong to the Roman Catholic church believe that under no circumstances should divorce be permitted, and I agree that so long as they are members of their church they should abide by its discipline. I am not complaining of their view because of their religion. I am suggesting to them, however, that there is in the province of Quebec a minority which does not accept that doctrine, and I believe that the rights of minorities should in all respects be recognized and protected, just as we wish to protect the legitimate rights of our Roman Catholic compatriots in the province of Quebec and elsewhere.

I suggest to my hon. friends also that the minority in that province have a right to have their views considered. No one is compelled to sue for divorce, but where individuals believe that divorce is warranted and it does not conflict with their consciences, surely that minority has a right to the exercise of a conscientious conviction in respect of the relief to which it believes it is entitled.

If the province of Quebec does not—and I do not think it will—establish a court of itself, as the other provinces have done, to which these cases may be referred, then I suggest, since we were asked a few minutes ago what the solution is to be, that there should be a federal court to which applications could be made, to which a minority could go if the majority in that province does not believe that its conscientious objections would permit it to establish a provincial divorce court.

I wish to plead with my hon. friends from the province of Quebec to look at the matter in the light in which I am trying to view it, not as a believer in divorce but as one who believes that a suffering minority in any province should have the right to divorce if it feels the need of it and if divorce does not violate its own convictions.

I suggest, therefore, that what should be considered is the establishment of a court or the naming of a court already established. I do not know whether that is possible. I have heard it suggested from time to time that once of the courts, such as the exchequer court, might be given jurisdiction in these matters. I do not know what court it should be; but if we have not a court that could give speedy and proper consideration to these matters, then I think it is incumbent upon parliament to see to it that people who are tied together to-day in what is sometimes a living hell are given a proper opportunity for relief from the position in which they find themselves.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS IN CONNECTION WITH SALE OF WHEAT

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fair for the second reading of bill No. 5 to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): We have had considerable discussion on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and I do not think he has left any doubt in our minds as to his object in its introduction. But I am sure, speaking as a layman and from legal opinion that I have personally sought, that the bill goes much farther than the hon. gentleman intends.

I do not believe that the bill in this form should pass. Although there has been considerable discussion of it, I submit that before we allow it to pass certain aspects of the situation should be discussed at length. I am ready, Mr. Speaker, to make a statement on the bill pointing out where in my opinion it will destroy necessary marketing agencies of the Canadian wheat board in western Canada, and I am quite satisfied that the hon. member for Battle River would be equally opposed to that happening.

I cannot possibly say before nine o'clock what I should like to say on this bill. If I did begin it would be merely a matter of my partly finishing what I have to say and the hour for private and public bills would have expired. However, I am prepared to offer a suggestion. I have not heard anything like this said before, but it seems reasonable to me, and I am not speaking as a lawyer. I would suggest having this bill referred for further consideration to the committee on agriculture if that were acceptable to the other parties in the house and to members on this side, and to that end I would be quite prepared to curtail discussion here and before that committee make the speech which I wish to give in the house. I know that I cannot take a poll of everyone in the house to see whether or not—

Mr. BRACKEN: I would suggest that the minister make his speech here and we will decide whether to send it to the agriculture committee or not.

Mr. MacKINNON: I thought I made it clear to the leader of the opposition that I have only seven or eight minutes to make a speech that will take me fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I would be agreeable to giving another day to it.

Mr. MacKINNON: May we call it nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the leader of the government when we shall return to this subject?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Next Tuesday evening.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not want to be responsible for allowing this subject to be talked out.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FAIR: I am sorry, but I shall not be able to be here Tuesday evening. I do not want this matter to be taken up until I have an opportunity of expressing my views.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We shall accommodate you.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $163,190.

Mr. CHARLTON: I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat at the moment. It was encouraging this afternoon to listen to the minister's remarks regarding agriculture. However, I find it difficult to understand the position taken by other members of the government with respect to that department. During the past six years farmers across Canada have made a magnificent contribution to the war effort. The war is now over. Demands are being continuously made by various groups for price increases, and those increases are being granted with the result that production costs of farmers have increased considerably; yet with two exceptions no change has been made by the government to help the farmer. The exceptions are butter and hog prices. These are the only two exceptions in the face of these terrifically rising costs. It would appear that this government has forgotten the promises it made prior to the last election when we as farmers were led to believe we were rather important people.

I hold in my hand some interesting figures which were taken from the estimates for 1946-47 and 1938-39. They reveal the probable trend of thought on the part of the government in relation to agriculture. As I say, these figures are taken from the estimates. They show the amount of estimate for each department, the increase in each department, the percentage of increase, then the amount of the estimate in that particular department in 1938-39, prior to the war, with the exception of eight departments, which I shall name. By the way, with the permission of the committee I should like to place this table on Hansard.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON: The table is as follows:

Fisheries	4,079,660 00	229,360 00		1,957,840 00

The only departments that show a smaller percentage of increase than the Department of Agriculture are the auditor general's department, the labour department—I might say in regard to labour that in 1938-39 the estimates were $863,331; this year they are $23,015,044; because of that terrific increase betwen 1938-39 and 1946 one would not expect a large increase in this particular year—the Department of National Defence, the Post Office Department, public printing and stationery, insurance and the governor-general and lieutenant governors.

With these exceptions the increase in the Department of Agriculture is less than any other department of government.

Most people across Canada realize the importance of agriculture, and most people expected an increase in the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture. But if we are ever to come to the point where we shall have balanced budgets in this dominion we must save somewhere. With the terrific increases in other branches of government to as high as 44·8 per cent in some cases, while in agriculture the increase is only 11·4 per cent, it does not seem that agriculture is getting its fair proportion when one considers its importance. Agriculture has always taken a back seat, and it appears from these figures that it will continue to do so. I wish the minister success in convincing other members of the government of the importance of agriculture to this country.

Most hon. members will have some idea of the present butter situation because of having had to do without it for some time in the House of Commons restaurant. The reason for the scarcity is quite obvious to me if not to other members. The price of milk for butter and cheese production in the United States is practically double that which is paid here. The United States buyers, therefore, can well afford to pay the high prices they are paying for dairy cattle. This price range is so high that it is almost impossible for a man to refuse it. Just last week a United States buyer paid as high as $185 for a grade first-calf heifer. Is it any wonder then that the number of dairy cattle exported to the United States up to May 2 of this year was 16,332, while the total in 1945 was only 11,452? If this government would allow a reasonable increase in the price of dairy products, thereby enabling the farmer to make a reasonable profit for the extra work involved in dairying, the sales of these cattle to the United States would shortly show an appreciable decrease.

Yesterday the minister mentioned an increase in milk production. Yes, there has been an increase in milk production, but not anywhere near the proportion that the consumption of whole milk has risen. I could name a number of instances in my own riding where large producers were forced out of milk production because of lack of labour. Then, again, I could cite dozens of cases where men who previously had sent milk to concentrated milk plants, powdered milk plants, and cream to creameries have now, with this huge increase in the consumption of whole milk, the opportunity for which they have been waiting for years, that of getting into the whole milk trade. That is happening all across Canada. It is not only happening in my own riding. It is a general condition, and I contend that that is the reason for the decrease in the production of butter, which is obvious from the figures the minister showed us yesterday with respect to Ontario, particularly. In 1939 the production of butter in Ontario was 88 million pounds. That was the high year. In 1945 it was reduced to 77 million, a difference of 11 million pounds.

We all realize that Ontario is the most highly industrialized province in the dominion, and we would expect the consumption of whole milk to go up there more than it has in other provinces. I might say that that increase has been quite a bit better than 50 per cent in Ontario. So that we would naturally expect that that milk had to be stolen from some other branch of the industry. The fact that creamery patrons have taken much less for milk separated and going to creameries is an obvious indication of where it would be lost. I contend it is impossible to control prices and stop inflation during an obvious scarcity. There are always people who want the article badly enough that they will gladly go out and pay black-market prices. They will continue to do so, so long as any product is in short supply, notwithstanding the fact that many officials of the department at Ottawa claim that there is very little black-marketing in Canada.

Take beef cattle, for instance. Reported marketings thus far this year are 52,839 head short of the same period in 1945. The minister would not suggest that beef cattle production has gone down that much. Where are those cattle? The very fact that retail butchers are paying higher than ceiling prices for beef carcasses, and still making a reasonable profit—or they would not be doing it—leads one to the belief, as was stated by the minister at page 1246 of Hansard that "by having the price levels determined by competition" is the proper method of correcting the situation. Another method is by removing restrictions on butchers killing their own beef and pork, commonly known as the quota system, and thereby releasing the strangle-hold which the large packers have on the industry.

Under present price controls I understand the retail butchers get a little better than $40 spread on a 600-pound carcass of beef. I leave it to the judgment of hon. members to say whether that is a fair spread or not. I contend that the price to the retailer could go up two cents, without increasing it to the consumer.

It would appear that most of the terrific spread between producer and consumer prices is caused by the consumer demand for service. I maintain that it is very unfair for all consumers across this country to have to pay for the service that a few expect. If certain consumers demand these extra services, why should they not pay for it themselves, without making a blanket charge to all?

This brings to my mind two striking examples. Two years ago I happened to be in a hardware store in the city of Brantford talking to the manager, when a lady telephoned in for an eleven-cent pane of glass. The manager later told me that she lived almost two miles from the store, but she wanted it delivered immediately. I think all hon. members will realize that the cost of delivery would be two or three times the cost of the glass.

Something similar occurred when I was visiting at an apartment house in Toronto. About ten-thirty or eleven o'clock at night the people I was visiting wanted to buy a brick of icecream. They telephoned the drug-store, and that 25-cent article was delivered—I do not know how far. But somebody has to pay those delivery costs. It is not always the consumer who pays it; most often it slaps right back in the face of the producer.

We had an instance recently of what we may expect when subsidies are removed. I have in mind specifically the canning crops. Subsidies have been removed on these crops, and price increases allowed the canning industry in lieu of payment of subsidies. The price increases allowed the canning industry were as follows:

	Per dozen cans cents
Peas, 20-ounce can (all grades)	11
Corn, 20-ounce can (all grades)	15
Corn, 14-ounce (vacuum-packed, whole kernel)	15
Tomatoes, 28 ounces (all grades)	32
Tomato juice, 20 ounces (all grades)	9½

True, as I said before, the canners are supposed to pay the same price to the producer as was paid last year, including the subsidy. But are they compelled to? I do not believe they are. That is left to the discretion of the farmer, as to what he can get for his product. In any event the farmer is not getting any more than he did last year. The consumer, however, will be asked to pay at least two cents per can and probably up to five cents or even six cents per can increase on some products.

If this is any indication of what the farmers can expect, when these subsidies are taken off other products, then one can hardly blame the dairy farmers for accepting the high prices which they are receiving for dairy cattle to-day. Unless some drastic action is taken very shortly, it is probable that production will drop to a point which will seriously reduce our exports to the United Kingdom.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to answer a few of the questions raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I was not at all surprised by the line of argument presented in the earlier part of his speech, in view of the fact that my hon. friend has not always advocated the policies he is now advocating.

The situation which has existed in connection with agriculture estimates is one which is very well understood by most hon. members. The suggestion was made that the present government, and more particularly the present minister, is to be criticized for not obtaining a larger proportion of the treasury funds for expenditure upon agriculture. I should like to refer the hon. member to the records of the past. During the period the Liberal government was in office between 1921 and 1929-30 there was a constant increase in expenditures upon agriculture until the provisions made in the last year the Liberals were in office were for the highest expenditures upon agriculture that we had had up to that particular time.

In 1932-33 the estimates for agriculture were reduced from a previous $11,000,000, to which amount they had been built up under a Liberal government, to $8,660,000. The next year they were reduced to $8,203,000, and the next year they were reduced to $7,395,000. I took over the department in 1935-36, and by 1936-37 the estimates had been increased to $15,553,000, or double what they had been in the last complete year that the preceding government had been in office.

I was invited to Toronto during the third year that I had had the privilege of administering the affairs of this department and I was met with a full page in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I have just forgotten the heading that they used to run at the top of that page, but at the bottom was a coupon which could be cut off and sent to the government at their suggestion without any expense to the treasury because it was considered to be government business. We were getting those on our desks in the House of Commons at the expense of the Post Office Department. The protest they made on that occasion was that I had provided for the enormous expenditure of $20,000,000 on agriculture. That criticism was carried on by the opposing party of that time right down to the day that war opened. This year the comparable expenditure with 1936-37 is over $17,000,000.

Mr. CHARLTON: Why was there the terrific drop from 1936, when I believe it was $15,000,000 to $9,160,000 in 1938-39?

Mr. GARDINER: This afternoon I explained why there had been some decrease in expenditures during the war period. I can tell my hon. friend that no other government in the history of the dominion has expended anything approaching one-tenth of the money that has been spent by this government in recent years in order to maintain agriculture in the position in which it is at the present time among the industries of this country. As a matter of fact, at the height of mutual aid, in order to increase the returns to the farmers we were paying $520,000,000 in connection with purchases in Canada. If we were to take the amounts paid in connection with the subsidies my hon. friend has been speaking about we would find that they run into hundreds of millions.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is the minister suggesting that these subsidies which are paid directly to the farmers are for the benefit of the farmers alone?

Mr. GARDINER: Producers' subsidies are paid directly to the farmers, or they are paid through the creameries and other distributors.

Mr. CHARLTON: They are paid directly to the farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: They are paid directly to the farmer to increase the return he would receive for the food which he produces.

Mr. CHARLTON: The reason was to keep down the cost of living.

Mr. GARDINER: It might be partly to keep down the cost of living, but it was largely to give the farmer a higher return than he would have obtained for his surplus products from any country in the world.

Mr. CHARLTON: Without increasing the cost of living.

Mr. GARDINER: Subsidies do not keep down the cost of living because they require the people to pay higher taxes. When you pay higher taxes your cost of living goes up. Subsidies did not keep down the cost of living of people generally. The purpose of the subsidies was to provide the farmer with more money for the food that went to Britain than Britain could afford to pay.

Mr. CHARLTON: And to keep up production.

Mr. GARDINER: Naturally it kept up production. But if we had employed the same number of farmers on our farms, if we had had the kind of weather that we did have, we would have had the same production. If subsidies had not been available the farmers would have had to take a lower return. I do not think hon. friends opposite should be criticizing this policy because one of the last acts of the Conservative government before they went out of office in 1935 was to pay a subsidy on cheese of, I believe, a cent and a quarter a pound. In principle that was exactly the same thing that this government has done, although this government has gone farther in that direction than any other government we have ever had. The result is that expenditures made upon agriculture are much higher than anything that has been made in the past. It has just been pointed out to me that the hon. member asked why the figure had dropped to $8,900,000 in 1942-43.

Mr. CHARLTON: No, to $9,160,000 in 1938-39. That was prior to the war.

Mr. GARDINER: I think my hon. friend has obtained a figure which is not comparable with those given. The total expenditure in the following year was $11,816,000.

Mr. CHARLTON: I took my figure from the estimates of 1938-39 and I do not think I made a mistake in copying them.

Mr. GARDINER: Then something has been left out, either the supplementary estimates or the statutory expenditures. I can get the year's figures. In any event I question if there was a drop of that kind in that year, but there was a drop in 1942-43 to the figure which I gave.

The point I rose to make was that this government has expended more money on agriculture than any other government that has ever been in power in Canada. During the periods that a Liberal government has been in power the agriculture estimates have gone up year by year, but each time we have had a Conservative government in power in recent times these expenditures have gone down year by year.

Mr. FERGUSON: With better results.

Mr. GARDINER: The results are better because the people elected a Liberal government.

Mr. CHARLTON: The only time that any other government has been in power in this country in the last twenty years was from 1930 to 1935, when we were experiencing the worst depression the world had ever known. The minister would not expect expenditures to be increased during that period.

Mr. GARDINER: I would have thought that when agriculture was suffering its worst depression was the very time for the government to spend more money on agriculture.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, first of all, may I say that I have found the discussions that we have had on agriculture on several occasions here very interesting. I wish to commend the minister for the amount of money which has been spent in subsidies which have kept up prices to producers in agriculture and enabled farm income to be held at a much more satisfactory level than it would have been possible to hold it without subsidies. I have heard several members in different parts of the house during this session say that the principle of subsidy was unsound. I do not believe that. I believe that the government is on the right track, and before we are finished I believe that we shall find far more money being spent on subsidies, that we shall be employing the principle of subsidy in a far greater degree than perhaps the members of the house could now contemplate with calmness.

The only thing that the members in this group would criticize with regard to subsidies is the way in which the government would propose to get the money with which to give the subsidies. This group would maintain that the standard of living of the people of Canada throughout Canada, agricultural, industrial and all other workers, ought to depend upon the capacity of this country to produce and deliver goods and services, and upon nothing else. Money should be the handmaid of production. Production should not be the slave or servant of money.

Such having been said in a general way, I wish to point out to the minister three things which have occurred in 1946 affecting his department, which I believe are not in the best interests of agriculture and not in the best interests of this country. These matters have all been mentioned before; I wish to express my opinion on them now. I do not wish to accuse the minister of being to blame for them.

The three things I have in mind are, first, the 12½ per cent increase in the price of agricultural machinery; second, the increase in the price of gasoline, and third, the unsatisfactory manipulation of beef prices during the last several weeks. The minister and I have had discussions at various times in the past regarding the beef policy. I am not quite sure whether the minister was the author or the victim of that policy, but I have a strong suspicion that he was the victim, just as the beef producers were. Those three things are, I think, altogether undesirable for Canadian agriculture and will have repercussions that members of the house will, I believe, be sorry to learn of in the days to come. They should be offset.

How inadvisable was the increase in the price of agricultural implements to the farmer we may judge by contemplating the following list of average retail prices and index numbers on an eight-foot grain binder in the Regina area between 1913 and 1945. A number of hon. members have placed on the record lists of these prices, but this list contains additional material of real interest to the members and something that has not yet been put before the committee. The list was prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics, prices branch, and was sent to me by Mr. H. T. Greenway, chief of the prices branch, in a letter dated May 8, 1946. The list follows:

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Prices Branch.

Average retail prices and index numbers of an eight-foot grain binder, Regina area, 1913 to 1945.

Year	Price	Index
1913	$194 (a)	100

May I interpose this remark, that the index number is something new, something different from what I have seen in these price lists. This index helps one to get a more comprehensive and consistent picture of the whole progress of prices of agricultural implements. We start then with 1913, when the price was $194 and the index 100. In 1923—the bureau of statistics advised me that they did not have the figures for the intervening years—the price had risen to $288 and the index was 148·5.

The figures for the following years were:

Year	Price	Index
1924	$313 00 (a)	161·3
1925	287 50 (a)	148·2

The price was beginning to go down:

Year	Price	Index
1926	$287 50 (a)	148·2
1927	287 50 (a)	148·2
1928	287 50 (a)	148·2
1929	287 50 (a)	148·2

During those years the index and the price remained the same. Then came a further drop:

Year	Price	Index
1930	$283 00 (a)	145·9
1931	283 00 (a)	145·9

Then there was a further fall:

Year	Price	Index
1932	$278 00 (a)	143·3
1933	266 50 (a)	137·4
1934	266 50 (a)	137·4
1935	266 50 (a)	137·4
1936	284 50 (a)

At this time there was a change in the kind of binder and we come to a different way of computing the figures:

Year	Price	Index
1936	$291 50 (b)	146·6
1937	291 50 (b)	146·6
1938	311 75 (b)
	313 50 (c)	156·8

There were two figures given for 1938; I will explain why later.

Year	Price	Index
1939	$320 75 (c)	160·5
1940	336 25 (c)	168·2
1941	336 25 (c)	168·2
1942	352 00 (c)	176·1
1943	352 00 (c)	176·1
1944	352 00 (c)	176·1
1945	352 00 (c)	176·1

(a) One October pay.
(b) New type binder—one October pay.
(c) New type binder—alemited, oil bath—cash price.

This addition of 12½ per cent in the price of the agricultural implement to the farmer takes place on top of the $352. This means that there is an added price of $44 to that binder, raising its total price to $396. I have not computed the index number, but the price, $396, as compared with $194 in 1930 is a matter which I believe is very serious, and I am sure the minister feels that way too.

I am not entering into any argument as to whether or not the price of agricultural implements should have been raised. I am not competent to enter into that discussion because I do not know the costs of the machine companies. Until I do know those costs and the difficulties which the companies face I am not competent to pronounce on this matter. But I believe I am competent to pronounce on this proposition: that that additional cost should not have been paid by the farmer. If it had to be paid it should have been paid by another subsidy, an extension of the principle which the minister, I think, will be accorded honour in history for having introduced and expanded to so great an extent.

I am going to put some more details on the record which will explain this price series which I do not think the committee ought to be troubled with. But I think the committee would like to hear the letter which accompanied this set of figures:

Dominion Bureau of Statistics
Prices Branch

Ottawa, Canada,
May 8, 1946.

Dear Sir:

In compliance with your telephone request, we have prepared the enclosed statement of retail prices and corresponding price index numbers of an 8-foot grain binder, covering the years from 1913-1945 inclusive. I regret, however, that we do not have a year-by-year record from 1914 to 1922.

You will note that it has been necessary to use three sets of prices during this period—

These prices will be indicated by alphabetical letter in the record.

—due to changes in the construction of binders being marketed. The price index numbers, however, give a fair indication of the increase which has occurred, because in each case where a change in the type of binder has been introduced we have been able to obtain overlapping quotations for old and new types of binders involved in this comparison.

Yours very truly,
H. F. Greenway,
Chief of the Prices Branch.

The thing which aggravates the inadvisability of implement price increases to farmers at the present time is the increase in many other costs that the farmers have to pay. Prices of other commodities have risen. The Searle index compiled and issued by the Searle Grain Company of Winnipeg as given in the April 17th number of the Searle letter informs us that the prices of 147 articles which western farmers buy have risen from 100 in 1914 to 159·8 on April 17, 1946. I think the members of this committee ought to contemplate those rises with deep apprehension and the greatest concern. They help to indicate why the condition of our farming population, in spite of all the efforts of the minister—and they are commendable—is not happy in many, many cases, and why it is that, in spite of the war in which prices have been high, the minister actually reported this year that the average income of farmers throughout Canada was $2,000. Those increases of price must somehow or other be controlled. I suggest to the members of the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F., and the Liberal party who are here listening that it is extremely important that we try to determine a way to deal with these increases in price. Our C.C.F. friends have one answer, and Social Crediters have an answer which probably is different from theirs. But I submit that these changes in prices could hardly have been prevented by government ownership of industry

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am suggesting it. I am not going into great detail. When the time comes I will go into plenty of detail; to-night, I believe it would probably not be in order to do so.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We have plenty of time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friends will get all the explanations they want if they will just wait. But let me leave with the committee the thought that one of the serious problems facing this country is how to overcome the adverse effects of this gradual rise in the prices of things like picks and doubletrees and shovels and gloves and boots and other commodities constituting the 147 items which western farmers must buy.

Mr. GARDINER: Shirts and pants.

Mr. MacNICOL: Far more than that.

Mr. GARDINER: You have forgotten Mr. Ashby's shirts and pants.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before leaving this matter let me say it is well to remember that the increase in the price of those 147 items since the outbreak of war in September, 1939, has been 22 per cent. There is no doubt that the farmer has been a victim of inflation.

May I turn for a moment or two to the prices affecting beef. Our whole structure of prices as it affects beef ought to be reviewed and revised most carefully. Once more, I am not imputing any of the blame for these prices to the minister, and perhaps those administering those prices have done the best they could. But it is my duty as member of parliament for my constituency to tell the committee what the effect has been upon beef production in my riding. The prices on beef during the years 1942 to 1945 inclusive have not been conducive to the maximum beef production in Canada. In 1942 the prices destroyed the confidence of producers in my constituency. I do not believe that confidence has ever been thoroughly restored, and what happened in the last six weeks has given another serious blow to confidence in the production of beef. In fact, beef prices in 1946 would appear to be a deterrent to full and confident participation by feeders in beef production in the future. Between 11,000 and 12,000 beef are estimated to be in my constituency ready to be marketed by the middle of June. If the men who are feeding those beef between now and the marketing of beef in the middle of June lose money on the beef, there will be many a plate in Canade next year without a beef steak which would have been supplied with one had prices been more wisely managed.

It must be understood that when men put money into beef in the fall and then put good money into feed of various kinds, and devote long hours of hard work coupled with great anxiety in the production of beef, and then because of price manipulation are forced into a loss where they had counted on a gain, they will react just as members of this house would. Their attitude will be, once bitten, twice shy.

I have in my hand a letter from a prominent beef feeder in my constituency, dated April 17, 1946, Lethbridge. From that letter I will read one short paragraph:

> The fact is that feedlot cattle cannot be produced at present ceiling prices. To discount this fact or the importance of the feedlot in the production of meat tonnage is unjust and is wilfully or ignorantly out of accord with the facts.

Those are pretty strong words and they come from a well-informed man who has great experience and who to-day is finishing in the neighbourhood of from 5,000 to 7,000 cattle.

So much for the objections or criticisms I have to offer. I wish to protest against the increase in agricultural machinery prices to be paid by the farmer. I wish to protest against the increase in gasoline prices. I wish to protest against the undependable manipulation of beef prices. I am not prepared to enter into the matter of determining scientifically exactly what is wrong at the present time, but something is wrong and it must be made right.

What can be done in the future? I believe hon. members have put their finger on the difficulties. It is easy to say what is to be done; the problem is how to do it. In the first place, prices must be made equitable in agriculture. In the west we are using very commonly among the farmers the expression "parity prices." No one has ever defined "parity prices" with complete satisfaction, but generally the idea is quite clear that the farmer should be able to get enough from his production to enable him to buy a fair amount of the produce of other people who produce goods for him.

That principle must be discovered and must be applied throughout the country. There must be parity prices as between agricultural products and the goods which farmers buy. Then there must be stability of prices. It must be obvious to anyone that when the price of potatoes, let us say, is likely to be down to 35 cents a hundred one year and up to $1.25 in the next year and down again to 80 cents, no one can possibly participate with confidence in the production of potatoes. And potatoes would be only one of the commodities.

Surely, if agricultural implement manufacturers can have a stable price for their product over a series of years, the farmer should be able to have a stable price for what he produces. This principle of stability must be established and maintained. The government has gone a long way in the endavour to establish that, and it is worthy of commendation for it. But much more must still be done, and I am sure the minister does not disagree with that. His problem would be the very question I have raised: how to do it, how to get the money to do it.

There is another matter that must be established and that is dependability of markets. If I am in the potato business and I propose to raise five acres one year and I can sell all my product and the next year I find I can sell the product of only one acre when I have raised five, obviously I am in a pretty precarious position. My father used to say to me when I was a boy, "Son, if I could be sure of selling my potatoes at fifty cents a hundred I would raise ten acres every year and I would feel quite secure." I do not suppose fifty cents would be sufficient now. That was back in the nineties and the early years of this century. The trouble was that some years you could not sell your potatoes; some years you could not even give them away.

We must establish stability of market. The question will be raised: How can you do that? There are two ways in which it can be done and our generation has pretty well indicated to us how it can be done. The first is this. We must see to it that the people are enabled to buy all of a given commodity that they can consume. Then what is surplus we must manage to put on the world market under a mutual aid scheme if needs be, under an UNRRA arrangement if necessary. Fluctuations in production from year to year could be taken care of through the world outlet. If we undertake to trade all our surplus we may be in difficulties. We can never be sure that we can trade off all that we can produce in a given year; but I do not think the time is likely to come, at least in our lives, when it will not be possible to distribute our surplus under mutual aid or under an UNRRA scheme.

The question will then arise: How will you pay for all that you distribute through mutual aid? Once more the problem is one of finance, and if you can produce enough in the dominion, and a sufficiently wide variety of commodities, it will be possible for you to keep your standard of living at whatever level your production will justify and also render available to the world your surplus. I am not going to go into great detail on that tonight. I may have more to say as the session progresses.

Mr. MacNICOL: We want to end the session some time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I could not catch what the hon. member said.

Mr. GARDINER: He wants to end the session some time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is always fair and I think he will grant that I have not used overmuch of the time this year. Fair prices must be maintained by the principle of subsidy. Even the labour on farms, which was complained of by several hon. members in the course of the debate, must be taken care of by a wage bonus. This afternoon an hon. member—I have forgotten which one—said in effect that he could not possibly pay $100 a month to a man to milk cows. Every hon. member of this committee will agree that it cannot be done.

An hon. MEMBER: It is being done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No ordinary farmer can do it. If he is operating on a large basis with many cows, a lot of mechanization and all that kind of thing, under ideal arrangements, he may be able to do it; but the ordinary farmer who milks five or six cows, who is the kind of farmer that will produce the greatest quantity of milk in this country, or to whom we must be prepared to look for the greatest quantity of our milk—

Mr. GRANT: It would not take a man a whole day to milk five or six cows.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A farmer could not afford to pay $100 a month to do it. That is the point under discussion.

Mr. GRANT: He would work at many other jobs besides milking cows.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the farmer had enough things for him to do, all of which were likely to give him a profit, he could afford to do that; he could afford to pay him $100 a month, but the ordinary farmer has no such set-up that would enable him to give a man $100 a month on his farm. At the same time everybody agrees that the man ought to have $100 a month for working on a farm. If $100 a month is not forthcoming a man will not be able to prepare himself to support a family.

The question that arises is: how are we to solve this problem? I suggest in all sincerity that the only solution is going to be a wage bonus, a supplementary allowance to farm labourers over and above what the farmer can afford to pay. The orthodox economist will immediately find himself affected much as he would be if a galvanic needle were thrust into his spine. The important thing for him to bear in mind, however, is this: Can the dominion of Canada produce enough goods of a sufficient variety to enable her to pay the man who works on the farm milking cows and thinning beets and doing other things, $100 a month? The answer must be yes. If that is possible, then we must devise a financial system which will reflect the physical realities of our productive capacity and enable us to do financially what we can do physically.

There is one more thing which will become necessary in order to guarantee a stable market. I said a moment ago that we must first of all be able to enable all Canadians to buy what they need of our produce, our potatoes, our eggs, our apples, our coal. Hon. members know how low is the average income of the wage-earners of Canada. What a disgrace to the Canadian people our wage rates are! We are in danger right now, as hon. members know, of a serious strike, almost dominion-wide. What for? For the privilege of having something like $125 a month. The sum of $125 a month is not too much for men engaged in steel work.

Mr. McKAY: Not enough.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is not too much; that is the point. It is not more than this dominion can pay in the way of goods. There is no doubt in the world that this dominion can produce enough eggs, butter, cheese, lumber and other things to pay these labourers $125 worth of such goods a month for producing steel. The thing we lack in our present concept is a financial mechanism to render our physical capacities financially possible.

I submit it is on the financial aspect of our economy that we must concentrate our attention. When we do that we shall find that it will be financially possible for us to distribute to the consumers of this country such an amount of purchasing power as will enable them to buy their full requirements of the goods we are able to produce, thereby guaranteeing our agriculturists a stable market so far as home consumption is concerned. This must be done. If not, then we must resort to a method of deliberate distribution of consumer purchasing power; and we might just as well acknowledge first as last, that the present financial system simply will not distribute that purchasing power.

Our C.C.F. friends, with whose expressions I often have a lot of sympathy, are fond of blaming the whole trouble on private enterprise. Well, private enterprise will produce the goods. There is no doubt about that. Private enterprise will produce the goods; it will produce the coal—

Mr. McKAY: It is not doing so now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The reason is that it cannot sell at a fair price. Get producers a fair price and a certainty of selling and private enterprise will produce all that this country can possibly use and enough for it to distribute abroad under a mutual aid system. The difficulty lies in the financial mechanism. I hope that all the members of the C.C.F. organization will come to recognize this soon enough so that they will not waste their time and the time of the people in these critical days thinking about a solution that is not a solution. Let us keep our minds concentrated on the real difficulty which confronts us. The real difficulty—

An hon. MEMBER: We thank the hon. member for his help.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You're welcome, and you need the help. The real difficulty is financial. It must be obvious.

Our farmers must have equitable prices, which means not only a fair price for the things they produce, but also a fair price for the things they buy. There must not be a steady rise in the price of these 147 commodities all up through the years in the future as there has been since 1914. That simply must not be. There must not be any more increases in the price of agricultural implements or of any other thing which the farmer needs. We must set about finding how to overcome the difficulties. When we overcome this disparity between the price of the things farmers sell and the price of the things farmers buy so that with the money they derive from what they sell they will be able to buy a fair portion of the things available for purchase, then we shall have prosperity, we shall have equitable prices. The thing can be done. We can produce enough in Canada to do it.

Then we must have stable prices going on from year to year. In the memory of every member of this committee there was the wildest fluctuation in the prices of such stable commodities as wheat. There is to-day in the price of many commodities. Why should there be any such fluctuation in prices? A bushel of wheat will feed just as many men to-day as it did fifteen years ago or fifty years ago. It will feed quite as many men a year from to-day or ten years from to-day as it will feed to-day. Its price ought to be stable. It is for us to determine the means whereby to make it stable so that from year to year we shall know, and not only shall our producers know what they are going to get, but our governments are going to be able to calculate with some measure of accuracy what they may expect to derive by way of income from our producers. We shall be able to put our whole economy on a business basis, so that we shall have a chance to know where we stand. Everybody will grant that that is a wholly desirable objective. Let us determine by what mechanism we can attain that objective. We must have stable markets. We must know from year to year how much we can sell, and how much we can dispose of. To say that is impossible is, I think, a reckless remark; for certainly in any age which has heard the Atlantic charter advocate that all men should be guaranteed freedom from want, it should not sound absurd to propose that we should be able to render available to the people who need our goods and services, whatsoever in Canada we may have left over, after having provided for the needs of our own people.

Once more the objective must commend itself to every member as being physically possible. Once more our primary task is to determine the financial mechanism by which to make it financially possible. So once more the problem is one of finance. It is not one of production; it is not one of ownership.

May I say just a word about labour, to which I have already referred. I am sure every hon. member is deeply concerned about the labour situation throughout this country. Everyone recognizes, for example, that the seamen's union is not asking for anything unreasonable. Everyone recognizes that the C.I.O. is not asking for anything unreasonable. There may be extremists, but they are exceedingly few in number and I have not met them. They are just asking for a common-sense standard of living that any right-minded individual would freely grant that they have a perfect right to ask. It must be conceded by all that we in Canada are able to produce all the goods necessary to provide a standard of living which, say, $125 a month would buy. If we do not solve that problem of the reward for labour, then our whole economy can be disrupted, with grievous consequences to agriculture, and to everyone else. We must determine how to solve that problem.

Mr. BARRETT: Mr. Chairman, it is evident, after listening to the discussion in the committee yesterday and to-day that the farmers in this country are not very happy. We have heard many speeches, some of which were most entertaining, and all of which were interesting and instructive. They have been delivered by hon. members from all groups in the house, and representing widely separated sections of the country. The main theme in all of them seems to be that the condition of farming in this country is not satisfactory. All are agreed that unless it is satisfactory, the condition of other groups in the country will be jeopardized.

But when we begin to inquire into the causes of unrest in agriculture we become embroiled in a mass of facts and figures which, to say the least, are confusing, and which at one time seem to prove one thing and at another, something else. In the end they really do not prove very much of anything.

For this reason I hesitate to use figures at all, because I realize there is some truth in the old saying that figures lie and liars figure. However, I think I am quite safe in assuming that all hon. members in the committee, no matter how we may differ in our opinions about certain things, have enough confidence in the integrity and sincerity of each other to believe that no one of us will deliberately use figures with the intention of misleading.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I have been trying to find a common base upon which to compare the income of farmers with that of other groups in the community. I was deeply interested in hearing the hon. member for Lethbridge use the year 1913, because recently a friend of mine gave me a graph of considerable interest. This graph, which I had not seen before, had been prepared by the Department of Pensions and National Health in 1937, and showed the index numbers of farm prices and industrial wages, taking the year 1913 as a base of 100.

Up to that time I had found that in some tables the period 1926-1929 was used. In still others I found the period 1935-1939. However, this was the first time I had seen the year 1913 used as a base. It seemed to me that whereas in that year industrial wages and farm prices were at exactly the same level, for that reason it was a fair year to take. I extended the graph from 1937 up to 1944, the last year for which I could get figures from the Department of Labour showing index numbers for wages.

I do not propose to draw any definite conclusions from the graph, because I am not an economist, and I do not know what the proper relationship is between the two lines which are shown. I frankly admit that as a farmer I look at this matter from a farmer's viewpoint. I dare say, however, that until I get other facts I cannot draw any definite conclusions. My only purpose in drawing this graph to the attention of the committee is to see if we can find out just what these figures imply.

For instance, we find that the index number of farm prices up to 1920 was above that of industrial wages. In comparison with the year 1913 when there was a base of 100, farm prices rose to 258·8 while industrial wages went only to 205·5, representing a difference of 53·3 points. In 1921 farm prices dropped 22·3 points below wages, and they have been below ever since.

Surely there should be a more fair relationship between prices and wages than the figures I have mentioned would indicate. The period 1926-29 is usually considered the period in which we enjoyed most normal conditions, and in that year the difference was 28·7 points; that is, the index number of farm prices was 28·7 below that of industrial wages. During the thirties both farm prices and wages dropped disastrously, but in 1932 farm prices went to a low of 25 points below the 1913 figure, while wage rates were still 72·1 above the 1913 base. And in 1933 when wages were at their lowest point they were 63·3 points above the 1913 level.

By 1939 wage rates had risen to 191·9, while farm prices had not quite reached the 1913 level, the index number standing at 99·6. In 1941 the index of farm prices was 109·3, while the index of wages was 218·6, or 109·3 points above farm prices. In 1944, owing to subsidies, farm prices rose to 160·9, but wages rose to 263·9, or a difference of 103 points.

As I said before, these figures do not necessarily prove anything unless we have many more related facts and probably they cannot be used to much advantage. However, they do give us a long-time picture of the trend of prices and wages. They are quite interesting when taken in conjunction with the cost of living. With the permission of the committee I should like to place on Hansard this graph and the figures that go with it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member the permission of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BARRETT: The graph and figures follow:

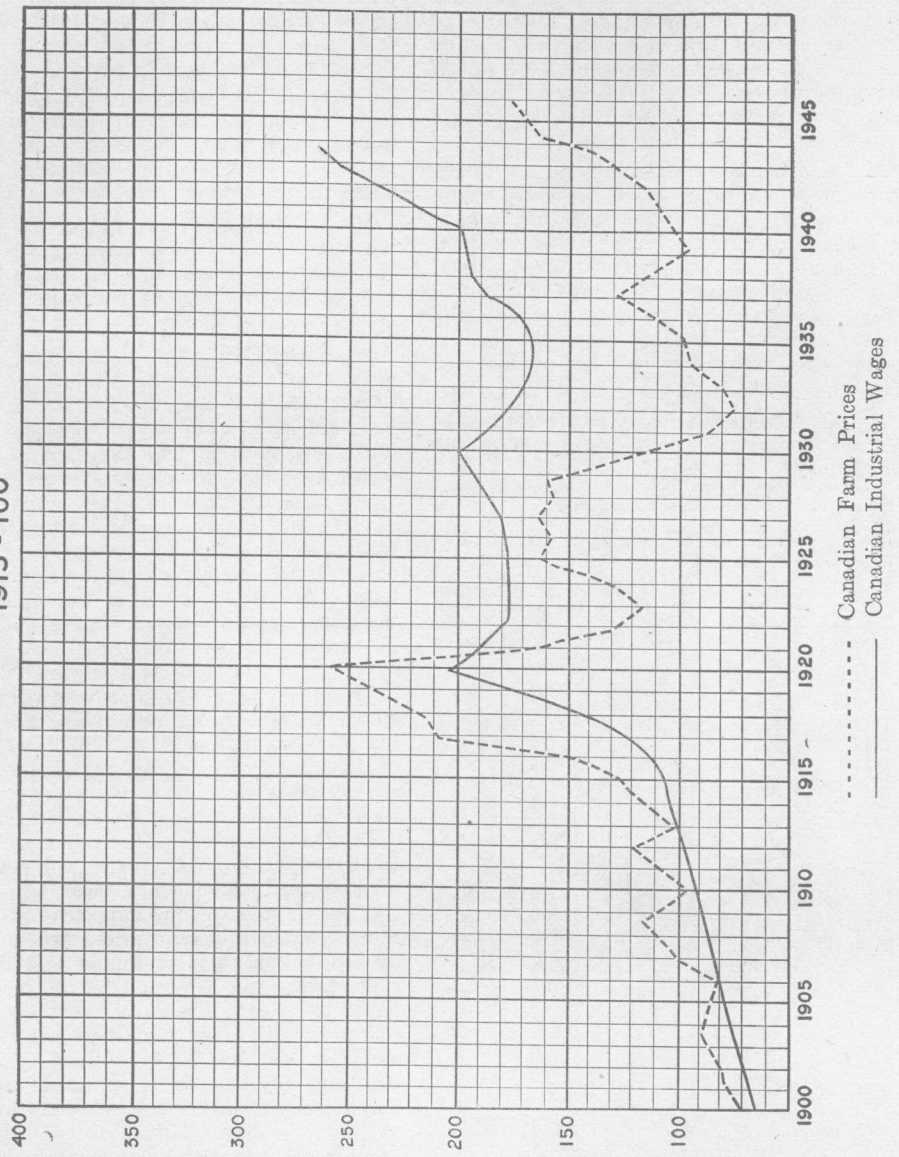
As I say, these figures show an interesting picture when taken in conjunction with the cost of living index. Taking 1913 as a base with the cost of living at 100, we find that the cost of living increased to 128·4 in 1939, while industrial wages increased to 191. This represented an increase in real wages or, as we usually term it, the standard of living of 49 per cent. Thus the long-time trend of real wages increased about two per cent a year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the graph indicate the wage rates or the actual wages received? It does not mean very much if a man is being paid $1 an hour and he can work only one hour a day.



Mr. BARRETT: This is the index of wage rates. The other day the Minister of Labour pointed out that the efficiency of labour had increased about two per cent a year. Therefore it would seem that the increase in real wages was about proper for that period, provided, of course, that the other earning classes received an equal raise. Unfortunately, according to what statistics we can find, the lines on this graph would seem to indicate that the farmers had not received an equal raise, and the efficiency of our farmers increased as much if not more than that of labour.

What happened during the war? The cost of living rose from 128 in 1939 to 151 in 1945, with wage rates rising from 191 to 266, so that real wages went from 149 to 176, or an increase of 18·4 per cent for the war period, representing an average of three per cent a year or 50 per cent more than the long-term average.

Taking these figures into account, I do not think any fair-minded person will deny that on the whole labour has been quite fairly treated. It must not be forgotten that during the pre-war period farm prices were governed by the normal laws of supply and demand, while wages were governed by the bargaining power of labour. The government sat in as a sort of umpire to see that there was fair play as far as possible. Now, however, by its controls not only does the government act as an umpire, but it makes the rules of the game and enforces them. More than ever, it is now encumbent upon the government to see that justice is done to all.

Because of recent actions of the government the farmers of this country are not at all satisfied that this has been done. They want to know what reason the government can give for farm machinery prices rising faster over a period of years than did agricultural prices This is what has happened since 1926. Between 1926 and 1929 farm machinery prices were stable and during the depression they fell only five per cent, whereas prices of farm products fell 52 per cent from the 1926-29 period.

(This is the graph referred to on page 1433 of Hansard in Mr. Barrett's speech).

At the outbreak of war in 1939 farm machinery prices were seven per cent above the 1926-29 period, while prices of farm products were still 36 per cent below that level. During the war farm machinery prices were frozen and prices of farm products rose; but in spite of that fact, in spite of the bonuses that were paid, those prices were only ten per cent above the 1926-29 level, while farm machinery prices were 16 per cent above. Most of the increase in farm prices was on account of bonuses or subsidies which came out of the national treasury and part of that was taken out of the farmers' own pocket.

The recent increase in the ceiling of machinery prices will increase this discrepancy because it will put those prices about 23 per cent above the base period, while farm products, even with all the bonuses and the recent increases in prices of hogs and butter, will be only 12 per cent above, as is shown by the following official figures of the bureau of statistics.

I have here a table entitled, "Index numbers of prices of farm machinery and prices of farm products." This was put out by the dominion bureau of statistics with the figures being converted to the 1926-29 level. It shows farm machinery prices and farm products prices as 100 for 1926-29. By 1939 farm products had dropped to 67·7, while prices of farm machinery had increased to 106·8. During 1942, 1943 and 1944 prices of farm machinery stood at 120, while prices of farm products were 81·7, 95, and 101·9 respectively. I should like permission, Mr. Chairman, to put the whole table on Hansard.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member the permission of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BARRETT: The table is as follows:

Index Numbers of Prices of Farm Machinery and Prices of Farm Products—Dominion Bureau of Statistics—Converted to 1926-29=100

	Farm Machinery	Prices of Farm Products	With* Bonus
1926-29	100	100
1939	106·8	67·7
1940	109·4	66·5	67·8
1941	112·9	75·6	79·4
1942	120	81·7	87·8
1943	120	95·0	101·5
1944	120	101·9	108
1945	116·2	104·4	109·6
May, 1946	123·1	107 (Estimated)	112

*Prices adjusted upward to account for agricultural subsidies.

If we compare these prices with those which farmers have to pay for the supplies they need we find, again taking 1926-29 as 100, that the index number in January of this year for farm machinery was 116·2 and now will be 123·1; fertilizer at 86; gas and oil at 100; hardware at 116; and binder twine at 78. Those are the main items of cost to the farmer.

The Minister of Finance has told us that wages in the Massey-Harris company have risen from 51½ cents in 1939 to 80 cents in 1946, or an increase of 55 per cent in seven years. Taking into consideration the rise of 19 per cent in the cost of living, this represents an increase in real wages of 30 per cent, or an increase of 4 per cent a year for real wages for this particular industry, or 25 per cent more than the increased wages in industry as a whole. It would seem that the government under its control system has allowed that to happen, and possibly in its opinion for very good reasons, but the farmers think it is not playing fair with them to ask them now to shoulder the whole burden of that increased cost. The committee will recall that the Minister of Finance said in 1944 in his budget speech that he was taking off the tariff on farm machinery:

> . . . to give to agriculture assurance in respect of some of the conditions under which it may expect to operate after the war.

Was this one of the conditions they expected? That is one of the questions the farmers of Canada are asking, but it is only one of many. There is, I believe, a general feeling throughout the country that a satisfactory solution of these problems can never be reached until representatives of agriculture, labour, industry, and government get together with their feet under one table and make an impartial study of the whole situation.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: There is just one problem I wish to bring up at the present time. It arises out of a letter that I have received from the Bulkley valley, between Prince George and Prince Rupert. I will read the letter so that the Minister of Agriculture can give me a reply when he speaks later. The letter says in part:

> The world is clamouring for wheat. Still the dominion government practically prohibits the Bulkley valley farmers from growing wheat and oats. The dominion government pays over $8 a ton for freight on oats shipped from the prairies to the Bulkley valley and Skeena river, plus more than $8 bonus per ton on wheat. As everybody knows, it is hard enough for Bulkley valley farmers to compete with the prairies growing wheat, but with the bonus against them it just stops them growing grain.
> If it was to help the chicken farmers, why not bonus eggs instead? What excuse is there to pay the freight on oats to the lumber camps? Is the price of lumber too low?

I would ask the minister, is there not some way of bonusing the farmers in that section so that they may supply the needs of that area? They have the land available, and if they were given the bonus rather than the railways they could produce at a fair return to themselves.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is one point which I think the Minister of Agriculture has not covered in his remarks. I believe he was present at the food and agriculture organization meeting in Quebec City last October, where the need was expressed for the promotion of human welfare and for saving the world by providing it with the necessities of life. Noel Baker, the head of the British delegation, said at that conference that it was hunger that made Hitler. That conference did recognize the necessity for the food-producing countries of the world tackling the problem of planning production in a world-wide way. Sir John Boyd Orr said:

> If the nations of the world are going to get together to feed the peoples of the world, they must increase the production of our most important foods.
> In many cases the production must be more than doubled.

In the face of that, the situation in Canada is alarming. During the past few years we have had hundreds of thousands of our men over in Europe, while food production was being carried on in this country in a noble way by those who remained on the farm. They did a great job. The fact that Canada can produce and did produce the food she did is one which no one can doubt. But to-day there are more people here to do the work, and people better qualified to do the work. There is a tremendous demand for food production in Canada to-day. Yet we are faced with a butter shortage, shortages of other foods, and with rationing. At the same time we have 260,000 people unemployed in this country.

There is something seriously wrong when we have the power to produce, and when we have those unemployed seeking work and yet are not getting the needed production, because irrespective of what the minister said in regard to production in the years from 1942 to 1945 he will have to admit that in 1946 we are facing a serious reduction in food production all along the line as compared with the corresponding months of 1945. There must be a number of factors causing this reduction. What is needed at this time is a study of those factors which are causing a reduction in our food production at the very time when we and the whole world need food as never before. If we are to save this world we shall save it through food production to-day. If the united nations organization is to be successful it must be built on the basis of a world where the people who produce the food must receive a return that will pay them for their labour. If the nations who need our food cannot pay for the produce we are selling, let the facts be presented to us and then we can decide upon the next step.

As has been said by a previous speaker, there is evidence in everything which emanates from farm organizations, whether in expressions of opinion or formal resolutions, that those engaged in agricultural production are not satisfied. There are factors which are definitely working against the production of food, and it is our duty to study what those factors are and decide upon a solution. I will submit to the minister one or two points which have arisen in my own experience. We find in the reports tabled by various organizations, in the statistical records, in general information received and from conversations with those actually engaged in the production of food, what are the considerations uppermost in the minds of those who are going out of production.

In proof of what I have said, the figures in the monthly dairy review of Canada issued by the bureau of statistics show, as I believe I stated about a month ago, that the following reductions have occurred in percentages of creamery butter produced in Canada since the beginning of the present year, as compared with the corresponding period of 1945: January, 15·6; February, 18·3; March, 19·6; April, 8·8. The production of cheddar cheese in Canada was 27·8 per cent less than in the same month of 1945; in February the reduction was 36·5 per cent; in March, 35·5 per cent; in April 33 per cent. The figures with regard to the production of hogs have already been admitted by the minister. I think his explanation is that the production of hogs and cattle, particularly in the winter time, depends upon the amount of feed that is grown; and since the volume of coarse grains grown in Canada was much smaller, there was bound to be some reduction. But the farmers who previously raised hogs have shown that, even though they had had the feed, they had no inclination to resume this line of production, that they would not bother feeding grain to hogs. That is true in the west, and there must be some reason.

Farm organizations, and particularly the United Farmers of Canada, have urged a more realistic plan to stimulate food production in Canada. Among their recommendations was one relative to farm labour. Surely these problems are not insurmountable. If Canada could produce these products in war time she can produce them in peace time. If people who are out of work are reluctant to undertake farm labour there must be something hindering them. Is it the fact that there is no adequate return for their work? What is the solution?

In his speech to-day the minister made a curious explanation as to what in his opinion is wrong with agriculture. He said we all know that people like to grow things, that they desire to produce food and clothing for mankind. If that attitude is an indication of his policy I believe his policy has been wrong. You kill the desire of people to grow things, whether for food or for clothing, if you require them to grow these supplies without giving them the necessary return.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Hear, hear. The profit motive.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: After these long years of drought and anxiety the farmer needs a return for his labour. If you are going to provide it—

Mr. FRASER: Private enterprise.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Private enterprise? Like the grain exchange? Money was made by those who operate on the grain exchange, and the people who consume the products pay more too, but not to the farmer. That is where your trouble is. Nobody will go on a farm and work year after year under those conditions. True, the farmer likes to see things growing; he wants to help in production, but from long experience he has learned that at the end of it all there is no guarantee that he will have something for his labour. Year after year the lack of return on the investment he has in his farm, and the weight of the mortgage he cannot pay back, mean a constant piling up of debt which cannot be met. Finally it means that he must leave the farm, because the mortgage company forecloses, and then it sells the place to somebody else when another crop of farmers comes along. That is your "private enterprise" for you. The chaps who run these mortgage and loan companies lend the farmer money when prices are high and collect when wheat goes down to thirty or forty cents a bushel.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What do you want?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The farmers of Canada stated in their brief that there must be an immediate cancellation of the federal tax of three cents per gallon on gasoline used for agricultural purposes. They also insisted that there must be an immediate revision of the Income War Tax Act to eliminate inequalities in the application of the act to farming operations. After talking to farmers during the past year, I do not believe there is one single thing about which complaints have been more general. Cases are cited where a farmer, not being permitted by the laws of this country to deliver his grain in 1942 and 1943, delivered it in 1944, and then the income tax officials came around and collected on the basis of his income from cash sales in 1944 in respect of grain raised and income earned in 1942 and 1943. I suggest, perhaps not to the Minister of Agriculture direct but through him to the Minister of National Revenue, that the time is long past when the government should go into the whole matter of farm income tax and put it on an equitable basis. The present system is entirely unjust in the light of conditions which have prevailed over so many years. Half the year in the prairie country there is no production. The minister admits that if for four or five years you have crops, you may then expect to go for four or five years with no production.

Mr. GARDINER: Not "no" production; low production.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. He also stated the facts when he said that production is so low that it does not cover the cost of operation during those drought years of which he spoke, when the farmer was going into debt year after year. In 1941, 1942, 1943, and to a greater extent in 1944 and 1945 the farmer found he had some income over and above his cost of production. What did he do with it? He turned over the money to pay off his debts; and the figures which have been placed before the house show the admirable way in which he did so. Now he finds, having discharged the debts he incurred in the thirties and early forties, a heavy income tax is placed on him for the years 1942, 1943 and 1944.

An hon. MEMBER: Then he has to go to the mortgage company to borrow money to pay his income tax.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Many cases have been reported to me where farmers have had to go to the bank and borrow the money to meet their heavy income tax. I suggest to the minister that revisions of the act in one or two respects would do a great deal to increase agricultural production on the prairies. Number one would be to allow as an exemption on his income tax any debts paid by a farmer which were incurred prior to 1940, in years when he had low production. Secondly, allowance should be made in that income tax form for wages to the farmer's wife and those of his children sixteen years of age and over who are working on the farm. To put the combined earnings of these people, as they are on the farm, on one man and charge him on anything in excess of $1,200 is patently unfair. Similar groups of people living anywhere else and putting in the long hours that are put in by the farmer and his family—the farmer working fifteen hours a day and his wife and children anywhere from ten or twelve to fifteen hours—would not be treated in that way. There must be some justice in this scheme of things if we are ever to get people back on a producing basis. The farmers feel this injustice deeply, and their natural reaction, for which you cannot blame them, is this: "Is it to be said that after working these extra hours raising hogs, feeding chickens, raising turkeys, getting up early and milking cows and working the cream separator, no allowance is to be made us? There is only one thing we can do, because it is not worth it; we will simply produce to the $1,500 level and live as best we can, cutting down our hours of labour to ten or twelve instead of fifteen, and in some cases, eighteen."

The farm organizations of Canada have also stated that some action should be taken to halt the practice of sales of flour with mill feeds sold to farmers. In eastern Canada there has been a common practice among people selling feeds to farmers to stipulate that if they want so many sacks of feed they must take so many sacks of flour along with it. Perhaps it was not put exactly in that way, but the farmer did actually have to take flour in order to get feed.

Mr. GARDINER: It is against the regulations to do that now.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe it is against the regulations now.

Mr. GARDINER: And has been for some time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When was it stopped?

Mr. GARDINER: An attempt was made to stop it two or three years ago. I am not saying that it has been stopped, but it is against the regulations. You cannot, however, prevent a farmer from taking home flour if he goes to buy feed and he sees flour in the store selling at a certain price. If he wishes to take it home and mix it with the feed which he has at home there is no way of stopping him.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is not the case to which I refer.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the kind of case.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am speaking of actual cases where the farmer has been told that if he wanted to take home feed he must take so many sacks of flour.

Mr. GARDINER: That was the position taken by the mills for a long period of years, that if you wished to get feed you had to take a certain proportion of flour. I understand it was first instituted by the mills, and the dealers were told that if they wanted half a carload of feed they must fill the car up with flour. At first it was a practice on the part of the mills themselves and later on, during the war, we had a provision requiring that cars should not be shipped partly filled. That, however, had nothing to do with feed or flour. It was due to the shortage of rolling stock to carry all the freight that had to be moved during war time. Some of the boards stated that cars had to be loaded to full capacity. When we attempted to enforce the regulation with regard to farmers taking feed we were confronted with that fact. We were told that if a man wanted only three-quarters of a car of feed they could not sell it unless they could fill the car, and he would take flour to fill it. Of course it was stated that this was carried out to the dealer, who said to the farmer, "If you want to get the amount of feed that you have ordered you must take so much flour"; and the farmer in some cases, I presume, took lower grades of flour home and mixed it with the feed he had and fed it. Attempts have been made to stop that kind of thing, but there are cases where the farmers find it to their advantage to feed flour. They have taken a lower grade of flour, particularly since wheat has gone up and flour has been maintained on the basis of 78 cents. The farmer walks into a shop and sees a bag of flour there, and he decides that it is to his advantage to buy the flour rather than buy wheat at $1.55 or $1.25 a bushel. So he buys the flour and mixes it himself along with the feed he has and he feeds it. I do not know any way of stopping that by law. It is a practice that has obtained.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that side of it, but there were cases where farmers were practically compelled to take home flour a couple of years ago.

Mr. GARDINER: That was true some time ago.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The farmers' organizations wanted it stopped because in many cases the flour was more than they could use themselves. It was a result of the milling industry being overstocked with flour; there was a heavy demand for feed and they did not have shipping space to send it overseas.

Mr. GARDINER: There was a heavy demand for mill feeds such as bran and shorts, in the United States and elsewhere, which could have been sold to better advantage there, and consequently pressure was put on.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The fact remains that the world requires that flour to feed people and I hope the practice will be completely stopped. I presume it will be stopped, because there will not be the same shortage, and flour will be in too great a demand throughout the world.

The other department that links itself with food production is not under the minister, but a statement was given this afternoon with regard to the number of veterans. I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture, with the assistance of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, give consideration to the fact that there are 18,000 returned men who have qualified as farmers. Everything possible should be done at an early date; some emergency measures should be taken, to see that these men get on their land and get into production for the crop of 1946. In another month it will be too late. I have letters from my constituency indicating that men have qualified and have been allocated land, but some inspections have not been completed or for some other reason they are being held up. Surely where these men have qualified under the regulations under the Veterans Land Act, where they have proved themselves to be farmers and men of sound judgment, they should be left to choose the land. It should be left to them if they are considered fit to be farmers, having some idea of what an economic piece of land is.

I understand the minister's difficulty and I appreciate his anxiety to avoid some of the errors that occurred under the old soldier settlement board. But here are 18,000 young men, many of them married, who want to get started, and the world is in need of production. I urge the ministers to get together and do all they can to wipe out the red tape that is preventing these young men from getting into production, because they should be seeding to-day. Seeding in the west is pretty well on and in some parts practically completed.

A good deal has been said—the subject has been referred to in every speech that has been made—with regard to increases in farm prices. This party has supported the government in its efforts by means of price ceilings to prevent inflation; we are going to stay with the government in the maintenance of prices, and we demand that these prices be not broken. There must be a proper relation between cost of production and the value of the farmers' products. If the government will stand firmly by this principle they will bring security into the minds and hearts of the farmers, and that is something that is valuable. But we will oppose them every time they puncture these ceilings. That position should be made clear. That is why we opposed the agricultural implement increase without a corresponding increase in farm prices. If the farm prices are raised there is an increase in the cost of living and a spiral will be started, as the minister has already said. A proper relation between cost of production and farm prices would give security to the farmer, the thing that is most important to him, the thing that would keep him on the farm, the thing that will attract others to the farm. There are many more people who would enjoy producing and who would like to be producing than are on the farms to-day, but they will not dare go on the farms because of the lack of security. If security can be guaranteed they will go at it. The same thing applies to the wages that are paid, and also to the cost of living. If there is a proper relationship existing there, there will not be much trouble with labour. If an increase is to be allowed on only one line without a corresponding increase in the other, then trouble can be expected from labour.

We do not believe, as do our hon. friends to the right, that the ceiling should be lifted. We went through a depression following a spiral of prices in the inflationary period and we do not want to go through that again.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. SENN: Does he believe that there is a proper relationship existing to-day between farm prices and prices of other commodities?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not entirely at the present time. But they have not helped it any by allowing a 12½ per cent increase in the machinery which the farmer has to buy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a question?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. I have only a few minutes left. I am always glad to hear from the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the hon. member believe in the socialization of milk?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Just as soon as milk gets into the hands of a monopoly I would say, yes, take it out.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member would take it away from the cooperatives?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Any profits or excess charges made in the operation are divided among the producers. A proper producers' cooperative spreads it around among the producers. There is no monopoly involved in a properly run producers' cooperative. The extra charges are spread evenly among the people.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They would have a corner on milk.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would rather have all the people have a corner on something through a true cooperative than a private individual.

Another thing I should like to advocate to the minister is the establishment of the Canadian wheat board as the sole marketing agency of Canada's grain. The thing which farmers dislike to see is the bringing in of an agency such as the grain exchange at the time when farmers are out producing at a minimum return themselves, when everybody is doing his utmost to produce at a time when the world is in such a difficult situation. To see an organization like the Winnipeg grain exchange reinstated in the marketing field and start gambling in food would be a bitter blow to the people and would work to the detriment of food production throughout the world. If the farmers are guaranteed that security the minister need have no fear of what Canadian people will do with regard to farm production. Guarantee them a proper relationship over a period of years and you will get the best returns from the farmers. You will get more economic production and you will have the farmer in a position where he can produce economically because he can afford to buy the machinery to produce efficiently. You will have prosperity among the farmers which will give prosperity to the state. You will have a prosperous industry which will not only make the greatest contribution to the welfare of the people of Canada but provide the people of the world the food which is most essential to the maintenance of peace and to the future well-begin of our people. It is the only hope of humanity if it ever expects or hopes to live in a world where there are no wars.

2. Publicity and extension division, $154,804.

Mr. SENN: On this item I should like to have the minister state if any new periodicals have been issued this year. Yesterday he made a statement to the effect that last year a certain amount of advertising of one kind or another had been done to assist the farmers in production. Could he give a short description of what is being done there?

Mr. GARDINER: During the year sixty-five new and revised publications were issued. These included sixteen farmers' bulletins, five technical bulletins, eight circulars, six acts, orders and regulations, seven special war-time production series and twenty-three reports and miscellaneous publications. The statistics covering 1944 and 1945 with regard to these indicate that 850,224 publications were mailed on personal request; 582,056 publications were mailed in bulk for redistribution; 1,330,434 copies of market reports mailed on request; 8,680,738 copies of mimeographed, multigraphed and multileafed publications comprising press releases, news notes, market information and leaflets, et cetera, were distributed.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. SENN: The minister did not say what advertising had been done. He said yesterday that a certain amount of advertising had been done.

Mr. GARDINER: Advertising comes under marketing. We had better take it up there.

Mr. BRYCE: Overseas does not come under the minister's department?

Mr. GARDINER: Advertising overseas is done under trade and commerce and external affairs.

Item agreed to.

4. Contributions to empire bureaux, $47,397.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many empire bureaux are operating?

Mr. GARDINER: The original eight bureaux were organized in 1928. They are as follows: Bureau of soil science, located at Rothamsted experimental station; bureau of animal health, located at the veterinary research laboratory, Weybridge; bureau of animal nutrition, located at Rowett research institute, Aberdeen, Scotland; bureau of animal genetics, located at the university of Edinburgh, Scotland; bureau of plant genetics (crops other than herbage), located at the plant breeding institute, Cambridge; bureau of plant genetics (herbage crops) located at Aberystwyth, Wales; bureau of fruit production, located at East Malling research station; bureau of agricultural parasitology, located at the institute of agricultural parasitology, Winches Farm drive, St. Albans. Additional bureaux organized since 1928; bureau of dairy science, located at national institute for research in dairying, university of Reading, Shinfield; forestry bureau, located at Oxford. Institutes operating under executive council of I.A.B.: mycological institute, located at Kew, Surrey; institute of entomology, located at British museum (natural history) Cromwell road, London, S.W. 7.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that each of the various parts of the empire make contributions to the bureaux that are set up in the British isles, is that right?

Mr. GARDINER: Commonwealth countries?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT, OTTAWA "JOURNAL", MAY 11

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On page 1 of the Ottawa Morning Journal of May 11, the following appears:

Two cabinet ministers, Works Minister Fournier and Fisheries Minister Bridges expressed themselves in favour of the present procedure of having parliament deal with divorce cases.

And on page 18 of the same newspaper I am quoted as saying:

So far as I can see there is no way you can get around the present problem. There is no way you can impose on the people of Quebec something they do not want—

Sir, I did not say on that occasion that I was in favour of the present system, nor for that matter did I say that I was against it, and further, I did not say, "There is no way you can impose on the people of Quebec something they do not want." What I did say, and what appears on page 1420 of Hansard of May 10, was as follows; and I quote:

—and so far as I can see at the present time there is no way that you can get around the present system. I am sure there is no desire on the part of any one to impose upon the province of Quebec a court which the majority of the people in that province do not want.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—DISCOUNT ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. LOW:

1. Who is responsible for the maintenance of the Canadian dollar at a 10 per cent discount in terms of the American dollar?
2. What has been the total net profit to the Foreign Exchange Control Board resulting from the maintenance of the Canadian dollar at a fixed discount in terms of the American dollar since 1938?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. The rate of exchange for the United States dollar in Canada is established pursuant to section 24(1) of P.C. 2716 dated September 15, 1939, as amended by section 13(1) of P.C. 7378 dated December 13, 1940, which reads as follows:

"Subject to any instructions that may be given by the Minister of Finance, the foreign exchange control board may prescribe rates of exchange for transactions in foreign exchange pursuant to this order with respect to such foreign currencies and such transactions or kinds of transactions as the board may designate."

On September 16, 1939, the Minister of Finance wrote to the chairman of the foreign exchange control board, setting a rate of 10 per cent premium buying and 11 per cent premium selling for United States dollars.

On October 4, 1945, the Minister of Finance wrote to the chairman of the foreign exchange control board, setting a rate of 10 per cent premium buying and 10½ per cent selling for United States dollars.

2. The foreign exchange control board does not make profits as a result of the premium on the United States dollar. The profits of the special exchange fund account in the name of the Minister of Finance which was established by the Exchange Fund Act, 1935, and has been operated by the foreign exchange control board on behalf of the minister under the foreign exchange control order since September 15, 1939, are derived from the spread between the rates at which the board buys and sells foreign exchange and earnings on investments less the costs of operation of the exchange fund account and the board. In the near future the Minister of Finance proposes to table a report giving details of the operation of foreign exchange control during the war period and statements of the revenue and expenditures of the exchange fund account.

INCOME TAX—FARMERS—1944

Mr. BERTRAND (Terrebonne):

1. Has the Department of National Revenue, Income Tax Division, sent to farmers, in recent months, forms for their 1944 income tax?

2. Were such forms addressed by Ottawa or by income tax district offices?

3. Will the Department of National Revenue, Income Tax Division, require farmers to file returns previous to 1944?

4. Owing to the fact that the majority of farmers find it impossible to file a correct return of their business in 1944, will the Department of National Revenue require them to file a return for that year?

5. Has the farmer the privilege of deducting from his income tax the cost of his income tax return, the preparation of which, owing to the multiplicity of questions and details to be answered and given, must be entrusted to an accountant, or other person familiar with accountancy?

6. Is the farmer entitled to deduct from his general working expenses the amount of wages that he would pay to hired men if he had no sons, which amount he does not officially pay over to his sons, but the total payment of which is used later towards their settling on a farm?

7. Is the farmer entitled to deduct from his working expenses the amount for board which he gives to his sons who receive no fixed or regular wages, and, in the absence of wages, deduct the petty sums which he gives them weekly or monthly, and which fall under the heading of "expenses?"

8. What is the maximum percentage that a farmer can deduct yearly from his income tax for the purchase of farm implements?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. McCANN:

1. As a continuous procedure, as information discloses the necessity from time to time, the department sends to farmers and all other persons delinquent in filing their 1944 income tax returns, the forms, together with a letter requesting compliance with the law.

2. By income tax district offices.

3. All persons, farmers or otherwise, from time to time as information discloses delinquency, are requested to file income tax returns in accordance with the law.

4. Yes. The return is required. The difficulties are dealt with subsequently thereto.

5. No.

6. No.

7. If able-bodied sons, not claimed as dependents, regularly work during the year, the "amount for board" and wages actually paid as such are allowed as an expense.

8. The question pertains to depreciation of purchased implements and depreciation varies in respect of various classes of farm implements. The expected useful life of the asset is reasonably known by each farmer and forms the basis of his initial request for depreciation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS TO ACT AND INDIAN ADMINISTRATION GENERALLY

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved:

That a joint committee of the senate and house of commons be appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, Chapter 98, R.S.C., 1927, and amendments thereto and to suggest such amendments as they may deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, the following matters:

1. Treaty rights and obligations.
2. Band membership.
3. Liability of Indians to pay taxes.
4. Enfranchisement of Indians both voluntary and involuntary.
5. Eligibility of Indians to vote at dominion elections.
6. The encroachment of white persons on Indian reserves.
7. The operation of Indian day and residential schools.
8. And any other matter or thing pertaining to the social and economic status of Indians and their advancement, which, in the opinion of such a committee should be incorporated in the revised act.

[Mr. Murphy.]

That the following members be appointed to act on behalf of the House of Commons on the said joint committee, namely, Messrs. Arsenault, Blackmore, Brown, Brunelle, Bryce, Case, Castleden, Charlton, Farquhar, Gariepy, Gibson (Comox-Alberni), Glen, Harkness, Little, MacNicol, MacLean, Matthews (Brandon), Raymond (Wright), Reid, Richard (Gloucester), Stanfield, Stirling.

That a message be sent to the senate requesting their honours to appoint senators to act as members of the senate on the said special joint committee.

That the said committee have power to appoint from its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary to deal with specific phases of the problem aforesaid with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to print such materials from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

That the said committee shall report from time to time and that the provisions of standing order 65 limiting the number of members on special committees be suspended in relation thereto and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

He said: The motion before the house in a very real sense is self-explanatory. It represents the initial step toward a review by a committee of parliament of the legislation relating to the administration of Indian affairs, usually referred to as the Indian Act. It is, in the judgment of the government, highly desirable, one might almost say imperative, before a revision of the Indian Act is undertaken, certainly before the revised act is submitted to the house, that existing legislation, together with amendments that may be deemed necessary, be carefully studied not only from the point of view of the government and the taxpayer, but also from the point of view of the Indian, and in the light of his present-day needs.

Requests—I might almost say, demands—for this inquiry have come to us from representative groups of Indians, from church authorities, and from groups of citizens who over a period of years have displayed an active interest in the advancement of the Indian population of this country. It was at first suggested that a royal commission be appointed to investigate and report upon Indian treaty rights, the taxation of Indians employed off reserves, the right of the Indian to have representation in parliament, the Indian educational system, and a number of other matters. While the government from the outset conceded that the revision of the act was overdue and that the requests for an inquiry were not unreasonable, it was not an easy matter to decide on the exact procedure that would be likely to bring about the best results.

As I intimated to the house at the last session, I had at that time an open mind on the question as to whether a royal commission or a committee of parliament would serve best the purpose we had in mind. May I remind the house that the welfare of the Indian is the sole responsibility of the federal government. It is not a responsibility shared by the government with the provinces. This expression of opinion applies particularly to the enactment of legislation relating to Indian affairs.

After careful consideration the government reached the decision that a committee such as the one now proposed is in strict conformity with sound parliamentary practice. The task of undertaking a thorough undertaking of the Indian and his needs is, in our judgment, a definite responsibility of parliament and one that we should not seek to evade.

It is not my intention to enter into a lengthy discussion of the resolution before us at this stage. The terms of reference, if I may refer to them as such, are not designed to restrict in any way the scope or the character of the inquiry. They are presented in the form in which they appear rather for the purpose of emphasis. It is the desire of the government that the work of the committee should be as thorough, as comprehensive and as searching as it is possible to make it. With this thought in mind we shall do everything possible to have Indians and responsible citizens representing Indians appear as witnesses. We are not only willing but anxious to have the best counsel and advice that can be obtained from Indians and from citizens who will make respresentations on their behalf.

When I took part in the discussion of a motion to grant old age pensions to Indians at the last session I expressed the opinion that the dissatisfaction which appeared to exist among Indians was in the main attributable to certain causes which are readily ascertainable. May I be permitted to summarize what I said at the time?

I would not be fair to the house, however, if I sought to create an impression that any difficulties which exist in the administration of Indian affairs were due in whole or even in part to our lack of information as a government on existing conditions among the Indians. I am rather convinced that the measure of economy insisted upon by the Canadian taxpayer from 1929 to the outbreak of war, the demands of the war itself, more rigid enforcement on the part of provincial governments of laws relating to hunting, trapping and fishing, and the gradual encroachment of white citizens into areas where lands, although the property of the provinces, nominally at least had been recognized as exclusive Indian hunting and trapping areas, in the main have contributed to the conditions now confronting us. In any event the need for a comprehensive programme based on the immediate and future needs of the Indian population is becoming increasingly apparent.

The return of the natural resources to the prairie provinces and the administration of the lands by the provincial governments for which provision was made in the terms of the agreements entered into at that time, imposed greater restrictions on a number of Indians engaged in hunting and trapping. The house will be interested to learn that prior to the return of the natural resources to the provinces, a survey in 1939 indicated that over 30,000 licences were issued to white trappers in that year throughout the various provinces and territories, excluding the maritimes, while not more than 15,000 licences had been granted to Indian trappers. The fact is that as the population of the country steadily increases, and the demands on the part of the citizens for land and other rights multiply, the Indian becomes subject to keener competition in fields of endeavour where for centuries he enjoyed a virtual monopoly.

It would appear that we have reached a stage in our development as a nation when economic conditions will force us to do one of two things: (1) purchase at public expense the additional lands and additional hunting and trapping rights for an Indian population of 128,000, increasing at the rate of 1,500 a year; or, (2) decide on an educational and welfare programme that will fit and equip the Indian to enter into competition with the white man not only in hunting and trapping but in agriculture and in the industrial life of the nation. While I have no desire to indulge in over-simplification; while I realize that there are many issues involved in the proposal before us, nevertheless I feel that we have here the crux of what is usually referred to as the Indian problem. I find it difficult to convince myself that an extending Indian reserve system, imposing controls and wardships and reducing Indian responsibility to the minimum, would be or could be in the interests of these people.

The educational and welfare programme to which I have referred cannot, in the nature of things, accomplish much overnight. Nor should it be aimed at making the Indian into a white man. The Indian, as I see it, should retain and develop many of his native characteristics, and should ultimately assume the full rights and responsibilities of democratic citizenship.

I should like, with your permission, to read into the record for the benefit of the members of the committee particularly, a brief historical summary of Indian administration in this country.

Since the inception of British rule in North America the Indians have been regarded as a special and separate responsibility of government. From the time of the first British settlements in New England the title of the Indians to lands occupied by them was conceded and compensation was made to them for the surrender of their hunting grounds. The crown has always reserved to itself the exclusive right to treat with the Indians for the surrender of their lands, and this rule, confirmed by the royal proclamation of October 7, 1763, is still adhered to. In 1670, during the reign of Charles II, instructions were given to the governors of the colonies which, among other matters, directed that Indians who desired to place themselves under British rule should be well received and protected. There are still of record numerous agreements and treaties, dating back as far as the year 1664, made by the British with the Indians of New England, while Canada was still under French government. Later it was found necessary to establish an office devoted solely to the administration of Indian affairs, and in 1755 Sir William Johnson was appointed Indian superintendent with headquarters in the Mohawk valley country of the Six Nations confederacy in what is now the state of New York. Following the revolution, the office was removed to Canada and the title of the position was changed to superintendent general of Indian affairs. From that time on a continuing administrative organization has been maintained for the protection and advancement of the Indian population. At the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century the department was divided. The office of the superintendent general and the secretary of the department was established in Montreal, and that of the deupty superintendent general and assistant secretary, at Fort George, Niagara; and by a general order of May 13, 1816, the management of Indian affairs was placed under the control of the commander of the forces in the British North American provinces.

By another general order of April 13, 1830, the management of Indian affairs in Upper Canada was placed under Sir John Colborne, lieutenant governor for that province, while that in Lower Canada remained under military control. In 1830, by order of His Majesty's government, the Indian department in Upper Canada was separated from that of Lower Canada, the former being placed under His Excellency Sir John Colborne, with Colonel Sir James Givins as chief superintendent for the province. The department in Lower Canada was placed under the control of the military secretary at Quebec who at that time was Lieutenant Colonel Couper, and Lieutenant Colonel D. C. Napier was removed to the military secretary's office to act as secretary, with the pay and allowances of superintendent.

After the Act of Union of 1840, the head office of the Department of Indian Affairs, now united, continued to be at the seat of government, which under the old province of Canada was moved from one place to another. Until 1860 the imperial government was responsible for the management and expense of Indian affairs, but in that year it was decided that the province of Canada should assume this charge. By the act 23 Victoria, chapter 151, entitled "An Act respecting the management of the Indian lands and property", the management of Indian affairs was brought under the control of the Crown Lands Department from July 1, 1860, the commissioner of crown lands being from that date chief superintendent of Indian affairs.

After confederation the administration of Indian affairs, which had been under the management of the several provinces, came under the control of the Dominion of Canada, by the British North America Act, "powers of the parliament", dominion, section 91, subsection 24, "Indians, and Lands Reserved for the Indians". Pursuant to this authority the dominion parliament enacted various legislation concerning Indians, which was first consolidated in a single act, as it still is, in 1876.

Immediately following confederation, Indian Affairs was attached to the Department of the Secretary of State, and in 1873, when the Department of the Interior was created, Indian Affairs was attached to it as the Indian branch. In 1880 the Indian Act was again consolidated, and it was provided, section 4:

> There shall be a department of the civil service of Canada to be called the Department of Indian Affairs, over which the superintendent general of Indian affairs shall preside.

Chapter 28, 43, Victoria, 1880. Accordingly, Indian Affairs became a separate department and remained so until December 1, 1936, when by the mines and resources act it became the Indian Affairs branch of the newly-created Department of Mines and Resources. It is interesting to note that when the department of Indian Affairs was created in 1880 it comprised twenty-three officers at headquarters and one hundred in the field. To-day the Indian Affairs branch has a staff of about 70 at headquarters and 700 in the field. In addition, there is the Indian health service recently transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare. These services employ a staff of approximately 600, including physicians, nurses, and other employees, with sixteen hospitals.

In 1880 the total expenditure from parliamentary vote for Indians was, in round figures, $500,000. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945—last year—it was, exclusive of family allowance payments, approximately $6,000,000. This growth in personnel and expenditures represents increased and extended services to the Indians.

There are at present 2,000 Indian reserves, varying in size from a few acres to five hundred square miles. The group unit of Indian population is the "band", which means a body of Indians having lands or funds in common held in trust for them by the crown. There are six hundred of these bands, varying in size from a single family to more than 5,000 souls.

The unit of field administration is the Indian agency in charge of a resident local official, the Indian agent. At this date there are ninety-eight of these agencies. Closely connected with the Indian agency organization is the Indian school system, comprising 75 residential and 258 Indian day schools. These are operated by the department in conjunction with the leading religious denominations. At many of the agencies there are farming instructors, and in a number of localities the Indians receive supervision in specialized pursuits such as fur development projects, handicrafts and other activities.

The house will be interested and perhaps a little surprised to learn that the Indian Act of 1880, with amendments made from time to time, is still in effect. It has not been the subject of a general revision since that year. The basis of this act, or indeed of all Indian legislation and policy under British government in North America, is the special protection of the Indian in his person, his property, his advancement and his general well-being. The Indian is subject to certain restrictions but enjoys a measure of local self-government under the act. Those who do not wish to remain under Indian status may, on their own application if found qualified, be enfranchised by the governor in council, whereupon they cease to be Indians under the law and acquire full citizenship.

In passing, I may say that many Indians are taking advantage of that provision. Only last Tuesday I signed fifteen orders enfranchising Indians.

Mr. SENN: Is the act of 1880, together with subsequent amendments, consolidated?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. We have it here; it is consolidated for office purposes only. All the provisions of the act together with the amendments are here. A rough draft of the revised act will be submitted to the committee during the course of its deliberations. This rough draft represents an attempt on the part of the officials of the Indian Affairs branch to bring existing legislation more into accord with the needs of the Indians and present-day tendencies. I am personally of the opinion, however, that before the draft is considered the committee will wish to hear a comparatively large number of witnesses who will be anxious to make representations and express points of view. The task is assuredly not an easy one. If approached in the right spirit, however, as I am sure it will be, the results should be gratifying and encouraging to the white citizen and the Indian alike.

Finally, let me say that while a great deal of criticism has been directed against Indian administration during the last twenty-five years or so, there is a brighter side to this picture, the significance of which should not be overlooked. In numbers the race is increasing; in educational effort the Indian is developing, slowly perhaps, but nevertheless developing toward a better acquaintance with the ways of the white race. His blood is becoming steadily more mixed, which, in fact, points toward ultimate assimilation. It is possible, in my judgment, to say that too much emphasis has been frequently placed upon the fancied injustice of requiring the Indian to conform to changing conditions. In the last analysis it is both just and expedient to help the Indian to adjust himself to these conditions. It is neither necessary nor merciful in the long run to encourage him perpetually to continue in a state of backwardness or semi-backwardness. Nevertheless, as I have already indicated, the process of assimilation cannot be unduly hurried, nor must it be rushed. Time, we are told, heals all wounds, and in this healing process the scars of race tension, conflict and misunderstanding will, I feel sure, disappear.

Judging by the expressions of opinion that have been given not only in this house but all over the country, showing an interest in Indian affairs, I am sure the house will agree that this resolution is the first step to be taken, namely, the appointment of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. In that committee, which will have the revised amendments suggested by the Indian Affairs branch, and where witnesses from all over the country who may desire to express opinions and give information to the committee, will be heard, I am satisfied that the work, which seems momentous in the beginning may prove not so difficult in the end. I believe that out of this committee will come legislation and suggestions in administration which will help the development of the Indian, which I am sure is the desire of the house. For that reason I am moving this motion, hoping that the house will see fit to pass it and that the committee will be set up accordingly.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): As one who for many years has been interested in the study of Indian affairs and of all that pertains to the advancement of the Indian, I rise not to delay but to support the principles of the resolution as enunciated by the minister. I believe that the present minister is the first minister who has planned to inquire in a big way into every possible means of improving the whole Indian picture in Canada. With that objective of the minister—and I am sure in this I am speaking for other hon. members of this house—I am in hearty accord.

I have often wondered why it was that the Indians of Canada, who have been so long under the control of the white man, have not advanced as rapidly as have the Maoris of New Zealand and even the coloured races in South Africa. In New Zealand the Maoris now have a number of representatives in the parliament of that country, and the same is true of South Africa. I am not sure whether the coloured people of South Africa themselves sit in the South African parliament. My memory is that they elect white people to represent them in parliament, and that these white representatives of the South African coloured races speak for them. For that reason I have wondered why our so-called coloured native race—they are of a reddish or copper colour—have not advanced as far as the native races of the countries to which I have just referred. They have long been under the control of the white man. First they were under the control of the British—I am now speaking of the British in New York—under Sir William Johnson, the great administrator, and later under his son, Sir John Johnson. In Canada I believe Sir John Johnson was the first Indian administrator. If I may interject a suggestion I should like the minister to go down to Williamstown in the county of Glengarry some day where the first Indian administration house was built by Sir John Johnson. His house is still standing. It has passed out of the hands of the Johnson family, but I think it would be a fine gesture on Canada's part to purchase Sir John Johnson's old house, if it is for sale, and set it up as a museum of Indian relics in that part of Canada.

As I said at the beginning, I have been intensely interested in Indian affairs over a long period of time. My interest has necessitated some travel and impelled me to visit many reservations. In the course of these journeys to the reservations I would first seek out the chief of the immediate band or branch on whose reservation I then was to ascertain from him all I could and to inquire into what improvements could be made in Indian administration. From what the minister has said, I have no doubt that he intends to call to the committee the main chiefs, or those who represent them, of the various bands.

I myself have paid many visits to the Six Nations in the riding of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Charlton) and that of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). In those ridings are the remnants of the famous Six Nations. I am not just sure how many of the branches came to Brant and Haldimand, but certainly the Mohawks did. The Oneidas did and the Muncies went a little farther west in the county of Elgin and are still there. The Delawares were not of the Six Nations. They settled further west at Moraviantown in Kent. I believe there are Senecas, Oneidas, Onondagas and Mohawks in Brant. They were of the famous Iroquois tribe.

I hope that the outcome of the committee's investigation will result in a much greater advancement of Indian life along the line, economically, educationally and in a business way, so that we as a parliament may be the means of stepping them up to a much higher level than they occupy to-day. In my travels I have found a great difference as between various reserves in the advancement of the Indian tribes. As far as I recall, the Iroquois in Brant and Haldimand are perhaps more advanced than any other Indians in Canada, though it may be that some of the tribes in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have also made considerable advances, because they have been long associated with white men. If we compare what they have achieved with what has been achieved by members of the coloured race who have come to Canada, principally from Jamaica and the southern United States, we have to admit that the coloured race have most assuredly achieved a very great deal in every walk of life. The Indians also have achieved something—although I observe from what the minister has said, not as much as he would like to see.

In this investigation I am quite sure all hon. members of this house, including those serving on the committee, will use their best judgment and seek the best possible advice to draw up recommendations designed to advance the status of our Indians all along the line. I am not going to enter into a detailed discussion at the moment, because I do not think it is necessary. I could say a great deal about the Indians, but that can be done in committee, and if I said very much now I would simply repeat it in the committee later. I feel that I have done my duty by merely rising to support this proposal for the betterment of our Indians. It is high time we did something of this kind; in fact the time is long past when this should have been done. I am not blaming anyone. Having been here for seventeen years I know that almost invariably the Indian estimates come up in the last few hours of a session and are carried so rapidly that nothing can be said to advance the welfare of the Indians, with the exception of perhaps one or two of the principal speeches. So after this investigation is completed I hope much may be done for these native people.

Many Indian chiefs have given me their views on these matters. I have spoken to them all over Canada, as far north as at Arctic Red river; at lake Athabasca; the Norman Indians near where Norman Wells is now; the Stoneys in Alberta; the Fairford River Indians in northern Manitoba, and the Moose Lake Indians, also in northern Manitoba. Perhaps I should not have mentioned any particular bands at all, but now that I have done so I should mention the Blackfeet Indians; and in the tribe in the riding of the hon. member for Lethbridge, right in his home town of Cardston, I met some chiefs of this band, whose name always slips my mind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Bloods.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is it. I asked the chief why they called themselves the Bloods, and he replied, "Well, you know when a rich man has a son he is called a young blood. A man who owns a fast race horse calls it a blood. We are an up and coming band of Indians, so we call ourselves the Bloods." That was his explanation as to how they got that name. It would be interesting, I believe, to ascertain the origin of all these Indian names.

Now, Mr. Speaker, following the example of the minister in proposing this resolution, I merely wish to repeat that I am heartily in accord with the proposal and sincerely hope that it will result in a great advancement of the Indians all along the line so that they may take their place among the white men who owe so much to them. We have taken away so much from them that we should try our best to advance their interests now. We might even consider having representatives of the Indians sitting in this house, just as the Maoris have in New Zealand. That is something which should be kept in mind in this connection.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): First I should like to congratulate the minister, who is new in this department and who I think is tackling this job in a way that should bring success. I am glad he is setting up this committee to give all the members of the House of Commons an opportunity to help in the revision of the whole Indian Act. It is a big job, and I think those who have made any study whatever of the Indian problem will realize what a tremendous task lies ahead. For instance, the committee has to revise treaty rights and obligations. The treaties alone require a tremendous amount of study. The committee also will have to consider band membership, the liability of Indians, the encroachment of white persons on Indian reserves, and so on. During the last few months I have done quite a lot of reading on the history of the Indians, and I find that the whole story of the treatment of the Indians by the white men has been one of exploitation all the way through. Not long ago I was talking to an Indian, who said, "The white man is very greedy. He grabs this and he grabs that," and that is so. Whenever the Indians had a reserve that included good farm land, the white man found a way of getting them to take inferior land, and it has been the same with timber. There were good timber berths on some of the Indian lands, and the white man found ways and means of getting the Indians to give up that timber. So I say it will be a tremendous job to look through these old treaties and old deeds of gift to find out just what the Indians have had to put up with.

I rise to-day more particularly to give the committee a little encouragement. I know some people have said the Indian is no good, that you cannot make anything out of him. During the Easter recess I had an opportunity to go to the Six Nations Indian reserve just south of Brantford, and I would not have missed that trip for anything. There I found very highly civilized, well-educated, cultured Indians, and I want to say something about some of the things I saw. In the first place I believe the whole reserve would average up pretty well as a farming community with any community of white people. They have eleven day-schools on this reserve. All the teachers are Indians, most of whom were educated on the reserve and who then went on further with their education. They have fourteen Indian teachers teaching the Indian children. I looked at their work and spoke to one of the teachers, and I believe the work those children were doing would compare favourably with the work done in any of the white schools. They have their own agricultural society. They have a very neat little town, Oshweken, on the outskirts of which they have their own agricultural grounds. Those grounds are neat, as everything else in connection with that reserve is neat. When you enter the agricultural grounds you go through a double arch gate, and inside to the right you find a recreation hall. I think these Indian teachers have done a wonderful work in preparing the young people of the reservation for citizenship. The recreation hall is large enough to permit the playing of basketball and softball. The young people meet twice a week and they can play these games. They are taught archery and many other things. They even have an orchestra of eighteen or twenty pieces, and also several small bands. They have a seed cleaning plant which is capable of cleaning all the seed used on the reservation.

I asked them how they were making out as far as higher education was concerned and they told me that in a number of the schools they teach first year high school but that quite a number have gone on to take higher education. I asked how many had entered the professions and they gave me a list. There is a Doctor T. J. Jamieson who is practising medicine at the present time in Detroit. Doctor F. A. Johnson is an eye specialist in Akron, Ohio. D. J. Smith, B.S.A., is in New Zealand. Doctor E. Jamieson is a science teacher in North Toronto collegiate. Doctor T. A. Miller is a homeopath specialist in tuberculosis. A lawyer named Norman Lickers is practising in Brantford. A very interesting person is Doctor Minnie S. Buerk. Doctor Buerk first graduated in Canada as a nurse. She went to the United States and married a doctor in Detroit. About a year and a half later her husband died, and she then went to the university there and took a course in medicine. She is now practising in Detroit. Another interesting person of whom I heard was a girl who had also graduated as a nurse in Canada. She went to the United States and was employed to take care of a sub-normal son of the Sears family—the Sears-Roebuck people. This boy could hardly speak and had little use of his hands. This girl taught the boy not only to speak, but also to read and write and how to use his hands. Eventually she married one of the members of the Sears family.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Three parsons graduated from these schools, one of them Reverend Jeno Porter, who broadcasts every Sunday from Brantford. I think it would be very interesting for any hon. member who happened to be in that vicinity to visit this reserve. It is an illuminating illustration of what can be done with the Indians. As I said before, some people have an idea that you cannot make anything out of an Indian. I admit that at times it may seem a big job, but there is no doubt that there are individuals on every reserve who have the capacity to learn, and they should be given every opportunity to get an education.

We have slipped up badly in the education of our Indians. Many of the reserves depend entirely upon residential schools. I have nothing against the residential school, because I know it is doing a lot of good work, but a large percentage of the children on some of the reserves do not go to school because there are no day schools. Last winter, speaking to a band of Indians, I told them that the Indians themselves must accept some of the responsibility of educating their people. I told them that they would have to do what the white people were doing, that is, have compulsory education so that their children would have to go to school.

I think we shall have to get the cooperation of the Indians before we can make much headway with their education. I suggest to the minister that when he is choosing men who are to be agents or teachers, he should not select them in a haphazard manner. They should be chosen for their special qualifications, and the main qualification should be an understanding of the Indian and an ability to get the Indian to cooperate with them.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in favour of the terms and implications of this resolution, and I wish to compliment the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) upon having brought the matter up for discussion in the House of Commons. I believe a similar discussion was originated last year by a private member's resolution, and some hon. members were afraid that the question might be left in abeyance. We are glad indeed to see this demonstration of the alertness of the minister and his department.

I am glad that the resolution calls for the setting up of a committee of members of parliament rather than a royal commission. I am not against royal commissions as such; often they have done splendid work, but in dealing with a question of this kind, in which departments of government are directly concerned and in connection with which there is no legal point involved, I believe the best procedure is to set up a committee composed of members of parliament.

If you read the names of the hon. members comprising the committee you will see that they come from every part of Canada. Many of them are familiar not only with their own local Indian problems but also with problems affecting Indians generally across the country. Again I should like to compliment the minister upon having taken action for the appointment of the committee. Royal commissions have done good work in the past, but if we are to reach practical conclusions I do not think there is any better way of doing so under our parliamentary system than to set up a committee of this kind.

I may be a little disappointed personally because I have not been named as a member of the committee, but even though I had been named it might have been impossible for me to attend its sessions, because I hope that the external affairs committee will soon begin to sit and I expect to be quite busy there; besides I have to attend other committees.

I happen to represent a section of the country which takes in the James Bay area in which there is a large Indian population. There are local problems to be faced, and there are problems national in character. I know that all of them will be dealt with by this committee in a proper and practical way.

The committee should not be satisfied with sitting in Ottawa only. Although it might take a lot of time, I think the committee should visit the different centres of Indian population from the Atlantic to the Pacific—and I am referring particularly to my own section. I hope the committee will find it possible to visit the Indian population at Moosonee, Moose Factory, Fort George and Fort Albany. I realize that the Indian Affairs branch has been giving a good deal of attention to these problems and spending considerable money, with fruitful results, but I think it would be worth while if the members of the committee could visit the Indians. It might cost a little more, but it would be money well spent.

I would not for a moment attempt to dictate or give direction to the chairman or members of the committee, but I do hope that my suggestion in this regard will be implemented. It would be a wonderful way to get to the root of the problem. I was greatly enlightened, although I had thought I knew something about the Indian problem, by the speeches of hon. members of the C.C.F. and Progressive Conservative parties on this subject in present and past sessions. The member for Comox-Alberni gave a most interesting account of the Indian people, describing their fine qualities and festivities and customs, which I am sure were a revelation not only to the members of parliament but to the people of Canada generally.

I hope that the committee will visit every section of our Indian population and will consider the Indian problem not only in itself but also as it is related to Canada as a whole. The committee will have a lot of work to do. I think it will be impossible for them to make a final report this year, but I am sure that the work they do will be well received not only by parliament but by the whole country. It will take much time and involve personal sacrifices. I do not mean that the members should pay their travelling expenses. For a number of years before I was Deputy Speaker of the house I was a member of the war expenditures committee, and when it was first mooted that the committee would travel I thought that the expenses should be borne by the individual members. But it did not take me very long to see that that would be unfair to members of parliament, and so I hope that the principle followed in that case will apply to this committee, because it will have to cover a good deal of territory. The members of the committee may have to go to the Yukon and the northwest territories. They may have to go to the habitats of the Eskimo. Certainly they will have to visit the northern section of my part of the country in order to study the actual conditions on the ground.

It is said that the Indians, generally speaking, do not mix with the white population. That does not hold true of my part of the country. I know many full-blooded Indians who do mix with the white population, and to their benefit. I know full-blooded Indians who are succeeding in the professions, and I hope that the educational system for the Indians will make it possible for them to become scientific agriculturists, technicians and craftsmen of various kinds. Some of the Indians are excellent doctors, and others good dentists. It would not be doing justice to the Indians, with all their natural talents, to keep them on their reserves and expect them always to earn their living by hunting and trapping. Many of the younger men have gone into the outside world, particularly those who have enlisted or attended our public and high schools. They are proud of the calling of their forefathers, but their horizons have widened and many of them have become enterprising co-citizens of the white population in our section of the country. I am convinced, however, that contact with the white man has not often been of benefit to the Indians. It has disturbed, in many, their way of living, and means must be found of maintaining the integrity of the Indians' own habitat.

The Ontario government about eight years ago set aside a large section of territory south of James bay, embracing thousands of square miles where the timber is not very heavy, to develop beaver, otter and mink. I have been told that ten or twelve years from now there will be sufficient of that wild game in that territory to give a living to at least ten thousand Indians, and some of the white population too. A scheme of that kind should be enlarged, and I hope the committee will find it possible to recommend the setting aside of thousands of square miles which should be left entirely to the Indians where they can make a living by hunting and trapping. To that they are entitled, and they should be assisted and encouraged by a scheme of that sort. The time has arrived when the demarcation line should be withdrawn between federal and provincial activities and when schemes such as I have mentioned should be instituted in many sections of northern Canada. I am an optimist by nature. I implicitly believe in our wonderful country and its future. As we have heard many times on the floor of the house, and read in the press, it is a land with wide open spaces, no doubt designed by Providence to remain as such for all time to come. Nevertheless there are ways of raising the standards of the Indians and providing them with fruitful employment, and one industry to which they are peculiarly adapted is fur raising. The furs we produce in the northern section of Canada command a premium in the world market. Any fur coming from my section of the country, from around James bay or Hudson bay, whether it be white fox, otter, beaver or mink, commands a higher price than furs from any other part of the world except northern Russia. A scheme such as the Ontario government has started for the raising of these fur-bearing animals will not only be helpful to the Indians in providing them with employment and a living, but in time to come will be of benefit to the provincial and federal treasuries as well. The scheme will not run into millions of dollars but into hundreds of thousands, and in a few years will be self-sustaining. I should like to see the committee recommend the setting aside and helping the development of areas on the shores of Hudson bay and James bay and across northern Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba such as the Ontario government has started.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. On account of the great distances, the Indians often are deprived of hospital accommodation for days and weeks, and I was therefore glad to see the other day that an air line was to be established from Moosonee to Cochrane, Timmins and Haileybury. That will help to relieve the situation, because these poor Indians follow their trap lines at the risk of life and limb and have to face all the hazards of climate. Tuberculosis is rampant among them, and sanitary conditions are not always what they should be. Often a sore will develop into cancer or some other disease, and so there must be rapid transit to bring those who need it out to civilization for prompt medical attention.

I do not know whether my information is correct, but I have been told that it is the intention of the government to build a large hospital in the James bay section. I believe it was in the year 1928 that I had the good fortune to see an Indian hospital built next to the municipal hospital in Cochrane. It gave fine service to the Indian population. They came to it from the east and west on the transcontinental line, and also from the north and south of our section; but after a number of years the Indian department decided, I believe seven years ago, to close that institution and turn it over to our own hospital. The service was maintained in the same way except that the local hospital was paid so much per patient. But that has not given the necessary service to the Indians. I do not know how correct my information is, but I understand that the department intends to build a fairly large hospital at Moosonee or Moose Factory. I have no right to dictate to the department, but speaking as one who knows the local and regional situation I fervently hope it will be found possible for the department to build that hospital in Cochrane. I am not speaking from the point of view of home politics. The question is away above any political considerations, and I commend the hon. members who have spoken for avoiding political criticisms. But my advice is based on several reasons. First, a large section of our Indian population starts from the shores of the Hudson bay and spreads as far as Amos on the Transcontinental. We have a large section in Matagami that spend most of their summer there, and also at Algoma and west to the town of Hearst on the Canadian National. I know the question comes to mind, what will become of the Indians of the Hudson bay and James bay sections? It may be found necessary in order to give the best service to that area to have an air service from the Moose bay section and Fort George to that hospital in Cochrane.

I am leaving these thoughts for thorough study and consideration by the minister and officials of his department. They have always been receptive of any practical suggestions I have placed before them, and I know that the permanent heads of this department and the ministers themselves have always wanted to play fair with this class of our population.

While Canada may not have done for the Indians all that we could have wished her to do, she has done better than most other countries. At least we consider them as human beings; the policy has not been one of extermination, but of preservation, of advancement, and of trying to do the best we could with them.

There are two matters referred to in the motion which I should like briefly to mention. First, section 5, eligibility of Indians to vote at dominion elections. Personally I believe that the vote should be accorded to our Indian population. If it were necessary that any citizens in order to vote should have an intelligence test, I am convinced that ninety-five if not ninety-nine per cent of our Indian population could pass that test. For our Indians to hew a living out of the northern sections of our country in districts like the Hudson bay and James bay, to face the climatic conditions involved in fur trapping, and successfully carry on that pursuit, requires much enterprise, initiative, courage and intelligence. The election act as it stands is a baffling piece of legislation. It is perfectly right, no doubt, that the franchise should be extended to Indians who enlisted in world wars I and II, and to their families, but you would be surprised at the reaction of the average Indian when he sees that one of his relatives has the right to vote but that he is denied the vote because, although he wished to do so, for some reason he was unable to enlist. I hope this anomaly will be rectified, because I do not believe in making distinctions between various classes of people. If you allow one section to vote and debar another section, you invite and are bound to have criticisms which are entirely warranted.

I would refer also to paragraph 6, the encroachment of white persons on Indian reserves, I hope members of the committee will study this question thoroughly. No doubt our civilization and the work of our missionaries have brought much blessing to the Indian population, but at times there is also resentment in the hearts of many Indians at the hardships which have been caused them by a few so-called white people—white in name only, not in respect of their behaviour and conduct to the Indian people. The law could be so defined that the Indians shall have exclusive rights in most parts of their own territory, and they shall be protected from any depredation or violation of the things they cherish. After all, they have maintained their own civilization, their own way of living, and all of us who have any acquaintance with them know how sincere and honest they are. Anyone who has hunted in my own section will have seen along the trails some caches containing meat, and Indian after Indian will tell you that never under any circumstances, unless threatened with starvation, has a single pound of that meat been stolen by the Indians themselves. They would rather suffer than take food which has been placed there for the use of people in need of it. They have some wonderful qualities; they have also resentment in their hearts at the depredations and the temptations which they have suffered at the hands of people who are bent upon exploiting them. At this point, as one who knows something of the activities of the Hudson's Bay company and Révillon Frères, may I say that if you go to the Hudson bay—where Révillon Frères are not located at this time—you will see people at the head of those posts working with the Indians, playing the game with them in every way. But sometimes outsiders disturb the peace of mind of the Indians and rob them of the fruits of their activities.

I wish again to compliment the minister upon having presented this motion. I know that splendid and lasting results will be accomplished. We do not need to be impatient. It is a complex question, and it shows the fine spirit of our parliament that, in a matter in which, perhaps, very few votes are involved, there is not one of us but who, for reasons of humanitarianism, wants to relieve these people of sickness and suffering, to remedy the lack of hospitalization and provide proper education and a place in our national life. When it comes to craftsmanship and education, the department has done wonderful work. Modern methods of trapping, fishing and knitting are taught to our Indians. So the situation at the present time is not bad, but, in the words of the minister, it can be improved. In trying to do this through the work of the committee, pursuant to the directive given by the minister himself, I am positive that our country, which can be proud to some extent of its past record in dealing with the Indian population, will have even more reason for pride when the recommendations of the committee now being formed have been implemented.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I congratulate the minister at the outset upon bringing in this motion, and may I also congratulate him on being the first minister for a good many years who has taken enough interest in this particular branch of his department to desire a thorough housecleaning. However good may be the record of the Indian department—and I think all must concede that it has many good qualities—there certainly must be room for improvement. The minister has adopted one of the means of determining what might be that room for improvement and what measures might appropriately be undertaken to effect the necessary changes. Out in my territory the people feel that there should have been a royal commission instead of a parliamentary committee, and a good many reasons have been advanced for this. The fine programme which the member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) outlined for this committee's activities would indicate that probably the committee will be called upon to do such an excellent, such a thorough job as might leave no real demand for a commission. We might be able to do all the work that a commission could do. But those in my territory who advocate a commission point to the fact that the members of a committee of parliament, no matter how wisely that committee may be chosen, will hardly have representatives of the Indians themselves on the personnel of the organization. They feel that certainly there should have been Indian organizations represented, and if we had had a royal commission it would have been a simple matter to include among the personnel several outstanding chiefs and leaders across the country. They point out that it will be exceedingly difficult for a House of Commons committee to do the necessary travelling.

I was almost alarmed at the picture which the member for Cochrane painted. I am wondering how we are going to take care of all the work that requires to be done here and at the same time do the travelling which that member has outlined for us. However, I am certainly in favour of doing everything possible to ensure a thorough job on this question.

I believe we should see what the different tribes do, the conditions under which they live. My own limited experience with Indians has shown me that the conditions under which they live vary widely from tribe to tribe. Consequently it looks to me as if, unless we see a good many of them in their living conditions, it will be difficult for us to be realistic in any decision we arrive at.

It is not going to be possible for us to hear all the witnesses we ought to hear unless we do a good deal of travelling. This would argue the advisability of having a royal commission rather than a parliamentary committee. The expenses would probably have been less if we had had a royal commission. I am not prepared at the moment to pronounce on that whole question. The thoroughness with which we go into the task will require, I believe, more than a parliamentary committee will be able to rise to.

I do not want to be dubious about the matter, but this has given us one of the reasons why there should have been a royal commission. Everyone suspects a parliamentary committee of having a certain amount of party bias, no matter how well the committee may do its work—at any rate everyone does outside parliament. If we had a royal commission, however, it would be possible to remove all suspicion of anything like party bias in dealing with the question.

We must grant, I believe, that there is a good deal of room for improvement. The Indians in my constituency, in the Blood Indian reserve, read the fine remarks made with reference to Indians being wards of the nation, and they laugh a mirthless laugh. They fail to see how the treatment that has been accorded them can in any way justify the expression "wards of the nation". They feel that they have had to do things in the hard way, and quite often it has been a case "root hog, or die", and they felt that they were close to dying.

There are several sections of the Indian act which the people in my area feel should be improved. They are of the opinion that section 18 should be amended. I will not go into details to show in what respect it should be amended, but the idea is that there is too much dictatorial power exercised in the enforcement of that section. The Indians believe that the chiefs and counsellors ought to have adequate pay. Not very long ago several chiefs were in my home from the Blood Indian reserve and were pointing out to me what an expensive business it was being a chief or a counsellor, how far they had to travel on the reserve to hear the problems they were called upon to decide. One of them said to me, "You member of parliament and it cost you a lot of money to travel; I chief and I get no money but I have to travel too." That I felt was a sound observation.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you say?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I said nothing; that seemed to me to be the wisest course. However, I decided that the Indians had a good case. I believe we should make provision for reimbursing these gentlemen for out-of-pocket expenses and any losses they incur as a result of having to neglect their own work to discharge the duties in connection with the position they hold.

The question of military service is one which is exercising the Indians, and a good many of the white people as well. Much attention must be given that question, I should not like to make a pronouncement at the moment as to whether I would favour complete freedom from military service. I submit however that the problem should be carefully studied.

Treaty rights which were granted to the Indians have been in many cases disregarded, as far as I can see. As I recall it, the Indians in my constituency signed in 1877 a treaty known as treaty No. 7. In that treaty there are a good many stipulations which have not been observed. That is not as it should be. What the reasons are I do not know, but I believe we ought to find out and reaffirm the treaty rights of the Indians. When the Blood Indians and those working with them signed that treaty they believed the white man meant what he said. If the white man did not mean what he said, then we had better see to it that we say it again and mean it.

The education of the Indians has occupied a good deal of my attention throughout the last twenty years. I have felt that there was much to be desired on the reservation in my constituency. In the first place—and I am speaking in a purely impersonal way—I find it difficult to see how we can guarantee the Indians an education when we are consigning every Indian on the reserve to become either a Roman Catholic or an Anglican in order to go to school. There are two residential schools, one Roman Catholic and the other Anglican. I have no fault to find with either of these churches, but to say that every Indian should have to become a member of one or the other in order to get an education is to say something which seems reckless and illogical in a country such as Canada. Nevertheless that is the situation. All the education which the Indians obtain in my constituency has been obtained in one or the other of these residential schools, which are definitely religious schools. This is a matter which ought to be considered with great care.

Among our treaty obligations with the Indians was the guarantee that we would educate the Indian, and we are falling far short of giving the Indians on the Blood Indian reserve what we would call an adequate education. That matter must be probed and a proper remedy prescribed. In my judgment, there should be modern every-day schools. In my constituency the Blood Indian reservation is a very long stretch of land of many miles. The Indians have to travel a considerable distance. It would not be so bad if they had automobiles, but if they have to travel by team all the way from the remote reaches of the reservation with their children up to the schools and come up occasionally to see the children, they are put to exceedingly great inconvenience. It ought to be possible for us to establish day schools on reservations similar to the rural schools which we gave to our white people scattered over the prairies. Therefore it should not be necessary for the Indians to send their children long distances to residential schools for many months at a time.

It is a well-understood principle by all people who give thought to educational matters that education after all is not only just a matter for the schools to take care of. There are at least three elements involved in education. One of these is the school; certainly another ought to be the home, and the third ought to be the church. Because of the way the children are being educated on the Blood Indian reservation, the home has no chance at all. In fact for over half of the time the children are entirely separated from their parents. Frequently at the end of their education they come back to find the parents do not know them and they do not know the parents, so widely separated have they become from what they were when they left their homes. This matter ought to be taken care of. So far as I can see the only way to take care of it is to establish day schools at convenient places in the reservations.

Indian parents have a right to the company of their children just as much as white parents have a right to the company of theirs. They have a perfect right to influence their children. When the Indians signed a treaty with us they did not sign away their rights to bring up their children as Indians. They have a perfect right to bring up their children as Indians if they wish to do so.

There is another matter that is rather serious. On the reservation in my constituency many of the parents need the assistance of their boys and girls when they are making hay and doing other work. They need the help of their boys and girls just as much as the white people do; yet the boys are away until they are fifteen or sixteen years of age, and the parents have to get along without them. That is a matter which ought to be looked into. It is another problem which can be solved only by the use of the every-day school.

It is suggested by some—I am not prepared to suggest it specifically for the Blood Indian reservation because I am not well enough informed on the matter—that there ought to be not only a day school but a semi-residential school here and there on the reservation. It is suggested that it ought to be possible for parents to send their children to residential schools where they can stay five nights a week and come home for the week-end. Such an arrangement would overcome many of the disadvantages which now obtain by reason of having all the children go to a complete residential school. This is a matter which ought to be given careful consideration by the committee, and upon which recommendations ought to be made.

It is advocated by some that there should be three kinds of schools on reservations where conditions are favourable. There should be a residential school, a semi-residential school here and there where conditions warrant it, and a day school in other places where conditions warrant it.

There is another matter which is receiving considerable attention in some parts of the west. Some Indians desire to send their children to schools which are outside the reservation. In other words, Indians who are better off, more ambitious and progressive desire to send their children to a school in a white community. They find that the children make more progress in those schools, but the cost involved in sending a child to a school outside a reservation is often so great as to render it completely prohibitive, regardless of how desirous the parent may be of giving his children that educational advantage. It is suggested by some that the government ought to be prepared, where children have the opportunity and desire to go to a school in a white community, to pay the tuition and an allowance which would enable the child to have such advantages as adequate laundry service, and so on, which are necessary to enable him to live in that kind of community without being self-conscious, so that he may have the chance to develop. This is a matter which ought to have serious consideration if we are desirous of having the Indians become one with us, as I am sure we are; if we wish them to assimilate with us in due time. I can think of no more direct method of accomplishing that objective than allowing the boys and girls to go from the reservations into the schools of white children, so that they can grow up in that environment, thereby becoming accustomed to the ways of the whites, and go home to their tepees at night. In this way they would be put in a position to compete and give to the country the kind of service of which they are capable.

I could say a great deal more on this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I feel that if I use up any more time I shall probably be depriving other hon. members of the opportunity to give an expression of their feelings in this regard. After all, it is a matter which affects every one of us; it is not a party matter; it is an national matter, a matter of great concern. I shall therefore content myself by saying that I heartily approve this resolution, if it is impossible to have a royal commission. I really believe that it would be better to have a royal commission. Perhaps the establishment of a committee to go into this problem will be the first step leading to the appointment of a royal commission, because the members of this committee, after wrestling with the problem for a year, may become convinced that a royal commission is the only solution and may so recommend. However, let me repeat that since it is impossible to have a royal commission at the present time I heartily approve the appointment of this committee and again wish to congratulate the minister on having introduced the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I can speak with some measure of intelligence on this subject, and especially on this motion because of my personal experience, past and present, with the Indians. First of all I taught for a time in 1907 in a Regina industrial school. My experience there taught me that the pupils in that school would compare favourably, physically or mentally, with our white pupils. Many of the pupils who passed through that school went on and made their name in Canadian history.

Physically I had the pleasure of drilling a soccer footfall team for a month in that school and they took the drilling well. We went to Regina where they thought they had a football team. When we were through with the game the Regina football team knew how to take defeat. From that time up to the present I have kept in contact with some of those pupils.

Then I served on a committee under the leadership of the late Doctor Baird of Manitoba college from 1897 to 1908. We studied the needs and possibilities of the Indians. On that committee I learned many things that I never forgot.

Another reason why I speak on this subject is that I have had personal relationships with the Indians. I am an Indian chief. Those who speak in this house as ordinary members speak only as white men. I speak as a combination of the white and the red. I am Chief Sky of the Ojibway Indians, and it is no mean tribe, especially when you see them led by such men as the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), who is another chief. We just do not belong to the ordinary common people. We are common people, it is true, but we have a little more; we have ability to do things in a modern way. I told the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) so last year, because I was with an Indian agent on a farm in the Nipigon district which we inspected, and where they did not have to buy artificial fertilizer. They went down to the lake and brought back wagonloads of fish which they scattered in the drills and I never saw better potatoes. Some men would say they had fish and chips as a result, but that is not the way the Indians live; they always wash their potatoes before eating them.

In visiting these schools I found the children pretty well attended to. Under the direction and companionship of the Indian agent of the Chippewa Indians I learned many things. I learned that they wondered why they did not have citizenship, like the rest of Canada. People born in Canada whose sons served in the last war and this war are just as much entitled to citizenship as even those who come from the north of Ireland. We have certain needs. Our hospitalization can be improved. Perhaps our public school system, whether under the leadership of the Protestant or Roman Catholic church, should be thoroughly examined and kept right up to the standard of these two branches of the Christian church. I would say, too, that when we have Indian agents of the character of Jerry Burke, who shows splendid judgment, efficiency and readiness to look after the needs of the Indians and give them leadership, our Indians will be well served.

So I would say to the minister that we of the Ojibway Indian band will support him, not with red paint and feathers, not with tom-toms and tomahawks, but by showing him and this government that we are capable of being good citizens.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I welcome the introduction of this resolution, Mr. Speaker, by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). Some of the Indians have been asking for a royal commission, but if this committee is given sufficient power to bring before it an adequate representation of Indians, in order to present their grievances, perhaps it will serve the purpose.

Speaking for the Indians of my constituency I would say there are many things that need to be cleaned up. We have young Indians from the Fisher river and Pequis reserves lying in gaol for trapping muskrats. These young Indians still feel they are within their rights, and they do not believe they have done anything wrong. We may be able to straighten out such matters in such a committee. There is also the question of the land in St. Peter's reserve which was leased or sold to the provincial government; that is the Netley marsh. If this land was surrendered, as the government maintains, why do the Indians still claim they never agreed to the sale? That is another matter than can be straightened up in this committee.

The young Indians of the constituency of Selkirk who fought overseas and are now coming back have new ideas. They have seen how other people live. They have been trained in the army, and they question such practices as taking water from a river into which, a little further upstream, the sewage of a town is dumped. These boys have learned that sanitation, hygiene and nutrition are essential to decent living. Tuberculosis is increasing among the Indians. Last year the department granted more money than ever before, but I am quite sure a great deal more will have to be spent before this disease is brought under control. There is the question of old age pensions for Indians; that can be discussed in this committee. There is the matter of the conditions in which some of these old Indians are living in the northern part of my constituency; we can bring that before this committee when the time comes.

There will be educational problems which require to be straightened out. I have in mind as one example the fact that when an Indian becomes enfranchised his children immediately have to stop going to the Indian school, though there may not be a school operated by the provincial government within ten or twenty miles. I am sure the federal Indian department and the provincial department of education could do a good job by cooperating to see that these Indians have an opportunity to obtain an education.

Again I welcome the appointment of this committee, which will afford these Indian bands, Indian organizations and people interested in the welfare of the Indians an opportunity to present their views, comments and recommendations to members of the Senate and House of Commons in an endeavour to correct any wrongs that may exist and in general to legislate for the improvement of the welfare of our Indians. I do not intend to say any more at this time, since I understand the minister would prefer to have any complaints brought before the committee. I am happy to be on it and am looking forward to the opportunity in the near future of bringing to the attention of the committee the representations of the various Indian bands in the constituency of Selkirk.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): I should like to make two or three brief observations on this lengthy resolution. In the first place I do not see that any good purpose will be served by a lengthy debate, such as seems to be developing at the present time. What is wanted is to get the resolution passed and the committee at work. The Indians themselves are sick and tired, I know from speaking to a large number of them, of people talking over their problems, making observations about them, and getting nothing done. As far as I can see, we are just wasting the time of the house in debating this matter at the present time. Let us pass the resolution and get something done.

As far as I have been able to determine, the majority of the Indians, and certainly a very large number of organizations which are friendly to the Indians and are supporting them, have been pressing for the appointment of a royal commission. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has gone at some length into the matter of a royal commission and some of the advantages which might accrue from it. Personally I think that would be a better way to handle this investigation into Indian affairs, if for no other reason than I think it would have been more satisfactory to the Indians and those friendly to the Indians than a parliamentary committee of this kind. However, since the government have decided on a parliamentary committee I believe they can be assured that we shall all give full cooperation, as I am sure will be the case with the various organizations interested in the welfare of our Indians.

The minister has indicated that full opportunity will be given the Indians to make representations to this committee, and I trust he used the word "full" in its widest meaning. I hope there will be no tendency to put pressure on Indians from any reservation to prevent them from bringing forward their problems and making what complaints they have to make. That was one of the reasons why a lot of them wanted a royal commission appointed. They felt that with a parliamentary committee they would have less chance to be heard and less chance to put forward their own points of view. I trust that we shall now go ahead and pass the resolution instead of wasting any more time in talk.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) for bringing forward this resolution. The Indians in my district did not want a royal commission; they wanted the problem dealt with in this manner. They felt that a royal commission would be too cold-blooded an affair; they wanted some body appointed, something in the way of a round-table conference, before which they could place their problems; they wanted to sit down with the members of parliament who make the laws.

I met the brotherhood which represents the Indians on the northwest coast of British Columbia; I also made a visit to the Indian village of Old Massett on the Queen Charlotte islands in order to find out what grievances they had, and they had many. The education of the Canadian Indian in years gone by has not been very good and many new requirements have to be provided for. The whole thing is a disheartening mess. I found in the school at Old Massett that the grade seven pupils were using grade six books while the grade five pupils were using grade four books. They simply did not have proper textbooks for the children. The Indian agent has been told of this but no action has been taken. There are no lights in the school and as hon. members know, in that latitude the days are rather short in the winter time. There is no library; there are no reference books, and no help has been received from the agent in connection with these deficiencies.

The Indians want to know who inspects the school. Apparently there is no proper inspection. The Indians tell me that the boarding schools are under the domination or control of the various religious denominations. They would like to have schools like we have, that is, government controlled education. It is granted that the people running these schools have the highest motives, but too many of them are picked for their religious qualifications rather than for their ability to teach, under modern conditions especially.

The teacher in the school at Old Massett is receiving $95 a month plus the cost of living bonus. I am told that the salaries paid in some of the residential schools are as low as $60 a month. When we realize the conditions a schoolteacher in an Indian village is up against we must know that we cannot get the right class of teacher to teach in an Indian village unless higher salaries are paid. It would pay this country to pay these teachers more than is normally paid to the ordinary day schoolteacher. These teachers have more difficult problems to meet and they must be more understanding. If proper salaries were paid a better class of teacher could be induced to go on the Indian reservations and make the teaching of these people their life work.

The inspector of the department states that day schools are more effective than residential schools. Apparently the residential schools break up the school day into so many hours of schooling and so many hours of actual work. Under modern conditions such a procedure is outlawed. These people will have to adapt themselves to present-day technology development at relatively a much faster rate than we had to.

I have here a description of the sanitary conditions in the village of Kitketla. These people state that they have no drinking water, that some people must depend upon rain water. Others dig holes in the ground but they cannot go very deep because of the bedrock. Hon. members know the kind of water you get when you can go down only two or three feet. Is it any wonder that there is so much sickness among the Indians? They tell me that there is a lake up on the hill and that all the government would have to do is to put in a pipe to provide water for the village. The Indian agent promised to have this done this summer, but nothing has happened. Previous Indian agents made no attempt to solve this problem.

The condition of the school is, to put it mildly, a disgrace. It is contended that the school is a source of tuberculosis. There are forty-eight families there and four babies died in three months. The size of the school is thirty-four by twenty-two feet; it has a seating capacity of thirty-six, and seventy pupils are registered. The older ones go in the morning and the younger ones in the afternoon. Some of the children do not want to go to school because the floor is full of holes through which the rats can crawl. This is the condition that these people have to face.

The Indians in British Columbia do not come under treaty rights. A total of $20,000,000 has been spent on Indians during the past fifty years and this amounts to $4.10 per capita per annum for the Indians in that province. They would like to see some sort of credit set-up arranged so that they could buy their own fishing gear and boats and not be under the control of the canning companies. This would give them a degree of independence which they have not had in years gone by.

Indian Affairs branch will have to take some responsibility for housing conditions in the canneries. No matter what is done on the reservation, when these people go to the canneries the conditions under which they must live are definitely bad for their health. The provincial authorities are not doing a great deal about the matter. The housing situation generally in most villages is bad and I do not think enough money has been spent in providing proper facilities.

I could give more details of the cases that have been laid before me, but now that this committee is to be set up they can be presented by the Indians themselves. I hope that the Indians and organizations such as the brotherhood will have ample opportunities to present their cases and that officialdom from the Indian Affairs branch will not take up too much time. I trust that the Indians will be able to speak their mind about what they want in the way of education and that representatives of the various churches will not be allowed to take up too much of the time of the committee. I know the Indians can make it very plain what they want if they are given the opportunity.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, until the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) spoke I had not intended to speak on this motion. The hon. member for Lethbridge suggested that the Indians should be exempted from military service. That would be an insult to the Indians in my riding. Practically every male Indian in my riding enlisted for overseas service, and many of them never came back.

Mr. LOW: Did the hon. member say that the hon. member for Lethbridge had said that the Indians should be exempted from military service?

Mr. FRASER: Yes.

Mr. LOW: I think I should correct the hon. member. The hon. member for Lethbridge stated distinctly that the committee should decide whether or not the Indians should be exempted.

Mr. FRASER: I stand corrected. But I do not think the committee should deal with the matter at all. It should be left as is. Let the Indians decide for themselves. They will enlist without any persuasion from any government, as they did in my riding.

The enfranchised Indians should, I believe, have a good deal of consideration from this committee because it is the enfranchised Indians who often find themselves at the parting of the ways, unable to look after themselves after a few years away from their tribe. In many cases they cannot even get schooling; they cannot get hospitalization, and township or county often will not give them hospitalization. I know of one Indian boy who developed tuberculosis of the leg, and the hospital and doctors' bills—mostly the hospital—ran to over $3,000. Eventually the county had to pay it. But I believe that is the responsibility of the government. These people are not paying any taxes; they never did pay any tax, and I doubt that they ever will, as they are on government land. These enfranchised Indians should be looked after.

I notice that of late years the Indian Affairs branch has been selling islands and lake shores. This has resulted in closing off many Indians who act as guides for tourists from going ashore in order to cook the noon-day meals for those they guide. Upon all lakes and streams where there are Indian lands, proper provision should be made for the Indians for this purpose.

The hon. member who spoke before me mentioned the pay of teachers in the Indian schools. Pay is essential, of course, but the most important thing for the teacher in an Indian school is to have an understanding of the Indian. The teacher must first learn to know the Indians and how to win their confidence. Once they have won the confidence of the Indians they can teach them, but they cannot teach them before having that. I have found that the Indian boys and girls, if given proper teaching, will do as well as if not better than the white boys and girls, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has said. They make wonderful pupils and wonderful citizens of Canada if given half a chance.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in participating in this debate is to emphasize the urgency of giving the utmost consideration to the question of non-treaty Indians. During the past few years we have had a bitter experience in our part of the country in connection with two bands of Indians. One of them up until recently was a non-treaty band and the other is still a non-treaty band.

Among these non-treaty Indians we find a roving group of people not limited to any specific area but moving seasonally to engage in various types of work, perhaps farm work during the harvest and trapping during the winter. The two bands that I am particularly concerned with, the Crees and the Chippewas of the Rocky Mountain House and White Court districts pose a tremendous problem because of the incidence of disease among them, venereal disease and tuberculosis particularly. During certain times of the year these Indians come out from the areas they inhabit during the winter and engage in harvest operations among the whites. I contend that this is a menace to the white people of those areas. About two years ago the district health nurse at Rocky Mountain House advised me that if the public were aware of the infant mortality rate among those Indians they would be appalled. A certain doctor responsible for checking these Indians for military service stated that he could not O.K. one of them for military service because of the incidence of both venereal disease and tuberculosis.

I wish to emphasize that during recent times one tribe has agreed to accept treaty. I understand there is an agreement whereby Indians cannot be forced to accept treaty and to establish themselves upon a reservation, but in my opinion where the prevalence of disease among them is such as to jeopardize the general health of all the people, whites and others, in that area, drastic action should be taken.

There are no educational facilities for the Indians of the non-treaty bands. There are no hospital facilities at all for them, and as I indicated earlier, the increase in disease among them is staggering.

I could not speak on this subject without paying public tribute to one who has done a tremendous work among these two bands of Indians and who has received very little if any public acclaim for his services. I have in mind one Henry Stelfox, the first public game warden in the province of Alberta, one who has given generously of his means and his time on behalf of these Indians and has been refused on more than one occasion repayment of the few paltry dollars he has paid out of his own pocket in order to meet some emergency such as illness among these Indians. Mr. Stelfox, I understand, was upon one occasion offered a position as Indian agent, but the wage offered was much less than he paid to his most poorly paid hired man. To me it seemed an insult. But I wish to emphasize that he is not looking for a position or compensation. I believe that he is deserving of the highest tribute I am capable of paying for the magnificent work that he has done among these Indians. But the work is becoming beyond what any one man can do, and the government must step in and take definite action to clear up a bad situation which has developed. I trust, therefore, that the committee will not overlook the position of the non-treaty Indians and that as a result of committee deliberations their problems will be removed.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I understood from the minister last night that he was hopeful there would be little debate on this resolution and therefore I shall be brief. We are pleased to see that the government are doing something about the Indians, if it is only the setting up of a committee. About a month ago I placed on the order paper a resolution proposing:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government consider the advisability of setting up a royal commission, which should include Indian representation, to study the whole matter of the treatment of Indians in Canada; the relation of the present Indian Act to its ability to fulfil the treaties signed by these Indians, and to recommend to parliament those changes necessary in the administration of Indian affairs and the Indian Act which will make it possible to properly fulfil the treaty obligations, and to properly provide for the future well-being of the Indians of Canada.

The government, however, has already seen fit to set up this committee, and we support this part of the resolution. I believe that if the committee gets out in the field, discovers the actual conditions, and really does the work required of it, it will have on it hands a job much larger than may be anticipated at this present time. I hope that one of its recommendations will be that such a committee shall become more or less permanent. My reason for this suggestion lies in the very nature of the problem, the fact that we have in this country about 130,000 Indians who, living on reserves or off them, have no way to air their grievances, no official voice by which to express approval or disapproval of what is being done, no way of protesting against undesirable conditions. We as Canadian people have a responsibility here to see that these people are properly treated. I am of opinion that the conditions which have been allowed to develop among the Indians with regard to their health, economic situation and training facilities are nothing less than a monument of disgrace to those who have been in power in Canada and have allowed human beings to suffer the conditions which exist among a very large majority of our Indian people.

What the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) has said on this matter is quite true. When the minister is closing the debate he might give us a statement as to what the infant mortality rate is among the Indians; it is reported to be over 50 per cent in some areas. We are pleased that this matter of public health improvement has been regarded so seriously that the government has decided to hand the subject over to another department, the Department of National Health and Welfare. I believe that surveys in the northern area and reports have already been made, and I would ask that the report of the committee of medical men who investigated conditions in northern parts of Canada should be made available to this committee, so that we may know something of the magnitude of the problem facing us, and be able to take proper steps to provide adequate medical services to the Indians.

Those young Indians who volunteered to serve in the Canadian army and served abroad have learned a good many things, and what has struck them most forcibly is the method of controlling sanitary conditions and the scientific approach to nutritional problems, matters of which the Indians in general are in complete ignorance. The economic conditions of these people are simply deplorable. They cannot live nobly and well, if they have not the means of proper living; and my experience in visiting them, hearing reports, attending their attempts at holding conventions of one kind and another, both provincial and federal, convinces me that the economic condition constitutes a tremendous and immediate problem. What first drew my attention to this matter was that in my own constituency, although agriculture is supposed to pay pretty well these days, according to a report from one reserve where there are forty-six families, only ten of them are actively engaged in agriculture, that is in raising grain or cattle or both; the other thirty-six have no means of earning a livelihood other than going out to work for the white men in the neighbouring areas, or cutting wood and hauling it to town; and if their ponies are able to haul a fairly large load they may get two or three dollars for it, but in many cases they may get less. It is time we took these matters into account. I hope a careful study will be made as to the basis on which these people can be made self-supporting with an adequate standard of living.

The Indian himself is a good man. There is a lot of inherent goodness among Indians. The Indian creed is "Love and help thy brother", which I think will be admitted to be a fairly high code of ethics, and he lives out his belief. Indians help one another. Moreover, the Indian is a conserver of natural resources. If there are a number of muskrats or beaver, or a herd of reinder, or whatever the Indian makes his livelihood from, in any area, he realizes that enough should be left each year in order to propagate those animals or provide that fur or that food, and he always leaves a sufficient number there. In this respect the Indian is more scientific than the white man, with all his cunning. Too often the white trapper will move in on Indian trapping grounds and take the whole cache, clean out the whole area, so that in many cases the Indians have to move away or remain without the means of livelihood. One of the best things the Indian Affairs branch has done has been to carry out its programme of fur farming, and I hope that this committee in its recommendations will advocate the continuation and expansion of that programme.

The Indian is suspicious of white men. I think this is largely because he has been fooled so often, and because fur trading companies operating in the north robbed the Indians of their livelihood. They took their furs and paid the Indians practically nothing for them. They are the people to whom the Indians must go for provisions, for food, for ammunition, for most of their supplies. The exploitation which we used to read about as having occurred in the early days in Canada is still being carried on in the northern areas of this country as far as the Indian is concerned.

Treaty rights is one of the matters for consideration by this committee. I am pleased to notice that, because although it is a difficult and involved question it is also an important one. You will find that the Indians still have copies of old treaties made between themselves and early French governors who came to this country long before Canada became part of the British empire. You will find treaties made with representatives of the British people who conquered Canada, and between representatives of Great Britain and Indians who fought for the English at the time of the American war of independence and came to Canada to the Six Nations reserve. You will find treaties made with governors throughout Ontario and further west. It will be difficult to see to it that the Indian Act and the administration of the act fulfil all the obligations made under the various treaties. In the west, treaties were made somewhat later, after the northwest rebellion. Promises were made by the representatives of the queen. The Indians, in reading over those treaties, find that they have been broken, that, for example, it was carefully and deliberately provided that day schools should be established on each reserve, but that no such day schools have been provided. Other understandings in connection with the treaties were arrived at in conversations between Indians and officials of the government. For example, the Indians say they made it clear that they did not want their children to be taken outside Canada and forced to fight the battles of the white man outside the country. Officials of the government at that time said, "No; we want you to live at peace among yourselves and with your white brothers and you will not be called upon to fight the wars of the queen outside Canada." But the present government instituted conscription and conscripted Indians off the reserves right in the province of Saskatchewan. These Indians had not volunteered; they had been promised these rights by treaty, and therefore they said, "You are breaking your treaty with us". What could they do? Could they go and complain to the Indian agent? Well, the agent would write to the department and ask for a directive and he would be told in reply that he should encourage the Indians to join.

When you break your word with an Indian he remembers it and it is no wonder the Indians are suspicious of their white brothers. Very often portions of reserves set aside for Indians have been sold to municipalities or to settlers and the Indian on the reserve wonders what has happened to the money he was supposed to get. He has no accounting. He has no way of saying, "You sold this land for so much money; where is that money?" He says, "By what right did you sell it? You set aside this land for us; you did so by treaty, and now you sell some of it." Well, they are told that they agreed to this; but who agreed to it? There is no record of anyone agreeing to it. The Indians understand that money was set aside in trust for them, but there is no accounting of the trust fund and they want an accounting. They want to know where the money is; they want to know something about the interest. What was done with it? The answer is, "It was used to pay you so much a year in treaty money; then there is the maintenance of the aged and the sick, and we have done many other things for you."

In the days when there was no crop in western Canada the Indians did not get relief from the municipalities. Quite often they had to pay for their own relief out of their trust fund and they lived at a terrifically low standard, as they do now. When there are only ten families on a small reserve and the only means of livelihood is farming, the living conditions of these people are such that they cannot be healthy. They cannot assimilate education; they cannot improve their conditions, and they are powerless to speak. They have no means of redress.

The fight of the Indian to-day is a fight against ignorance, against poverty, against fear; and it will be a fight for democracy.

I am sorry that this committee will not have some group representing the Indians. I am sorry that it will not have some means of such representation, somebody who can sit in on the deliberations, or persons chosen from selected groups in various parts of Canada. I should like to see an Indian from the Micmacs of the maritimes. I should like to see one from the Iroquois reserve and one from the Caughnawaga. I should like to see on the committee representatives who can listen to the deliberations, and I would recommend to the government that a place be made on the committee for representative groups of Indians from across Canada.

Mr. REID: It might not be a peaceable committee.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A good thing every now and then is a good fight. I believe we would avoid a good many mistakes.

Mr. REID: I am a peaceable man; I agree with you.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I appreciate the hon. gentleman's qualities. If this suggestion were adopted, then for the first time in the history of the country, in the making of important legislation, the Indians would at least have a voice. They would have representatives chosen by the people themselves and that would help to prevent mistakes, because I do not believe that we understand entirely the position of the Indians. There are good men on the Indian reserves, man of ability, with qualities of leadership.

I should like to see representation from Manitoba. There was a young Indian from Manitoba on the committee who interviewed the minister recently and I had the honour of listening to him. He had volunteered from that province. He could not pass the medical examination to start with, but after medical treatment, special training and setting-up exercises, he turned out to be a man of fine physique, a man of courage, and he won the Military Medal. He belonged to the paratroopers and went behind the enemy's lines in Sicily and Italy. He could tell the committee a few things.

I should like to see representation from Saskatchewan, from the Sioux, the Cree, the Blackfeet and the Stony Indians. They could tell us something about their treatment. We also need representation from British Columbia, where I understand no treaties at all were made with the Indians. They have no means of making themselves heard. They cannot say, "Here are our treaties and you are breaking them." Under proper representation, however, those Indians could put their views before the committee. I would earnestly suggest that representatives of these Indians sit in with the committee throughout the whole of its deliberations.

I would also direct the attention of the government to education and a training programme for the Indians. Evidence is abundant to prove that of the few Indians, out of the whole 125,000 or 130,000 who get an opportunity for education, so many have gone so far and done so much, that proof is hardly necessary for my contention that the Indian could be made into a great man and a great leader. Under existing educational and training facilities, however, the opportunities are small.

Here is a school statement from the department's own report of 1945 showing that out of the whole of the Indians of Canada in every province and in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, some 132,000 Indians, the children from the ages of seven to sixteen who went to school in 1945, only 56 reached grade nine, 171 reached grade eight, 400 reached grade seven and 600 reached grade six. Of thousands of Indian children, that is the extent of their education.

These people can never advance until that condition is changed. I agree that it is not an easy problem but it is one that must be approached with understanding. It must be approached scientifically and with a view to providing efficient training and education for the Indians. They must be established in decent homes. It is no use having children coming to school if they are to spread disease among the others. They cannot come from homes where there is filth or dirt, because in that case they will only spread these diseases. They must be established economically and schools must be provided where the children will have an opportunity for proper education which will develop their abilities.

The present system of residential schools is not meeting the problem. I know there are residential schools where good work is done but there are many where children are not getting an opportunity of attending classes. Moreover, they attend classes for half a day. Actually the number of hours spent in the classroom is not sufficient for the number of students who show ability to carry on and to take on further training.

I am going to recommend for the study of this committee—and I hope it will be available to it—a complete report of what has been done in the United States with regard to freeing these people, giving them power and raising them from the status of wards to the position of free men.

Citizenship is a matter of contention. There are many Indians who want it and many who do not. I hope that this committee will thresh it out. My contention is that since these Indians show capacity and a desire to become citizens they should be given citizenship rights; and if they so desire they should also retain their rights under the treaty, as is done in the United States. No citizenship should ever be forced upon these people if they do not want it.

If this committee finds, when it starts its work, that it requires so much attention that it will have to be continued as a committee I hope that it will be set up year after year to receive reports from the Indians until the day comes when they can speak for themselves.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) made one statement which should be corrected at once. As I understood him, he said that the infant mortality rate for Indians was, he understood, 50 per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to correct that.

Mr. CLAXTON: On reflection I am sure he would like to correct it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have not all the figures and reports, but from the reports that I have for certain areas in northern parts of Canada the infant mortality rate is 50 per cent.

Mr. CLAXTON: Fifty per cent? Of course it is possible that at a locality two children may be born and one of them die within a year of the birth of the two of them, and that would make the rate 50 per cent in that spot. It would give a totally wrong impression to say that the rate for Indians is 50 per cent or anything like it. The rate, of course, is very much less. I have the rate for deaths from diseases peculiar to the first year of life. This is the infant mortality rate measured per 100,000. While the rate for Indians undoubtedly is higher than the rate for white people, it is quite different from anything like 50 per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the comparative figures for the whites?

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe we can give this information more suitably when the committee sits. I should not like to take up the time now when there is a strong desire on the part of all hon. members to have this resolution carried and the committee set up and at work.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the minister sure that the rate is estimated on the 100,000? Is not the infant mortality rate considered as so many per thousand live births?

Mr. CLAXTON: It could be either way; I am giving it as it was given to me. The health of Indians has been a matter of serious concern to the government for some time. On November 1, 1945, as the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) said, responsibility for the health and hospitalization of Indians was transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

At the time of the transfer the Department of Mines and Resources, Indian Affairs branch, had prepared plans for a considerable extension of hospital and health facilities among the Indians and Eskimos. Since we have had the responsibility in the other department we have reviewed these plans and extended them in some respects. If hon. members will look at the estimates they will see that there is a considerable increase in the amount provided over last year. I hope that this is an increase for which we shall have the support of members in every part of the house.

With regard to the health of Eskimos in the far north I may say that we had a conference here on February 8 of this year, which was attended by some of the prominent doctors who have made the trip to the far north in recent years, such doctors as Doctor Dennis Jordan, Doctor Campbell Laidlaw, Doctor George S. McCarthy, Doctor George Hooper, and Doctor W. L. Crewson representing the National Institute for the Blind. We have had their assistance in drawing up plans for dealing with the exceedingly difficult problems of the Eskimo, and we hope to be able to do something further to extend the service that they have already been given in that field where there are some 7,700 Eskimos scattered over a territory of nearly 700,000 square miles.

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) spoke about the possibility of a hospital being constructed on the shores of James bay. That is under consideration. There are some 3,759 Indians in the neigbourhood, plus some 1,200 Eskimos on the eastern shores of James bay and Hudson bay. It is felt that a hospital or additional facilities are needed there, and that is receiving consideration.

Consideration is being given; indeed active steps are being taken to increase hospital accommodation in many centres. Only on Wednesday of last week I visited the band of the Six Nations at or near Brantford which was referred to by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). There I saw the Lady Willingdon hospital, a small hospital of eighteen beds, with two doctors and three nurses, which is doing excellent work in looking after the health of the Six Nations Indians on the Six Nations reserve. So far as the statistics go I think it will be found that the health of the Indians on that reserve is probably as good as that of the white people around in every respect except that of tuberculois, where the death-rate is considerably higher.

The suggestions that have been made by hon. members in a helpful way during the course of this debate with regard to the health and hospitalization of Indians will be taken into consideration. When the committee sits we shall have available any information that we have, and we shall be prepared to discuss any matters of interest to the members of the committee or in the interests of the welfare of the Indians themselves.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In reply to the minister I should like to say my plea was for this committee to get the actual statistics with regard to the health of Indians, and to clear up the doubts. When I made my statement I was not referring to the infant mortality rate as 50 per cent, but that report had been brought down.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): I also wish to join with others in expressing a word of commendation to the minister for having introduced this motion to-day. I should also like to congratulate him on the splendid presentation that he made.

It is quite true that I am not the chief of an Indian clan; I am too young, but I hope I can lay claim to the fact that I have been, am now and hope I always shall be, a friend of the Indian. He is not of the mentality of the white man; but I believe the constitution of this committee offers a splendid opportunity to do something worth while for the elevation of that part of our human race.

In the constituency that I represent there are two residential schools, one at Elkhorn, Manitoba, of which I have heard splendid reports, but I am not so intimately familiar with the work done in that school as I am with the work done in another school a couple of miles from Brandon. For the last thirty-five years I have been in close touch with the work of that school, first under the direction of the late Doctor Ferrier, than under Doctor Doyle, now retired, who succeeded him, and at the present time under the Reverend O. B. Stroppe, who has a long experience in Indian affairs. I can bear testimony to the splendid work which has been done in that school down through the years. Those who have attended that school have, in later life, gone on to other seats of learning and have made their mark, not only educationally but in whatever vocation they followed, agriculture or otherwise.

I have heard it said frequently, that after finishing their courses at the residental schools very often those young boys and girls go back to the reserves and lapse right back into the old ways. I have made inquiry in that connection, and I find that in many instances they do lapse for perhaps a year or two but that almost invariably they stage a comeback, so that a little later you find them taking a more forward place in the affairs of the band and endeavouring to make a better livelihood than otherwise would have been the case. I believe a great deal depends upon the teacher. This matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). We can quite appreciate how difficult it must be for those in charge of the educational section of the department to secure and retain really good teachers on many reserves. Like the rest of us, teachers are human, and probably the conditions they find in regard to residence for white people on the reserves are not of the best, so that I believe this subject must be a headache for those in the department having charge of education.

In the western part of my constituency we have a reserve to which I should like to take the minister some day, when the crops are flourishing, to show him what has been done there from an agricultural point of view. We have there an efficient farm instructor, and the progress in agriculture that has been made on that reserve is to my mind, simply marvellous. It is good land; they raise good crops; they till the soil well, and they have made a marked success during the past few years. Apparently those Indians have a new spirit to-day. They have fine herds of stock; they are not pure bred, but I believe the day is coming when those young Indians will be exhibiting at the fairs, and you will see them carrying off some of the red ribbons.

Again, we must not forget the loyalty of the Indians, many of whom have served their country. The Indian has always been loyal to the best of his ability. I recall a sentence or two written by Lord Dufferin after he made an extended trip across Canada during his regime as governor general. After speaking of the attitude of the average Indian toward our sovereign, he went on to speak of the—

> . . . untutored halfbreed hoisting some cloth or rag above his humble shanty, and of the stolid Indian in forest or reserve marshaling forth his picturesque symbol of fidelity in glad allegiance to his country's queen.

The Indian has always been loyal, and we would not be loyal to the best traditions of our race if we did not see to it that he is taken care of and that his living conditions are made better than they have been in the past.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear so many expressions of appreciation of the fine qualities and characteristics of the Indians. If we really believe what we have said we are all set to give them the advantages that will bring out and develop these qualities, and allow the Indians to make a fine contribution to Canadian life. I thought the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) performed a useful service in making a survey of Indians who had succeeded in various lines, but I was sorry to learn that three of them had gone to Detroit, one to Ohio and another to New Zealand. More than half of those who have made outstanding successes have left Canada. I believe we should see if we cannot offer them some inducement to serve their own people here. With the advantages they have gained through their experience outside this country they might be the better qualified to come back and help meet the problem here. I believe that would be particularly true of the person who has gone to New Zealand, because when I was in that country a few years ago I was astonished to learn that the Maori people there elect four Maori members to sit in the New Zealand parliament with all the rights of members, including one with the statutory right to be a member of the cabinet. Sometimes that person holds a portfolio; at other times he is a member without portfolio, but they tell you there that one of the best ministers of health they ever had was a Maori. They tell you also that it is not uncommon to have a Maori New Zealander say to a white New Zealander, "Remember the day when my grandfather ate your grandfather," because when the white people went to New Zealand the Maoris were cannibals. So that I think we should learn from other parts of the commonwealth what may be done to develop the possibilities inherent in native peoples.

I hope the minister will not consider that in citing examples of what happens in other places we are being critical. Far too often, it seems to me, the government go on the defensive and try to prove that we are traitors or something of the kind when we mention the possibilities that other countries have explored. I hope they will be good enough to asume that we, too, are ambitious for the record of Canada. We too would like to be proud of our treatment of our native people; and whether we sit on this side or the other side we would like to see reforms carried out that will make us the envy of other parts of the commonwealth.

I have only another moment or two at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say that I believe we should give special training to teachers engaged in handling Indian children, and special training to the administrators who apply the Indian Act. First of all, I believe these persons should be humanists, with social vision and broad sympathies. In my experience, which has been limited, in talking with Indian agents and Indian doctors, too often I have been discouraged by the attitude of these people who have the lives of the Indians in their hands. Too often they regard the Indians very lightly, with nothing but contempt. I hope that is not a sample of the sort of people who work for the government, and to-day I was glad to hear reference made to persons of outstanding accomplishments and achievements in that department.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—OUT-OF-WORK BENEFITS FOR EX-SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour which is based upon two telegrams I received this morning, one from the mayor of the town of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, and the other from the president of the Cape Breton labour council. I have sent copies of the telegrams to the minister so that he knows their subject-matter. Has the government considered the advisability of extending the period for which unemployment insurance benefits may be paid in areas where there is a serious unemployment problem with no immediate relief in sight? Second, has the government considered the advisability of extending the time period for which out-of-work benefits may be paid to ex-service personnel when employment cannot be had in the communities in which they reside?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was good enough to give me a notice of his question and I may say that I received similar telegrams. I should like to say this for the general information of hon. members. There are 1,106 applicants for work registered at the Glace Bay employment office. Of this number 262 males are receiving unemployment insurance benefits, and 566 veterans' out-of-work benefits. An additional 350 were receiving unemployment insurance benefits, but the period for which they were entitled to these benefits has lapsed and payments have been stopped.

The employment situation on Cape Breton island, including Glace Bay, is not good. It is true that agricultural workers, some men for the coal mines at Sydney and a number for fishing are still required. However, it is not feasible for all those registered for employment to accept the work available and many of them are not able to do the work. Housing, the type of work to be done and the physical disabilities of the unemployed are factors.

The labour department has provided for issuance of transportation to other parts of the country and men are being moved to places where jobs are open, but the general situation in the maritimes is such that possibilities for transfer are not great. Nevertheless, transportation is being supplied where a satisfactory transfer can be arranged. The movement of a number of men from Cape Breton island to the state of Maine for lumbering and logging is being considered. The United States authorities have asked that some men be furnished for this work. It is anticipated that some wharf construction work can proceed early in June and that the repair work in the Sydney shipyards will increase from now on. The situation is under constant study by the labour department and the reconstruction department and everything possible is being done to work out a satisfactory solution.

One of the proposals which was before the dominion-provincial conference was that the dominion government establish a system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons. However, pending the conclusion of a general agreement between the dominion and the provinces the responsibility for such relief is on the local authorities, the municipalities in the first instance, and then the provinces.

[Later:]

Mr. GILLIS: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the government has not considered the advisability of extending the benefits of unemployment insurance. My inquiry a moment ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has already asked his question.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not get an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: It looks to me as though this is developing into a debate rather than just questions. The rules are quite clear that a lengthy question should be placed upon the order paper.

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER INDUSTRIAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the acting leader of the government. In view of disturbing reports of the possibilities of impending industrial strife, has the government considered the advisability of calling a conference of representatives of the government, labour, farmers and employers in an effort to prevent grave economic dislocations?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am not a great believer in having too many conferences, although sometimes they are necessary. Probably my hon. friend has a vivid recollection of the conference called by President Truman. That conference did not do a great deal to increase industrial stability in the United States; at least I do not think so. As I have said before, we have ample machinery for meeting any industrial condition that arises. There are many statements made in the press to-day which in my judgment show an utter lack of responsibility. Irrespective of the government that may be in power, whether it is made up of my hon. friend's followers or of the official opposition, when you have built up machinery which in a general way is equal to handling these problems, I think it is the duty of employers' organizations and of labour organizations to avail themselves of that machinery. That machinery was created by agreement, in a broad way of course, between the federal government, the provincial government, labour organizations and employers' organizations.

As I said last week in this house, I do not think anyone is rendering a service to his country when he says he will not use the machinery that has been established. In the main, out of the tens of thousands of cases that have been dealt with by these boards, composed of representatives of labour and of employers with impartial chairmen, there have been very few which have gone off the rails. I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that there are certain forces in this and other countries which do not want industrial peace. What they want is strife. I hope that wiser counsels will prevail on both sides so that we can go through this very difficult period in good shape, in the best interests of the working people and the industrial structure which is necessary if they are to be employed. I do not think I can say much more than that.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a supplementary question? I quite agree that labour and the employer should be brought together, but if reports are correct more people are involved than just the employer and the worker. It seems to me that the whole community is involved, and that was the reason for my question.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it can be truthfully said that we have been reasonably successful in the settlement of industrial disputes. My hon. friend may rest assured that everything will be done that can be done to settle these disputes. However, I do not think so-called responsible people should be getting up and saying that they will not obey the law or avail themselves of the machinery set up.

AVAILABILITY OF PRISONERS OF WAR TO SUGAR BEET GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, and it has nothing to do with the subject we have just been discussing. Will the Minister of Labour tell the house what provisions have been made to provide German prisoners of war as labour for sugar beet cultivation in the Red river valley district of Manitoba in view of the fact that no reference was made to this most important district in the recent announcement of the provincial farm help service of Manitoba as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press issue of last Thursday?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's question should be to the point.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In reply to the hon. member I am able to state that our plans call for the establishment of about ten hostels or centres through which we shall use German prisoners of war as labourers in the sugar beet industry in Manitoba.

I can assure the hon. member for Provencher that the Red river valley area will not be overlooked. I believe that six of the ten centres we are establishing will be in that valley. Plans to open the first two at Emerson and Letellier by May 24 have already been made. There will be at least one hundred prisoners of war at each centre.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

KING GEORGE VI

PROCLAMATION WITH RESPECT TO HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): May I ask the Secretary of State when we may expect a proclamation with respect to His Majesty's birthday?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): I hope to be able to say something on that later in the week.

HALIFAX CITADEL

INQUIRY AS TO FIRING OF ROYAL SALUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): May I ask the responsible minister of the government, or the minister who is leading the house, if a royal salute was fired at the Citadel in Halifax to-day and, if so, why?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no information on the subject but I will find out just as soon as I can.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 8, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering the amendment to clause 10 moved by Mr. Diefenbaker to add the following words:

Such certificate of citizenship shall be deemed to include a bill of rights, as follows—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I wish to support the amendment and to draw to the attention of the committee that the amendment is one which has attracted the attention of the whole dominion which has been shocked at some of the practices that have been resorted to in what have been styled the "spy" investigations. In years past we have been critical of practices in another country which we have referred to as strong-arm practices, and which we thought could never come into existence in our own country. Even if this bill be not the ideal place to set forth these traditional rights it is well that we avail ourselves of the very first moment to put on record the indignation which is felt throughout the land at the stories that have come out of what took place in the investigation into the activities of these men.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken on the amendment I should like to take a few moments of the committee's time to present the view of the group which I represent with respect to the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

During the debate which has taken place, particularly between the hon. member for Lake Centre and the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, I listened most carefully hoping to get the answers to two questions that arose in my mind. It is those two questions that I should like to discuss briefly before the committee to-night. The first of these is, do we now need a new charter of liberties?

It is sometimes argued, indeed I heard it argued in this very chamber, that we already have Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, habeas corpus and the Bill of Rights as the root and core of the common law part of the Canadian constitution; that they constitute a sufficient bill of rights to safeguard the liberty of Canadian citizens, and that, therefore, we need no further bill of rights. This argument raises interesting questions particularly in the mind of any person who is familiar with the history of Great Britain, from whom we obtained the common law which is part of the constitution of Canada. These are some of the questions.

Why was it that the British people found it necessary to enact habeas corpus when they already had Magna Charta? And why the Bill of Rights when they already had Magna Charta, the Petition of Right and habeas corpus? I submit that a study of British liberties reveals the fact that they were won gradually and as a result of struggles that lasted over a long period of time. Each charter was a reenactment of charters of freedom previously in existence, together with a statement of expanded liberty, freedoms newly won. Thus the Petition of Right of 1628 reaffirmed the promises of Magna Charta, and in addition to that provided protection for the subjects in Great Britain from the depredations and the encroachments of Charles I.

Again, I submit that habeas corpus in 1679 grew out of article 39 of Magna Charta and was a restatement of Magna Charta and an enlargement upon it. The Bill of Rights of 1689 began by reciting the declaration of rights, which was nothing but a statement of all the individual freedoms which had been won up to that time. Then it went on to declare further freedoms as inviolable for the future protection of the citizens of Britain. Thus, freedom grew naturally. Each new step was a natural outgrowth of something already in existence. Each new charter was a restatement of and an enlargement upon charters previously granted by the monarch of the time.

That has been the outstanding characteristic of Anglo-Saxon development, and that also, I submit, should be the natural growth of things Canadian. At no time did Britons ever cut themselves off from the past, and I submit that at no time should Canadians ever cut themselves off wholly from things past. But as we grow, it seems to me our enlargement and development should be out of things already in existence.

It is noteworthy that periodically Britons felt that they had to reaffirm the freedoms already won. These reaffirmations always came at a time following great struggles during which miguided monarchs had succeeded in encroachments upon the liberties of the people, or following periods when some freedoms of the people were suspended for the purpose of meeting crises.

We have just emerged from the greatest struggle which the human race has ever faced —sixteen years of it. I say sixteen years of it because we have had two great wars following one another very closely, one economic, and the other military, both the most tragic in all history. In the course of these struggles personal liberties have gradually declined and the powers of the state have correspondingly increased. During both great struggles of those sixteen years we have had a marked but steady and certain decline in human values, and a steady but sure increase in the materialistic emphasis. During the thirties men, women and children starved or were driven half-starved from place to place in their efforts to find food and comfort, and they were hardly noticed by those who were in a position to do something about the matter. In the military war human beings were counted pretty cheap and there was a growing indifference on all sides and in every nation to human suffering and to mass human destruction. I submit that such a decline in the morality of nations and of their estimate of human values undoubtedly does call for a new bill of rights, a new charter of freedoms of the citizen to meet the conditions of this day.

Churchill and Roosevelt must have felt this need when they declared the Atlantic charter. Unfortunately, the Atlantic charter has not been taken up by the nations. Rather, I submit, it has been forgotten if not tacitly revoked.

Again, during the war we in Canada surrendered to the government some of our freedoms in order to help Canada to meet the great crisis which faced us and successfully to achieve our part in the world struggle. I need hardly remind hon. members that we fought that war to preserve our freedoms. Now that the war is over, there is definite need to redefine in clear and unmistakable terms just what freedoms and rights individuals shall have in this country, now and for the future, and just what rights are to be yielded up by the government that have been temporarily surrendered to them by individual Canadians. Governments have a habit of trying to make themselves into the all-powerful "State", and that is something we do not want in Canada. This is the time for the people of this and of every other country to assert their determination not only to preserve freedoms which have been won for them at great cost in the past, but also to enlarge their freedoms, to show their determination to enlarge those freedoms. It seems to me that we must add to the freedoms already won through past generations, and now issue a new declaration of freedoms: freedom of our people to consume what they require of the abundance that we can produce; freedom of choice, which goes hand in hand and closely with the freedom to own property and to conduct a business so long as in the holding of property and the conducting of the business our citizens do not interfere with the same rights of other citizens in this country; freedoms, I mean, in addition to all freedoms which we have won in the past. I believe, therefore, that a new charter of liberties of Canadian citizens should now be laid down.

The second question I had in my mind was this: is the amendment presented by the hon. member for Lake Centre the type of restatement of liberties of the subject or the citizen that we want? In the first place, I must say that I do not like to see such an important thing tucked away in an inconspicuous place in a bill such as the citizenship bill, although if it is to be related to a bill at all I can see that this is, perhaps, the best one to which to relate it. However, I should like to urge upon the members of this house the necessity of introducing at the earliest possible time a completely new bill which will be a real charter of Canadian liberties.

There is at least one government in Canada which has already recognized the necessity for such a thing, and I make brief reference to one such measure which has been laid down here in the dominion. I refer to bill 76, passed unanimously by the legislature of Alberta, which is known as "An act respecting the rights of Alberta citizens". I wish to quote two or three sections from it to indicate exactly what I mean by an enlargement upon freedoms already won. From part I of the bill I first quote sections 3 and 4:

> 3. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be free to hold and cherish his own religious convictions and to worship in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience.
> 4. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be entitled to enjoy freedom of expression provided that he does not violate the defamation laws in force in the province or the criminal code of Canada.
> 5. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be free in association with other citizens, to assemble for any lawful purpose in accordance with the laws in force in the province.
> 6. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be free to engage in the work of his choice which may be available to him within the province.

That is a statement of something which has not been included in any charter in this or any other country, and it is, I submit, an important freedom if people are to be in congenial employment. Next:

> 7. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be free to acquire land and enjoy the use of his home and property without interference or molestation, so long as he conforms to the laws in force in the province for safeguarding the lives, property and personal rights of other citizens.
> 8. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta shall be free to do or refuse to do any act or thing within the limitations of the laws in force in the province, provided that thereby he does not infringe upon the same right of any other citizen.

I emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that that is one of the great freedoms for which the people of the world have fought; freedom of choice, without which there cannot be complete freedom of conscience; and I say that it is most important to have that laid down now in a declaration.

> 9. It is hereby declared that every citizen of Alberta of not less than nineteen years of age and not more than sixty years of age is entitled as a right of citizenship to,—
> (a) the opportunity to engage in gainful employment; or
> (b) if gainful employment is not available, to a social security pension.

That is, the right of the citizen to consume of the abundance which we produce, even if he has not the opportunity to labour.

These comprise at least some suggestion of the type of bill which might be brought into this House of Commons; and if the hon. member for Lake Centre, or anyone else for that matter, will bring in a bill of that type, a complete declaration of the rights of Canadians citizens, he certainly will have my support. If there is no prospect that a bill of that kind will be brought in and have a good chance to pass this house, naturally I am bound to take the next best choice, which is to support the hon. member for Lake Centre in the amendment which he has proposed. But I really believe that it belittles such an important matter as a charter of freedoms and of the rights of individual citizens to have it tucked away in an inconspicuous place in a bill such as we have before us.

Finally, I wish to say this. The rights of citizens have been obscured through sixteen years of conflict, economic and military. And in discussions, political, economic and constitutional, which have taken place between the provinces and the dominion in their attempt to find a satisfactory allocation of the powers of government, we have completely overlooked the most important responsibility we have—the individual citizen of this country. He it is who should be considered; he is the man whose rights should be the fount and source of all the things we do. It is not for us to fight and bicker over what this government or that government shall have the power to do. It is for us to determine and define once again the rights and liberties of our people. Because the rights of our citizens have been obscured, I say it is high time that we clarified the whole situation. I am anxious for that clarification, and I suggest to the hon. member for Lake Centre or to anyone else that if he can see his way clear to bring in a bill of rights of Canadian citizens he will get the enthusiastic support of the group I represent.

Mr. CROLL: With reference to the amendment, I think the time has come for some positive action on the part of the government pertaining to a bill of rights. At this stage there is not much that can be said that has not already been said. I do not know whether this amendment in its present form will answer the purpose; I rather doubt it. I do not know whether it is wise at this stage to add another clause to the citizenship bill, nor do I think it wise to add a preamble. But I feel that a clear and concise statement on the matter of citizenship rights is long overdue, and I think this is a good time for us to consider a bill of rights which will act as a bulwark for the cause of free men.

In the past we have held the theory that the personal liberty of the subject has been fully protected by the British common law and by the Canadian constitution, but now we must face up to realities and realize that the liberty of the subject is not fully protected. I wish to prick the conscience of the committee for a few moments by recalling some episodes to hon. members.

I can well recall the padlock law, which was an abridgement of the right of assembly, and which is still a part of the law of one of the provinces. I remember well section 98 of the criminal code, which was an assault on the civil liberties of every individual in this country. It took years and years before we were able to get rid of it. I remember also references in this house to various deportations that took place at one time or another in Canada when men were arrested, whisked away, and before legal process could be put into force were taken out of the country.

Most members will recall vividly that the Japs in this country were deprived of both their natural and their legal rights, and I have not much to say about the most recent spy case, except to remark that it was an arbitrary use of government power.

These are not isolated cases. The other day I came across a case which I think will be interesting to the committee. It was reported in the Toronto Telegram of November 10 and reads:

> When customers of the Runnymede hardware store complained that they did not like being waited on by a Jew, Earl Fleming, the proprietor, discharged Joseph Moses, twenty-nine year old war veteran, and set off a spontaneous storm of protest from the Canadian Legion . . . Earle Burgess, of St. Thomas, president of the Canadian Legion's Ontario command, labelled such discrimination "a vicious thing which must be crushed by all right-thinking Canadians."

I bring this to the attention of the committee because we find here a man who was fit to fight but not fit to serve. The Toronto Star of that day carried an editorial in which it said:

> It is a disgraceful thing that a veteran, or anyone else for that matter, should lose his job in a Toronto hardware store because the customers "did not like being waited on by a Jew." The man in question was educated in the schools of the district in which he recently found employment after returning from service in France. He was good enough to serve his country overseas, but not good enough, it seems, to wait upon his fellow citizens when they were buying hardware. Those who complained about him and lost him his position should be ashamed of their narrowness and prejudice. They have the consolation of knowing that their attitude is exactly that which Hitler approved and practised.

The Toronto Globe and Mail, which has always put up a good fight for civil liberties, had this to say:

> There are no words of condemnation too harsh to apply to the people in the neighbourhood of Runnymede store, who took it upon themselves to protest the employment of a Jewish war veteran as a clerk in the store. Complaint was not based upon discourtesy or inefficiency, which might have been a legitimate reason for objection, but simply because the young man was a Jew. It is a disgrace to the whole community that such barefaced prejudice should exhibit itself in this manner. It is the negation of everything that the word British should convey.

Further down.

The least favourable aspect of this matter is that these prejudice-ridden people were depriving of his job a young man who had willingly risked his life in their defence in the armed forces of the country. He was in the army for three years, and saw active service in Europe. As he has justly said, no one told him he wasn't good enough to serve on account of his religion. All too little credit has been given to the Jewish people in Canada for the extent of their war effort, for that matter. On the most conservative estimates, not counting those who may have served in other allied forces, no fewer than 10,116 Canadian Jews served in the army, 5,870 in the air force, and 573 in the navy. These comprise ten per cent of the Jewish population, a most admirable record. Of the 800 casualties, more than 200 made the supreme sacrifice. More than 165 won decorations.

Again:

In the light of all this, it might be asked when some Canadians are going to become mature. Those who criticize or display prejudice against any racial or religious group are vulgarians. They are consumed with an envy for obvious talent, or resent the willing capacity for hard work. It is time they put aside such unworthy attitudes and agree to live and let live. Because certain mean people vented their evil spite upon a man whose only crime was a difference in religion and ancestry, the whole community is a meaner place in which to live. It is time these displays of prejudice were stopped.

I would point out that the name of this hardware store was the Runnymede—a historic name indeed; for it was at Runnymede that the first blow for freedom was struck. I put this to the committee: Who understood better the lesson of Runnymede, the soldier who was deprived of his job or the people who had complained?

I pass on to my next point, which is this. Our people need education in citizenship. It is important that the laws be codified and be added to, and it is important also that we put upon our statute books a bill of rights in order to protect people not only against other individuals but against governments, yes, against governments which are sometimes colour-blind.

It is often necessary to restate principles that appear only too obvious. I know the argument used is that if you write a law you narrow it, but it is better to make it too narrow than to have it entirely neglected. I do not think the present amendment covers the ground. I do not think the mover felt that in forty-four words he can write a bill of rights, although I should compliment him on the words he carefully used. We should serve notice upon this House of Commons and upon those who are responsible, that the battle is on; that the members from all sides of the house have just started to fight; that the forces are now deployed; that we do not intend to give up at the present time, and that the government is now notified that we intend that it shall in due time produce a bill of rights which will be acceptable not only to the members of the house but also to the country at large.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the hon. member for Lake Centre speaks I wish to say a few words. Most hon. members would be favourable to a bill of rights that would outline adequately, or as adequately as we can, the rights of the Canadian citizen. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre would be the last person to say that his amendment has done that. He has made an attempt to do that, but I believe that no sooner had he written it than he realized its shortcomings.

One thing of which I am sure, is that a bill of rights should not be made a part of a section of this bill. If a bill of rights is to be put into this bill at all it should go in as a preamble, and then it would become a guide to those who must interpret the citizenship act. But I wish to say something tht has not been said in the long debate on this amendment, namely, that no matter how broad and comprehensive a bill of rights may be it will not protect the rights of the citizens of Canada unless there is the will to protect them.

Mention has been made of the fact that in the United States they have a bill of rights written into the constitution, but it does not mean that every citizen in the United States is assured of his rights within the constitution. Those of us who have been close to affairs during the last thirty or more years realize that, despite the United States bill of rights, in that country things have been done to its citizens that would make any citizen of any country blush with shame. What happened during the war of 1914-18? As a matter of fact there were very little rights that any one had in the United States. Undoubtedly things have improved in the last few years. We hope that they will go on improving because there is still need to extend and broaden the rights of the negro in the United States, and he is a citizen. Therefore I would say that unless we in Canada have the will to protect essential rights, regardless of what we have in this bill or in the constitution, those rights will not be protected.

I do not believe that we can go so far as to say there can never be any interference with a citizen's rights that we would put in a bill. The time may come in the life of a country when, for the preservation of its life, it must, like an individual, take action which may at times seem to us arbitrary and cruel. But the times in which this action must be taken should be very few, and the people should always be on the alert to see that the government does not go too far.

We remember that, after the fall of France, thousands of people who had come into Great Britain as refugees and who had been extended the protection of the British government and the constitution were swept up all at once and interned. The authorities considered that this action was necessary at that time because the preservation of the state itself was the most important thing that faced the people. But that did not continue very long. As soon as conditions became a little more stable they began sifting out the good from the bad and getting back to normal. Some of them came over here. They sent a representative over here, and those of us who heard him speak before the defence of Canada regulations committee really got an earful of how the British people respected the rights of individuals, excepting in moments of great peril.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Patterson.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, that was the name. The hon. member for Spadina said that we need education in citizenship. We need education in more than that; we need education in tolerance and in human rights. Once we depart from dealing with man as man, there is nothing to indicate where we are to stop. It is a well known fact that Hitler began with the persecution of the Jews, but he ended up by depriving everybody in Germany of liberty. We have come pretty close to that in Canada. Until we get away from that and consider the rights of every human individual we are not going to protect those rights as they should be protected.

The principle of the amendment is something that I would support, but the amendment itself is so restricted in its terms that I do not see there is anything to be accomplished by adding it to the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: To a large degree I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. His remarks were like a breath of fresh air in this debate. I believe in the British way of doing things. We have heard a lot this evening and in previous days on this debate about the bill of rights. What we need to-day is a bill of responsibilities. This evening I was asked a question by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar with respect to certain conditions in this country. The hon. member for Vancouver East knows about them as well as I do. He knows their policy and their approach to industrial relations. He knows they say: "We are not going to obey the law; we are going to take the law into our own hands."

I get tired of hearing people talk so much about rights and not enough about responsibilities. The mere fact that something is put down on paper does not always ensure its application. I have had some experience with the labour movement in this country and in Europe. While I am not going to name countries, I would point out that one of the Balkan countries approved more conventions of the international labour office than any other country in the world. Yet I think it fair to say that industrial conditions in that country were possibly the most backward in Europe. My hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party read a bill of rights which I think was passed by the legislature of Alberta.

Mr. LOW: Yes, unanimously.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope my hon. friend will not find fault with me when I say I did not notice in that bill of rights anything about $25 a month.

Mr. LOW: The minister might notice that it would be more if proper pension arrangements were made.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a moment. My mind goes back to when that government was first elected; at that time I was chairman of a commission which was touring western Canada. Let me say to my hon. friend that for a good, clean government that of Alberta is equal to any in the Dominion of Canada in matters of day-to-day administration. But we must remember that in some sections of Canada we have large bodies of people who have come from persecution to freedom almost in one jump. They do not altogether understand the workings of democracy as they are understood by those of us who for generations have been trained in that direction. I remember many of those simple souls out there really thought that one month after that election they would begin to receive $25 every month. I believe in the British way. I am opposed to putting it down on paper, as has been suggested by my hon. and good friend from Lake Centre. As the hon. member for Vancouver South has said—

Mr. MacINNIS: Vancouver East.

Mr. MITCHELL: I keep on saying "South", but I do not believe the hon. gentleman would have received the same majority in Vancouver South that he got in Vancouver East.

I think it is far better done by precedent and understanding of the basic principles of our institutions; and I thought I would just put forward the point of view that with rights go responsibilities. I think rights have been established in this country. Some hon. gentlemen have talked about people in this country who were arrested for breaking the oath of office they took upon assuming office as civil servants; that was also mentioned by the hon. member for Spadina. I never thought I would live to see the day when anybody in Canada would be charged with an offence of that description. When one reads the press and listens to some of the speeches one would almost think some of these people had won a military decoration, or the Victoria Cross. They will be prosecuted by due process of law; and as the hon. member for Vancouver East rightly said, the government, charged as it is with responsibility for the safety of the state, under certain circumstances has to do many things it would not do under normal conditions.

During the war we had to have selective service of a kind and character that I never thought we would have in Canada. My ministry was given the power of direction over the lives of the men and women of the country to an extent that never existed before, and that condition still exists in Great Britain. As to the communist philosophy, I am one of the few people in this house who have been to Russia. Just take a look at that country when you talk about democracy! I think this is the first thing to say, that in a comparative sense the degree of freedom existing in Canada to-day is equal to that existing in any other country. I hope we shall have the good sense to maintain the procedure adopted by the people of Great Britain and all the British countries, and let the broad and basic principles of freedom stand on the basis of the common law and those other things which have made this and the other countries of the British commonwealth what they are.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): All of which is said "in a kindly way".

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish to take just a few moments to mention a point which so far I do not think has been sufficiently emphasized in this discussion. Let me say at once that I am in full agreement with the sentiments expressed in the amendment. If I thought that was the only thing we could get I would favour voting for it, and probably I shall vote for it anyway just because it contains sentiments with which I am in agreement. But I hope it will not be taken in lieu of a real bill of rights. I also hope this parliament will not be satisfied with a mere reiteration of principles of rights, some of which were passed centuries ago, and not in this country at all. While these principles still have a value and we would wish to retain them, yet there are other phases of liberty which we have never tasted and which I conceive should be fundamental in any bill of rights we might draw up.

The minister who has just taken his seat says he believes in what he calls the British way, of not writing it down on paper. I do not think there is any harm in doing that, but of course I agree with him that if that is all you do you are not doing much. But he is in an enviable position. If I were where he is and could write these things into the lives of the Canadian people by actions, I think it would be great; and if he will do that we shall not clamour for any bill of rights whatsoever. I agree that merely declaring something does not make it so. The hon. gentleman to my left has given us an outline of an admirable bill, in sentiment, passed in Alberta. These declarations have some value; they are at least declarations of faith, if nothing else; they are a declaration of the objective a nation sets for itself. But merely to declare that we shall have this liberty and that liberty will not give it.

The main point I wish to make is this. I want to see a bill of rights that will be up to date, that will put into legislation and practice in the economic, social and educational life of Canada those principles of liberty which I think we all conceive to have been the objectives of the men who fought in the last great war. I want to emphasize that the very basis of that must be economic liberty, for there can be no liberty in any country in which one individual must depend for his right to live upon the right of somebody else to hire him. We have seen too much of that kind of bondage. So that whether or not this amendment passes I hope it will not be regarded in this house or in the country as a complete bill of rights. I have the hope, expressed by my hon. friend to my left, that during this or next session a carefully prepared bill of rights will be brought in, which will begin with economic liberty and go on from that to restate in the most modern way possible all the other liberties which flow therefrom.

I believe the instances brought to the attention of this committee by the hon. member for Spadina are a disgrace to Canada. I hope that those hon. members who heard that will feel as I do about it and protest against it. The circumstances which we all know are prevalent in this country where men cannot find work, where men have not sufficient income to maintain their families and give them an education—all this is a negation of our liberty. A country abounding in wealth as this one is should be ashamed to know that such things exist. That is something I wanted to emphasize because it is not included in the amendment. A bill of rights should make economic liberty the basis of all liberties we desire to see in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I think in every way this has been a most constructive debate. Apart altogether from the appropriateness of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre in regard to what is in my opinion a most important bill in this Commons of Canada, I think we shall all agree that basically we are not very far apart. I have, as one who was born and bred where freedom had to be fought for, where fredom was denied and defied, heard with some cynicism the nonsense that has been talked in this house about magna charta and the Bill of Rights. After that declaration given to the barons at Runnymede, after the Bill of Rights and the various reforms, everything was broken up by wars of tyranny.

A few years after Runnymede we had to fight at Bannockburn in Scotland in 1314. We had to fight again for our very existence at Flodden in 1513. This, despite all the great charters and rights which you prate of so greatly in this Canada, a country largely made up by those who loved freedom who came from Scotland. The hon. member for Vancouver East reminded this committee of that the other evening. His people were the victims of tyranny in the highlands and so were mine. My grandmother's house was burned down because of tyranny and oppression. Where then was your bill of rights? Where then was your Magna Charta? Where then was your declaration of rights?

The hon. member for Vancouver East never said a truer thing in his life than when he said to-night that human rights, political rights and economic rights cannot be defined by charter. Basically and fundamentally they are in the soul and spirit of man. I think everyone of us in this chamber knows a little about the history of Canada. You had to fight in Canada for your rights. You are fighting for your rights to-day in Canada. No one can convince me that because of a matter of procedure which may affect the right of personal and political liberty you are going to destroy the fundamental rights of freedom. A poniard has been planted at the back of our nation, and when that happens it requires drastic remedies. Sometimes we have to sacrifice these personal liberties which may mean so much, and which I think I love as much as anyone, in order to preserve and maintain the freedom and strength of our nation.

You have the rights of the provinces in Canada. You have the rights of the federal authority in Canada. You have economic rights in Canada. You have fundamental human rights. Do you think for one second that this miserable, anaemic amendment meets the fundamental and basic problems of the rights of our people as Canadians, as Liberals, as Conservatives, as socialists or as those who come from Alberta? Like my hon. friend who spoke, I was amazed and ashamed. No one in this house has a higher respect for the hon. member for Peace River than I, but according to our accepted doctrines, what was the most wanton violation of fundamental rights that ever took place in this Dominion of Canada? It was that futile and fatuous measure by the former premier of Alberta who attempted to deprive men of the right of return on proper investment in the province. That may be right; according to the doctrines of the future, Alberta may be right. We are moving fast these days.

British Columbia has denied the franchise to orientals. Others think we are wrong, but we think we are right. Who here says that we are wrong?

Mr. PROBE: I do.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who says that?

Mr. PROBE: Right here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What a feeble voice heard alone!

Mr. PROBE: The hon. minister says—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Regina City has almost vindicated himself by his sudden appearance from his seat in trying to justify his miserable effort of just a moment before. Manitoba has Manitoba rights. Can anyone say that the great pioneer province of them all, Ontario, has no great Ontario rights. What about the province of Quebec, that province which I love? Why? For four hundred years the Scots brigade fought the battles of France. For once in history the Queen of France became Mary, Queen of Scotland. Have they no rights? What about Nova Scotia? Sometimes Quebec has too much pride. Do not forget Alexander who came to Nova Scotia in 1622. Do not forget the Hector which came to Canada in 1773. Do not forget the Selkirk settlers who came in 1811.

Did they come to Canada because of any bill of rights? They came to Canada to get freedom, and they got freedom in this country. They nursed and cherished that freedom, and because of that we have freedom to-day in this Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for Lake Centre and I are very close together in this thing, but I suggest to him to-night that this is far greater than this trivial and piffling amendment dealing with three simple rights among a multitude of rights.

Why cannot we in this parliament get together on this issue? Why cannot all parties form a committee to consider these things apart altogether from this bill? If necessary, that committee could call in advisers from the various provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that not what I suggested?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not what this piffling amendment says at all, and that is why I say we cannot support the amendment. We should have a joint committee to go into this matter calmly, thoroughly and completely. I think we are all animated by the same great human desire to analyse as far as we can and with due consistency our historical rights, the rights of the provinces, of the federal domain, of labour, of industry and all the various other rights that may be involved. Then in a time, not too long away, we can fashion and evolve a declaration of principles if you like—a bill of rights has a somewhat obnoxious significance to my mind because of my little knowledge of old country history—a declaration of Canadian principles containing the real stuff of freedom, the principles for which our people have fought and are now fighting.

May I say to my hon. friend that the place for that is not in connection with this bill; the place for it is in those terms which may be brought to reality in a year or so from now, terms which would contain a joint declaration of this parliament and sent, if necessary, for such comment as might be made upon them to the provinces of Canada. And thereby may I say with the greatest possible respect for my hon. friend, whom I deeply respect that we shall be worthy of the traditions of this great country of ours, and worthy of the great principles of freedom of the various provinces, and so build a charter worthy of the future of this nation which we all jointly love.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Chairman, in his efforts to achieve the championship of political opportunists in Canada the Minister of Veterans Affairs has made some pretty wild statements in addition to some that were fundamentally sound.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mostly wild.

Mr. LOW: Pretty wild. There is one thing that I should like to ask the minister to be good enough to repeat, because in his exuberance he lapsed at times into his native tongue and it was difficult for me to understand him.

[Mr. Mackenzie]

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is one of my rights.

Mr. LOW: It is also my right when the minister attacked a man who is now dead and not here to defend himself, to ask the minister just what it was that he said, and I will proceed to take him to task myself when he repeats what I think he said. I want to know what it was the minister said about my former leader in the province of Alberta. I understood him to say that he had divested people of their property and civil rights. I should like to know if that is what he meant, because, if so, I want to answer it. What was the minister referring to, if he does not wish to repeat his statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was referring, Mr. Chairman, if I am bound to reply, and I think I am—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is not bound to reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should like to reply. I was referring to a radical departure in financial policy which was sponsored by the government of Alberta and which in my humble judgment was a derogation of honourable agreements made by the province with those to whom it had financial obligations.

Mr. LOW: As I said, that is attacking a dead man who has no chance to answer.

An hon. MEMBER: Laurier is dead too.

Mr. LOW: That is so, but that is a different matter from calling a man by name in the tone and with the feeling with which the minister attacked a man who is not here to defend himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say at once that I have the greatest possible respect for Premier Aberhart.

Mr. LOW: There is one thing I should like to say in reply, and that is that the minister himself, if he were faced with the situation with which the then premier of Alberta was faced in 1935, would have done exactly the same thing that the then premier of Alberta did.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LOW: I am speaking of rights now which is what we are discussing on this bill and I am not going to be hushed by any politicians on the other side of the house. I have a right to say what I am going to say.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. No hon. member will be hushed in this house, and there is no way of hushing any member. The suggestion is not a proper one. I would remind all hon. members that we are considering an amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre and that all remarks must be relevant to that amendment.

Mr. LOW: I am speaking now, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment. I am speaking of fundamental Canadian rights as represented in the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I am answering a charge in respect of those rights made by a responsible so-called,—minister of the crown.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should not use the word "so-called" in that sense. It is entirely improper.

Mr. LOW: "So-called" was in reference to the preceding word and not to "minister of the crown". I am dealing now with fundamental rights of Canadian citizens, and I say that if the hon. minister who is leading the government in the house to-night had been in the position the then premier of Alberta was in in 1935 he would have given exactly the same consideration to the fundamental rights of Alberta citizens that the then premier of that province gave. There are rights of bondholders, it is true, and rights of holders of contracts, but those rights cannot be enforced completely if it means the destruction of the people who signed those contracts made in good faith. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that when a man goes before a group of people who hold contracts and says to them: The best we can do is to pay one-half of the interest rate—

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, not to take issue with the hon. gentleman, but I am sure he will appreciate that this bill has been under discussion for a long time and that every hon. member has had a full and complete opportunity to discuss it. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he is clearly out of order now and I would ask him with great respect kindly to confine himself to the amendment. I am sure he will appreciate that, as the minister conducting the bill, I am anxious to have it passed as quickly as possible without eliminating any necessary discussion, but the matter he is now discussing is clearly not relevant to the amendment.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Chairman, I understand that, and I shall respect the minister's request, but if I am to keep my seat and not be able to answer the minister I ask respectfully that the Minister of Veterans Affairs withdraw his statement and have it expunged from the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be most happy to withdraw it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The Minister of Veterans Affairs started off with a vision which by the end of his address became almost a fact. May I ask whether his suggestion is an indication of what government policy may be with respect to a bill of rights, or was it just his own hope?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be glad to discuss it with the members of the government. It would be my wish to have this done as I said. I had a moment's consultation with my colleague to my left and he agrees with what I said.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 16—On acquisition of other nationality.

Mr. HACKETT: On this section I wish to ask the minister a question or two which possibly might have been asked when sections 9 and 10 were under discussion. It appears from section 16, if I grasp its purport, that a Canadian woman may in certain circumstances renounce her nationality. I wish to ask the minister if the bill before the committee confers Canadian citizenship upon an alien woman who marries a Canadian citizen?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. HACKETT: And does a Canadian national woman who marries an alien man by the fact of marriage become an alien?

Mr. MARTIN: No; she certainly does not lose her Canadian nationality by the fact of marriage alone.

Mr. HACKETT: That is a departure from the rule which has obtained in Canada and still obtains at the present moment, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN: In other words, under this bill women are given the right to control their own status. That is a very progressive step.

Mr. HACKETT: A very progressive step? Will the minister say for the information of the committee if there is any other place in the British commonwealth of nations where a similar rule obtains?

Mr. MARTIN: At the conference of the Hague in 1930, where these matters were discussed and where commonwealth countries among others were represented, the general conclusion of that important gathering was that this was one of the steps that should be made. Legislation, or a provision in this particular, now exists in the United States and one or two other countries.

Mr. HACKETT: I am aware that the United States some few years ago departed from the rule of domicile; but my question was, is there any dominion, is there any country in the British commonwealth of nations in which the rule which appears to be embedded in the bill now before the committee is in force?

Mr. MARTIN: In the first place I do not think this arises under section 16. I do not want to prolong discussion of a matter that is already dealt with. I think my hon. friend will find that about two years ago Australia made a move not completely along this line but somewhat along this line.

Mr. HACKETT: It is my information that nowhere else in the British commonwealth of nations, nowhere else in the area that was known as the British empire, has there been any departure from a rule which has obtained—

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We have already dealt with the section which deals with the separate status of women; we are now dealing with another section altogether, and I think I must ask you to keep the discussion to this particular section.

Mr. HACKETT: I hope the minister is not going to attempt to be technical in discussing a matter which is one of the most important in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, I must rise to the point of order again. It is not what I want; it is what the rules of the house provide. Surely under this section the hon. gentleman is not in order in discussiong the status of women. We have passed that section. There will be an opportunity later for the hon. gentleman to make his references on that point, but we are now dealing with loss of Canadian citizenship, which has nothing to do with the separate status of women. I submit that the hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I hope that it will not be necessary to go into a long argument on whether or not I am in order. I would draw to the attention of the minister that a cursory reading of section 16 shows that the very question which I am discussing is the status of women arising out of marriage; and even were I a little bit on the margin I do not think the minister would wish to be over-technical in discussing a matter of this importance.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, may I have your ruling I do not want to be over-technical; but we have had a lot of discussion of this matter—

Mr. HACKETT: Then—

Mr. MARTIN: May I just complete it? Consequently, as the minister conducting the bill, I have no other position to take than to ask that we discuss this particular section. We dealt with this matter, and the hon. gentleman on another occasion will have his chance. But on this section he is out of order, and, Mr. Chairman, I would ask your ruling.

Mr. HACKETT: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say a word on the point of order. I am talking about, or attempting to discuss the status of women resulting from marriage. I shall now read section 16:

> A Canadian citizen who ,when outside of Canada and not under a disability, by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

The point is that in certain circumstances a Canadian woman, by a voluntary act other than marriage, may yield up her Canadian citizenship. I am debating and hope to be permitted to debate the issue which arises from her marriage to an alien, and I submit with great deference that it requires very slight imagination to see that I am speaking of something which is entirely relevant.

The CHAIRMAN: In committee, of course, considerable latitude is given with respect to a matter that arises in a section. There is a reference here to marriage, although there is no mention either of men or women; therefore it would appear to relate to either men or women. I would ask the hon. member to make his remarks relevant to section 16, upon which the note is, "on acquisition of other nationality."

Mr. HACKETT: I shall endeavour to keep within the limits of your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, but my effort at the moment is to discuss the effect of marriage in its application to citizenship as stated in section 16. I hope that the minister, who has given a great deal of time to the study of this bill and who possesses a great deal of information cencerning it, will be good enough to tell the committee why an age-old rule, based upon the integrity of the home—

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, I must again ask you to request the hon. member to deal with this particular section. We have dealt with the disability sections in so far as they apply to women; we have passed those sections; now we are on a matter which merely has to do with the acquisition of nationality or citizenship by any voluntary act other than marriage. It specifically excludes the question of marriage. To discuss the status of women under this section would certainly stretch the meaning of relevancy to a point which I do not feel, conforming to my responsibility under the rules of this house, I can possibly accede to.

Mr. HACKETT: If the hon. gentleman would endeavour to stretch his sense of responsibility to the house to the extent of observing the ruling of the Chairman, he would give a much better example to the house than by attempting to evade a question with respect to a departure from a fundamental rule of citizenship that has obtained for centuries.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have given my ruling and I think it is clear. There is in the section a reference to marriage and the hon. member may wish to strike out the words regarding marriage. I do not know what his intention is, but I believe my ruling was clear and I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to a discussion within the four corners of the section.

Mr. HACKETT: I would be grateful indeed if the hon. gentleman would enlighten the committee as to the reason for departing from the rule that has obtained for centuries in all British countries and which is still the rule in Canada, a rule that is set forth in section 13 of the Naturalization Act, which declares that the wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject and the wife of an alien shall be deemed to be an alien. If section 16 be enacted it will be a complete departure from the rule that is set forth in the statute and included in the statute which amended section 13, which was passed in 1931. It would be most enlightening to the committee if the hon. gentleman would give us the reasons for this radical departure. I would be grateful to him if he would give an explanation of some length.

Mr. MARTIN: As I said, dealing with the relevant sections and in my statement in chief, we felt in framing the bill that we should treat women as persons and give them the right to have their own nationality just as well as men. I am sure the sole woman member of this house will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the section carry?

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask the hon. member for Stanstead a question?

Mr. HACKETT: Certainly.

Mrs. STRUM: Do you mean to say that you are opposing that?

Mr. HACKETT: I am sorry that the hon. member has been absent from the house. It was my endeavour to oppose it and I shall be happy to set forth the reasons upon which that opposition rests.

Mr. MARTIN: Kindly do it on the relevant section.

Mr. HACKETT: There must be a little confusion in the minister's mind as to what constitutes relevancy, and this confusion seems to be a little more marked when he finds the answer to a question embarrassing. Let us consider for a moment why I am asking these questions. I am one of those who believe in the integrity of the home. Marriage brings about a union which is the foundation of the home. There are many influences—more to-day possibly than there used to be—which appear to be undermining the integrity of the home. I am one of those who believe that when a man and a woman marry they set up a partnership, a union in which there should be complete harmony and understanding, and the elimination, in so far as possible, of everything that may disturb that union. However, I should be very glad if the minister would say what is the reason for departing from a rule which has obtained from the very genesis of the existence of separate states. I recall that in Roman law the bride said: "And your people shall become my people and your gods my gods". The minister must remember the old French adage, "qui prend mari prend pays". She who takes a husband assumes his nationality and becomes a citizen of his country. But I am interested in knowing the reason for the departure. Has anybody asked for it? If so, who?

Mr. MARTIN: Having taken the position I did as to the relevancy of the hon. gentleman's point, I hesitate to give a reply in view of the ruling of the Chair. The hon. member was not in the house when we discussed the disability sections of the bill. He asks what made us do it. I am afraid—and I say this with great respect to him—that if there is anything that distinguishes his group from those on this side it is the inability to realize that women who rear children, women to whom he did pay tribute to-night, in this day and age are persons just as well as the sex to which he and I belong. If they are entitled to own property, to sit in parliament; if they are entitled to be designated persons by the judicial committee and to take their place in the upper chamber, then surely this house will support the government in declaring that women have the right to separate national status.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given the hon. member for Stanstead wide latitude, as I believe all hon. members will agree, but I do not think we should revert to the general question of disability.

Mr. HACKETT: May it please the Chair—

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks, with respect to disability, to the meaning within section 16.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to know if the minister is aware that in the United States, for instance, the estates duty—succession duty as we call it here—is imposed upon the estates of citizens of the United States, and that if this section and other sections which are cast in the same spirit are finally passed and became law, the estate of an American woman, a citizen of the United States, married to a Canadian citizen and retaining her nationality, would be subject to taxation in the United States. Her estate would be taxable in the United States because she is a citizen of the United States. Her estate would be taxable in Canada because she would be domiciled in Canada, and the result would be that her estate would be liable to double taxation. Would the minister advise the committee—

Mr. ABBOTT: Could we not discuss this question on the budget?

Mrs. STRUM: Is the hon. member worried about the double taxation or about the sanctity of the home?

The CHAIRMAN: Does section 16 carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to ask a question.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister be good enough to answer my question?

Mr. MARTIN: It certainly has nothing to do with this section.

Mr. HACKETT: It has a great deal to do with it. If a lady who is a citizen of the United States marries a Canadian citizen who is a man and she retains her citizenship, her estate at her death is liable to taxation in the United States where, under their estate tax, taxation rests upon citizenship. In Canada our inheritance tax rests upon domicile. I am asking the minister whether he will be good enough to inform the committee if he has examined that phase of the situation which will result from the enactment of the bill which is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have listened carefully to the question of the hon. member for Stanstead. I would draw his attention to the fact that this section is related to disabilities other than marriage, and consequently his question is out of order.

Mr. HACKETT: May I speak to the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: No; I have given my ruling.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, but you have not allowed me the privilege of speaking to the point of order. I would respectfully ask that I be permitted—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have given my ruling. I have ruled that the question of the hon. member is out of order. The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to speak to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order before the committee.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to ask the minister a question. I do so very humbly. I say that for this reason: I have endeavoured to attend this long drawn-out discussion. Any discussion that I have missed I have read in the record of our proceedings. I do not want to be told that it was covered two or three weeks ago because my memory does not extend back that far.

Would the minister enlighten us on his views as to this whole question of dual nationality? To my mind it is a—

Mr. MARTIN: Section 17 deals with dual nationality.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Am I in the wrong corner? With respect, Mr. Chairman, my submission is that we are dealing with a section which gives dual nationality to a woman; therefore a question with respect to dual nationality clearly comes under section 16.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 17 deals with that question. I shall be glad to deal with it when we come to that particular section.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect may I say to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that section 16 deals with dual nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out that section 16 deals with the acquisition of nationality through voluntary acts other than marriage.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, but the whole—

Mr. MARTIN: The whole question of dual nationality is covered by section 17, which we still have to pass. It is one of the remaining sections that we allowed to stand.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am saving the minister a lot of time. If I ask the question now he will not have to bother with it when we come to section 17. Obviously dual nationality is covered in section 16. That is what we are dealing with. The minister is saying that it does not exist under one condition. However, I shall be very happy to wait.

Mr. MARTIN: Thank you.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Except that I have certain engagements later on.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to point out to the minister that ladies are persons; that Canadian citizens who are females are persons, and the fact that they have rights is hardly an answer to the point that has been raised here. The point is whether a home that results from a marriage is to be divided, and whether there is anything that has overtaken us in the last year or two which makes it desirable that there should be two nationalities in the home?

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, may I call your attention to your ruling and I am sure the hon. gentleman will observe it.

Mr. HACKETT: I say with great respect—

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling.

Mr. IRVINE: Tell him again.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think I need to repeat it. I hope the hon. member for Stanstead will respect it.

Mr. REID: When this section was up before the committee the last time, some of us were asking the minister certain questions, and it was held over for further consideration. I am going to move an amendment to section 16, to take care of the matters which were discussed when the bill was before the committee, and to which no answer was given to the questions asked of the minister. My amendment will delete four words from lines 16 and 17. If hon. members will look at lines 16 and 17 of section 16 they will see that the four words I am asking to delete are as follows: "when outside of Canada". The section would then read:

A Canadian citizen who, and not under a disability, by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

That will take care of the matter. This amendment would cover all those both inside and outside Canada.

Mr. GREEN: That was one of the points I meant to suggest to the minister in connection with this section. It would repay members of the committee to read this section carefully because it is an important one. I have detected a tendency, or what I thought was a tendency, on the part of the minister, not to pay much attention to the loss of citizenship, but rather to spread the cloak of citizenship over as many people as possible. It is not quite that simple. We must give careful consideration to the loss of citizenship. There are certain people who are not entitled to have Canadian citizenship, and this committee should bear that fact in mind. The section reads:

A Canadian citizen who, when outside of Canada and not under a disability, by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

The provision is that he must do some voluntary and formal act other than marriage. By acquiring the nationality of another country he then will lose his Canadian citizenship. But he can do that only if he is outside Canada; in other words, if he does that act within Canada he cannot be deprived of his citizenship. I think the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster meets this last situation, and is therefore very much to the point. But I suggest to the minister that some provision should be made in this section by which the man who serves in a hostile force loses his Canadian citizenship. The other evening I instanced the Canadian-born Japanese—

Mr. MARTIN: I shall have an amendment along that line for section 17.

Mr. GREEN: I agree there should be such an amendment to section 17, but why is it not put in section 16 also?

Mr. MARTIN: I shall explain shortly.

Mr. GREEN: If a Canadian-born Japanese served in the forces of Japan, and there were instances of that, then he should be deprived of his Canadian citizenship, and I suggest that section 16 should be amended accordingly. Another reason why a man in Canada should be deprived of citizenship if he does an act by which he acquires the citizenship of another country is that actions of that sort have already been taken in Canada. Take the case of the citizen of another country who appears before his consul in Canada and does an act that substantiates his citizenship in that other country. There is no reason why he should also retain his Canadian citizenship. Last November in Vancouver one of the Russian officials from Ottawa took applications from former residents of Russia. I have here a newspaper clipping—

Mr. MARTIN: He was not renouncing citizenship in that case, was he?

Mr. GREEN: Here is a picture of the Russian official and the applicant appearing before him. Underneath we find this caption:

Becoming U.S.S.R. citizens—Fifty B.C. residents a day are registering for Soviet citizenship at the Marine building offices of the commercial counsellor to the embassy of the U.S.S.R. in Canada. They are former citizens of the western regions of the Ukrainian and Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republics who have not taken out Canadian citizenship. V. G. Pavlov, representative of the consular division of the embassy, is seen above registering a former Polish citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: They were not citizens.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently they had been residents of Russia at one time. But before Japan struck she took a census of the Japanese in Canada, and Japanese residents here complied with the census regulations of that country. From time to time actions of that kind are taken by people who are nationals of other countries. I submit to the minister that when they do such things they should lose their Canadian citizenship, and I suggest that he should consider adding the words "or acknowledges" after the word "acquires" so that the section would read "by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires or acknowledges the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada." The act done by that person may not be sufficient to make him a citizen of the other country, but his intention may have been to become a citizen of that country. In other words, if he acknowledges another nationality or another citizenship, then there is no reason why he should retain Canadian citizenship. As the section now reads, it is too restricted. Persons will lose Canadian citizenship only when they actually acquire another citizenship, and I am suggesting that where they acknowledge another citizenship, though in fact they may not have acquired it, they should lose Canadian citizenship.

My final suggestion is that a provision should be added to this section to the effect that making a declaration renouncing Canadian citizenship is sufficient to make that declarant lose his citizenship. The government has already followed this procedure in connection with the Japanese requesting repatriation. It obtained from them a renunciation of citizenship. I have here a copy of the renunciation, which reads as follows:

I, ...(.....), born ..... registered as a Canadian-born British subject (J. R. No. .....) under order in council P.C. 9760, dated December 16, 1941, hereby declare my desire to relinquish my British nationality and to assume the status of a national of Japan.

Further, I request the government of Canada, under the conditions set out in the statement of the Minister of Labour dated February 13, 1945, to arrange for and effect my repatriation to Japan.

I declare that I fully understand the contents of this document, and I voluntarily affix my signature hereto.

A similar declaration was signed by Japanese who had been naturalized in Canada, except that in their cases the words were "Canadian naturalized British subject" rather than "Canadian-born British subject." There was an instance in which the government actually obtained a renunciation, and I suggest that section 16 should contain power to take such renunciations. There is a similar provision in the Canadian Nationals Act, which is chapter 21 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. In section 3 the minister will find provision for a certain type of citizen making a declaration renouncing his Canadian nationality if he is of full age and not under disability. I do not understand why no provision has been made in section 16 of this bill for a renunciation of nationality. So that I would suggest to the minister that in addition to the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster he give consideration to adding the words "or acknowledges" after the word "acquires" and adding after the word "Canada" in the second last line of the section the words "or makes a declaration renouncing his Canadian citizenship," and also that he deal with the case of the man who served in a hostile force.

Mr. MARTIN: What I say first will apply to the observations of the hon. member who moved the amendment and to those of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The section seeks to deal with a class of Canadian citizens who, when outside the country, by a voluntary act other than marriage acquires the nationality or citizenship of another country. That is the main, broad intent of the section. If we were to accept the suggestion and add the words "or acknowledges" the mere acknowledgment would not give to the person making it the nationality of the other country.

Mr. GREEN: Of course that is his concern.

Mr. MARTIN: The fact is that it does not. What we are seeking to do—and this is altogether part from my comments on the proposed amendment—is to avoid statelessness. The hon. gentleman has given this matter a great deal of thought, and he knows that at the 1930 conference at which all commonwealth and other countries were represented one of the understandings—it was not a commitment nor was it an agreement; this was a general conference attended by representatives of the government representing the party of my hon. friend—there was a general understanding that there should be promoted greater uniformity in the nationality laws of the countries represented at that conference.

Mr. REID: The minister has on many occasions referred to stateless persons. Supposing the government had proof that a man living in this country had two citizenships and one was taken away, how would he be stateless?

Mr. MARTIN: That is why I said I was speaking apart from the amendment. If the hon. member will permit me, I shall come to that in a minute. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to mention this matter privately to me. We have considered it carefully. The mere acknowledgment would not give him the nationality of another country, but the amendment does raise an important point, one which regretfully I cannot accept. The section itself deals with persons who are outside Canada, persons who are not within the reach of the constituted authorities of this country. The section as it now stands is substantially that of the present Naturalization Act and contains substantially the same wording as will be found in all the naturalization laws throughout the dominion. I should like to call the attention of the committee to Dicey on "Conflict of Laws", fourth edition, which contains the following comment:

> A person not under disability may, when in a foreign state, become naturalized there by any voluntary and formal act, which achieves this end according to the law of such state, e.g., by becoming naturalized in the United States. But remark that he cannot, do this unless he is within the foreign state. This rule, apparently, would render ineffective the naturalization in France of any Englishman being still in the British dominions by the vote of the Fren legislature, such as the votes by which French national assembles have on several occasions naturalized foreigners as French citizens who were not at the time in France. It appears also to be necessary that the person naturalized in the foreign state should take some part in the naturalization which proves his voluntary assent to it. Of course, the neglect of either of these conditions, would not render the vote of a French legislature turning a British subject into a French subject invalid in France, but it would prevent such vote from rendering the person so naturalized an alien in the United Kingdom.

It is, I submit, fundamental that no state in the world affords its citizens residing in that state facilities for becoming naturalized in another state. In other words, the responsibilities of a Canadian citizen cannot be thrown off at will or caprice by a Canadian who still resides in Canada. Take a concrete instance. Canada was at war with Germany from September 10, 1939, but did not declare war on Roumania until December, 1941. I am taking this example not to make any invidious comparison but simply to show that if we were to accept an amendment like this it would create abuses which I am sure on reflection it will be found had not been borne in mind.

Mr. HACKETT: That is subject to exception.

Mr. MARTIN: As I said, Canada was at war with Germany from September 10, 1939, but did not declare war on Roumania until December, 1941. During a considerable period of this time it was notorious that Roumania was under effective enemy control and influence, although technically neutral. Could this country have tolerated any of her citizens who might be disaffected in relation to the war acquiring, through connivance with the Roumanian government, naturalization as Roumanian citizens? The whole tenor of the discussion thus far has been to emphasize that if Canadian citizens are disloyal or disaffected they should be punished by Canadian authority; in other words, that we should clean our own house. We cannot have in Canada, any more than they can have in any other country of the commonwealth where there are similar provisions, groups of citizens who acquire within Canada the nationality of a foreign country.

I appreciate that the hon. gentleman is addressing himself to another situation, but if we were to accept this amendment it would mean that any group of citizens could at a particular moment denationalize themselves by some act in connivance with a foreign power. No country in the world can afford to allow citizens within its borders to denationalize themselves. While I appreciate the purpose of the amendment, I cannot accept it because of the great abuses which it would provoke, even though unintentionally.

Mr. GREEN: In the very next section the minister provides for just that which he now says should not be done, that is, for a person in Canada to renounce his Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: That section deals with dual nationality, and I shall have an observation to make on that later on. Section 16 simply deals with the citizen outside Canada who, by some voluntary act, acquires the nationality of another country. The suggestion is that we should extend that to people within Canada and I say that I cannot agree to that.

Mr. GREEN: Section 17 provides that when a person born in Canada becomes of age he can renounce his Canadian citizenship. What is the difference between that and the man who is a citizen of Russia and Canada, living in Canada and who, being over age, renounces his citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: Section 17 deals with the dual nationality of persons—section 16 deals with the simple question I have mentioned, that of the person who, outside Canada, seeks by a voluntary act to acquire the nationality of another country.

Mr. REID: The majority of people in British Columbia are a little perturbed regarding the status of 1,600 people who were born and educated in that province. Of course they would not come under section 16 because they were citizens of this country before they left it. I am not sure whether the minister is aware of the Japanese law which I believe is still in effect. I am speaking from memory, but up until 1922 the births of children of Japanese citizens born in this country had to be registered within forty-eight hours. They were compelled to register those births or they ceased to be Japanese citizens. There was such an outcry by people in British Columbia and elsewhere over this that the Japs, in that cute way they have, changed the law so that on the surface it seemed to mean something else when in reality it meant the same thing.

Supposedly the new law did not impose compulsion, but every Japanese family that I knew of regsitered their children with the Japanese consul. When these people appeared before the committee of this house which sat in 1935 and again in 1936 they were asked to which country they owed allegiance. This was long before there was any question of racial hatred or thought of war. They said without hesitation that they were citizens of Japan. I am receiving requests to get an explanation from the minister as to what will be the status of up to 1,600 Japanese who left British Columbia, before 1940 went to Japan for military purposes and later fought against Canada and are still in Japan. These Japanese were born in British Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall deal with that on section 16. I may say that it has not been possible to ascertain that there is any such number. We have been in contact with other countries, but to the extent that there may be a certain number, we shall deal with them by an amendment I am going to offer to section 17 when we reach it. The reasons I have given I trust will convince the committee of the desirability of not accepting the amendment. When we come to section 17 we shall deal with persons who have served in a war against Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wise to provide also in section 16 that the adult who has Canadian citizenship and serves in a hostile force shall lose that Canadian citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to put it in the appropriate section, but not in this section which deals with another matter.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to raise a question that has not been raised before on section 16. I refer to the families of Canadians born and raised in South America. There are a great number of Canadian families who are normally resident in South America, particularly in Brazil, Colombia, Peru, Venezuela, the Argentine and other South American republics. The heads of these families are engineers, technicians, and so forth, but some are business men carrying on normal business practices. They have raised and are now raising their families in South America. They have to many outward signs a dual nationality in that they live and earn their livelihood in South Amercia. Nevertheless, they consider themselves and are by nationality Canadian citizens, and they travel under what is known as a British passport.

There is in many of these South American countries a compulsory service law which compels young men of the age of eighteen to undergo a period of perhaps a year and sometimes longer of military training. The period varies with the different republics. The young man may elect to do one of two things. He may elect to leave the country in which he is resident and return to Canada or, particularly if he is going to school in one of the South American republics—and may I say that some of their schools are excellent in teaching both English and the language of the country—he may elect to undergo that year of military service. Under this section that would be a voluntary act. If he joins the armed forces of any of the South American republics he is considered by that republic to be a national of the republic. But under this section it would be a voluntary act because he could have elected to leave the republic and return to Canada. In Brazil there are many hundreds of Canadian families, and it is most inconvenient for their children when they reach the military age to leave the republic and return to Canada. I suggest that this section will be a serious deterrent or, shall I say, put a crimp in quite a number of these families, who will have to be separated in order to retain their Canadian citizenship. I understand that there was a treaty between the United Kingdom and many of the South American republics—

Mr. MARTIN: Are these people South American born?

Mr. ADAMSON: They can be either.

Mr. MARTIN: That is an important question. Are they Canadian-born or South American-born?

Mr. ADAMSON: According to the South American law it does not matter if they have resided there for five years.

Mr. MARTIN: If they are Canadian-born we can deal with them. If they are South American-born, that is a different question altogether.

Mr. ADAMSON: Let us assume that they are Canadian-born. If they have lived in Brazil for a period of five years the republic of Brazil considers that they are liable to their draft law, or they did; I do not know what the law is at present. But I lived there myself and I know this question came up. After the young men had lived there for five years, on attaining the age of eighteen, they were faced with two choices.

Mr. MARTIN: Is my hon. friend speaking of minors?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: They are not affected by this section.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, they are, because it says that if he acquires the nationality of citizenship of a country other than Canada he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: They are in the disabled class.

Mr. ADAMSON: They are considered to be citizens of the South American republic at the age of eighteen.

Mr. MARTIN: But not by us.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is what I want to find out. Then undoubtedly they have a dual nationality between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one because they are considered as being nationals of the South American republic in which they reside. Presumably they would have to make a declaration after they are twenty-one years of age to say that they wish to become Canadian citizens.

Mr. MARTIN: Then we deal with them under section 17.

Mr. ADAMSON: Section 16 deals with them, too, because they have presumably voluntarily made this choice when they become a member of the armed forces of one of the South American republics, and under the South American laws they are considered to be be nationals of that country. Therefore, between those years they have a dual nationality. I admit that the second part of my argument comes under section 17. They would have to renounce South American nationality and become Canadians once again, as it were. It is a serious question. Many young Americans were called to the colours in the South American countries, while Canadians, because of a treaty made between Great Britain and most of these republics, were exempt. I suggest that this section will put Canadians in the same status as Americans and make them liable for service to which they were not liable until the passing of this bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the hon. member for York West if his contention is that we have dual Canadian citizenship, in that Canadian citizens residing in South America are citizens of, say Brazil, and also citizens of Canada? I know that applies in the case of Great Britain, but I was not aware that Canada had sunk to that terribly low position which we have been hearing about now for three weeks, in that Canadians were guilty of this crime of dual citizenship. I hope not.

Mr. ADAMSON: I thought we were.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FULTON: Could the minister clear up this point so that it will not have to be raised when we come to section 17: what is the position at law of those Japanese either who have not become naturalized in Canada or whose children have been born in Canada and whose birth certificates are registered with the Japanese consul? I feel it is important to know that so that we shall know whether we are changing their status when this bill becomes law. What is that status under Canadian law now? Do we regard them as Japanese nationals or Canadian citizens, or under our law are they only Canadian nationals?

Mr. MARTIN: I was following the hon. member, but I should like to consider the question carefully before I answer. They are dual nationals.

Mr. FULTON: Our laws recognize that they have Japanese nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: I say they are dual nationals. It is not a question of recognition, it is a question of fact.

Mr. FULTON: I wonder whether the minister would not consider that there is a good deal of force in the amendment suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster, because the point of some of us, anyway, who have been concerned with this question is that under our law as it stands at present these Japanese are Japanese nationals.

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to deal with that when I come to section 17. I cannot accept the amendment for the reasons I have mentioned. We are not going to create a special group in this country. Under the circumstances I have mentioned it would create a serious situation.

Mr. FULTON: I wonder whether the minister could anticipate a little further and say whether under section 17 he intends to make it possible or to allow it to be possible for these people to be regarded as a separate group, which they now are under our law, or if he is going to change our law for them to become, as they have not been up to the present, Canadian citizens.

Mr. MARTIN: I intend later to deal with people who served in the armed forces of another country with which Canada is at war.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate that, but my point was more general; at least that was the intention of my question. I was asking about those whose births have been registered with the Japanese consul and those who are not registered as Canadian citizens.

Mr. MARTIN: I have dealt with that in a general way; but I think we should wait until we come to section 17.

Amendment (Mr. Reid) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—By renunciation where dual nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: Before we discuss that I wish to give notice of an amendment, which I am asking my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move:

To amend clause 17 by adding thereto as subsection (2) the following:

(2) "Where a Canadian citizen who is under the law of any other country a national or a citizen of that country serves in the armed forces of such country when it is at war with Canada, he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen."

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment will necessitate making the original section 17 subsection 1. Does section 17 as amended by subsection 1 carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am coming back to where I stood up a little while ago, and I hope that this time I get the right ball in the right pocket. I do not know whether hon. members play that game or not. What I am anxious to have the Secretary of State do is—and if my memory serves me aright he has not yet done it—to give us his, and therefore the government's view, on this whole question of dual nationality. I realize that in times gone by such a thing has existed. My humble opinion is that it is a complete contradiction in terms. In other words, we have heard recently where a certain person avowed a higher duty or morality or something of that sort to a country other than Canada. Or let us take those, of whom we have quite a number, that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle spoke about a moment ago. There are United States women who have married Canadian husbands. Many of them are now living in Nassau to avoid taxation and that sort of thing; they go freely between California and Canada, and the only way, as I understand it, that they can lose that United States citizenship is if they vote in this country.

Mr. MARTIN: That is one of the ways.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is the main way.

Mr. MARTIN: No; there are others.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I say that is the main way; but we, being opposed in politics, watch that they do not vote, so that it really does not happen very often.

Mr. MacINNIS: Maybe they vote on the wrong side.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have found that out, and I am glad the hon. member supports me in that respect. This is the only time he and I have seen eye-to-eye since I met him, and in spite of that I still like him. Here is my thought: we have all been making speeches as to what an important bill this is, that it is going to give us a status and a standing. I am all for it, and I agree with all that. But as a matter of common sense, is it possible for any person to have two loyalties? Is it possible for any person to take the oath of allegiance to the king and at the same time take the oath of allegiance to the ruling person, or whatever it may be, in another country? It is all very well to say that many of us have not taken the oath of allegiance. I never did until I came to the parliament of Canada. I spoke of being Canadian-born; that is so; nevertheless the same loyalties are required of me, and the same laws apply to me, I mean, with respect to treason, official secrets and acts of that description. Therefore I should like from the Secretary of State his view as to what is the position of a person having dual citizenship. Nationality is the wrong word; it is citizenship. That is what they have. In my judgment it is a complete contradiction in terms and it is just not possible. Let us assume that the woman is a person, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle so ably reminded us a moment ago. Indeed, her presence would put the question out of debate, and the hon. member is quite a person at that. Will the minister please tell me how a person can be a citizen in two countries having regard to the loyalty to a country which citizenship involves?

Mr. MARTIN: There is actually no difference at all between the hon. gentleman and myself. What we have tried to do, in so far as that is possible, is to avoid as many occasions of dual nationality as we can. Of course, the hon. gentleman is correct; one cannot be really loyal to two countries, particularly when they have opposite currents of political thought, different ideologies and the like. No one quarrels with the hon. gentleman's statement, and all this bill does is to minimize, in comparison with the existing law, the occasions of dual nationality. One of the reasons for the Hague conference of 1930, to which I have made several references, was by agreement to try to get countries to pass laws of nationality which would minimize occasions of dual nationality. It is possible under the existing law in some countries to-day for a person to have no fewer than eleven nationalities. As hon. gentlemen know, before the war, by countries who were our allies and by some who were not, persons who came to this and other countries did not lose the nationality of these other countries. I do not want to mention specific countries. I have not in mind at the moment the far eastern countries but some European nations. Nationality is acquired by most countries either through jus soli, the law of the place, or jus sanguinis, the law of blood relationship, or a combination of these two. All that countries can hope to do in the framing of their nationality laws is to create a situation which will avoid so far as it is possible dual or more than double nationality.

Lawyers in the house will recall the case of an individual born in a zeppelin travelling over the territory of the United States, the father a German and the mother an Italian, creating a situation where that child under the laws of four different countries was a national of as many countries. These are situations that can be cured only by common agreement among the nations. I cannot add anything more. I fully agree with everything the hon. gentleman has said, and we are doing in this bill all we can to minimize occasions of dual nationality.

Mrs. STRUM: I did not intend to speak at all, because I did not think it would require a lot of flowery language to give women the status of human beings, and it seemed to me that the minister was only doing what any decent, self-respecting nation would do sometime in its history, so that it did not require comment. However, for the sake of the hon. gentleman who some time ago wanted to defend the sanctity of the home, I may say that it was called to my attention twenty years ago at a homemakers convention that we had a number of Canadian women who, through marriage had lost their Canadian nationality. They had married aliens and in some cases those aliens were deported because of some criminal offence. Here we had a Canadian woman being deported because her husband was being interned as a criminal in Italy, say, and she knew nothing of Italian, shared no Italian customs or attitudes, and went there as the wife of a criminal. It made her position extremely difficult indeed. I may say for the benefit of the hon. gentleman that women's institutes and councils and organizations, for at least twenty years—because I have been associated with them for twenty years—have tried to establish this simple fact of the integrity of the woman as an individual apart from her husband. We have many cases of United States men coming to this country and living here for many years, enjoying everything but the right to vote, and in spite of such a man's marriage to a Canadian, it has never altered an American's status as a citizen of the republic to the south. I take it that the passing of this bill rescues women from the position to which marriage had degraded them. That is to say, through marriage the woman sank to the level of an imbecile or a dependent. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN: It is a fact that under the old act there were certain classes of disabled persons—idiots, imbeciles, minors and women. We have taken women out of that group.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you not include judges?

Mrs. STRUM: Instead of protecting the sanctity of the home, marriage was degrading it. In other words, the effect of the law was to degrade woman by putting her down to the level of the same status as an imbecile or an incompetent or a minor. The passage of this bill merely restores human rights and allows a woman to choose whether or not she will take the citizenship of her husband, and that, it seems to me, should be a matter between husband and wife. I am all for the sanctity of the home, but not for the sake of taxes—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have ruled out of order any references to taxes. This bill has nothing to do with that question.

Mrs. STRUM: I am sorry. I do not think the sanctity of the home can be maintained by degrading one of the partners to the contract.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member allow me to interrupt her. It was only her charm that prevented my rising earlier to object on the ground that she was out of order.

Mrs. STRUM: I apologize if I am out of order, and I do not wish any considerations of "charm" to weigh in my favour. I wish to be democratic.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that the purpose of the amendment which has been introduced is to get at the natural-born Canadian citizen who happens to have another nationality and serves in the armed forces of that nation at a time when that nation is at war with Canada. I take it, in view of the provisions of section 21 (1) (e), it would not be necessary to have such a provision to take care of a naturalized Canadian citizen. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, quite. The section deals with natural-born Canadian citizens.

Mr. FLEMING: The amendment, therefore, is designed to make a similar provision in the case of a natural-born Canadian citizen. Would it not be logical to apply the principle of the minister's amendment to the case of a person serving in the armed forces of any country at war with Canada? Let us take an illustration. Suppose the minister has in mind the case of a natural-born Canadian citizen who, under the law of Japan, because of Japanese origin, is also a subject of the Japanese emperor. Suppose that instead of fighting in the armies of the Japanese emperor he served in a nazi U-boat. Why should he not be under a disability in that case? Why should he not lose his Canadian citizenship just as much as if he served in the forces of the Japanese emperor?

Mr. MARTIN: This deals with a situation that is quite clear; it deals with a man who serves in the armed forces of a country at war with Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not want to belabour the point; it is a simple one. The amendment confines the situation to where a man has served in the armed forces of the other nation which recognizes him as one of its nationals.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: But another nation. The use of the word "such" in the fourth line of the amendment would confine that case to service in the armies of the Japanese emperor. My suggestion is that it be broadened to include any other country which is at war with Canada at the same time. That is in keeping with the principle of the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN: We think this is the proper way to deal with it.

Mr. FLEMING: Is the minister not prepared to take account of the other situation where some person of Japanese origin may be serving in the German armies or in the armies of other nations at war with Canada? Why confine it to the one case where he is serving in the armed forces of a country which looks upon him as a national?

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister given consideration to making the provision simply service in a hostile force? Under the law of the enemy country this Canadian citizen might not be a national of that country. I suggest that if he has served in a hostile force he should lose his Canadian citizenship automatically.

Mr. REID: Some consideration should be given to that because, according to information given us during the war, a certain number of Japanese left British Columbia, went to Japan, and later went by submarine to Germany where they gave information and assistance before the capitulation. We have no idea as to the number, but the statement has been made by British and prominent Canadians that in Germany there were Japanese who had been born in British Columbia and who were assisting Germany by giving information. I think the minister might well take into consideration what has been brought out by hon. members on the other side.

Mr. GREEN: If that change were made the section would read:

Where a Canadian citizen serves in the armed forces of any other country when it is at war with Canada he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to accept the words: "any other country".

Mr. FLEMING: Thank you.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not quite the same point the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. FLEMING: It is precisely the same.

Mr. GREEN: How will the section read?

Mr. MARTIN: It will then read:

Where a Canadian citizen who is under the law of any other country a national or citizen of that country serves in the armed forces of any other country when it is at war with Canada he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. GREEN: Then the minister is not accepting the suggestion?

Mr. BENTLEY: If a Canadian-born citizen who had no other disability of being called another national, but a natural-born citizen like myself, served outside Canada in an enemy force during the war, and at some future time came back to Canada, would he not be subject to the laws of Canada and be liable to be tried for treason? If we take a person of Japanese or any other origin or nationality that we are talking about at the present time, and if that person served in the Japanese navy or in a German U-boat and we cancelled his citizenship because of that, does it preclude the possibility of Canada taking action against him for treason or dealing with him as an enemy if he should ever return to Canada, or are we to absolve him from that sin and simply punish him by cancelling his citizenship, or are we to use the law of extradition, bring him home and give him the punishment he deserves?

Mr. GREEN: What is the answer to my question?

Mr. MARTIN: We are leaving out the word "other," and so it will read, "any country that is at war with Canada." The amendment that I present would then read as follows:

Where a Canadian citizen who is under the law of any other country a national or citizen of that country serves in the armed forces of any country when it is at war with Canada he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. BENTLEY: That does not answer my question. I should like the minister to deal with my question.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 25 deals with it.

Mr. BENTLEY Will section 25 deal with it after this amendment is passed?

Mr. MARTIN: Certainly.

Mr. STIRLING: I wish the Secretary of State would explain what is meant by the inclusion of these words:

. . . who is under the law of any other country a national or citizen of that country.

It seems to me to be redundant. I do not know what the minister is aiming at in including that. Without these words, it would be a plain statement of fact as follows:

Where a Canadian citizen serves in the armed forces of another country when it is at war with Canada he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: What we are dealing with here is a person who acquires our nationality, and continues to have it and acquires the nationality of another country and serves in the armed forces of that country. The person who does not acquire the nationality of the country in which he is serving is dealt with under our system and in Britain and in Australia and so on in the regular way by using the regular machinery of the courts. He can be found guilty of treason. We are dealing with the special case of a person who is a national of our own country and a national of another country and who at the same time serves in the armed forces of that country when Canada is at war with it. We are dealing with a special group.

Mr. STIRLING: Under this law I do not see how a Japanese who fights in the Japanese forces can be dealt with if he does not return to Canada. That person may claim in Japan that he is a Canadian citizen, and there would be no way of dealing with him if this amendment passes with this wording in it.

Mr. MARTIN: We cannot deal with that situation. What could we do? No law would remedy that.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under this section a man like Joyce who took out German citizenship would be exempt from punishment. He was tried as a traitor. By joining some military police or something like that he was considered by the German regime as—

Mr. MARTIN: We are not dealing with punishment; we are simply dealing with the laws of nationality.

Mr. ADAMSON: If a man loses his nationality he cannot be tried as a traitor.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, he can, under section 25.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, about a week ago or perhaps longer—we have been so long discussing this bill—I wanted to make some observations on this section but was ruled out of order on a technicality. I wish to take advantage of the opportunity to do so to-night, though I do not believe I can finish before eleven o'clock. Every time we begin to discuss this bill and hon. members from British Columbia take part in the discussion I have to turn to the front page to assure myself that it is called the Canadian Citizenship Act, because I believe the bill they are discussing should be entitled "the perpetual racial discrimination act." Let me say that I support the amendment. As a matter of fact, knowing as little law as I do, I was in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster. In the debate on this bill we have witnessed a most curious situation concerning hon. gentlemen to my right. We had the hon. member for Lake Centre and some others attacking the government, particularly the Minister of Justice, most violently in connection with two orders in council which were passed last fall, P.C. 6577 of October 23 and P.C. 6444 of October 5, under which those people caught up in the espionage affair were taken into custody. I have been thinking to myself, what can be said of the sincerity of hon. members who cry to high heaven about the iniquity of those two orders in council, yet forget altogether orders in council, P.C. 7355, 7356 and 7357 which were passed to take away the citizenship rights of not a mere half dozen or so but thousands of Canadian citizens?

Mr. FULTON: They were not Canadian citizens.

Mr. MacINNIS: They were.

Mr. FULTON: The minister just said they were not, when I asked the question.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister did not say anything of the kind, and in any event he can speak for himself. I am saying they were Canadian citizens, and I believe a majority of the court which tried the case said they were.

Mr. MARTIN: And I did not say they were not.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know the minister did not. That is what has gone on in this house day after day for the last three or four weeks.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. BOUCHER: You are not helping it much now.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not helping you people any.

Mr. BOUCHER: Nor the debate.

Mr. MacINNIS: Certainly I am helping the debate. I am bringing some reason and justice and clarity into it. If we are to deal with the question of citizenship let us deal with the whole question, not citizenship based on some colour or creed or race. For most hon. members from British Columbia the only citizenship worth thinking about, as far as I can ascertain, is the citizenship of those speaking the English language. Perhaps they would accept the French language as well, because it would be bad politics to exclude it. I should really like to have time to demonstrate to this committee how the hon. member for Lake Centre pummeled the government over these orders in council I have mentioned, P.C. 6577 and 6444, and how skilfully he skated around the other orders in council that were passed, mind you, under far worse conditions than in the case of the other two he mentioned. The National Emergency Powers Act when first introduced provided in section 3(1)(g) for the revocation of naturalization and the deportation of citizens. That section so outraged the feelings of the people of this country and of the members of this house that they would have nothing to do with it. The bill had to be withdrawn and this obnoxious section, together with many other obnoxious sections, removed from it. Then, on the second last day of the session, the orders in council providing for the deportation of persons of Japanese origin, many of whom were Canadian citizens, were announced in this house, with not a word of opposition from my hon. friends who are so keen on maintaining the rights of citizenship.

Mr. FULTON: You must have been out of the house that day. Read the speeches of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have already mentioned the hon. member for Lake Centre, but he was very careful not to touch those orders I have mentioned.

Mr. FULTON: He did.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not in my hearing, in any event. But let us take the hon. member for Vancouver South. The hon. member for Lake Centre would wag his finger and shake his head and point at the Minister of Justice and say, "What are you going to do about this?" Then the hon. member for Vancouver South would stretch himself half-way across the floor and say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, "Are you going to carry out the government's policy in regard to the Japanese?" That government policy was put into effect by orders in council after this house had rejected it. Either we have to be honest with ourselves, or we cannot be honest with anybody else. You can fool everybody but yourself. You cannot fool yourself; and when you are dishonest with yourself you are dishonest with everybody.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member does not mean to insinuate that I was dishonest in my stand. If he does, I ask that he withdraw.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not insinuating in regard to anybody in particular. I am merely stating a fact, and anybody who feels that this statement of fact applies to him is entitled to take that position.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member has now made it perfectly clear that he is out of order, and that he must withdraw his statement. If he were referring to a party I would not care, because a party has to take abuse of that type, but here he is referring to an hon. member and I submit that he must withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. member for Vancouver East to say definitely that he was not referring to any particular person.

Mr. GREEN: But he went on to say that if any hon. member wanted to accept it he could do so, or words to that effect. He must withdraw that statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: I said I made a statement of fact, and if anybody wished to apply that statement of fact to himself that was not my business.

Mr. GREEN: That is not so, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not see anything out of order in that, and I cannot ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: To-morrow we shall take up bill No. 7 at the commencement of the proceedings. After the conclusion of that measure we shall take up any second readings of the minor bills on the order paper.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT, OTTAWA "JOURNAL", MAY 13

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with a story which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Evening Journal about the fate of certain questions asked by myself. A direct quotation was included in the story. It has been my experience that one who makes a statement is as the mother; the reporter is very often in the place of the father, and the child always takes after the father. The words attributed to me in the story are:

"I'm having a lot of questions turned down these days," he complained, "and I am getting mad about it."

The inference unfortunately is that we are not getting the service we expect from the officials of the house. I should like to dispel that inference immediately. I have nothing but praise for the cooperation and assistance which we do get. Whatever slighting reference there is in the story applies entirely to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The government is quite prepared to accept that, from the hon. gentleman.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) presented the first and second reports of the banking and commerce committee, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CANADA-FRANCE—EXCHANGE OF NOTES RELEASING PRIVATE PROPERTY FROM GOVERNMENT CONTROL

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave on behalf of the Department of External Affairs to table copies of notes exchanged between Canada and France concerning the release of private property from government control. These notes were dated Ottawa, February 12, March 22, March 23, March 27 and April 3, 1946, and constitute the Canadian Treaty Series 16 of 1946. From the exchange of notes there results an agreement providing the conditions for the release of French private assets which had been placed under the custodian of enemy property in Canada at the time of the occupation of France by the enemy, and reciprocal provisions for whatever private Canadian assets might have come under government control in France.

POSTAL SERVICE

GIFT PARCELS FROM CANADA TO HUNGARY

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, last month the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) raised the question of the dispatch of gift parcels from Canada to Hungary. At that time I told him that the matter was before this department and that this service would be placed in operation as soon as the necessary facilities became available. I am now glad to say that it has been found possible to restore the parcel post service to Hungary for parcels weighing up to eleven pounds and the Canadian postal service has been informed accordingly.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PERSONNEL

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That the committee appointed on 16th April last to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies of the corporation shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Beaudoin, Bertrand (Prescott), Bowerman, Diefenbaker, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Hackett, Hansell, Knight, Laurendeau, Leger, Maybank, McCann, McCulloch, Mullins, Nixon, Picard, Pinard, Robinson (Simcoe East), Ross Hamilton East), Ross (St. Paul's), Smith (Calgary West), Sinclair (Vancouver North), Zaplitny.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I was not here yesterday, but I understood that this was not on the agenda for to-day's proceedings.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): There is no such thing as an agenda.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister wants to be technical.

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Order paper".

Mr. GRAYDON: He can be so if he desires, but I was using a term which I thought conveyed my idea, namely that I understood the order of business for to-day did not include the moving of this particular motion. I believe there are one or two hon. members who desire to say something in connection with it. If it is going on to-day I want to ask the minister a question; but perhaps the government would be prepared to let it stand over until to-morrow.

Mr. McCANN: May I point out that on April 16 the motion to set up the committee was passed, and this motion to-day has to do entirely with the personnel of the committee. Outside of the personnel, therefore, any other discussion, I submit, would not be in order. There was a debate on April 16 when the original motion was passed. The motion was:

That a select committee, the members thereof to be later named, be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records.

That motion was discussed and carried, and at this time we are only naming the personnel; so any discussion on this motion would have to do entirely with the members who will constitute the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): As one who is anxious to say something on this motion, speaking to the point of order raised by the minister, Mr. Speaker, may I submit, with respect, that a resolution of this nature is debatable, and that it should in no sense be confined to the personnel of the committee. What I had intended to say had to do not so much with what the committee might do but with the matter of government policy with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I would like a ruling, sir, as to whether or not I am in order in making such a speech on this motion.

Mr. HANSELL: On the point of order which has been raised, I think the minister will agree that in years gone by we have had an open discussion on matters pertaining to these committees, even when the personnel of the committee has been included in the motion; otherwise there is nothing we can discuss. I could not very well discuss the colour of the hair or the colour of the eyes of these men. The matter for discussion is with respect to the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I believe the point of order made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is well taken, because last night when we concluded our business the leader of the house told us what we should go on with to-day, and he did not include in his remarks that we would take up this motion; consequently we expected that the minister would ask that it stand. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this looks too much as though the resolution, if this order is proceeded with, is being slipped through. I am not saying it is; perhaps we should have been a little more alert, but it would not hurt for the matter to stand for another day.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say a word on the point of order? I think there are quite a few members who wish to say something about the policy of the broadcasting corporation. I have a matter which I should like to discuss. May I point out to Your Honour that when we allowed the motion to go through, on April 16, it was the day before the house was adjourning for Easter; there was a great deal of business, and I know I felt, as probably some other hon. members did, that it was desirable to clean up the business which we were then discussing and that another opportunity would arise. At any rate I did not at that time feel like taking up the time of the house. But it has been usual, before sending the matter to the committee, to give members an opportunity to deal with some of the business which might be discussed before the committee. While the minister is perhaps technically right, I think that latitude in the past has been allowed.

Mr. McCANN: Personally I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the fullest discussion if you declare that it is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think this can be done only by the unanimous consent of the house. I have no objection, either. But some hon. gentleman mentioned that this was not referred to last night on the agenda. It has never been the custom to refer to a government notice of motion the evening before; and the house had complete opportunity on April 16 to debate the whole principle in regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. However, sir, if there is a general desire now to debate this motion I am sure that my colleague has no objection, and probably the house itself has no objection. But strictly speaking we passed on the principle of the appointment of the committee on April 16, and this refers only to the personnel of the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw attention to the fact that on a previous night the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who was leading the house, did indicate that a government motion would be proceeded with,—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was—

Mr. STIRLING: Excuse me, whereas last evening the wording he used was:

> To-morrow we shall take up Bill No. 7 at the commencement of the proceedings.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no doubt that this motion is debatable under standing order 38, subparagraph (j):

> The following motions are debatable:
> (j) for the appointment of a committee,

The motion now before the house reads in part:

> That the committee appointed on 16th April last to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies of the corporation shall consist of the following members:

The principle of the establishment of a committee was accepted by the house on Tuesday, April 16, 1946. According to Votes and Proceedings of that date:

> On motion of Mr. McCann, it was resolved,—That a select committee—the members thereof to be later named, be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine—

Et cetera. The question before the house is not the principle of appointing a committee to do certain things as directed; the motion concerns the personnel of the committee. The Chair could not permit a debate on the principle of the appointment of a committee, that question having been decided by the house on April 16. I must therefore ask the house whether it is ready for the question.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one observation. The first resolution was put before the house on the day before we adjourned for the Easter recess. The sum total of the discussion that took place covers no more than one and a half columns of Hansard, and only two members, apart from the Minister of National Revenue, referred to the matter. I would respectfully suggest that under the circumstances debate ought not to be circumscribed in the manner you indicate. Of course we recognize the authority of the Speaker, and if your ruling, sir, is as you have stated, we shall of necessity accept it. I would repeat, however, that there has been no substantial debate on the motion that was submitted to the house on April 16.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition no doubt realizes that the Speaker cannot take cognizance of any discussion there may have been between himself and the leader of the house. The duty of the Speaker is to follow the rules of the house. There is therefore but one course open to me, and that is to put the motion to the house, unless there is unanimous consent that the principle be debated with respect to the appointment of the committee itself. Is it the pleasure of the house to give unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the fact that in the past it has always been the practice to include the personnel of the committee in the motion authorizing its appointment. This is an extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion which I read to the house is simply that certain hon. members therein named shall constitute the committee already appointed, and no debate is permissible on the principle of the appointment of the committee. As I have already stated, that principle was accepted on Tuesday, April 16. Unless there is now unanimous consent for discussion of the principle of appointing the committee, I must put the motion.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word. If I understood you correctly, we may debate the principle of the appointment of the committee if there is unanimous consent.

Mr. McCANN: The appointment of the committee was debated, and that motion was passed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I fully realize that the principle of the appointment of the committee was passed, but that is all that was passed. I am not going to discuss that principle, but I do intend, if I am permitted, to discuss, on this motion, government policy with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As a lawyer, the hon. member no doubt realizes that the only question before the Chair at the moment is the personnel of the committee, which has already been appointed. It is the privilege of any hon. member to object to the appointment of a particular person on the committee, but no hon. member has the right at this stage to discuss the principle of appointing the committee. I shall therefore be obliged to put the question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say this on a point of order—and I am trying to learn something; I am not trying to be facetious. Could I not, in discussing the question whether I myself am qualified to act on that committee, give the reasons why in my opinion there are difficulties in the operation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the present time?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows the practice, and he is aware that it is his privilege, after the committee has been appointed, to move that his name be withdrawn.

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not rise to discuss your ruling, Mr. Speaker; any remarks I make will have reference to the personnel of the committee. For instance, I see the names of the members for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Beaudoin) and Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) on the committee. I suggest that this house give serious consideration to the appointment of these two hon. gentlemen on the committee unless they assure us that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in its policy truly reflects the feeling of the house instead of the opinion of a particular section of parliament.

I see the names of the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Bowerman) and the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I suggest that they as members of the committee should give their opinion with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation outlawing provincial legislatures in respect of broadcasting systems. I do not think that this house should appoint either of these gentlemen to the committee unless they give the house their views on this point.

I notice also the names of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I should like to hear these two gentlemen state their opinions on the policy of the corporation, the promptness of the reporters in broadcasting the news of this parliament over the C.B.C., and their impartiality in connection therewith. I notice the name of the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) and the name of the member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). I should like to have them express their views on the qualifications of the various persons hired by the C.B.C., and what these hon. gentlemen think of the policy of the C.B.C. with regard to broadcasting. Then I notice the names of the members for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight). I should like to know from them, before they become members of this committee, what their belief is as to the wages, hours of labour and terms of service of the various employees of the C.B.C.

I now come to the names of the members for Berthier-Maskinonge (Mr. Laurendeau) and Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger). I should like to have them express their view as to whether this parliament gets sufficient information as to the policy of the C.B.C. without having to ask the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Reconstruction. Then there are the names of the members for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) and Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson). May I ask them to express their views to the house as to whether or not this government should not be more willing than it is to table correspondence, communications, interviews and particulars as to what goes on in the C.B.C.

So I could go on down the line, but I suggest that before the personnel of this committee is appointed this house should give some guidance to the members of the committee as to the success or otherwise of this whole enterprise.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion agreed to.

COAL

TRUCE IN STRIKE IN UNITED STATES—DELIVERIES TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): May I direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, notice of which I have already given him? What steps, if any, has the Minister of Reconstruction taken to assure the delivery to Canada of a fair proportion of the coal that will be mined in the United States during the two weeks of truce in the coal strike?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): In reply to the hon. member I may say that the solid fuels administration has issued orders restricting the delivery of the coal mined during the truce period to certain classes of essential users whose stock position is such as to require immediate delivery. The same classes of consumers in Canada, whose stocks are below the minimum will, I understand, receive the same treatment as those in the United States. Beyond this, I would point out that coal from the mines must first be supplied to United States railways whose services are vital if the coal is to continue to move at all.

SITUATION AT DRUMHELLER—SHIPMENTS FROM WALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I did not send the minister notice of the question I am going to ask about Drumheller coal. I know he is a walking encyclopædia on the coal question and does not need notice. My question is: What is the present situation in connection with Drumheller coal production, and is it likely that a substantial tonnage of Drumheller coal will be shipped to Ontario for next winter's requirements?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The production in the Alberta fields is satisfactory. Each succeeding month is higher than the preceding month. It would seem that the area is producing all the coal that the available man-power will permit. The coal controller is moving as much of the coal east as he believes can be spared from this area. There will be a considerable amount of Alberta coal in Ontario this year. Steps are being taken to give incentive to increase the production of all the coal mined in Canada, and it is hoped that production, over and above the normal amount, will contribute to easing the serious situation which is facing us.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister say whether or not we are receiving Welsh coal at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: No Welsh coal is coming into Canada at the present time. I am sure the hon. member knows that the United Kingdom itself is short of coal.

GRAIN

RETENTION OF SEED AND FEED IN COUNTRY ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government given consideration to retaining sufficient seed and feed in country elevators in the west until the present drought is over and the 1946 crop is reasonably assured

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): At harvest time last fall the provincial governments asked us to freeze all grain in the area that was affected by drought last year until such time as they were able to make provision for its proper distribution for both feed and seed. So far I have had no complaints from anywhere that seed and feed are not provided. As a matter of fact to-day's reports indicate that the wheat is all seeded, as is a large percentage of the oats and barley; therefore I think the seeding is going along fairly satisfactorily.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I understood the question, the hon. member means next year. In the event of drought taking place in these areas next year is some provision being made for 1947? That is the way I understood the question.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall have plenty of time to deal with that after July.

Mr. McCUAIG: That is what I had in mind.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SHORT WAVE BROADCASTS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I had intended to direct this question to the Minister of National Revenue had the government given unanimous consent to a discussion of the constitution of the radio broadcasting committee. I should like to direct the question to him now on the orders of the day. Are the facilities of the short wave broadcasting station of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at Sackville sufficient to carry a broadcast to Russia? If so, are the facilities of this station being used for that purpose in the same way as are the facilities of the British Broadcasting Corporation? The reason I ask the question is that in the British House of Commons yesterday Mr. Hector McNeil, the under-secretary for foreign affairs, in answering a question of the opposition, said that the British Broadcasting Corporation broadcasts in Russian were heard very well in Moscow and "many Soviet listeners are exhibiting a friendly and constructive interest in the programmes."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is the Speaker of the house? I was expecting to be called to order by His Honour the Speaker, but I have been called to order from the far corner. This is a simple question, and an easy one for the minister to answer. I should appreciate it if he would answer it to-day.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): In reply to the hon. gentleman's question I can say that the power of the short wave station at Sackville is sufficiently strong to broadcast to Russia, but the facilities have not been used particularly for that purpose because when a programme is sent to a foreign country it is not of much use unless it is in the language of the country to which it is going. Among the personnel of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation we have no artists or others who can broadcast in Russian.

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF THREE NEW STATIONS—ACQUISITION OF WAVE LENGTH OF THREE PRIVATE STATIONS

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I have a question to ask the Minister of National Revenue, since I was not allowed to do it a moment ago. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation purchased three new large stations, and are they contemplating taking over the wave lengths of from one to three private stations? I did not give the minister notice of this question, but I did not get much notice of what he did to me.

Mr. McCANN: The matter which the hon. member for Calgary West has brought up is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is Canadian Broadcasting Corporation policy. It is surely not government policy. Will the minister not answer it? It is a corporation.

Mr. McCANN: As the minister responsible for the announcing of policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I submit that when I do announce it I am indicating the policy which would be endorsed by the government, and that policy will be announced in due course.

Mr. HOMUTH: Whose government is it?

Mr. HANSELL: Supplementing what the hon. member for Calgary West has said, may I say that I sometimes get a little tired of being brushed off with the remark that it is government policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the rules, which state that a minister is not obliged to answer a question, and to the fact that the house has just appointed a committee to consider the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The hon. member will have an opportunity to ask his question before that committee.

Mr. HANSELL: I was just going to suggest to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that if he comes to me I can give him the answer which the minister was not able to give.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Monday, May 13, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last evening it was considering section 17 together with an amendment thereto moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Shall section 17 (1) carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: I was saying a few words on this section when the committee adjourned last night. I wish to continue my remarks, but before going on to deal with the peculiar confusion that seems to exist among the members to my immediate right, where one section is urging that the government give up legislating by order in council and another section is urging that the government continue with it, I want to make reference to a statement made last night by the hon. member for New Westminster. Speaking on this section the hon. member said, as reported at page 1486 of Hansard:

> Supposedly the new law did not impose compulsion, but every Japanese family that I knew of registered their children with the Japanese consul. When these people appeared before the committee of this house which sat in 1935 and again in 1936 they were asked to which country they owed allegiance. This was long before there was any question of racial hatred or thought of war. They said without hesitation that they were citizens of Japan.

A number of wild statements of that kind have been made and I think the best thing I can do is to answer the hon. member for New Westminster by quoting a statement made in the committee on the elections and franchise acts which sat in 1936 and 1937, and not in 1935 and 1936. The hon. member for Davenport was questioning one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, and I quote from the procedings as follows:

> Mr. MacNicol: You are Canadian born?
> Professor Hayakawa: I might tell you, for the information of Mr. Reid, who seems to question our loyalty—
> Mr. Reid: No; hold on a minute. Just get away from that. I have never questioned your loyalty nor do I. The inference I was drawing is that Japan has the first claim, because your children are registered in Japan, in time of trouble.
> Professor Hayakawa: No; Canada has the first claim because we are here.

Surely if we feel that our case is just, we should not use material in support except what can be vouched for. The same question arises with regard to the 1,600 Japanese-Canadians who are supposed to have gone from Canada to Japan and to have fought against Canada in the Japanese army. May I say here and now that there is no definite evidence on that that anyone can bring forward in this committee.

I should like now to continue with the point I raised last night as to the different points of view in the official opposition in connection with orders in council. First I should like to quote what was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre, as reported on page 513 of Hansard of April 2. I believe the hon. member was acting as the chief spokesman for the official opposition on that occasion, because he followed the Secretary of State in the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill. Referring to the orders in council, which I mentioned last night, he said:

> The order in council P.C. 6577, and the order in council of October 5, 1945, P.C. 6444, which I believe will always be remembered as the forgotten order in council, interfere with the fundamental rights of citizenship which were referred to by the Secretary of State. Is it not time that in this country as in Great Britain these rights shall not be interfered with except under a law passed by the parliament of Canada?

I agree with that absolutely, and I suppose when the hon. member for Lake Centre made that statement he made it without reference to race, creed or colour. As I said before, having spoken in the debate immediately after the Secretary of State who introduced the bill I imagine he was speaking as the leading speaker for the official opposition. But what are we to say, what are we to think, when we pick up Hansard of April 5 and read what the hon. member for Vancouver South had to say? This is another prominent member of the official opposition, and at page 619 he said:

> We intend to hold the government to its policy. We ask also that the whole of British Columbia be made a protective zone permanently as a defence measure. That is the policy advocated by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I hope he has not changed his mind since the announcement he made just a little over a year ago.

And then again, in the next column:

Parliament can empower the government to act on this question. We will support the government. I am confident that the Social Credit party will support them because of the stand they have taken throughout. The C.C.F. will not.

What I want to ask is this: What policy was the hon. member for Vancouver South insisting that the government should carry out? The policy of deportation, the policy of revoking naturalization and deporting Canadian citizens? Are we not entitled to ask who is speaking for the official opposition? Is it the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Vancouver South, or does the official opposition speak with two voices?

In the second paragraph from which I read, the hon. member for Vancouver South said that "parliament can empower the government to act on this question". "We will support the government." That is: "We will support the government" if it brings to this house a bill to revoke the naturalization of Canadian citizens, to make non-citizens of people who were born in Canada. Then the hon. member generously included hon. members of the Social Credit party to my left. When the hon. member makes this statement in support of a bill he wishes the government to bring in, is he speaking for the hon. member for Lake Centre? Is he speaking for the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario? Is he speaking for the hon. member for Calgary West? Yes, is he speaking for any number of hon. members in the opposition, whose names I could mention, who have expressed themselves as astounded and perturbed by the policy of the government under which, by order in council, it takes away the rights of citizens? That is something this committee is entitled to know.

I too suggest to the government that they bring in a bill of this kind. When parliament refused to accept the emergency powers bill, and insisted upon a completely revised bill, the government reluctantly complied. In my opinion the government had no right to issue the orders in council. It should have had the courage to come to this house and ask parliament for permission to do what it wanted to do. Then we would have found out who stands for liberty—liberty without regard to race, colour, creed or language, or just liberty for the chosen few.

Later on in his speech of April 5 the hon. member for Vancouver South labelled as "pressure groups" those who have been working in all parts of Canada to prevent the government doing this iniquitous thing. The hon. member referred to the editor of Saturday Night, the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, and the editor of the Toronto Star. But I noticed there were omissions in his list of "pressure groups," including, at least one other editor who has supported the hon. member in his elections, but who does not support him on this issue. I refer to the Vancouver Daily Province. There were certain other pressure groups to which he did not refer. Among these can be found the Church of England in Canada, and the United Church of Canada, of which he is a member. He did not refer to either of these. Nor did he refer to the National Council of Women, to the Young Women's Christian Association, or to dozens of other "pressure groups." Pressure groups indeed! Anyone is a "pressure group" who will interfere with those who want to destroy liberty. They had pressure groups in Germany. They were the decent people of Germany. Hitler put them into the concentration camps.

Let us see what the Vancouver Daily Province has to say in its editorial of February 21, 1946, where it makes reference to the judgment of the supreme court. Before I read, let me remind hon. members, if they do not already know it, that the Vancouver Daily Province is the leading daily paper in British Columbia. It states:

The judgment of the supreme court on Japanese deportation touches the lives and destinies of 10,000 to 15,000 people of Japanese blood and may have tragic consequences for every one of them. But that is not all it does.

It also touches the lives and destinies of 12,000,000 Canadians, and the consequences to them may be tragic, too, if they do not take steps to protect themselves. The judgment is thus of greater importance to the Canadians who will remain at home than to the Japanese and the Japanese Canadians who may be deported under it.

And farther down:

The real question, however, is not what the government may or may not do. The question is what it has the power to do. No government, it is not too much to say, should have the power to deport any Canadian citizen and no parliament should have the power to confer such authority upon a government.

In the last election the Vancouver Province did not support me; but it supports, and supports nobly, the policy I espouse on this question. The editorial continues:

There are certain rights which are vital and fundamental. They should not be subject to revocation or destruction or interference. They should be sacred. Citizenship is one of these rights. The people of the United States, long ago, saw to it that their fundamental rights were safe-guarded. They placed a bill of rights in their constitution, and no president, no state or federal administration, no congress or court can interfere with them

And concluding:

Seven hundred thousand Canadians fought recently to protect fundamental rights. Tens of thousands laid down their lives. Are we going, now, to allow these fundamental rights to go by default? Or are we going to do something to guarantee them?

It is for those reasons that with the member for Vancouver South I would like to see the government bring into this house a bill to empower it to do what it did in an underhand way. At the very time we were discussing the emergency powers transition bill this government was drafting orders in council to put into effect what parliament said should not go into effect.

I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver South was really speaking for British Columbia. I have in my hand a clipping from the Vancouver News-Herald of March 23, 1946. It is J. K. Nesbitt's column, "Day in the House". It deals with the doings of the legislature during the session in Victoria. The subheading is "Putnam Wants Japs to Stay". Mr. Putnam is the minister of agriculture in British Columbia.

An hon. MEMBER: And a good man.

Mr. MacINNIS: A good man, I have not the slightest doubt. I believe he is a good man, and I think I shall prove it. I quote now:

Mr. Putnam was the first M.L.A. this session to refer to Japs. Time was when mention of this unfortunate section of Canadian people was sure to stir up a storm. The minister expressed concern that the Japs might be removed from the Okanagan. If this happens, said Mr. Putnam, it will be tough for the farmer, who desperately needs help.

Mr. Nesbitt concludes the paragraph:

Quite a change from the days when we heard Japanese-Canadians were useless.

I have one more quotation to make from the Vancouver Province, and I quote it because of all the indignities which have been heaped one after the other on the Japanese-Canadians. We have had Japanese in British Columbia for a long time. They fought in the last war when Japan was our ally; and let us not forget that there may be another war, and when the wheel of fate stops at the next war, the Japanese may again be our allies—who knows? If so, these little brown devils of to-day will be the little brown heroes of twenty-five years hence. I have here an excerpt from a news report which appeared in the Vancouver Province of February 24, 1920, dateline Victoria, B.C. It tells of a delegation which waited upon the provincial cabinet urging that the franchise be given in British Columbia to naturalized Canadians who fought in the great war. It says:

Leading the delegation was A. M. Whiteside, as counsel, while official support of the Vancouver branch of the great war veterans association for the Japanese was voiced by Captain Ian Mackenzie in his capacity as president.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite right. It is well known.

Mr. MacINNIS: The quotation goes on:

It was pointed out to the government that 195 sons of Nippon—

They were called sons of Nippon in those days.

—had gone overseas from British Columbia in the ranks of the Canadian Expeditionary Force as naturalized British subjects. Out of this number 54 had given their lives in the allied cause and all but 12 of the remainder had been wounded more or less seriously. It was a matter therefore, it was stated, for the government at the moment to make provision in the Provincial Elections Act for 142 members of the Canadian Japanese Association. British subjects wearing the returned soldier's button, to share the full privilege of British citizenship as expressed by the right to vote.

Captain (Ian) Mackenzie, in answer to a question from the Hon. William Sloan asking what effect he expected the granting of such a request would have on the position of Hindus in British Columbia who had served with the imperial forces, replied that for the time being the great war veterans' association was not so much concerned with the details as with the general principles upon which the plea of the Canadian Japanese association was based.

I wish hon. members would think more of principles to-day than of details. Then listen to this. He goes on to say:

In his opinion these British subjects have vindicated the fundamental essentials of citizenship and an acceptance of that principle lay in the extension of the franchise.

An hon. MEMBER: A good speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: I fully agree with Captain Mackenzie, as he was then, because then he accepted and spoke on behalf of the principles of democracy. Let me say that the Japanese are no less to-day than they were in 1920. They are the same people, and they have demonstrated that wherever they have been allowed to fight on our side during this war that they can fight bravely. There was a battalion, if that is the proper term, of Japanese Americans who fought with the American army in Italy, and it was the most decorated unit of the American army.

I do not wish at the moment to say much more on this question. I think I have definitely demonstrated that this committee cannot in logic, in justice, or in common sense maintain the position that my hon. friends from British Columbia are trying to maintain.

There was one other peculiar statement made in this debate. It was made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, a Canadian who still speaks with an English accent; consequently we would expect him to retain some of those principles of democracy that Englishmen usually carry with them, though perhaps not as conspicuously as they should in their dealings with Asiatics. The hon. member for Nanaimo suggested that the proper thing, the Christian thing, I think he said, was to send these people to Japan as missionaries to teach the Japanese our Canadian way of life. Bash a man in the face, kick him in the pants, and then tell him to go back to where he or his ancestors came from and tell his countrymen what a fine fellow you are. Yes, to preach the gospel, as someone behind me suggests, of brotherly love. I suggest to the hon. member, that if he has not done so already, he should read Bruce Hutchison's column on this subject, which appeared I think in the Free Press. Bruce Hutchison is no friend of mine, but I could not have put it better myself.

Mr. PEARKES: Can the hon. member tell me the page of Hansard that he is referring to? I do not think I have been quite correctly quoted.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot give my hon. friend the page number, but if he will look it up before I sit down, or after I sit down. and if what I have said is not correct, I will apologize humbly. But why delude ourselves with the idea that if we are foolish enough to send Japanese Canadians out of this country, they will be missionaries for our way of life? They will in fact be missionaries for a way of life which is not ours. There may be only a few of them, but the international implications of what we are doing at this time may be of supreme importance—of far more profound importance than the implications of arresting and keeping in detention without trial a few people here; although I am not condoning that act. Asia is a large continent, with an enormous population who have become pretty well tired of the white man's "superiority". Now, with the instruments of war which we have invented and which they can use just as well as we can, it may not be a good thing for the world if we goad them too far. So I suggest that in anything further we have to say in regard to this citizenship bill we try to think of Canadian citizens not according to the colour of their skin, the slant of their eyes, or the country from which they came, but as human beings.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I have finished, Mr. Chairman; thank you. But I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for Nanaimo to the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North has found the page for me, and if you will pardon me I will read the paragraph to which I referred; it is on page 704:

> I think from the high Christian point of view now is the opportunity to repatriate the Japanese back to their homeland where perhaps they would be able to introduce to Japan, which has suffered so much, some of the western and Christian ideas that they have learned and in this way raise the standard of the other Japanese. They can do a great missionary work there. If they have not assimilated the ideals of western civilization while they have been here, they never will, and we should send them back.

There is no indication, Mr. Chairman, that the Japanese Canadians have not assimilated the ideals of civilization, but there are disturbing indications that people who talk in that way have not assimilated the ideals of Christian civilization.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member speaks, may I remind the committee that they are discussing section 17, the marginal note of which is "By renunciation where dual nationality", together with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. The remarks of the last speaker were in order largely because the amendment has probably been introduced to meet certain objections made by hon. members to whom he has referred; but I do not think it is the desire of the committee to enter into a general discussion of the Japanese question,—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN: —and I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the section, and more particularly to the question of dual nationality.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I understood that when we arrived at sections 16 and 17 after they were stood over we would have the opportunity to go into this matter which the hon. member for Vancouver East has just brought up; and in view of the very wide latitude which, I must say, you have allowed him, I trust you will allow me some small measure of the same latitude.

Mr. MacINNIS: Similar latitude is allowed to all other speakers from British Columbia. We are in a preferred class, I imagine.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Are you addressing the Chair or are you addressing me?

Mr. MacINNIS: The Chair, of course.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The hon. member is talking into his beard, I imagine.

One of the remarks made by the last speaker was "I do not think that the hon. member for Vancouver South is speaking for British Columbia." Personally I was quite sure that that was the reply that the hon. member for Vancouver South would give to him; but so far as the hon. member for Vancouver East is concerned I am quite certain that he is not speaking for quite a large section of his constituents of Vancouver East. He is probably speaking for the Japanese who resided there formerly, but he certainly is not speaking for the Army and Navy Veterans of that constituency. I have a resolution which was forwarded to me the other day, passed by the Army and Navy Veterans, East Vancouver, unit 68, with regard to the Japanese. I do not know whether the hon. member has read this resolution or not. If not, I will bring it to his attention, and it may change his views on the subject.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I should like to get this on the record; it is well worth while:

Whereas an insidious campaign is being carried on, particularly in eastern Canada, with a view to again inflicting upon the people of British Columbia the Japanese scourge, from which welcome surcease has been given during the past several years;

And whereas paid press propagandists, subversive political groups and ill-advised religious idealists are raising the false issue of racial prejudice in a determined endeavour to prevent the deporation of the Japanese to their homeland and at the same time advocating the restoration of their former privileges and holdings in this province;

And whereas experience has amply demonstrated that the Japanese in Canada are and have been a fascist-minded, easily regimented, closely integrated group of foreigners, wholly unassimilable, and always a threat to our Canadian way of living, and whether Canadian-born, naturalized or not, have always borne true allegiance to the Emperor of Japan only;

And whereas their return to British Columbia will seriously complicate an already difficult situation and render almost impossible the re-establishment of our ex-servicemen in all lines of small business, fishing, farming and fruit growing:

Be it therefore resolved by this Provincial Command of the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada, in convention assembled, that the dominion government be strongly urged to proceed immediately with the repatriation of all persons of Japanese origin; and, in the alternative, should such be impossible, that the lower mainland and the coastal regions of British Columbia be forthwith declared a defence area, from which all persons of Japanese origin shall be totally excluded for a period of at least ten years next ensuing:

And that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, and to the British Columbia members of parliament.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Certainly.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is a letter accompanying the resolution. Who signed it?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is from the army and navy veterans, British Columbia provincial command, signed H. E. Warburton.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend said that it was from Vancouver East. I received a copy and it was from Vancouver, not from Vancouver East. An attempt was made to put over a fast one, I suggest that my hon. friend withdraw the statement that it was from Vancouver East. The people from Vancouver East gave me a majority, and all other candidates lost their deposits. That indicates that they stand by my position.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friends, but surely this discussion has not a great deal to do with the question of dual nationality. The rules are clear; hon. members ought to confine themselves to the section.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe I made my interpretation of the procedure quite clear a moment ago when I pointed out that we were discussing section 17 with reference to dual nationality, and that all debate should be strictly relevant thereto. I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks strictly to the section.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The Japanese of course are the largest group of dual nationality citizens we have in Canada. In reply to the hon. member I may say that this resolution was passed and submitted to the provincial command by the Vancouver East unit No. 68. The government has a particularly difficult job on its hands trying to satisfy everyone from British Columbia, but actually, it seems to me, the solution is simple. If they can satisfy one province in confederation with regard to its very simple demand, that the Japanese be excluded for a specified number of years, something that was actually promised, I should think they would leap to that opportunity. The other night when we reached section 46 I offered an amendment which, had it been accepted by the government, would have given us power to keep the Japanese out of the Pacific coast area for the next twenty years. Why the government showed such undue enthusiasm, such unnecessary enthusiasm in getting out Beauchesne's fire extinguisher to put that out, I do not know. As a matter of fact in the election campaign the government was definitely committed on the point that the Japanese would be kept from that coast for a period of years. The undertaking at the time was that they would be kept away in perpetuity, but we are willing to concede a small point in that regard, and this is an opportunity for the government to implement that promise. I am quite sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs would be particularly happy if the promise were carried out.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to express his opinion, but I cannot see how excluding the Japanese from a certain section of the country has anything to do with the clause under consideration with reference to dual nationality.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I have suffered from such a ruling three or four times and so have others. I respectfully submit, sir, that if you sit quietly and allow members to spend twenty-five or thirty or forty minutes on a question, presenting one side, and then refuse anyone else in the committee permission to present the other side, you are certainly giving a decision which it is difficult for anyone to understand, and certainly it does not conduce to anything like frank, free and fair discussion in the house. If this sort of thing goes on, how can any hon. member answer any point that is made against him? Undoubtedly, from the point of view of British Columbia, there is no more urgent question to be discussed at the present time than this one. I am not questioning the ruling, but I certainly think it is time to draw attention to this situation. With all respect I suggest to the chairman that if he wishes to cleave to the rules he should prevent anyone from making any attack and not stop the man who is beginning to defend himself.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the member for Vancouver East has listened to attack after attack, not only upon himself as a member from British Columbia who takes a view opposed to the views held by other members from that province, but upon the party with which he is associated. He waited patiently until the time came when he could reply to those attacks, and I believe you were quite justified in permitting the reply. Now, however, it is a question whether further discussion is to be had, and if attacks are made replies will have to be permitted. The chair was quite justified, in my opinion, in allowing the member for Vancouver East to reply when attacks were made upon him. I think the committee will agree that this a fair statement of the case.

Mr. GOLDING: I would point out that it was thoroughly understood that the member for Vancouver East would have an opportunity to speak on that particular section, and I happened to be in the chair at the time. He did rise to speak on another section, and an amendment was moved and carried and he was not allowed to speak. In all fairness I think he should have been allowed to take advantage of this opportunity to present his case. May I make this further remark. I suggest that the remark made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni with reference to the ruling on the amendment was entirely uncalled for. There are rules in this house, and it does not matter who happens to be in the chair, the chair will always, I believe, try to be fair and to stick to the rules. The amendment which the hon. member proposed at that time was completely out of order. I was in the chair at the time and I so ruled, and if I were in the chair again under the same circumstances I would have to give the same ruling. I do not think it is right to speak of "Beauchesne's fire extinguisher"; it is not fair.

The CHAIRMAN: I must agree to a large extent with what has been said by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). I would not think of shutting off discussion if I have allowed some hon. member to take advantage of the rules. The hon. gentleman's point is well taken. I must say, however, that it shows the difficulty which arises when an hon. member departs from the rules. It prolongs debate unnecessarily. For that reason I would ask all hon. members to try to abide by the rules. I hesitate to interrupt an hon. member unless it is absolutely necessary, and hon. gentlemen can assist greatly by resolving to abide by the rules, more particularly the rule that all speeches in committee must be relevant to the clause under consideration. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested that the hon. member for Vancouver East had been attacked time and again in the house. If that was so, the hon. member should have risen at the time and not have waited for some other clause to come up before rising to discuss what had taken place days before. I hope that from now on all hon. members will discuss the sections under consideration. The section under consideration at the present time is section 17, which has to do with dual nationality.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I thank you for your ruling, and also for the opportunity which you are giving me, and I shall try to abide by your ruling. With regard to the hon. gentleman who was acting as chairman the other night, may I say that if he took exception to the remarks I just made he must have misunderstood what I said. My reference was to what I thought was the great activity that the members of the cabinet displayed that evening. Three of them were in the house, and they displayed considerable interest in what was going on. So far as his decision is concerned I am certain it was well and fairly given.

With reference to this question of dual nationality, I would point out that the difficulty has arisen from the fact that we cannot get any definite answer from the government. If they would give us an answer "yes" or "no", we would know where we stand. The people of Comox-Alberni believe that the Japanese are going to drift back to British Columbia. Until we have had some word from the government one way or the other I am afraid we shall have to ask them certain questions on every opportunity that presents itself.

There is an excellent precedent of this house for an evasion on the Japanese issue. I had occasion to browse through Hansard of 1908, and I found that there was a long discussion on the Japanese question. At that time we were having trouble with the Japanese in British Columbia. In 1908 the present Prime Minister was deputy minister of labour, and he came out to British Columbia to try to solve the problem. I find from Hansard of January 1908 that the Conservative party of the day was trying to get an answer from the government. The discussion ranged over a few hundred pages of Hansard, but the government was pretty light on its feet at that time too. It is curious to find that a certain Mr. Owen, a member of parliament of that day finally got the minister driven into a corner. He asked this question:

> Will the hon. minister tell the house to what extent the Japanese government promised to restrict immigration?

The Hon. Mr. Lemieux, who was postmaster general at that time, said:

> My hon. friend is too inquisitive. I will not answer, not from disrespect for him but because if I did answer, I would commit an act unworthy of a Canadian representative, and unworthy of myself.

I hope that the government is not going to take the same position at this time. They should have learned something in forty years.

Mr. MARTIN: Are we discussing section 17?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): We shall get along. All that the British Columbia people are asking for is a definite statement. The government, which is just as much responsible to the people of British Columbia as it is to the Japanese citizens, should give that answer. I can tell the committee quite definitely that if Japanese people are allowed to come back to British Columbia there is going to be trouble. This government owes it to our Japanese residents in Canada to protect them to that extent. In my own constituency we had the Pacific coast militia rangers during the war. They did an excellent job of seeing to it that the Japanese did not invade us from the west, and they are equally determined at the present time that we are not going to be invaded from the east. The government should bear that fact in mind, because they owe the Japanese that protection.

I am not going to ask the indulgence of the committee to say any more at this time, but I did intend to say something further on the Japanese question.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a question that is relevant to the section?

Mr. MARTIN: Thanks.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has to do with something which has puzzled me for a long time. I have read the declaration that a prospective citizen of the United States makes when he applies for his first papers. It has always puzzled me how a man who makes that declaration can afterwards be regarded as a Canadian national. I am referring to a subject of His Majesty the King, which, I understand, is the qualification of a British or Canadian citizen or national.

Mr. MARTIN: If he acquires—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not the phraseology before me. I know it because I have read it a number of times. He forswears all allegiance to every foreign king or potentate, including, if he is a British subject at this time, His Majesty King George VI of the United Kingdom and the British dominions. It seems to me from that point on he forswears his citizenship, and yet if he comes back to Canada he is not required—

Mr. MARTIN: That is not quite right; it is an intention to forswear.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know. It is a pretty strong statement.

Mr. MARTIN: A strong intention.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has always struck me that it is difficult to reconcile the kind of discussion we have had, for example, on British citizenship, with a statement—even if it is an intention—of that description made by a British citizen, without his making some other declaration after he comes back to this country to show that he is prepared to fulfil his obligations as a Canadian citizen and a subject of His Majesty the King. When I read the bill it struck me that nowhere is that point covered. We have had a long discussion here on the Japanese. We are not talking about the Japanese. I have no sympathy with the Japanese. We are talking about Canadians of Japanese origin. I am a Canadian of British origin; we are all Canadians of some origin. If a Canadian of Japanese origin or of Egyptian origin or of Chinese origin or of any other origin takes an oath of allegiance to His Majesty the King and becomes a British subject, we expect him to remain a British subject. If he forswears, or even says he is going to forswear, that allegiance, I think there is some form he should go through in order to restore his citizenship.

Mr. WINKLER: I agree with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has just said. It is well known that a Canadian who takes out papers for United States citizenship has to swear that he or she is willing to take up arms against Great Britain if necessary. That point should be borne in mind in considering this section.

Mr. ADAMSON: If we pass section 17 we shall be giving up a great deal of the protection which is afforded to a Canadian as a British subject. A Canadian was, and, I assume and hope, still is to be, considered a British subject, although a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: That is section 26. We have passed that.

Mr. ADAMSON: All right. But by section 17 you are doing one of two things. I have objected to sections 16 and 17 on this account. These sections will bring about great difficulty for many Canadians who find themselves citizens with dual nationality. I speak for many thousands who are living in South America to-day. I also speak, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, for the man who has taken out his first papers in the United States and has sworn, not allegiance to the United States constitution, but disavowal of allegiance to His Majesty King George VI. It seems to me that under section 17 a man who has taken out his first citizenship papers in the United States has become stateless. There is no other interpretation I can put on this section. In our endeavour to emphasize Canadian citizenship we are throwing away a very valuable thing which we had and have as British citizens. We are British subjects but of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: This section is an old one; it does not change anything that has not been the law for thirty-four years.

Mr. ADAMSON: It seems to me that it is subject to an interpretation which jeopardizes our position abroad as British citizens.

Mr. MARTIN: Not a bit.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FULTON: I take it we are now dealing with section 17 as it stood in the original bill and which is now subsection 1 of the new section 17?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. FULTON: Would the minister give consideration to a suggestion that the section be amended by striking out the word "if" in the fourth line and inserting the words "unless he renounces nationality or citizenship of that country" and striking out the words "and still such a national or citizen, a declaration renouncing his Canadian citizenship." The section would then read:

> Where a natural-born Canadian citizen, at his birth or during his minority, or any Canadian citizen on marriage, became or becomes under the law of any other country a national or citizen of that country, unless he renounces nationality or citizenship of that country he shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

That I think could cover the cases such as we have in Canada at the present time whereby an act, such as the registration of a person's birth with the Japanese consul, gives a person the nationality of another state.

While I am on my feet I wonder if I might be permitted to refer briefly to what has occurred in connection with these Japanese. I think a study of Hansard will show that the cases we are referring to are those which were the subject matter of this order in council.

Mr. MARTIN: I rise to a point of order. I am prepared to deal with the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I do not want to get into a discussion of the Japanese. Surely we have dealt with that matter.

Mr. FULTON: Nor do I.

Mr. MARTIN: I am prepared to deal with my hon. friend's suggestion, unless he wants to go on to discuss it.

Mr. FULTON: I mentioned the Japanese in order to illustrate the importance, as I conceive it, of this amendment. Last night the minister stated that under our law as it stands at present the dual nationality of a Japanese citizen is recognized. While I am on this subject I should like to clear up a certain matter. At one point last night I interjected a remark that the minister had said that according to our law they were not citizens of Canada. I find upon studying Hansard that the minister did not say that. I wish to assure him that it was not my intention to put words into his mouth, but in the heat of debate I understood him to say that.

The importance of this amendment can be illustrated by the present situation of the Japanese in British Columbia which has given rise to so much discussion in this house. The position which has been taken by us is that the government's action in December would be wholly objectionable and our case against the Japanese would be unfounded were it not a fact that the Japanese possess this dual nationality. Our stand is further supported by the fact that the Japanese in question have actually renounced their Canadian nationality and status, which I think removes the inconsistency which has been alleged so violently by the hon. member for Vancouver East. However, respecting your ruling, sir, I shall not deal further with that subject.

I repeat the contention which we have made from the outset, that it is important, and it has been proved by this bill to be important, to have the status of these Japanese cleared up and decided before the bill becomes law.

Mr. MARTIN: The suggestion of the hon. member amounts to compulsory renunciation in the case of dual nationality, and I regret to say that I cannot accept that. The hon. member for Vancouver South was kind enough to bring the same point to my attention this morning, and thus give me an opportunity to reconsider something which we have considered in the preparation of the bill. First of all, no country has legislation in exactly that form. Under the laws of certain countries there can be no loss of nationality no matter what act of divesting takes place, and the result would be that we might place an individual in a rather difficult position.

There is a further consideration. If you were to compel renunciation, say in the case of a Canadian-born woman who acquires another nationality by marriage under the law of another country, you would deprive her of something which she may wish to retain and which, because of the laws of another country, she can do nothing about because of the compulsory feature. I think that administratively it would be impossible, and on principle I do not think it is desirable.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has mentioned the matter I discussed with him this morning. He will remember I suggested that he take power under the bill to require an election where a person has two or more nationalities. Probably that power would not need to be exercised very often, but I think it would be well worth while to have it set out in the bill, so that where some condition arises under which it would be wise to find out just what the allegiance of a person is, the Secretary of State could do so. Has he given consideration to the suggestion?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I have tried to deal with it in the reply that I made.

Mr. FLEMING: The cases referred to by the Secretary of State are cases of involuntary nationality, and one can see a reason for the position taken by the minister where that second nationality is possessed or acquired in that way. I know it is the practice of some European and certain Asiatic countries to insist that a subject shall never lose his nationality no matter what he does. Is not there some room for the provision for or reservation of an election as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South, to cover those whose second nationality is not acquired involuntarily in that way?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think I can add anything more.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Attention has been drawn to the dual nationality of certain Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, acquired by the registration of their births by their parents with the Japanese consul. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether a Japanese consul now resides in Vancouver and is functioning in his office.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: God forbid.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I did not know the hon. member over there was the Secretary of State. My second question is this: Are the Canadian born children of Japanese parents being registered at the present time with any Japanese official?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know anything about the last question, but answering the first question I will say that there is no such person in Canada. Canada was and technically may still be at war with Japan.

Section agreed to.

On section 45—Acts repealed.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has moved: that the section be amended by numbering the present clause No. 1 and by adding thereto the following section as subsection 2:

(2) Where, in any act of the parliament of Canada or any order or regulation made thereunder, any provision is made applicable in respect of

(a) a "natural-born British subject" it shall apply in respect of a "natural-born Canadian citizen," or

(b) a "naturalized British subject" it shall apply in respect of a "Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen" or

(c) a "Canadian national" it shall apply in respect of a "Canadian citizen," under this act and where in any act, order or regulation aforesaid any provision is made in respect of the status of any such person as a Canadian national or British subject it shall apply in respect of his status as a Canadian citizen or British subject under this act.

Mr. GREEN: Is this amendment offered primarily to make certain that the bill we are now considering shall not invalidate in any way the measures taken by the government to carry out the Japanese policy announced by the Prime Minister last December?

Mr. MARTIN: This amendment is introduced to cover that point, and to cover any other statutes, any other orders which in any way might affect the subject matter of this bill. This matter does not invalidate or validate the measures mentioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, may I ask the Secretary of State a question, then? Will support for this section in the bill, and therefore for the bill itself, be support for the policy laid down in the orders in council which are referred to in this particular amendment? If so, so far as we are concerned we shall oppose the bill, and oppose it strenuously.

I should like to have an answer to that question, because the answer given to the hon. member for Vancouver South would indicate, by inference, that those of us who are opposed to what is suggested to be done with loyal persons of Japanese origin, are in agreement. Let me point out that no charge has ever been laid against many of those people, and we are not going to support a measure which can be construed subsequently as validating what we believe to be an act of injustice toward many people.

If the government wishes to deport people who are guilty of sedition or guilty of disloyalty to this country, well and good—if they are not Canadian citizens. But if they are Canadian citizens, then proceed against them according to the laws of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: May I say—

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. COLDWELL: But do not go about it in this way. I want to be clear on that, because it is important to us. As has been said, we have for years taken a point of view which has been unpopular. We still take it, believing that ultimately the ideals of right and justice which are behind our position will prevail.

Mr. MARTIN: May I answer in this way, that what I have already said in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South, and what I said the other night in the house, clearly inidcate that the intention behind this subsection is not that of in any way affecting any existing order, one way or another. We are not dealing with the merits or demerits of the particular orders in council the hon. member has in mind. My statement the other evening clearly indicates that. The matter is not affected, one way or the other. We are not dealing with the merits of the particular problem to which attention has been called.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it is related to this other problem, according to the answer given by the Secretary of State.

Mr. MARTIN: No; it does not affect those orders one way or another. This measure does not deal with the merits of that particular question, which is now before the courts.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): If this amendment were not in the bill, what effect would the orders in council have?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think it would affect them at all, and I said so when the matter was first discussed. However the law officers of the crown point out to me that there was some doubt in connection with the application of certain statutes. And since a question had been raised as to the relationship between this measure and certain orders, it seemed best to make it clear that the measure in no way affected those other orders. So I can only repeat that the merits or demerits one way or another of those particular orders are not affected in any way by intention, implication or direction.

Mr. FLEMING: Does it not go farther than that? Not only are the merits not affected, but the provisions of the orders are not affected.

Mr. MARTIN: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: And the whole purpose of the amendment was to remove any doubt affecting those particular orders.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: So that it is perfectly proper for any hon. member, notwithstanding his view as to the propriety of the orders, or the principle in them, to support the amendment; because all he is saying is that in a general bill of this kind there will be no application to those orders.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wished to bring that point out. That was why I asked the question. I am quite satisfied with that position.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the indulgence of the committee just for a moment. This has been a long discussion, and I am not complaining by any means. In a bill of this kind I believe a thorough discussion is most desirable. This is a bill having great implications, because of the type of subject with which it deals. But as a junior minister who has piloted thus far his first bill through second reading and the committee stage, may I say that I am truly grateful to the committee for its forbearance and its understanding of my shortcomings.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the Secretary of State has done a good job.

Bill reported.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS, ETC.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the operation and financing of government companies, to define their status as agents to His Majesty, and to provide further for the superannuation, pension or other rights of the employees of such companies.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with this business, may I point out that last night when the question was asked as to what the business for to-day would be, the following reply was given:

Mr. Mackenzie: To-morrow we shall take up Bill No. 7 at the commencement of the proceedings. After the conclusion of that measure we shall take up any second readings of the minor bills on the order paper.

This order of business is not a bill; it is a resolution. We are not in a position to deal with it to-day, because the Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated last night that other business would be taken up this afternoon. Therefore we must ask that the measure be not proceeded with at this time. It is a most important one, and we must have proper notice before debate takes place.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, last night, of course, I intended to refer to any other business on the order paper. Probably I was not specific enough. In any event, this is only a resolution, and there will be ample opportunity to discuss the merits or demerits of the proposal when the bill is introduced.

Mr. GREEN: There are many hon. members in the official opposition who, had they known this matter was to be debated to-day, would have been here to take part in such debate. I must object to the government's making promises, and then breaking them the following day. If these statements made at adjournment each evening concerning the following day's business are to have any value, they must be followed.

There are on the order paper many bills which could be given second reading to-day, and the government should carry out the promise it gave last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In that connection may I reply that, except by way of courtesy, there is no such thing as necessity for any promise in regard to the business of the following day. I tried, and I intend to continue to try, to meet the wishes of hon. members opposite as far as possible. But there is no obligation whatsoever upon the government, and never has been, except in a general way, to announce in detail the business for the following day. Ministers have business to attend to outside the house which sometimes necessitates changes in the order of business here.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have understood that when the acting leader of the house tells us what the next day's business will be the order announced will be followed. If now we can place no faith in these statements we shall know what value to put on them in future. All I wish to say at the moment is that we on this side are not prepared to proceed with this resolution, or with the other resolution this afternoon, for the reason that neither had been announced.

On Friday night the acting leader of the house announced that a certain motion would come up for discussion yesterday. That was proceeded with. Last night there was no announcement that this particular resolution would be proceeded with to-day. If the decision is that it will be proceeded with to-day I can only say that we are not prepared to discuss it at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend insists on taking that position I shall not feel compelled to announce the business for the following day, but naturally I wish to cooperate with the leaders of all parties. Sometimes the order of business has to be changed on very short notice. You cannot always have rigid control over the whole business of the house. You can only try to make the closest possible approach to it. I have frequently met the leaders of the various groups and given them all the information I had regarding the business for the next day, and then next morning something arises to necessitate a change in the order of business.

Mr. BRACKEN: We knew nothing of this resolution coming up until a few minutes ago.

Mr. GREEN: The minister announced last night that we would take up to-day any second readings of minor bills on the order paper. There are on the order paper for second reading Bill No. 9, to amend the Navigable Waters' Protection Act; Bill No. 10, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways; Bill No. 14, to amend the Export Act; Bill No. 16, respecting the manufacture, testing, storage and importation of explosives; Bill No. 15, to amend the criminal code (race meetings); Bill No. 54, to amend the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942; Bill No. 17, respecting the marking of articles containing gold, silver or platinum; Bill No. 29, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929; Bill No. 56, to amend the Naval Service Act, 1944; Bill No. 57, to amend the Royal Canadian Air Force Act; Bill No. 61, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act; Bill No. 62, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act; Bill No. 63, respecting the boundaries of certain national parks—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order in regard to procedure.

Mr. GREEN: There is only one more second reading on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An item was called by you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask if it is in order for the hon. member to discuss every other item?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The discussion has not been strictly in order. There is a motion before the house that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider a certain resolution.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the leader of the house changed the order of business at my request. There happens to be an important air conference in Montreal starting on Monday next which will require my presence there for some two weeks, with perhaps a break here and there. The railway committee is now sitting, and I feel it necessary to spend a day or two there in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is for that reason that I asked the privilege of advancing this resolution one stage to-day. I had hoped that the discussion would come on the bill, and not on the resolution. The resolution is rather a colourless statement of the contents of the bill. But since there has been objection to proceeding with the resolution to-day, I suggest that I be allowed to make my statement, and then any member of the opposition can adjourn the debate. That would help me a little. I am fairly busy just now, and I do not like to prepare a statement of this kind several times. I am afraid that if I go away for two weeks without making my statement now, I shall have to prepare it all over again.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the acting leader of the house had communicated that to us we would have been only too glad to accede to the minister's request. We have never objected to the procedure that the leader of the house has suggested, but we never heard of this resolution coming up to-day until three minutes ago. The suggestion just now made by the Minister of Reconstruction is most acceptable to us.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is rather a pity that we did not know before about this resolution coming up, but after all it is proposed to advance the resolution only one stage and there will be ample opportunity for debate when the bill is before us. I think we should try to free the minister by hearing his statement this afternoon and then the debate could be adjourned. On another occasion, however, I will join with the leader of the opposition in expressing the hope that the leader of the house will get in touch with the party leaders before the house meets in the afternoon if there is to be any change in the announced business.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that it is the desire of the house that I put the motion, and that in committee of the whole the minister will make a statement.

Mr. GREEN: On the understanding that after he has made his statement the debate will be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. FLEMING: It is understood that the resolution is not to be reported to-day but that there will be an opportunity to consider the matter further. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: I have said that I have no objection to any member adjourning the debate if he wishes to do so after I have made my statement, but of course I should be glad to have the resolution advanced one stage if that were agreeable. I am in the hands of the committee after I make my statement, which will be short.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the resolution, and of the bill that will be based upon it, is to provide legislation to govern the conduct of crown companies. There are a number of crown companies which were established during the war years, which have now been liquidated, or are in process of liquidation, but there are three which will, I think, continue for a considerable period, and two others which will require to continue for a time at least.

During the war, some thirty-one crown companies were incorporated under part I of the Companies Act, 1934, to carry out special projects. Some of these companies, such as Polymer Corporation Limited and Canadian Arsenals Limited, will continue their operations for a considerable period. It may also be desirable, where statutory authority exists, to incorporate similar companies to carry out other special projects.

The present bill is intended to provide for the financing of such companies and in particular to enable them to use operating revenue to pay operating costs, and to enable emergency requirements for funds to be met; to define their status as agents of His Majesty; to make the usual provisions as to superannuation and other rights of civil servants who become employees of the company; to authorize the companies to set up pension and other welfare plans for employees who are not under the Civil Service Superannuation Act; to provide expressly for the application of the Government Employees Compensation Act to employees of the companies; and to provide for the making of annual and other reports by the companies.

Crown companies were an invention of the Department of Munitions and Supply in the early days of the war to provide a method for carrying out duties which could only be carried out with difficulty by the staff of the department. Hon. members will appreciate that, at the commencement of the war, the Department of Munitions and Supply had no staff. It was a newly created department, and it acquired its staff by going out into the highways and byways and inducing men with high patriotic purpose, men of skill and experience, to leave their civilian occupations and join the service of the government for the period of the war.

One of the first problems encountered was the establishment of a chemicals and explosives industry in this country adequate for war. Obviously the first and paramount requirement of war is an adequate supply of ammunition and explosives. We had a chemical industry in this country and that chemical industry was used to the full, but, in addition to that, it was necessary to establish new sources of supplies for chemicals, and to establish large-scale plants for the manufacture of explosives. A very large construction problem was involved,—ultimately requiring an expenditure of more than $100 million for new construction of chemical and explosive plants.

It seemed obvious to the department that it must enlist men of great ability to carry out that programme,—men who were able to command the special skills which would be required to make the programme a success. In looking about for ways and means of organizing that programme, the department hit upon the plan of organizing a crown corporation. Thus Allied War Supplies Limited became the first of the administrative type of crown companies.

Allied War Supplies Limited is now in process of liquidation, having carried out its obligations; and we can look back on the operation of that company with a good deal of pride. It built some magnificent plants; it produced chemicals and explosives in excess of the programme set for it; the work was carried out at reasonable cost; every obligation was met; and after war requirements ceased considerable earnings were obtained by sale of products produced by the plants, which helped in liquidating the cost of the projects; in fact several very expensive projects have been liquidated by the sale of the product into peace-time world markets. I shall be glad to go into that operation in more detail when the bill is before the house. I mention the work of Allied War Supplies Limited at this time as an example of the purpose of the crown companies and the manner in which that work was carried out.

Crown companies divide themselves into three classes. The first class includes the administrative and supervisory companies. Allied was in that class. It did not directly operate plants, but it supervised their building, arranged for the operation of the plants, and handled the sale of the product. A number of crown companies were in that class. In second class were the manufacturing companies. We found as the war proceeded that it was necessary to increase the manufacture of certain products beyond the capacity of private industry to provide the service, and certain plants were built and operated directly by the government, through crown companies, to manufacture certain products. Research Enterprises Limited is an example of that class of plant. Another is Small Arms Limited, which produced vast quantities of small arms such as rifles and Sten guns. There are several other examples of crown companies established for the purpose of actually manufacturing.

Then there was the third class of companies, companies engaged in merchandising certain raw materials and in providing stockpiles sufficient to assure adequate supplies for war and civilian purposes. An example is Melbourne Merchandising company, which purchased the wool requirements of the country, stock-piled the wool and made it available to manufacturers during the war period. That company is now being liquidated. Another is Fairmont company, which performed the same duty in relation to rubber and allied products. A third is Wartime Metals, which was charged with the duty of keeping on hand an ample supply of metals not obtainable in Canada, such as tin and manganese. This company also undertook the expansion from Canadian sources of rare metals such as chrome, molybdenite, tungsten, mercury, and provided from Canadian sources sufficient supplies to meet all requirements during the war period. This company, Wartime Metals, is now fully liquidated.

One of the inducements for adopting the crown company plan was that it permitted men with business responsibilities of their own to give a good deal of their time to the government, in executive positions associated with a form of administration with which they were wholly familiar. The corporation is an accepted unit of Canadian business. Corporate practice is well understood by those engaged in private business. The corporate system of accounting is also well understood and has been highly perfected through experience over the years. Therefore, to bring into being a form of organization which was readily understood, to make it sufficiently flexible so that the head office could be established in a location most convenient to those men whom we wished to attract to the business, and to secure other advantages which appealed to us at the time, were the determining factors which led us to carry out a number of war operations through the agency of crown companies.

The crown companies during the war years were carried on in part under the War Measures Act and were financed from the war appropriation. The finances of each company were carefully segregated. I shall be glad to give the house, when the bill is before us, a financial statement on any one of the thirty-one operations which were carried out through crown companies. Each company was expected so to conduct its business that it would not be operating in red ink. In other words, each crown company was carrying out a business operation and it was expected so to conduct its business that receipts would at least cover expenditures.

Some of these companies have been amazingly successful. As far as war work was concerned, they sold to the Canadian government and to our allies at cost, but there were certain transactions outside the purely war field which were carried on at a profit. Many of the crown companies were wound up having considerable balances on the profit side, all of which were turned over to the crown in the form of a final dividend, or alternatively were used to reduce the cost of the product to the crown. The administrative companies had no direct means of obtaining revenues even though their business was carried out in such a manner that the plants whose administration they directed were themselves profitable. The administrative companies would show chargeable to them the cost of administration without offset of earnings. In order to determine the results of companies of that type, it would be necessary to look beyond the balance sheet of the company management itself, and examine the balance sheet of the plants which it built and administered. The breakdown there is in some cases difficult to arrive at, but I think I shall be able to satisfy the house as to the results that were obtained by companies of an administrative type.

Of the thirty-one companies, seventeen have ceased operation and are either wound up or very nearly so; nine are in process of winding up, and only five are still active. The five companies that are still active are Canadian Arsenals Limited, Polymer Corporation Limited, Park Steamships Limited, Wartime Housing Limited, and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. Of these five I anticipate that Canadian Arsenals, the Polymer Corporation and Eldorado Mining and Refining will continue as crown companies for many years to come. I also anticipate that the Park steamships company and Wartime Housing will be wound up within the next three or four years at the maximum.

We are now asking that the crown company organization be formalized. In doing so we are making provision for a form of organization that has its own uses in the work of government, particularly as the work of government becomes more complex. I quite agree that the work of crown companies should be examined by a parliamentary committee from year to year. The war expenditures committee was charged with that function during the war years, and it may be that a committee similar to the committee on railways and shipping, government-owned, or perhaps the same committee, should examine the accounts of the crown companies from year to year. However, the books of all crown companies are kept by treasury officers of the government, and all accounts and transactions are audited by the auditor general of Canada, so that members of the house can feel every assurance that the creation of a crown company does not in any way weaken the ordinary safeguards that apply to government business.

One difficulty in analysing government-owned business in general is the government's method of bookkeeping. It is a simple method of bookkeeping. Everything that is paid out by the treasury is charged up as expenditures from a government appropriation and everything that is received is entered on the books as revenue. In a business, it is difficult to provide incentives with that kind of bookkeeping. Unless the corporation can be charged with its expenditures, and has to account for those expenditures, and at the same time receives credit for its income, and be expected to have the income side in excess over the expenditure side and be required to answer questions to a parliamentary committee if the reverse is the case, I think we lose a good deal in incentive to the personnel that is carrying on that particular government business.

The bill that will be based on this resolution provides for the normal corporation accounting for crown companies. I think that is an important feature of the measure. It also makes provision for the welfare of the employees of crown companies. These men are not civil servants, unless they have been transferred to the company from the permanent civil service. In cases where they have been transferred, the bill makes provision for their civil service protection to be continued. In the case of employees recruited outside the civil service, the bill provides for the benefits that are usual in similar private undertakings.

The bill has been carefully drawn. It is simple in form, and contains only those provisions that are required for the normal business of the corporation. At the same time, I believe the bill contains all the safeguards that parliament will require. However, hon. members can judge that for themselves when the bill is brought down, and I shall be glad to reserve for that occasion anything more I have to say.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have just two questions to ask the minister. His resolution states that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the operation and financing of government companies, which the minister has referred to as crown companies. I presume this measure is made necessary because the companies were set up under the War Measures Act?

Mr. HOWE: Under the Companies Act.

Mr. BRACKEN: And now they are continued under the emergency powers legislation?

Mr. HOWE: They were set up under the dominion Companies Act, part I. They were operated to some extent under the War Measures Act, and were financed from the war appropriations voted by parliament. Therefore, since there are no more war appropriations, it is desirable that separate provision be made for finances and for operating method.

Mr. BRACKEN: That brings me to the point of my first question. If some legislation of this kind was not needed before, what is the special need for it now? Perhaps the minister will make that clear after I am through.

The other question is this. One of the purposes of the measure is said to be to define the status of these crown companies as agents to His Majesty and to provide further for the superannuation, pension or other rights of the employees of such companies. I had gathered from the resolution that these companies were not to be permanent institutions. Apparently they are either temporary or semi-temporary institutions. Would the minister explain why it is necessary to provide for superannuation, pension and so on in crown companies that, so far as we know, are intended only to be short-lived? There must be some thought that they will be long-lived institutions. These are the two points I had in mind to ask about.

Mr. HOWE: In reply to the first point, the particular need is to provide a method of financing for the companies. During the war the funds required by the companies were withdrawn from the war appropriation that had been voted by parliament, and the receipts of the company were paid into the consolidated revenue fund. The companies had no right to retain in their possession funds beyond those required for operating. In other words, the companies worked on appropriations and paid their surplus funds into the consolidated revenue fund. This bill will enable each company to accumulate from its earnings the funds which can be used for the expenses of the company and would be held for that purpose to the extent of operational requirements.

Mr. BRACKEN: The effect is to remove them still farther from parliament.

Mr. HOWE: No; to bring them closer, if you like. The method of bookkeeping proposed is much easier for parliament to check than the method in the usual government accounting. I think that fact will appear when we examine the bill.

As regards the permanency of the companies, we have continuing operations that in my judgment will be better continued under an organization of this type. One is the Polymer Corporation, a vast chemical plant built for the manufacture of synthetic rubber to meet emergent war needs. It was built at a cost of about $50 million. In addition to the manufacture of rubber, certain by-products of the process are being sold as a basis for a great separate organic chemical industry. Already two or three important privately owned chemical plants are either in operation or are being constructed to purchase by-products of the Polymer plant. The Polymer operation is a tremendous undertaking, and I think it would be folly to attempt the operation without using a corporate form for the enterprise.

Mr. GREEN: That is a new crown company which is in contemplation?

Mr. HOWE: No; the Polymer Corporation was created to build and operate the synthetic rubber plant at Sarnia.

Mr. GREEN: The minister spoke about a new chemical company.

Mr. HOWE: The Polymer Corporation built its plant and has operated it for the past three years.

Mr. GREEN: The new chemical developments mentioned are to be carried on by Polymer?

Mr. HOWE: No; these are private developments. They will purchase as their new material certain by-products resulting from the preparation of the material for the Polymer process which were surplus to the requirements of the Polymer. These are becoming the basis of a substantial organic chemical industry in the same area. Private expansion in the organic chemical field will continue, I believe, and should the requirements of synthetic rubber be curtailed at any time it would prove to be a way of saving the government's investment by providing a market for the products that are at present the base materials for synthetic rubber.

Another crown company that will continue is the Dominion Arsenals Limited. Before the war, it was the practice to operate the arsenals as a branch of government. All the employees were civil servants, and the operations were carried on by civil service practice. An appropriation was made by parliament to cover the expenditures and any receipts were paid into the consolidated revenue fund. At present the arsenals are being operated as a crown company. There is a reasonable chance that the earnings of the arsenals will pay their operating expenses, and that an appropriation from parliament from year to year will not be needed, which will certainly be a welcome change in the pre-war arsenal situation. I shall be glad to explain the composition of Dominion Arsenals when we consider the bill. I believe that present arrangements are a great improvement in the method of operating continuing dominion government arsenals between wars.

A third company that should continue in corporate form is Eldorado Mining and Refining. This is a mining operation in a remote area in the northwest territories. It is one of the world's great suppliers of uranium and radium.

Mr. COCKERAM: What about their outside properties?

Mr. HOWE: All the Eldorado properties are owned by the Eldorado Corporation. This is the third corporation under the Companies Act which I think will be a continuing operation, at least as long as it is desirable the production of uranium be under strict government control.

I might explain the difference between a crown company referred to in this bill and other government companies. For example, War Assets Corporation is not a corporation under the Companies Act; it is a corporation created by act of parliament. That is the only company associated with the Department of Munitions and Supply, that is not a company under the Companies Act. This bill does not refer to the operation of War Assets Corporation.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the minister's answer is that it is intended that at least three crown companies shall continue more or less indefinitely?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: So far as we are concerned at the moment we can look upon them as semi-permanent, or perhaps permanent?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that would be the intention.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister did not answer the question with respect to superannuation and pensions. If the government intends that some of these companies shall be permanent or long-lived I can understand that provision would need to be made for that kind of thing, but my impression was that these companies were only temporary in nature. I wondered, therefore, why it was necessary to have plans for superannuation and pension. Does the minister propose to give these companies power to make their own plans for superannuation and pension?

Mr. HOWE: The companies will be charged with the duty of formulating plans, but the plans must be approved by the government through order in council before they can be adopted by the company. The government has control over the appointment of personnel, salaries of personnel and matters such as superannuation and pension plans in the present regulations governing the company.

The need for a reasonable superannuation and pension plan will be apparent in the case of Polymer. Polymer is located alongside the Imperial Oil refinery at Sarnia. The type of employee is much the same as the type of employee of the Imperial Oil refinery. Hon. members are no doubt aware that Imperial Oil has an advanced policy in the matter of superannuation and benefits to its employees. It would hardly be practical for the government to carry on a similar operation alongside without having some plan of a corresponding nature. The same is true of the arsenals. In my opinion the number of civil servants in the arsenals should be reduced rather than expanded, and protection afforded by means of an adequate retirement and benefit plan. The same is true also of Eldorado.

Mr. BRACKEN: Does the minister anticipate that more than the three companies he has mentioned will be of a permanent nature?

Mr. HOWE: The department over which I preside has plans for only the three companies mentioned, although two other companies will require at least two or three years to liquidate their obligations.

Mr. GREEN: Which ones are they?

Mr. HOWE: Park Steamships is one and Wartime Housing is another.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Will these social security plans be the same for all three companies?

Mr. HOWE: Not necessarily. The needs of different industries vary and each industry has its own pattern for social security. In some industries it may be desirable to have an earlier retiring age than in others, and other industries may require a different type of benefit. It has been the practice to permit the management to work out its benefit plan with its employees, and the companies have not been held to a standard pattern.

Mr. McKAY: Has the minister any figures as to the number of employees in each of these corporations? I am concerned at the moment only with the Polymer Corporation, Dominion Arsenals and Eldorado.

Mr. HOWE: Would my hon. friend permit me to give that information on the next occasion this matter is considered?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a couple of questions to ask, but before doing so I wish to bring something to the attention of the committee. I would not like to see what took place in connection with this debate become a precedent. Before Mr. Speaker left the chair the hon. member for Eglinton was on his feet and he certainly had the right to speak. He tried to speak but Mr. Speaker simply left the chair. The rights of hon. members should be respected and any hon. member who wants to rise to his feet to speak should be permitted to do so. Before we vote money on anything like this we should have an opportunity to have Mr. Speaker in the chair. I just bring that up in passing.

In connection with the Polymer Corporation, I should like to know the price per pound at which synthetic rubber is selling. I should also like to know if the plants of Dominion Arsenals are to be operated as pilot plants for experimental work. If so, how does the minister expect to make a profit? Perhaps he can give this information later on when the bill is before the house.

Mr. HOWE: My recollection is that synthetic rubber sells at 20½ cents a pound.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How does that compare with the price of natural rubber?

Mr. HOWE: Natural rubber has been selling for 45 cents a pound but I think the price of new importations is 24 cents a pound f.o.b. Malaya. I presume that would permit it to be laid down in Canada for about 30 cents a pound, or perhaps a little less. I am sure of the price at which synthetic rubber is selling but I am giving the other figures from memory.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will our Canadian plant be able to compete in the future with the supplies of natural rubber?

Mr. HOWE: The fact that the government owns a synthetic rubber plant will not be used to deprive anyone from the privilege of purchasing natural rubber. Natural rubber is brought in without duty, and there is no obstacle to trade.

In my opinion nothing should interfere with the right of Canadian industry to purchase either synthetic or natural rubber. At the moment, even though the synthetic rubber plant is producing considerably in excess of its rated capacity, it is unable to supply the demands of Canadian industry. When the plant was built, it was tailored to meet war requirements, which we believed would be about double peace-time requirements, but the fact is that the full capacity of the plant is being used to meet peace-time requirements, just as it was used during the war years to meet war-time requirements. There is no indication on the horizon that there will be any change in the situation, at least for two years. Reports indicate that the natives in the jungle seem to have wakened up to the fact that they can sell their labour for money, and it seems doubtful whether they will be prepared to produce rubber for the low wages that prevailed in pre-war days.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just what is proposed in connection with the Canadian arsenals? Are these plants to be operated as pilot plants for experimental work?

Mr. HOWE: The plants of Dominion Arsenals were never primarily experimental plants. They produce the requirements of the army in times of peace. Their work consisted partly of the overhaul of equipment, partly of the development of new equipment and partly of the replacement of wastage caused by the wear and tear of army manoeuvres in time of peace. As I have said, in former days an appropriation was voted for Dominion Arsenals and any work was charged against that appropriation until it was exhausted.

It is now proposed that Dominion Arsenals will charge the army, the navy and the air force for the work allocated to each arsenal. The work will carry with it a price, just as it did in war-time, and it is expected that the work performed in the arsenals will provide sufficient revenue to pay the expenses of operating. For instance, one arsenal plant is now producing ammonia nitrate fertilizer and selling it in the world market. It is also producing other chemicals which are being sold at a profit, and the total profits on this one operation are at present well over $1,000,000 a year, which is quite a contribution toward the cost of carrying the entire arsenals programme.

Another arsenal plant is engaged in overhauling 25-pounder guns for the army. That is an army contract which carries with it the same price it would have carried in wartime. The revenue the arsenal is drawing from that price will also help to carry the cost of the arsenal programme. Similarly, orders for ammunition are placed from time to time; perhaps not just at the present time, but they have been for years and doubtless will be again. That ammunition will be sold at a reasonable commercial price, and there again the proceeds will go into the arsenal fund.

It is my hope—perhaps it is rather a bold hope at this time, or until such time as we have more experience—that the work performed by the arsenals, paid for at reasonable commercial rates, will provide sufficient revenue to cover all costs of the arsenals, and perhaps provide a surplus which can be paid into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: While this resolution would appear to be a most innocuous one, I submit it represents an unusual advance in the direction of the government's going into business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I note that there is applause from the C.C.F corner of the house, indicating that the minister will get support from that direction—

Mr. HOWE: And I hope from the Social Credit corner.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —in the stand which he has taken. I suggest that at some time during the discussion on the resolution the minister should let the country know to what extent the government intends to carry into effect a policy of that kind, or of going into or continuing in business in competition with private industry.

If the government is going into business, has consideration been given to the fact that it should accept the responsibilities ordinarily accepted by private industry? Has consideration been given to the removal of the principle which has been in effect for many hundreds of years, namely that the crown cannot be sued. If the government is going into business, through the setting up of crown companies, in any bill introduced provision should be made so that suit can be brought against such companies, in the same way as against private industry.

Then, if the government is going into business should the ancient principle, that which states that because a company is a crown company it should not be subject to municipal or other taxation, be continued? If the government is going into competition with private business, or if it is going to operate industry by itself, should it depart from what is ordinarily accepted to be the ambit of government operations?

Is it not time to place in this measure a provision permitting that crown companies be sued, and that they be placed on an equality with corporations operated privately by their being required to make payments of taxation.

I suggest that the minister should reply to these points, because they are of peculiar importance at this time, owing to the fact that apparently the government has decided, in days of peace, to carry into effect a system of crown companies which operated in time of war. The minister has pointed out that they operated successfully in war time and that, generally speaking, they returned a profit. One can understand that. But we are now in days of peace, and we know that all crown corporations have not in the past returned profits. The fact that they are crown corporations does not necessarily establish any assumption that they will be successfully operated for the benefit of the public. I mention only one company—and I shall not discuss its affairs in detail—but if there is any corporation in the country criticized to-day, then certainly that corporation is War Assets Corporation. The people as a whole find it difficult to get any replies from it, and on many occasions to get service from it. Indeed, as someone suggests to me, even members of parliament experience the same difficulty; and that is a condition which I believe is general on all sides of the house.

I should appreciate the minister's outlining generally the adoption of any new type of policy by the government, so that the committee and the country will know just to what extent the government has decided to adopt socialistic principles at this time.

Mr. HOWE: I was called a socialist in the early days of the war, and now I am called a capitalist because I am liquidating socialized organizations. We built some government-operated plants, to a value of nearly $900 million. During the last few years we have liquidated the larger portion, as far as government ownership and operation are concerned.

We would be glad to sell the Polymer Corporation to private industry, if private industry would buy it. We built it to serve a great national need, particularly to serve a war need. It has been a successful undertaking, and is now operating at a substantial profit. It has already paid back in profits some $10 million of the $50 million. We are selling rubber at the ceiling price. We are prepared to meet competition for some time to come. However, I believe the manufacture of synthetic rubber by the government of Canada is for the general advantage of Canadian business. I have yet to hear any business man suggest it was not a good thing for Canadian business to have Canada's only source of rubber in the hands of the government, rather than in the hands of a private corporation.

The government has no intention of going into business unnecessarily. Occasions have arisen in the past where it was important and, I suggest, imperative, that the government go into business on a very large scale. Such occasions may occur again, and if they do I hope the government of that day will be bold enough to meet the situation. This fetish, in the minds of some people, that everything is wrong that is private industry, and in the minds of others that everything is wrong that is public industry, is a most ridiculous situation. Fortunately I am a Liberal, and hold no such theories. I regret to observe that my hon. friends across the way seem to be divided into groups that are unanimous, either on one side or on the other.

Might I remind hon. members that in a speech on March 31, 1943, Mr. Churchill offered the following observation:

> If we act with comradeship and loyalty to our country and to one another, and if we can make state enterprise and free enterprise both serve the national interest, and pull the wagon side by side, there is no need to fear.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is Mr. Churchill a Liberal?

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was at one time, he was in former days.

Mr. HOWE: Like my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister available financial statements of crown companies in a shape which would permit of their being placed on Hansard?

Mr. HOWE: I should think that would not be possible. There are thirty-one companies, and the statements of some of them are involved. It may be that an abbreviated statement would mean but little.

However, I would be glad to put on Hansard a statement of any one company, and perhaps I may be able to meet the request of my hon. friend in full.

Mr. GREEN: Could they be laid on the table?

Mr. HOWE: I shall try to have them in such shape that they can be, but they are not in that shape at the present time. I have before me the latest financial statements from each of the companies. I am having prepared final statements of companies which have been wound up, and interim statements of others.

Perhaps at this stage I might ask hon. members whether they wish me to continue at nine o'clock. Some objection was taken earlier.

Mr. GREEN: We would like to have an opportunity to go over the statement that has been made, and then we would be prepared to go on with the resolution on another day.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NAVIGABLE WATERS

APPROVAL OF WORKS CONSTRUCTED AS OF JUNE 1, 1938

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of bill No. 9, to amend the Navigable Waters' Protection Act.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Before this bill is read a second time I should like to ask the minister a question. The purpose, as I understand it, of part I of the Navigable Waters' Protection Act is to prevent our navigable rivers from being obstructed or impeded or rendered dangerous or difficult for ships by the construction of bridges or wharves or dams or other structures which have not been approved by the governor in council. This is necessary and important legislation. The amendment that is proposed is an amendment of subsection 2 of section 5 of the act, which I have just had an opportunity to look at for a minute, and provides that before any obstruction can be put in navigable waters permission has to be obtained of the governor in council. If permission is not obtained from the governor in council, if my recollection serves me correctly—I have not had the time to look carefully into this just now—there is provision that permission can subsequently be obtained; and if I understand it, the amendment which is proposed has to do with that permission. Am I right in that supposition? Is the amendment to provide for permission in the cases of works which have been put up without the consent of the governor in council?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask, then, why the date has been changed; why this amendment is being made? Have certain works been constructed without the approval of the governor in council which this amendment is intended to cover and, if that is so, for what particular works is this amendment to provide?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): As the hon. member has mentioned, the amendment proposed in this bill is a change of the date mentioned in subsection 2 of section 5. The act itself came into effect in 1886, and it was passed for reasons of security and defence purposes, to ensure that there were no obstacles or impediments in navigable waters so that in case of emergency or in case of war navigation would be free in those waters. The act has not been amended very often since 1886, but on a few occasions parliament has approved the change of the date in subsection 2 of section 5. It actually reads:

> The governor in council may approve of works constructed, or in process of construction, on the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, subject to the provisions of section seven hereof, and such approval shall have the same effect as approval of works to be constructed.

That refers to section 7 of part I of the Navigable Waters' Protection Act. I may state here that the first part of the act comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works; the two other sections of the act come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges). The first part relates to works that are "built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council," or "unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council." On account of war conditions, this section has not been amended for a good many years. I cannot recall whether it was 1926 or 1928 when the last amendment was made. But I am informed that certain works since 1918 have been put up without approval of the sites or of the works being asked from the Department of Public Works, and it is thought that we should now change this date to June 1, 1938.

Personally I recall one instance, and I think this is the general case, where somebody, through ignorance, puts up some works without applying for approval of the site or the plans. Later on these works are transferred to other parties. These people request approval of the site and works, and the governor in council cannot give approval of these works because this subsection 2 of section 5 gives this definite date of June 1, 1918.

I have in mind certain hydro electric power developments on the North river in the province of Quebec. The development of these works took place about 1923 or 1924. They were carried out by a man named Wilson. Later on, the development was sold to another concern, the Montreal Power or something of that sort. This last company in 1928 sold its rights to the Gatineau Power company, which applied to the department, when a thorough study was made of the situation and it was found that we could not grant approval of these works. Generally, when the department has no knowledge of works that are going on we give notice, or if the works are put up and there are complaints, or if they are a danger to navigation, we are empowered by section 5 of the act to remove unauthorized works. We would not remove works that cost money when, by reason of some error or ignorance of the statute, approval had not been requested, but if there are complaints we take action.

The case I have mentioned—I cannot think of any others at the moment—would be met by this amendment if it carried. It would give authority to the governor in council to approve after we had received a description of the site as set out in section 7 of the act and a description of the works. That is the only object of the bill, to change the date from June 1, 1918 to June 1, 1938.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): On reading this brief bill over I said to myself that it had important relations behind it. To my mind, the erection of works of any description over a navigable river should have the approval of the governor in council, which in this case means the Minister of Public Works, who of course would be advised by the engineers in his department. I gathered from what the minister said that there were certain works he had in view on some river, and I also have in mind certain works on rivers. I think we should insist upon the approval of the government before the commencement of the erection of works over navigable rivers.

I read a few days ago of a proposal to erect a bridge over the Slave river. I believe the position is south of the Northwest Territories and in the northern part of Alberta, and it would be in a part of the river where there is at the moment no navigation. There are rapids there; but at some future date it is possible there may be navigation if the rapids are canalized between Fort Fitzgerald and Fort Smith. The construction of any works on the Slave river at that point would have to have the approval of the government, would it not, and the government through the department would protect the interests of the public? That is fine.

The same would apply to the Saskatchewan river. I refer to the North Saskatchewan. I have been advised of a proposal to build a bridge over the North Saskatchewan river west of Battleford, quite a few miles, and before any such structure could be erected across that river the promoters would have to obtain the approval of the department. In that event I would feel satisfied that the public would be protected.

I have in mind works started some twenty-six miles down the river from Prince Albert. Is the minister familiar with the dam that goes half-way across the river, an uncompleted dam at what in that part of the country is called the Coal rapids? It has different names; sometimes it is known as Lacole. Before these works were started about 1913, would they not have had to receive the approval of the federal authority?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In every instance approval is asked for. It would be better if we went into committee because I could answer questions then, seeing that I am not in order in doing so at this stage. However, if the hon. gentleman will look at section 7 of the act he will see that it is not mandatory. It is provided there that the local authority, company or person proposing to construct any work in navigable waters for which no sufficient sanction otherwise exists may deposit the plans thereof, and a description of the proposed site, with the Minister of Public Works, and a duplicate of each in the office of the registrar of deeds for the district, county or province in which the said work is proposed to be constructed, and may apply to the governor in council for approval thereof.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I suggest to hon. members that they refrain from asking questions at this stage of the proceedings. The motion is that the bill be read the second time, and when the house is in committee there will be ample opportunity for questions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will not delay the house, and I may say that so far I have not wasted any time. I simply wish to learn from the minister that the public are thoroughly protected in the contruction of any works across navigable rivers. There will be many works on the Ottawa river shortly. Whether that river is regarded by the government as navigable, I do not know, but it is as far as Ottawa, and west of Ottawa it should be and perhaps will be. If the act covers such rivers as are navigable, like the Ottawa, I am satisfied with the protection afforded.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Approval of works constructed.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In answer to the hon. member, this act applies to all navigable waters except the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is international.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Section II of the act reads:

[Mr. MacNicol.]

No approval shall be given under this part of the site or plans of any bridge over the river St. Lawrence.

We have found that generally the public, persons or corporations, having works done on navigable rivers, apply for approval of the site and works, but without having definite information we believe that during the war works were put up on navigable waters in certain parts of the country without the necessary approval. I cannot give a single instance, but officials of the department are going into that phase of the matter. Certain works may have been put up on navigable waters in certain parts of the country during war time, for defence purposes, which have not received the approval mentioned in sections 5 and 7 of this act. If they were completed we would have no way to give approval to these works—

An hon. MEMBER: By changing the date?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That would not apply. I am not correcting what I am stating, because the date we present here is June 1, 1938. I have gathered together what the officials of my department told me in trying to justify this amendment to the act when it was brought into the house. It is hoped that the department will be able to make a survey of works in every district and in every part of the country which have not received approval since 1918. If they are not an obstacle or an impediment, or if no complaint has been made against these works, and if they file plans and descriptions of the sites and the works we shall be ready to approve them.

Mr. GRAYDON: This strikes me as putting the cart before the horse. Before a survey is made, or before the officials have found anything wrong a survey is to be made. If the minister has found something wrong I think the committee should be given the benefit of of the information upon which this bill must be based; otherwise the minister is bringing in legislation before that information is gathered. After the legislation is brought in a survey is to be made to find out whether any of these things have happened. I should think it ought to be the other way round. If after the survey is made that situation is found to exist, then parliament would be in a position to pass legislation, if it is deemed advisable, to correct the situation.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when I first made my short statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, I was.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): One case was brought to my attention which I thought was an important one. An application was made to the department by the Gatineau Power company under section 7 of this act. It was found in the file that these works had been made by a man by the name of Wilson at Wilson's chute on the North river in the province of Quebec. Later on, this development was sold to another company, and a little later was again sold to the Gatineau Power company. In looking up their files when they came in possession of these works the company found that no approval by the government had been given to the site, to the erection of these works. They made application, sent in their petition, filed the plans and descriptions of the site and works, but we could not give approval because these works had been made after June 1, 1918. This would be a case in point which this amendment would cover. I do not know of any other specific case of this importance that has come to my knowledge.

Mr. GRAYDON: I recall the minister citing that particular case. Judging by what the minister said a few moments ago, I thought this was only one of many cases. The minister does not seem to have any other case in mind, but we are now going to pass legislation to cover a widespread number of cases that may turn up once a survey is made. That is the point I am trying to make. I do not wish to be unduly technical about it, but it seems to me that we are putting some carts before some horses. I do not think we should do that if we can avoid it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under this bill no approval will be given to works that obstruct navigation.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; that is gone into before we do give approval. We have a series of regulations which they undertake to follow. These regulations have been established for many years, and we find that they generally conform to the regulations.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Is it necessary under this act for a lumber company to get permission to drive piles or build docks or booms in navigable waters? What is the procedure in determining if there are no protests from the public? There is something in the point made by the hon. member for Peel with regard to putting the cart before the horse. Here we may be legalizing and regularizing something that has already taken place.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I would not say that the act applies to all works that are put up on navigable waters, because there are some exceptions in section 4, subsection 2, which reads as follows:

> The provisions of this section shall not apply to small wharves or groynes or other bank or beach protection works, or boathouses, if in the opinion of the Minister of Public Works
> (a) they do not interfere with navigation, and > (b) do not cost more than one thousand dollars.

These are certain small works that would not be obstacles to navigation. But every company that does put up works on navigable waters makes application. There is a regular formula that is sent out to these people, a request, and they have the forms. They have the plans prepared. They file those plans with us and with the local registry. There is a public notice given in the Canada Gazette and in the local papers. After one month's delay, if no objection is taken to the application, the governor in council, on condition that the company or the person undertakes to follow the regulations, generally grants approval of this site and of the works.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any complaints been received that any works have interfered with navigation?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Not to my knowledge.

Mr. HERRIDGE: It has been mentioned that works to the value of $1,000 or less that do not interfere with navigation do not come within the provisions of this act. A company could easily drive half a dozen piles and put a boom chain out in a navigable river which might not cost more than $100, but it might be a serious impediment to navigation. Does the minister say that in these circumstances the piles could be driven without the permission of the department?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I believe in the case mentioned we would receive complaints immediately, and then we would certainly investigate and have these works removed under section 5 of the act. I cannot visualize a case where somebody would just put up works to interfere with navigation. That is not the way it is generally done. People do ask approval. Probably some do not know of the existence of this statute, and by error or even negligence put up works which do not interfere with navigation; and when we have no complaints we generally give approval.

Mr. LOCKHART: Where smaller or larger works have been constructed along the chain of great lakes, other than the St. Lawrence river, which have been in existence for some time, what is the extent of the responsibility of the federal government? What distance is taken in by the federal government as a responsibility in connection with any small work that may have been undertaken in the past? Could the minister give me any direction on that? There are many places along the chain of lakes where projects have been completed and in use for some time, and from what the minister says I gather that this amendment is proposed to bring such works within the scope of the act. But I am asking how far the responsibility of the federal government goes, say along the shore line, from the point where the work has been erected.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I would not know exactly the extent of our jurisdiction, but any work which would interfere with navigation seems to be covered in this statute. We are governed by section 4 of the act, and I have given the exceptions to that section, which reads:

No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council, nor unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council.

That is the limit of our jurisdiction. Nearly every week applications come in from different parts of the country, even for small wharves along rivers and lakes. We may find instances where the person putting up such work did not really understand that the work required our approval if it amounted to over $1,000. Then he is advised that he should obtain approval. He makes application, and if this work was completed after June 1, 1918, we cannot grant that approval. The object of the amendment is to extend this date to 1938. This is in the interests of protection to navigation when any works are put up which may interfere. When this happens we generally hear about it. If the work does not interfere with navigation and there is no complaint, if no application is made we do not tear down the work.

Mr. LOCKHART: Perhaps I can be a little more explicit. Take a case where smaller docking facilities may be provided at some place along the chain of lakes, we will say. Over a period of years quite a number of boats may anchor in that vicinity because of the facilities provided by that small work which has been installed. There may be certain interference with navigation and there must be some responsibility where there is a small harbour or where these docking facilities are provided. Does the federal responsibility end at the edge of the dock, or does it extend some distance from the dock, and whose responsibility is it? Let me put it in this way. Who is responsible for maintenance along the shoreline of inland lakes and rivers where these works may be constructed? I should like to have that clear.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Any responsibility for damages, say, would not rest with the federal government but with the owner of the property. All we do under this act is approve such works in navigable waters. We have absolutely no other responsibility than to see that such works do not interfere with navigation.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, if something had been permitted, even though it had never been approved, there would be a responsibility in connection with any interference or damage that might be caused.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): These plans are filed not only in the Department of Public Works but in the local registry of the county, and anyone using navigable waters generally has a plan of those waters and knows where such works have been erected. That is one reason we have this act, in order that everyone can refer to the approved plans of the sites of these works and know where these obstacles are. Then they certainly can avoid them while navigating the waters.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then in a general way whose responsibility is it to see that the shoreline along our chain of great lakes, say, is maintained? Is it a provincial or a federal responsibility? It comes under navigable waters, because they are all navigable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do not keep on with this "carried" stuff. I should like an answer to that, so that I may know exactly under whose jurisdiction these navigable waters come.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If the hon. member is speaking of the shores of rivers and lakes, they do not come under federal jurisdiction at all. I have always been under the impression that they were under provincial jurisdiction. What we are dealing with here is navigable waters, and any works in navigable waters that may affect or interfere with navigation. We do not go farther than that Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister care to define "navigable waters"? Then we shall find out what we are talking about.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I would have to refer to the judgments of the privy council in some very famous cases, and I would not care to do so from memory. If I had time I might even refer to the Gatineau case, which went to the privy council, to decide whether that was a navigable river, and the question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Anything a child's boat will go down is a navigable water, is it not?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Perhaps the hon. member had better give us his definition.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would the minister explain why he has this cut-off date of 1938? If this act is to be passed, why not bring it right up to date?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is a fair question. Probably this is an arbitrary date. Years ago, in 1926 or 1927, they fixed the date at 1918. Now they are moving it up, and I believe they have been doing that since 1886.

Mr. COCKERAM: Why not bring it right up to date now?

Mr. FOURIER (Hull): I would not want to take upon myself the responsibility of not following the advice of my officials, who think June 1, 1938, would be a proper date.

Mr. FRASER: A few moments ago the minister said his department would have plans, or they would be in the registry office, showing the works along these waters. But there might be unauthorized work done, without any plans being registered. This would cover that as well, would it?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Before giving approval we would have to obtain plans of the works. I think it is for the benefit of everyone that we should change this date and try to have these plans for unauthorized works registered in the local registry as well as with our department, in order that people using these waters may know exactly the location of these works.

Mr. FRASER: When this bill passes would not such unauthorized works receive approval?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Not unless an application is made.

Mr. FRASER: I see nothing here against those works passing.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We do not give any blanket approval of works because we are changing the date in this amendment.

Mr. FRASER: But if it were done before 1938, they would—

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They would have the right to apply for approval.

Mr. COCKERAM: Why do we not bring this act up to date?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There can be no objection to this more recent date.

Mr. COCKERAM: I have no objection to the date, but I should like to have it advanced, if it is possible to do so.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Perhaps we shall do that next year.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Will the minister's department supply a list of the navigable rivers in Canada?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That would be quite an undertaking, and I do not know if the expense would be justified. Would it be tabled in the house? I do not know what object there would be in tabling a list of that kind. Some of them in the northern part of the country have not yet been explored.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR TWO RACE MEETS AT ONE TRACK

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of bill No. 15, to amend the criminal code (race meetings).

He said: Perhaps I should make an explanation of this bill before we go into committee. It was introduced in the senate, partly for the purpose of expediting the work of the session, and received its introduction as a result of representations made from the Department of Agriculture.

When the bill was introduced it was the intention to make two amendments, the most important of which is contained in section 2 of the bill. This amendment provides for having two race meets held, or the race meets of two different associations held on one track. Prior to the war an association held a race meet of seven days on its track. During the war we found it necessary to use some of these race track accommodations, and it was found advisable to have two meets held on one track. It has been found that there is no objection to that. As a matter of fact, many things can be said in favour of it, both by those who favour racing and by those who do not. It is proposed that what has been in the order in council throughout the war should now be placed in the legislation itself.

While that legislation was being prepared, it was proposed to eliminate, or to make it impossible for those who had had a charter under the old situation which existed prior to 1912, to operate. Charters were given under different conditions. A law was passed about that time compelling all those who wanted to have a charter for racing to have legislation either federal or provincial. It was thought that we might eliminate from pari-mutuels all those who had been organized for the purpose of having trotting and pacing races. But it has been represented to me by hon. members from both sides of the house that only one organization is affected by it, that some hardship would be created so far as it is concerned, and that no particular good would be done by bringing about a change at this time.

Therefore, when we are in committee I intend to move an amendment to remove the words "other than an association empowered by its charter to conduct only trotting and pacing races or to maintain and operate a driving park." Those words having been asked to be eliminated, the section will be in exactly the same position as it was before, with the exception of three words in line 6 near the top of page 2, which are only to clarify the meaning. No change is brought about by them.

Therefore the important change is in section 2, which makes it possible for two associations to hold a race meet at one park.

Mr. FLEMING: In view of the amendment suggested by the Minister of Agriculture, it seems to me there can be no objection to the principle of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Betting, pool-selling and bookmaking.

Mr. GARDINER: My colleague will move the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

That the words "other than an association empowered by its charter to conduct only trotting and pacing races or to maintain and operate a driving park" as they appear in lines 25, 26 and 27 be stricken out.

Mr. HAZEN: If section 1 is amended, will it permit the operation of pari-mutuels at harness races?

Mr. GARDINER: This will permit the operation of pari-mutuels at running races run on a track operated by an association organized before 1912 for the purpose of having trotting or pacing races. Pari-mutuels would be operated in connection with running races run on those tracks.

Mr. HAZEN: Does this amendment affect the operation of pari-mutuels in connection with harness races on tracks in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it does not affect them. If this amendment is made, it does not affect the operation of pari-mutuels on any tracks whatsoever. They operate in the same way as they do now.

FEEDING STUFFS ACT

BAGGING OR PACKAGING OF WHOLE GRAINS AT STANDARD CONTENT WEIGHTS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of bill No. 64, to amend the Feeding Stuffs Act, 1937.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister explain?

Mr. GARDINER: The bill is for the purpose of providing some protection largely, I think, for dealers. It has been the custom in the past to sell feed in 98-pound bags, 96-pound bags and 100-pound bags, and difficulty has arisen largely in the province of Quebec because the practice has been to sell simply at so much per bag, without specifying whether it is a 96-pound, 98-pound or 100-pound bag. The amendment is to compel the weight to be put on all bags.

There is also a provision in regard to vitamins which I think we can best discuss when the bill is in committee.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the analysis of the feed content be put on the bag as well as the weight?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that is provided for under the general legislation. This bill has to do with the weight of the bag.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Exemptions.

Mr. SENN: Does this apply to all kinds of feed stuffs?

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment substitutes a new section 3, and subsection 1 of the new section 3 provides that "subject to subsection 2 of this section" the act shall not apply to those mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Subsection 2 of the new section 3 provides:

Such hulled oats, hulled barley, cracked Indian corn and the whole seeds or grains of cultivated farm crops as are intended for consumption by live stock shall be deemed to be feeding stuff and subject to the regulatory powers provided by section fourteen of this act.

I have an amendment which I will ask my colleague to move to strike out the words "and subject to the regulatory powers provided by section fourteen of this act" and substitute therefor the words "for the purposes of section fourteen of this act," so that subsection 2 will then read:

Such hulled oats, hulled barley, cracked Indian corn and the whole seeds or grains of cultivated farm crops as are intended for consumption by live stock shall be deemed to be feed stuff for the purposes of section fourteen of this act.

Section 2 amends section 14 of the present act by adding immediately after paragraph (d) thereof the following paragraph:

(dd) prescribing and limiting the vitamin claims that may be made for any feeding stuff or any ingredients or constituents thereof.

Mr. SENN: Many farmers go to a mill grinding this class of goods, and they take their own bags and buy a ton of a certain kind of feed stuff. In a case of that kind does this section compel the weight to be put on the bag?

Mr. GARDINER: The exemptions are shown in subsection 1 of the new section 3, which says that this act shall not apply to:

(a) whole hays, straws, corn stover and silage when unmixed with any other material;
(b) hulled oats, hulled barley, cracked Indian corn and the whole seeds or grains of cultivated farm crops;
(c) feeding stuff prepared in accordance with a prescription provided and signed by the purchaser for consumption or processing by such purchaser;
(d) feeding stuff for export from Canada and so labelled;
(e) feeding stuffs sold by the individual grower thereof.

The act does not apply to them. I shall ask my colleague to move the amendment I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the farmer who is making up this feed on his own farm have to comply with these regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: A farmer selling to another on the farm would not be affected by this.

Mr. BRYCE: That is the point I wanted made clear. It is only when the feed stuff goes into the commercial market?

Mr. GARDINER: That is it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations.

Mr. SENN: Is this just to protect the buyer with respect to the vitamin content?

Mr. GARDINER: Present vitamin regulations apply only to articles which are primarily vitamin A and D supplements, those vitamins supplied by cod liver or other feeding oils. There is a need and demand to regulate other vitamin products, and also to limit vitamin claims to those vitamins and potencies which feeding authorities recognize as necessary supplements to ordinary rations. There is a growing tendency to market multiple vitamin products under claims which are misleading to the average feeder, inasmuch as some of the vitamins claimed are adequately supplied without such supplements or the potencies are insufficient to serve the needed purposes. This is to safeguard the farmer who is purchasing against representations which are not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. REID: Is any test made of the cod liver oil and other oils that are put in feeds? I have in mind a case where one party lost one thousand turkeys. I know that the vitamin contents are stated on the sack, but there was nothing to prevent the dealer from using oil that was detrimental and that might affect the lives of poultry. Are precautions taken to protect the buyer in that respect? In addition to putting the vitamin contents on the bag, why not go a step farther and have the ingredients such as cod liver oil and other things that are put in poultry feeds tested before they are put in?

Mr. GARDINER: I know that we had test feeds in connection with the different organizations in the department. This particular section empowers the departrment to make regulations to do the very thing that is suggested, prescribing and limiting the vitamin claims that can be made for any feeding stuff or any ingredients or constituents thereof. I would assume, in order to enforce a regulation of that kind, there would have to be means of making tests if complaints were made.

Mr. SENN: I was going to raise the same point which was raised by the hon. member for New Westminster. It seems to me that this will be a most difficult thing to regulate. The time it will be done in most cases will be after the wrong type of feed has been given to poultry, and before any action is taken. Is any penalty attached to misleading information?

Mr. GARDINER: The penalties are in the act. I am not sure what they are, but penalties will apply to this section along with all other sections. There will be difficulty, of course, in enforcing a regulation of this kind, and it is just possible that in most cases someone will lose turkeys or chickens before a complaint is made and an investigation held. But it will prevent any repetition after that.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT ACT, 1942—REGULATIONS GIVEN STATUTORY EFFECT

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of bill No. 54, to amend the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister going to explain the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL: I really do not think any explanation is needed apart from the explanation I made on the first reading of the bill. In 1942 an act was passed dealing with the reinstatement of men in the armed forces. I think the house will appreciate that at that time this was more or less a virgin field. In the last war there was no legislation of that description, and the act was drafted in the light of the limited experience we had at that time. I remember that I played some part in the drafting of that measure.

In the light of practical experience a number of orders in council were passed under the War Measures Act. That is, as difficulties arose and interpretations were necessary to broaden the act, they were embodied in orders in council passed under the War Measures Act; and all that this does is to give statutory authority to those regulations under the War Measures Act, because we shall need them, we expect, at the time when bill No. 15 expires.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act was passed, as the minister has said, in 1942. It was passed after careful consideration by a special committee of the house, and I think that in practice it has worked out very well. I agree with what the minister said on the first reading of the bill to the effect that employers had shown great willingness to comply with the spirit of the act and that generally speaking, the act had been very successful. The bill under consideration this evening is to amend that act and bring it up to date. Apparently in the years which have intervened since the act was passed it has been found that corrections were needed; and, as the explanatory note points out, these corrections, which were made by order in council are now to be incorporated in the act. On page 2 of the bill will be found these words in one of the orders in council:

> That it is therefore, by reason of the war, deemed necessary, for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada, to make regulations defining the rights of persons to reinstatement in civil employment pending reconsideration of the said act by parliament.

Those last few words are the ones I want to emphasize: "pending reconsideration of the said act by parliament." This is what was done: changes were made by order in council. They were called regulations, but in effect they were changes in the act; and now I suggest to the minister that these changes should be written right into the act—

Mr. MITCHELL: In effect that is what this does.

Mr. GREEN: —whereas this bill simply takes four orders in council and makes them schedules to the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the same thing.

Mr. GREEN: It does not sort out the parts of the regulations which should be written into the act. It just takes the four orders in council holus-bolus, calls them the schedule to the act, and that is all there is to it.

This is the first time, to my knowledge, that legislation has been brought in to put orders in council into statutory form. I assume there will be other instances, both during this present session and in the sessions immediately ahead, and I think it is important that we get started in the right way. I suggest to the ministry that the practice should be to take out of the orders in council those portions which should be in the acts, and leave as regulations those parts which are really regulations. But that is not what is done here. It is particularly important that all legislation having to do with men who have served in the forces be clearly set out, so that there can be no misunderstanding of the rights of those men who have stood between us and our enemies, who have saved this country. If this bill passes in its present form their rights will not be clearly defined, because there is apt to be a conflict between the act and the regulations.

Take the soldier who reads the act. If this bill is passed in its present form, the man who goes to the act to see what his rights are, when he reads the act, will think it defines his rights. But in fact many of the most important rights which have been given to him are set out in the schedule. In other words, they were in the orders in council, and now, in the way this bill is drawn, they will have to be dug up out of the schedule. I would ask the ministry to look at these orders in council and see some of the examples. For example, on page 2 we find that section 3 of the regulations in that particular order in council reads:

For the purposes of the act and these regulations,.....

Then it goes on to make certain definitions. Section 6 deals with what shall be done where an employer operates a business in several different establishments: it is an important provision; yet it will be in the schedule and not in the original act. In section 7 of the order in council, to be found at the foot of page 3 of the bill, we find provisions for making application for reinstatement. In the bottom line the following appears:

And, notwithstanding section 4 of the act, it is not a defence in proceedings for violation of section 3 of the act for the employer to prove facts described by paragraph (b) of section 4 of the act unless he also proves that the employee applied for reinstatement before he offered reinstatement to him.

That contradicts part of the original act and it should be written into the act.

Mr MITCHELL: Look at the last section of the order in council.

Mr. GREEN: I will read that. It is the worst feature of all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is the best.

Mr. GREEN: Paragraph 8 of the order in council covers application to a reinstatement officer for assistance, and we find at the bottom of page 4 another provision which protects the veteran. It takes away one of the defences given to the employer under the original act. Section 10 should also be set out in the act. It provides:

Proof, for the purposes of paragraph (e) of section 4 of the act, that an applicant was employed to take the place of an employee who had been previously accepted for service in His Majesty's forces may only be made by proving that the applicant was employed directly or indirectly to take the place of the other employee and would not have been employed if the other employee had not left the employment.

Section 11 is an important one that should be in the act. It relates to rate of remuneration on reinstatement and also provides for permanent status and seniority of the employee. Section 12 of this order in council provides for vacations with pay, another important feature that should be in the act.

I will not cite other instances, but there are two or three more to be found in the order in council. The order in council concludes with paragraph 17:

Where there is any conflict between the provisions of the act and the provisions of these regulations, the regulations prevail.

All other legislation that I know of provides that the provisions of the act shall prevail over the regulations, but here we have a provision that the regulations shall prevail over the act. That was quite proper when the order in council was originally passed, because in effect it was passed as a statute under the War Measures Act. I am not quarrelling with its being there in an order in council under the War Measures Act, but I suggest that most of the provisions should really be part of the act and should be put into the act, leaving anything else as a schedule or more properly as regulations. Actually, this is careless draftsmanship on the part of somebody.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say to my hon. friend that the regulations were drafted by a gentleman like himself, a lawyer, not a layman. In any event, I thought that on the second reading we discussed the principle of the bill and not its details.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely that is a principle.

Mr. GREEN: The second order in council, which is made part of the schedule to the bill, obviously contains provisions that should be written right into the definition section of the act itself. It is to extend the act to cover members of the naval, military or air forces of any of the united nations who were employed in Canada prior to September 9, 1939. The other two orders in council, made a part of the schedule, should also be incorporated in the definition section of the act.

I would not want the minister or the house to think I am quarrelling with the act respecting reinstatement in civil employment, or with the provisions that have been passed during the war to improve that act; but I am suggesting, in fairness to the veterans, in fairness to the men who are protected by this act, that the bill should be withdrawn and should be brought back in the form of an amendment to the original act. Not until then shall we have it in proper shape.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), even if it only applies to neatness. We have many orders in council and we have been told—I was going to use the word "threatened", but I will not—shall I say it has been suggested by the minister that many things under his jurisdiction are to be brought in during this session by way of statute. I am quite sure most of us will agree with that. However, I lay this down, and I invite any lawyer in this house to support the position where it is stated in an act which is making a regulation part of a statute that this regulation shall supersede the provisions of the act when the regulation is made a part of the act itself. Let any man in this house with legal training, any man who values his reputation, rise in his place and try to defend that sort of draftsmanship in legislation. I know perfectly well no one will do so.

What we are doing is this. We are passing a statute and saying that such and such is the law. I hear someone opposite saying something. I wish he would speak louder. He is a lawyer and I should like to hear what he is saying. I repeat, what we are doing is passing a statute which says A, B, C, D, and in the same statute we say, "No; it may be E, F, G, or H". That is what we are doing. The minister says he is a great draftsman.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I beg your pardon.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am a humble person.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then permit me to compliment him on being a good draftsman thoroughly in discord with what his people have done in this particular job, because his legal training is sufficient for that. This may be a matter of urgency; I gather it is. Let those people whose business it is to draft laws put them in simple form. Heaven knows, we need them in that form. Let us therefore take just a little time out for the purpose. I think the whole house agrees with the principle and with what is sought to be done. We have here a short act and tremendous schedules, because they are tremendous, comparable with the size of the act itself, and the act means nothing; the schedules mean everything. Let us simplify our procedure, our reading and our difficulties and avoid trouble for us who are lawyers and who have to try to interpret these things that are done by non-legal persons.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I rise to support what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) have said with respect to the manner in which this bill has been brought in. I do not believe there would be any disagreement from any section of this house on the objects of the bill. As the hon. member for Vancouver South said a few moments ago, the urgency of the bill does not mean very much because it is in effect now, having regard to the legislation passed under the War Measures Act. However, that drives or should drive the minister into the position where this bill ought to be overhauled. It is not a question of amendment; it is a question of a complete overhaul of this bill. In my opinion this bill will create a dangerous, a clumsy and an ineffective precedent for this government and this parliament to follow. Particularly is that true at a time when we are passing from order in council legislation to ordinary parliamentary legislation.

I am perfectly serious with respect to this, because if we create this precedent now there is no reason why in the transitional period legislation may not follow the basis and the example that this legislation now sets. I am not referring particularly to the minister in this regard because he has completely exonerated himself from all possible results that may follow from this bill. This is nothing but a lazy man's legislation. As an hon. member said, from the point of view of neatness alone it should be changed, but I shall not put it on that basis. This is nothing short of simply making parliament just an ordinary bookbindery for putting together some orders in council and running them through. That is not good enough. We have to be something more than a bookbindery putting together orders in council.

We hear talk about a veterans' charter. This is nothing more than a scrapbook so far as veterans are concerned. It is making a laughing-stock of veterans' legislation. I do not think this is the kind of legislation that we should pass as the law by which the veterans of this country are to be governed, to say nothing of the employers who are to give them employment when they come back.

The schedules of ordinary legislation usually contain the aftermath of the legislation or some of the regulations and so on that go with it. But here we have the material parts of the bill not in the bill itself but in the schedule. From a reading of the bill it is obvious that it is unsound so far as procedure is concerned, because in three or four places in the bill one finds not only the numbers of the orders in council passed under the War Measures Act but also the name of the clerk of the privy council, if you please. His name is right in the legislation. If that is not an untidy piece of business, to say nothing of the operational parts of the bill, then I think the minister will have to revise his opinion as to what is good legislation.

Before second reading is given and before the bill becomes law which will serve as a precedent—and that is bothering me considerably, particularly at this psychological time, because it might be followed by this government passing a piece of legislation after a piece of legislation where we shall be simply binding up orders in council that have been passed during the war; they will be presented to the house in undigested form and we shall be asked to fill the statute books by simply putting the rubber-stamp of parliament upon orders in council that have been passed under entirely different circumstances—I would ask the minister to consider these objections to the bill. The objects are good; the idea is an excellent one and will have no possible objection from any part of the house. But when there is such unanimity with respect to the objects and the principle of the bill, please do not let us render it ineffective or pass it in a form which is much less than what a good bill deserves. For that reason I ask that this clumsy bill be overhauled and something better put in its place, something that will give effect to what we want to give effect to, namely, the objects of the legislation.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not a lawyer, but I have listened to some of my legal friends to-night. What we need is a bill that the ordinary layman can understand. I have spoken on the floor of this house many times since 1942 in connection with veterans legislation which is to be found in chapter 31, 1942-43, of the statutes of Canada, and is entitled:

An act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces and other designated classes of persons.

There is in this act a section which is most important and interesting. I shall read it. It is section 3, and reads as follows:

It shall be the duty of any employer by whom a person accepted for service in Mis Majesty's forces was employed when accepted for such service, to reinstate him in employment at the termination of his service in such occupation and position as would be consistent with the true intent and purposes of this act and under conditions not less favourable to him—

Remember that.

—than those which would have been applicable to him had he remained in the employment of that employer.

It is impossible to put that into effect because you do not know the individuality of the individual; you do not know what his capabilities are; you do not know how far he would have gone. He might have been general manager of the company if he had stayed there. I want to bring this to the attention of the house. The section continues:

Provided, that the right to reinstatement shall be subject to established rules of seniority in the employer's establishment, with retention of seniority rights during the employee's period of service with His Majesty's forces, or, in an absence of such rules, to preference according to dates of first employment in the employer's service with due consideration to continuity of employment in that service: And provided, further, that for determining the employee's rights to pension or other benefits, service in His Majesty's forces shall be deemed to have been service with the employer.

I am of the opinion that that paragraph of this act is almost impossible of accomplishment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member objecting to that?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not objecting to it. I should like to see them all come back and get better positions than they would have had had they not gone into the forces. I am not a lawyer; but when I picked up the bill which is before us, this scrapbook, as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) called it—that is all it is—I was amazed. There is nothing in it. What we need is a new act that will mean something.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has worked very well.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It may have worked very well, but only because the employers themselves have made it work. It has not worked well because of any acts of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Cheap stuff.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It has no teeth in it. On many occasions I have asked the Minister of Labour why he was not enforcing the act, and he could not tell me. He could not enforce the act; that is all there was to it; there were too many other reasons. As I say, I am not a lawyer, but I think this is the most ridiculous piece of legislation I ever saw, from a layman's point of view. For heaven's sake let us get a new bill.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am afraid this is one time I have to agree with hon. gentlemen to my right. It does not happen often, but I suppose on the law of averages it must occur once in a while. Personally I think this bill is in the wrong place when it is brought up to be discussed in this house. It is important legislation, dealing with a subject matter which has caused considerable ill feeling within the past year. Many sections of the orders in council which are incorporated in the bill have been very difficult to interpret. A moment ago the hon. member for St. Paul's said that the employers made it work. In the section of the country from which I come the employers did not make it work; anything else but, particularly in connection with vacation with pay.

It seems to me this bill is so important that it should have gone to the veterans affairs committee. It is something pertaining absolutely to veterans; and if we are to have a veterans charter administered by one department and one minister, then I believe the subject matter of this bill belongs to the veterans affairs committee at this time, in order that it may be given an overhauling. There are many things wrong with it. I am not going to take time this evening to go into them all, but I would suggest to the minister that this legislation be passed along now to the veterans affairs committee. All during the war we bowed to the emergency and accepted legislation by order in council. Under the Emergency Powers Act the government still has the right to administer by order in council where there is an emergency. No emergency exists at the present time with regard to this legislation. The war is over; the soldiers are coming back. Many of them are having difficulty in getting back the jobs they left when they entered the services. Instead of the Minister of Labour continuing to try to handle this, with the many complex problems with which he has to deal in the field of employment, I believe he should be glad to pass it over to the veterans affairs committee.

I believe the time to legislate by order in council has passed. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South that simply incorporating all these orders in council into this bill and making the schedule the dominant factor in it is the wrong thing to do. I am going to point out just one or two difficulties in connection with the provision concerning vacation with pay; and mind you, these difficulties exist right across the country. For example, during the war thousands of soldiers were on industrial leave. They were taken out of the services for work in coal mines and on farms, and to meet other essential requirements. They may have spent a year or eighteen months in industry before going back to the army to be discharged. Then, when they came back to industry the time they spent in industrial life did not count in connection with vacations with pay. The employer said no, the man was in the service. The army said no, he was on leave without pay. So that there is a good deal of friction in that regard. Only a few days ago the mine, mill and smelter workers' union—

Mr. MITCHELL: You are speaking of industrial leave from the services?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. In spite of the fact that a soldier on leave might have spent approximately eighteen months in a given industry he had to go back to the army to be discharged. Then, when he came back to the industry they told him he was not entitled to a vacation with pay because he had not worked for ninety days since his discharge, overlooking the fact that he had been there for the previous eighteen months. The order in council having to do with vacations with pay still contains that disability, and I should like to see it amended. Then the ninety-day period for vacations with pay is causing difficulty. I know the order in council states that if the employer so desires he may waive the ninety-day period and grant a vacation with pay; but the minister will remember that this subject nearly caused an upheaval in the mines of Nova Scotia, because the employers said they would not grant that vacation with pay if a man did not have the ninety days of service, unless they got a directive from the government. The Department of Labour refused to give a directive, because they said the power was there if the employers wanted to use it. That matter hung in the balance for months, and I believe it requires clarification.

The enforcement of the act with regard to reinstatement in civil employment is another thing that is not working out. The minister knows that when bill No. 5 was first introduced back in 1942, I think it was, the canteen committee worked on it. A provision was written into that bill to the effect that if the employer refused to reinstate a man in the job he held prior to enlistment, without reasonable grounds, it was the prerogative of the department administering that act to see that it was enforced by prosecuting the employer. I have run into cases where the employer did not have reasonable ground and still refused to reinstate his former employee, and I did not have any success in persuading the departmental officials in the centre where I was at that time to take the employer into court and prosecute him. I know boys who went around for months and could not get back into their previous employment. I want to see these difficulties ironed out by the veterans affairs committee. There is no hurry about this matter, and I am suggesting to the minister that this bill should go to that committee, where it can be fixed up.

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it has been very difficult to sit here and disagree with the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Vancouver South. The thing that most commends itself to me in this bill is the marginal notes, and it does not make any difference whether or not they are there.

I must say to the minister that the draftsmanship is slack and a bit inferior. I believe we deserve just a little better than this. We dealt with this bill in the veterans affairs committee last year.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no, you did not.

Mr. CROLL: Yes; we had the officials before us and questioned them on this very bill, and we became quite well versed in it. I think the minister will regret it if the house passes this measure in its present form. It will reflect upon his department. Certainly it is not the kind of legislation dealing with veterans that would come in here from the veterans affairs committee. I think it is unfair to put the minister in this position, even though someone in his department has done so. If the bill is either withdrawn or sent to the veterans affairs committee I believe we shall be doing the department a service. The bill contains a great number of things which have to be cleared up. The legislation has worked very well in some parts of the country, and for that reason the department is a little backward about making changes. They say, "This has worked. Let us see if it will continue to work." I believe the time has come to take another look at it and improve it. I am particularly perturbed about section 17, which seems to appeal to the department. I never saw it before in any act I have ever seen, and I cannot quite understand what it could possibly mean in that particular form. So I am asking the minister if he will reconsider and allow the matter either to stand or to be sent to the veterans affairs committee, where we will deal with it in a kindly way.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Now that the hon. member for Spadina has spoken, I think that makes it almost unanimous that we should not be asked to proceed with this type of legislation this evening. I do not believe it is correct to say that this particular bill was discussed by the committee on veterans affairs last year, but I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South has a good deal of merit, and it seems to me the arguments presented by the Progressive Conservative members have been convincing. I do not think hon. members should be asked to pass this kind of legislation. One of the orders in council was dated January 11, 1945; the next one August 2, 1945; another, November 6, 1945, and the last, April 9, 1946. Surely the minister should not proceed with this type of legislation. If he would agree to refer it to the veterans affairs committee for redrafting, he would be supporting the general objective of the legislation.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I do not intend to cover any of the points which have been covered so effectively thus far, but I should like to state briefly one or two things which have occurred to me.

So far as the form of the legislation is concerned, if parliament gives second reading to the bill in its present form we shall be making ourselves look foolish, not only in the eyes of the people of this country, but in the eyes of other legislatures as well. With the idea that there should be submitted to parliament certain regulations and orders passed under war-time authority, or under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, I think we are all in agreement. In other words, I believe we agree that what has the force of legislation passed under that authority should now be submitted to parliament.

But that is a very different thing from submitting these orders in council to the house, regardless of whether they are in harmony with or in contradiction of the existing statutes, and saying, "You have to take them, holus-bolus." I suggest that in its present form this bill offends every canon of legislation.

Here are the four simple rules which any bill coming before this house should clearly observe. In the first place, a bill should be a unity. In the second place, it ought to be clear in meaning. In the third place, it should be logical in construction. In the fourth place, it should not be contradictory. This bill offends each of these four canons of legislation.

In the first place, it is not a unity. What do we find in the bill? We find that we are to take what really represents five different bills. We have the original enactment of 1942, followed by the long, general regulations, of which there are seventeen in all. Attention has already been drawn to section 17, which states, in effect, that if the regulations and statute are in conflict, so much the worse for the statute.

Following that, we have three other orders in council. I should like the house to take just a minute to observe what these various steps are, in sequence. I have referred, first, to the general order in council consisting of seventeen sections. It will be noted that section 17 in the first group of regulations is not repeated in those which follow. Therefore, in giving effect now, as proposed, to section 17, we are not saying that the three following orders in council, if adopted, override the statute. No, we do not say that. It is only this first one.

Then we come to the next order in council of August 2, 1945, and we find there an amendment of the original act. This is an amendment to the definition section, section 2.

Then we turn to the third order in council of November 6, and find an amendment to the regulations.

Turning to the fourth order in council, we find that it is an amendment to some of the regulations set up in the third order in council. What does it mean? We say in the bill that all of these become law, and that all shall have the effect of a statute, from this time forward. We are legislating a contradiction. We are legislating with respect to this third order in council, and we are saying, "We will give this the force of a statute." Then we come along to the fourth order in council, and say, in the same breath, and under the same enactment, that part of the third order in council has not the force of law because it has been overridden by the fourth.

Is parliament going to put itself in a position of legislating a hodge-podge like that, contradictory within its own terms, anything but clear, illogical and anything but a unity. I suggest that parliament will look foolish if it proceeds to enact legislation in that form. If there ever was a bill which ought to be so clear that he who runs may read, then it should be legislation dealing with the rights of veterans, because the veterans are looking to this measure for their charter rights. Those rights ought to be perfectly clear for any layman to read. This is not the kind of legislation that a citizen should need to take to a lawyer for interpretation; it should be abundantly clear. But we are just going to legislate in a hodge-podge fashion if we pass this.

We have heard a useful suggestion, one which has now been endorsed by several hon. members, namely, that the bill should go to the committee on veterans affairs, and should there be rewritten. All these contradictions and any repetition should be eliminated, so that when the bill comes back, with such improvement as may be worked out in the veterans affairs committee, we shall have a piece of legislation which will be sound, complete and comprehensive, and will be free of the accusations now properly made against it, that it is not clear, that it is illogical, that it is full of contradictions.

I do not offer that in any sense in a scolding spirit. Rather, I urge upon the minister in charge of the bill that in this matter affecting the rights of veterans to reinstatement in civil employment we want to have a clear and comprehensive statute, and we should not pass this legislation in its present deplorable form.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, if I may close the debate—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. MITCHELL: We get the same general suggestion from every speaker.

Mr. BROOKS: If the minister is going to withdraw his bill—

Mr. MITCHELL: I just wish to say this, that I am going to close the debate, withdraw the bill and send it to the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. BROOKS: Then, may I say a word, so far as that committee is concerned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, matters which have come before the veterans affairs committee have been those of principle. It was not my understanding that it had been set up to draft bills.

I think all hon. members are agreed that the principle of this bill is good. The only objection has been as to the draftsmanship. Knowing something about the work still to be done in the veterans affairs committee. I for one feel it should not be asked to redraft this bill. If the house were objecting to the principle of the bill, or if other principles could be set out therein, there might be some justification for sending it to that committee for study. But where it is only a matter of redrafting, where it has already been hashed over, if I may use that expression, I think it is a mistake to ask the already overburdened veterans affairs committee to redraft the bill.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, reports have come to me of instances where the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act has not worked. I am glad the Minister of Labour has recognized the necessity for introducing legislation at this session to bring about the intent of that act. That intent was expressed in these words:

> It shall be the duty of any employer by whom a person accepted for service in His Majesty's forces was employed when accepted for such service, to reinstate him in employment at the termination of his service in such occupation and position as would be consistent with the true intent and purposes of this act and under conditions not less favourable to him than those which would have been applicable to him had he remained in the employment of that employer.

Let me refer the minister to an actual case in the Canadian National Railways shops at Saskatoon. Men who were employed as workers in the shops had made application as early as 1940 to be taken on as firemen. Before being taken on, they enlisted. Now they have come back and they find that workers who did not enlist have gone out as firemen. The men coming back find their seniority almost completely wiped out, and they cannot get seniority except in the old departments in which they were working. It is a technical point and I hope that an amendment will be brought in to cover it. I am not sure that the veterans affairs committee is the place to redraft the bill, but if a bill is prepared that will carry out the original intention I am sure that it will get support in committee.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): A simple layman has been given a going over this evening by the legal profession for bringing before parliament a bill drafted by the legal profession.

Mr. GREEN: We hope it has done you good.

Mr. MITCHELL: It may have too, but nobody knows better than my hon. friends that once you have laid down the basic principles of a law and given it to the legal officers to draft a bill, you have to get a lawyer to interpret it because it is beyond the power of the average layman to do so. But the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and these orders in council have worked successfully, speaking in a broad way. There may be objections to details as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) have pointed out, which might well be the subject of debate. But the fact is that there has been only one prosecution under this legislation and over 95,000 veterans have been reinstated. So that on the law of averages I do not think that is bad batting.

Mr. GREEN: The special committee drafted the original bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; it went before the committee. This has been referred to as lazy man's legislation. I do not altogether agree with that. But I am quite prepared to withdraw the motion for second reading and have the bill sent to the committee. It has been referred to also as a scrap book, and is said to be difficult to interpret, and so on. We have a staff of 300 across this country who advise the returned men of their rights under these orders in council and under the original legislation. The soldier organizations also understand these orders in council, and in addition we have advisers in the selective service offices across this country. But there is no objection, I am sure hon. members, to putting the legislation on a basis where it will be clearly understood by the people whom it is designed to benefit.

Something has been said about seniority. Probably no one knows better than the hon. member for Cape Breton South how difficult a thing that is to deal with. The average worker puts seniority in a trade union agreement ahead of wages itself. In dealing with the men who work on the railways, there has been consultation with railroad unions, also with employers and the men affected, who are represented by one of our officials. Where there has been a trade union organization and collective bargaining between the employee and the employer the application of the orders in council and the act itself have been more satisfactory than where there is no such organization. My hon. friend knows that when you are dealing with an employer who gives no seniority rights to his employees it is more difficult to get the justice we think is due to the men.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if the committee consider that this bill should be consolidated and brought before the committee I am quite prepared to agree to that.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Leader of the House): I think, Mr. Speaker, the proper motion would be, and I move accordingly:

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the select committee on veterans affairs with instructions that they shall consider the same and report thereon to the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT ACT AMENDMENT

REPEAL OF SECTIONS 5 AND 6—EXPORT OF WILDFOWL

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of bill No. 14, to amend the Export Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to eliminate certain overlapping with the Game Export Act and to assist the administration of provincial game regulations. Sections 5 and 6 of the Export Act, which this bill seeks to repeal, prohibit:

The export in the carcass, or parts thereof, of (a) deer, except as authorized by regulation of the governor in council made under the authority of the Customs Act; and (b) wild turkeys, quail, partridge, prairie fowl and woodcock.

It is contrary to law in the United States to import game which is illegally exported from Canada, and the United States and state authorities enforce this law.

Under the Export Game Act a visiting sportsman may come into Canada and shoot woodcock, wild turkey, or prairie fowl under a permit issued by the province, but on returning to his home in the United States he will find that he cannot import into that country the game which he legally shot in Canada. We had a case which illustrates the point very clearly. The chief game warden of New Brunswick was endeavouring last year to make arrangements with United States authorities so that United States sportsmen who lawfully killed woodcock in New Brunswick might take their birds home with them. We were obliged to point out to him, when he referred the matter to us, that sections 5 and 6 of the Export Act prohibit all export of woodcock from Canada. In consequence, these tourists who came in for the particular purpose of shooting this kind of game in Canada found that the game which they had legally shot they were prohibited from taking home with them. Provincial authorities have found themselves in a similar position in that game legally shot in one province could not be taken into another province, but they now have provincial acts whereby under permit a person may legally shoot game and legally take it out of the province to his home.

The whole purpose of this bill is to eliminate sections 5 and 6 of the Export Act. The whole matter has been before the dominion wildlife officials, who have pointed out the difficulty, and they say that the Export Game Act now covers all that is required and that sections 5 anl 6 of the Export Act are therefore redundant and operate as a hardship against visiting tourists and sportsmen who may wish to take the game they shoot out of the country.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to say just a word to express my full approval of what is here being done. I would like the minister to tell me, though, where any wild turkeys are to be found in the Dominion of Canada. It may be that what is so referred to is the sandhill crane. Wild turkeys on this continent are not found north of the Mason and Dixon line. So that is another reason why we should eliminate this "export" of "wild turkeys" from Canada.

What I have in mind, and what the minister has said in this connection is so true, is that in certain parts of western Canada we have enjoyed the visits of United States sportsmen, particularly in our pheasant areas, areas largely confined to irrigation districts until a few years ago. The increase in number of these birds, brought in by a few private people, of whom fortunately I was one, reads like a romance of wild life; and I am happy to know that this stupid provision will not now hinder our friends from coming and taking home with them their game. We used to be able to do so if we plucked them. I do not know whether some disease was the occasion for that provision, but it all seemed to be stupid.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice that it says in the Export Act:

5. The export in the carcass, or parts thereof, of (a) deer.

It does not mention moose or cariboo or any other wild animals. In the interpretation of "deer", are moose and caribou included?

Mr. GLEN: In the interpretation section of the Game Export Act:

(b) "game" means the carcass or any part of the carcass, including the skin, of any wild animal, domestically raised fur-bearing animal, wild fowl or wild bird.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why would it not be put in the bill? The same would apply to a bear.

Mr. GLEN: I am not speaking now of the Game Export Act, which is now the law. We are dealing with the Export Act, not the Game Export Act. We are eliminating from the Export Act provisions which are redundant and which conflict with the Game Export Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: I quite agree, but does the act prohibit the exportation of bear or moose?

Mr. GLEN: Except under licence by the provincial authorities. Section 3 of the Game Export Act provides:

3. No person shall knowingly,

(a) take, carry, send, ship, or have in possession for the purpose of taking, carrying, sending or shipping or receive for shipment or transmission beyond the limits of the province within which such game was killed any game except under the authority of an export permit duly issued under the laws of such province;

(b) except as in this act otherwise provided, have in possession, within Canada beyond the limits of the province within which such game was killed, any game not the subject of an export permit issued as aforesaid.

Mr. BROOKS: Should that not be repealed too?

Mr. GLEN: We have not considered that. The migratory birds officials, thought these actions should be eliminated, and we are dealing with it only as far as the Export Act is concerned, not the Game Export Act. That can be a matter of discussion later.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There are no migratory birds in here at all. We had a prohibition against the export of certain migratory birds and animals, and we are merely getting rid of that.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Those not mentioned there we really are not concerned with?

Mr. GLEN: We are not concerned with them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The prairie fowl,—whatever they are: I have never heard of them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister any idea what quantity it is anticipated would be taken across the border? Also, will he tell us if this measure is reciprocal; is there a similar act in the United States legislation which allows game shot in the United States to be brought back to Canada?

Mr. GLEN: I have no knowledge of any such act as far as the United States is concerned. We are now regulated by the Game Export Act, which is the law in Canada, passed in 1941, which gives provincial authorities the power to issue permits for the killing of game and the taking of game into the different provinces.

QUARTZ MINING

CLAIM STAKING PRIVILEGES—GROUPING OF CLAIMS —NON-FORFEITURE OF CLAIMS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of bill No. 61, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Persons who may enter and locate and lands subject to entry and location.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister make a statement on this section?

Mr. GLEN: This bill has been submitted at the request of those who have been dealing with mining in the Yukon. It has been the subject of a good deal of discussion, and I am glad to say that I have had the privilege of having the hon. member for Yukon deal with this matter, because he knows more about these matters than, probably any other person in the house. He has made representations to me coming from the miners of Yukon and from those who are interested in mining, that it is necessary that this should be done in order to protect as far as possible the rights of miners who are now going in.

In consequence of the activities which are now taking place in Yukon and elsewhere, it was felt that the provisions of this bill would render to those miners who are going in prospecting and endeavouring to locate claims a protection of their operations. The idea of the bill is this. Formerly under this act one could only have the right to have mineral claims to a certain number. These may now be increased in number and the owners of these properties will have the right to consolidate their claims. For instance, subsection 2 and 3 provide:

(2) Subject to section forty-five of this act during any period of twelve months no person shall be entitled to locate, whether personally, as attorney for another or by an attorney, more than seven mineral claims in the aggregate within a distance of ten miles from any other mineral claim (making a total of eight mineral claims) located by him personally, as attorney or by attorney, during that period.

(3) Every power of attorney authorizing a person to enter, locate, prospect or mine pursuant to subsection one of this section shall be filed with the mining recorder before the entering, locating, prospecting or mining is undertaken.

The idea is that where formerly a man made a claim he could stake only three claims within twenty days. In the meantime, when he had located the claims and had induced other prospectors to come in there, they might file adjoining claims, with the consequence that he might be deprived of all the effort and expense to which he had been put in making the original discovery. The bill gives him the right to have eight claims registered in his own name, by himself or by attorney. The matter has been carefully considered, and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has been extremely helpful in conveying the wishes of the people in the north with regard to the staking of claims. I am satisfied that this is a proper provision to be made for the benefit of all parties concerned.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I may add a word or two to what the minister has said. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act is the legislation under which lode or hard-rock mining is done in Yukon. The act was first passed as it is now, with one slight amendment, as chapter 74 of the acts of parliament of 1924. I was member for Yukon at that time, and after consulting with the miners of Yukon I drafted an act, submitted it to the then Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Charles Stewart, in whose department Yukon was administered, who in turn submitted it to his law officers. The act was drawn, submitted to the house and then to a special committee, was finally adopted, and has been the law in Yukon since 1924. It has proved very satisfactory; but as mining is developed up there, changing to some extent from mining of placer gold to lode gold mining, it has been found that certain amendments are required and they have been clearly explained by the minister.

The main object of the bill is to allow the prospector or miner to stake a group of eight claims. As the law now stands, he can stake only one in his own name and two under powers of attorney, and these powers of attorney must be accompanied by sworn evidence that the persons giving the powers of attorney have made it possible for that miner to go on that trip. Had it not been that the mining recorders and officials of Yukon had interpreted that clause generously, few claims would have been staked under it. This will eliminate any difficulties in that respect, inasmuch as it will allow a man to stake a group of claims sufficiently large to attract capital to its development. The other sections are equally important and will be dealt with section by section, I expect, in the committee. On some of these I may have something to say.

Sections 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

PLACER MINING

NON-FORFEITURE OF CLAIMS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL—SMUGGLING

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of bill No. 62, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Non-forfeiture of claims of service personnel.

Mr. GLEN: This section is added, as the explanatory note indicates, for the purpose of protecting the rights of soldiers who had claims and to ensure that such claims would not be forfeited by reason of time spent in the service or for one year thereafter.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Export of gold without payment of royalty.

Mr. GLEN: This provision is inserted really at the request of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They have found that transportation being so easily available, there being so many routes by which a person may leave the territory and go outside, there is a consequent smuggling of gold. They wish, therefore, to have these provisions in order that they may more effectively control the situation and, where necessary, prosecute those who are smuggling gold out of the country without paying royalties. Apparently there have been several cases which the mounted police have investigated and, as I say, they desire these provisions the more effectively to control the situation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the minister satisfied that $250 is an adequate fine?

Mr. GLEN: We thought it would be sufficient.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It does not have to be a placer miner?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He might be smuggling gold for half a dozen placer miners. It seems to me that $250 is small and that there should be an option to impose a heavier fine if the judge sees fit.

Mr. HARKNESS: Subsection 4 provides that where any peace officer has reason to suspect that any person has committed or is about to commit an offence described in section 83 he may without warrant search him or any of his belongings. Surely that is giving a large amount of power to a police officer. If he suspects that a man is about to commit an offence he can search him or his belongings without a search warrant. Is there any strong justification for retaining that section, particularly this part of it which states that he is about to commit an offence?

Mr. GLEN: One must take into consideration the place where these offences are likely to be committed. A good deal would depend on the observation of an officer who sees something which he knows is contrary to the usual practice. If he does not have that power in order to make the search, then I am afraid that he would lose the opportunity quickly if he did not act immediately and expeditiously in doing it. I do not think there is anything unusual in such a section. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are anxious that it should go in.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with the hon. member for Calgary East. I do not think this parliament should ever pass sections like subsection 4 except in narcotic cases. It seems to me that we have to permit such high-handed procedure by police officers in such matters. My suggestion to the minister is that he should eliminate section 4. He should increase his penalties in subsection 1. In other words, let us have a strong deterrent, but let us not extend the position which existed in legislation during war time. Of necessity that kind of legislation exists in war time. But let us not permit a mounted policeman or any other peace officer the right to go—without penalty against him—and search people's belongings, clothing and houses. The penalty provided in subsection 1 is a term not exceeding three months' imprisonment and fine of $250. My thought is that if you made that a fine of $1,000 minimum and a period in gaol of three years, and in default—that is optional with the court—of payment of the fine imprisonment for at least two years you will accomplish everything you are seeking to accomplish here; in fact you will accomplish it much better than you will in this way.

In his explanatory notes the minister has said that these things are necessary because there are now more ways of leaving Yukon than there were in the old days. I appreciate that; but we shall never have enough mounted policemen in Yukon, having regard to the different and new methods of travel, to search everybody who comes out. What happens? I gather that this is high-grading. An organization which is mining finds that it is short of some raw gold. They can fairly well confine that, having regard to the circumstances, and they usually give the police a lead. Warrants are now to be found in Yukon much more easily than in the old days. There are more places where you can find them than you could heretofore. My serious suggestion to the minister is that he should increase his penalties. I do not think they are nearly large enough, having regard to the conditions under which mines operate in that country. He should increase the penalties to the point of severity, but he should eliminate adding one more place where a peace officer, even though he be a mounted policeman, can search a person, his boat, his motor car, his aeroplane, his home or even his clothing, and even his friends; I imagine they are covered. The peace officer may even take that kind of action without a warrant.

A warrant can be obtained only on the ground that some person pledges his oath that he has reason to believe that an offence has been or is going to be committed. If the magistrate so wishes he may put that person on oath and ask him the grounds for his belief. That is normal, ordinary procedure. With great respect I am going to suggest to the minister that he reconsider this section.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I quite agree with the hon. member for Calgary West, and with all due respect to the minister, that the penalties provided by section 83A should be increased. As I see it, a fine not exceeding $250 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or a sentence to both such fine and such imprisonment is altogether too light to create any fear in wrongdoers, thieves or high-graders.

I must say that I do not agree with the hon. member for Calgary West or with others who object to subsection 4 because, having lived all my life in Yukon and having seen the Royal Canadian Mounted Police up there, I know that no innocent person will be inconvenienced by them, and the baggage of no one will be searched unless the police have good reason to suspect that it has high-grade gold or stolen material in it. So far as I am concerned I should like to see the subsection stand as it is drafted, but I would suggest to the minister that the penalty for high-grading or theft of gold or export of gold without a proper permit should be increased.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot sit in this committee and allow this section to pass without taking objection to it. It is a principle of our law that every person who is accused of an offence is presumed innocent until proved guilty. Under this section a person does not have to be accused of an offence before the mounted police can, if they suspect that he is about to commit an offence, proceed against him.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No; they may search him.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, proceed against him and search him. The section reads:

> Where any peace officer has reason to suspect that any person has committed or is about to commit an offence . . .

A peace officer is no wiser than any other person. How he can form a judgment as to whether or not a person is about to commit an offence, or suspects that a person is about to commit an offence, is more than I can understand. Legislation of this kind should not be passed by this committee.

The minister said that we must take into consideration the place where the offence is committed. Well, this place is Yukon territory. In Yukon territory there are places like Dawson city, which is a town of some size, where there are police officers and where I suppose there is a form of municipal government. Why should the police of Dawson city be permitted, because they suspect a person is about to commit an offence, to take any action against that person under the principles of the law under which we live in this country? As I say, I cannot let this section pass without protesting against it. It should be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. COCKERAM: How does this section compare with similar sections in provincial acts?

Mr. GLEN: In this matter we are dealing not with the question of high-grading but with the question of royalties which should be paid. As I said before, conditions are such that any person leaving would be doing so with such expedition that the officer would be unable to obtain a warrant in time to seize the gold and exact the royalty due upon it. I agree with the hon. member for Yukon that subsection 4 should be retained. I have no doubt that any officer dealing with these matters, having some idea and knowledge of what was happening, would have direct evidence in his own mind that such a thing was being done; and if he did not take action immediately he would not be able to catch the person he suspected. As far as the penalty is concerned there seems to be a disposition to regard it as too lenient. The hon. member for Calgary West suggests a rather extreme penalty of $1,000 and a term not exceeding three years, or to both such fine and imprisonment. I would be willing to have an amendment moved to that effect, provided that upon summary conviction a person would be liable to a fine of not more than $1,000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, if my colleague would move it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Will that amendment be to paragraph (f) of section 1?

Mr. GLEN: That is in section 2 of the bill, subsection 1; the words "two hundred and fifty" in line 22 to be deleted and the words "one thousand" substituted therefor; and in lines 24 and 25 the words "three months" to be deleted and the words "three years" to be substituted therefor.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The committee has heard the amendment read by the minister. Shall section 2 carry as amended?

Mr. HAZEN: No. I should like to ask the minister this question. Is the export of gold without paying a royalty a tremendously serious offence? Is it any more serious than many of the offences which are now dealt with in our criminal code and for which the penalty is very much less? How do this offence and this penalty compare with many of the provisions in the criminal code having to do with the same matters?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With all due respect to the hon. member for St. John-Albert, I think the criminal code would be improved by making those penalties much more stringent than they are now. They are too light. They do not create any fear on the part of criminals. Even with the proposed amendment, increasing the maximum fine to $1,000, a convicting magistrate or judge may make the fine not more than $10 if he wishes, depending upon the circumstances of the case. Because we say "not to exceed one thousand dollars," that does not mean in every case the person convicted will be fined that amount, or that he will be imprisoned for three years. He may get only three months, within the judgment of the convicting magistrate or judge.

As to its being a crime to take gold out of Yukon without paying the royalty, in old times when gold was exported almost entirely in its natural state, that is in the form of gold dust or nuggets, it was very easy to steal gold. At that time the mounted police had not only male searchers but female searchers to search women passengers. Before a person was allowed to leave Yukon he or she was searched for gold, if they had any reason to suspect that he or she would be taking out that gold. Even within the past two years gold was stolen in its natural state from one of the big dredging machines up there. They noticed that a theft had been committed, and also that a couple of members of the crew had quit within a short time. So the police met these men at the airport when they were about to board a plane and made them open up their grips; and there was the gold dust. They did not wait for a warrant to do that; if they had done so the men would have been out of the territory and into the United States. I think the subsection should remain just as it is. To-day the great bulk of gold shipped from Yukon goes through the banks and is sent out in gold bricks, of a value not less than $10,000 each. It is almost impossible to steal those; they are too bulky and thieves cannot get away with them. But in the natural form of gold dust and nuggets it is easy enough to steal and conceal, so that I think the penalty should be severe, and I belive the police officers should be given a free hand to discover and search any thieves.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Yukon. It is important that we realize that laws which are necessary for a city like Calgary or Saint John are not applicable to these northern areas. We must recognize that one who seeks to evade his responsibility in the payment of royalties is trying to cheat his fellow citizens, and all this section asks is:

> Where any police officer has reason to suspect that any person has committed or is about to commit an offence . . . or has in his possession or in his belongings any gold in respect of which the royalty . . . has not been paid, such police officer may without warrant search such person and his belongings. . . .

If that provision is not made, as the hon. member for Yukon points out, a person may be out of the country by plane within a very short time. Most of us have our baggage examined for customs purposes whenever we cross the international boundary, and we do not particularly object. If the individual has no gold that he is trying to take out of the country without paying the royalty, no serious damage will be done. So that I think the hon. member for Yukon is quite right in urging that this section should be retained in its present form.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In listening to this debate, one would think gold is one of our most precious metals. Actually I believe it is one of the least important at this time. If we are to live up to the Bretton Woods agreement, which we talked about so much, we should not be so worried about gold just now. However, I rose to say that I am opposed to any increase in the penalty in subsection 2; and as far as that is concerned I am entirely opposed to subsection 4. After all, we are dealing with human beings, whether they are in gold mining areas or anywhere else, and here we are giving police officers the right to go through a person's belongings. It will be noted that in the second last line it says, "and any articles believed to be his belongings." They do not even have to know for sure that the belongings are those of the person they are searching; they may search the belongings of other people. I believe this is placing too much power in the hands of the police, and I want to record my objection to both subsections.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wonder if we could get together on this. I have a suggestion to make with respect to subsection 4.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if we could clear up section 2. Shall subsection 1, of section 2 carry as amended? Then we can go on.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you not think they are definitely related, sir?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Go ahead.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No; they have nothing to do with each other.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): My hon. friend says they have nothing to do with each other, but surely what we are trying to do here is to prevent crime or, once we find it, to punish it. The deterrents which I suggested to the minister, and which he adopted, in exacting greater penalties under subsection 2, were as a deterrent to the crime itself.

With respect to subsection 4, we find the words:

> Where any peace officer has reason to suspect that any person has committed or is about to commit an offence . . .

I wonder if we cannot arrive somewhere by adding the word "sufficient" before the word "reason", and then eliminating the words "or is about to commit". I have had occasion to say before in the house that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are a very fine force of men. But we all know that you cannot have four or five thousand men—and I think their numbers must be about that by this time—and have them all saints. It seems to me the wishes of the minister would be met by adding the word "sufficient". He would meet those cases where it is suggested that someone has heard a person has done something and escaped by aeroplane. Then such a person may have been picked up at the end of his journey, a search made, and the person taken from the aeroplane. In that instance the officer would have sufficient reason for believing that an offence had been committed.

In connection with a failure to pay royalties on gold, how can it be said that we suspect a person is about to commit an offence? The offence is the removal of gold from Yukon territory.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Not necessarily; in most instances it is stolen gold.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): High-grading, if you like.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No, not high-grading.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect to the hon. member for Yukon may I say that this does not deal with theft; rather it is a matter of failing to pay royalties. I am accepting the minister's word for that, because that is what he said only a minute ago. How can it be said a person is about to remove gold? If that is all, how can a search help? If a man has gold in his pocket or his pouch—and perhaps the hon. member for Yukon is thinking of that night on the marge of lake Labarge they cremated Sam McGee—

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): That is just rubbish.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But delightful rubbish, by the way.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): And you do not entertain the committee with it, one bit.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It would assist an officer in finding someone who is about to commit an offence.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With all due respect, I cannot see why members should be so filled with fear that some crook is going to be inconvenienced—and that is all it means. If a person has not stolen gold, or has not gold on his body or on his person, he will not be inconvenienced by the officers. One hon. member mentioned that when one crosses the boundary the customs officers search the baggage. I have seen them search their persons. The suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary West would make it even more drastic than it is now. I am all for subsection 4 as it is.

Mr. HARKNESS: I suggest to the minister that the words "or is about to commit" be deleted. The hon. member for Yukon has referred to the searching of baggage by customs officers, but I would point out that that is a different matter altogether. They lay open the bags and take a cursory look, but that is a different matter altogether from permitting police officers to have power to search one's person or belongings, simply because there has been a suspicion that someone may be going to commit an offence. It is bad enough to give power to a police officer to make a search when he has good reason to suspect that an offence has been committed. This section will allow such officers to search anyone at any time in Yukon.

Mr. GLEN: The words in the section are:

Where any peace officer has reason to suspect that any person has committed or is about to commit an offence.

He does not commit the offence until he is actually outside the territory and evading the payment of royalty. If we eliminate from the section the words "or is about to commit" we take the teeth from it. What would happen would be that a peace officer would know about a man who is about to commit an offence, namely, of his intention to leave the territory in a hurry, by aeroplane, train or team—

Mr. MacNICOL: Or boat.

Mr. GLEN: Unless the man is searched at that time, the man will have left the territory; the offence will have been committed and the officer left in a position where he could do nothing. If those words were taken out the section would not be effective.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie) agreed to.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARIES IN RESPECT OF CERTAIN SMALL AREAS

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of bill No. 63, respecting the boundaries of certain national parks.

[Mr. G. Black.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, as this bill, if enacted, will divest the crown of certain areas of land in certain national parks, title to which is at present in the crown. The governor general has been informed in respect thereto, and has given his consent to consideration of the bill.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Should that not have been done before? Is this the proper time to indicate the assent of the crown to this legislation?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, and I am informed that it is. This is the time that that should be done, namely before the question is put on second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: With great deference to the minister I should think it is a strange procedure if the parliament of Canada can get as far as second reading before obtaining the consent of the governor general, and acquainting the house with that fact. I think something must be wrong, somewhere. It is certainly new to me; I never heard of this procedure before.

Mr. GLEN: I think the hon. member for Peel has in mind a resolution involving a payment of money, in respect of which it should be indicated that His Excellency the Governor General has given consent. But that is not this case. This is not dealing with a question of money but divesting the crown of parts of areas in the parks, and I am instructed by the law officers that that statement should be made before the motion is put.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GLEN: I should explain to the committee that although Banff park is described by metes and bounds in the National Parks Act, the boundaries of Banff park were not surveyed until 1940 when on instructions from the surveyor general a survey was made and boundary posts set up. Following the survey, an official map of the park was prepared.

This map was approved and signed on behalf of the Dominion of Canada by the Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, under authority of an order of His Excellency the Governor in Council and on behalf of the province of Alberta by the Hon. N. E. Tanner, Minister of Lands and Mines. An original signed copy of the said map was filed in the land titles office for the South Alberta land registration district of Calgary on the 18th April, 1941.

Two small parcels of land not formerly in the park are included within the boundaries of the park, as set out in schedule A. One parcel containing approximately 210 acres was acquired as a site for the eastern gateway. The other parcel comprising one-sixth square mile due to an adjustment of the boundary made on the survey of the park is added with the approval of the province. Total area added is approximately one-half square mile.

The total area of the park as described in schedule A is 2,585 square miles more or less.

Then as to Kootenay Park, the original agreement known as the Banff-Windermere road agreement which was approved by the dominion government by orders in council dated the 14th and 20th March, 1919, and ratified by an Act of the provincial legislature known as the Banff-Windermere Road Agreement Ratification Act, being chapter 5, British Columbia statutes, 1919, contained the following provision:

(4) The said province will grant to the dominion government a strip of land along the said Banff-Windermere road as laid out and completed to an approximate width of five (5) miles on each side thereof; provided always that, as far as possible, the crests of the mountains shall constitute the outside boundaries of the said area.

Kootenay park as established by order in council, P.C. 827, in 1920 included the area granted by the province of British Columbia.

A small part of the park unsuitable for park purposes was removed from the park area by order in council, P.C. 209, of February 2, 1922, following an arrangement with the province.

An official survey of and map showing the boundaries of Kootenay park were made under instructions from the surveyor general.

Upon completion of the survey, it was found that the park area varied considerably from the area mentioned in the original agreement, but the principle set out in the proviso of section 4 of that agreement was maintained in that the survey fixed the boundaries of the park along the crest of the mountains.

The provincial government of British Columbia, upon the completion of the survey and map, implemented the above-mentioned statute, chapter 5, British Columbia statutes, 1919, by passing order in council No. 810 of August 8, 1928, approving of the survey and the boundaries fixed by the survey. The boundaries of Kootenay park, as surveyed, are set out in schedule A to the bill.

The area of the park when established in 1920 was estimated at 587 square miles. Approximately seven square miles were removed from the park in 1922. Upon completion of the survey, the area of the park was established as 543 square miles, more or less.

Next is Riding Mountain park. The department acquired a number of small areas comprising in all slightly less than two sections with some pieces of roadway as an addition to the Riding Mountain park. These areas lie immediately south of the townsite of Wasagaming, the headquarters of the park. They were specially required to round out the park in this important section. The area being added consists of 962.3 acres.

This is similar to what was done in connection with Banff park. They had to add a portion of land at the south gateway in order to protect the entrance and prevent the building of hotels and the erection of other buildings at the gateway of the park.

The two small areas being withdrawn from the park were former sites of the forest officer's headquarters when the park area was a forest reserve. These two areas are outside the main park area.

Upon the establishment of the park a more intensive administration of the area was organized under which it was found advisable to locate the park wardens inside the park. The improvements upon these two small areas have been disposed of and the said areas are not now being used as they are in the centre of a farming district. It is considered they should be available for agricultural purposes. The total area of the two parcels being withdrawn is 320 acres.

The total area of the park is approximately 1,148 square miles.

Then Point Pelee park. The areas being added to Point Pelee park comprise:

(a) Part of a number of squatters' holdings which the department purchased from the estate of Joseph W. Post, together with some adjoining lands, the title to which was in the crown in the right of the dominion but which were not included in the park;

(b) Two lots in a subdivision of lot one of the squatters' holdings which the department acquired at a tax sale;

(c) With the formal consent of the local municipality, the department expropriated the roads inside the park boundaries.

The total area of the parcels being added to the park consists of 255·03 acres. The total area of the park is 3,869 acres, including the additions.

I come next to Georgian bay islands parks. Flowerpot island, which it is desired to include in the Georgian bay islands park, is located at the head of the Bruce peninsula.

The island was surrendered by the Chippewa Indians on the 5th day of June, 1856, and was acquired for park purposes from the Department of Indian Affairs on the 6th December, 1930.

With the addition of Flowerpot island, Georgian bay islands parks will consist of Beausoleil island (2,712 acres), Flowerpot island (475 acres) and some 28 smaller islands (251 acres), a total area of approximately 3,438 acres.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have squatters any rights there now?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. FRASER: Beausoleil Island is where the sea cadet camp is held. Is that included?

Mr. GLEN: The Georgian bay islands parks will consist of Beausoleil island, Flowerpot island and some twenty eight smaller islands, with a total acreage of 3.438 acres.

The next is Mallorytown landing park. The new scenic highway which the provincial government is constructing between Brockville and Gananoque runs through the Mallorytown landing park, one of the St. Lawrence Islands parks. The provincial government secured and transferred to the dominion a small area adjoining the park in compensation for the area taken up by the right of way for the highway.

The area of the parcel being added to this park is 3·38 acres.

The total area of Mallorytown landing park is approximately 10 acres.

St. Lawrence islands parks, consisting of 15 islands, contain approximately 190 acres.

The idea of this whole bill is to round out, under the surveys that have been made, the boundaries of the parks, including some portions and excluding other portions.

Mr. MacNICOL: The schedule in connection with Point Pelee park exempts 200 feet along the foreshore. Would that not mean the spoiling of the part to be annexed?

Mr. GLEN: We are adding to the park a piece of land bought from the estate of Joseph W. Post and other small parcels.

Mr. MacNICOL: But it exempts a strip of 200 feet along the foreshore. Unless the park owns the land lying along the foreshore, would this exemption not spoil it?

Mr. GLEN: We need some of it and some we do not. What we have we bought from the estate of Mr. Post.

Mr. HAZEN: When was that?

Mr. GLEN: Two or three years ago.

Section stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister leading the house if he will give us the order of business for to-morrow, and if I may be so bold as to say it, the definite order of business this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I definitely resent the implication and the imputation contained in the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The order of business is only announced in this house as a matter of courtesy. To-morrow we shall deal with committee of supply.

Mr. MacNICOL: What supply?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The only supply that is possible to-morrow according to the order paper.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SOLWAY AND SONS—PURCHASE OF STORAGE BATTERIES, ETC.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, recommendations and other documents exchanged between Solway & Sons, Toronto, and any government department, from July, 1945, to 30th April, 1946, with respect to purchase, sale and disposition of storage batteries, scrap or otherwise.

EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS, CAPE BRETON ISLAND—REPORT OF DR. CURRIE

Mr. GILLIS:

For a copy of the report of Doctor A. W. Currie, on the matter of unemployment conditions on Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: The report in question is one from an officer of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to his minister, and as such is privileged. I have no objection to my hon. friend seeing the contents of the report for his own information, but I do not think we can establish the principle that reports of that type must be tabled in the house. I therefore ask that the motion be dropped.

Motion dropped.

COAL

NEW ORDERS IN VIEW OF SHORTAGE OF SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. In view of the order issued by him yesterday banning the use of bituminous coal to heat office buildings, stores, schools, theatres and public buildings in Ontario and Quebec, may I ask him why the heat is still on in these parliament buildings?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is due to the Conservative party's activities.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The Department of Reconstruction and Supply is able to exercise control over certain government institutions but it has no overriding authority with respect to the parliament buildings.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Will the Minister of Reconstruction make a statement to the house giving information on changes made in the government's coal policy yesterday?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to make a statement later. The position is, however, that the situation is deteriorating very rapidly. It is now over five weeks since any coal has been received from the United States into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and it is not likely that any considerable shipments will be received for another month. Existing supplies are not sufficient to see us through, and therefore a determined effort is being made to spread out existing supplies as far as possible. The order made public yesterday is the first in a series that will probably be necessary before adequate supplies can be obtained.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the minister whether he is in a position to make a statement regarding coal conditions in Nova Scotia, and whether a survey has been made of their capacity to produce and ship to central Canada? I am quite sure that if an appeal were made to the workmen and operators, in view of what they have received from central Canada in years gone by in the way of markets, there would be a whole-hearted response to the dire needs of central Canada at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to consider an appeal. I am happy to say that production of coal in Nova Scotia is stepping up. Apparently a greater number of men are returning to the mines. Coal is being shipped from Sydney to St. Lawrence ports and is being very helpful in the situation. We should like to get the last pound of Nova Scotia coal which that province can spare. I will ask the officers to explore the possibilities of a special appeal.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply if the government have taken steps to see that coal is taken out of the various strip mines which were opened in Alberta during recent years?

Mr. HOWE: Arrangements have been made or are being made to operate all the strip mines that have been developed during the war years. We have been making every effort to get the last pound of coal that it is possible to have mined in Alberta.

THE SUPREME COURT

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "FINANCIAL POST"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice in order that he may explain on behalf of the Supreme Court of Canada, which is denied the right of explaining, an article appearing in a recent issue of the Financial Post in regard to the Supreme Court of Canada, pointing out that, so far as the supreme court is concerned, in one case involving $200 a 37-page judgment was given by the supreme court, whereas in another case involving a man well known in public life the court refused to hear the case on the ground that less than $2,000 was in dispute. This article—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I cannot see that there is sufficient urgency in the matter which the hon. member seeks to bring to the attention of the house to justify his proceeding with the question at this time. I would suggest to him that he move for the production of papers respecting the matter.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am quite sure, sir, that you have not seen the article in question. If you had seen it you would have come to the conclusion, as I think most other lawyers would, that it is urgent that the misapprehension which this article might create should be cleared up, if in fact it is not true. I ask for your indulgence because I think it is a matter of genuine public interest.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have noted the remarks of the Minister of Justice. This is not regular procedure, but to bring the matter to the attention of the house and with unanimous consent, the hon. member for Lake Centre may continue.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thank you. This article says, having regard to these cases, one of minor importance and the other in which a man formerly in public life was involved, one being heard and the other not:

> What flashes through the minds of Canadians as they hear about this Supreme Court turn-down? Could there possibly be any connection between that fact and the other fact that Mulock is influential in politics?

My question is: Will the minister explain the difference between these two cases, so that any suggestion of bias, prejudice or the suspicion of the likelihood of there being any in the supreme court, will be removed?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member for Lake Centre is rendering a real public service in bringing this matter to the attention of the house. It came to my attention over the week-end, and I had the same misgivings about it that he had when he saw it. The title of the article is: "Our Supreme Court Should Be Careful." It then goes on to say:

> Just out from the Supreme Court of Canada is a thirty-seven page judgment. Somebody is suing somebody for $200 because sixteen horses shipped from Saskatchewan arrived at Montreal with their tails cut off.

I do not know where the writer of the article got the information that there was a thirty-seven page judgment. I looked at the reports of the supreme court and that case has not yet been reported. I did not look at the Dominion Law Reports to see if it had been reported there, but I inquired about the facts, and I found that this is a case in which the supreme court had no alternative but to exercise its jurisdiction.

An action for damages which involved the interpretation of the live stock bill of lading as approved by the transport commissioners had been brought, and the case was dealt with in the trial court and in the court of King's bench of the province of Quebec. After the judgment in the court of King's bench confirmed the judgment of the trial court an application for special leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was made in the court of King's bench on the ground that this was a form that was in use generally all over Canada, and that there was a matter of considerable public interest in the proper construction of that form, which was the approved form of making contracts with transportation companies for the transportation of live stock.

The Quebec court of King's bench or court of appeal, as is authorized by the Supreme Court Act, granted leave to appeal. That having been done, the supreme court had no discretion; it had to hear and dispose of the case.

In the other case, an appeal as of right was taken from the unanimous confirmation by the court of appeal of Ontario of a judgment rendered in the Ontario trial court in a case in which there was no specified amount of money involved. Under the statute and under the practice of the supreme court, confirmed by a large number of cases, that is not a case which can be appealed to the supreme court as of right. The respondent moved to quash the appeal. The supreme court heard the motion, and finding that it was not a case which could could be appealed as of right, granted the motion and declared itself without jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

It is most unfortunate that, because of the names of persons involved in the litigation, there should be any suggestion that their present or former positions in society or politics could have anything to do with the result. As a matter of fact, the house sees that the supreme court was without discretion. It so happened that when the motion for the dismissal of the appeal came before the supreme court, the chief justice was absent, and the court was presided over by Mr. Justice Patrick Kerwin, who, if there was anything in the suggestion sometimes heard that a man does not forget to which political party he belonged before he went to the bench—

Mr. HOMUTH: Do not be too sure of that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —would not be suspected of leaning for political reasons towards one who had been prominent in another party. Suggestions of that kind are most unfortunate, and it is most unfortunate that there should be anywhere in the house any echo of it. The reputations of our courts are above that; and it is necessary for the sound administration of justice that they should remain above it.

This matter might be the occasion of proceedings for contempt, but proceedings for contempt have to come before the court that is injured, and it is not something that one finds very palatable to put gentlemen in the position of having to decide in cases in which there has been reflection upon themselves personally.

I feel sure this paper, the Financial Post, will be only too anxious to correct whatever misapprehension this article may have caused when it is able to verify that the factual background upon which it was based was entirely unfounded.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LUMBER WORKERS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I was expecting to be asked a question about the strike of the lumber workers in British Columbia which started at two o'clock to-day. Since no hon. member has asked about it, I think the house is entitled to be informed. The facts are these. The International Woodworkers of America, through their representatives, have requested the British Columbia lumber operators for an increase, I understand, equal to twenty-five cents per hour and reduction of hours of work to forty per week.

Negotiations on a collective bargaining basis have been going on between the operators and a committee representing the union which resulted in an offer being made by the employers of an increase of 12½ cents per hour with a reduction of the work week to forty-four hours. The union have also requested a union shop and a check-off system.

The dispute is one which comes within provincial authority. Notification was publicized that a strike would occur to-day, and as there was evidence that the negotiations were breaking down, the Hon. George S. Pearson, Minister of Labour for British Columbia, consulted with me in the matter and recommended the appointment of a special commissioner. Accordingly I appointed Hon. Chief Justice G. McG. Sloan, of Vancouver, B.C., an industrial disputes inquiry commission—I quote from the order of appointment:

> To confer with the parties and to endeavour to effect a settlement of the issues in dispute between them as aforesaid. In event that the commission is unable to bring about a settlement of the dispute, the commisison shall report to the Minister of Labour not later than thirty days after the date hereof or such longer period as may be authorized by the Minister of Labour setting out its specific recommendations as to the manner in which the dispute may be determined.

I have not had a report from Chief Justice Sloan. However, the information received by me by telephone early this morning from the British Columbia minister of labour is to the effect that at the meeting held by the chief justice yesterday the negotiations came to an end because those representing the union took the position that the strike was going to take place at eleven o'clock this morning. The operators felt that there was nothing to be gained by proceeding further with the negotiations, in view of the refusal of those representing the union to postpone the date of the strike.

Briefly the position is: (a) the union would not postpone the strike; (b) both parties were willing to arbitrate the question of union shop and union security conditionally, in so far as the operators are concerned, upon the strike being called off; (c) the union offered to settle the wage question on a basis of an increase of 18 cents per hour and a forty-hour week; (d) the operators are prepared to negotiate further on the question of wages providing the strike was called off.

The dominion Department of Labour is keeping in close touch with the provincial department of labour, and hon. members may be assured that no possible solution will be overlooked.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): The other day I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say that certain changes were under consideration in the subsidies being paid on dairy products. May I ask the minister if a decision has been reached and, if so, what the decision is; or, if it has not been reached, can be say when that will be done?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question has been under discussion, but a final decision has not yet been reached. It is hoped to come to a decision shortly.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality and naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, last evening the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked the leader of the house what would be the business to-day, and there was no reference at all to third reading of this bill being moved. At page 1542 of Hansard the hon. member for Peel asked the question, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who was leading the house, replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order . . . The order of business is only announced in this house as a matter of courtesy. To-morrow we shall deal with committee of supply.
> Mr. MacNicol: What supply?
> Mr. Mackenzie: The only supply that is possible to-morrow according to the order paper.

I suggest, sir, that no notice having been given of the intention of the government to bring up this matter to-day, it should be held over for one day. I realize that it may be only a courtesy on the part of the government, but I do ask that the courtesy be shown, because after all it is impossible for anyone to prepare for the business of the next day unless reliance can be placed upon the statements that are made.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): May I suggest to my hon. friend that in all the sixteen years I have been in this house I have not yet seen notice given of the intention to move the third reading of a bill. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard for last evening he will see that when this bill was reported for third reading the question was asked, "When shall said bill be read a third time?" and I immediately replied, "Next sitting of the house." If, however, there is any fundamental objection to third reading being given now we shall be only too glad to accede to the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thank you very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Stand.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was going to ask that this bill be not read a third time to-day. To say that a bill is to be given third reading at the next sitting of the house does not mean anything, as every hon. member knows. It means third reading may be moved the next day, but not necessarily so. Some very important amendments were made to this bill, and we should have the bill with the printed amendments before it is given third reading. I make that a suggestion to the minister and to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The bill is being reprinted and distributed. Does the same objection apply to order for third reading of bill No. 62?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Motion stands.

PLACER MINING

NON-FORFEITURE OF CLAIMS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL—SMUGGLING

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the third reading of bill No. 62, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

PRICE CEILING POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO FARM PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Monday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in presenting the case against the increase in the prices of farm implements the other day I pointed out that according to the select special committee of the Saskatchewan legislature on farm implement prices and distribution, in the year 1936 out of a cost price to the farmer of $281, some $22.62 or only eight per cent went to labour, and $71.06 or 25 per cent went into the cost of materials, so that the total cost of labour and materials came to 33 per cent, or only one-third of the total cost of a binder. I pointed out also that in the remaining costs in connection with overhead, experimental work, the cost of selling, the cost of advertising, the cost of credit, collecting bad debts and so on, the companies in the meantime had been able to effect considerable savings. So it seems to me that in a consideration of this whole question we should take the gains or savings made by the implement companies and balance them against the increased costs.

Everyone knows costs in the fields of labour and material have increased, but we have not yet considered the increased savings to the companies in these other directions. Let us take the cost of selling, for instance. Those who have lived on farms remember that it is not so long since the farmers were canvassed by the implement agents in attempts to sell them tractors or binders. It is not many years since the dealers were driving over the country roads in company with high pressure salesmen, interviewing prospects. That does not happen any more, because for several years now the office of the small town agent has been haunted by farmers clamouring for the privilege of buying implements for cash, and it is now a matter of being put on the list and trying to get a preferred position. No longer do the companies need to spend money trying to sell farm implements. The farmers are begging to buy. No longer do the companies need to indulge in high priced advertising, because the farmer is not fussy any more. He does not insist on a Massey-Harris tractor or an Allis-Chalmers tractor; he takes any tractor or combine he can get. So there must be considerable savings in the fields of advertising and salesmanship. Also in the fields of financing and the collection of bad debts these costs must have been wiped out. Not only does the farmer pay cash, but even in previous years the companies took care of that situation by increasing the cash price to the buyer and making the man who paid cash carry the risk of the man who bought on credit. I submit therefore that in these fields the company has effected considerable saving.

What about the pre-war picture? The pre-war picture seems now to be accepted, just as we accepted excess profits as being excess in relation to normal profits. We seem to have accepted the pre-1939 structure of farm implement prices as legitimate. Time and usage have sanctified the position of the companies. But the report of the special select committee on farm implement prices did not. It condemned very strenuously the practices of the company, and recommended that certain steps be taken to remove these abuses of power in a field where the producer of farm implements had the whip hand over the consumer, the man who bought them.

These abuses have not been remedied. Although tariffs were reduced to allow more competition in the field, every time the tariff came down, the price paid by the farmer and the profits collected by the company went up. That is why no one should accept this new price increase without question. Increases are based on established abuses, not upon a just price structure.

This is a strong indictment of the attitude and policy of implement manufacturers. Their whole practice is built, not on cooperation with the workers in the industry and the farmers whom they serve, but upon how much profit they can secure and how far they can go in defying governments. Yet this government took evidence and advice from no other body when the increase in the price of farm implements was being considered. When permission was given for an advance in prices, the manufacturers were the only people consulted. This is a breach in the wall of price control, a wall which the Progressive Conservative party wishes to demolish even more rapidly by removing all price controls. This is another victory for big business, and its control over the family income and over the homes of thousands of Canadian men, women and children.

We in this group have consistently supported the government in its price control policy as applied to the things the farmer has to buy, and its policy of stabilized prices for the things he has to sell. In other words, we have supported a proper price relationship.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis):

That all the words following the word "government's" in the amendment, in the last paragraph of page 184 of Votes and Proceedings, May 6, 1946, to the word "imposing" in the second line of the amendment, be struck out and the following words be substituted therefor:

"policies permitting recent unjustifiable increases in the prices of farm machinery and of steel have resulted in" and that the amendment be further amended by inserting the words:

"and workers" after the word "producers" in the third line of the amendment, so that it would then read:

"This house is of the opinion that the government's policies of permitting recent unjustifiable increases in the prices of farm machinery and of steel have resulted in imposing on food producers and workers of Canada an unfair share of the burden of maintaining the government's price stabilization policies."

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) asked me to spend some time with the officials of the wartime prices and trade board in order that I might satisfy myself as to the facts supporting the action taken with respect to farm implement prices, and provide a further report on this action for the benefit of the house. I am now prepared to make a statement in this matter. I should like it to be understood by all that the Minister of Finance has not seen the statement I am about to make, and that therefore I take full responsibility for what is said. However, I have done as requested, and I have certain figures and facts which I believe will be of particular interest to hon. members.

Various hon. members have suggested that for many years farm implement prices have been too high, and that under present conditions, where selling and collection expenses must have been reduced, no permission to the manufacturers to increase their prices was necessary. They have inquired whether there have been reductions in selling expenses, and other such expense items, and whether the wartime prices and trade board investigated these matters before issuing this order.

I can assure the house that the action taken by the prices board followed an exhaustive survey of the costs and the financial position of the major manufacturers of farm implements in Canada, extending over a long period of time—not a period of days, but some months. All the evidence obtained in this investigation indicated that on the basis of the position of these companies in 1946 some measure of relief had to be provided in order to ensure the continued supply, on large-scale production, so badly needed by the farmers of Canada at this time.

I can assure the house that there has been a substantial reduction in the general expenses, including selling expense and collection expense, which, in relation to sales volume, was reduced by forty per cent between 1936-39 and 1945. The fact is that increases in factory costs, which include direct materials, direct labour and factory overhead, since 1941 have been in themselves substantially in excess of the amount of relief which manufacturers were permitted to obtain through the 12½ per cent adjustment in maximum selling prices.

The Minister of Finance has already informed the house that such cost increases were in excess of twenty per cent over this period, and such cost increases could not be offset entirely by a reduction in general expenses.

Perhaps it will serve to illustrate the point still better if I place before the house specific figures showing a break-down of costs and selling prices for several typical items of farm machinery produced by domestic manufacturers and sold in Canada, both in 1941 and in 1946. These costs reflect only increases which have actually been experienced by the companies to date, and do not in any way reflect further cost increases, about which I shall have more to say in a minute, and which the companies probably will have to face in forthcoming months.

I have taken seven different items of farm implements and have tried to show by the following table the retail costs and the relief furnished by the 12½ per cent increase, along with the net result of the increase. The figures are as follows:

Retail price before 12½ per cent increase—
13 run single disc drill	$219 50
20 run double disc drill	320 75
Manure spreader	221 00

* This is the only item out of the seven which shows that the relief given is more than the extra cost.

I think the house will agree that the implements selected are in common use by farmers, and it is therefore important to note that in all but one of the cases the amount of relief provided is appreciably less than the actual cost increase incurred. The total cost increase shown in these figures is less than the actual increases in factory cost because of the saving in expense to which I have already referred. So much for the costs on individual machines.

It has also been suggested that the implement companies did show need for relief on the basis of their financial position and that domestic supplies of implements would have been in jeopardy without some adjustment. I can provide the house with some very informative figures on this point also, and I should point out that all such figures are based upon a forecast of 1946 operations and costs which are likely to be optimistic in view of developments which are almost certain to come. Factory costs will increase further beyond the level at the time relief was granted. For example, the office of price administration in the United States has just announced increases in farm machinery and parts amounting to 10·6 per cent at the manufacturing level. Canadian manufacturers depend on imported parts to a considerable extent and they will have to pay this increase, plus others which are expected to become effective shortly in the United States. This cost was not anticipated when negotiations began or when they were completed.

The estimates in the hands of the prices board also anticipated a level of total sales 100 per cent above the average level in 1936-39. This appeared to be the maximum sales volume which could be expected, taking into account the information available at the time it was made as to availability of materials and labour. Since making that estimate there has been a serious coal strike in the United States which has affected the implement companies both directly and indirectly, and through a slowing down of delivery of component parts and materials. Deliveries of steel products were of course materially reduced during the steel strike in the United States. Hon. members will recognize that problems in obtaining supplies of materials will continue to be exceedingly difficult for several months at least, and that as a result of these factors it is unlikely that the estimates of sales volume can be achieved. If there is a reduction below the estimated figure the forecast operations of the companies will prove to have been too optimistic, and profit margins will be further narrowed by their reduction in revenue and resulting increased cost per unit produced. If the sales volume is very much below this level I think it is safe to say that the manufacturing operations of these firms would be conducted at a loss.

Bearing in mind all these uncertainties regarding the future it will be of interest to the house to be informed that the companies were expected to earn not over 70 per cent of their approved standard profits in 1946 if they take the full amount of the price adjustment made available to them. This profit reflects revenue from export sales and from sales of imported equipment merchandized by the companies in Canada. Looking at their domestic manufacturing operations by themselves, it is estimated that one major company will still lose money after the price adjustment, and that the three major companies without the adjustment would have lost amounts running into millions of dollars during 1946.

Here is another way of looking at it. The level of sales in 1946 which, as I have said may not be achieved because of material shortages, is expected to be 100 per cent above the average of 1936-39, although reduced from 1945. Despite this and the economies in general expenses, actual uncontrollable cost increases have occurred which would have left the industry, without price adjustment, in a position to make not over thirty per cent of standard profits, with a substantial number of small producers showing a loss, and even one large producer being in this position.

I am sure that the house will also be interested to have a comparison of the movements in farm implement prices paid by farmers in the United States and in Canada over the period during which the prices board has been administering over-all price control. As the house is aware, an announcement by the office of price administration in the United States, made on May 13, granted an increase in prices of farm implements of 10·6 which resulted in a five per cent increase in prices paid the farmers. This appears low in relation to the 12½ per cent increase recently granted in Canada. However, the story is not complete unless reference is made to other increases granted during the same period in the United States.

Since the fall of 1941 there has been no increase in domestically manufactured farm implements in Canada with the exception of the 12½ per cent with which you are all familiar. During the same period in the United States, on the basis of the experience of one major company which is typical of the whole, there were increases ranging from a minimum of 12 per cent to a maximum of 20·6 per cent, to which must be added the 5 per cent announced this week. The proper comparison therefore is between 12½ per cent in Canada and a range of from 17 to 25·6 per cent in the United States. These figures are supported by an official index of prices paid the farmers for farm machinery in the United States, prepared by the bureau of agricultural economics, which shows an increase in the United States implement prices in the United States of 12·8 per cent since 1941, to which must be added the further 5 per cent already referred to. It seems clear therefore that the farmer in Canada has benefited by a better control of this element in his costs, and I should add that there is reason to believe that further increases will be announced very shortly in the United States for particular companies.

I have not taken very much of the time of this house on any occasion during the last two or three years, and particularly in the last two sessions. But I should like now to have the privilege which some have, as a back-bencher not attached to any department of government, and to present some of my own reactions and make some statements which I have wanted to make as a result of things which have been said in this house.

It might be inferred from something which I have said that I am making a point for the farm implement companies. I am doing nothing of the kind, and I am satisfied that the wartime prices and trade board was not doing so either. The board wanted to see a steady and increasing flow of farm machinery to the farmers, particularly at this time when we are in short supply, and that was the main motive of their adjustment. I feel certain that, had I been sitting in the place of the members of that board, looking at the matter from the point of view of Canada as a whole, I would have adopted very much the same position. However, were I to turn myself around and put myself in the seat of the managers of some of these larger manufacturing concerns, I am not just sure what my reaction would have been. I rather think that I would have hesitated; I would have waited for a clearer sign of what my production possibilities were going to be before I made my application. However, they have made that application; and I think that the board, in the light of their financial standing, in the light of the costs of their equipment, and in the light of the need for farm machinery, did the right thing.

Generally speaking, this might indicate that I am not a believer in high prices, but I assure you that I am a believer in high prices. I believe in high prices as long as those prices can be controlled. High prices, high wages and high standards of living go hand in hand. But I am opposed to anything which would mean, for this country, inflation. In my opinion inflation and sudden decontrols would be very detrimental, and I will oppose them with all the vigour that I can command.

I have in my hand a chart—I do not know whether many hon. members can see it or not—indicative of where prices ran to in 1919, shortly after the war. Prices ran as high as 300 per cent above normal. Those who are close enough to see this chart will notice that it represents a bare triangle; there is a sharp rise and a very sudden fall in prices. What the wartime prices and trade board are trying to do is to prevent this rapid increase and this rapid fall. If the Canadian people will give the board support in maintaining a reasonable level of prices—not a permanent rigid structure without adjustments here and there as they become necessary, but the holding of the line on a reasonable level, cutting off this absurd peak at the top—the people will be spared untold hardship and discouragement.

Mr. FRASER: Prices are sky-high now, right here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MAYHEW: I suppose the hon. member is speaking of farm prices.

Mr. FRASER: Prices of anything—clothing, food, office rents, anything one may want.

Mr. MAYHEW: If you take the controls off, prices will be higher. I do not think any hon. member can accuse me of once having interrupted him when he was speaking, and I would ask that the same courtesy be shown to me that I have extended to everyone else.

The inference has been left in this house by some hon. members that business men, particularly manufacturers, are anxious to see large pools of unemployed men in this country so that at a moment's notice they can reach out and bring in whatever men are necessary to meet seasonal demands, and thereby get cheap labour, and as soon as the temporary demand is satisfied, let them go back again on relief. I assure you that such a view is entirely opposite to good business, and is the very reverse of the view held by the men with whom I associate most. A man who is unemployed, who is walking the streets without any money in his pocket, without a pay envelope coming in weekly, is not a customer of anybody. The one thing that a business man wants, be he a retailer or a merchant of any kind, is customers, and in order to obtain customers, people must be working. So far as I know the feelings of the group of people whom I represent, it is their firm desire that the men and women of this country shall be fully employed.

A further view, and in my opinion an erroneous one, held in some places is that manufacturers want the farmers to be in receipt of low prices. They do not want to see anything of the kind. The view I have here expressed more often than anything else is that we want to see the first four large producers of primary products in Canada operating at capacity and at reasonably good prices. The first of these groups is the farmer. We want to see every farmer at work, extra men employed on his farm turning out the maximum of production, and we want to see him receiving the maximum return for his product. There again, if you like, the selfish motive comes into play, and there is where we shall find an outlet for our secondary goods.

Secondly, we want to see the lumber companies and those working in the woods operating, not to the capacity of the saw mills to cut lumber but to the capacity of the nation to regrow the forests that are cut year by year; otherwise the product would run out. However we want to see that industry running as fully as it can.

We want to see the mines, the third primary industry, in full production; and in addition we want to see the fourth primary producer, a very important one so far as British Columbia is concerned, operating to capacity. I refer to the fishermen and those dealing in fish products.

We maintain that by giving these people full employment, putting them all in a position where they can be actively engaged, those who are engaged in secondary industries will not have difficulty in keeping the rest of the men and women in Canada fully employed. That chiefly is the position I take. If you like to regard it as selfish, you can do so, but it is good business, and the two go together. Let me say this, however, that in my opinion while selfishness will succeed for a time, eventually the man who employs only selfish tactics in his own business will lose out, because selfishness is bound to ruin anyone who uses it to further his own needs only.

Our fight in this house therefore—and it is one that should receive the support of every group here—is to see that the man who desires an undue profit on his own goods, thus creating a spiral, shall not be allowed to have his way. I think we have every right to ask for the full support of the house for any move in that direction.

I know that adjustments have to be made from time to time; I am prepared to support any necessary adjustments. Adjustments, however, must be timed, and they must be orderly if they are not to ruin the country. What I am particularly concerned about is not the cost of the end products, but the cost of the basic products; and I consider that any wide jump in the price of wheat, which is not an end product in itself—I think it may be regarded as the cornerstone, so to speak, of many other products in the country—would not be to the advantage of the farmers themselves or to the advantage of the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I know that the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) is sincere in his presentation to the house and believes everything he says. I have a high regard for him. I believe however that in his attempt this afternoon to justify the increased price of farm machinery there are one or two things he overlooked. Personally I am not very much impressed by figures prepared by those who were responsible for granting the increase. They may or may not be correct; we have no way of checking them.

There are one or two things which I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain with regard to the hand-out of 12½ per cent given the farm implement companies. I would like him to check up on how much of that was due to changing their capital structure. The member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a few evenings ago put on the record the fact that they had given their higher employees gifts of blocks of stock that ran into a considerable amount of money. That is something that should be checked.

Second, I would ask the hon. member to check and some time inform the house how much they are losing in their export trade. Are they losing in exporting at the present time in order to establish their export markets, taking it out of the home market?

Third, one statement which the hon. member made jarred me a bit. He said that an increased price was granted these companies because of the fact that they were in short supply. In effect, the government was desirous of seeing maximum production in the field of agriculture, but they could not get it because there was a shortage of farm implements. The farm implement companies were in a position to sit back and say, "We will export; we do not have to sell here. If you get implements you will get them on our terms". That was the impression that I got, and that in effect is to sabotage an important industry and is an indictment against any organization that takes that attitude because of a shortage or because of the crisis that exists. These are a few of the things I would like to have clarified.

In rising to take part in this debate there are a few things on which I feel strongly. First I was disappointed, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) moved his amendment, that he confined the discussion exclusively to agriculture. In my opinion there is no possible solution in looking at the problem as it pertains to one section of society. Unless the whole economy of the country is healthy, there is no possibility of improving the situation for any one particular section of that economy.

My impression of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition was that it was the thin end of the wedge to get away from price controls, taking advantage of a problem in the country to-day in regard to which there is a good deal of agitation, quarrelling with the government's position in the matter of price controls, and starting to chisel in that direction. I was disappointed that the hon. gentleman did not include the whole economy of the country so that we might have it thoroughly discussed. However, the subamendment moved by the member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) now opens up that discussion.

I do not think anyone in the house is doubtful as to where the Progressive Conservative party stands in regard to price controls, and I agree with the statement made by the member for Victoria in this regard. This group believes in realistically handling that situation and in having a real price control, but I am afraid that the government, while making statements in the house and in the press, and the wartime prices and trade board, while expressing anxiety to maintain price controls and protect the consumer, are only rendering lip service, and that secretly they are doing the same thing that the Conservative party stands for only they are not doing it in the open.

Price controls are being removed, and removed rapidly. They started with the farm implement companies and the basic steel industries; they granted increases in the products from the top, which is bound to be reflected in the cost to the consumer. Once that kind of thing is started there is no getting away from it.

Let us take the list of some four hundred articles and commodities in Canada in respect of which price controls have been removed. If one examines the lists sent out by the wartime prices and trade board he will find that there is not very much price control on the things that the average person has to buy in Canada to-day. Go down town and buy a hat; you will pay $1.50 more for it than you would have paid two weeks ago. Buy a suit of clothes and you will have to do exactly the same thing. It is true all along the line. Controls are being removed from the very things that the average person has to buy. I suggest that any hon. member on the government benches who means what he says with regard to price controls should carefully check and find out what is going on.

[Mr. Gillis.]

We got into this spiral when we made the first bow to the steel companies. An increase was granted to the basic steel industry which automatically reflected itself in the price of implements made by the farm implement companies. They came along and asked for an increase. They will all come along and ask for the same consideration. If the controls are dropped from all the basic commodities of Canada, we shall not have price control very long.

This afternoon I should like to go into the other side of the story. The farmers' side of the picture has been handled capably. I am in agreement with the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar with regard to stabilization of farm commodities, parity prices and so forth, and there is no need for me to repeat it.

The government made its first mistake when it granted the increase to the basic steel industries of Canada without any consultation with the general public or with the employees of the steel companies. The increase was granted despite the fact that the steelworkers' union of Canada have been patient and long-suffering, particularly in the community from which I come. They have been trying to get an adjustment in their wage rates for the last four years, in order to wipe out the differential which exists between themselves and the rest of the industry in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a reason for it.

Mr. GILLIS: They have appeared before the regional war labour board and the national board.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend tell us about the subsidy which makes it possible to pay the wages? There is a reason for the differential. Tell us about the subsidies.

Mr. GILLIS: Does the minister want me to go into the subsidy picture? It is a long story, and I should like the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) to be present. If subsidization of industry in Canada was the solution to the problem, we should have a prosperous industry in Nova Scotia, because they have been on federal relief for the last twenty years. The basis of the industry down in Nova Scotia is the Royal Bank of Canada, which is not a poor organization by any means.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a pretty glib way of getting around a difficult situation.

Mr. GILLIS: When the steel manufacturers of Canada were granted an increase of $5 in the price of basic steel they were called in and the matter was discussed with them. It was also given to the manufacturers in Sydney, despite the fact that they are subsidized. According to the statement I saw in the press, a certain portion of that increase was supposed to be used for the purpose of increasing wages; but when the steelworkers' union approached the wartime prices and trade board and asked what portion of that increase was to go to paying wages, they were told to go out and see the steel companies and iron it out with them. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) knows that until a week ago the union has not been able to meet the steel companies; the companies would not meet them. In effect the wartime prices and trade board said this: Go out and fight it out with the companies yourselves. They have got the $5 increase on basic steel; a share of that is yours; go and get it. That kind of attitude promotes industrial strife. They should have been consulted. The proportion of that increase which was allocated for the purpose of increasing wages should have been determined, and the steelworkers' union should have been informed about it. That was not done.

Since this session opened hon. members have been lobbied by the steelworkers' union, by the packing-house workers, by coal miners, electrical workers, and shipyard workers. I am of the opinion that this country is on the verge of an industrial upheaval. The Minister of Labour realizes that. It should be headed off. The demands of the workers are not so great. The steelworkers' union is a good case in point. If there is any organization in this country which has been patient and long-suffering, which has canvassed every legal piece of machinery available in an effort to iron out its difficulties, it is the steelworkers' union. It is a national organization. In the lobby they put on in the house the majority of the members signed a statement which said that their case was just, that their demands were reasonable and that they would back them in getting their demands. What were their demands? They were conservative. They asked for a minimum weekly wage of $36, a forty-hour week, two weeks' vacation with pay, tax exemptions up to $2,000, and a tri-partite council consisting of the employers, the employees and members of the government to sit together to iron out their difficulties and come to an understanding, instead of doing what they are doing now, declaring war on each other. These are their demands. They are conservative when considered in the light of the wage rates in the same industry in the United States.

So long as there exists a differential between the standards of living in the different sections of society in Canada and the United States, we are going to have difficulties in this country. It is bound to flow over here. The workers of Canada know what the wages are in the United States; they know what the standards are. A lot of our unrest to-day is based on the fact that our standards are so low in comparison with similar occupations in the United States. I am going to give the minister a few comparative rates in the steel industry of the United States and Canada to show how great the difference is. The rates are as follows:

	United States Steel Average	Algoma Average
Larryman coke ovens	1·15 P.W.	·76½ P.W.
Roller, bloom mill....	2·44	1·46
Heater, bloom mill....	2·43	1·42
Bottom maker, bloom mill	1·58	·81 P.W.
Shearman, bloom mill	1·58	·82 P.W.
Manipulators, bloom mill	1·61	·91½ P.W.
Stove tenders, blast furnace	1·19 P.W.	·74½ P.W.
Pig cast, blast furnace	1·03	·70 P.W.
Gas washer, blast furnace	1·14	·76½
General labour	·96½	·64½
Blacksmith	1·38	·82½-·90
Bricklayers	1·49	·90
Carpenters	1·26	·82½
Machinists	1·41	·92½
Pipefitters	1·25	·82½
Pattern maker	1·36	·90-100
Welders	1·31	·90

I have given the differences in the steel industry as an example; the same differential exists in other industries. These unions are international unions; they are part and parcel of the United States set-up. They hold joint conventions; they exchange literature. The average worker in this country knows just how far his standards are below the standards in the United States. In most industries I think there is a differential of about 30 per cent as between Canada and the United States, and something must be done to level that off. There is also a difference in the cost of living; I realize that, but it is not equal to the differential in the income of the workers. I do not care how high the cost of living goes; if you have wage rates which are comparable and which enable you to buy. I do not believe shrinking the pay envelope or the income of the people of this country is going to solve our problem. On the contrary it is going to get us back to where we were in 1939. One of the first things President Truman did in the United States on the cessation of hostilities was to instruct industry in that country that wage rates must be brought up by something like 25 to 30 per cent, so that the people would have purchasing power to enable them to buy back the things they were producing. The opposite attitude was taken in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: That increase in the United States has gone down the drain already because of inflation.

Mr. GILLIS: I would not say that. There is a whole lot of the bogey man in this business of inflation. I am not very much afraid of it. We talk about the difference between the cost of living to-day and the cost of living in 1919 and 1920, but some time I should like the Minister of Finance to put alongside those figures the rates of taxation in the two periods, so that the public may see how much worse off they are to-day. You are getting it in a different way this time. After the last war it was put on a pair of shoes, a pair of socks, a can of milk and so on, where everybody could see it. To-day it is being taken away from the worker by a very heavy income tax and then passed back to the industrialists and manufacturers under the table by way of subsidies, so it is hidden. The profits made during this war by the industrialists and manufacturers of this country were higher than those made during the last war; make no mistake about that. This business of waving that flag of inflation is overdone. A little inflation is good, if it does not get away from you. If you mean your price controls, when you get the thing where you want it and control it for ever I do not think you will have any difficulty. But I do not believe you are controlling anything to-day; that is my opinion. You go out to buy anything in this country and you will find that the price has taken quite a jump since the end of the war. I have a few figures here. I believe the cost of living index in this country is crazy. I do not believe anyone who compiled that cost of living index can justify it by any reasonable means to any sensible person. I do not think it reflects the cost of living in this country at all. I would ask any hon. member of this house to have a committee in his community go out and check the merchants, the fellows who are retailing. Take their inventories in 1939 and their inventories to-day; compare them with the cost of living index as put out by the government, and you will find a great discrepancy.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And check the quality of the material.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, and the quality of the material. I have a few figures on the cost of living which were taken locally by committees in Rouyn and a couple of other sections. This has been done several times in my own community since the outbreak of war. We have sent out committees of the mineworkers union to canvass Sydney, Glace Bay, New Waterford and so on, and we can show you figures gathered from the merchants, showing their inventories and the prices at which they were selling at a certain date, and so on. According to these figures the cost of living in that section of the community in 1942 was up around thirty per cent in the essentials the average person had to buy. Do not forget that about eighty or eighty-five per cent of the cash handled by the average small salaried man or wage earner in this country is spent on food, clothing and shelter, particularly on food. That does not include any luxuries. When you put the increase on a pound of butter and a pound of bacon, and on clothing, you are hitting him one hundred per cent. Here are a few figures which were gathered locally, showing the difference in prices as between 1939 and to-day:

	1939	1946
Butter	25 cents	40 cents
Eggs	31 cents	45 cents
Bacon	33 cents	70 cents
Round steak	24 cents	39 cents
Sirloin steak	28 cents	49 cents

Flour is up twenty-four per cent; sugar is up thirty-two per cent; potatoes are up fifty per cent; tea and coffee are up thirty-one per cent. In fact everything is up but wages.

Mr. ILSLEY: Be a little bit fair, will you not?

Mr. GILLIS: I am trying to be. The fact of the matter is that I am bending over backwards to try to make it easy for the Minister of Finance, because I appreciate his difficulties.

On the other side of the picture, in reference to this business of profits, I refer to a recent survey by the Bank of Canada—and Graham Towers does not make any mistakes. This comes from his organization. The net profits of Canadian business institutions in 1944 were double those of 1936. Accumulated surpluses and reserves by 700 companies in 1943 amounted to $1,188 million as compared to $800 million in 1938. Wages have not gone up proportionately.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member does not say that the profits after taxation were double those of 1936, does he?

Mr. GILLIS: That is right; after taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will have to check that.

Mr. GILLIS: You check it, and you will find it is worse than I am saying. I am really making it easy for the minister. According to recent statistics given out by the dominion bureau of statistics, 611 Canadian plants with a total of 108,308 hourly employees—this is where your wages are going—as of December 1, 1945, the average employee received 67 cents per hour, which compares with a rate of 70·5 cents as of December 1, 1944. In other words they suffered a reduction of over 3 cents per hour in that period of time. Three cents an hour has been actually chiselled off.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member takes business and makes a comparison between 1936 and the present time.

Mr. GILLIS: Between 1936 and 1943.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, what about taking the same period for wages, and making a comparison between those years?

Mr. GILLIS: I think it would be a good idea, but I have not the figures here just now. That is the job of the Minister of National Revenue. He should know more about wages than anybody else in this country, because he is getting most of them by way of taxation.

The point I was going to make is this. As I said a moment ago, President Truman ordered an upward trend in wages in order that the people might have purchasing power, because if they cannot buy we are going to have unemployment. The trend in Canada is the reverse. According to the dominion bureau of statistics, hourly rates of wages in Canada have dropped by approximately 3 cents. But in addition, has anybody checked how much purchasing power the Canadian dollar lost in the last year through price increases? I would not say this figure is accurate, but I did hear that in essential commodities the Canadian dollar has lost about 16 per cent of the purchasing power it had a year ago. In other words it costs you that much more to buy things. A $4 hat has gone up by $1.50; I bought one myself only a few days ago, and I know. The cost of a suit of clothes has gone up, and so on; and mind you, you are not getting the article you got in 1939, by a long shot. The values are away down as far as material is concerned. As I said before, the trend in Canada is back to 1939. There is no doubt in my mind about that. That is the attitude of big business in this country to-day.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., spoke about secondary industries, and with much of what he said I can agree. I believe that not many of the secondary industries, these small decentralized industries which are standing on their own feet, are being heavily subsidized. Those fellows are square, if they have an opportunity. But there are a few large monopolies across the country which are squeezing the small fellows out of the picture. If the present trend continues for another four or five years there will be no secondary industry left. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is from Nova Scotia. All he has to do is to look back in that province for the past ten or fifteen years and he will see that about fifteen fairly substantial secondary industrial set-ups have been siphoned off and swallowed up by monopoly control. In fact, as recently as the period of the war, one industry, which had existed for over thirty years, expired. A few people who are connected with monopolistic industry are to-day running the show. Unfortunately the government is subsidizing them, carrying them along and keeping them in the picture.

I should like to focus the minister's attention upon the difference between the condition of the average person and that of the industrialist. Certain statutory regulations were put out on February 18, 1946. The first of these was order in council P.C. 254, dealing with the rehabilitation allowance to veterans. I shall not read it in detail, because it is lengthy. May I state briefly that it makes provision for some relief when a veteran is out of employment awaiting a course. This is restrictive and narrow, and comes back to the old system of relief. But the veteran who is not about to take any course, who may not wish to take one, or who may not be qualified to do so receives nothing. There are about 30,000 unemployed in the maritime provinces to-day. Of that number about 4,100 are on the island of Cape Breton; and of this group about 1,600 are war veterans. Most of them cannot take vocational training courses because they have not the necessary educational qualifications. Under the regulation one must have reached at least the eighth grade, and if that grade has not been reached, he does not qualify. Many of those men did not reach that grade because they did not have the clothes in which to go to school during the years of depression. They get nothing.

I turn to another order in council, P.C. 358, which makes provision for underwriting the losses, or guaranteeing the profits—one may interpret it in either way—of the Dominion Shipping company, a subsidiary of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. This company conveys the ore from Newfoundland to the Sydney steel plant, a distance of only about ninety miles. The government has found it necessary to pass a special order in council underwriting the losses of that subsidiary of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation.

On the one hand is the boy who has just come back from overseas after fighting a war. In this house for five years we were saying that nothing would be too good for him. He could have a new world, a new heaven and a new earth. He is the fellow who saved us from ourselves. Well, he is back, and he is back on relief. There is no subsistence allowance for that man who cannot qualify for a course; and there is a limit of twelve months even for the one who is qualified. On the other hand those who stayed at home, the boards of directors, the bondholders in companies such as the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation are protected by orders in council, so that they may be guaranteed that every dollar they invest will produce a certain income. Those people are comfortable; they have good homes. They have everything they want. They have bank accounts. They are not suffering; they are not in need. But the dollar they invest is guaranteed a return by the Dominion of Canada. On the other hand, the fellow who fought the war and who saved us from the stupidity of people who have been running this world for the past thirty or forty years, comes back here and finds he is not even entitled to eat. He has no home, because the insurance companies cannot make money out of him under the national housing scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it not true that our system of reestablishment credits and gratuities is more generous than that of any other country?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but let us remember that those gratuities are limited. They run out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. GILLIS: And in many cases they have run out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: And unemployment insurance has run out. They have no jobs and no prospects of jobs.

Mr. ILSLEY: The subsidies about which the hon. member has been speaking are to keep industry going so that they can give jobs. That is the only reason for them.

Mr. GILLIS: But there has been no expansion in those industries. They are not going any farther. They are not hiring any of the boys who are coming back. There has been no expansion in those industries, and there are no jobs for them when they come back. And not only the ones who have come back, but hundreds who left school since the beginning of the war are now looking for employment.

When I asked the Minister of Labour a few days ago, as a result of several telegrams, whether the government would consider the possibility of extending out-of-work benefits to soldiers until they could find some employment, or continuing unemployment insurance until those receiving it might be in a position to secure employment, his answer was discouraging. In effect, his answer was no, that the matter had not been considered, and that relief in any community was the responsibility of provincial and municipal governments. That is the philosophy of the thirties. It is not good enough to-day. I appreciate the necessity for subsidies under present conditions. If they are taken from any of the industries in Nova Scotia which are receiving them, those industries will fold up. But surely this is some indication that there must be a reexamination of the whole economic set-up.

The farmer asks for increased prices. Fine; I agree with that. I believe those prices have to be stepped up. But when we increase the price of farm products we automatically increase the cost of living.

Mr. ILSLEY: True.

Mr. GILLIS: And that comes back to the industrial worker. If farm prices are going up, then in proportion to those increases in farm prices we have to increase the wage structure if we are to keep on an even keel. Unless this is done, the effect will be that of dumping an additional load on the shoulders of the small salaried worker. He is not in a position to pay for any increased cost of living, owing to the taxes he is paying. Certainly those who were on fixed incomes during the war took it on the chin; but I do not think the business man did, at least not to any great extent. I am amazed when I read, in the income tax form, the exemptions the business man can claim for income tax purposes. But the civil servant receiving $2,500 a year, or the wage earner receiving $25 or $30 a week, can write in nothing by way of expenses. His total income is taxed, and taxed heavily. The man who is operating a business has his expenses deducted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because he is taxed on the profits.

Mr. GILLIS: He can deduct the expenses of all his trips across the country, and the expense of any additions to his buildings—

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: Extensions to plant.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not at all.

Mr. GILLIS: And the expenses for commercial travellers, car allowances and special depreciation for cars. I wish I had got into some business before the war. If I had, I do not think I would be paying any taxes at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: And might not be making any money, either.

Mr. GILLIS: If I could write in on the income tax forms some of the things they write in, it would be a lot easier for me.

I make a plea to the Minister of Labour. In the field over which he presides there is need for serious thought.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have heard that before.

Mr. GILLIS: It would not surprise me after reading the newspaper and the correspondence that I have received if within the next few weeks we had a tie-up of the packinghouse workers, the steelworkers, the electrical workers, and many others. Personally I do not want that to happen because I think the rest of the world is depending upon North America for its production, and the main emphasis should be upon the production of everything. However, the attitude taken by the industrialists of this country, which apparently has been confirmed by the Department of Labour, is—

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not true.

Mr. GILLIS: Wait until I finish. In a broad way—

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish my hon. friend would speak in a broad way instead of going round in circles as he has been doing this afternoon.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going round in circles. If you read my speech afterwards you will find it is very cohesive.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend has not swallowed himself, he is getting pretty close to doing it.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not catch that. Would you mind repeating it?

An hon. MEMBER: Read it in Hansard.

Mr. GILLIS: Are you ashamed of it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I said that if the hon. member has not swallowed himself yet, he is getting close to it.

Mr. GILLIS: I cannot quite figure that out.

An hon. MEMBER: There are many things you cannot figure out.

Mr. GILLIS: I mean this. The minister says that they do not confirm the attitude taken by the employers, but I would remind him that the price of basic steel was increased $5 per ton and you told the workers to go out and fight it out with the employers.

Mr. MITCHELL: We never told them anything of the kind.

Mr. GILLIS: Donald Gordon did.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are talking to the Minister of Labour now.

Mr. GILLIS: The job of the Minister of Labour is to work for the good of labour. If Donald Gordon is making the minister's job any tougher than it should be, the minister should tell this house about it; the minister should get tough with him. That sort of thing promotes industrial strife in this country. I do not want to see these steelworkers in a fight, because there are too many of them in my riding. The packinghouse workers should not be permitted to get into difficulties, because food is the main requirement of the world to-day. We should be producing the maximum of everything we can, and there should be understanding in that industry right along the line. I think that can be done.

Mr. MITCHELL: Only three months ago I set up a commission to settle the packinghouse dispute.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not so sold on commissions. They just write reports. We are facing an emergency to-day similar to the one we faced during the war. The only difference is that the firing has ceased. The situation to-day is just as tense; the war has simply shifted to the home front. We should not permit these things to happen, because they are not necessary.

The Department of Labour set up a building industry council, made up of employers, employees and representatives of the government. When a dispute arises in that industry you do not hear anything about it. They get together, they arrive at an understanding, and the men go back to work. Why cannot the same sort of set-up be provided in all these industries that are facing disputes at the present time? The steelworkers' union has been asking for this for the last two years. There should be set up a tripartite council so that these problems can be talked over, so that the different parties may meet one another. If the industry does not want to do it, then the minister should set up such a council and ask them to take part.

There should not be any interruption in the production of steel. The position here is similar to that pertaining in connection with fuel. When your fuel supply is tied up, your whole economy is tied up; if the fuel supply is cut off, your plants and factories must shut down. If you cut off the supply of basic steel, your fabricating plants will be tied up, as well as many other industries across the country. As far as I can see, the production of steel is going to be tied up. They have taken a strike vote which has been practically unanimous from one end of the industry to the other. If some reasonable settlement is not arrived at, this production will stop.

The labour relations board, that is the O'Connor board, is getting into difficulty. I do not intend to make any accusations, but I have received a number of letters protesting against certain actions of this board—or rather of the chairman of the board, who does not seem to be acting as an impartial chairman should. In connection with McCormick's Limited application he has been accused of casting the deciding vote to permit the establishment of a company union. If that is so, it should not have been done. I notice from press clippings that the mine workers of Nova Scotia, the steelworkers, the mine, mill and smelter workers are protesting against that action in that particular case. The application for the establishment of a company union was rejected twice by the labour relations board of Ontario because financial assistance was being provided by the company. This is the sort of thing that creates strife, because it builds up a lack of confidence in the board. The chairman is supposed to be impartial. I understand that in this particular case the labour representatives on the board dissented.

It is a rambling statement I have been making, but I mention these things because I feel that they must be taken care of if we are going to get through this period.

I should like to say something to the Minister of Finance about this matter of price controls. I believe he is in earnest and wants to do a good job in that field, but I tell him not to be fooled by some of his officials who may be kidding him that there is really price control in this country. Actually there is a lot of chiselling going on. We know just where this party stands. They want to take them off and go out and carry on under the old tooth and claw law.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not say "this party," say "Conservative."

Mr. GILLIS: The Conservative party. They want to climb on their neighbours' backs and get all they can for themselves. They want the old rugged individualism—to the swift the race. If you are strong enough, trim the other fellow. Get something for yourself. That is their philosophy. They may varnish and polish it up by saying that they are getting so much money for agriculture or labour; they may say what they like about it, but I am awfully glad they are not sitting over there. All they can do here is talk about it, and I think everybody is getting wise to them.

I tell the minister not to be fooled by people who may be just giving him lip service. He may have a lot of Tories on his administrative staffs, but the fact is there is a lot of chiselling going on. I agree with the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., who says, "Hold the line." However, I do not want just to hold the line and then keep the clamps on about eighty per cent of our people who are at the bottom. We should also hold the line at the top. If you start jacking up the prices for the manufacturers, then you increase manufacturing costs, which in turn increases the cost to the consumer. The whole thing will get into a spiral, and you will never get out of it. You have to hold it at both ends. We will back you in any control that is necessary.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend will not back me in the rigid control of prices of agricultural products, and he will not back me in the rigid control of wages.

Mr. GILLIS: Surely I will.

Mr. ILSLEY: He has proved that by the statement he has made this afternoon. He has expressed approval of higher prices for agricultural products, and he has demanded higher wages.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister was not listening to me very carefully. He made his first mistake when he increased the price of farm machinery 12½ per cent to the farmer.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was the last increase, not the first.

Mr. GILLIS: He has increased the price of basic steel to the manufacturers.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend who has just spoken will pardon me if in the main I do not follow the thoughts in his speech. I would rather like to direct the thoughts of the house to the remarks which have been made in regard to the original motion. But may I say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis)—if he would mind listening to me just a moment—that I think it is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that he as a member of the House of Commons is walking around with so many distrusts. He has said plainly he does not believe that the cost of living index is a correct index of the actual cost of living.

Mr. GILLIS: I know it is not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Everybody knows it is not.

Mr. CLEAVER: In addition to that, he says wages have not increased since 1939.

Mr. GILLIS: No, I did not.

Mr. CLEAVER: In addition to that, he says he does not believe the figures which have been given through the wartime prices and trade board of the need for the increase in the selling price of agricultural implements. I would not bring up all these points if I did not have a constructive suggestion to make to him, and it is just this. We have parliamentary committees of this house. If any hon. member has reason to doubt the ability of officials who prepare such figures or the correctness of official figures which are issued we have an instrument at our disposal; we can check their correctness; and I say to my hon. friend, in all good friendship, that if he doubts the correctness of the cost of living index he should take the matter up with the bureau—

Mr. GILLIS: I have done that many times.

Mr. CLEAVER:—get the information, as I have done, as to how they prepare it. Then, if he is not satisfied, he should bring the matter before a parliamentary committee where he will get a proper hearing. Obviously we cannot adequately go into a matter of this kind on the floor of the house. But let him follow the matter to a satisfactory conclusion.

The same thing applies in regard to these implement companies. In principle, the C.C.F. party is apparently in complete agreement with the government in so far as price controls are concerned, but we are as far apart as the two poles in our opinion as to the need for the increase in the selling prices of agricultural implements. We have machinery whereby those figures can be checked and verified. I am told—maybe I am wrong and my hon. friends across the floor are right—that for the past number of years the agricultural implement industry have been producing implements at an actual loss, but they have been making sufficient profits on their war contracts to offset that loss, to considerably more than offset it. The time has, however now arrived when these war contracts are no longer in existence and when the implement industry must stand on its own feeet. If what I am told is correct, my hon. friends across the house should support the wartime prices and trade board in approving that increase. If my information is incorrect I, too, should be opposing the increase. Let us go at this matter in a businesslike way, find out who is right, check the figures, and then act accordingly.

I seldom take the time of the house to express my views on anything but an important subject. But as I pondered in my office the motion of want of confidence which was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on May 6, and as I have listened to the speeches which were made on that motion, I felt that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express my views. I feel strongly that the time has arrived when we should make up our minds as to which way we are going. The time has arrived when we should decide whether we want inflation as we experienced it after the last war or whether we do not want it. I do not think anyone who went through the distressing times which we had during that last inflationary period wants a recurrence of it; and I was surprised that the hon. member for Cape Breton South brushed off so blithely the "bogey of inflation", as he termed it. I was wondering where he was when we went through those distressing times after the last war, and privately I am going to ask him some time. I went through those times, and I do not want a recurrence. Every hon. member knows who suffers during an inflationary period, which is always followed by a deflationary period.

Mr. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): That is why we did not want to see the price ceilings broken.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am happy that my hon. friend says that; I have been happy to hear him repeat it so often in the house, and I think we can get together, because we are not so far apart in our viewpoints.

As I say the time has arrived when we must make a decision as to which way we are going. We know the government's policy. We have many times had an expression from the leader of the C.C.F. party and members of that party; they have announced their policy. As far as the government policy is concerned, it is, as I understand it, simply this, that we shall retain the price ceiling and the various controls which were so necessary and worked so satisfactorily during the war, just so long only as we must retain them in order to keep our economy on an even keel, and that we shall get rid of those controls just as quickly as that can be done with safety.

As far as the C.C.F. party is concerned, I do not want them to take offence at what I am now going to say, but I am saying it because I believe it to be true. They agree with us in principle, but time after time I have noticed that when some group, representing labour or the farmers or some other interest, comes here wanting an improvement in its individual position, the C.C.F. party, instead of sticking to its established principle, is willing to bend it at that place even though it should throw the whole price structure out of control.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is wrong.

Mr. CLEAVER: If I am wrong I am happy to find I am wrong, and I hope that when the vote comes on the motion of the Conservative party, as it will in a few days the C.C.F. party will vote to prove I am wrong.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope the hon. member will vote for our sub-amendment.

Mr. CLEAVER: As to the Conservatives, I think the time has arrived when the leader and the party itself, in fairness to themselves and to the country, should announce what their policy is in regard to price control. The country is entitled to know that. Down to date I have not heard any official declaration as to where the party stands with regard to the price ceiling and these controls. So far the party has contented itself with flank attacks on price controls. No one other than, perhaps, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has had courage enough to rise in his place and say positively that he wants all the controls removed at once. The party up to date has contented itself with flank attacks. This particular motion is another flank attack, and in introducing the motion the leader of the party was very careful to omit, or at any rate he did omit, to say anything at all about his party's policy in regard to controls.

As to the general policy of the government, let us take labour first. I have heard many people say that labour throughout the war has profited more than any other group. But when I look at the Labour Gazette for March, 1946, at page 335, I find in a table there showing the number of employees as reported on January 1, 1946, in the different groups covered by that table, that approximately 1,717,000 employees receive an average weekly wage of $29.85. I ask the house this question: Under present-day living conditions and costs, can any married man rear a family on a smaller amount per week? I say no. So that to those who argue in that way, and if the Conservative opposition feels that the ground for the present motion is that labour is getting too much, I suggest that these figures adequately answer that contention.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

I concede at once that in certain isolated instances it is possible that considerations were extended to some small groups of labour which were too generous; but in discussing the whole problem of the price structure and controls, we cannot get anywhere by simply referring to isolated cases. I submit that we must look at the broad picture of the total figures, taking averages rather than individual instances.

To come to the farm group, what has happened there? I have a statement from the bureau of statistics showing that the farm income in 1939 was $722·3 million; that is the cash farm income. I concede at once that the industry was a depressed industry at that time, but may I point out to the leader of the opposition that, while agricultural income was $722·3 million in 1939 and the industry was then in a distressed condition, the distress at that time was nothing like what it was in the early thirties when the party of his adoption was in power. Following down from 1939, I find that in 1945 the cash farm income had more than doubled over 1939. It is now $1,654 million.

When the leader of the opposition launches this motion and makes the bald statement that agriculture is not being properly treated in the present price structure, I ask him to be good enough to indicate by what percentage farm income should be increased to bring it up to parity or an amount commensurate with the receipts of labour, of the manufacturer, and of the other groups in the country. Obviously you cannot advance one without considering all the others, and if the leader of the opposition honestly thinks agriculture is not to-day receiving its fair share of the national income, the least he could do would be to indicate to the house the percentage by which he considers it is being unfairly treated.

Mr. SENN: Does the hon. member think agriculture is getting a fair proportion of the national income to-day?

Mr. CLEAVER: I say this to the hon. member for Haldimand, and I thank him for the question. I think that, compared with the total national income and with the taxes of all the groups in Canada to-day, agriculture is getting a proper proportionate share of the total as far as it is possible for any human being to bring this about. A man would need to be a Solomon to do any better.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Ask your own Minister of Agriculture if he is satisfied.

Mr. SENN: You had better page the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. PROBE: Will the hon. member give us the figures for all groups? He is pursuing an excellent argument right there if he would go farther.

Mr. CLEAVER: I will do the best I can in the time at my disposal.

Mr. PROBE: The manufacturers too.

Mr. CLEAVER: This motion is a want of confidence motion because, if it carries, the government resigns. Surely that type of motion is not to be made on any irresponsible or ill-considered grounds, and the least the leader of the opposition can do is to indicate to the house the percentage by which he thinks agriculture is being unfairly treated. Then, having done that, he must not stop there. His duty does not end there. He should then frankly admit, "It is true that if we increase agriculture, say, ten per cent, giving it another $160 million, the cost of living goes up". Then he should frankly tell the house, "In view of that increase in the cost of living, I think labour should receive an additional percentage", and he should indicate what in his opinion should be that percentage. After he gets through with that, with wages having increased, and manufacturers' costs having undoubtedly increased, he should indicate to the house to what extent he thinks the manufacturer should be permitted to increase the wholesale selling price of his products.

If anyone is dissatisfied with our present price structure, is that not the obvious thing for him to do, to explain the reasons for his dissatisfaction, keeping in mind all the different groups; because, after all, no one likes price control; no one likes wage control. These controls were imposed as a matter of necessity; the necessity continues, and until it passes we must have them. It is, therefore, only natural that all the different groups should selfishly take their own viewpoint.

But that is no reason why a responsible member of the house should not advance some sound reasons before moving a want of confidence motion asking that the government resign office because of the unfair way it is treating a certain group. I have yet to hear one word of proof from the leader of the opposition in justification of that motion.

I come now to the actual motion itself. I am now coming to my quarrel with the leader of the opposition, if you wish to put it in that way, and I am glad that he is here, because I want to talk to him. Speaking to the house on May 6, he stated, as reported at page 1244 of Hansard:

> I wish, therefore, to raise a question of major importance to the chief primary industry of this country and to the country itself, namely—

And this is the matter he wanted to raise.

> —the inequitable position in which agriculture now finds itself and the lessened production as a result of that inequity.

I should like to read two or three other quotations to make it clear beyond all shadow of doubt what was said on that day, because I think my hon. friend will be a little bit ashamed and apologetic of the stand he took at that time. He went on to say that production in agriculture is lower now than it was last year. Then at page 1245 of Hansard he said this:

> On the whole, farm production in Canada has been declining since 1944; 1945 was lower than 1944, and 1946 will be lower than 1945. I suggest that, if the farmers were given the necessary stimulus to produce, the situation would be greatly improved.

I suggest that if these words mean anything at all they mean that the farmer has lessened the production of food in this country because the prices are not satisfactory to him. Knowing the farmers of my riding as well as I do, and admiring as much as I do the wonderful contribution made by agriculture during the last war, the way in which, notwithstanding labour troubles and the shortage of farm machinery, they rose to the emergency and produced food supplies in quantities that were the admiration of the world; keeping all these things in mind, I say that it little behooves any member of this house, even though the motion is couched in such flowery, inoffensive language, to say in effect, in the words of the motion, that the farmers of Canada are carrying on a mode of sabotage or a sit-down strike and are declining to produce foodstuffs that the world so badly needs, simply because they are not getting high enough prices.

I wish to say to the leader of the opposition that he knows—and he should know it better than anyone in Canada—that last year, one of the years he complains about, the farmers had more acreage in production than ever before; but we had a smaller crop. Why? Simply because weather conditions were unfavourable. Are the farmers of this country to be faced with the accusation that appears in this motion, the accusation that appears in the speech of the leader of the opposition, namely that of deliberately curtailing production because the price was not right, simply because nature let them down after they had done everything that they could do?

Let us have the figures. Unlike the leader of the opposition, I do not ask anyone to take my thoughts on a subject unsupported by the facts. I hold in my hand a statement issued by the bureau of statistics, agricultural branch. Let us take wheat. Last year our farmers sowed 23.4 million acres to wheat. Looking over the table that I hold in my hand, I see that over a period of six years that was the largest acreage sown to wheat in any of those years. Notwithstanding that fact, the crop yield is very much lower.

Mr. ROWE: Summer-fallow did not help it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am not talking about summer-fallow. The crop yield last year was 129·6 million bushels less than the previous year, although in the previous year there was less acreage sown to wheat. When one compares that with the bumper year of 1942 he will find that the crop yield last year was still greater in deficit when compared with that other year. Is the farmer to blame; is the farmer to be maligned and that nasty innuendo go out that he has deliberately decreased production because the price is not right? I say that statement is positively untrue and should be retracted.

I now come to oats. In oats we have the same story. Last year 14·4 million acres were sown to oats, whereas in the previous year only 14·3 million acres were sown, and yet the yield is down 118 million bushels. Are the farmers to blame for that? Is the wartime prices and trade board to blame for that? Is the price structure to blame for that? Let us follow on through with barley. All through the picture the story is the same.

There is not a word of truth in the charge made by the leader of the opposition and in the innuendo contained in the motion that the farmers of this country have put on a sit-down strike and decline to produce as much food as they could, simply because the price structure is not right. I know the leader of the opposition would dearly love to get into power and I fancy he would do quite a bit to try to get there; but I want to tell him in the friendliest spirit that he underestimates, and he almost insults, the intelligence of the farmers of this country when he adopts the tactics that he adopted in his speech when introducing this motion on May 6 last.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer, namely farm implements. I come from a rural riding. I know I am treading on dangerous ground when I say anything about the cost of farm implements, because over half of my electors are farmers. The house well knows that if you want to get cheers at any farm gathering all you have to do is to build up a good case against either the packers or the implement companies, and you are off to a good start. However, I believe that the present is an occasion when we should frankly speak our minds and when we should not do anything to make a difficult situation any worse.

I am told, and I honestly believe the information to be correct, that the 12½ per cent increase recently granted to the implement industry does not compensate the industry for the increase in labour and material costs which it has experienced. If that is correct—and I believe it to be correct—and when one bears in mind the fact that we so badly need the implements, is it not the part of wisdom to make it possible for our farmers to get these implements? I have been told by farmer friends that the implement situation is so bad that at auction sales secondhand machines are selling for almost as much as new implements.

An hon. MEMBER: And more.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why?

Mr. CLEAVER: Because of the shortage of farm implements.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And the income tax.

Mr. CLEAVER: Here is another thing that should be kept in mind. It is strange but true that no farmer can dispassionately discuss the cost of farm implements with you. It is a subject that you cannot talk to any farmer about on a businesslike basis.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, you can.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is the hon. member's experience, is it?

Mr. ROWE: Yes.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is not mine, and I have ofttimes kidded my farmers in that respect. It is a touchy subject.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is, when you do not raise their prices.

Mr. CLEAVER: Here are the figures. I am making this statement so that it will be on the record. It is estimated that if the implement companies do everything that they hope to this year they will produce in Canada just under $34 million worth of Canadian-built implements. What is 12½ per cent on $34 million? It is $4·25 million. Now I ask my hon. friends in the Conservative opposition on the other side of the house, who are moaning about these increases in the prices of farm implements, to relate that $4·25 million to the total farm income, which is over $1,600 million. What do you get? You reach a figure of less than one-tenth of one per cent. There is another point to consider. The life of most of these implements is more than ten years, so you divide that figure of one-tenth of one per cent by ten, and reach the figure of one one-hundredth of one per cent.

I suggest that we have reached a time in our economy when we have to be courageous enough to speak our minds, if we are to get anywhere, and when we have to face this problem in a businesslike fashion instead of trying to whip up the sectional feelings of the people.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): In rising to support the amendment moved by the leader of this party, I wish to state briefly the views of a large number of western farmers to whom I have spoken about the matters contained in the amendment, particularly one subject which is dealt with in these words:

> . . . the government's price ceiling policies . . . are imposing on the food producers of Canada an unfair share of the burden of maintaining the government's price stabilization policies.

The farmers of western Canada believe that, and feel strongly about it.

However, before going on with that point, I should like to say it seems to me that most of the complaints of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), who has just taken his seat, against this party boil down to the petulant complaint that this party has not yet published an agricultural price control policy for the government to follow. Had we done so probably we would have been fine fellows. The hon. gentleman accused the leader of this party of belittling the farmers by saying they were going on a sit-down strike, and so forth. I am not a bit afraid to say that as far as the hog producers of Alberta are concerned they have gone on at least a semi-sit-down strike. A certain number of them have definitely quit raising hogs entirely because of the prices they have received in relation to the price they could get for the barley, while large numbers of others have considerably reduced their hog production. This is at least one definite instance where you have a refusal on the part of farmers to produce an extremely important commodity because of the price policy of the government.

Mr. CLEAVER: It would not be because of a shortage of coarse feeds?

Mr. HARKNESS: If you will look up the figures of the shipments of coarse grains from Alberta to eastern Canada you will find that it was not due to any shortage of coarse grains.

Before going farther, I should like also to say to hon. gentlemen to my immediate left, who are extremely fond of poking gibes at the members of this party and of accusing them of inconsistency, and so on, that they would do much better to devote themselves to educating public opinion, if that is the proper word, to their ideas rather than spending so much time in this house attacking ours.

In that connection, I should like to make it plain that there is one fundamental conception as far as I am concerned on which my remarks are based. It is that artificial control of prices and arbitrary distribution of commodities are contrary to the conceptions of free trade and free enterprise under which Canada has developed from the very beginning and in which the great majority of the people of this country quite evidently believe, as shown by the results of the last federal election. Artificial controls are the essence of a socialistic state, and the people of this dominion demonstrated at the polls that they do not want a socialistic state, as evidenced by their lack of support for hon. members to my left. So that I think we may take it for granted as something definite that everyone will admit that the majority of the people of this country are believers in free enterprise. In view of that fact, I think all believers in free enterprise, including the government, who profess so to believe, should now be bending their thoughts and energies toward the abolition of all those controls which were forced upon us during the war. One evil at least, of price control has been well demonstrated in this and many other debates we have had in this house. That is, you have endless arguments as to how these price controls should be worked, which should be upped, which should be taken off, which should be reduced, and so forth, all of which is motivated essentially by the desire on the part of each economic group in the country to improve its lot at the expense of some other group.

To come back to the western farmer for whom I intend to speak chiefly, even among those who are socialistically inclined the realization has finally spread that they are bearing almost the entire burden of price controls on many agricultural products, particularly on wheat. As a result, there is now a very widespread feeling in the west that we should get world market prices for our grain. Along with this is the almost universal belief that if the government will not permit the people of the west to obtain world prices; if it is to continue price controls on farm products and thus subsidize the consumer in Europe as well as the consumer in Canada, then all the taxpayers in Canada should shoulder the load equally instead of leaving it to the farmer to pay the shot.

To show that the farmer is carrying the load, I should like to quote a few figures. At the present time the price of wheat at Chicago is $2.18½ in Canadian funds; and at this point I may say that any figures I quote will be in Canadian funds. The price at Fort William is $1.55 a bushel. That represents a subsidy of 63½ cents a bushel on all wheat shipped out of this country for overseas use, and the entire amount of that subsidy is carried by the wheat producer. He has to stand the whole shot and he is getting a little tired of that. You have an analogous situation in regard to barley. At Duluth the price of barley is $1.48 for the best grade. At Winnipeg the price is 84¾ cents, with the exclusion of damp barley, and that covers all grades; it is a flat price. Here again we have a subsidy of 63¼ cents a bushel on barley, paid by the man who grows it. The situation with regard to oats is similar; I need not give the figures.

But this is by no means the end of the story. Western wheat growers subsidize all consumers of wheat in Canada to the tune of 30 cents a bushel, owing to the fact that the price for consumption in Canada is $1.25 a bushel, whereas the price for export is $1.55. That is a direct subsidy by the farmers to the Canadian consumer of wheat to an extent of 30 cents a bushel. However, in addition to that, the general public, the taxpayers—and this includes, of course, the farmers in western Canada—pay a further subsidy of 47⅜ cents a bushel, on account of the control which makes the price of wheat to millers 77⅝ cents. In other words, that is a further load put on the backs of the farmers, and on the backs of the rest of the people in the country.

There is still another chapter to the story. Not only does the western producer subsidize all eastern consumption of barley and oats for live stock feeding purposes, but he also bears his share of the freight subsidy paid by the government on the movement of that grain to eastern Canada. It is a combination of these subsidies of one kind or another which the western farmer must bear. With him, of course, are all the people in the west, because practically everyone lives off the farms, or as a result of farm production.

The result is that the western people are sometimes annoyed when some people complain to the effect that the western farmer is always whining. Indeed, that was stated last year by an hon. member on the opposite side of the house. People in western Canada are annoyed when other people in the east talk about their having to shoulder the entire tax burden, and paying 85 per cent of the taxes.

[Mr. Harkness.]

In these various subsidies on wheat alone which the western farmer has to pay, he pays a tremendous hidden tax which is never even mentioned, and which does not appear anywhere. That is the general story showing how agricultural price controls are to a large extent paid for by western farmers.

I should like to mention one other example of how the western farmer is penalized, and that is in respect of durum wheat. I have here a press release of April 10, 1944, from the Canadian wheat board, which states:

re: Durum wheat prices

Before the seeding of wheat actually begins, the board feels it necessary to advise those producers concerned that it is becoming increasingly difficult to sell durum wheat at any premium above bread wheats. The visible supply of durum is about 4 million bushels, mostly in country and lakehead elevators. Under normal market circumstances, the producers would have current information through cash market quotations to guide them, but these quotations are not available at present. By this announcement at this time the board merely wishes to inform producers as to the present price relationship between durum and bread wheats.

They need not have bothered making an announcement, because what happened was that there was no premium on durum wheat. There is no premium at the present time. Before these controls went into effect, durum wheat averaged a premium of from eight to ten cents a bushel, sometimes running up to fifteen cents. Now, as hon. members know, those wheats are used to make macaroni, and the alphabets which are put in alphabet soup. The producer enjoys no premium on that production at all. In other words, it is just another crack at the farm producer, another penalty under which he suffers.

I should like to say something about beef prices. In my opinion, prices received for beef on the hoof have not increased to anything like the extent to which retail prices have been allowed to increase. In other words, there is not a good relationship. In this connection the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is reported as follows at page 1247 of Hansard:

In 1941 the price of steak was 48 cents a pound or some price related to that, and cattle were selling at around nine cents a pound.

The best that can be said about that statement is that it is half right. The latter part of it is right. Cattle were selling at nine cents a pound.

Mr. GARDINER: And beef steaks at forty eight cents.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister was misinformed when he said that beef steaks were selling at forty eight cents a pound. I have here a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press of October 20, 1941. Hon. members will see why I have saved it. It was the issue announcing the fixing of wage and price ceilings.

Mr. GARDINER: The price is written right into the controls. The hon. member does not need to have the Free Press; it is right in the controls.

Mr. HARKNESS: In this issue is an advertisement of the Hudson's Bay company and, among other things, meat prices are listed. It states that, on a cash and carry basis, sirloin steaks were to be sold at twenty seven cents a pound.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the date of that paper?

Mr. HARKNESS: October 20, 1941, the very day on which these price ceilings were announced.

Mr. GARDINER: What was porterhouse steak?

Mr. HARKNESS: Porterhouse steak was not listed there. I shall give some further figures.

Mr. GARDINER: There are a lot of steaks, you know.

Mr. HARKNESS: Lamb chops, twenty two cents a pound.

Mr. GARDINER: With the bone in, or the bone out?

An hon. MEMBER: Never mind the bone.

Mr. HARKNESS: Here is one the minister need not worry about; boneless stewing beef, sixteen cents a pound, cash and carry; seventeen cents delivered.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the lowest.

Mr. HARKNESS: No, that is not the lowest. Brisket of beef is eleven cents; shoulder of boiling beef, eleven cents; chuck roast of beef fifteen cents; shoulder roast of beef seventeen cents; prime rib roast of beef twenty three cents; wieners twenty cents.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will permit, just to have the record clear may I say my statement was to the effect that prices of beef in 1941 were approximately the same as prices in 1928, and that prices of cattle in 1928 were very much higher than prices of cattle in 1941. Now, with prices of beef only slightly up, prices of cattle are back to about where they were in 1928.

Mr. HARKNESS: I may be a little dense, but to me the minister's statement is unintelligible.

Mr. GARDINER: Read it in Hansard tomorrow and you will understand it.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister says prices of beef are slightly up. I have read the prices of beef as advertised in the Free Press on that date.

Mr. GARDINER: And I again submit that the official prices are those which should be quoted.

Mr. HARKNESS: All anyone has to do is to look at the prices in any paper to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member to be permitted to read—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The minister may speak, with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. GARDINER: The prices I quoted were actual prices set by the board. It is not necessary to take Free Press prices for things that are not comparable. The prices are those set by the prices board in 1941, and there have not been any great increases from 1941 to the present time in those prices. Those are all official, and can be obtained.

Mr. HARKNESS: This paper is October 20, 1941. I do not think there is any need to read again the minister's statement in Hansard, but he said that in 1921 steak was selling at 48 cents a pound. I have just given a list of prices taken from the Free Press, and I have a few prices of other items at the present time: porterhouse roast, sirloin tip or wing roast, 47-49 cents per pound; rump roast, round steak, 42-46 cents per pound; sausage, breakfast style, 28-30 cents per pound; boneless stewing beef, 18-20 cents per pound. The same Winnipeg paper gives the quotations for cattle, which show that top beef ranged from $8.50 to $9 per 100 pounds at Winnipeg in 1941 when steak was selling at 27 cents per pound. The last market report I have is for May 9, which gives prices of better steers at Winnipeg as ranging from $12.50 to $12.75 per 100 pounds. Most items of meat in the retail stores have risen in price from 50 to over 100 per cent between that time and the present.

Mr. GARDINER: That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. HARKNESS: During the same time beef prices have risen from $9 to $12.50.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is quoting porterhouse steak—

Mr. HARKNESS: If the minister wishes to ask a question, I will sit down and he can ask it. If he has not a question, I ask him respectfully to keep quiet.

Mr. GARDINER: I will ask it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Calgary East has invited the question.

Mr. GARDINER: I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. HARKNESS: I did not invite a question. I said if the minister wanted to ask a question he should indicate that and not be constantly interrupting.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HARKNESS: I want to finish what I have to say. Briefly, the situation is that the retail price of meats has gone up from 50 to over 100 per cent, while the price of live cattle has risen from $8.50 and $9 per 100 pounds to $12 and $12.50, or approximately 35 per cent. Prices of cattle on the hoof have not gone up like prices of meat in the shops. If the minister wishes to ask a question I shall be delighted to try to answer it.

Mr. GARDINER: Was the hon. member not comparing sirloin steak with porterhouse steak?

Mr. HARKNESS: Porterhouse steak would perhaps be worth five cents per pound more.

Mr. GARDINER: Porterhouse steak is worth much more.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister is trying to labour the point and crawl out from under the remark he made in Hansard.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sticking right with the remark.

Mr. HARKNESS: The proposition gets down to this. The meat producer is being called upon to subsidize the general consuming public just the same as the wheat producer is being called upon to subsidize that public as well as overseas markets. I think that is a just statement to make. The proposition that the government price control policy has placed a heavy burden on the western farmer has been adequately proved, not just by what I have had to say but by what other hon. members have said in this house from time to time. I do not think there is any doubt that the government price control policy will have the result of reducing production.

There is no use in blinking our eyes at that or trying to throw up a smoke-screen. It is being said it is disgraceful that the farmers should be carrying on a sit-down strike, but I think we may as well admit that if the farmer or anyone else cannot get a fair return for his labour he will not try to put his product on the market if he can avoid doing so. In view of the unfairness to the western farmer, I feel I must call upon the government to raise the ceilings on agricultural products if they will not abolish them altogether. If it is desired that our own people shall be able to buy bread cheaply; if it is desired that the people in the overseas countries shall be able to do the same thing, then the cost of the necessary subsidies should be borne by the country as a whole and not be placed upon the shoulders of the western farmer.

On motion of Mr. Harkness the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 16, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 82, to incorporate the Executive Board of the Church of the Nazarene.—Mr. Warren.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

FISHING VESSELS AND FISH DRAGGERS—SUBSIDIES

Mr. FRASER:

To what firms, or individuals, did the Department of Fisheries pay subsidies regarding the construction of packer-seiner type fishing vessels and fish draggers, during 1945-1946?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

Packer-Seiner type: Brooks Bay Packing Co., Vancouver, B.C.; Nicolai Jurinicich, Vancouver, B.C.

Dragger type: W. B. Moriarity Co. Ltd., Halifax, N.S.; Halifax Fisheries Ltd., Halifax, N.S.; Lunenburg Sea Products, Lunenburg, N.S.

MAGNESIUM

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What quantity of magnesium products was produced by the Dominion Magnesium plant at Haley's Corners during 1944 and 1945?

2. What was the total amount of money paid to Dominion Magnesium for the management and operation of this plant?

3. What was the cost to the dominion government of setting up this plant?

4. What was the price at which this plant was sold to Dominion Magnesium Limited, Toronto?

5. How was the price arrived at?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 1944, 10,763,726 pounds; 1945, 7,798,205 pounds. (Of this latter amount, 3,948,204 pounds were produced by the company for its own account.)

2. Nil. The company agreed to manage and operate the plant until the cessation of hostilities without fee or profit.

3. $3,464,102.15.

4. $1,400,000.

5. The lack of an assured peace-time market for the product, the need for a capital outlay in excess of half a million dollars on the part of the purchaser for modification and improvements, heavy depreciation because of the character of the process and a reasonable write-off for high war-time construction costs were factors taken into account in determining the selling price.

WAR ASSETS—MATERIALS OR EQUIPMENT FOR MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. How many municipalities have applied to Crown Assets Allocation and War Assets Corporation for materials or equipment as of April 1, 1946?

2. How many of these have had their applications met by War Assets Corporation?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 1,639.

2. The priorities division, head office, War Assets Corporation, has filled 103 of these applications in full and 350 in part. In addition, many of these municipalities have had their applications met from branch offices of the corporation across Canada. The branch offices are not required to notify the priorities division of the corporation of these sales. Furthermore, in regard to the sale of certain surplus properties, such as real estate, the appropriate sales division at the Montreal head office of the corporation deals directly with the municipality without notification to the priorities division. It is therefore impossible to give a precise answer to this question.

WAR ASSETS—WINDSOR, N.S., TRANSIT CAMP

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Upon what date was the Windsor Transit Camp at Windsor, Nova Scotia, declared surplus?

2. Were electric motors, heating units, plumbing fittings and fixtures, and buildings from this camp disposed of? If so, to what persons or organizations?

3. Did other persons, firms or organizations in the Windsor district make application to purchase these materials and buildings?

4. If so, were they given an opportunity to purchase them at the same price at which they were finally disposed of?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. January 26, 1946.

2. Yes. The dominion government, Department of Labour, obtained the majority of the buildings, with services for the training of veterans under the Canadian vocational training programme.

3. Yes.

4. No sales other than that mentioned in No. 2 above have been made to date. Other individuals were not given an opportunity to purchase, because the application of the Department of Labour for training of veterans carried a higher priority than applications from the general public. Disposal of the remaining surpluses will be made in accordance with the established priority policy of War Assests Corporation.

VICTORY BONDS HELD BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. JOHNSTON:

1. What is the total amount of victory bonds held by the chartered banks of Canada?

2. What is the yearly amount of interest paid to the chartered banks in this connection?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Information as to holdings of particular dominion government issues is not of government record as a large proportion of each issue is in bearer form. In addition the monthly return of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks of Canada made to the Minister of Finance pursuant to section 112 of the Bank Act gives figures of total holdings of dominion government direct and guaranteed securities maturing within two years and other dominion government direct and guaranteed securities and does not segregate holdings of these two types of securities.

2. Answered by No. 1.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many persons were receiving unemployment insurance benefits as at January 31, 1946?

2. What were the new claims for each month, February, March and April, 1946?

3. How many persons were receiving unemployment insurance benefits as at April 30, 1946?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. 145,952.

2. February, 1946, 53,331; March, 1946, 49,467; April, 1946, not available.

3. April 1946, figures are not available. At March 31, 1946, the number receiving unemployment insurance benefits was 154,820.

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the total amount in the Unemployment Insurance Fund as at December 31, 1945?

2. How much was put into the fund for the first four months of 1946 by (a) employers; (b) employees; (c) government?

3. What was the amount paid out in benefits during the first four months of 1946?

4. What was the amount of the fund as of April 30, 1946?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. $315,937,572.37.

2. These figures are for the first three months of 1946 only; April figures not available. (a) $7,366,543.21; (b) $8,752,807.37; (c) $3,223,870.12.

3. This figure for first three months of 1946 only: $17,595,590.51.

4. $319,369,134.33. (Of this amount $1,683,931.77 is interest.) This figure to March 31, 1946, only.

PRISONERS OF WAR ON FARMS

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What salary, wages or other compensation are farmers required to pay for the services of prisoners of war working on farms?

2. How much of such compensation is payable directly to the prisoner by his employer?

3. How much of such compensation is held back for the credit of the prisoner of war to be given him at a later date?

4. When is such hold-back given to the prisoner of war?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. At present time $50 per month plus board and lodging, or $1.75 per day for broken periods of less than one month's employment plus board and lodging, payable to the Department of Labour. This rate has been established in Ontario, with the approval of the dominion-provincial farm labour committee, and is also in effect in other provinces.

2 and 3. The Department of Labour pays prisoners of war at the rate of 50 cents per working day. This amount is credited to the prisoner's individual account, which is carried by the Department of National Defence, less such portion thereof as is spent by the prisoner on purchase of canteen supplies.

4. By transfer of funds upon evacuation from Canada.

GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD

4. If so, what were the total recoveries made from insurers?

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What is the daily cost per inmate to the state in each of the penitentiaries in Canada, and how does this figure compare with twenty years ago?
2. Of total inmates, what percentage are repeaters?
3. How does this percentage compare with the figures of recent years, since world war 1?
4. What gratuities are awarded long-termers, say of five years or more, upon discharge? Is it an increase over that of twenty years ago?

INFRACTIONS OF SUGAR RATIONING REGULATIONS

Mr. GINGUES:

1. From February 1, 1942, to date, how many industrial users of sugar have been convicted of infractions of the sugar rationing regulations in each province?
2. What are their names and addresses?
3. What was the court sentence in each case?
4. What fines were imposed?
5. Were business operations of such violators suspended?
6. If so, for what number of days in each case?

VETERANS LAND ACT INSURANCE FUND

FOOD

CONDITIONS IN EUROPE—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): In view of the widespread starvation in Europe will the Acting Prime Minister tell the house what further steps the government intends to take to avert needless human suffering caused by lack of food in Europe?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The Canadian government has made it clear on a number of occasions that it recognizes the urgency of the food situation in Europe and Asia and that it is prepared to cooperate, and is cooperating, with the United Kingdom, the United States and other nations in making additional food available for shipment abroad. Without in any way detracting from the efforts of other countries, I think it is recognized that the people of Canada have made and are making a notable contribution to the relief of hunger and starvation the world over. The question asked by my hon. friend relates to the further steps the government intends to take. My answer can only be this: that the Canadian government intends to continue its present policy of cooperation with other governments in providing food so that hunger and starvation will be minimized if they cannot be averted. If this cooperation involves measures in addition to those already taken, they will be announced in due course.

WHEAT

PAYMENT ON 1943 WHEAT PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister say when payments on the 1943 wheat participation certificates will be made, and what amount per bushel will be paid on the different grades?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A short time ago I announced in the house that the payments on the 1943 wheat participation certificates would be made early in June. So far as I know the board is hoping to be able, and feel confident they will be, to start the issuing of cheques on the 1943 wheat participation certificates in June. I should like to say to the hon. member for Souris that it is just a matter of being able to get the cheques out. The accounting has all been done; it is just a matter of doing the physical work of issuing the cheques, and they will be issued as quickly as possible.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the amount of payment?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is impossible for me to say in advance of the issuing of the payments what the amounts of each payment will be.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF ANSWERS GIVEN TO QUESTIONS ON MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yesterday the Minister of National Revenue answered two questions of mine—Hansard, page 1546—that were on the order paper, but the answers do not give the information that is asked for in the question. I therefore should like to ask the minister if he would review the questions again and give full information asked for. One question was:

What is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's share of the cost of producing and broadcasting the "Johnny Home Show?"

In his answer the minister said that there had been no cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in producing and broadcasting the "Johnny Home Show."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FRASER: He added that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is a lengthy one; I suggest to the hon. member that he put it on the order paper.

Mr. FRASER: I had it on the order paper. I asked what the costs were and the minister said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation supplies part of the time of a staff producer, and station and network facilities. The answer did not give me the cost, and that is what I asked for. I should like to ask the minister if he will review that question, and the other question which was asked regarding the broadcast "The People Ask", and give me the cost which I asked for.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I shall be very glad to have the answers reviewed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPRESENTATION OF EMPLOYERS AT CLEVELAND MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Did the government invite Canadian employers to send representatives to the recent conference held at Cleveland, U.S.A., under the auspices of the international labour organization? Was the invitation accepted? If not, what reason was given by employers for their non-participation?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The Department of Labour did invite employers to send representatives to the international labour organization meeting referred to by my hon. friend, and it was agreed that they would nominate representatives to attend. But later we were informed that it was found impossible to find men who had sufficient knowledge of the questions which would arise who would leave their business to attend this particular conference. Two representatives of the employers did attend the second conference.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. As Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs can he say what action the government has taken on the extradition treaty with the United States and the report that was made on it by the committee on external affairs last session.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): After the report of the special committee on external affairs was tabled in this house negotiations were resumed with the United States authorities on the extradition treaty and protocol, and these negotiations are still proceeding.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality and naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Before the motion is put there are two or three observations I should like to make in regard to the meaning of citizenship. Speaking to the amendment which I moved in committee on May 7, I said, as reported at page 1300 of Hansard:

> This amendment is not meant to be all-exclusive, nor is it meant to be all-inclusive. My first suggestion is that if the Secretary of State accepts the principle of the need in this country of a bill of rights signifying what citizenship stands for, then possibly the best means whereby that result could be effected would be to set up a committee of the house. It would not take very long for that committee to meet and it would afford an opportunity to exchange ideas among the various groups in the house and thereby evolve a bill of rights which would be acceptable to all, and one which would carry into effect the highest principles of citizenship.

I think I can safely say that in the course of the discussion on the amendment there was almost unanimity, as close an approach to it as can ever be expected in a representative institution, on the need of a bill of rights. One hon. member after another rose in his place in the house in support of the principles embodied in the amendment which I introduced. Some hon. members took the stand that it was too much circumscribed, and that in any event it could not possibly be comprised in the few words which I used in the amendment. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I could have order. I cannot compete with what goes on behind the curtains.

I was saying that there was general unanimity on the need of a bill of rights, but there was also fairly strong opinion expressed by the hon. members immediately to my left, by hon. members of the Social Credit party and others, that a bill of rights, to be effective, must comprise more than what was confined within the ambit of my amendment. Finally the government, represented by the president of the privy council, placed this view before the house. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) dealt with the whole question of rights, freedoms and privileges. As reported at page 1477 of Hansard he said:

> The hon. member for Lake Centre and I are very close together in this thing, but I suggest to him to-night that this is far greater than this trivial and piffling amendment dealing with three simple rights among a multitude of rights . . .
> Why cannot we in this parliament get together on this issue? Why cannot all parties form a committee to consider these things apart altogether from this bill? If necessary that committee could call in advisers from the various provinces.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that not what I suggested?
> Mr. Mackenzie: It is not what this piffling amendment says at all, and that is why I say we cannot support the amendment.

The minister joined with me and said there was very little difference between us. Apparently the only point of divergence was as to the method of operation. I can say that there was never any disagreement between us because I said the same thing as he said in my opening paragraph when I introduced the amendment. I suggest, therefore, that, being in entire agreement with my hon. friend and with those who have expressed themselves on this question—the leader of the C.C.F. party, the leader of the Social Credit party and others—now is the time for us to make a declaration that a bill of rights shall be brought into this parliament which will assure that what we all desire in this regard shall be now determined and declared.

Section 27 of the bill as passed reads as follows:

> A Canadian citizen other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all rights, powers and privileges and be subject to all obligations, duties and liabilities to which a natural-born Canadian citizen is entitled or subject and, on and after becoming a Canadian citizen, shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have a like status to that of a natural-born Canadian citizen.

There were those who raised the objection that the amendment did not go far enough; that it did not comprise citizenship of those who were Canadians by birth. I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who raised that point, and it was an effective one. I could not but fail to accept it, because after all, what we are trying to do here is to get a bill of rights which will be the epitome of the wishes of all hon. members of the house. The section says:

> . . . a Canadian citizen, shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have a like status to that of a natural-born Canadian citizen.

I know of no other section which would permit of a definition of the rights of citizenship. Having regard to the measure of agreement that there is amongst us, and answering the appeal made by the minister in which he asked us all to get together, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

> That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend it as follows:

1. By adding subsection 2 to section 27 as follows:

"27 (2) That when this act comes into force, if parliament be then sitting or if parliament be not then sitting within ten days after the next session begins, the question of adopting a bill of rights, so as to assure the maintenance and preservation of democratic and traditional processes of liberty and of equality under the law of all Canadian citizens without regard to race, creed or colour, shall be submitted to the House of Commons in a resolution to be considered in a select committee properly representative of the entire population of Canada."

Sir, by this amendment the views of all hon. members on all sides of the house will have an opportunity for expression. Out of that common expression and common cooperation —because after all this matter is above partisan consideration—there will come a declaration that will assure the preservation of democratic rights and ensure that in the years to come men and women, Canadians all, will be able to look back and say: These are our rights; no longer are they nebulous; no longer do they consist only in tradition and in precedent. They have been epitomized by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not at this time propose to discuss the merits or demerits of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I desire only to refer Your Honour to the obvious rules of the house. In doing so I would refer Your Honour to paragraph 710 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 238. I quote:

All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

That is taken from May at page 421. Then, again, quoting paragraph 712 in the same volume:

On the third reading of a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act—

Most of us were in the house at that time.

—an amendment was moved that the bill be not now read a third time because it does not provide for complete government ownership of the Bank of Canada. This amendment involved the main subject matter dealt with in the bill. The Speaker ruled it out of order on the ground that it was an expanded negative.

And thirdly, at paragraph 713 in the same volume:

On the motion for the third reading of a bill to incorporate the Bank of Canada, an amendment that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole, with instruction that they have power to amend same so as to safeguard the sovereignty of parliament over Canada's financial policy, was ruled out of order for the following reasons: "The amendment is irrelevant."

I submit that this amendment is irrelevant to any of the essential principles of the bill. The paragraph continues:

"The sovereignty of parliament cannot be affected by the passage of a bill in this house. The sovereignty of parliament is created and defined by the British North America Act, Section 91 of which states that it shall be lawful for the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to all matters, except those assigned to provincial legislatures and, inter alia, subjects enumerated therein, including banking, incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money. The sovereignty of parliament can only be affected by an amendment to the British North America Act."

This is the most decisive citation, where a Speaker's decision is approved by the House of Commons. It was moved that the bill be not now read a third time but that all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"The bill be referred back to the committee of the whole with the request—

Note those words, "with the request."

—that the government consider ways and means of providing compensation—

And so on. Then it continues:

Mr. Speaker ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the ground that a bill may be referred back with instruction either that the committee have power to amend it in certain particulars or for further consideration; it cannot be referred back—

These are the words upon which I base my contention—

It cannot be referred back with the request that certain matters be considered by the government.

That was a decision of a Speaker, upheld by the House of Commons. The same principle is now involved in the amendment now offered by the hon. member.

Again at page 503 of the same volume:

On the motion for third reading: (a) Amendment proposing to refer a bill back to the committee of the whole with instruction to amend it so as to safeguard the sovereignty of parliament is out of order.

As I said before, speaking with the consent of such of my colleagues as were present, I made certain declarations the other evening. The hon. member for Lake Centre is now endeavouring to anticipate, by way of direction, the policy of the administration and government of Canada by forcing it into a position where it does not belong. I suggest that the hon. member's amendment is entirely out of order.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that an examination of the precedents put before Your Honour by the leader of the house will show that they are not analogous to this situation. It would appear to me that an amendment to the motion for third reading is in the same category as an amendment to second reading, provided it does not introduce a new subject. That makes this amendment clearly in order, because it introduces no new subject. Section 27 of the bill deals with the rights and obligations of Canadian citizens. The proposition is not that any direction should be given to the government of the day with regard to what it should do or what it should not do, but rather that an opportunity be given parliament and the House of Commons to discuss the reason why, in the opinion of so many people, it is necessary that a bill of rights be considered by parliament.

I suggest that the amendment by no means introduces a new matter of business; it does not bring in any new subject. It deals with a subject already dealt with in section 27 of the bill. For these reasons I suggest the amendment is in order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I have a word on the point of order? I am referring to standing order 77, and citations 813 and following. That paragraph or citation states:

> When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

It seems to me that the house always has authority to govern its own procedure. The fact that rulings of Speakers in different parliaments from time to time have been upheld by those parliaments should not bind subsequent parliaments for ever. We now have before us an amendment to the third reading of the bill which purports to give to the house what most hon. members desired when the bill was in committee. It seems to me that, despite the rulings of former Speakers, upheld by former parliaments, this is a new parliament, and as such it has the right to make decisions as to its own rules and their interpretation. We should not be for ever bound by decisions made in the past.

I submit respectfully that a ruling of this description should not be invoked to prevent a member from bringing before the House of Commons on third reading something which many hon. members desired when the bill was in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We voted on it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I suggest to Your Honour that the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre should be declared in order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to dispute the wisdom or otherwise of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to the effect that this parliament should not feel bound by decisions rendered by Speakers in former parliaments, and upheld by those former parliaments. Be that as it may, the practice of paying some respect to judicial and parliamentary precedents is worthy of consideration. But on the merits of the question I would submit that, in the absence of any precedent, an amendment such as this could not be properly introduced and appended to a bill.

The bill deals with the right of citizenship, and is intended to provide permanent legislation. This would constitute an attempt, by way of amendment to a bill intended to be permanent legislation, to provide a direction as to what shall be done by somebody not named in the amendment, at this or at some other session of parliament.

Let us examine the terms of the amendment. It says:

> By adding subsection 2 to section 27 as follows: "27 (2) That when this act comes into force, if parliament be then sitting or if parliament be then not sitting within ten days after the next session begins, the question of adopting a bill of rights, so as to assure the maintenance and preservation of democratic and traditional processes of liberty and of equality under the law of all Canadian citizens without regard to race, creed or colour, shall be submitted to the House of Commons in a resolution to be considered in a select committee properly representative of the entire population of Canada."

What has all that to do with the permanent provisions of the citizenship bill? The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has argued that this does not give a direction to the government, that it does not deal with a sovereign power of parliament. That is one of the objections to it. It says that certain things shall be done, but it does not indicate who is to do them, or who is to take any responsibility for doing them. It would provide for the consideration of a bill of rights "so as to assure" and so on; that certain things "shall be submitted to the House of Commons". By whom? Are they to be submitted by the hon. member for Lake Centre? Are they to be submitted by Mr. Speaker, or by the government, or by whom? And this is to be "in a resolution to be considered in a select committee". Who is to introduce that resolution?

What possible sanction could there be for a provision for this kind in the bill? What can it be, other than a pious hope that there may be another opportunity to discuss this matter of civil rights at this session, and at this time?

On a motion for second reading of a bill something other than second reading may be recommended in an amendment. On a motion for second reading it may be said that, instead of reading the bill, the house should do something else. But when the motion for third reading comes up, it is all or nothing. That is the only question before the house. It can go back to the committee for some amendment to the bill, but it cannot go back to the committee for the house to take some other kind of action.

The only matter which at this stage of the procedure is open for discussion is whether this bill, with or without further amendments which might affect its provision for permanent legislation, be passed. I submit that it would be a very dangerous practice if parliament at one session were to determine, by legislation to be considered in the other place and to be sanctioned by the crown, what parliament should do at some other time. The right of parliament to exercise its sovereign powers exists continuously, and I submit that it is not in order to add to legislation of this kind or any kind a direction as to what parliament shall do at some future date if it happens to be in session when that piece of legislation comes into force, or what it shall do at another session if it is not in session when the legislation comes into force; and that is what the terms of this amendment provide for, without indicating upon whom any duty is cast by the provision itself.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The arguments advanced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) have, I submit, little to do with the question whether this amendment is in order. They have rather to do with the criticism he offers of the meaning and purport of the amendment. I refer Your Honour to section 708 of Beauchesne, third edition, 1943:

> When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.
