My information is that these cherries laid down on the American continent, irrespective of what they may be in Italy or elsewhere, cost from 18 to 19 cents. If you add all the other costs, including the duty, the excise and the exchange, that is increased by 48½ per cent, which makes the laid down cost of these outside cherries 26 or 27 cents a pound. In other words the processor here is purchasing these cherries at 16·32 cents per pound and the price of the imported cherries is 26 to 27 cents. Surely there should be sufficient margin there for the Canadian processor to handle the situation. But from the statement I have been given I understand the problem is that there is not sufficient sugar allowed to process all the cherries that might be used in Canada, and as a result other manufactured cherries do come in, even at a high price. They are being utilized for a special purpose. Anyone understands that when you have a cocktail party you do not worry much about the cost of the one cherry. Other things can be dealt with accordingly. So that that is not so much a factor, as the fact they want the cherry.

Mr. MacNICOL: They want the cocktail.

Mr. GARDINER: They are short, not because the producer is short on production, but because there is not enough sugar to carry out the curing process. But that is another question which, I suggest, should be discussed separately from this matter. If they should have more sugar, then that is a different problem.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is there anything in the schedule covering the dumping duty?

Mr. GARDINER: No; on checking last night I found, as was suggested by some hon. member on the opposite side of the house, that the dumping duty regulations were taken off during the war, and have not been re-established.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is nothing in there now?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there is no way to stop dumping at the present time.

Mr. LOCKHART: When did these higher rates of protection go into effect? I am anxious to find out, because I cannot find anything which would lead me to believe that there was anything more than 17½ per cent ad valorem, with no dumping duty. And that information was obtained a short time ago.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister responsible for that matter came down a minute ago and handed me a slip of paper indicating that there is no dumping duty, and that there is a higher duty in Canada than in the United States. My own officials, during the time since we rose last evening, have got certain information on the point, and I have just put it on the record. It was obtained directly from the customs branch, and I assume it is correct. But the date as to when it was brought in was not indicated.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have only a word to say with respect to this $5,000 vote for the Canadian horticultural council. Perhaps the minister would tell us the relationship between this council and the Ontario horticultural council or the Toronto horticultural society, and all down through the various branches.

There is one such branch, known as the St. Clair horticultural association which operates in my part of Toronto. In their respective spheres these local organizations do first-class work. I often feel that what they do is not appreciated either by the public or by the authorities as much as it should be. In my view some practical way should be found to recognize the work of all these horticultural councils, societies and associations throughout the country because, in their way, they do much to brighten the lives of each and everyone of us. Their work is carried on in the parks, on the street corners, in the vacant lots, the gardens and the lawns.

In my end of the city of Toronto the St. Clair horticultural association gives a number of prizes, including silver cups, to those who have the best showing or stands of flowers in their gardens or in front of their residences. I can say that my section of the city is recognized by visitors for its beauty, resulting from the activity of this horticultural association.

Is there any connection between the Canadian horticultural council, which receives this small vote, and these other bodies down the line? What is done with the vote?

Mr. GARDINER: The Canadian horticultural council has only indirect relationship with other organizations. Of course, it is the section which deals with ornamental displays which promotes the growing of flowers.

The organization mentioned in this vote takes into consideration all matters having to do with orchards, gardens and the growing of flowers. It has direct connection with provincial organizations across Canada. This grant was first allowed in 1922, when the late Hon. Mr. Motherwell was minister of agriculture, and was done for the purpose of promoting greater activity and showing a national interest in the work of the national council. Apart from that, we have no direct relationship with them. They are an organization which we believe ought to be assisted to the extent of $5,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to say a few words about the growing of sugar beets. Last fall a request was made by the minister that he hoped there would be a material increase in the production of sugar beets in Canada. My recollection is that the request by the Department of Agriculture was for a 50 per cent increase this year.

The same condition of affairs prevailed in the United States. Only recently the United States secretary of agriculture, Mr. Clinton P. Anderson said that sugar is one of America's greatest food needs for 1946, and that farmers could do no greater service to their country this year than to plant a full acreage of sugar beets.

Generally in Alberta—and I shall not deal with that specifically—in Manitoba, and also in Ontario there has been a material increase in the sugar beet acreage this year. In the United States the request was for an increase of 31 per cent. In this country there would be a much greater increase were it not for the difficulty mentioned the other night by the minister, when he pointed out that from the point of view of agriculture one of the greatest deterrents to production in Canada is the lack of necessary man-power.

In the United States, with a view to the encouragement of this necessary industry, and having regard to the requirements and shortages in production, they gave benefit payments last year averaging $5.50 a ton, and this year the amount has been increased to $6.50 a ton. The Canadian government has cancelled the one cent per pound tax on sugar, and has made provision for a subsidy of 60.75 cents per hundredweight on refined sugar, without any increase in the consumer price.

This matter was brought to my attention recently while I was in western Ontario. Following that, I asked a number of questions, which were answered by the Minister of Labour. As I say, I am not speaking about Manitoba or Alberta because, while we appreciate their problems, there are other hon. members who will speak for them. The aim in western Ontario this year was 35,000 acres.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Last year the acreage under crop was 17,400 and this year the acreage signed up so far is 26,500 with a prospect of an additional 3,000 or 4,000 acres if labour is made available. I am advised that if labour is made available between now and June 15 this additional acreage, namely some 3,500 acres, will be put into crop. That would make the total for this year about 30,000 acres, which would be quite an advance over the figures for last year.

Sugar is a commodity very much in demand in this country. Last year the sugar beet factories of the United States produced 22 per cent of their domestic requirement, while in Canada the production was approximately 15 per cent. Knowing that the Minister of Agriculture gets whatever he goes after, and knowing also that he asked the farmers of this country materially to increase the production of sugar beets this year, I am going to ask him what he is endeavouring to do and will endeavour to do within the next ten days to assure that maximum production.

Last year prisoners of war were made available in larger numbers than they have been this year. Some 890 were made available as a travelling squad in the five counties of south-western Ontario, and an additional 200 were quartered at various points. This year the number made available up to the day before yesterday is only 480, a number totally insufficient to meet the demands.

There are some who will say that man-power should be available because so many are out of work and receiving unemployment insurance benefits. That may be true, but the fact is that a person receiving unemployment benefits is required to accept only what is called suitable employment. There are very few who regard work in sugar beet fields as suitable alternative employment. It has been brought to my attention that not only is there a possibility that the 26,000 acres will not be increased, but that if labour is not made available immediately there may be a considerable reduction in this acreage.

Is the minister prepared to state the general course he intends to follow and whether he will again direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to this matter? I feel sure he is desirous of having action on this matter. I bring it up at this time because I know that unless action is taken this desirable commodity will be in greater short supply during the present year than it was in 1945, and certainly there will be no approach to the target which the minister set last year for production during the current year.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to add a word on behalf of the Manitoba sugar beet producers. I received a wire somewhat along the lines of what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said. This wire reads:

Manitoba beet growers have nearly sixteen thousand acres sugar beets seeded of which eight thousand dependent on outside labour. Labour department was informed continuously and requested early this spring to provide if no other agricultural labour available two thousand prisoners of war. We now understand that only seven to nine hundred POW's allocated Manitoba although there are enough POW's left in Canada to supply balance of thirteen hundred. All our direct and sugar company's efforts so far unsuccessful. Please approach Messrs. Mitchell and MacNamara or raise question in the house without delay drawing attention to gravity situation and fact that negative attitude may mean loss of five thousand acres or fifty thousand tons beets or twelve million five hundred thousand pounds sugar unless additional beet labour required is forthcoming immediately. Herbert Sulkers, president, Manitoba Sugar Beet Products Cooperative Association.

This matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour and, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has so well pointed out, it is most important that it be considered at this season of the year if we are to have the necessary sugar beet production.

Mr. GARDINER: It would not be proper for me to make the announcement which I know will be made shortly with regard to this matter, but I think I can satisfy members of the committee by saying that the question of whether prisoners of war should be retained for work in the sugar beet fields has been under discussion for some time. The consensus is that an effort should be made to have these men returned to Europe as soon as possible and it may be possible to move some of them before the work would be completed in the sugar beet fields. Without saying just how it is to be done, I should like to give the assurance to hon. members that the government has considered the matter. While the order has not yet been officially passed by the government and therefore it would not be proper for me to say what is in it—the Minister of Labour will say that himself—I think I can say that provision is being made which will be satisfactory to the people of Canada generally to have men of the highest type brought here to replace prisoners of war who are being removed. These men will be brought here in as large numbers as prisoners of war are removed, and possibly in greater numbers.

We have had some concern about the matter which has just been stated by the hon. member for Lake Centre, that is, that there are many people in this country who do not like to hoe sugar beets. As one who hoed sugar beets when younger, I can understand why some people do not like to do that work. I have had to do a lot of things, including answering some questions put by the opposition, that I did not like to do. It does not make much difference what your employment is or in what walk of life you may be, you are generally required to do some things you do not like to do.

If we are to have sugar beets grown in Canada we shall have to find Canadians who are willing to hoe sugar beets, at least until we find some other way of having them hoed. If we can work out some machinery, well and good, but in the meantime they must be hoed. I hope when the announcement is made as to who these men are, where they are coming from and how they are getting here everyone will be ready to say that they are just as good as the prisoners of war and will make much better permanent settlers in Canada.

Mr. DESMOND: I should like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Souris. One thing strikes me as being significant. During the past six years we have been labouring under a misapprehension that sugar beets have not been available because labour was not available. There was a question on the order paper yesterday asking the Minister of Labour what help was available to harvest and market sugar beets. It is not just the hoeing. We are in a mechanized age and mechanized equipment will shortly be available. But is it economically sound to produce sugar beets in Canada? What is the government's policy in that regard? Are we to produce sugar beets in Canada or are we to import cane to supply our plants in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta? Would the minister state what the government's policy will be and whether he thinks we can produce beets economically in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I should attempt to state government policy, because I doubt very much if anyone could at this stage indicate what government policy will be in connection with the production of sugar beets for some considerable time. We may have a better idea in two or three years. But I would say that most of the sugar beets produced in the last twenty-five years, no matter where they were produced, were not produced under plans which were economically sound, and they were not intended to be. The production of sugar beets was encouraged in many countries as a preparation for what was known to be coming, a war during which they would not be able to get sugar from the countries where it could be produced on an economically sound basis. Many things were done to encourage the production of sugar beets, not so much in this country as elsewhere. I am sure that my hon. friend will remember that when the leader of the preceding government desired to join in that effort he met with opposition all over this country. He put a tax on sugar entering Canada, and I went about this country as one of his opponents ridiculing that policy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very unwisely.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend over here says, "very unwisely." But the potato growers in eastern Canada did not think so. They lost their potato market because of what Canada did then in regard to sugar. When we start out to do what is not economically sound because of some situation which exists for the time being in the world, there is no use in fooling ourselves into thinking we are doing something economically sound. We might have been doing something which was in the national interest for the time being, just as other countries did.

I stated last session, and I am going to repeat it, that I recall being down at the graduation exercises at Macdonald college last year. I met three or four chaps there from the West Indies and the northern part of South America. I made it a point to talk with them and find out why they were there, and they told me that they were officials of the governments of the countries from which they came. They were there to get a special line of education, and that special line of education was to learn how to introduce dairy farming into the countries from which they came. I asked why they wanted to do that and they said "Because we are being driven out of our natural pursuit, which is the growing of sugar, by countries like Britain, which is our natural market, subsidizing the growing of sugar beets in their own country so that they may have sugar in time of war." Other countries to which they had been selling their sugar were doing the same thing and they went on to say, "You are doing it in Canada." They said that if they were not permitted to market sugar—which was the natural product for their countries to grow—in countries which formed their natural market, they would have to produce dairy products even if it cost a great deal to do so.

We have now fought the war, and if we are to improve the standard of living of mankind and prevent war I am one of those who think an effort should be made to bring about natural production and exchange. Someone over here said that he was in favour of free trade but that until all countries of the world could live on the same standards he would not advocate free trade. I will put it the other way and say that until we get free trade we shall not all be able to live on the same standards. The people who are absolutely dependent upon the production of sugar for their existence have just as much right to expect that we shall eat their sugar as we have to expect other people to eat our potatoes, wheat and dairy products upon which our farmers are absolutely dependent.

Mr. HAZEN: And fish.

Mr. GARDINER: And fish and any other natural product we have, and we must promote that idea. I will say quite candidly that so far as I am concerned I have never at any time urged anyone to grow sugar beets. Last fall we did put out a recommendation from the conference which was attended by the provincial governments, this government and farm organizations, to the effect that if the farmers increased their sugar beet acreage from 60,000 acres to 90,000 acres in 1946, they would be able to dispose of all the sugar beets they grew on that acreage. The acreage proposed in the preceding year was 60,000 acres and that was increased by 50 per cent to 90,000 acres. But I do not recall anyone associated with the federal government urging the farmers to increase their sugar beet acreage. It was simply stated that if they grew sugar beets on that increased acreage they would be able to dispose of all they grew in 1946. But we have not been urging people to grow sugar beets. Some provincial governments have done so, and I am not going to criticize them for that. Manitoba put up $600,000 for the building of a plant; the government of Ontario did something to encourage the growing of sugar beets; the government of Quebec bought a plant in Michigan and moved it over to Quebec province. I am not in a position to say what Alberta did to encourage production there. It was quite proper for these provincial governments to do that if they felt that by so doing they could promote a branch of agriculture in their province to their advantage. But we are concerned with the larger question, whether we should step out and encourage the production of something which, if it is to be produced in this country at all, must be protected very highly, and if it is protected very highly it will take away a market in this country from other countries where we must market some of our products, if we are to market them at all, particularly potatoes grown in the maritime provinces.

Mr. DESMOND: Does the minister think it would jeopardize our trade relations with any other country if we entered into a larger production of sugar in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: You should know the answer. You felt the effects of it some years ago.

Mr. DESMOND: Quite so. That is why I am asking the question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before this item carries, Mr. Chairman, I think it is fitting that I should say a word or two. I may state here why I have said so little in the last three or four years regarding the beet sugar industry. I believe the last time I spoke at length in this chamber on the matter was on April 3, 1941. The occasion of my speaking at that time was that some body or some combination of interests in Canada had ordered that 1,300 acres of sugar beets should be taken out of production in Alberta. When hon. members reflect upon the shortage of sugar under which this country has suffered since that time, everyone in this house must, I believe, be almost astounded that there should have been in the dominion in the year 1941 any man or combination of men so egregiously stupid as to make a move of that sort; yet that was done. The speech I gave in April, 1941, was to point out the grave seriousness of such a foolhardy move; and I am pleased to say that for some reason or another the 1,300 acres of sugar beets were permitted to be grown that year.

I have not said anything to speak of regarding the sugar beet industry since that time, for this reason, that in Alberta, in my constituency, we have two beet sugar factories, namely one at Raymond and one at Picture Butte, which between them have a substantial beet sugar producing capacity. These two beet sugar factories together with the factory in Manitoba are said to be able to produce all the sugar which the three prairie provinces could absorb. On that matter I am not competent to pronounce, because I do not know sufficient of the details; but it is ordinarily argued that it would not be wise that beet sugar should be taken into British Columbia, because already provision is made through the cane establishments in Vancouver to take care of all the needs of that province with regard to sugar.

The idea seems to prevail throughout Canada, or at least in some parts of Canada, that it would not be economically sound to bring sugar from Alberta or British Columbia into Ontario or Quebec, although I believe nearly everybody in Ontario and Quebec would be quite willing to have Alberta sugar now in order to avoid the shortage. Because of that condition it was deemed inadvisable by a good many of the people in the beet producing business in Alberta to advocate an increase of our productive capacity for beet sugar at the present time. Consequently I have not said very much about the matter in the house. But I rise on this occasion to say a few words regarding the beet sugar industry.

The Minister of Agriculture and I are, of course, altogether different in our experiences, and we are different with respect to the places from which we come, as well as the responsibilities which rest upon us. He is in the government; I am not. But I am going to express just as frankly my opinion in opposition to what the minister said as he expressed his opinion in favour of his views. It is going to be done, I know, with the very best of feelings.

In the first place, with respect to the increase in the production of sugar in Canada, to give hon. members an idea of how near the beet sugar industry can come to competing with the cane sugar industry, may I point out that in 1937, sugar was sold by the Canadian Sugar Factories from the Raymond and Picture Butte sugar factories wholesale for a trifle over four cents a pound. I doubt very much whether people generally throughout Canada would feel aggrieved if they could always get sugar at four cents a pound. In that year a sufficiently substantial profit was made by the Canadian sugar factories and the growers of beet even at four cents a pound wholesale. I believe that alone is sufficient to show that the beet sugar industry is fully capable of standing up under ordinary economic conditions and making a magnificent showing.

Mr. GARDINER: If that is true I am in favour of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, then, the minister and I are in complete agreement.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What was the price of cane sugar at that time?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not come prepared to talk along this line, and I do not think it would be wise for me to speak from memory, because people might take seriously what I say and I do not want to let anybody get any wrong ideas; what I do say I want to say with perfect assurance that all I am stating is correct.

With respect to the future of the beet growing industry of Canada, I think the first thing we have to do since the minister very kindly said what he did, and thereby raised himself greatly in my estimation, is to recognize that the future is all in favour of cheaper production of sugar beets. I do not wish to detain the committee too long, but I believe everybody here, including the minister, will be greatly interested in this little account of what is being done in the way of developing machines to do the hand work with respect to sugar beets.

Thus far indications are that there will be machines to do every kind of field work in connection with sugar beets and to do it exceedingly well. I am referring to an article, "Notes on Sugar Beet Machinery", which appears in the annual report of the Alberta sugar beet growers for 1945. The article is by Mr. A. E. Palmer, officer-in-charge of the dominion experimental station, Lethbridge, Alberta. Mr. Palmer has been doing a great deal of the work of taking care of that experimental farm for a good many years under Doctor Fairfield, and is now in charge; he is a man thoroughly qualified with respect to everything pertaining to sugar beets. In this article he points out that beet harvesting is almost completely conquered by machines. He refers to the various machine companies which have thus far produced sugar beet harvesters successfully: the John Deere, International Harvester, Marbeet Harvester, Hydrographic harvester, the Ford-Ferguson harvester, and the Scott-Urschel harvester. That is a sufficiently imposing list to show the committee that there are plenty of brains working on the problem, and the success so far has been so great that Mr. Palmer, discussing the American crystal spike wheel harvester, which is another type again, uses these words:

> It is estimated that the cost of harvesting mechanically will not exceed half of the cost of harvesting by hand and this estimate has been substantiated by careful tests. Furthermore, both the John Deere and International toppers have been found to top slightly more efficiently than experienced hand toppers.

This fact must be reassuring to all hon. members who were wondering whether or not it would be possible to get a machine which would perform the intricate and difficult task of lifting beets and topping them.

There is another kind of hand labour which is very hard: that is the loading of the beets after they are topped. There is a loader which works very successfully. Mr. Palmer says of loaders:

> Incidentally mechancial loading is rapidly replacing hand loading in the Alberta territory where the Robin loader machine, manufactured in Calgary, and similar in design to the Rassmann, is the principal machine used.

Thus the next of the back-breaking difficult hand-labour jobs has been conquered. They have already completely conquered the task of unloading the beets. Beet growers use a truck with an adjustable box on it. After the truck is loaded they run it to a big piler right by the factory pile, and they loosen a catch and put a chain over the box and dump the whole box at once into the hopper of the piler. The piler does all the rest, elevating the beets just as high as is necessary—nearly to the height of this chamber—and doing it very successfully.

The next back-breaking job is thinning and blocking. Those who are familiar with the culture of beets know that these processes have to be performed. Science has segmented the seed and has developed a precision planter with which farmers are able to plant the segments of seed one right after the other in a row, thus obtaining a very fine stand, without having two beets beside each other. The beets follow one another in a series. That has already been accomplished and they are using the machine with great success right now. A few more inventions will perfect it.

As to the question of blocking, there is a mechanical blocker which has attained great success. Mr. Palmer has the following to say at the close of his article:

> However, it is the opinion of the people interviewed that at the present time segmented seed, development and planting knowledge have progressed to the point where it should be possible soon to eliminate most of the hand labour of thinning should the labour situation become acute. It is possible that this would reduce yields slightly but not seriously and under good conditions of germination it is felt that there should be no loss.

That removes present anxiety in relation to labour for beet culture. May I now turn to the question of trade, to which the minister referred. I was somewhat disturbed when he started on that line, because that is the line that was used against me back in 1936, 1937 and 1938. They said it would destroy our trade. I have not under my hand, but I can get it in ten minutes from my room, material to show that all the talk about the loss of our potato market in the maritimes is nothing but legend, purely a myth. I have an article that shows how dependable is what I have to say in this regard. It is a scientifically written article by Mr. Ralph Bell of the Acadia Sugar Refinery, who is well known to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). Mr. Bell played an extremely important part in the war effort and is respected throughout Canada for his business acumen, his ability, his executive skill, his dependability as a reasoner, and his readiness to face facts. Mr. Bell shows conclusively that the extent of the loss which Canada would sustain by producing her sugar and omitting to buy sugar from Cuba and from other sugar producing areas would be completely negligible.

I know that the answer will be given, he is wrong. Well, I leave it in the hands of Mr. Bell, but I may tell the committee that I can bring down the information if it is desired. The article appeared in the Halifax Herald in 1938. It is an extensive article and it completely solves the question. We would not lose the potato market in any serious degree at all.

The idea which is conveyed, or which it is attempted to convey, is that the Cuban people will buy our potatoes if we buy their sugar, and they will buy our saltfish if we buy their sugar.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that if those are the facts—and I am not questioning what the hon. gentleman says—then there is nothing for us to argue about. What I wonder at, however, is this. If those are the facts, why should anyone come and ask us to do any more so that they can grow sugar beets? I assume that if people can grow sugar beets in this country, to their own advantage and the advantage of Canada, there is nothing that any government is doing that would stop them. They can go ahead and grow sugar beets if they like. It is only when they come and say that they cannot grow sugar beets in competition with someone else and therefore must have some assistance from the government that we become at all involved. We are prepared to promote in every way possible, obtaining labour and doing everything else we can, the growing of beets or anything that can be satisfactorily marketed from this country, or marketed in the country, and if sugar beets can be grown here and the product marketed at a lower cost than the commodity coming from outside and marketed here, then there is no difference between us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would not say that sugar can be manufactured more cheaply here than it can be brought in from outside, from the cane-growing areas, because no one can ever tell what the cane sugar price is going to be. When it is brought in from cane-growing areas it comes from places where sometimes the standard of living may compel poor people to work in plantations under conditions that are a scandal and a disgrace. Sometimes great quantities of sugar come into the possession of certain people in such areas as Santo Domingo, Cuba and Jamaica, under conditions which make them ready practically to give the sugar away.

Mr. GARDINER: It has been so in the past. I quite agree with that. One of the reasons why we have had a low price for sugar, as well as for some other commodities, in years gone by, is the way in which labour has been treated in those areas. In recent months I have had the privilege of sitting in at conferences where there have been representatives from all those countries that we are talking about. After listening to those people, who are leaders in those countries, I have grave doubts whether anyone from now on will be able to treat those people as they have been treated in the past by some people, and that in itself may be a partial solution of the problem we are discussing. I hope that the people who produce sugar there will be living on a standard comparable with our own, and that the people producing some other commodities which we require will enjoy a similar standard. If such a condition prevails in those areas, then the situation which is being described at the moment may develop under which we may grow sugar beets in this country to the advantage of all and sell our product advantageously. I do not think there is any question, no matter what the result finally was, that a considerable number of farmers in the maritimes did lose the potato market for a time in the West Indies and elsewhere because of what we did in connection with sugar. Whether there could have been some way around that situation is another question. At that time they did lose the market, and we have had great difficulty, in the ten years I have been here, in getting it back.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it must be granted that the maritimes did lose their potato market, but the reason was not that we did not buy our sugar from Cuba, because the amount of sugar we Canadians were producing from beets was so small as to have a negligible effect on Cuba's ability to absorb our potato crop.

Mr. GARDINER: But the effort made at that time was greatly to increase it. It did not increase it, because there was an election within a few weeks and the result of the election was to change the policy in this country. If the policy which was then put into effect, and which did spoil our potato market, had been carried on, I do not think there is any doubt that sugar beet growing in Canada would have increased and they would have had greater difficulty getting their sugar into this country. That was the intention, whatever happened.

Mr. BLACKMORE: First of all, may I point out the reasons why our maritime producers lost their potato market? As I recall it, Cuba was unable to sell the quantity of goods she normally would sell, because of the depression. Naturally she was unable to buy our potatoes and our salt fish, because she was unable to sell her products.

Mr. GARDINER: As far as Cuba is concerned a depression means inability to sell sugar.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right; and the difficulty was also Cuba's inability to buy our potatoes. Hon. members from the maritimes will correct me if I do not recall this matter exactly. I was not expecting to discuss it and have not gone over it for years, but, as I remember it, Cuba used to buy potatoes in the maritimes and raise new potatoes to sell to the New England market.

Mr. GARDINER: That was seed potatoes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right; they would buy our seed potatoes in the maritimes and then sell new potatoes to the New England market. Anything that prevented them from selling those potatoes naturally would prevent them from buying our seed potatoes and salt fish. Certainly, if Canada were producing her own sugar, so that she did not need to buy sugar from Cuba, that fact should have been in evidence; but at the time when there was a change of government in Canada there was only one sugar factory in southern Alberta. So that the cause of the falling off of the Cuban market for both seed potatoes and salt fish was not sugar; it was entirely something else, and the matter should be explained in that way. I believe, however, that is only a minor point.

I wish now to say a word in reference to what the minister said. The minister said if we could produce sugar so that we could withstand outside competition, then there would be no further cause for worry. This afternoon hon. members have risen in their places in this house and urged that greater protection be given the cherry producers. While we can produce cherries in Canada with great success, we cannot say that we can successfully compete with certain cherry growing areas in the United States. We cannot grow small fruits in competition with those areas, one reason being that their crop matures two or three weeks earlier than ours. They can dump their fruit in here and fill our cellars completely before our fruit matures. Consequently we simply must have protection against their fruit, and must have an anti-dumping duty.

A somewhat similar condition obtains in connection with sugar. While we can produce sugar from sugar beets and sell it at four cents a pound wholesale—at least we could in 1937—and make a good profit, that does not mean we can successfully compete against sugar coming in, we will say from Haiti, or Santo Domingo or Jamaica, where there may be a glut of sugar as a result of which they would be ready almost to give it away or dump it. We would require to have ordinary commonsense protection, but that protection does not necessarily raise the price of sugar to a point at which any consumer in Canada will suffer. Certainly when sugar was being sold wholesale at four cents a pound and the dominion government was deliberately adding two cents a pound or 50 per cent to the cost of the sugar by way of excise tax, no dominion administrator and certainly no supporter of any Liberal government had any right to go about the country telling the people they had to pay high prices for sugar because the beet sugar industry had to be protected.

I want to say just a word or two further on this matter while I am at it, because I think there are important considerations to be borne in mind. May I refer to the question of what to do about the sugar-producing areas? I will bring just one instance to the attention of hon. members; that is, the rubber industry. Speaking entirely from recollecation of an article I read, so that I may not be entirely correct, though I believe I am, I am told that the rubber we use in Canada would keep a hundred thousand Malayans in Malaya.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I hope the hon. member will keep to the item under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely sugar is one of the matters under consideration. The hon. member for Lake Centre rose and discussed it, and sugar has been discussed by several other hon. members.

Mr. GARDINER: The sugar discussion may be quite proper, but certainly rubber is not produced on the farms of Canada; it must be brought in from some other country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall not be on rubber for more than just a second. Would any hon. member or anyone in this country advocate that we discontinue the production of rubber in Canada just in order to keep the poor Malayans?

Mr. GARDINER: I would.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In case of another war I am afraid the hon. gentleman would regret his stand.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope there will not be another war, and there may not if we do not keep on doing these foolish things.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, we all kept on hoping that the last war would not occur, too.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I hope the hon. member will discuss this item. It has nothing at all to do with rubber.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am no longer, on rubber, Mr. Chairman; I have left it entirely and gone back to sugar. In 1936 we had in this house a very large number of members who literally scoffed at the idea of another war; the minister will remember that.

Mr. GARDINER: I was not one of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; fortunately the minister was not one of them. He is too much inclined to face the facts. He was too wise for that, but there were plenty of silly people in this house who were sure we would not have a war. Yet look at what happened in 1939. I am not saying we shall have a war. but I am saying it is the part of wisdom to be prepared in case war should come. That is one of the most important matters bearing on this whole question of sugar. If we should have another war and had to transport our sugar from cane-producing areas, using precious ships, railroads and other transportation facilities, how in the world could it be argued that we would be wise in allowing ourselves to get into a position of that kind? I am just one ordinary Canadian, the same as the rest of us, but as far as I can judge, the more nearly we can come to producing our sugar requirements in this dominion, the sounder will be the basis upon which we establish our economy.

The minister raised another question which is important. I follow him and agree with his reasoning. He says we must come to the point where we have free trade; we must come to the point where we live and let live. I grant that, but I am contending here that the problem must be solved in a different way from what the minister has in mind. The problem of Jamaica, Cuba, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Puerto Rico, Malaya and these other countries which find themselves unable to produce enough goods to enable them to buy the things they need, will have to be taken care of by an international mutual aid arrangement, to the extent of their needs. To the minister, and to many people who have not had experience of the kind I think I have had, that may seem impossible, but to me it is not impossible at all. I do not want to be out of order in making this statement, but I think it must be said; as a matter of fact, if the fundamental principles of social credit are applied to the national and international economies of the world, that problem of international distribution can be taken care of just as easily as the ordinary trade we carry on to-day. It is a simple matter to deal with the question. The solution must be found sooner or later, and we might as well begin to look forward.

The first important thing in this world is production. The minister agrees with that 100 per cent, I know. The first thing we must do is to make sure we have all the sugar produced in the world that the world can use. That is the first thing; and that applies to all other commodities. This means that in this Dominion of Canada the prime responsibility resting upon us is to increase our production, increase our immediate productive capacity in just as many lines as possible, so that we shall have the goods. That is one of the greatest reasons for increasing the sugar production of the country.

Just before I take my seat, I think perhaps hon. members will be interested to hear these facts regarding the sugar industry in my constituency.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been listening to these remarks for a long time, hoping they were coming to an end some time; but if the hon. gentleman is dealing with matters of production, we passed all the production items yesterday. We are concerned with marketing, and nothing else. If it is a question of discussing the marketing of sugar beets or sugar, all well and good. But I do not think we are in order to go on discussing production, when the item was passed yesterday.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wish to displease the minister; I do not wish to carry on the discussion, if he has strong objection. But certainly the hon. member for Lake Centre was discussing the production of sugar, as did several other hon. members. Certainly the minister, when he attempted to answer those gentlemen, was discussing the same question. I am doing nothing more.

However, I have said enough on this occasion so that, if it is the desire of the minister and the chairman, I shall gladly permit the item to pass.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

29. Live stock and live stock products, $721,521.

Mr. FARQUHAR: I wish to say only a few words on this item of the marketing of live stock and live stock products. The marketing of farm products has always been one of our great problems. Much has been said in the house from time to time on this subject, especially by hon. members from the western provinces. Much has been said too by hon.

members from the other provinces. It is quite within the rights of any hon. member to speak at length on the subject.

There is one thing, however, to which I take exception. Many times when these subjects are under discussion in the house, comparisons are made between western and eastern farmers, in an effort to show that the eastern farmer has enjoyed a favoured position, when compared with that of the farmer in the west.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the hon. member include me among those?

Mr. FARQUHAR: I have not mentioned anyone in particular.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I just wish to disavow all that, for myself.

Mr. FARQUHAR: I refer not only to what has been taking place in this debate, but also to what has happened from time to time when farm policies have been discussed in the house, notwithstanding the fact that the eastern farmer is receiving a smaller percentage of the national income than is the farmer in the west.

During my years as a member of the house, from year to year millions of dollars have been poured into the western provinces. On every occasion that western farmers have asked special consideration in connection with some of their problems, we of the east have supported them. We feel, however, that we would like to see a better feeling of co-operation. When western members can show that they have some special reason for asking special consideration, we are prepared to support them, as we always have been.

However, after listening to the debates in the house from time to time, I have come to the conclusion that there are some characteristics that eastern farmers have in greater extent than is indicated by western farmers. For instance, we have a much greater degree of personal independence; we have greater confidence in our community and in our province. I believe, too, that we have greater confidence in ourselves and in our own ability to solve some of our own problems, rather than ask the government to do everything for us.

I should like to tell the committee some of the things being done in the constituency of Algoma East, which I have the honour to represent. In that constituency we have agricultural sections second to none in Ontario. We produce some of the finest cattle sold on the Toronto market. We produce, too, the highest quality of sheep and hogs, and our Manitoulin turkeys are known throughout Canada for their fine quality.

[Mr. Farquhar.]

For many years buyers have been coming in from the eastern parts of the province. I understand that a number of them have come from the section represented by the hon. member for Middlesex West. Those buyers who have been coming into Manitoulin island for years, and have been buying cattle, sheep and hogs, are much better judges of weights than many of the farmers with whom they deal. The result has been that they have been taking advantage of the farmers of that island.

Through our farm organizations, however, all this has come to an end. Those organizations, especially the ones operating on Manitoulin island itself, take care of practically all the marketing of farm products in that section of the constituency. Our wool growers' association takes care of the grading and shipping of our wool. The turkey growers' association looks after the grading of turkeys, and their shipment in carload lots to any point in Canada offering the best market. Our farm organizations take care of the marketing of our cattle and sheep. Our live stock yard is as fine as that in Toronto. Cattle are brought in, in large numbers. The days on which sales are held are well advertised, with the result that the abattoirs send men in who are prepared to pay prices satisfactory to the farmers, prices which are much higher than they have received in years gone by.

Buyers from other parts of the province, including Middlesex West, still come up to my constituency; but they do not buy cattle. They just look on, and think of the good old days when they used to come to Manitoulin and fleece the farmers. But those good old days are gone forever, a fact for which we are truly thankful.

I appreciated what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West last evening when he described what the farmers in his constituency are doing in the matter of marketing their own produce. I suggest to my western farmer friends that they put forth a greater effort in endeavouring to solve some of their own problems, through their own local organizations, as we are doing in Algoma East. By so doing, I believe they will accomplish much more than they have accomplished by complaining so much in the house, and from time to time by making comparisons of their conditions with those of farmers in the eastern parts of Canada.

Mr. KNIGHT: I had some difficulty, while listening to the observations of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, in knowing what item is under discussion. I fancy he thought it was the marketing item.

Mr. FARQUHAR: I was discussing the marketing of live stock.

Mr. KNIGHT: I see. The hon. gentleman has referred to the ability of the western farm organizations to be able to take care of themselves and I can assure him that they are doing that quite efficiently.

I wanted to say a word or two about Canadian bacon and I have some questions that I should like to direct to the minister. He may remember that I asked certain questions last year and, as the hon. member to my right said last night, they provided the necessary stimulus to the minister for a couple of speeches. I do not know whether he will have time this afternoon to make a couple more, but I assure him that my questions are couched in such a way that he will be able to answer them in two minutes.

I am making these queries on behalf of the forgotten man of this country, or perhaps I should say the forgotten housewife; in any event, I speak on behalf of the consumers. It is a notorious fact that much of the bacon we have had in this country during the past six years has hardly been fit for human consumption according to our standards. Instead of being produced from No. 1 hogs, it has been manufactured from what is commonly known in the trade as sows, stags and heavies. I think I know meat when I see it, and the unfortunate thing is that we are having to pay as much for this low quality meat as we paid for good meat when it was available.

It may be said that the good bacon is being sent overseas to people who are hungry and need it. I was glad to hear the minister say the other day that it is now considered more important to send grain. As he knows, it takes seven or eight pounds of grain to manufacture one pound of meat, and perhaps grain is a more economical form of food for these hungry people. It may be contended that the higher grades of meat contain more nourishment per pound and that to ship them would save shipping space, but the war is over and shipping is now available.

I have been doubtful for some time whether we are granting an unmixed favour to the hungry people of Europe by sending them our top quality meats at the prices we have to charge for them. I want to make myself perfectly clear. If the government decided to export all the bacon produced to feed the hungry people of Europe and charge the cost against the taxpayers of Canada, I would support them. But having said that, I submit that these same hungry people would probably welcome some less fancy meat if it were offered to them at prices which they could afford to pay. My opinion in this regard was confirmed and strengthened the other day when I went into a store to buy a piece of back bacon. The butcher handed over an infinitesmal piece of bacon for which he charged me seventy cents a pound, and then he said, "Isn't that terrible stuff to be sending to a hungry man?" He said, "The people who are really hungry cannot afford to buy meat at that price."

Last year I asked what percentage of rough bacon, if you can call such things as front hocks and jowls bacon, was being consumed in Canada. The minister in one of the speeches to which the hon. member referred and in which he took us down to South America and around to other parts of the world—

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member has gone nearly around the world and I shall have to do the same in order to answer him.

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister stated that we were sending about 90 per cent of the top cured bacon to Great Britain. That was not exactly an answer to the question I asked. That would mean that the housewife in this country is able to buy only ten per cent of the good meat that is produced. I was asking what proportion of the rough meat of poor quality that is produced is used here? I think the answer would be 100 per cent. However, I should like to have some confirmation from the minister. Canadian bacon as sold on the British market might be all right, but as we know it on the home market it is almost unfit to eat. At first our bacon was not popular in Great Britain because they objected to the type of curing, but we have solved that problem by working out a milder cure.

During the war we were prepared to make sacrifices, but I think the time has come when the Canadian housewife who is paying high prices for meat should receive good meat for her money. We are told about children in Europe who have never tasted an orange but I can tell of children in this country who have never tasted a piece of good bacon. Last session the minister named a period of at least twelve months during which we should try to send to Great Britain bacon of prime quality, and he said, as reported on page 3190 of Hansard:

> . . . we shall try to keep on our own market food value in accordance with its real food value.

That is a somewhat vague statement, but I think it meant that while these meats were not the best they would be sold at a price where they would be at least worth the money being paid for them. I claim that that has not been done. This is a matter in connection with which the packer can easily deceive the public on account of the prevailing ignorance on the subject. When one goes into a store nowadays and asks for a piece of back bacon, he is given back bacon all right but it is off a sow. It has been trimmed of the two or three inches of fat which would naturally be on it. The residue is lean, but it is hard, tough and comparatively tasteless.

From my own knowledge and of my own experience I know there is no difference between the price usually charged and what should be paid for good bacon, even if it were possible to find the latter. As I say, it is almost impossible to find any good bacon. I suggest to the minister that there should be a definite ceiling upon the prices of this inferior so-called bacon and that such fancy and deceptive names as "picnic ham" used to describe things which are not hams, or "bacon" used to describe pig cheeks should be prohibited by law. High-pressure salesmanship and deceptive terms have been regulated in connection with the fur trade. If it is rabbit, it must be described as rabbit. That may appear in small print in the advertisement, but it must be described in that way. It is time that something should be done in this other and similar commercial racket.

Having thus expressed myself, may I respectfully ask the minister to answer the questions I shall put to him? First, how much of these rough meats produced in Canada is being consumed in Canada? Second, is the percentage of good bacon that is exported, which was given last year as 90 per cent, still unchanged? Third, will the minister assure the housewives through us that more good bacon will soon be offered on the Canadian market and tell us how much and how soon?

There is another question which I should like to ask but which I will not expect the minister to answer at the moment. It seems to me to be relevant to the subject under discussion. Has the minister any reason to hope that, all things being equal and the war now being over, Canada will be able to retain her position in the British bacon market? The only reason I can see for sending all that quantity of meat over there is to retain the British market as against the Irish and Danish producers. So far as my information goes, we can retain that market only with great difficulty against Ireland and Denmark, because of their proximity to the British market and the fact that they are grass and dairy countries and have a tremendous amount of milk which they can feed to their pigs. If there is no hope of holding our preferred position—and I think it is generally admitted that we cannot hope to hold our bacon market as we did during the war—then any sacrifices that we are making in the direction of eating tough meat to retain the British market are only postponing the evil day and are in vain in any event.

With regard to the quality of the meat that is going over—I am not sure how far I should discuss this because the case is sub judice—I have here a Canadian Press item which says:

> The Supreme Court of Canada has decided that the Union Packing Company of Calgary, Limited, should proceed against the crown in an effort to obtain damages for loss of quantities of bacon.

There was a question whether they should proceed against the crown or the bacon board. The item goes on to say:

> The claim arises out of a shipment of 160,000 pounds of bacon and other pork products to Saint John, N.B., which arrived there on March 11, 1941, to be shipped to the United Kingdom.

It appears from the following paragraph that no ship was available for eighteen days, and the bacon spoiled, a fact which does not speak very highly for the curing methods, and then on March 29:

> On that date the board's inspectors rejected 73 boxes containing 42,785 pounds of rib backs on the ground of slime, odour and some mould.

Now 42,785 pounds is a lot of meat, particularly when you can scarcely get a pound of bacon in Canada. I would ask the minister what final disposition was made of that meat. He knows that when we cure our own bacon on the farm we often have a struggle with a little mould on the outside. I should like to know whether this meat was salvaged, and whether we have since eaten it, in addition to the other types of meat I have discussed.

Mr. GARDINER: Any meat which is condemned is sent back to the plant that produced it to be reconditioned before being put on the market again, or it may be used for tankage or some other purpose.

I have been asked, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise at twenty minutes to six, which is five minutes from now, and therefore I shall not attempt to make a speech at this moment. I would suggest to the committee that we have been discussing the marketing service and agriculture on two different amendments which were moved to the address, and also on a motion to go into supply and on two amendments to that motion. In other words, we have had weeks of discussion of these items and have now spent the greater part of to-day on them. I would suggest that, after I have answered as shortly as I can one or two questions that have just been asked, the committee might allow the marketing items to pass so that at the next sitting we can discuss the special items.

Replying to my hon. friend's questions, we certainly could not retain the British market in competition with Denmark and other countries if we followed the suggestion that has been made of sending our poorer bacon to Britain and retaining the good product at home.

So far as beef is concerned, we have been sending praactically all our canner cattle overseas in cans. Last year we sent 126,000,000 pounds of canned meat to Britain, and it was the poorer pork and the poorer beef that was put into those cans. That is always the case in our canning processes here in Canada. It must be remembered, however, that we are in competition with the Argentine in canned meat and the Argentine follows quite a different practice. They put very good meat into cans, and if we want to compete with them in that trade we shall have to do differently from what we have been doing. The greater part of the 400,000 odd head of cattle which have been shipped out of this country in the form of meat during recent years has been the poorer beef. As a matter of fact, under the arrangements we have we are not permitted to send more than twenty per cent of our red and blue beef out of Canada. That is provided by the prices board regulations. We have never got up to that twenty per cent. Only a very small percentage of our red and blue beef, which is the highest quality of beef we have has gone out of this country for export. We are eating it at home. I know from experience in my own home that in the last three or four years I have been eating the best beef that I ever ate in Canada. When the United States market was open we sent our best beef to that country, but that market is now closed and we are consuming the greater part of our red and blue beef at home.

The other question had to do with the 90 per cent. I never at any time said that we were marketing 90 per cent of our A's and B's in Britain except for two months last fall. Hon. Ben Smith telephoned me one morning to ask if we could not supply Britain with more bacon. I told him over the telephone that we would try to do so, and during a two months' period we raised the amount going to Britain to 90 per cent of our A's and B's. Ordinarily we send from 70 to 85 per cent to Britain, but during that two months' period we sent 90 per cent.

Mr. KNIGHT: What percentage of the meat is being consumed in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I could not state the exact percentage offhand, but if my hon. friend will put the question on the order paper I will answer it. The figure can be got, but first I would want his definition of poorer meat.

Mr. KNIGHT: Can we hope that a greater proportion of good bacon will be released for consumption in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not a question of whether any more can be released. It is a question of whether we can market the quantity we desire to market and thus retain our marketing position. If we turned all the good bacon that is produced in Canada on to the home market, the price, irrespective of anything that this government might do, would not remain high very long.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not want to be discourteous to the Chair or to the minister, but I have been waiting for this item to ask a question about hog graders that I asked at a previous sitting, when the minister asked me to wait until this item was before the committee. How many hog graders have you in the Dominion of Canada and how do they work? Do you keep them in one place the whole time or change them around like the cream graders—leave them in a plant for three months? How long do you keep them in a plant at a time? When the committee meets again will the minister tell us what are the duties of a stockyard agent?

Mr. GARDINER: The answer to the first question is, about seventy-five. The answer to the second is that they rotate, in a community like Winnipeg, for example, from plant to plant, and not always for the same length of time. It depends on the plant and on the individual; sometimes it is a week and sometimes it is a month.

Mr. BRYCE: Would the minister give me an answer some other time as to how long they stay? I think it is far longer than a month.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will write me a letter indicating what he wants to know, I will reply to it.

Mr. BRYCE: Certainly. And the minister will tell me what a stockyard agent is?

Mr. GARDINER: Call the next item and let us carry that.

Mr. SENN: So far as this party is concerned, I think there is no trouble about passing these two items, except that there is one matter of grading which one of our members wants to bring up. It will take a little time, probably about ten minutes, and I understand that it is desired to adjourn. Will the minister undertake to let us discuss that item later?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

Thursday, May 30, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. MacLean.

First report of joint committee on the library of parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

C.N.R. STATION, MONTREAL

Mr. KIDD:

1. What has been the total amount of expenditure up to September, 1939, on the new C.N.R. station in Montreal?
2. What has been the total amount of expenditure from September, 1939, up to the present time on the new C.N.R. station in Montreal?
3. What has been the total expenditure on the new C.N.R. station in Montreal to date?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1, 2 and 3.

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows: Main terminal—including land, cost of excavation, cost of the station building and sub-track areas, together with viaduct and trackage from north side of St. James street to the tunnel portal: To Sept. 30, 1939, $7,278,297; since Sept. 30, 1939, $5,751,342; total, $13,029,639.

NATIONAL DEFENCE (AIR)—CAPE SCOTT-FISHERMEN'S BAY ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Mr. PEARKES:

1. Was a road constructed for the Department of National Defence for Air between Cape Scott and Fisherman's bay, Vancouver island?
2. If so, to whom was the contract awarded?
3. What moneys were paid to the contractor for any work done between 1942 and 1945?
4. What length of roadway was constructed?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.
2. Marwell Construction Company.
3. $20,780.40.
4. Approximately four miles.

[Mr. Senn.]

CANADIAN NAVY—PRIZES

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Will the officers and ratings of the Royal Canadian Navy share in prizes taken by the navy during the war?
2. If so, when will the first distribution be made?
3. What approximately will be the value of the first distribution?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. From information made available by the government of the United Kingdom, it is considered that officers and men of the Canadian naval forces will share in the distribution of prize money resultant from the capture and sale of enemy merchant ships and cargoes during the war 1939-45.

2 and 3. The date and amount of the first distribution are not yet known in the Department of National Defence for Naval Services.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. HERRIDGE:

1. Has Canada any ambassador, consul or trade commissioner in Yugoslavia?
2. If not, why are we not so represented?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2. The Canadian government agreed to receive a Yugoslav minister in Ottawa in 1942 on the understanding that the question of reciprocation would stand over until the end of the war. A statement to this effect was made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on February 9, 1942. Somewhat later Major General Vanier, now Canadian Ambassador to France, was accredited as minister to the Yugoslav government then temporarily established in London; he was also accredited to the five other allied governments then in London. Since the end of the war it has not yet been found possible to establish Canadian missions in the capitals of all these countries, including Belgrade, because of the difficulty of finding the requisite number of experienced personnel to meet the rapidly growing needs of the Canadian foreign service. The establishment of diplomatic missions in Yugoslavia, and in the other countries which maintain missions in Ottawa without reciprocity on the part of Canada, is under consideration.

ALLOTMENT OF SUGAR TO PRESERVING AND CANNING INDUSTRIES

Mr. BARRETT:

1. Has the government taken any action toward increasing the quota of sugar allotted to preserving and canning industries during the months of June, July and August?
2. If so, what action?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. No action has been taken to increase these sugar allocations. The policy of the board for 1946 provides sugar for the manufacture of preserves on exactly the same basis as that granted during 1945, i.e.: 100 per cent of the quantity used during the first six months of 1944; 70 per cent of the quantity used during the last six months of 1944.

For commercial canners the amount of sugar allocated is related by formula to the quantity of fruit purchased and processed.

2. Answered by No. 1.

NATIONAL HARBOURS—FLOUR MILL, PIER 23, HALIFAX

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Did the provincial government of Nova Scotia apply to the National Harbours Board for permission to erect a flour mill at or on pier 23, Halifax, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, was permission to lease or use this property granted? If not, why not?

3. Did the provincial government of Nova Scotia appeal to the federal government at Ottawa against any decision arrived at by the National Harbours Board on the proposal to erect a flour mill at or on pier 23, Halifax, Nova Scotia?

4. If so, what was the answer of the federal government to the provincial government with regards to the proposal to erect the above mentioned mill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Answers (furnished by the national harbours board). The answers to the above questions are contained in an order of the House of Commons tabled on December 15, 1945, and recorded as sessional paper No. 248.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POLYMER CORPORATION—EXCHANGE OF RUBBER FOR MATERIALS OR SERVICES

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Was any type of rubber used as a medium of exchange for material supplied or services rendered by any individual, company or corporation to the Polymer Corporation Limited?

2. If so, when and how much and at what price?

3. Was any rubber sold or shipped outside of Canada?

4. If so, when, to whom, what quantity and at what price?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

POSTAL SERVICE—LETTER-BOX COLLECTIONS

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. What requirements are necessary for the establishment of letter-box collections in cities or towns?

2. What cities and towns have letter-box collection and what is the population of each?

3. Are there any cities or municipalities where a letter-box collection has been established and where there is no home mail delivery?

GOVERNMENT PRINTING—OUTSIDE CONTRACTS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. What is the total dollar value of government printing, given by the King's Printer to outside companies since Janauary 1, 1946?

2. What are the names of all companies which have received government printing since the above date?

3. Since January 1, 1946, what is the value of the work done by each of these companies, and what is the value of contracts outstanding with each?

4. How much government printing was done (a) in each maritime province; (b) in each of the four western provinces, during this period?

5. How are outside printing contracts let by the King's Printer, by tender or by some other method?

JAPANESE IN CANADA

REPATRIATION—DELAY IN DEPARTURE FROM VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a question of the Minister of Labour? According to a report from Vancouver, persons of Japanese origin who have requested transportation to Japan or who are being deported otherwise are being held incommunicado and their friends are not able to gain access to them before they leave the country. Of course no charges have been laid against these people. Is this action taken by reason of a local ruling, or a ruling of the Department of Labour?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I know nothing about it, except that there has been a delay in the departure of the ship that was to have taken these people back to Japan. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister check it up?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

HOUSING

APPOINTMENT OF COORDINATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply based upon a release by his department which reached us to-day, announcing the appointment of Mr. T. F. Flahiff as coordinator of housing. Are we to understand that he has begun this work, or will he begin it shortly?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Flahiff has been an officer of the department carrying on other duties for some time. He was transferred to this work some two months ago, and his appointment as coordinator was made recently. Formerly he was in the deputy minister's branch.

Mr. STIRLING: He is now operating?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs how this will affect the housing operations, especially in connection with small loans under the Veterans Land Act. I notice this gentleman is to be coordinator and I should like to know if that means that the director of the Veterans Land Act will no longer act in that capacity.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): There will be complete cooperation between the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the director of the Veterans Land Act in the Department of Veterans Affairs. Generally speaking, we shall not embark upon small holdings operations close to urban areas; that will be left entirely to the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. STIRLING: We shall continue to keep in touch with the director of the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

VICTORY CELEBRATION

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is it the intention of the minister to send or authorize to be sent any high ranking officers to the V-E day celebration to be held in London?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): It was announced some time ago that General Crerar would represent Canada at this celebration.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will any members of parliament be going?

Mr. PROBE: I understood the minister to say that General Crerar was the only delegate who would represent Canada at the V-E day celebrations in Britain. Are there any other officers in Canada whose expenses in attending that celebration are being paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. So far as expenses are concerned, General Crerar is still on retirement leave, and the only expenses involved are his transportation expenses there and back. No other Canadian officers are going. The remainder of the Canadian representation in the parade will be made up of members of the armed forces already there. I understand that the Prime Minister, who is in Great Britain, will also take part in the ceremonies.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY—POLISH SERVICEMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, or the Minister of Labour, or both. Is it the intention of the government to bring to Canada several thousand Polish servicemen, who served with allied forces, as a means of overcoming the labour shortage in the sugar beet industry?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The government has no announcement to make at the present time, although the matter is being considered.

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—STATEMENT AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) asked me a question with reference to the present strike on the great lakes. Hon. members will no doubt be interested in receiving a report from me with respect to the efforts which have been made to deal with the strike of seamen on the great lakes and inland waters.

The Canadian Seamen's Union and the various steamship operators represented by the Dominion Marine Association entered into a collective agreement effective August 1, 1945, for a period of one year. The agreement covered wages, rates of pay for overtime, working hours and other matters. The termination clause of the agreement provided that it would remain in effect until July 31, 1946, with a reservation that changes in the agreement could be made during the currency of the agreement by mutual consent of the parties thereto. It was under this latter provision that the union had been carrying on negotiations with the employers for a reduction in the working hours from twelve to eight per day, or from a total of 84 per week to a total of 56 per week. These negotiations having terminated unsuccessfully, the Department of Labour was brought into the situation some two months ago and, after holding separate conferences with the parties, has since been endeavouring to get them into agreement on this issue.

At my first conference with the operators I took the position that I could not defend the 84-hour week, and I urged the employers, and later on the union, to settle this issue by the process of collective bargaining. Representatives of the operators and the union conferred early last week in Toronto and this conference was attended by one of the senior conciliation officers of my department.

At this conference, while the operators accepted the principle of the eight-hour day, disagreement ensued as to the detailed application of the principle, and the negotiations broke off. I then arranged that a meeting between representatives of the Dominion Marine Association, which speaks for a considerable number of the operators, and the union, would be held at my office in Ottawa on Tuesday, May 28, and both parties had indicated their intention of being present. At that meeting I was hopeful that the negotiations broken off in Toronto would be resumed and that a settlement would be reached. However, on the morning of May 24, the department was informed that two union delegates, who had boarded a vessel owned by one of the operating companies, were ordered off by the master, who said that they could not discuss their business with the crew except during the lunch period. It was claimed by the union that this was a violation of their collective agreement, and ten members of the crew, of whom eight were off duty, followed the union delegates to the wharf and were then refused readmittance to the vessel.

The union alleges that this constituted a lockout and a violation of the contract. The company on the other hand takes the position that provisions existed in the collective agreement for the settlement of grievances and that these provisions should have been invoked by the union instead of the men walking off the ship. The union thereupon called a strike on the vessels of that particular company, and this action was followed on Monday of this week by orders for a general strike.

On Tuesday of this week representatives of the union and of the companies came to Ottawa as previously arranged, and since then I and officers of my department have been meeting them in separate conferences. Matters have been developed to the point where there was willingness on the part of the representatives of the companies and the union to meet in joint conference, and late this morning I brought them together.

So far as the movement of the ships is concerned, hon. members will I am sure have read various reports in the newspapers and probably would desire me to say a word in connection with the arrests that have taken place and the reports that some disturbances have occurred.

Reports of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would indicate that such disturbances as have occurred have, in the main, been centred in Cornwall and along the forty-five miles of canal which hon. members will recall is paralleled by a highway. This creates a difficult situation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to control. On the other hand the disturbances have not been as bad as some press statements would indicate. Such arrests as have been made were made as a result of charges laid by the individual steamship companies.

Resulting from the joint conference between the representatives of the parties this morning it was agreed:

1. That the Minister of Labour shall hold a meeting with the larger operators and lay before them the definite proposals which have been discussed for the settlement of the dispute. This meeting is tentatively scheduled for Monday next.

2. That to provide for a suspension of activity it was further agreed that as Minister of Labour I should issue a statement as follows:

The union agrees to allow members who are still on ships to operate them until the meeting of operators called by the minister is over, provided the operators will suspend attempts to man ships which are now tied up because of shortage of crews until meeting tentatively called for Monday or any continuation thereof is concluded.

I am sure all Canada will join with me in urging upon both parties acceptance of the plan of suspending action in connection with the strike in the interest of the dominion.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The CHAIRMAN: Item 31.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, last night when we adjourned we had passed item 30, conditional upon a request made by the hon. member for Haldimand that there were some questions to be asked on grading by some members not present at the time who desired information, and some questions were also to be put by those present.

Mr. SENN: I did not say anything about those who were not present. There were members present who wanted to ask questions.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is correct, on grading particularly, and those questions were to be asked to-day before we proceeded with this item.

Mr. PEARKES: I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the grading of turkeys. Some years ago a special type of turkey known as the broad-breasted turkey was introduced to Vancouver island. By selective breeding and careful feeding a superior bird has been produced, and it is now recognized that this particular type of turkey has a definite advantage in the market. The majority of turkeys are, as the minister well knows, raised on the prairies, and are the standard type of turkey, including such birds as the bronze, reds and white hollands. This is an athletic bird which spends a good deal of its mature life in roaming the range, and, by chasing grasshoppers, develops muscular legs and wings. On Vancouver island we have no range, and our turkeys do not live such an exciting or interesting life, because as soon as they have passed from childhood—or chickhood, if one might use the expression—they are enclosed in narrow confinement; many of them are placed upon wire and spend the rest of their lives in crates. Now the range-fed turkey or standard type is brought in a few weeks before Christmas or Thanksgiving and fattened, but the Vancouver island turkey has been fed a balanced diet all through its life, and the meat grown on it is more uniform than the meat grown on the standard type of turkey. The contention of the Vancouver island turkey growers is that the meat from their turkeys is superior to that of the prairie turkeys; in fact I am told restaurant keepers claim that sixty pounds of the meat type turkey compares with one hundred pounds of the standard type turkey; and the breeders and poultrymen of Vancouver island wish to know whether they could be given a special grading, or if the existing grades, that is, special, A, B and C, could be reviewed so far as dimensions and conditions are concerned so as to give this superior type of turkey a fairer deal in the markets and so that the breeders of these turkeys might have the benefit, rather than the hotel and restaurant keepers, of having a special grading, or the condition of the existing grades reviewed. Can the minister give me any information on that matter, and can he have the case reviewed and see that before next Thanksgiving we get a better service?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: Unfortunately I have never seen the double-breasted turkey in British Columbia.

Mr. PEARKES: "Broad-breasted".

Mr. GARDINER: I have seen the double-breasted turkey exhibited in Ottawa, at the Chateau Laurier. I am not suggesting that any of them are in the house! At the annual meeting of the poultry people, I think it was two years ago, there was a very fine exhibit of this type of turkey at the Chateau. They were there to be seen by those attending the meeting, and on that occasion I did see them. They are a very fine type of bird, and produce, of course, much more in the way of breast meat, which is the important part of the turkey, than does the ordinary turkey.

The other matter, feeding birds without allowing them to use their muscles, does not apply only to turkeys; it has been applied in a very big way in connection with ducks. Ducks are not allowed to swim if you want them to produce just what people like to eat. If turkeys are not allowed to run, that helps too, as far as the legs are concerned.

On the matter of grading, I see no reason whatever why a special grade should not be allowed for birds of that type, whether ducks or turkeys or whatever they may be, just as we have red and blue beef in cattle. I will look into the matter and see if we cannot devise something to give proper recognition to this condition.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): With reference to what my colleague has just said, you do not have to go to British Columbia to get these broad-breasted turkeys. My young lad is always at me to get some of these double-breasted turkeys. Right in Manitoba, in the Portage la Prairie district, we have one of the largest ranches, producing from eight to twelve thousand birds a year, but they are never out roaming the prairies and becoming the athletic type that the hon. member spoke of. I should like to support his request that the minister do something in the way of providing a special grade. These people have developed a fine specimen of bird.

Special—

31. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage. (This does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $10,000,000, No. 606, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Under this heading the discussion of the marshlands at the head of the bay of Fundy has always taken place. On May 17 the minister made this statement, as reported in Hansard, page 1641:

> Of course the main problem in that area is the dikeland problem, which in a sense is somewhat similar to this. I can discuss the present position in relation to that problem more effectively under the prairie farm rehabilitation vote. I had hopes up until very recently of being able to report to the house that we were hoping to have something done in connection with this problem but I am not so hopeful now. I shall be glad to discuss that when we come to the prairie farm rehabilitation vote.

With your permission and that of the committee I think we should deal with this subject all at one time. I do not think it will take very long. In previous years the discussion has been mixed up with discussions on the very important subject of prairie farm rehabilitation as it applies to the prairies. I feel it would be in the interest of all concerned if we could exhaust at one time what has to be said rather than have members interested in the direct vote make their remarks. I believe my colleague the hon. member for Colchester-Hants has something to say now in connection with this item.

Mr. STANFIELD: I would like to ask the minister's kind consideration to having the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act enlarged so that it will take in eastern Canada, and include our marsh lands in Nova Scotia. Our problem of course is not putting water on the land; it is to keep it off the land and carry it away.

I think we have said on a good many occasions in this chamber that these lands are the most fertile and productive in Nova Scotia. They are protected from the high tides by dikes which were built a long time ago, some of them as many as a hundred and fifty years ago. In the last few years we have had very high tides in the bay of Fundy, and as a result of the wear and tear of many years these dikes have gradually given way. You may ask me why they cannot be repaired just as they were built many years ago. The answer is simple. In those days there were many men in the rural communities and on the farms who were glad to work on the dikes, digging ditches to drain these parched lands, and the cost was low. To-day however you cannot get anyone in the rural communities, or at any rate very few, to go and work in the muck and mud digging ditches all day and building dikes.

There are a few places where the dikes have been kept in very good repair, but there are a great many more that had to be abandoned. The minister knows that we have not too many areas in Nova Scotia that are good for farming, and he knows also that the resources of the province are not as great as those of many other provinces, while our farming population is decreasing to some extent. We hear a great deal about the western farmers and what a terrible time they have had, but we hear little about the hard time that our farmers have had to face. A great deal of the sustenance obtained in Nova Scotia has come from lands that were not very fertile. For many years people made a living on those farms; in fact, they did not make a living but simply existed. Very capable people grew up on those farms and went to different parts of the world and made a name for themselves, but gradually those communities had to be abandoned. There is no one living there to-day, and I assure the committee that the great shift in the population of Nova Scotia in the years has meant a considerable hardship to the province and to farming and the rural communities.

If our marsh lands have to be abandoned, where shall we stand in Nova Scotia in regard to our farms? Some people say it will take a great deal of money to reclaim many of these lands. I dare say there are some areas which it would not pay to reclaim, but I contend that if even half a million were appropriated each year for a few years, together with what Nova Scotia would do in cooperation with the marsh owners themselves, such areas would soon be restored to a proper productive condition.

We are told that it is difficult to find the money for it, but it seems to be very easy to find two or three hundred millions for this or that. Sometimes I think charity begins at home, and I would ask the minister to give his serious consideration to this question so that as many as possible of our people in Nova Scotia may be kept at home and we may have a larger production from the marsh lands and good areas where our people may make as respectable a living as possible.

We do not want our farmers to leave the province any more than the people in any other part of the country would like to see their farmers leave. We therefore ask that the minister give the matter his earnest attention. This is a mechanized age, and modern methods are required to keep these dike lands and marsh lands in good productive condition. As I have said, you cannot get men to go and dig ditches nowadays and work the way they used to on these dikes. They simply will not do it. But modern machinery and modern methods would keep these lands in good repair. Once more I urge upon the minister that he consider this question very seriously so that our marsh lands may be made productive.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to supplement what the hon. member for Colchester-Hants has said. What we want in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is a definite declaration of policy from the minister and the federal government as to what they intend to do with respect to providing assistance for the reclamation and drainage of these marsh lands at the head of the Bay of Fundy. It is not suggested by anyone that the federal government should do it all, but they should take the lead in conjunction with the provincial government and with the marsh owners.

The vote for western Canada, for the prairies, I am not going to oppose. I have supported it every session, and it has amounted to $20 million—two million every year during the war years, and it is being increased this year by fifty per cent. Three millions is the vote this session, and in addition there are other items purely for the benefit of western agriculture. There is item 12, $451,340, item 25, $245,520; and in the vote we are now considering it is stated that there are special appropriations out of the sum of $10 million under this vote 31, that "this does not include the cost of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta, and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from an item of $10 million, No. 606, Department of Reconstruction and Supply."

I would point out that these expenditures are all for the west, while nothing is being done specially for agriculture on the marsh lands in the east. This subject has been before parliament on many occasions. It was before the committee dealing with rehabilitation and reestablishment. That committee heard evidence from the premiers of the maritime provinces and the ministers of agriculture, and brought in a definite report back in 1943. This is 1946. The reports were favourable. The report was submitted to the previous parliament and passed unanimously. The provincial legislatures have passed special resolutions, and nothing is done. What the people at the head of the Bay of Fundy want to know is what the minister and his department and the government propose to do with respect to this matter. If nothing is to be done, if there is no hope, we want a declaration from them in order that the provincial legislatures and the marsh owners may know what they have to do and what they have to face. For the time being they are waiting for a lead from the federal government.

I am going to read a recommendation of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee which sat in 1943. That committee made a report on January 26, 1944, which had special reference to the maritime provinces. The report read as follows:

> Your committee has given a great deal of thought to the economic situation in the maritime provinces.

I shall not read the whole ten recommendations. The second one read as follows:

> Through assistance to the farming community, by the application of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

What our people want to know is what is proposed to be done in connection with our marsh lands.

I have a resolution which was passed unanimously by the legislature of Nova Scotia. There is also one I believe from the New Brunswick legislature. The Minister of Agriculture of New Brunswick came up and gave evidence before this committee. The premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick came up and they gave evidence.

I shall quote a few sentences from the evidence of Doctor E. S. Archibald, director of experimental farms, Ottawa, who gave evidence before the reconstruction and reestablishment committee. At page 1026 of the evidence of that committee of December 2, 1943, he said:

> There are seventy thousand acres of improved marsh land, and as stated the farmers are really not in a position to rehabilitate this themselves.

I shall skip some of his evidence and go down to the bottom of the page where the following appears:

> As Mr. Black knows, surrounding all the marsh lands in the upper reaches of the Bay of Fundy there are good uplands which have gone back to scrub and woods, probably in acreage twice that of the marsh lands themselves. I cannot think of a rehabilitation job that is more potent as a basis for land settlement than a broad scale approach to this question of marsh land improvement.

Doctor Archibald has given a great deal of time to this subject, and has made many investigations at the Nappan experimental farm. He said further:

> When one looks at the problems of post-war settlement in the clay belt of northern Ontario of a few million acres, the grey bush soils in the three prairie provinces, the Peace River district, central British Columbia, the area adjacent to the Alaska highway, getting further and further away from the centre of population, further away from existing social services, to think of neglecting the possibility of rehabilitating good lands on the seashores and in the valleys of Nova Scotia appears to me to be ridiculous.

I turn to page 1027, where Doctor Archibald said:

Then I think it is up to the government to establish a real sound live stock policy. This matter of selling hay has been the ruination of marsh land, and a good sound live stock policy which ties together both the upland and the marsh land to me is the real salvation of the situation.

Doctor Archibald is a man of wide experience, and commands the confidence of agriculturists all over Canada.

I now turn to the evidence of the Hon. A. S. MacMillan, premier of Nova Scotia. He said, at page 1020:

If our marsh land is abandoned and not reclaimed and made useful to agriculture in the maritimes, you may as well wipe out any prospect of raising stock and dairy products in Nova Scotia; and if it is going to be done, it should be done now.

You could not have a stronger statement than that. A little later on he said:

It costs considerable, even if the main arteries were open—and you know something about the cost of opening these arteries, the cost of maintaining them, the cost of keeping open the laterals—which are just as important as the main arteries—is quite expensive; and then the cost of keeping up the dikes.

I shall not read any more from this extensive evidence. We have had many resolutions from boards of trade and municipal councils. I hold in my hand a resolution from the Cumberland county municipal association passed on January 28, 1946. It says:

Whereas several thousand acres of dikeland are in danger of being lost to the sea, several hundred acres already lost; and whereas the loss of these fertile tracts cause many farms to become too small to be profitable productive units; and whereas the main drainage vents are clogged with rushes, and sediment owing to scarcity of labour for regular ditching; and whereas these conditions are causing a great loss in production and assessment;

Therefore be it resolved that the municipal council of Cumberland, in regular session on this twelfth day of January, A.D. 1946, hereby respectfully petition our provincial and federal governments to render early assistance.

A resolution placed on the order paper in 1946 by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) is expressive of the general interest of those in public life in Nova Scotia. I shall not read the preamble. The body of the resolution reads:

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, in any programme of reconstruction, rehabilitation and development, the government should take into consideration the advisability of developing that tract of marsh land, consisting of approximately 100,000 acres located along the head waters of the Bay of Fundy in the counties of Cumberland, Nova Scotia and Westmorland, New Brunswick.

And he might have said, the counties of Colchester, Hants, Kings, Annapolis and Albert in New Brunswick.

I have another resolution from the Colchester county council. I do not wish to delay the committee by reading it all. It is a long resolution. The preamble sets out the general conditions, and this is the substance:

. . . we endorse the resolution as presented by the committee of the Colchester county marsh owners' association, and also that this municipal governing body put itself on record as heartily favouring the efforts of this association in every respect.

In my opening remarks I said that the marsh owners and the provincial governments are waiting for action from the minister, the Department of Agriculture and the federal government. I am going to read a letter written by the present Minister of Agriculture in Nova Scotia, the Hon. A. W. Mackenzie, to Mr. E. B. Faulkner, who is secretary of the Colchester County Marsh Owners' Association. This letter is dated April 29, 1946, in answer to a letter from Mr. Faulkner, and states:

I have your letter of recent date with reference to marsh land rehabilitation. We are at a loss to know just how to move in this connection, due to the fact that for four or five months we have expected that the federal government would establish a new marsh and drainage act which would apply to eastern Canada in very much the same way that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act applies to western Canada.

The ministers of agriculture of eastern Canada have discussed this with the federal minister, the Hon. J. G. Gardiner on a number of occasions, and in our last discussion in December, Mr. Gardiner stated he felt this would be prepared at the present sitting of the federal house. Recently I have been advised that the bill has been prepared, and that it will be presented soon.

You can readily realize that it would be practically impossible and certainly very impractical for any of the eastern provinces to go ahead on a temporary marshland assistance policy if there was a chance in the very near future of having a policy which would allow for complete rehabilitation by joint financial assistance of federal and provincial governments and the owners.

I trust that now that you know the facts you will agree that our procedure is correct, and I hope we will be able before many months to establish a policy which will meet the requirements of the operators of your association.

As the hon. member for Colchester-Hants pointed out, this is no longer a hand labour job; the farmers cannot do this work alone. It has to be done by machinery, and all agree that it is necessary to have government assistance.

As I said, anyone who has given any thought to this subject is in favour of some assistance along the lines of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, to reclaim, drain and protect these marsh lands. But the condition continues from year to year. The report and the evidence were submitted back in 1943; here it is 1946, and nothing has been done.

The minister of agriculture in Nova Scotia wants to do something; he wants to see something done. He realizes the important of this work, and is waiting for action from the federal government. We should be told by the minister what is going to be done. Let him tell us what the policy of the federal government is going to be. I take it for granted, from statements he has already made, and from what he said the other day, which I have already quoted, that he is sympathetic. But the fact remains that there is no declaration of policy. The people in the provincial legislature and the municipal councils do not know whether anything is to be done or not. Members in the previous parliament were unanimously in favour of federal action in the matter.

A few days ago an hon. gentleman in another place said, on a discussion respecting the expansion of parks in the west, that while we had offered lands in the east, it was not included in the bill; simply because it was in the east it was considered unnecessary. That feeling is growing. It cannot help but be looked upon in that way by those who are interested in these marsh lands.

I should like to hear an expression of opinion from hon. members in other parts of Canada. Do they want the same measure of justice and fairness and equality handed out to the eastern provinces in connection with agriculture? I have already referred to the large special appropriations made for western Canada. In the vote we are now discussing there is an increase from $2 million to $3 million, an increase of 50 per cent. Then, there are several other large votes for the assistance of the western provinces. I am not going to object to that, although I did say last year that if something comparable was not done for the east, I would vote against these expenditures for western Canada. I am not going to do it to-day, because I am still hopeful the minister will make a declaration of policy, and that in the supplementary estimates there will be a vote sufficient to enable work being done in the part of the country about which I have been speaking. I am hopeful that a policy will be agreed upon by the federal government, the provincial government and the marsh owners, whereby the marshlands at the head of the Bay of Fundy can be protected, reclaimed and brought into a high state of cultivation.

This affects not only marshlands. As Doctor Archibald and everyone else familiar with agriculture realizes, it means the well-being and the future success of agriculture in the uplands adjacent to these marshlands. They require the products from this fertile marsh country, where three to four tons to the acre of the very best timothy and clover can be grown.

Mr. IRVINE: How much land is involved?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Roughly speaking, 100,000 acres. The whole area which might be described as the marshlands might total 150,000 acres. Doctor Archibald has said that 70,000 acres are now growing crops.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the estimated cost of doing the work the hon. member wants to have done?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): As the hon. member for Colchester-Hants has said, it would require an appropriation of a few hundred thousand dollars—perhaps $400,000 or $500,000—for a few years. These dikes and aboideaux which protect the marshlands from the sea have not been kept up.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be $4 million or $5 million.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The dikes should be recapped and strengthened, and the aboideaux should be strengthened. Drainage channels should be cleaned out. They are filling with sediment and vegetable growth. The large lateral ditches should be cleaned out. This is a machine job; the farmers cannot do it. Then, smaller ditches will have to be made; and that, too, would now be a machine job, although it used to be done entirely by men working with a small marsh spade, who made a specialty of that type of work. Then the land should be ploughed and seeded. Although this is fertile land, it would be benefited by the addition of lime and a small amount of nitrogen fertilizer.

The experimental farm at Nappan, which is under the direction of the minister, and more particularly under the supervision of Doctor Archibald, has made experiments and obtained satisfactory results through the addition of lime and fertilizer. The result has been that they get an average of 3 to 4 tons of the best feed hay for stock purposes from these lands.

There is much more I could say, but I make this appeal to the minister and to hon. members from all parts of Canada, to use their influence to see that some action is taken.

If nothing is going to be done, if there is no hope, if it is against the government's policy, if there is something holding it back or preventing its making a contribution or a declaration of policy, then let the minister make a statement so that the marsh owners, the provincial legislatures and the ministers of agriculture will know what the situation is. We want some declaration of policy.

Mr. GARDINER: Let me go on and I will give it to you. This question of the marsh lands has been a live issue for many years. I do not know how long it was a live issue before I came to Ottawa, but it certainly has been ever since. I understand that the hon. member for Cumberland, who has just spoken, was in the government of Nova Scotia at the time the matter first became a live issue here. This question is one of many that arise across Canada in connection with responsibility of the provinces or where a province finds itself in the position of having to do a job and not being able to find the money with which to do it.

This matter is clearly one of provincial responsibility, and it always has been. The province has legislation governing drainage, just as other provinces have similar legislation, particularly those in the west. The governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have found it impossible to repair the dikes, some of which were built many years ago with the assistance of governments even outside of Canada when settlers were first going into these areas. The dikes have deteriorated and it has been found most difficult to obtain funds with which to repair them, through provincial legislation, municipal legislation or otherwise.

I have not the complete history before me, but many years ago these lands fell into disuse, partly owing to the fact that an active live stock industry which had existed in earlier days had gone backward rather than forward. The people of that area are not raising as much live stock now as they did a long time ago. Whether the fact that there had been a stoppage in the production of live stock was in some degree responsible for their not being interested in the marsh lands, or whether the fact that the marsh lands were not properly handled was responsible for live stock production going down, is a moot question. One could take either side of that question, but the fact is that the lands are not producing live stock as they once did or to the extent that they could produce.

In 1934 or 1935 an amount was placed in the estimates. This may have been done at the suggestion of the government of Nova Scotia when the hon. member was a member of that government, or it may have been done at the suggestion of Doctor Archibald, who was then and still is the head of the experimental farms. He comes from that section of Canada and, as has been suggested, he knows this problem perhaps better than anyone else in Canada. He has always been a strong advocate of putting these lands back into production to the same extent that they were in an earlier age. I made my first trip to the maritime provinces in 1936, the year after the vote had been placed in the estimates. The vote was to permit some work being carried on by the experimental farm down there to determine whether or not these lands could be brought back into the production they had been capable of in an earlier day. Doctor Archibald was with me, and we went over the land together and decided to go ahead with the experiment. The experiment was conducted, and I think it was three years ago that I went back with Doctor Archibald to look at the results of the experiments. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that there was easily three times as much alfalfa growing on the land that had been properly drained and cultivated by the experimental farm as there was on land immediately across the fence. That proved to my satisfaction that this is a job that ought to be done.

We are looking for land upon which to settle men coming back from overseas, upon which to settle persons who are coming from the over-populated areas in other parts of the world, and upon which to settle the sons and daughters of our farmers in different parts of Canada who still wish to carry on in agriculture. Doctor Archibald was with me on that second visit, and I agreed with him when he said that there was no place in Canada in which a better job could be done, where money could be spent to better advantage than to take care of these marsh lands and make them produce as they are capable of producing. I think everyone who is familiar with the situation will agree with me when I say that that job ought to be done.

The fact is that there is responsibility on at least two authorities, but when we discuss the matter with the provinces they maintain and insist that there must be responsibility placed upon a third group, namely, the people who are on the land. It is all very well to say that the leadership should come from Ottawa; the fact is the leadership, with our constitution as it is, ought to come from the provincial government. There is a reason for the provincial governments coming to Ottawa and saying that we should assist, but the leadership ought to be with the provincial governments.

I am inclined to believe that the leadership has been with the provincial governments. They have been urging the matter and insisting that something ought to be done. I think that hon. members who have discussed the matter up to the moment might have said that something has been done. We have been operating on these lands for the last three years under an arrangement made between the provinces and the federal government. We have been spending some money—not as much as I would like to see spent—the provinces have been advancing part and the farmers themselves have been made responsible for the payment back of some of it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The expenditures that have been made have been only for emergency repairs of breakages in the dikes.

Mr. GARDINER: That is just what I was going to say. Those are the only kind of expenditures that can and ever will be made under a three-way arrangement. It is all very well to argue that we should go to the provinces and say, "You give us fifty per cent of the cost." What will happen is that they will go to the municipalities or to the individual farmers and say, "We will spend dollar for dollar with you." It would all be based on what the farmer or the municipality could spend. The amount that the municipality or the farmer can spend, multiplied by three, will not do the job at all. We may go to start to build a dike with $100,000 or $50,000 and be able to do only half the job when the season is over. Then it is all washed out and we might as well not have spent any money at all. That is what has happened on two or three occasions.

The position the government finally took was that this was one of a number of problems that should be submitted to the dominion-provincial conference, that there should be a decision upon it. This policy did not apply only to this particular job; it applied to the P.F.R.A., to road building, and to many other things. I believe the hon. member for Cumberland was once minister of highways of his province, and I was once minister of highways in my province. At the end of the last war I directed the expenditure of Saskatchewan's part of the $20,000,000 which was voted for road work. Long before I got through spending that money I came to the conclusion that we were wasting the greater part of it because of the necessity of getting undertakings between Ottawa and Saskatchewan. I venture to say we have wasted much energy and a considerable part of the money voted for this project by the fact that we must sit down and discuss it with the municipalities and provinces before anyone starts to do anything, so that by the time we get started the season has passed, and, this country being so far north, the opportunity is gone to do anything worth while. As a result of that experience I have maintained and still maintain that the job ought to be done by some one government, and that some one government ought to have control of sufficient money to do it and do it properly. If there is to be an understanding arrived at with regard to maintenance, let that be undertaken also.

But so far as doing the job is concerned, what I have been suggesting from the very beginning is that the federal government ought to recondition these dikes and clean out the main ditches—that is if we are to take on any part of the work. We should go ahead and do the main job which is to protect the land, and then someone else can do the rest of it. But my difficulty when I approach the treasury to get sufficient money to do that has been to get someone else who will take the responsibility for making use of the lands after the money has been spent. The treasury will say: What is the use of spending four or five million dollars or even two or three hundred thousand dollars blocking up a few holes and cleaning out a few ditches and taking out some rotten abutments and putting in new ones in certain places and leaving the job undone somewhere else, so that the water gets in behind and undoes all the work you have done and the expenditure you have made? Someone has to take over the job in a big way and do it in a big way and get the main part of the job done.

I had hoped when the dominion provincial conference was called that we should get this question settled this year. As has been stated, an act was drafted, in fact two acts. People who know their own problems perfectly but do not know the problems in other parts of Canada are continually making statements in this house with regard to those other parts which are unjustified. I had occasion a few days ago to say something with regard to freight rates, as related to the shipment of grain from western to eastern Canada, in defence of those who live in eastern Canada, and those who were discussing the question and relating it to the western P.F.R.A. did not really understand the position. I know what my hon. friend from northern Manitoba, who has been waiting to get into this discussion, is going to say. He is going to say that the line over which we do not go runs right through his constituency, and that a considerable part of his constituency does not come under the P.F.R.A. Every member from northern Manitoba is going to say the same thing, as well as every member from northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta, because they are not taken care of by P.F.R.A. There is just the Palliser triangle, which takes in a little of Manitoba, a considerable area of Saskatchewan and about one-third of Alberta and we spend this money within that area. The men who live north of that in western Canada will join with the hon. member for Cumberland in saying that they ought to be taken in too, and so will every other part of Canada.

But there is a good reason why the government took in the Palliser triangle. It was the Bennett government that did it, and the reason was that people had been put into that area. As a matter of fact they were put in there against the advice of Mr. Bennett who was in provincial politics in Alberta at the time it was done. He opposed the putting of people in that area. It was also opposed by others in western Canada. Later Mr. Bennett found himself, as leader of the federal government, confronted with the problem of dealing with the 1,000,000 people who had been put into that area by the federal government against his own advice and against the advice of others. He said that these people ought to be assisted in getting reestablished on that land, and I agreed with him in taking that position. But hon. gentlemen will see that that problem is entirely different from the problems in most other parts of Canada. The problem in the maritime provinces which we have been discussing existed before there was a Dominion of Canada. It came to us when the provinces joined confederation. But the Palliser triangle problem was one which we ourselves created, and therefore Mr. Bennett said that the federal government ought to finance the reestablishment of those people who had been put in there by the federal government against the good advice of some people.

What I want to emphasize is that there is just as much opposition to applying this assistance only to the Palliser triangle in western Canada as the opposition we heard only a few moments ago from the hon. member for Cumberland to this assistance not being applied to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. We should all get together and agree. We are not battling one another. We are not criticizing anything being done in any other part of Canada. But here is a job that ought to be done, and it requires a great amount of money which can only be provided by the federal government. This being so, we ought to do something about our constitution. In the conference, instead of talking generalities that do not solve very much, we should try to get a question like this settled. But people like to go to these conferences, as they go to international conferences, where very often they discuss things that do not solve very much. They talk generalities. We tried to get this question before two conferences. We tried to get permission to sit as a special committee and discuss this question with the conference and make recommendations on it. But other questions were regarded as bigger and more important. I personally do not think they were bigger, but some people thought they were. The governments discussed other matters and went home and left this question entirely unsettled, as well as similar questions on which we probably could have reached agreement in a week if we had got together and discussed them instead of discussing simply theoretical questions.

As I said, I had two acts drafted. One was for the four western provinces. The name would have to be changed; it would not be prairie farm rehabilitation, but simply rehabilitation. If that bill had been passed by the house it would have covered the four western provinces. Another bill was drafted to cover the five eastern provinces. We had intended to have the administration of the act dealing with the western provinces centred where it is now, at Regina, and the administration of the other act centred at Ottawa. They deal with two completely different problems. One deals largely with drought; the other deals with too much water, and in British Columbia there is a combination of both because there are areas in that province which need diking, and other areas which need irrigation; and sometimes these areas are only five or six miles apart, depending upon where the range of mountain lies.

These problems exist right across the country, and we believe that there ought to be agreement in the first place on certain sources of revenue being open to the federal government which are now tapped by the provincial governments in order that we may have the means to do these things. Then we ought to have a division of authority to make it possible for us to spend the money in these areas. I have been going to provincial conferences ever since 1922, and there have not been very many decisions arrived at in all that time; but I am still hopeful that while I am alive and in politics we shall reach a decision on some of them, and if we do, I can guarantee to the hon. member for Cumberland that we shall give leadership in the problem, just in the same way as we have given leadership in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. But the first thing I had to do in connection with P.F.R.A. when I came here, to get anything done, was to refuse to go and discuss everything that came up with some other authority and obtain agreement before we could start. Under that policy we would never have got anywhere in regard to P.F.R.A. We said, "We have a certain amount of money and we are coming in to spend it. We would like you to help us in connection with spending it, if you will; if not, we shall come in and spend it without your help; but if you will help us we shall be able to do that much more for you." That explains what some hon. members are going to ask me with regard to different provinces in western Canada. But if we can get into that position in relation to this question I guarantee that, if I am here, I will bring the legislation down. It is drafted, it is ready to come down, and we will go ahead with that job in a manner which will bring it to a successful conclusion and will achieve results such as are desired.

In the meantime there is no use of my saying that that is the only policy we have. We shall have to proceed with a policy which is not ours at all and cannot be ours. It is a policy in which the leadership has been given by the provinces. The position has been: We have so much money to spend; if you will put dollar for dollar on it then we will go ahead and do the job. The only mistake we have made so far in connection with these expenditures is that we have not determined definitely who has the authority in connection with them, with the result that, instead of spending the amount of money we set out to spend, sometimes we have spent double the amount, and we have not achieved the results we started out to get. So I say we will go along and deal with these matters as we have had to deal with them under the condition which exists. I would have had money in the estimates this year had these estimates not been prepared prior to the dominion-provincial conference. Since the conference did not make decisions, and we are left where we were, I have had to withdraw the legislation for this session, but I did it on the understanding that money would be available to go ahead with undertakings as between ourselves and the maritime provinces, to continue the work in connection with these marsh lands in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I have had those understandings, as has been suggested by the ministers concerned in those two provinces. We have had a lot of correspondence and much discussion about it, and have reached conclusions we had hoped would materialize in the form of legislation. That has not happened, and I am afraid we shall have to go back to doing this year what we did in two or three previous years—enter into an arrangement between ourselves and the provincial government under which some responsibility is placed on the farmers themselves. It will not get the results I had hoped for, but it is the best that can be done under a system whereby there must be some agreement reached with the provinces.

I would like to repeat that I think it will take four or five million dollars, spent just as rapidly as it can be spent. The work cannot be done by spending $100,000 or $150,000 year by year; I think, when we do that job, to do it right we shall have to have a considerable amount of money voted, perhaps to be spent in two years but certainly in not more than three. We ought to go right through with the expenditure and reclaim those lands, put the dikes in as they ought to be put in, put in the main ditches, and then have some scheme under which we can get the farmers to cultivate and fertilize the land properly and produce from it as it ought to produce. The only way they will ever do that is under such conditions as many hon. members have been emphasizing in the debates on agriculture during this session: if we can create a situation under which they can market their product at a reasonable return, one which will induce them to produce enough live stock to feed themselves in that section of Canada, a thing they have not done up to the present time.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding) The hon. member for Dauphin has had his name on the list. I wonder if he would allow the hon. member for St. John-Albert to close the discussion on the marsh lands.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to close the discussion, but there are one or two questions I would like to ask the minister about the marsh lands in New Brunswick and the work which has been done there in 1944 and 1945. This afternoon the minister made an interesting and, I think, valuable statement about those marsh lands. Last year, on December 8, I said, when speaking on this matter—Hansard, page 3193.

I understand that last year —

That was, in 1944.

—in New Brunswick about 5,000 feet of dike were constructed under a plan whereby the owners paid one-third of the cost, the provincial government paid one-third and the dominion government paid one-third, and that this year about a similar length of dike has been constructed under the same plan. If I am wrong in that, perhaps the minister will inform me.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

In connection with that work I would like to ask the minister if he is in a position to inform us whether a written agrement was entered into between the parties in 1944; that is, between the dominion government, the provincial government and the land owners. If there was such an agreement, will he tell us what it was, or put a copy of it on the records of the house? If there was no written agreement, was there a verbal agreement, or on what terms was the work carried on? I have the following further questions:

Was the work which was undertaken in 1944 completed? How many feet of dike were constructed or rebuilt, and how many aboideaux were constructed in 1944? In 1944 was all the work which was planned completed, and did it stand up? Who did the work in 1944, and who supervised it? Did the dominion government or the provincial government—that is, the government of New Brunswick—supervise it, or who looked after the construction that was done? What did the dminion government's share of this work cost in 1944? Can the minister tell us what amount was paid by the provincial government—that is, the government of New Brunswick—and what amount was paid by the land owners? Did the dominion government or the provincial government collect the cost of the undertaking and pay it over to the contractor or whoever did the work? Has all the cost been collected; that is, have all the people who agreed to contribute to the work paid their share? If not, how much remains to be paid? I am speaking now of the year 1944. I would also like answers to these questions as applied to the year 1945, that is last year. My final question is, where in these estimates do we find the expenditures on those marsh lands for the year 1944?

Mr. GARDINER: I must ask the hon. member to have the questions which he has asked remain on Hansard as notice. As a matter of fact, I am not in a position to answer personally the last question that has been asked. The moneys will not be found in my estimates. They will be found in the estimates prepared for special works during the war period, and I am not certain at the moment whether they come within the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction or those of the Minister of Finance. They will be under one or the other. The money is provided in that way. They appear as individual items but not as a bulk vote having to do with the war. In any event, the amounts can be obtained and I will see that the questions are answered in detail.

However, to answer in a general way, let us take first the question as to whether there was an agreement. There was correspondence and there were meetings and delegations of representatives of the provinces and of the farmers concerned as well as of the federal government, and a committee was set up of which I believe the superintendent of the experimental farm at Nappan was chairman. He is an employee of this department, though he was not acting as such. He was selected as one who knew the problem and had detailed information regarding it, and he was made chairman of the committee. There were also on the committee representatives of all those concerned—I have not the names before me—and they were instructed by the provincial and federal governments to go ahead and supervise the expenditure of a certain amount of money to do certain things. That money was expended, and when the total had been expended it was found that it did not cover the cost. Some works that had been done were washed out and had to be redone.

Mr. HAZEN: Was an investigation made into that? It must have been somebody's fault.

Mr. GARDINER: There was an investigation, but I do not know that one can say it was anybody's fault. As I said a few moments ago, it is impossible to take $100,000 or $150,000 and start to build these dikes if you wish to construct them properly. If you instruct the engineer to take $150,000 or perhaps $100,000 and do the best he can and he does the very best he can, and then it is found that as a result of an extraordinary wave coming in something happens, I do not know that you can blame the engineer or say that somebody is to blame for it. In any event the matter was gone into and there were losses in connection with it. The question raised a moment ago is precisely the question that I raised. I do not think that kind of job can be done under dual authority, because there is no one responsible when two or three people are giving orders.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree with the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: If there were on the job an engineer who was not employed by the federal government and we were paying half the cost, or, vice versa, if an engineer was employed, not by the provincial government but by some other authority, and they were paying half the cost, it would be the easiest thing in the world in an argument to slip out from under, and say, "We are not responsible." We did not maintain that position. We said, "All right. The expenditure must be made and we will take our share of the extra expenditure, whatever it may be"—and the figures will be indicated in the answers to the questions that have been asked. At any rate, it is because of that kind of experience that I made the statement I did a few moments ago, that if we are to do this job as it ought to be done, and as the hon. member for Cumberland and other hon. members from those areas want it to be done, we should find some way of placing the funds in the hands of a responsible authority, and it would be best if that responsible authority were the federal government. We could then go ahead and do thoroughly the part of the job that must be done before the rest of it can be undertaken. If we start on that basis we shall accomplish something. I am prepared to admit, without answering in detail, that the plan under which we were proceeding, as it was carried out, was not the plan under which we should have operated. We must find a better way of doing it, and it was in the hope of finding that way that we were bringing down the legislation and trying to get all the problems properly under control.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It was repair work.

Mr. GARDINER: It is difficult to repair a dike without rebuilding it.

Mr. HAZEN: There is one other matter in connection with the dikes in Albert county. I refer to a local situation that exists at Hillsborough, which is the largest community in that county. I will not go into details, but one dike went out and the result of the whole thing was that the Canadian National railway in that section was undermined; the road that leads to the cemetery was washed away; the main road that runs from Hillsborough to Surrey was in danger of being destroyed, and the plant of the Canadian Gypsum company, a very modern plant, was put in jeopardy. As I understand the situation, a meeting of the parties interested was held.

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: I am informed that an agreement was reached about rectifying that situation which affects that one community. Was an agreement reached on the part of the Canadian National or the dominion government—I understand they had already spent between $20,000 and $30,000 on account of the damage they suffered—the provincial government, whose roads were affected, the Canadian Gypsum company, whose plant was also affected, and the marsh owners themselves? Was there an agreement with regard to repairing that particular section of dike in order to protect the various parties interested?

Mr. GARDINER: Speaking again from memory, I believe that the province did investigate the damage done and the expenditures that were required and that was submitted to investigation by persons representing all the parties concerned. Finally an understanding was reached as to what ought to be paid by each party to the arrangement. My memory is that our part of it was about the same amount as we undertook in the first place. It was a three-way arrangement and I would not wish to bind myself to a few thousand dollars. We may have gone farther in one direction than some thought we should have gone, or not as far as others felt, but that was the basis on which we set out.

Mr. HAZEN: Does the minister know who will supervise the work? It should be done this coming summer. The work should be undertaken as soon as possible, and it should be put through in the summer or it will again be washed out and the moneys put into it will be lost.

Mr. GARDINER: The definite action that was going to be taken was awaiting this legislation; but I have insisted, and I think the government agrees with it, that either the province or ourselves, one or the other, must take absolute responsibility for carrying on the further work there; that if we undertook the responsibility then the province must turn the money over to us and we will go ahead. If the province undertakes the responsibility then we will turn our money over to them and they will go ahead and take responsibility from that point. Whatever money is advanced is advanced, and that is the end of it. If we do things that we should not have done under arrangements with the province we shall have to pay for it. If they do the job and something happens that was not anticipated or because of the fault of anyone, then they will probably have to do the paying. I think it should be either one or the other and we should get ahead with the job and have the whole difficulty cleared up.

Mr. HAZEN: It is important that the work be done this coming season if it is at all possible.

Mr. GARDINER: I agree.

Mr. HAZEN: If it is not done you will have to do it all over again.

Mr. GARDINER: I agree with that. When I spoke a moment ago I should have said that later on in the supplementary estimates there will be appropriations brought down either by myself or by someone else to take care of the work which must be done there, and I hope this will be brought down shortly.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I appreciate the statement of the minister, but this is an appropriation to deal only with emergent repairs. The main policy, if properly put into effect, would bring about conditions which would do away with the necessity of expenditures for repairs; repairs would not be necessary. In the last few years no work has been done until the dike is broken and the aboideau goes out. Practically all the dikes have weakened or the aboideaux have weakened; the canals and drainage ditches have filled up. With a general policy for new work and the money properly expended it will not be necessary to make these repairs at all. We want a general policy. I appreciate the statement of the minister and thank him for the undertakings he has given. But the fact remains that no immediate action is being taken.

I agree with the minister that some body should be set up which would carry the responsibility. That body should have the confidence of the marsh owners and the provincial governments as well as the federal government. It might be a commission, or, as the minister suggests, it might be carried out entirely by the federal government with the provincial governments and the marsh owners making their contributions.

What we should like to have is an expenditure of at least half a million dollars, and that it be made available this year. We should also like a policy arrived at which would be satisfactory to all concerned, and which could be carried out in the next five or ten years. That is a long-term policy. The success of agriculture and stock raising in that whole area depends on it, and that policy should be arrived at without any further delay. What is grieving these people who are interested is that this matter has been discussed and no policy has been decided on. Any expenditure that is being made is with respect to emergent repairs after the damage is done.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As the Minister of Agriculture said a few moments ago, I have been popping up and down regularly since this discussion began. However, I understood there was some urgency in the matter of the Nova Scotia marsh lands and on this occasion I was happy to give way to the hon. members from that area who wanted to speak on it.

In the past there have been suggestions and complaints that when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are before the committee, western members monopolize all the time; therefore on this occasion I thought we should show our good-neighbour policy and give them an opportunity to discuss their matters.

The Minister of Agriculture was kind enough to make half of my speech for me; therefore I shall not have to burden him very long, but there are a few matters in connection with prairie farm rehabilitation with which I wish to deal. I think it is clear to all hon. members of the committee that it is not only a matter of prairie farm rehabilitation but a matter of rehabilitation generally across Canada.

Last fall I had a discussion with the Minister of Agriculture and brought up the question of the advisability of extending the boundaries of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I do not know what is in the draft that the minister has prepared, but in the act as passed in 1935, and amended in 1937, 1939 and 1941, these words appear; they are the key words:

> The committee shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Evidently the original purpose behind the act and, as it still stands, was to rehabilitate those areas which were known as the drought areas, and which are sometimes referred to as the Palliser triangle. But as the years went by it was found that there were other matters which entered into the question of drought; that is, there were certain other areas in western Canada which were not in the drought area, but which were becoming drought areas because no precautions were being taken to conserve the water or to conserve the texture of the soil. Something of that kind is in process of taking place in the constituency I have the honour to represent. That is why I pressed the question last fall and want to do so again.

On numerous occasions several municipalities within the Dauphin electoral district have made representations to the government—I believe years before I came to the house—to be included in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I need only to quote from one of the resolutions to show what I mean. This resolution comes from the rural municipality of Grandview, and is in these words:

> Therefore it is resolved that the rural municipality of Grandview make application to the prairie farm assistance branch of the dominion government to have the rural municipality of Grandview included in the area which qualifies for financial assistance to farmers in the making of dugouts on farms.

The minister said that on the prairies it was mainly a problem of dealing with drought areas, and getting more moisture there. Within thirty miles of this same municipality which is appealing for assistance to make dugouts in order to obtain a supply of water we have a situation just south of the town of Dauphin where the very opposite is the trouble. There in the spring time we have flood waters which do a great deal of damage to the best farm land in Manitoba. I have already had correspondence with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Mines and Resources as to where the responsibility lies for doing something to control these waters which come down from the Riding mountain national park, which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the municipalities concerned, makes the federal government at least partly responsible for the flood condition. It has a double effect, because in the spring time the water rushes down; the creeks overflow the banks and destroys or damages good farming land. Within a few months, in fact within a few weeks in some years, the water is all gone; the creek beds are dry, and there is not even a supply of water for the live stock in the area. They have evolved a plan whereby a number of controlled dams can be built at a fairly reasonable cost, so that the waters, instead of coming down in the spring and drying up completely in the hot days of the summer, can be so controlled as to provide a steady flow of water all through the year. I believe it is a worthy project.

I shall have more to say about national parks on another occasion. I would point out, however, that the condition has been caused largely by the fact that the timber in the national park has been denuded. When the timber was thick the snow which fell in the winter melted slowly in the spring time, and the water was controlled by nature. Then, beaver dams kept the water in a controlled state.

But since the timber has been removed by certain interests, the water now comes down much faster, with the result that we have flood conditions. I leave this matter for the attention of the minister. In passing, may I say I have every sympathy for those in Nova Scotia because of the condition which exists there. I know something about marsh lands.

I leave the plea with the minister that he ought not to delay the introduction of the measure he has drafted until agreement is reached with all the provinces. As I understand the situation, it is the break-down of the dominion-provincial conference that is delaying the introduction of the bill to incorporate the four western provinces under a new rehabilitation measure. I believe it will be admitted that the four western provinces which took part in the conference were willing to sign an agreement with the dominion. That being so, I can see no reason for delay in introducing a bill which would formulate an agreement for those provinces which are now willing to come to an agreement.

If the eastern provinces still have differences of opinion which they think must be resolved, then they may have to wait until such time as that is done. I believe the western provinces indicated their good faith at the conference, and are willing to come to an agreement. The minister has a green light to go ahead with the introduction of the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: The people of the irrigated section in southern British Columbia will, I know, read with a good deal of regret the minister's statement this afternoon that, consequent upon the adjournment of the dominion-provincial conference he does not believe it will be possible to proceed with rehabilitation work in that part of British Columbia at the present time.

The minister has received a brief submitted by the association of irrigation districts in British Columbia. I certainly shall not read it, but shall point out that its object is to urge the federal government to extend to British Columbia the terms of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, so that many veterans now settling in the irrigated areas may not be handicapped by inability to find land.

I shall place only one paragraph on record, because it succinctly states the case:

> There are in the Okanagan valley and immediate vicinity some 27,000 additional acres of arable land, mostly within, or adjacent to the present irrigation systems, which could be brought under irrigation at a cost of from $100 to $150 per acre. The increase in production from this acreage would eventually double the present production of the area, expand the towns to almost twice their size, and cause new towns to develop. The resultant production would provide increased employment and augment the available market for goods from the coast cities, from the prairies and from the east, just as the P.F.R.A. projects are improving our markets for fruit by assuring the prairie farmer a full crop, regardless of drought.

That states in a few words what is in the minds of farmers in the irrigated districts. The condition is not identical with the drought conditions of the Palliser triangle. But the land in the dry belt in the southern part of British Columbia is capable of producing very little in the nature of crop until irrigation water is applied to it. Then there is scarcely any limit to the crops which may be grown there.

Once that land is developed, as a good many tens of thousands of acres have been developed over the years, not only does it carry increased population, but it produces secondary industries. The increased population must be supplied with the necessities of life, and those requirements in turn cause business for the merchants, and freight for the railways. It is an area in which returned men are most desirous of settling. But the difficulty is that the land, so productive when irrigated, is valued at a high price. There are very few pieces of developed and irrigated land which fall within the terms of the Veterans' Land Act.

The consequence has been that endeavours have been made in the last two years to discover areas which can be irrigated at a cost that would not be too high, and which could then be turned over to veterans for purposes of settlement. There must be ten or fifteen veterans to every parcel of land which a veteran under the land act is capable of obtaining.

I have in mind three areas concerning which consideration has been given to the possibility of putting irrigation water on. The benefit of engineering advice from those connected with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been received in connection with formulating schemes for putting water on the land.

I should like to learn from the minister his hopes and expectations in the matter, and whether next year we may look to rehabilitation expansion in that part of British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, strange to say, I am asking, not that water be brought on, but that it be taken off. Cannot this procedure be extended to give protection to certain areas in the Fraser valley? Our trouble is that of keeping the water off, not on. We are asking only that the act be extended to protect us from flooding conditions in the river. Would the minister state whether, under the measure, we might expect to have our land protected from flood and flood erosion?

Mr. IRVINE: As the minister is likely to answer all our questions at the same time, perhaps I might now get in under the wire and ask one or two. I believe it would be a fine policy for some political party—I hope the Progressive Conservative party does not do it —to advocate that we export some of our drought from the west and import the surplus water from the east, thereby bringing about a greater balance.

The problem I would draw to the minister's attention is somewhat different from either the marsh lands problem in the east or the irrigation problem to which reference has just been made. The problem that arises in the Peace River block is different from either of these. In that district it usually rains sufficiently to provide them with crops and they are not troubled with floods. Their difficulty is to find sufficient water in wells for the use of their families and their stock during the summer. They are anxious to come under the P.F.R.A. in order that reservoirs may be built to hold the melting snow in the spring and thus provide sufficient water for their stock during the summer. I expect that the minister's answer, at least in part, will be something similar to that which he gave in connection with the marsh lands of Nova Scotia. Last year, when the matter was under discussion the minister said that he was referring the problem to the dominion-provincial conference. Certainly the question is still under reference and has not yet been settled. I should like to emphasize the point raised by the hon. member for Dauphin, that the minister should proceed with his legislation and then have the provincial governments pass enabling legislation later on in order to carry out the work which he has in mind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think this act should be extended to cover those of us who want to keep water off their land. In the Fraser valley our land is protected by dikes. In 1904 a dike broke and we built a new one which cost several hundred thousand dollars. I have had several questions about this on the order paper but I have not been able to get satisfactory answers. When the Canadian Pacific built their line running into the United States to connect with the Northern Pacific they claimed that they had built above the high-water line. They have never paid any diking tax, and the result has been that their land is protected from freshets at the cost of the farmers of the district, although at the present time their line is eight feet below the highwater mark. This branch line is one of the best paying lines in their whole system. I asked question after question about this but I was told that the government had no information. I presume the Canadian Pacific did not want to give out the information. Can the minister assure me that the farmers in my district will have every assistance in keeping water off their land? I should like to ask also if the minister can get me the information I want as to why the Canadian Pacific are able to have full protection from floods at the cost of the farmers of the Fraser valley?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the questions which have just been asked are the best demonstration we could possibly have as to the idea that is held about what the federal government can do. The diking in British Columbia was undertaken as either a provincial or a municipal responsibility. The taxes just referred to by the hon. member would not be collected by this government. Those who replied that they had no information were making the only posible answer. If we are to start in to try to get information with regard to municipal and provincial taxes in order to answer questions I am afraid we will be very busy and we shall be attempting to keep other people very busy when we have no authority over them. I think the proper place to get that information would be the provincial government, some municipal organization or any other organization that has been set up to handle the collections having to do with diking. It certainly would not be the Department of Agriculture, because that matter would have nothing to do with these estimates. Therefore I am not in position to answer that question.

Dealing with the other matters, we should have nothing to do with diking in British Columbia unless we had special legislation such as I referred to a few minutes ago which imposed that responsibility. That special legislation probably will be forthcoming only if certain financial arrangements are made between the provinces and the federal government making it possible for some of the revenues which now go provincially to go federally. I may say that we are hopeful that some time that may happen.

When it was decided recently that this legislation would not be proceeded with this session I did ask that consideration be given to the possibility of our proceeding with works of a certain kind, under restrictions if necessary, to bring about some of the developments which we hope some day can be carried out under the type of legislation we have been discussing. One of these works is a project similar to the one referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay East.

There is one project in the Pemberton river area which I know quite well. I am not sure just when it was put in there, but a soldier settlement was put in following the last war. I do not know of any more naturally beautiful spot that that one; but unfortunately the river, which is fed from a glacier, is quite close to the top of its banks at all times. The whole plain is built up from silt which has been carried down by the floods. All that is needed is for a tree to fall some night, as often happens, the silt form behind it to form a dam, and flooding occurs. Engineers have looked over this project and I have more details with regard to it than I have with regard to any other.

We have sent the P.F.R.A. engineers in there, and we have a report which would suggest that by blasting out some of the rock in the stream we can lower the level of the water and allow it to get away with greater readiness, and then by a certain amount of diking keep the river from flooding.

Mr. STIRLING: That is entirely different from the Okanagan; that is similar to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. GARDINER: The Fraser is quite different from the Pemberton; it runs through a different type of country and a different situation is created. The area is much larger. One reason for being interested in this particular situation was that they are all returned soldiers. We could not take exactly the same position with regard to the Fraser river, because that country has been settled for many years and municipal organizations have been built up. We had nothing to do with putting the people there, but we cannot say that about the Pemberton area. We put the returned soldiers in there after the last war and I think we ought to do something about it as a special case.

As to these other irrigation projects, one of them is only seven or eight miles from the Pemberton valley, just over the mountains in the Lillooet district, in the constituency of the hon. member for Kamloops. There is an irrigation project which could give good results. There are similar areas in the valley where fruit is grown. Putting water on a larger area would make it possible for many more people to live and sustain themselves there. These projects could all be considered under legislation such as we had hoped to bring down this session. While a project such as the Pemberton one could be proceeded with this summer, it would be most difficult to proceed with projects in the Fraser valley or in the Kootenay district without legislation.

Mr. QUELCH: I think all the people of western Canada have a high appreciation of the excellent work done under P.F.R.A., specially in regard to small water projects and in regard to the surveys which have been made by the P.F.R.A. engineers in connection with larger irrigation projects.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the problems put before the committee by the hon. member for Cumberland. I should like to see the P.F.R.A. extended to every province. I recall that when this question was before the reconstruction committee which sat for two or three sessions, a recommendation was made to that effect. We were investigating a number of worth-while projects for the purpose of developing the resources of the country and thereby increasing the wealth of the country, and I think it was felt by the committee that these projects should be undertaken as national projects and financed by the federal government. Once the project had been constructed and completed, the maintenance would fall on the provinces and municipalities and the farmers concerned on a certain share basis.

We also discussed in the committee the problem of the salt marshes, and some of the witnesses pointed out that these salt marshes originated as a result of the farmers being unable to maintain their dikes because of depressed prices. While the maintenance of dikes may have been a provincial responsibility, to-day we all recognize that the maintenance of prices is a federal responsibility and that unless we maintain prices at a level which will meet the cost of production, it will be impossible for the farmers to carry on the necessary maintenance work. That is a good example of the devastation resulting from a depression or deflationary policy. We hear so much of the dangers of inflation, but we seldom hear of the terrible devastation caused by a deflationary policy. After the deflationary period has gone, we are left with a heavy capital depreciation, which costs many times more than it would have cost to maintain the capital in the first place.

The main criticism I have heard in the west regarding P.F.R.A. has been that they have not expanded their work rapidly enough. I realize that that is not really a criticism of P.F.R.A., but rather of government policy, because P.F.R.A. is dependent upon government policy for the amount of work they can do. Whilst the people are critical in that regard, they realize the impossibility of going ahead with these large-scale projects during the war, but they feel that, now that the war is over, no time should be lost in going ahead with them at the earliest possible day. There was a good deal of disappointment visible when the Minister of Reconstruction stated that these national projects would not be gone ahead with for two or three years, because the federal government was building up a shelf of projects to take care of unemployment in the future. However, I understand that the government's policy has been modified so that some of these projects may be started at an early day or are now being started. It is a very good thing that the government has decided to start the work earlier, because day after day we are told of the tragic plight of people in Europe and Asia as a result of the shortage of food; and while this condition is largely, I believe, the result of the war, nevertheless it has been aggravated considerably by a number of crop failures throughout the world. This condition is not only tragic but an extremely dangerous one, because one of the main essentials of a sound peace is an ample supply of food. If we are to allow shortages of food to continue it will be that much harder to bring about a satisfactory peace in the world to-day.

This spring there was quite a general demand that we should increase wheat acreage in western Canada. The farmers were urged to reduce their summer-fallow in order to expand their sown acreage, but I think the Minister of Agriculture was wise when he advised against such a policy because the reduction of summer-fallow may easily bring about a reduction in production over a two-year period.

The only safe way to overcome drought is by irrigation. You may mitigate it by cultural practices, but in the final analysis the only way to overcome severe drought is by the application of water. In western Canada we have a number of rivers running through the parched lands and practically no use is being made of the water. We have rivers without a dam or a power project. The water of these rivers is urgently needed now to irrigate the lands in the drought areas, and no time should be lost in starting these irrigation projects, because we now have the men and, I believe, the machinery available, so that an early start could be made.

In past years—I am thinking especially of the thirties—when we discussed irrigation in this house we were met with these two main objections: first, the cost would be too great; we could not afford it; second, if we were to carry out large-scale irrigation projects we would increase the amount of farm produce and create surpluses. Dealing with the first objection, the financial cost, to-day we should realize that it is not a question of not being able to afford it but of not being able to afford not to do it. Let us consider the cost of failure to provide irrigation in some parts of the drought areas in western Canada. I shall give an example from my own constituency which no doubt could be duplicated in many other parts of the west.

In the constituency of Acadia, from 1918 to 1935, over $10,000,000 was paid out in direct relief, and from 1935 on many more millions have been granted in the form of seed and feed relief and under prairie farm assistance. Thousands of homes were abandoned and thousands of acres have become useless for pasture because of the lack of water.

Recently surveys have been completed by P.F.R.A. engineers of the Red Deer diversion project, which would involve an initial expenditure of $6,750,000. It would flood 1,200 miles of waterways and provide a reservoir to irrigate half a million acres and provide water for 8,000,000 acres of pasture. It would take probably another $7,000,000 to get the water from the reservoir on to the land. That cost, I take it, would be the joint responsibility of the province, the municipalities and the farmers, but the initial cost of $6,750,000 would be the responsibility of the federal government. The completion of this irrigation project would bring about a complete transformation of that area and bring prosperity where there has been want for many years. It will bring prosperity where there has been want for many years, and put that whole area to a very large extent upon a self-supporting basis.

Let us think what the result of the completion of that project would mean. First, there would be a tremendous expansion of production; second, there would be a great expansion of revenue for the government from that production; then, of course, there would be a great increase in the general well-being of the farmers in that whole area; and it would also mean a great reduction in payments of relief to the farmers. So that I do not think we can say we cannot afford that project; it might very well be said that we cannot afford not to carry it out.

In the thirties we used to hear a good deal about the danger of expanding our production and thereby creating a surplus. The tragic period through which we are going at this time should teach us a lesson that we should never forget. Never again, I hope, shall we be guilty of destroying food and allowing our resources to go to waste. One of the greatest resources we have in western Canada is water, which is going to waste day by day. I believe our aim and the aim of every nation should be to maintain a brimming pool of consumer goods; in the first instance, to maintain the well-being of our own people, exchanging our surplus goods for the surplus goods of other nations, and in the event that we can produce more than we need we would be in the enviable position of being able to assist nations less fortunately situate than ourselves, and in that way be making a great contribution to peace. If the governments of prosperous nations fail to live up to the principles of the Atlantic charter and the Hot Springs food conference, the outlook for peace in the world will be pretty bleak.

I should also like to issue this warning. If in the future as we expand farm production we allow that expansion of production to be an excuse for reducing prices we shall very soon find that production will be reduced. Unfortunately that is what has happened in the past. When farmers produced abundantly it caused a reduction in price, with the result that production was discouraged. So that, whatever policy we have in the future, it must be one which will make it possible to maintain maximum production and at the same time a fair price to the producer.

Since under this item we are discussing irrigation, I would urge upon the minister the desirability of bringing about the immediate construction of the various irrigation projects which have been surveyed in western Canada. If the war were still in operation, and these projects were considered necessary to the carrying on of the war, I do not doubt that they would be carried out, almost overnight. Unfortunately, just as soon as peace comes, we seem to suffer a form of creeping paralysis. I should like to ask the minister whether he can give any assurance that actual construction will be started on a number of these projects in western Canada at a very early day. When we were discussing this question on April 8, I think it was, the minister stated that he did not know whether it would be possible to do any actual construction work so far as the larger irrigation schemes were concerned; $750,000 was to be spent on the St. Mary's project, but he did not know whether any actual construction work would be done on the other ones. Could the minister give us any information on that point?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year we spent some money on the St. Mary's dam project in the form of making surveys and checking on the engineering which had previously been done. This year we have in these votes $750,000 with which to proceed with construction. Tenders have been called for the construction of part of that work and contracts will be allotted within a few days in connection with it. As far as the Red Deer diversion is concerned, we have already taken from the $10 millions referred to, $115,000 for engineering and surveying during the present season. That has already been asked for and obtained by P.F.R.A. to proceed with that survey work. For the Saskatchewan river project $137,000 has already been obtained, and the survey and engineering work in connection with these two projects is proceeding. It is understood, of course, by the hon. member for Acadia that ever since about 1938 we have been doing a certain amount of engineering work on the project. The engineering work which is now being done is the checking of that work by an expert. If he finds any fault with any of the engineering decisions which have been made he will indicate that further checks will have to be made in connection with it. If he finds that the engineering is satisfactory and the results which have been recommended are also satisfactory of course we shall proceed from there on the basis of the engineering work which has been done.

Mr. QUELCH: That is, with the construction?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I would hesitate to say that we shall be in a position this summer to call for tenders on the work, but at the moment I would not say that we would not be in a position to do so. That is, I would not say that we shall be, but there is the possibility that we may be able to do so.

Mr. QUELCH: There is a good chance of going ahead next year, then?

Mr. GARDINER: I think so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was very much interested in a remark made by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that he was unable to bring down legislation in connection with doing a lot of this work. He said that he could not bring down these bills and do those things which are supposed to be done, because of the failure of the dominion-provincial conference. As a matter of fact, If I understood him aright, he stated that he has been deprived of certain sources of revenue. I should like to know what sources of revenue the minister has been deprived of. At the present time I do not know of any, and I do not think he should use the failure of the dominion-provincial conference as an excuse for not bringing down bills in respect of this work. He says that some sources of revenue should be taxed. What are the sources which should be taxed? I think he ought to give us a little more information about that and not merely lay the blame on the failure of the dominion-provincial conference. As far as the province from which I come is concerned, we are quite willing to help anybody.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes! Yes! Yes! That is right. We have been willing to do so, and the fact is right on the record. We can stand on our own feet. I should like to know what are the sources of taxation of which the government is deprived at this time. I repeat that I do not know of any.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to enter a discussion of that question. I am afraid that if we got on to that matter my estimates would never pass. All I can say is, my inference was that at the time of confederation certain responsibilities were placed on the provinces and certain responsibilities were placed on the federal government, and among those placed on the provinces were such things as drainage and diking and all those matters about which we have been talking. I think, when we get to the province of Ontario or any other eastern province, even the provincial government does not assume the responsibility in these matters; by legislation they have placed it on the counties and townships; and the row over the back fence about the ditch across a farm does not become a provincial matter but is a municipal matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion is that we should take over some of these works which are now the responsibility of the provinces and conduct the developments from Ottawa. There would, of course, be a limit to the extent to which we could do that. If the provinces do not desire to have certain grants from Ottawa, we might spend that money direct instead of making the grants from Ottawa to the province and having somebody else do it. Speaking of some of the work we might undertake, such as diking in the maritimes, I can think of projects in Ontario related to black marsh lands—

Mr. MacNICOL: In Kent county.

Mr. GARDINER: —where we have been admiring live stock for some years and where we could grow onions and other things to good advantage. The undertaking, however, is too big for the farmer or the municipality, or, in some cases, for the province itself. It would not be too big for Ontario, because my hon. friend says they can stand on their own feet; but if we undertook such obligations in some other provinces, Ontario would expect us to do the same.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think so.

Mr. GARDINER: They probably would. We could undertake this under a bill of the kind suggested. I wish to say that I was not making a criticism of any particular province.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says that he has been deprived of certain sources of taxation.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to avoid an argument here in regard to the question, I will put the blame on the federal treasury and say that when I go for money to spend on such activities I have to face what the treasury will say.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister cannot say in this House of Commons that he has been deprived of any source of taxation, because the federal government is taxing in every field at the present time. That is the whole point. It is not a question of being deprived of any source of taxation. The minister cannot get away with that. There may be other reasons but he cannot lay the blame there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Sit down for a minute, please. The minister cannot blame the failure of the dominion-provincial conference for any lack of diking in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, or for lack of prairie farm rehabilitation in the west. He has never heard any kick, as far as we are concerned, about money spent on prairie farm rehabilitation or on diking. I have risen in my place in the house and advocated it. The whole point is, however, that the minister cannot hide behind a subterfuge of that kind and suggest that the reason is that he is being deprived of a source of taxation, because he is not deprived of any source of taxation at the present time since he is in every field of taxation in this country.

Mr. McIVOR: It seems a long time since I last spoke on these estimates. I had a few words to say on item 13 on May 17 and that does seem a long time ago. A good deal has been said since then and it seems necessary to have good sitters and good listeners here. That in itself explodes the idea that we sometimes hear from some corners, that estimates are left to the closing days of the session and then rushed through. If anybody says that in connection with the Department of Agriculture there must be something wrong with his upper storey.

I congratulate the minister on the opportunity that may be presented for changing the policy from prairie farm rehabilitation to rehabilitation, because in our district we would like to have the drainage transferred from the province to the dominion. If that were done we would have a very fine district drained. It may not be the best potato land in Canada but I do not think it will take second place to any. I have been told by expert lumbermen that there is an extensive district in Savanne where, if the land were drained, trees that are now water-stunted would have an opportunity to grow and in a short time there would be at least 50,000 cords of wood available to be cut. It is encouraging to hear the Minister of Agriculture say that rehabilitation will take in all Canada. Therefore we shall be listening.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was hoping that the minister would anticipate my question and answer it before I rose, but he has not done so and I suppose it slipped his memory. There are two questions I wish to ask him, but first let me say that most of those associated with me will, I believe, agree with hon. members who have spoken for an extension of the prairie farm rehabilitation measure to rehabilitation covering other areas. Fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be, I live in the Palliser triangle where the agreements are already signed and the minister has full responsibility and authority to go ahead. He started some time ago with the Duncairn project, and I am informed that very little work is contemplated this summer. If that is the case I urge him to reconsider the position, because it is important. It was important when it started, and it is not operating as it should at the present time. There are tremendous possibilities for that little area—I realize that it is small—and we would like to see the work completed as soon as possible.

The other point I wish to make is this. In some parts of the area out there, apparently assistance is not given in the digging of dugouts and the conservation of water for stock. Where such assistance has been given, it has been of great value to the farmers and has removed a great deal of worry from their minds. Without such help, it costs a farmer $250 and he cannot afford it. I would be glad if the minister would give us some idea as to whether it can be extended to help more farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole question of extending the district is involved in what we have been discussing ever since we entered upon this item, namely, that the vote is for a specific purpose. That purpose is to take care of the area in which we had drought or drifting soil. When we get outside that area we have no authority, in the votes as they are, to spend money.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am speaking of the Palliser triangle.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no place in that area where we have not the authority to go and dig. We have about 15,000 applications in advance all the time.

Mr. BENTLEY: For dugouts?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. We have dug some 22,000 and, digging between 3,000 and 4,000 a year, it will take five years to overtake what we have now. While some have made application and we have not gone ahead, it is because we could not get around to them.

Mr. BENTLEY: It is not a matter of policy?

Mr. GARDINER: No. It is not a matter of policy against doing it. As the hon. member knows, there are two dams constructed south of Swift Current. They are now holding what I sometimes call small lakes and the water is not being utilized to the extent it might be. Some people are inclined to say that is because we are not prepared to go ahead. We are prepared to dig ditches to make that water available as soon as there is organization at the other end of the ditch to use the water. But we do not see any point in digging a ditch from a dam fifty or twenty miles long across an area where the soil drifts and have it drifted full before anyone uses the water. The present position is that the provincial law provides for setting up irrigation districts, and we have stated that in that area there is a certain amount of water and a certain amount of land that can be irrigated, and we are prepared to co-operate in setting up districts that will permit a certain amount of the water being used by any irrigation organization which will make use of their proportion of the water that is available, without denying to someone else, two or three years hence, the use of water. We are in a position to give information as to how many acres within a certain area can be irrigated and have that divided among the farmers in that area, and we are prepared to put in a ditch to take the water to that area. But they must also be ditching for individual supply so as to run the water to their own land. We have assisted in many places in levelling land, and we will dig ditches as soon as there is enough organization at the other end to indicate that the water will be used when we take it there.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to ask a question with respect to the amount of appropriation for water storage for Moose Jaw and Regina. The minister is aware of our problem there. Moose Jaw is definitely short of water. They have not enough for ordinary purposes. In Regina we have reached the danger point with respect to the continuance of water from our wells out in the Boggy Creek and the Pilot Butte area. Then, of course, we have the problem of maintaining the Wascana lake in front of the parliament buildings which is the beauty spot of the city. Will the minister indicate whether or not a survey of the Many Bones and Wascana creek project which was mentioned in this house last session by the hon. member for Weyburn, and to which he got the reply that a survey was being undertaken there is still going on? Has that been completed, and what expenditures, if any, are being made this year toward water reservoirs for the Regina and Moose Jaw areas?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact amount that has been spent, but at Moose Jaw something over $600,000 has been spent over a period of years. In the first place, that had to do with pumping water from the Saskatchewan river and running it down an open ditch to the Caron area and pumping water into the sand there. The water is then pumped out and into Moose Jaw by the city itself, a distance of some eighteen miles. On that project we have spent something over $600,000. It is the only place in Canada where the federal government has undertaken to make water available to a city. The only reason that we undertook that was there was a combination of circumstances existing. It was a drought period; it was a period of unemployment prior to the war, and there was the possibility of irrigation along the way, farmers requiring irrigation. Because of that combination of circumstances we said that we would try the experiment of pumping water in an open ditch down to within eighteen miles of Moose Jaw, conditionally upon Moose Jaw pumping the water out of there and into Moose Jaw. The plan of pumping water down there has been a success. The water was put there. A small lake was put there last year; but when Moose Jaw put the pressure on the pipeline that they have, about half of it was found to be in a condition where it would not stand the pressure. That is the only reason Moose Jaw is not getting water now. It is not because the water is not there, but because it could not be put there because of the condition of their pipeline.

Mr. PROBE: Is it entirely a pipeline proposition?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as we know up to the moment. We think there is all the water in the sand now that Moose Jaw would want to use at the present time. The only problem in connection with it is that first the intake silts up, and there has been some trouble in getting equipment with which to clear the intake. I might say that I have done everything that I can possibly do as an individual to see that they get that equipment, but somebody in Saskatchewan takes it and utilizes it for some other purpose. It cannot be secured for Moose Jaw. I do not know just what the reason is. I would not want to go into the details of that; but I have been trying. As a matter of fact, I tried the other day to get it myself, to declare that the department wanted to use it, to clear this up, to get first priority on it. So far I have not even got that. We will do everything we can to get the equipment with which to clear that silt out of the river.

Mr. PROBE: May I just interrupt for a moment? Is the minister referring to that War Assets declaration which was mentioned?

Mr. GARDINER: I am referring to the fact that at the present time most of the equipment goes to certain authorities in Saskatchewan, and they get first priority; but I do not want to get too far into that.

Mr. PROBE: No; I know that. At the same time I do not think it is strictly correct. That pumping equipment is still in the No. 2 R.E.M.U., near Moose Jaw.

Mr. GARDINER: We have done everything possible to get it, anyhow, and we have not got it up to date. Moose Jaw city has been doing everything possible too and we have not been able to get it. That is the position at the moment.

So far as Regina is concerned, the only dam that is being put in at the moment in order to supply water for Regina is the one I referred to a few moments ago, namely, the Saskatchewan river project, on which we are spending $137,000 for survey work. It is anticipated that if that is a success, if the dam is put in eventually, the Saskatchewan river water will be available for Moose Jaw and Regina. That is probably something for the future.

The only dam that I referred to is on the Many Bones creek. We have been making a survey. We have all the detailed information necessary for carrying that project through. We have not yet determined whether we shall proceed with it this summer or not. There has been some discussion between the provincial government, the city of Regina and the prairie farm rehabilitation act organization. I am sure there is not entire agreement at the moment on the amount that should be provided by the different authorities, but all the information is available on which to proceed.

Mr. PROBE: No expenditure is contemplated this year?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: I would not say there is none contemplated. There is none provided for at the moment, but they are urging strongly that we should go ahead this year. I am not sure whether we shall go ahead or not; it depends somewhat on the urgency of other work.

Mr. PROBE: Does the Minister of Agriculture know whether any expenditure is contemplated in connection with the Moose Jaw end of the project?

Mr. GARDINER: No; we think we have spent as much money there as we ought to spend.

Mr. IRVINE: In one of his replies the minister referred to the Pemberton project. Has the federal government undertaken any work there at all? If so, how much has been done? Is anything further that may be done by the federal government contingent on the dominion-provincial conference agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: No; so far as the Pemberton project is concerned, we have put engineers there. They have made a report to me and I have made a report to Mr. Pearson of the provincial government. We are in entire agreement as to what ought to be done. I am hopeful that there will be somthing done there this year, but I would not want to be too definite about it anyhow because I must get a supplementary estimate.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be extended to cover all of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Not this year. I had bills prepared in order to make it apply to all of Canada, but they were contingent upon agreements being reached at the dominion-provincial conference. Those agreements were not reached, and until the conferences are continued it is not thought advisable to bring the legislation down.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear what the minister had to say this afternoon, and to note the vision he has of what can be accomplished under this vote. I was pleased particularly to hear his observations respecting the marshes of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I am not going to discuss that matter myself, because it was well covered this afternoon by the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Colchester-Hants. Undoubtedly the people who live in Nova Scotia will be greatly encouraged to know that the minister has in mind a programme for development in that province as and when agreement can be made to permit the carrying out of such a programme. That is all to the good for Canada, because that is one part of the country it is important the government should assist, if it possibly can. The population in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick has not advanced to anything like the degree we would like to see it advance. I have no doubt that when the works in connection with the reclamation of marshes in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are completed it will have a material effect upon business there. Consequently the population should increase.

The minister referred to the Moose Jaw water supply, and it is in that respect I wish to speak particularly for a few minutes. I hope the minister will not be apologetic for the government's part in providing water for Moose Jaw, even though that part may not have been as great as might have been wished. I take the same stand as is taken by the bureau of reclamation in the United States. We must remember that it could be said that, because of permission being given to the Canadian Pacific railway to have its divisional works at Moose Jaw, without first making certain that there would be an ample water supply for the engines of that railway, which has done so much to open up western Canada, the government is responsible for the fact that a town has grown up where the railway first built its shops in that part of the country. To that extent the country is responsible for the city's development at a point on the prairies where there is insufficient water supply to permit its full growth.

I have said before, and I repeat, that whatever is decided by the government in the matter of spending money to bring a water supply from the Saskatchewan river, the only permanent and abundant available supply for both Moose Jaw and Regina, will have my undivided support. As a businessman I know, from my past experience in big business in Canada, that an increase in the population of those two cities to three or four times their present size would be beneficial to all Canada. And they cannot help all Canada as they would do unless they are amply supplied with water.

I shall not repeat what has been said by others and what I have said on other occasions, but I shall close this part of my remarks by saying that I will support any government programme designed to provide an abundant and permanent water supply for those two cities. I look forward anxiously to learning what is contained in the report the minister will receive from the engineers now engaged in drilling holes up and down the river, north and south of Riverhurst. I am firmly convinced that the Supreme Being, in His wisdom, when permitting those cities to be located there, had made ample provision somewhere in that river, and that the source will eventually be found.

I would point out to the committee briefly that we should not be critical of expenditures in connection with this vote. The engineers engaged by the department, through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, are compelled to spend considerable sums of money without showing much, if any return. That is not their fault. I know something about that kind of engineering, and I know they can drill many holes in the river without showing any satisfactory results. But holes have to be drilled to find a safe bottom upon which to build a dam—if, indeed, it is possible to find a safe bottom. If they did not, then they would have to build a dam which would be much more expensive than the one required if a safe bottom were found.

I hold in my hand the core of a diamond drill. This one came from the St. Mary's river, at which point, I understood the minister to say this afternoon, contracts are to be let shortly for the St. Mary's river dam. I should imagine the purpose would be, first, to divert the river, and then to proceed with the building of a dam. It would seem that on that river they have found a safe and sure bottom, of which this is a core. And a dam foundationed on terra firma, if we may call it that, if it is as good as this sample, will support the building of any type of dam. I am happy that the St. Mary's river work is proceeding satisfactorily.

I listened to what the minister had to say about the Red Deer work. There, too, I might say, they have found a safe bottom on the Red Deer river. Although this core is not from the Red Deer bottom, to all intents and purposes it looks the same as a core I have of the Red Deer river bottom. If I were to break this core in two, I am sure hon. members would not know whether one-half was from the Red Deer or from the St. Mary's. I know now that the department has found a safe bottom on the Red Deer river, about which the hon. member for Acadia spoke this afternoon.

I was most happy in February last to meet the hon. member in the really smart town of Hanna, a town which some day will be a city, if the programme the department has in view is carried to a successful conclusion. Recent figures show that about 500,000 acres can be reclaimed south of Buffalo Lake to Hanna area. Do not have any hesitancy in asking this house to vote whatever is required to carry through the Buffalo Lake-Hanna or Red Deer river project, because that will be a self-liquidating project. An hon. member, incidentally a very bright and brilliant member, said to me the other day that he could not understand how I could term these projects as being self-liquidating. I told him that after irrigation was provided to an area there was a great increase in the population; I told him that this in turn increased the buying power of the people, and that employment was created all along the line.

I have here some facts and figures about an area that I intend to visit as soon as the house rises. I expect to cover some 10,000 miles by motor. I have here the details of what has been accomplished by the bureau of reclamation in several of the western states. You, Mr. Chairman, had a lot to do with a fine plant in the town of Seaforth where you held a responsible position. That was operated by a really fine family, I believe the Bell family. I know you can picture what it would mean to the town of Seaforth if the population were increased by 50,000 round about. I do not think you would have to be convinced that any project which would add 50,000 buyers in the area around the town of Seaforth and the town of Clinton was a self-liquidating project.

The United States bureau of reclamation is spending $160,000,000 this year in carrying on a gigantic programme. By 1951 they will have reclaimed 6,500,000 acres of land just as dry and the same type of land as that which lies between Buffalo Lake and Hanna and in the southern part of Alberta where the hon. member for Lethbridge comes from. Some of that land around Lethbridge now looks like the garden of Eden because of the irrigation projects they have there. The improvement will be much greater when other projects are completed, but I am not going to discuss them at the moment.

I understand that the first irrigation project in America was carried on by some friends of the hon. member for Lethbridge at Salt Lake City. When those pioneers went from Illinois to the west and started to build that magnificent temple which is one of the finest buildings in the world they found the ground so dry that they could not pick it. They brought water from the lake in order to make the ground soft enough to work and they conceived the idea of irrigation. Later they brought those ideas up to Alberta. Those pioneer settlers deserve a lot of credit for what they did in Alberta.

The bureau of reclamation states in its latest report that the average net return from irrigated farms under their jurisdiction is $36.33 per acre. Throughout the whole United States, including those prolific states of Iowa and Kansas, the average is only $14.41 per acre. When irrigation gives such wonderful results how can any one say that it is not self-liquidating.

I hope the minister will not hesitate to bring in whatever programme is required to irrigate these lands which my hon. friend spoke of this afternoon. We should have a programme to irrigate the semi-dry acres of our western prairie land which now grows nothing but sage; wild rose and prairie grass. I presume that if I wanted to buy some of that land to-day I would not have to pay more than $2.50 or $5 per acre. But, once it is irrigated, the land would be worth anything up to $50 per acre. If special crops were grown it could easily be worth $75 to $100 per acre. The difference in land value alone would pay for the cost of irrigating, and that is apart altogether from the magnificent crop returns which would be obtained.

I do not care what government brings in a programme to irrigate the Hanna and Acadia and Buffalo Lake areas, it will get my support. I think the minister knows that the land from Buffalo Lake south has a slope which would permit a flow of water. The more I examine our whole western country, the more I am convinced that God Almighty has laid it out in such a way, with the great river behind it, that it is possible to have a flow downhill. Very little pumping, such as they have to do in the United States and which they find it pays them to do, would have to be done in the Buffalo Lake to Hanna area.

I should like to say a word about the Ronelane-Redcliff area. I do not know whether the minister said anything about it this afternoon, but I believe it comes under the other $10,000,000 vote. I wish this was under the minister's department because he is a farmer and knows what increased farm crops mean to our nation. They are a benefit, not only to the farmer, but all along the line right down to the smallest factory in Davenport riding. I would not say that the Ronelane-Redcliff area deserves first place, but I think it would come right with the Lethbridge area project.

Mr. GARDINER: The engineering is fairly well completed in that area.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that all they have to do is to complete the syphon across the Bow river. That area comprises about 70,000 acres immediately west of Medicine Hat. The main canal is completed almost right up to the city. I sincerely hope that project will be carried through as rapidly as possible. With the increased land values that would result, as well as with the additional returns from the land itself, this country could afford to irrigate every dry acre in the west that is capable of being irrigated. It cannot all be irrigated, but three to four million acres can be irrigated. I should like to see the minister take the bit into his teeth and bring a programme into this house for the irrigation of the whole four million acres or thereabouts of dry or semi-dry land that can be irrigated, also a vote for bringing water from a Saskatchewan river dam to supply the two cities of Moose Jaw and Regina with a permanent abundance of water. I will predict that if the government would provide those works—it would take nearly five years, I should think, to build the dams and either a tunnel or conduit across the seventy miles for Moose Jaw and the 110 miles to Regina—within ten years of the completion of the works the city of Regina, which to-day has a population of around 70,000, would be closer to 150,000 and the city of Moose Jaw, which has from 20,000 to 23,000, would have closer to 50,000. As it is to-day they cannot get big industries to locate there. I have heard members in the house say what a fine thing it is to decentralize industry. I was in big industry, but if I were going to build a plant in the west I would not locate it where I could not get a permanent and abundant supply of water. No business man would. But any business man would be happy to build a branch plant in Regina or Moose Jaw, if he wanted to locate in that part of the west and there was a demand for his goods there, if he could obtain an abundant and permanent water supply.

So that I for one would go the limit in supporting any government or any party which would carry through these western irrigation projects, knowing they are for the good of all Canada. Let no one think they would be for the benefit of the west only. While some of my hon. friends may think that, I was too long in big business not to know what such a development would mean much to the east. You could not benefit the west by building it up in that way without also benefiting every manufacturing town and city in the eastern provinces. They will prosper just as much. So that the minister has one solid supporter and there are others on this side for a gigantic water conservation and water supply project in the west.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The people of my constituency are naturally anxious to know what progress is being made in the construction of the St. Mary's river dam. Would the minister answer several questions on this subject which have been sent to me?

How many tenders have been submitted for a contract to build the 1946 portion of the work on the St. Mary's river dam? When did they come in, and why has not one of the tenders yet been accepted? There is some doubt whether a tender has been accepted, but from the minister's remarks this afternoon I gathered that no tender has been accepted.

What items in the construction of the dam are to be disposed of by the contractor in 1946? Is it only the three tunnels mentioned earlier this year in the discussion of this matter?

Has the work actually begun on any one of the tunnels or on any aspect of the dam? If so, what progress has been made?

Has any unforeseen difficulty been encountered? Have there been any difficulties with respect to labour or materials which would be likely to interfere with the consummation of the prescribed portion of the project this year? Are the materials required now in sight?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing has developed which would raise any question about the possibility of going ahead. The work for which tenders have been called is just the tunneling for handling the water while the dam is being built. Tenders were called and received, but there was so much variation in the tenders that it was thought the engineers should check them carefully before making a final decision. There was a difference of some $500,000 between the highest and lowest tenders. The estimated cost was $750,000. To make absolutely certain that no mistake had been made, it was thought better to make a check before actually awarding the contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the minister any idea when the contract will be awarded?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot say exactly when, but I think it should be almost any day.

Mr. McKAY: Will any work be done on the Souris river and the Long creek project in southern Saskatchewan this year?

Mr. GARDINER: There is an amount of $18,000 set aside for work on the Souris river.

Mr. THATCHER: May I direct a question to the minister regarding the Moose Jaw water situation? This afternoon he made several remarks which I think were not quite correct. He said that the open ditch there, for pumping water, has been a success. Originally this ditch was built from the South Saskatchewan river to provide Moose Jaw with an adequate water supply. If the plan had been a success it would have provided Moose Jaw with an adequate supply in the past spring. But, as I stated earlier this session, Moose Jaw was shorter of water in the past spring than ever before in its history. The water mains were turned off for about half of each day for several months and the housewives were filling bathtubs to get water to cook with the following day. The Canadian Pacific engines were hauling water from Regina and other points to run their trains across the prairies, and sanitary facilities could not be used on many occasions.

Mr. GARDINER: That had nothing to do with the ditch.

Mr. THATCHER: I do not think the water scheme was a success. The minister went on to say that a small lake was put in the saturation area there last year, but that when Moose Jaw put the pressure on the Caron pipeline they have, about half of it was found to be in a condition where it would not stand the pressure. According to him, this was the only reason Moose Jaw was not getting water now; not because the water is not available, but because it could not be put there in view of the condition of the pipeline. For the minister's information I will quote from a letter that I received from the city engineer of Moose Jaw:

> Our Caron pipeline is used as an excuse for loss of water, but on checking over the loss of water on the river scheme in transit, here are the figures:
> Amount of water pumped from the river, 1945 season, 1,119,300,000 gallons.
> Amount of water delivered to the saturation area, 1945 season, 300,000,000 gallons.
> Amount of water withdrawn from the saturation area up until December 29, 1945, 296,340,260 gallons.

That shows only 26 per cent efficiency; 74 per cent of the water was lost between the Saskatchewan river and the saturation area, while only a very small amount was lost between the saturation area and the city of Moose Jaw.

The engineer goes on to say:

> . . . had the pipeline been perfect in every respect, we did not have sufficient water from the river to meet our requirements, and further, the leaks on the Caron pipeline were repaired before the shortage of water in Moose Jaw arose.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Moose Jaw is in very difficult straits as far as water is concerned. This spring, when they began to pump water from the river again, something happened to several of their pumps; they would not work. I am told by the mayor that the pumps they needed were located four miles south, in one of the old airports, and so far the city authorities have not been able to get War Assets or whatever authorities are necessary to release those pumps to the city. If the minister could do something about that—the hon. member for Regina mentioned it this afternoon—I know it would be appreciated, and I think it is very necessary indeed for the city.

Before sitting down, I should like also to ask the minister whether he intends to call for tenders on the South Saskatchewan scheme this year. Some weeks ago a former member of the house made a statement in Saskatchewan along these lines, according to the way he was reported in the Regina Leader Post:

> Tenders will be called shortly for the much-discussed South Saskatchewan irrigation scheme. The scheme has been worked out, much of the engineering has been done, and before long some contracts will be let. A start will be made as soon as men and equipment are available.

Would the minister tell the committee whether that is correct, whether we can definitely count on this scheme going ahead this year?

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. gentleman had been in the chamber this afternoon when we were discussing this matter by the hour he would not have had to ask some of the questions he has asked this evening; and I do not know that the rest of the committee should sit here and listen to answers the second time. I stated this afternoon that $137,000 was being spent this year on completing the engineering and surveying of the South Saskatchewan river. That is all the money that has been made available or has been asked for to the present time.

Mr. THATCHER: But the project will not be actually started this year?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I do not think there is any possibility of the engineering being completed this year, and the survey, to the point where tenders can be called for the building of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river.

As far as Moose Jaw is concerned, the waters from the Saskatchewan and an open ditch were never intended to supply all the water which is necessary for that city. Moose Jaw had 16,000 inhabitants when that ditch was first constructed, and Moose Jaw had always had water, not all they would have liked to have had, but they had water from the Caron sands supply. There was not any ditch required in order to give them the water they had down to 1942 or 1943, and even down to this last year there was very little water supplied from anywhere else. If they have got 300,000 gallons, or whatever amount was required on top of that, pumped down from the South Saskatchewan river, they have had more water from the South Saskatchewan river than they actually utilized out of the sands at Caron, in addition to what they had before; and if you add the two together there would be far more water than Moose Jaw would utilize at the present time. Everyone knew that when you dug an open ditch through an area of country about one-third of which is sand there would be some leakage from that ditch and some water wasted, but the open ditch was dug for the purpose of determining whether water could be got down there successfully from the Saskatchewan. The contract entered into by the government with the city of Moose Jaw was to demonstrate that that water could be brought down. The water has been pumped there for two years; it ran down the ditch full length. The ditch was dug down from the Saskatchewan river and the pumping equipment was put in.

The government had difficulties with the pumping equipment even before the project was turned over to the city, in that the intake which was first put there silted up and sand came with the water into the pumps. Anyone who operates pumps knows that they will not handle very much sand without the pumps being destroyed. So that a new intake had to be put in the river; and I did not understand that there were any pumps being looked for at the present time; it is a dragline which is required in order again to clean out the intake and thus prevent the sand from getting into the water and destroying the pumps a second time. I understand that they do not desire to operate the pumps until this cleaning out process is gone on with. What they are really trying to get is draglines and not pumps. They have been applying to me for weeks to assist in getting them the draglines, and we have thought on one or two occasions that we had been successful. Up to two weeks ago, anyway, a dragline was not obtainable, but we hope to be able to get it for them before long.

On the other question, that of pumping water in from Caron to Moose Jaw, that is entirely up to the city of Moose Jaw. From the beginning of the project they have always undertaken to see that the water was got in the last eighteen miles. The government has never assumed any responsibility in connection with that. Whether the leakage is great or small, there is leakage; and as I understand from reports which have been made by engineers—and I have read a number of them—the leakage is not the only difficulty; they cannot put much more pressure on these pipes. They have to reconstruct the pipeline, which has been in for a long period of time. Some of it was reconstructed a few years ago but part of it was not. The pipeline is old, and it requires to be reconstructed before they can pump in any such quantity as they desire to pump.

That, I think, is pretty much the story of the Moose Jaw project, and I would say again that it is the only one of its kind in the Dominion of Canada. It is the only one where the federal government has undertaken to supply water to any city, and I think Moose Jaw is very fortunate to have had almost $700,000 spent for a purpose which has not been an object of assistance in any other part of Canada.

Mr. THATCHER: May I ask one supplementary question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a chance.

An hon. MEMBER: We want to get home by Christmas.

Mr. THATCHER: Would the minister tell me whether there is anything he can do or I can do to get these pumps from War Assets? Here we have a city without water, and the pumps, or dragline, as he calls it, sitting in War Assets doing nothing. It seems a strange situation.

Mr. GARDINER: As far as I know, there are not any pumps required. What is required is a steam shovel, what we call a dragline, to take the silt out of the river. There are some draglines, I understand, held by someone; I am not sure whether they have been declared surplus or whether they are still held by the air force for work which they want to do themselves. Efforts have been made to have some of these draglines made available, but to date we have not been able to get them. I said, when the hon. member was not here, that I went so far as to try to utilize the priority which my department has for equipment which we are going to use ourselves; I stretched the point so far as to say that since we had spent almost $700,000 on the project we considered it sufficiently important to the Department of Agriculture to exercise our first priority to get that equipment, but I have not been able to get it. The next priority, of course, is the provincial government. If they have some equipment of that kind I do not know why they do not turn it over to Moose Jaw as against somebody else. The next priority after that is Moose Jaw itself. I think, if we get out of the way and the provincial government gets out of the way and leaves all the equipment alone for a while, probably Moose Jaw will be able to get it themselves.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would ask that the same consideration be given out in British Columbia to the prevention of flooding of farm lands and the erosion of farm lands on the Fraser river as is given under this act to bringing in water for use elsewhere. I do not think it is necessary to make a speech on this; the minister knows about it.

Mr. GRANT: Let us pray for rain.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We do not need to pray for rain; we have it.

What I am particularly interested in is that we should be given the same consideration, so far as our difficulties are concerned, as is given the prairie provinces. We are asked as farmers, including the farmers of British Columbia and particularly of Fraser Valley, to provide protection against floods and other dangers, and I am suggesting to the minister now that when the rest of Canada is giving protection to the prairie provinces under this act we, too, are entitled to consideration. I have heard a lot from the prairie provinces about starving to death. Well, we are asking for some protection now to keep water off instead of bringing it on, and when that is done we shall be satisfied. Can we expect from the minister some assurance that the rest of Canada will be treated equally with the prairie provinces under this act?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe I have twice explained that this act applies only to the Palliser triangle and that therefore nothing can be done under it to take care of conditions either in British Columbia or in any other area outside that which is included in the triangle. The work which is referred to by the hon. member is work for which British Columbia is at present responsible, and until something is done to change that situation there is not much possibility of anything being spent under any legislation here.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am afraid the minister is not quite familiar with farming practices.

Mr. GARDINER: I admit there are some things I am not familiar with.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not carried, Mr. Chairman. I want to make that perfectly clear. I am the last one who would defend the present government in British Columbia, but when the minister tells me or implies that this is a local responsibility, that is all tommy-rot. We might as well understand that now. The Fraser river is the second biggest in British Columbia. Last week two farms in my riding lost ten acres apiece from river erosion. When the minister tries to suggest that this is a provincial or a municipal matter, that is not in accordance with the facts. I am suggesting to the minister that if we in British Columbia and the rest of Canada are expected to contribute toward protection in the prairie provinces, we in British Columbia should be given consideration and should have river bank protection. I do not think the minister fully appreciates the situation. Perhaps it is my fault; maybe I have not stated the matter as clearly as I should.

Mr. GARDINER: Give us the Fraser river on the prairies and we shall not ask you in British Columbia for anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, it is not carried. I heard the hon. member for Provencher talk about wheat day in and day out, and the rest of Canada carried wheat.

Mr. CASE: What is the rest of Canada?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Ontario, British Columbia, and Manitoba.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not leave out the maritimes and Quebec.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister recommended that the act be extended to cover—

An hon. MEMBER: Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am asking that it be extended to cover the whole of Canada and not the prairie provinces alone.

Mr. GARDINER: I have already recommended that.

Item agreed to.

32. Prairie Farm Assistance Act Administration, $250,000.

Mr. GARDINER: It might facilitate discussion if I were to make an explanation at this stage. I am bringing in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as soon as possible and I intend to refer it to the committee on agriculture for consideration. I was going to suggest that we stick as closely as we can to expenditures under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and there will be opportunity to discuss fully any amendments that may be suggested, or any changes in the act, when it is brought down.

Mr. BENTLEY: Both in the committee and in the house?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I had hoped to have it brought down before the estimates came up, but when it is brought down I will move it to the committee on agriculture so that full opportunity will be afforded for discussion.

Mr. IRVINE: There is one question which I should like to ask the minister with reference to a peculiar situation which exists in the Peace River block with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and which, I believe, does not pertain elsewhere, and that is that it would be difficult for that district to qualify as a crop failure area. Is there any means whereby localities that are affected in the Peace River block may come under the benefits of this act? I understand that the Peace River block is in Alberta for the purposes of the act, and that means that before a district can be regarded as a crop failure area ninety townships must be affected. I question whether the Peace River block, being comparatively a small area, would ever qualify to receive the benefits. For that reason it seems to me hardly fair that they should pay a proportion of the cost without the possibility of enjoying the benefits of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: "Spring wheat area" means the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace river district of British Columbia. It is brought under the act at the present time. It can collect under the act, but I understand that the suggestion is that the situation in the Peace River block is such that they cannot come under the terms of the act.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I am suggesting, as an amendment to the act, that the provinces be able to determine whether they wish to come under it or not.

Mr. McKAY: What I have to say consists largely of suggestions and this, I think, is the time for me to say it. My remarks will not take up much time, but I would be remiss in my duty to my constituency if I did not discuss this matter now. For the benefit of some members of the house who at one time or another have seemed to show a lack of appreciation of the difficulties which face a large part of the farming population of the west, may I be permitted to make a few comments? Almost every year some part of the west has a partial or a complete crop failure because of the vagaries of the weather or because of the ravages of plant disease, as in the case of cereal rust and too from insect pests, which frequently cause a total loss of crop. This brings about a wide fluctuation in farm income and, in many instances, creates real distress and hardship. I come from that district and I doubt if anyone else here has spent as long a time as I have in the particular area affected. I have witnessed that hardship on many occasions in the more than forty years that I have lived in southern Saskatchewan where the crop has failed because of want of rain, and dire poverty has resulted because the crops have never reached maturity. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was enacted primarily for the purpose of relieving such distressful conditions in the areas affected, and has, I may say, been a definite improvement over the old system of relief which was in vogue during the thirties.

I wish to commend the government on this move, because I feel it is certainly a step in the right direction; it is progressive. But at this time I desire to draw the minister's attention to certain dissatisfactions which seem to prevail, at least in some quarters of the west, with regard to the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I hope that the minister will accept what I have to say in the spirit in which it is given. While there is criticism of the administration, I shall endeavour to be fair and offer constructive suggestions which I hope will be given careful consideration by the government.

In the first place, before the act becomes operative the federal government must declare a crop failure region or an emergency year. This is done at the discretion of the federal authorities, and only when 171 townships are involved in crop failure. Many farmers are of the opinion that the act should apply automatically whenever an applicant, through the loss of his crop, and through no fault of his own, is in need of assistance. Furthermore, I should like to suggest to the minister that, since revision is under consideration, some thought be given to the young veterans and others under twenty-one years of age who are still residing with their parents and operating farms elsewhere because they have been unable as yet to set up homes for themselves. Under the act these young men are not eligible to receive any benefit. I suggest that if at eighteen years of age they are eligible and old enough to fight for the country they should be eligible, even though they are under twenty-one, to receive benefits under Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Second, there is a growing demand from various groups of farmers that the bonus should be paid on an individual basis. There has been the suggestion that such a plan would involve considerably more administrative costs, and I appreciate some of the difficulties in this regard. But appraisers and inspectors are now employed to inspect individual farm units in areas where crop failure is most apparent in order to ascertain what the actual situation is. It would appear that there may be sufficient field men now employed to do this job without the addition of large numbers to the staff. I believe that such an alteration in the policy would actually save money to the treasury rather than increase its expenditures. To support this contention, I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that there were farmers living in the bonus area last season who had substantial yields, but because they resided in the government declared area were recipients under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. On the other hand, farmers living on the very fringe of that stricken area who had little or no crop at all received no benefits whatsoever under the act because the average yield in the area in which they conducted farming operations exceeded the maximum set by the act as a qualification for bonus payment. Not infrequently the farmer who failed to obtain assistance was just across the road from his neighbour who did receive the bonus.

The farmers pay a levy of one per cent on grain marketed to establish a fund from which benefits can be drawn. Unemployment insurance operates in a very similar way but is not dependent in its payments to the unemployed on the discretionary power given a governor in council which must declare an emergency year before those in need can benefit under that act. When the farmer has a complete crop failure, or even a partial one, he is in need of assistance, and he should be eligible at once to obtain that assitsance from the fund that has been set up to provide it. An unemployed person enters a claim for assistance from the unemployment insurance fund immediately he loses his job, and in the matter of a very few days becomes eligible to receive benefits. I believe the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should operate similarly and should become automatically operative in the same way as the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Third, the amount of bonus under P.F.A.A. is definitely inadequate if the intention of the act is to eliminate the demand for relief, and I believe that is one of its objectives. The maximum of $500 per farm unit is obviously sufficient only to meet very modest farm operating expenses, such as the purchase of fuel and seed. There is not sufficient in this amount to provide adequately for the living expenses of a farmer's family.

[Mr. McKay.]

In areas of western Canada where P.F.A.A. is operating at the present time the maximum amount which is allowed to farmers is, I believe, $500 per farm unit. There must be a sufficient allocation made in this case to carry the farmer from one crop to another, because he has no means of livelihood in the meantime. At this time may I refer to a resolution which was passed at the convention held in March of this year by the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities? The resolution reads:

> That the crop failure bonus be increased to $5 per acre, and that the maximum be $1,000 and the assessment two per cent, and that payments be made on an individual basis.

It has been suggested that certain areas in Saskatchewan be zoned, leaving northern and north-eastern areas at the present one per cent levy, while areas subjected to repeated drought will be provided with a somewhat higher rate. Areas in Manitoba and Alberta could be similarly zoned, because they have much the same situation in these provinces as we have in Saskatchewan.

So far as the operating of this act is concerned, I believe that the wider possibilities of a crop insurance plan should be carefully explored by the government. The minister may reply to this suggestion that such a scheme would be feasible only under the jurisdiction of the provinces. But it appears to me there should be no objection by the federal Department of Agriculture to at least exploring the possibilities of a nation-wide crop insurance plan, even though the implementing of the scheme by federal authorities may be ultra vires at the moment.

If the plan is then considered practicable, arrangements could be made to subsidize the provinces, or better still to have an amendment to the British North America Act introduced to take care of the situation, as was necessary for unemplomeent insurance, to give the federal government jurisdiction in the field.

In order to have stability in farm income some comprehensive system of crop insurance appears vital. It is generally recognized that such a scheme would require substantial contributions from the federal treasury. I submit that even though that may be necessary it would be a wiser policy than to leave the farmers in the unhappy state of having to accept relief when a series of crop failures occur.

The farmers' levy to the fund would still have to be based on production, and of necessity would vary from year to year, as do the contributions of the industrial worker to the unemployment insurance fund. Crops have long been insured against hail damage. There seems to be no adequate reason why crops should not be insured against damage from frost, drought, insects or ravages of plant disease in the very same way. The fruit grower who suffers a loss of crop because the fruit blossoms are destroyed by a late spring frost and the truck farmer who suffers because of insects destroying his vegetables need protection quite as much as do the cereal farmers. Any plan of crop insurance therefore should include fruit, tobacco and vegetable crops, as well as cereals. The setting up of such a scheme would tend to create stabilized conditions in agriculture throughout the Dominion of Canada for our farming population, which the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act, because of its inadequacy, does not provide.

Mr. QUELCH: I was very glad to hear the minister say the other day that far-reaching amendments to the act were to be brought down because, if its efficiency is to be increased, those amendments are urgently needed. I hope that when they are brought down they will be of the right type. I do not wish for one moment to belittle the value of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It has performed a great service; had it not been for that act many farmers would have been tossed off their land before this.

I had intended to discuss the act at some length, but in view of the fact that the minister says a bill will be brought down in the near future, I shall defer my remarks until that time. Would the minister intimate whether or not the amendments will cover the procedure in respect of deciding upon the eligibility of land?

Mr. GARDINER: The amendments to the act, as I have submitted them, have not yet been finally passed by council. But the act itself will provide a different method of determining whether lands shall or shall not come under the act.

Mr. ARGUE: I do not wish to delay the passage of the item, but I think it will be agreed that I have not taken an undue amount of time in this discussion of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. As most hon. members know, parts of western Canada are at this time experiencing severe drought.

An hon. MEMBER: It rained the other day.

Mr. ARGUE: I hope that is so. We had a long discussion respecting the increase in prices of farm implements. That subject, important as it is, would not be of much importance to the farmer if he suffered a long series of crop failures.

I noticed that the Minister of Agriculture, in replying to a suggestion the other night that a crop insurance scheme rather than a scheme of assistance in time of crop failure should be brought in, stated that all studies as to the feasibility of a strictly crop insurance scheme had shown that such a scheme was not feasible in that part of Canada at least.

The reason it is not feasible is that the area is large, and has a variable yield. Investments farmers have to make are high. More than that, the farmer receives for his products prices which vary widely. Any scheme of crop insurance practised in the past has collected an almost uniform rate from the farmer, based upon the sales he makes. The payments made out are on a fixed basis. For that reason, whenever prices go down, the crop insurance scheme goes bankrupt.

While I should be very glad to see Manitoba given a chance to withdraw from the operation of the act, if they so wish, I would suggest that if in future years we have poor prices for our farm products, a crop insurance scheme will not be able to work, even in Manitoba, and that the people in that province will be wanting to get back under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act very quickly. When we are discussing any crop insurance scheme we should keep in mind the fact that in the past the government has had to come to the assistance of farming communities in a way that is far less desirable than under the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Between 1930 and 1939, governments in Canada spent in Saskatchewan alone $156 million on relief. In that province in the last six years the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has cost the federal treasury about $20 million. The act cost the federal government in the year in which Saskatchewan had its poorest crop yield since the act was in operation, the sum of $11 million. But in 1937 the government paid $47 million in relief to take care of the people in that province in the absence of a proper scheme of crop failure assistance.

A number of crop insurance schemes have been tried in various countries of the world, and particularly some extensive operations in the United States. In every case, every crop insurance plan undertaken has failed miserably. In order that a proper insurance scheme may be feasible at all it must operate in an area in which yields vary little. For instance, in the crop insurance scheme used in the United States in a county in Ohio, where the yield was 21·7 bushels per acre on a long-time average, and where the crops were insured for half of that amount, the farmer to insure a crop of at least eleven bushels to the acre had to pay only two per cent of his annual sales. In the county of Morton, Kansas, where the average yield was only 7·7 bushels per acre, to get insurance of something less than four bushels per acre the farmer had to pay each year 26·3 per cent of his sales as a premium.

So it is obvious that in any area in which there is a great variation, the premiums which must be collected to cover even a meagre scheme of crop insurance are very high, and the farmers naturally think they cannot afford that type of crop insurance. Consequently they withdraw from the plan; and those farmers who have crops almost every year—and good crops—stay under the scheme because they can probably get an insurance rate of around two per cent.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act came up in the discussions of the dominion-provincial conference. The brief Saskatchewan presented to the last session of that conference contains a good deal of information and many suggestions with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I should say that perhaps about 40 per cent of the material in the brief dealt with that act. So that, certainly for Saskatchewan, a comprehensive scheme of crop failure assistance is absolutely necessary. In any scheme undertaken I believe a standard levy must be collected, as there is at the present time, on the basis of the sales a farmer makes.

I think some consideration should be given to zoning and perhaps Saskatchewan could be divided into three or perhaps only two zones. Certainly any scheme of crop insurance under which the individual farmer must pay a rate depending upon his own long-term average yield is entirely out of the question. It just is not practical.

At the present time the highest average payment to any farmer in a crop failure area under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is $400. That will do little more than pay the cost of seed and the seeding of the crop; it allows nothing for the payment of taxes, for summer-fallowing, for interest and for living expenses. Farm management studies conducted by the university of Saskatchewan shows that a farmer needs a minimum of $1,000 to maintain his farming operations and his family for one year.

An hon. MEMBER: What sized farm?

Mr. ARGUE: For the size of the average farm in my area, 320 acres.

Farmers in a crop failure area should receive $6 per acre on their cultivated acreage, which would provide a man who had 160 acres in crop and 160 acres in summer-fallow with approximately $1,000. He could then buy his seed, pay his taxes and maintain his family for a year, although that is little enough. Then $3 per acre would be a reasonable payment in a low yield area, possibly based on a yield of from four to eight bushels per acre. Payments should be made on an individual basis. We all know that there are farmers who have suffered complete crop failures through no fault of their own but because there are not enough other farmers around them who are in the same predicament they are unable to obtain any benefit under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

In order that an area may be declared a crop failure area there must be 171 townships in Saskatchewan, 54 in Manitoba and 90 in Alberta having an average yield of less than five bushels per acre. One can easily see that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as applied in western Canada does not adequately cover all farmers who suffer crop failures from time to time.

Certain of the regulations under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be changed. I have received dozens and dozens of letters from farmers who felt they were entitled to receive the so-called bonus but who, for some reason or another found they were not entitled to it because of the regulations. Prairie farm assistance payments should be paid to all bona fide farmers. A farmer may see in July that he will have no crop to harvest. He may go to another province or go to town and get a job. If he does that he will not receive a bonus payment.

Mr. GARDINER: He gets a bonus if he comes back to the farm again; it is only when he stays away that he does not get it.

Mr. ARGUE: I am glad the minister has given me the assurance that such a man will get the payment. I have been in the Regina office time and time again and have talked with the officials, but this is the first intimation I have had that if that man returns he will get paid for that year.

Mr. GARDINER: Anyone who leaves the farm before November 1 and stays away is not paid, but anyone who leaves the farm to go to work because he has no crop and comes back before May 1 of next year and puts in a crop is paid.

Mr. ARGUE: I thank the minister for making that statement. Regulation No. 2 states that a farmer is not considered a farmer under the act unless he lives on the farm and his primary occupation is farming, or unless he lives not more than twenty miles away from the farm and has no occupation other than farming. I have in mind one man who is a storekeeper in a small town. He tells me that on the average he can make $500 a year from his store. He has a half-section of land a few miles out of town which he farms. Last year he had a crop failure.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How much does he make on the average from his farm?

Mr. ARGUE: I think he is working under the misapprehension that he can make some money on the farm. Anyway, he lost money last year, and he finds he is not entitled to come under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and receive a payment. He is going to find it difficult to buy seed and to farm this year. I can think of another man, a mechanic, who has a small garage, I do not suppose it is any larger than twelve by fourteen feet. He overhauls cars and tractors in the winter time. He has rented a half-section of land which he farms in the summer. Last year there was a crop failure in his area and assistance payments were paid to most of the farmers in the district, but he was not considered to be eligible. Simply because a man has initiative and enough ambition to attempt to make a decent living should not cause him to be discriminated against.

Mr. SINNOTT: He is not a farmer; he is a speculator; a farmer is a man who stays on the farm.

Mr. ARGUE: I notice the hon. member did not stay on the farm. I understand he is an implement dealer.

Mr. SINNOTT: Let us get this matter straight.

Mr. ARGUE: I can think of another man who was a real farmer. Last year he moved to Regina on October 23. He had been a farmer for thirty years; he was a bachelor and he had a crop failure. He saw no reason why he should stay on the farm this year and he moved to Regina. Because he left his farm eight days before the deadline he was refused a bonus payment.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did he not stay for the eight days?

Mr. ARGUE: The minister must realize, as I do, that most of the farmers in Canada do not know of the orders in council that are passed by the government and tacked on to the various acts. I assure the minister that I do not know all the regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: If he lives in that district he ought to know because he has been dried out often enough.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some of the ministers forgot about orders in council.

Mr. ARGUE: Then there is the regulation that a man must be twenty years of age in order to be eligible to obtain a payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. During times of war a man of eighteen years of age is considered to be sufficiently mature to be drafted into the army. As I expressed in a resolution which I placed on the order paper but which we have not as yet got around to discussing, I think young people should be given the franchise when they reach the age of eighteen years. I believe, along with them, that they should be allowed to receive benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I do not think I can advance a stronger argument for reducing the eligible age at which a young man can receive assistance under the act than by quoting a few lines from a letter I received from a young man in my constituency who had not received the bonus. He says:

> If I leave the farm now—

This letter was written in February of this year.

> —it will be for good and I'm sure there are a lot of fellows who feel the same. There's no sense in going out working and then come back and invest in something that I'm not sure is a paying proposition, especially when I did not get the bonus.
> I had 60 acres in wheat and 60 acres in summer-fallow. My dad had 90 acres in wheat and oats and 60 acres of summer-fallow, which is a total of 270 acres between the two of us.

If the father had kept the land in his own name and had said to his son, "You drift off into the city; you are old enough to earn your own living," that man would have received an assistance payment on half the total of 270 acres.

Mr. GARDINER: Not if he had land of his own. There is a limit.

Mr. ARGUE: If he had 270 acres he would have received $2.50 per acre on 135 acres. But, instead, the father said to his son, "I shall turn over to you 120 acres of my land and you can farm on your own." The son stayed home and worked on the farm. He had a crop failure. Then, under the regulations of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, he was told that he was not entitled to the bonus, and worst of all, the department would not issue a joint cheque to these two men which would still have been a good many dollars less than some individual farmers were able to obtain under the act. The letter goes on:

> I am sure it is quite evident that we weren't trying to cheat the government of any money. We were just trying to be honest. If it would have been in my dad's name I would have got the bonus. But by some of the Liberal laws I guess a fellow has to be a crook to make any headway.

I am afraid that he arrived at that conclusion a little bit too late.

There are many farmers, in my neighbourhood at least, who have only 160 acres under cultivation and, because they are farming a quarter-section of land, they received under this act last year $200. I know families which have only the $200 under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and a few dollars family allowance to maintain themselves for one year. Surely that is not good enough.

I believe that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, since it was implemented, has cost the government something like $5,000,000 a year on the average. I believe that the suggestions I have made for changes in the act would mean that the cost to the government might be in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000 a year; but $15,000,000 is not a sum that the government should shudder away from when one considers that it would be used to help, as the Minister of Agriculture has told us, at least one million people. It is something less than the cost of a single day's war effort. I would suggest that the government take the money that they spent on one day of the war and spend it now to give the farmers of western Canada adequate protection against crop failure. I am sure that in doing so they would receive no serious objections from any part of Canada, because we in the west, too, are also asking that this act be applied to all parts of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was pleased to hear the minister state this evening that he was going to bring in an amending bill which, after discussion on the second reading, would go to the committee on agriculture. But in view of the minister's statement a few days ago about weather conditions on the prairies, that if it did not rain soon they would not have very much of a crop, coupled with the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher not long ago about this act, I am sure there will be many farmers in his constituency, which is farther east in Manitoba, who will be wanting some assistance under this act if it does not rain and rain quite a few times in the next month on the prairie provinces.

Mr. JUTRAS: They have just had two years of crop failures and never got much assistance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is on their behalf that I want to say a few words so that they will become eligible in future for the drought bonus on the prairies.

I agree that considerable changes should be made in details in the amending bill. For instance, many farmers who might be eligible to receive the bonus under an individual basis, receive no assistance under the township set-up at present. I have here a return that was brought down last year. It shows that 8,194 farmers received prairie farm assistance on the basis of eight bushels per acre or less for the 1944-45 crop, and that 2,557 farmers received assistance on the basis of from eight to twelve bushels to the acre. The 8,194 farmers received $1,686,488.92 and the 2,557 farmers received $511,116.29.

The question was raised a while ago of repeated crop failures in certain sections of the prairie provinces. The return from which I have just quoted also shows how many townships or part townships were eligible for assistance from the 1939 crop to the 1944 crop once, twice, three times, four times or five times. The figures are as follows:

Townships eligible in whole or in part in 1 year, 1,434.
Townships eligible in whole or in part in 2 years, 1,141.
Townships eligible in whole or in part in 3 years, 837.
Townships eligible in whole or in part in 4 years, 527.
Townships eligible in whole or in part in 5 years, 135.

That is quite a record of consecutive crop failures, 135 townships having crop failures for five successive years. The point I wish to make is this. At one time under the act a man who, in a small corner of a township, had threshed forty bushels to the acre still collected the bonus because the greater part of the township had almost an entire crop failure. That situation has been taken care of in recent years to some extent, but I hope that in the amending legislation the minister will protect the individual farmer. I have cited this one case just to show how unfair the act could be on the township basis. A man with a big yield received this assistance, despite the fact that many of his neighbours had crop failures. The reverse might be the case, whereby those having a crop failure would be denied assistance. That is one of the difficulties I point out to the minister in the hope that it will be overcome by the amending legislation. As I pointed out the other evening when the hon. member for Provencher was speaking, the provincial governments of the three prairie provinces have set up committees more than once to study the matter of crop insurance, and their reports show that they found many difficulties. But in this amending legislation, assuming that a very careful and thorough study will be given to the matter, I believe the minister will be able to make some headway in improving the act in the interests of the individual farmer who suffers crop loss through no fault of his own, but owing to drought conditions, which, though I hate to say it, I feel convinced many farmers in the prairie provinces are going to suffer during this calendar year.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I rise to say a few words on the question of prairie farm assistance. A good deal has been said about it by other members of our group, and I need not go over that again. But, coming from Manitoba, and having heard two opposing views of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act from Manitoba members, one view by the hon. member for Provencher and the opposite view by the hon. member for Souris, I am inclined to agree this time with the hon. member for Souris. I do not think the solution of the difficulty we have been having in Manitoba in connection with this act is to withdraw from the act, because in the first place, as far as I have been able to find out, there is no prospect at the present time that the provincial government has a crop insurance plan ready or that it is prepared to put one in operation in the near future. Until such time as there is some legislation to replace this act in Manitoba, I do not think it would be wise to withdraw from it.

That is not the only reason why I am inclined to take the view of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat rather than that of the hon. member opposite. I believe the whole spirit of the act is one of mutual aid, so to speak, that farmers are banding together under this act to do something which each one individually cannot do. It is a form of cooperation, something toward which we should take further steps, and to withdraw from the act because the provinces as a whole do not receive as much in benefits as they pay in by deductions would be, to my way of thinking, a regressive step, an act of selfishness. I admit that the farmers of Manitoba have paid more into the fund than they have received from it, and I would urge upon the minister the necessity of certain amendments to the act in order to make it more equitable for Manitoba, but I do not believe the solution is to withdraw from it and leave ourselves between the two well known alternatives.

I should like to point out one amendment which I think is particularly needed: it is in connection with hail damage. I do not know whether anyone has mentioned it here to-day; but, according to the way the act works now, it is very difficult for the individual farmer to collect compensation for hail damage. I have a case in point in my own constituency—I believe the minister is quite familiar with it because we have had correspondence about it—where in a certain township a hailstorm came along in a narrow strip and made the damage such that certain people who should have received compensation could not get it because their township did not have the required amount of damage, while perhaps in another township where the damage was not quite so bad but was spread out more thinly, they were able to collect. The letter which I received from the deputy minister has this significant sentence in it:

> This department inspected townships 27 and 28 and found the average yield to be, in wheat, 8·3 bushels per acre. Therefore the board of review disqualified this township.

This means that on account of having just a little more than the eight bushels per acre the farmers in that township were not able to get any assistance whatever. I happen to know there are certain townships in the constituency where the extent of damage put them just on the borderline and the individual farmers could not collect. That is, I think, a strong argument for putting the administration of the act on an individual farmer basis.

I should like to add that in the case of Manitoba, if amendments to the act are to be made, it might be possible to provide in that province for compensation for flood as well as for hail and drought. I do not know if any part of Saskatchewan is susceptible to flood damage, but there are certain areas in Manitoba, including the constituency of Provencher, where flood damage is somewhat more serious than drought or hail damage, and if the act could be so amended that compensation could be paid in the case of flood and hail as well as drought in Manitoba I am sure that the farmers of that province would not advocate withdrawing from the act.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the discussion goes any further I should like to say something which I had intended to say at an earlier stage. I want to express my own appreciation to the hon. member for Wood Mountain for having given to this committee the very careful outline that he has of some of the shortcomings of what we sometimes call crop insurance. I take from his remarks that he has made a very careful study of it, and I judge from what he said that he was much in favour of crop failure assistance rather than crop insurance. While I was listening to what he had to say, I thought it would be well worth while for hon. members who have been discussing these two ideas, the one of crop failure assistance and the other of crop insurance, to take the trouble to read that part of his speech which deals with that matter. It bears out fully, I think, what has been contended by myself, as the originator of this idea, from the beginning, that in an area such as Saskatchewan, particularly crop insurance as such is almost impossible, for the reasons which were given; and the illustration mentioned as between a state in the United States where they seldom have crop failure and another state where they have it quite regularly is the best indication of what happens to those who rely upon insurance as against crop failure assistance in areas of that kind.

Other matters which were brought up cover most of the objections to the act. One thing I have been urging, and urging rather strongly recently, was given the greatest emphasis by two of the speakers, namely that the situation is probably not quite the same since young men started to come back from overseas as it was before they went overseas. The provision which is in the regulation—it is not in the act—to the effect that a young man under the age of twenty who lived with his parents was not paid, had not much more to do with the claims than simply this, that there was an effort, when the act was first brought in, by a very limited number of people to collect more money under the act than they were really entitled to. A man with, let us say, two or three sections of land was entitled to collect only on half of 400 acres, or 200, but by dividing that land among a certain number of members of his family he could get all the land under the compensation provisions. Some of the regulations were inserted in order to avoid that, and one of the methods of simplifying the administration which was strongly recommended for a considerable time before it was brought in was that the age limit be put in. That may have been all right at the time and it did not create much difficulty until this year, but men have been coming back from overseas since last year who could not possibly have been utilizing any method of that kind in order to obtain greater advantages under the act. I have been suggesting for some time that that regulation ought to be changed and perhaps made to apply retroactively, but at the moment I am not able to say that it will be. It has to be given further consideration and brought in for change. I can see, however, that there is some reason for that.

When the act gets before the committee, hon. members who are interested in that area will be able to discuss the question, and there is no member who has greater reason to be interested in the area than the hon. member for Wood Mountain. The area has been under drought for a considerable number of years. I think it will be agreed when we go over the act carefully and make some changes in the regulations as they now stand, that most of the restrictions which are there must exist for the general reason that restrictions of this kind are put into legislation, namely, to safeguard the treasury, which, after all, represents the money of the people against a few who sometimes take advantage of conditions, and unfortunately there are people who suffer in consequence. It is not easy to overcome some of the difficulties that exist by any method other than the regulations that are here, but these matters can remain for discussion until the act is before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to take up any time repeating what has already been said, but I desire to bring to the attention of the minister a specific instance that has been brought to his notice previously in the course of correspondence. I have also taken it up a number of times with the officials of his department who have given me a most courteous hearing but who invariably have advised me of the impossibility of doing anything toward relieving the situation.

The hon. member for Souris, who has given profound study to the matter, both since being in the house and prior to that time in connection with his position as president of the municipalities' association of Manitoba, has pressed for a long time, together with other members, for payment on an individual basis. I realize the difficulties in the way of that being carried into effect, but it does seem unfair that many are denied the payment of the bonus by reason of the regulations or because they do not live in an area sufficiently large to bring them within the regulations. They are required to make a contribution, in return for which they get nothing, unless the area that suffers drought damage is large enough. I refer particularly to an area north of Regina in the rural municipality of Dufferin. That area is bordered on the south by a water course. Across that water course the crops are invariably good, while north of the water course they are invariably bad; but because the area is less than one-quarter of a township, they are unable to secure payment of any bonus whatsoever. They have been in that position for the last several years.

Mr. GARDINER: They live at the top of the valley.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister knows the area. They live right at the top of the valley; they pay year by year, and they suffer loss year by year. It is all very well to ask, why do they not get out? They cannot get out. The fact remains that each year they sow, and it so happens that for the past four or five years, and even prior to that, they have suffered losses and have never had any return.

I fully realize that legislation, however carefully drafted it may be, cannot cover every eventuality. But there is an area that has suffered repeated failures, and there are two other similar areas in other parts of the province. I suggest that, when amendments are brought down, something be done to cover that situation.

With regard to the matter raised by the hon. member for Wood Mountain, in what all must have regarded as a most able and constructive address, he mentioned the case of some man who was not living on the farm and was denied payment of the bonus. I realize that there, too, there are difficulties in the way; but I feel that section 5, subsection 6, which gives the minister power to make regulations excluding from the operation of this act farmers who do not reside upon farms within the meaning of the regulation, should be reviewed and changes should be made in connection therewith.

Let me mention one example. An elderly couple have lived on the farm until they find it necessary to leave and have someone work the farm. They make the contribution but they are denied payment of the bonus. I might mention also cases such as the hon. member for Wood Mountain pointed out of individuals who go into town to earn a living temporarily. There is no reason that I can see why they should not be considered bona fide farmers and entitled to the application of the act.

I suggest that when an opportunity is given to discuss this matter in the committee on agriculture, and when the amendments are brought down, questions such as have been referred to this evening should receive the consideration of the draftsman to the end that the anomalies which now exist be removed. I do not like repetition, but I again urge the minister to do something with respect to the area I mentioned near Bethune, Saskatchewan, and two or three others, with a view to having these people, who are bona fide farmers and who have struggled against adversity for years, be given consideration such as this act is designed to afford. I suggest that something be done to meet the situation of farmers who, by reason of drought, have not a reasonable crop.

Mr. FAIR: Another problem has given trouble in the past and I do not know whether provision has been made to meet it. I refer to the farmer who has one, two or more sons working on the farm with him. They may all have their own separate crops, but because they all use the same set of machinery they have been given only one bonus.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not the intention. The regulations do not prevent a son from living with his parents and using the same equipment as his parents use. As a matter of fact, the intention was that they should be encouraged to do this rather than discouraged. But there are cases where that is given as the reason—though other reasons develop—why they are not allowed the payment. It may be that the board have decided that the arrangement is not a bona fide one.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister explain the formula used for deciding whether a man is a farmer or a rancher? Two or three years ago the minister himself criticized strongly some of the decisions that have been handed down, and recently I have run into a good deal of trouble regarding a number of men who were termed ranchers but who, in my opinion, were farmers. In the area south of the Goose Lake line it takes an average of forty acres to one head of cattle. So that if a man had seventy-five head of cattle he would have to have 3,000 acres for pasture; and if he farmed 200 acres it would be decided that, having 3,000 acres for pasture and 200 acres for crops, he must be a rancher. In such circumstances a man could be a farmer, although he had 3,000 acres for pasture land.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that shortly after the matter was discussed in the house on a previous occasion—as a matter of fact, I had some discussion with the board—the board was changed and a new chairman put on it. These matters were all discussed fully, and I understand that that interpretation has not been put on the ranchers since.

Mr. QUELCH: How do you arrive at what is a rancher; what is the formula?

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, I insisted that there should be no arriving at it at all; that anybody who did not know what a rancher was in western Canada should not be on that board. I told them that I would try to see that he was not on unless he was able to determine what was a rancher himself, without any definition being put down. Anyone out there knows what a rancher is.

Mr. QUELCH: I did not have any trouble for about two years and then within the past month or two I have received a number of letters protesting about it. I think I had better hand them over to Mr. Stevenson.

Mr. GARDINER: Send them over and I shall have a look at them. I might say that I was getting a lot of complaints before I took action. I think none have come to me since that time. I hope the board is not getting back to its old practice.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have had some correspondence with the department regarding the position of a number of cooperative farms. Would the minister give us some statement as to whether amendments are to be brought in whereby the cooperative farm will be put back in the position—

Mr. GARDINER: That is one of the amendments proposed. I cannot say it will get here, but I hope it will.

Item agreed to.

Special—

34. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese anad cheese factories, $2,000,000.

Mr. DANIEL: I notice that under this item there is an amount of $2,000,000. There has been an additional amount of $200,000 added this year. I understand that this item is for premiums paid on high-scoring cheese; in other words, high-quality cheese. Another portion of it is for subsidies paid for the construction of cheese factories and to bring such factories up to a certain standard. Am I right in my assumption in that regard?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is correct; that is what it is for.

Mr. DANIEL: Since I have the honour to represent perhaps one of the largest producers of cheese in the Dominion of Canada I feel that a large percentage of this money will eventually come back to my constituency, because I am quite sure that the cheese-makers there can be favourably compared with those of any other part of Canada.

For the information of the committee, I may say that last year in Oxford county we produced some eight million pounds of cheese. That is a lot of cheese. In addition to that, we produced processed milk by the carload. In fact, hundreds of carloads of condensed, evaporated milk were shipped overseas. I remember that at the last session the hon. member for Lanark mentioned the large cheese they made in Perth. He attributed the success of Lanark in the production of cheese to that large cheese. If it did that for Lanark it also did Oxford county some good, because we have been in the production of cheese ever since that time.

I should also like to bring a matter to the attention of the minister to show him that in Oxford county we treasure the dairy cow. I believe we are the only county in Canada which has erected a statue to the memory of a dairy cow after she has passed to her great reward. I refer to that wonderful cow Springbank Snow Countess, owned, bred and milked by Mr. Tom Dent of the city of Woodstock. Mr. Dent is now a member of the Ontario legislature at Toronto.

Mr. GRAYDON: A Progressive Conservative?

Mr. DANIEL: Yes, he is a Conservative.

Mr. GARDINER: Don't blame that on the cow.

Mr. DANIEL: On the outskirts of the city of Woodstock on the very ground where this cow used to graze, eat the grass to produce this wonderful record of 9,300 pounds of butterfat in her lifetime lactation period, stands a monument or statue, life-sized, with floodlights on it at night. It was erected by the Holstein Friesian association of Canada. No doubt that cow has had her picture taken more often than any other cow in Canada. I feel safe in saying that her picture is in every state of the United States and in every province of Canada, because whenever you drive past there in the day time you will see tourists out having their pictures taken, with the children on the back of this beautiful Holstein cow.

Things are going along not too badly in the dairy industry in Oxford apart from a little dispute over prices, but there is another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister at this time. Mr. Chairman, I may be entirely out of order, but if I am no doubt you will correct me. This matter should have really come up under the diseases of animals item, but I was unavoidably absent on that occasion. When that item was under discussion I understand no hon. member mentioned mastitis, a dread disease which is making serious inroads into the production of milk in western Ontario at the present time. I know of a complete herd which has gone to the butcher's block because of it. Mastitis is a very contagious infection. It gets into the udder of the cow, and when the dairy cow loses her udder she has lost everything. Have the federal government taken any steps to combat this disease, or are they making any studies of it? I wish the minister would answer that question. I have been approached by many farmers of my riding and they certainly are concerned over this matter. I have many farmers in my riding with 200 acre farms; it is not uncommon for them to produce up to 2,500 pounds of milk a day, and that requires a lot of milking. When this disease gets in the herd I know for a fact that their production has been halved. There are certain remedies that I know veterinarians have been using, but I believe that further study should be made into this important matter.

Mr. GARDINER: As the hon. member said, the item was up some days ago, but the disease of mastitis was not mentioned in the discussion that took place. We spent most of our time on Bang's disease. For a number of years studies have been under way that finally resulted in the discovery of a method which appears to give most promising results. Penicillin used under conditions which ensure an accurate diagnosis has proved capable of curing approximately 90 per cent of the infected quarter. Every effort is being made to encourage the use of this drug under conditions which aim at total elimination of the disease from the herd. It is believed that only when this is put into practice will the economic burden caused by this disease be removed. Therefore the investigations have been made. Penicillin, which is proving beneficial in so many things, is proving beneficial in the treatment of this disease.

Mr. WEBB: I have been sitting here now for some weeks listening attentively to the interesting discussion in connection with the Department of Agriculture. I have listened to hon. members from the west pleading for assistance for their people, because it is too dry. I have listened to hon. members from the east pleading that it is too wet. I happen to live in between, less than a hundred miles from Ottawa, and I would not want anyone to have the impression that we are either too dry or too wet. But we do, at times, really suffer from drought, and sometimes from too much rain. However, we are fortunate in being able to crawl up on the high spots when it is too wet, and when it is dry we go down to the lower places.

So far as assistance is concerned, in my particular part of the country I think the minister will agree that it must come particularly from this item. I should like some explanation of the subsidy for the construction and reconstruction of cheese factories. Mine is a dairying part of the country, and I was not of the opinion that cheese factory construction received much assistance. I do not know in what way that assistance is given.

In fact, we have lost a number of cheese factories to milk factories. Would the minister be good enough to break down the item? I am not referring to equipment, but rather to the reconstruction of cheese factories. The amount is increased this year from $50,000 to $250,000, which would look as though we might expect something further by way of building and maintenance of cheese factories.

Mr. GARDINER: The vote has been in existence since 1939, and was put into effect for the purpose of improving the quality of cheese. There were two ways taken, as was suggested a few minutes ago, to bring about that improvement; one was to pay for high-quality cheese the amount of one cent on 93 score and two cents on 94 score. In addition to that, provision was made for spending money to improve equipment; that is, to get refrigeration into the curing room, and to improve curing rooms in order to assist in improving the standard of cheese.

In addition to that, in quite a number of places there were factories which were very much out of date. Then, in some places there were more factories in those districts than were required. They were not able to make things go. Too many of them had been established, and we wanted to encourage them perhaps to do away with one and to improve the other. We agreed to do certain things to assist along those lines.

Those were summed up in this way: (a) to encourage the consolidation of existing factories in order to secure improvement and greater uniformity of quality of production through increased production per factory;

(b) to assist in providing improved cheese maturing facilities in cheese factories which will result in improved quality and reduce loss of weight during maturing;

(c) to assist in a standardization of diameter of cheese pressing equipment, thereby securing improved appearance of the cheese. That is, many of the old presses were of different sizes. Some of them built a high cheese instead of a flat cheese. To get it standardized, we gave assistance to have that equipment changed.

(d) to provide for the payment of a premium for highest quality cheese. I gave the premiums when I spoke a few minutes ago.

Then, it has been pointed out that the item this year is $250,000 as against $50,000 last year. The point is that last year we were unable to get the materials. During the war, as hon. members know, many of the materials required for doing these things were not available. It was anticipated more of them would be available this year, and we would be able to overtake many of the applications that are in. That is, for subsidies for construction and reconstruction of cheese factories, the improvement of cheese maturing facilities in cheese factories, and for the standardization of cheese pressing equipment. We expect to be able to get five times as much equipment as we got last year. We could have spent the amount last year if we had been able to get the equipment. But we were not able to get it.

Mr. WEBB: I understand this large item of $1,750,000 for premiums on high quality cheese. But the item which was not quite clear to me was the one for $250,000. Have any subsidies been paid for construction and maintenance of cheese factories in the county of Leeds?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that we have the information for counties, but we have it for provinces. Under the item of amalgamation, we have amalgamated 47 in Quebec, three in Ontario. In the matter of insulation, there have been 150 in Quebec, 19 in Ontario, two in Manitoba and one in Alberta. For insulation and refrigeration there have been 242 in Quebec, 262 in Ontario, seven in Alberta and one in British Columbia. For pressing equipment there have been eight in New Brunswick, four in Prince Edward Island, two in Quebec, 141 in Ontario, and one in British Columbia.

The totals for all are: New Brunswick, eight; Prince Edward Island, 4; Quebec, 441; Ontario, 425; Manitoba, two; Alberta, eight, and British Columbia, two.

While I have not the information by counties, I am reasonably sure that there has been some reequipment in the county of Leeds, and that they have received payments under the provision for reequipment. Perhaps they have not received anything in respect of the rebuilding of factories.

Mr. HACKETT: In the last month or six weeks the minister has referred frequently to a procedure in Quebec whereby factories have become convertible into cheese factories or butter factories, as opportunity for sale of one or other of these commodities seems to become more attractive. Has any part of this $250,000 been devoted to effecting this convertibility in respect of the butter and cheese factories in Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER: I would doubt very much if any considerable proportion of it has been used for that purpose. There may have been instances where it has been proposed to add a cheese factory to a building already producing butter, in which event they would probably come under the regulations as applied to equipment. But that is a condition which, as I understand it, has existed in Quebec for many years. They have had duplex plants. I do not know what their origin was, or who originally advocated their operation. But the fact is that they have those duplex plants and, strange to say, there are very few of them anywhere but Quebec. One may wonder why that should be so, but the fact remains. Someone must have promoted the idea at one time, and succeeded in having a considerable number of them established in that province.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister any detailed information on this particular phase of the enterprise? He made several references to it. The fact that I am not thoroughly familiar with the situation is of no great significance, but I must point out that I have not been able to localize many of those factories, nor have I been able to find many instances where a change from cheese making to butter making has taken place.

Mr. GARDINER: I had the figures here the other night when we were discussing it, but I do not know whether I can locate them at the moment. Would the hon. member mind if I got the information for him and give it to him to-morrow in typewritten form?

Mr. HACKETT: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. TUSTIN: Cheese production this year is down considerably as compared with the same period last year. If my figures are correct it is down 35·8 per cent for the four months. The estimates provide for $1,750,000 for quality cheese, which is the same as was voted last year. In many instances the subsidy is not forthcoming to the cheese factories in the late fall and the patrons do not receive it for some time. Some cheese factories borrow the money and pay the subsidies and then wait until it is passed by the government for the ensuing year. Beginning June 1, cheese is being requisitioned for the British market. After that date all cheese manufactured in Ontario and Quebec will have to be sent to the dairy products board for shipment to the United Kingdom.

Does the minister think that, with the prices now prevailing for milk going into cheese, he will be able to supply the 125,000,000 pounds which we have contracted to ship to the United Kingdom this year? If he does not, then I suggest that some arrangement be made whereby, if all this $250,000 for the improvement of cheese factories and equipment is not required this year, an extra premium for quality be paid to producers. I believe the minister is on the right track in paying a subsidy for quality, because I think the records will show that since this subsidy was put on there has been a great improvement in the quality of cheese manufactured in this country. If the minister does not think he is going to get this 125,000,000 pounds of cheese for the United Kingdom, when he brings down his supplementary estimates he should give further consideration to increasing the quality premium.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to discourage anyone, but our officials do not expect to get the 125,000,000 pounds of cheese for export this year, no matter what we do. Our feed position seems to be such as not to permit of that being accomplished. The only thing that may make it possible is particularly good grass during the summer. We are requisitioning all cheese after June 1 to go to the United Kingdom, but we are not requisitioning cheese in May. Some think that the figure we shall reach will be 115,000,0000 pounds and others think that we shall not reach even that. I took the position that we should not lower our sights, that we should aim at 125,000,000 pounds. This matter has been discussed with the British and they understand the position. They do not anticipate getting 125,000,000 pounds, but if we produce it they want it; they want even more than that if we can produce it.

Then, as to whether we shall make use of the $250,000, if we can get the equipment there will be no difficulty about using that vote, or perhaps even more. There is enough demand to use that up and perhaps we can get the equipment. We have voted $1,750,000 for premium subsidies, but I should not like to say that our estimates at the moment show that we shall reach that point.

The hon. member suggests that we should pay more. It is purely a question of whether we can maintain it, not only this year but at other times. It is most difficult to take off these premiums once you put them on. This premium has done very well up to date, as has been suggested. There is another danger to be faced. If you get it up too high, somebody takes it all off. Up to date we have been able to maintain it. Every time the estimates are under consideration before they come here the question is raised whether we should not take it off. It has been maintained at its present level and we have been able to indicate good results. I would hesitate to add another cent this year and then have somebody take it all off next year or the year after.

Mr. TUSTIN: In his remarks the other day on another item the minister suggested that prices paid in Canada were about the same as prevailing prices in the United States. I asked him if it was not a fact that most of the cheese manufactured in the United States was manufactured from skim milk, and I think he more or less agreed with me. I think the minister was making a comparison which was not fair to the farmers of this country. If cheese in the United States is manufactured from skim milk the farmer there has a benefit of three or four pounds of butter fat for every 100 pounds of milk he produces. Consequently the return to the farmer in the United States would be considerably above the return to the farmer in Canada. Will the minister make it clear whether cheese in the United States is produced mostly from skim milk?

Mr. GARDINER: Wisconsin cheese, to which I was referring the other night, is a cheddar cheese similar to our own. If you were to go to the United States and take cheese at different points you would get different results. The prices I gave the other day were the prices that had obtained. I became a little concerned about them myself, and I asked the officials to get me not only the prices but the subsidies that are paid on both sides of the line. Figured out on the basis of the return in Wisconsin on milk that goes into cheese, the return to the farmer is much higher than it is in Canada.

When you consider the subsidies which have been increased recently in order to get more cheese on to the market to be shipped to Europe and elsewhere, the total return from milk going into cheese in Wisconsin would be $3.03 per hundred. In Ontario, if you take a similar kind of cheese, it is $2.10, or a difference of 93 cents.

Mr. HACKETT: In Quebec it is much lower.

Mr. GARDINER: It is lower by the amount of the subsidy.

Mr. WEBB: I am fully aware that it is important to produce a high grade of cheese and almost equally important to have good buildings and good equipment. Would the minister briefly outline the procedure in making application for assistance in buildings and equipment and state the percentage of subsidy in both cases?

Mr. GARDINER: The act provides in the case of cold storage equipment that 50 per cent will be paid by the government and 50 per cent by the individual. The same provision is made with regard to buildings. We pay 50 per cent where it has been agreed that the improvement will be brought about. The procedure followed in making application is that the person or company writes in and we send out an inspector who inspects the plant and determines whether the improvement can be made and whether we would be warranted in spending the money necessary to have it made. After the inspection, the application is passed by my office and then goes to council and goes through practically as an order in council.

Mr. HACKETT: Would a butter factory becoming a cheese factory be an improvement within the interpretation of the item?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt very much if that happens. It possibly could happen indirectly through a person making application for assistance and putting up a new plant which replaces the creamery.

Mr. HACKETT: I suppose the converse would not apply in any event.

Mrs. STRUM: Are these outright grants to individual butter plants or cheese factories?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mrs. STRUM: And are cooperatives eligible for these grants?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

35. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $200,000.

Mr. BLAIR: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. GARDINER: The item was $300,000 some years ago and now it is $200,000. In 1937 or 1938 the Americans were objecting to our maple syrup being shipped to the United States because it contained lead, and it was condemned as having lead poisoning in it. They would only permit our maple syrup to be used at that time for the purpose of sweetening cigarettes, and that applied to some of the syrup produced across the line. Upon investigation, we found that lead got into the syrup through the lead covering on the cans put out to catch the syrup and through the lead covering on the vats. They are covered with lead to prevent rusting. I am speaking from memory, because it was quite a few years back. The lead got into the sap in that way and finally into the syrup. We undertook to assist in improving the equipment on a three-way plan, the individual bearing one-third, the provincial government one-third, and the dominion one-third, of the cost of changing that equipment. The plan went along and we spent about $300,000 in one or two years before the war, but when the war started it was difficult to get the equipment, and the amount spent was very much lower. We are getting back now to the point where the equipment can be secured and we are going on with the programme. We have an item of $200,000 this year. If we are able to procure more equipment we shall come along with a supplementary, because we want to have this change made as rapidly as possible. This item is to pay our share of the cost of changing over to the new equipment.

Mr. FRASER: This is for up-to-date evaporators too?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is changing over from the old equipment to the new.

36. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $50,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Last session the minister stated that this act had not yet been proclaimed. Recently I understood him to say that the act had been proclaimed and that one member of the board had been appointed. I think it might avoid discussion if the minister would state just what the present position of the board is.

Mr. GARDINER: It is scarcely correct to say that a member has been appointed. We set up a board under the act. The act did not say that we had to appoint any particular persons, but simply appoint a board of three. We appointed what we intended to be the permanent chairman in the person of Mr. Taggart. Then we appointed Mr. Shaw, who is the director of marketing, and Mr. Booth, who is in charge of the economics branch of the department, as pro tempore members of the committee. We did that for two reasons. In the first place, they would have to direct the staffs that would be gathering the information in any case. In the second place, it did not require the paying of two extra salaries at a time when there was nothing to be done in the matter of administering the act itself. The only work to be done was to gather information with regard to conditions in the last three years of the war and keep comparable figures for the other years as we go along. That is being done by the staff under Mr. Taggart. Some of them are employees in the branches headed by Mr. Shaw and Mr. Booth. Until we require to bring the legislation into effect —we have declared it to be in effect but there has been no necessity up to the moment to operate under the act—it will not be necessary to appoint permanent members to the board. In the meantime, we are keeping it in its present form to save expenses, and the work is being done just as well by the present staff as if we had appointed two permanent members of the board. When we make the appointments we expect to have one man from the west, one from the east and probably one from the central provinces.

37. Agricultural research special projects, $200,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: Just what projects are being carried on under this appropriation?

Mr. GARDINER: The main one is carrying on experiments at Portage la Prairie in connection with flax. There is another research project being carried on at Lethbridge in connection with wool, and one at Morden which is being carried on more particularly in connection with fruits. These are not the type of project which I myself had in mind or, I think, which the committee had in mind when this appropriation was recommended some three years ago. I think that what was in the minds of those who were responsible for the appropriation being brought into being was some central research organization, somewhere in western Canada, which would be utilized for the purpose of carrying on in one place quite a number of these investigations. The equipment was not available with which to equip a plant of that kind, and it was difficult to get building material. This year it has been suggested to me that we take on a half dozen of these special projects again, and I to-day returned the suggestion to the director of experimental farms and asked him to reconsider it. I think the money ought to be spent just as soon as it possibly can be spent to establish a much more effective plant somewhere in western Canada which would do somewhat the same service for the west as much of our research work at the central experimental farm here is doing for the eastern part of Canada. I hope we shall be able to get started on it this year. If not, we shall utilize the money to go on with the investigations at a number of points.

Mr. WRIGHT: The reason I asked was that I wondered whether the work was to be carried on at Saskatoon, where, I believe, the national research council are constructing a laboratory.

Mr. GARDINER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce had a vote for that. It is not covered under this vote.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is the same amount, and I wondered if it was the same vote, or if you people were going to work in conjunction with them. It might not be a bad idea, because probably it could be done more economically in one place rather than by erecting separate buildings

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the other project is likely to be carried out at Saskatoon. I think that is the understanding of all three provinces. That is one reason why we have been waiting; we do not want to proceed with this until we know what will be done in that respect.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

200. Departmental administration, $422,774.

Mr. FLEMING: It is the custom, I believe, to make some remarks of an introductory nature on the first item of a department's estimates. I promise that these general remarks of mine will be brief and, I trust, to the point.

Of the importance of the work of this department in the two fields of health and welfare there can be no question whatever. Actually there is not much time spent in this chamber in discussing health and welfare, but I take it as a matter of common ground on the part of us all that these are matters of the highest importance to all Canadians.

I should like to indicate in just a word what will be the attitude of the official opposition with respect to the estimates of this important department. We find, in the first place, that there is a substantial increase in the estimates submitted to us for 1946-47 in comparison with those of the previous year. The increase is largely accounted for by the fact that family allowances will this year be paid on the full twelve-months basis instead of the nine-months basis which prevailed in the previous year. But actually we find proposed in these estimates an increase in the expenditure of the Department of Health and Welfare from a total of $242,372,257.27 in the previous year to a figure of $305,064,716. I am including the items which will be found on page 72 of the main estimates. It will be seen that there is an increase totalling $62,692,458.73 this year as compared with the estimates of last year.

The attitude of the official opposition with respect to these estimates is simply this. Appreciating as we do the tremendous importance of health and welfare, we nevertheless will expect justification for each appropriation sought. It will be our duty in scrutinizing these estimates to see that the taxpayer receives value for the money that he is being called upon to pay, a fair dollar's return to the people of this country in health and welfare for each dollar collected in taxes.

It is a matter of regret—and perhaps I am being rather brash in undertaking to criticize the form of the estimates—that we do not have before us the actual expenditure in the previous fiscal year. We are given simply two columns: first, the appropriation for the previous year; then, the estimate for the year before us. We are not given the figure of actual expenditure. Compare that with business practice, Mr. Chairman. I do not suppose there is any business which would attempt to set up a budget of estimated expenditure for the current year without having before it the actual expenditure for the previous year, not simply the budget of the previous year, the estimate of expenditure, but the actual expenditure. It is no greater criticism of the form of estimates of this department than of any other that we are not given that information. That is definitely a shortcoming in the form in which estimates are submitted to parliament.

There is another factor which I think hampers the effectiveness of the work of the House of Commons in relation to the estimates. We are not furnished with the report of the department in question for the immediately preceding fiscal year. The last report of the Department of Public Health and Welfare which is issued is the report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. We have no information concerning the detailed operations of the department for the past fourteen months. There will be found in certain of the statutes provision that some of the items which appear in the annual report of the Department of National Health and Welfare must be submitted within three months of the conclusion of the fiscal year. This means that some of these items must be laid before parliament in the form of a report not later than June 30, but, reaching these items as we do on May 30, we are labouring under the handicap of not having that report for the immediately preceding fiscal year.

I make no apology whatever for returning to a theme on which I have spoken once or twice in this house. I dealt with it when we were on the estimates of this department in the fall session. I think we are surely finding day by day the need of a standing committee of this house on health, welfare and social security, and with it I would include housing, because, to my way of thinking, housing must be regarded as inseparably related to the problem of health in this country. We have, of course, an informal committee of the two houses at the present time. It has existed for a number of years; it has no official standing; it is doing good work; but I am satisfied that a standing committee with some official status could do better work. If we had such a committee, I suggest that the study of the estimates would furnish it with an opportunity of making an effective contribution, both to a careful, systematic scrutiny of the estimates of the department, and to saving this House of Commons valuable time.

A good deal of time spent in consideration of estimates is devoted to obtaining information from the minister as to a multitude of details in relation to the administration of his department, information which, it seems to me, could just as well be obtained in committee. It would then be a matter of record. Those members who wanted information could always find it there and much valuable time would be saved. That is one great service which a standing committee could render in this field.

I think it is patent as well that such a committee would be helpful to parliament in analysing a great many proposals that are put before individual members in the field of social security. I expect that everyone of us receives from time to time ideas of different individuals as to schemes of social security, and it would be most helpful if there were a standing committee which could review such proposals and make a constructive study of them. I think also of the valuable contributions in the form of proposals put forward from time to time by labour organizations in this country. I take it we are all conscious of the obligation that we owe, both as parliament and as citizens, to labour organizations for the thought and study which organized labour has devoted to problems in the field of national health and welfare. There is no class in the community which has given more constructive thought to problems of national health and welfare than has organized labour in Canada. We do not do justice to these proposals at the present time, nor shall we do justice to them until we have some body which is capable of giving thought and study to the subject in an official way, such as a committee of the house.

It would be helpful also if a committee of the house had an opportunity of direct contact with the officials of the department, many of whom have no doubt had much to do with framing the estimates now before us. It would be interesting to have the views of some of these officials at first hand and to question them. That would be of great assistance to members of the house in the discharge of their duties.

In concluding my remarks on that theme, I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be able to persuade his colleagues that the time has come when the rules of the house ought to be revised at least to the extent of providing for the establishment of a standing committee on health and welfare and social security; and, as I have said, I would include housing in it.

It is difficult to approach a review of the functions of this department without having an eye on the sometimes difficult question of the borderline of jurisdiction as between parliament on the one hand and the legislatures of the provinces on the other, in the field of public health and welfare. It is not my intention to precipitate a debate or discussion on the proposals submitted by the dominion government to the dominion-provincial conference. I believe that last year we did our best to assist those engaged in that conference, and those engaged in the meetings of the economic committee, between the two sessions of parliament, by refraining—as I described it on an earlier occasion—from muddying the waters of the conference. It is a matter of hope on the part of all of us that anything that is attempted in this field will be done in the spirit of cooperation, but I do lay stress on one or two principles in this respect. I am sure the minister has them in mind, but they are principles of leading importance in this field.

Due recognition must be given not only to the constitutional prerogatives of the provinces, as those which possess jurisdiction in the field of administration of health and welfare services under the constitution, but also to the desirability of keeping our practice close to that constitutional position. I think it is axiomatic that we shall have the best administration of health services and the best administration of welfare services as well if the governments immediately responsible for such administration are those closest to the people. It has always been my view that the closer the administration is to the people concerned in the fields of health and welfare, the better will be our administration, the more efficient, and the closer it will approach its objective of meeting direct and proven social needs.

With that in mind, I urge that, apart from those specialized fields which the constitution vests in the dominion, such as quarantine and the health of civil servants and so on, we must avoid overlapping as between the dominion and the provincial administrations.

We shall do well, in the second place, to avoid centralization. The fathers of confederation are sometimes not given justice. There is a feeling on the part of some that there is more wisdom in the year 1946 than there was in the year 1867. The fathers of confederation exercised vision and foresight when they devised a constitution which places the administration of health and welfare services under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. If we avoid overlapping on the one hand and centralization on the other, I think we shall avoid waste and duplication.

Let us at all times seek to keep administration in the fields of health and welfare close to the people. Let us, in approaching these twin fields appropriately linked in one department, ever keep before us the imperative necessity of maintaining close cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. The act under which the minister administers his department recognizes the limited field assigned to the dominion by the constitution in these matters. The principal functions assigned to the department under the act of 1944, establishing this department, are, with the exception of those specialized fields I mentioned a moment ago, research and assistance to the provinces with information. There is useful work to be done in those fields, but I urge that the dominion will make its best contribution to national health and welfare if it has due regard for the constitution.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister care to make a general statement regarding the first item? It might be mentioned that his department has prepared three useful studies in the whole field of health services during the last few years, and I am sure that the people whose interest in health was aroused by these studies expected that some constructive steps would have been under way by this time had the dominion-provincial conference been more successful. I personally would appreciate some statement by the minister regarding future plans, since seven of the nine provinces were prepared to reach some agreement with the federal authority with minor adjustments. It might not be too much to expect that the federal government might be prepared to enter into negotiations with some or all of these seven provinces in the fields in which there has been some general agreement. Would the minister make some statement regarding plans as to where we go from here?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In answer to the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I would refer to the statement of the Prime Minister of May 9, which appears at page 1345 of Hansard. He was asked for a statement on the dominion-provincial conference, and he said that a discussion on that and of the developments that were necessary would be entered on by the Minister of Finance when he came to present his budget. I am afraid that any discussion I entered on now would be in anticipation of that. Unless the hon. member has some matters particularly related to health and welfare, such as the health proposals that form part of the dominion governments proposals to the provinces, I am afraid I might be anticipating something that more properly might be entered on later. However, if there are any points he would like to have answered as to the attitude of the government, the course of the discussions in the conference and the meaning of the dominion government's proposals on health and welfare as made to the conference, I should be only too glad to go into them just as fully as the committee might wish.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton, he expressed regret that he did not have a statement of expenditures to compare with the estimates. That, of course, is a comment that might be made about the estimates in any year and of any department. The statements of expenditures are not put in the estimates, but they are put in the public accounts, and the public accounts come out just as soon as they can be prepared.

The hon. member spoke about the desirability of comparing expenses in this department in a previous year with the estimates for this year. I regret that that is not possible because there are no expenditures for a full previous year. The department was not in full operation for a full year before; therefore, there are not any comparable figures even to be found on reference to the public accounts. He also referred to the fact that the last report for the department is for the year ended March 31, 1945. That report is furnished to parliament in accordance with section 11 of the act. It was tabled well in advance of the time that might have been usual, and the report for the year ended March 31, 1946, will be tabled in due course in accordance with the act.

The hon. member referred to his own suggestion made in a motion which he had on the order paper that a special committee should be—

Mr. FLEMING: A standing committee.

Mr. CLAXTON: —a standing committee should be provided for in the rules to deal with matters of health and welfare. That suggestion might very properly be made to the special committee which is advising Mr. Speaker on the rules of the house. I am sure that if the committee reports in favour of the establishment of such a standing committee the government will have to give serious consideration to that report. I must say that my own idea with regard to this some time ago was that there should be such a standing committee; but on considering the matter and looking into the practice in the United States and in England, I am coming to the view that it probably would be a mistake for us to have a number of standing committees dealing with the functions of different departments, such as they have in the United States. That leads to a totally different parliamentary system, one which is very much more similar to that in force in the United States than that on which we have modeled our own parliamentary system, namely, the parliament at Westminster, where they have no functional committees. They have five standing committees, and matters are referred to one or another of the committees by Mr. Speaker. From such examination as I have made of it, and comments made in England, I believe that the British procedure is the best; that the multiplication of functional committees in the United States leads to an effort by committees to administer departments. I believe that experience has shown that our system is as good as, if not better than, any in the world. Therefore, on that point, on which I have an open mind, I certainly am not convinced that we should change. I think we should consider most cautiously the institution of standing committees which have a definite relationship with the department and to which estimates would regularly be referred.

With regard to the hon. member's comments on the constitutional position, of course we are fully alive to that. Under the provisions of the constitution the primary responsibility for health and welfare generally rests with the provinces. Paragraph 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act gives power to the provincial legislatures to enact laws in relation to:

> The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

When the hon. member suggests that there should be no overlapping and that we should each exercise jurisdiction within our appropriate fields, I should like to ask him what functions of the department he would like to see estopped. Would he suggest that the family allowances provision, the old age pension provision—

Mr. FLEMING: I say that there should be no overlapping. I am speaking of the policy of the department.

Mr. CLAXTON: We are careful to avoid overlapping, and also in accordance with his suggestion we tried to secure the most effective cooperation with the provinces. I must say that generally, cooperation has been forthcoming.

JAPANESE IN CANADA

REPATRIATION—DELAY IN DEPARTURE FROM VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked a question concerning communication between Japanese repatriates now at Vancouver awaiting transportation to Japan and local persons. It was anticipated that these repatriates, who are groups from Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta, would go on board ship within a day or two after reaching Vancouver. However, there has been a few days' delay in the arrival of the second ship in Vancouver, owing to the necessity for completing ship repairs, and it has been necessary to provide for the housing of these people in the immigration sheds at Vancouver in the meantime.

There are a number of people in Vancouver who want to talk to these repatriates, and it has been found desirable to make orderly arrangements to limit communication of this nature to responsible parties who have legitimate reasons. We have appointed an officer for this purpose, and all reasonable requests are being met. It must be remembered that the supreme allied commander in Japan has prescribed strict limitations on the types of currency, securities for money, and nature of personal property which can be taken on board ship, and the government is responsible to see that these provisions are complied with. Priority in time of staff and repatriates at Vancouver is being given to the carrying out of these provisions. I may say that the first ship is in dock in Vancouver to-day, and repatriates are being placed on board.

CURTAILMENT OF PRODUCTION IN STEEL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply based on a telegram which I have received from the steelworkers union in Sydney, a copy of which I have sent to him. Was it on the fuel controller's orders that operations at the Sydney plant in the production of steel have been drastically curtailed? If so, can the minister give the house any valid reason why conditions in a section of the country which is badly affected by unemployment should be further aggravated by this order?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): As a result of an order of the fuel controller, coal suitable for conversion into coke has been moved to St. Lawrence ports to relieve a very serious lack of domestic fuel. This situation has resulted from the coal strike in the United States. Every hon. member will appreciate that if any considerable body of labour goes on strike, other bodies of labour are affected. That is the situation in this case. It has been necessary to take coke from another steel plant in order to relieve an urgent demand for domestic fuel. I hope the situation is reasonably temporary, but as long as the emergency lasts it will be necessary to continue this diversion.

Mr. GILLIS: Has there been a curtailment of steel production in other plants across the country?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, particularly at Sault Ste. Marie. Coke taken from that plant is resulting in a limited curtailment of steel production. The curtailment is entirely in connection with the production of steel rails, which happens to be a form of steel which is not urgently required. I understand that the production of steel rails has been curtailed at Sydney and Sault Ste. Marie to provide coke for domestic purposes.

TEXTILE STRIKE AT CARLETON PLACE, ONT.

Mr. W. G. BLAIR (Lanark): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Will he make a statement on the Carleton Place textile strike?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): A commissioner has already been appointed to conciliate the dispute upon the request of the minister of labour for Ontario, and I think it would be wise if we said nothing, awaiting his efforts to settle the dispute.

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—FOOD CONTAINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he is able to make a report on the efforts being made to get the box factories in British Columbia working again?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am hopeful that I shall receive a report from Chief Justice Sloan to-morrow on his efforts to conciliate the dispute.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRIORITIES IN PURCHASE OF FARM MACHINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on May 21 last the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked the following question:

Are veterans who own or purchase their own farms entitled to priority in purchasing farm machinery and do they receive the ten per cent special discount?

The answer is as follows: Veterans establishing themselves without assistance from the Veterans' Land Act can obtain a certificate of identification from any office or field man of the Veterans' Land Act. Implement companies have agreed to give preferred treatment to all veterans presenting this certificate, and so far this has worked out very well in so far as machines available are concerned. They are not, however, entitled to any discount but implement dealers in many cases have voluntarily granted discounts.

SUPPLY

200. Departmental administration, $422,774.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In view of the fact that these estimates will not be before the house for another year, I was hoping that the minister would have been able to hold out more hope to the committee as to the intention of his department to cooperate with provinces which are prepared to discuss with the federal government plans for the future. It was demonstrated during the war that the health of the Canadian people was a matter of national concern. In order to wage war effectively it was found important to recruit healthy men and women and provide them with the very best medical, dental and hospital facilities. Many of these young men and women, for the first time in their lives, were able to have the most up-to-date treatment in times of illness. Many of them have now been discharged from the armed forces and are returning to various parts of Canada which have not the facilities which they enjoyed while in the service. Young men and women from my area, for example, left a district in which we now have three dentists to serve 57,000 people, or one dentist for 19,000 people. In the service, whether in the army, navy or air force, there was one dentist to every 500. It is going to be very difficult to explain to those discharged from the forces how Canada during the war from 1939 to 1945 was able to supply one dentist for 500 people when both before 1939 and after 1946 these young people will have to live in communities so sadly lacking in these facilities.

The situation is nearly the same so far as medical personnel are concerned. In my area we have ten medical doctors serving a population of 57,000, which works out at one doctor for 5,700 people. In the very excellent report which has been presented, prepared by the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board, is given an analysis of the supply of doctors and dentists across Canada. It shows a very wide variation. In Prince Edward Island there is a doctor for 1,659 people, and the figures for the other provinces are: Nova Scotia, 1,450; New Brunswick, 2,136; Quebec, 1,206; Ontario, 1,068; Manitoba, 1,438; Saskatchewan, 2,078; Alberta, 1,626; British Columbia, 1,168.

It seems strange that in Saskatchewan we have the lowest ratio of doctors per thousand of people of any province in Canada; yet we recruited more doctors per thousand than any other province. I am happy to say that many doctors from other provinces are now turning longing eyes to Saskatchewan with a view to practising there. It would be very difficult for Saskatchewan to provide out of her own resources the medical, hospital and dental services which the service personnel received during the war, and so I think this is a matter of national concern. In Ontario you have paved roads and good telephone communication all over the province, so that a doctor can answer a call at a few moments' notice, and in that province there is one doctor to 1,068 people. But in Saskatchewan we have very few miles of paved road, a very small mileage of gravel road, and huge distances to cover, and we have only one doctor for 2,078 people. Up in the northern area where I live we have only one doctor for 5,700 people. It must be recognized therefore that this is a national problem and that the people living in these remote areas should have made available to them the type of services that Canada can provide.

The table regarding the number of dentists is similar. In Prince Edward Island there is one dentist to 4,272 people, and the figures for the other provinces are: Nova Scotia, 4,345; New Brunswick, 6,442; Quebec, 4,134; Ontario, 2,587; Manitoba, 3,881; Saskatchewan, 6,095; Alberta, 4,945; British Columbia, 2,743. This works out at an average of one dentist for 3,477 people. In the armed forces there was one dentist for every 500 people. Young men and young women in the prime of life in the armed forces would normally require a minimum of work done on their teeth, and yet they had one dentist for 500 people, whereas the average for Canada is one dentist for 3,477. Obviously there is something wrong. The federal department of health should at this stage be prepared to indicate the pattern that might be followed, and also make it clear that the department is prepared to go along with any province that will proceed to introduce a programme to meet our needs. I realize that it would be impossible in any part of Canada to have the ideal set-up next year or the year after, because it takes many years to train doctors and dentists. But we should be proceeding in the field of health in exactly the same way in which we proceeded in the field of defence during the war. Disease is an enemy that we should be worrying about. I will mention two of our most serious problems.

In the publication entitled "Health, Welfare and Labour", a reference book prepared for the dominion-provincial conference, on pages 14 and 15 we have statistics in connection with the death rate from tuberculosis. Only two provinces in Canada are giving complete and free treatment for tuberculosis, namely Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Alberta comes first.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, Alberta does not have to come first. Alberta did not introduce free treatment as soon as it was introduced in Saskatchewan. I cannot take credit for the free treatment in Saskatchewan for the C.C.F. government, because the service has been provided for many years. We in that province found twenty-five years ago that it was good business to spend money on preventing the spread of tuberculosis and providing free treatment for all those who suffer from it, and for many years we have had one of the lowest death rates in the world. If you leave the Indian population out of the picture, in 1943 Alberta had a slightly better record than Saskatchewan; the death rate in Alberta was 18·2 as compared with 18·3 in Saskatchewan. But consider Manitoba, right next door to us, where you have a similar group of people under similar climatic conditions, but where they have not been as progressive in dealing with this problem: there, the average between 1938 and 1942 was 48·2 as compared with 28·7 in Saskatchewan. If you consider the death rate among Indians you have the shocking figure of 1421 in Manitoba. I am not proud of our figure for Saskatchewan, namely 752. It is away out of line with what it should be in a modern civilized society.

During the war I visited the United States hospital at Churchill, Manitoba, and talked with some of the doctors there who had made emergency flights to visit some of the Indian communities. They said, "You Canadians should be ashamed of yourselves for tolerating the conditions which prevail in many of these Indian communities where the original settlers in Canada have been denied medical, hospital and dental services." They said, "We understand you spend large sums of money in sending medical missionaries to China, India and Africa. That is a fine gesture, but why have you not been concerned about providing hospital, medical and dental services for your own Indian population?" I find from the analysis made by the department that in the past the provinces have not been able to deal with the problem adequately, and it is not too much to expect that grants should be made available to provinces which carry out a scheme which complies with the minimum set by the federal authority. More beds are needed in most of the provinces; and I think, until the federal authority takes a greater interest in this disease, we are not going to be able to show for all Canada statistical results such as we have in Saskatchewan.

I should like also to refer to the pages of this publication which deal with the analyses in connection with mental diseases. Practically every province in Canada is very short of facilities for mental patients. I find that in most provinces there is an excess of the daily average population over the bed capacity in mental hospitals, as shown on page 23 of the report, running to as high as 61 per cent in British Columbia. Again our statistics for Saskatchewan are not satisfactory; we have a very large number of patients there in proportion to the number of beds available, but plans are now being made to correct that condition. In Saskatchewan we are trying to face up to these problems.

The premier of the province is the minister of public health; and on the resources which we have available they are trying to establish new patterns. I was interested in seeing in the last number of Health an article entitled "Winged Samaritans", by Christian Smith, telling of the air ambulance service provided by the Saskatchewan department of health. In the article it says:

> It is believed to be the first government-operated service of its kind on this continent. Courageous bush pilots have dashed into the sub-Arctic on mercy missions.

So far as the writer knows, it is the first time that any government or department of health have provided this service. Last night I had guests in for dinner—a young chap back from the navy, and his wife, who is a trained nurse. She was telling me that her brother, a former R.C.A.F. officer, owes his life to the service of this Saskatchewan air ambulance. The taxpayers of Canada, according to a figure quoted by the former minister of national defence for air, spent approximately $28,000 on training him to be a navigator. He had served his country faithfully, and after discharge became critically ill at his home at Wadena, Saskatchewan, last winter, and there was no hope for his recovery unless he could get away to the city. He was unable to make the trip by train, but in a few hours the air ambulance was sent down, the trip was made safely, and while he has not yet completely recovered it is felt that he owes his life to this service. I do not know how many lives have been saved by this air ambulance service; but there is no reason why the people of this country, who made that kind of provision for casualties during the war, should not be prepared to provide it for citizens in peace time.

I remember being at the Dafoe airport during the war. I was going through one of the finest small hospitals one could expect to find, where the patients were receiving the very best of care. One of the patients was not responding as rapidly as might be expected, and while I was there the air ambulance came in from Winnipeg. Nobody asked how much it cost to bring that ambulance from the city; the only questions asked were, "Is there an air ambulance available?" and, "Is there something which can be done in Winnipeg which cannot be done in Dafoe?" The answers were, yes, and this young airman's life was saved through his being transported to a city which, by air, is really quite close. I think the federal department of national health should be prepared to give some assistance to all isolated localities in Canada where the local authorities would be prepared to cooperate in providing air ambulances for sick people.

I think the federal authority might also be expected to make grants to try out some experimental work in new fields. Last winter I visited in Oakland, California, the Kaiser hospital, an institution which has done such a spectacular job during the war. There were about 80,000 workers in the shipyards for whom complete medical and hospital services were available at the hospital. Doctor Garfield, who is in charge of the hospital, in one of the articles he prepared for the medical association explained that this was not a very popular project with the members of the medical profession; they frowned on any form of group practice where doctors worked on a salary. The scheme embodied three major principles: free treatment, group practice, and adequate facilities. It is true that the doctors who were working on salary were not receiving as much as many of them would have received in private practice during the war, but they were getting salaries of from $5,000 to $15,000 a year, and they were working approximately an eight-hour day. Of course a doctor, if he was in the middle of an operation, did not put away his instruments when the eight hours had passed, but on the whole they worked around a 48-hour week. They had some time for golf and fishing, and they worked as members of a team. They had adequate facilities. They built hospital accommodation to care completely for the eighty thousand who were working there, and the patients, the members of the staff and the people in the community were loud in their praise of this type of project. I cannot see any reason why the federal department of health should not be prepared to make substantial grants to the provinces that are ready to do experimental work in fields such as I have suggested. I suggest that before these estimates are brought down for another year, the minister endeavour to work out some technique whereby the provinces that are prepared to take seriously the analyses and recommendations made by the federal government during the last four or five years in the general field of health may be given some assistance so that we shall have experimental work carried on in the several provinces.

Mr. BLAIR: I am very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie, particularly as they concern the question of tuberculosis. I congratulate the province of Saskatchewan on the work they have done in regard to tuberculosis. Their programme is at least twenty-five years old; but the hon. gentleman stated that the only free treatment given was in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Complete.

Mr. BLAIR: I should like to point out to him that Ontario has been for some time holding chest clinics in towns throughout the province. A chest clinic with complete X-ray equipment comes to my own town twice a year. Appointments are made through doctors, and everyone caring to go, or cases referred by doctors to the clinics, will have diagnosis made, and in the event of their being tubercular they are taken care of in the sanatoria of the province. At the present time also, in Ontario, mass surveys are being carried out. People in the towns in my constituency are being X-rayed. Next week 4,300 will be X-rayed in my own town, without cost to them. There is a shortage of beds, but that is being taken care of.

The hon. member also pointed out some of the benefits derived from practising medicine in Saskatchewan. I would never have believed that such a condition existed. I cannot believe that doctors are getting $15,000 a year and working forty-eight hours a week.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is in California.

Mr. BLAIR: Does the hon. gentleman suggest it is so in Saskatchewan?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not yet.

Mr. BLAIR: Does he hope it will be? I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what would happen in case his wife were ill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They have a large staff of fifty or sixty doctors working as a group in the X-ray clinic in Oakland. The doctors do not lay down their instruments in the middle of an operation. If a doctor works sixteen hours one day he does not come to work the next day. They organize their work in such a way that the doctors put in approximately forty-eight hours a week.

Mr. BLAIR: That would be impossible in a rural district where one doctor has charge of the district.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is in Oakland.

Mr. BLAIR: Often a doctor in a large area will work twenty hours a day as an hon. member suggests.

There is one question I should like to discuss this afternoon. In going over the estimates I find little in the way of grants for public health research. This is something that has been neglected in Canada. Little research has been carried out by the dominion, and very little by the provinces. The high incidence and high mortality in certain diseases would indicate that they constitute problems which should be subjected to intensive research. If Canada has reached the status of a nation, the responsibilities of a nation in the protection of the health of its citizens should be undertaken by the state. That applies to research, which I am especially considering this afternoon.

In the closing days of the previous session, during the discussion of the health estimates, I inquired of the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to the research being carried out in Canada at the present time. He replied that it was being carried on by universities, hospitals, institutes, "and the like", with assistance from the national research council. This is far from an ideal situation, as it is only by advancing our knowledge that effective or preventive treatment can be accomplished.

Let us consider the disease of cancer. Cancer kills one in every eight people in Canada. In view of this serious situation, Ontario is at present carrying on a campaign for subscriptions to the Ontario cancer fund, to be used for the purpose of dealing with this dread disease. In Canada the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund, raised in 1935, amounted to $500,000. From 1937 to 1940, $14,000 was paid out of that fund each year to the cancer committee of the Canadian Medical Association. In 1940 it was agreed that half of the grant should be paid to the association. In 1942 the grant to the association was reduced to $7,000. I would like to point out that this is a cancer fund raised by the citizens, and not money voted by the government for cancer research or treatment. It was, however, pointed out by the minister that cancer research is being carried on in England and the United States, and that if we were to do anything effective "we would have to do it on a large scale as we do not wish to duplicate the work being done in other countries." It would seem from this reply that our attitude in Canada is to wait and follow the results of research in other countries. This suggests the question, do we wait, in Canada, until a cure has been discovered? It would seem to be the attitude of the department, in spite of the fact that this disease is responsible for the death of one in every eight people in Canada. Everyone is acquainted with the long course of the disease and the terrible suffering it causes.

I have had pathetic requests from all over Canada for research in respect to arthritis. Almost every member has had such requests, though possibly I got more than my share. It is a disease of long duration; it has been called Canada's No. 1 crippler. The cause is not known. No accurate records are available, but the number of sufferers from this disease is estimated at from 100,000 to 400,000, and it accounts for a greater number of days lost than from any other chronic ailment except nervous and mental diseases. Sir Kingsley Wood, British Minister of Health, says, "Rheumatism among insured males is responsible for 16 per cent of the total sickness and disablement." In Canada there is only one hospital equipped for specialized treatment of arthritis, and they accept only seventy-five paying patients. Millions of dollars are spent annually by patients for treatment, but it continues to cripple and deform, and those afflicted suffer untold agonies. Apart from the loss to the industrial life of the nation, the outlook for those afflicted is dark, suffering as they do from a disease without any known cause or effective treatment. Under present conditions there is as yet no ray of hope to brighten their lives. No work is being done by the national research council regarding this disease.

The seventh cause of death for all ages in Canada is tuberculosis. It is the first cause of death for the age group 15 to 45. Thirty thousand Canadians died of tuberculosis in the years 1939 to 1943. Saskatchewan has carried out a campaign to control this disease within the province for many years. Ontario has a very active campaign at the present time, and mass X-rays of the population are being conducted. Not only is there a very high mortality rate, but owing to the fact that it is so easily transmitted from an infected to a healthy person, every means should be taken to arrest the disease. The high death rate in Canada calls for investigation and research.

Last fall I asked the minister certain questions regarding maternal and infant mortality. There is no research being carried on; it is largely confined to educational programmes. The high infant mortality rates in Canada are much higher per one thousand live births than in England, United States, Australia or New Zealand. In a young and growing nation such as ours we cannot afford to lose such a high percentage of our future citizens. As regards maternal mortality, our rates are comparable to Australia, slightly below the United States, but not as good as New Zealand, England and Wales. These facts would indicate that we are remiss in our duty if further investigation is not made into the cause of these high mortality rates.

According to the statement made by the minister last December, research in Canada is carried on in institutions such as the Banting institute, Toronto; the Connaught laboratories, Toronto; McGill university, and other hospitals and laboratories. He also stated at the last session that research at present is not a function of the federal government, and not very much function of the provincial governments. It may therefore be called nobody's child at the present time.

Let us take, for example, one institution, which I had occasion to visit a week or so ago. I became interested in the marvellous work being carried on in this hospital, the neurological institute of Montreal. Patients are admitted for neurosurgery from all over Canada, and in fact all over the world. They had patients from Palestine, from Arabia, from every country of the world. The outstanding results in neurosurgery obtained during the last war are largely the result of the research carried on by Doctors Cone and Penfield; and not only does this institution do its own work, but it trains young surgeons in neurosurgery. After three of four years' training these young surgeons go out all over Canada, in fact all over the world, to carry on this work. It is one of the finest institutions of its kind; yet it has been starved financially. It would be a dire calamity if this institution were forced to close its doors and the research should have to be discontinued for lack of funds. It has done much for the cause of humanity.

It is true that the demand for research will entail the expenditure of money. But we might very well curtail expenditures in other matters, as there is no problem we face which is more important than the health of the people.

One Sunday in February I listened with much pleasure to a radio address of the minister, in the course of which the minister said—this is as close as I could get to it:

> One measure of a nation's greatness is the efficiency with which it cuts disease and death rates. We have been satisfied too long with the provision of hospitals for the care of those who should not be ill and the provision of charities for those who should not be poor.

I fully agree with the minister's statement, but I should like to point out to him that in Canada we are doing very little to eliminate the diseases responsible for the highest percentages in our death rates. The suffering of those afflicted by a disease such as cancer should in itself be sufficient to stimulate more concentrated research for knowledge of causes and cures.

The standard of our Canadian universities rates very high among educational institutions in the world. Our medical colleges and the science faculties of our universities are graduating many students who are anxious to carry on research and are capable of doing it. It is an unfortunate fact that on graduation many of them are forced to leave this country and become citizens of the United States where there is a broader field and more lucrative positions are available so far as scientific investigation is concerned.

Mr. KNIGHT: When the committee rose last night we were discussing the formation of a standing committee on public health and welfare. If I remember rightly, the hon. member for Eglinton included the subject of social security.

Mr. FLEMING: And housing.

Mr. KNIGHT: Public health and welfare and social security are matters which surely deserve the attention of any Canadian citizen. Certainly they are of sufficient importance to engage the attention of a standing committee of this house. There is in this country an aroused social consciousness in regard to public health, as evidenced by the success of and the interest taken in campaigns against venereal disease and cancer.

In the province from which I come, Saskatchewan, as my colleague the hon. member for Mackenzie has pointed out, much attention is being paid to these things at the present time. The government of that province has been criticized for the heavy expenditures on matters of health; but so far as I am concerned I am proud that four times as much has been allotted in the current budget for expenditures of the department of health as was allotted by any former administration. The opportunity, and I may say the need, for welfare work has been enormously increased in Canada by the recent war. I myself have been for some years connected with family welfare work, and I am amazed at the number of problems which arise in connection with returned service personnel. Wars always increase there maladjustments and produce the emotional upheavals which cause social disease. While I am on the subject may I point out that there is a great dearth of trained family welfare and social workers, and agencies have been compelled to carry on understaffed and without benefit of persons properly trained.

Social security has a distinct bearing upon public health and welfare. There is a lot of truth in the statement that social security would spell the doom of a great many of our social diseases. It is my opinion that the time which hon. members of this house might devote to the study of this subject in committee would be time well spent.

I should like to draw the attention of this committee to two or three things which I think should be studied by such a committee. I believe these matters have already been drawn to the attention of the government by the Canadian Welfare council. On their behalf, as well as on my own, I should like to put some of them on record.

First, a national council in the welfare field might well be set up to compare with the present Dominion council of health. Such a council might synchronize and correlate the work of the various provinces. Of this there is much need. A national point of view would increase the general standard, and progressive action in one province, of which we have some examples already, would stimulate the action of other provinces along social service lines.

The second point is the confusion of residence—and I am thinking in regard to family welfare work in particular—in respect of eligibility for municipal assistance. When a person moves from one municipality to another he loses his right to assistance. He is nobody's child and so becomes a problem. I have in mind a case which was drawn to my attention last winter. A woman and her three children were living in a shack, and the only thing they had on which to live was the children's allowance which they were receiving from the government. The reason was that her husband, who previously had been a very good farmer, refused to cooperate in any war work; therefore he had been spending a period of three years in gaol or in work camps. This woman, unable to cope with the problems which she had on the farm—unable, for instance, to pull water out of a deep well for the cattle—moved into the city of Saskatoon. When her resources were depleted she became dependent upon the allowances of her children. It is an actual fact that nobody had any responsibility for her. The city, of course, had no responsibility, because she had not been long enough in residence. The province said they could not do anything for her unless she were to move back to the municipality whence she had come, and the municipality whence she had come said exactly the same thing. But the woman had not a dollar; she could not move anywhere, and if she did go back there she would have nowhere to live and nothing to eat.

In the same connection I might mention the case of a person taking temporary employment somewhere else, in a different town or province. What we appear to need is a channel cutting through which will enable people to move to different parts of the country in pursuit of their livelihood without jeopardizing their right to the social assistance they would have received in their former place of residence if such had become necessary.

Another matter is the consideration of methods of preventing people from escaping responsibility to their dependents by moving from their accustomed domicile. It is a problem with which we have had to deal in connection with some returned men. I was glad to see that the government of Saskatchewan passed a bill enforcing in Saskatchewan maintenance orders made in England, Northern Ireland and all His Majesty's dominions. There was need for such legislation.

Another matter with which I think the committee might well deal is the giving of encouragement to young people who wish to join the nursing profession or to take up family welfare work. I think perhaps the government missed certain opportunities when they released so many girls from the armed services following the end of the war, girls who would have made excellent material for such work because they had undertaken certain basic training.

So, sir, for the reasons I have stated, I wish to go on record as being heartily in support of the formation of a special committee of this house to study the subject.

Mr. CHURCH: As one who probably has had a longer connection with public health than any other hon. member at present in the house, I wish to point out that only $11,000,000 has been spent by the government on public health. For the rest we depend upon statutory provisions—$285,000,000 for the baby bonus, and so on. The first duty of the government is to look after the health, happiness and prosperity of its people. We have a government to-day that is spending $11,000,000, but all it contributes to the health of the people would not amount to a snap of the fingers. This great public spending department has its members travelling all over the world. While the minister is occupying himself at the economic conference, according to this morning's Globe his deputy is away off in Chicago making speeches. It requires more than speeches to make a health department.

This whole matter of health has been left to whom? To the municipalities. The federal government used to have a mere skeleton department, spending about half a million dollars a year. They have some good men in the department; I am not criticizing the permanent officers. They have a very good deputy; I have known him a long time, and I can speak of him in very high terms. They tell me that last fall he said, "There ain't no Santa Claus." Of course there ain't no Santa Claus in public health; the municipalities play Santa Claus, and don't you forget it. Years ago in Toronto we had a good health officer. Later he was succeeded by a health department, at the head of which we placed one of the greatest physicians on this continent, the late Doctor Hastings. The province simply had a skeleton health department; the federal government had a skeleton health department, and all it did was advise. But the federal authorities bring the people into the country and dump them all over, making them direct charges on the municipalities in regard to public health.

What does public health consist of? It has many branches. Let me just refer to a modern health department. In the city of Toronto they have had to supply pure water, see that sewage is properly disposed of, supervise transportation services and do many other things not only for the city of Toronto and half the county of York but also for part of the county of Peel and the county of Ontario. According to the Toronto municipal handbook for 1945, the divisions of medical services and public health nursing discharge their functions through eight district offices, each under the joint direction of a district medical officer and district superintendent of nurses. These offices are located all over the city, and on the borders of the city as well. This booklet states:

> Toronto continues to enjoy a satisfactory standard of health as revealed by the 1944 statistics and this is due, in no small measure, to the constant vigilance of all branches of public health control. Safeguarding the water, milk and food supply, supervision of the environmental sanitation, active control of communicable diseases, home visiting and the conduct of health clinics, vaccination against smallpox, and immunization against diphtheria and whooping cough, all these and many other services have resulted in better health for Toronto's citizens.

And I can tell you they have had to do all that without any federal or provincial assistance. It is a heavy burden on real estate and on the taxpayer to give these services, not only as far as the city is concerned but for the townships all around the city. When the water supply was not what it should have been, we used to have many cases of typhoid fever and diphtheria. Now you can almost count them on your fingers—as a result of what? As a result of the municipality spending money on the services I have named. The booklet continues:

> The general mortality rate for 1944 was 12·1 per 1,000 population and is an improvement of 2·4 per cent over the 1943 rate. A study of the main factors underlying the general death rate again reveals that over two-thirds of the total number of deaths are attributed to diseases of the heart, arteries, kidneys . . . cancer and diabetes. Going hand in hand with this concentration of deaths due to diseases commonly associated with later adult life, the average age of death has advanced from thirty-nine years to slightly over sixty years during the past quarter of a century.
> An outstanding feature, particularly in wartime, was the decrease in both cases and death rate from tuberculosis. The benefits that have resulted from the constant efforts of public health authorities are reflected in the mortality rate of 31·3 per 100,000 population, the third lowest rate in the history of the city. Cases declined for the first time since 1939, and when we realize that 13 per cent of all reported cases were discovered by means of mass surveys in large industrial, commercial and other organized agencies, the value of such service is well demonstrated.

I should like to read just one or two paragraphs further:

A perusal of the incidence of diseases in the acute communicable group reveals that control was well maintained, with twenty fatalities being reported for the group as a whole. Of special interest is the all-time low mark of only eight cases and no deaths reported from typhoid fever.

No doubt that was due to the provision of pure water, constant inspection and many other factors. I have heard of municipalities where there have been very many cases of typhoid fever in a single year, so you can see what a modern health department has to do, with no federal aid at all and practically no provincial aid. As I said, this is a direct burden on real estate and on industrial workers, especially when these services must be extended to surrounding townships which are unable to pay for them. I quote further:

Also free from fatalities were measles, mumps, encephalitis lethargica, German measles and smallpox. The record of twenty cases and four deaths from diphtheria was disappointing in view of the absence of deaths and only sixteen cases reported last year.

The improved birth rate, evident during the last few years, continued on the same high trend and the rate of 21·9 per 1,000 population was recorded. Non-resident mothers, recognizing the value of Toronto's excellent hospital facilities, accounted for over 30 per cent of all births and this percentage has been increasing steadily during the past decade as shown by the fact that in 1934 it was only 14 per cent.

Further progress also is noted in the field of infant welfare, and deaths of infants under one year of age have decreased to a new minimum rate of 36·4 per 1,000 living births. Toronto has been fortunate in establishing a new low record for eight consecutive years and this attests to the value of the services directed towards saving the lives of infants.

Despite the increased number of confinements during the past few years deaths associated with childbirth have been on an excellent level with a rate of 2·6 per 1,000 live births in 1944. The importance of early pre-natal care and supervision so emphasized by all the health agencies has undoubtedly proven a factor in the lowering of maternal mortality. This is a significant reduction when compared with the average rate of 5·8 which prevailed during the ten years immediately preceding the war.

To have attained this degree of success in the promotion and conservation of health the assistance of many individuals and organizations has been required, and due appreciation is accorded by the department of public health to all participating, private physicians, hospitals and staffs, health and welfare agencies, and to the citizens of Toronto for their cooperation.

So much for that. This government is spending a little over $11,000,000 on health and welfare, while at the same time it is spending billions of dollars on other things. The services provided by this department do not amount to a snap of the fingers to the civilian population and the municipalities of this country. Under this department provision is made for food and drugs, opium and narcotic drugs, leprosy, immigration inspection, child and maternal hygiene, public health engineering, treatment of sick mariners, civil service health, nutrition service, tuberculosis control and so on. Only $32,000 for tuberculosis control; just fancy that! Then there are grants to institutions assisting sailors, medical services for Indians and Eskimos, grants to hospitals, and so on.

Practically no money is being spent on public health, whether in the city or town or on the farm. Is anything being done about housing, rural, urban and suburban? Very little that I know of. We have had a survey made which shows that 7,000 wartime houses are needed now in Toronto for soldiers. We are asking for 1,000, but I doubt if we shall get any. Our soldiers are coming home. Many others are coming to Toronto who do not belong to Toronto; they have relatives there and they have come to stay.

If we are to have a health department, let us have an up-to-date department, not a mere skeleton of a department. That is all it is. This department seems to be more interested in the health of the United States. Some of the officials are going off to Chicago while others are heading for New York, Philadelphia and other points in the United States. Dear knows what the travelling expenses will amount to.

The government should come to the assistance of the municipalities. We would be in a bad position if it were not for the work done by our public institutions, our hospitals, our homes for the aged and infirm and all that sort of thing. The government contributes very little toward this work. A year or two ago I asked some questions about what the government was doing to secure nurses and domestic services for the homes of soldiers and civilians, and I found that little or nothing was being done. Nobody can find out about it. Just try to get a room in a hospital. No one would be able to get in were it not for the work done by the municipalities and various public hospitals and charities.

I think money should be given to the larger municipalities direct to help them in carrying on this work. I remember the time when Doctor Hastings' inspectors had to go out as far as sixty miles to inspect milk and food. The restaurants and other places were cleaned up and inspected; water and sewers and housing and food and milk and all that kind of thing were taken care of. This dominion department of health is the most talkative health department I know of in the world, through radio, films and advertisements. What are we going to do about it?

Another matter relates to the schools for our rising generations. I remember when we had to carry on a long fight supported by the Toronto Telegram, to have medical inspection in the public and separate schools of our city, and the health department had to provide nurses to visit the homes and the people. This was a most commendable work, but the whole cost was placed on the taxpayers. I believe the department has done some good work but I submit the time has come when there should be more actual direct aid by bonus or subsidy in this connection.

The government is spending billions of dollars to-day, but in the days of Sir Charles Tupper, in 1896, the Conservative government was able to run the country on $36,000,000. Our population has not gone up more than a couple of million since that time. Before the war we got on with about $400 million for civil government, but now the cost of government has gone up by geometrical and arithmetical progression. There are many things we are going to need. If we are going to have a health department, let us have a health department, not some kind of a skeleton health department where they just make speeches and travel all over the civilized world. Let us have an up-to-date health department that will provide hospitals and other relief for our sick, for our mothers and infants, for the whole of our population. Let us have a real national health scheme, not a skeleton scheme that gets nowhere and does nothing.

Take cancer and many other diseases which affect the human race. What is being done in Ottawa about them? They are doing a lot of talking but when you get down to brass tacks you find that the universities and hospitals have had to do most of the work. Public health is too big a quetsion to be mixed up in politics. If this department is kept in politics there will be very little done.

I hope something will be done to provide more hospital accommodation and to help the municipalities in the work they are doing and relieve the heavy burden upon the taxpayers. I have been speaking only of our own health department, but I think I can speak for the health departments in the surrounding municipalities. They are similarly situated and are doing grand work. The health officers of our cities work very hard for very small remuneration. I do think that at a time when we are spending so much in making hand-outs for breakwaters and all that kind of thing we should have a little pin money to hand back to the taxpayers who are paying the cost of all this. Something should be done to provide more nurses in Canada by releasing them from the services, which would not suffer any now. What are we doing with 20,000 of the forces in Germany? The United States is going to quit; and when the appropriate vote comes up I can give eight or ten reasons why we should reduce it and let a lot of these nurses come home.

I am very much surprised that we are voting $11,000,000 for national health and welfare in addition to the $285,000,000 baby bonus authorized by statute. I am not objecting to this if the money is properly distributed, but I know some well-to-do people who are getting the children's allowance, yet the old age pensioner gets pin money only and has to pass a means test.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the committee to say a few things about health policy in general, and more particularly to make a plea on behalf of the more than 400,000 Canadians who are afflicted with the crippling disease of arthritis. Some weeks ago I placed on the order paper a resolution which I hoped would be discussed, and I had hoped too that there would be a full-dress debate on this whole question of arthritis, because I feel that now is the time to begin to focus the attention of the public on this terrible disease and the widespread suffering it has been causing for some years.

During the past twenty years public attention has been centred on ways and means of combating such terrible killer diseases as tuberculosis and cancer. Public health bodies, medical men and governments over the Dominion of Canada have publicized their efforts and have combined their efforts so well that at the end of twenty years we now see that most excellent results have been attained through their efforts. To-day if tuberculosis and cancer are taken in time a cure can be found for them. This has been the result of the intensive efforts that have been made to deal with these diseases, and also the fact that public opinion has been aroused and demands that something be done.

But while our efforts have been directed towards combating the killer diseases, I am afraid we have neglected diseases such as acute rheumatism, and especially arthritis, which have afflicted and crippled about 600,000 people altogether in Canada. The hon. member for Lanark spoke about arthritis, and I appreciate what he said, but I should like to repeat this much. So far we have found no means of treatment; we have not even determined as yet the cause of arthritis. That ought to be enough, it seems to me, to spur us on to intensified effort. I am sure that much can be done in the next few years to alleviate the sufferings of arthritics if public health bodies and medical men will concentrate public attention on this disease. The only real attempt in Canada to give follow-up treatment and bring relief to arthritis sufferers has been made at Banff, Alberta, and even that has been entirely inadequate to meet the needs of the people.

As a matter of general policy it seems to me that the governments in Canada should concentrate first upon diseases which require long and costly treatment; those for which so far there has been found no cause, those which require intensive and careful investigation to find the cause, especially those which are proving such a scourge among the Canadian people. The reason I say that is this. Diseases like poliomyelitis, cancer, tuberculosis and arthritis can, because of their long and costly treatment, impoverish families. I have seen such impoverishment. We saw poliomyelitis, for example, strike in a family in Alberta during the height of the scourge that we had just a few years ago, and attack perhaps one or two of its members, and the family itself through the long and costly treatment required lost its entire property. This is a matter of grave concern, and it is time that the federal government stepped in and gave some assistance to prevent such impoverishment. That is why in Alberta we did start out several years ago by assisting in the treatment of tuberculosis, poliomyelitis—or infantile paralysis, as it is more commonly known—and cancer, through providing free government treatment and hospitalization as well as after-treatment and care for the sufferers from these diseases. We did this chiefly because we felt that no family should be allowed to be deprived of home and property and become impoverished by the long and costly treatment required to bring about a cure of these diseases. The result so far has been very good. Not only that; by focusing the attention of medical men and public health societies and organizations upon these diseases we have begun to find cures and the most effective treatments, which to-day are being extended free to the people of Alberta.

Now, it seems to me, is the time to extend our operations and to take in the field of arthritis. A substantial sum of money ought to be set aside by the government of Canada for that purpose, to be placed at the disposal of trained investigators, technicians and research workers who would combine their efforts with those of the research council in one all-out attempt to find the reason for arthritis which creeps upon and cripples people as it does, and to find a cure for it as quickly as possible. I do not mean the expenditure of just ten or fifteen thousand dollars. It seems to me that hundreds of thousands of dollars should be spent for this purpose, and this is the government that should do it. When the cure has been found, or the most successful treatment ascertained, the provincial governments through their own health departments can apply the cure or treatment successfully, and, I am sure, relieve the suffering of many hundreds of thousands in Canada. I would urge upon the government, and upon the minister particularly, that he see to it that a substantial amount of money be set aside this year, and that work be initiated at the earliest possible moment on this dread disease arthritis.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I rise principally to ask the minister, when he makes a statement on arthritis, to make it as complete as possible, and, if he will and if he can, to let us know something about the hospital to which the hon. member for Peace River referred, the one at Banff, which to my own knowledge has effected some amazing cures. To help him with his research I am going to give him an experience of my own; I have some excellent information for him. I have received 102 letters on this subject of arthritis; in fact there were so many coming in that I dictated a form, which I will read to the committee:

I have your letter respecting arthritis.

For the additional reason that I am suffering from it myself, you may rest assured that I will do all I can.

At the same time I was receiving, as we all did, hundreds of postcards on the subject of everybody being retired, women at the age of fifty-five and men at the age of sixty, at $60 a month. Being my own secretary, and not being very efficient, I got some of my arthritis letters in envelopes addressed to people who wanted $60 a month, and I will now read a reply I received yesterday, and in which the minister will find, I am sure, the cure for arthritis:

Dear sir:

After receiving your letter of 18th April, 1946, I have carefully scanned the card which I mailed (copy enclosed) to you, and to date I have been unable to find any reference to arthritis, so am wondering if you are trying to have some fun at the old lady's expense or if your stenographer mixed letters.

Since I have never had arthritis I cannot speak from experience but I have always heard that if you were thoroughly stung by bees it would cure the disease, so why not hunt a good apiary and stir up the tenants of two or three lively swarms of bees and of course you will then get stung and be able to speak from experience as to whether the rumoured cure is a success or not, and I wonder if you would be stung any worse at that, than the people of Canada have been in electing some of the present members of the house of parliament, of course present company is always excepted.

I am enclosing the second chapter of our serial which is being issued by card.

Now, having become an authority, I should be glad to join in the research work. I will not undergo the test myself.

But, seriously, would the minister mind, when he does make his statement, if he and the department have knowledge of what is being accomplished at the seventy-five bed institution in Banff referred to a moment ago, where excellent work has been done in affording relief to friends of mine.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): When the estimates of this department were before us last session, the minister concerned, if my memory serves me correctly, received more bouquets and verbal compliments than all the rest of the ministers combined. I am not at all afraid of these compliments having gone to his head, but I do hope that they went to his heart, because if there is one department of government more than any other which needs a heart it is the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I have long believed that the health of the people should constitute a first charge on any government, and I should like to say a word or two in support of what has been said by the hon. members for Lanark and Peace River with regard to the need of those who suffer from arthritis.

I am sure that the prevalence of arthritis in Canada to-day has not been recognized either by the public or by the government as it should have been. It is a most serious disease, and one which makes an appalling drain on the efficiency and well-being of our people. There may be those who, reading these debates, will say that we have a medical profession and it is their business to look after this kind of thing. I am prepared to pay the highest form of tribute to the men and women of the medical profession, but I am sure that there is a task here which is beyond the abilities of our medical practitioners of to-day; I believe it is a problem which requires research and definite legislative action now. Up to the present time our health programme and proposals have been incomplete in not having recognized the need to deal with this disease which is so prevalent among our people.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

A little while ago the hon. member for Lanark said that we might have in Canada from 100,000 to 400,000 suffering from this disease. Those who have made a close and detailed study of it, people who are chiefly concerned about it, tell us that there are at least 690,000 cases of arthritis in Canada, all of them calling for relief. Here I would like to point out that there are twice as many sufferers from arthritis as there are from heart disease, ten times as many as those who suffer from tuberculosis, and seven times as many as those who suffer from cancer. On Friday, September 14, 1945, the late Harry Leader, then member for Portage la Prairie, made an impassioned appeal in this house on behalf of those who suffer from the dread disease of cancer. I for one heartily concur in the appeal which he made; but, as I have already said, there are seven times as many arthritis patients as there are sufferers from cancer. Many of these, we hope, will be eventually cured, for it is admitted that early diagnosis and proper treatment will avoid crippling and in most cases effect a cure. Even where the case is well advanced and treatment obtained late in the progress of the disease great benefit is still possible. I have had personal experience of this. At the moment I am thinking of a lady in my constituency who spent several years in bed, a helpless cripple. We were able to get her to the Banff Hot Springs hospital under the care of a splendid physician, with the result that after many months of careful theatment she returned to her home and her family, not cured one hundred per cent but certainly greatly benefited and able to walk. In other words, as a result of the rest and the treatment she receeived she is now enjoying a new lease on life. Before I left for Ottawa she begged me with tears in her eyes to make an appeal on behalf of those in Canada who suffer from arthritis as she has done.

I understand that in Sweden something worth while has been done along the lines for which I am appealing; for Sweden has no less than nine hospitals, each containing sixty beds—that is, 540 beds exclusively devoted to the treatment of arthritis. Naturally we are interested in what has been accomplished thereby. Reports reveal that sixty per cent of the patients three years after leaving the hospitals have returned to and are actively engaged in their former occupations, and the condition of another eighteen per cent is so improved that they need no further treatment.

Against this splendid showing of Sweden what is the picture in Canada? Here, as has already been stated, we have one hospital containing about seventy-five beds which are set apart for arthritics, but let it be clearly noted that these are for paying patients exclusively. Then where do the poor and the needy come in? Well, they don't come in at all; they just stay outside and continue to suffer until death brings relief to them. During the war years this country suffered great shortages of labour owing to war needs, and drastic legislation was introduced to remove various bottlenecks; yet all the time this particular disease and others continued to remove workers from their place in industry.

In order to strengthen my appeal I should like to read an item from the press relating to this matter. The following appeared in the Nanaimo Free Press of Friday, July 27, 1945:

A number of local people, many of whom have been victims of arthritis, are banding together in order that suitable representations may be made at the August 6 dominion-provincial conference at Ottawa regarding the growing need for combative measures in new legislation. They urge that this disease, termed "Canada's No. 1 crippler," should receive No. 1 priority rating on the conference agenda. The present means of battling arthritis are said to be wholly inadequate, with the result that its menace to public health increases at an alarming rate. It is a disease which causes great suffering, deformity and eventual incapacity, doing incalculable damage and causing immeasurable loss to the economic, social and domestic welfare of Canadians. Statements are to the effect that Canada now has 600,000 persons afflicted by this dread disease. Medical practitioners do an heroic best to offset its activity, but are handicapped by lack of suitable hospitals and equipment. Authorities now concur that in a majority of cases hospitalization is essential, including specialized treatments. Day to day observation and corrections are said to curb progress materially. Canada has but one hospital where such treatment is at present available. It is the mineral springs hospital at Banff and of this hospital Doctor Lowenstein of New York, arthritis specialist, recently said in an interview:

"The work that is being done in this hospital in combatting arthritis rates among the best on the continent and merits a new and better building with the very best of facilities. The combination of treatments used here is exceptional, and the results are excellent."

It is being urged that some provision be made in the national health bill for similar hospitals to be made available in every province.

We take pardonable pride in our national war effort. We recognized the tremendous forces that were arrayed against us, and we marshalled our forces against the threat to our way of life. We spared neither time nor effort nor money to achieve victory on land, on the sea and in the air, yes, and on the home front. We addressed ourselves to the task that was before us and, by the grace of God, we won. To-day I am asking that we recognize the fact that in Canada we have other enemies to fight and other victories to win. The battle against arthritis will challenge our mettle, and here I would suggest some definite lines of action: First, that the national health bill should make provision for treatment of arthritis through special grants to the provinces for the erection of adequately equipped hospitals; second, that such hospitals be made available at Canada's famous mineral springs hospital, the mineral waters of which are invaluable in the treatment of arthritis; and third, that where suitable existing military hospitals are to be found, with their furnishings and equipment, those in each province should be allocated to the care of chronic rheumatism. I suggest this for the consideration of the minister, in the hope that something will be done for this very needy class of our citizens.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Those who have spoken previously have given a clear outline of the conditions that need rectifying. I recall that in the last parliament the then member for Swift Current, Mr. Graham, gave us an excellent account of the work which was done at Banff Springs hospital in connection with the cure for arthritis, and he spoke with reference to the treatment of members of his own family. At that time the minister stated that they were giving every consideration to this problem. I am sure that the members of this committee will be extremely disappointed if the minister gets up and makes what I was going to call the old routine statement that the department is giving the matter consideration, because that was over two years ago. Surely the department, having listened to the former member for Swift Current and to other members of this house relating certain experiences—we have had one to-day from the hon. member who has just taken his seat—will propose something concrete. It is not sufficient to say, after two years of warning from members on all sides of the house, that we are still investigating the subject. The country at large demands something more than that. The people demand action, because in the final analysis the disease takes a greater toll than the war itself and it is something that should be considered most carefully. I hope that in the time at his disposal the minister will make a definite statement to the house assuring us that the department is making progress, and will indicate the extent of that progress, so that the people throughout the country will receive some encouragement, especially those suffering from this terrible disease of arthritis.

Mr. McKAY: I wish to make several observations with regard to one of the great scourges of mankind. It is tragic indeed that man will rally against the menace of war but will largely ignore his greatest, most elusive and most unrelenting enemy, cancer. More than 65,000 Canadians died of cancer during the five years of the war. There were somewhat less than 40,000 fatal casualties as a direct result of enemy action. War is always a terrible tragedy when a nation loses its youth in conflict. I suggest however that Canadians are fighting a war every day against cancer; so far it has been a losing battle, and our casualties are increasing from year to year. But I believe that we can win that war if we go about it seriously in an all-out struggle to destroy this terrible menace.

Millions are spent in Canada on tobacco, liquor and the luxuries of life where only hundreds are spent to fight cancer, something much more deadly than the bullets of either the Hun or the Jap. There is still a long road to travel before our cancer research laboratories are adequately equipped to widen the field of human knowledge in regard to this dreadful disease. There is a lack of free cancer clinics, except in Saskatchewan, where one of two clinics handled five thousand cases for free diagnosis and treatment last year. Next to the diseases of the heart and arteries cancer kills more Canadians than any other malady. It is the No. 2 killer of men and women in Canada. According to the Canada Year Book 13,417 people died of this dread disease in 1941. By 1943 the number of deaths had increased to 14,135 persons. Whether this increase is due to a more accurate diagnosis of the disease or not is difficult to ascertain; but the fact remains that more Canadians died of cancer in 1943 than in 1941. Authorities state that in six persons over the age of forty one dies of this disease.

An examination of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare shows and appropriation for tuberculosis control but none for cancer control, despite the fact that there are less than one-half as many deaths form tuberculosis as from cancer. There should be a vigorous educational campaign to inform the general public about this disease. Knowledge is a powerful weapon in the fight to control any disease. It is a primary step. Generations of victims have either had the true nature of their illness concealed from them or have concealed it from their own families. Its appearance was thought to be a death warrant.

To-day enough is known by scientists about cancer to assure us that many lives can be saved by proper diagnosis and early treatment. It remains only for this information to be made available to the public so that the dangerous curtain of rumour, the half-truths and erroneous information can be torn aside.

[Mr. McKay.]

Last month was set apart as a cancer month by the Canadian cancer society. This is a most commendable move. The purpose in doing this was to stimulate research, treatment and education in the field of cancer. The public appears woefully ignorant of certain facts about this disease. According to a poll conducted by the Canadian institute of public opinion more than one-half of our adult population believe cancer is incurable, or do not know whether it can be cured or not. Medical authorities have long insisted that the disease can be cured in the great majority of cases if treated in the early stages. About one-third of our population still believes cancer to be a contagious disease despite the fact that surgeons agree it is not. Most amazing of all, the survey conducted by this institute revealed that two-thirds of our adult population do not know any of the early symptoms of this disease. It seems to me that this is sufficient proof of the great need of a widespread educational programme.

I would suggest that as a supplement to the cancer month campaign just concluded, the Department of National Health and Welfare should conduct the most vigorous educational campaign to inform the public about cancer every day of the year by utilizing the facilities of the radio, the motion picture theatres, our schools and the press. This country must do all in its power to save from the clutches of this disease many people who through lack of knowledge of its early symptoms are doomed to a life of misery which all too often ends in horrible death.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before proceeding with what I was about to say I think I should say a word or two for the sake of the C.C.F. representatives from Saskatchewan. The hon. member who just took his seat recklessly remarked that there was a scarcity of cancer clinics in all the provinces but Saskatchewan. May I submit to him that he knows Saskatchewan, but he does not know the other provinces half so well; and if he will just talk for Saskatchewan and let those from the other provinces talk for their provinces I believe he will not misrepresent and mislead the people.

Mr. McKAY: Are there any cancer clinics in Alberta?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are four, and they have had them for four years.

Mr. McKAY: How many did you treat last year?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Every person who has cancer in Alberta can come to a cancer clinic and get free treatment until he is cured or until he dies. You cannot surpass that anywhere. I suggest to the hon. C.C.F. members that they are so enthusiastic over their new government in Saskatchewan that they just do not try to give the rest of us credit for what we do. I just say that in a kindly way. Remember, there were social credit reformers in action in Canada several years before the C.C.F. got in action, and they were really doing things too.

I should like to say that the idea of having a health department in Canada is a good one. We feel glad that the health department has been organized. In our group we are satisfied that the total appropriation has been increased $63,221,407.73 since last year. This all indicates a sound attitude on the part of the dominion with respect to health and welfare in Canada. We recognize that under the British North America Act the responsibility for health services is primarily a provincial responsibility; but let it be borne in mind that this particular type of service is exceedingly costly, and that most of the provinces in Canada are very short of money and are limited in their resources with respect to getting revenue. It may be said that the dominion is likewise. That is not entirely so, because the whole power over financial policy in this country is centred in the Dominion of Canada, and is exercised by that dominion to the utter exclusion of all provinces. If any province undertakes to do anything in the way of progressive financial operations the dominion instantly rushes in and disallows its measures and declares them ultra vires, and all the rest of it. Therefore the dominion must take responsibility; if they will not let any province go ahead then the dominion has to go ahead. That is about all there is to say on that point.

In Alberta we have progressive ideas with respect to finance. We are positive they will work; the dominion is positive they will not work, but we notice that the dominion are very chary about giving them a chance to work. So once more may I say that the dominion simply must find the money where the goods and services are available in the country.

I should like to urge upon the newly established Department of National Health and Welfare in Canada that it do not endeavour to duplicate the work which is being done by the provincial governments. There are two or three departments in Ottawa that seem to look over the whole field of activity, and endeavour to dabble in everything, that which the dominion ought to take care of and that which should be looked after by the provinces. The result is a duplication which brings about waste and also destroys motivation, and has further undesirable consequences. The dominion should supplement the work of the provinces. I am not saying or implying for a moment that this is not the ideal of the present minister. The dominion should take the lead in coordinating the work of the provinces by calling regular conferences of provincial health ministers to decide upon desirable national objectives and the means of attaining them.

The main task of the federal department should be, first of all, to determine how to provide adequate grants in aid to the provinces to enable them to provide health services which they consider advisable. I think it will be found by each successive minister of health in Ottawa that the provinces will have progressive ideas of their own with respect to the kind of health services they desire. The records of Alberta and Saskatchewan already indicate the truth of what I am saying. The dominion does not need to undertake to tell any province what it is desirable to do. What the dominion needs to do is show the provinces how to do those things which they think desirable. Any deficiency on the part of the provinces does not arise from their inability to see what it is good to do, but from their financial inability to do the things they desire.

Another thing the dominion government must do is determine how to raise the Canadian standard of living. It may be argued by the minister that this certainly is not the business of public health departments in this country, but I am not so sure about that. What is the use of telling people the baby needs orange juice when in so large a percentage of cases throughout the dominion the parents are unable even to buy the baby the milk it needs, let alone orange juice. This would seem to indicate that the very first thing necessary is to set up or develop in Canada a system under which all those who are prepared to do their share of service in the dominion may obtain the means with which to discharge their responsibilities to their children as they come along, and to just as many of them as come along. I believe we can safely state that in this country one-third of the total population are in receipt of incomes so low as to render them unable to maintain a standard of living involving the bare necessities of life. In an age in which we have seen such a great development of scientific and mechanical skill; when we have such great power and other resources, that is a serious reflection upon the government which continues in operation in charge of the nation. Canada is no exception. I believe the United States has a record far more blameworthy than that of Canada. But in dealing with this whole situation it is well to remember that there must be something radically wrong in the way the affairs of great nations like Canada and the United States are being managed to-day, or with the system under which they choose to operate, if we are unable to provide a full one-third of the people of our countries with the bare necessities of life. Until we learn how to remedy that problem, governments can expect a great deal of difficulty with regard to ill health.

If they propose to raise the standard of living, provision must be made for fair prices for goods, fair wages, and employment. Once more the minister may say that has nothing to do with his department. Well, if that has nothing to do with the minister's department, then the minister has not the power to deal with the health problem in Canada.

Very soon the question will be raised: where is the money coming from? I do not propose to go into any details with respect to that matter; probably I should be out of order if I did; but long before this debate is over we shall see the minister rise time and again and shall hear him remind us that he has not at his disposal limitless funds, and that he will be unable to do many of the things he would like to do because he simply cannot get the money. Before ever the minister says these things I am going to agree that it will be impossible to get from the people of Canada, by taxation, enough money to do the things that need to be done in order to guarantee the Canadian people a proper standard of health. Yet the money must be found.

I agree entirely with the remarks of the other hon. members who have preceded me, that the first responsibility of a government in a country like Canada is the health and well-being of the people. The people are the greatest natural resource of any country. Let the people be weak; let them be unhappy; let them be unhealthy, and the efficiency of the country is immediately greatly impaired. Our problem ought not to be one of finance in this country; our problem ought to be one of goods and services. For example, if we want to know whether or not we can provide a dentist for every five hundred people in the country, let us say, as was suggested, the only question we need to ask is, are we raising enough young men and young women who are willing to go into our universities and acquire skill as dentists in order to provide a dentist for every five hundred people—if that should be the desirable number? The answer would have to be, yes, unquestionably. It could not be answered otherwise, when we are afraid of unemployment and have experienced unemployment to such an extent as it has been experienced in Canada within the last fifteen years. If it is held desirable that there should be hospitals all over the country in order to care for people who are unfortunate, the only question we ought to ask ourselves is, can we get the lumber, the bricks and all the other things which are necessary to build enough hospitals? Can we manufacture the instruments required to perform the operations which will be necessary? Again the answer undoubtedly must be, yes, we can. Then these requisites which enter into the providing of a suitable standard of health for the country certainly are physically possible. If then, there is anything wrong, unquestionably it must be in the matter of finance.

Let the minister weigh that with great care. The other day, just as I was going out of the chamber he made a remark—of course not just because I was going out—about letting our money go to pot, or something of that sort. In making a remark of that kind the minister did not indicate the kind of vision a man of his age, in a responsible position such as he holds, should have, because he was entirely overlooking the physical possibilities of this country, its resources in manpower and materials. He was overlooking the fact that where the resources of a country in man-power and materials are such as to render it possible to provide a given standard of living in that country, then it ought to be able to have that standard of living; and if the financial system will not enable the country to have that standard of living something must be done with the financial system. Otherwise it will automatically "go to pot." I do not wish to emphasize this over much, but we might as well have the cards laid on the table at the beginning of this debate, because before we are through there will be plenty of talk about money. Practically every person who rises in his place is going to demand or ask for some special kind of service which will cost money.

I suggest that the minister should not spend any of his time in the house bewailing the failure of the dominion-provincial conference. It seems there was a carefully laid out plan some months before the dominion-provincial conference took place to tell the country that if these provinces would only come together and humbly consent to allow the dominion government to have all the power it wanted, to take away from the provinces anything it wanted to take away, then thus and so would be possible; but if the said provinces should not be cooperative in this respect, then all these fine dreams would be impossible of realization. I say, Mr. Chairman, that was not a very healthy thing to do. Since the dominion-provincial conference met we have noticed a tendency on the part of ministers to get up and whine about it, to say in effect, oh, we could have done this and this and this if the provinces had only consented to let us destroy the British North America Act, or take away their taxing powers, or do this, that and the other that the dominion wanted to do. I suggest that the minister do not do that; I suggest that he do not tell us that the dominion-provincial conference has to succeed in order that he may do the things that he needs to do.

The whole question is whether Canada can produce the goods and services necessary to attain the standard of living we desire. The standard of living we desire in this respect is a high standard of health and welfare. The only answer that can possibly be given is that we can provide the goods and services. Then then only conclusion that can follow is that we can provide the money and are going to provide the money whether the provinces consent to give up their taxing powers or not. That does not enter into the matter.

There is only so much money that can be taxed from the Canadian people. What the dominion gets from the people, the provinces cannot get. The provinces want, need and can use all the revenue that they can raise. It may be that there are certain companies so strong and so dominion-wide in their operations that no province can sufficiently tax them. If that is the difficulty, let the dominion come in behind the provincial taxing power with the power of the dominion. Then it will be found that the company concerned will see fit to obey the provinces. There should be no difficulty in that respect. All the money which the dominion could collect, if the dominion had the power to collect all the money, can certainly be collected by the provinces with the dominion's assistance. That is an aspect of the whole question which, for some strange reason, has never been emphasized in all the discussions entered into by dominion cabinet ministers, from the Prime Minister down.

I would advise the dominion cabinet ministers to forget their schemes for the centralization of power in Canada. Let them cease whining about the naughty provinces that have the wisdom and courage to insist on maintaining their provincial power as given them by the British North America Act. Iet the minister lead out in exploring the possibilities of modifying our financial system. Let him learn how to make our financial system reflect the facts of Canadian production and productive capacity. Let him learn how to make the Canadian financial system distribute the goods and services Canadians are able and willing to produce. Then the minister will find that he can obtain plenty of money to enable Canadians to have the healthful and abundant standard of living which is essential if we are to have a healthy and happy people. He will be able to find plenty of money to provide a system of health services federally supported but provincially and municipally administered, a system of health services that will cure all the curables and rescue all the unfortunate.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, will the minister make a statement regarding rheumatic diseases which have been referred to by many hon. members? I have nothing further to add except to say that ways and means should be adopted across Canada to fight the inroads of these diseases. This matter was dealt with by the British Columbia legislature this spring when a recommendation was brought in by the select standing committee on social welfare and education, which read as follows:

> Arthritis—Your committee recommends that, in view of the serious social and economic problems involved in the increasing incidence of arthritis and other rheumatoid diseases in Canada, the provincial government press the federal government for the establishment of the widest research facilities and the gathering together of all available information from all parts of the world as to the causes, treatment, and prevention of these diseases.
> Further, that the provincial government on its own initiative should take steps to provide more facilities for diagnostic service, to increase facilities in existing hospitals for the more advanced methods of treatment for both indoor and outdoor patients, and the development of rest homes at suitable locations where all sound measures to help arthritis might be applied.

I have no doubt the minister has had this subject in mind for some time, but when he spoke earlier in the session I gathered that he was not convinced that it was necessary to do something at an early date. On page 420 of Hansard of April 1, 1946, hon. members will find reported an oral answer by the minister to some questions asked by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley). The minister pointed out that the associate committee on medical research of the national research council had been unable to do anything with regard to these rheumatic diseases during the war. He then went on to say:

> The committee is, however, prepared to give consideration to applications for assistance in any project that gives promise of adding to knowledge regarding the cause methods of prevention or treatment of arthritis in the same way it does to other medical research projects. No such application is pending at the present time.

In the following paragraph he dealt with the question of grants. Apparently a suggestion had been made that a grant be made to the Canadian rheumatic diseases association, but the minister said that he had been advised by the ministers of health of the different provinces that that association was not in a position to be given a grant at the present time. That may or may not be the case, but the answer the minister gave on April 1 caused me to have some doubt as to whether he realized how much people were concerned about this disease. I think it would be helpful if he would make a statement this afternoon.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Chairman, it is desirable that I say something at this stage on the various subjects which have been raised this afternoon. I am grateful to hon. members for their suggestions and comments and I want to tell them that I share many of the views that have been expressed. One general observation may be made with regard to much of what has been said this afternoon. Under any construction of the British North America Act, if the suggestions for action were carried out it would mean that the federal government would be taking action which ordinarily would be found to come within the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces. At the same time that these suggestions are made we have other suggestions that there should be no duplication of the work done in the provinces. I find that almost every suggestion that has been made would have been met had the health proposals of the dominion and the agreement, of which they formed a part, been accepted and put into operation.

With regard to research, I would ask the committee to consider seriously whether they regard general medical and health research as an ordinary function of the federal government. At the present time we have two laboratories at Ottawa doing research work in connection with virus diseases, immunization and other health problems, including those relating to the Food and Drugs Act, and nutrition, but so far it has not been considered a proper function of the department to undertake fundamental medical research. One reason is that that kind of research is usually best carried on in connection with clinical opportunities which are to be found most frequently in large centres where they have hospitals in association with teaching institutions. That is not invariably the case, but it is so in many instances.

I would point out that the actual number of personnel qualified to do competent research work in Canada is definitely limited. I might call to the attention of the committee an observation made by Surgeon-General Thomas Parran of the United States public health service, when appearing before a committee of the house of representatives in the United States in connection with a bill to provide more money for cancer research. Surgeon-General Parran said that there are not as yet enough properly-trained cancer research workers even to begin the programme that was suggested. That is an important limiting factor on the volume and quality of research work that can be done in any locality at any time. It may be that in order to increase the total volume of research work in Canada we shall have to start further back and to provide fellowships to permit young doctors and technical experts to enter into research work and to train themselves by attendance at research and teaching institutions.

In this connection, too, I would point out that we have had the advantage of discussing the matter with representatives of the ministry of health of Great Britain, and the United States public health service as well as with officers of various foundations engaged in medical and health research. We have had several of those officers here at various times, and we have also entered into discussions with committees of the Canadian medical association and had interviews with many of the leading research workers in Canada, all in an effort to determine the proper field of research activity for the federal government.

Ever since the department was created on the 13th of October, 1944, barely eighteen months ago, this subject has been receiving continuous consideration and it still is receiving continuous consideration. But when you ask for action I must tell you that so far we have not been able to see any way in which action could be taken which would be likely to produce favourable results and which lies within what has so far been regarded as the proper scope of activity of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Since 1938 the national research council has had an associate committee on medical research and it has granted assistance to many people and to many institutions in connection with medical research.

Mr. JOHNSTON: In what particular cases?

Mr. CLAXTON: In a great number of different cases.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Have any been in the special field of arthritis?

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe there have been.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Can the minister tell us what they are?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would have to get that from the research council.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Would the minister try to do that?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, I will try to do it. The national research council has been established by parliament as the principal agency of the federal government to carry on research. My predecessor and I have discussed with the council whether or not that function of the national research council should extend to medical research. We have decided that medical research should be assisted through the national research council rather than through the Department of National Health and Welfare. We came to that conclusion because we felt that it was desirable that practically all support of research by the federal government should be coordinated through one institution. The national research council has done magnificent work in assisting medical research relating to the prosecution of the war, but to a very great degree its assistance to medical research in connection with diseases not associated with the war had to be suspended because of the shortage of doctors and technicians in Canada. The pressure on the available personnel in connection with the war really exhausted all their possibilities of rendering useful service in any other field. But that has now changed, and with the demobilization of men from the armed forces, together with the continued output from the medical schools, it is expected that the medical research division of the national research council will be called on to assist in a very much larger number of research projects of various kinds.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there any liaison between the council and your department?

Mr. CLAXTON: I was just going to say that that does not mean that our department is not interested, because we are definitely interested and we are in continuous consultation with the research council just as it is in consultation with us. The deputy minister of national health and welfare is also a member of the associate medical committee of the research council.

I ask hon. members if that is not the sensible way to do it rather than to try to set up a duplicating institute of research for the federal government. In view of the resources available in Canada, it is our view that the best way to do this job is to assist in programmes of research being carried on in the places which can carry it on and are carrying it on and have the equipment and the trained research workers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You are entirely right.

Mr. CLAXTON: If we are wrong I certainly should like to know it, because then we might have to make some changes.

Mr. KNOWLES: The way is all right, provided that full use is made of it.

Mr. CLAXTON: I wish to say, too, that that is the way it is handled in the United Kingdom. The ministry of health there is a large ministry compared with anything we have in Canada because it renders direct service to the people; they have not a federal constitution. It has very great resources of personnel; it spends very large sums of money, and yet I understand that medical and public health research work is not carried out through the ministry of health but through the medical research council which does not come under the ministry of health but under three committees of the cabinet of which the minister of health is a member, but which report to the president of the council. I have had opportunities of discussing this with Sir Wilson Jameson, chief medical officer of the ministry of health, a distinguished public servant who came out on our invitation to discuss matters with us; also with Mr. Attlee and the president of the council. They have reached this conclusion based on their much longer experience in the field of public health than this department has had.

In the United States research work is carried on by the United States public health service in fields particularly related to public health. We do a certain amount of that work ourselves, either in our department or in other departments of the government. In addition, in the United States the public health service carries on cancer research through the national cancer institute which is located at Washington. I visited it and went all over the building with the director, and if hon. members of this committee could see the kind of equipment that is needed to organize research on cancer I think they would appreciate something of the nature and magnitude of the task before us. Cancer research is also carried on in the United States by a number of teaching special institutions and institutes where large sums of money are spent, just as they are by the imperial research institute in the United Kingdom.

If I might develop the question with regard to cancer research for a moment or two, we know there is a very great deal of work being carried on in the field of cancer research. There is free interchange of experience and knowledge as they accumulate. If we were to start to establish an institute of the kind they have in Washington we would have to develop not only a great plant, which would duplicate the equipment there, but a trained staff which it would take years to gather. Then, if we accelerated our activities, we would be abreast of where the Americans are in this kind of project. That is not the only kind of cancer research.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it not be worth doing, though?

Mr. CLAXTON: We in Canada have great scientists, great doctors, great research workers whose names are known throughout the world. Canada holds second place to no other nation in these fields. Where we can proceed most intelligently is to see that anyone who is reasonably qualified to do research work gets the assistance necessary to enable him to do it, and, in addition, we could give some scholarships or see that scholarships were given in order to increase the number of research workers qualified to work in Canada.

This brings me to the King George silver jubilee cancer fund, to which the hon. member for Lanark referred in his interesting and helpful speech. To that fund, which was raised in 1935, a substantial contribution was made by the federal government. It was set up under a trust deed, and the trustees have full power to spend the money from the fund as they may wish. The hon. member for Lanark referred to what I said last night and gave from my speech last year the expenditures which have been made so far and which have been almost entirely on educational work carried on either by the cancer committee of the Canadian medical association or the Canadian cancer society. In no year has more than $14,000 been spent. The expenditure was made in that way on the advice of the cancer committee of the Canadian medical association, because the trustees could not see how during the war money could be intelligently spent on research in cancer in addition to the money which was available from other sources. But that situation is changing. The trustees have been meeting; we have examined the whole situation, and we have had a number of sessions with representatives of the Canadian cancer society and the cancer committee of the Canadian Medical Association, as well as the others I mentioned earlier. In consequence, not only are we going to give assistance again this year—one year more—to the Canadian cancer society in connection with its educational work, but we shall hold out the possibility of making grants to those who want to do research work in this field. In addition, we hope to establish a number of fellowships to train research workers.

While these developments have been going on, we have been having active discussions in an informal way with various provincial ministers and deputy ministers. There has been, the most general kind of cooperation; and I hope very shortly to call a meeting of those interested at which the fields of activity of the various organizations interested in cancer control work will be defined as well as they can be without putting them in straitjackets. The objective will be a programme of work in cancer, using all means, which will mobilize all the resources that can be mobilized within Canada and to see to it that we do everything possible to find the cause and the cure of cancer.

There are four ways in which money can be spent in work in connection with cancer. The first is in the education of the public, to which the hon. member for Weyburn referred. That is necessary. It is necessary that it be brought home to people that if they have any of the symptoms—a lump or a tumour or a persistent sore throat or any of the other things—they should consult their doctor; and a large part of the money so far spent by the Canadian cancer society has been spent in just that work. We believe that organizations like the Canadian cancer society can carry on that work effectively. If there is a general desire that the federal government should go into the work of publicizing the need of early discovery and diagnosis and treatment of cancer, that certainly will be considered, because I believe we could do an effective job in that field, but it would remain with the house to say whether that is a proper activity for the federal government to undertake.

The second way is the training of doctors to specialize in the diagnosis and treatment of cancer. As I believe hon. members know, there are only three established methods of treating cancer: radium, X-ray, and operation. As yet, there are no other established cures. These are effective only if used early enough. It seems to me that this work of enabling doctors to improve their own ability in this field can best be done by the establishment of fellowships, by work through the Canadian cancer society, the Canadian medical association, through hospitals, teaching institutions, clinics, the provision of refresher courses, and the like. Certainly the federal government should not enter into that field at all.

The third way in which cancer work can be aided is by improving facilities for the treatment of cancer. That, it seems to me, is peculiarly a matter of provincial responsibility.

The fourth way is in research and the training of workers to do research. I have already mentioned this in relation to the subject of research, and I have nothing further to add to what I said in that connection. But I think I might say this. I am informed that it is a generally held opinion among those who are competent to say that it is unlikely that up to this day anyone who is really competent to do research in cancer has been held up for lack of funds. That is substantially true, though there may be exceptions.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What about Doctor Davidson in Winnipeg?

Mr. CLAXTON: His cure was considered by a royal commission in the province of Manitoba which seemed to be a competent body, and they brought down last year a report stating that it had not been established that the cure was worthy of support. There are cures every now and then, or alleged cures, which receive public attention, but I believe the situation is substantially as I have described it.

I should add that in many of our teaching institutions and laboratories there is work going on in cancer research to-day. At McGill there is a cancer research institute which has carried on fundamental studies. At the university of Montreal there are doctors doing work directly associated with cancer research. At Kingston there is a research foundation which is working on the production of an alleged cure for cancer. In Toronto there are a number of individuals engaged in basic research in the Connaught laboratories, the Banting institute, the university and hospitals, at all of which work is going on, much of it of great value. Similarly in Manitoba there is the cancer relief and research institute, and there are no doubt a number of doctors carrying on clinical research work as well as fundamental research investigations. A great deal is being done, and my information is that no one is prevented from doing anything that shows reasonable prospect of assisting in this study. No one is prevented by any lack of money. From my discussions with doctors who know about it, it seems that cancer is a disease the causes of which are likely to be discovered in consequence of highly organized technical work and the free interchange of views such as there is among scientists throughout the world.

Turning to the question of arthritis, here we have a disease which is not the killer that cancer is, though it is crippling to a very large number of people. Someone mentioned the figure of 600,000 or more alleged to be suffering from arthritis in Canada to-day. It is quite possible from what I am told that the number is considerably greater than that, because arthritis is a condition, or rather a number of conditions, from which a high proportion of people over forty years of age suffer in some degree or another, without being crippled. If you have aching joints or nodules or something of the kind it is likely that they are due to arthritis. The disease takes a great number of forms. The hon. member for Lanark will correct me if I am wrong, but I am informed that there may be as many as thirty different forms of arthritis and it is a term which is generally used to describe a condition. There are many varieties, and it is difficult indeed for a doctor, unless he has had special training, correctly to diagnose the kind of arthritis from which a person is suffering. The cure seems to be uncertain and the disease appears to have in many cases a common characteristic in that it comes and goes in waves. When a person has a recession of the disease, when it passes off, if that happens to coincide with some new treatment he is receiving he is likely to say that he has found a successful treatment and is likely to continue so to believe, although the change in his condition was due to something within himself and not to the treatment at all.

There are treatments which undoubtedly do benefit people. I was asked by the hon. member for Calgary West whether I could comment on the hospital at Banff. I am sure hon. members will not expect me to make any comment on any hospital, doctor or institution in Canada. If I commented favourably and it was a private institution I would be regarded as giving it an advertisement; and if my comment were unfavourable, then my capacity or my objectivity would be brought into challenge by those who believed the contrary. I must not do that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister can say whether there has been any report as to the success of the treatment.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should, however, refer to one hospital where there are continuously a large number of cases of arthritis under treatment and observation. I refer to the veterans affairs hospital under my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, at Toronto East General hospital where there are over 100 cases of arthritis which are looked after by specialists trained in dealing with the disease. A good deal of research work is being carried on in connection with these cases.

Arthritis is a condition, for the cause and cure of which we should search as vigorously as possible, but because of its nature this is an exceedingly difficult thing to undertake. What I have said with regard to the general matter of research and also with regard to research into cancer applies equally, I believe, to any suggestion that the Department of National Health and Welfare should undertake fundamental research into arthritis.

It would seem, too, that this is a condition in which it is important that fundamental research should be combined with clinical research and observation of patients. It is, therefore, a condition which should be dealt with through the existing agencies, particularly those in conjunction with hospitals.

The hon. member for Mackenzie, in his speech at the opening of the discussion, referred to the uneven distribution of doctors and dentists across Canada, and that is, of course, true. It is true also of medical services. In the time I have been with the department I have come to know all the ministers of health and the deputy ministers in the provinces. I have been in every province and discussed their situations with them, and as chairman of the economic committee of the dominion-provincial conference I spent several days in going over their situations with them. In addition, we have had access to the work done by the parliamentary committees in 1943 and 1944 as well as that done by my predecessors in the department, and this all leads to the recognition that services vary greatly from province to province. It was in the hope that services, hospital, medical treatment and nursing, might be made available to everyone in Canada irrespective of locality or income, that we proposed a nation-wide system of insurance to be administered by the provinces, introduced by stages. That was developed on previous occasions before this committee, and the modified proposals will be found in the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference for April 29, 1946, at pages 6 and following. These were supplemented by substantial grants for public health, and in the proceedings before the conference the general public health grant which might have totalled a large sum each year was extended so as to be available for use in connection with cancer and arthritis.

[Mr. Claxton.]

In addition to the general public health grants, there were proposed grants for tuberculosis, mental health, venereal disease, crippled children and also provision for professional training and for public health research. Provision was also made for the lending of money through the provinces at cost for the construction of hospitals, and for planning grants to plan the introduction of health insurance and health services. All this was made available as part of the plan, and it was made available on such terms as to provide for its introduction by stages in the various provinces and in various parts of the provinces, so that the provision would enable each province to make use of it in the most effective way possible.

The hon. member for Mackenzie asked whether these proposals would be available to the provinces which made separate agreements with the dominion, if that is possible. In this connection I must repeat what I said last night, namely simply refer to the remarks of the Prime Minister on May 9 when he said that the dominion-provincial conference and the situation arising out of it would be dealt with by the Minister of Finance when he introduced his budget.

The hon. member for Mackenzie also referred to the provision of an air ambulance in Saskatchewan. During the war we were able to do a great deal in transporting Indians, Eskimos and others in the far north through the facilities of the various air forces using that territory and also through the other government services. Some wonderful flights were made; and wonderful feats of endurance, courage and skill have been performed by doctors who have been flown in. In one case the flight was fifteen hundred miles, to land a doctor in an Eskimo band and live there for five months to deal with an epidemic of typhoid. I refer here to Doctor Rawson, who was flown in 1945 to Cape Dorset, and saved a substantial number of the band of Eskimos through his being able to diagnose the condition, radio it out and have the supplies for immunization landed by parachute to enable him to perform his service. After he had been there for a number of months and had travelled through the band by dog-team he was flown out to Chesterfield. He is a doctor who has spent a considerable part of his life in service in the far north. He was a major in the army. There were other similar episodes in which doctors and nurses performed great feats of heroism and rendered service to the people of the far north.

The largest single increase in the ordinary health services provided for by these estimates is the substantial increase in the estimate for the health of Indians and Eskimos. They are the two groups of people in the dominion to which this department directly renders service. In consequence of this vote, if it is passed by the committee, we hope to be able to increase substantially the services which are rendered to our Indians and Eskimos.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you made any surveys in that field yet?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; we have made extensive surveys and have plans laid out which will substantially improve the services rapidly.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are reports of these surveys available?

Mr. CLAXTON: As the hon member knows, a committee on Indian Affairs has been set up. I understand it is the intention of the committee to call officers of this department before it, and we shall make available all the information we have. When we come to surveys of some conditions among the Indians and Eskimos we still may have fairly sketchy material, but we shall make available all we have. While the results of our plans will not be spectacular at once, I hope that in a few years it will be possible to make substantial improvements in the health and welfare of our Indians and Eskimos.

Several hon. members have referred to the need for cooperation in this field. In my first speech in this connection I think I said, that cooperation was essential, as I have said the same thing to every other organization I have met in connection with the work of the department. It has been my privilege to be invited to attend the annual meeting or other meetings of practically every organization working in the field of health on a nation-wide basis across Canada. I have welcomed these opportunities and have gone to all these meetings with the hope of creating confidence and of establishing the foundation for real collaboration as well as cooperation. I believe that the general statements made by the officers of these associations have on every occasion, been supported by their members, and that their reciprocal promises of cooperation have shown by their works.

During the eighteen months that the department has been in existence, we have had, with very little exception, nothing but the heartiest and warmest cooperation from everyone working in the field. That applies to the provincial officers, to the municipal officers and to the members of all professional and voluntary associations. This is one field in which there can be no room for competition. It has more than enough for everyone to do, and we have not failed to seek the assistance of everyone possible to make the best contribution we can to the work which we and they have in hand, namely, to see to it that as far as lies within our power we shall improve the health and welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister, and I have no doubt that he meant everything he said, but after listening to him I am reasonably sure that he is not going to get very much activity in the field of medicine in this country until the government are prepared to tackle two problems. First, they have to face up to the British North America Act and get away from this business of passing the buck to the provinces. That is one stumbling block which will offset about 75 per cent of what the minister had to say to us this afternoon. I do not wish to leave any doubt in his mind as to whether he is getting improvement or not when he makes the kind of statement and paints the kind of picture with regard to the future of health in Canada that he has done this afternoon.

Second, there is another problem that the government will have to face up to. They are going to have to tackle the drug manufacturers of the North American continent. There is a straight monopoly in drugs. The medical profession is largely hampered in putting on the market drugs that are already available in a form in which they could perform some service, because the drugs are pigeon-holed, curtailed, and kept off the market by the drug monopoly which exists on this continent. These are two things which will completely hamstring everything the minister had to say this afternoon.

I am not going to go into the matter of health in Canada. I think it is well known, and it leaves much to be desired; but the federal government will have to face up to the two questions I have just mentioned.

With regard to this question of research the minister's statement also left me rather cold. He outlined so much machinery he is going to set up that his department will be completely fenced in, and he will not be able to break out of that ring. There is too much of it. It is like a committee. If you get twelve men on your committee, particularly if you include two lawyers, and want the committee to do a specific piece of work, the twelve men start arguing and fighting and you get nothing done. If you boil it down to a couple of men, they will perhaps do something and bring in some sort of comprehensive report.

I am going to mention one specific matter on this question of research, following the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He asked the minister a specific question with regard to arthritis; what was being done and could be expected to be done. He gave the minister a golden opportunity to make a long speech, but he wound up without giving the committee very much information as to what would be done on the question of arthritis. The minister would lead me to believe, in his discourse to the committee, that he is pinning his hope on research to be conducted in Canada and the United States, and is not going beyond the borders of those two countries.

In June, 1944, as the Minister of Veterans Affairs will remember, I raised the question of arthritis in this house and pointed out that a drug known as ACS had been perfected in Russia which was guaranteed to cure arthritis and allied diseases. At that time I asked the minister if he would make some inquiries into the matter, pointing out that arthritis was responsible for the loss of more man-days in industry in this country than any other disease, and that, in addition, a large number of our ex-service personnel, particularly from the first war, were badly crippled, that our hospitals were filled with them. The Minister of Veterans Affairs, always cooperative, did what he could at the time by way of making inquiries and informed me that he could get very little information on the matter. Well, I took time off to write the Soviet embassy in Ottawa, who referred me to the Mission of Alliance of Red Cross and Red Crescent societies of the U.S.S.R. in the U.S.A.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was referred there also.

Mr. GILLIS: I wrote Professor V. Lebedenko, the representative in the United States of this organization, who replied on July 6, 1944, as follows:

> A shipment of the anti-reticular cytotoxic serum is expected in the near future from Professor Bogomolets. Professor Bogomolets, however, in informing me of the shipment, asks that this shipment be restricted to laboratory and experimental use until such time as whatever research institute receives the serum is able to prepare a product identical with the original. Only after that time can it be prepared and released for general consumption.
> It seems to me that the Canadian government or a responsible research institute should be able to request a quantity of the serum from Professor Bogomolets through the Soviet legation for similar use in Canada.
> Hoping that you will find this information useful . . .

Shortly after receiving that letter I saw in the Globe and Mail of July 10, 1944, an editorial commenting on this very question, from which I should like to read a short extract:

> Gifts from Russia
> While Britons and Canadians are sending relief supplies to the stricken people in Russia, the English-speaking nations are in turn receiving gifts from the Soviet Union. There has come from Russia, for example, the unique dandelion from which natural rubber can be produced and it is now being experimented with here and in the United States and England. Russia also sent recently a serum which may prove a potent weapon against rheumatism, arthritis, childbed fever, cancer, high blood pressure and perhaps also mental disease. This serum, known as ACS, is now being tested in a clinic by Lord Horder, chairman of the empire rheumatism council.

That is definite and specific information. I was surprised at the statement this afternoon by the minister of health. I did not expect the Minister of Veterans Affairs to get very much information on the subject back in 1944, because the drug was still in Russia and apparently the matter was in the embryo stage. But nearly two years have elapsed, and a Department of National Health and Welfare has been set up, with a minister and an adequate staff. The minister pointed out that it had a research department, and that research into various diseases was being carried on by the research council in cooperation with his department. If this drug known as ACS has the potential medical value indicated in the editorial I read; if it has been made available to the rheumatic council in Britain, through the chairman of that council, why has not something been done by the department and the research body in Canada to make that drug available to the people of this country?

Mr. CLAXTON: May I answer that question at once?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. CLAXTON: More than a year ago we looked into that question, and I was advised there was nothing at all in it. I was advised of that by representatives of the Russian government as well as by the other people who had looked into it.

Mr. GILLIS: You were advised by representatives of the Russian government? I should be very much obliged if, before these estimates are passed, the minister would make available to this committee any correspondence he may have had with representatives of the Russian government, stating that this drug had nothing in it at all. It was widely ballyhooed through Reader's Digest, through editorials and so forth, and the Canadian people were led to hope that they would receive some relief from this source. I received at least a hundred letters from people across this country inquiring as to the merits or demerits of this drug, and I should like to see some official statement by the Soviet people to the effect mentioned by the minister. I do not doubt his word at all, but personally I am not convinced. I think the drug manufacturers on this continent are too much concerned about profits and too little concerned about the health of the people, and that is why I do not feel like taking that statement at face value.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: A United States senate committee made an exhaustive investigation into the drug traffic on this continent, and if hon. members care to take time they can go to the library in this building and read the report of that committee, together with the evidence presented before it. It is a most terrific indictment of the drug manufacturers of the continent of North America and of Great Britain.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was making some observations on the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and pointing out what I thought was neglect on the part of his department in not checking more carefully on a possible source of relief for persons suffering from arthritis. During the course of my remarks the minister stated that they had information from two sources—he named someone in the Soviet Union as one—to the effect that this particular drug known as ACS had no medical value.

When I first saw reference to this particular drug I did not consider that the statement had emanated from any propaganda source within the Soviet Union. I saw it in the May, 1944, issue of Magazine Digest in an article written by Paul Winterton, Moscow correspondent of the News Chronicle. The story he wrote at that time would lead one to believe that there was definite and positive hope for relief from the afflictions of arthritis by the use of this particular drug.

I should like to repeat what I said before six o'clock. If the story in connection with that particular serum was merely propaganda, I should like to know it. I think the people of Canada who took that as a possible source of relief from that particular disability should have their minds disabused of any idea they may have that the government has neglected to take up something which might afford relief to those suffering from arthritis.

I want to tell the minister that I appreciate his difficulties. He is head of a new department and, as I stated before, he has a whole lot of stumbling blocks to get over, not the least of which is the British North America Act. I was in hopes that the dominion-provincial conference would have decided the field of jurisdiction in these matters. I am convinced that until such time as the federal government has the taxing powers necessary to finance and to a large extent administer an adequate social security scheme across this country we are not going to solve the problem we are discussing here to-night, the health of the people of Canada. I hope that before many years have passed the federal government will measure up to its responsibilities. As long as you keep passing the buck from the federal to the provincial authorities you are not going to get anything done in connection with health matters. I want to know whether there is any possibility of relief for those suffering from arthritis.

There is another specific matter about which I should like the government to do something. When the Family Allowances Act was passed there was quite a lengthy discussion and the act was examined from all angles. I believe that was a step in the right direction because it has done a lot of good. However, in my opinion discrimination is being practised. When the bill was being discussed I asked the minister if it provided for payments to illegitimate children or other children being maintained in institutions, and the minister replied that in his opinion it did. But I now find that these allowances are not being paid to children maintained in institutions. If a child is either boarded out or adopted from an institution, its foster parents receive the family allowance. But the child who remains in the institution does not come within the scope of the Family Allowances Act. I contend that there is discrimination, because I understood that the act would be made applicable to every child born in Canada.

Illegitimacy is a social problem. A child unfortunate enough to be born under those circumstances should not be penalized for something for which he is not responsible. In looking over a recent isue of a very good paper, the Glace Bay Gazette—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: It is a good paper. The mine workers happen to own it themselves. An editorial contained certain figures with respect to this matter and showed that there had been an increase during the war. I am not going to give the figures, but the fact is that illegitimacy during the war years was not as high as it was in 1936. When you refer to the war years people say, "Oh, yes, there was war hysteria; people were uprooted; nothing was normal and that is merely the effects of a war." The fact that it was higher in 1936 than it was during the war is proof positive that the war was not responsible.

This is a permanent social evil within our structure of society. Either it must be removed or the victims of it treated the same as other citizens of the country. Many people are too prone to look with scorn upon the girl who happens to get herself into that situation. Anyone who has any idea of conditions in the slums of our cities will agree with me when I say that at least ninety-five per cent of the girls who fall victims to this kind of thing do so because they were brought up in homes that were totally inadequate. There was not sufficient income in the home to provide most of these girls with a decent dress to wear, and most of them were unemployed. They did not have a decent pair of stockings to put on. They could not afford recreation of any kind, and if they had a boy friend they could not take him home because in the majority of cases they were ashamed of their homes through no fault of their parents because the order of society under which they lived did not enable them to provide these modern necessities. So that when a girl becomes a victim she is obliged, despite the fact that we have all these hospitals and all the medical fraternity—

Mr. REID: Has the hon. member any statistics to bear out his statement that these transgressors come mainly from the poor?

Mr. GILLIS: I did not say, from the poor.

Mr. REID: From people who lived in poor houses and poor surroundings. I think the hon. member meant the poor in a broad sense.

Mr. GILLIS: I think eighty-five per cent of the people of this country can be considered poor, and these victims come largely from that section of society.

Mr. REID: I do not like the indictment.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not an indictment at all. If they were not poor they would not go through the ordeal of having to go into a charitable institution.

Mr. REID: I dispute that.

Mr. GILLIS: Those who have sufficient means can avoid the possibility of being exposed. There are ways and means, if you can pay for it, that will enable them to do that. The fact of the matter is that those who are obliged to go through that ordeal come from homes where there are not sufficient funds to cover up the transgression.

As I was going on to say, despite the fact that we have all these hospitals and all this research in medical science, a well-organized medical fraternity and standard hospitals from coast to coast, as the minister pointed out, when one of these girls falls a victim, and a victim, I repeat, of a faulty order of society, she is obliged to seek refuge in a charitable institution. The charitable institution is not maintained for profit. It is operated in all cases by people who are interested in doing something for those who are not able to do for themselves. There is practically no compensation for such people by way of salaries, and the institution is operated inadequately because of lack of funds.

Under the present scheme of things these institutions are the responsibility of the municipality and the province. The grants that are made by the municipalities are far too small. They have not the funds or the means of taxation to make large grants; and under the present set-up, where the federal government has invaded the fields of taxation of the province, the powers of the province to make adequate grants are restricted. Therefore we find these institutions operated on a charitable basis, and a large number of children are left in the institution because they cannot be boarded out. That is a burden which cannot be borne much longer by those who operate institutions of that kind. I have visited some of them and I know the terrific struggle they are making. I know that most of the doctors who look after the patients in such institutions do it for nothing, and they should not have to. Practically no one connected with the institution receives anything by way of salary, and they all work long hours.

The time has come when the least the federal government can do, because this is a federal act and it is supposed to be applicable to all the children in Canada, and the federal government has the taxing powers necessary for the next eighteen months at least to collect the necessary funds, would be to make the act applicable to all children born in Canada. Despite the fact that for the past fifty or sixty years we have been trying to shift the responsibility from one to the other, the time has come when we must face realities, and I urge the minister to give reconsideration to living up to the statement that was made when the act was first brought down that the family allowance would apply to all children in Canada. The least that the federal government can do is to allow the five or six dollars for each child so that it may be properly fed and properly clothed and sent out in as healthy a state as possible. I do not think that is asking too much and I do not believe it would involve a large expenditure of money.

The minister may take the stand that these are private institutions. They are in a sense, but they were made necessary because no other institution had been set up for the purpose of performing this function. They may be private, but they are not operated for a profit, and I think it would be carrying out an obligation on the part of the federal government as well as a gesture of charity to extend the scope of the act to make it all-inclusive so far as the children in Canada are concerned.

Mr. McIVOR: I may be living in past days, but I am convinced that some of the best cures for disease are those that are plainest, cheapest and most easily understood. I think the minister will agree with me—I am judging by his conduct—that the best kind of cure for disease is plain food and lots of it, and the right kind of things to drink.

Somebody has said that a fence at the top of a hill is better than an ambulance down in the valley; and good plain food, as the minister has proven, is a splendid prevention against disease. The stand that he has taken in the family allowance which enables children to have plenty of good food and to be properly cared for is the best cure for arthritis and all allied diseases. I think the minister is going to ask his experts to spend a good deal of their time in finding the cause of arthritis, tuberculosis, cancer and other diseases.

There are some members of the house who will agree with me that one of the causes of sickness is overwork. There are men in this house who, in the eyes of some people outside, may not be doing much work but who, nevertheless, are broken through overwork in this house.

In order to get good food every home should have somebody that is a real honest breadwinner who works every day and he should see to it that the boys and girls with whom that home has been blest go to bed in decent time and do not use the things that will hurt their health. Any athlete knows—dear knows, I know well—that no boy or girl can smoke cigarettes and take care of his eyes, his heart, his stomach, his nervous system. I am sure the minister will pay some attention to this menace in the future.

An hon. MEMBER: Smoking?

Mr. McIVOR: Preventives will be found in good food, lots of sleep and healthy exercise. May I say that there are some men in this house who would do well to take more healthy exercise and it is the duty of some of us to see that they get the opportunity. I hope that such opportunities will be available in future and that we shall enjoy recreation in a good, honest, humorous way.

I spent some time on a committee, trying to help the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It continued for two years, and experts were called from all over the world, from Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain, the United States and various parts of Canada. To-day we have a health insurance policy second to none in the world. It is on a contributory basis, and my attitude in that connection is that every man in health and strength who has a job—and many times it is his own fault if he has not a job—should contribute to his own future. Quite a while ago a former minister of labour sponsored a scheme of annuities which was a splendid insurance policy; I know of nothing in Canada of this kind which can beat it. I am sure that as soon as possible the government will put contributory health insurance into operation.

The information I get from heads of homes is that the family allowance is proving most effective as a preventive of disease. From the point of view of nutrition, the Speaker of this house and the Sergeant-at-Arms know that a good drink of wholesome milk to growing boys in the afternoon is a valuable contribution to the upbuilding of their health. My purpose in speaking this evening is to urge the minister to put emphasis on measures of prevention rather than to try to pick people up from the bottom of the valley when they have fallen victims to overwork or disease.

Mr. LAURENDEAU (Translation): Having listened this afternoon to the statement made by the Minister of National Health, I think it behooves me to commend him for having based himself on scientific and especially on medical data in the account he gave of what he has done. I feel quite justified in paying him such a compliment because I am dealing with a branch of social science with which I am acquainted when I speak about medicine. I have also had the pleasure, later in the afternoon, to hear some of our opponents, a few C.C.F. and Social Credit members speak on the subject of medicine when they questioned the minister's statements connected with arthritis and rheumatism. I noticed that the minister did not say much on these questions when our hon. friends across the floor went to a great deal of trouble in explaining to him that those diseases should be placed on the same basis as cancer and tuberculosis. I regret to say to my hon. friends, who refer to arthritis as being a disease, that they should consider it as a syndrome rather than a disease. When they urge the Minister of National Health to make treatment available for those who suffer from arthritis they might as well ask him to provide for the treatment of all common diseases. Arthritis is not a disease, but as I said, a combination of medical syndromes; when a physician examines a person who suffers from arthritis, he may discover various ailments such as cirrhosis, nephritis and other diseases. Having practised medicine during twenty-six years, I know the terrible suffering caused by cancer. I rose to-night simply to ask the minister to do everything in his power so that every bit of scientific knowledge and research may be used in our fight against so terrible a disease.

Secondly, there is tuberculosis. Its causes are now known and that is a step in the right direction. On the other hand, from a practical point of view, we know absolutely nothing about cancer. The work of research should be continued in both those fields.

I want to challenge a certain statement, made by an hon. member opposite, from the scientific point of view. A C.C.F. member told us that a certain Russian serum sent to Canada and which had given results in Russia was kept from the Canadian people. From the point of view of the Canadian medical fraternity generally, such a statement is absolutely without foundation. The Canadian Medical association, indeed the medical profession throughout the whole world, is much too honest, much too interested in the welfare of all human beings to hid from a single group or nation, a scientific discovery that might be a blessing to all mankind. I do not believe that there is anything to the rumour, and it is unbelievable that this Russian discovery if it has any merit would not be welcomed by the government and the Canadian medical profession.

I want the public to understand that whenever Canadian medical men have made a discovery, whether it be of little or of momentous importance, it has always been given to the world and used for the well-being of mankind. I could quote several instances, but it is sufficient to glance through newspapers, without delving into medical subjects, to find out that as soon as insulin had been discovered by a Canadian physician it was made available to the whole world. The same may be said of penicillin. Then, if I may mention something more personal, there is the case of my own father who discovered a new abdominal operating technique. After he had submitted his new technique to the Canadian medical profession, an Italian physician requested detailed information in respect thereof; the details of the new technique were forwarded to the Italian medical men who have made use of it for the greatest benefit to mankind.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of Canadian medicine, of the whole Canadian medical profession, in fact, I wish to protest. There is not the slightest doubt that, had Russia discovered a product for the relief of the victims of arthritis, the Canadian government, and the Canadian medical profession, could not have rejected it. To claim otherwise is going entirely too far, and I refuse to believe it unless I am given the most convincing proofs.

I urge the Minister of National Health to help our rural population, especially in connection with hospitalization. The farmers' income is only sufficient to allow them to secure individual treatment from their family doctors, but it is inadequate to take care of hospitalization when needed. When an operation, a surgical intervention, is indicated, I ask the government to find some way of solving the problem of paying for hospitalization. Could not either the federal or the provincial authorities take care of this, I am not discussing the principle of this question; I am only pointing out the blunt fact that our farmers cannot afford to pay for hospitalization when an operation is needed. I ask the Minister of National Health to give them efficient help in cases of this kind.

In concluding, I wish to offer a suggestion. Preventive medicine is infinitely superior to curative treatments. The minister should give special attention to popular education in medical matters. Results are invariably better achieved through persuasion and conviction than through coercion and legislative action. The government should place in the hands of public organizations the means of educating the masses. Our citizens must be told that periodic examinations are essential. We should teach our people that every Canadian should pay a periodic visit to his physician, as some insurance companies require of their policyholders, who must be examined every year or every five years as prescribed by them. This way it is easier to discover certain diseases which would otherwise remain unknown until too late. Again I say, prevention is better than cure.

Mr. MERRITT: This afternoon we had a most interesting discussion which to my mind has brought out two points of view. First of all, so many members have mentioned the pressing need for research into arthritis and cancer and have addressed their remarks to the minister that it would appear that many persons in the house and in Canada think this department is the one that should do medical research. Of course, I join with those members who have spoken in agreeing that medical research into such diseases as arthritis and cancer is of the utmost importance and is a matter upon which money can be well spent, but it is apparent from what the minister has said that any moneys which might be expended on such matters do not come within this vote.

I want to turn the discussion to something which arises when one discusses estimates, and that is the question whether expenditures are proper or not. It seems to me that we have to balance the urgent demand for the spending of larger sums against the almost equally urgent demand for the elimination of unnecessary expenditures and therefore for the reduction in taxation which would then be possible.

Thinking that over, it struck me that these two points of view can be reconciled only if one determines that for any money that is voted value is obtained. That is how I propose to approach the estimates. I want to make a few observations in particular about the estimates other than the statutory vote. Of the amount of about $11,000,000, $5,500,000 is referable to Indian affairs and the national film board, which hardly arise in this discussion. They are, I think, separate items. That leaves $5,500,000 being voted for national health and welfare, and I think the Canadian people would have believed that in that $5,500,000 there would be something for medical research, whereas in fact there is not.

The whole vote seems to be made up of three items: administration of certain statutes which come under the purview of the minister, such as immigration medical service, quarantine, leprosy and the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act; social welfare generally, not in the field of research; and the item of publicity. Of that item of $5,500,000 of which I speak, roughly ten per cent is taken up in votes for publicity. I wish to lay before the committee what those particular votes are, because I am going to argue that while, of course, publicity has its proper place in the expenditures of this department, the amount for that purpose is so large that this money might very well either not be voted or, if voted to the department, be put to much better use so that we would get more value for what we spend, and thus the two points of view I mentioned at first might be reconciled.

Going through the estimates, I find that this year departmental administration gets an allotment of $50,000 for publicity. There is no change from last year and it represents no less than twelve per cent of the total expenditures on departmental administration. Turning to the health branch, I find that the administration of that branch is given $100,000 for publicity. That is no less than 50 per cent of the total vote to that particular branch and represents an increase of $80,000 in the publicity item. It is up five times. The third item, child and maternal hygiene, is $68,400, or 60 per cent of the total for that special department. The next subdivision is public health engineering, which has never had a vote before for publicity so far as I can find out. It is now granted $30,000 for publicity, which is 20 per cent of its total vote. Industrial hygiene is allotted $21,000 for publicity, or 20 per cent of its total vote. The civil service health division is granted $18,000 for publicity, which represents 10 per cent of its total vote. That item is down from last year. The nutrition service subdivision is granted $50,000 for publicity. That sum represents 28 per cent of its total vote. Venereal disease control is granted $5,000 for publicity, which represents 12 per cent of its total vote. The directorate of health insurance studies is granted $3,500 for publicity, which is eight per cent of all that goes to it.

Then we come to the dental health division which is granted $30,000 for publicity. This vote is up $28,000 from last year. The amount this year represent 50 per cent of the total vote for that branch. The same can be said of the mental health division. It receives $5,000 for publicity, which represents 20 per cent of the total vote for the branch. The blindness control division is given a small vote of $500. The percentage is negligible and I shall not quote it. The tuberculosis control division is granted $5,000 for publicity, which again represents 20 per cent of its total vote. The advertising and labels division gets $1,200 for publicity. That again is a small proportion of the total vote, and I have not the percentage figure. The Indian medical service receives a new vote of $10,000 for publicity. We shall deal with this when we come to the item, but it can be said that it is a little strange that medical assistance to Indians should require any vote for publicity.

I turn now to the welfare branch and we come first of all to branch administration. This branch gets $4,000 for publicity, or nine per cent of its total vote. The family allowances division gets $150,000 for publicity purposes this year, the same amount as last year. This is seven per cent of the total administrative expenses of the Family Allowances Act. The old age pensions division gets no grant for publicity. The national physical fitness administration is allowed $18,930 for publicity, which is a large percentage, namely 37 per cent, of its total vote. The total of all the items I have read out is $570,530. Over half a million dollars is being spent on publicity and advertising by this department out of a total vote of $5,500,000. Last year only $416,000 was spent on advertising and publicity. Therefore the total vote for that purpose is up $154,000 this year when, in my view, we should be doing everything we can to curtail expenditures.

The two other general observations I wish to make about the publicity vote are as follows. In the first place, this department has the second largest allotment for publicity of any department of government. It is exceeded only by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The other notable thing is that as one searches through the estimates one finds that very few of the subdivisions of the department failed to put in a bid for their quota of this publicity vote.

If we turn to the department in its infancy we find that in the first annual report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1945, the total amount spent by the minister's department upon publicity was $165,570; quite a different sum from $570,000 this year. Of that total of two years ago, no less than $115,000 was spent in the control of venereal disease, whereas this year that vote for publicity is down to $5,000. Therefore we can see a tremendous and alarming increase of expenditures in respect of publicity in this department.

Before continuing on this question of publicity, may I say that the other interesting thing that arose this afternoon appeared in the statement made by the minister in which he outlined that he believed to be the proper scope of his department. Since he said that it was a new department last year and only just formed and in operation, I think it would be most interesting to all members of the committee if during this discussion the minister stated further what he believes to be the proper scope of the activities of the department. This afternoon he said that he believed the dominion government should assist programmes of research, and that research was carried on through the national research council. Naturally I agree with that statement of policy, but I believe that the people of Canada would have thought that the Department of National Health and Welfare, which is spending a large sum of money this year, would have had that task included in its vote. We should hear from the minister as to how the activities of the national research council and medical research are coordinated; whether the minister has any right to direct what research shall be conducted and any power of controlling or augmenting the funds which are granted to the national research council for medical research.

Since, however, medical research is not in his department I wish to continue with this matter of publicity and to ask the minister if he will give us his views upon the proper place of publicity in his department. I shall offer a few suggestions of my own before I sit down. It is my view that publicity certainly has its place, and in the course of my remarks I shall indicate one place where I think it is properly expended. But publicity is a dangerous thing to play with. In my opinion it must be strictly governed by the test that I suggested, namely, value for money.

I would ask the minister, as we come to these votes for publicity, to explain in each case what degree of efficiency he believes arises out of these grants for publicity purposes, and also if he does not think he would get more value in relation to the health of the Canadian people if he spent some of these funds in other ways. For instance, the hon. member for Lanark has brought up the need for money grants to aid in neurosurgery research in Montreal, and certainly we have heard enough about arthritis and cancer to make us realize that grants to bodies conducting that kind of research would be money well spent. So I say to the minister that in my view, particularly at a time when we need to review our expenditures, it is not sufficient to point out what is undoubtedly true, that from all the money spent on publicity some benefit will be realized. Rather he must go further, I suggest, and show that great benefit will be realized, greater benefit than would result if the money were applied elsewhere.

I wish to make one or two other observations on the matter of publicity, taking a very broad view. In the first place, as the minister has said, health and welfare is a provincial matter. I should like to hear from him what is the tie-up, in the expenditure of money for disseminating to the Canadian people information on public health and welfare, with each of the provinces. How are these expenditures coordinated with those of the provinces, to be sure that they are not advertising the same thing or perhaps even a slightly different thing, and that there is no duplication or overlapping in these expenditures? The second broad observation I would make is that direct advertising to the public is rather by-passing provincial health authorities, who have trained staffs in the field, and to me would seem prima facie to be not making the best use of this money which, if it is to be spent on publicity purposes, might be better spent by way of grants to the provinces for these purposes instead of indirect action by this government.

My next general observation is that I believe the percentage effect of advertising is probably remarkably low. In order that one may get the best results, surely one should particularize in one's advertising rather than generalize. To give a specific example, I want to point out that the sum of $68,000 is allotted for publicity in respect of child and maternal care. It is my understanding that the booklet which probably represents most of that money is very useful indeed, and that it is doing a great deal of good in the field of child and maternal care in this country. That is the sort of advertising which one can readily approve, where there is a clear need by an obvious class, and where it is almost certain that this class will be only too anxious to read and study and apply that publicity. On the other hand, as I understand it, the department gets out another booklet called the "Master Menu Pattern", which, if you please, is a bright little document telling the people of Canada what food to take with them when they go on picnics in the summer, and how best to make use of that food. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that, in my view, money spent on the "Master Menu Pattern" is absolutely and completely wasted. I believe any persons in this country who go on a picnic know enough to take with them the food they want to eat, rather than the food described in such a booklet. That, I say, breaks a good rule of advertising, because it is offered to the Canadian people as a whole, while there is no demand for it and it is probably not read. In the army we had a "paper war", and we know what we did with pieces of paper like this.

I want to give one further illustration of this generality that may destroy the usefulness of expenditures of this kind. I refer now to what I call paternalism in advertising, telling the Canadian people, in terms which a very simple-minded man could understand, just what they ought to do. In this connection I wish to read what is called a "filler", issued by the division of information services of this department. I believe it is issued to the newspapers, and it says it may be used at any time. It states:

> Just because people have reached middle age, they should not give up all forms of exercise, say health authorities. An official of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Ottawa, states: "There is no reason why a person in the prime of life should abandon health-giving exercise. In fact, the evidence is all in favour of recreation at all ages. Of course, the family physician should be consulted, so that all may keep fit without strain at this most important time of life."

I do not know how much a filler costs, but I do say that this is paternalism in its worst form. Instead of promoting the health of this country, a thing like that is debilitating to the morale and to the mind; and I do not think any money spent on that sort of thing is well spent. In the first place, it is the most enormous platitude, and that is the best thing you can say for it. Another thing one could say, I suppose, is that it is a most outrageous blurb. There are more of these "fillers" which we can dish out during consideration of the estimates.

Another point I wish to make in connection with this question of publicity is that there is great danger of duplication. For instance, I have here in a file a calendar put out by the magazine Health, which tells you what you should eat every day. It gives you the right menu for Monday, for Tuesday, and so on. It is a very good thing, I am sure, but I think every hon. member knows that over a period of many years various magazines and periodicals have put out so many of these things, which are mutually contradictory, that adding one more to the lot will not make any difference.

The same thing might be said about the publication, "Canadian Health and Welfare Bulletin" put out by the department. I understand that this is printed, 50,000 copies in English and 25,000 copies in French, and is distributed free. I am sure all hon. members get a copy; I know I do. Just before these estimates were presented I got one and I read it. I also get a copy of the magazine Health, put out by a private organization which, I believe, receives some financial assistance under these votes.

Two of these magazines are unnecessary. Everything that goes into the departmental magazine could go into the other. The circulation of the departmental magazine could easily be added to the circulation of the private magazine, if there is not already duplication. The Department of National Health and Welfare should not be a printing and publishing office; it should be a Department of National Health and Welfare.

These are all the general observations I want to make, but there are some questions I should like to ask about vote 200, departmental administration. I wish the minister were in the chamber at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He will be back at once.

Mr. MERRITT: I think I shall wait until the minister returns.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): I have listened quite attentively to the speeches of the hon. members for Lanark, Peace River, Weyburn and others, who have preceded me and I have found them most interesting. After hearing the views of those hon. members, I must say that I agree with those who feel that we should spend for protecting the health of Canadians as much if not more than we have spent for sending them to war.

However, while physical health is important, I believe that the spiritual sphere, which is still more important, should not be neglected. As an old latin proverb says: "Mens sana in corpore sano." That is why I claim that the primary duty of a government anxious to protect the true interests of the people, is to give them servants who respect and elevate them instead of degrading and debasing them. Doctor Chisholm, deputy minister of health, who is unable to distinguish between good and evil, does not deserve his present position and he should be replaced by some one intelligent enough to respect the faith of those who believe in God. It is a disgrace that we should have civil servants as devoid of moral principles as Doctor Chisholm and we should not hesitate, through decency and concern for public morals, to dismiss him so as to prevent him from spreading throughout Canada, with the government's approval, his subversive ideas and from flaunting his atheism. It is high time that consideration be given to the numerous petitions to the government requesting the resignation of Doctor Chisholm whose utterances are an insult to the decent citizens of this country.

No one can take as a pretext for avoiding action in this matter, the failure of the dominion-provincial conference. Let us dismiss General Chisholm and replace him by some one competent in the field of moral health as well as in those of physical health or social welfare. I think that such a reform is the one that is most urgent in the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I am sure that a considerable part of the population would be quite pleased if the minister complied with the requests that have recently been directed to him in this connection.

Mr. MERRITT: In order to relieve my rather solemn talk I should like to read another of these fillers. It reads:

> Now is the time to substitute the fruit bowl for the cookie jar in Canadian kitchens, say Ottawa health authorities.

While the minister was out of the chamber I made some general observations with respect to the expenditure of money by his department for publicity purposes. It will be noted that there is one item for $50,000 covering publicity and information. Then under the health branch there is another vote of $100,000 for publicity and information, and later on there is still another vote for $4,000. The total amount voted for publicity in connection with the administrative branches of the Department of National Health and Welfare is $154,000. Incidentally, that is the exact amount of the increase this year in connection with publicity. All other votes for publicity in connection with specific items for specific branches are in addition to this $154,000.

I consider that the members of this committee would be more prepared to approve these votes for publicity if they were earmarked specifically for definite purposes rather than being voted for general publicity purposes. For example, I think it would be better to increase the amount expended on publicity in connection with child and maternal hygiene and decrease the main vote by that much.

I am wondering if this $50,000 we are talking about would not be better spent if it were in the form of grants to organizations now covered by votes 233 to 242. These cover grants to the Canadian Welfare council; to the Canadian Red Cross society, which gets only $10,000; to the St. John Ambulance association, which gets only $4,050, and other grants. This money could also be used to good purpose to support some of the institutions mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Lanark.

In the light of the remarks I have made I should like to ask some specific questions about this item of $50,000 in vote 200. First, how was the similar vote of $50,000 expended last year? I should like that answered in some detail. I should like also if the minister could explain to the committee just what is the division of information services mentioned in the annual report of the department, and how it works.

Second, I should like to know how it is proposed to spend the $50,000 to be allotted this year. Upon what principles are these disbursements made? Is it under a scheme now laid down by the minister to attain specific purposes which he has in mind; or alternatively is it a reservoir into which all the departments may dip if they find they have exhausted the publicity vote specifically allotted to them; or alternatively again is it a fund available to publicize some new idea to be born in the department during the year but which has not yet been conceived?

Finally, is the expenditure of this money coordinated with provincial departments to prevent overlapping? I shall be glad to ask these questions, of which I know there are quite a number, individually, if the minister prefers.

Mr. LaCROIX: Are there any possibilities of securing bilingual forms in connection with the family allowances? Are they at the disposal of the public in different provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: In every family allowance office,—and there is one in each province,—forms are available in English and in French and correspondence is carried on in both English and French. So far as we can do it, we make the application forms for the family allowance available in both English and French in all the offices and in all the post offices, which is the other source from which the application forms can be got. Anyone can write in to the family allowance office for his province in French or in English and be replied to in the language in which he corresponds and receive a form in the language in which he wants to fill out his application.

Mr. LaCROIX: Does that apply to all the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MERRITT: Would the minister now answer my questions?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has raised quite a few questions about publicity in connection with the administration of this department. In the first place, it should be said that the estimates are the amounts which the officers of the department who are experienced in such matters, after having consulted with their advisers, consider necessary to cover the field adequately. When these have been passed through the department and verified by the department, they appear as items in the estimates. This does not mean that the amount asked for will be spent in every case, but if we take publicity, for example, it means that in every case there is a programme of publicity designed or in course of preparation which would use some such amount if it is desirable to spend the money.

The work of public health is one which must be carried on a number of fronts at once. First, there is the devoted work of doctors and nurses; second, the provision of adequate facilities for treatment and care, hospitals and laboratories; third, the work of scientists and doctors in research; fourth, the work of public health authorities, provincial and municipal, supplemented by the federal; fifth, and perhaps most important of all, the work of public education.

The real gap in our performance, either as federal health authorities, provincial health authorities or municipal or voluntary health authorities, is not in our knowledge but in the difference between what we know and what we do. We now know enough about disease to wipe out most of the killing power of most diseases from which men suffer except cancer and arthritis. But tuberculosis and a great many other diseases could be wiped out completely with the knowledge we have. The difference between what we do and what we know is due just to the failure of public opinion to support the demands of health authorities and others for adequate assistance and adequate support. We must bring home to the people the fact that they can secure adequate help and assistance if they go to the doctor, take his advice and follow it soon enough. That is true also of the killer, cancer. So that I would say that to-day the greatest single failure of public health authorities is a lack of education and a lack of information. If we are to do anything in this field to bring what we know we can do up so as to match what we should do, that gap must be bridged by public information.

One of the most interesting things in this field is the demonstration given by the Metropolitan Life Insurance company over a great number of years. As far back as 1912 that company found that it was beginning to have interesting experiences in connection with public health education, so that instead of advertising insurance it advertised health. It has carried on that service ever since at great expense but at great profit, because its statistics show that there is a consistent difference between the records of the people to whom the advertisements have been directed and to whom its health service has been offered and the records of the rest of the population. It has shown the way in institutional advertising of that kind.

We are not going in for anything like that. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has picked out the items and said that they represent about ten per cent of the controllable items in the total vote for this department. I am not sure about his figures, but I imagine that he has given the correct amount —ten per cent for education. I think that is a pretty fair figure. But I must say that we had it in mind that it was desirable to use a much bigger figure. There is a good deal to be said on either side about every advertisement.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was good enough to refer with commendation to the pamphlet "Mother and Child", of which more than a million copies have been circulated in Canada free. It has probably the greatest circulation of any single Canadian book except the bible. It was written by Doctor Couture for the department and widely circulated in both languages. Since that book has been distributed, infant and maternal mortality rates in Canada have improved. We do not claim credit for the improvement, but we do say that you cannot have improvement unless people know what should be done. The greatest thing that should be done in most of these fields is to see the doctor in time and to follow his advice.

The hon. member has asked me to say how much of this programme has been discussed with the provinces. A very considerable amount of it has been, through an agency known as the Dominion Council of Health, which meets twice a year, where representatives of the provinces, the dominion and the public meet together for three or four days and decide on programmes, and a very considerable proportion of this has been discussed by them. There is always a danger in saying how much a province has approved a thing, because some time later it may turn out that the required authority was not forthcoming from the province to give the appropriate blessing to that particular project. All we can do is consult with the officials and the ministers who are willing to consult with us. We have done that on every possible occasion; and I can assure the committee that the demands for expenditures by the dominion coming from the provinces are far greater than the expenditures we are providing for in these estimates.

Let us look at just one other possible comparison in this field. Perhaps it may not be so relevant; but if there is anything in the assertion I make that public information and education are important in the realm of health, then how important is it? Is it as important as advertising this particular brand or that particular commodity? The amount, if the total the hon. member says is right, as I assume it is, which we ask here as a possible expenditure would, I should think, judging from my experience in these matters, be a good deal less than half that sought for the advertising of particular commodities by half a dozen or more Canadian industries. We believe that these expenditures pay dividends just as industrialists believe that their expenditures pay. We believe that these expenditures have paid dividends in the past. I can remember when tuberculosis caused the deaths of 200 out of 100,000 Canadians, and I went as a small boy to the first anti-tuberculosis exhibition in Canada, on Ontario street in Montreal. It was one of the first in the world, and was the beginning of a campaign of education, and from that campaign has been produced the result that in forty years we have eradicated three-fourths of the former killing power of tuberculosis in Canada. I believe that we can do the same thing with other diseases and conditions, taking them one after another, and that also in the fields of nutrition and positive health and preventive medicine we can achieve still more.

With regard to the items for publicity, I would be glad to go into them if the hon. member wants to raise each one as it comes along. I would, however, ask him and the committee to consider that in working out the affairs of a department like this we are still understaffed; we have to do what we can with the people we can get, and we can lay out a programme and then find that it coincides with a victory loan or some other major national advertising campaign, so that it has to be postponed or dropped. It requires a good deal of flexibility in the arrangement of these things to make the most effective use of the money. I think we have done that. I have never heard any suggestion that any of the money was used for improper purposes.

The hon. member questioned this pamphlet about camping. We can show, for his testimony, I suppose, a hundred letters saying that it is a very good thing and asking for more copies. There are two opinions on most of these questions of publicity, but there are no two opinions, as I think the hon. member would be one of the first to agree, about the necessity for public education and publicity and information in the field of health. I respectfully represent to the committee that the total amount sought is not too large, having regard to the fact that some of these matters must be dealt with on a nation-wide basis if they are to have any effect. We endeavour to cooperate with the provinces and local agencies in every way we can; we will do the best we can with the money parliament allows us, and I believe it will pay dividends in the health of the Canadian people.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, there are a few words I should like to add to the discussion of this important matter. I regard as a very good sign the extent to which it has been argued by almost everyone who has taken part in the debate to-day that the health of our people should be a major concern of government. At times we hear theoretical arguments about the place of government in a democracy, and in such arguments there are those who contend that governments should interfere as little as possible with the affairs of the people. It is my view, however—and I think that view has been expressed by all who have spoken to-day—that in reality government is the collective effort of people in a democracy to make their own lives better and happier in every possible way; and I suggest that there is no sphere of our human activity in which more can be done toward achieving that ideal than in the sphere of health. I hope we may look forward in the years that lie ahead in Canada to an increasing part being played by governments in helping to improve the health of our people.

I had thought to make some comments on the criticisms levelled at the expense of information and publicity by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard; but perhaps the minister has already given an answer which, I am sure, will carry weight with the hon. member who made the criticisms. After all, what we need is not less information but more of it. It is still true that the truth can help to make us free from a good many diseases and other afflictions of human life.

I should like to say a word about a subject which was before us a good deal this afternoon, that of research into a number of different diseases. I want to support those who have pleaded with the minister for all the assistance the government can give to research in connection with cancer, arthritis and other ailments which have been mentioned to-day. The minister, in replying, told us of the way in which the government prefers to carry on its research in the medical field, that is by having it done through a committee of the national research council on which this department is represented, and I think most hon. members who have spoken agreed that that is the better way to do it. But sometimes we find, in dealing with governments, that when two bodies are concerned with the same matter there is a little tendency to "buck-passing"; and my only hope is that having this way of doing it will not be an excuse for the minimum amount being done.

I was glad to hear the minister suggest that in the matter of public information and education he had tried to get more from the treasury board than they were prepared to grant. I hope that in this matter of medical research, if it is left to a committee of the national research council he will fight with all the vigour he has and instruct the members of his department to do likewise, to ensure that just as much as possible can be done, and not simply the minimum, in this field.

In connection with medical research, there is this point I would ask him to consider, that it be not done only in laboratories. As hon. members know, only two days ago I was myself a patient in an institution in this country which is quite famous. As a matter of fact it is located in the minister's constituency. I refer to the Montreal neurological institute which has a considerable reputation not only throughout Canada but in all parts of the world. One of the main reasons for the fame of that institution is that it is not merely a hospital or merely a laboratory, but an institution in which the two are combined. We have there an eight-floor building, four floors of hospital and four floors of laboratory and experimental work, and it was my privilege, while there, to be not only a patient in bed, but, as a friend of some of the doctors, to get around and learn something of the work that is done in that institution. It was impressed upon me how valuable it is, in research into the kind of questions with which that institution is concerned, to have patients of all types and for the doctors and fellows by whom research is being carried on to have a chance to see not only the things in the test-tubes upstairs but the patients downstairs as well.

That raises the whole question as to whether there should not be some way whereby the government might make a grant not only for research in the laboratories but for the hospital side of an institution such as that, so that they can have patients who will enable those working there to do the best kind of research possible. I learned, while there, of the plea that Doctor Penfield, the superintendent, has been making for money, terribly small amounts of money, so that they may be able to minister to the needs of people who go there from all parts of Canada, and may be able to do research not only in some of the diseases mentioned to-day but in some others of a neurological nature, which also afflict a great many people in Canada. I do not expect the minister, since we have the estimates before us—and that is usually what passes in this house—to come back, before his department is through, with a promise of something else. I do ask him, however, to give consideration to this phase of research, namely, that it shall include not only the laboratory but the clinical side as well.

I would be remiss in my duty as one who feels a considerable debt of gratitude to the institution from which I have just come if I did not take this opportunity of stating that their position should be considered by the government. The institution is located in a city, in one of the provinces, and it receives some help from that city and that province; but it serves the whole of Canada and, indeed, has spread the name of Canada throughout the world because of the kind of work done there. I know the minister concurs in what I am saying about that institution, and I hope that consideration will be given to its needs, for the relief of human suffering, relief that might result from the expenditure of a very few thousand dollars in further research in the institution. The institution is already there and has its equipment; its need is sufficient money to make full use of it.

There are one or two other thoughts I would leave with the minister. When we speak in terms of national health, for the most part we think of curative and corrective measures, of hospitals and treatment. Yet we have come to realize in this day and age that preventive measures are of equal importance. I am not by any means a faddist in matters of this kind. In fact, in regard to what I am about to say, I realize that I have perhaps broken my own rule thousands of times. However, I am convinced that medical and scientific men have not yet scratched the surface of the whole question of nutrition and its effect in building sound health. I suggest that it should be the concern of government, which is the collective effort of the people of a democracy to make their own lives better, to do some real research in this whole field of proper foods. As has been said by others, the objective should be to make it possible for the people to get proper foods so that we might build up, in a generation or two, a healthier Canadian nation than we have so far known, and one that might not be prone to many of the ills that we have been discussing this afternoon and evening. This is one of the reasons, I confess, I did not follow very closely the thinking of the member for Vancouver-Burrard; for here is a field where, instead of laughing at the few suggestions that have been made with regard to balanced diets, we should encourage the government to go much farther in providing for research and information so that our people might take the lead in building health through proper diet and nutrition.

One other thought and I will conclude. I was interested in reading the remarks of the minister on behalf of Canada at the economic and social council of the united nations with respect to organizing the health of the world. As I read his remarks I was proud that he had taken the aggressive position that he did. It is important that we concern ourselves with the health not only of our own back yard but of the whole community and of the whole world. There is no freedom from disease for any of us until we rid the world of disease, and so I was proud of the aggressive stand which the minister took on behalf of Canada. I do not wish to detract from that compliment—I mean it—but it seemed to me that it was a different person who stood up in the house this afternoon and defended the government for not going farther and not acceding to the various requests made aggressively from this side during this debate. I would urge that the next time the minister appears in a meeting of the cabinet or of the treasury board in connection with these matters, he take on, not the character of one defending low expenditures, as he did this afternoon in defending failure to do this, that and the other thing, but rather the character that he had when he spoke at the economic and social council. I would ask him to get in there and fight for the very best and the most aggressive programme for public health which it is possible for us to achieve.

Mr. MERRITT: I do not want to be unpopular with the hon. member or with any other hon. members to my left, nor do I wish to be too persistent in bothering the minister and his staff. I wish to say, however, that when I spoke of expenditures with regard to publicity and information, obviously a proper field for his department, all I asked was that we should have proof that we were going to get value for our money. I do not think that the simple spending of money in this department will necessarily bring the wonderful things about which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke. It must go to the right place. One of the right places is the institute in Montreal which he mentioned, but that is by the way. My specific question to the minister was on this vote of $50,000. Would he say whether that money will be spent under a scheme now laid down by him to achieve certain purposes? If so, what are these purposes? Or is it a general reservoir into which these sub-departments may dip if they run beyond their own particular publicity vote?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am going to suggest to the minister a way in which this question could be answered. This vote is the same as the one we had last year. If the minister will give us a break-down of last year's vote, then I think we shall have the information that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is seeking.

Mr. CLAXTON: The expenditure out of the vote of $50,000 which was provided last year is not yet available to me here for the year ended March 31, 1946. I might say that the expenditures to December 31, 1945, which is the last figure I have here, were $2,421.71. That left a considerable amount to be expended out of this vote. I think I can tell the hon. member that this vote is not earmarked for any particular purpose. It is there to be used for purposes which do not fall under any of the specific votes, but are of such a nature that they apply to the department generally. The fact that the amount is set out does not, of course, mean that it will be fully spent. I think that gives the hon. member the answer he wants.

Mr. FLEMING: I have a question arising out of the answer just given. In view of the duty that is laid on the department to carry on the function of education and of the fact that an appropriation of $50,000 was provided last fall for that purpose, what reason is to be given to the committee for the fact that only $2,400 has been spent on this important work?

Mr. CLAXTON: On what side of this question are my hon. friend and his party?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I agree with the minister in his remark this evening that our greatest problem is one of education. Where education is at its lowest ebb we have some of the worst records of health, and that bears out what he said. Where there is ignorance we have fear, and where we have knowledge a lot of that fear disappears. There cannot be healthy people when the people are filled with fear. I recognize some of the difficulties of the minister in the operation of his department when there are nine provinces in each of which there is a department of health, and then more or less over and above these is the federal department. Would the minister explain how he decides how far his services shall go within each province? How does he spread his services? Does he spread the services in each province according to its need or according to the requests that have come in from the provincial governments, or does he carry on a sort of over-all service available to the provinces if and when they want it?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid it would have to depend on the kind of service that was considered. If it were in connection with venereal disease control, then there is provision for the allocation of money and medicines on an agreed basis with the provinces.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about your staff?

Mr. CLAXTON: If it is staff, then the family allowances staff, for example, is the staff which is necessary to do the job within each province. With regard to food and drugs laboratories, and inspection, the staff is located at points where they can do the job best through the country without regard to provincial boundaries. Apart from these two, we have not any staffs generally scattered through the country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wondered, because I noticed that outside of the welfare branch, which I presume is doing most of the work with regard to the family allowances, the health branch have some 197 of a staff on a temporary and permanent basis, exclusive of Ottawa. The department has seen fit to put one temporary member of the staff in Saskatchewan. I did not hear Alberta complaining of the fact that they have only four. I could not understand why it was that the staff had been spread in a somewhat inequitable way.

Mr. CLAXTON: These would be food and drug inspectors.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They do not require them in Saskatchewan? Is that the idea?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is generally related to the population and activities of various kinds in the provinces, particularly in centres where food is manufactured and distributed. If the hon. member assures me that there is one in Saskatchewan I will take his word for it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have the department's report.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would not think there would be more than one there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In your own report, which was issued this year, there appears at page 73 a list of the health branches in the various provinces. This shows that Nova Scotia has a total of sixty-four employes; Manitoba, twelve; British Columbia, forty-seven; New Brunswick, twenty-two, and Quebec, twenty-eight. They are spread out in that way, and it does seem rather inequitable, not that I am finding a great deal of fault with the minister; but if he is carrying on separate services with regard to laboratory work and drugs, finding out whether drugs and medicines are up to standard or whether these people are working in connection with the provincial governments on their educational work or whether it is a matter of seeing that the physical fitness programme is being carried on in the provinces, or whatever the function is, then there should be a more equitable distribution.

There is the problem of industrial diseases. Of course, that does not affect Saskatchewan to the same extent as it does others, but there must be the same problem of nutrition and the educational work that is to be carried on should be required there. I suggest that the department should have someone there keeping in contact with what the province is doing. Saskatchewan has an ambitious programme of health. They are taking the lead in the Dominion of Canada. At the present time the government is providing free medical services, free hospitalization, free medicine, and, where required and recommended by the medical men, free dental care for 25,000 people in the province who are old age pensioners or dependent under the children's allowance act of the province. If the present plans of the province materialize, for a small fee they are going to be given to every person, young or old, rich or poor in the province. I think that is something to which the present department of health could give a good deal of assistance in the way of advertising to show the people of Canada what can be done.

The other question that I wanted to ask the minister perhaps should be brought up under one of these other items. That is, among the important features of any health scheme are the medical men and social service workers and those who carry on the educational work, particularly in the preventive field. In that connection I was just wondering whether the minister could tell us if any encouragement is given in regard to the training of medical men throughout Canada. During the war special grants were made, I believe through the Department of Labour, for the training of these people. In peace time we still require these medical men; Canada is still short of trained people in these fields, particularly in the field of preventive medicine. We are looking forward to the day when we shall be paying our medical men to keep the people of Canada well, and when we shall give them proper remuneration for that work. Those of us who lived on the western prairies during the hard years of the drought saw the medical men doing splendid work, giving everything they had and getting very little for it. The idea of paying our medical men to keep us well seems to me a much sounder principle than to have people who become ill unable to pay their medical men and feel themselves not in a position to call them. Would it not be much better for every person to know that whenever they become ill they may call in the doctor and receive proper hospital and medical treatment irrespective of their ability to pay at the time? Very often the poorest families are the largest, and that is where care is needed and where we find the least money per capita being spent on the service most required. If the minister is aiming to establish a healthy Canada, it seems to me he will have to face that problem, of setting up within this country a form of state medicine under which our medical people will be paid to keep us well.

Some of the figures across Canada in regard to certain diseases are alarming. Already in this debate statements have been made concerning health conditions among our Indians. When I think of some of the treaties that were signed with our red brothers, in which we said we would take care of them; then when I read some of the records in regard to the deathrate per 100,000 of population from tuberculosis in the various provinces, I hang my head in shame when I reflect what these people must think of those who made such promises to their forebears. For instance, I see that in Manitoba the death rate from tuberculosis is 1,421 per 100,000 among the Indians as compared with twenty-four among the white people. In Alberta it is 1,249·7 as compared with eighteen among the white people. The rate for all Canada is 757 among the Indians and forty-five among the white people.

The infant mortality rates in Canada, too, are such that we should hang our heads in shame. I notice that in some of the eastern provinces the rates are very high; and if this department is going to carry on an educational programme to better that condition, I should be quite satisfied to see only one of the minister's representatives in Saskatchewan and all the rest distributed throughout the other provinces where they are needed to carry on this work. The province of Alberta has, I think, four representatives of this department of the 197 in Canada outside of Ottawa. The infant mortality rates reveal that the figures for Quebec city are something like three times as high as those for some other cities. According to the report of the department, the rate in Vancouver and Calgary was twenty-nine, and it goes up from that figure as you go across Canada, taking in Hamilton, Victoria, London, Toronto, Saskatoon, Halifax, Ottawa, Regina and Windsor, where the rate is forty-six. The figure for Saint John, New Brunswick, is fifty; for Winnipeg, fifty-two; for Montreal and Verdun, sixty-one; for Three Rivers, seventy-one and for Quebec city, 104. Surely some big problem is involved there which will have to be faced, and I hope that in the course of his remarks the minister will inform the committee as to what plans he has in mind to deal with this situation.

Mr. FLEMING: Last evening, Mr. Chairman, I ventured several observations, to which the minister replied. If I may do so without wearying the committee I wish to go back to one or two of those matters, because in the course of the last few minutes I think we have had light thrown on the answers given me by the minister last night.

First, I suggested that there was a distinct lack of information in the estimates as they have been laid before the house. I pointed out that we do not have before us the actual expenditures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, at a time when we are being asked to approve estimates amounting to tremendous sums of money. Last evening I was told by the minister that the information would be forthcoming in due course in the public accounts. How many months must pass before the public accounts will be available we do not know, but certainly it will be long after the estimates now before the committee are disposed of. The public accounts will not be of the slightest assistance to us in reviewing the estimates now before us.

This evening we have dealt with one aspect of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, namely the expenditure on publicity and information. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has pointed out that this item holds such importance in the estimates of this department that it totals over half a million dollars. But when we come to the first item, and seek, for this committee of the whole, information which any intelligent committee ought to have before it undertakes to approve a request for another $50,000 under the first item concerning publicity and information, the minister is not able to furnish the committee with the expenditure under this item last year. Here it is May 31, two months after the close of the fiscal year, and we are told that it is not within the power of the minister to tell this committee what the expenditures under this item were during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946. As a new member of this house, I say that that statement shocks me. We are asked to vote $50,000 on this item alone, and over half a million dollars on similar items scattered throughout the items for this department. On this first item alone it is not within the power of the minister to give the committee this information. It would not have surprised me if the minister had said, "I have not this information before me, but I shall have it for the committee on Monday." But the minister did not answer that he did not have the information; he answered that the information was not available.

If the committee of the whole is to have to do business in that way it might just as well fold up and decide to pass these items holusbolus. A lot of general information is not of the slightest value. We are sent here for a purpose; we are sent here to review estimates that total between three and four billion dollars. Are we not to be expected to apply even elementary business sense to a task of that kind? We asked for information about the expenditure last year under this item and we were told it is not available. We are now two months beyond the close of the fiscal year.

That is not all. Last night I suggested that it would be of assistance to the house in discharging its duties in connection with these estimates if the House set up a committee of reasonable size which could get information first hand from the officials of the department. Surely the officials of the department are not made of fragile glass. They do not need to be insulated from members of parliament. Surely to goodness, we have a sense of responsibility and we can bear that sense of responsibility in mind when we are in committee. Why should it be so necessary to insulate these officials of the department from the members of the house, especially when it comes to seeking information which I say should be before us if this committee is to do its duty in connection with these estimates?

Last night I put forward the idea that there ought to be a standing committee on health, welfare and social security, which could review the estimates of this department, not with a view to depriving this committee of supply of its proper opportunities to consider the estimates but rather to supplement its work, to assist it and to get information first hand from the officials of the department. Apparently that was not approved by the minister. What do we find to-night? When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked for information about these items, what was he told? In connection with the publicity items totalling half a million dollars he was told that they were put in—I think I am quoting the words of the minister—by the officials of the depatrment.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is not so at all.

Mr. FLEMING: That was the significance of the minister's remarks as conveyed to me, and I made an immediate note of them. Would it not be a good idea for the members, not in any spirit of hositility—I do not want anyone to get that impression at all—but with a view to discharging our duty, to get information and to apply our intelligence based on that information to a review of these estimates to see whether they are reasonable and should be passed and approved. How can we do that when we do not get information, when we are told that these items were put in by the officials of the department?

I should like very much to have an opportunity of asking the officials of the department about the method by which they arrived at these substantial figures. I should like to ask them, what are the programmes, the well thought-out and carefully integrated programmes which they ought to have had in mind, yes even as far advanced as the blueprint stage, long before they asked the minister to take the responsibility of going before the treasury board and asking for substantial amounts of money under the heading of information and publicity? Would that not be the responsible course? Would that not be a course that would permit this House of Commons to do its duty?

A word in conclusion about the general attitude toward this and other items in the minister's estimates. I tried to make it perfectly clear last night that we of the official opposition attach the utmost importance to the work of this department. I think I indicated that we had the view that there are no two more important aspects of government administration than health and welfare. Therefore, let no one say that it is in any spirit of hostility to health and welfare that we approach our duty with regard to these estimates. I indicated last night, and I repeat now, that in approaching these estimates we want information. We want to be sure that what is asked for here will represent the soundest application of the taxpayer's dollar. that the taxpayer is going to get value in good administration of health and good administration of welfare services for the dollar he is being asked to pay.

We are going to have the budget before us before very long, we hope. What are we to be told by the Minister of Finance when we come to discuss taxes? I think it is fair to say that if the minister recommends any reduction in taxation he will say that that can be done only to the extent that we are prepared to spend less. If he does not recommend any reduction in taxes he will probably say that he could not do so because the house has insisted on large expenditures for certain services that are considered by the house to be necessary. Would it not be helpful to the Minister of Finance; would it not be helpful to ourselves if we weighed in the light of common sense and in the light of information, which we do not seem to have at the present time, these expenditures that we are being asked to pass?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking of the duty and functions of this department to provide and disseminate educational information throughout Canada, said that what we need is not less information, but more information. Those are true words, and if I might add to them I would say that what we need is the best possible information. It is only when we get the best possible information that shall have the best application of the taxpayer's dollar. The minister has said, and rightly, that our health problem to-day is, in effect, to close the gap between what we know and what we do, that that is the way to meet the killers of humanity. I wonder how much this department is contributing to the elimination of those killers by this May "filler" issued by the department:

> Better health and greater happiness for children are expected to result from wise spending of the family allowance it is stated by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Ottawa. A family's basic needs include adequate food, clothing, shelter and medical supervision. Family allowance officials suggest that, when all these things have been provided, parents use what is left of their income on extras calculated to add zest to living.

Is it making the wisest application of the taxpayer's dollar, the dollar which the Minister of Finance may be trying to conserve when he brings in his budget, to tell the people of Canada to use the money paid out in family allowances to add zest to living? Is there a member of this house who thinks that is adding to the education or information of the people of Canada on necessary matters of health, to be told to use the remainder of the family allowances to add zest to living? I hope, Mr. Chairman, that is not a fair sample of the kind of publicity which is being issued by this department. I hope it is not a fair sample of the way in which the taxpayers are being called upon to contribute over half a million dollars to the publicity channels alone of this department.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I think the issue is perfectly clear. But I do want in all good part to say to the minister that we have important estimates of his department to review. We do not intend to approach them in any spirit of hostility, but we want to see the money spent wisely on health and welfare, and so far as we can be satisfied that the money is to be devoted to wise purposes we shall be back of his programme to a man. But we shall want a lot more information than we have yet been given.

I ask the minister now, with a week-end ahead of us, if before this committee proceeds to consider the detailed items of his estimates he will provide the house with information on all expenditures of his department for publicity last year; that is the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, in all these branches in which we are asked to approve appropriations for publicity and information. In the second place, will he give the committee the expenditures made by this department during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, for publicity and information representing payments made outside of departmental salaries, that is to persons outside the department, and to whom these amounts were paid, and what the amounts were? I think the committee will receive that information with appreciation.

There has been enough said in all parts of the house, at least by those who sit on this side of the house, to make it clear to the minister that we want to see carried on a greatly extended programme of research. There is great hope in the realm of research, and if it comes to choosing between expenditures on research and expenditures on publicity of this kind I think it is the duty of the house to make it quite clear to the minister for his guidance and that of the government in future that we would rather see the money spent on research. Where money can be spent wisely on education, let it be spent, but spend it wisely.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have spoken on this department. I can assure you I have listened with a great deal of interest to those who have preceded me. It seems to me that the one great plea that has been made by all speakers is that the function of the Department of National Health and Welfare should be widened in its scope, that it should become more effective, that we should have more research, that other types of health service should be set up, and especially should we try to facilitate the cure of those who are suffering from such maladies as arthritis, cancer and other diseases which are looked upon as being more or less incurable.

I rise to mention what may appear to be a rather tiny thing but one which some speakers have overlooked. I refer particularly to the security of those sufferers, perhaps incurable, who because of their financial circumstances are thrown upon either charitable institutions or perhaps upon their civic governments to receive assistance in the form of relief, which, after all, is a pittance, or else have to rely upon the good graces of friends or perhaps their relatives who are not in a position to keep them. I think we could all cite a good many such cases. The minister may feel that this does not primarily come within his department, but his department is known as the Department of National Health and Welfare and the minister is due sooner or later to put through a measure of social security.

I had several cases brought to me last year, one that I am particularly well acquainted with. This young woman was afflicted with infantile paralysis, and it was found, after some considerable treatment through the programme of the Alberta government, that nothing much could be done for her because the disease had gone too far. She is one of the finest types of young women I have ever met. Her mother is a widow. This young woman wrote to me and said, "Mr. Hansell, what am I going to do? Is my widowed mother to keep me for the rest of my life?" That is only one case, but I am certain that it could be duplicated thousands and thousands of times in Canada.

I had another case of an epileptic woman. Her mother and father were on the old age pension. She said, "My only help is from my mother and father." I speak for these people because, while these cases may not be so numerous as others, and they are scattered throughout the length and breadth of this land, they have no organization. It is almost impossible for these incurables to bring into existence an organization that can present their case and mobilize public opinion behind them. Yet I suppose there is not a member of parliament sitting here to-night, or sitting anywhere else on this Friday night, who is not just as anxious about these cases as I am. I think we are all agreed that something should be done for them, and I plead on their behalf that something should be done for them. I know I have the support of parliament. I would ask the minister what he is prepared to do for them. Are they still to be considered as indigents, a word that has fallen into miserable disrepute? Are they to be considered as relief recipients, another term that has fallen into disrepute? Surely our country and civilization are worth more than that. I ask the minister what he or his government is prepared to do for these unfortunate people; I do not know what his answer is going to be.

Nearly everyone who has spoken to-day has raised his voice on behalf of patients afflicted with cancer, arthritis and rheumatic diseases. I am not going to repeat their pleas; I would just add mine as one more voice, one more pleading voice, perhaps a "still small voice" that is "crying in the wilderness", but surely 245 voices all crying in the same wilderness should bring forth some results.

I was particularly interested in the speech this afternoon of the hon. member for Lethbridge. I really think he put the minister on the spot. As he was speaking I fancied he was a mind-reader and could almost tell beforehand what the minister's reply would be. When the minister rose to reply to these pleading voices, I thought he was floundering around, probably because the hon. member for Lethbridge had stolen some of his thunder. When the minister had finished his reply I wondered whether I dared send out Hansard to these people who had written in asking us to lift our voices on their behalf. I could imagine the young woman whom I have referred to as an infantile paralysis case, the paralytic girl I have in mind, and a host of others getting copies of Hansard, looking at the index to find the Department of National Health and Welfare, turning over the pages anxiously to see what the government was going to do for them, and then reading the minister's speech.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And your remarks, too.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, and my remarks too. What a disappointment they would have! I believe they would put Hansard aside and say, "Well, I suppose we shall have to await another election for a few more promises, and perhaps by the time I am an old woman"—or, an old man—"I may get an extra few dollars." It seems to me that that is all the minister's answer amounted to.

I appreciated what the hon. member for Lethbridge said as to what was the source of the minister's trouble, and I am confident that he was right. All of us want our people to be healthy; all of us want clinics to be established and research to be proceeded with. But it costs money. That is where the "sticker" is, and let us admit it; the minister does not know where to get the wherewithal to finance these projects. He said that the solution offered by this Social Credit group is a solution of "funny money." I believe Hansard will record that he made that statement—"funny money"—and of course he was not going to use that and put the economy of Canada into, I think he said, a "jackpot" or something like that.

Let me ask him one or two questions. How does he know that the money we would propose to get is funny money? And how does he know that if he used a few million dollars of national money, issued without debt to the taxpayer and the country, he would upset our whole economy or put it into a jackpot or a cocked hat or whatever term he wants to use? How does he know?

Mr. MITCHELL: Ask yourself the same question.

Mr. HANSELL: My suggestion is this, try it and see. I am not saying that he should go to the Bank of Canada and say, "Mr. Banker, give us a billion dollars"; I am asking him to go there for a few paltry millions. We have been talking throughout the war years in terms of billions. Let him go and ask for $5,000,000.

Mr. PROBE: Let him make it a little more than that.

Mr. HANSELL: Why, $5,000,000 is just chicken feed.

An hon. MEMBER: Some chicken.

Mr. MITCHELL: Social Credit feed.

Mr. HANSELL: I expect my congregations in the churches where I preach to come forward with a little more than chicken feed. Let him try this; let him ask for $10,000,000. Surely that is only a drop in the bucket.

Do I understand that the Minister of Finance poked his head in the curtain and then pulled it back again?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is just saying that to bolster up his speech.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That actually happened.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, that actually happened.

Mr. HANSELL: I did not hear the Minister of Labour. When I was a boy we used to go out snaring gophers. We put the snare around the top of the hole; there we would stay for one minute, two minutes, five minutes, maybe fifteen minutes, and when that gopher put his head up through the hole we would pull, very often only to find that the gopher was a little faster than we were. I think that was the case with the Minister of Finance; perhaps he pulled his head in before I could pull the snare.

Let the government ask the Bank of Canada to bring in a little legislation which will issue, free of debt, about $10,000,000—surely that is not going to upset the whole economy of the country—and see what effect it has. I challenge them to do that and prove whether or not that money would be phoney money and whether the issuance of it would knock the economy of this country into a cocked hat. I challenge the minister to do that. Just a paltry $10,000,000, chicken feed.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not make it $10 billion? If you want to be foolish, be foolish.

Mr. HANSELL: You would be afraid to do that. I would not want the minister to do it with a palpitating heart, fearing he is going to ruin the economy of the country. I am suggesting $10,000,000, mere chicken feed. I am suggesting that he pay it out for national health. That is not very much to spend for such a purpose. If he does not do it, this country should know that he regards the mighty and holy dollar as more sacred than the health and welfare of our children.

I think that is a good place to stop.

Mr. McKAY: Just one brief word before we pass this item. Since my speech on cancer this afternoon I have been making a brief examination of the annual report of the department of public health of Alberta, and from what I see there I have every reason to congratulate that province on the splendid progress it has made in developing cancer clinics. It was not my intention this afternoon to make any invidious comparisons between provinces, but I would say this. If there is to be a race between one province and another to see which develops the best cancer clinics, I am all for it. Saskatchewan has set up free clinics, free in very sense of the word, free diagnosis, free X-rays, free radium treatment and free surgical treatment, without any limits, for rich and poor alike.

Mr. IRVINE: Free hospitalization?

Mr. McKAY: Yes, and free hospitalization, without limit and absolutely without cost. It is my hope that every province will do likewise in order to defeat this terrible scourge.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is one thing I would ask the minister to do. It does not come within his department and the budget is no doubt being prepared. When it is brought down I hope the minister will use his influence with the Department of Finance to see if we cannot get invalid equipment brought into the country duty free. I know that certain types of chairs, bed-tables and so on, used by invalids, come under a fairly high rate of duty, and I think this is one place where it would cost the government very little and would bring a good deal of relief to people who have sickness in their families. I mean the placing on the free list of equipment of that type for the assistance of invalids. I will support any appropriation that is made to assist in the study of cancer, rheumatic diseases, sclerosis and those mysterious diseases which afflict so many people at the present time, but I would ask the minister if this might be kept in mind when the budget is brought down.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely the minister will reply to the request for information from the hon. member for Eglinton. He has requested certain information which in the past in other departments has undoubtedly been forthcoming—the amount expended under the vote in the previous fiscal year. Surely the minister will comply with that request.

Mr. CLAXTON: In reply to the member for Rosetown-Biggar, as he probably knows, the Department of Veterans Affairs has succeeded in securing the entry of such equipment for veterans, and I have been greatly interested lately in receiving representations by the veterans themselves that they would be glad to see such equipment imported free into Canada for other than ex-soldiers. I shall be glad indeed to see every possible consideration given the representation.

With regard to the questions of the hon. member for Eglinton, I have not, I hope, given the impression that I was not willing to give any information, or that I was finding it difficulty to give any. It is perfactly possible, given time, to secure information on any expenditure by the government; and when I gave the figure before, of the expenditure made under this vote of $2,421, that was the figure I had before me. Since then, however, I have sent out for further information, and I find that we have a figure for the period up to March 31, 1946 of a total expenditure for the year of $24,959.68. Also, I am told that the unexpended balance at March 31, 1946, of $25,040.32 was committed for in part, although the accounts were not submitted and therefore not paid, and since the vote expired the amount due on the commitment will have to be paid out of the 1946-47 publicity vote. In this connection there is, as I explained, I hope to the satisfaction of the committee, quite a wide demand for a wide variety of publicity activities, which it is not possible to allocate under the different departmental heads such as nutrition, tuberculosis, venereal disease, child and maternal hygiene and the like, and it is necessary to provide for their general allocation. This vote is used for that purpose. I shall be glad indeed to obtain from the treasury, as the figures become available, anything that my hon. friend wants. As he knows, every member is entitled to that and he will get it. It is just a question of availability at any particular moment. He must realize that it is not possible for one to carry with him into the house the breakdown of every expenditure up to date. I hope, therefore, that with that explanation it will be agreed that the item should pass; and in view of the interest he has taken, and which other hon. members have shown in these items, I shall endeavour to obtain the information from the officers of the department and the treasury and have them available when these estimates next come before the house.

Just one further word. The hon. member seemed to suggest that the officers of the department were responsible for the estimates. He must know that the deputy ministers draw up the estimates after consultation with their officials, as a result of weeks and months of work, having regard to what they plan, what they spend and what they expect to do, and in the light of the over-all position. It is then taken up with the minister and, when signed by him, is put before the treasury and then ultimately brought before parliament. I hope the hon. member did not suggest that there was anything wrong with officials putting forward estimates. There is no other way in which it can be done at the initial stage, but the estimates must, of course, be put forward by the deputy ministers, and by the ministers before parliament.

One word in reply to the hon. member for Macleod. I would be very glad indeed if I could give him all the assurances he wants, both on fiscal and other matters, but in regard to disability benefits we did have a debate in the house, and I indicated what I considered would be the right view at that particular moment, on that occasion. I do not think he would want me to go over it at this time; but I must say that I have, as everyone has, the utmost sympathy for the people who are afflicted as those are whom he had in mind. It is a question of what agency should look after them. If it is decided that it should be some agency other than that which it always has been, then I think it is something for the provinces and the dominion to agree to. Until that is done all we can do is to continue to administer the laws in accordance with the constitution.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad that my hon. friends to the right insisted on an explanation of the vote that was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. When the minister gave the explanation that of the $50,000 vote he could account for $2,400 which had been expended up to December 31, 1945, I thought it was the most amazing answer that I had ever heard given this house over a period of fifteen years. So far as hon. members are concerned, these estimates are important or they are not. A mere item in the estimates does not mean anything to a member unless he has an explanation of what it is for. Indeed, a member should not pass such an item unless he knows what use is to be made of it.

I am not at all satisfied with the explanation given by the minister a moment ago as to how these estimates are arrived at. Surely he does not arrive at an estimate by saying or have someone from his staff say that we shall put down $50,000 for this and $25,000 for that and so on. Surely, when an estimate of $50,000 or of any amount is put down under any particular head there is before the minister a description, not a complete itemized account as to how it is to be spent, but at least an indication of what is to be done with it. It seems to me that is the only way that an item makes any sense when it comes here, and the only way in which the minister can make it real to the members of the committee. That is why I suggested, since this is a new department, that a break-down of the item of last year, which I insist the minister ought to have before him when he came into the committee, would be the easiest way to arrive at whether or not the money was well spent.

I do not want to draw any invidious comparisons between one minister and another. Certainly I do not wish to do that so far as the present minister is concerned. I did not take any part in the discussion of the estimates of the department which were before the committee for about a week. I am sure that those who did take part in that discussion found that they got about all the information they could be given, and I do not see any reason why we should not receive the same information from the department with which we are now dealing.

I wish to say a few words on the general subject which has been discussed to-night. I find it difficult to understand my Social Credit friends. If my memory serves me aright, I believe that one of them said in a public speech a few days ago that that country was governed best that was governed least. If that is a good maxim to go by, surely we should not ask in the next breath that the minister of health or any minister should inject himself and his department into every phase of our economic, cultural and social life. Either we want a government to do things or we do not. I take the position which was taken a little earlier in the evening, perhaps in a different way, that the government is an agency of the people which does for the people collectively what they are not able to do for themselves individually. The moment our affairs reach the stage in any department where the collective will and the collective effort of the people can be mobilized to do the thing which individually we are no longer able to do for ourselves, then at that moment that thing is ripe for government action. Our health affairs have in many respects, perhaps not all, reached that stage. I do not believe—if I ever did, it was a wrong belief—that health is a matter that can be maintained by doctors. I believe the more doctors you have, the more disease.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: The diseases of your grandparents and their parents were few and simple.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We had no doctors.

Mr. MacINNIS: We had no doctors. When you multiply your doctors you multiply the number of diseases, and if you are not sick before you see a doctor you will be sick afterwards. That will continue to be the state of affairs until, as some hon. member said this afternoon, the doctor becomes an educator who will tell the people how to maintain health rather than try to cure people when through their bad habits they get into ill health.

There is not an hon. member in this chamber to-night who does not know that by his own actions he can make himself sick within the next day or so. He knows equally well—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: Every intelligent person knows that if he takes care he can preserve his health and feel fit from day to day. I believe in public health. I believe that fresh air and the plentiful use of soap and water do more to promote health than anything else.

An hon. MEMBER: Just water?

Mr. MacINNIS: I always insist on drinking water. That is why I keep my health. You cannot take it out of a bottle with a spoon or from a pill in a bottle or a box you carry in your pocket. If we and the minister are to deal with this matter effectively we shall have to work to get the cooperation of the provinces so that we can have a national health system. I thought under the then Minister of Pensions and National Health, with the efforts that were made in 1942 and, I think, in 1943—the fact that we were coming to an election in those days may have had nothing to do with it—we were really moving toward a national health system for Canada. I do not know why the thing has fallen down, why it is to be thrown away now after so much very good work has been done. The staff of the former department did excellent work, and we should carry on with that work, despite certain set-backs, until we convince the people of Canada that a national health system will pay for itself.

Mrs. STRUM: I almost got shut out to-night by being a gentleman, and I am going to quit acting that way. I want to say a few things under the general item which cannot be said under the item concerning child and maternal welfare, on which I intend to speak again. I wish to congratulate the minister on bringing to this country from England a distinguished person, Sir Wilson Jameson. It was a very great privilege to listen to him, and I only regret that all hon. members of this house did not attend the meeting in the railway committee room.

Mr. JACKMAN: We were practically all there.

Mrs. STRUM: If you were I did not see you.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was amazed myself.

Mrs. STRUM: I thought it was a great advantage to have first-hand the plans of the government of Great Britain and the marvellous example they are setting the world. Here we have this devastated country, which had one-third of its homes damaged or destroyed, undertaking a great rehousing programme with public money.

Mr. GRANT: We are giving them the money.

Mrs. STRUM: I am coming to that. They are undertaking subsidized housing, so that even the poorest people can live in decent houses even if they cannot pay economic rents. These people who are undertaking this terrific thing in housing are now undertaking a terrific thing in public health. I think this is the valuable thing the British people do. They meet a need and establish a precedent; that is the British tradition which I am proud to own. Here we have the British people, in the hour of their extremity, amid the ruins of their homes and their country, planning to supply forty million people with complete coverage, while we in this country, who did not have one home destroyed; who have more equipment and a greater production potential and greater wealth than we had before the war are still denying help to the poor arthritics, the victims of infantile paralysis, the victims of cancer, the victims of any one of a hundred other things which can kill you—and you will be just as dead. Here we are still saying we do not know where we are to get the money. I think we need education, but even more I believe we need some political education in this country, the sort of thing that will tell the people that Great Britain now has undertaken to own, in the name of all the people, the basic industries and to spend for the good of all the people the revenue derived from their operation. I have in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen containing a news dispatch dated May 14, 1946, from the London representative of that newspaper, outlining the objectives and the accomplishments of the Labour government of Great Britain. It says:

1. Every man, woman and child will get free medical attention under a national health scheme and every general practitioner will be working for the state at an average salary of $4,500.

2. Apart from this national health scheme, the social security of every Briton, regardless of financial status, will be guaranteed by the state from the day of his birth to the day of his death and including allowances to mothers before the babies are born.

It goes on to say that England will now have state-owned and state-operated coal mines, and goes through the whole catalogue of resources of England from which the people will now enjoy the revenue. They will own the great public utilities of England; the revenue will go into the treasury and will be returned to the people in housing, in health and in well-being. That is the sort of education I am interested in. That is the sort of education I intend to carry on inside and outside this house as long as I am able to do so, because the people of this country need to be told that this government refuses to undertake the technique that will replenish the treasury so that adequate funds may be given to the Minister of Health and Welfare, who is now doing an execellent job, with the limited resources his party allows him to have, in looking after the health of this country.

I believe in public education. We have all kinds of voluntary organizations doing excellent work. For twenty years I belonged to the women's institutes of my province. For twenty years we circulated petitions and passed resolutions, until we were black in the face. We asked for better old age pensions, for mothers' allowances, for blood testing of both contracting parties before marriage, for free textbooks, for free cancer care. These simple, sensible human needs of the people we asked for again and again; we carried on public education, but it was not until our province got political education and elected a C.C.F. government that we got all these things. And we got them in one year. To-day our financial position is better than it has ever been in the history of the province, regardless of the fact that we had a severe drought last year. You need only consult the bond markets to see that our bonds have hit a new high. We have retired a sizeable chunk of the public debt, and our sinking fund is much greater than it was two years ago.

It is true that education is a necessary thing, but I did not notice any campaign of education about this time last year directed toward family allowances. I did not know of any widespread demand for them, unless it was from the party I represent, because ever since I was in New Zealand five years ago I have been talking about family allowances. We got family allowances, but I submit that the Prime Minister did a good thing for a bad reason. That was not preceded by years of public education, either. So I submit that political education is the thing this country lacks most of all.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria) moved that the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented on May 30, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

LABELLING OF CANS—CANNED FISH OR SHELLFISH

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 164, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. STIRLING: Explain.

Mr. BRIDGES: By way of explanation I might say that this bill is composed of only two sections. The first section is to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act so that it will no longer be compulsory for dealers to have cans of fish or shellfish labelled with the name of the place and/or province where the same are packed. The present requirement causes unnecessary hardship to assemblers who pack or buy a number of products in more than one province, in which case labels have to be made for each type of product and for each province where it was packed. The amendment will make this no longer necessary. I might also say that the present requirement is now unnecessary, as under the regulations all cans are required to be embossed with the registered mark or number of the cannery in which they are packed.

The second section of the bill substitutes "fish or shellfish" for the word "lobster". This change will provide statutory authority for the establishment of standards of quality and grades for canned fish or shellfish in addition to lobster if the need for such is established to the satisfaction of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REDISTRIBUTION

APPLICATION OF CENSUS ENUMERATION NOW PROCEEDING IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. To-day the census taking of the three western provinces is beginning. Will the distribution of constituencies in the three provinces be based upon the census now being taken, or upon the 1941 census?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I have not had an opportunity to give consideration to the hon. member's question, but I can say at this time that under the British North America Act as it stands the redistribution would have to be made on the basis of the 1941 census. The ten year census is the one which is required to be used for the purposes of redistribution. Whether or not there could be any change made in that is something to which further consideration would have to be given.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister intend to make an amendment to the British North America Act to cover this present census?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The intentions of the government with respect to redistribution that are ready for announcement are those disclosed in the resolution which is now on the order paper. If any other decision is arrived at, it will be made known in due course.

SEAMEN'S STRIKE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Is the Minister of Labour in a position to give us a statement on the progress made towards settlement of the seamen's dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): All I can say is this, that I met the operators and the seamen last Thursday and suggested what I suppose people might call an armistice in view of what has occurred since then. The ship owners are meeting in Montreal to-day, and I expect to meet them in Ottawa on Wednesday. I met the men's representatives this morning. A good many people, of course, give wonderful advice as to settling labour disputes, but, as the hon. member knows, there is no short-cut in these matters. The department has been fortunate in settling every dispute which came before it up to now, and I hope that good sense will prevail on both sides and will settle this one.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope the Minister is not trying to give the impression that I am attempting to give him advice as to how to settle this dispute.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No hope.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says there is no hope.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say that the hon. member for Vancouver East has always been very helpful in these matters.

REPORTED DISTURBANCE AT CORNWALL, ONT.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): I should like to know from the Minister of Labour whether the government is making an investigation of the disturbance in connection with the strike reported from Cornwall, Ontario?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer at the moment is, no.

TRANSPORTATION OF STRIKE BREAKERS

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I have a question to address to the Minister of Justice; I am sorry I have not had time to give him notice of it. Has the minister been informed that persons hired and transported by the Fidelity Detective Agency of Montreal provoked the disturbances and thereby incited civil strife in Cornwall, in the current dispute of the Canadian Seamen's Union?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just direct a supplementary question to the Minister? Will the Minister of Justice look into this, and if he finds that the facts are as outlined, prevent such incitements to civil strife?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Minister of Justice has no means of preventing illegal acts apart from endeavouring to have all the constituted authorities of the country carry out their own responsibilities, and, to the extent to which he has jurisdiction to do that, it will be done.

Mr. COLDWELL: That will be done.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What is the minister doing to prevent the menace to navigation and property involved in the sailing of inadequately manned ships during this strike?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman sent me no notice of the question, but in any event I can reply that the Minister of Transport is taking all means to keep the waterways of the country open and is seeing to it that the property of the crown is protected from damage and from violence thereon.

VICTORY CELEBRATION

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION—MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AWARDED V.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): In view of the fact that New Zealand is sending its winner of Victoria Cross with bar to London to the victory parade, will the government give consideration, in view of the fact that we have in the House of Commons two winners of the V.C., to flying them to London for the victory parade?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): No notice was given of this question. There has been no consultation with the two V.C.'s in the house, and under the circumstances I do not know what answer to give to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just say "yes".

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the representation in London has already been arranged, but I will discuss the matter with my colleagues.

Mr. FRASER: Take it into consideration.

HOUSING

CONDITIONS AT CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queen's): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, of which I have given him due notice. Is the government taking action for the assistance of some one hundred families regarding housing conditions at the Charlottetown airport? If so, what action?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The answer is, yes The project originally entered into in November, 1945 and effective until May 31, 1946, is being continued, by arrangement, for an additional three months, during which time plans will be made for alternative accommodation.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to make provision for public control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and in connection therewith to provide for the incorporation of the atomic energy control board; the creation of corporations to carry out certain powers of the board which may be more conveniently performed by separate corporations; to provide for the appointment of members of the board and its officers and employees, their tenure of office, remuneration and expenses; to provide for the organization, administration and financing of the corporations; also to provide for the superannuation, pension and other rights of the employees of the board and of the corporations; and also that the board may, with the approval of the governor in council acquire or cause to be acquired by purchase, lease, requisition or expropriation, prescribed substances and any mines, deposits or claims of prescribed substances and any works or property for production or preparation for production of, or for research or investigation with respect to, atomic energy.

He said: Recent developments in the field of atomic energy have placed Canada in a unique position among the nations of the world, in that Canada is an important source of raw material and, as well, shares with the United States the position of having a plant able to produce the final product from which atomic energy can be released. For that reason it is essential that legislative action be taken by parliament to control both the production of atomic energy and the materials from which this energy is derived. It is also of the first importance to encourage further research and development towards a peaceful and constructive application of atomic energy, under proper safeguards.

Hon. members are familiar with the part which Canada has played in the development of the atomic bomb. The house will recall that the primary materials required for atomic fission is uranium. The Eldorado mine on Great Bear lake is the second most important deposit of uranim oxide that has been discovered to date. The importance of this material as a potential war weapon was recognized some three years ago when the government expropriated the ownership of the Eldorado mine near Great Bear lake in the northwest territories, together with its refinery located at Port Hope, Ontario.

Activities in the field of atomic energy have been carried on in close association with the United Kingdom and the United States. In 1942 the Montreal laboratory was established, and leading scientists of the United Kingdom joined with those of Canada to press forward the development of the science of atomic energy. In 1943 the United States had made such progress in developments leading towards the possibility of creating a successful atomic bomb that it became clear that allied efforts in this field should be coordinated and closely integrated. Accordingly a combined policy committee representative of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada was formed under the chairmanship of Mr. Stimson, United States Secretary of War. Other United States representatives were President Conant, of Harvard university, and Mr. Vannevar Bush, president of the Carnegie institute. The United Kingdom was represented by Lord Halifax and Field Marshal Sir Maitland Wilson. The Canadian membership on the committee was held by myself, as Minister of Munitions and Supply.

In pre-war years the United Kingdom government had made a substantial contribution to the development of atomic energy in the field of research. The joint British-Canadian laboratory in Montreal continued this work. The Montreal organization came under the administrative control of our national research council and this laboratory, with a staff of over 340, became the largest organization ever created in this country to carry out a single research project.

Prior to the war, Eldorado mine and its refinery at Port Hope had been concerned primarily with the production of radium, with uranium as a less important by-product. Radium was in over supply at the outbreak of the war, and as a consequence the operation of the mine at Great Bear lake had been suspended. When the importance of uranium was recognized the mine was reopened and brought back into production as rapidly as possible. The refinery was enlarged and was used to refine ore from foreign sources during the period required to bring down Eldorado ore from Great Bear lake.

Since then the refinery has been in operation day and night and has processed a substantial part of the uranium requirements of the united nations. A plant for the preparation of fissionable material has been constructed at Chalk River for the purpose of exploring one particular process for producing the ultimate material. This plant has certain features that make it unique and it is believed by our partners in the United States and in the United Kingdom that Chalk River can make a substantial contribution in the field of peace-time development and use of this new source of energy.

It is expected that the plant at Chalk River will provide a centre of research in Canada which will not be excelled elsewhere in the world, for a considerable time at least.

From this brief review of war-time developments, hon. members will appreciate the important position of Canada in the field of atomic energy. I have not traversed the field in great detail, since all hon. members have in mind a comprehensive review of Canada's part in these matters made by the Prime Minister in a statement to this house on December 17, 1945, on the occasion of moving a resolution to approve the agreed declaration signed at Washington on November 15, 1945, by President Truman and Prime Ministers Attlee and Mackenzie King.

Atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki were largely responsible for the surrender of Japan and the sudden ending of the war. Since the ending of the war the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada have continued their cooperation, recognizing the imperative need for the control of atomic energy as a weapon of war as well as for its development in the service of mankind.

The purpose of the bill to be based on this resolution will be to encourage research in this field, both public and private, while taking adequate security measures against the use of the material from which atomic energy is derived as a weapon of war.

The three-nation declaration on atomic energy, signed at Washington on November 15, 1945, which was approved in this house on December 17, 1945, gave recognition to the need for further cooperation not only between the three countries which have been mainly concerned with this field but also for extending this cooperation to all countries throughout the united nations. The declaration recommended the setting up of a commission under the united nations to prepare recommendations on atomic energy for submission to that organization. Such a commission was set up by resolution of the general assembly of the united nations on January 24 last. Because of the special position of Canada in this field we are the only country, apart from the great powers, to be permanently represented on the commission. General McNaughton has been appointed Canadian representative, and the commission will hold its first meeting on June 14. This commission has been charged with the responsibility of inquiring into all phases of atomic energy and, in particular, of making specific proposals with regard to certain objectives which were stated in the resolution of the united nations assembly setting up the commission as follows: (a) for extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends; (b) for control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes; (c) for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons, and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass desrtuction and (d) for effective safeguards, by way of inspection and other means, to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions.

Much has been said and written about the form of international control that should be initiated. The government is giving earnest study to this immensely complex problem. It seems to me that the meeting of the atomic energy commission will mark only the first step on the road towards international control. It is recognized that the final solution of the problem can be attained only by stages. In the long run the finding of a solution must depend on good will and mutual confidence among all the nations concerned.

I am sure that the house will agree with me that the immense gravity of the issue, raised by the discovery of atomic fission, and its potential danger to civilization, has made it imperative that we should approach this question in a boldly constructive manner. It may very well be that the problem of dealing with the newly-discovered force, so dangerous to human society, may afford us an opportunity of making a great step forward in the field of international cooperation.

Among the many discussions of the form which international control of atomic energy may ultimately take, the report recently published by the state department of the United States, which was prepared by a board of consultants, all specialists in the field, under the chairmanship of Doctor Lilienthal, deserves careful study. This report constitutes perhaps the most far-reaching attempt so far made to sketch out a plan that would control the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and turn the discovery into productive channels. I feel sure than hon. members will find the Lilienthal report an absorbing and enlightening document.

Until such time as the united nations atomic energy commission has made its recommendations, and has translated these recommendations into action, it remains the responsibility of Canada, as well as that of the United States and the United Kingdom, to establish and maintain conditions under which these recommendations can be made fully effective. Canada and all other nations possessing raw materials, or productive apparatus, or special knowledge with respect to atomic energy, have a very special responsibility to establish and maintain conditions which will ensure the effective carrying out of any recommendations that may be made by the commission to provide for international control of atomic energy.

In the United Kingdom, first reading has already been given to an atomic energy bill which will empower the United Kingdom government to establish control over the production or use of atomic energy. In the United States the McMahon bill has been drafted by a special senate committee on atomic energy, and I am informed that the administration intends to conclude legislation on the domestic control of atomic energy before the adjournment of the present session of congress.

The house will apprciate, for the reasons I have just outlined, the necessity for introducing a bill for the control of atomic energy in Canada, in the terms of the resolution now being considered. It remains for me to say something of the general character of the legislation proposed. Fresh discoveries in the field of atomic energy may bring about swift developments which cannot now be foreseen precisely. Therefore, the measures for control must be not only wide, but also flexible, to meet the new situations.

The bill that will be based on this resolution will provide for a board that will continuously study the field of atomic energy. It will be the responsibility of the board to propose regulations designed to meet fresh situations as they develop. Any such regulations would be issued under the authority of the governor in council. The board will be organized, and will function, much along the lines of the national research council. Liaison with the national research council is provided for, by making the president of the council a member of the board.

There will be provision in the bill for the incorporation of crown companies, and for the taking over of existing crown companies, should the board decide that atomic energy operations can better be performed by separate and subsidiary organizations. It is possible that the operations at Great Bear Lake, Port Hope and Chalk River, may be carried on by crown companies, under close supervision of the board. The board will report to the committee of the privy council on industrial and scientific research, to which the national research council now reports. An annual report of the board will be tabled in the House of Commons by the chairman of the committee, who, at the moment, is myself. The board will make such other reports to the committee as may be required, and will also, on the board's own initiative, report any matters which the board considers should be brought to the attention of the government. Thus, machinery is provided for the government being kept fully informed, and in a position to deal with any question relating to atomic energy which will deserve its attention, or which may be brought up in this house.

Apart from the proceeds of its operations, the work of the board, and the operation of the crown companies, will be financed by moneys voted by parliament for this specific purpose. Any regulations made by the board are to be published promptly and tabled in parliament.

It is the intention of the government to encourage scientific initiative and research directed towards finding constructive applications for the use of atomic energy. The bill will empower the board not only to itself undertake research and investigation, but also to facilitate and finance approved research, to be carried out in our universities and elsewhere under proper safeguards.

To build up a Canadian source of raw materials the government will carry out its own prospecting and development programme, and will encourage private prospecting, even though all the materials related to the production and use of atomic energy are to be under government control at all stages.

Thus the bill will provide means for continuing the important developments that have placed Canada in the forefront of war-time developments in the field of atomic energy, as well as means for furthering and encouraging research and development in the peace-time application of atomic energy. The bill will provide also an appropriate legislative basis, both for the domestic control of this highly dangerous substance and for international measures which will need to be concerted by the united nations commission.

All hon. members will agree with regard to the need for legislation of the kind outlined in the resolution, as a means of bringing under control a newly discovered force of nature which promises great benefits to mankind when applied to peace-time uses, but which has great destructive potentials to mankind unless developed under strict government control. There can be no lack of agreement with regard to the objectives of the bill, and I feel that there will be general acceptance of its provisions.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us has to do with a very important problem, namely the control of atomic energy. I am not one of those who believes that at this stage, when we do not have the details of the bill before us, we should have a lengthy debate. Obviously the opposition is always handicapped in trying to debate a subject of this kind when it has not before it the details of the bill, which the government knows all about but about which we know little. I rise at this time to say something of a more or less general character, only because of the importance to mankind of this new form of energy, and because of the need to move cautiously, sanely and wisely in deciding how to handle it.

I want to say to the minister who has moved this resolution, to the government, to the house and to the Canadian people, that in so far as the measure to be brought forward aims to control this new form of energy, to encourage research in this new field of science, to encourage the use of this new energy for peaceful purposes or to prevent its use for purposes of war, we shall be strongly in favour of it.

In looking over the objectives outlined in the resolution, and listening to the minister's remarks in respect to it, I see only two points on which we shall expect further light when the bill itself is brought before us. The first of these is in respect to the second objective set out in the resolution, "the creation of corporations to carry out certain powers of the board." We shall want to hear a more detailed explanation of what is proposed before we can give unanimous approval to that provision. The other is the last objective outlined in the resolution; it has to do with the expropriation of substances and any mines, deposits or claims of prescribed substances. At the moment we have nothing before us except the general statement of the purpose of the government to set up these corporations and to make provision for expropriation. When we see the details of the bill I trust we may be able to support even these clauses, but I hesitate to do so until we have seen the bill itself.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that since less than a year ago, when the atomic bomb was brought so forcefully to our attention, we have been facing a new situation. Physical science has exceeded the development of social science. We have produced gadgets by means of which it is possible that our civilization may be destroyed before social science has discovered how men in different nation states may live together in peace. That is the major problem human society faces to-day. We see physical science so far in advance of social science that the gadgets we produce have become a danger to humanity and, in a war-like society, may result in the destruction of our whole civilization and large sections of our population.

As I said, when there is before the house a motion to go into the committee of the whole to consider a measure involving the expenditure of money, hon. members have an opportunity to seek information as to the general scope of the proposed legislation before it is given first reading. Later, when the bill comes before us, these general principles will be amplified by the details it contains. In his remarks the minister referred to the necessity of international control of this new source of energy. I am sure most hon. members will support that idea, but in the resolution we see nothing whatever referring to such international control.

From the resolution now before us the purposes of the proposed bill are represented to be as follows: to make provision for public control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, to provide (a) for the incorporation of an atomic energy control board; (b) the creation of corporations to carry out certain of the board's powers, which was only briefly touched upon by the minister; (c) the appointment of members of the board, its officers and employees, their remuneration, expenses, and so on; (d) the organization, administration and financing of these corporations, the superannuation of employees, and so on. From this outline it is apparent that a board is to be set up which is to be given wide powers, including the creation of corporations and the power of expropriation with respect to substances, mines, deposits, claims and the like.

Just how far all the matters encompassed in the proposed bill are to be removed from the practical control of parliament will not be fully clear until we have an opportunity to see the bill. From the outline given to us, however, the bill can mean either very much or very little in this respect. From the resolution on the order paper several things seem evident. First, that the measure is to provide for a very extensive degree of public ownership, development and control. For example, we are asked to make provision for what is likely to be one of the greatest state-owned developments of our time. Second, that the object of the bill is either for purposes of offence or defence, offence for or defence of Canada in cooperation with our likely associates and allies. Whatever its merit—and it has merit—it is not a measure for preventing war. The minister is not claiming that, of course, but I am pointing out that whatever else it does, it is not a matter of war prevention.

In this connection let me say that the discovery of a method by which atomic power may be released and used for the benefit of mankind unfortunately coincided with the bitterest war in history. As a result the greatest of all potential blessings is now considered as a major threat to mankind. Were the world at peace, with an assurance of continuing peace, I should stand firmly for the immediate release of all governmental controls over the development of atomic energy and for the widest restoration of the liberty of scientists of all nations to exchange knowledge, a liberty which must be restored sooner or later if we are again to march forward on the road of progress. For the moment we can all understand that this is not practicable. Canada must cooperate with those nations of whose peaceful intentions we are convinced, in all necessary measures to control the development and use of atomic energy. Certainly I support warmly the plan that the use of atomic energy for military purposes must be kept the sacred prerogative of the government, and not be permitted to be left in private hands. This involves the possibility that government monopoly in this field will be automatically extended to cover those possible uses of atomic energy which are not of a destructive but rather of a constructive nature. It is quite possible rigid governmental control of the military use of atomic energy may involve hampering limitations upon the development of these peaceful uses.

It is our intention to support the government's rigid control of atomic energy development for urgent reasons of national and international safety, not because we believe that the government should retain a perpetual monopoly in this most important field, if peace were assured to us. I think all will agree that we must look forward, and not backward. We must have confidence that lasting peace will eventually be established. But that time is not here yet. For that reason I agree that this particular subject is one which must remain under most rigid government control. Whether these bodies that the government proposes to be set up will be for the purpose of developing atomic energy or for the purpose of preventing its development for destructive use, or for both, has not been made clear to us at this stage of our proceedings.

So far as this resolution goes, it looks as if the government is planning to be ready for the eventuality of war, not for the prevention of war. The defence of Canada is a perfectly laudable purpose in itself. I would point out, however, that we have nothing before us to suggest that by enacting this measure into law we are solving or even coming within a measurable distance of solving the two great problems facing us, namely, (1), the development of atomic energy for economic use and benefit, and (2) the prevention of its use for war and devastation.

At this point some more general observations on the problem of the control of atomic energy I hope will be in order. There is a strong demand in this age to place in the hands of the government the manufacture of instruments that may be used for war. There are very few who will dispute that the manufacture of war instruments should be in the hands of the government. I agree that this is desirable if they are to continue to exist at all. But I am wondering if the dust and smoke of the bombs that landed on Hiroshima and Nagasaki are not clouding our thinking at this hour and making it impossible for us to appreciate the sweeping changes on the industrial front that are inherent in the fact of the atomic discovery.

The impending change in our economy may be more sweeping, in my opinion, than that following the industrial revolution. I wholly disagree with those who assert that we shall not see the application of atomic energy for practical purposes in our lifetime. It is the view of many that it will revolutionize science in the fight against disease, and revolutionize the means of supplying power to the enterprises of our already complex society. As it takes its place in competition with electricity and steam, many believe—and certainly I believe—that atomic energy will bring a transformation in our capital goods structure greater than that attending the industrial revolution of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

The difficulty is that while men and women are paralysed by the fear of the potential dangers of atomic energy, its development for peaceful purposes will be hampered. We all know that the great developments of the age of steam and of the age of electricity would not have been possible had industry been kept within the iron grip of government ownership and control. Furthermore I think the events of the last thirty years have proved that, whatever merits there are in government ownership and control, economic power held by governments tends to place in the hands of the few who form the governments not only the control of these government-owned enterprises, but the power of decisions on matters affecting whole populations. The few who are in government have the power to decide what is good for the many. But what is more important is that the threat of this dictatorial power becomes dangerous when left in a few hands. The concentration of economic power in the hands of a dictatorial government is much more likely to lead to war than if that power be widely diffused among the people as in a true democracy.

That is one of the major arguments for democracy in this age, namely, that the decision as to peace or war is left to democratic procedure. The danger of rushing unthinkingly into war is much less than where such decision rests in the hands of only a few.

There is no use in shutting our eyes to the dangers that lie about us. Much of Europe to-day is neither peaceful nor free; much of that continent is in the grip of a totalitarian power quite as thorough, and some consider quite as ruthless, as the power that we fought for five years to destroy. The business of making competition serve the purposes of progress deserves a high priority in the governments of those countries that still adhere to the democratic process.

It will thus be seen that this generation in the democracies has a heavy responsibility. It faces a great challenge, one of the greatest of all time. Three facts stand out as never before:

1. The devastating potentialities of atomic energy have been demonstrated. They are in the minds of everyone and, therefore, need not be elaborated again here.

2. We have become the custodians of a new type of knowledge and of power that has more promise of good and greater of evil than any set of facts ever before placed at the disposition of mankind.

3. We have made great strides in the physical sciences, but we have lagged behind in social science, and particularly the science of nation states living together in peace. The great advances in the physical sciences have universalized our thinking, while our social thinking in many respects still conforms more to the organization of a local community .

Obviously, something new and vastly more of understanding must be brought into the relations between communities if the homicidal danger of the atomic weapon is to be averted. The science of living together has been outdistanced by our scientific capacities for penetrating the unknown, and for producing gadgets potentially more dangerous to a society of nation states than anything we have ever known before.

I stated on another occasion that we must begin to move out of a world of conflicting economic nationalisms and accept the world of interdependence that has become our heritage, and that there should be no delay in making a firm beginning in that direction. The overwhelming majority of mankind of every race and in every clime craves for permanent and lasting peace. The danger is that mere handfuls of men, here and there, may still plan for national or ideological expansion, even for war, using bogus revolutions as the stalking horses of their aggressive designs.

It is one thing to try to control atomic energy. But our main problem is to prevent war. If we cannot make reasonably sure that we can prevent war, we should of course take steps to make as certain as we can that this new instrument of death will not again be used in war. That means putting it into the hands of an international authority which will be given the power to issue a passport that will have to be accepted by every national state. All our vague talk of abridging sovereignty and limiting sovereignty is a mere patter of words. War must be averted. The atomic bomb we must find a way to debar or denature. It is not by abridging and restricting and hampering national development and growth that the goal of real peace is to be achieved; it is rather by clothing an international authority with such prestige and power that we can be assured in this parliament from year to year that there are not underground, clandestine factories stealthily preparing to obliterate large sections of the human race. Until we make a firm beginning in this direction, we are but fooling the people when we pretend that legislation such as this offers as security in this very insecure age.

Pass the bill, with such amendments as may be necessary, if any. But let us not stop there. Let us either banish war or let us take practical steps with other nations to prohibit the use of the atomic bomb, in the event that another cataclysm should visit itself upon mankind.

The discovery of practical methods of producing nuclear fission has presented the human race with its most supreme challenge. Can the world of politics and law reveal comparable inventiveness and skill so that the invention may be turned to good use? It is not alone a moral problem; it is a problem of world organization.

The minister in his remarks referred to the work of a board of consultants in our neighbour country to the south, the chairman of which is David E. Lilienthal. The report prepared for the United States government by this board of which Mr. Lilienthal is chairman happily does somewhat narrow down the dimensions of the problem. The report says, among others, these two things (1) that uranium is and is likely for a long time to remain the only raw material from which fissionable substances can be prepared—this simplifies the problem of control of original sources; (2) that U-235, the fissionable material could be so "denatured" as to make it unusable for atomic weapons and still remain perfectly serviceable for the "non-dangerous" uses of atomic energy. To remove the "denaturant" is possible, but only at the cost of large plants and the expenditure of much time and money.

This suggests that the way to effective control lies not in what is ordinarily thought of as an international agreement in any wide sense but in the specific proposal to put the material at its source into the hands of a world monopoly. Such a world monopoly would of course be under the control of the united nations. Such a monopoly could mine uranium and experiment with it in its denatured state. National states could acquire denatured material only. The problem of inspection would thus be greatly simplified. The monopoly would be a world authority; it would be a supra-national authority.

As I said at the beginning Mr. Speaker, so far as this measure aims at controlling this new source of energy at encouraging research in this new and vastly important field, and so far as it aims to make it available for purposes of peace and to prevent its use in time of war, it will have our support. We ask only for more elaboration of two sections of the resolution; namely, the one having to do with the appointment of government corporations to carry out some of these activities, and the other having to do with the confiscation of property.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I regard the resolution now before the house as probably the most important resolution that has ever appeared on the order paper. I do not think anyone will dispute that when its implications are understood. Last week a resolution was moved by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) dealing with the establishment of a more comprehensive research organization. It seems to me that the two are correlated.

So far in the discussions in this house, and indeed across the country, the aspect of atomic energy that has been most emphasized is the terror of the atomic bomb, and I think it is well that the average citizen in every country should understand what a revolution was made in military tactics when the atomic bombs fell on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. But it seems to me that only the scientists have yet come to a realization of the significance of the discovery of atomic power and its potentialities for industrial uses.

I had the privilege last December of attending a meeting in New York organized by the New York Nation and attended by many of the scientists who had taken part in the Manhattan project, which was very largely responsible for the evolution of the atomic bomb. I listened there to a statement from Professor Henry DeWolf Smyth, who, as many hon. members will recall, wrote the report on the atomic bomb experiment in the New Mexico desert for the government of the United States. On the very day we were meeting in New York, on December 1, he had been appointed adviser on atomic energy to the President of the United States. I shall refer, a little later, to something he said. But one of the speeches which impressed me most was that of Doctor Leo Szilard; I have a report of it in my hand at the moment, and I shall quote a few sentences. As the minister will know, Doctor Szilard was one of the atomic bomb scientists who formerly worked in the metallurgical laboratory of the University of Chicago. In opening his remarks he made this statement, which seared itself on my memory:

> On the 3rd day of March, 1939, Doctor Walter Zinn and I performed a simple experiment on the seventh floor of the Pupin building at Columbia.
> After two days of preparations, everything was ready and all we had to do was to turn a switch, lean back and watch the screen of a television tube.
> If flashes of light appeared on the screen, that would mean that neutrons were emitted in the fission process of uranium, and this in turn would mean that the large scale liberation of atomic energy was just around the corner.
> We turned the switch and we saw the flashes.
> We watched them for a little while and then we switched everything off and went home.
> That night there was very little doubt in my mind the world was headed for grief.
> This crucial phenomenon was independently discovered just about the same time by Anderson and Fermi, and by Halban, Joliot and Kovarski.
> They used different methods but arrived at the same conclusions, and I have, therefore, good hopes that my own plea of not guilty will receive merciful consideration in the heavenly court of justice.

That seemed to be pretty much the opinion of the men who had been engaged in the development of atomic energy and the atomic bomb. But it was not only the development of atomic energy and of the atomic bomb which seemed to worry them; it was the tremendous effect which the use of atomic power would have on the economy of the whole world. They were afraid that man had not reached the stage of development at which it would be possible for him to create the abundance flowing from the use of atomic energy, and to use that abundance for the good of all mankind.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) remarked this afternoon that perhaps this was a greater discovery than that which inaugurated the industrial revolution of about one hundred and seventy years ago—if one may date it from any particular period. I think that is true, and I would go farther and say that I agree with the scientists who were present at the conference of which I have spoken and whose opinion was that it was the greatest discovery since man discovered the use of fire many thousands of years ago. It foreshadows, in their opinion and in mine, such a revolution in man's way of life as is comparable only with the revolution resulting from primitive man's discovery of the use of fire. Beside it, the discoveries to which the leader of the opposition referred this afternoon in a general way—the discoveries of coking coal, the power of steam, the power loom, Faraday's discoveries with respect to electricity, and the other discoveries linked with the industrial revolution—all these pale into insignificance.

It seems to me that the purpose of this resolution and our object as the parliament of this country should be to perform the task which will enable science to inaugurate a peaceful and prosperous society based upon the widespread use of this energy. As the leader of the opposition said, and I heartily concur, social science has lagged far behind physical science, and the social scientists have lagged behind the physical scientists; the physical scientists are to-day exercising greater imagination with respect to their discoveries than politicians and social scientists are exercising, and because we as politicians and social scientists have failed to relate our thinking to the discoveries of physical science, we are apt to get into a tremendous mess in the not far distant future.

I listened with a great deal of interest to what the leader of the opposition said. I agree with him that we must have international control of this form of energy. I agree with him that within our own boundaries we must have public control of this energy. But I do not agree with him that this is necessary only in so far as it relates to the making of war. I disagree wholly with that concept. I say that it must relate also to all the economic developments of peace-time; because the ownership and control of atomic energy will set the pattern of living for years to come, just as the ownership and control of the new machines at the time of the industrial revolution set the pattern of living for our own time and the period which immediately preceded it.

I know history. I know British history, perhaps, particularly well. It was a subject I taught for a good many years, and in which I specialized when I was a student. When one reads of the misery and the poverty which came upon the people of the British isles and the rest of the world following the discovery of the physical means which brought about the industrial revolution, one makes up one's mind that never again must such consequences occur in the history of any nation. The alienation of the new discoveries, the placing of them in the hands of a few people who would manipulate them for their own use, in any country, would so undermine the economy of that country that it might enslave the many to the few. Moreover, the selfish development of atomic energy for industrial purposes in any one country would upset the economy of the whole world, and that must not be permitted to happen in 1946. It is a discovery which will set the pattern of life for years to come.

I listened to the leader of the opposition when he talked of the danger of a government exercising power over this atomic energy. He called that a dictatorship. Am I to understand that the leader of the opposition considers that in our democratic countries governments are dictatorships? Do our governments not rest in the final analysis upon the will of the people? Are they not, in theory at least, expressing the will of the people when they bring before parliament measures upon which, as representing the people of Canada, it must decide? I know of no other form of democracy as efficient and effective as the parliamentary democracies of the British commonwealth; and to suggest that in a resolution of this description, to be followed by a bill setting up corporations which will be public corporations, we are departing from democratic procedures seems to me to reveal an entire lack of knowledge of what democratic government really is. To do the opposite, to place this in the hands of various corporations, such as the Imperial Oil company, the Aluminum Company of Canada, International Nickel, or a number of other monopolies which I could name, would destroy democracy in Canada and tend to do so throughout the world.

I congratulate the minister upon this resolution. I congratulate the government upon it. I think it shows a certain amount of imagination which should demand the respect and support of every right-thinking person. The carrying into effect of the ideas which lie behind the resolution, if I apprehend them correctly, means that an attempt at least will be made to see to it that we shall be able to introduce this new form of energy and power without condemning thousands of our people to destitution, poverty and want, as the industrial revolution, over a century and a half ago, condemned hundreds of thousands in the country in which I was born. I have seen the long-time effect of it, and so have some of my hon. friends in this house. I have seen the stunted masses in the northern industrial areas, the stunted masses in the Manchester slums, in the Yorkshire mills and in the London slums.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And in Glasgow too.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I have seen, written on their bodies, the evil results of the industrial revolution. Therefore we dare not permit that kind of thing to happen again in the history of any country. The use of atomic energy, in our opinion, must be to benefit society and not to benefit a few people in society. Its misuse would upset the economy of the world and cause untold misery, but its use for the benefit of mankind would inaugurate a new era.

Even before the war, educationists were concerned with the problem of leisure. I wonder if we realize to-day just what the problem of leisure will be when this new source of energy is developed. I agree with the leader of the opposition to this extent, that the development of atomic energy is at hand. I do not know when it will be used, but I heard certain statements made at the conference which I attended. I heard it said that in all probability within the space of five years a city the size of Seattle—that was the city named—might be heated by atomic energy. I heard it said that those who were expecting atomic energy to be used for the operation of automobiles, for example, were going to be disappointed for some time to come, because it was highly probable that what I might call the machine or the apparatus which would be necessary to utilize that atomic energy for transportation would be so large as to require perhaps a ship to carry it, and therefore the first vehicle that would utilize atomic energy might be a ship. It was said however that the time would come when the ingenuity of man would reduce the apparatus to the size where it could be used for all means of transportation, though that might be fifteen, or twenty, or twenty-five years away. But not one scientist there believed that a period of more than a quarter of a century would pass before atomic energy would be generally used throughout the world.

That is why I say that the problem of leisure forces itself upon our attention. Scientists say that a pound of uranium, the cost of which was put in December at $3, could deliver as much energy as 1,000 tons of coal as that fuel is at present utilized. If that is so, one can understand at once what it might mean in the coal industry, in the mining industry, what it might mean in transportation. For something like forty per cent of our transportation system is engaged in the movement of such heavy freight as fuel oils, coal and so on. If that is true, one can see what effect it will have on the entire transportation system and on the movement of heavy freight.

If we do not seek to control this energy and to plan its use to inaugurate the atomic age, we may be faced not with leisure but with technological unemployment. Of course the only difference between leisure and unemployment is that leisure is enjoyable unemployment while unemployment is unenjoyable leisure. That is what it amounts to, and so we dare not leave the development of this energy in private hands. From its very nature it is imperative that it be publicly owned and controlled as a public enterprise.

I remember very well some of the speeches of the former leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I remember sitting here and hearing him thunder across this chamber, as was his wont, with regard to radio and the necessity for bringing that great utility under public ownership and control, and I remember too his saying to the members of the house at that time: "Who is there among us who would repeat the mistakes of the past? Who is there, among us who, if he could, would not have preserved some of the great resources of the country for the good of the nation instead of for private exploitation?"

The former leader of the opposition was a very interesting man, and in some respects a far-sighted statesman who saw some of the implications of these great new scientific discoveries, such as radio, television and so on; and were he here now I am perfectly certain he would take the same view of atomic energy.

Of course I do not follow all the fanciful things that we are told. We are told, for instance, that one day atomic energy may enable men to air-condition tropical cities and turn the polar regions into habitable places. I do not know whether that is so; but if it is, it is a long way off. There are however some developments that are very close at hand, and these are the things we have to safeguard the country against if they are evil or make available to our people if they are good, and make them available in our day. Scientists are certain that what is now within sight is something which, uncontrolled or left in private hands, will make a shattering impact on present business, present industrialism and present development, internationally as well as nationally.

Scientists, as I said at the very outset, are trying to emphasize the benefits that may accrue from atomic fission. They believe that the peaceful development of energy will destroy an age-old conflict, the struggle for room in which to live in this world, which struggle is so frequently at the root of war, the struggle for elbow room. This energy, they believe, if properly used will enable mankind to produce such an abundance of the necessities of life that men will not have to struggle for room in which to live but will be enabled to enjoy the things that are made possible. Consequently, as I said a few minutes ago, the acquisition of leisure should be regarded as the means whereby we might enjoy a higher cultural standard than the world has ever known. And all this, we as average people have perhaps yet to learn.

The leader of the opposition closed his remarks with some reference to the terrors of atomic bombing. I was not here in December when the question was discussed; I was unavoidably absent. I have in my hand however a copy of an address which Professor DeWolf Smyth prepared for delivery before the conference to which I have referred. When we talk, as the leader of the opposition did, about using this energy for offence and defence, it might be well to hear what Professor DeWolf Smyth said:

> I do not at present see any likelihood of any adequate military defence against this new form of weapon.

He went on to say that if various devices that had been suggested were tried out they could not possibly be effective, and again I am using his own words. He says:

> The nature of the atomic bomb and the speed of its approach make it highly questionable that any anti-aircraft or other defence could be developed against it which will be one hundred per cent effective. Some atomic bombs would inevitably get through.

Doctor Ivan Getting, who is regarded as one of the great radar experts of the world, and who went to London to assist in devising ways and means of meeting the flying bomb and the V-2's in the autumn of 1944, gave it as his opinion that there was no effective defence that could be foreseen against this new form of weapons. Then Professor DeWolf Smyth said also:

> Since rocket bombs might be sent in a few moments from any spot on earth to any other spot, it could well prove impossible, in the event of an attack by atomic bombs, to know from which country the attack had come.

He went on to say:

> There is no scientific reason why atomic bombs cannot be shipped in trunks or boxes in peace time to key industrial and population centres and detonated at the moment desired by remote control wireless or other means.

Six or seven thousand miles away in a room a man with a set of buttons before him, with an instrument attuned to the bombs which had been placed in the industrial centres of the United States or of some other great country, we shall say Russia, if you like, could, by pressing the button, detonate bombs that had been planted weeks and months before, without danger of deterioration, and incidentally destroying, as one scientist said, sixteen million people in a single night.

These are the dread uses to which this new energy could be put. By the same token there are constructive uses to which it could be put. I quite agree with the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, and I believe with all parties in the house, that the scientific development of this new discovery must be used internationally; that the scientists of the world must be encouraged to exchange information. Let us bear this in mind; there can be no blackout of science. The Germans tried it, but did not succeed. We cannot blackout science. If we cannot black it out, then the thing to do is to have an organization through which scientific knowledge can be disseminated. This means an international organization. The proper organization to set it up is, of course, the united nations organization. I do not believe that the proper organization within the united nations organization is the security council; I believe it is the social and economic council, because the emphasis has been placed in the wrong place. It has been placed upon the military uses of this new energy. I hope the great and beneficial consequences that will be felt by the world will be in the industrial field.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I wanted to express these views because my colleagues and I are supporting the resolution. We are supporting it because we believe the fundamental principles of it are sound. Of the details we may have something to say, and we may disagree with some of them, but fundamentally the resolution is sound.

At the beginning I said that this resolution is perhaps in some respects the most important that has ever been introduced into this house. The minister knows that a similar bill has been discussed in Great Britain, and that a bill very like the terms of this resolution has been introduced into the United States congress and is now being studied by a committee there. Farsighted men everywhere are aware of the uses to which this new discovery can be put; and whether in peace or in war the public of this country through its democratically elected government must exercise complete control of this great new source of energy. We dare not allow it to get into the hands of a few people who will use it for their own purposes and not for the common good.

We shall welcome the bill when it comes; we shall look into its details, and if it follows the principles of this resolution we shall support it.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I shall not detain the house longer than a few minutes, because most of the important things which should be said have been said here this afternoon. First, let me express to the minister my feeling that this is a timely resolution; that I appreciate his bringing it in at this time and giving us an opportunity to discuss and consider its various provisions in preparation for the bill which will be introduced shortly.

Like the two hon. gentlemen who have already spoken, I must say that I believe it is one of the most important measures to be brought before the house since I came to Ottawa and I hope that it will receive the most earnest consideration of all hon. members. There are many things in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) said with which I agree, and some of necessity with which I could not agree. The same is also true of the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell).

I just wish to say one or two things which have occurred to me in connection with this resolution, and which I should like to make clear. In the first place, I believe that the discovery of atomic energy has brought us to the verge of the golden age of the world. I am just wondering whether man's stupidity will keep us from passing over the threshold into the realization of that golden age. Whether or not our stupidity will prevent us will depend on how bodies of this kind react to suggestions for development and control of the energy in the best interests of the people of the world.

I should like to emphasize that I am anxious to see the best possible use made of atomic energy in the interest of peace, prosperity, health and happiness of the people of the world. That is fundamental. I believe that every thinking man must take the same stand.

In the second place, I believe that the development of atomic energy is fraught with such grave problems and dangers for the world that it is necessary for us to place the control of its development, at least for the time being, in the hands of the government, and I support that wholeheartedly. So far as the application of developed atomic energy to economic uses is concerned, I am not yet just sure where that control should best be vested. I am quite content to study that question more thoroughly and to see what the future brings. But there is one thing I am certain of, namely, that Canadians, in common with the nationals of every other nation, will have to settle down to a thorough and complete study of the social sciences in an effort to find out how we can distribute the benefits that derive from such great discoveries to all the people. All the people should share in the benefits that derive. To see that they do so we must make absolutely certain that we have a real democracy.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we have heard much about a democratically elected government. I believe that we have had a form of democracy, certainly; but I cannot believe that we have really had a democracy in Canada. The reason is not hard to see. I would not worry very much about placing the control of atomic energy, for destructive purposes as well as for economic purposes, in the hands of this government, provided that I could be certain that this government was democratically elected and controlled. The only reason I feel diffident about placing such control in the hands of a central government is that under the system we call democracy the people have not yet been able to get the results they wanted from the management of their affairs. They have got just the opposite from what they wanted. Witness the bread lines; witness business recessions; witness depressions and strikes. These are anything but what the people have wanted. If there had been a real democracy; if the people had effective control of their government as the leader of the C.C.F. party suggested they have through the mechanism of this house, those things never would have taken place. I say now, sir, not only must we have a reorganization of our whole economic system in this country in order to give the people the results they want, but we must see to it that our political reorganization actually reflects the will of the people.

I am going to make this suggestion. I would not be a bit afraid of placing the control of atomic energy in the hands of the minister's commission, both for destructive purposes and for economic purposes, and its development along those lines, provided that the people in the constituencies of this country actually paid their members of parliament and actually had control over those members so that when they did not do the will of the people they could kick them in the place which was built into man to be kicked, and put others in their places. We need political reform that will give us real democracy, which we do not have under what is known as the political party machine rule which we have had in this country for so many years. If we did rehabilitate democracy; if we put new blood into it so that the people actually did control their government, then there would be the least possible danger, even in government development, control and application of the economic phases of atomic energy.

For just a moment let me turn to the social aspects of this whole matter. I do not believe the leader of the C.C.F. party meant exactly what he said about the industrial revolution. I do not believe he meant that the industrial revolution actually caused the stunted masses.

I believe he referred to the results of the industrial revolution in displacing men with machines and perhaps another result which followed, in that labourers were exploited by the centralization of capital. I can quite understand that, but surely the industrial revolution in itself was of inestimable benefit to mankind, in essence. The whole difficulty was that we did not have sense enough properly to apply it.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. LOW: So it might be with atomic energy. I believe that this is one of the greatest discoveries of all time. I believe that through its proper application for the benefit of the people of the world men can be progressively released from the drudgery of the productive effort. I believe that if we organize properly, and with vision, it will be possible for us to allocate and distribute equitably a progressively greater amount of leisure time to all Canadians. But we should have begun years ago to prepare our people for the proper use of that leisure time. In itself such leisure can be a danger to humanity if it is not used as it should be. We should have been educating our people in the proper use of that time for the benefit of their fellowmen. The greatest play ever written, the greatest painting ever painted, the finest music ever composed, all were produced by people in their leisure time. That is the sort of thing we want to aim at in future; to give our people sufficient leisure time so that they may turn to the arts and sciences and the development of cultures in order to benefit mankind generally.

We should now adopt a sensible attitude toward the finding of means to distribute the abundance which the application of atomic energy will ensure; and I do not believe for one moment that this is an impossible thing to do. I think we are on the verge of discovering it; but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when we do discover it I believe that it will be the seventh great discovery of the world: how to distribute equitably among the people the abundance which can be produced through the application of forces now at our disposal, of which atomic energy is one. I hope, that as we set up the commission for the development and control of atomic energy we may also set up commissions to study the needs of the people and the means of getting into their hands the things they will need, out of the abundance we produce. As we stand on the threshold of this golden age I believe that we should give very careful attention to that phase of the new life which is bound to come, if we ever survive some of the difficulties which have been pictured here in connection with the application of atomic energy.

In conclusion, let me say that I am not one of those who see darkly. I am not looking into the mud with regard to atomic energy. I would rather see stars, and there are stars to be seen. There is no question about that. I would far rather leave with hon. members the thought that, as men think, so will they become. If we think constantly in terms of war and destruction, as a mass of people, then that is exactly the situation that will be brought about. If we think in terms of peace, prosperity and happiness, than we are seeing stars; we are raising our eyes to the skies. Then men will go on to greater achievements, to higher objectives, infusing humanitarian aspects into all the things they do. I plead with hon. members to give careful consideration to all sides of this question of the development, control and application of atomic energy so that the people of this land and of the world may be happy, peaceful and prosperous.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Just before we go on to the next stage, Mr. Speaker, may I make two or three observations which have come to my mind in listening to the various hon. members who have taken part in this debate. I fear there is a great tendency to refuse to face the realities. We are in the gravest kind of danger if we make a serious mistake. I am not referring particularly to the remarks of the minister. I thought his dissertation was scientifically prepared, as we would expect it to be, and sane, not committing him to any particular policy at all. But when we begin listening to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Bracken) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) we begin listening to doctrines which might be fraught with grave danger to the world.

May I say something about one or two matters which were talked about. It is true, as the leader of the opposition has said, that the science of living together has lagged far behind. The important thing for us to-day is to make an effort to bring our social sciences up to date. Let us develop our science of living together.

But one of the amazing things to me is that we never hear a single, solitary suggestion from the leader of the official opposition or from any of his party as to how that is to be done—no, not a single suggestion. Thus far also I have not heard one from any hon. member on the government side of the house as to how that is to be done. The assumption seems to be that all one has to do is to take the power away from Canada, and from each of the national governments corresponding to that of Canada, put it into the hands of a big enough board, one that is far enough away from the control of the people, and automatically the problem will solve itself.

That is not the way things have happened in this world thus far. It is true that we must learn something about the social sciences, the science of living together. The alarming thing is that all over the world nothing is being said about that. In the spring of 1945, when we were discussing the San Francisco conference, I alone among all the members of the house rose in my place and pointed out the fact that in all the discussions leading up to the San Francisco conference there was not a single hint that any of the men discussing the problem had any idea of what on earth the fundamental cause of war was, or had any suggestion whatsoever for the removal of the cause of war. Yet they assumed that by coming together at San Francisco and building up a united nations organization, consisting of a group of men who did not know a thing about how to distribute goods in their own countries, they would be able to solve the problems of the world.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but, as he knows, we have before us a resolution, and we should discuss its subject matter. That resolution states:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to make provision for public control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and in connection therewith to provide for the incorporation of the atomic energy control board.

There are further provisions in the resolution. I must ask the hon. member to discuss the principle of the resolution now before the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly what I shall endeavour to do. The advisability of having government control of atomic energy was discussed by both the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. from this point of view, that only the government could be entrusted with the control of power such as that of atomic energy, because if any other body had that control it would use it for private purposes, and consequently cause disruption in the world.

It seems to me I would be perfectly in order to express some observations contrary to that idea; and that is what I propose to do. Great numbers of machines have never been allowed to come on the market, I understand, because it is feared that if they were permitted to enter the market they would displace so many men they would completely disrupt the economy of the world. If atomic energy were to come into common use industrially the assumption seems to be that the same sort of thing would happen.

Mr. COLDWELL: If misused.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. And the assumption is that if the government controls it, the use will automatically be a proper one.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is less likely to misuse it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the very proposition I challenge. My hon. friend says that the government would be less likely to misuse it, or to use it unwisely. Let us examine that. However, I believe I shall return to that subject after I have completed the other observations I wish to make.

It is suggested that we place atomic energy power in the hands of a world monopoly. May I ask this: Who is to control the world monopoly which, it is proposed, should have control of atomic energy? This does not bear particularly on what was said by the minister, but it is a matter which was discussed freely by the speakers representing the Progressive Conservative party and the C.C.F.

Who is to control that body? The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) asked that question. If the people cannot control that body by democratic means, then who is to control it? That is one of the most serious questions confronting our age. Once more we assume that somehow or another, by some sort of fatuous reasoning, all we need to do is to get control in a body situated far enough away from us, and that body will use it all right. That is just so unreasonable and so completely out of harmony with any human experience as to impress the ordinary man as being inconceivably absurd.

What will be the policy of such an international body? Will it know how to distribute goods? Will it use its knowledge, provided that it should have any knowledge in the distribution of goods? Will it endeavour to distribute by trade? Will it distribute by free trade or by unrestricted international trade? If it endeavours to use either of those devices, then tell us how it will overcome the disadvantage which arises from having industrial power concentrated.

In Canada, for example, the industrial power of this country is concentrated in two provinces, which run Canada. Those two provinces do just that. They drag the other seven provinces helplessly behind them. If the whole world is put into an organization similar to the political organization of Canada, who will run the whole world organization? It will be the two or three nations which have the great concentration of industrial power. Surely that must be obvious. I intend to discuss that matter at greater length by and by, when it will be more in order to do so. But I am just warning members who are talking recklessly in terms such as these. They know not what they do.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. member give us an alternative for the united nations organization?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will give an alternative, just as soon as it is in order to do so. It is not in order at the present time. However, I will say, since the hon. member has raised the question, that social credit is the alternative. I know the hon. member will not accept that, but the more he comes to know about social credit, the more he will realize that it is the answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no doubt about that. That seems to be absurd to people who do not know; but it is not absurd to those who understand it.

An hon. MEMBER: Who understands it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I understand it, for one.

An hon. MEMBER: Anybody else.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Don't you? Come on over, and I will teach you, when I have time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This last thing I would say for the benefit of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar: His assumption is that if government owns industry it will solve all problems.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, that is not his assumption, at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all we hear, from what is being said.

An hon. MEMBER: The C.C.F. is the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, it would not matter; if the Progressive Conservative party were in charge of Canada they would be just as socialistic as the C.C.F.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Much worse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No doubt about it. They would be advocating measures of government ownership and control, just as the present government is doing, exactly as the present Liberal government are to-day simply rushing into socialism. Measure after measure after measure, week after week, they are going right, straight into socialism; there is no doubt about it.

I am going to ask one question: If monetary reform were essential to a solution and we had an international organization controlling atomic energy and industry, such organization consisting of men of the mentality of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton), as manifested by them within the last two or three months, I ask the house if there would be any chance in the wide world for solution. They would absolutely refuse to accept any measure that would solve the problem and would just let things drift until we had a world revolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are a pessimist.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not at all. Just a realist. Mr. Speaker, having given these few words of caution, I discontinue until it is more in order to say something further on this subject.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the resolution is passed may I ask the minister to enlarge upon three aspects of this matter? He has referred to the importance of international control of atomic energy, but I find nothing in the resolution dealing with that. Perhaps the minister would explain how he expects that to be brought about.

Would he also give us some idea of the crown corporations that it will be necessary or advisable to set up under this proposal.

Thirdly, what concerns does he expect it may be necessary to confiscate?

From my reading of the resolution these are three things upon which I would ask the minister to enlarge.

Mr. HOWE: The measure does not primarily concern itself with the international control of atomic energy. That is a matter with which an international forum is dealing. Canada has its representative on the atomic energy commission of the united nations. The commission includes representatives of the great powers and certain other powers. Canada was given a special place because of its contribution to and interest in this particular problem; it was made a permanent member of the commission. Canada is represented on the commission by General McNaughton, who is surrounded by a panel of those best able to offer advice on that problem to our representative.

Rather the purpose of this measure is to keep the situation within Canada in such a position that the recommendations and the decisions of the international commission can be carried out in so far as Canada is concerned. We are a source of raw material, certainly the second most important in the world, and the source of raw material will be a matter of great international consequence. Therefore it is the intention to keep strict control over raw material that is used for atomic fission.

Mr. BRACKEN: What country is the largest source of the raw material?

Mr. HOWE: The Belgian Congo is the largest source.

Second, we have the industrial know-how. This at present is confined to two countries, the United States and ourselves. The know-how is really more valuable than the science of producing the atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: Does the United Kingdom not have that knowledge?

Mr. HOWE: While the United Kingdom has not as yet built a plant, I have reason to believe that that country has the know-how that will enable it to do so.

Then we are one of the two countries which have a plant that produces the final product from which atomic energy is derived. Therefore it is important that we control not only the raw materials, but, in addition, the working processes and the finished product.

One of the difficulties concerning this product is that the material which will be used for peaceful purposes is the same material which can be used for warlike purposes. If anyone had three pounds of the material for any peaceful purpose, from the same three pounds of material a bomb could be made which would destroy all life within the city limits of Ottawa. Therefore it is not a material which can be used promiscuously. Its use for peaceful purposes must be carefully guarded at all stages, so that no one can accumulate a quantity which could be used for destructive or anti-social purposes.

That, I think, answers the first question asked by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition as to the relationship between this measure and international control. This measure simply controls the domestic scene, so that when decisions are taken in the international field Canada can fit in with those decisions.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will this atomic energy control board itself have direct association with the international organization or will it act through the government of Canada?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: The board acts through the government. It is proposed at the moment to make our representative on the international commission a member of this board, so that he may be in close touch with the domestic situation. This is a board to control the domestic situation and it has no direct part in the international scene.

Next my hon. friend asked about crown companies. Here again the power is permissive. One operation associated with atomic energy is at present controlled by a crown corporation, Eldorado Mining and Refining. There are two opinions as to the direction of Eldorado. One is that it should be under the national research council, and the other is that it should be under the board referred to in this measure we are now discussing. It will depend upon the view of the board when it is appointed whether it should be an operating board or simply a policy board. The board will be closely allied with the national research council in any event, and it may be the decision will be that the national research council shall do the actual operating or it may be that the board itself will be the operating body. If the board is the operating body, then in my opinion Eldorado should be placed under it. I am also rather of the opinion that Chalk river itself should be operated as a crown company, for undoubtedly, in due course, it will be buying and selling materials as well as conducting research. We are simply taking permission in the bill so that if a crown company turns out to be desirable it can be created by the board.

The third question was, what properties—

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask one question before the minister passes on?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. BRACKEN: He says he anticipates at the moment two crown companies, one having to do with the Eldorado Mining company and the other with the Chalk river development. He is asking for permission here to set up any corporations he chooses?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: Which may be done by the governor in council?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. REID: Will any Canadians participate with United States representatives in the experiment which will take place in July?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; provision has been made for six representatives to be there. There will be representatives of the navy and the air force and, I believe, two civilians.

Mr. LOW: In connection with the expropriatory powers of the board—

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the leader of the Social Credit party proceeds, the minister, I think, had one other question he was willing to answer.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The leader of the opposition asked what properties the government intends to expropriate. As far as we know, the government now owns all the sources of uranium in Canada. It is carrying on extensive exploration in the Great Bear area to prove up additional properties. If valuable discoveries are made privately in other parts of Canada this bill permits the government to acquire those properties, by expropriation proceedings, if necessary; and if the properties are not acquired the uranium itself, or the uranium oxide from these properties, would undoubtedly be acquired by the government. It is not contemplated, until the matter is very much farther advanced that uranium would ever be permitted to be sold to private purchasers.

Mr. BRACKEN: The resolution makes clear the answer which the minister is now giving; it also includes these words, "expropriation (of) any works or property for production or preparation for production of, or for research or investigation." Would the minister elaborate on what that might contemplate—expropriation of works or property? That is in addition to mines and so on?

Mr. HOWE: There are no "works or property" at the moment that are not in the possession of the government. The government has works and property; for example, it has a refinery at Port Hope, it has also certain facilities for the further processing of radium for commercial uses, such as luminous paint, and medical purposes. The clause in the bill simply gives the government power, in the event that works of that kind are established privately, to acquire them by expropriation. But at the moment I can say there are no properties in Canada known to the government which it is desired to acquire under this provision.

Mr. LOW: The minister has partly answered the question I started to ask, but there is this second part. It is not inconceivable that deposits of uranium might be found in certain provinces. In case, we may suppose, there is a discovery in Ontario, would the minister add, say the minister of mines of the Ontario government, to the board? I can see that some difficulty might arise when the senior government attempted to expropriate or to obtain those properties. I can understand, too, that some force might be given to the peaceful expropriation or peaceful transfer if the province were recognized as a part of the board itself.

Mr. HOWE: Fortunately the problem does not arise at the moment. It happens that all the known deposits of uranium are in the northwest territories. Should uranium be discovered in one of the provinces—and I sincerely hope it will, though I have my doubts, from what we know of the geology—there will be a problem as between the board and the province to determine the best manner of dealing with the provincial rights to the mineral. I think my hon. friend will agree that there is an overriding national interest in the product, which should make that fairly simple when the time comes.

Mr. LOW: Yes. The suggestion I make would perhaps help in that direction.

Mr. HOWE: That might be helpful.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain what control parliament will have over the atomic energy control board? I understood him to say in his opening statement that there would be reports from the board to what is known as the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research; apparently there will be no direct reports to parliament. Would the minister explain in some detail what control parliament will have over the board and its undertakings?

Mr. HOWE: The bill provides that the board will operate by directives, that all directives will be published and tabled in parliament by the chairman of the committee of the privy council to which my hon. friend referred. As set out in the bill, it will be the duty of the chairman of the privy council committee to bring to the attention of parliament any regulations or orders issued by the board and to give parliament any information acquired by the board that it would be in the public interest to publicize.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any way of interrogating the chairman of the control board? Will there, for example, be any provision for having him appear before a committee of the house, or will the control be merely indirect through one cabinet minister, probably the Minister of Reconstruction?

Mr. HOWE: Well, Mr. Chairman, any committee of the house can summon any public servant. I suppose that if any committee of the house wishes to interrogate the chairman of this board it has only to call him. The board must report to a member of the government; all boards do; and the information is conveyed from the board to parliament by a member of the government. That would be the case with this board.

Mr. GREEN: What control would there be over the crown corporations set up under the control board?

Mr. HOWE: I assure my hon. friend that, in its early stage, Chalk River will not operate very long without a preliminary appropriation, which will be voted by parliament. Thus there will be the usual control of the expenditure, the usual opportunity to obtain information about the operations of the project.

Mr. GREEN: What type of board is to be set up? Could the minister give us any idea of the size of the board and the type of men or women who will be appointed to it?

Mr. HOWE: The government has in mind a board of five members. The only ex-officio member is the chairman of the national research council. I have suggested that Canada's representative on the international commission would be a probable appointment. The other three are not definitely chosen; but I would say that certainly one should be from the universities, and certainly there should be on the board a good businessman, familiar with corporate practice.

Mr. GREEN: Would there be no representative from the defence forces?

Mr. HOWE: Canada is not concerned with the use of atomic energy for making weapons. The development of defence weapons is closely interlocked with the national research council, and I think the contact there would be sufficient. But it is not the intention, as far as Canada is concerned, to develop atomic energy for the manufacture of weapons. Therefore I doubt whether a member of the defence forces would logically be a member of the board. However, that has not been finally determined.

Mr. GREEN: What is the difference between the plans of the Canadian government and those of the United States and United Kingdom governments with regard to these atomic boards? Are they all following the same plan? If not, what is the difference?

Mr. HOWE: As I recall the bill that has had its first reading in the United Kingdom, the board is somewhat similar in character to that of Canada, in composition and in objectives. I have the bill before me but I am not as familiar as I should be with its objectives. Perhaps I can give a clearer explanation of the composition and objectives, so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, when the bill is before us. The McMahon bill in the United States is only in the committee stage. It has not been introduced into the house of representatives. It provides for a civilian board somewhat similar to the civilian control in Canada. Up to the present the development of atomic energy in the United States has been under military control throughout. It has been a military project for reasons which my hon. friend will understand. A great deal of attention is being devoted to the peace-time development of atomic energy in the United States, but actual control has not moved from military to civilian. Here in Canada, it was recognized as unlikely that Canada would manufacture material which would have any use in war, and therefore our development has been planned from its inception for peaceful use.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister make a little clearer the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South as to what control parliament would have on the commission or board of control set up? Perhaps I can put the question in this way. Would those boards, as far as parliamentary control is concerned, be on a basis similar to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? In other words, would the reports made be referred to a standing or a select committee of the house?

Mr. HOWE: The board proposed is more analogous to the research council, which is actually a branch of government. My hon. friend has referred to two corporations. This board will be not a corporation but a branch of government. It may have corporations functioning under it, but I would say that the members of the board and the staff would hardly be government officers operating in a sphere remote from parliament. Any question regarding the board would undoubtedly be answered in parliament, which is not the case with the Canadian National Railways or the broadcasting corporation. If parliament wishes to have the affairs of the board examined by a standing committee it would need only to make a request and a committee could be established. But it is not a type of organization analogous to the two mentioned.

Mr. FRASER: The minister indicated that he would be asking parliament for money. Has he any idea what it will cost the government a year?

Mr. HOWE: The budget for atomic energy contemplated at the moment, that is to say, for the operation of Chalk River and the laboratories associated with atomic energy research, is about $3,500,000 a year.

Mr. FRASER: There is some revenue from the plant at Port Hope?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: What is that revenue? You have revenues to offset part of the $3,500,000?

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid the revenues from Port Hope are just about sufficient to take care of that operation and the development work carried on in connection with Eldorado operations.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Are the researches which will be conducted by the commission so far removed from any other kind of research being carried on in the country as to necessitate their being carried on separately, or is there some liaison with any other form of research? Second, would the minister care to make any comment, as suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, on the time within which economic peace-time uses may become available.

Mr. HOWE: I have stated that there will be a close liaison between the work of the board and the work of the national research council. Definite liaison is planned by making the chairman of the research council ex officio a member of the board. But the purpose of the board is to exercise powers other than directing research. It must keep a close control over security and over the handling of the product. It must also keep abreast of developments in the international field, and must be prepared to guide the government in its international relations.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do I understand the minister to mean that for reasons of security, and I take it he means military security, it will be out of the question to have contact between the researches carried on by the commission and those of the research council or any other industrial research going on in the country?

Mr. HOWE: I did not intend to imply that there would be no relation with other researches. It is expected that under the direction of this board work can be carried into university laboratories and into any laboratory that is able to give man-power to it, and carry on under careful supervision. The danger is that it takes a matter of only three or four pounds of this material to blow up the city of Ottawa.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why pick on Ottawa?

Mr. HOWE: The reason for the security is that no one shall be able to divert any of this material from the purpose for which it is intended. As to the time when there will be practical applications of the material, I believe the time will be short. The science of atomic fission is in about the same position to-day that electricity occupied when Faraday discovered the electro-magnet about 100 years ago, but science has broadened since then, and application of this energy will probably move faster than in Faraday's time. I would say that in five years there will be practical applications of the material. The first will probably be in direct transference of heat, and once that transference of heat has been worked out the application will follow logically.

Mr. SKEY: Who will be responsible for employing the various scientists who will work on this new project?

Mr. HOWE: The pattern of the national research council will be followed. Its scientists are employed by the governor in council.

Mr. SKEY: Will special care be taken to screen the personnel who will be dealing with these atomic projects? Will they pass through the mounted police or some other authority who can pass on their security?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. For several years, every man or woman who has been employed by the national research council has been screened by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. FLEMING: From what the minister said a moment ago with regard to the proposed personnel I took it that the members will serve on a part-time basis. Probably that has direct relationship to the point he made earlier with reference to the essential nature of the board, as to whether it would be an operating body or a policy body. Will the minister indicate to the committee within what period of time we may expect the decision to be taken as to whether this body will be an operating or a policy body, and what opportunity we may expect parliament to be given at that time to consider that question? It will affect also, I take it, the proposal to clothe the board with power to set up a corporation to carry on specific works under the authority of the legislation.

Mr. HOWE: The bill itself, when it is placed in the hands of the committee, will indicate the authority with which the board will be clothed. The decision as to whether it will, in fact, be an operative body will be left largely to the board itself. The operations at Chalk River are being carried out under the national research council. At the moment the national research council is favourably disposed to the board taking over actual operating in the field of radio-active substances. The present intention would be to clothe the board with the duty of actually operating the project. However, no decision has finally been taken, and I should not like to commit myself at this time and say that the board will be an operating body.

Mr. FLEMING: May I infer from what the minister has said that there is no present intention of expanding the scope of operations? It is simply a matter of whether the present type of operation shall be carried on directly under the board or continue as at present under the research council.

Mr. HOWE: The activity is certainly expected to expand. Up to date the activity has been to carry on extensive research in laboratories, with a pilot plant and, concurrently, with the building of a pile that is perhaps not wholly a full-size commercial pile, but something approaching that magnitude. It is expected that, as material becomes available, the board will devote its attention to widening the field of experiment; that is, by making it available to those who wish to devote time and attention to development work in that field under proper supervision.

Mr. JACKMAN: On numerous occasions the minister has referred to the commission. May I ask him to straighten out my own mind on that? Is it the same as the atomic energy control board?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: When the minister referred to the fact that there was a meeting of the commission on June 14 at which General McNaughton was to attend, was that the same—

Mr. HOWE: No; I am sorry. Perhaps I have confused the committee. I shall look over my remarks carefully to make sure that I used the word "commission" in its proper sense, and the word "board" in its proper sense. The proper use of the word "commission" is in reference to the international commission, and the proper use of the body to be created by the bill which will follow this resolution is "the board".

Mr JACKMAN: This is an international commission, the members of which are Great Britain, United States and Canada. Are these the only members?

Mr. HOWE: No. There are other countries represented on the commission. All the great powers are members, as in Canada, and certain other countries.

Mr. JACKMAN: As tabled on December 17?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. JACKMAN: There is to be an exchange of information between the members of the international commission. How does Canada or any other member get its particular assignment as to research? For instance, I read that in the United States they are appropriating $250 million for research for the navy, mostly along atomic lines, and one million is being appropriated for research into pure mathematics. While I believe our country must do its share in making its contribution, particularly because of its early contribution along this line, I think the committee should be given some idea as to how we get our assignment, because if we have carte blanche and had unlimited resources, undoubtedly we would spend I suppose as much as the United States, running into hundreds of millions of dollars. I do not think the minister has that in mind. Can he tell the committee how, when the international committee meets, it is decided that one country shall do certain work and so on? How is the expense appropriated? The information is to be intercommunicated, and I merely wish to find out whether or not we are doing about our relative per capita share, or are we going ahead a little faster than one might expect from a country which has the population that Canada has?

Mr. HOWE: The situation is not difficult at the moment. There are only three countries which are publicizing extensive work in the field of radio-active substances. One is the United States; another is the United Kingdom, and the third is Canada. For the past three or four years these countries have been carrying on their efforts under the direction of the policy committee to which I referred in my earlier remarks. The policy committee has three representatives of the United States, two of the United Kingdom and one of Canada. One purpose of the committee is to see that the research of the three countries does not overlap. The project that is being carried on in Canada is not a duplication of anything that has been done heretofore; it is research into one particular method of arriving at the ultimate result.

Britain is beginning to undertake practical research into production of the material itself. Britain has been the leader in laboratory work, and she will still pursue a different line of experiment. All three are being guided by the policy committee for the time being. If the required measure of cooperation can be obtained so that the united nations can take control of research of this subject around the world, then the duties of the policy committee would be transferred automatically to the international commission.

I have read somewhere that the expenditures of the United States on this particular project have been in excess of $2,000,000,000, over the past three years. In the same period, Canada's expenditures have been on the order of perhaps a little less than $30,000,000. These relative expenditures may be reasonable, bearing in mind the resources of the two countries.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister indicate what were the expenditures of the United Kingdom in connection with the same enterprise, and to what extent the cooperation that brought about the development of the atomic bomb during the war—cooperation between the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom—is being continued in this immediate post-war period, while the united nations atomic energy commission is deciding what it will do about international control?

Mr. HOWE: During the war period the expenditures of the United Kingdom on atomic energy were not large, for the reason that, England arranged to carry on development work in Canada, and in cooperation with Canada. The Montreal laboratory was a joint project, and the United Kingdom has pooled its scientists with those of Canada in working out the project at Chalk River. The United Kingdom is now planning to build atomic piles in England, similar to ours at Chalk River. The war-time arrangements are still in effect. The policy committee is still functioning as between the three countries, and is continuing to coordinate the work of the three countries.

Mr. FLEMING: In both research and production?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I took it from the minister's initial remarks that the Chalk River project was intended to explore one particular fissionable material?

Mr. HOWE: One particular method of obtaining fissionable material.

Mr. JACKMAN: Using uranium as a base?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Later the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned that the Lilienthal report said uranium was the only practical material to-day, and was likely to be so for many years to come. Do I understand that the material used at Chalk River has a uranium base, if I may use that term?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: What arrangement has been made by Canada with the United States and the United Kingdom in regard to supplying them with uranium from the Eldorado mine?

Mr. HOWE: The Eldorado mine has had continuing contracts with the United States government for the sale of uranium, and it has delivered small quantities to the United Kingdom. At the moment the principal consumer of uranium is the United States, but the combined policy committee may allocate available supplies of uranium in accordance with the requirements of each partner government. Canada is the only country of the three which at the moment has an excess of uranium over its own requirements, and this surplus will continue to be dealt with as the policy committee may decide.

Mr. FRASER: Is that a united nations committee?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is a joint committee representing the three companies.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister explain how he arrives at the price of uranium?

Mr. HOWE: There has been a bit of difficulty there. I am afraid our methods may not have been exactly correct. Our earlier operations were primarily based on obtaining radium as the main product and uranium as a by-product. When the question of marketing uranium came up, its cost depended greatly on the value placed upon radium. It is quite obvious that the greater activity in mining operations which has occurred since uranium began to be used in quantity has cast great doubt upon the value of radium. The fact is that the fissionable material will probably be much better than radium for medical purposes. The advantage in medicine of the fissionable material is that its intensity can be controlled, where as it cannot be controlled with radium. In other words probably it will be possible to manufacture to specification for medical purposes, rather than to depend upon radium.

Mr. BRACKEN: And it will not be so likely to burn people?

Mr. HOWE: No. It will be made to suit various applications. On that account, it is unlikely that radium will have the same value in future that it has had in the past. For that reason, I am not sure that we have been charging enough for our uranium. I rather think we have not. We have a considerable stock or radium, on which we have a value that may be too high.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would prefer not to answer this question; perhaps it would be better not answered, but is the product being sold anywhere other than to Britain and the United States?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would prefer not to have that answer appear in Hansard?

Mr. HOWE: No; that is all right.

Mr. GREEN: In his opening remarks the minister said something about private research having a place in connection with the development of atomic energy for peace-time use. Could he amplify that at all?

Mr. HOWE: Several universities have branches devoted to nuclear physics. McGill university at the moment is installing a cyclotron, which was the instrument first used to break down the atom. Several other universities have active branches concerned with nuclear physics, and the intention will be to assist and encourage developments in those university branches.

Mr. GREEN: The minister also said something about sending out prospectors to try to find the raw ore. Could he give us any further light on the plans for that type of work?

Mr. HOWE: For the last two seasons, and the present season, we have had about twenty prospecting parties studying the geology of the Great Bear lake area. They use a Geiger counter, which is an instrument for measuring radio activity, and which has been used previously in laboratories. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen noticed an article published recently in the Saturday Evening Post. It is well known to those interested in radio activity. Portable sets have been made and are being used in the northwest territories to discover the degree of radio activity in various localities of the north. As a result of its use, some promising discoveries have been made.

Mr. GREEN: Are these parties sent out by the Department of Mines and Resources?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Or by the research council?

Mr. HOWE: By the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. GREEN: And they will continue to be sent out by that department rather than by the atomic energy control board?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, by arrangement between the two. I know Eldorado pays the bill, but I rather think the Department of Mines and Resources directs the exploration, though I am not sure. But Eldorado Mining and Refining and the Department of Mines and Resources collaborate on the project.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any attempt to reach agreement with any of the provincial governments about exploration parties in the provinces? I ask that because the press in British Columbia carries a report concerning a find of radio-active ore in the Kootenay district. I am wondering whether the dominion government has looked into that find.

Mr. HOWE: Eldorado investigates every find reported to it. To date, as far as I am aware, there has been no likely prospect discovered outside the northwest territories.

Mr. SKEY: Does the government intend to make public the text of the report following the special investigation carried out last fall by Mr. Glassco, of Toronto.

Mr. HOWE: The report is now the subject of litigation, and will be released after that litigation is completed.

Mr. SKEY: For what length of time is the Canadian representative on the commission to be appointed. Will it be an annual appointment, an appointment pro tempore, or under what arrangement?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure. That matter is within the ambit of the Department of External Affairs. However, I shall make enquiries and inform the hon. member.

Mr. SKEY: Is it like the Senate, for life?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RESEARCH COUNCIL

APPOINTMENT OF VICE-PRESIDENTS AND EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, ETC.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of bill No. 154, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. HOWE: Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BRACKEN: Lest there be any misunderstanding, I hope it is not considered that the bill has been read a second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock we had just taken up consideration of the second reading of bill No. 154. That bill is connected with the following bill, bill No. 155, and involves the main principle of bill No. 155. For that reason, Your Honour, I move the adjournment of the debate on bill No. 154 until later this day in order that we may consider bill No. 155 first, and I would ask the approval of the house to that being done.

Mr. HOWE: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction) moved the second reading of bill No. 155, respecting the operation of government companies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since I made an extensive explanation of this bill on the resolution stage I shall reserve any further remarks until later.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this bill is described as "An act respecting the operation of government companies." It is a far-reaching bill because it sets up a new plan for activities by the dominion government in peace time, sets up a plan that may very well be adopted by some or all of the provincial governments in Canada, and for that reason I suggest to the house that it merits the most thorough scrutiny. The explanatory note to the bill gives a brief summary of the reasons for its introduction. It reads:

> During the war, several companies were incorporated under part I of the Companies Act, 1934, to carry out special projects. Some of these companies, such as Polymer Corporation Limited and Canadian Arsenals Limited, will continue their operations for a considerable period. It may also be desirable, where statutory authority exists, to incorporate similar companies to carry out other special projects.

That is the way in which these companies were formed during the war, and it was a new way not used before by any dominion government. A group of individuals, in most cases civil servants, applied for the incorporation of a company, in just the same way as three or more individuals from any city in Canada might apply for such incorporation; in reality these companies formed as a result of such applications were crown companies, wholly-owned by the dominion government, but having their shares held by officers of the government. That is the way in which these crown companies were formed. They were operated under the provisions of the War Measures Act and were financed out of the war appropriation; each year there would be money voted under the war appropriation bill with which to finance their operations.

We now come to the days of peace, and we are faced with the question, what is to be done about these crown companies? Is the government to carry on in the way in which it carried on during the war? On the resolution preceding this bill the minister explained to the house that it was proposed to retain some of these crown companies and also to form certain new ones, and it is for carrying out that purpose that bill No. 155 is now introduced.

The title of this measure is to be "The Government Companies Operation Act." I would point out to the members of the house that it is a blanket act, to provide for the operation and financing of all crown companies incorporated in the way in which these companies were incorporated during the war.

There are in the bill certain key provisions. The first important feature of the bill is this, that there is no limit to the number of crown companies that can be formed; there may be one, there may be ten, there may be five hundred of them. It is quite clear also that these crown companies may be set up by any minister in any one or in all of the departments. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) may have one or ten crown companies; the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) may have the same number, and obviously the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is going to have quite a few of them. They can be set up in any department of government, so that we may have each minister with a flock of crown companies, just like an old mother hen with a lot of ducklings.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Chickens, isn't it?

Mr. GREEN: No; I said ducklings. Then under bill No. 154 power is given to the national research council to procure the incorporation of crown companies. That council, too, may have a flock of ducklings.

Provision is made in the bill also that each one of these crown companies can have paid to it by way of capital up to a total of $500,000 at any one time. The company gets that amount either by loan direct from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada or by borrowing from the public under guarantee by the dominion government. In addition to being able to get capital up to that amount of half a million dollars, provision is made that each company can construct, acquire or improve capital works up to a total of a further $500,000 in any one fiscal year. As I read the bill, this means that each company may have up to a million dollars. Then, each company is to be an agent of His Majesty; it can sue or be sued. Furthermore, each of these companies can employ whom it wishes, can pay whatever salaries it wishes, and has full control over all officers and servants. Again, each company can set up its own pension fund or its own group insurance plan, subject in those cases to the approval of the governor general in council, but the pension funds may be all different and they may have different group insurance plans.

The other key provision to which I would refer to-night is that each company must make an annual report in such form as the minister who happens to be the mother of that particular company requires. In due course that report comes through the minister to parliament; there is provision for its being laid on the table of parliament within a certain number of days after the house meets in session.

These crown companies were a creation of the war. It is important that hon. members should realize just how it came about that we have such an institution in Canada. The minister explained it the other day; hon. members will find his explanation at page 1511 of Hansard, when he said:

> Crown companies were an invention of the Department of Munitions and Supply in the early days of the war to provide a method for carrying out duties which could only be carried out with difficulty by the staff of the department. Hon. members will appreciate that, at the commencement of the war, the Department of Munitions and Supply had no staff. It was a newly-created department, and it acquired its staff by going out into the highways and byways and inducing men with high patriotic purpose, men of skill and experience, to leave their civilian occupations and join the service of the government for the period of the war.

I would point out in that connection that, now that the war is over, many of these outstanding businessmen who came into the government service, solely from patriotic motives, have gone back to their businesses and are no longer available for the operation of crown companies of this type. The minister went on to explain:

> One of the inducements for adopting the crown company plan was that it permitted men with business responsibilities of their own to give a good deal of their time to the government, in executive positions associated with a form of administration with which they were wholly familiar.

There were thirty-one crown companies set up in this way during the war. They have now been or will shortly be reduced to five.

The minister listed on the same day the companies which were to remain; they are set out on page 1512, of Hansard as follows: Canadian Arsenals Limited, Polymer Corporation Limited, Park Steamships Limited, Wartime Housing Limited, and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. He said:

> Of these five I anticipate that Canadian Arsenals, the Polymer Corporation and Eldorado Mining and Refining will continue as crown companies for many years to come. I also anticipate that the Park Steamships Company and Wartime Housing will be wound up within the next three or four years at the maximum.

It may be that a crown company is the best method to carry on certain types of business in peace time. For example, I am not arguing this evening that Canadian Arsenals Limited is not the proper structure to carry on the manufacture of weapons in Canada. That may be true also of the Eldorado company, because it has to deal with uranium and, as every hon. member knows, uranium is of world-shaking importance at the present time. There may be reasons why the Polymer Corporation should be a crown company; I am not arguing this evening either that it should or should not be. But I suggest to the minister and to the members of the house that where we need a crown company it should be set up by means of an individual bill brought into this house to deal with that one company alone. If that were done, parliament and the Canadian people would know exactly why a crown company is required. Parliament would be able to approve or disapprove the powers which it is supposed to give to the company. Parliament could provide for the operation of the company. That has been done in certain cases, for example with War Assets Corporation. I believe that if that were the policy followed, each company being set up by an individual bill, there would be far fewer crown companies, and surely crown companies should be the exception rather than the rule. But this bill No. 155 is a blanket bill; we as members of the Progressive Conservative party have serious objections to some of the terms of that bill, and because of those objections cannot support it.

I am going to list six objections. No doubt there are others. I think each one of these six is important, and I would ask hon. members on all sides of the house to give careful consideration to them.

The first objection is that there is no limit to the number of crown companies which can be set up; further, that any department can set them up.

The second objection is that government activities of this type are far removed from parliamentary control; the crown company is far removed from parliamentary control. If this bill is carried it will weaken parliament; it will be one more step in taking away parliament's powers. The only check on a crown company that the minister can promise is that its accounts will be brought in once a year and laid on the table of the house. It may be that they will be studied by a special committee, but I submit to hon. members that that is an ineffective control; it means locking the stable door after the horse has gone.

As the number of crown companies increases, the effectiveness even of that control will diminish accordingly. Just consider the position if we have fifty of these crown companies; parliament will have no effective control over them or their operations. I do not think anyone in this house will contend that parliament has had any effective control over crown companies during the war. Certainly in my experience there has been little control over the activities of these companies; with other problems pressing, and in the hurry of the war, parliament did not bother very much about how these crown companies were carrying on.

The third objection is that no provision is made for these crown companies to pay any taxes municipal, provincial or federal. The Minister of Reconstruction pointed out the other day that a crown company did not have to pay taxes because it had the protection of the British North America Act. Hon. members will find in section 25 of that act the following:

No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The time has long since passed when the dominion should shelter behind that provision of the British North America Act at the expense of the municipalities. Certainly these crown companies should pay municipal taxes. I suppose there are dozens of municipalities across Canada losing out because the dominion pays no taxes. I have here a resolution passed a few months ago by the city council of my home city of Vancouver which sums up the situation as it applies in every municipality in Canada in which there is any considerable amount of crown property:

That this council reiterates its stand of June 12, 1945, when it passed and asked His Worship to present to the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities the subjoined resolution which was adopted at the 8th annual conference of that body for submission to the federal and provincial governments.

Whereas under the British North America Act, 1867, the property of the crown (whether dominion or provincial) is not subject to municipal taxation;

And whereas at the time the act was passed only a few properties belonged to the crown, such as post offices, court houses, penitentiaries, etc.;

And whereas since that time, and particularly during the war years, both governments have vastly increased their holdings and have embarked upon many forms of commercial business never contemplated in 1867;

And whereas municipalities are required to provide services for government buildings, such as roads, fire protection, police protection, sewer facilities, etc.;

And whereas it may be expected for some years that the number of government properties in the municipalities will not diminish;

Therefore be it resolved that this conference reiterate its stand that some measure of relief for the municipalities must be worked out, and that pending such an amendment to the British North America Act as will require the government to pay taxes in the ordinary way provision be made by way of grants or otherwise to offset the value of the services contributed to them as aforesaid.

In that city there is dominion government property assessed at over $15,000,000 and provincial government property assessed at over $3,000,000, to a total of $18,464,150. If that were taxable at the ordinary rate that a ratepayer has to pay it would yield $608,574 per annum. In my opinion the dominion has been getting away with murder in the last few years in so far as exemption from payment of municipal taxes is concerned. Also, the crown companies pay no provincial taxes, nor do they pay federal taxes and therefore are not on the same footing as private business, and that brings me to my fourth objection.

In some cases crown companies will be in direct competition with private business. I do not think any member of the house can question that fact. They are bound to be in competition with private business, to some degree at least, and one proof of that fact is that these crown companies are set up in the way that has been devised so that they can pay the same type of salaries that are paid by private industry. I do not want hon. members to think I am speaking on behalf of big business, because the big fellow is usually able to take care of himself. It is the little fellow who goes to the wall and who will suffer from competition of this type. It should be made clear to every Canadian that with each independent business man destroyed we chop down one of the pillars on which the nation rests.

The fifth objection is that the bill makes possible the setting up of a super civil service. Employment is entirely in the hands of officers of the crown companies. They can hire whomsoever they choose and pay whatever salaries they wish. The minister explained that one of the reasons he wanted crown companies was to pay salaries commensurate with those paid by private industry. These provisions regarding employment leave the way wide open for patronage, wide open for employment of supporters of the government that happens to be in power at the time. The companies are designed to get around the Civil Service Act. That is one reason for having them.

The Civil Service Act, as hon. members know, is based upon the principle of employment on merit; upon the principle of everyone having the same type of pension plan and of keeping appointments entirely away from patronage. But these crown companies are set up in such a way that their employees can become a super civil service.

The sixth objection is that by using these crown companies the government is putting into effecet a very fine method of bringing about a socialist state. There are "hear, hears" from my left. The members of the C.C.F. party will agree, I am sure, with that statement; and that very fact should be a warning to the private members on the Liberal side of the house. Let that sink in, that the C.C.F. are applauding the fact that this bill makes socialism easy. They have already been using this same system in the province of Saskatchewan and naturally they want the same system written into the federal law. I warn the government, I warn private members of the Liberal party particularly, that this bill—

An hon. MEMBER: We are stealing their thunder.

Mr. GREEN: —is opening the floodgates of socialism. We believe that the bill should be withdrawn, that far more thought should be given to its implications, and that in the meantime the minister should bring in separate bills providing for his three companies which are to carry on or, if he wishes, providing for the five companies. I think there would be little trouble in having bills of that type pass the house; but we cannot support any blanket bill of this kind which in effect, even though it may not be in intent, is an attempt to grasp, for ministers of the crown, powers that belong to the Canadian parliament.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not very often intervene in debate in this house, but I must say that in seventeen years' experience here I have never heard a more stupid, a more nonsensical, a more fatuous speech in my life than I have just listened to from my hon. friend on the opposite side.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have the floor.

Mr. GREEN: On a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman is speaking to a point of order.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that those words are not parliamentary and should be withdrawn, although I may say I have a very low estimate of the value of the minister's opinions. I submit, however, that the words should be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If they are not parliamentary, sir, they are very sincere, and if I were to express my opinions outside they would be no less sincere and ten times more unparliamentary.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will not withdraw a single word, because every single word is parliamentary. I know my rules.

Mr. TUSTIN: Yes, you think you do.

An hon. MEMBER: We know our rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The remark has been made to-night by the typical Tory mind—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Speaking only to the point of order—

An hon. MEMBER: Don't be stupid.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You know, the mule gave certain advice at one time; therefore I realize where it comes from.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, we have heard—

Mr. FLEMING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: We are waiting for a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear the hon. member ask that the words used by the hon. member should be withdrawn.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not intend for one second—

Mr. GREEN: I ask that the words used originally be withdrawn. I forgot what they were. One was—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have pleasure in withdrawing all the unremembered words. So far as the clever boy from Eglinton is concerned, I think he had better just refrain for the moment from intervening in this debate.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why not sit down on the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must say I myself have not infringed upon the tolerance, patience and indulgence of the house as the hon. member for Calgary West has in the last few days.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I rise to another point of order. Why not take that back? I accept it just as it is given.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members know that when an hon. member has the floor he should not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I rise to a point of order. The minister, charming and all as he may be, a moment ago said that he had not been in the position of the member for Calgary West who did certain things. I am quite unable to keep up with him because he has that fluid sort of mind which runs all over.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the house will probably forgive the hon. gentleman. All I want to say is this, and I think the house will pardon me for saying it. To-night we have the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) submitting to the house and to the country in the days of transition, reconstruction and reconversion a well-considered plan for the direction of certain activities of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: C.C.F.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think the whole house, regardless of our political affiliations, will agree that no man in the Dominion of Canada did more during the six trying years of war to lead us to victory than did the hon. gentleman who is now submitting to this house a certain plan in regard to crown companies. And just because it savours slightly of public ownership, direction and control, these backwoods Tories come here with rusty bowie knives to try to kill the very fine conception of modern industrial development in Canada. I think the country which gave my hon. friend such loyalty and support during those dark years of war, and also this house, will give him equal support and loyalty in carrying out these new policies for the development of Canadian industry to meet the problems of to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is one for the book.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I regret very much that I have not the fluency of language to follow in the footsteps of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). However, with my disabilities in that regard I shall try to deal with this bill and with some of the objections to it raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), in which he was stating the position of the official opposition in the matter.

To-day I was writing a radio script for a recording, and without knowing exactly what my hon. friends were going to say I think I put it down right by saying that they would oppose these several bills on the order paper for public ownership. I can understand their fears but I cannot understand how they can logically oppose measures of this kind. Let us look at the picture that is confronting not only Canada but the world. And in doing this let us take our minds back to the ten years before the war and consider the state of affairs that existed when the war began. Are we to leave the natural resources, and the welfare of the people of this country, to the caprice of certain individuals who may or may not develop our resources for the benefit of the people of Canada? That is the question confronting us. Unless my hon. friends will say and give proof that there are people in Canada who are prepared to place their capital in ventures of this kind and at the same time safeguard the interests of the whole of the people of Canada, there is nothing they can logically do but support the representatives of the people—the government—in carrying out these projects.

In discussing another measure to-day I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) referred time and again to the fact that we were taking these things away from the Canadian people.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a point of order? Is it not against the rules to discuss a recent debate in dealing with this measure?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, not necessarily. Look up citation 293.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he rose twice on a point of order and I did not see any point of order. If he wants to ask a question of the hon. member who has the floor it is his privilege to ask it, but the hon. member need not be interrupted. Having no point of order, I do not think the hon. member should rise.

Mr. MacINNIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): My point was that the hon. member was quoting from a previous debate. If I am wrong, all right.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not quote from a previous debate. I merely mentioned that such a debate took place, and gave the trend of the speaker's remarks. But I need not even go that far. Surely the people of this country have far more control over what is done by this government, or by any other government that might be sitting on that side of the house, than they have over the acts and actions of private concerns. What control, for instance, have the people of Canada over the Aluminum Company of Canada? What control have they over International Nickel? What control have they over any of these large corporations that are essential to the life of this country? They have not the slightest control.

During the last few months we have seen a trend in affairs not only in this country but in nations throughout the world. Where there are socialist governments they go on with measures of this kind as a matter of considered policy in the best interests of the people, and they are really doing what the people have asked them to do.

The hon. member for Vancouver South raised six objections to this measure. I am not going to say that this measure is perfect; but it is now before this house and it is the duty of those who believe in the principle involved to make it as perfect as possible, while at the same time it is the duty of hon. members to my right, the official opposition, to oppose it if they do not agree with it. But I think most hon. members will agree with the principles of the bill. The hon. member for Vancouver South says his first objection is that there is no limit to the number of crown companies that may be set up. If the welfare of the people of Canada demands the setting up of crown companies why should we set any limit? Surely it is within the good judgment of members of this house whether or not a crown company is desirable or necessary at any particular time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Agreed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is just what we are asking. We want to examine them one by one, which is what the hon. member asked.

Mr. MacINNIS: That may or may not be an objection. But the hon. gentleman objects to the whole principle, as far as I am able to gather.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GREEN: Let us have them one by one.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. MacINNIS: And perhaps the hon. member would oppose each one. Why not, as the member for Vancouver South said a moment ago, oppose them in blanket form rather than go to the trouble of opposing them one by one?

Then the hon. member said this bill would take the crown companies away from parliamentary control. But, Mr. Speaker, it lies with this parliament as to how much control we wish to have.

His third objection was that there was no provision for crown companies to pay taxes. Well, since the value of what will be produced by the crown companies will go back to the people of Canada through the consolidated revenue fund, the services required by the people will ultimately be paid for out of such funds. I quite appreciate that the municipalities have difficulties, but we shall have to meet those difficulties in the same way we met the situation when private companies refused to provide employment for the people of Canada, and we had to pay unemployment relief. The government cannot get away from these matters. We may as well use the resources of the country to provide these things first hand instead of leaving them to private companies and then have to do them second hand.

The fourth objection was that crown companies would be in competition with private companies. Well, I thought my hon. friends believed in competition, so that does not appear to be a very strong objection.

The fifth objection was that these companies will create super civil servants. I have always noticed that when my hon. friends think of government or government projects they always do so in relation to the jobs which may be created and who will get them. After all, their fears are merely an evidence of what is constantly in our minds, that is, that under the present competitive system all are competing against each other to survive, each one striving here and striving there to get a job so that he may have some hold, no matter how precarious, upon the means of existence. Surely an intelligent society that is able to produce sufficient for all our needs could get us away from that sort of struggle.

The sixth objection was that this would bring about socialism. Well, it is perhaps a natural fear, but I cannot see any great objection myself. But whether hon. gentlemen to my right move to the other side of the house or whether the present government remains there, it will not make the slightest difference; all of you will be driven in the same direction. You must socialize the means of life within this country in order to assure the people of Canada of the goods and services which their labour produce.

Mr. KUHL: The farms, too? The farms are a means of life.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not very long ago I heard an hon. member over there say that under the present system the farms were a means of carrying on slavery. If we can put an end to the slavery on the farms we shall do so; but if the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) wishes to continue it for himself, that is all right with me. This war has demonstrated several things. One thing it has shown is that men and women will work for the government, or, in other words, for the people of Canada, just as faithfully and just as effectively as they will work for a private company. From some of the not very loud statements I hear coming from the other side of the house I have an idea that all are not in accord over there.

An hon. MEMBER: It is behind you, to the left.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not expect anything from over there, anyway, because they have nothing there. But my hon. friends should not worry about the opposition over here; let them worry about their own opposition over there. I may have been hearing echoes from this side, however, so we shall let it go at that. So far as this party is concerned, we are going to support the principle of this bill. We will do what we can to improve it and to see that the interests of the people of Canada are protected as well in the operation of the measure as they are in the principle itself.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, a speech is a good speech or a weak speech as it provokes argument or stimulates sleep. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—or Vancouver some place—made a good speech because it provoked argument.

Mr. GREEN: South was right.

Mr. McIVOR: I was going to ask the minister a question. What is the difference between crown companies and public ownership? I lean decidedly toward public ownership, up to a certain stage. When I think of the controls we exerted during the war in connection with war expenditures, and when I see the country is safe under the foundations laid by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) I take some satisfaction. I believe where public ownership or crown companies can be operated for the good of the people as a whole, they should be set up. Look at Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. FRASER: Look at them.

Mr. McIVOR: I think Trans-Canada Air Lines should be publicly owned or controlled by the government; but, of course, if you have not an honest government in control, it is a bad thing. But we happen to have an honest government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIVOR: Of course doctors differ. I believe radio should be controlled.

Mr. FRASER: And how!

Mr. McIVOR: I mean government controlled. Who would say that anything connected with atomic energy should not be controlled? But when the hon. member for Vancouver South said there were no controls, I bring to mind some of the controls exerted by the war expenditures committee, reports sent to the minister, investigations made and contracts cancelled and fines levied. Control is what is necessary. As the other hon. member from Vancouver said—and we have some great men from Vancouver, no matter what party they belong to—I believe controls are absolutely necessary. We shall have better control from a man like the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply than we shall have from men who control privately owned corporations.

I would take my stand in this way, that one of the causes of labour unrest to-day is that men who toiled at small wages remember, when they go on strike, that they have seen companies able to invest hundreds and thousands of dollars in victory bonds while they, themselves, cannot own their own homes.

I congratulate the minister upon this bill, and of course I shall support it.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the three-cornered Vancouver debate with considerable interest. I am always very happy to hear my hon. friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). He always gives a fine demonstration on these things, and I always try my best to follow that smooth, Gaelic language of his; but I find it difficult to get every word of it.

However, I thought this time he did a very good job, except for this one thing, that he drew the complete support of my hon. friends to the right. That always makes me most suspicious. If I did not have suspicions before, I certainly did have them after the exchange took place.

I must say, first of all, that I for one, having watched with interest the work done by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), and having noted carefully the contribution he made during the war, must say that I appreciate what he did during the war. But his contribution in wartime certainly does not entitle him to special privileges after the war is over.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is not asking for any.

Mr. LOW: That seemed to be the whole tenor of the appeal made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. STIRLING: Exactly.

Mr. LOW: No other reason for it at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By their fruits ye shall know them.

Mr. LOW: I was not much moved either, by the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I have listened time after time in the house to speeches from him and from other members of his party, and they often remind me of that mental conceit that is utterly unaware of the rattle of its own dry bones. So far as his arguments were concerned, he did not get down to the facts of the situation with respect to this bill.

Here is the nub of the whole thing: Are we to put into the hands of the government an enabling bill under which they can set up at will any crown corporation they wish to set up; and to finance, and carry on under its terms the hiring and firing all servants? By the way, when I speak of financing, I should like to refer to what was said by the minister when he introduced this measure. These are his words as reported at page 1511 of Hansard:

> The present bill is intended to provide for the financing of such companies and in particular to enable them to use operating revenue to pay operating costs, and to enable emergency requirements for funds to be met.

I draw attention to that for this purpose: I do not think it is good governmental practice at any time to set up a crown company and clothe it with power to use its own operating revenue to pay its own operating costs, because you take the control of the corporation, which ought to carry on in a responsible way to the people, through their representatives in parliament, completely away from the House of Commons. One of the major reasons members sit in the house is to control expenditures by the government. But if we are to set up crown companies under enabling or blanket bills of this kind, and give them the power to use operating revenue to pay operating costs, then it removes control of that company and its financing largely from the House of Commons; and I object to that procedure.

I am asked if private companies would not do the same thing. Yes, but private companies carry on their own affairs, and, further, private companies are not supposed to answer to parliament for their revenues or expenditures.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are they supposed to answer to anybody?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: To whom?

Mr. LOW: The people whom they serve.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, "the people whom they serve"—the shareholders.

Mr. LOW: No, the consumers of this country. I know what these people are thinking.

Mrs. STRUM: Did the farm implement companies consult the farmers when they increased the cost of farm implements?

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, one of the things we need most in this house is another lady member to take the measure of my hon. friend to the right. If I started to do it they would blame me for picking on a woman.

Mrs. STRUM: Did I ever at any time ask you to give me preferred treatment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to address themselves to the Chair.

Mrs. STRUM: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I merely wished to ask the hon. member if at any time I had ever given the impression that I wanted preferred treatment in this house.

Mr. LOW: There are some of us at least, Mr. Speaker, who try to be gentlemen.

I have attempted to place before the house one of the objections which I take to this bill. This sort of thing, granting a crown corporation the right to use its own operating revenues to pay its own operating costs, is not done in the operation of the Canadian National Railways. If it is not done there, there must be a reason. If it is done in these crown companies, Polymer and Canadian Arsenals Limited, already set up, I have yet to find one good reason why they should follow a different practice from that which is followed with respect to the Canadian National Railways.

The second reason I object to this bill is this. I have no objection whatever, where the exigencies of the occasion demand it, to seeing a crown corporation set up. Crown corporations have their place, and that was amply demonstrated during the time of emergency in the war. I have never objected to Polymer; I have never objected to Canadian Arsenals, and I have never objected to any other crown companies being set up to meet an emergency situation. But I claim that the emergency situation requiring them has largely passed. We are now facing a time of peace, and certainly it is only right that we should return in our rehabilitation and reconstruction measures so far as we possibly can to the system of enterprise carried on privately. I have never criticized those crown corporations; but, sir, why we should now give blanket powers to the government to set up other corporations at will and clothe them with unusual powers is beyond me. The wisest thing to do, if we need other crown corporations, is to bring a bill into this parliament for each, and let the representatives of the people judge whether the corporation proposed is a good one. Let the representatives find out from their people whether they want more corporations, and let them say whether or not the minister is entitled to have such crown corporations. If that is done, and if I am convinced that the corporation proposed is a good one, I will certainly support a bill brought in to create it, but I do request that we give careful consideration to a principle which I think is objectionable, of granting the government blanket powers to set up any crown corporation they see fit at any time. That is the main reason why I cannot support this bill.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I want first to reply to the hon. member (Mr. Low) who has just taken his seat. He made a statement to which I took exception. I also think he had no grounds for the accusation which he tacked on to the end of his remarks. That, however, is beside the point.

But to say that the great corporations of this country are responsible to the consumer is to show oneself very young indeed or very irresponsible, for the consumers are the last persons to be consulted by the great corporations, and everyone in this house knows that. The record of corporations in this country, as revealed by the mass buying and price spreads commission of a few years ago, is a record of piracy really, which regarded neither the worker nor the consumer, nor the man who provided the raw material. That was true of tobacco, textiles, farm implements and so on through the whole catalogue of Canadian industry. If anyone does not believe that, all he has to do is to go back and read again the price spreads commission's report. To say otherwise shows a complete lack of responsibility. The consumer has never been consulted, and neither has the worker. So that is a complete misrepresentation of the facts.

When the minister introduced his bill some weeks ago he made it clear that the government was going out of business. I shall not quote from his speech, but he said at that time that he was reducing the assets of the government, which at one time had amounted to some $900,000,000—he will correct me if I am wrong—

Mr. HOWE: Of capital.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes, I thought it was around that figure. The minister said he was reducing the assets of the government to the point where he would retain only those things that were needed for defence; such things, for instance, as are required in the servicing of ships, the arsenals, those things connected with atomic power, uranium deposits and related industries which may arise through the development of atomic power. As to Polymer, everybody knows that we cannot afford not to have supplies of rubber in this modern age if we are to defend ourselves. The only thing the minister asked was that in the interest of defence we maintain these activities for our own safety. He made it quite clear at the time that the government did not believe in government enterprise and would do only those things that were required for the safety of this country. So I fail to see the logic of the objection; I fail to see the reasoning.

Although I hesitate to jump into this Vancouver civil war, I cannot see that the fears of what the minister might do were justified because the record of this government has been that only very reluctantly has it ever embarked upon social ownership, and then only because of an emergency.

I want to ask this question: What other authority has the right to defend Canada? There is not any other authority. This government has not only the right but the responsibility to take care of those assets which are vital to our defence. I am sure, having the record of this government in mind, that they will undertake only those things.

The point has been made that the government pays no taxes. To me that is a fallacious argument because the government in fact pays 100 per cent taxes, for the earnings of any government enterprise — the earnings of the arsenal were about $1,000,000, I think the minister said, because they had sold certain things—go into the federal treasury. It is the only form of enterprise that does pay 100 per cent profits tax, and so I see no grounds for the argument that the government pays no taxes.

In closing, I merely wish to say that the people of Canada would be very much disappointed and very uneasy indeed if the government did not provide the necessary means to embark on those things which we must do for our defence at this time when there is so much fear in the country.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I listened with amazement to some of my Conservative friends this evening on the question of public ownership. I have a vivid recollection of Sir Adam Beck when in the province of Ontario he established the greatest publicly owned power system in the world at that time.

An hon. MEMBER: It still is.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe we can all agree that he made a notable contribution to the life of that province. We had the cheapest power in the world. The establishment of that great publicly owned undertaking profoundly affected the industrial life of the province of Ontario.

Mr. MANROSS: The 25-cycle!

Mr. MITCHELL: "The 25-cycle", my hon. friend says. I could argue that point with him too. If he knows anything about the industry he will know that at that time it was agreed by those interested that 25 cycles was the most economical way of distributing power. Of course in later years that opinion has changed, but that is beside the point. I have a vivid recollection of the campaigns which took place at that time. I thought, when the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was speaking this evening, that he is just thirty years behind the times. Recently we had an example in Quebec of the taking over by Premier Duplessis of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company: I do not suppose by the longest stretch of the imagination he, or his predecessor Premier Godbout—for anyway it was done by the government of Quebec—could be accused of being a socialist. Confronting us now is an undertaking far more revolutionary than the development of electric power. The potentialities of atomic energy, we are given to understand by those scientists who specialize in the subject, are the greatest of any invention since the discovery of the use of fire and the invention of the wheel.

I am not altogether in agreement, however, with the statement of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) that you do not need to be taxed for government ownership. I am of the opinion that, with the development in various directions of public ownership, governments will find it necessary, while not directly taxing publicly owned industry, to tax the users of those undertakings. There are only two places where one can get the money. Like the Quakers are said to do, you must go where the money is; you must go to the people who are able to pay. But that does not affect the principle that the state should own great undertakings of this kind. I am not a socialist. I believe that where risk is involved, where one has to take the long view and encounter dips and elevations in the economic life of the country, there is a proper place for private enterprise. But the proper place for such great undertakings as the nation's power sources is under the jurisdiction of the government. I was surprised, therefore, that the hon. member for Vancouver South reverted to the dark ages of the Conservative party in advocating a policy which is in direct contradiction of everything which has been supported by some of its greatest leaders.

[Mrs. Strum.]

Mr. GREEN: Of course the minister did not understand what I advocated.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are really having a great evening, and I am afraid I shall not be able to live up to what has already been said.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody expects that.

Mr. MACDONNELL: I did not refer particularly to the standard set by the hon. gentleman opposite; I was just speaking generally.

I would say first of all to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) that I am afraid I am going to be in his opinion "stupid, nonsensical and fatuous", because I propose to maintain the ground taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green); and to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) I may appear thirty years behind the times. But I do want to get hon. members if I can to look at the propositions made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, from which everybody except the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has departed miles away. The hon. member for Peace River has said so many of the things I was going to say that I almost felt it was not necessary for me to speak at all. But in view of the speeches made since he spoke, I believe it is worth while to come back and direct the mind of the house to the things which the hon. member for Vancouver South said, and which I believe, as he believes, are serious and well worthy of our consideration.

What did he ask? He did not speak for or against socialism, and I do not think to-night we need to have impassioned speeches on the subject of socialism. I am one who believes that it should be looked at in a detached way. I do not think we should become theological about socialism. I do not regard myself as an enemy of the human race because I am not a socialist. I believe the way we should look at questions of this kind is, which method will do the particular job best in the particular case, public ownership or private ownership; and that in effect was the attitude taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South in what he said to-night.

Let me repeat what he said. In effect it was this, let us get away from a lot of—shall we say?—herrings. Are there "red" herrings?

An hon. MEMBER: I would say that Ontario Hydro is a pretty fair herring.

Mr. MACDONNELL: We shall come back to that in a moment. The hon. member for Vancouver South said, although not in these words, that as the bill stands it gives us a nice, easy, slippery slope right into socialism. If that is what we want—and hon. gentlemen to my left want it, and I expected that they would acclaim the bill—then, of course, we shall vote for it. But some of my hon. friends to the left will agree with me in this, because I know some of them can be talked to like the rest of us can be talked to, that before we slip into socialism the people of Canada are entitled to have a good look at it. I believe hon. members will agree that there is no sign at present that the majority of our people want socialism. Therefore, if we are changing our way of doing business, it is fair that the people should have a good look at what we are doing while we are doing it. That is all that the hon. member for Vancouver South asked for.

I come now to a point made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I wish I were as highland as he is; I am only a poor diluted highlander, about twenty-five per cent genuine: were I 100 per cent I feel that I might amount to something. All we highlanders are more or less sentimental. I think the Minister of Veterans Affairs is a real sentimentalist; I love him for it but I do not follow him for it. He really asked us to vote for the bill because the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) had done a good job during the war. That was what his speech amounted to. I would not disagree with him that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply did a good job during the war. Incidentally I suspect that if we knew the whole truth we would discover that this is the Minister's bill and that a great many hon. members opposite feel about this bill very much as we do but they will not have any more to say about it than I have, indeed not nearly as much, because they will not have the chance to say anything about it at all.

During the war the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply exercised great powers. We approved that; we could not be finicky about giving power in war time. At such a time one expects a relaxing of ordinary restrictions. But now we are in peace time, and we are really being asked in time of peace to accept a condition applicable only in time of war. I submit—and I think this is the point which the hon. member for Vancouver South made in connection with the bill—that if the measure passes we can have government companies by the score, and let no one imagine that measures creating them are going to be considered by parliament. I expect they will not even be considered by the government. I assume what will happen is that each particular minister will decide what company he wants and will come with his proposal to the cabinet and the thing will be approved.

Therefore what do we have? If we approve this bill we have a movement into socialism to an extent which nobody can measure. That is the reason why hon. gentlemen to the left of us approve—quite naturally—the bill. There is no stopping place; nobody can tell us where the thing will end.

One further remark. I have made the point that people are entitled to "stop, look and listen" when the way of life which they have approved is being changed. It is perfectly proper to ask that this thing should be taken step by step. When there is an industry which the government thinks should be run by the public, very well; let them come and tell us all about it; let us discuss it; let the people of Canada know what is going to be done; let parliament consider the matter, and let it be approved by the people's representatives. We are not saying that there should be no public ownership. The hon. member for Vancouver South said exactly the opposite.

One further point. There have been many references in this house to the present British government, and I submit that it is of some interest to us to know that the present British government is dealing with this matter, as I understand, in exactly the way that we propose that it should be dealt with. Take the steel industry. They are passing a special bill in that regard and they are doing it cautiously. The British minister in introducing that measure said that the British government proposed:

. . . to review the field—

That is, the field of the steel industry.

—section by section and firm by firm, in consultation with the industry, before deciding on the exact boundary in each case.

That, it will be said, is different, that they are taking over an existing industry. I submit, however, that in principle it is not at all different. I say to the government: You are going to step into this, that and the other industry, and when you step into an industry, do you mean to suggest that that does not affect the industry as a whole? Of course it does. It alters the whole condition of doing business in that industry if you step in where there is already private competition. This case that comes from England is absolutely in point. Moreover, it indicates the sound way in which these matters should come up in the house and should be considered; and, as the hon. member for Vancouver South said, only when that is done, only when the people of Canada have had a chance to consider what they are doing, should these important steps be taken.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I speak now largely to assist the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), who told me just now, sotto voce, that he had not yet spoken. I want to speak now so that he will have ample material to discuss when he does close the debate. I am not going to be very long, and that should be gratifying to most hon. gentlemen who are here.

First, I wish to refer to some things which by some stretch of imagination might be regarded as political, and I want to compliment the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), on having that nice clean line between the two Vancouver seats, and to reinforce an idea which I have always had that hon. gentlemen immediately to my left and those immediately facing me have a thorough understanding of one another's position. I hope that will not be regarded in a narrow sense, because I made a note of what the hon. member for Vancouver East said, that he commended the government for going on with socialistic measures. I do not think any phrase of mine could even compare with the choice of phrase made by the hon. member in his compliment to the government, on the pace and direction in which they are proceeding.

May I mention just one thing, and in the event of my being regarded as not being always serious, I am asking the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether in his judgment the passage of this bill does not mean, as in my judgment it does, a blanket authority to constitute crown companies. Before he shakes his head, let me add this. Adding this to the previous resolution with respect to the national research council, wherein a blanket authority is certainly given to create these companies; having regard to the resolution with respect to atomic energy, I again ask the minister the question that I have put to him—and I notice he is being advised by that eminent lawyer, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I am again asking him whether it is not the fact that this gives the government blanket authority to do exactly what I said. That is my view. I am just a bit of a police court lawyer; I know nothing about constitutional problems. But behind the minister there sits a very great lawyer from Windsor who operates in another department. I am sure that the minister has only to whisper to him the question I have asked, and he will be told that my humble suggestion is accurate with respect to the law as to what the government is now proposing.

Now, granted that I am wrong—

Mr. ABBOTT: We will grant that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have just heard from the Minister of National Defence and I am glad he interrupted me. What he is folding now is not a newspaper, but he is the greatest newspaper reader in the House of Commons. He really reads them. He does that in moments of embarrassment and I know perfectly well that the Minister of National Defence would not read a newspaper upside down. We who come from the west have learned that everybody who advertises in eastern Canada advertises upside down. That is all I have been able to get from the backs of papers spread out in front of the hon. gentleman.

Our humble suggestion is this, and I say this with great respect to the imaginings of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who of course gets out the old needle. The record is a bit scratched, but every time we come to socialism away goes the needle and we hear the same old song, which some day I hope will be a siren song. Nevertheless we hear it. All we are saying in connection with this matter is this. No one has said a word against Polymer or the company which produces at Great Bear lake—Eldorado. No one has said a single word against Canadian Arsenals, with great respect to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), and I confess I am thoroughly frightened of her. However, may I say that I agree with her entirely that matters of defence should be owned and operated by the government of the country.

Mr. GILLIS: No profits in that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Probably you would like to have a go at this thing. You are probably one of those people who a moment ago discussed taxation—no, it was the hon. member sitting immediately to my right. Certainly they will give 100 per cent of their profits to the country, but we have not heard of any profits yet, though it is lovely in theory. But the little municipality in which they run their business does not get a dime. Let us think that one over, because they are the people who are trying to operate the municipalities. I am being interrupted in many places, Mr. Speaker. I am not like the chap who went to the sea and told the waters to go back. I was never that silly. I leave that to my hon. friends the socialists immediately to my left.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are doing your best.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I always do, and that is a great deal more than you do occasionally.

Mr. MacINNIS: It would be too bad for you if I did.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask a question?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Indeed you may.

Mrs. STRUM: Did you ever hear of a corporation getting a tax-free option for twenty-five years? General Motors got that in Saskatchewan, in Regina.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will accept what the hon. member says about the city of Regina. I do not know anything about the General Motors situation. But if they did the burgesses of Regina passed on it and voted for it. There cannot be any doubt about that, because they could not get it otherwise.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask the hon. member another question?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Ask me anything you wish, and I shall be very happy to answer.

Mrs. STRUM: Did the hon. member hear that about two years after the employees had been brought in they had to go on relief and Regina had to keep them?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I can answer that in one word. I have a brother who worked there for a long time. He was employed when the government took over and operated it as a war plant, and he has never been on relief nor has he ever asked me for a dime, for two reasons: one, I did not have a dime; and two, he would not ask for it.

I turn to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. He told us how well the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had done. I will admit —and I am sure my hon. friends to my immediate left will be happy when I say this—that during the war years the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was the darling of big business. Nobody could say enough about—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Your leader is to your immediate left.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I said the party to my immediate left; I am sorry but a hairpin is good for an occasion, I am told.

During the three years the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was the darling of big business. Times have changed in that way. Remember, I have not lost my humble admiration for him one little bit owing to his change of heart. As the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) said—my memory is terrible but I think I have him pinned down somewhere—during these days all of us from the humblest to the greatest, whatever these expressions may mean, were of one mind. We were all at one; we were all united. I am going to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question. He tells us what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply did then. He is very much in favour of the incorporation of crown corporations. In order that he and the hon. member for Vancouver East may get together, may I ask, is he in favour of private enterprise or state ownership?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Both.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, I have been at many circuses, and I have found that the only chap that can do that wears a long hat and paints his face.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read the works of Winston Churchill. May I have the permission of my hon. friend for half a minute?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You have my permission for anything in the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is what Churchill said in a speech on May 21, 1945:

> And I tell you my solemn belief which is that if we act with comradeship and loyalty to our country and to one another and if we can make state enterprise and free enterprise both serve national interests and pull the national wagon side by side then there is no need for us to run into that horrible devastating slump or into that squalid epoch of bickering and confusion which mocked and squandered the hard-won victory which we gained a quarter of a century ago.

That is Right Hon. Winston Spencer Churchill speaking.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I be so happy as to agree with the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, and I am happier still that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has had the remarks passed to him from somewhere down the line and discovered what Churchill said on March 21, 1945. We are all so happy about that, and some of the hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. ABBOTT: The Minister of Veterans Affairs gave me the same quotation—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish I could hear what the Minister of National Defence is saying.

Mr. ABBOTT: I just wanted to say that my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, gave me the same quotation to use in the debate on the industrial development bank two years ago, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Of course, Churchill did not say it until March 21, 1945, so—

Mr. ABBOTT: Nineteen forty-three.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nineteen forty-three; you are wrong again.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, if you say I am wrong again, all right. I am one who is anxious to admit that I am wrong. I will not apologize for it; it is just my ignorance and I could not help it. You see, I am not always right. I differ so much from the people opposite. They were never wrong. The only way they can prove they are always right is to go back to 1930 and 1935 when a man by the name of Bennett sat over in those seats. They are using him to prove that they were always right. Only a fool is never wrong. The wise man admits it, and it would be a grand thing if all of us in this house—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The people proved it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Minister of Veterans Affairs interrupts me again. I have been waiting for the day when he would stand up in the house and say, "No Tory will ever make me sit down." I wanted to be here to reply: "No Grit will ever make him stand up." That, of course, is neither here nor there.

My simple suggestion to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is that he has not heard a single word in objection to the three companies which have been suggested. The minister shook his head a moment ago when I suggested that this bill, together with the previous one and the previous resolution, was an omnibus concern where crown companies might be generally incorporated and brought in to operate our business. I know in connection with one he spoke of a crown company under the research council to operate patents. Someone on the government side said—I have forgotten who it was—that any patent owned by the government should be sold to the highest bidder. I agree with all that. With great respect I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, would he not consider the serious suggestion we made, that when a crown company is formed it be treated as an individual concern? That is not asking a great deal. With that I assure him that of the three companies he has in mind I can safely say he will find very little opposition from this side. Therefore it is not very much to ask that they be treated individually.

We have heard about the toboggan slide to socialism. That expression was used by my deskmate, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I am not thinking so much of a toboggan slide, but I know that if we get a lot of them there will be difficulties. It may be said that parliament can examine these companies in committees. For a couple of months I have been sitting on the war expenditures and economies committee which covered a great many companies. We could not make a proper examination in a couple of years if we sat every day. We have the Canadian Broadcasting corporation committee. We have the Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian National railways committee. Hon. members who sit on these committees know how limited we are in time and in circumstances. Hon. members know of the lack of research people in our parliamentary library. The individual in this house who endeavours—and I am not criticizing the few unfortunate people who are down there—to undertake research soon runs into difficulties. One of our greatest lacks is a dozen or half a dozen trained research people, so that when we give them a subject we may get back into our hands something having to do with the subject. Do not think for a moment, please, that I am criticizing Mr. Hardy or anyone under him. We who have no staffs—and this applies to members on all sides of the house—that if we have to hunt for anything we waste our time in the catacombs over there and probably find the wrong things. There are not sufficient people over there. There are a few very good ones, but there are not enough to tell us where to go to try to find the answers to our problems.

Once more I am just saying to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker: will he just not reconsider this a bit? I know many people say he is drunk with power. I would rather be drunk with something else, if the occasion should arise; but they also say that about a chap named Caesar Petrillo, of the musicians' union, and they say it about John L. Lewis. It is an easy accusation to make against anyone; I am not making it against the minister, but I know this. Only one man who ever lived in this world could have tremendous power and remain humble, I do not mean to his fellows but to himself. What I am suggesting in all seriousness is that the minister reconsider this. Let him bring in the bills he thinks are necessary. Do not regard us as being merely suspicious but regard us as people who are seeking truth and wanting to examine individual measures. Then, with great respect, you will find very little difficulty from this side; but we are frightened of omnibus measures.

Mr. HOWE: I wish to protest the ruling that if I speak I close the debate. I have not spoken during this debate, and I think I am entitled to do so and perhaps have the rebuttal. I ask for your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Since Mr. Speaker made the ruling, as far as I am concerned I would have to abide by it; but if you would like the Speaker recalled to the chair I shall be glad to ask him to come back. With the unanimous consent of the house—

Mr. HOWE: I do not want unanimous consent, but I have not spoken during this debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is that if the minister does not speak when introducing the measure he can speak at any time during the course of the debate.

Mr. BRACKEN: Speaking to the point of order, I should like to ask whether, when the minister moves the second reading of a measure, by that very act he has not spoken?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must say this puts me in rather an awkward position. I believe Mr. Speaker should return to the chair and decide the point; and if hon. members will just content themselves for a moment he will be here.

Mr. GILLIS: I could not hear you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Since the point of order was raised when the Speaker was in the chair I suggested that he should decide the point, instead of the Deputy Speaker; and the Speaker will be back immediately.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of stopping the minister if he wanted to make a statement, but certainly I am not going to let him close the debate because I have a few general observations to make on this measure.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Mr. Speaker is about to take the chair, and I suggest that he be asked to rule on the point of order before the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) continues.

Mr. HOWE: I have no desire to press the point. I shall be glad to wait.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this debate concerns a serious matter, though some hon. members do not treat it as such. For example, when the last speaker took the floor he said he was going to speak briefly; and then he nearly exhausted his forty minutes. Apart from making a very good show of the thing, a humorous speech, I think he really contributed little to the debate except confusion. I was surprised to find that in answering the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) as to whether he stood for private enterprise or government ownership, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) was on both sides, as the Conservative party is at the present time. He believed in public ownership, and at the same time he believed in free enterprise. That is exactly the position the Conservative party are taking, as I see it. They are not opposing this bill, except as to the extent to which it may go. Then they go into the realm of prophecy and point out to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that at some time in the future this can be developed into adjoint system of state and private ownership, and that kind of stuff.

I just want to make this point, which I do not think has been made so far in this debate. The legislation proposed by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not analogous to what is going on in Britain and bears no relation to it. The British government have decided upon a policy of scolialization. They have passed the basic legislation in the house and are now examining the steel industry section by section to see in what way it can best make its contribution to the economy of Britain. That is exactly what we would do were we on that side of the house. But the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is proposing this, in my opinion, on the basis of his war experience. He is proposing the setting up of crown companies. He is asking this house to lay down for him, through this bill, the basic legislation necessary because those who have operated the so-called system of free enterprise in this country for the last seventy-five years have failed. They failed in time of peace, as they are failing now with 243,000 unemployed registered in Canada last week and with the continent of Europe and the world at large crying for production. The system of free enterprise has fallen down on the job. They are not producing; they are not absorbing the ex-service personnel coming back. The minister, with his war experience, realizes this.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How many unemployed are there in Britain?

Mr. GILLIS: That question is too silly to answer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then laugh it off.

Mr. GILLIS: A country devastated by war, wrecked from one end to the other; 43,000,000 people on a litle island you could put inside the province of Ontario—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How many unemployed?

Mr. GILLIS: —still trying to get out of the air raid shelters; and the hon. member for Calgary West compares that with Canada, a country with unlimited resources; 11,000,000 people occupying half the continent of North America; a country which does not know what to do with its resources. And we have 243,000 people unemployed while the world cries for our production. That is too silly to answer. This is a serious question and should not be put on the plane on which it was placed by the hon. member for Calgary West during the time he spoke.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why do you not answer the question?

Mr. GILLIS: There is one thing that perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not forgetting, that no hon. member should forget and that certainly the Canadian people will not forget. When this war broke out; when Britain had her back to the wall, the country about which the Tory party seems to be so anxious; when the free enterprise system was called upon to produce for war the very minister who is introducing this bill tried to let war contracts in this country for the production of the necessary materials of war to assist Britain. But at that time there was a profits limitation of five per cent in those contracts; and a statute passed by this house during the short session of 1939 had to be repealed by order in council at the instance of the present minister because for months he could not get the free enterprisers across this country to accept a single contract to produce munitions of war to enable Britain to build a jumping off place for the rest of the world when it was ready to fight. Now, in the days of peace, he is finding himself in the same position. With thousands of our boys coming back; with thousands of our war workers being relegated back to the streets, we find the free enterprisers back in the saddle putting up a fight for the removal of controls, for the removal of the excess profits tax, wanting to throw the field wide open or threatening to go on a sit-down strike and not produce. In my opinion that is true in every industry in this country. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not asking the house for power to socialize or nationalize anything in this country. He is merely asking us for authority, to give him the right to act where free enterprise has failed to develop the resources of this country as it is doing in the maritime provinces from end to end. There are many small industries which could be set up there. But they would be competing with the big industries in central Canada. They are not set up, with the result that in the maritime provinces to-day you have either to get a policy of taking the people out or to give someone authority to develop small industries in that end of the country.

That is the idea behind what is being done by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply at this time. So far as I am concerned, this bill is limited in its powers. When one considers the amount of capital that any one company will be allowed to handle in one year, namely a half a million dollars, it means nothing. And they are restricted and limited to that extent, under the bill. Personally, I should like to see those limitations taken out.

All we have to do is to stop and examine for a minute the whole problem on the basis of common sense. Is the fuel industry in this country operating to capacity, or in the best interests of the people of Canada? It is not. We face an emergency, a crisis, in that industry to-day. Is that not also true in the lumbering industry? People in this country are crying for houses, and we find the lumbering industry—the essential industry in the building of houses—tied up under your system of free enterprise.

We can go right along and find the same thing in the textile industry. You cannot buy a shirt or a suit of clothes without a priority ticket. The whole machinery is tied up under the system we have to-day. There is no competition; there is no threat to them. In giving the minister the right to set up crown companies we are going to make that attempt and that step in the right direction. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has said that we are facing days of peace. What world is he living in? Where is the peace? Is it international or national peace? There is certainly not any peace. We have just transferred the war to the home front in every country. I do not think it looked much like peace in Cornwall a few days ago when members of a private detective agency from Montreal were handling strike-breakers with crowbars, in order to smash up members of the Canadian Seamen's Union who were trying to get away from an 84-hour week. There was no peace there.

From one end of this country to the other you have industrial strife and industrial unrest because those who control the means of life in Canada to-day—and incidentally control the government from behind the scenes—are sitting back in the saddle and putting on the squeeze so as to get a freer hand to exploit the people of this country. There is no peace there.

There will be no peace in this world until the standard of living of people throughout the world is raised. Rather than hon. members looking upon this measure as a step toward socialism, I would point out to them that it is nothing to be afraid of. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) says that the people of Canada should be consulted. Well, were the people of Canada consulted when the capitalist system was adopted? Were the people of Canada consulted when the Dominion Steel and Coal company were given a blanket right to lease all fuel properties in Nova Scotia, clean out to British Columbia? They were not consulted, at all. Bills were passed, and your birthright was stolen, without any reference to the people. Socialism would merely restore to the people of this country the things that were stolen from them, legally stolen from them, through the legislatures and the House of Commons. That is what it would do. The people were not consulted then. But the people are consulted now, because under the bill proposed by the minister I would have the right to sit here, when a crown company was set up, and examine the accounts.

Mr. FRASER: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: You do with the Canadian National railways, you do with the Post Office Department; you do with the Canadian Broadcasting corporation. Every company or government department operated or controlled by the government can be examined in the house at any time by any member who wishes to ask a question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): After it has been set up.

Mr. GILLIS: Do you examine the National Trust Company's activities? Do you examine the activities of Canadian Collieries, from Vancouver? You do not.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Government inspectors do.

Mr. GILLIS: So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, we are supporting the minister in the step he is taking.

I just wish to clarify the minds of my Progressive Conservative friends on the matter of socialism. This is a long way from socialism. It is merely the matter of giving a minister the right to set up, in areas where free enterprisers are not developing the resources of this country, means of employment.

Let us suppose that the Minister of Transport to-morrow were to go ahead with the building of the causeway across the strait of Canso, for which Nova Scotia members have been asking, for so long. He would have authority to set up a corporation to do that. Under the bill he would not have to come back to the house and wrangle for months and months.

Mr. McILRAITH: There is no power in this bill to set it up.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, there is power in the bill. All you have to do is to read the explanatory note, the short bit on the second page. I am merely using that as an illustration. The Minister of Transport would have to set up a crown company. I believe the mechanics of it has been worked out in his department; at least I have seen that part of it.

If the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply wished to start an industry in New Brunswick—and many of them are badly needed there—they could be capitalized at half a million dollars. He would not have to come back to this house and be tied up for a year with all sorts of wrangling and talking about it. He could set it up and report to parliament, and we would have power to change the legislation if we so desired.

The fact of the matter is this—and we might as well understand it once and for all—that what pulled the house of cards down around the heads of the people of Europe was greed, selfishness and stupidity. That is what built Hitler. They feared social change more than they did Hitler; they were short-sighted. Many of them are dead to-day.

We are travelling the same road on the North American continent, if we are not careful, and if we are not prepared to take some responsibility.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no "oh" about it; and you may not have to wait long. If you will just look across the border at the industrial unrest in the United States—in transportation, in fuel, in every one of their major industries—and look back to Canada, you will see that effort is organized by people who understand the stupidity of those who are trying to hang on to something that died a natural death on the battlefields of Europe, and cannot be revived. Social change has to come about.

I am pleased to see that we have at least one minister in the government who is prepared to take the first logical step toward giving parliament the necessary authority to develop the resources of this country in the interests of the people of Canada; and the money derived from that comes back to the government to be distributed to the people by way of social legislation. I am glad to see that we have at least one minister; and I hope that the other ministers will get behind him, and that he will not receive a lot of Tory opposition from that side of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. During my absence the Minister of Reconstruction asked if he was entitled to speak twice, or to close the debate. If hon. members will recall, at the opening of the sitting this evening, when the Minister of Reconstruction moved the second reading of bill No. 55, respecting the operation of government companies he said:

Mr. Speaker, since I made an extensive explanation of this bill on the resolution stage I shall reserve any further remarks until later.

In making this statement, according to the rules the hon. minister is considered as having spoken. If hon. members would look at Beauchesne, third edition, page 115, they will find this:

If a member who moves an order of the day should rise and say only a word or two, for instance that he moves the order, he is precluded from again addressing the house, except if the order of the day be a substantive motion for second reading of a bill in which case he will be allowed a reply.

Beauchesne, 2nd edition, page 106, under the heading "Standing order 43—Members not to speak twice", says in clause 3:

In all cases Mr. Speaker shall inform the house that the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate.

So that when no other members rise to speak, the minister, when he takes the floor, will close the debate.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before making special reference to certain sections of the minister's speech delivered on May 14, may I refer to one or two statements made in the debate to-night?

In the nineteenth parliament we had an overflow of government members into the opposition side of the house. It becomes completely obvious to-night that in this twentieth parliament the picture is entirely reversed, because now we have the C.C.F. both here on this side and an overflow of C.C.F.-ers to your right, Mr. Speaker.

During his early remarks the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) as one who was riding two horses on this particular subject, namely, public ownership and private enterprise, and he also tied in the Conservative party with that assertion. I should like to ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South how many horses he is riding. I heard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) say that in order to accomplish certain results which he believes essential to the welfare of the people of Canada we must socialize the means of life; yet if he used that expression in some parts of Canada the C.C.F. there would become furious because they realize that it is politically wise in certain parts of this country to exclude many things from their programme of socialization, and one of the things they exclude is certainly enterprises which produce the means of livelihood.

I should like to ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South and other members of his party this question: Is it the specific function of industry to provide employment? Or is it the specific function of industry to provide the goods and services which the people of the country require? We hear from time to time a great deal said about that very subject. We are presumed to have a quarter of a million people unemployed in this country to-day. Since we are living under the present arrangement of things unemployment means no income and therefore a desperate situation, and having that situation, it is asserted by my hon. friends to my immediate right that the responsibility for it rests entirely upon the industrial enterprise of the country. In other words, they say: "regardless of all other circumstances, industry must absorb those who are unemployed." I still look upon industry as that section of our economy which is charged primarily with the production of goods and services of the best possible quality at the lowest possible price. We must recognize the technological fact that almost daily we are improving and increasing our ways and means of production. We must recognize, therefore, that the tendency in the industrial life of our country is to remove persons from the field of so-called work. This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the leisured state, and I think he got reasonably close to the conception which I hold, namely, that if we can, through improvements in science and technology, remove men from the drudgery of eight to ten hours' work a day, then that should be our objective. But let me emphasize that we must make certain that those who are displaced as a consequence of scientific and technological development are not going to be deprived of an effective claim against the production of our industrial life.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to the era of peace and at the same time he referred slightingly to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I have never witnessed the hon. member for Cape Breton South making a substantial contribution towards the peace of this country. In fact, I sometimes think he and some of his associates thrive upon the discontent of the country, and I sometimes think they are hopeful that people will become more discontented rather than more peaceful. They refer to certain practices which have developed in industry and to the report of the price spreads commission. I know all about that report. Those practices constituted an abuse of capital, and I admit that governments should have sufficient intestinal fortitude to step in and check abuses in industry which are nefarious in character. I think everybody realizes that no government whatsoever has any right to close its eyes completely to the abuses of some of the larger corporations, while concentrating upon probably minor offences which are more easily visible.

May I refer to the speech delivered by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) on May 14. I would be remiss in my duty if I were not to associate myself with the hon. member for Peace River in condemning the introduction of this new principle which the minister referred to on page 1511 of Hansard of allowing crown corporations to use their operating revenues to pay their operating costs. Within the last day or two I have had a number of complaints from my part of the country with respect to that aspect of the government's proposals. At the bottom of page 1511 of Hansard the minister classified these crown corporations in three groups. First, he referred to those of an administrative and supervisory nature. He said:

> It did not directly operate plants, but it supervised their building, arranged for the operation of the plants, and handled the sale of the product.

While that applied during the war, it is assumed that the minister gave it as one of three functions which one or all of these crown corporations might discharge after the war. But I say to him that it does not require a crown corporation in order that building may be engaged in throughout the country. It does not require crown corporation to operate any industry efficiently; in fact, of all the examples of industry I have seen, some of the most inefficient were labelled as crown corporations. Let me assure the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that before the war industry experienced difficulty in selling its products was not because a substantial portion of our industry was owned privately. Let me emphasize this fact: whether a corporation is privately owned or publicly owned you must have in the hands of your people an effective claim against its production. We realize that we have had and still have crown-operated corporations in this country, but their products and their services are not a bit easier to secure than the products and the services rendered by private companies.

Just before leaving No. 1, let me say again that our view is that the affairs of this country should be so regulated that we shall have in the hands of our people an effective claim against goods, and then it will take no crown corporation to see that such goods are properly distributed.

On page 1511 of Hansard the minister asserted:

> In the second class were the manufacturing companies. We found as the war proceeded that it was necessary to increase the manufacture of certain products beyond the capacity of private industry. . .

We agree that the urgent demands of war made that course of action necessary. But what does the minister advance as the reason for a crown corporation to function after the war? I reflect back on that period from 1930 to 1939. No one will say that the industry of this country was then incapable of producing the requirements of the Canadian people. I well recall that our stores and warehouses were jammed with commodities. The government of the day called them "surpluses". But we realize that the whole problem was lack of effective demand for those goods. We shall have no difficulty in securing the vast quantities of produce necessary for the requirements of our people, provided that our people are in possession of those incomes which alone create effective demand and which alone guarantee the full-time operation of those industries.

I move to No. 3. The minister stated:

> Then there was the third class of companies, companies engaged in merchandising certain raw materials and in providing stockpiles sufficient to assure adequate supplies for war and civilian purposes.

Once again I agree that during the war this was an important function of a crown corporation. But do you remember the stockpiles we had before the war, stockpiles of grain, called "surplus", stockpiles of almost every other type of produce, called "surpluses". Why, they were even paying people not to produce, in order to reduce their stockpiles. Yet we accuse private industry—at least some people do—of not being capable of producing the requirements of our people.

An hon. MEMBER: The C.C.F. do.

Mr. SHAW: Place in the hands of your people, by whatever method you desire, purchasing power so that they can create an effective demand, and industry will flood this country. We have the natural resources. We have the skilled technical personnel and all other types of workers. It is remarkable what would be accomplished. So that I say to the minister, maybe he was simply endeavouring to justify crown corporations during the war by making these statements, but in my estimation if he is endeavouring to use them to justify the existence of crown corporations after the war his case falls miserably flat.

I agree with my leader, the hon. member for Peace River, that where special conditions exist, particularly emergency conditions as was the case during the war, there is justification for the establishment of certain crown corporations, but when I see a measure of this nature, almost unlimited in its application, appearing as though it will pass through this parliament, I say that we are making a step which we may have occasion to regret.

The question occurs to me, when it comes to the establishment of another corporation, say two years hence, will parliament know anything about it before it is established, or will someone quite accidentally discover, maybe a year after it is established, that such an animal is in existence? It removes from parliament, by virtue of the fact that it will spend its own money, a substantial measure of control. If that corporation has to come here for the money to carry on, and if, in asking for that money, it is obliged to justify its existence, we shall be able to say that parliament truly operates in an effective manner as applied to the control of these corporations.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOWE: Filibuster. I am sure this hon. member does not know much about it.

Mr. FRASER: I could say in five words just what I think of this bill, but I am going to say more than that. I tell the minister right now that I am against the bill the way it is set up at the present time. I believe he would serve the coutnry best by following the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), taking the bill back, and treating each company individually on its own merits. Only this afternoon the minister said that the Eldorado mine and the radium plant at Port Hope were only paying their way. If I remember rightly, that outfit was making a profit before the government took it over. Why is it that at the present time it is only paying its way? However, I suppose we are lucky that it is doing even that; most of the corporations which the government is running or has run have cost the country many millions of dollars. Take the Canadian National Railways; it has cost this country millions on millions of dollars.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is the Tory position.

Mr. FRASER: I did not hear the remark of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MAYBANK: I hope Hansard did.

Mr. FRASER: See what the broadcasting corporation is costing the people of Canada. Everyone who owns a radio chips in two and a half dollars to help run that corporation. But there are broadcasting stations in the United States, owned by private interests, which do not cost the people a nickel, and give good programmes. They do not serve out trash like the corporation we have in Canada serves out.

Mr. MARTIN: Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: It is not "who set it up"; it is who is running it at the present time.

Mr. MARTIN: Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: That is not the question now, but, who is running it?

Mr. MARTIN: Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: The Secretary of State keeps chipping in, but I only wish the Secretary of State would listen to some of the programmes they have on the air now.

Mr. MARTIN: Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: I am quite sure that the minister would not only have a headache after listening to it, but that he would be very, very bitter.

Mr. MARTIN: Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: That is just like hon. gentlemen on the other side sitting around the Secretary of State. They often start up the "quack, quack". Who set it up?

Mr. MARTIN: I am simply asking a question. Who set it up?

Mr. FRASER: I have often thought, when friends of the Secretary of State start the "quack, quack" it would be a good idea if the Speaker would throw a few kernels of corn to the ducks and geese on the Liberal side.

I have been wondering why the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is so anxious to set up these crown corporations. There are more reasons than one, but is it because the Minister of Munitions and Supply—the department is now the Department of Reconstruction and Supply—has men whom he does not want to let out and wishes to make a place for them? Is it because the minister wishes to retain the power he has of real dictatorship over the industry of Canada? That is what he has at the present time. It has been said to-night that parliament has no control over private industry. This government at present has private industry in such a position that industrialists do not know what is going to happen next. They do not know what is going to happen to-morrow and they cannot plan as they should be allowed to plan. This government has not given them any lead at all, or any help, or the prospect of any help.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said to-night that we in Canada were competing against each other to survive. Of course, I have always believed that his party felt that way. They do not want to compete with anyone; they would rather sit down and have somebody feed them. If I am right—and I know I am—I have seen deer, elk and other wild animals in game preserves, as other hon. gentlemen have also seen them, and I have always found that those animals in a game preserve are not as strong as the animals that are in the wild, which have to fend for their own food.

An hon. MEMBER: They live a lot longer though.

Mr. FRASER: I think the hon. gentleman over there will agree that no one has ever seen a man or a woman, a boy or a girl who was worth anything unless they worked and tried to do something for themselves. One has to do that. It is really the survival of the fittest and we all have to contribute something. I know the socialist party represented by my hon. friends to my left, and right across the country, seldom try to contribute anything to the welfare of the country. In welfare work, how many of them get out and help? They do not in my riding, and they do not in many other ridings in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Is your riding the whole country?

Mr. FRASER: No, and I am glad to hear that in the hon. member's riding there is one in that section who does a little bit for welfare. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, under this bill, will be able to set up crown companies holus-bolus.

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt to say that that is wholly untrue. This bill makes no provision for setting up any crown company. The authority must be found outside the bill.

Mr. FRASER: That interpretation is absolutely different from what we have had before.

Mr. MARTIN: Read the bill.

Mr. FRASER: I have read the bill and it would give the government a chance to set up companies holus-bolus. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOWE: Read the section.

Mr. FRASER: I will read the section.

(b) "Company" means a company incorporated under part I of The Companies Act, 1934, all the issued shares of capital stock of which are owned by or held in trust for His Majesty in right of Canada, except shares necessary to qualify other persons as directors.

And so on.

Mr. HOWE: Where is the authority?

Mr. FRASER: You have the authority under this bill.

Mr. HOWE: No. That is perfect nonsense. It has been said all evening and you might as well continue, but I simply point out that it is nonsense.

Mr. FRASER: I am pleased to hear the minister say that it is not as I suggest, and I hope that when he speaks he will explain what he means by his remarks. As I see it, the setting up of these crown companies will mean extra income tax to the people of Canada. The companies to be set up under this bill—

Mr. MARTIN: There are none to be set up under the bill.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you sure you have the right bill?

Mr. FRASER: I only wish the hon. member for Fraser Valley had read the bill. I think he would agree with me.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I could not find the holus-bolus.

Mr. FRASER: After the bill passes, you will find it to your regret and to your constituents' sorrow. At any rate, the set-up that the minister has here will mean extra income tax to the people of Canada, and they have plenty at the present time. I hope that the minister will do as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has suggested.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): I simply wish to make a few observations. I could not allow the statements made by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) to go by without some comment. In the first place, he said that this group were in favour of sitting down and allowing someone to feed them. I represent a group of people who pioneered in Saskatchewan from 1904 and on through these years, a group that produced more food possibly than any other section in Canada. When the hon. gentleman says that the members of this group are in favour of sitting down and having someone feed them, I resent that very much, and I know that the people in my constituency will want me to rise in my place and protest against a statement of that kind. Why was the C.C.F. started? There was a good reason for it. It was started because the people who produced the wealth of the country did not get anything for it. Therefore no hon. member in my hearing will get away with a statement of that kind.

Another statement which the hon. gentleman made was that we were not interested in welfare work. What is welfare work? I have seen something of welfare work. The people who do welfare work are good-hearted people—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I will ask him to discuss the bill before the house.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There has been a good deal of opposition to crown corporations. Many remarks have been made which did not have much to do with crown corporations. If hon. members bring the question of welfare work into this discussion, then other hon. members should be permitted to answer. We have welfare work in connection with business of all kinds. The people who do welfare work are largely the people who have had a greater share—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but on second reading of a bill it is against the rules to discuss matters which are not relevant to the bill itself.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): My interest in the bill is not to indicate my opposition to public ownership but to indicate my concern about the taxation feature of crown corporations. I think I am within the scope of the bill in discussing the aspects that apply to taxation with regard to municipalities in the future. Naturally I have been greatly interested in public ownership for many years. I am associated with the hydro enterprise, and I am a member of a public utilities board of my home city. I am already on record so far as hydro is concerned. In expressing my convictions to hon. members to-night, may I say that I believe in equality of taxation. The only standard by which you can measure the efficiency in management of any enterprise is that they should in common with all other citizens or corporations bear their fair share of the nation's costs, and particularly the costs of the municipalities.

So far as the hydro electric power commission of Ontario is concerned, it can be considered a crown company. It is true they make money. They make it by the rates that are fixed and levied on the people who use hydro, but none of that money is returned to the municipalities in which hydro power is sold. Therefore in that sense they contribute nothing toward the building of sidewalks, the laying of pavements, the building of bridges or of schools, or the educational costs, the police to protect their property or the fire department which is also necessary to protect their property; whereas other public utilities which are operating within the municipality, such as the water works, any revenue or profits resulting from their operations go into the coffers of the municipalities.

With the crown companies as proposed in the terms of this bill, it would appear to me that, wherever they might be located, if there is a profit resulting from their operation it will find its way into the coffers of the central administration. Hon. members may say that is where it should go. I have no doubt that, in the main, municipalities throughout Ontario and the whole dominion would bid for one of these companies if they could get them to locate in their midst. Nevertheless it seems to me that the time has arrived when the government should give consideration to a local levy of taxation or crown companies; and if we can accept what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said to-night, the government will in due time, and I think should, give such consideration. If that is done, then I feel our position with respect to the quotation given by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) would not be very different from what he quoted from the Right Hon. Winston Churchill. If the suggestion of the Minister of Labour is acted on, then we shall be in a position to make private enterprise and public ownership work side by side.

At the moment I cannot accept the principle that a crown corporation should escape its share of municipal taxation. Many hon. members know that my background is one of municipal government. There we are charged with the responsibility of raising sizeable sums to carry on the administration of local municipalities. All the municipalities of Ontario, being creatures of the provincial government, legislate or work within the terms of the authority laid down by the provincial legislature; therefore their field of taxation is one of direct taxes, and it is limited and must be borne by the property owners.

My objection is—and I am more impressed when I listened to the round of applause emanating from the quarter occupied by the C.C.F. socialist group, that this can easily be; in saying this I am not doubting in any sense the sincerity of the present incumbent of the ministerial post of reconstruction; I think that generally we have considerable confidence in the man who is charged with that responsibility at present—that he is not the one who is going to carry on forever. This legislation could become, in the hands of those who would seek to use it for a purpose it was never intended, in the mind of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), a dangerous thing. We are all individuals; we think as individuals; we act as individuals, and we shall continue to do so until there is mass regulation and regimentation. In order to bring that about there will have to be instituted a system of government similar to that which we destroyed or hoped we had destroyed in central Europe. I agree in that sense with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that the thing we thought we fought the war for was to destroy state or national socialism which was rampant in Germany. It was brought about by what we might do here unconsciously in this sense.

There is more than one way to bring about state socialism. The first way is to listen to its being advocated from a public platform. The other way is to continue to impose taxation until you have taxed private enterprise out of existence or destroyed the will of the people and their ambition and desire to make their contribution to the state. As I look back and think of the contribution which has been made by government agencies during the war—and all of them are praiseworthy—I am still reminded that in association with the contribution were the tremendous resources of this nation which have been built up under the finest system in the world so far as I am concerned, namely, private enterprise. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the functions of government can quite properly be considered as legislative and not entirely regulatory or administrative. In other words, if there is anything wrong with private enterprise; if there may be so-called monopolies; if some have usurped the privileges of citizenship and have sought to exploit the nation for the benefit of a privileged few, then I say this parliament or any other parliament having authority can legislate and regulate in order that private enterprise may be brought within the scope of the legislation and required to render an account of their stewardship which must indeed, after all, bear some semblance to fair play. I am inclined to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), with due deference to my good friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs that there is something in this legislation delegating to the government an authority which, if I understand the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply aright, he is not seeking; and that is one very good reason why the bill should be further considered.

Then the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) spoke about General Motors in the city of Regina receiving some advantage by way of freedom from taxation. In Ontario the only bonus or consideration we can give a prospective industry is a fixed assessment. Of course, if the statutes of Saskatchewan provide that an industry may be brought to Regina where it will pay no taxes, that inducement must have been approved by the ratepayers of that city. They may have taken a long-range view, knowing that at some time, sooner or later, that enterprise would pay taxes in the municipality, and that would be offered as an inducement to have it locate there. The moment we approve the establishment of crown companies, which will be located in municipalities across this country without being subject to taxation, then I say the situation is entirely different from that of offering a bonus or some similar inducement to private enterprise, since they will never pay taxes.

The real source of security, after all, is employment, and I will go so far as to say that I believe this country of ours offers everyone the right to earn a living at a fair rate of pay for a fair day's work. But I certainly do not feel that we should subscribe to the false theory which I believe is all too prevalent in these days, that the country owes a man a living. I cannot accept that, nor do I think it is good for the nation. There is a tendency at the present time for people to lean upon others, and we find a constant trend toward paternalism on the part of the government. We are now to have crown companies, and we shall have no way of knowing whether or not they are efficiently operated, because we have no yardstick with which to measure them since they pay no taxes. I have heard it said in this house, for instance, that T.C.A. had an operating surplus, but unless we know what they paid in taxes for the use of airports and other property it is difficult indeed to determine if they are efficiently managed. In order to determine the measure of efficiency we must have some means of comparison. The setting up of crown companies may be the thin end of the wedge, so that our people will be still further robbed of their initiative and their desire to build Canada into a great nation. We have in Canada what it takes to make a great country, but what we need more than anything else is good, sound business management. We need balanced budgets and lower taxes, because at present our people are being discouraged by taxation, and that may account to some extent for the constant migration from this country to the United States.

It has been stated in this house to-night that in many enterprises the crown can give leadership, and I would point to one outstanding example in that connection. In the great province of Alberta there is a wealth of coal, a great deal of which may be needed in this country before next spring comes around. I hope the government are considering giving leadership in that development, because I believe great quantities of this coal could be made available. I have no doubt that one of the reasons back of the introduction of this legislation is atomic energy, which has been referred to this evening; and I feel that for whatever the government may have done or may do by way of research in this connection they should be commended, because in atomic energy we have a latent power greater than anything mankind has ever conceived. Man has now discovered a means of harnessing this power; but how is he going to use it? In the beginning I believe it is in good hands when it is under the control of the crown. We should seek constantly to see that it is developed and devoted to useful purposes. As my leader (Mr. Bracken) said this afternoon, it should not be developed in anticipation of destruction but for purposes of construction. It may be that these crown companies are to be set up in order to develop atomic energy still farther, perhaps to utilize the products resulting therefrom or even to use the power that may be developed in this way. But I believe the minister should accept in good faith the suggestion that has been made from this side of the house. I would not want in any way to appear belligerent about this. I rose to speak only because I have been long associated with public ownership ventures in Ontario, and I would not want my position to be misunderstood or misinterpreted. I am in favour of public ownership, but by the same token I am in favour of every enterprise and every individual bearing a fair share of the cost of government, because that can become a terrific burden.

We in Ontario realize that our hydro system, owned by the crown, has brought us cheap power and has assisted in our industrial development. Nevertheless, to get a true picture of the value of such great institutions I feel they should bear their fair share of the cost of local government within the municipalities. I believe we should give careful consideration to all these matter before we travel too far along the road to socialism. Mind you, socialism is nothing new. If time and Mr. Speaker would permit I could trace socialism back for hundreds of years, and show that it has always destroyed the civilization of its day. It may do the same thing again unless we are alive to what it really means, and unless we decide whether we are to have our people reduced to a point where they are subservient to the government, or whether the government is to remain the servant of the people. So that to-night I am simply trying to place myself on record as believing in public ownership. I am also in favour of a limited development in the matter of crown companies, as long as certain protection is given and the right of taxation is admitted. If we are to embark upon something of this kind I believe the sooner we recognize these factors and give them thought and study, the better it will be. It appears to me that we are now just about in the position in which the Minister of Veterans Affairs is, when he said that he is both for public ownership and for private enterprise. No one can find any grave fault with that statement, if he can work it out in practice. But when we do come to work it out in practice, will it give the individual an equal opportunity against equal odds? And the odds at the present time are in favour of those who do not have to bear a share of the nation's costs.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, time is short, and I have only a few words to say. I rise to-night for only two or three reasons. In the first place, my honourable and jovial friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) said this afternoon that the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was most stupid and fascist—

An hon. MEMBER: No; fatuous.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I thought he said fascist, and I take exception to that. I must apologize if the minister did not say "fascist". I thought my colleague from Vancouver South made a well-reasoned, plain and well-ordered speech, and my only complaint is as to the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs described the speech as stupid. After listening to him, the only conclusion I must come to is that the minister is much more stupid than the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Replying to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), the minister said that the bill did not allow the setting up of crown companies. Of course it does; at least as I see it it does. How can you run a company without getting money for it? That is what this bill does. It says that any of these companies may be formed under part I of the Companies Act. They can get money from this measure, up to a million dollars.

So that the minister can go on and on and on, creating company after company, without coming to parliament at all. He has the money for it right there; only it is just a million for each company. But he can have as many millions as he likes by creating companies.

I object to the bill because it is the inalienable right of a member of the House of Commons, one which dates back to the times of Charles II, to take one's grievance to the foot of the throne. Since that time a member of the House of Commons has been given that right. For instance, that is what we do when we pass the estimates, the current issue of which I hold in my hand. Why not have many more companies? For instance, let us look into these estimates and turn first to the Department of Agriculture. Why not have a company to control the experimental farm service? Had we such a company, the ministry would not have to come to parliament at all; the minister would just take the money.

Then, let us turn to the insurance branch. Let us have a little company for that branch. I could go on. We are keenly interested in this, because the minister says that these statements of the companies are brought down every year. I have not yet seen a statement of Wartime Housing Limited, nor do I know if one has ever been published. Of course we shall be told that everything is all right, and that we are doing it for a purpose. I do not know whether they operate at a profit or a loss.

Speaking about companies, the minister said that the system of bookkeeping was inadequate. Well, I have sat in the house for almost eleven years, and I have not yet found out whether the Post Office Department makes a profit or a loss. Money seems to go in one way and out the other. I do not know just how it is done.

Then, let us go on, because there is more here. For instance, as I have said, we shall have a little company to operate the post office, others to operate other departments. If we did, then they would not have to come to parliament for money, because they would simply get $500,000 to begin and another $500,000; that would be a million dollars between the two parts of the bill. Of course, that is just a start. When we get along a little farther they will be more ambitious; and when they find it so easy to get money in that way, without any kick from members, without any criticism on the estimates, they would just go on forming more companies.

I doubt if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would ever ask for a company to run his show, although I do not know about some of the other ministers. You see, first of all, we have ministers; then we have parliamentary assistants, and now the job is getting so big we are going to have boards of directors for these companies. Indeed, after a while we shall have more people directing companies than are employed by them.

I do not think we are far apart in this matter. The hon. member for Vancouver South put it plainly when he said that if the minister wishes to incorporate a company he should put it in the bill. Let him come to parliament with a separate bill for each company, in the regular way. What objection could there be to that? We could have discussion; it would always be out in the open, and no one would be subject to criticism. Then, too, we would be preserving our rights as members of the House of Commons.

I, for one, do not intend to give up my right to criticize when the government asks for money. That is a most precious right. We relinquished that right to a certain extent during the war, because at many times in those years we were very careful about our criticism of the government, and the government knows that very well. We in the opposition had to be careful of what we did, and even then we were called saboteurs of the war effort because sometimes we criticized what the government was doing.

On motion of Mr. Ross (St. Paul's) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 4, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received notices of the vacancies which have occurred in the electoral districts of Pontiac, province of Quebec, and Portage la Prairie, province of Manitoba, and I have issued my warrants for writs for new elections in these electoral divisions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WOMEN IN ATTENDANCE IN THE GALLERIES—WEARING OF HATS

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in connection with ladies having to wear hats in the galleries, which reads as follows in Hansard of May 29, page 1984:

There is a matter I wish to draw to the attention of the acting house leader, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It has been the custom not to allow women in the gallery without some kind of head covering. So many women go everywhere now without hats that the observance of this regulation is enforcing indignity on this house . . .

Pursuant to this question I made the following statement:

As the question asked by the hon. member concerns the house, I suggest that she put her question to the Speaker, but not from the floor of the house, as it is against the rule. I shall be very glad to give it consideration.

After a few days of meditation and mature consideration I have prepared the following statement:

The practice of requiring women to wear hats in the galleries of the House of Commons was probably borrowed from what was until recently the practice in all churches. Indeed in the churches it may very well have been looked upon as a rule promulgated by Saint Paul, both in the first epistle to Timothy, in which he recommends that——women appear in churches in decent apparel, adorning themselves with modesty and sobriety, not with plaited hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly attire, and that they learn in silence . . . But I suffer not a woman to teach nor to use authority over the man: but to be in silence.

—and also in his first epistle to the Corinthians in which he ordered:

Let women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted them to speak, but to be subject as also law saith.

The fact that women have now become eligible to the House of Commons and been given the right to speak their minds there, even if it does involve "teaching and using authority over the man," shows that the church rules need not necessarily apply to parliament.

As a matter of fact I am informed that the Church of England dispensed during the war with the rule that women appear in church with their heads covered, and that it is not apt to be reestablished there. As far as this house is concerned, I have made enquiries and I have found that there never was any written rule about the matter. I am not disposed to adopt any severe decree; for I think it is advisable to leave the decision to the ladies themselves. I am sure that whether they are covered or hatless their presence in the galleries will always be welcome.

INDIAN ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) presented the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, chapter 98, R.S.C., 1927, and all such other matters as have been referred to the said committee, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE IN CANADA

PETITION OF RESIDENTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA URGING REPATRIATION

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table a petition signed by thousands of residents in British Columbia urging the repatriation of Japanese. This petition comes from the Japanese repatriation league, and reads:

To the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled:

The petition of the undersigned of the province of British Columbia humbly sheweth:

That your petitoners view with alarm the fact that approximately two-thirds of the persons of the Japanese race in Canada are still in the province of British Columbia and that a very small number have been resettled east of the Rocky mountains on a permanent basis.

That your petitioners are unalterably opposed to persons of the Japanese race being permitted in the said province which is a natural defence area for Canada in the event of war on the Pacific.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house may be pleased to enact such measures as may be necessary to make certain:—

1. That persons of the Japanese race shall not be permitted to reside in the province of British Columbia.

2. That all persons of the Japanese race not permanently resettled east of the Rocky mountains are repatriated to Japan or resettled in territory in the Pacific ocean under the jurisdiction of the united nations or whatever international organization may be founded.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Dated the 1st day of March, A.D. 1945.

This is only one of a number of petitions that will come to the house.

STRAIT OF CANSO CAUSEWAY

REPORT ON BORINGS AND SURVEYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On March 22 of this year the minister intimated that he might be in a position at the end of May to make a statement with regard to the progress being made in the development of the causeway project across the strait of Canso. Can he make a statement now?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of the question. I have a statement which I am happy to give him now. The present position of the Canso investigations is as follows:

1. A good subsurface survey of the site of the causeway is completed.

2. Five borings to rock have been made at the lock site at the west end of the causeway.

3. One boring to rock has been made at the east end of the causeway.

4. A proposal to put down five borings in the central section of the causeway from J. P. Porter has been accepted and material therefor has been ordered by the contractor. Work should start in the near future.

5. The above proposal includes two borings on the site of a possible bridge.

6. A subsurface survey on the sites of new terminals on either side of the strait is completed.

7. Much field work has been completed in study of possible railway diversions.

8. Four borings have been completed on the possible site of terminals at Steep Creek and on the shore opposite.

9. A barometric reconnaissance survey of the country between the Sunnybrae line and Antigonish-Mulgrave line has been completed and an excellent low grade route has been found for connecting these lines.

10. The geological survey have given us a new report on the territory in the vicinity of the causeway and the availability of material for its construction.

The services of Mr. S. W. Crowell of Amherst have been secured and a survey party headed by him will be in the field in one week's time if all goes well. During this summer we expect to spend about $45,000 on borings and $15,000 on surveys. We shall probably complete our work in September.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct to the Minister of Labour a question of which I have given him notice. What steps are being taken by the federal government to settle the dispute between the typographical union and the newspapers concerned?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): For the information of the hon. member for Winnipeg North and other hon. members regarding the stoppage of work in three newspapers published by the Southam Company—I speak now of three only; there may be others to-day that I do not know of,—the Ottawa Citizen, the Hamilton Spectator and the Edmonton Journal, the employees affected are members of the international typographical union. The work stoppage at these points has its basis in a similar stoppage which has been in progress at Winnipeg since November 8 of last year, affecting the Winnipeg Tribune, also published by the Southam Company, and the Winnipeg Free Press, published by the Sifton interests.

In Winnipeg, basically the issues were the union's policy that its international law is not subject to arbitration, et cetera—and when I say "et cetera" I refer to the regulations set in motion by the respective governments of this country—the forty-hour week and payment for overtime if the union could not provide labour under its closed shop agreement. Unfortunately the situation had deteriorated to such an extent in Winnipeg by the time it reached the attention of my department that the appointment of two industrial disputes inquiry commissions and the holding of several conferences in Ottawa did not bring about a settlement.

The chief reason why my department intervened in the dispute was to prevent its extension to other newspapers of the Southam and Sifton chains. The Southam Company is taking the position that each of its local newspaper managements has control over local newspaper policy and labour relations. The union's position is that certain basic labour conditions must apply in all newspapers operated by the company. Apparently its individual managers in the Ottawa, Hamilton and Edmonton newspapers would agree to the proposals of the union, but no agreement can be reached in regard to the Winnipeg newspaper of the company.

My department has been in touch with the minister of labour of Ontario concerning the stoppages affecting the Ottawa and Hamilton newspapers. With regard to the Edmonton newspaper, my department has no jurisdiction in the province of Alberta.

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Is the minister in a position to give us any information with regard to the strike of the international woodworkers of British Columbia? My reason for asking the question to-day is that there were indications last night that work may have been resumed to-day.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As my hon. friend and those interested know, Mr. Justice Sloan rendered his report on Saturday. I received it on Monday. I do not think it is necessary for me to give the details of his decision. The operators have already accepted the report. The men's organization have asked until Wednesday of this week to consider it. I can understand that, because they have to get in touch with their membership, which takes a little longer than with the employers. I hope that both sides will have the good sense to accept what I call a very fair report. It is not often that I use an expression of that kind in the House of Commons. I always endeavour to walk down the middle of the road.

Mr. COLDWELL: To sit on the fence.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, that is all right. I believe it is sensible, it is fair, and it is sound. I hope that the I.W.A. will have the good sense to see to it that they recommend it to their membership so that the necessary assistance can be given to farmers of British Columbia in connection with the forthcoming crop in that province.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not hear the last part of the remark of the Minister of Labour. Did he refer to the farmers of British Columbia, and if so would he repeat that portion of his statement? It may save my asking another question.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know what my hon. friend is interested in, and I said, "and to render the necessary assistance to the farmers of British Columbia." Goodness knows they have been long suffering.

USE OF EMPLOYMENT SERVICE TO RECRUIT MEN TO REPLACE STRIKING SEAMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In dealing with the seamen's strike, is the national employment service employing personnel to man the ships at the present time?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to say to the hon. member for Spadina that officially I know of no instance in which our employment offices are being used for the recruiting of men to take the place of members of the Canadian seamen's union who are on strike through a dispute with the lake boat operators. If an operator filed a request with one of our employment offices for men to work on lake boats, the office would canvass those looking for jobs, and if they were interested in taking the job they would be cautioned that there is a strike and that they were taking these jobs to replace men on strike. Printed instructions have been given to managers of all our offices to explain this point to the men referred to jobs under these circumstances.

IMMIGRATION

DISPLACED PERSONS—BRITISH TRADE UNION PROTESTS AGAINST ADMISSION TO BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I wish to address two brief questions to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Will the displaced Europeans and others mentioned in the minister's statement to the house on changes in the immigration regulations, Wednesday, May 29, have preference in time of admission to Canada over thousands of British ex-servicemen and women who have indicated their desire to come to Canada at the first opportunity? Has the minister any information concerning protests of British trade unions against admission to Great Britain for employment there of displaced persons mentioned in his statement?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman sent me a copy of his questions. The answer to the first question is no. The controlling factor in the movement to Canada of admissible immigrants from the British isles and the continent of Europe is passenger accommodation. This was referred to in my statement to the house on May 29. Immigration facilities for the admission of British subjects are now available; there is practically no movement of immigrants other than the dependents of our service personnel, simply because there is no steamship accommodation for them. Immigration facilities have not yet been provided for the examination of immigrants at continental ports, for the reason that there is no passenger service to Canadian ports. It will be recalled that on Wednesday last, when referring to immigration from the continent, I said that it is proposed to re-establish inspectional facilities on the continent as quickly as circumstances permit so that as transportation becomes available imigrants of the admissible classes may come forward.

The answer to the second question is no.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

QUESTIONS AS TO RECONVENING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. THATCHER (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I am sorry I did not give him notice, but if he is not in a position to answer to-day, perhaps he would do it to-morrow. Has the government considered the advisability of reconvening the dominion-provincial conference? Have representations been received from any province asking that it be reconvened?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I intend to deal in my budget speech with the matter referred to in the hon. member's questions.

Mr. GRAYDON: When will that be?

Mr. COLDWELL: When may we expect the budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall announce that date just as soon as I am in a position to do so.

COAL

QUESTION AS TO MEETING NEXT WINTER'S REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. It arises out of a statement made by the deputy coal controller, Mr. Ian MacLaren. He said that widespread unemployment would result next winter because of the coal shortage. He said that it is not possible to assess fully the tremendous damage that the recent bituminous coal strike has caused Canadian industry, because of the possible shortage of 5,500,000 tons of coal. Would the minister comment on what his associate, the deputy coal controller, has said, and give us some idea of what our people are to have in the way of coal next winter?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The statement of the coal controller is quite correct. We are behind in normal shipments of coal from the United States to the point of about five and a half million tons. The fact that there is a seamen's strike on the great lakes is putting us still farther behind. It seems impossible that we can make up the shortage between now and the time that coal will be required. We are doing the best we can. It is quite useless to ask me to-day where we shall stand next December. I have not the faintest idea, but I can assure hon. members that anything that can be done will be done to provide heat for domestic users and for industry during the next cold season.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If I may ask the minister a further question, is anything being done to get coal from Alberta, for instance? What effort is being put forward as far as that is concerned?

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Maloney be substituted for that of Mr. Leger on the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS

The house resumed from Monday, June 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of bill No. 155, respecting the operation of government companies.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), speaking yesterday in the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill, called attention to one of the objections to it, in that no provision is made for the payment by crown companies of any taxes, federal, provincial or municipal. I intend to devote my brief remarks this afternoon to that aspect of the bill before us, and that aspect only. I believe it is of interest to hon. members on both sides, since I notice on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) a notice of motion referring to the heavy and unequal burden that is placed upon certain municipalities by these tax exemptions. This comes pretty close to home, because just across the border from my constituency is a small municipality of some 1,500 ratepayers. This I will use as exhibit A to show the burden which may be placed upon a small municipality which has within its borders a large number of government-owned buildings.

I desire to refer to the municipality of Esquimalt as the example, I might almost say the horrible example, of a small municipality which is throttled by the octopus of government-owned tax-free property. Out of a total assessment on land in 1946 of $2,000,000, nearly $700,000 is crown property. Referring to the improvements on this land, out of a total assessment of $11,000,000 for improvements, $9,000,000 is represented by improvements on crown properties which were erected prior to the outbreak of hostilities. That figure does not include improvements which have been erected during the years of war. It is impossible to give an accurate estimate of what those improvements might amount to, but a rough estimate would easily place them at an additional million dollars. Disregarding those improvements and dealing with the land alone, this small municipality suffers an annual loss of $22,912 at the present mill rate. During the war many of the choicest building sites and waterfront locations were expropriated by the government for the construction of crown properties, and in this connection there is an annual loss of revenue amounting to $7,500 from land which has been appropriated.

It is of little value to say that the wages paid those employed in these government owned properties increase the wealth of the merchants of the community, because that is not so. Those working there are principally men connected with the services. The navy have their barracks and the army have their fortifications in the municipality of Esquimalt. If these men are married they have their families living in the nearby city of Victoria. When they wish to spend their money for recreational purposes they do so either within their own barracks or in the city of Victoria. Yet this small municipality has to maintain a road system which carries much heavier traffic than it was designed to carry, because of the government-owned properties now located within its boundaries; it has to maintain additional police services; it has to look after the additional garbage, lighting, and perhaps hospital and school services.

I do not intend to elaborate on this; I merely want to say that this municipality is an example of what may happen if a small community finds itself with a large number of government buildings or crown companies established within its boundaries. The municipality of Esquimalt will wonder how far these crown companies are going to be extended. They will look tc their ship yards and to their dry docks. They will ask whether these ship yards, now run by Yarrows, are going to be turned into a crown company, and if so, will they be free of taxation. I believe that if hon. members of this house will consider the position in which Esquimalt has been placed for many years; if they will realize the burden borne by the municipal council, which has not been able to find any solution to the problem though in past years appeals have been made to this government for grants, they will think twice about giving the government carte blanche in regard to the establishment of crown companies in other small communities.

As I said, I intended to deal with only this one phase, because I feel that other phases have been dealt with adequately and effectively by other hon. members. Therefore I rest my case at this point and ask hon. members to bear in mind the example I have given. This is not the place to suggest remedies for the particular situation at Esquimalt. That I intend to do on a later occasion.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, some remarkable attributes of the present bill have been brought to light in the course of the debate. If one is to judge by the effect it has had upon certain quarters of the house, then indeed it is a most versatile bill. It is an inspiring bill: it inspired the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) last night to deliver a eulogy on socialism and on the minister who introduced the bill. It inspired the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) to embark upon a eulogy of the minister, and upon what he, I am sure, on calmer reflection will wish he had not indulged in, namely, comments of a personal nature on the observations made by an hon. member on this side of the house when that hon. member urged that the house do not give second reading of the bill.

Reading Hansard, I find in the remarks last night of the Minister of Veterans Affairs that he invited me not to participate in the debate at that particular juncture. Were he in the house at this time I should have liked to assure him that my failure to participate in the debate at that point was in no way attributable to his invitation. In fact if his remarks had not been lost in the din in the house at the time, I should have been most happy to participate then.

I should like, if I may, to contribute by way of clarification of the essential issues presented on the motion for second reading of the bill. I regret to say that those essential issues have been greatly beclouded during the debate.

Mr. HOWE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FLEMING: I am glad the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) agrees with me. I should like to dispel those clouds, so far as I can, and direct our thoughts to what exactly is involved in the bill before us and what is the principle thereof.

The justification offered by the Minister of Reconstruction for the bill, as stated by him in the course of his observations on the resolution, is that the method of joint stock company administration is a more useful vehicle in the administration of enterprises of certain kinds carried on by the government than is direct administration under his department. That, I take it, is the gist of the minister's remarks, and the reason he has given for introducing the bill.

I would ask hon. members to look farther and to see that that is not the issue on which the house is now deliberating. The issue presented by the bill is not whether the method of joint stock company administration shall be preferred in respect of certain forms of government enterprise to direct administration by a government department; rather, it is the issue as to whether parliament shall hand over to a minister the power to continue to set up crown corporations and to finance them without specific reference to the house having been made in advance. That is the issue.

It is all very well for the minister to make a speech outlining the advantages of the corporate form of administration. But again, that is not the problem presented by the bill. We can have those advantages and at the same time stay within the four corners of the sound principles laid down last night by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in his most useful and thoughtful contribution to the debate. He made it clear—and I ask hon. members to underline what he said—that in any specific situation in which the Minister of Reconstruction or any other member of the house thinks administration can better be performed by a joint stock company controlled by the crown than by direct administration under a department, then the house is prepared to review that situation and that proposal on its merits; and, if satisfied that the company form of administration is to be preferred it will give effect to the minister's request. But I take it, Mr. Speaker, that we are not prepared, without regard to such situations as may arise, to hand over holus-bolus to the government the power to go on setting up and financing crown companies—

Mr. McILRAITH: There is no such power in this bill.

Mr. FLEMING: —without reference to parliament. In other words the principle put forward by those of us who oppose second reading is this, that parliament must retain control. It must be for parliament to decide whether in any particular situation a crown corporation is to be set up. That, we think, is the parliamentary method; that, we think, is the sound democratic way of meeting the problem.

The government may be assured parliament will give careful study to any such bill presented. Indeed, parliament has already given proof of its willingness to give careful consideration to proposals for the incorporation of crown companies on a statutory basis. For instance, at the last session of parliament we passed a bill to incorporate the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation. Parliament gave consideration to that bill, approved the principle on the whole, and in that particular instance established a statutory corporation. Other corporations have been established in the same way. Surely the names of at least half a dozen corporations spring to one's mind when one thinks of crown corporations established under special acts. One thinks immediately of the Canadian National Railways; one thinks of Trans-Canada Air Lines; one thinks of the Canadian Broadcasting corporation. I draw attention to the fact that order No. 21 on the order paper is a resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) setting out a proposal to establish a corporation to be known as the Canadian Commercial corporation. It would not be proper for me to make any comment on the merits of that resolution, but I do say that the method is sound, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in that respect following a sound course. In the bill now before us the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is following an unsound and unparliamentary course. I have placed before the minister these various examples of statutory corporations, the establishment of which parliament has approved, and I point out to him that it is a method which ought to be followed in all cases.

Does the minister say there is no danger in this bill? That, I take it, will be one of his arguments. As a matter of fact he will be hard put to it to convince the house that there is no socialistic danger in the measure, in view of the eulogy, concerning the bill and the minister who introduced it, delivered in the house last night by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I do not believe that at this session of parliament, or in the first one, we ever listened to such transports of delighted oratory as we listened to last night from the hon. member for Vancouver East. It seemed as though the millennium had arrived. I thought he was about to burst into a nunc dimittis. Actually it seemed that the bill gave him everything he had been waiting for so long, everything he had been praying for, as an advocate of and a believer in complete socialism.

I fancy that having delivered that speech the hon. member for Vancouver East must have realized that it presented some embarrassment to the minister whom he had so fulsomely eulogized. It will not have escaped the notice of the house that the next member of the C.C.F. who spoke, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), was quite restrained in her favourable comments on the bill. As a matter of fact the tone of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was to this effect: Oh, well, after all, this bill has a quite limited application; if you look at the minister's remarks you will see he intends to exercise these powers only for the purposes of continuing the three corporations, Polymer, Eldorado and Canadian Arsenals Limited, which now owe their existence to orders in council. The reason is obvious. The minister must have been embarrassed by the eulogistic oratory of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and the apparent purpose of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in speaking was to play down somewhat the effect of the bill.

I listened with interest to some of the remarks from the opposite side of the house. It was suggested that the view put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver South was based on a complete antipathy toward government ownership. Obviously that was not a fair interpretation of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Where a situation calls for incorporation by statute of a crown company, then I take it that all parts of this house are prepared to entertain such a measure, review it and bring their best judgment to bear upon it. But it is the view of those of us who sit in this part of the house, and perhaps it is also the view of the Social Credit group, that in such a situation this House of Commons is going to see fair play for those who may be adversely affected by the bill. In this instance I am thinking particularly of the municipalities.

There have been some who have expressed the view that if this bill should be adopted we might expect corporations to be set up by a number of ministers. It may be a perfectly sound view, but I am more disposed to think that the Minister of Reconstruction will retain control in his own department of all corporations which are likely to be set up. I say that because he has retained to himself the two corporations which have fallen most closely under his administration by taking them out of the control of the minister who presides over the department to which they are assigned by statute. I refer to his having retained control, when he gave up the ministry of transport, of Trans-Canada Air Lines and radio broadcasting. I think it is not unlikely that if the Minister of Reconstruction should go on incorporating companies and proceed to take over the responsibility of some other portfolio, he will take with him into the new department all companies incorporated under this measure.

It is not enough to have assurances as to any limitation of intent on the part of the minister. I am confident that when the Minister of Reconstruction rises to speak he will say again to the house: We have in mind at the present time only three comapnies, the three I have referred to; it is not our thought at the moment to extend in the next two or three years others of the thirty-one corporations set up under orders in council during the war. That may be his view at the moment, but I suggest it is the duty of this house to go much farther in testing the propriety of giving endorsement to the principle of this bill.

The minister asks for broad powers, but does not think he will use them all; that is the pith and substance of the view which has been put before the house by the government. I suggest that that should be enough to defeat this bill in principle. Parliament has no business whatever giving powers to the government for which the government cannot make out an appropriate case right now or within the period that may expire before the next meeting of this house.

The minister says in effect: this gives us general powers for the future to bring new corporations into existence; it is general in its application. I say that that is not good enough. When the minister makes out a case, as he considers he has, for the continuation of three crown corporations, then I say his case is confined to the continuation of those three companies. The proper method for him to follow would be to bring in three separate measures providing for the continuation of the corporate existence of those three companies. This method would be in keeping with the sovereignty of parliament.

It is not good enough to have the statement of the minister to the effect that there has been a good deal of exaggeration of the effect of the bill. That is no answer to the clear argument, based on the terms of this bill, that the bill gives to the minister sweeping powers which this parliament ought not to be handing over to any minister. There is not a dictatorship on the face of the earth that did not begin as a benevolent dictatorship. Dictatorships never get an opportunity even to begin except on the basis of being benevolent. I do not suggest that we are going to open the way to a dictatorship of the kind that was defeated at the hands of the united nations in the recent conflict, but we have to have regard for the dangers inherent in a bill of this kind. There are always those, such as our friends of the C.C.F., who are ready to repeat the old, old story, "It can't happen here." If enough bills of this kind are introduced, if powers as sweeping as these are given to enough ministers, it can happen here. It is our duty as the House of Commons to see that it does not become possible for dictatorship in any form to happen here in Canada.

Let us have regard to the particular scope of this bill. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East, this bill and the two accompanying bills—one having to do with the incorporation of an atomic energy control board, and the other having to do with an amendment to the National Research Council Act—form a pattern. The other two bills give those bodies, with the approval of the minister, the widest possible powers to set up crown corporations. This bill will permit the governor in council to finance crown corporations to the extent of a million dollars each, half a million dollars for capitalization and half a million dollars for works. There is the pattern.

Are they limited in the field they are to cover? The bill before us does not tie the government down to any particular field. Whenever the government holds the power to establish a corporation under part I of the Companies Act, it will at once be able to apply all the provisions of this bill. There is no limitation as to the field; the field is broad, as broad as Canada. If other ministers obtain power by statute, or by order in council having the force of statute, to set up corporations within the ambit of their respective departments, all the provisions of this bill can be put into effect by them in the way I have mentioned. Every power provided by this bill will under those circumstances be enjoyed by every minister with respect to every corporation whose stock is owned completely by the crown. That is the situation in naked fact.

I am not commenting on the methods of administration of certain fields of public enterprise. I have made it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am dealing with the principles presented; with the question whether this House of Commons should hand over to the minister these broad powers without reference to parliament. In one interjection he made last evening the minister sought to indicate that this bill of itself does not create the power to establish the companies. He indicated that the scope of the bill is confined to financing such companies and clothing them with certain additional powers not related to the original incorporation. Now, let us examine that—not, I trust, in any spirit of hair-splitting, but having regard to the realities of the situation.

We have at the present time, or have had established by order in council under the authority of the War Measures Act, thirty-one companies which came into existence by what I understand to be the following method. Under authority of the War Measures Act the governor in council passed an order in council authorizing application to be made to the Secretary of State under part I of the Companies Act for incorporation of a company for certain purposes and under a certain name. Those corporations came into existence by letters patent. At the present time, we are told, twenty-six of them are in the course of being wound up and their charters surrendered; two are to continue for a limited period, and three for an indefinite and perhaps permanent period.

Now, if this bill does not give, as the minister seems to suggest, power to incorporate companies, it certainly does not give power to continue companies in existence. The three corporations to which we have referred particularly—and we might include the two others, Wartime Housing Limited and Park Steamships, which are to continue for a period of several years at least—these five corporations must find, on the minister's argument, some basis for continuing their corporate existence. Where do they get it? Are they to go on simply on the basis of having been brought into being under part I of the Companies Act pursuant to an order in council passed under the War Measures Act? If they do, I cannot square that with the proposition that the minister suggested last night in his interjection. If this bill does not give power to establish or incorporate companies, it does not give power to continue those corporations; and I am arguing that either the Minister of Reconstruction is going to carry into peace-time corporations which owe their existence entirely to an order in council passed under the authority of the War Measures Act, or he must come back to parliament in the case of each of these companies for a special act continuing or giving statutory authority for the continued corporate existence of these three companies. If the second alternative is correct, and the minister must come to parliament for authority to continue those three corporations, would not the sensible course be that suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South, namely, to introduce in the case of each of these companies a separate bill and to get away entirely from the vice of the bill which is now before us?

If the first alternative is the one on which the minister relies, namely that crown corporations brought into existence in war-time pursuant to authority contained in an order in council passed under the War Measures Act, can continue as such, then I think it is quite clear, certainly to every lawyer in the house, that he has similar powers under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act passed at the first session of this parliament. And if he has powers under that—which I think is clear to all, if his reasoning is correct—the governor in council has the power right now to go along setting up more crown companies under the authority of that act, bringing them into existence with the machinery contained in part I of the Companies Act. There is the situation. If the minister is correct in saying that this bill does not permit the incorporation and the bringing into existence of new corporations, he still has that power under the emergency legislation passed at the first session of this house; and it is clear, on the record of this government, that the minister will not hesitate to use that power if so minded in any particular situation.

That is not the whole story, either. I am pointing out the breadth and the scope of this bill if we approve it in its present form. If we approve it, what is the other aspect? It is this, that there are two other bills which are being considered along with this bill. Both bills make provision for the incorporation of an unlimited number of limited companies. I ask you to have regard in that respect to the words used by the Minister of Reconstruction himself at page 1897 of Hansard. He was then dealing with the bill to empower the national research council to establish crown companies with the approval of the minister himself. When the minister was asked as to the extent and the scope of this provision, how far it was intended to extend it or within what area it was intended to confine it, what did he say? These are his words:

> I have no desire to limit the number of companies which the research council can have. If it needs twenty, then it should have twenty.

And, Mr. Speaker, by parity of reasoning, under the measures now before this house you can have scores and scores of companies set up under these acts, power being given under the bill now before us to finance them up to the extent of a million dollars apiece without reference to parliament, and thus to transact a substantial part of the business of government in this country without reference to parliament in advance, without seeking parliamentary approval, and for that matter, to embark on an excursion into socialism without consulting parliament. That is the naked reality of the principle of this bill. There is no escape from it, and it is not good enough for the minister to say: Well, I do not intend at the moment to give it that wide application. That is not good enough. The minister has no right to ask parliament for these broad powers when no present justification for them exists. We say, Mr. Speaker, that the proper method in any particular situation requiring it is the creation of a statutory corporation.

I want to say a word on one particular vice of this bill which has been already referred to by certain hon. members. We are being asked to give the governor in council power to establish an unlimited number of crown companies for purposes which are not disclosed, and to do so on the basis that not one of these crown companies shall be subject to taxation by a province or a municipality—yes, more than that, shall not pay anything by way of taxes to such bodies. I asked the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in the committee stage of this bill if it was not the intention of the government to insert a provision in this bill that such corporations should submit to taxation, should agree to pay amounts in lieu of taxes to municipalities in which they might acquire property; and the minister said, no. I want to deal with that for a moment.

The hon. member for Vancouver South has dealt with the situation in the city of Vancouver. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has dealt with the situation in Esquimalt. That situation is duplicated many times over in the municipalities throughout the length and breadth of this country. Take for instance the city of Toronto. At the present time property owned by the crown in the right of the dominion in that city, including crown companies, totals $15,187,981—over $15 million.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that no crown company owns any property in Toronto not subject to taxation at the present time.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to deal with certain situations in Toronto—

Mr. HOWE: You included crown companies.

Mr. FLEMING: In the short space of time at my disposal it was not possible for me to get a break-down as between crown companies and government-owned property, but if the minister says that it is all government-owned property, I thank him for the information. I submit, however, that the same principle ought to be applied to government-owned property as to property owned by crown companies. It imposes an unfair burden upon the municipalities for the government to acquire or expropriate property and have it exempt from taxation by the municipality while other property owners in the municipality have to pay their share of taxation. It is putting an unfair burden upon the municipalities when they have to provide essential municipal services.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. FLEMING: I have only five minutes left, and I should like to proceed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. No questions may be asked without the consent of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the C.P.R.? What about church property and other property of the kind?

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is inquiring about churches, I am not dealing with that question.

Mr. COLDWELL: I also said the C.P.R.

Mr. FLEMING: I am not dealing with churches, because they are not owned by the crown. I am suggesting, however, that the principle that property owned by the crown in the right of the dominion, and property owned by crown corporations, shall not be subject to municipal taxation, is unfair and unjust. When we have section 125 of the British North America Act quoted to us, I would remind hon. members that when that act was passed in 1867 not one of the fathers of confederation could possibly have foreseen such a situation as exists to-day, where government-owned property, growing in leaps and bounds throughout this country, is exempt from taxation by the municipalities.

Here is another situation, and I take it that this is one the Minister of Reconstruction had in mind in his question a moment ago. There is already precedent recognized by the government, indeed created by the government—aye, and recognized by this parliament—for submitting the crown or crown corporations to municipal taxation. In the resolution stage of the bill I referred to the statute enacted by this parliament to incorporate the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation, being chapter 15 of the acts of the first session of this parliament. It provides that that crown corporation may pay sums in lieu of municipal taxes on property acquired by it under mortgages. There you have the principle of a crown corporation, under those circumstances, making a grant equivalent presumably to the taxes upon its property. I come to the point which the Minister of Reconstruction had in mind, and I call it a precedent created by the government itself, because in the John Inglis plant in Toronto, where the government carried on operations during part of the war, the government paid the city of Toronto the sum of $8,500 a year in lieu of taxes.

If the principle is not sound, the principle of taxation or of payments in lieu of taxation equivalent to the municipal tax, by crown companies, why was it done in that case? Not only that, but the Toronto Shipbuilding Company was taken over by the government during the war. That was a corporation established under part 1 of the Companies Act. The government took over operations during the war and paid taxes. You have another precedent in the case of the Canadian National Railways for the payment of municipal taxes. Why not give general recognition to a principle which has already received recognition by this government, and has certainly been recognized by this parliament in the measure to which I have already referred, namely, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act passed at the first session of the present parliament?

If there is not a grave danger of socialism, a danger of sweeping governmental powers inherent in this bill then why the eulogy from our socialist friends last night? The government sitting opposite, all members opposite, were elected, if the advertising material provided by the Liberal party in the 1945 election meant what it said, on a platform of preserving the free enterprise system. Why not do it?

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): I think what is troubling my hon. friend is not so much the bill as the people who support the bill. He is much concerned about the eulogy that was paid last night to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe).

Mr. GRAYDON: A bill is known by the company it keeps.

Mr. CROLL: After all, if hon. gentlemen sitting across the way like the minister and are prepared to applaud him, as the rest of the country has done on many occasions, and as members directly opposite have also done, we cannot find very much fault with that. I think it is recognized that the minister made a great contribution during the war, and as a result of his experience, as a result of his knowledge, and, what is more important, as a result of his success with the department during the war, he now brings to us this particular bill.

It is important to read the resolution, because many hon. gentlemen in the house have lost sight of it. As set out at page 1908 of Hansard, the resolution states:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the operation and financing of government companies, to define their status as agents to His Majesty, and to provide further for the superannuation, pension or other rights of the employees of such companies.

Now, what the bill does in effect is to bring these companies under the control of parliament. At the present time parliament has no control over these companies, and if I may refer to section 6, section 7 (3) and section 10 of the bill without reading them, I think hon. members will appreciate that these provisions indicate exactly what the bill intends to do.

Let us see whether the analogy to dictatorship, as suggested by some speakers, is applicable. The minister, who was minister of munitions and supply, had thirty-one companies under his control. Eighteen have already been wound up; eight are in process of being wound up, and five continue. If there are any gentlemen in the house who wish that these companies be done away with, this, I think, is the time and place so to declare. Is there anyone who would like to do away with Canadian Arsenals Limited, or with Polymer corporation, which cost us fifty millions and now stands at forty millions, and which even now is a paying proposition? Wartime Housing Limited, is as essential today as it was when it was first created, and the same applies to Eldorado Mining and Refining company and the Park Steamships company.

This bill does not give the minister any power. As a matter of fact, a clear reading and understanding of the bill indicates that his powers are now limited; he actually gives up powers which he formerly had and which now belong to the house generally.

Mr. MERRITT: Under what section?

Mr. CROLL: As a matter of fact, under section 10, if my hon. friend will read it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Whereabouts under section 10?

Mr. CROLL: Well, read it. There are some aspects of this bill that are encouraging; for instance, section 9, dealing with superannuation, pensions, and payment. It is well that the house should recognize that one of the great strengths of the department of munitions and supply during the war was the ability of the minister to go out into the open market and hire the best possible people he could get, pay them a decent wage and then have them do the job. This is a splendid principle if it will only show the way to the civil service commission so that they in turn may in some way find it possible to raise wages to a decent standard. The house should know that present statistics indicate that some thirty thousand of our young people, the cream of the crop—statisticians, young professional people, graduates of our universities—are flocking to the United States, going away because there is a lack of opportunity, because they cannot possibly receive compensation in accordance with their need and their requirements in this country.

Mr. JACKMAN: Liberal taxation.

Mr. CROLL: My hon. friend talks about low taxation.

Mr. JACKMAN: "Liberal".

Mr. CROLL: Liberal taxation; it has been pretty fair. It has not done too badly by my hon. friend. I have heard a lot of talk about taxation, but it is a privilege, and my hon. friend should know it, to pay taxes in a country such as Canada. A great number of people would like the opportunity to pay taxes in this country, and I have not seen anyone become poor as a result of paying taxes.

Mr. KUHL: Most of it is legalized robbery.

Mr. CROLL: My hon. friend comes from Alberta, and he knows legalized robbery when he sees it.

Mr. JACKMAN: The people of ward 2 will find out.

Mr. CROLL: Getting back to the subject, here is an opportunity for these companies to recognize some of our own Canadians and give them a chance to take positions of which they are worthy and for which they can be properly compensated.

I come back to the original point. What is troubling my hon. friends across the way, as I see it, is the socialistic danger, and the very fact that other people find something acceptable in a measure presented from this side of the house. I do not think it is a question of socialism or capitalism. It is well for my friends across the way to recognize that all capitalistic countries and nations are accepting increasing degrees of socialism. The issue is whether social development will be carried out by democratic processes in open and fair discussion, or by some other method.

This measure is presented to the house because this is the time for forceful measures; it is a time for decision, and it will be of some consequence to the country generally to know that the government intends to create companies and that these companies are carried on in the best interests of the people generally. If my hon. friends have not yet recognized that, if those of us who look upon Canada as a land of milk and honey have not recognized that, then they ought to change their views just a little and appreciate the fact that at the present time we are living in an age of licensed milk and registered honey. We are living in that sort of economy.

The question that appeals to me, and one which I have to ask myself, is whether I want the Polymer corporation, the Canadian Arsenals, the Park Steamships company, Wartime Housing and Eldorado Mining corporation to continue as is, and if my hon. friends say that that is socialism, well, then, I like it.

Mr. MERRITT: That is not the point at all.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): I rise to take part in this debate although what I am about to say may not be taken very kindly by some hon. members on this side of the house. Having been the head of a municipality for a number of years I can see the difficulty which will be placed on the small municipalities and cities. I should have no objection to this bill had it contained a taxation clause which the ordinary business man has to contend with. Having seen airfields being built, having seen lands acquired by the dominion which took up the large part of certain municipalities, having seen public buildings subject to no tax, having seen roads, schools, hospitals and other services going behind in small communities, I think it is time we saw to it that the dominion government should not be so high and mighty that it is not subject to taxation.

We have to keep in mind the little fellow. After all, in Canada to-day the little fellow is paying the major portion of the taxes, and as private members of this house it is up to us to support the man who is paying the taxes. If this bill contained a clause which would make the companies subject to taxation, I should have no objection to it, because I believe there is nobody who is more capable of expanding the industry of Canada than the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). He has had experience in war time. If we have his guidance in peace time, I think we can do a lot toward helping the poorer classes of this country. I do not see how private enterprise can compete with a business alongside of it which is paying no taxes. It is not fair to private enterprise; it is not fair to the little community in which the government business is situated. Had this bill contained such a section I would have supported it. In the present circumstances I cannot.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): There has been a certain amount of controversy on the issue of government companies versus private enterprise. There are a few thoughts which I should like to express concerning that issue. A certain amount of support of this bill has been expressed by hon. members on the government side, but I have not yet heard a clear statement from the minister or from any of his political supporters as to the real reason why the government must set up these corporations.

Why is it necesary for the government to go into business in the manner in which they intend to do under this bill? From listening to what has gone on I have not been able to discover just how far they intend to go in the matter of setting up these corporations. As a matter of principle I should like to hear a clear-cut statement on the part of the minister as to just why it is necessary for the government to enter into business in peace time in competition with private enterprise. I think that raises a very fundamental question which has been referred to already by several members of the Progressive Conservative party; that is, whether the carrying on of business is a legitimate government function. I agree with the statement made last evening by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) who said he considered the chief function of a government was that of legislating, not entirely carrying on regulatory or administrative action. Personally I agree with that thought. I cannot agree that the carrying on of business by the government is legitimate in any way whatsoever. As a general principle I say a government should do for the people what they cannot do for themselves; and I think the people of this nation have demonstrated that they are quite capable of conducting their own businesses. Consequently I cannot see any real reason why a government should go into any business at all during peace time.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see what purpose such actions serve, what is gained by a government going into business. I have observed right along our C.C.F. friends claiming that the government must go into business because private industry has failed. I do not consider that it has failed. I believe the C.C.F. charge private enterprise with having failed because they are charging private enterprise falsely. They are holding it responsible for things for which it is not responsible. Therefore it is quite easy to charge it. Last evening the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and others stated that we have a quarter of a million unemployed and that private industry is doing nothing about it. To hold private enterprise responsible for employment, as my colleague the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) stated last evening, is to hold it responsible for something for which it is not responsible. In all these discussions we should get down to a basis of fundamentals, and in considering this or any other similar bill I do not think we shall make any progress until we agree on those fundamentals. Of course if private enterprise is responsible for employment, then the socialist charge is legitimate; but I do not consider that it is responsible. On numerous occasions I have said that I consider the only legitimate function of private enterprise to be the production of goods and services, regardless of whether that requires much labour or little labour.

Some of the C.C.F. members made a few points with which I should like to deal for a moment or two. I feel that in their condemnation of private enterprise the C.C.F. members constantly confuse the use of capitalism with its abuse, when what they should do is condemn the abuse. To assert that we must abolish the use of private capital because it is abused would be equivalent to saying we must abolish the use of motor cars because very often people lose their lives through the use of motor cars. Likewise it would be just as logical to abolish the use of firearms because sometimes people are murdered through their use. So I say the C.C.F. members should deal with the abuse and should not confuse the use of capitalism with its abuse. I would not be so critical of their attitude if they were consistent in their policy, but this is what we find them doing. They condemn private enterprise; they condemn capitalism; they condemn profits and the profit motive, yet they advocate a procedure under which they except certain sections of the community from that policy. They proceed to the farmer and say: We are against capitalism; we are against private ownership of the means of life; we are against profits; but we do not mean you. Then they proceed to the small merchants and tell them the same story. Thus they go up and down the street telling people they do not mean to include them. On the other hand, however, they condemn the principle of private enterprise. My comment is that if profits and private enterprise and private ownership are wrong as a principle, they must be wrong for everybody. They cannot be wrong for some and right for others. Surely consistency should be the acid test of any philosophy; and I suggest that hon. members of the C.C.F. party consider that very seriously. If they are prepared to place all people under their general policy, then I can do nothing but submit to the will of the majority if a majority of the people in this country want complete socialism. But I think the fact that they have left out the farmer, the small merchant and many other sections of the population indicates that they are quite well aware that the majority of the people of this country believe in private enterprise for themselves.

As was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I believe, as far as state enterprise and government companies are concerned the government has no mandate to carry on in that fashion. If the last election demonstrated anything, it demonstrated that the majority of the people of this country still want to be their own bosses,—to manage their own affairs and to support private industry. I notice that quite frequently when that point is raised the C.C.F. members bring in the matter of Trestrail. My only comment is that surely they can rely upon the people of Canada to judge for themselves. The point with which I have not heard them deal as yet is the charges which Trestrail made in the literature which was circulated; and I think that would be much more relevant.

I believe those who supported the Liberal party, the Progressive Conservative party and the Social Credit party indicated by their support that they wanted to continue under a system of private ownership and private enterprise. But where the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party fall short is in not supplementing and in not advocating policies to supplement the private enterprise system in such a way that it can be made to work. They must reconcile themselves to certain fundamental changes which will permit private enterprise to function. And it can function if certain changes are made. It is a tragedy to me to see that the country, the world in general, is being driven more and more into nationalization as a consequence of the refusal and failure of those who believe in private enterprise to make the necesasry changes. That is the greatest tragedy, that those who are the strongest supporters of private enterprise constitute its greatest danger by reason of their neglect to bring about the necessary changes which would make it function.

I believe wholeheartedly that once the basis of private enterprise and private initiative is destroyed, the basis for democracy is destroyed. I do not believe we can have any kind of democracy whatsoever once private ownership and private initiative are removed from society. All that will take its place is mass regimentation, as has been suggested many times. There can be no other substitute. So I suggest earnestly to hon. members in the Liberal and Progressive Conservative parties that if they want to see private enterprise flourish in this country they had better examine the proposals which have emanated from the Social Credit group in the house, because they are the only proposals which will permit private enterprise to function properly.

May I emphasize that it is wrong to conclude that just because there is unemlpoyment and a lack of distribution of goods, it necessarily follows that the government must go into business. As I said earlier in my remarks, I believe private individuals in Canada are capable of running their own business. Private enterprise does not necessarily mean monopoly enterprise—and I am afraid C.C.F. members constantly make that error. When they condemn private enterprise, meaning to condemn monopoly enterprise, they do the former a great injustice. I suggest they should differentiate; but they do not. In condemning private enterprise they condemn the thousand-dollar business as well as the million-dollar or billion-dollar corporation. Fundamentally I believe all people are private enterprisers, even including hon. members in the C.C.F. Many of them own their own businesses and their own farms; they sell their goods at a profit, and, if they had their choice, would remain in those circumstances for the rest of their lives.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And they ask the government for more profit.

Mr. KUHL: If private enterprise is good enough for them, then surely it should be good enough for everyone. I suggest their charges do not come with very good grace when privately they themselves believe in private enterprise.

I suggest that they should deal with the abuses of private enterprise and advocate the elimination of those abuses. Monopoly control, cartels, price manipulation and all those practices are merely abuses of the private enterprise system. If their position is a logical one, then the thing to do is to retain competition but remove the abuses. That is where I think the C.C.F. criticism and analysis goes off the beam. I agree with them in their condemnation of monopoly control and abuses which arise as a consequence. But if they are logical they should argue that competition should be restored. Instead of that, however, they suggest by way of substitution a still greater monopoly, namely state monopoly. All that happens when there is monopoly control is absence of competition. Surely logic dictates that the solution is to restore competition. It is only in competition that there can be freedom. Competition does not necessarily mean cut-throat operations.

An hon. MEMBER: How about cooperatives?

Mr. KUHL: That is a matter for the individual. If people wish to join in cooperative societies, that is their business. But that is possible only under a system of prviate enterprise.

So I say to them this: Let them advocate the elimination of the abuses and maintain the principle intact, and we shall preserve a free society. To the minister, and to those who support him, I suggest that if they will bring in legislation which will enable private enterprise to work, they will receive the wholehearted support of the Social Credit group. If that is done, I do not think it will be necessary to bring in legislation of this kind. By making it possible for the people of Canada to buy everything produced, and by stimulating the buying power of the people, it will be possible for every industry to sell what it has to sell. If the abuses of capitalism are removed and the deficiencies taken care of, with adequate purchasing power, I am completely satisfied the private enterprise system will work as near perfectly as any human agency can be made to work. It is only under such an arrangement that we can preserve freedom as well as enjoy security.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I suppose like many others, I am at a loss to know whether the house is discussing the policies of the C.C.F. or this crown companies measure.

Mr. GRAYDON: The same thing.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad to hear it, if that is so. If we were discussing the policies of the C.C.F. I should make a speech somewhat different from the one I am going to make.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has given us an example of that type of irrational circumlocution which might be expected from an hon. member with far less capacity than I hope he possesses. I do not propose to follow his line of reasoning, or his lack of it; but I should like, in passing, to point out to the hon. gentleman just the sort of reasoning that he has presented to the house. In criticizing the C.C.F. he says that capitalism is all right, that we should not condemn private enterprise. He says that what we should condemn is the abuse and not the use of these great institutions. Then he goes on to give an illustration or analogy. He says, "You may as well condemn the motor car because here and there one runs over somebody as condemn free private enterprise."

Then he goes on from that to argue the very opposite. He says, "You cannot be wrong and right at the same time; when the C.C.F. distinguishes between capitalism that is robbing the agricultural people of this country and the farmers who have been robbed, that is wrong. You must either be right or wrong all the time and make no distinction between the motor car which runs over somebody and the motor car which does not."

Mr. KUHL: It is a matter of how you deal with it.

Mr. IRVINE: I am dealing with it now. You were dealing with it a moment ago. I am dealing with it in order to show how illogically the hon. gentleman dealt with it. May I say to him that we have judged his precious system by the fruits that it has grown. By the fruits of the tree, the tree shall be known.

I should like to take up the objections to the bill which were offered, I think in a most logical fashion, by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). He took exception to the bill on six different counts; first, that it was a blanket act; second, that crown companies would be far removed from parliamentary control; third, that no provision is made in the present bill for crown companies to pay taxes, especially municipal taxes; fourth, that such companies would be in competition with private business; fifth, that it would be setting up a super civil service, and, sixth, that it would be a method of introducing socialism.

Before commenting on those various points or arguments, I should like to refer to the discussion which took place thereafter in the house last night. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) got into an argument with my fair and honoured desk mate, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum). I noticed, as no doubt you did, Mr. Speaker, that he escaped from the impossibility of answering her pointed questions under cover of courtesy as a gentleman. Those of us who have had long experience in domesticity will appreciate the position of the hon. gentleman and overlook the fact that he refused to face an answerable question. The most remarkable thing that the hon. gentleman said was that he was suspicious of this measure because the C.C.F. members supported it. I think that was an unworthy remark for the hon. gentleman to make; at least I hope it was unworthy of him. I hope he is not as small as that makes him appear to be.

Let me ask the hon. gentleman if the people of Canada will be any less suspicious of him and his party when they read the words of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). The hon. member said, as reported at page 2136 of Hansard:

> The hon. member for Peace River has said so many of the things I was going to say that I almost felt it was not necessary for me to speak at all.

Mr. Speaker, if we followed the logic of my hon. friend we would be filled with suspicion of the Social Credit party because of its close associations with my hon. friend to your left, the Progressive Conservative party. I think it is time that full grown men with the responsibilities of members of parliament should stop having childish suspicions of that kind. It is not much more than a week since Social Credit members, C.C.F. members and members of the opposition—those of them who were here—voted together. I do not know where the suspicion would go then.

I have pointed out before and I do so again that as a group sitting to your left we do not line up with any official opposition. But we will not allow prejudice to prevent us from voting with them when we believe that they are right. Neither does our prejudice prevent us from supporting a government measure when we believe it is right. I wish to protest against the scurrilous innuendo of my hon. friends when they suggest that the bill must be regarded with suspicion merely because a few C.C.F. members have indicated that in the main they agree with its principles. I am almost afraid to go on because the minister will be praying to God to be protected from his friends if we continue to defend the measure as we have up to this time. I rather like the attitude of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario when he said, as reported on page 2137 of Hansard:

I do not think we should become theological about socialism. I do not regard myself as an enemy of the human race because I am not a socialist.

I think he meant to say also that because I am one I should not be regarded as an enemy of the human race either. Then he goes on:

I believe the way we should look at questions of this kind is, which method will do the particlar job best in the particular case, public ownership or private ownership.

I think that was a very fine view to take. That was an attitude of mind which is understandable and commendable and statesmanlike. If we discuss the matter on those broad principles it should be of benefit, both to hon. members of this house and to the country itself.

I should like now to follow the main points of the argument which have been much better presented by the hon. member for Vancouver South than by any of those hon. members who have opposed the measure. He said that this is a blanket act. By that he meant that the passage of this measure will leave the government free to organize any kind of company at any time they like without consulting parliament at all. I do not think that conclusion is justified by the bill itself and I point out the unequivocal denial of that charge made last night by the minister himself. He described that view of the bill as being nonsense. The measure provides for the operation and financing of crown companies which are now in existence or which may come into existence, but I do not think any other crown company will come into existence except through the doors of this parliament. I cannot see that parliament will lose any of its power or its control in the acceptance of the present legislation.

The second argument is that crown companies would be removed from parliamentary control. So far as I am aware there is not any kind of measure which could remove from this government and this parliament responsibility for its actions. The government will have to be responsible for whatever company is organized under the legislation now being passed, just as surely as it must be responsible for any one of its other acts. As a matter of fact there is not any crown company but is entirely under the control of this house and of the government. To begin with, the policy followed by any crown company is settled by the government itself. Next, the auditor of crown companies is appointed by this house. Third, the affairs of every crown company are open to examination and criticism by the appropriate committees of the house. So that in every way possible parliament retains control over crown companies.

The hon. member for Peace River, in discussing this point, says that private companies are not supposed to answer to parliament for their revenues or expenditures. That was a most significant admission by one who was arguing that crown companies should not be established because they could not properly answer to parliament; but if a crown company is not established to do a certain thing, then a private company will be established to do it. The hon. member for Peace River is not disturbed about a private company not reporting to parliament, but he is perturbed over the possibility that a crown company might be prevented—according to some quirk of his imagination—from reporting to parliament. It is quite true that private companies do not have to report to parliament; and that is what is wrong with them. They report to their shareholders. Crown companies report to the representatives of the people. I cannot understand why any such objection should be taken by critics of this measure. Why so critical of the control when private enterprise, which is championed by the hon. gentlemen who oppose this measure, is allowed to do what it pleases, sometimes with important and vital industries upon which the lives of almost all the people of this country depend?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Such as this.

Mr. IRVINE: The next point is that there is no provision that crown companies shall pay taxes. The hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) comments on this point, and says, Hansard, page 2150.

We in Ontario realize that our hydro system, owned by the crown, has brought us cheap power and has assisted in our industrial development.

I think the hon. gentleman should have pointed out that his community has already received taxes in the forms of cheap power and developed industry. The matter of whether a government concern of this kind should be taxed could very well be considered by this house at some other time. But if we proceed that far there will be objections from many quarters; because, to follow the logic of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl), what is good and right for one must be good and right for everybody, so you must not stop in the middle, and if you are going to tax public institutions of this kind you must tax hospitals and public schools; you must tax churches, and, most sacred of all, you must tax the property of the C.P.R. So I am afraid that when we start to be logical about this thing my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party will not be so anxious about it. Let us not forget that the surpluses which come into any publicly operated institution go into the public treasury, whether of the municipality or the provincial government or the federal government. It is nothing but absurd folly to tax what you already have in the public treasury: the result is to increase expenditures and the cost of public business by doing a foolish thing. When it comes to the municipalities, there may be a case there, and that, as I have said, might very well be argued at some other time. But I repeat if we extend the taxation powers of municipalities to government institutions they will have to be applied to such other organizations as I have mentioned.

I come now to the fourth argument of those who oppose the bill, and it is that these companies will be in competition with private business. That should be welome to those for whom the life and soul of business is competition. One hon. gentleman who spoke last night suggested that the principle of life is the survival of the fittest, and so, of course, he opposed the bill. I am afraid that if the principle of the survival of the fittest were applied individually it all cases the hon. member might have ceased to exist long ago. But as regards opposing government-operated institutions because they furnish competition to other companies, for people who believe in competition as an economic principle to take that stand is an utter absurdity. I do not believe there should be competition and this is where I shall proceed on the way a little farther than my socialist friend the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: The Progressive Conservative party can see a joke. It is most extraordinary.

Mr. GRAYDON: They can hear one too.

Mr. IRVINE: I listened to one just now.

Mr. FRASER: Which one is the joke?

Mr. IRVINE: You. But here is the difference. I do not believe that the government should enter into competition with private industry. I believe that private industry should be taken over in every case where the government enters business.

Mr. KUHL: Totalitarianism.

Mr. IRVINE: If that were totalitarianism, then my hon. friend would be leading it; that is where he belongs. That is where he has always been and where those associated with him have always been—on the side of totalitarianism.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is utter nonsense.

Mr. IRVINE: You ought to know, sir; you are the best authority on nonsense I have ever met anywhere.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: You had better explain your remarks.

Mr. IRVINE: If I am to explain my remarks the hon. gentleman will have to do the same. Those who live in glass-houses had better be careful of the rocks they throw and the number of times they engage in throwing them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad I do not live in one.

Mr. IRVINE: The survival-of-the-fittest idea, which is held up as the soul and spirit of free enterprise, should not be condoned by a crown company which has been set up to perform a specific function in the national economy. It should not enter into or countenance the wasteful and stupid duplication which competition involves, and to that extent the bill is far from being socialistic. It has the marks of free enterprise upon it in that regard. If I were the minister I would expropriate all companies in any field in which it was found necessary for the government to enter and do business.

As to the fifth argument, that the government is setting up a super civil service, that is to say, that by providing in this bill the means whereby the servants of the crown corporation shall be employed, the government is instituting a super civil service, well I think that is hardly worth stopping to answer; for with respect to crown companies the government will have to have the same responsibility that it has in regard to any other department of the civil service.

So I hasten, owing to the shortness of my time, to deal with the sixth argument, which is that this measure should be opposed because it is a socialist measure. I wonder what hon. gentlemen mean by a socialist measure. Perhaps that is the first question that we ought to settle so that we may know exactly what terms we are employing; otherwise no debate can have any meaning. I say, therefore, that in my view a socialist measure is this—or perhaps it would be better to discuss a socialist enterprise. In my view a socialist enterprise would be one which had as its chief objective the interests of the community. On the other hand, a private enterprise is one which has as its sole objective, its chief objective, the profits of the shareholders.

With that definition before us let us examine this bill. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, in dealing with this point, warns us that we must stop, look and listen. I tell my hon. friend that the most that his party has ever done has been to stop. I do not know whether it has looked or listened. We have come to the time, however, when we must start, look and listen. This measure may be termed socialistic, if you like, to the extent that it has as its object the meeting of specific community needs, that being the chief objective of such companies. In that respect it is distinguished from private enterprise, which is not free at all and is extremely costly to the public, for it never enterprises except in its hunt for profit, and it has left a trail of failures, in so far as humanity is concerned, right across the pages of industrial history.

It is remarkable that all hon. gentlemen who have opposed this bill have said that if this were only war time they would not oppose it but would hold up both hands for it, because they say in effect that in war time there was a great emergency, and that emergency was so great that they were willing to do wrong things in order to meet it. That is a most extraordinary concept of things. Again I say to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson who was so concerned with the logic of the C.C.F. policy: if this is wrong in peace time it would be wrong in war time.

Mr. KUHL: Different situations entirely.

Mr. IRVINE: Two different situations with exactly the same principle to be applied. As I say, it is a most extraordinary type of argument indeed. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) stated at page 2145, of Hansard:

> We agree that the urgent demands of war made that course of action necessary—

Referring of course to war-time crown companies.

> —but what does the minister advance as the reason for a crown corporation to function after the war?

That is to say, we are perfectly willing to contribute to the wrong type of action during a war but we are not prepared to do so now in peace, and the reason why they were willing to do wrong during the war was that there was a great emergency. I say to my hon. friends that there is just as great an emergency in peace now as there was in war. Any intelligent man who tries to make a survey of the world situation to-day must realize that there is an emergency of the first magnitude. If he does not, he has no business to be in this house.

The world is practically faced with starvation. Our own country has tremendous problems to face. To mention only one, there is the housing situation; and in that connection there are such industries as coal and lumber which to-day are failing to function, as they very well might be functioning, under crown companies, to the fullest extent, in meeting the needs of the Canadian people. The hon. member for Red Deer argued that private enterprise could produce abundance. How does he know? It has never been known to do that.

Mr. KUHL: Overproduction before the war.

Mr. IRVINE: That was underdistribution.

Mr. KUHL: That is a different thing.

Mr. IRVINE: He refers to the great stockpile which could be viewed in 1939 and throughout the thirties. Such stockpiles were not in themselves an evidence of private enterprise's capacity to produce. They were grim evidences of free private enterprise's incapacity to distribute. But the great point that I wish to make in this connection is that the objective of free private enterprise is not primarily to distribute goods to the public; its objective is to make profits out of goods, and it does not care whether there are many or few goods, it makes the profits anyway. The objective of a public corporation dealing with a community need is to meet the needs of the people. That is the first thing, the chief object of its coming into being. That marks the difference between the public ownership and the private ownership argument stated so well by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

The hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) seemed to have a sort of vision that the Progressive Conservatives may just happen by accident to come to power some day, and therefore he says, as reported at page 2149 of Hansard:

> This legislation could become, in the hands of those who would seek to use it for a purpose it was never intended, in the mind of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), a dangerous thing.

I am glad that he has given us that warning in time. I hope the people of Canada will take notice of it and see that they never endanger their interests by entrusting him with power.

Let me conclude by saying that it is absurd to discuss this bill as being socialism. I wish it were. But I say this about the bill; its trend is so far toward common sense that it makes it look like socialism, and it is because of this trend toward that measure of common sense that I shall be glad to give it my support.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): There are in this bill a number of things that I was prepared to think were quite satisfactory until I heard the hon. member who just took his seat, who showed the trend of socialism and the way of thinking of the C.C.F., and also the way in which they would interpret a bill such as this.

There are one or two inaccuracies concerning what has just been said that I should like to clear up first of all. The first inaccuracy is in regard to private companies. Private companies certainly do make a report. They make a report to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), but not to this parliament. They are subjected to careful inspection by that department. They are inspected far more closely than any crown company ever is by any committee of this house.

Mr. KNOWLES: The information is kept secret.

Mr. ADAMSON: They report and publish a detailed financial statement. They report to their owners in public meetings. The officers of the company have to give a most explicit and detailed statement, not only to the department but to the owners, the shareholders. The officers are subject to questioning. They have to make a forecast of what they expect in the year to come, and they have to justify their actions of the year past to their shareholders. No crown company is ever subjected to the scrutiny which the average private commercial company must undergo. That is the first thing I wish to make clear.

The second thing is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is the greatest individual taxpayer in Canada to-day. It pays taxes several times the amount of any other company. Where we would be without the tax revenue from the Canadian Pacific Railway company, I shall leave to the Minister of National Revenue to say. Suffice it to say it would cause a great hole in the tax revenues of the country.

We come now to the second suggestion made by the C.C.F. philosophy, namely, that if the government find it necessary to go into business, they should not only go into business but completely expropriate all other competitors in that line of business. This means that if the government went into the business of the production of synthetic rubber—synthetic rubber is a combined product of the rubber and oil industry—they would, under that reasoning, expropriate the Canadian rubber industry and the Canadian oil industry. That is an untenable situation, but it shows the way of thought in Canada to-day; it shows the type of thinking that is going on to-day, which is being fostered by the present government, and this bill is one of the measures which is doing it.

Debate on the bill has resolved itself into a discussion of the government's function as an operator of business. Is the trend in that direction? If so, is it a good trend? During the war there were certain emergencies which had to be met. There is a fundamental difference between war and peace. War is an economy of destruction. Everything you produce for war you produce for destruction. What you hope to produce in peace time you hope to produce for construction and for use. That is one of the essential differences between war and peace; and because it is the function of a government to produce uneconomically things, shall we say, like the Polymer Corporation and several of the strategic metal materials in war time there is no reason why they should be doing it in peace time. In war your aim is to destroy. Everything you produce you produce to destroy the enemy. There is a fundamental difference between production for war and production for peace, and the economy is entirely different.

The first objection which is being mentioned in regard to crown companies,—and I shall not deal with it at length because it has been dealt with successfully by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—is the matter of municipal taxation. In the Toronto area at the present time there are, with the exception of the Dominion Arsenals and the War Assets in my riding, a number of warehouses. There are no active crown companies which do not pay taxes to the city. But there is in the city and in my riding a great deal of property which does not pay taxes, and it has been a severe handicap to several of the municipalities.

The second point is that under stress the government enters business which is not normally commercially profitable. Here I mention housing. Wartime housing cannot be and I doubt if it ever could be commercially profitable, in this or any other country. It is an emergency measure and should be treated as such. I do not think it will have any place in the Canadian economy after this immediate and desperate housing shortage is alleviated. I do not say that wartime housing is the answer even now; in fact in many cases it has proved very much a disadvantage, but in our present desperate situation concerning housing we have to grasp at any straw that comes along.

Then the government may go into business, as they have in the past, for reasons of geography. While they have not definitely taken over companies they have paid and probably will continue to pay subventions for the production of coal and other materials, because of the freight haul involved. I am speaking of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal. Here action on the part of the government will probably be necessary. This is a technical question, and no doubt subventions and such things are necessary to ensure the mining and satisfactory marketing of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal. That is a function which it may be necessary for the government to perform.

Another form of government enterprise is in setting up marketing and distributing agencies. Here I have in mind the wheat board and government selling agencies and marketing schemes abroad. Under the present world set-up, with conditions so chaotic, no doubt there is a necessity for the government to take a hand in these activities.

I should like to speak briefly about the government entering business as a war measure. First we have Polymer, which I think has proved itself in spite of the fact that it has lost $40,000,000.

Mr. HOWE: What are you talking about?

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, it has not paid for itself.

Mr. HOWE: That is too bad. It has been in operation for two years.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize that, but on the minister's own admission synthetic rubber is not likely to be a commercial factor in future, so that the plant is not likely to pay for itself.

Mr. HOWE: Do not take your losses until it is necessary.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, we are still into it to the extent of $40,000,000. I do not care to forecast the future with respect to synthetic rubber, but on the minister's own admission it is unlikely to be a serious factor when natural rubber comes back into normal production. However, it was necessary during wartime, and that is the only point I am trying to bring out. It was necessary during the war, in spite of the cost.

Then we have the production of such things as mica, tungsten, mercury, magnesium and many other strategic metals. Production has now ceased in connection with nearly all these. Magnesium is not being produced at the moment, though I understand the company has some hopes for the future. The production of all these strategic metals was on a basis which is now uneconomic, and they were produced as an emergency measure. I am sure that is a justifiable function of government in war time, but it is not a function for the government now that the war is over.

Then we have the Dominion Arsensals. I think it is reasonable to assume that in the enlightened future the government must and shall be the sole maker of weapons of war, because I believe in the past the manufacture of weapons was uncontrolled. Certainly before the first great war large companies such as Krupp and the big cartels did a great deal to foster the spirit of war, and I feel that the manufacture of the weapons of war must remain a function of government. From that point of view I have no objection to the Dominion Arsenals, though I believe humanity to-day is pretty much the same as it was two thousand years ago, and we are not going to banish war from the world for all time. So I believe that encouragement should be given to private firms or private individuals who may from time to time invent new weapons. This is one of the things we have to think about. New weapons will be constantly invented. We must—and I say this regretfully—be prepared to keep at full efficiency our inventive genius in regard to new weapons.

I now want to go on with a discussion of of the government entering into the development of natural resources. Recently we had the government going into the Yellowknife area and constructing a hydro electric power development there. I think that is a progressive step. The Yellowknife is isolated, and the devolpment of a great mineral area requires hydro electric power. Under the present system of taxation it was probably a justifiable function, and in this case a good thing, for the government to develop hydro electric power in that area. It will be expensive; the rate per kilowatt hour, per horsepower year, will probably be high, but if the development is to go ahead quick action must be taken. So I think the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) is to be commended—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his remarks should be relevant to the bill which is before the house.

Mr. ADAMSON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but the development of hydro electric power in the Yellowknife area will probably necessitate a crown company.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. ADAMSON: In any event it is a government-sponsored project. If it is not to be sponsored by a crown company certainly the financing will be very peculiar, and must be a direct charge and liability of the government, who will expect some return in the shape of revenue from the power users. The development of that water power has been undertaken by the government; and if it does not require a crown company it will require some kind of financing. It is the sort of thing that could be financed in a crown company.

But it brings me to the question which I wish to discuss in somewhat more detail, and that is the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company. That company is the largest, if not the sole producer of pitchblende in Canada. If there are other producers, they are small. It is apparent from the policy of the government that any mineral suitable for producing material which can be used in connection with atomic fission is going to be the prerogative of the government. Certainly that is so in respect of pitchblende.

But there are other materials in which the government is interested. For instance, there is thorium, which is now being used, and there are many others.

Since the government's action in taking over the Eldorado company, so far as I have been able to find out there has been practically a cessation in prospecting and attempting to develop pitchblende. This may or may not be a good thing. Pitchblende, the ore of uranium and radium, may be found only in one limited location. But, apart from what is being carried on by the Eldorado company, the average prospector is not interested in searching for these minerals because he feels that if he makes a find the government will take it over. I have discussed the matter with many of them, and that is what I am told. That is one of the results—perhaps an inescapable result—of the government's action in taking over the Eldorado property.

I am not complaining of the fact that the government did take over that property. At a very critical time in the war it had to see that a supply of uranium was available, because at that time it was the only known material which could be used for the development of the atomic bomb. I have no quarrel with that; but with our present knowledge of atomic warfare and science, I believe that the government should inform the country as to its policy in respect of the development of minerals which have atomic uses, of which pitchblende is one and thorium another. There may be a great many others. In my view it is greatly to the advantage of Canada that all mineral deposits containing these minerals, and any others which could be used for the development of atomic energy, should be vigorously prospected. But if the government preempts the field in respect of these important minerals we shall find that prospecting development will die. Instead of having an active fraternity of prospectors looking for gold, lead and zinc, as we have to-day, we shall find that these important minerals will be left to development by the government. Surely that would be a retrograde step.

It is necessary that the most active search for these metals should be carried out. If the government is prepared to take the position that, in the event of another source of pitchblende being discovered, it can be developed by the people who made the discovery and brought it in, I believe we shall have a far greater activity and a more extensive development of these strategic minerals.

I realize that during a critical period of the war Eldorado was taken over, and that possibly the government had no other choice. I feel now, however, that with the possibility of these potential atomic minerals being useful not only for purposes of war but, it is hoped, for the pursuits of peace, every encouragement should be given to their prospecting and development. I criticize the government for not stating clearly its position as to what its policy shall be in respect of newly discovered and newly developed strategic mineral production. In that way the government is holding back development, and it is a restriction which should be lifted at the earliest possible time. The research work at Eldorado should not be discontinued. Possibly the work being done there is properly a function of the government, but in my view, it should make its policy clear in respect of what it intends to do in the matter of new deposits. These new minerals and new scientific developments may constitute the most valuable natural resources we possess and, despite the work it is doing, the present policy of the government is not a proper one and is not conducive to developing deposits of these new metals.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, this debate has wandered into strange fields and has covered a large territory. One speaker has referred to myself as the darling of big business and in the same speech called me the builder of a slipping slide to socialism. I regret that I was not able to save considerable time of the house by intervening earlier in order to explain the bill. I realize that no one who spoke last evening had read the bill. I felt greatly comforted when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) rose to-day to clarify some of the points because I then thought he had read the bill. Unfortunately he had not. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) must assume some responsibility because he undertook to interpret the bill to the house, and it was because the discussion was based on his interpretation that it has wandered up and down so many peculiar lanes.

Mr. GREEN: Do not blame me for all that.

Mr. HOWE: You started the discussion and I found an echo of your dissertation in all the subsequent speeches. The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned six objections to the bill. The first objection was that there was no limit to the number of crown companies which could be set up and, further, that any department could set them up. I can assure my hon. friend that no crown company can be set up under this bill.

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that it could.

Mr. HOWE: I understood that you were discussing this bill.

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that companies could be set up under it.

Mr. HOWE: This is a bill respecting the operations of government companies. As is stated in the explanatory notes, there were at one time thirty-one crown companies operating under the direction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. There was no lack of statutory authority for setting up those companies. They were set up under the provisions of the Munitions and Supply Act which is an act passed by parliament, and unanimously, in 1939. The authority is contained in paragraph 6, which reads:

(3) (a) The minister may, if he considers that the carrying out of any of the purposes or provisions of this act is likely to be facilitated thereby, procure the incorporation of any one or more companies or corporations under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1934, or under the provisions of any act of any province of Canada relating to the incorporation of companies, for the purpose of exercising and performing in Canada or elsewhere any of the powers conferred or the duties imposed on the minister by this act or by the governor in council and may delegate to any such company or corporation any of the powers and duties conferred or imposed upon the minister under this act or any order in council.

Then it goes on to state that for the purposes of the section the Secretary of State may, if the minister so requests, issue letters patent. That is the authority for forming crown companies as far as the Munitions and Supply Act is concerned. As I have said, at the height of the war there were thirty-one companies formed under the authority of that act. We are now in process of liquidating the war, and it is hoped that in time we shall be able to liquidate the Munitions and Supply Act. It was never intended to be a permanent statute of Canada and when it serves its purpose, which we hope will be in a matter of months, the government will ask for the repeal of the act.

The situation is that out of the thirty-one companies there are still thirteen that are active. Five will continue for a considerable period; perhaps three will continue as permanent companies; two may continue for a certain period, while eight others are in process of being wound up. The winding up of large operations takes time, and it seemed desirable to ask parliament for some continuing provision for the operation of these companies independent of emergency wartime legislation. That is the simple purpose of the bill before the house.

It has been suggested that there should be a separate bill for each company. That would mean thirteen bills on the order paper of parliament. All the companies are identical in form; they were all formed under a uniform statute, which is part I of the Companies Act. The suggestion that we have a separate bill for each company would mean that we would have to have on the order paper thirteen bills, each one identical in form with the others, except for the name of the company to which it applied.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. C. D. Howe for the second reading of bill No. 155, respecting the operation of government companies.

Mr. HOWE: Before the recess I pointed out that the purpose of this bill is to give statutory authority for the operation of the crown companies as set up under the Munitions and Supply Act during the war. The explanation of the bill makes its purpose clear. It states:

During the war, several companies—

Some thirty-one crown companies.

—were incorporated under part I of the Companies Act, 1934, to carry out special projects. Some of these companies, such as Polymer Corporation Limited and Canadian Arsenals Limited, will continue their operations for a considerable period. It may also be desirable, where statutory authority exists, to incorporate similar companies to carry out other special projects.

Having stated that the bill does not convey statutory authority to create any company, I might point out the articles of the bill, which to my mind are very clear and simple. The first section is the "short title", then the definitions of the "minister" and the "company". Then it provides for the bank accounts. Then it provides for additional capital. The purpose of that provision is that in winding up crown companies capital is sometimes required for unexpected purposes, either for operating or for capital investments. The provision referred to enables the Minister of Finance to advance money not in excess of $500,000 for such purposes as an accountable advance. If the money is not refunded before the next parliament meets it will be necessary to include the amount in the estimates of the department in order that the money may be refunded to the department, as is required for all refundable advances. This provision is simply a provision for additional capital, that is, to permit the treasury to make lump advances to the company either for capital or for operating purposes, which in each case is a refundable advance.

The bill provides that all funds in excess of those required for current operations shall be paid to the Receiver General of Canada. I might say that it has been the custom, in the operation of crown companies to examine accounts at the end of each month and that all funds not required for the operation of the company are then recalled by the receiver general.

The bill appoints the company the agent of His Majesty and provides that it can make contracts in its corporate name and that it can sue and be sued.

It provides for the appointment of employees. It provides for the setting up of a pension fund and a superannuation fund. It provides for the protection of civil servants who may be transferred to the employ of a corporation. It preserves to them the benefits of the Civil Service Act.

It provides that each company shall make an annual report and that the report shall be laid before parliament, and it provides also that any other reports required by the minister shall be made.

In closing, it provides for the coming into force of the act.

I cannot see how any hon. member could read into the text of so simple a document any provision for the setting up of new crown companies. It was never intended that that provision should be in the bill and it is not, in fact, any part of the bill.

I mentioned the first objection, which is, that there was no limit to the number of crown companies which could be set up under the act, and I think I have shown that that objection is wholly without foundation.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say, "set up under the act". The minister is wrong in that.

Mr. HOWE: How would they be set up?

Mr. GREEN: Just read the speech and you will see what I said about it.

Mr. HOWE: That any department can set them up? The only method I know of setting up a company is to come to parliament for the necessary authority.

Mr. BOUCHER: What about the Research Council Act?

Mr. HOWE: I have come to parliament for the right to amend the Research Council Act which was originally passed by parliament.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is it not a fact that the minister has also asked parliament under the Research Council Act for power to the council to set up some of the companies on its own initiative without special reference to parliament?

Mr. HOWE: Quite. Parliament may grant that right as it sees fit. That is a matter which I hope the house will decide in the next two or three days. Nevertheless, if Parliament passes this bill in its present form it will have authorized the setting up of certain crown companies under the national research council—to which, I think, no hon. member can take exception, provided that parliament agrees that this should be done.

The second objection is that government activities of this kind are, according to the hon. member, far removed from parliamentary control. I must say that I cannot agree with that, because it seems to me that parliament has all the control over the activities of a crown company that it has over the activities of a government department. The main control of the activities of a department is through the voting of the estimates. If funds are required for a crown company they must be voted by parliament, and parliament can then exercise the same control as it would exercise over any department of government.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister if the vote is a vote for each crown company, or is it one lump sum voted for all crown companies?

Mr. HOWE: The vote would necessarily be for each crown company. I can hardly imagine the opposition agreeing to vote money in a lump sum for all crown companies.

Mr. GREEN: It is not that way in the estimates this year.

Mr. HOWE: Well, these are the demobilization estimates. I think they are exceptional.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister seems to be comtemplating a deficit each year.

Mr. HOWE: Well, that may be. I think parliament has always voted money for the maintenance of arsenals. I am hoping there will not be a deficit in the arsenals company; but, if there is, it will be exactly the same situation as has obtained ever since I have been in parliament and, I think, ever since the oldest member has been here.

Mr. GRAYDON: It looks as though this adventure into socialism will be a loss.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. May I remind the hon. member that the house is not in committee of the whole at the moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOWE: The third objection is that there is no provision for crown companies to pay taxes, municipal, provincial or federal. I suggest that it is not within the competence of this parliament to order crown companies to pay taxes. In order to provide that crown companies shall pay taxes, we must amend the British North America Act. At least, that is my understanding of the matter, and I would be glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. FRASER: We can do that easily enough.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps; nevertheless the fathers of confederation decided that crown property could not be taxable either to the dominion or to the province or to the muncipality. As far as the excess profits tax is concerned, that tax on crown companies is a tax of 100 per cent, in that all the earnings of the company are returnable to His Majesty. That applies to companies wholly owned by the government.

A good many crocodile tears have been shed in this house over the fact that crown companies operate in cities and municipalities without paying taxes to those cities and municipalities. I must say that I have had singularly few complaints from the municipalities concerned. In fact, I have never had a complaint from any city or municipality. I have had a few requests for taxes after the company had been built and put into operation, and when such complaints have been received I have made it my business to examine the accounts of the corporation to determine whether, in fact, it is worse off as a result of the establishment of the crown company, or otherwise. Invariably I have found that the revenues of the corporation were vastly improved, not necessarily perhaps as a direct result of the establishment of the crown company but certainly as a by-product. Many war plants have been built during the war in various parts of Canada, and during the war those plants did not pay taxes; but I can say that at least 80 per cent of them are to-day paying taxes. They have been placed in private hands and are to-day on the active tax rolls of the cities of this country. I should be very glad indeed to have some hon. member rise in his place and give me a specific instance of any loss in a community as a result of the government's building a war plant in that community.

I might mention an interesting coincidence. My hon. friend the member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) entered a complaint on behalf of his constituency about the fact that Polymer Corporation is not taxable. Under date of May 31 I have received an entirely unsolicited letter from the mayor of Sarnia, as follows:

Hon. C. D. Howe,
Minister of Munitions and Supply,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir: With reference to the recent debate in parliament in which the member for West Lambton made certain charges against Polymer plant here, may I say personally as mayor of our city I could not commend his attitude. It is my belief that Polymer has been a great asset to our city, capably managed and efficiently directed, and that we have been very well treated by the government in this regard. It is my hope that the incident above referred to will not be held by yourself or your department against our city, as it is my opinion that Mr. Murphy's remarks, while perhaps reflecting his own views, do not in any way represent the majority opinion of this city.

I am,

Very truly yours,
W. C. Nelson,
Mayor.

I suggest that the reaction in this instance is typical of the reaction of every other city where crown plants have been established. The crown does not pay taxes, but it does not put cities or municipalities to expense in connection with its operations. If it requires service from a community it pays for that service, and I think the numerous speeches that have been made in this house in this debate, deploring the fact that crown companies do not pay taxes, are entirely without foundation as far as the real situation is concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask the minister whether he has resolved all his difficulties so far as the town of New Toronto is concerned?

Mr. HOWE: We have never had any difficulty with respect to New Toronto.

Mr. ADAMSON: They camplained to me with reference to storm sewers.

Mr. HOWE: The next complaint is this:

In some cases crown companies will be in direct competition with private business. I do not think any member of the house can question that fact.

That is the next point. Let me say that while the Department of Munitions and Supply created thirty-one crown companies, it has never created a company that is in competition with private business in any way, shape or manner. If private business was able to carry out the war objective, private business was given that opportunity. The government has created crown companies only to undertake work that private industry was not willing to undertake.

It has been suggested that the Polymer Corporation is in competition with private business. May I say that if the government had not built the Polymer Corporation when it did there would have been no private industry in this country as far as rubber is concerned. There was absolutely no way of bringing supplies into Canada to keep the rubber industry in operation or to fill the war needs in connection with rubber. Polymer is the backbone of the rubber industry, but it is not in competition with private industry in any way, shape or manner. Similarly, our arsenals have always been operated by the government. It is quite proper that the making of arms and ammunition for war purposes should be in the hands of the government, and that has been the policy of the government for a great many years. The arsenals corporation will carry out that policy, which will meet the requirements of the armed forces in certain ways that have been met by the arsenals for years, and it will not be in competition with private industry.

[Mr. Howe.]

The third company is Eldorado; and I have explained to the house, as every hon. member is well aware, why the products of Eldorado must be kept in the custody of the government from the time that mining operation commences. until the finished product is delivered.

Mr. GREEN: What about the companies to be set up under the research council.

Mr. HOWE: There is one company in connection with patents which are the property of the research council. Surely that company will not be in competition with any other concern that I can think of.

Mr. GREEN: What about the other company?

Mr. HOWE: The second company proposed is the company which is already in existence, and to which I have referred, and the third suggestion was that there may be a company to operate Chalk River, which is a government operation that is hardly in competition with private industry. I know of no government company that has ever been in direct competition with private industry; and certainly those that will be continuing companies cannot possibly be considered to be in competition with private industry.

I continue with the hon. member's objections:

The fifth objection is that the bill makes possible the setting up of a super civil service. Employment is entirely in the hands of officers of the crown companies. They can hire whomsoever they choose and pay whatever salaries they wish. The minister explained that one of the reasons he wanted crown companies was to pay salaries commensurate with those paid by private industry.

Surely no hon. member will suggest that the government should go into the manufacturing business with one hand tied behind its back. No one would suggest that the Polymer Corporation, a $50 million project with a turnover of $40 million or $50 million a year would be operated by a man with a civil service salary. The government is going into business on equal terms with private business. It must do so if it expects to have a record which will compare with that of private business. I suggest that no hon. member should ask that the terms under which the government enters business should be any less favourable than those that obtain in private business.

Mr. FLEMING: But not more so.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member think they are more favourable?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, where taxes are concerned.

Mr. FULTON: It has the resources of the whole country behind it.

Mr. IRVINE: I cannot hear this private conversation.

Mr. HOWE: It is not very important. I go on with the objections of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

> The sixth objection is that by using these crown companies the government is putting into effect a very fine method of bringing about a socialist state.

Surely that subject has been debated sufficiently. We need hardly pursue it any farther. Had the government been desirous of setting up a socialist state I suggest that it would hardly have disbanded the majority of its thirty-one companies. It is keeping only the companies which I believe are companies which properly should be under public operation. If the government wished to enter the field of socialism it would certainly advance in a wholly different way from that which is being followed in the present instance.

I believe that covers the main argument in opposition to this bill. As I say, the hon. member for Vancouver South set the tone of the debate, and it was religiously followed by other hon. members of his party. In dealing with his arguments, I feel that I have dealt with the subject matter of the debate.

I would again point out that this is a harmless bill. Its purpose is to permit orderly liquidation of the government's war business, and to ask for the repeal of the Munitions and Supply Act under which all the crown companies in the department were founded. As soon as we can carry it out, the objective is to liquidate the eight crown companies which are still functioning, but which are not required for any purpose other than to liquidate their accounts, and to set up the five companies remaining, on a legal basis aproved by parliament. That, I believe, is a worthy objective. The purpose of the bill is to do it simply. The alternative would have been to introduce into parliament thirteen separate bills of the same content. Therefore, in asking hon. members to approve this bill, I am not asking parliament to depart from any practice which is usually followed.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the crown company at Fort McMurray one of the companies the minister has in mind?

Mr. HOWE: The operation at Fort McMurray is not carried on by a crown company. It is an operation under the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may be wrong, but my recollection is that it was set up as a crown company. The crown certainly put up the money for it, and turned it over to a group to operate. I have not heard anything in the debate—one, by the way, in which I took no part—which would indicate that any of the companies the minister is about to set up will be operated in any other way. All those crown companies are operated by a group of men, just as is done at Fort McMurray.

Mr. HOWE: Abasand, as I remember the situation, was a privately owned company which had been operating for some years. Arrangements were made with Abasand by the government under which certain experimental operations would be carried out under contract by the private company at government expense, but Abasand was never a crown company.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am still in the dark; I cannot get the picture of what the minister means. The original Abasand company was a privately operated concern, but when it was taken over by the government the old Abasand Company went out of the picture completely. The government has had this operation under its control for about three years or more and during that time $2,000,000 more or less of this country's money has been voted by this house to carry on that business. I do not see any difference between that and any other company that is being operated under the crown. I am not trying to find any fault with the minister, but I want to know if Abasand is to be continued or is to be closed down? Personally I should like to see it closed down as a government operation.

Mr. HOWE: My officers advise me that I gave the correct position. Abasand is the same company to-day, with the same shareholders, that it was before the war. It has been carrying on certain experimental work under contract with the Department of Mines and Resources, and this work was carried on at the expense of the government. I am unable to give my hon. friend the information he desires. I am sure the Minister of Mines and Resources will be better qualified to do so, but I can assure him that Abasand is not a crown company.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know the minister is thoroughly qualified to tell me what I wish to know, and I do not know that the Minister of Mines and Resources can know very much about it. He has not had it under his control very long and he had nothing to do with the setting up of the company. The minister did have something to do with that. The minister set it up and I am sure he can tell us, if he will, exactly what is to be done with it. When the Minister of Mines and Resources comes before the committee I shall not expect him to answer. He will have to ask somebody sitting in front of him, but the minister does not need to ask anybody in front of him; he knows himself. It was set up under his orders and he is familiar with it.

I am not finding any fault because it is all past and gone, but I am anxious to know what is going to go on. It makes no difference to me at all, but the minister knows that the plant built under his supervision—it was not built under the supervision of the Minister of Mines and Resources—was burned down some time ago and insurance amounting to several hundred thousand dollars was collected. I was informed a short time ago that application is to be made to the government for a sum equal to the amount of the insurance, which I believe was $350,000, to make a total of $700,000, in order that the rebuilding of the plant may be proceeded with.

If the government is to expend the money received from the insurance I think it could be more sensibly spent in continuing the operations that were started under the minister's direction a year or two ago—this was before the present Minister of Mines and Resources had anything to do with the matter—of drilling down the Athabaska river in the known oil sand beds in order to investigate the tonnage of oil sands in that area. If that work is not completed now, there is a danger of what has already been spent being lost. It is government business to find out what are the resources of the country and I think this money could be better spent in doing this drilling than to rebuild the mill. I am trying to be nice to the minister because I recognize his ability, but I should like to know what is to be done.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is much too complimentary about my knowledge of that particular transaction. I did have something to do perhaps with starting the experiments, but the contract was always carried by the Department of Mines and Resources, and the officials of that department supervised the operations with some collaboration by our oil controller when we had an oil controller. My officials tell me that I have a memorandum on my desk about this, but I have not read it. I do not know whether they will continue operations, but I do know that if any money is to be forthcoming for that purpose it will be voted in connection with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources. I am sure the minister of that department will be well briefed when he appears in the house and will be able to discuss the matter with my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: That particular company is not one of the companies the minister has in mind to carry on under this bill?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes or no?

Mr. HOWE: That company is privately owned. It is the same old Abasand company; I can assure my hon. friend of that. It has never been a crown company; it is not a crown company at the present time and, I think I am safe in saying that it never will be a crown company.

Mr. MacNICOL: I recommend the Minister of Mines and Resources to read what the minister has just said, that it is not a crown company. I will not pursue the matter with the minister any longer, but when the Minister of Mines and Resources comes before the committee I will read to him the original contracts entered into by the government with the so-called private concern. There is no private concern about it to-day. I hope the Minister of Mines and Resources will get the memorandum the minister has on his desk because he will need it and every other memorandum he can put his hands on.

Mr. BOUCHER: When the Minister of Reconstruction was speaking this afternoon he referred to the fact that this bill really was enabling legislation to help in the operation of such crown companies as are now in existence or such others as the government may wish to create. Such companies as Polymer, Canadian Arsenals and Eldorado are already owned by the government; they have been financed by the government; they have been in operation and they have some revenue. What further financing does the minister want to do for them? I am thinking particularly of the powers set out in section 4 of the bill, which authorizes the governor in council at any one time to finance a company to the extent of $500,000 for additional working capital by way of loan or guarantee.

Then section 5 of the same bill provides that the governor in council may advance a further $500,000 at any one time in any one fiscal year —I suggest that this would permit as many half million dollars in as many fiscal years as they may wish—for the purpose of constructing, acquiring, extending or improving capital works and for the purpose of purchasing additional shares of capital stock. Taking the three sections together, and bearing in mind that there are three companies, Polymer Corporation, Canadian Arsenals and the Eldorado company, one can see the possibility of a great deal of government money going into these crown projects without sufficient notice to parliament. The companies will have the capital which they now possess, plus their increased earnings, which may be retained and may not be recalled by the receiver general, plus not more than $500,000 granted at any one time for the purposes of operation, plus a further number of $500,000 for extensions and improvements and the buying of stock, so long as not more than one sum of $500,000 is given within any fiscal year. If you add those amounts together you will see the possibility of huge sums of money being obtained by these crown companies without any actual vote by parliament until after the deed is done. It is true that a statement will be available to parliament by being laid on the table of the house at a future time. But combining these three things, it seems to me the minister cannot but agree that he is asking parliament at this time to make an unusually large concession at one time. If my interpretation of the bill is correct it will be dangerous for us to assent to it in its present form. Probably he can enlighten me on this point. He may say that my construction of the terms of the measure is not correct, that the government cannot add to the capital of these companies beyond what they already have, or it may be that the minister will see fit so to revise the terms of the bill that there will be something which will limit, more than it does at present, the amount of money which the governor in council can give these crown companies without first submitting the matter to parliament.

Mr. HOWE: Am I to understand, Mr. Chairman, that sections 1, 2 and 3 have passed by the committee? We are discussing at the moment section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: The section under consideration is section 1, short title, and it is usual to have a general discussion when section 1 is up for consideration.

Mr. HOWE: This is a very special discussion of section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: Does section 1 carry?

Mr. BOUCHER: With all deference to the minister, I say that it is not a question of section 4. It is a question which has in view the purposes of the bill under sections 1, 4 and 5. These are pretty nearly all the pith and substance of the bill, and I think that under the policy and procedure of the house this is the proper time to ask the question, because otherwise we are restricted to the one section. This question relates to three or four sections of the bill and how they are related to each other.

Mr. HOWE: I am quite willing to discuss section 4, but I had always understood that the principle of a bill was discussed on second reading and not in committee. However, section 4 gives each crown company the authority to borrow from the Minister of Finance not more than—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think the minister is probably correct, and if he intends to discuss section 4 he might reserve his remarks until that section is reached.

Mr. HACKETT: I think the minister is adopting the proper policy in telling us something about this corporation. I do not believe that many members of the committee understand what is its purpose and how it functions, and if the minister can in a few sentences enlighten the committee, now is the time to do so. It may save a lot of time later on.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is the wish of the committee to discuss section 4 now, the chair will certainly not object, although I believe it would facilitate the proceedings of the committee if these sections were discussed as we reach them. If the minister is just going to make a few remarks with regard to section 4, without a general discussion, it might be satisfactory to do so now.

Mr. HACKETT: Before the minister commences, may I be permitted to say that many hon. members who have some acquaintance with business and finance are completely at sea concerning the method of operation and the purpose of creation of these and other corporations of a similar nature, and we would be profoundly grateful to the minister, who has a far broader knowledge of the operations of these corporations than anyone else, if he would give the committee the benefit of his experience and his information concerning them.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, if I may resume, the purpose of section 4 is to permit each crown corporation to borrow from the Minister of Finance, for a period, up to a limit of $500,000 for operating, and up to a limit of $500,000 for capital purposes. It is simply a loan. A crown corporation differs from a private corporation in that it cannot borrow money from the usual sources. It cannot float a bond issue, nor can it borrow money from a bank except by authority of the Minister of Finance. This bill authorizes the Minister of Finance to guarantee a loan from a bank up to half a million dollars or alternatively make a temporary advance up to half a million dollars direct from consolidated revenue. That is simply banking accommodation. The important feature of the bill is that it allows each crown company to operate with money which it earns, which is not the case at the present time.

For example, Polymer corporation sets up a maintenance fund. It would be free to a private corporation to invest that maintenance fund for capital purposes or for any corporate purpose. Under the present practice that particular fund is paid to the Receiver General of Canada and is not available for corporate purposes unless voted. When this bill is passed the maintenance vote will still be paid over to the Receiver General of Canada, but it will be kept in a suspense account for corporate purposes of the company until the auditor general decides that the amount has become excessive, when it will be transferred from that account into the consolidated revenue fund. That is the difference between the present-day practice and the practice under this bill. But provision is made in this bill for borowing power up to half a million dollars for operating, and half a milion dollars for capital purposes. That money must be refunded before any further loan can be obtained. The amount outstanding can never be more than $500,000 for each account at any one time.

Mr. GREEN: That is, a total of one million dollars?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BOUCHER: I appreciate the minister's explanation, but I do not understand the section, because if he refers to section 4, he will find that there is a limit of $500,000 for operating expenses at any one time; but if he reads section 5, that is the latter part of it, he will see that the only restriction is that the advance or loan is not to exceed $500,000 in any fiscal year. That means, as I understand it, that in each fiscal year the government can advance this company $500,000 and the total could be much in excess of half a million dollars by reason of several advances. I see nothing in the bill to confirm the minister's statement that at no time can the advances exceed two loans of $500,000 or a total of $1,000,000, nor do I see anything which provides that a company must refund one loan before it can secure another. That is not in the bill.

Mr. HOWE: The fact of the matter is that the loan, under section 5, which is for capital purposes, is limited to $500,000 until it is cleared. It can be cleared in either of two ways. It can be cleared by vote of parliament for capital purposes, to replace it, or it can be cleared by the finance department taking additional stock in the company, as it has a right to do. The loan is limited to $500,000 for any fiscal year, and naturally there can be no further loans until the next fiscal year, until the first loan has been cleared.

Mr. BOUCHER: I cannot read in the bill anything to that effect. I hope that is the case, but I cannot see anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. HOWE: It is stated clearly in paragraph (c) of section 5 that the Minister of Finance is authorized "to purchase additional shares of capital stock of a company and to pay for the same out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund." Unappropriated moneys have to be appropriated. There is no such thing as a vote of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BOUCHER: But there is nothing to say that they could not be appropriated to this crown company for each fiscal year for five, ten or fifteen years before any of the loans are paid back.

Mr. HOWE: They can be appropriated only by vote of parliament. My hon. friend is right. They must be appropriated by vote of parliament or otherwise refunded.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister has stated that only on one occasion can they have a loan of $500,000. This section does not say anything of the kind, nor does any other section say anything of the kind. It does not say that they cannot have a number of appropriations by way of loan or advance to the company, of $500,000 each, and it does not say that they must pay back one loan before securing another. The section says that the governor in council may do it, not parliament.

Mr. HOWE: The governor in council can authorize an advance from unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, but at the end of the fiscal year unappropriated moneys must be appropriated. No one in the government has the right finally to spend unappropriated money of the consolidated revenue fund. My hon. friend, having lived all his life within sight of the capital, must know government practice to that extent.

Mr. BOUCHER: Unfortunately I know it only too well, because it looks to me like locking the barn after the horse is stolen. The minister says that the governor in council can appropriate money, and there is no requirement saying that they cannot appropriate it again even though the first loan is not paid. The minister himself stated it a few minutes ago, but now his stand is not the same, which leads me to believe that, although he has lived in the capital for some years, and has been much more active in the capital treasury than the member for Carleton has been, he is not in a position to give an explanation.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is saying again and again that black is white while I am saying that black is black and we cannot get together in that kind of discussion. However, I leave it to any hon. member whether he can read anything else into that section.

Mr. HAZEN: Would not section 4 be clearer if the last four words of paragraph (b) were deleted, so that it would read "shall not, in the case of any company, exceed $500,000"? What is the purpose of putting in the last four words, "at any one time"? It seems to me that the company is limited to an advance of $500,000. Why put in those words, "at any one time"? That creates the impression that at another time they can get another $500,000.

Mr. HOWE: The company might very well need an advance of $500,000 in August to buy coal for the winter, and by December it might be able to pay off that $500,000. By March it might need another $500,000 for inventory for something else, and that might be liquidated later on and a third loan made in the fiscal year. But let me point out that the advance can never be more than $500,000 at any one time. You can borrow $500,000 several times in the year if you pay back earlier borrowings.

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not follow the minister. Section 4 says, not more than $500,000 at any one time, but section 5 does not say that: it says, not to exceed $500,000 in any fiscal year. There is a vast difference in wording as between the two and in the meaning of the enactment by virtue of the difference in wording.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps the minister on the one hand and the hon. member for Carleton and myself on the other are really in agreement if he can explain the position. I understand that under section 4 advances up to $500,000 can be made, but it must not exceed $500,000 at any one time. But my understanding is that under section 5 advances or payments or subscriptions, whatever you choose to call it, may be made at the rate of $500,000 each year, because it is not the aggregate of the amount outstanding but the aggregate of the amount paid under paragraph (b) which shall not exceed $500,000. My understanding is the same as that of the hon. member for Carleton. Under section 4 you have an aggregate of $500,000, but under section 5 you can go on year after year, $500,000 each year. Is that the minister's understanding?

Mr. HACKETT: And at the end of five years you have $2,500,000.

Mr. HOWE: Let us go about this thing quietly and see if we cannot understand it. My hon. friend has operated in business for a long time—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are going about it quietly. We want to be sure that we understand the same thing.

Mr. HOWE: Section 4 gives the company an operating credit of $500,000, a limit—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes, I understand.

Mr. HOWE: A banker would take you aside and explain what a line of credit is, with a limit of $500,000. You can borrow up to $500,000 and do it repeatedly, provided that you pay it off in the meantime. It is a floating credit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I understand that.

Mr. HOWE: The second is a loan for capital purposes, a loan that goes into the property.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But is it a loan? Is it not a purchase? Paragraph (c) talks about a purchase of shares.

Mr. HOWE: It can be cleared in several ways. The provision is for an advance for capital purposes and the advance must be covered. It can be a loan repayable from a vote of parliament, or it can be a purchase of shares by the government, a purchase of interest by the government.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Supposing an amount of $500,000 is used this year for a purchase. Then the hon. member for Carleton argues, and I argue, in this way: All right; that is $500,000 which is paid this year, and next year the same thing can be repeated, and the next year. Does the minister agree? If he does, then we are all at one. That is the way it reads, surely.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that the advance is made from unappropriated moneys and the money must be appropriated. In other words, in between, before another $500,000 is made available, they must come to parliament and get an appropriation. They must change unappropriated moneys into an appropriation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But we are talking about whether it can happen year after year and, as I understand, you are agreeing to that.

Mr. HOWE: It can, if parliament votes it. Parliament must vote the money.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister said that the corporation might not keep the moneys that it made as profit through its operations.

Mr. HOWE: At the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there anything in this bill that expresses the effect of the statement the minister has made?

Mr. HOWE: When this bill passes, the company will be able to use its earnings for corporate purposes.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that section 3?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The section reads:

> Every company shall establish and maintain in its own name one or more accounts in the Bank of Canada or a chartered bank approved by the Minister of Finance and shall deposit therein all moneys received by the company and shall pay out of the said accounts all administrative and operating costs and expenses of the company.

Mr. HACKETT: When one reads that section with section 6 which gives the minister or the Minister of Finance the power to take back anything that is conceded to be in excess of the requirements of the company, what are the particular uses of section 5?

Mr. HOWE: Once it is out of section 6, then it is gone. It goes into the consolidated revenue fund. The requirements for capital come up very suddenly. For example, the Polymer Corporation is in many different kinds of business. Its main business is the making of rubber. It also sells the by-products of petroleum in several forms. For example, there is a demand now for additional styrene, and apparatus is being installed with some urgency to increase the cut of styrene. That happens in any chemical company; and if funds were not in hand to-day, section 5 of the bill would be invoked and the Minister of Finance would be asked to advance the required sum in excess of $500,000, to be repaid either from earnings or be appropriated by parliament, as the case may be.

Mr. BOUCHER: Now that the minister has agreed with me that the governor in council may appropriate $500,000 for extensions or for the buying of capital stock, construction and acquisitions of the company each fiscal year, the limit is not $500,000 as he stated; it is $500,000 in any one fiscal year, which may be accumulated over a number of years by $500,000 each fiscal year. Does he also agree with me—

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BOUCHER: If the minister wishes to answer he may do so.

Mr. HOWE: I agree with nothing of the kind. My hon. friend may keep on saying that for the rest of this evening, but I do not agree with him.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister's statement was clear, and that is what I at least took from what he said. He said they could appropriate $500,000 in one fiscal year for the buying of stock and the acquisition of property under section 5. The next fiscal year they could get another appropriation of the same amount. That is what section 5 says.

Mr. HOWE: Put this proviso down in writing and keep it in front of you: Provided that in the meantime the appropriation is voted by parliament; provided that parliament votes the money that has been appropriated in the previous year.

Mr. BOUCHER: That is not in the bill. The bill says:

The governor in council may . . .

Even though parliament does appropriate the money, it gives the same result. The result is that a company like Polymer, which the minister says has made so many million dollars, can over and above any appropriation it seeks from parliament, use all its profits for its own purposes or for any purpose it may see fit without consulting parliament at all. Is that not correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it can use its own earnings.

Mr. McMASTER: As I read sections 4 and 5, they deal with entirely different matters. As I read section 5, it deals with the carrying on of the operating end of the business. As the minister said, at one time they need money to buy materials, and at another time to buy coal. Section 5 seems to me to deal with capital expenses.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. McMASTER: If that is so, then following what the hon. member for Carleton has said, is it a fact that each year they could be advanced $500,000 for capital expenses?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is correct, provided —and this proviso is reiterated—that in the meantime parliament votes $500,000 to the company for capital purposes to clear the last advance that has been made. If the proviso does not wrok it cannot be done.

Mr. BRACKEN: Where can we find in the estimates the appropriation from which funds for this purpose will be drawn?

Mr. HOWE: The present arrangement obtains. In other words, if this is a company under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply it would be an item in the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could not the minister, through his advisers, tell us where that item is in the estimates?

Mr. HOWE: There is no such item.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wanted to ask that question, and I wish to ask one other. Is there a blanket vote from which the moneys required for these corporations may be drawn? The minister has referred to parliament voting money for particular companies. I rather doubt whether the minister will bring down estimates showing a separate vote for each company. I expect to find it in some blanket vote, and we shall not understand what it may be used for.

Mr. HOWE: There has been no occasion for individual votes. The money has been appropriated in the war appropriation under a blanket vote. In fact, the war appropriation for the whole cost of the war was contained in one bill; but under the arrangements of this bill there must necessarily be a separate item for each repayment. In other words, it would be a vote to repay a recoverable advance. It must be a separate vote. If this is a vote for general purposes it would be so labelled. But the item under section 5 would call for a specific vote for a particular company.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the question I am asking. We are over two months into this fiscal year, and there are ten months ahead of us. If this measure goes into operation, surely there must be an appropriation already in the estimates.

Mr. HOWE: There may be.

Mr. GREEN: May I call the minister's attention to the fact that on page 74 of the main estimates, item 609 reads:

Administration, reconversion and operation of crown companies and/or crown plants, $20,000,000.

There is an increase of $16,000,000 over the vote for the last fiscal year. Is that the vote to which the minister refers?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is correct. The reason for the increase is that last year the companies had considerable revenues. This year it is a question of the clean-up of contracts, and the amount was increased accordingly. I shall be glad to give a full explanation of the items when the estimates of the companies are reached; but that is not an item that is used to finance these particular companies. It is more a clean-up item of the companies that are now out of business.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not mean to embarrass the minister, but if this measure is to come into operation in this fiscal year and it requires funds the question I was asking is, where in the estimates shall we be able to find the vote? Is it a blanket vote from which the governor in council may draw funds as it requires them for these separate companies? The minister said that he would be asking for a specific vote for each of these companies. From the answers given so far I rather question whether he is correct in that statement.

Mr. HOWE: Any money borrowed under sections 4 and 5, unless it can be repaid from the operations of the company, will be repaid by a specific vote for a specific company. My hon. friend has referred to requirements. Polymer, for instance, will require no funds from the government during the coming year; its earnings will be quite ample to take care of its requirements. Park Steamships will require no funds; its earnings are ample to take care of its requirements. Eldorado may or may not require an appropriation, depending upon the amount of exploration work undertaken during the current season. Wartime Housing, of course, does require appropriations, and these are in the estimates; I refer hon. members to item 607, covering housing developments and including commitments of previous years. Canadian Arsenals will require an appropriation. Whether or not that appropriation is spent will depend upon the experience of the first year. We shall have certain extraordinary expenses involved in organizing Canadian Arsenals and moving and placing the equipment, but we hope that in future years Canadian Arsenals can operate without an appropriation from parliament.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think the minister can clear up my difficulty with one answer. I gather that in the estimates for this year any appropriation asked for is a bulk appropriation and that there will not be specific votes for specific companies. I also gather from the minister that in future there will be specific votes for specific companies?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: If that is the minister's intention I have my answer.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is not in the estimates in that way this year, but in future the requirements of specific companies will be asked for in the estimates?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is with companies borrowing under the bill. It must be the case.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister come to my assistance in this matter? He has explained section 3, under which in future a crown company may have to its credit moneys which it earns. Then section 6 provides that the minister or the Minister of Finance may take those moneys from the company. Will the minister state the difference in method and purpose between sections 4 and 5, in getting new moneys for a company?

Mr. HOWE: Section 3 permits the company to use its revenues for operating purposes. Section 6 provides that if the company does not believe it is time for a dividend to the consolidated revenue fund, the Minister of Finance may step in and say that the dividend shall be paid. Sections 4 and 5 are to cover temporary borrowings, one for current purposes and the other for capital purposes, borrowings which can be made in advance of authorization by parliament, but which must be cleared by parliament before a further advance can be obtained.

Mr. HACKETT: Section 4, then, covers borrowings for temporary purposes; and section 5—?

Mr. HOWE: For capital purposes.

Mr. HACKETT: I have some difficulty in understanding that section 5 has to do with borrowings for capital purposes, since it entails the sale of securities. Is that considered a borrowing for capital purposes? I refer particularly to section 5 (c), which authorizes the Minister of Finance to purchase additional shares of capital stock of a company and to pay for the same out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can explain it in another way. The Minister of Finance has no money of his own. This is authorizing him to borrow money from the consolidated revenue fund, which he does out of unappropriated moneys in that fund; but that money has to be paid back to the consolidated revenue fund by way of an appropriation. An appropriation will be required to square the Minister of Finance and his consolidated revenue fund before he can make another loan from the same source.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps I am stupid, but I still think the minister is either confused or is confusing us or we are confused; it is one of the three, and I am not sure it is not the first. The minister still speaks of this as a loan to the company, but I still find it difficult to understand that purchasing a company's stock is making a loan. Paragraph (c) of section 4 speaks of purchasing additional shares of the company's stock. Is that what the minister speaks of as a loan to the company?

Mr. HOWE: I think we would get on much faster if we took up this bill clause by clause. The point is that this stock is purchased with unappropriated moneys, and nobody can spend unappropriated moneys permanently without going to gaol. Unappropriated moneys must be appropriated at some stage.

Mr. MERRITT: That is the point that is troubling me. I know very little about finance, but it seems to me that section 5 is a statutory authorization to pay money out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. Then, if at the end of the year the auditor general asks for the authority for the payment of, say $500,000, the production of the order in council under section 5 of this measure would be adequate authority for that payment and adequate appropriation of the money. Therefore it would not be necessary for the minister to come back to parliament and recoup that $500,000 by an item in the estimates. It would seem to me that the only limit to this would be the existence or non-existence of unappropriated money in the consolidated revenue fund at any particular time. If I were to pay my annual income tax of $500,000 and it happened to be lying there the day the minister wanted some money, under this section he could take it without putting an item in the estimates; or if it appeared in the estimates it would be like the family allowances, for instance. That is, it would be a statutory item, just as the minister's salary is a statutory vote which does not require to be discussed and passed in committee of supply.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend it quite mistaken. This is not a statutory vote; it is not a vote at all. This gives permission to make temporary borrowings, which must be repaid by means of appropriations. If it were a statutory vote it would say so. The vote covering the salary of the minister, for instance, is a statutory vote, but this only gives permission to borrow up to this amount each year.

Mr. BOUCHER: I may be hard to convince, but is it not a fact that after this bill is passed an order in council itself will be sufficient appropriation to authorize the government to advance the money? What further steps will be necessary?

Mr. HOWE: The further step is a vote of parliament appropriating the money.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: During the discussion on second reading of this bill there was quite a bit of talk about the ways of forming crown companies, and I think this is a good time to have that straightened out. If I am wrong in any of the statements I make about the method of incorporating these companies I hope the minister will correct me. As I understand it, these crown companies, formed under part I of the Dominion Companies Act had never been used until the war. During the course of the war the Department of Munitions and Supply decided that it would be a good idea to set up crown companies in that way. The minister, who was then Minister of Munitions and Supply, was given power to do so in the session of 1940. That is found in chapter 31 of the statutes of that year, which is an act to amend the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. The power to bring about the incorporation of these crown companies is set out in subsections 3 and 4 of section 6, as enacted in 1940. Those subsections give the minister this wide power, namely that of bringing about the incorporation of crown companies under the Dominion Companies Act.

It was done, I believe, by having employees of the government sign the necessary application for letters patent just in the same way a private businessman would sign an application leading to the formation of a company under the Dominion Companies Act. The act to which I have just referred put no restriction whatsoever upon the number of companies which could be formed through the minister in that way. That provision is still law.

That section of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act is still law; so that right up to the present time under that act the minister has power to procure the incorporation of any number of crown companies he thinks should be formed. As I have said, the act is still in force.

Mr. HOWE: Only for the purposes mentioned in the act. The minister can only delegate powers given to him in the act. My hon. friend voted for it; I presume he thought it was all right then.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will admit that the powers given are quite wide.

Mr. HOWE: Not too wide. They were related wholly to war.

Mr. GREEN: At the last session we passed the Department of Reconstruction and Supply Act, which is chapter 16 of last year's statutes. Under section 6 of that statute the minister was confirmed in all the powers he had under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. So that, as long as the Department of Reconstruction and Supply Act remains on the statute books, the minister will have that power to set up crown companies which he was given by section 6 of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. Again, there is no limit on the number of companies he can set up.

Mr. HOWE: Provided that they are for the purposes specified in the act, which relate wholly to war. There being no war, I think it would be difficult to find a basis for setting up any new company under that act. In any event, when the Department of Munitions and Supply was called upon to set up War Assets Corporation it did not proceed under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, because that was not within the competence of that act. It came to parliament for a separate bill.

Mr. GREEN: Of course my submission on second reading was that any new companies to be formed should be formed in the same way as War Assets Corporation was formed, namely, by special statute of parliament.

Mr. HOWE: That would necessarily be so, in my opinion.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister say, then, that there will be no more crown companies set up under the provisions of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act or the Department of Reconstruction and Supply Act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Well, then, under Bill No. 154, which is a bill to amend the Research Council Act, power is given to procure the incorporation of these crown companies.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: No limit is set upon the number of companies they can incorporate.

Mr. HOWE: It is limited to the purpose of the act. That is, as long as they keep within the field of the national research council, they are all right.

Mr. GREEN: Then, again, under the atomic energy control board act, the same power is given.

Mr. HOWE: It has not yet been given.

Mr. GREEN: We have not yet seen the bill. However, in the discussion on the resolution preceding the bill we were told that power would be given to set up crown companies under part I of the Dominion Companies Act.

Mr. HOWE: For the purpose of carrying out the bill.

Mr. GREEN: With no limit set as to the number that could be set up. I suggest to the minister that there is also power to set up these crown companies under the provisions of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act which was passed at the last session, and which remains in effect at the very least until after the house meets next spring. Then it may be extended for a further time.

Mr. HOWE: Under what section of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, would we set up companies?

Mr. GREEN: Under the general powers contained in that act.

Mr. HOWE: No; those are limited powers. I would refer the hon. member to section 2 where it states that the governor in council may do such acts and things as are deemed necessary or advisable for the purpose of certain things set out in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). I believe the hon. member would have difficulty setting up companies under that.

Mr. GREEN: The minister thinks there would be trouble in doing that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: At any rate, there are these other ways of setting up crown companies at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: By authority of parliament.

Mr. GREEN: My point was this: Parliament passes, let us say, the Research Council Act. There is then no necessity for the research council to come to parliament to obtain approval respecting any of the companies they wish to set up. I was suggesting that parliament should pass on each company rather than give a blanket power to the research council to set up any company they might see fit to set up. That is where the minister and I do not see eye to eye as to what would be the best policy.

Mr. HOWE: My difficulty is to discuss three bills at the same time. I have said that the bill we are now discussing—and the only bill we are discussing—does not give authority to set up any crown company.

Mr. GREEN: But what the bill does do, in the section we are now discussing, is that it describes a company. The section states:

"Company" means a company incorporated under part I of the Companies Act, 1934, all the issued shares of capital stock of which are owned by or held in trust for His Majesty in right of Canada, except shares necessary to qualify other persons as directors.

So that the provisions of this bill are so broad that they cover every crown company, do they not?

Mr. HOWE: Every existing crown company.

Mr. GREEN: No; any crown company to be set up in the future is covered by section 2.

Mr. HOWE: No; they do not cover a company until it is in fact set up. I know of no way of setting up a crown company to-day, except by coming to parliament. Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me a way.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that I have already told him the way that it is done and I think he agreed with my statement. For example, under the Research Council Act, once the amendment is passed the council will have the power to set up any corporation it wishes.

Mr. HOWE: For the purposes of the act and provided that power is given by parliament to the research council. It could not do it to-day.

Mr. GREEN: I admit that, but having got that power they can set up any company. Let us say that they set up five companies; each one of those five companies would come under this blanket bill. The minsiter will not deny that.

Mr. HOWE: Of course, but my hon. friend will remember that anything the companies could do, the national research council could do without the companies.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that that is a very good reason why the national research council does not need to set up companies at all.

Mr. HOWE: Which bill are we discussing? Do I get any protection? Do I have to discuss four bills at once?

Mr. GREEN: Surely the minister is not asking for protection. We will call in the mounted police to help him out.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering section 2 of a bill respecting the operation of government companies. All discussion should be relevant to that section and to this bill.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. GREEN: I was speaking of crown companies. Paragraph (a) of this section also has great significance and it supports the argument I made last night. It reads:

(a) "Minister" means, in relation to each company, the minister who has direction or control of the affairs of the company.

I suggest that that is worded broadly enough for any minister in any dominion cabinet to operate under this bill if there happens to be a crown company set up dealing with the business of his department.

Mr. HOWE: Under part I of the Companies Act.

Mr. GREEN: Yes. I think there can be no question about that. That is one of the conclusions I was trying to reach in my speech last night, and I think the minister's answers this evening have made it perfectly clear that that is the situation. There is power taken under this bill to provide for the operation of any crown company that is set up under part I of the Companies Act, and there is no limit to the number of companies that can be dealt with under the bill. Any minister has the power to operate under this bill if he has a crown company mixed up with his department.

Mr. HOWE: Organized under part I of the Companies Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Bank accounts.

Mr. KNOWLES: This section provides that every company shall establish and maintain a bank account in the Bank of Canada or one of the chartered banks. I should like the minister to clear up a point that arises in my mind in connection with this section. As I read the section, it implies that a company could carry on its banking business either with the Bank of Canada or with a chartered bank, the company is given a choice. If that is the case, and if it is possible for a company to do all its banking business with the Bank of Canada as well as with a chartered bank I should like to know if consideration was given to wording the section so that these crown companies would do all their business with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will note that the company is instructed by the Minister of Finance as to the bank with which it will do its business. It so happens that the Bank of Canada does not do commercial banking, and therefore I think an active crown company would hope that the minister would place its account with a chartered bank.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought that was the reason for the section. I do not deny that I would prefer that all the business be done with the Bank of Canada, but in the light of what the minister says I am still bothered by the wording of the section. It says, "Bank of Canada or a chartered bank approved by the Minister of Finance." That seems to imply that it could be done with either one. If what the minister says about the inability of the Bank of Canada to carry on this type of business is correct, then it seems to me that there should be a change in the wording of the section.

Mr. LENNARD: How could a crown company located in northern British Columbia utilize the facilities of the Bank of Canada? In that case, it would be only common sense to use one of the chartered banks.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Additional capital.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The third line of this section refers to additional working capital. I draw the attention of the minister to the explanatory note, which reads:

> It may also be desirable, where statutory authority exists, to incorporate similar companies to carry out other special projects. The present bill is intended to provide for the financing of such companies . . .

I think in our consideration of the bill so far we have been talking mainly of existing companies. Will the minister explain the financial arrangements which would be made on the inception of a new company? Section 4 implies that the company is already a going concern financially, because it speaks about additional working capital. Where would the first financial resources comes from?

Mr. HOWE: If the company is set up by an act of parliament the initial money could be obtained by an appropriation of $500,000 as a working advance, or it could be provided with capital from a vote of parliament. It must be one or the other, surely.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You made it clear to us that in many of these cases there would not be any occasion to come to parliament. There is already power given to the various departments for the purposes mentioned. If I understood you correctly, what you are saying is that the company would then proceed to avail itself of the financial powers under this bill, but surely the phrase "additional working capital" cannot be appropriate. The word "additional" implies that it is already a going concern.

Mr. HOWE: I am mistaken. The provision is not intended for the purpose of starting a new company. The appropriation would have to be provided from some source.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If it were one of the companies contemplated under the Research Council Act that would not be done by parliament; that would be done by an executive act.

Mr. HOWE: It would have to come from the national research council appropriation or from moneys at the disposal of the national research council. The national research council has money of its own from two sources, from gifts and earnings, which represent quite a substantial sum, and from annual appropriations of parliament. With the consent of the treasury board the money could be diverted from one source to another.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask the minister a question which he may have answered already. The question is this: will the money which is advanced by the Minister of Finance to these crown companies by way of a loan under section 4 be voted by parliament before it is advanced, or will it be advanced by the Minister of Finance and parliament be asked later to provide the money?

Mr. HOWE: This gives power to the Minister of Finance to advance up to $500,000 to a company without the consent of parliament. The expectation will be that the money will be repaid from the earnings of the company. But, if not, the minister responsible for the operation of the company must come to parliament, explain why an appropriation is necessary, and obtain the appropriation. If he is unable to obtain the appropriation the borrowing power of the company is ended.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I still query this word "additional". If I understand the situation the minister is tying himself there unnecessarily. I do not see why that word "additional" is there. It seems to me that he may want to use it for companies which are not going concerns at all.

Mr. HOWE: This bill is drawn to deal with existing companies which have capital. If it could be enlarged to deal with new companies the department would have no objection, but it was designed to deal with companies already in operation which have a capital, and I think it would be better to leave it that way.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is not according to the explanatory note The explanatory note states:

It may also be desirable . . . to incorporate similar companies to carry out other special projects.

If I read that correctly it means that it is not intended to apply only to going concerns. There is the research council and, as the hon. member for Vancouver South points out, there may be many others. I suggest earnestly that the minister look at that word "additional".

Mr. HOWE: The $500,000 was not supposed to be working capital. It was a temporary advance.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is called "working capital".

Mr. HOWE: It is called "additional working capital." No chartered bank would advance working capital to a firm that had none, I should think. It would expect the firm to have a certain amount and would advance them additional working capital from time to time as required for temporary purposes. That is the purpose of this particular section. It is not to provide capital to a company being established. We are assuming that the authority that established the company also provided it with capital.

Mr. GREEN: There is one question which I should like to ask under this section. Is it the intention that Canadian Arsenals Limited will make ammunition for sale to the public, for example for hunting or other uses of that kind?

Mr. HOWE: That has never been the purpose of the arsenals. Arsenals make ammunition and make weapons only for the armed services.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the minister said the other day that he expected that Canadian Arsenals Limited would operate at a profit. How is that profit to be made if there are to be no sales to the public?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that I said that it would operate at a profit. I said that I hoped it would pay its way. The purpose is to charge the defence departments for work placed at the arsenals, at current rates. In other words, instead of getting a blanket appropriation for the arsenals and doing work for the services free, the services are charged at commercial rates for the work which they place with the arsenals.

Mr. GREEN: And it is not intended to sell any of the products made by Canadian Arsenals Limited to any buyer except some other department of the dominion government?

Mr. HOWE: Well, that is hardly true. We were speaking of weapons. The hon. member spoke of guns and ammunition. It so happens that at the present time Canadian Arsenals Limited is making fertilizer, which is sold to the public; it is also making diacyanamid, which is also sold on the markets of the world; and it is making sulphuric acid, which is sold to private concerns. These are by-products of the operation, and they are being maintained because part of the plant must be kept as a stand-by resource for making picrite, which is an explosive material peculiar to war and not sold to the public.

Mr. GREEN: These articles then, are being sold in competition with private business?

Mr. HOWE: I presume so, yes.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said earlier this evening in answering my speech of last night that none of these crown companies was to be in competition with any private business in any way.

Mr. HOWE: Well, there are exceptions to anything. These are by-products of an operation; they are sold at a world price, and they may be competitive, but I do not think there is any crime in that. There is at the moment an acute shortage of all these articles. I doubt if my hon. friends could say that they are in competition.

Mr. GREEN: I just wanted to get the facts straight, and now we have them, that there is to be competition with private industry.

Mr. HOWE: Well, if you call it that.

Mr. FRASER: Are they sold direct to the consumer, or are they sold through an agency?

Mr. HOWE: I assume that in Canada they would be sold direct to the consumer, but 95 per cent of the sales are foreign sales and are made through agents.

Mr. FRASER: The minister says he "assumes" they are. He is not sure?

Mr. HOWE: Well, I am quite sure that if anyone applies to the arsenals for a carload of anything they will sell it to him.

Mr. FRASER: They will sell it direct?

Mr. BRACKEN: I have just one observation to make, and I am looking at the estimates. I think it is quite clear now what procedure is intended under this legislation. One item here is:

609. Administration, reconversion and operation of crown companies and/or crown plants.

Under that item the department asks for $20 million this year as contrasted with $4 million last year, an increase of $16 million. Then another item is:

611. To provide recoverable advances for working capital purposes and to authorize, subject to regulations to be approved by the governor in council on the recommendation of the treasury board, the re-advancing for working capital purposes of any amount received by way of repayment of advances for working capital purposes provided hereunder or from war and demobilization appropriations in previous years.

The amount there is an extra $10 million.

Mr. HOWE: At one stage of the war it was $600 million.

Mr. BRACKEN: That may be. One of the criticisms which we have been making is that this is a blanket measure for the operation of government companies, some of which are already formed, others of which may be formed. There has been no detail given in the discussions on this legislation as to the assistance to be provided for each of these companies. There is no detail given in the estimates before the committee. There are these two large blanket votes. It is quite clear to me that under each of these two votes the governor in council has power to make these advances to the different companies, and that the house may never see or have that information. What I was trying to get from the minister a while ago was whether in subsequent estimates we shall have an item for each of these companies. He intimated that there will be. I think he answered that question too quickly, and what we shall be asked to do is to vote a bulk sum under these two items of $26 million which then will be at the disposal of the governor in council through these crown companies or otherwise to disburse as they like under legislation which has previously been passed. Whether that is good or bad, I believe it is a fair statement of the legislation with the estimates which are before us.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will look at page 74 of the main estimates, from which he was reading, at the top of the page, he will notice that this is a special item on demobilization and reconversion. In other words, it is a transitional vote, and that is only part of the total vote, most of the estimates being voted specifically. But in that vote there are blanket items; and the purpose of this legislation, the purpose of the government, and the purpose particularly of reconstruction and supply is to liquidate war accounts so that we can get back on a specific basis. The object of this bill is to enable us to do precisely that, instead of depending on blanket votes, so that each vote of parliament may be for a specific purpose. That is why I gave the undertaking.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not want to protract the discussion. Do I gather that the minister does intend in future to have a specific vote for each of the companies—

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: —but that for this year there is only a bulk vote from which the governor in council may draw as in his judgment he deems necessary?

Mr. HOWE: This is a transitional period, and we are trying to get back to the condition which both the hon. gentleman and I desire.

Mr. BRACKEN: I hope the transitional period will not continue for too many years.

Mr. CASE: In connection with section 4, do I understand that the Minister of Finance can advance up to $500,000 to any one company in any one year? There is no number of companies stated, but there is provision for up to $500,000 in any one year. That is the limit.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why in this bill does the government seek to depart from the system carried on under the Canadian National Railways Act, whereby any profit from year to year is turned over to the consolidated revenue fund and, if the railway needs it, it is voted to the company by act of parliament. Why are any profits allowed to stay in the company, no matter how large they may become, instead of being turned over to the consolidated revenue fund as in the case of the railway? The growth of companies in this country, and in other countries as well, is the result of ploughed-in profits; and I see no reason why, if some of these government companies are successful by reason of charging high prices for patent rights and so forth, they should not become extraordinarily large and take an undue share of the business of the country. If the minister will give me his attention, would he also couple with his answer a statement as to why the government, in the case of the T.C.A., has a five per cent interest rate on capital advanced to that government-owned company, whereas in connection with these contemplated government-owned concerns, some already in operation, apparently no interest charge is being made?

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend referreing to the Canadian National Railways Act? What is his interpretation of the act?

Mr. JACKMAN: If there is any profit in the Canadian National railways, as fortunately there has been in the last few years—a surplus of $24,000,000 last year and an estimate this year of $7,000,000—it is not kept in the funds of the company to revolve around there and be used again this year and in subsequent years, but is repaid to the government.

Mr. HOWE: The only reference to the question I find in the act is that, whenever the accounts of the railway system, certified by the auditors appointed by parliament, show surplus earnings, after payment of all charges including interest on securities held by the public, the directors of the Canadian National Railway company may cause to be paid over to the minister for the consolidated revenue fund all or any part of any such surplus earnings.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps the "may" is permissive and not mandatory; I do not know whether in the case of crown companies "may" is taken to mean "shall."

Mr. HOWE: What does "any part" mean?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know; but certainly it has been the custom, and I suggest it is a very good custom, for them to do it. In the case of the Canadian National Railways it goes to pay off debt held by the government; nevertheless it is a surplus for the year and is returned to the government. My position is perhaps strengthened by the fact that when the Canadian National Railways require money for capital expansion they have to come to parliament for a vote for the various items, which are approved first of all in the railway committee and then presented to the house for approval before the railway can buy any more rolling stock or build bridges or make other expansions. That is a good principle; and the principle with regard to earnings being turned over to the government is also very important because, as I mentioned, the only way by which a company grows—the history of companies indicates this—is by the shareholders refraining from taking the last cent out of current earnings after taxation but, instead, leaving it in the concern and allowing it to accumulate. That is the way in which companies become large over a period of years; and while some of these crown companies may start on a small basis, if they are allowed to retain these earnings they may become a veritable octopus and do a very great proportion of the business in any particular field in the dominion.

Mr. HOWE: I pointed out the provision in the act which permits the Minister of Finance to take any money which he regards as surplus to the requirements of the company, and that is carried out in this case. Every two weeks the bank account of Park steamship company is moved into the consolidated revenue fund, and that is the case with several crown companies that have earnings. Any money not required for the operation of the company is drawn into the consolidated revenue fund on the demand of the Minister of Finance.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the question of paying profits into the consolidated revenue fund would more properly be discussed under section 6.

Mr. JACKMAN: The point I am making has to do with a revolving bank account and it may be discussed under section 3, 4 or 6. It does not make very much difference where the minister discusses it, but I should like to get an answer. The minister has not indicated why in this bill there is not inserted a principle similar to the one in the Canadian National Railways Act where it is permissive, if not mandatory—and I question whether that permissive provision does not mean it is mandatory as applied to a crown company. He has not answered why it would not be a good idea for these companies, if they do make a profit from year to year, to pay it into the consolidated revenue fund, which provides the capital whereby the profit is made, and then, if the company requires money to grow, it can be revoted by this house. There is the same principle, almost, in relation to private business and cooperatives. Where you have untaxed profits they quickly mount up, and that enables you to expand in a way in which private business cannot expand and therefore is unable to compete. I see the same principle here, if one carries it far enough. One does not know how far these government-owned companies may go, how large they may become, and we must be careful that parliament keeps close control over the direction in which the business tends. The minister should explain to the committee why he does not want that principle adopted in this bill.

There was a second question I asked with reference to the five per cent charged on capital in connection with the T.C.A. Why should that principle not be incorporated in connection with other government companies?

Mr. HOWE: This bill was drawn primarily to apply to existing companies; that is, companies which have capital sufficient for their purposes. The provisions suggested by my hon. friend might be appropriate for one company and not for another, for example, a trading company. It would be difficult for it to put up an actual budget requirement. This is an act of general application, and I think no grave abuse can accrue under the terms thereof.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will these companies that the minister has in mind setting up under this bill be set up in somewhat the same manner as the Dominion Magnesium company, which operates at Haley's Corners, was set up?

Mr. HOWE: The Dominion Magnesium company was never a crown company.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may say to the minister that this country voted, right here in this house, millions and millions of dollars for that company and others, and now we are told that they are not crown companies. Later on, where shall I be able to get full proof as to the Dominion Magnesium company's set-up and operations? I remember the glowing accounts that the minister gave in this house of what a great thing the Dominion Magnesium company would be for this country, and how it would make lots of money not only during but after the war, and we now see what a mess it has got into.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Munitions and Supply by direct expenditure built a plant at Haley's Corners for the manufacture of magnesium. It made a contract with a group of men with specialized experience to operate the plant for the government without fee. It was a very simple operation, but there was no crown company. It was simply a directly owned government plant operated by arrangement with a group of men with specialized knowledge, of whom Doctor Pidgeon was one.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Company an agent of His Majesty.

Mr. FRASER: Does this section mean that any company can make a contract without reference to parliament? I should like an explanation of subsection 2.

Mr. HOWE: It can operate in its own name. For instance, it can buy raw materials and sell its own product, dealing in its own name. There is only one type of transaction that it cannot do under the general regulations. No property can be bought for the crown or sold for the crown except by authority of the governor in council.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Employment and remuneration of officers and servants.

Mr. GREEN: This section has to do with employment and remuneration of officers and servants. It goes very far. It provides that:

(1) Every company may, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act or any other statute or law, employ such officers or servants as it deems necessary to conduct its operations and may determine their conditions of employment and their remuneration which shall be paid by the company.

(2) Every company has the control and supervision of the officers and servants employed by the company.

As I read this section, it means that in the case of each of these crown companies the employment is entirely in the hands of the officers of the particular company. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the directors and the officers of the company, subject to such conditions as the minister may impose. At the present time any employee of any crown company who is paid more than $4,000 a year is approved by myself in writing. That is done simply to keep the pattern of salaries in crown companies in order. Aside from that, the directors of the company have a free hand in employing.

Mr. GREEN: Is there a separate pattern of salaries for crown companies as distinguished from the regular civil service?

Mr. HOWE: It is the same pattern, depending on the industry. For example, the salaries of Polymer, which is akin to the oil industry, are akin to the salaries of the oil industry, and the salaries in Eldorado, which is a mining company, are akin to the salaries in the mining industry.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has said that in the case of the payment of a salary of $4,000 or over he has to write a letter authorizing that payment. Why is there not some provision to that effect put into this section instead of giving the officers of each company carte blanche to pay whatever they wish?

Mr. HOWE: Another minister may wish to examine salaries of $3,000 and over, and another minister may wish to examine all salaries. A minister may impose any regulation he likes.

Mr. GREEN: How does the minister square this policy with the policy that has been in effect by the dominion for many years of engaging people under the Civil Service Act, and on the merit basis? This seems to be a complete departure from that principle, a departure not only in respect of executive officers, but right down the line to the lowest paid employee. He or she may be hired by the officers of the company and be paid whatever salary they see fit, quite regardless of what the ordinary civil servant doing the same work may be paid. What is the justification for going that far?

Mr. HOWE: The civil service was not designed for handling business transactions. The civil service was designed for the ordinary work of government.

Mr. GREEN: It handles some pretty big business.

Mr. HOWE: In the work of departments. For example, does my hon. friend expect the civil service commission to choose the officers of a commercial concern? What would be their standard? What rules would they apply; the same rules that they apply in the government departments?

Mr. GREEN: It seems to me that some system could be devised whereby the Civil Service Act could be amended in some way to meet that situation. There is no doubt that it is a new situation; but surely there should be something devised to meet it instead of ignoring the whole question and giving each of these companies the power to set its own rules and to hire its own employees. This section may affect hundreds of employees. It is not as though there were only a handful to be covered by it. There are bound to be several thousand employees of crown companies. The minister has said that during the course of the debate. Surely we cannot just ignore the unfairness of having two types of civil servants, one type subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and then the officers and employees of these crown companies working on an entirely different basis.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend must be aware that we have had that situation for many years. I have before me the National Harbours Board Act.

> The board may employ such professional, technical and other officers, clerks and employees as it may deem necessary for the proper conduct of its business and fix their remuneration.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, there have been exceptions.

Mr. HOWE: This is not an exception. When the government is in business it does not do that business under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GREEN: There have been exceptions, but this is a different matter.

Mr. HOWE: Tell me one instance of the government being in business under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GREEN: Other departments than reconstruction are in business, and in big business too. This is not the only department of the government that is in business.

Mr. HOWE: Name one.

[Mr. Green.]

An hon. MEMBER: How about the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that when earlier this evening the minister said he brought in this provision so that he would be able to hire the best people. That was a serious reflection on the civil service, and I think it shows a wrong attitude. I believe that some different method should be worked out for employing at least a portion of those who will work for these companies.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is trying very hard to involve me with the civil service, but as a matter of fact I take civil servants wherever I can get them. There is provision for civil servants to be employed in these companies and their rights under the Civil Service Act are protected. But my hon. friend would not suggest that we could draw from the civil service people with expert knowledge of mining who could go to Great Bear lake and operate a mine. We borrow geologists from the Department of Mines and Resources whenever we can, and they are turned over to Polymer for certain operations. But the ordinary rock miner who works underground is not a man you can hire through the civil service commission. It is the same with specialists at Polymer. Men require years of experience in similar operations.

Mr. GREEN: But there are specialists in all the branches of government.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt if there are any specialists in the manufacture of synthetic rubber. If there are I should like to borrow them.

Mr. GREEN: But there are many scientists in other branches of the government who are just as capable as the scientists who may be employed in these crown companies. They have been engaged under the Civil Service Act and are bound by the terms of that act.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so; and we borrow them whenever we can.

Mr. GREEN: There may be some professional men who should be hired in the way contemplated by this section, but there are thousands of others who could be employed under the Civil Service Act as easily as those already under that act.

Mr. HACKETT: In the employment of personnel by these companies is any preference given to returned men? I refer to that aspect of employment which is so deeply imbedded in the civil service commission. In engaging men for these companies, is a preference given to people who have seen service?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: How is it exercised, and what type of preference is it?

Mr. HOWE: It is a complete preference, the same preference that is in force with regard to the civil service. If a returned man is qualified he is given the position, even though someone is available who is not a returned man but who is much more highly skilled. It is exactly the same.

Mr. HACKETT: What methods are employed to make known the requirements of a crown company? If an engineer is needed is the position advertised, or does the company have to rely upon the casual acquaintances of the minister or the directors of the company to find candidates for the opening?

Mr. HOWE: The government operates its own bureau of technical personnel and these positions are filled through that bureau, just as manual position are filled through the national employment service.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to add a word to echo the uneasiness expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think we can quite understand the minister's statement that highly technical operations such as Polymer and Eldorado have required people with special techniques and they have had to deal with them in a special way. I am not suggesting that the problem is easy, but it seems to me this is a light-hearted and easy-going way of trying to solve a problem which I think is much more difficult than the minister has admitted. Let me read this section again. It is too nice, too easy and too simple, and may, in years to come, land us in difficulties which none of us will want to face. After all, we are talking about what may turn out to be a far-reaching plan. The section provides:

> Every company may, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act or any other statute or law, employ such officers or servants as it deems necessary to conduct its operations and may determine their conditions of employment and their remuneration which shall be paid by the company.

No one is trying to make cheap capital out of anything the minister said earlier about civil servants. I have no doubt he has a higher regard for civil servants than any of us, because he has had a great deal to do with them. Nevertheless it seems to me that here we are stepping carelessly, as I see it, into a situation which may prove to be fraught with many difficulties. First of all there will be great difficulties as between the companies themselves; and just to step in like this, without a pattern of any kind, without any regulation and without even an attempt to set up any plan but to leave it entirely to the discretion of each company, seems to me to be going very far. After all, each company will wish to go ahead and do the best possible for itself. It will be quite irresponsible, as far as the directors are concerned. It will have a desire only to improve its own operation. It will not care two straws about the civil service. In the meantime it must be remembered that there will be thousands of people in the civil service who will know what is going on and will be critical of it. If they are wise people they will admit that in cases such as Polymer and Eldorado there are special conditions which require special treatment, but I would earnestly suggest to the minister that this light-hearted and omnibus way of dealing with this matter is hardly the way to deal with such a serious problem.

Mr. HOWE: Surely my hon. friend will not say there are not already precedents. The largest crown company the government owns is the Canadian National Railways. The remuneration of its employees is fixed by the board of directors and the management. The national harbours board is another; the national research council is another; the Canadian Broadcasting corporation is another; the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation, which parliament authorized last year, is another. I wish my hon. friend would tell me of one business corporation set up by the government that follows any other plan. He suggests that we are starting something new. I am simply following the practice that has been authorized by this parliament for many years in dealing with business enterprises.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not terribly impressed with that answer. As far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, we all know that salaries and wages are settled by long precedent, international agreements and so on, so that does not seem to me an answer at all.

Mr. HOWE: So they are in crown companies. Each of these companies is unionized.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have already pointed out that as far as Eldorado and Polymer and one or two others are concerned these are special cases involving special circumstances, but I am talking about something which may develop into scores of companies, as the minister earlier admitted. To take a few special cases and say that because they have been recognized as special cases the same procedure is to be applied in scores of others does not seem to me quite reasonable. Furthermore, I am not impressed with this argument that we have been doing this for three or four years. Those were war years, when people were prepared to put up with all kinds of special conditions and keep their mouths shut. We are now stepping into years which I suggest are quite different. Again I repeat the suggestion that to leave this wide open in a careless manner is dealing in a trivial or in at least a careless way with what I think is a serious question.

Mr. MacINNIS: The point to which I shall address myself has perhaps been already covered, because of relations established in crown companies. No doubt, in these crown companies there will be employees who will come under certain trades and occupations the members of which are formed into trade unions. Will the government's policy which was established in 1943 in connection with crown companies entering into trade union agreements be continued?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. All the employees of these crown companies are union men who have contracts with the companies.

Mr. HACKETT: What provision, if any, has been made for pensions of employees and servants of the companies?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 9 covers that point.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I note that in one of the returns brought down yesterday it was pointed out that the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation is receiving a salary of $18,000. Has that been fixed by order in council, or will this measure now legalize the setting of salaries on that scale? Is this section designed to give crown companies the privilege of paying salaries in the higher categories, or salaries that are out of line with those paid in the regular civil service?

Mr. HOWE: This bill does not apply in any way to the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister mentioned it a minute ago.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but I mentioned it as a business concern which was not under the supervision of the Civil Service Act. It is not under this bill, either.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister said a minute ago that written authority is required from himself for the payment of salaries of $4,000 or over. It seems to me there will be many employees in these crown companies who will not be highly trained. They would stand almost in a parallel situation with clerks and various other employees operating in the civil service under the Civil Service Act. In my view, if in crown companies there are groups that correspond with groups of employees operating under the Civil Service Act, they should be governed by the same act and the same regulations.

Then, the minister requires that the management of a company shall receive from him written authority before they shall pay salaries in excess of $4,000. I fully appreciate the advisability of keeping some limit on salaries these crown companies can pay. Otherwise, they could be paying what is virtually government money in an exorbitant fashion, without detriment to themselves, but with detriment only to the people who pay the money.

I believe that in this measure there should be much more specific limitations respecting the power to employ and to pay employees in various grades, whether they be specialists, tradesmen, clerks or stenographers. While the minister says he has made a regulation under which his signature is required, I would point out that there is actually nothing in the law requiring that his regulations be obeyed, or to assure the people of Canada that there is equity in the arrangement.

Under what authority does the minister make those regulations, and how is such authority exercised? Will he also explain why people holding corresponding positions in the civil service, those who are not specialists or experts in any particular line, are not put in entirely the same category, and why they do not operate under the Civil Service Act which applies to civil servants?

Mr. HOWE: The minister exercises the potent authority of the shareholders of the company. He can get rid of the management, if that management bungles the operation—and, I might say, he sometimes does. Also, the company is an agent of the crown, and the minister representing the crown in a particular case has the right to act.

It is all very well for my hon. friend to speculate how things could be done; but may I point out that these are business concerns. They have bargains with their employees. Usually they are unionized. I would say that 90 per cent of the employees of these companies are members of unions which have contracts with the companies. I do not know how my hon. friend can suggest any particular rule that would apply, other than the usual bargaining arrangement between employers and employees found in all business firms.

Mr. JACKMAN: It seems to me almost incredible that the minister should say to the committee that, even leaving aside his own department, the government is not in big business. Any organization which employs tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of employees, must of necessity be in what is called big business.

The only difference I can see between some forms of government business—and we will exclude the Canadian National Railways, for special reasons—and private business is that private business is in active competition with its fellows; and most of that competition has to do with selling.

I have not heard from the minister that these government companies are to be in active competition with private industry, although he did mention one exception when my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South brought up the point to-night. But, as I say, the only difference I can see is that they actively compete with someone in regard to selling. I do not see why the men and officers who staff these government-owned companies cannot come under the civil service. I believe the minister has a completely wrong conception about why the civil service was ever started. It certainly was not, as one must infer from his remarks, an organization started up for the sole purpose of creating a system which was not efficient.

Mr. HOWE: Do not put words into my mouth.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is the only inference which can be drawn.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is fond of doing that. I did not say the civil service was not efficient.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is the only inference which can be drawn.

Mr. HOWE: Never mind inference.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is the inference I draw from your remarks. If you wish to correct it you may do so at another time. But do not interrupt when I am speaking.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind hon. members that when they are speaking they should address the chair.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, Mr. Chairman. What I am saying is that the only inference I can draw, with my limited background, is that the minister does not believe that the Civil Service Act is an efficient form of organization, or that efficiency in a government department can be developed under it. Otherwise, why in connection with these companies which he intends to set up, or which are set up and are to be extended, does he not use the civil service form of administration.

Surely the Civil Service Act when it was brought down, was a forward step in governmental administration, because it got rid of the curse of patronage which every government knows is sometimes a greater nuisance than it is worth. With a setup of this kind, in taking this retrogressive step, in connection with a series of companies the minister and those around him may appoint any number of people to jobs commanding high salaries. Under such circumstances you can only have a system of patronage which is undoubtedly bad and which flies in the face of the whole reasoning behind the Civil Service Act. This building up of a super civil service, for that is what it means, will lead to a lack of harmony—I will not say a lack of best effort—and will cause discouragement to many who have served for a long time in the civil service.

For example, take the announcement in the press to-day that the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation is to receive a salary of $18,000. The deputy minister of finance and other deputy ministers are doing not only an equal job but, in many cases, a much superior job; they require a background at least equal to the other gentleman, and in other cases they have had many more years of experience, but they are getting only approximately half that amount. How do you expect to get loyalty and the best endeavour from your senior men when you introduce new men and start them off at much higher salaries?

Another example is the unknown salary of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I presume that that salary is three times what the deputy minister of finance is getting from this government which states it is willing to pay equal wages for equal work. There is no excuse for paying these limited salaries in comparison with those being paid to the super civil servants you are setting up under these corporations.

I believe the minister misconceives the purpose of the Civil Service Act and by implication is condemning it as an efficient instrument to carry on the business of government. This committee would be well advised to consider putting the administration of these new companies under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think I should say something on the point just raised by the hon. member for Rosedale. Since coming to this house I have taken a special interest in civil service matters and have been on many of the special committees set up to consider the civil service. If I felt that the staffs of crown companies of this kind could be as efficiently recruited under the civil service as they can be by the means to be used I would certainly press to have the civil service do the job, I believe the civil service is the best method of staffing our governmental institutions, but I feel the hon. member for Rosedale would not ask that the staff of the Canadian National Railways, from the men who tamp the ties to the engineers who drive the locomotives and the clerical staff that administers the office, be recruited under the civil service.

Mr. JACKMAN: I excepted them.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend says that he excepted them, but are not these corporations to some extent on all fours with the Canadian National Railways? It seems to me that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who is piloting this bill, must accept the advice of my hon. friends to my right with a certain amount of suspicion. They are opposed to what he is doing, and anything they offer in regard to the measure would be something to make it less effective than it otherwise would be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course that is right. Any man with any logic would immediately come to that conclusion, and I try to approach matters in a logical way. If my hon. friends want to improve this measure and to make the crown companies set up under it a success they will have to stop opposing it and bring forward ideas and suggestions to make it better and not ideas and suggestions to hamper the operations.

Mr. SKEY: I am sure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply appreciates the help he has had from the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I find it difficult to rationalize the ideas or tenets or theories of the hon. member as previously put forward in this house with the suggestion now made that there is an unequal basis for civil servants in the country.

However, I am concerned with another aspect of this bill. Yesterday afternoon I asked the minister about the security provisions that were being set up, and I am particularly concerned about the company set up with respect to atomic energy. Section 8 provides that, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act or any other statute or law, the officers or servants—a few moments ago the minister said that would mean the directors—are empowered to employ such officers or servants are deemed necessary to conduct the operations of the company.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

May I remind the committee and the minister that at this time we are dealing with Canadian Arsenals Limited and Eldorado. If the power to employ such officers or servants as are deemed necessary is given to the directors, it is thereby taken away from this house, from the civil service commission, from the R.C.M.P. or from any other agency which might check on the security of those particular people. I should like to ask the minister whether the security provisions provided by this particular clause are sufficient to guarantee to the country, to the people who may deal with atomic energy and to the government that the employees who are employed can be completely trusted and will be those in whom they can have full confidence. When I asked this question yesterday the minister said that for years the R.C.M.P. had been checking such employees as were employed in the national research council and other services of the government.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

MONOPOLISTIC TRADE RESTRICTIONS—COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): moved for leave to introduce bill No. 193, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: This bill arises from the report "Canada and International Cartels" which was tabled during the course of the last session and which was prepared by the special committee under the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act. Hon. members will recall that the report illustrated the undesirable effects on the Canadian economy of the operations of private international trade combinations known as cartels, and generally the obstacle to full employment in either the international or the domestic sphere, which might result from undue restraints of trade. It recommended consideration by the government of certain lines of approach with reference to the forthcoming international discussions respecting international trade. It also recommended that steps be taken both legislatively and administratively to make the Combines Investigation Act more effective in preventing and removing undesirable domestic restraints of trade and in obtaining and making available for the determining of government policy information respecting the effects of international cartels on the Canadian economy.

The principal steps to implement the report require no legislation but merely larger staff and appropriations for the commission, and that will be dealt with when the estimates of the department are being considered by the house. Legislation is necessary, however, to remove certain anomalies from the present act and to provide the necessary tools for the revived activities of the commission.

The bill proposes no changes in the definitions of offences or in the basic scheme of the act. It provides for greater flexibility in the administration of the act and removes or modifies some of the restrictions on the operations of the act which were added in 1935 and 1937 when the dominion trade and industry commission was set up, and it proposes to restore to the commission some of the activities that were entrusted to the dominion trade and industry commission, under the original set-up of that body which was to control the Combines Investigation Act administration. That was removed in 1937 and the amendments proposed in this bill are with respect to procedure and not with respect to the substance of the offences aimed at by the legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RADIO BROADCASTING—CFRB, TORONTO

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all minutes or memoranda of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation since the 1st of July, 1945, touching on or in connection with the cancellation of the wavelength or frequency presently occupied by CFRB Toronto, and/or the taking over of the said wavelength or frequency by the corporation.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Speaker, the special committee on radio broadcasting is now sitting, and at its meeting yesterday this question, or a similar one, was brought up. In view of that I suggest that this motion might be dropped, since the matter is already under review. I am sorry that the hon. member for Lake Centre was not at the meeting yesterday, or he might have brought up the question there himself.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I was at the meeting yesterday, but not at the time in question. I do not believe this motion should be dropped, because yesterday the Canadian Broadcasting corporation refused to produce the minutes; therefore I have no other course than to ask that this order be proceeded with.

Mr. McCANN: If the hon. member insists on having his motion put, I shall have to oppose it on the ground that memoranda between different officials of the corporation are privileged documents and should not be produced.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely this is not a private corporation.

Mr. CHURCH: It is the most mischievous corporation that ever saw the light of day in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: As hon. members know, these motions are not debatable. If I have not unanimous consent I shall have to put the question to the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—DISRUPTION OF TRAFFIC ON INLAND WATERWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. Perhaps I might explain that I gave notice of this question, and he advised me before leaving the house that in his absence it would be answered either by the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Labour, or perhaps both. The question has to do with the present disruption of traffic on some of the inland waterways of Canada.

I am receiving many manifestations of concern, from people who have no direct connection with either side of the dispute, with respect to the interruption of this traffic and certain untoward events in connection therewith. My question is: Will the Acting Prime Minister state, for the information of the house and of the public, what steps the government is taking to bring this issue to a satisfactory end, in order that civil strife may cease and the food products of Canada be dispatched overseas with as little delay as possible?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am meeting the operators this afternoon. I do not know what the results of the deliberations will be, but I live in hopes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister get an assurance from the operators that there will be no recurrence of what happened in Cornwall the other day?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to get an assurance from both sides.

Mr. COLDWELL: The other fellows started it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope there will be no recurrence of the incident, because I do not think it is necessary in industrial disputes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not, either.

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY—PRISONER OF WAR LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Will the Minister of Labour say what portion of the 850 additional prisoners of war required to plant, till and harvest the increased sugar beet crop in southwestern Ontario, advocated by the government, has been made available to the farmers in that area?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thought I made a statement on that question a few days ago. The employment of men changes from hour to hour. However, I hope to have the answer completed to-morrow, and to give it to the member to-morrow afternoon.

COAL

OPERATION OF FISH CREEK MINE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, of which I have not yet given notice. My question has to do with the coal situation in Alberta. Has the minister taken steps to open the Fish Creek coal mine, southwest of Calgary, Alberta?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall accept what the hon. member has said as notice of question, and give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the government is not working the mine, will the minister at the same time give the reason why?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to do that.

MEAT

REMOVAL OF PRICE CEILINGS FROM RED AND BLUE BRAND BEEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if it is true that the recent order removing the price ceiling from red and blue brand beef applies only to government-inspected beef shipped from abattoirs?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I believe I am Acting Minister of Finance, but I am not in a position to answer the hon. member's question to-day. I shall be glad to take it as notice of question, make inquiries from the wartime prices and trade board, and give the answer to-morrow.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. ROWE: If it is true that the order applies only to government-inspected beef, will the government take into consideration making the same provision in respect of prime carcasses of beef produced from other sources?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will see that the hon. member's question is brought to the attention of the responsible officers.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

OPERATIONS AND FINANCING—SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION PROVISIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 4, consideration in committee of bill No. 155, respecting the operation of government companies—Mr. Howe—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 8—Employment and remuneration of officers and servants.

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last night we were discussing security checks in respect of employees of crown corporations. I had referred to a reply given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to a similar question I had put to him when we were discussing the atomic energy bill. At page 2123 the minister's reply is reported in this way:

> For several years every man or woman who has been employed by the National Research Council has been screened by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In the interval since last night I have checked the records of the employees of the public service and others who are now accused of espionage and are undergoing trial. I find nearly all of them were employed after the beginning of the war. It seems to me that since two of them were employed by crown companies, this is a point which the house ought not to overlook; the government must have some control over appointments made by directors of crown companies and should check their security categories. I think that contention is also supported by what occurs in other realms of government employment. An item appeared in the press to-day with reference to the remarks made in a committee by that able and tireless civil servant, Mr. Hume Wrong. When asked whether the Department of External Affairs had any check on the security or political affiliations of its employees, Mr. Wrong stated he thought it would be unfair to investigate the political affiliations of any applicant. That had to do with the civil service, this has to do with people who will be engaged to work for crown companies.

I would not want to be misunderstood on this issue, because I have in mind the unfortunate circumstances that have developed since last February when this whole business of espionage broke upon the Canadian people. Just to keep the record straight I should like to quote two items from the first interim report of the royal commission. In the first interim report issued on March 2, 1946, the justices report:

> The evidence establishes that a network of under-cover agents has been organized and developed for the purpose of obtaining secret and confidential information particularly from employees of departments and agencies of the dominion government.

I should like to quote from the second interim report, issued on March 14, as follows:

> In a case of this nature where the evidence has revealed the existence of an organization constituting at least a threat to the safety and interests of the state, as evidenced by the fact that some witnesses holding strategic positions have made the significant statement under oath that they had a loyalty which took priority over the loyalty owed by them to their own country, and for that reason they acted as they did, and would unquestionably have continued so to act had they not been detected.

In to-day's paper there is an editorial dealing with a speech made by the national leader of the Labour Progressive party. In that speech the leader of that party tore away the veil which previously covered the motives of the party when he said:

> We want 10,000 new members this year. We want a mass marxist party—a party of communists.

That is what was said in Toronto at a meeting held on June 2. The fact is that both in government departments and in crown companies there have been people employed who have professed a greater loyalty to another ideology than toward their own country. The minister has said that they have been checking on the affiliations and beliefs of these people for several years, but that answer is inadequate, because nearly all these people who have been reported as having engaged in espionage work were employed by the government since the beginning of the war. We are dealing with Eldorado and Dominion Arsenals; in both these companies employees will have access to official information and secret processes which might be turned against this country, against the empire, or against the United States. Therefore there should be a greater check on all empolyees of crown companies.

Mr. HOWE: To reply first to the question as to what precautions were taken, all direct employees of the department of Munitions and Supply and all direct employees of the national research council were finger-printed and their records explored by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Reports were rendered to the department in all doubtful cases, and certain men left the employ of the department on that account. So far as employees of crown companies are concerned, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were in charge of that work. The record of each employee was checked if he had access to any information of importance. However, with all the precautions that can be taken, I know of no way in which the government can assure itself that a man who enters the service of a department with a stainless reputation cannot be seduced by communism or some other allegiance. When a man is hired, there is no way in which we can predict with certainty what his course will be in the years to follow.

Mr. BOUCHER: Under section 8 of the bill wide powers are being given to the company and its officials in the employment of servants, agents and officers. With an ordinary company that would only be proper. Last night I suggested to the minister that he should consider putting under the Civil Service Act all employees who render services similar to those rendered by civil servants. I would except expert and specially skilled personnel, scientists, et cetera, so far as salaries and wages are concerned. Antogonism will be created among our regularly employed civil servants if government employees in crown companies are employed under different conditions or circumstances. There will be a large number of employees in these crown companies with qualifications and abilities similar to those in the regular civil service, and there should be no great differentiation between the treatment given to these people and that given to the members of the government service who are appointed through the civil service commission.

This point is particularly emphasized by the powers that are given to the governor in council to advance moneys to crown corporations for operating expenses and capital investments, to the tune of one-half million dollars as a maximum at any one time, and an additional total of one-half million dollars in any one fiscal year—and I believe that can be done in every fiscal year—for the extension and improvement of plant, the purchase of capital stock, et cetera. A thorough study of the bill will disclose that the governor in council can take out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund any amounts within those limitations that they see fit to take without submitting them to parliament, the minister has stated that they will be submitted to parliament, but I think a perusal of this bill will show that it is an appropriation act.

The CHAIRMAN: The subject being discussed by the hon. member is covered by sections 4 and 5, which have been passed by the committee. The hon. member should make his remarks at this time relevant to section 8, employment and remuneration of officers and servants.

Mr. BOUCHER: I would draw your attention to the fact that section 8 provides that the remuneration of these employees shall be paid by the company. The money that a company would have would be obtained partly from earnings and partly from money that the government may have advanced. If this bill is passed in its present form the directors of these companies will be able, without reference to parliament, to expend what is really government money and to hire whom they see fit and pay them what salaries or wage scales they see fit. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I am in order in discussing the way in which this money is to be used under the broad powers which the directors and officers are being given to pay any remuneration they see fit and determine the conditions of employment of their employees.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should relate his remarks to the section dealing with remuneration.

Mr. BOUCHER: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I do not see how I can relate my remarks to remuneration unless I also relate them to where the money is to come from and how that money is secured.

The CHAIRMAN: How the money is secured has been settled by sections 4 and 5. Section 8 has to do only with the spending of the money.

Mr. GRAYDON: Money does not grow on trees.

Mr. BOUCHER: If this money were not coming out of the public treasury but were being paid by some private enterprise, it would be no concern of mine. But I am objecting to the wide powers of expenditure of public money which these directors have. That is the whole basis of my argument. The directors and officers of the companies can hire anybody, from low-paid clerks and stenographers to highly-paid scientists, engineers, experts and managers, and can fix the rates of compensation without reference to parliament and without any regard to the scale of salaries paid to similar employees in the civil service, whose salaries and conditions of employment are determined by the Civil Service Act and regulations. Here we have the public treasury contributing a substantial portion of the working capital of these companies, and the directors being given almost unlimited powers to hire their employees at whatever salaries they see fit, without parliament having any say in the matter. This is definitely blank cheque legislation and uncontrolled expenditure. It is therefore all the more important that the employees of the crown companies should have their terms of employment and compensation governed by the Civil Service Act.

I am not so sure that the minister himself has appreciated what is involved, because in answer to a question of mine he stated yesterday, at page 2182 of Hansard:

> They can be appropriated only by vote of parliament. My hon. friend is right. They must be appropriated by vote of parliament or otherwise refunded.

With that I agree, if we look upon the passing of this bill as a voting by parliament. But I submit that if we pass the bill in its present form the directors and officers have the right to hire anybody they like and pay them what salaries they like, and get the money required by order in council or upon recommendation of the minister from unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. All that is to be done without the sanction of parliament, other than what is given in the bill itself. Therefore if we pass this section and other sections in their present form parliament will be divesting itself of any authority or power over the hiring of the employees of these companies and the terms and conditions of their employment, even though they are all being paid substantially at the public expense. Parliament should not divest itself of the power of scrutinizing appropriations and of passing estimates for this purpose; we should retain control from year to year of the expenditure of public moneys by the directors or management of these crown companies. If we pass the bill in its present form we are breaking all custom in that we shall be, first of all, establishing a separate set of government employees who will not be working under the same terms and conditions as those in the regular civil service who have proven themselves loyal, efficient and competent; and secondly we are allowing the directors of these crown companies—perhaps scientists, engineers, businessmen—to expend moneys out of consolidated revenue without parliament having the right to scrutinize the expenditures before they are made. The minister was technically right when he said last night that appropriations made to these crown companies appear in the estimates; nevertheless they appear as statutory enactments.

Mr. HOWE: I see my hon. friend does not undestand these things. They will not appear as statutory votes.

Mr. BOUCHER: Perhaps I do not understand it, and anyone who read the answers the minister gave to several questions last night will see that he does not understand it either, because his answers are in direct conflict with each other. I shall be glad to read them now if he so desires. His answers to questions on sections 4 and 5 show gross inconsistency. I felt when I was raising the point last night that possibly I was not as sure of my ground as I should be, but I found great consolation when I saw from the minister's answers that he was just as uncertain as I was. Will the minister stand up and say now that the appropriations for these government companies will be passed as ordinary estimates are passed before the expenditures are made? Parliament has no check on expenditures if it is allowed to review them only after they are made. That is not business. That is not the way government should be carried on. Parliament should have the right to scrutinize particulars of the proposed expenditures and have a full discussion just as we do on the ordinary estimates. I would therefore like the minister to give a full explanation, and in a different way from his explanation of last night, of just what the situation is.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure the situation is clear to everyone except my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOWE: I hardly think that anyone who reads the sections can be in doubt as to their meaning. There is nothing new in this. I jotted down others acts which have the same provisions: the National Housing Act, the Central Mortgage Act, the Bretton Woods Agreement Act, which were all agreed to by the opposition without question. I mention these because they are very recent, and I have no doubt that if you go back over the records you will find any number of similar instances of expenditures made in this way from unappropriated moneys.

Mr. HACKETT: Are they not all specific cases and of very recent origin?

Mr. HOWE: The ones I have mentioned are recent. That is why I mentioned them. I mentioned them because my hon. friends voted for them and I thought the matter would be fresh in their minds. The practice of government companies employing people outside the Civil Service Act is not new. It was done in the dim and distant past, when my hon. friends were in power. It was done in the case of the Canadian National railways. Every employee of the Canadian National railways is employed by the management, and his salary is paid by the management. My hon. friends voted for it. Hon. gentlemen are trying to suggest that we are breaking new ground. This is not so in any particular. We are following established practice in connection with government-owned companies. There is no government company that employs its men through the civil service commission, nor has there been one over the years. As a matter of fact, in the employment of tradesmen, for instance, the practice in government companies is exactly the same as that followed by the civil service commission. Tradesmen employed by the government through the civil service commission receive prevailing rates; the prevailing rate in the district is established by the Minister of Labour, and the employees are paid that rate. The practice is exactly the same as in crown companies. There is the additional protection, however, that almost all the employees of crown companies are organized and have contracts with one of the international unions, and they have the right to bargain between management and labour.

I cannot think of any reason why we should argue the matter at greater length. I repeat, we have followed the established practice, and it seems to me that every safeguard is provided in the crown companies referred to. The same provision is made in this act as in those establishing other crown companies, and I would point out that the employees in crown companies outnumber all civil servants by at least two to one and perhaps three to one. I think that explanation should be sufficient.

Mr. CHURCH: Involved in section 8 is an important principle to which I would direct the attention of the minister. We had an experience with two other corporations in connection with the questions of employment control and wages, and there we saw the House of Commons divesting itself of control over these two corporations. The minister is himself an able engineer. I can remember when he was a younger man practising his profession, and he is fully aware of conditions governing the employment of men in his profession. As far as possible I would like to see him give a preference to the graduates of our Canadian universities when it comes to employing technical men under this bill. This is the golden month of commencement in the universities of Canada, and there is no part of science that is more the child of science, the bright-eyed creature of science, than the engineering profession.

As the minister knows, between the two great wars we lost thousands of our young graduates to the United States—graduates in medicine, physics, chemistry and in other branches of science, who went south and contributed to the development of that country. After the first great war, 1,250,000 Canadians went to the United States, as was indicated in a survey that was tabled in this house. Many of those men fought for this country at the risk of their lives. I hope therefore the minister will see to it that as far as possible graduates from our Canadian universities are given the preference in employment with crown companies.

I know it will be said that this corporation will make its annual report to the directors and that the facts will be submitted to parliament. Well, we had great hopes in that regard from the Canadian National, and we were also promised great things in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I remember the stand which my former leader took, quite properly, in regard to that corporation. He insisted that they should report to the house. But what do we find to-day? If you want to find anything about employment or control or salaries, for instance, they will tell you nothing.

The Chippewa canal, developing 550,000 horsepower, was built by graduates of Canadian universities. Sir Adam Beck insisted that the engineers engaged in that great undertaking should be Canadians, from Canadian universities. Canadians were employed and they built that magnificent system. As I said before, the minister was engaged in his profession as a young man at the time I was chairman of the harbour board, and he knows the record of Canadian graduates in discoveries in the northwest territories and the development of mining and other engineering projects in Canada. Only the other day I was making inquiries as to where the graduates in engineering of the university of Toronto and other universities will go to make a living, and I was told about what they had done in the great mining development in new Ontario—gold, silver, zinc, platinum, copper, lead, in fact, thirty-six minerals. Survey parties from Toronto, McGill, Queen's and other universities across Canada went out as students, and later as engineers, exploring these fields, and at times they had with them high school students. These people did not ask for any easy job in the summer time; they did not work forty hours a week, because you can never develop the resources of the country in that way. They left as students an easy time in the city and worked hard in the holidays to do something for this country.

I hope that the directors of these crown companies will consider this question of employment in the light of what I have said, because we are removing the corporation from the control of parliament and of the civil service commission. I hope it may work out all right; no one knows. I can say that I never got a job for anyone through the civil service commission from the time they were appointed. You cannot even get a branch subpost office where it is badly needed.

Coming back to section 8, I am not one of those who believe that public ownership should develop everything. The only branch of public ownership that has made a great success is the one I referred to a few minutes ago.

From our experience with the other crown corporations, we know that once the house has divested itself of any control over them parliament will get no information concerning them. Recently a list was given by one of the universities of young graduates who went to the United States. There were doctors of medicine and other professions. There were able graduates in the various branches of the great engineering profession, civil, electrical, chemical, mining, geological and other branches. They have gone to the United States to develop the resources of that country, the sea, the soil, the mines, the forests and so forth. They have gone there after this country has spent millions of dollars on their education. The provinces spend large amounts of money in grants to universities and public and separate schools to educate these young people, and when they graduate the only position they can expect in Canada, except for the odd man, is one which gives them a few dollars, not enough to keep body and soul together.

In connection with this venture I do feel that veterans should be given a chance to show what they can do in this work. Geological parties have been made up to go on surveys, and I hope that our young veterans are included. Our young Canadian university and high and technical school graduates have done much for the advancement of science, and they should be given an opportunity. The future development of the northwest territories will be somewhat under the control of the minister's department. This development may turn out to be one of the most promising that we have ever had. While I have confidence in this venture and believe that it will work, still there is the question of security with regard to those who shall be employed. What check is there on these people?

Under section 8 the company is under the control and supervision of the officers and servants employed by the company. We know how it worked out with the Canadian Broadcasting corporation; they just snapped their fingers at parliament and said: "What are you going to do about it?" The same thing is true of the Canadian National railways. We have a committee that inquires into the operations of the Canadian National railways, and makes little or no check of it. On one occasion I called that committee a whitewashing committee. We do not want to have this corporation act the same way.

While I have every confidence in what is being done, I believe the time has come to limit some of the salaries to $10,000 a year. There should be a limit of $10,000 on those whom the directors employ without any order in council or special provision. I know of a young engineer about to graduate who has a position now which will pay him more than that, and he has just got a degree. That is true of the mining industry in Canada. If you pick up a copy of the manual issued by the financial and mining companies of this country you will see what has been done there for the benefit of Canadian industry and Canadian students on whom the country has spent so much money. It is possible that in the preparatory stages we may have to bring somebody from Britain or from our neighbour to the south, but I believe that ninety-five per cent of the technical men should be Canadians who have been educated as I have indicated. If that is done we shall be giving some help toward the real development of science.

There is another bill before us which has to do with scientific and other research councils. I shall not refer to it at the moment. I do not want to see this corporation under government control turned into research, and research just to keep the government of the day in office. Parliament should have some control over it, and we should have no politics in it. It seems to me that everything in parliament is politics. We are the worst party-ridden country in the world. I say that without fear of contradiction, because I have seen something of politics, since I have been sitting on the back benches for many years. I can tell the committee that the people in the constituencies want to get value for their money, and these crown companies are run solely from the commercial aspect. The people do not want to see their children and their grandchildren go to the United States after having gone through our technical schools and universities in the cities where in Toronto $12 to $14 million is spent on technical education. I want to see the children and grandchildren of our soldiers of the two wars get a chance to earn a livelihood and develop their own country, for which their fathers and grandfathers fought.

We do not see much reference to this in the newspapers. We shall not see much reference to the discussion here. In fact for all we do hear we might most of the time just as well meet in secret.

Then we have the broadcasting corporation —another one. A motion was on the order paper to-day calling for certain information and it was challenged. The house refused to give us any information on that government corporation. There are thousands of municipalities in this country. They developed their own power through Canadian engineers. They had control because it was a municipal scheme, and there was very little politics in it. I believe the time has come to consider the scientific aspect of this matter if we are to make any headway in research. A separate research council should take control and develop and explore these subjects. We have only touched the fringe of these mining subjects in Canada. We should undertake development without politics. We should develop our great heritage, coal and all these other things. It would mean a great deal in employment to the people of Canada. A wrong solution of it will not. If we get politics mixed up in this, we can say good-bye to any search or research, because, as I see it, that search is research trying to keep my hon. friends in office.

The minister, who is an engineer, has been showing some capacity and ability to get results. I do not agree with all that he has done, because you cannot get everybody to agree. Fortunately we have a diversity of opinion in this country, but I will say this about him. Since I have known him, and I have known him a long time, I have found him to be a man whom I, one of the opposition, can approach and he will give careful attention and consideration to what is placed before him. As an officer of a municipality and chairman of the harbour board, I found that out. I do not wish to say anything further on that. This should be a non-political venture. It would be a good thing if an individual who was not known to be of a certain political stripe could be placed on the directorate. There should be included men from different branches of business so that these crown companies could develop solely from the commercial point of view.

Mr. HOWE: Every effort is being made to interest young graduates of engineering schools in the work of the corporations. At the moment there is an acute shortage of young scientists, or older scientists for that matter, and of engineers both young and old. My hon. friend can be assured that there will be no lack of openings in the next few years at least for men graduating from our universities.

While I am on my feet may I say that my authorities have been questioned on the point discussed by the hon. member for Carleton. I hold in my hand the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936. I shall read sections 16 and 17. While I am reading these sections the hon. member can compare them with sections 4 and 5 of the bill before us. Section 16 reads:

> The governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, may authorize the Minister of Finance to place to the credit of the corporation working capital advances from any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, but the aggregate amount of such advances outstanding at any one time shall not exceed one hundred thousand dollars, and such advances shall be repayable to the Minister of Finance on demand.

Then section 17:

> The governor in council may authorize the construction, extension or improvement of capital works of the broadcasting facilities of the corporation in Canada and, on the recommendation of the minister, may authorize the Minister of Finance to place to the credit of the corporation from any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund such sum or sums as may be necessary to carry out such construction, extension or improvement of capital works: provided that the total amount which may be authorized for the said purposes shall not exceed five hundred thousand dollars.

Then I have before me the consolidation of the National Housing Act of 1944. Section 27A thereof reads:

> The minister may pay any expenditure incurred under or in carrying out the provisions of this part, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund to an aggregate amount not exceeding five million dollars.

I have the Hansard record of the vote on that question, and included among the yeas I find the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. BOUCHER: I am very glad to have the minister place that on record, because if he will just check it up he will find a perfectly satisfactory reason for the stand I am now taking and the stand I took in that vote. In connection with the Canadian Broadcasting corporation we were speaking of one company, under one act, to operate in one way. We put a limit of $500,000 on the money which could be advanced. This bill places a limit on the amount that can be advanced in any one year, but no limit on the amount that can be advanced in any number of years.

Mr. HOWE: You are quite mistaken.

Mr. BOUCHER: Here we have a number of companies. This bill is to deal with all crown companies, including Polymer, Elorado or any others of the hundred or more companies which may be set up under it. So that our present submission is entirely consistent with our stand in connection with the broadcasting corporation, when we ask the minister to bring in one bill for each company, to limit the amount of money that may be given each company and to set out the powers of each company in a separate bill, just as was done in connection with the broadcasting corporation. It is an entirely different matter when you come to grant money for crown companies. Certainly parliament cannot expect to set up crown companies without granting them money; certainly under the broadcasting act we did grant money, and gave the governor in council certain power. But that power is much more limited in the act setting up the broadcasting corporation than in this bill. Here it is not limited to one company.

Mr. HACKETT: Moreover, that was a great public service and I submit should be distinct from the commercial enterprise or enterprises upon which the government may embark under this bill. Here we have no limitation restricting the corporations to what are sometimes called the public services, such as those rendered by the post office and by the broadcasting corporation, if you like. The whole realm of financial, industrial and commercial activity is thrown open to government action, and these powers will enable the government to finance these crown companies in an altogether extraordinary way. I am sure the minister has given mature consideration to the drastic and radical change made by section 3. Even during the war the profits made by these companies came to the treasury. They could not be expended or dealt with in any way by the corporations themselves. Under these powers the crown companies become masters of their own finances, and in each case independent undertakings financed by public moneys are free from the control of parliament. That, I submit to the minister, is subversive of the very elementary principles of parliamentary government.

Mr. HOWE: Then surely parliament must have been subverted many years ago, because a great many corporations do spend their earnings. For instance, the national harbours board does; the broadcasting corporation does; the Canadian National railway does, and it has been in operation since 1919.

Mr. HACKETT: Those are the great public services.

Mr. HOWE: How do you measure a great service? Polymer, with a capital of $50,000,000, is not a small service.

Mr. JACKMAN: It has a great inventory turn-over, but what is the turn-over of the national harbours board? It is nothing at all. It does not handle a commodity; it is a service company.

Mr. HOWE: It handles a great many commodities.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Pension or superannuation.

Mr. FLEMING: On this section several questions immediately arise. Here we have provision that the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall not apply to the officers and servants employed by any of the companies to be established under the bill. The second subsection preserves all the rights of persons who may have had any rights under the civil service superannuation provisions before becoming employees or officers of one of these crown companies. What was said yesterday as to the effect of section 8 in creating a super civil service will likewise apply to this section. Not only that, but it is quite apparent that under this section it will be possible for a number of companies—and the number is unlimited as far as the legislation is concerned—each to have its own superannuation scheme. There may be the utmost diversity as between them, with wide discrepancies in amounts. I ask if that is a sound principle.

I invite you also, Mr. Chairman, to consider the fact that when we are dealing with legislative provision for the establishment of superannuation schemes we are dealing with something that contemplates a long period of time. Let us look at this situation squarely. Actually in this legislation the minister is playing a game for keeps. It is not just temporary legislation; it is not legislation introduced for a temporary purpose. If that were the case there would be no occasion, I suggest, for legislative provision to establish superannuation funds and take care of employees who have given over twenty years and often a lifetime of service. Let us be quite frank about it. What the minister had to say in the first place in justification for the bill was that there were five corporations which must continue to exist for a time, two to exist for a brief period and three for a long period.

In the two bills accompanying this bill, namely bills Nos. 154 and 165, we are asked to open the gates so that crown companies, without number and without limitation on their existence in point of time, may be established. The situation is simply this—and this section proves it beyond peradventure—that what parliament is now being asked to authorize is a permanent method of doing government business, namely a method whereby crown companies are set up by the government without first having reference to parliament, and without first having their creation subjected to direct parliamentary approval.

Legislation of this sort is not the kind of legislation which ought to precede the incorporation of crown companies to carry on specific projects of government business. If there are any hon. members who are still naive enough, after all the time spent in this debate, to believe that this is simply legislation to take care of an immediate and temporary purpose, then surely to goodness their eyes are opened by now.

I will say this for our C.C.F. friends to my left, that from the outset of the debate they have seen clearly the scope and potentialities of the bill.

Mr. FRASER: And they approved it.

Mr. FLEMING: That is a gentle word to describe the enthusiasm with which they have received this legislation. However, I give them credit for having been clear-sighted in their approach to the legislation. They can see that, so far as the effect of the legislation introduced by the minister is concerned, it is a policy of socialism for keeps.

Mr. KNOWLES: First of all, there is one point of a general nature I should like to have cleared up. It seems to me that most of the opposition raised against this measure by members of the Progressive Conservative party is based on the fear that the legislation makes it possible for the government, without coming back to parliament, to incorporate crown companies without number. There are many lawyers sitting to my right and, if that is their belief, I wish they would point out in the bill any section which substantiates that position.

Mr. GREEN: If the hon. member had been here last night he would have heard it discussed.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member's imagination is running wild. We did not mention that.

Mr. KNOWLES: As I see the bill, it is simply what the title indicates, namely an act respecting the operation of government companies. I do not see anywhere in the bill a provision for setting up any crown company.

Mr. FLEMING: Has not the hon. member read the provisions of bills Nos. 154 and 165 which give power, with the approval of the minister, to go on setting up crown companies without number? And has he not regard for the fact that these three bills were introduced together, for common purpose?

Mr. HOWE: There are no such bills as those mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. KNOWLES: The other bills to which the hon. member has referred substantiate the position I am taking, namely that in order to set up these companies without number, of which my hon. friends are afraid, legislation has to be brought before parliament.

Mr. FLEMING: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: If my hon. friend's position were well taken, it would not be necessary to bring in these other bills. Bill No. 155 would give that authority to the government.

Then, my hon. friends talk about our ready acceptance and approval of the bill. Yes, we do approve it, as far as it goes. As a matter of fact, we are not satisfied that it goes far enough; and the minister is quite aware of that. But it seems to me that there should not be quite so much loose talk about the bill's giving the government power which it does not give at all.

It is only a measure laying down a pattern by which crown companies are to be operated, if set up under these provisions. If I am wrong in that, then I should like to be corrected either by the minister or by hon. members to my right.

Mr. BOUCHER: The spending of a million dollars a month is more than a pattern, is it not?

Mr. KNOWLES: The million dollars to which my hon. friend refers has to have reference to a particular company which must either be already in existence or set up in the normal way by act of parliament.

Mr. FLEMING: No, not by act of parliament; it is under part I of the Companies Act, so far as the provisions of these other measures are concerned.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. BOUCHER: Study the other bills.

Mr. KNOWLES: Bill No. 154 simply proves the point I am making.

I would interpret your leaning forward in the chair, Mr. Chairman, as a suggestion that I ought not to do what other hon. members have been doing, but rather that I should proceed to a discussion of the section. I have one or two suggestions to make, and I hope that the minister will realize they are made with a desire to be helpful and not to hinder the operation of the measure.

Mr. FLEMING: Helpful for socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would refer first to section 9 (1) where I notice the word "may" appears. It is stated that these companies may establish and support a pension fund or group. It seems to me that the principle of making provision for the years of retirement of those rendering service should be accepted at least by the government, and with that in mind I would suggest that the word be changed to "shall", so that the provision would be compulsory, and that the companies would either have to be connected with some established pension fund or have to establish one for their employees.

Then, subsection 2 makes provision to keep on a superannuation basis employees who formerly were in the civil service and who came over into one of these crown companies. It also makes a similar provision for former civil servants who became employees of crown companies and then went back to the civil service. That, too, seems clear. However, I see no provision for employees of one of these crown companies who, let us say, in the event of such company completing its job and dissolving, have a chance to come into the civil service. Should not consideration be given to the beginning of a superannuation or pension fund right at the commencement of the term of service of all these employees, making sure that such arrangement would be completely interchangeable as between service in crown companies and in the civil service.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why not put them all under the civil service?

Mr. KNOWLES: That would be perfectly satisfactory to me. My only concern is that we should not lose any more time in recognizing the claim of those who render service to some security in their old age.

One other closely related question is that having to do with age limits as applied to entry into employment in government companies. I have at the moment one case in mind. It has to do with a young lady who for a number of years was employed in a temporary capacity in one of the departments of government, and who recently was considered to have those special qualifications which would make her employment by the Canadian Broadcasting corporation desirable. I understand that arrangements were just about completed for her employment by that corporation when it was discovered that she was a little older than she looked. She was in fact slightly past the age limit of thirty-five years.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would not call that old.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not, no. Because of that circumstance there seems to be some difficulty about her being employed by the Canadian Broadcasting corporation. I understand that the reason so far as the Canadian Broadcasting corporation is concerned is that it would not meet the provisions of their pension fund. Is there any danger of anything like that happening in connection with these companies? It seems to me that throughout employment generally, and certainly in government service, whether civil service or a crown company, there ought to be interchangeability. It should be possible for people to move about, particularly when, as happens in many cases, the experience gained in one line of government service makes a person desirable for some other kind of work. I would appreciate it, if the minister would comment on the suggestions we make for the purpose of strengthening the bill and making employment with these crown companies more attractive. In other words, they come from one who is in support of the measure before the committee.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister allow me to add to that question? I apologize in advance of asking the question because, if it has any validity, it will really give assistance to the minister. As I read section 9 as worded, anyone entering the service of a crown company from the civil service would be entitled to whatever rights he would acquire while in the company and still retain all the pension rights he would have in the civil service. The latter part of subsection 3 would seem to indicate that he would have all the benefits, except salary, that he would have had as a civil servant.

There is another question I should like to ask with regard to subsection 2. It would appear that anyone employed in a government company would still be entitled to his rights under the civil service pension fund. In other words, he would be entitled to the contributions that had been made, I presume partly by the government. It is possible I may have read this subsection wrong, but I think I have read it carefully and it seems to me that there is that duplication.

Mr. HOWE: Section 9, subsection 1, makes provision for the setting up of certain benefits by the company, not necessarily a pension scheme. None of the crown companies formed during the war has a pension scheme. A company may have sickness insurance, a hospitalization fund or group insurance, which would be paid for by the employees with a contribution by the management. That is the type of benefit we have to-day in the crown companies. Crown companies which are permanent or reasonably permanent no doubt will apply to have a pension fund established. The rules of the pension fund will be worked out in agreement between the officers of the company and the superintendent of insurance for the government and would have to be approved by the privy council before being adopted. That is a matter for the future. This is simply permissive to allow the setting up of a fund of that sort.

Subsections 2 and 3 have appeared in every act that has been passed during the last ten years where there is a possibility of a civil servant being used in a government company. It is simply a provision to protect the rights of a civil servant who may leave government employ presumably to take temporary employment with a crown company. This provision preserves his rights to the benefits of the civil service fund. If he is already a member of the fund when he joins the company he can continue his payments into the fund and keep up his standing, even though he draws no salary from the government. But if he elects to keep his benefits under the civil service fund he is not entitled to the benefits of any superannuation fund that might be set up by the crown company. Obviously he would not be eligible to benefit from two types of superannuation under the federal government.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand that it is quite possible that the salary paid by a crown company would be greater than that paid in the civil service. Let us assume that a man earning $5,000 left the civil service to take a position with a crown company where he was paid $10,000; he would not be permitted to keep up his civil service insurance, if you permit me the word, to that extent and be insured in the company for the residue?

Mr. HOWE: No; the civil servant would contribute to the civil service pension fund on the basis of the salary he was receiving when he left the civil service. If he were paid more money in the crown company it would not affect his position under the civil service fund.

Mr. HACKETT: It seems to me that in fairnes he should have some pension rights for his excess salary drawn from the crown company.

Mr. HOWE: The question is hypothetical because no crown company under the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has at present a pension fund. I think the point raised by my hon. friend would require study if and when pension funds are established by crown companies. The only crown company that I know of that has a pension fund is the Canadian Broadcasting corporation. I am not familiar with the provisions of that fund, and therefore I cannot say whether the point raised by my hon. friend is met.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Annual report.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister be agreable to having these annual reports brought down to the public as soon as possible? The section as it stands provides that a company shall submit an annual report to the minister as soon as possible after the 31st of March in each year; the minister shall lay the report before parliament if parliament is then in session, or within fifteen days of the next session of parliament. Would the minister be agreeable to adopting the principle which applies under the Companies Act where a company submits its annual report, not as soon as possible but within four months? Would the minister be agreeable to having these reports published within the four month period?

Mr. HOWE: This is the standard section that is put in all bills. I doubt if hon. members would wish to have a report published in the press before it was presented to parliament. I would not be a advocate of that. If I were a member of the opposition I should like to see the report before it was published, or at least as soon as it was published, so that my comments on the report could go out. I think it is desirable to follow the standard form. This section will be found in a great many bills having to do with similar corporations, and I believe it would be unwise to have a departure from that practice in this case.

Mr. JACKMAN: Most government reports do not concern business enterprises where time is of some importance. If the fiscal year of a company corresponded with the government fiscal year the auditor general would have four months to go over the accounts. That would take it into the summer. We hope that parliament will not always be sitting through the summer months. That would mean that in all likelihood the report would not be tabled until parliament assembled in January or February of the following year, at which time the report would be from eight to ten months stale. I think the question of time outweighs the minister's argument that members of parliament would like to have the report submitted to them first rather than to the press of the country simultaneously. I hope that the minister will give consideration to the suggestion I am making. I do not think it would cause him or the department any difficulty, and it would mean that we should get the information when there is still time to bring about any rectification in policy or to make any comments needed.

Mr. HOWE: I would hesitate to change on the spur of the moment the practice that has been well established in connection with these crown companies. Every corporation of the government has a section similar to this.

Mr. JACKMAN: The report of the Canadian National railways is always tabled in parliament before it is printed in the newspapers. Certainly the monthly earnings are not tabled in the house but are given to the newspapers from month to month. I think that is the way that any business enterprise, whether government-owned or privately owned, should carry on. The minister should draw a distinction between this type of company and certain other emanations from the crown.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would it not be possible to have the fiscal year of these companies end on December 31? Then the figures would be available to parliament during the session. I do not see why the fiscal year of these companies should have to coincide with the fiscal year of the government.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to give consideration to that suggestion. The fiscal year of the Canadian National railways was changed so that it would terminate with the end of the calendar year. I dare say that could be done. I shall be glad to give it consideration.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Coming into force.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to section 11 which I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move. It is as follows:

That section 11 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This act shall apply to a company only from the date of the issue of the proclamation by the governor in council declaring this act to be applicable to such company."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister explain the effect of this amendment?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. As I explained to hon. members, there are at the moment some thirteen companies which would be affected by the proclamation of the act. It is the feeling of the department that the act need not apply to certain of these companies which will be wound up in the next two or three months. The purpose of the amendment is to permit the government to select companies at present in process of being wound up and to apply the act only to those others which will require its application for a fairly long period.

Mr. FLEMING: If I may make an observation, it will be noted that the proposed amendment is not confined to existing companies. The reason given by the minister for the amendment relates purely and simply to existing companies, because he says it may not be expedient to apply the act to certain companies now existing. But the amendment goes much farther than that. It applies to any company whether in existence to-day or hereafter created. Certainly if there is any merit in the bill there can be no justification for a series of orders in council applying its provisions in turn to any one of the numerous companies which may be set up as crown companies in the future. My suggestion to the minister, in the light of the ground he has put forward, is that the amendment be confined to existing companies. If there is reason for not applying it to companies which are in process of being dissolved and their charters surrendered, well and good; but once you make that exception, surely there should not be any reason for not making a general proclamation of the act. Is it reasonable to make individual proclamations of the act making it applicable to a particular company? The minister has put this bill forward as one which was required to lay down a course of procedure and a method of financing for crown companies in general, with the exception of statutory companies. That is a long way from his amendment. If the amendment passes in the form in which it has been introduced it will mean that it will be possible to defer any general proclamation of the act and reserve to the governor in council the power to say to which individual company, whether in existence now or hereafter created, the act shall have application.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend's colleagues spent several hours in arguing that there should be a separate bill for each company, and now he is arguing that there should be one bill of general application.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOWE: If a company is brought into existence it must have a body and legal existence. This is the standard provision for companies under part I. Since my hon. friend's colleagues have argued strongly for a separate bill for each company, he should not object strenuously to a separate order in council for each company. He seems to be taking a strange position.

Mr. FLEMING: It is not a strange position, as the minister will see if he will apply a little logic. Here is an amendment which cuts right across the principle for which the minister has been arguing throughout the consideration of this measure. If there is any merit in the legislation, surely the ordinary rule should apply, that there shall be one proclamation of the act. The minister says: We have a situation which makes it desirable for us not to apply this measure to certain existing corporations. But he did not answer my point. I tried to make myself clear and thought I had spent enough time in doing so. I do not want to take up more time than is necessary for a clear understanding of the situation. The effect of the amendment will be this. It will lie within the power of the minister—it is always a question of giving the minister more power, and that is what we object to—to decide whether the act shall or shall not apply to any particular crown corporation as long as it is a joint stock company. That being so, the amendment cuts right across the principle for which the minister has been arguing right along, the principle which he says he has sought to give effect to in introducing a general bill of this kind applicable to all crown companies incorporated under part I of the Companies Act. Far from cutting across the position for which I have been contending all the way through, the position I now take is precisely in keeping with that which I have taken all along, and what I have said is put forward with a view to making a constructive suggestion in order to be helpful to the minister, though I do not think he has accepted it in that light. I think the amendment proposed ought to be further considered. I should be surprised if in introducing this amendment the minister had in mind anything more than the existing companies to which he has referred.

Mr. HOWE: It is quite true I had in mind existing companies. I had in mind that Allied War Supplies, one of the largest of the crown companies, is expected to be liquidated before the 1st of July, and therefore it is hardly worth while applying this bill to Allied War Supplies. But there are existing companies to which it is applied, which will require the provisions of the act prior to their winding up, instead its being applied automatically to companies such as Allied, which does not require it. The officers of my department have suggested that it be applied by order in council to each individual company rather than by a blanket provision to all companies. As far as new companies are concerned, if they are set up under act of parliament, such as the national research council, they could not be effective until the rules and regulations were applied. The provision now suggested would permit those rules and regulations to apply through the issuance of order in council rather than automatically.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am impressed by the last words of the minister when he said that the officers of the department felt that this act should be applied by order in council to individual companies. I think that is entirely consistent with the argument which has been advanced, that this whole act should be a measure with respect to each company when that company is created, and not an act covering all companies. But if the minister makes the amendment he is actually making this act, which was general, apply only to such companies as the governor in council may select for its application. I do not know what the intention is. The minister may have the very best intentions now and his intentions may be exclusively confined to existing companies; but it would seem anomalous if we were to allow the act to pass so that the minister could say that company A shall have the benefit of the powers, privileges, liabilities and so forth and that company B, run under similar circumstance, a similar business, shall not. If we come to that point, then I suggest that the minister should take the officers of the department again into consultation and see whether they will not agree with us that a separate bill should be brought in for each company, setting out its powers, privileges and liabilities.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house I should like to have it read now.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the measure before us has had very full discussion and what I am about to say need not take more than a very few minutes. It has to do, however, with one of the fundamental features of the measure, namely, the drawing upon unappropriated funds for the financing of these government companies. The bill is for the operation of government companies, including their financing, and it provides for financing them out of —I think I use the words correctly—unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

It is important that hon. members should thoroughly understand what we are doing in this measure. The measure itself is for the operation of government companies, companies already set up under other measures, or companies which may yet be set up under measures now existing or which later may be brought in. We are saying to the government that, no matter how many of such companies there are or may be, the government by this bill may arrange for financing any or all of them from unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

What is the consolidated revenue fund? It is one fund into which all of the revenues of the government are brought, whether derived from taxation, from borrowings, from earnings or from any other source. That is the consolidated revenue fund. What this parliament does when the government comes in with a supply bill or a money bill or an appropriation bill is to authorize the government to spend so much money on specific enterprises of one kind or another. They are called appropriation bills. Out of that consolidated revenue fund parliament authorizes the government to draw so much money for specific purposes, nearly all of which will be found in the estimates for the present fiscal year and some of which will come down in supplementary estimates later.

Let us assume for a moment that the consolidated revenue fund changes. It is changing daily. Let us suppose the fund is $4,000 million, or that amount may be accumulated during a given period of time. This house may have directly authorized, either in the estimates now or by statute formerly, the expenditure by the government of only $3,000 million. There is therefore a balance left in the consolidated revenue fund. What we are doing by this bill is saying to the government, "You have government companies now. You may set up other government companies under other bills than this, and you may draw upon this fund to the extent provided for the operation of any or all of them without coming back to this house again." In other words, it is a blank cheque of a size that we do not know. Not only is it a blank cheque of a size that we do not know, but it can be arranged by the government in any way it choose after we have gone. It is in effect an appropriation bill not for this year only but for as long as the measure remains on the statute books. We thereby give the government power to draw on any balance that there may be in the consolidated revenue fund of this country, to operate these companies. My submission is that it is much too broad powers to take away from parliament and put in the hands of the governor in council. That is the only point I propose to raise on this measure at this time. I think it is a matter of fundamental concern to the house and to the country. The minister said that it had been done before in some cases. Suppose it has been. It does not need to be continued. And generally when it has been done before it has been done for specific measures. Therefore I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher):

That Bill No. 155 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to committee so as to be amended as follows:

1. That the word "unappropriated" in the third line of paragraph (a) of section 4 of the said act be deleted and the word "appropriated" be substituted in its place.

2. That the word "unappropriated" in the second line of paragraph (b) of clause 5 of the said act be deleted and the word "appropriated" substituted in its place.

3. That the word "unappropriated" in the third line of paragraph (c) of clause 5 of the said act be deleted and the word "appropriated" substituted in its place.

This amendment means simply that the government may draw upon funds that may be appropriated from time to time for the operation of these companies, but that we do not give the government a blank cheque now of unknown size. This bill is an appropriation measure for as long as the act remains on the statute books, the result of which is that the government may draw huge sums for the operation of present and subsequently formed companies without coming back to this house again for the appropriation of funds. The amendment I have moved would require the government to get the approval of parliament for specific expenditures. It is opposed to giving the government a blank cheque of unknown size.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The purpose of the amendment would be to destroy any meaning whatever of sections 4 and 5. The bill would then read:

The governor in council may

(a) authorize the Minister of Finance to advance to a company, by way of loan, additional working capital out of appropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Obviously, if the moneys were appropriated it would not require this bill to authorize the Minister of Finance to pay the money over to the company. In authorizing the appropriation bill, parliament would have already taken that step. The purpose of sections 4 and 5 is to authorize the government to afford temporary relief in case of need to the company, subject to later appropriation by parliament. The reason is that these companies are now operating in a commercial field and are not able to predict their financial requirements in advance as accurately as is a government department.

My hon. friend has referred to the present provision as a blank cheque. The cheque is not blank. A maximum amount is definitely specified. It is $500,000 in the case of working capital, and $500,000 in the case of capital advances.

An hon. MEMBER: For each company.

Mr. BRACKEN: But there are a number of them.

Mr. HOWE: For each company. It does not matter if there are thirteen companies, the advance to one cannot be $500,000 multiplied by thirteen.

Mr. BRACKEN: It may mean thirteen more.

Mr. HOWE: It may. In any event, each company is taken individually. They do not make application all together. The practice is not new. I have referred to the Canadian Broadcasting Act where the limit is $100,000 for working capital advances and $500,000 for improvement of capital works. In the case of Bretton Woods, which hon. gentlemen opposite voted for only a few months ago, the limit was $700,000, and in the case of the Central Mortgage and Housing corporation the limit is $7,000,000 that can be drawn. Exactly the same words were used in all these acts. In other words, they are standard provisions which have been placed in the acts setting up government corporations.

As I have said, to change the word "unappropriated" to "appropriated" would make the provision absolutely meaningless, because if the money has been appropriated it does not require any provision in any act other than the Appropriation Act to place it at the disposal of the corporation or any other agency to which the appropriation was made. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to oppose this amendment as being an attempt to vitiate that which the government believes to be important to the successful operation of the crown companies which would be affected by it.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I have some slight interest of a personal nature in this measure in that last night when I put this point to the minister he said: "My hon. friend is quite mistaken." That remark appears at page 2186 of Hansard. Last night in deference to the minister's experience I did not go on, but on examining the question after that incident I found that what I had said was, in my view, strictly correct.

On many occasions, both last night and to-day, the minister said that these payments are subject to later appropriation by parliament. After being further questioned by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), the minister said, as appears at page 2186 of Hansard:

> The further step is a vote of parliament appropriating the money.

Therefore it is quite clear that the minister intends to come back to parliament each year to have this money voted. The wording of section 5, as it exists in the bill, however, does not require the minister to come back to parliament for the money. I am sure that the minister would not wish the statute to be passed in a form which he does not intend it to take.

Last night I said that I thought this section was analogous to the provision in the Family Allowances Act whereby the amounts of family allowances paid are a statutory vote and are not subject to discussion and control in the estimates, although in fact they appear in the estimates; whereas the administrative expenses of the Family Allowances Act are subject to control by parliament, are discussed in the estimates and are in a numbered vote which can be controlled by vote of the committee of supply. I referred, therefore, to the Family Allowances Act and found that what I had stated was exactly the case. Section 3 of that act contains wording similar to that of section 5 of the measure now before us, and provides that these family allowance payments may be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. Then, when I turn to page 28 of this year's estimates I find an item covering family allowance payments of $250,000,000, with "(S)" before it instead of a number, showing that it is in fact a statutory item which does not require to be voted. To prove more conclusively that I am right, in section 16 of the Family Allowances Act provision is made for the payment of administrative expenses, in these words:

> The expenses necessary for the administration of this act, other than payment of allowances, shall be payable out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

If you turn again to page 28 of this year's estimates you see item 228, "Family allowances—administration", showing that to be the way of providing for a controllable vote, and that the present wording pertains to a statutory vote. The minister has said several times that he intends to come to parliament for these moneys every year, and I am sure he would not wish the statute to pass in a form that would not require him or possibly his successors through the years to come to parliament. In fact, as the section now stands, it is my view that, no matter how much the minister wished to come to parliament for these moneys at the time the estimates are brought down, legally he would not be able to do so.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): I believe that one other point in the minister's last statement might be brought before the house. The minister stated that to amend the bill as suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) would vitiate sections 4 and 5. Let us analyse that statement. Sections 4 and 5 provide that by order in council the dominion government may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund to any crown company and any number of crown companies a sum or sums up to $500,000, and at any time. In the second place, it can give in the same way to any company or any number of companies, and even the same company or companies as before, in any fiscal year and, I submit, in every fiscal year if that should be so decided, a further sum of $500,000. The minister says that even if an order in council is passed allocating moneys to these firms it will be brought back to parliament and there discussed. I cannot agree with that statement because I do not understand how it would be done. This amendment simply means that the money must be voted by parliament before an order in council can transfer it to a company.

The minister says that if the government is not permitted to advance this money by order in council before it is voted by parliament, sections 4 and 5 are of no value, that their meaning will be destroyed. According to his statement, therefore, sections 4 and 5 have absolutely no meaning or significance if parliament is consulted before an order in council is passed. But he suggests they have a meaning if the order in council can be passed giving the money to the companies, with parliament then asked to approve something already accomplished. In other words parliament is to be asked to lock the barn door after the horse is stolen. I believe that the minister's own statement more than justifies the discussion this afternoon and last evening in opposition to this blank cheque legislation. I say "blank cheque" because, while it is a limited cheque, there is no limit to the number of companies that may get this limited cheque, or on the number of years during which that cheque may be issued.

In the amendment which was moved before the bill came out of committee the minister said he was making this act apply to one company; that they could not make it apply to any others, but they could make it apply to any company by order in council at any time they saw fit to do so. In view of these very revealing statements by the minister, Mr. Speaker, I believe the present amendment is entirely justified.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to argue the point as to whether this is a blank cheque. If my hon. friend would like to know how blank cheque legislation reads let me read—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The minister has a perfect right to answer a question, but if it is not a question he may not speak a second time.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this is the end product of what I referred to last evening. During yesterday's debate most of the hon. gentlemen to my right who spoke to this measure referred to the few remarks I made the previous evening. Of course I feel greatly flattered that what I said should have so much significance, but as a matter of fact I did not say at all what my hon. friends have suggested I did. We are supporting this bill, not because it represents socialism or is a step in that direction. I am not going to discuss that aspect now, but I want to submit that in my opinion the amendment is out of order. I would refer to citation 344 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, at page 136:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I submit, sir, that this amendment is not intelligible or consistent with itself. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) moved the amendment and then explained it; but what he said in explanation is not what the house has before it. It has what appears in the written amendment, and it contains these words:

That Bill No. 155 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to committee so as to be amended as follows:

1. That the word "unappropriated" in the third line of paragraph (a) of section 4 of the said act be deleted and the word "appropriated" be substituted in its place.

Then it goes on through the other sections, proposing a similar change. The point I wish to make is that if the money has already been appropriated it cannot be appropriated a second time. Consequently I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Good team work.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order, I rule that the amendment is in order. My belief is that the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is more one of procedure. Is the house ready for the question?

TAXATION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED KINGDOM

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I wish to table copies of two agreements for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income and with respect to duties on the estates of deceased persons between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed in London yesterday and being tabled in the House of Commons in London to-day. I understand that the Minister of National Revenue has a statement to make in regard to these agreements.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister copies immediately available?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Copies have been mimeographed, and I have tabled three of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could they be printed in Votes and Proceedings so that they would be available? Are they too long for that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are quite long, they are printed in the treaty series of external affairs and will be available in pamphlet form for the convenience of members of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I wish to make a statement with reference to the agreements which have just been tabled. The above mentioned agreements, inter alia, affect, as to Canada, income tax, excess profits tax and succession duties; as to the United Kingdom, income tax, excess profits tax, national defence contributions, and estate duty.

Income tax, excess profits tax, national defence contributions:

(a) As to both countries, the industrial and commercial profits of a branch are to be initially taxed in the country of source, with credit for the tax so paid in the country of receipt, if the same profits are there subject to tax;

(b) Profits of ships and aircraft are taxed only in the country of residence of the taxpayer;

(c) Canada may deduct up to fifteen per cent at the source in respect of dividends, interest and other like income going to the United Kingdom;

The United Kingdom forgo their claim for surtax on income arising in the United Kingdom coming to Canada.

Each country will give credit for the taxes paid in the other;

(d) Both countries exempt copyright payments from taxation at the source, except rents and royalties in respect of motion picture films;

(e) The salaries of Canadian civil servants shall not be subject to tax in the United Kingdom, and vice versa;

The Washington office was established in April, 1943, with a view to assisting the Canadian embassy in its information work, to furthering co-operation in film matters between departments of the Canadian and United States governments and to represent the board in its relations with the headquarters of national organizations interested in the use of film.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—DISRUPTION OF TRAFFIC ON INLAND WATERWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to repeat a question I asked of the Acting Prime Minister yesterday respecting the tie-up of traffic on the great lakes, a question which in his absence was answered, or at least to which a reply was given by the Minister of Labour, who indicated that he was meeting the operators yesterday afternoon. I am wondering if the minister could give us any information as a result of that meeting.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I met the operators yesterday afternoon, and am meeting the seamen immediately after the orders of the day are through to-day. My hon. friend came from Winnipeg; I think he has knowledge of industrial disputes and how they can be settled, and he knows that sometimes they take time.

REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS OF MR. IAN MACLAREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): On June 4, I asked the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply a question in regard to a statement made by Mr. Ian MacLaren to the effect that we would have widespread unemployment because of the coal situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): All right; you can call "order" if you wish, but I think it is a pretty serious thing if the deputy coal controller says we are to have widespread unemployment because of a shortage of coal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. According to the rules the hon. gentleman may not make a statement on the orders of the day. If he wishes to put a question he may do so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Very well, Mr. Speaker. The minister is not in his place, but perhaps the parliamentary assistant can tell us something about it. My question is, what are we going to do to prevent widespread unemployment in this country?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made two statements on the subject of the coal shortage. Apparently they were not noted by the hon. gentleman, though I can turn up the references quite easily. He has answered the hon. member's question on June 4 arising out of the statement of the deputy coal controller. As to the other part of the hon. gentleman's question, I suggest the answer is to keep this government in power.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask a supplementary question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The parliamentary assistant asked me a question, so I should like to ask, how long is this government going to be in power?

EXPORT OF TRUCK SPRINGS TO DETROIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a question based upon a telegram I just received? I am informed that steel truck springs are being exported from Canada by War Assets corporation and Ontario Steel Products to Detroit Steel Products, where a strike is in progress; and in this telegram the charge is made that this is being done in order to break that strike. In view of the shortage of steel required in this country for automotive and farm equipment, would the minister look into the matter and report to-morrow?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): We had no notice of the question, and I cannot answer it at the moment, but we can get the information to-morrow.

Mr. COLDWELL: I received the telegram only just now.

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Is the Minister of Labour in a position to state whether both parties to the dispute in the lumber industry of British Columbia have accepted the report of Chief Justice Sloan?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The operators have accepted it, and the union have turned it down.

FRUIT

BRITISH COLUMBIA BERRY CROP—THREAT OF WASTAGE THROUGH LACK OF CONTAINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the government. I do not know which department it comes under so I have given notice to three ministers. My first question is, what steps are being taken to save thousands of tons of berries worth over a million dollars now under contract to the United Kingdom from being lost, owing to the lack of barrels and containers? The second question—and these are straight questions—is, will the government grant an immediate export permit for five hundred tons of raspberries to the United States—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman put his question on the order paper.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I could not hear what you said.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggested that the hon. gentleman put his question on the order paper, as it appears to be quite lengthy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: These berries are rotting on the ground to-day. If that is not urgent I do not know what is. May I ask my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman insists on asking his question I suggest that he be brief and to the point, as required by the rules of the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am getting advice from all around here, but I am asking a question which is very important to British Columbia. The second part of the question is, will the government grant an immediate export permit for five hundred tons of raspberries to the United States, barrels and containers for which will be supplied by the United States purchasers, thus permitting raspberry barrels on hand to be used for the present emergency in the marketing of strawberries? That is a straight question, and it is a vital one for the people of Canada.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The first part of the question has to do with a contract which has been negotiated by the special products board of the Department of Agriculture with the United Kingdom. On two or three occasions we have made inquiries when these matters were under discussion.

The information we have is that if the harvesting of the berries proceeds in an ordinary manner, and if other conditions exist which do not result in great quantities being available for shipment at an unusual time, there are sufficient barrels and containers to take care of the situation. We cannot go very far beyond that at the present time, not knowing exactly what the crop is going to be, and not knowing exactly how berries are going to be marketed. If they are marketed according to the usual practice, then there are containers to take care of them so far as these contracts are concerned. But the other question has to do, indirectly, with the same matter, namely whether berries can be marketed somewhere else.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not a very fruitful answer.

FOOD WASTAGE THROUGH LACK OF CONTAINERS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the immediate threat of wastage of the current crop of small fruits, tree fruits, vegetables, butter and egg production and the fish pack in the province of British Columbia, because of the lack of necessary wooden or wood product containers.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's motion is out of order. He should have put his motion before the house before the orders of the day were entered upon. If he will read standing order 31 he will see the following:

31. (1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are the orders of the day called?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion of the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. MAYHEW: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe asked the Acting Minister of Finance—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order; I am appealing the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I declared his motion out of order. After I did so, he resumed his seat, and before five members had risen I gave the floor to the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., who proceeded to reply to a question which had been asked. I understand many members rose, but the hon. member did not then have the floor.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not have an opportunity. I appealed Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member did not say he was appealing my ruling.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, I did.

An hon. MEMBER: Do it now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appeal Your Honour's ruling. My colleagues stood, about twenty of them. I appeal Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The rule is clear. At a certain time any hon. member has the opportunity of moving the adjournment of the house, but that opportunity was not taken advantage of on this occasion. Moreover, according to a previous decision in 1932—I am sorry I have not the decision before me at the moment—there is no appeal from Mr. Speaker's ruling in this regard.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am appealing your ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no appeal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, Mr. Speaker is in control of the house; I am appealing his ruling.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I make a brief comment on the point of order? The hon. member for Fraser Valley has moved the adjournment of the house to permit the discussion of an urgent problem facing his community, and Your Honour has ruled that at this point it is out of order. The same decision has been made on similar occasions previously, and supported by the house. I should like to make the observation that immediately before the orders of the day are called, the motion would be in order.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: We have not yet come to the orders of the day. But immediately prior to that—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, we have.

Mr. BRACKEN: Prior to that it may be moved.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose it is purely by indulgence of the house that I speak to the point of order. However, there seems to be a feeling among hon. members that the ruling is wrong, or that it is not justified. May I point out that this same ruling has been made time and time again. The standing order states:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order No. 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

And if one refers to standing order 15 he finds out what is meant by "the ordinary daily routine of business". One finds this:

> The ordinary daily routine of business in the house shall be as follows: Presenting reports by standing and select committees; motions; introduction of bills; first readings of senate bills.

The ruling has been made repeatedly in the house, as it has been to-day, that the motion must be made after the ordinary daily routine of business, as defined in standing order 15, is concluded.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will move it to-morrow.

TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the budget is in course of preparation, would the minister kindly accept and give consideration to twenty-two telegrams directed to him by farmers in my area having to do with the adverse effects of the present taxation policy upon farm production?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am receiving about four hundred suggestions each day with regard to the budget. I shall be very glad to add those to the list.

MEAT

REMOVAL OF PRICE CEILINGS FROM RED AND BLUE BRAND BEEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I may now proceed with the answer I began somewhat earlier, I would say that yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) asked the minister if it was true that the recent order removing the price ceiling from red and blue brand beef applies only to government-inspected beef shipped from abattoirs. Then he asked, whether if it was true that the order applied only to government-inspected beef, whether the government would take into consideration making the same provision in respect of prime carcasses of beef produced from other sources. The answer to the first question is yes, at wholesale levels only. The second question is answered by the first.

I think it would be well at this time to place on Hansard the press release of May 26, 1946, from the wartime prices and trade board, which states:

> In an effort to facilitate the movement of cattle and provide a better beef supply during the present seasonal shortage, price ceilings at wholesale on beef carcasses grading "red" brand or "blue" brand according to government standards will be temporarily suspended from May 27 until July 20, wartime prices and trade board announced to-day.
> The retail price ceiling on both these grades and on all other qualities will remain at the present level and no higher prices will be paid by the consumer. Present pricing regulations governing retail prices of commercial quality beef will apply to all sales at retail of blue brand beef. Ceiling prices at both wholesale and retail of all grades and qualities other than the two mentioned above will remain unchanged.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall not read the resolution, because it is before you. There are great and vital issues facing this country to-day which require solution by parliament. There are questions having to do with the burden of taxation, with food, with housing, and with labour which may very well not be considered at this session of parliament because of numerous other matters that are being brought before parliament at this time.

In 1943 the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said that the debate might very well give rise to differences of opinion that might cause serious divisions in this country. If that is so, the debate will be a long one. Many Canadians believe there is no reason for adding to the membership of the House of Commons at a time when expenditures should be decreasing rather than increasing. Opinion is widespread in this country that since we have now waited for several years for redistribution the matter might well be postponed until 1952, because it will have to be considered again in that year. I do not intend this afternoon to deal with these phases of the matter.

May I at the outset say a word on behalf of the prairie provinces. In 1943 when the Minister of Justice brought before the house a resolution for an address to amend the British North America Act, he pointed out, as reported on page 4337 of Hansard of July 5 of that year:

> It is argued on behalf of Manitoba and Saskatchewan that some of their population has been drained away as an effect of enlistments in the armed forces and of a drift from certain portions of those provinces to war plants in Ontario and Quebec or British Columbia. As to the men who enlisted, though efforts were made in taking the census to credit all these men to their own respective provinces, it undoubtedly did happen that some of them had changed their homes since enlistment, and there is no doubt that a great many had changed their homes to go to war plants in other centres. It can be argued that these provinces should not be penalized because of these facts, but to make a redistribution at this time and not to make it along the lines above indicated would require an amendment to the constitution.

The Minister of Justice stated also in 1943 that—

> The effect of employment in the production of munitions of war was to remove large numbers of the population from their homes to reside temporarily in other parts of Canada. If it was unfair in 1943, as it was, is it not equally unfair to-day? A census is now being taken in the western provinces, and it may show a return to those provinces of residents who left for war services in other parts of Canada; yet the redistribution is to be based upon the census of 1941, which the Minister of Justice said in 1943 would be an unfair basis.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Let me point out that between 1931 and 1941, having regard to the natural increases in population, Manitoba lost 48,478 persons; Saskatchewan, 157,545 and Alberta, 41,841. If the 1946 census establishes that that population has returned, those provinces would be entitled to the representation they would have had had the people not left. They would therefore be penalized by this measure.

It is not with this phase of the matter, however, that I intend to deal particularly on this occasion; it is rather with the broader aspects of the constitutional issue involved in the amendment to the British North America Act as contemplated by the resolution now before the house. It has a much broader significance then the mere matter of redistribution. But I wish to deal this afternoon not with the fairness or unfairness of the provisions of the resolution or the desirability of achieving a greater measure of representation by population, but rather with the method employed by the government to secure an amendment to the British North America Act.

One of the most consequential provisions of this resolution is the proposal to amend section 51 without consultation with the provinces which will be affected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Duplessis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate the attitude of my hon. friends. When they speak I am courteous enough not to interrupt, and I ask them for the same consideration unless there are questions that they wish to ask.

The material subsections of section 51 of the British North America Act are as follows:

> (1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members;
> (2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).
> (4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth—

Those subsections were the essence of the basis upon which the provinces entered confederation. If they are to be repealed—and they will be, because the imperial parliament will accept the recommendation of this parliament—then a different basis of representation will be established than was contemplated either by the Canadian delegates in London in 1866, or earlier at Quebec. I read the pertinent sections of the resolutions passed at the city of Quebec on the 10th of October, 1864, as the basis—as the report itself says—of a proposed confederation. Section 20 says:

For the purpose of such readjustments—

That is, readjustments after succeeding censuses:

—Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members.

That was the basis upon which the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick entered confederation.

For the purpose of such readjustment, Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members, and each of the other sections shall at each readjustment receive, for the ten years then next succeeding, the number of members to which it will be entitled on the same ratio of representation to population as Lower Canada will enjoy according to the census last taken by having sixty-five members.

Then of the essence of confederation was this section, No. 21:

No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any section, unless its population shall have decreased relatively to the population of the whole union, to the extent of five per centum.

That five per centum was changed in the British North America Act to one-twentieth. Later, on the 4th of December, 1866, there was a conference in London of delegates from the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They made some changes in the resolutions passed at the city of Quebec, but while they made certain alterations they stood firm on those two sections, renumbered 21 and 22, which read as follows:

20. For the purpose of such readjustments, Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members, and each of the other sections shall at each readjustment receive, for the ten years then next succeeding, the number of members to which it will be entitled on the same ratio of representation to population as Lower Canada will enjoy according to the census last taken by having sixty-five members.

21. No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any section, unless its population shall have decreased relatively to the population of the whole union, to the extent of five per centum.

It is significant to note that it was on the basis of the Quebec resolutions and on the basis of the resolutions passed in the city of London that the foundation stones were laid and the requisites for confederation established.

I am not going to enter into a discussion to-day, interesting though it might be, of the question whether the British North America Act is a pact, a treaty, a statute or a contract. There is a division of opinion on that. Professor Kennedy, of the university of Toronto, and others, take the stand that we should get away from the idea that it is a contract or treaty. They say it is not so, either in history or in law. Doctor Maurice Ollivier, a law officer of the crown, in an outstanding book entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" refers to the evidence of the Clerk of this house, Doctor Beauchesne, who before a committee of this house strenuously denied that the British North America Act was a contract. He pointed out, at page 360, after referring to a discussion that took place in the committee set up by parliament in 1935 to discuss the question of amendments to the British North America Act:

From the preceding dialogue it is easy to understand the danger in which the province of Quebec stands if it lacks the right to take part in deliberations on the subject of our constitution. If the British North America Act ought to be amended, it is better that this be done with the consent of the province and that it take its part of the responsibility rather than that it should see the changes made without its knowledge.

That statement, I respectfully suggest, applies to all the other original parties to confederation, and to the provinces that have entered since. Other outstanding leaders have taken the point that the British North America Act is a contract. The Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, when premier of Ontario, wrote a letter to Mr. Bennett on September 20, 1930—I am not going to quote the whole of it; it is set out in detail in Dawson's "Constitutional Issues in Canada"—in which he said in part:

The province of Ontario holds strongly to the view that the agreement should not be altered without the consent of the parties to it.

And he attached a memorandum in which it was submitted that the rights of the various provinces to equal voice concerning any contemplated changes in the law or the convention of the constitution of the dominion rest upon fundamental considerations and historic facts which are as binding to-day as ever they were upon all the parties to confederation.

There are others who maintained that the British North America Act is in the nature of a treaty. Sir John A. Macdonald took that view, Sir George Etienne Cartier took that view, and Sir Robert Borden took that view; for on February 10, 1914, when the question of redistribution was before the House of Commons, he used these words, at page 612 of Hansard:

> The terms which were then fixed between the four original provinces undoubtedly constituted a compact between those provinces, and up to the present time they have, of course, been carried out according to the true intent and meaning of the statute.

Let me give some references to the statements regarding amendments to the constitution made by outstanding leaders right down to 1935. I might refer to Cartier, Blake, Laurier, Borden, Meighen; and what the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was a constitutional authority, said on more than one accasion in this house about the dangers of serious amendments to the British North America Act without consultation with the provinces.

I refer first to what Sir Robert Borden said in 1914 as to the desirability of an address being submitted to the parliament of Great Britain to assure that the maritime provinces should at no time in the future have a lower representation in the House of Commons than in the Senate. This is what he says:

> Speaking for myself, I do not see how it would be possible for this parliament to attempt any alteration in the representation of the provinces without the consent of the provinces themselves. It was in that connection that the question was taken up before the Interprovincial Conference held last autumn in the city of Ottawa, and the result of the proceedings of that conference amounted to this, that the conference declined to take any action on the subject, saying that the matter was one for consideration of parliament.

Apparently the provinces agreed on the fairness of the terms of the amendment in 1915, because there was no objection taken. I repeat that Sir Robert Borden contended that there can be no alteration of the basis of confederation as to representation unless it is made with the consent of the provinces.

I pass on to what Mr. Meighen said on February 19, 1925. I quote from Hansard, page 335 of the debates of that year:

> Undoubtedly, the pact of confederation is a contract and there are rights involved therein not represented by the parliament of Canada. We could not put ourselves in the position of asking that rights so secured should be disturbed on our motion alone. The speech of the Minister of Justice determines, I think, without power of dispute, that there should never be suggestion of amendment affecting other parties to the contract save after conference and consent of those other parties.

I will now read, for the benefit of hon. members who interrupted a moment ago, what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Throughout the years he stood in the House of Commons as the representative of the rights of the people, as the champion of the constitutional privileges of minorities in this country, and as one who raised the standard of public life as few others have done. What did he say in 1906-7? He was followed by Sir Robert Borden, whose words, as quoted in Hansard of that session, page 2199, are these:

> I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman regarding the undesirability of lightly amending the terms of our constitution and am inclined to agree with him on the necessity of some consultation with the provinces, although of course all the provinces are represented here.

I pause to refer to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day, because Sir Robert Borden answered him in the succeeding words. The Minister of Justice said on May 28 last, as reported in Hansard, page 1936:

> The provinces, that is to say the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confided to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak.

Well, I give you not my opinion but that of a great constitutional lawyer, one time prime minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden. He said this—Hansard, 1907, volume 2, page 2200:

> But inasmuch as this is a federal compact which we are asked to vary, it is only right that each province should be consulted and its decision given, in the right of its separate entity.

This answers the argument that because in the House of Commons there are representatives from the different provinces, the provinces who entered into the pact, and their successors, should not be consulted in regard to any constitutional change in the basis of confederation.

No one can say that Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe would be a prejudiced witness. I quote from what he said in the House of Commons on February 18, 1925—Hansard, page 297:

> If confederation was a pact, an agreement, is it possible for one of the parties to the agreement, or rather for the body which resulted from the agreement, to amend, to alter the conditions of that pact without consulting and without securing the consent of the parties to the original agreement?

He does not restrict the consent of the provinces to matters coming within sections 91 and 92 and possibly 93, but covers the entire ambit of the act. Further on he says:

> As regards the United States as well as Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, they all agreed at the time of the enactment of the statute creating their constitution that they would have the right to alter it. They possess that right because it was made one of the conditions of the statute constituting them a state. Not so with Canada, because there were special conditions and difficulties in the way. I ask my hon. friend this question. Confederation was achieved and the new parliament was opened in 1867. Does he believe that two years afterwards, in 1869, for instance, this parliament could have fairly and reasonably amended the British North America Act or have asked the Imperial parliament to amend it without the consent of the four original provinces?

I ask the Minister of Justice, when he speaks, to answer that question. Does he answer it in the affirmative? Mr. Lapointe goes on:

Could he fairly say that that could have been done two years after the opening of this parliament? If it could not be done at that time, could it be done twenty-five years afterwards, or even fifty years afterwards, without the consent of the contracting parties in the pact of confederation?

Then he comes to the conclusion that we cannot ask power to alter, without the consent of the provinces, a constitution which is theirs as well as ours. That was the stand which he consistently took. Later, on March 20, 1924, as reported in Hansard of that year, page 520—I do not want to tire the house, but I want to trace this matter through because it shows the attitude taken by the great leaders since confederation—he said this:

It is a treaty between various colonies which entered into an agreement. They fixed what the powers of the central parliament should be, and they also fixed what the powers of the various provinces which succeeded the colonies of that time would be, and this was ratified and accepted by the Imperial parliament of the time. Everything we have or have not is because we wanted it so. Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities, and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper".

All through Mr. Lapointe's life his view was that if the rights of minorities were to be protected against an overwhelming majority in this house and in the senate, there could be no change of the pact of confederation without consultation with and the consent of the provinces. In that view he was not alone. I am not going to read the next quotation I have here, but I shall give the page. Mr. Lapointe said the same thing on February 18, 1925, and he was supported by a minister who a few short months ago sat where the Minister of Justice now sits. He was supported by a statesman, wise in experience and in years of public service, Mr. Crerar, who on February 19, 1925, said, as reported at page 318 of Hansard:

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice yesterday argued that confederation was in the nature of a treaty, and I agree with him in that assertion. That being the case, his suggestion that the matter be approached through the avenue of a conference with all the provinces is the first step that should be taken in dealing with it.

Further on he said:

I can quite appreciate the anxiety, or, shall I say even the fear, that my hon. friends from the province of Quebec may entertain as to the position which that province would be in in respect of the peculiar rights it enjoys under the constitution to-day, were we placed in the situation in this country where the constitution could be amended by the ordinary means of majority rule.

Sir, how times do change! In 1920 the Prime Minister of Canada brought up the question of the amendment of the British North America Act, and on March 16 he said, as reported at page 469 of Hansard:

The government should consider the advisability of an address being presented to His Majesty to have powers given to the parliament of Canada, subject to the concurrence of the several provinces of the dominion, to amend the constitution of Canada . . .

I point out that the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, said this:

. . . in such particulars as may be agreed upon as a result of conference between the provincial and federal authorities and approved by this parliament and the lgislatures of the different provinces.

In that, sir, the Prime Minister went somewhat farther than any other leader has gone. A while ago there was an interruption to the effect that I was taking a sectional stand, one which was unfair, or unjustified, ingenious, or something of the kind. But this is not the first time a question has arisen with regard to section 51, subsection 4, and the desirability or otherwise of changing the basis of representation by virtue of which Quebec receives sixty-five members. It has been discussed on a number of occasions. Again I must refer to the views expressed by Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, in 1932, in which he gave a better answer than I can give to the resolution now before the house. He recognized that the provinces should be consulted. He condemned any other method, which would have the effect of changing the basis of confederation. Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, now Viscount Bennett, accepted the view expressed by Mr. Lapointe against amending section 51 before the calling of an interprovincial conference. Mr. Bennett said that the conference was being called in view of labour conditions in the dominion and that the time then was not opportune. The very stand we take to-day was the stand taken by Mr. Lapointe in 1932, at pages 1592 and 1593 of Hansard. This is what Mr. Lapointe said in reply to the suggestions now made by the Minister of Justice, in this resolution:

I have tried to find in the debates on confederation and elsewhere the reason for the exception in subsection 4 of section 51, but have been unable to do so.

As a matter of fact no one seems to know why that section was placed in either the Quebec conference articles or the London conference articles. During one of the debates Mr. Bennett said that he had tried to ascertain the reason for it, and the only conclusion to which he could come was that it was meant to protect the representation of some of the maritime provinces, although there was no evidence to support that view. After reading the subsection he said:

Why this provision? I cannot find why it appears; I should be pleased if some one could give me a reason. Perhaps it was inserted to help some of the smaller provinces, but when it works the way we see it will work this year, certainly it is an anomaly which works unfairly. I am sure hon. members from Ontario want only representation by population.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; that is what Mr. Lapointe said, but he gave warning of the dangers which would follow the course which is being followed here. He knew the difficulties, he knew the unfairness, and he pointed them out. I shall quote his words, in order to place the record fairly before the house. He said:

Before confederation they fought for it, and that should be the principle governing that province. What amazes me is that this same principle is not working the other way. Why should not the representation decrease when its proportion of population with regard to the whole of Canada has not decreased by one-twentieth? Why should it increase if the number is increased by less than one-twentieth? As it is, any other province which would come under the same conditions keeps its representation, not on account of its own increase, but because of decreases in other parts of Canada,—and not of Quebec, which is taken as the pivot.

He mentions the same difficulties as were referred to by the Minister of Justice the other day in what I think was a masterful address. Mr. Lapointe saw the difficulties in 1938, but he also saw something else, the dangers. I continue with what he said:

A suggestion was made that in order to equalize with Ontario, the number of representatives from Quebec should be increased. I do not think that would be a fair way of settling it. I believe the representation of Quebec should remain at sixty-five, as fixed by the British North America Act, but that subsection 4 of section 51 should disapper. Then we would have a real representation by population.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

With that point of view is there disagreement? How, then, are we to change it? This is where Mr. Lapointe, with his farseeing vision, portrayed the situation, realizing as he did that representation by population was not being achieved under that section.

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK: Suppose the method which has just been suggested were followed, with which the hon. gentleman says he is in agreement, what would be the effect of it? Has the hon. gentleman worked out those figures?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These figures were given by the Minister of Justice. A perusal of Hansard by my hon. friend will give him the information he is asking for.

Mr. MAYBANK: Thank you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I continue with Mr. Lapointe's remarks:

The right hon. gentleman opposite has stated that before parliament meets again at the end of January there will be an interprovincial conference. There are certain changes in our constitution, and with regard to taxation, which seem desirable. I submit the Prime Minister should place this matter before the premiers from the various provinces. If that were done I believe they would come to the conclusion that subsection 4, which certainly works unfairly, ought to be repealed.

Mr. BRIDGES: Will the hon. member permit a question? I do not interrupt often, and I assure him I will not do it again. Is it the hon. member's contention that no amendment to any section of the British North America Act can or should be made without the unanimous consent of all the nine provinces?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently the minister has not been following the argument I have been advancing. I have been quoting the views expressed by his hon. friends, and after I establish that a departure in constitutional practice is being made in the resolution now before this house I will come to the situation he has in mind. Looking ahead a few years, this may well be a measure as a result of which the rights of minorities subjected to a majority in parliament will be destroyed. What did Mr. Lapointe say? He said the matter should be submitted to the provinces. He took that stand in 1932, and gave his successor in 1946 the answer as to the method to be adopted in order to secure fairness in representation. Not only did Hon. Mr. Crerar take that view, but Hon. J. L. Ralston took the same stand—and possibly this will answer the Minister of Fisheries. Speaking in this house on November 25, 1932, at page 1594, Mr. Ralston said:

I submit, Mr. Speaker, although it cannot be done in connection with this bill, that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe)—

That suggestion was a submission to the conference of provincial premiers.

—might well be accepted by the right hon. Prime Minister, the matter might be made a subject of discussion at the interprovincial conference, and in view of the fact that constantly during the last two or three sessions there has been forecast the possibility of amendments to the British North America Act, it seems to me this subject is one which might well engage the attention of those framing these amendments and discussing the subjects to be dealt with thereby.

Mr. Lapointe's view was the view of Mr. Ralston. It was the view of Mr. Crerar too.

Now, I have cleared away the situation as I see it by bringing before the house the views expressed by outstanding statesmen, and I could multiply those expressions almost without number. I have not referred to similar statements made by Sir John A. Macdonald, Cartier, Blake, Sir Allen Aylesworth, Mr. McCarthy, former ambassador to the United States. All the way down the line minister of justice after minister has taken this view.

I suggest that a mere reading of Hansard will show that whether you regard the British North America Act as a contract, a statute, a treaty, or a pact, without exception—I repeat, without exception—outstanding leaders since confederation have agreed that no material alteration may be made without consultation with the provinces. I submit that what is proposed is a material alteration of a provision which was founded on the Quebec conference, reiterated at the London conference, and made part and parcel of the British North America Act. It was so viewed by Mr. Lapointe and by all the other leaders up to that time. As I have already said, section 51 was born in the deliberations of the Quebec conference, and it was confirmed at the London conference, which did not adopt all the recommendations of the Quebec conference. One of the recommendations of the Quebec conference was that the provinces should look after the redistribution and the determination of the boundaries of the constituencies. Section 51, by the very circumstances connected with it, ratified as it was by all our leaders since confederation, is of the essence of the contract, pact, treaty, or call it what you will, of confederation. I warn this house and the country that if parliament passes a resolution for an address changing a basic section of the British North America Act without consultation with the provinces, it is doing what the leaders of the past up to and including Mr. Lapointe said could not be done without consultation with the provinces, namely, changing the basis of representation of any province.

For the moment the membership from the maritime provinces will not be decreased; but if that pouplation, in relation to the whole population, decreases what is to prevent some future parliament, without consulting Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, from passing an amendment removing the present limitation that the membership of a province may not fall below its representation in the senate? As a matter of fact Mr. Woodsworth, the distinguished predecessor of the present leader of the C.C.F. party, stated at page 1592 of Hansard for November 25, 1932:

There cannot be two or three different classes of Canadians in this country, with certain classes having superior rights to others. If a mistake was made in giving a fixed number of representatives to Prince Edward Island there is no reason why we should follow a bad precedent. The way to get away from that is to amend the British North America Act so that Prince Edward Island would have only its due number and not a number out of proportion to the rest of the country.

In this extraordinary resolution, Mr. Speaker, a precedent is being asked for the amendment of the confederation agreement and its basis. Parliament is being asked to change one of the sections—not a section thirty-one years old, but one going back to confederation itself—upon which confederation was based. The Conservative party, and the Progressive Conservative party, since confederation has believed in change based upon experience; but it believes that the constitution is the bedrock of the rights of minorities and will resist changes in that constitution, without consultation with the provinces, under which the rights of the provinces will be affected or under which minorities may be affected. Parliament is being asked to pass an address which to-morrow will become a precedent which may be used to destroy the rights of minorities if in this house there should be a majority desiring to do so. This is an example of the dangers inherent in not requiring consultation with the provinces about amendments not directly concerned with the division of powers between the dominion and the provinces, which by the way are the only ones the Minister of Justice says cannot be amended without the consent of or consultation with the provinces. Under the procedure of amendment in the address section 133 and many others might be repealed or altered by means of an address passed by a majority in parliament. This, sir, indicates the dangers inherent in this haphazard manner, this novel scheme which is now before the house, of amending the constitution.

The Minister of Justice has argued that the representation of the various provinces in the House of Commons is a matter exclusively for the federal authority, in that the provinces are represented here. Earlier I answered that argument with a quotation. He indicates, too, that the rights of the provinces are not interfered with. I answer that simply by saying that by increasing the membership of the house the relative influence of the provinces is altered. This resolution seems to comprehend merely an innocuous change in representation, but closer examination of its terms reveals the dangers with which the method to achieve it is fraught.

The minister endeavoured to make answer because, like all resourceful counsel, he anticipated the arguments which have been made. The resolution contains all the artifices of a political dodge. It dangles a bait designed to catch political favour, but destined if accepted to achieve a drastic change in and a dangerous departure from the very basis of confederation.

The change advocated may be designed with a view to securing equality of provinces, the foundation stone of confederation, and to achieve a greater measure of representation by population; but however desirable the objectives may be, the means taken to that end are in my opinion dangerous in the extreme.

Let us take one example. Suppose the communist party were to attain power in this country; parliament would be setting a precedent under which every section of the British North America Act but sections 91 and 92, and possibly 93, according to the interpretation placed thereon by the Minister of Justice could be changed by a simple majority vote. Some will say that that is an extreme case, but it is illustrative of how cautiously and carefully amendment should be considered. I do not hold out against constitutional changes, but I am unalterably opposed to constitutional changes being effected in the haphazard manner of this resolution.

No one can contend—I know some will say that we are opposed to amendments to the constitution—that the British North America Act should not be subject to amendment. Events and changes since confederation have shown the necessity for amendment. The dead hand of the past must not control the living present. But having regard to the events which culminated in confederation, and the arguments which were advanced—I have read and reread them—and having regard to the divisions of our country racially and geographically, the British North America Act should not be amended by any means in the nature of a subterfuge that will open the door to a denial of the rights of minorities by the decision of a majority in parliament.

I have referred to the historical background. I have referred to the dangers inherent in the resolution. Do I believe in change? Do I believe in necessity for reform? Has the government any monopoly on that? When the government convened a dominion-provincial conference, only financial matters were brought before it, and that at a time when the people of Canada were demanding national action, and when other amendments were asked for. Yet there was no consultation when consultation was available.

I could do no better than to quote the words of Mr. Lapointe when he said on February 18, 1925:

> Mr. Lapointe: . . . As I have said, I would not like to leave the impression that my own view is that no changes should be made at any time, or that no changes are possible. I agree that we are living in 1925, and not in 1865. The problems of Canada must be settled in the light of the present situation.
> Mr. MacLean (York): By the men of to-day.
> Mr. Lapointe: By the men of to-day, yes. I am not one of those who are riveted to the past and who are prepared to deny to our children the liberty of the future, but those changes the necessity for which may be seen as a result of our experience of sixty years cannot be made unless you proceed in a legal and constitutional way; they cannot be made arbitrarily.

I repeat those words in this year of grace 1946. Changes should be made in a legal way; changes should be made in a constitutional way; changes should not be made arbitrarily. Then Mr. Lapointe said:

> They cannot be made only at the will and at the request of the dominion parliament; but those who are just as much interested as the dominion parliament in this matter must have their say, must be consulted, and must give their assent.

In this he went as far as the Prime Minister went in 1920, in the quotation I placed before the house earlier.

The stream of freedom must be preserved. Our constitution is the custodian of freedom. Widespread invasions of that freedom have taken place, and we have seen this happen in recent years. This address, if passed by parliament, will undermine constitutional safeguards, and in doing so will drive the first wedge that may well lead to the destruction of the liberties of the minorities among our people.

Admitting that this section of the British North America Act may be amended by a majority of parliament, all that remain outside the sphere of this parliament, according to the Minister of Justice are those sections dealing with the division of power between the dominion and the provinces. I quote the words of Junius as to the operation of precedent:

One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, to-day is doctrine.

I say to the house and to the country: look at this measure not for what it immediately achieves, but for the dangerous potentialities of any such precedent as this. The Prime Minister of Canada once said, as reported in Hansard of January 21, 1935:

We have looked upon the constitution of our country as the safeguard of its liberties and as the home of its freedom.

That is the test, I respectfully submit, parliament should apply to the resolution now before the house—the test of looking not at the advantages of the present to be achieved by this short-cut method of amendment of our constitution, but rather at the grave potentialities inherent in making a precedent for amendment of our constitution by a majority of parliament. The great danger of attractive measures such as this is that of the people and the people's representatives, by reason of the very attractiveness, giving up the substance for the shadow.

This party subscribes to the view expressed by Edmund Burke, in a speech on the reform of representation, when he said:

Our constitution is like our island, which uses and restrains its subject sea; in vain the waves roar. In that constitution, I know, and exultingly feel, both that I am free, and that I am not free dangerously to myself or to others.

Believing as I do in proper safeguards against tyrannical acts of majorities who would deny tolerance, and believing that these basic rights in the constitution should not be interfered with without consultation with the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith):

That the motion be amended by deleting the words: "A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:" and substituting therefor:—

And whereas it is desirable that the government should consult with the several provinces in respect of the said matter.

Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address to His Majesty in the following terms.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss this resolution, and the amendment thereto, not as a lawyer but simply as a layman and a member of parliament who seeks to do what is best for the country in which he lives.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) quote Edmund Burke's reference to the British constitution. The glory of the British constitution is that it does not exist in the form in which we know constitutions, and that it is ever amenable to the will of the majority of the representatives of the people. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that if this parliament decides that something should be done in the interests of all the people of Canada, and it is within its constitutional right to do so, the will of this parliament should prevail. From my reading of Canadian history, from all that I have read of former debates in the House of Commons, and in spite of all the quotations that have been placed before us this afternoon, I am of the opinion that this address to His Majesty is within the rights of this parliament.

Actions speak louder than words. Sometimes politicians shift their position according to the side of the house on which they happen to sit at a given moment. If we look back over the history of our country since confederation we find that important amendments have been made to the constitution. One in particular which upset the whole basis of representation was made in 1915. At that time a resolution was placed before the house by the Right Honourable Sir Robert Borden, Conservative prime minister of that day, which was much more explicit in its references to the British North America Act than anything contained in this proposal. That resolution was moved by Sir Robert Borden on June 11, 1914, one year before the house adopted it. Let us look at its terms. It read:

Resolved, that a humble address be presented to His Majesty praying that he may graciously be pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner set forth in the draft bill hereto attached.

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

I would draw attention to what followed:

1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act, 1867, or in any act amending the same, or in any order in council or terms or conditions of union made or approved under the said acts, or in any act of the parliament of Canada;

Then it went on to alter the whole basis of representation in the Senate. That was a much more fundamental change, because the Senate has always been regarded by the minority—I think they lean upon a broken reed—as having been established to protect the rights of minorities. The resolution proposed also to alter the proportionate representation of Quebec in the upper chamber. A new and fourth division of the dominion was agreed upon, and the western provinces were to be represented by twenty-four Senators instead of the number by which they were previously represented. This was done in 1915 under the leadership of a Conservative prime minister and may I pay tribute to Sir Robert Borden by saying that he was possibly one of the greatest constitutional lawyers who has ever sat in this house. This was done by and with the consent of all the parties in this house. Therefore I am amazed to see in 1946, thirty-one years later, an amendment moved in this house which would bring a new basis into confederation. We who represent the western parts of this country are extremely anxious to see that the representation in this parliament of the western provinces shall be adequate. I believe it is the intention of the government to try to give that representation at this time. On the basis of representation by population according to provinces I shall support the resolution.

My hon. friend spent a great deal of time trying to frighten the house with what might happen in the future if the communist party came to power. Let me tell my hon. friend that if the communist party comes to power—I do not believe it ever will—it will come to power with the approval of the majority of the people of Canada. If it comes to power, this parliament will disappear; there will be no constitution, and there will be no parliament. My hon. friend is setting up a straw man to knock down and to frighten old ladies of both sexes. I apologize to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), who does not fall within the category either of being old or of being frightened.

My hon. friend brought forward some arguments other than from the constitutional point of view. He said that we were making an increase when economy demands perhaps even a decrease in the membership of this house. Perhaps it would be stating more nearly what he said to say that there are some people in the country who advocate a decrease in the membership of this house. The most important institution in this country is parliament. To my mind representation in this parliament is the most important privilege that the people of Canada have. If representation is to be adequate and real, then the members of this house must keep in close touch with their constituents. A decrease in the membership of the house would mean an enlarging of the size of the constituencies in some parts of Canada, which would militate against the democratic procedures of which we approve. So that argument surely was unworthy of the speech, fine in many respects, which my hon. friend has just made. Certainly it is not in accord with the desires and the wishes of the people of the part of Canada from which we both come. Delay until the next census? My hon. friend has argued to-day that we have to stand by the constitution. The constitution requires that a redistribution shall be made after every ten-year period. Then he rises in this house and urges the government to delay in carrying out the provisions of the constitution for another few years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I never advocated such a thing. I said that there were those who said these things, but I was dealing with one particular thing. My hon. friend has placed words in my mouth that I never used.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry if I misinterpreted my hon. friend but I think a good many members of this house must have found the same difficulty as I had in listening to him. I could not tell when he was reading quotations and when he was reading prepared parts of his speech. But if I have done him an injustice I regret it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Speaking of reading speeches, you are doing it right now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not reading my speech. I was just referring to notes I made while my hon. friend was speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind all hon. members that they must address the chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to notes I made when my hon. friend was speaking.

It is true that there has been a serious loss of population in the western provinces and particularly in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In 1941 this house gave approval to deferring redistribution in the hope that when the war ended and people had returned from the armed services and from industry to their home constituencies our population might have been recovered. I do not know whether it has or not. There is a quinquennial census in the west this year and the question whether our population has decreased or increased may be settled by that enumeration. But in fairness to other members of the house who agreed to deferring redistribution in 1943 I am not at this moment asking that another privilege of that kind be granted to western Canada. I believe that the proposal placed before the house by the government at the present time is fair, just, sound and constitutional.

The hon. member for Lake Centre has preached this afternoon what is in effect a new doctrine. In 1915 only one province, according to Doctor Skelton, took advantage of the privilege of appearing before the special parliamentary committee on amending the British North America Act, and his comments in the case of that amendment are as follows:

> Object: To increase the number of senators and alter the main senatorial divisions.
> Procedure: The procedure adopted was that the act was passed by the United Kingdom parliament following an address by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada. Prince Edward Island made representations before a House of Commons committee, which were not accepted. Other provinces were not consulted and made no representations. The suggestion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. O. Turgeon, now Senator Turgeon, that the provinces should be consulted, but it was not acted upon.

That is the position regarding the fundamental change which was made at that time.

I shall not attempt to answer the legal arguments of hy hon. friend. I am not a lawyer and I leave it to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and other lawyers in the house to deal with the legal aspects of this question. But the thing that presents itself to me is this. Is Canada a nation? Or is Canada merely a collection of individual provinces, each one willing to go its own way? That is the question which occurs to me. Is Canada to be another Balkan peninsula of warring states, or are we to build this great country into a nation? I say that arguments, constitutional or otherwise, such as we have heard this afternoon serve no useful purpose in promoting national unity in this country. Of course they undoubtedly reflect the point of view of certain sectional interests. It is not an unknown phenomenon for my ultra-imperialist friends of the Progressive Conservative party to be in secret alliance with sectional interests in one of the great provinces.

Mr. FULTON: Where are the frightened old women now?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not frightened. I say the same thing in Ontario and Quebec and all over.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That will be a new experience.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend says, "That will be a new experience." I say the same thing in all parts of Canada. Perhaps my hon. friend does not know that I have been followed by the same newspaper men right across Canada who found that I said the same things everywhere. I do not refuse to call this country Canada in this house and then, within a week, speak of the kingdom of Canada in the province of Quebec. So I say it is not a strange phenomenon because the same thing has been observed in the past.

If my hon. friend's argument of this afternoon were accepted it would result in the two provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan losing seven seats after the next election.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: Seven seats after the next election, because I am convinced of this, that it would be difficult indeed to get certain provincial premiers to agree to this proposal. Premier Drew of Ontario sees that Ontario now has—what is it?—seven or eight seats more than she is entitled to according to population. I give that just as an example. There might be other premiers who feel the same way about the matter. But in my opinion, to do justice to the western provinces, representation by population is the only basis upon which justice can be done.

We are told that we run the danger of the rights of minorities being lost. Is there a right of any minority involved in the resolution that is before the house? I would say there is, and that is the right of the minority to have adequate representation in this house as against the majority and against overrepresentation by one province.

My hon. friend quoted from a former leader of this movement, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. I took down the page number he gave, but I am afraid he made an error in the number, or maybe I did not hear him correctly. The page which I think he gave was 1592 of Hansard for 1935. Mr. Woodsworth is not reported on that page, but that is immaterial. I will take it for granted that Mr. Woodsworth said that. But what I will add is that Mr. Woodsworth may have said that, and in logic he was sound, but in the matter of representation in parliament regional representation may be as important as population representation. For example, I believe that the northwest territories are entitled as well as the Yukon to a member in this house, because of the mining, trapping and other interests which are unrepresented here in the sense in which they should be represented. On the same basis, I believe the maritime provinces have a right to regional representation; and in spite of what Mr. Woodsworth said in 1935 my opinion would be that the provision in the act is not unfair and does not seriously impair the argument that we should have representation by population.

What are the minority rights guaranteed in the act? Is one of these rights that the basis of representation shall be along the present lines? I think not. The minority rights written into the British North America Act are surely the religious, educational and certain other rights of a minority. We are in no way interfering with those rights. Let us bear in mind that there were three provinces which entered confederation: Canada—united Upper and Lower, subsequently called Quebec and Ontario—Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. In the long agitation, from 1840 up to 1858 and beyond, while confederation was being discussed, the argument was that there should be adopted a basis of representation by population. That was the incentive in the minds of many of the fathers of confederation, especially George Brown. We are now endeavouring to carry out the principle of representation by population. Why was sixty-five adopted by the province of Quebec as the basis of representation? Surely merely as a convenient yardstick. That was all.

Mr. REID: It has worked out fairly well, though.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has worked out fairly well, but we find in these days, owing to the evolution of our constitution, it is not working out as well as it might have worked out. Consequently it is now suggested to do what the fathers of confederation intended we should do, have a parliament based more nearly on representation by population. The maritime provinces—and I am not complaining about this—are safeguarding their representation. But the present redistribution, if carried out on the old basis, would be, as I have said, unfair to the western provinces, and as we see from the resolution and its preamble, it is now designed to rectify that wrong.

There is something else I should like to say. There were three conferences which led up to confederation: Charlottetown, Quebec and London. When the fathers of confederation or a delegation of them went to London, did they go there bound by all that was laid down at Charlottetown and Quebec? They did not. In London a number of changes and adjustments were made to the resolutions which had been adopted with the approval of the various provinces, indicating clearly that, having come to a basis of agreement, that agreement in detail might be varied outside Canada and apart from consultation with the home provinces. That was the situation in London, and adjustments were made there. So I say that the contention that the provinces should be consulted in matters which lie within the competence of Parliament is a new contention. As I indicated earlier, the House of Commons committee which was set up in 1915 received representations from only one province; no other province thought it worth while even to appeal against what was a fundamental change in the basis of representation in the senate.

My hon. friend quoted to-day from Sir Robert Borden. As a matter of fact I happened to run across the same speech, but if I read it aright it confirms the position I am taking and does not confirm the position which my hon. friend takes. I may quote a little more extensively from it. This is what Sir Robert Borden had to say in introducing the resolution, the preamble of which I read in part: Hansard, 1914, page 5278:

> So far as the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are concerned, we are agreed on both sides of the house that the parliament of Canada has the constitutional power to increase the representation of the senate of each of those provinces from four to six as is proposed.

"We are agreed on both sides of the house" —and no one demurred—that the parliament of Canada had the right to vary the representation in the senate; in other words, that this parliament had a right to change the constitution in the very particulars which we are discussing to-day. That is what Sir Robert Borden said.

Mr. BROOKS: But not as far as the British North America Act is concerned.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. It is true that as far as Manitoba and British Columbia were concerned they were on a different footing. As far as Alberta and Saskatchewan were concerned this parliament had the right to vary that representation. They did more than that. If you will read the amendment of 1915, as I imagine most hon. members have done, you will find that parliament not only settled the representation in the senate of the provinces which then existed in Canada, but went farther and actually provided for representation in the senate of a new province which might come into Canada, specifically mentioning Newfoundland, and laying it down that in the event of admission to the union Newfoundland would have an additional six members of the upper house. I do not think those who argue as my hon. friend argues have, in the light of what has been done, a leg to stand on. The whole history of this country since confederation surely points to the fact that this parliament has the right to deal with representation in this parliament. We do it when we redistribute the seats; we have done it in connection with the senate, and now we propose to do the same thing again in connection with representation in this house. It is, I take it, our right to do it.

May I quote from Sir Robert Borden's remarks of June 11, 1914, at page 5278 of Hansard? Hon. members who have read this debate will recollect that it took place right at the end of the session. There were certain amendments suggested by the senate, and the following year the address came before the house again. There was a short debate and the address was adopted. This is what Sir Robert Borden said in connection with it:

> My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, in the course of the debate upon these bills, suggested—what had occurred I daresay to some of us before—that a fourth division should be constituted, which should comprise the four western provinces of the dominion, namely, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. He suggested to me—> —that the better course would be this: that we should not proceed with the bill at this session; but that, inasmuch as legislation was necessary for the purpose of increasing the representation of the province of British Columbia in the senate, we should accomplish that result as to all the provinces in that way; and that, further than that, we should constitute a fourth division and ask for the necessary amendment to the British North America Act for that purpose. My right hon. friend also suggested to me that he thought that, in case of the future constitution of any additional province in Canada, it was desirable that that province should be represented by not less than six members in the senate. We have the power to deal with that under our constitution at the present time.

That is, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

That is the statement made by Sir Robert Borden. Let us now turn to the same debate and see what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said. I shall quote from page 5280 of Hansard in the same debate on June 11, 1914. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said this:

> There can be no doubt that this parliament as constituted has the power to increase the representation of those two provinces.

That is the senatorial representation of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Therefore I am at a loss to understand why in 1946 we should go back to a position which was not held by the leaders of the two great parties in 1914, or why we should reverse the practice which has been in effect throughout the years, of this parliament passing a humble address to His Majesty from time to time, praying for amendments to the B.N.A. Act when this house felt they were needed, namely, amendments in the interests of all the people of Canada.

I think I have said pretty well all that I wish to say on this matter at this time. But before taking my seat I should like to say that surely if this country is to be regarded as a nation, matters which are assigned to this parliament by our constitution must be within the right of this parliament to deal with. We have no right to interfere with something that has been assigned to one of the provinces without that province's consent. That I readily grant, and with that I agree. But I maintain that we would stifle this parliament completely if we accepted the position that my hon. friends are accepting and agree that, before we do something which, according to Borden and Laurier, in the important debate to which I have referred, the last time that change in representation was made in one of the two house of parliament, lies within our rights, we should for one moment do other than exercise that right of our own volition, and appeal to the people of Canada when the times comes to validate the action that we have taken.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I must state at first that I find myself in a peculiar situation regarding this resolution. In fact I am strongly in favour of the principle which is at the basis of it and I believe that it will be supported by the great majority of the population of the country; but I cannot agree with everything that the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said when he introduced the resolution. I am further convinced that any amendment of our constitution should be discussed with and by the provincial governments before it is acted upon, especially when it deals with the representation which, according to the terms of the resolution, must be calculated on a provincial basis. If it had been possible to settle the redistribution without being obliged to amend our constitution I would have more heartily supported the resolution; but when I notice that the result of the amendment will be the disappearance of the grave injustice created by paragraph 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act I cannot do otherwise than admit that, notwithstanding the defects of procedure, the resolution carries with it the remedy to a serious condition for the people of the country.

I wish, however, to take this opportunity to make some remarks on the question of the procedure of amending our constitution. I have listened with great interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I deeply regret that he did not make a similar speech in 1943, when the constitution was amended in spite of the opposition of a very few members in this house. We based our objections on the very same grounds raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. At the time he was in favour of amending the constitution.

We have read and heard many suggestions regarding the procedure to be adopted for the amending of our constitution. Different points of view have been expressed by experts, politicians and laymen. But there is one point on which I believe everyone agrees at the present time, namely, that the time has come for our country to adopt, once and for all, a procedure which would enable us to amend our constitution, when necessary, without being obliged to have recourse to another country; provided, however, that this procedure does not come into contradiction with the principle which was at the basis of confederation, namely, a compact between the two races, the French and the English.

The history of the confederation movement, together with the Quebec and London resolutions, indicates clearly that the provinces of Canada could not have united in 1867 except on the basis of a federal constitution, and also on the basis of effective guarantees for the interests of the French minority, especially in respect of language, civil law and religion.

At this time I should like to cite some declarations of persons in authority. As early as 1920 in this very chamber, the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), said, as reported at page 468 of Hansard:

> But I would like to submit to my hon. friends opposite that perhaps it would be more in accord with the status which Canada has as a self-governing dominion or nation within the British empire if, instead of presenting an address to His Majesty to ask His Majesty's consent to the parliament of the United Kingdom amending the British North America Act in the two particulars mentioned, the government shoul consider the advisability of an address being presented to His Majesty to have powers given to the parliament of Canada, subject to the concurrence of the several provinces of the dominion, to amend the constitution of Canada in such particulars as may be agreed upon as a result of conference between the provincial and federal authorities and approved by this parliament and the legislatures of the different provinces.
> I have here a copy of the constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia and of the Dominion of New Zealand. Both Australia and New Zealand have the right to amend their own constitutions in the particulars mentioned therein. Why should this parliament not have the same powers to amend its own constitution, subject to the safeguards that are necessary to comply with the spirit of the act of confederation, as have these other nations within the British empire?

[Mr. Dorion.]

In the course of the same debate, Hon. Mr. Doherty, Minister of Justice, speaking for the then Conservative government, said at page 479:

> Now nobody has ever disputed that legally the legislative power is supreme in the parliament of the United Kingdom and it follows that the British North America Act—though in reality and in substance a compact between the provinces is in form an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom. Such being the case when that act has to be modified we have to go through the form of addressing ourselves to that parliament of the United Kingdom. But to suggest that that throws any doubt upon our constitutional status as a nation within this empire I think only implies a confusion between what may be the requirements of the law and what, side by side with those requirements of law, may be the constitutional rights of the nations or peoples within the empire. We have the two things, we have the law and the constitution, and they do not always agree—sometimes they are in absolute contradiction.

He went on to say:

> The hon. gentleman went on to say apropos of this condition, that what we ought to have, instead of what we are asking in these resolutions, is a power in this parliament, subject to the concurrence of the provinces, to amend our own constitution. In that I am most heartily at one with the hon. gentleman.

Since then, many other debates have taken place in this house, and I believe I can state without fear of contradiction that every time this question was raised the official policy of the Liberal as well as of the Conservative party remained the same; that is to say, that to complete our status as a sovereign nation within the British commonwealth we should not suffer the humiliation of being obliged to humbly request another country to amend our own constitution. I did not deem it necessary to report any declarations by members of the C.C.F. party, because it is a well known fact throughout the country that since its foundation the leaders of that party have expressed their views on this matter on many occasions. The late Mr. Woodsworth, first leader of the C.C.F., and also its present leader have not only seized the opportunity but grasped every occasion to claim for our country this element of soverignty.

I deem it proper to recall a principle which is at the basis of our constitution and which has been clearly stated by jurists as well as by political leaders on many occasions. This constitution, like that of all countries connected with the British empire, is partly written and partly unwritten. In the course of the 1926 electoral campaign the Prime Minister took advantage of several occasions to emphasize the soundness of the confederative pact. In Le Soleil, mouthpiece of the Liberal party in Quebec, we find in the edition of August 24, 1926, the following declaration made by the Prime Minister at Sherbrooke:

We stand for the rights and freedom of the people and I hope that the Conservatives will follow me.

Our opponents talk about annexation and accuse me of such intention. . . . We have but one aim, the defence of the constitution. We desire to be one nation among the self-governing nations of the British empire, no more no less. This British constitution for which we fight is the most precious heritage won by centuries of fighting. The tie uniting Canada to the British empire has been strengthened by the means of war sacrifices and British immigration. . . .

The constitution is something sacred, partially written and partially unwritten. It has its source in a far off past and tangibly shaped itself in our traditions. It is founded on the customary right and is moulded by means of precedents, of grand charters and peoples' rights. Nobody has seen it and nobody can wholly define it; but one can feel its presence whenever peoples' freedom and rights are threatened, because it is the result and the deed of the best British tie born out of secular struggles. Throughout the dominions, it constitutes a component part of loyalty. It is a pendulum against any tendency of severance or annexation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who was that?

Mr. DORION: The present Prime Minister, in 1926. I believe it is an indisputable fact that our constitution is founded not only upon the British North America Act but also upon precedents which have become, so to speak, part of the constitution. It goes without saying that these precedents cannot be in contradiction with written text, but they have been accepted as an explanation of the letter of the text. This is why they have come to be accepted as the written law itself. It is in the light of this principle that I intend to show that the procedure of amending our constitution must be carefully studied so as to protect the rights of minorities and of the provinces.

I do not need to recall that our country is the only one in the world that cannot amend its constitution in its own way. Many reasons can be given to explain this anomaly, but the fact is that this situation does exist at the present time. That is why on so many previous occasions the Canadian government has thought fit to study the question. The first occasion this question was discussed was, I think, in October, 1887, when a conference was held of all the provinces except Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. In the course of this conference special consideration was given to some proposed amendments of the British North America Act. The representatives of the provinces made many suggestions as to the amendments they wished adopted; yet they did not touch the main question of the procedure to be followed for the amending of the constitution. They seem to have taken it for granted that the only way to amend it was by imperial enactment. Later, in 1927, a dominion-provincial conference was held in Ottawa from November 3 to November 10. According to official reports, the question of "procedure in amending the British North America Act" was the subject of discussion during an entire session of the conference.

This dominion-provincial conference was held shortly after the imperial conference at which the status of the British dominions was finally established according to the terms of the Statute of Westminster. It was then clearly stated that the present method was not consistent with dominion status, and the question was asked whether Canada should not have the same powers over its constitution as had the sister self-governing dominions. It was then admitted that the constitution could not be regarded as rigid and inflexible and must be subject to change with the changing times. It was therefore only a question of the best procedure to be adopted under the circumstances. At the conclusion of this debate it was stated that the government would carefully consider all opinions on the subject.

In April, 1931, before the passing of the Statute of Westminster, the provinces were consulted through the medium of a conference with the dominion, for two reasons: first, because a question arose whether the removal of the barrier of the Colonial Laws Validity Act should extend to provincial legislation as well as to dominion legislation. The dominion was having that barrier removed and the provinces stated they also wanted it removed.

The other reason was that the report of the 1930 imperial conference which was to be the basis of the statute of Westminster, was figuring to preserve the status quo with regard to the distribution of powers between federal and provincial governments and to the way in which the British North America Act was to be amended. No resolution was adopted at this conference with the provinces as to the method of amending the constitution, because it was announced at that time that a conference would be held between the dominion and the provinces at a later date when the whole question would be taken up. All that was sought to do in 1931 was to ensure that, for the time being, the status quo was not altered by the statute of Westminster, as regards constitutional amendment.

The fourth time this question was considered by the authorities was in 1935 when, at the session of that year, a special committee on the British North America Act was set up. This committee held many sessions from January, 1935, to June of the same year. Many experts in constitutional law were heard as witnesses, and finally a report was made to the House of Commons on the 19th of June, 1935. I wish to quote two paragraphs of this report, which will show that, even if they did not come to a final conclusion on the question, it was considered as very important, and it was thought advisable that the question should be finally settled as soon as possible.

I quote from the report:

The committee recognizes that there is a divergence of opinion with respect to the question of whether or not the British North America Act is a statutory recognition of a compact among the four original provinces of the dominion and as to the necessity or otherwise of provincial concurrence in amendments. Without expressing any opinion upon that question, the committee feels that in the present case, and at the present time, it is advisable in the interest of harmony and unity that there should be no consultation with the provinces with respect to the adoption of a definite mode of amendment or the enactment of amending legislation which might seriously alter the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion.

The last part of the report reads as follows:

In view of the fact that the several provinces did not feel it advisable to give the committee the benefit of their views with respect to the method of procedure to be followed in amending the constitution, the committee is of the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter of the resolution is finally made, that the opinions of the provinces should be obtained otherwise if at all possible and for that reason recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be held as early as possible in the present year to study the subject matter of the resolution. The proposed conference should have ample time in which to study every phase of the question.

In view of the above recommendation the committee expressly refrains from recommending any form of procedure for amendment so as to leave the proposed conference entirely free in its study of the question, except that the committee is definitely of the opinion that minority rights agreed upon and granted under the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

One may ask himself why the fathers of confederation did not provide in their project of constitution the ways and means of amending it. I do not think any explanation can be found anywhere for the lack of this provision. The most probable reason was that they believed the terms of the confederation were broad enough for the settlement of any problem that could arise in consequence of the establishment of Canadian confederation. They must have thought that the clause regarding the residuary powers would make all the problems very easy to settle. There is one thing certain: neither in the Quebec resolution nor in the London resolutions was there any question of adopting a procedure for the amending of the constitution.

It was not very long after the confederation that this question of amending the constitution arose. The first amendment took place in 1870 when the Manitoba Act was passed. Since some diversion of opinions had arisen on the question of constitutionality of section 146 of the British North America Act, the Canadian parliament in 1871 petitioned the imperial government to present to the parliament of the United Kingdom a law to dissipate any doubts.

In 1875, the imperial parliament adopted an amendment along the lines suggested by the governor general in council for the changing of section 18 of the British North America Act.

The third amendment was passed in 1886 when there was adopted a law intituled "an act respecting the representation of the parliament of Canada in territories which, for the time being, formed part of the Dominion of Canada, but are not included in any province." In other words, the object of the amendment was to empower parliament to provide for representation of territories in the Senate and House of Commons.

In April, 1907, the House of Commons and the Senate adopted a joint resolution asking the imperial parliament to pass a fourth amendment to permit the increase and regulation of federal subsidies to the provinces.

In 1915, another amendment was passed to increase the number of the senators and to alter the divisions of Canada in relation to the constitution of the senate.

An amendment was passed in 1916 to extend for a year the duration of the parliament elected in 1911. In 1930, a new amendment was passed to return the national resources to the western provinces. In 1940, an amendment was adopted by the parliament of the United Kingdom (to institute unemployment insurance amongst the class of subjects enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act).

Finally, the last amendment was passed in 1943 under the following title: "an act to provide for the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons of Canada consequent to decennial census taken in the year 1941."

A few words of comment on these amendments will be, I think, worthy of interest. It must be noted, first, that the amendment of 1875 was passed by the imperial parliament at the request of the Canadian government, without any resolution of the parliament itself.

This was the only time that such a procedure was adopted, but once is enough to show that the lack of procedure in such an important matter may lead to any sort of abuses.

On this occasion Sir John A. Macdonald declared that he deprecated any infringement upon the provisions of the British North America Act in a manner which would interfere with the rights of the different provinces of the dominion. He believed, however, that there were occasions when parliament might address Her Majesty in regard to bills, the validity of which were questioned, without referring to the provinces, but with the greatest of circumspection. In all the other instances, the amendments of the British North America Act were passed after a resolution of the Canadian parliament.

There is also, as regards these amendments, another aspect of the question that should be carefully considered. As I said a few minutes ago, there was an amendment in 1907 regarding the grants by the dominion government to the provinces. This was an amendment of section 118 of the British North America Act in which it is clearly stated that " such grants should be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada."

In 1906, there was held in Ottawa an interprovincial conference at which the provincial governments passed a resolution to the effect that a measure would be submitted to the parliament of Canada for an increase of subsidies and that an amendment is judged necessary.

Following this interprovincial conference, a resolution was passed by the Senate and House of Commons requesting from the imperial parliament an amendment of the abovementioned section 118 of the British North America Act.

However, British Columbia opposed this resolution. Objections of this province were conveyed to the secretary of state for the colonies in London; but in spite of this opposition, the imperial parliament passed the act requested, with some minor changes. Therefore, in this instance, the imperial parliament adopted an amendment of our constitution, notwithstanding the opposition of one Canadian province.

Furthermore, in 1943, objection was raised by the leaders of the two political parties in the province of Quebec against the proposed amendment regarding the redistribution. Even then, in spite of these objections, the resolution was passed by the Canadian parliament and the amendment was granted by the British parliament.

We must admit, as demonstrated at the beginning of my remarks, that precedents form part of our constitution, and taking into account what has taken place as regards the amendments to our constitution since 1867, we must conclude that the British parliament can amend our constitution, even when serious objections are raised by the provinces and even when the only request is made by the Canadian government.

Therefore we have the right to contend that our constitution has become an ordinary law which can be changed at the request of any political party which happens to be in power. This is a serious situation, and that is the reason why we must see to it that some protection be given to this constitution of ours, because we have here in Canada provincial rights as well as minority rights that are the basis of confederation. These rights should be preserved at all costs.

I do not intend to discuss the procedure itself which should be adopted for the amending of our constitution, but I should like to show the necessity of setting up a commission to study this procedure. One of the main reasons why the special committee set up in 1935 by the House of Commons could not arrive at a better conclusion was that the provinces had not been called to take part in the setting up and the proceedings of the committee. Messages were sent to all the provinces in the following terms:

The special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act desires to have the views of your government with respect to methods of securing amendments to said act. The resolution referred to the committee follows:

"Resolved that in the opinion of this house a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope."

While the committee does not object to the personal attendance of a representative of your government, it was thought less costly to ask for a written submission. Copies of proceedings have been sent you, please intimate when we may expect to receive your submission.

In the replies of all the provinces one may notice a similar point of view which can be summarized as follows: This matter should be approached by a conference of representatives of provinces and dominion. That is why my suggestion is that if a commission can be set up it should be with the concurrence of all the provincial governments.

I should like, however, to point out that special care should be taken to the effect that all the major political parties representing the people should collaborate with the provincial governments in each province in the appointing of the provincial representatives to this conference. Special care should also be taken to have on such a commission representatives of provincial minorities. I would also suggest that the deans of law faculties in the dominion be called to participate personally, or through representatives, in the work of this commission.

As regards the representation of the dominion government, I should think that some of our experts in constitutional law could be called upon to form part of the delegation. I should like to mention especially some of the outstanding experts like Professor Kennedy, Mr. P. C. Edwards, Doctor Beauchesne and Doctor Ollivier.

One may object to such a proposal on the ground that the personnel of this commission might be too numerous. After having given full consideration to this matter, I came to the conclusion that this objection would be counterweighed by the fact that such a commission would receive satisfactory appreciation by the people of the country. This would also be a way of expediting the business in organizing some sub-committees who could prepare the suggestions for the commission itself.

The last important point I should like to submit to the attention of this house is that the report of this commission should be adopted by each of all the provinces, as well as by the Canadian parliament. I sincerely believe that with the concurrence of all the interested parties there surely can be found a way of amending our constitution which would meet with the agreement of every province.

Therefore, to summarize my contention, I should like to say, first, that the Canadian government must take, at the earliest opportunity, the initiative of setting up a commission to study the procedure of amending our constitution; second, that the provinces must be invited to collaborate in the setting up of this commission which could not be organized if any of the provinces objected to it; third, that the deans of law faculties throughout the dominion should be invited to collaborate in the work of this commission; fourth, that the report of this commission should be sent to the dominion government and to the governments of all the provinces at the same time and, fifth, that to come into force, this report should be adopted by the dominion parliament and by each one of the provincial legislatures.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that in voting in favour of this resolution I sincerely hope it will be the last time we are called upon to discuss a resolution of this kind.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. ROCH PINARD (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of these remarks I wish to express the astonishment I experienced when I noted how some hon. members have decided to oppose the present resolution. I had thought—I trust my naivety will be excused—that this resolution would be adopted unanimously, that is to say without a single dissenting voice. As a matter of fact it appeared to me strange that any of the people's representatives in this chamber could oppose the principle laid down in the measure we are considering, a principle by virtue of which the very one who fights it has the right to speak in this house.

This principle constitutes the very basis of our system of government. When I heard certain of our opponents state their intention of voting against the resolution I could not keep from thinking of the injustice of their attitude. By their opposition to this measure they wish to deny to others the right they at present enjoy of speaking in the name of the population after having been chosen by a certain number of citizens who have the right to demand a representative who will be their spokesman in this parliament.

I know that several of those who have opposed the resolution have stated that they are not fighting its underlying principle or spirit, and I will go so far as to say that nobody in this house can take exception to the essential feature and purpose of this measure. But I firmly believe that all those who have taken upon themselves to join battle with us by raising objections on the score of delay or for the sake of appearances perform nevertheless the same job and seek the same result, which is to prevent each of the provinces making up this country of ours from having in the House of Commons the number of representatives to which its population entitles it.

There are several ways of combating legislation which one does not want to see adopted or approved. Exception can be taken to its spirit, or one can attack its substance and its form; one can bring forward amendments thereto, or again one can suggest postponements or formalities before it is adopted. When legislation involves the enunciation of a principle which it would be dangerous to deny or to ignore, such as is the case here, they go about it more skilfully. Opponents insinuate that they unhesitatingly accept the principle laid down; they even go so far as to pretend that they are its only true champions. Then some parliamentary means or expedient of procedure is contrived to combat the measure and one often obtains the result sought after. In certain cases it is even claimed that the principle at stake is not vigorously enough defended, but the result nevertheless is to prevent its application in a practical form.

Such really seems to be the attitude of most of those who oppose in this house the adoption of the present measure for the redistribution of electoral ridings. All opponents declare themselves in favour of the principle but they devise means of preventing the adoption of the resolution.

The principal means our opponents resort to consists in stating that the Canadian parliament has no right to ask for an amendment of the constitution without having previously secured the consent of the provinces. In the present resolution the Canadian parliament asks the imperial parliament to amend the constitution by changing the terms of section 51 of the British North America Act, which relates to the representation in the House of Commons, and making therein the modifications set out in the resolution.

Utilizing this makeshift means with that much skill our opponents, among whom we even number, strange to say, the premier of Quebec, who thus is a party to their attitude, once again wave the flag of provincial autonomy and shout about the spoliation of provincial rights.

In the first place, I venture to declare that the attitude of the premier of Quebec is all the more singular since it is not supported by the few friends he has in this house. He knows the provisions of the resolution we are now considering; he knows that its purpose is to increase the number of the representatives of the province he directs; he knows that the measure would increase the number of federal members of the province of Quebec from sixty-five to seventy-three; he also knows, I presume, that this resolution is the one and only means of increasing Quebec's representation in Canada's parliament. He must conclude, as I do, that, failing this resolution, the figure of Quebec's deputation would remain unchanged.

Finally and especially he must know the injustice that would ensue if, notwithstanding the increase in its population since the census of 1931, the province of Quebec retained the same number of members at Ottawa and consequently suffered a real injustice by comparison with the other provinces of this country.

It is all one to him; what seems to count with him is that he resorts to the cry to which we have become accustomed over a span of several years, namely, that he claims once again that Ottawa is attacking Quebec's autonomy. He states in open letter to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) that the provinces must be consulted and yield their consent before the Canadian parliament seeks the proposed amendment from the imperial parliament.

In other words, the premier of Quebec exacts that Ontario, British Columbia and the other provinces should agree and give their assent before the Canadian parliament does justice to the province of Quebec. He wills and requires that the other provinces say yes before the parliament sitting at Ottawa is authorized to increase from sixty-five to seventy-three the number of federal members from the province of Quebec.

If that is the premier of Quebec's way of defending his province and the French minority it constitutes in Canada, if it is by surrendering its destinies to the decision of the other provinces that the premier of Quebec wants to protect his own province, I prefer the stand I shall adopt by defending with all my strength in this house the resolution now under consideration and the principle it sanctions.

I shall better defend the minority to which I belong; I shall better understand the spirit of the constitution and of the Canadian confederation; I shall better protect my compatriots, and I shall better do them justice by enabling them to secure the additional representatives it is their right and their duty to demand. Facing my conscience and mindful of my oath of office, I shall thus better understand my duties toward my province and toward the other provinces.

As for the attitude of the other opponents of the resolution, of those who in this house combat it by also resorting to the same means, I believe such an attitude is unjust and illogical. When they ask that the provinces be consulted and their assent secured, I say to them that the House of Commons is master of its own destinies. I claim that the Canadian parliament alone must decide who shall represent the population of this country at Ottawa. I believe that it is not incumbent on Canada's parliament to consult the provinces in order to alter the electoral districts.

Finally, I declare that the parliament of Canada is no more required to have recourse to a consultation or to seek consent any more than the provincial legislatures have done so or are bound to do so when it is a question of altering their representation in the provincial assemblies. I acknowledge, however—and I want my attitude in this respect to be clearly understood—that the provincial parliaments are also sole masters of their destinies. I declare that the central parliament has no right to do anything or enact any legislation that could interfere with their true autonomy. If ever the parliament of Canada manifested its intention of amending the Canadian constitution to the detriment of certain rights, privileges or prerogatives of the provinces, and if it decided to take such action without their explicit consent, I would be the first to rise against such an attitude.

I was not elected to this house to have a hand in sabotaging the constitution. I never want to become the opponent and the enemy of the rights of minorities and of the provinces. I shall never be a party to a measure the purpose of which is to take away from my province or from the other provinces their respective privileges and rights. On the other hand, when it shall rest in my power within this parliament and on the floor of this house to have a hand by my attitude, by my words, or by my vote in correcting an injustice done to a minority or to a province; when it shall be given to me to defend the weak and the oppressed in this Canadian democracy, I shall not shrink from my responsibilities and I shall record my vote in support of the measure that shall seek that end.

If, as in the present instance, it is once again my party that takes this initiative of righting a wrong or correcting an injustice; if it is my party that constitutes itself the defender of minority rights or of the true prerogatives of the provinces; if it is my group that takes upon itself to be the real champion of true autonomy I shall be proud and happy to belong to it. Such is, I believe, the stand which every Canadian should take in respect of the present measure, and here is a true means of defending Canadian democracy in this chamber.

When opponents of this proposed redistribution had occasion before to discuss the problem, they did not always take the same stand. That is why certain facts connected with the position taken by our opponents of the Progressive Conservative party should be pointed out. They clearly show how inconsistent are some of their present statements.

The present measure is not new. It has been discussed every time there has been a question of redistributing the electoral districts. After each census, the government of the day, in order to abide by the constitution, was required to introduce a redistribution bill, and on every occasion such a bill was the subject of discussion in the House of Commons. On the occasion of each of those discussions or debates when it was Canada's good fortune to have a government directed by the party to which I belong, that government always took the same stand. It always strived to have redistribution carried out with all necessary dispatch and in the same spirit of justice and equity.

It really seems that on this occasion, too, it will fall to the Tory group which has so often changed its name and its leaders, but which has not often changed its policy, to be the first to combat a measure the principle of which is the very keystone of our political institutions and of our system of government. But it is in the attitude our opponents have adopted since the census of 1941 with reference to the very question we are now discussing that their inconsistency appears to us in full light.

In the course of the year 1943, especially, the Minister of Justice had to introduce in this house a resolution asking that the adjustment of the representation from the provinces be postponed and redistribution deferred until the war against our enemies, Germany, Italy and Japan, had been brought to a close. As in the present case, the resolution proposed a change in the provisions of the British North America Act. I think it will serve a useful purpose to refer thereto and to read that part of the resolution so that we may fully grasp the change then sought in our constitution. This is the text of the preamble of the resolution introduced on July 5, 1943, which I shall now read:

> Whereas provisions of the British North America Act require that, on the completion of each decennial census, the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted . . .

Then, further on, at the conclusion of the petition itself, I read this:

> Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts . . . it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted, in consequence of the completion of the decennial census taken in the year 1941, until the first session of the parliament of Canada commencing after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German Reich, the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire of Japan.

So, Mr. Speaker, I contend, by that resolution the provisions of our constitution were directly affected, as is the case in the present resolution. In fact the Minister of Justice was then seeking much more than he now seeks by the resolution under consideration. He asked for something more than an amendment of the British North America Act. He was asking the imperial parliament to allow the Canadian parliament not to carry out the terms of that constitution. He asked that parliament ignore the provisions of section 51 for a period of time which it was then impossible to determine. He asked that the application of our constitution to the then existing situation be suspended and that one of its essential provisions be set aside at least for a time.

The question gave rise to a long debate, a debate in which several hon. members who are to-day opposing the resolution under consideration took part. What was the attitude of the official opposition? What was the attitude of our opponents then led by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon)? All without exception voted in support of the measure and consequently went on record in favour of this essential modification of our constitution. Did none of them feel the scruples that seem to beset them to-day? Did none of those members of the opposition who to-day object to the resolution protest at that time because the provinces were not consulted? Did any of them raise the objection that the provinces had to consent to a suspension of the application of the terms of our constitution?

What was the attitude of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who to-day claims to be the champion of the rights of the provinces? What did the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) say, who to-day will claim to want to prevent the provinces from suffering an injustice? What were the views expressed by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), whom the autonomy of the provinces, especially that of Ontario, I suppose, seems to concern so deeply to-day? Silence. Not one word from them was heard during the debate in July, 1943.

What stand did the house leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Peel, take in the matter? Speaking for his party, he then went on record in support of the resolution and we did not hear him voice a single word of protest over the failure to consult the provinces or the provincial parliaments.

Was it because at that time the resolution asked that the constitution be altered but on that occasion so as to defer redistribution? Was it because, when that first resolution was introduced, certain aggrieved provinces were prevented from securing justice and others were allowed to avail themselves of a situation contrary to equity and to the very text of the constitution? Was it planned in 1943 to deny for a time to democracy its sovereign rights, only to refuse again in 1946 to acknowledge them? Was it planned at that moment to postpone redistribution because of a state of war, or was it simply because the sponsors of the resolution preferred to take delight in illegality and injustice? I believe there is cause to be astonished at the attitude of our opponents who to-day adopt a course from which they refrained yesterday when the situation was the same but the goal sought was different.

Amidst these contradictory attitudes, these dilatory tactics, these fiery speeches on the autonomy of the provinces, what becomes of the great principle on which the resolution now under consideration is founded? All seem to recognize the truth it holds; all want to see the provinces treated justly, but the attitude of several runs counter to their statements and to their so-called wishes.

I revert for a moment to the position taken by our opponents in 1943. Not only did none of them then declare that the provinces should be consulted as a preliminary step; not even one objected against the application of section 51 being postponed. On the contrary, all those who took part in the debate at the time declared themselves in favour of redistribution. This often happens elsewhere; one subscribes readily to a fundamental truth when one knows beforehand that it will not be put into practice. Redistribution and an equitable division of representation in each province were supported at the time with great emphasis. But this was no doubt owing to the fact that it was known at the time that the government could not put the measure into effect.

Here is what the hon. member for Peel stated on July 5, 1943, on behalf of the party which he then led in the house. I find his words at page 4343 of Hansard for that year:

> We are anxious as a party that no provinces shall have any just grievance in respect to redistribution. Having that in mind, we base our support of this resolution upon the one ground that this is a war-time period when abnormal conditions exist. Because of the war and because of these conditions we feel that it is part of our duty to the nation at large to support the present resolution.

The hon. member—and I underline his words—stated that the one ground on which he agreed to delay redistribution was the existence of a state of war. He then agreed to delay redistribution, notwithstanding the constitution and notwithstanding the assent of the provinces. He did not want the provinces to suffer any injustice in this respect, he said, and the existence of a state of war was the one ground why he agreed to defer redistribution. To-day, if he finds himself called upon to express his views in line with his statement, he will reaffirm his attitude but this time he will find a way of putting off that which he claims to be his wish.

For my part, I understand differently the importance of the principle the government asks us to sanction by the present resolution. This principle, as I have already said, is basic to our parliamentary system. That parliamentary system was not given to us on a silver platter, with no effort on our part. We had to labour and strive to establish it in this country. To vouchsafe this system to us, our forebears fought with the pen, by word of mouth and even with the sword. They waged notable battles to enable the Canadian people to possess this system and enjoy it. It was in order to guarantee to us the privileges and rights of self-government that men of courage in bygone days did not quail before exile and even death itself. Is it not by reason of that fact that the names of Mackenzie and Papineau and, yes, of other pioneering spirits in the cause of responsible, representative government are inscribed in golden letters in the history of this country and that they will forever remain engraven in the minds of those who love Canada?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PINARD: Before the house rose at six o'clock I was expressing the opinion that a vote against this resolution is in reality a vote against our system of government. It was in defence of our system of government that we had to wage war against those who claimed to derive their power and authority from themselves and not from the people. The allied nations undoubtedly jointed battle with the totalitarian powers for preservation of that very idea. Hence, it is not without cause, I am sure, that we declare to-day that those who died have shed their blood for the defence of democracy and sovereign rights. Again at this very hour, when anxiety grips the minds of peoples throughout the world, at a time when powerful forces seem intent on jeopardizing a peace we have just won, we must realize more deeply than ever the necessity of guarding, protecting and defending those concepts of life we wish to continue to love and respect. It is in that spirit that I shall support the present measure and also because I want to remain a true democrat. I shall vote in favour of the resolution to enable the Canadian people to be heard by all parts of the country equally and with justice within the precincts of this parliament.

I shall lend my support to the Minister of Justice who once again has understood his task and his duties admirably and who wishes to exemplify equity and justice.

Before concluding, I should like to say a few words with reference to the obligation resting upon us to have recourse to the imperial parliament in order to secure the remedy proposed by the terms of the resolution before us. Every time the occasion arose we proudly proclaimed our complete independence within the commonwealth of British nations. We wish to believe, and we have a right to insist, since our country is now of adult age, that the statute of Westminster be not a dead letter and was not adopted in vain. The most serious obstacle to the proclamation and the recognition of our sovereignty and of our complete autonomy lies in the fact that we do not yet possess our own constitution. Our constitution is embodied in an imperial statute; it does not even constitute a Canadian statute. That is why we must on every occasion undertake, perforce, that pilgrimage to London to ask others to decide upon our own destinies. So long as this anomaly has not disappeared from our national life, we shall not have the right to claim that Canada is a sovereign country.

In 1935, when a committee of this house inquired into the British North America Act, it was suggested that we should at long last give ourselves a constitution that was essentially our own, a truly Canadian constitution. One of those who sponsored this suggestion is none other than Mr. Maurice Ollivier, one of the brilliant legal officers of the House of Commons. In that respect I entirely agree with what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

In Mr. Ollivier's often quoted volume, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", we find the following at page 394:

> I suggested, too, that the committee should recommend the establishment of a commission charged with redrafting a new constitution based on the British North America Act. The first step would be to consider the sections in the act which were temporary and now spent, which therefore should be left out.
>
> The new Constitution Act would then be divided into seven parts, as follows:—
> 1. Preamble and preliminary;
> 2. Those provisions which affect the federal power alone and where the consent of the provinces would not be required for the purpose of amendment;
>
> 3. Provisions affecting the internal constitution of the provinces and which could be amended by the provinces without the consent of the federal parliament;
>
> 4. Ordinary sections requiring for purposes of amendment the consent of a majority of the provinces;
> 5. Certain sections which would require the consent of all the provinces before they could be amended;
> 6. A section providing that in case amendments relate to only one or to a restricted number of provinces the consent of that province or those provinces alone would be sufficient;
> 7. A section providing, in the manner before described, for a mode of amendment to the constitution. After a new constitution has been devised and agreed upon, it should then be adopted as a Canadian act, that is, as a dominion statute, and we should then obtain from the imperial parliament their consent to repealing the British North America Act.

I believe, that such a suggestion was essentially progressive, and I would have supported it unhesitatingly. Our country now has the right to proclaim to the world its complete sovereignty. It owes to itself, by reason of the reputation it has acquired, alike at home and in international councils, to have that document which characterizes most the sovereignty and the independence of a nation, its own constitution. We have witnessed what is occurring at the present time in European countries that bore the yoke of foreign occupation during the war that has just ended. Their first impulse and their first action on recovering freedom were to bestow upon themselves a new constitution to reaffirm to the world their sovereignty and their greatness. Let us do likewise; for it is also our right and our duty to proclaim our faith in the future and in the greatness of our destinies. We have just enacted the bill that makes us Canadian citizens. I hope that we shall soon be given a really distinctive Canadian flag.

Let us ever march forward. Let us sanction our rights, our privileges and our national entity by giving ourselves this time a really Canadian constitution.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to register my protest against the cause and effect brought about by this resolution. We of this country have had a fixed policy on representation in the House of Commons brought about, first, by written law and, second, by unwritten, law the unwritten law being, one, agreements, conventions, usages, customs, made by the two original provinces which came together on the Act of Union of 1841, and the other two, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which joined at confederation.

There were certain definite principles laid down on representation in the written law, in the constitution and in the unwritten law consisting of customs, subventions, agreements and all these things that go to make up the written law at the time the common law was adopted in this country by the constitution.

I have great respect and admiration for the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and I am surprised that he has brought forward this resolution. Who is asking for it? What mandate has the government of the day to bring in a resolution such as this, upsetting all the electoral law we have had since confederation?

I have always been in favour of the principle of confederation, "Each for all and all for each", the old Cornish battle-cry, which I believe is good enough for all the provinces and was so written by the founders of the act of confederation. They were not all of one party fortunately in 1867.

The proposed resolution grows out of what? It grows out of a private member's resolution which was presented in this house last year, and which was not adopted. It never had a chance to be adopted. The government put up certain speakers and the motion was talked out at eleven o'clock. Fortunately it did not come up again.

The people of this country have been very much alarmed at what has been going on in this house ever since the session began. Like so many other matters, this resolution will cause widespread disunity in Canada.

The visit of Their Majesties to this country in 1939, when they were accorded such a tremendous reception by people all over the country, and nowhere more so than in the province of Quebec, showed the tremendous popularity of the monarchy. It also showed the decay of parliament and the decline of the House of Commons. That is a fact. We are talking about representation in the House of Commons, but what does it amount to? It does not amount to very much in the government of Canada. We have handed over our rights, franchises, privileges and customs to a whole crowd of people in various central boards, so much so that at the present time we need a John Hampden in this country. When King Charles walked into the House of Commons and said he was looking for certain birds, only to find that the birds had flown, the Speaker told him, "I have neither eyes to see nor ears to hear but as the house gives me utterance."

We have heard some strange doctrines preached in this house since parliament convened after the last election. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a remarkable fact in connection with this motion. In 1927 I proposed in this house a resolution concerning parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reforms, and those were the main questions in this country from that year on. The Liberal party calls itself the reform party. Well, all the reforms for the benefit of the people that have been brought down this session do not amount to the snap of the fingers as far as they go to help the working classes get any relief. What representation have we had in the last number of years? Shortly after my resolution came up in 1927 and before it after the last war, a million and a quarter men had to leave the central provinces for the United States, in order to earn a living. What did they care about representation in parliament; and what does the average member have to do with the affairs of the country at the present time? He has very little.

What happened when the last census was taken? It was taken at a time when thousands of men were out of the province of Ontario. They followed a different principle during the first great war. At the exhibition grounds in Toronto, in the Niagara district and up at Camp Borden they had 65,000 troops, all from that area. That, however, was changed in the last war. Then the government said, "We shall have our artillery at Petawawa and Winnipeg; we shall have other branches of the army down by the sea, and we shall have another part of the army right out at the west coast." The result was that young people from the city of Toronto had to go all over Canada, and they were not included in the census of 1941. I also know that in the constituency I represent and in the constituency of Eglinton, where I live, many people were left off the list. I do not believe anyone called at my home at all, and there were many similar complaints in regard to the method of taking that census. If the government want to do the thing for representative purposes, let them start over again and do it right; a recheck as it were.

At the time of the baby bonus I had before the house a bill which was debated when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was present, which suggested a real reform, to enable a referendum on matters of great national public importance like this. It was like the reform bill of 1834 in England, under which the agricultural and industrial classes of the mother country obtained proper representation, after a great fight. Here we have a resolution of the Minister of Justice which has grown out of the motion of a private member. It is a political bill. It is not in the interests of the constitution or of real parliamentary representation. It is a half-baked scheme that will lead to more disunity than anything else. You have to see the cause and effect in the country. Look at the improvements which have taken place in the province of Ontario, and for that matter in all the provinces. Consider what has been done to improve transportation since the first census was taken in 1871. Look at all the farming constituencies around the city of Toronto. They are practically urban constituencies. York North is right at the end of a bus line at Havergal college. That is the case with York North, York East, York South, Peel, Halton and all the constituencies adjoining Toronto. It is the case around Hamilton, Guelph and London, right on up to Sarnia and Owen Sound. It is the case with the constituencies adjoining the great city of Montreal, the city of Quebec and other large centres throughout the country. What has been the reason? Good roads; good transportation; cheap light and power; rural electrification, and so on. These things have changed the whole situation as far as the census is concerned, and former rural ridings are now suburban. Let us have real representation by population. That was a good doctrine in the days before confederation, a clear Grit doctrine of representation by population, but the people are having their eyes opened in regard to what this parliament is doing. They had the same sort of discussions in Edmund Burke's day, when he was a member of the house and laid down the duties of a member of parliament, which is the law to-day. Let me read a few paragraphs from what he said, because he and others of similar views brought about real reform in the mother country. What does he say about the duties and functions of a member of parliament? This may be quite a myth now, but I was glad the Minister of Justice quoted it last year, as I have quoted it on many occasions:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasure, his satisfactions, to theirs; and, above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interests to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you—to any man, or to any set of men living.

This was at a time when some of the electors of Bristol tried to instruct him as to the duties of a member of parliament and how representation there was to be conducted and carried on. He went on to say:

> These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving, you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

What have we in connection with this bill? We have one legislature passing an act directing its representatives in parliament to do certain things here contrary to what the Minister of Justice set out in his admirable address. The right hon. gentleman always speaks with a great deal of force and with moderation.

He referred to the fact that under section 91 this parliament has certain functions and under section 92 the provinces have certain functions. In conclusion, Burke said:

> Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests, which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation with one interest—that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole.

How true those words are to-day, in 1946.

> If the local constituent should have an interest or should form a hasty opinion, evidently opposite to the real good of the rest of the community, the member for that place ought to be as far, as any other, from any endeavour to give it effect.

He went on to say that once he became the member for Bristol he was a member of parliament, and must not consider sectional interests. I have referred to that in connection with a motion in the house on this particular question, and I have pointed out where, as representatives of the people in parliament, our rights and privileges have been taken away.

On September 11 of last year I made reference to this point. I believe I was the first to refer to this vicious control system which has crept into our parliamentary form of government. I said:

> For years past we have been told, by Mr. Churchill in the British House of Commons, and more or less by our own Prime Minister here, I believe, that once the war ceased these controls and other war expenditures would cease and we would regain what we, the high court of parliament, surrendered when the war broke out, namely control of expenditures. At the present time we have virtually no control. All kinds of bodies, over the head of parliament, are spending money like water. Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the seventeenth century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.
> I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal.

I object to this and I want to restore to parliament its rights and privileges. Parliament is supreme, and it should have control over these outside bodies. So much for that.

I wish now to refer to two or three other matters, and then give way to other hon. members who may wish to speak. We must not forget the way the census was taken. They propose now to have some sort of ready-made representation in which one province would benefit at the expense of the others. Well, if you want to start this thing, I can tell you where it will lead to. It will lead to an abolition of the principle of having sixty-five members for Quebec, and dividing it into their population to apply to the other provinces in proportion to their population.

You will not have in this country any longer one province the representatives of which will continue to urge all the things they have urged since the beginning of the session, small secondary matters which do not result in any effective legislation. We shall not have government of the people, for the people and by the people.

It is the duty of the government to look after the health, wealth and prosperity of its people. Matters have been introduced to this discussion which to my mind are irrelevant. When the resolution was introduced reference was made to a private member's resolution made at the last session, concerning which two of the younger members from Quebec spoke. I do not wish to criticize them in any way, but I would point out that at that time it was proposed that we should have a certain form of representation along the lines indicated.

However, the minister did not like the wording of that resolution. Who did like the wording of it? Who likes the wording of this resolution? Does Ontario? I can tell you about Ontario. Ontario is the forgotten child of confederation. In my city of Toronto we do not have representation of the population at all. We have not had a single cabinet minister since 1935, although we pay almost 29 per cent of the cash taxes of this country. There was a time when we had three or four cabinet ministers from the Toronto area. That was the condition when I entered the house, as the representative from a constituency north of Bloor street, reaching from the Don almost to the Humber, and numbering between 120,000 and 125,000 people.

But to-day we do not have representation by population. The city of Montreal has it. They have fifteen or sixteen splendid members from Montreal island. I wish we could receive the same treatment in Toronto. But I repeat that when I first entered the house we had three or four cabinet ministers. When I came to Ottawa I was mayor of the city. I did not want to come here in the first place, but I came in an effort to get something for the soldiers, and to secure federal assistance for the cheap light and power movement.

With regard to this particular form of representation, while one province may be treated in one way, and another province treated in another way, the people will not stand for it. This whole doctrine in this resolution is a mistake. Despite all that has been said in this chamber since the opening of the session, not one word has been said with respect to the taking of the census. The government had no policy back in 1943 regarding census and redistribution.

What did they do? They went overseas and begged the mother of parliaments to be good and kind enough to pass an amendment to the British North America Act, and all that kind of thing, to postpone redistribution until after the war. The minister has referred to section 51 and a case which came before the courts involving Prince Edward Island, which had overrepresentation.

We were promised at the time of the last two elections that there would be senate reform, and we notice in the minister's speech, when introducing the resolution, a further reference to senate reform, and the number from each province. It is, I admit, badly needed. They are here to-day and gone to-morrow, and are always criticizing this chamber. I am referring to the people in another place, to whom the minister has referred. I have to refer to it as "another place"—because it is another place, and has been all the time. However, I am not criticizing them. Indeed, on ten or twelve occasions in this chamber during the war I urged that more work be sent to that other place because there are a large number of men there of great ability, and the Prime Minister promised consideration for my suggestion.

I will admit they do a good deal of work in connection with divorce bills. I am a believer in the second chamber; I want it to be given real work, but I want a real, up-to-date second chamber, one which will do some work, and not always be criticizing this house. The Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada is the keeper of the king's conscience. I know the minister has some conscience, and as a leader at the bar he has given special pleading for this bill, as have others who have spoken.

I have listened to two addresses to-day, two essays which were read, both of which pleaded somewhat the legal situation. The public in this country want real parliamentary reform. First of all, we must rid ourselves of these controls, restore the rights and privileges of parliament, and have some system of electing members other than we have at the present time.

Let us for a moment look at the election returns since confederation. Have we representation by population? We shall see that some of the ridings were formerly rural, but now they are completely suburban. One can get into a bus or motor car, and within an hour's time or less be at points within a radius of fifty miles of the city. With good roads, electric buses, to which the city of Toronto has contributed greatly, and with the sewers and other public utilities, in light, power and radials, which that great city has given to the working centres, many of the outlying areas have come closer to the city. Guelph, Hamilton, Barrie, Owen Sound and London are in a similar position. They are not in rural ridings as in the olden sense.

The whole situation has been changed, because nature is changing all the time. This is not a static world. Times change; conditions change; labour conditions throughout the world are changing. "Change and decay in all around I see"—in the house and out of it. Labour is cheap in some places and dear in others. Some new invention may come along and change the whole situation. That has been the case with the last two or three censuses. Great economic changes have come about in that time.

They presented a petition to His Majesty and to the parliament of Great Britain. The government said that it is not the government that controls redistribution, but you find out about that around election time. You soon find out that it is the government of the day that controls the authorities. As I said yesterday, the government are continually trying to keep themselves in office under the present antiquated, dilapidated and outworn representation system which was set up years ago. The best Conservatives that I know of are to be found on the government benches; you will find there some of the best Tories that were ever known. I know a great many of them and I have a great regard for them. I do not take my duties too seriously and I do not like to say anything to hurt a man's feelings.

Where are we going? After all, the mother country saved our shores from the awful horrors of war. But for her the enemy would have come over here and taken the best of our men to work in the mines of Czechoslovakia and other places. After all that was said in this house about the mother country and Great Britain, where are we going now? I was very glad to see the Attorney General of Canada receive the honour he did. He works very hard and he is a gentleman of considerable courtesy and ability. He may have seen somebody with regard to this legislation when he was over in Great Britain; I do not know. Let me tell him, however, that Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will have something to say about this proposed resolution, and it cannot be passed by the parliament of Great Britain without their consent.

After all is said and done, the British North America Act as it has been used in connection with this parliamentary reform resolution is full of inconsistencies, contradictions, duplication, provisos, exceptions and qualifications. Every means have been taken to secure federal authority. Federal power in Canada is at its lowest ebb since confederation. Federal power is being administered from the provincial capitals, not from Ottawa. That is what they tried to do in 1927 and at that time they were in power in nearly all the provincial capitals. We want a British North America Act for the living, not for the dead. There were no so-called experts in those days. The drafters were only ordinary lawyers.

I wonder who drafted this resolution and the proposed bill? I remember a parliament, called the unlearned parliament in history, that met at Coventry in 1344 to discuss parliamentary reform. They decided that there should be no lawyers or sheriffs in it; they did not want any lawyers there, and the sheriffs were too busy executing their people. It was said in 1344 the lawyers were not wanted because they were too busy with the idea of getting some customers or clients. However, no doubt they do it for nothing. The Minister of Justice and the law society of to-day know more about that than I do, or than they did in 1344. I have never been before the law society, although I have been a member of the bar for a good many years.

The people in the constituencies back home will not be satisfied with the view that has been given. The Minister of Justice mentioned the senate several times. Representation there was changed so that one province had four senators, another province had a few more and so on. The representation was arranged in geometrical and arithmetical progression. Each province has so many more than the others. When they get over to England, what is the government going to do? I think the mother country has enough to do to look after conditions over there without being bothered by us.

First, let us do something primary. Let us regain our real representation; let us recover the rights, privileges and functions which we used to have in olden days. Let us go farther and see to it that there is equality of treatment and that we have a real system of representation. The last census caught Ontario napping. Thousands of its citizens were out of the province. There were two regiments in Bermuda and Jamaica. I have looked over the census list and have found a great many mistakes. This resolution should be held over for at least a year.

I believe the system is all wrong. It is not electoral reform. If the government want a real electoral reform, let them bring it down instead of bringing down electoral reform for some constituencies and not for others. We should have real representation by population in parliament. Let us put a fair construction on section 51, not the construction put on it in the Prince Edward Island case by the law courts. After all, this is the high court of parliament. The courts of this country are subservient to the legislature. That is one of the cardinal principles of our constitution. If we do not like what the courts do, we can change it. The court that gives substantial justice is the privy council. I believe a litigant can get justice over there. Had it not been for the decisions of that great body, we would not have had the great publicly owned power system in Ontario, nor would there be so many privileges enjoyed by urban workers and farmers and the public generally throughout the province.

I want to see the province of Quebec have justice. It is a great province. It stood by the mother country in other days. As Sir Eugene Tache said, "In defence of Canada the last shot will be fired by a French Canadian." I do not believe it was the view of the fathers of confederation that we should have a makeshift system that would be under the control of the government of the day which has only a slim majority. It has to advocate a great socialist programme in order to keep itself in office.

I urge that this whole matter be shelved for another year. We should not bother the mother country at the present time about our domestic affairs because she is so busy with many local problems. I did not wish to take part in this debate but I believed it was my duty as a representative of the people to do so. Ontario has not sufficient representation in the cabinet and yet she pays 29 per cent of the taxes. That is not real representation by population, at all. There is no such thing as a pure Grit on the government benches. I admire a pure Grit. I remember the other day seeing the grave of Robert Baldwin in the cemetery. He was a clear Grit and for representation by population.

When Baldwin was beaten in York, the great grandfather of the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) gave up his seat in Rimouski to Robert Baldwin, who sat for it instead. I am sorry that the present member for Temiscouata does not speak for real electoral reform. This is not a system of reform; it is a scheme. Perhaps I should not even call it a scheme; it is a resolution. They are going over to beg at the foot of the throne for some further legislation to save the government. After all they said about the authorities over there, they are going back again. This is not the first time; this is not the second time; this is the third time we have sought British North America Act amendments—three strikes and they are going to be out, as it was in the ball game they played out here last night. They have had three trips over there for British North America Act amendments to beg at the foot of the throne for some other system of reform. No doubt this will please some of the newspapers. You do not read much about it in some of them because no doubt they have been putting the soft pedal on this debate and favour this resolution.

The people in the county of York and other counties of Ontario are going to object to this resolution. The province of Ontario is willing and ready to do its duty to confederation, and it wants no favours that other provinces do not get. It wants the system of confederation continued as the fathers of confederation framed it—all for each and each for all—and a fair and just representation.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think I should place on record the stand of the Social Credit group with regard to the resolution that is now before the house. I would have spoken this afternoon but I yielded my place to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), who wished to make his contribution before six o'clock, at which time I understand he had to leave the city.

I have given earnest consideration to the resolution and, generally speaking, I find its provisions are not at all unfair or unjust. I have debated in my own mind, of course, the wisdom of using the 1941 census as the basis for redistribution because of the dislocated population which Canada had in that year, but after careful consideration of all the facts I am convinced that we cannot use that as a successful argument for not proceeding with the redistribution. It would be better in my judgment, if it were possible, for us to withhold action until after the 1951 census, but I recognize that the constitution provides for redistribution after each decennial census. Hence we cannot, perhaps I should say we should not, attempt to hold another election without complying with the terms of the British North America Act.

My studies have convinced me that the proposed change in the British North America Act envisaged in this resolution will remove a number of the anomalies that have existed for some years in Canada with respect to our electoral distribution. I have never favoured any province having any more members in the House of Commons than its just and proportionate share. Everyone knows, of course, that under section 51 as it has stood for some years some of the provinces have had more than their just and proportionate share. But I must criticize the arrangements set out in the resolution on the ground that they are not consistent.

It seems to me that when we set out in any action of this house to remove injustice and anomalies from our present way of allocating members to the provinces of Canada, we should do a complete job of it and not leave any province with more members than her population would entitle her to. By the proposed changes provided for in this resolution to section 51 of the British North America Act we do not do a complete job.

It is pleaded, of course, that we must not reduce the House of Commons representation for any province below the number of senators that the province enjoys at the present time. My answer to that is this. Let us then reduce the number of senators to the rightful level while we are at it. Or perhaps, on the other hand, representation by population should not be the only factor in the formula that is applied to determine representation in this house. If not, then I say, let us weigh the whole matter most carefully and it may be possible to find some other factors to be used along with representation by population in a formula, the application of which will yield fair and just results in every province. But as long as exceptions to the general rule exist we shall continue to have a source of discontent and disunity within this Canada of ours.

I am anxious to find a way to give the other provinces a more even voice in the affairs of this country with the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. There has always been under the British North America Act as it now stands, a preponderance of voice on the part of these two central provinces, and a great many injustices have continued for many years chiefly because of that uneven distribution of voice. If it is at all possible to find a way of evening things up, then I certainly would like to find it.

The debate thus far, to which I have listened with great care, has revealed the fact that the Liberal party and its spokesmen through the years have been anything but consistent in matters affecting amendments of the British North America Act. They have shifted their ground to suit special occasions as they arose. That is quite evident from the information given by a number of speakers this afternoon. However, it seems to me that the constitutional issue has arisen as the battleground in this debate and therefore I should like to state just where I stand with respect to that issue.

Social Crediters have always been known as decentralizers. They have always been consistent in arguing for, speaking for and pleading for decentralization, and they have had good reasons for that. It has not been for lack of vision—not at all; in fact it has been the contrary. However changeable has been their past, it now appears that the C.C.F. and the Liberals are centralizers, and in saying that I do not believe I am saying anything they would disagree with.

Not only that, but Social Crediters have always been consistent in their stand with regard to the British North America Act. We have fought to prevent hasty and radical changes to that act. We have fought constantly to preserve every safeguard that we had against hasty and radical changes to our constitution. We have not fought change, for we know that there is no more inexorable law than the law of change and the need for change and progress. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that when the Rowell-Sirois commission was planned, the Alberta government, the only Social Credit government in the world, headed by the late Premier Aberhart, requested the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) to set up for that commission an agenda which would include more than just financial references. He went so far as to suggest that there be added to the agenda for full discussion amongst the provinces and the dominion the matter of amendments of the British North America Act and that a procedure be arrived at by which those amendments would safely be made. But that was refused. The Prime Minister insisted upon the reference of the commission being purely a financial reference. Later, Premier Manning of Alberta wrote to the Prime Minister suggesting that the agenda for the coming dominion-provincial conference provide for a discussion of amendments of the British North America Act. He felt that any proposals for changes in the act should be brought before the provinces while they were in conference.

Social Crediters have always held the view that confederation was a matter which arose, or was supposed to have arisen, out of the action of the provinces and that whatever powers were given to the central government were conferred upon it by the provinces. Therefore we have contended that there should be no material alteration in the British North America Act without consultation with the provinces.

I have always considered it to be the greatest responsibility of the members of the House of Commons to confirm every Canadian in his own rights. This can best be accomplished by decentralization. Centralization of power will in time destroy any possibility of so confirming every man in his rights, whether it be in Quebec, Alberta, British Columbia or any other province. There has been for some years a strong movement for centralization of power in this country and, I might say, also elsewhere throughout the world. In fact, some elements have spread throughout the land the doctrine of the inevitability of centralization. Social Crediters have done their best to combat that doctrine, which we contend is inimical to the interests of the individual citizens of Canada. The best guarantee we have against complete centralization of power in Canada is the constitution, the British North America Act. The best guarantee that the rights of minorities will always be respected is the spirit of that same constitution. The best assurance that the constitution will remain a safeguard of the rights of minorities would be to lay down, once and for all, a procedure for amending the constitution, a procedure which breathes the very spirit in which the constitution was originally framed. The foundation of that procedure, ought, in my judgment, to be consultation with the provinces.

Mr. BRIDGES: May I ask the hon. member a question? What is the next procedure if the provinces do not agree?

Mr. LOW: I do not see how we could possibly argue that measures brought before this house should be passed by a majority vote unless we were also prepared to arrange that at such times as consultation on the part of the provinces is sought, the same should be had.

Mr. BRIDGES: May I ask the hon. member one more question? I promise that I will not ask another. Is it his view that no amendment of any kind of any section of the British North America Act should be made without the unanimous consent of the provinces?

Mr. LOW: I have not said anything of the sort. I did say before that no material amendments of the British North America Act should be sought without consultation with the provinces. I said nothing about unanimous consent. The provinces in consultation would agree upon whatever procedure they thought best.

Mr. MICHAUD: Who is to determine what is material?

An hon. MEMBER: Apparently you are.

Mr. LOW: That is the responsibility of the members of this house, and that is what, I take it, we are now doing. I submit that it would be a simple matter to refer to subject of the present resolution to the provinces before the next election is held; that is, of course, unless the government has some secret plans to hold an election earlier than some of us think. We all hope that the dominion-provincial conference will reconvene at an early date; certainly it should reconvene before another election takes place. The whole matter of the procedure for making any change in the British North America Act should then be referred to the provinces and the dominion in their conference for their agreement, rather than that their agenda should be confined to financial references only.

I must emphasize that I do not wish to delay redistribution. Neither I nor the members of my group in this house have any such intention. I think this parliament will have to deal with it; I am speaking now of the twentieth parliament. But I am opposed to any frenzied haste in doing the job, haste such as we saw here in connection with the Dominion day resolution and the Bretton Woods arrangements, amongst others. There is time, I submit, to refer this whole matter to the provinces in session with the dominion before any election needs to be held. Let me suggest also, in fact let me emphasize that we cannot hope to bring about unity in Canada by allowing the federal government to go over the heads of the provinces and to do that consistently and constantly. No one can argue successfully that there is not need for unifying influences in the country, influences which will improve the relationships amongst the provinces so as to achieve something like unity of our people.

Before I close, let me say one word through you, Mr. Speaker, to my friends from the province of Quebec. Your province, it is true, stands to gain most as a result of the bill which will be brought in as the result of this resolution. That being the case, it seems to me that you are in the best position to give a real object lesson to the Dominion of Canada. You are in a position, by supporting a request to have this whole matter referred to the dominion-provincial conference for consultation, to assist in bringing about real unity in this dominion, rather than hasten into something about which some of you may later have time to feel somewhat badly. There will come a time, I am sure, when, if we now lay down one more good argument for parliament to use in future, an argument based upon precedent, you will be faced with something which may cause you to rue the day when you passed this resolution without giving due thought to consultation with the provinces. Members from the province of Quebec have an opportunity now to strike a blow for unity and good feeling amongst the people of this country.

May I just add that I am not supporting the Conservative party in supporting their amendment, or, indeed, any party; I am trying to be consistent with the beliefs which I have always held and with the principles for which social credit stands. I find myself under the necessity of supporting the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), solely because it coincides with my belief, but in doing so I would make it abundantly clear that should we be unable to convince hon. members from the province of Quebec that it is their duty not to rush into this thing with undue haste, and therefore the amendment be defeated, I shall have to give support to the resolution of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the proposal now submitted to parliament for approval evinces consummate skill. Its sponsor has forestalled any possible opposition to the measure. He has assuaged the feelings of the people from all parts of this country. This proposal provides for an increase from 245 to 255 in the number of representatives in the House of Commons. For that purpose, he requests that section 51 of the British North America Act, 1867, be repealed and that the following be substituted therefor:

1. Section fifty-one of the British North America Act, 1867, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

51. (1) The number of members of the House of Commons shall be two hundred and fifty-five and the representation of the provinces therein shall forthwith upon the coming into force of this section and thereafter on the completion of each decennial census be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:

1. Subject as hereinafter provided, there shall be assigned to each of the provinces a number of members computed by dividing the total population of the provinces by two hundred and fifty-four and by dividing the population of each province by the quotient so obtained, disregarding, except as hereinafter in this section provided, the remainder, if any, after the said process of division.

I would be the last one in this house to oppose the carrying out of an act of justice toward each of the Canadian provinces. The latter are entitled to their respective representation in this parliament. This redistribution should have come long ago. If there is a province which has not been treated with fairness, as far as its representation is concerned, it is certainly the province of Quebec. Under this measure, Quebec would have eight more members. This should not be considered as a concession. It means the recognition of a right. Each province has the duty to assert the rights that have been guaranteed to her by the constitution. The dominion government, in turn, has the duty to respect the jurisdiction and the rights of the provinces. Since 1867, the constitution has often been infringed upon for the benefit of the central authority. To-day, we are asked to change a contract without the contracting parties having been consulted. It would have been easy to grant each of the Canadian provinces her full influence in the dominion parliament without any change in the constitution. My view in this respect is confirmed by the third paragraph in the preamble of the resolution which we are now considering.

It reads:

And whereas the said act provides for the readjustment of representation on the completion of each decennial census, and that on any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards;

I was right in saying, at the beginning of my remarks, that the government have shown consummate skill in drafting the present resolution. They manoeuvred in such a way as to quench the least opposition on the part of provinces losing members in parliament. They lessened the reduction in the representation of two provinces to a minimum and at the same time abated any opposition to their scheme. They could have achieved the same ends by sticking to the letter of the constitution. But Ontario would lose eight members and the other provinces a total of ten, while Quebec's representation would not change. The total number of federal members would fall from 245 to 227.

But the population of Canada has increased greatly since Confederation and I think it would be unreasonable and unfair to work on this basis of representation. I am in favour of the bill, provided that provincial rights are protected. Their constitutional prerogatives must be fully respected. But I refuse to believe that we shall never see the day when the dominion government will give back to the provinces their respective rights, guaranteed by the British North America Act. The time has come when provincial jurisdiction over taxes, education, civil rights and legislation must be respected. The time has come also to restore parliament to its supremacy, encroached upon by all kinds of boards not answerable to the people. It is no use increasing the membership of this house if our mandate is taken over by a bureaucracy which has substituted itself to the representatives of the people.

The plan before parliament reminds us of a very humiliating condition. We have never ceased to be a colony. As a matter of fact, the London parliament will decide whether or not we shall amend our constitution. I submit that it is a shame, in view of Canada's heavy share of sacrifice and all the help we are still contributing to the United Kingdom. But who governs here? Is it London or is it Ottawa? What a shame for a country that has shed its best blood and shaken its economic structure for the sake of United Nations victory to apply to the British parliament because we lack the power to amend our own constitution! How disgraceful and humiliating for a nation!

But I know of some who will gloat at the thought of our begging on bended knees from the British house of commons the right to amend the British North America Act. They are the selfsame people who, for five weeks, opposed Canadian citizenship; who, in another place, opposed Canada Day, and who tomorrow will fight to the last ditch against the adoption of a Canadian flag.

Why does not the government put an end, once and for all, to this antiquated colonialism, so that Canada may never again suffer such humiliation? Why not ask the provinces, rather than the British house, their consent on the right and opportunity to amend the constitution? Paltry interests and ulterior motives rear their heads in this matter of national concern. Infringements of the constitution have become innumerable. And those infringements have been committed without the consent of the provinces. Breaches of contract invariably stem from an essentially evil principle. The government should not have to apply to London. London was not a party to the confederation. The contracting parties are the provinces which signed the British North America Act. Why were they not approached beforehand? Why are they not consulted? There are people who never stop advocating good understanding and national unity; but when the time comes to act they always act in the sense of misunderstanding and disunity. I ask the government what are you seeking in London? A concession? The exercise of a right? As for the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), where is he now? His ministers are doubtless anxiously awaiting his return. I had hoped, with so many others, that his long stay in London would have spared us this humiliating request to the British house, and that he would bring back with him the original draft of our constitution, which is kept over there.

We shall not be our true selves until we abolish appeals to the Privy Council, until we can amend our constitution without currying favour from anyone and until we can hoist a truly distinctive flag. But since it is so difficult in Canada to exercise the right of self-government, I feel it my duty to support the government on this measure, provided it manages our affairs without the interference of foreign countries. As all human laws, this one is imperfect. However, I wish to avoid that at some future time, it may be said that I did anything to decrease the influence of my province in this house. Time will improve this project. I endorse it as far as it is fair and beneficial for Quebec and all other provinces of the confederation. I also endorse it because if minorities were to forsake their rights, they would lose them irretrievably. In 1943, I opposed the delay in redistribution for the sake of the very principles on which our constitution is based. I foresaw a grave injustice to my province. I felt that our rights were infringed upon by such a delay. True, at that time, as at present, an amendment to the confederation act was contemplated. Ever since, we have suffered a real handicap because we did not have in this parliament, the full representation to which we were entitled. We are not overly surprised by the fact that, in this house, a group of politicians, ever the same, lead the fight against the claims of minorities. For over twenty years, I have been here a witness to this pitiable exhibition. However, this very same group of politicians claim to be the champions of right. I know them for having seen them at work. Champions of right they are not; rather pillars of the empire. I shall carefully avoid the path that leads directly to the forsaking of our rights to the advantage of those very men who never miss a chance of reproving, by gesture and word alike, any measure leading to a slightly fairer treatment of minorities or to a loosening of our colonial bonds. Although consultation with the provinces, on this matter, would have been preferable, I shall support the motion in the interest of the province of Quebec, whose influence should increase in every part of Canada and more particularly in the House of Commons. I want justice for all, with true respect for provincial autonomy and representation. All should be treated alike. The number of members elected to parliament should be according to the population of the country, I also want all Canadians to possess those qualities of fair-mindedness and patriotism without which we can never be a great nation.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a masterly speech. But although he opened to our view some splendid vistas, he kept in the dark others even more imposing. He recalled for our benefit the solemn statements of men who made Canada famous both nationally and internationally; but even though they were builders in many spheres of our political and social life, they failed to achieve that which has eluded us since confederation, that is, to make Canada free and independent with regard to both her foreign and domestic policies and create a Canadian mentality capable of withstanding the assaults of colonialism and imperialism. During my lengthy career, I have fought on so many constitutional issues that, looking back into the past, considering the present and peering into the future, I wonder whether we shall ever be able to proclaim ourselves a nation. How difficult it is to call ourselves Canadians in this country! Shall we always follow in the wake of the empire? A few days ago I heard in this house invidious words during the debate on Canadian citizenship. A few moments ago I heard similar utterances in connection with our constitution. When shall we be able to hold up our heads and assert ourselves? When shall we be in a position to amend our own constitution without requesting any permission from London? Everywhere our actions stamp us as an immature nation. We are a country without a flag and I would even say without a constitution, since our constitution does not belong to us. It cannot be called ours. We have no right to use it as we see fit. London has the first say in regard to Canada's constitution. The British House of Commons may say to Canada: "Hands off this document. You have no right to amend, modify or change it. We are the masters." Do you realize how dependent we are? This unspeakable situation must be remedied without delay. Let us free our Canadian constitution from all parasitic influences. Let us abolish appeals to the British Privy Council. Let us hoist a Canadian flag. Then and then only shall we rightfully claim that Canada is a nation.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport) (Text): First, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who this afternoon demonstrated that he is a big man. He could have easily taken the view that was taken by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard), who made me think of a small boy looking in the window of a candy store; if he could only get at the bullseyes and chocolates in there he would be thoroughly satisfied. The hon. member sees, as he imagines, eight more seats for the province of Quebec if redistribution goes through on the basis of the present resolution. But the hon. member for Lake Centre gave a studied, reasoned argument as to why the resolution should not be adopted. It would have been more to his advantage to have the resolution pass in its present form than to the advantage of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, because Saskatchewan is due to lose four seats if redistribution is carried out as proposed. I like a man who will stand up and argue a point of view. He realized that this form of redistribution would make it much easier for him, but he was fighting for a principle. So that I say the hon. member for Lake Centre is a big man. As I see it, the house has before it only two choices: (a) to pass the resolution and (b) to accept the amendment, and to consult the provinces as the government should do. If I can judge from what I read in the press I should think some of the provinces, particularly the province of Quebec, will not likely give much support to the resolution. I should expect that, if the premier of Quebec expresses the attitude of those he represents.

Then we would come back to the other position. I would presume we would have to pass through the house quickly a measure asking the British government to postpone redistribution until after the census in 1951. I am going to do my best this evening to set forth an argument as to why the resolution should not be passed, and why there should be no redistribution until after 1951, a matter of only five years more.

I said that the British North America Act could easily be amended to permit postponement of redistribution until after the next census. What is behind this resolution? Why is the government not proceeding with redistribution in the regular way? This is the first time in seventy-nine years any government in Canada has attempted to violate the British North America Act, as this government proposes to do at this time. What is the reason for changing the basis upon which seats are now established?

That basis is set forth in section 51 of the British North America Act, a section which is the foundation and copestone of the whole British North America Act. If that can be violated, then, later on, a majority can violate any section in that act.

I say it is unfair to have a redistribution on the basis of the present census. I see the minister—

An hon. MEMBER: Of fisheries.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I was not looking at the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges). He has not been here long enough to know much about these matters. Rather, I was looking at the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) who was smiling.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, I always smile when my hon. friend speaks, because I enjoy his speeches so much.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you very much.

Mr. BRIDGES: I think we all do.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall try to show that redistribution should not proceed on the basis of the 1941 census. In 1941 this country had been two years at war. We had fought during the remainder of 1939 and throughout the whole of 1940. When the census was taken in the middle of the summer we had been two years at war.

I shall try to show that redistribution should not proceed on the basis of the 1941 census. In 1941 this country had been two years at war. We had fought during the remainder of 1939 and throughout the whole of 1940. When the census was taken in the middle of the summer we had been two years at war.

Referring specially to the publication "Canada at War", for 1945, I shall place on record the number of enlisted men in 1941 in the armed forces. First, I shall take the total number for 1945, shown here as 992,103, of whom Ontario contributed 390,007, or 40 per cent. Then I go back to the number who were in the armed services in 1941 and, in the same issue I find that the number of enlistments stood at 364,000. Ontario's portion of that, at a rate of 40 per cent, stood at 145,000 men in the armed services in 1941.

Although I cannot say I have personal knowledge of each of the persons in question, I can say definitely that from my own constituency there were thousands who had gone to Nova Scotia or to other points, possibly Goose Bay, although perhaps they would not take their wives to that point. I do know for certain, however, that from Ontario many of them went to the maritime provinces and did take their wives and their children with them. Those people were not in Ontario at the time of the census enumeration in 1941. I know I am safe in saying that, counting those who went to the Pacific coast and those who went to the maritime provinces and overseas, there were thousands who were dislocated. So that I say the dislocation of population in Canada in 1941 was substantial. The census enumeration of that year was a most unfair basis upon which to establish parliamentary representation.

Not only that, I know of many who came to my constituency from the western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have in mind—and I shall not mention names—three ladies whose husbands had come to the east to work in war industry in the city of Toronto. These three ladies lived in the constituency of Davenport. One of them had a family of three children, or a total of five in the family. Another brought her mother with her and, counting her child, made up a family of four. The third was of a family of three. There were hundreds, perhaps thousands, of similar cases.

Later, I shall place on record figures showing the numbers who left Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Many of them went to British Columbia and many others came to Ontario. Those enlistments materially affected the balance of population in the three western provinces.

I mention that because I do not believe the government would have attempted to bring in the resolution if two of the western provinces were not going to lose seats as a result of that census. But the government saw that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba would lose seven seats. The government anticipated support from members from Saskatchewan and Alberta, with the exception of course of the brave member who represents Lake Centre—

An hon. MEMBER: Brave?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I say that. He stood up like a major-general this afternoon and defended a principle—and it takes backbone to defend a principle, at any time.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The population was badly dislocated, and those two provinces, both Saskatchewan and Manitoba lost heavily. The result was that the government anticipated that it had friends who would reach out and try to grab or to hold on to the seven seats which they would not have, if redistribution proceeded on the present basis. The government expects support from that quarter.

If one examines the census returns of 1941, what does he find? He finds that Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia are affected one way or another. In looking through this census I direct the attention of the house particularly to the age groups of 20-24, 25-29, 30-34, 35-39 and 40-44, the groups from which the working men are taken, or from which people were dislocated and came to Ontario, British Columbia or elsewhere. What does one find in these groups. He finds that of the four western provinces, British Columbia continued to advance rapidly, not in the aggregate, but in proportion to the other three provinces. For instance, in 1941 in the age group twenty to twenty-four years British Columbia had 69,247; Alberta had 78,358; Saskatchewan had 85,097 and Manitoba had 69,273. In that ratio British Columbia had the lowest number, but when you consider all those age groups you find that British Columbia had the highest number of the four provinces, that it had advanced more than any other of those four provinces in the age groups forty to forty-five, thirty-five to thirty-nine and thirty to thirty-four and it was only exceeded by Saskatchewan in the age group twenty-five to twenty-nine. What does that mean? It means that a great number of people in those age groups had left the prairie province, either to go into the armed services or to work in the factories of Ontario or British Columbia. The number of people working in factories increased considerably in those two provinces.

It is wholly unfair to have a redistribution that will so seriously affect the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We should not base redistribution on a census taken when so many of their men either were working in war factories or had entered the armed services.

Mr. MITCHELL: They were in Ontario voting socialism.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will give you Ontario by itself. What was the result there? In 1939, prior to the war there were 400,000 unemployed in Canada, but in 1941 the number of those engaged in war work alone was 1,021,000. That showed a great change in what the populace was doing. As I said a moment ago, many of those workers came from the western provinces, particularly Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which provinces would stand to lose seven seats. I maintain that it would be wholly unfair to have a redistribution based on that situation.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) asked about Ontario. As the minister knows in his city of Welland, and as I know in the city of Toronto, large numbers from those provinces came to work in our industries. However, the population of the province did not go up as much as one would have thought it would considering the ingress of people from outside. The fact is that Ontario had 145,000 in the armed services, which was 40 per cent of all those in the services in 1941; Quebec had 17 per cent, and the other provinces had lower percentages. Because of the dislocation of population caused by those working in war industries and the dislocation of population through enlistments it would be unfair to redistribute seats on the basis of the census of 1941.

At one time our American cousins were in the very same boat. This is not a new thing because they have gone through the same experience. However, they handled it in a different way. They took a census in the United States in 1920, and had reapportionment of congressional seats taken place at that time it would have resulted in a number of states losing some of their representatives in congress. They refused to reapportion their seats, and I should like to quote what was said before a committee of the house of representatives which was set up to deal with the apportionment. This shows why reapportionment did not take place in 1920. One of the senior ranking investigators said this:

> Mr. Rankin: Let me make this statement for the benefit of members of the committee. I do this because I, more than any man alive, am responsible for the failure to reapportion congress in accordance with the 1920 census. That census was taken in the winter time, which was the first time such was done. At the time it was taken many of the farmers were more or less scattered, it was hard to find them, and therefore the census, in my opinion, was incomplete.

That is just the situation that prevailed when our census was taken in 1941; many had moved away.

> Again, it was taken when we were just emerging from the world war and when hundreds of thousands of former soldiers had not returned to their homes.
> As a result, if we had reapportionment according to that census, many agricultural states would have lost a portion of their representation, and a very large portion.

That is the same thing we are up against here. Because of the war two western provinces lost a large part of their populations. Following what they did in the United States, we should not have redistribution. They did not reapportion until after the 1930 census and in the meantime the population of the United States had increased by 30,000,000 from 1910. Were they unfair in not reapportioning? They did not think so. They had some consideration for those men who had not yet returned home by 1920 when the census was taken following the great war. They had consideration for the farmers who had gone to work in war factories.

Everyone in this House of Commons can read that the number employed in war factories was 1,021,000, according to "Canada at War", for 1945. Those people came from everywhere. I know that many went to the United States, because in 1941 that country was not at war and they paid higher wages. I am trying to show the house that we had the same condition here that prevailed in the United States when they refused to reapportion their congressional seats in 1920. They waited until 1930 before they did that. I consider that that was fair play; that was the right thing for them to do.

Someone asked about Ontario. As I said, the enlistments from Ontario were 145,000 in 1941, and this materially affected Ontario's population. Otherwise we would have advanced much more. These men were followed by many of their wives and, in some cases, their families and that affected the population of the province. It is for these reasons that we should not go on with redistribution.

As was said so well this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), so much so that I do not need to say much about it, if the government proceeds with this they will be opening the door for other violations of the constitution if and when some rabid majority gets into power, as may some time happen, and determines to change the British North America Act. Supposing such a majority wanted to change section 92, subsection 12? Subsection 12 of section 92 deals with:

> The solemnization of marriage in the province.

The provinces have control of that now, but there has been agitation for the Canadian government to have more control over marriage. Marriage is a contract. Can you change it just as you like?

Section 95 pertains to agriculture and immigration. It says:

> In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province.

The provinces are doing that now. But that could be changed. This government could take to itself of everything pertaining to immigration.

Section 98 says.

The judges of the courts of Quebec shall be selected from the bar of that province.

That is a special privilege. That also might be changed.

Section 133 pertains to the English and French languages. That might be changed too. I am one of those who believe that all these provisions in the British North America Act should be inviolable. I believe that these contracts which have been entered into with the province of Quebec and other provinces should not be changed. I do not believe that the province of Quebec would have come into confederation if they had thought that these contracts would be so lightly changed. I am a supporter of this clause preserving the use of the French language and of any other clause pertaining to the province of Quebec. But if you open the door wide to change, then, no matter what anyone else says, each and all of these provisions can be changed if you change the cornerstone and copestone which is section 51. Violate that and all the rest can be violated just as easily. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that you have to go very carefully in making changes. It is a serious thing to violate the main clause of the British North America Act.

Representation by population has been mentioned in this debate. I am in favour of representation by population, if fair. I see that my hon. friend the member for Nipissing (Mr. Gauthier) is having a good laugh. But the premier of Quebec has announced his opposition to this bill, so that I am in pretty good company in opposing the bill.

So far as representation by population is concerned, are you going all along the line with it if you pass this bill? Let me give some figures to show how alleged representation by population is actually working at the present time. I think Canada is conspicuous throughout the world as one state where representation by population is not observed the least so far as the constituencies are concerned. I know no place in the world where there is less representation by population than in Canada. In Nova Scotia four constituencies have more than the quota of representation, and eight are under the quota. The highest number of people in any constituency in the province is 85,000, and the lowest, 27,000. You would not call that representation by population.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

In New Brunswick there are three constituencies over the quota, and seven under. The highest number of people to any constituency is 78,000, and the lowest, 24,000. You would not call that representation by population.

In Quebec twenty-seven constituencies are over the quota, and thirty-eight below the quota. The highest number of people to any one constituency is 93,000, and the lowest, 22,000. It does not seem fair to me that it should require 93,000 people in one seat to balance 22,000 in another seat.

Mr. LALONDE: That is why we want more members.

Mr. MacNICOL: That has nothing whatever to do with the matter. In Ontario there are thirty-four constituencies over the quota, and forty-eight under. The highest number of people to a constituency is 113,000, and the lowest, 19,000. There is little representation by population there.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Nipissing): Which constituency has 113,000?

Mr. MacNICOL: That is Nipissing. My hon. friend knows that because I told him that. That is why I often said that his predecessor should be given double the indemnity for having so many people to represent. It was not the fault of the last government. I did my best to provide Nipissing with two members, but for reasons that it is not necessary to go into now that was not done.

Manitoba has five constituencies over the quota, and twelve under. The highest number of people to a constituency is 71,000, and the lowest, 23,000.

Saskatchewan has three constituencies over the quota, and eighteen under. The highest number of electors to a constituency is 59,000, and the lowest, 33,000.

Alberta has five constituencies over the quota, and twelve under. The highest number of people to a constituency is 58,000, and the lowest, 26,000.

British Columbia has nine constituencies over the quota, and seven under, and the highest number of people to a constituency is 77,000, and the lowest, 25,000.

Nipissing is the constituency in Canada which has the highest number of people, 113,000, and the lowest is also in Ontario, with 19,000. There are ninety ridings in all Canada that are over the quota, and 150 below the quota. You will not find a situation like that in any other democratic country. We now have a chance to make a proper redistribution.

In Australia they work on a basis of five, seven and nine. That is, there are five voters in a widely extended riding like Cochrane, seven voters in a riding like South Ontario, and nine voters in the city ridings. Those nine voters in a city riding are considered equal to seven voters representing a riding that is partly urban and partly rural, and equal to five voters in a widely extended riding. I do not believe that we should change from such a basis in Canada at present, but after 1960 this country should get down to a more equitable redistribution.

In the United States their quota is 304,000 per seat, and they adhere to that as closely as they possibly can. Practically every riding in the United States is within measurable distance of the quota, a little above or a little below. The same applies to the main states of the union. They have no situation like we have in Canada, where one riding will have 113,000 people and another riding 19,000. Nor will you find that in England, where the quota is 70,000. I looked over the first 220 seats in the British parliament and they were comparably close to the 70,000. We have little like that here. So that we have a lot of work to do yet to give a reasonable measure of representation by population in the ridings.

In the United States they are drastic against gerrymandering. We have had a lot of ridings gerrymandered here. In the United States the federal ridings are determined by the states, not by Washington. The state governments appoint a committee which draws up the boundaries for the various federal seats and then they have to be approved by the supreme court of the state. It is shocking to think of what has happened in Canada. We have a great disproportion of representation in this country. How we are going to overcome it, I do not know. But that is one thing we should do.

I read an interesting bit of information about the state of Massachusetts when I was studying this question. I am not in favour of what they do in Massachusetts; I do not think we should do it their way. They base their representation on the voters' list. I had an interesting time in computing the results in the provinces of Canada if representation were reapportioned on that basis. As I say, I do not favour it because I do not believe it would give us the result we desire, although it would provide the same number of seats as the government proposes, namely 255. However, it was interesting to observe that other jurisdictions have troubles beside our own. Our difficulties arise largely from the way our seats are laid out. There is not much fairness, as I pointed out a moment ago, in a system which creates such a great disparity between the numbers of people residing in various ridings. A letter on this subject which I received from Pennsylvania indicates that they are not gerrymandering over there. The assistant director of the bureau of elections writes:

> It is my personal opinion that the legislature of Pennsylvania will be unable to favour one type of area over another type—

That is, they want the seats to be relatively the same population.

> —in the matter of representation in the legislature or in congress. I feel that such apportionment would violate both the federal and state constitutions.

By that he means that, as between a seat which has a population of 113,000, as Nipissing has, and one with only 22,000, like Argenteuil, there is such a disproportion in the value of each elector's vote that it does not seem defensible. As I have said, I am not in favour of a change which would cause a great deal of disharmony, but I believe we could reapportion representation on a basis of 5-7-9; that is to say, five voters in a wide open rural area to seven voters in a semi-urban and rural area, to nine in a city. At the present time we are altogether out of proportion.

I believe this matter should stand over until after the next census. What would we lose by it? The Northwest Territories would lose a seat, and I believe they should have one; how we could give it to them without redistribution I do not know. But there would not be very much change in the rest of Canada. If we go on with the bill what would be the result? Some of the western provinces will lose anyway. That Ontario will have one more seat is neither here nor there; that is a mere bagatelle. As far as I am concerned I am ready to accept what comes as a result of redistribution.

Much of the talk this afternoon seemed to me like an attack on Ontario. Well, we have not violated the constitution. We took what the constitution gave us. We were reduced to eighty-two seats and we have not made any fuss about it. Previously we lost ten, and we did not make any fuss about that; Ontario used to have ninety-two seats, but upon redistribution our representation in comparison with that of Quebec had to be reduced; it fell to eighty-six and then to eighty-two. That was in accordance with the constitution. Now, to avoid complying with the constitution, the government proposes to violate the British North America Act.

Mr. LALONDE: Not violate it. Just change it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a violation of the crown and pinnacle of the constitution, section 51, a straight violation of the British North America Act, and the main clause of that act, section 51.

Mr. LALONDE: An amendment, not a violation. There is quite a difference.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a violation when you cannot amend it, and I do not believe the government have authority to amend it. To support my statement, I will read what Lord Atkin said. The quotation is as follows:

> No one can doubt that this distribution is one of the most essential conditions of the inter-provincial compact to which the B.N.A. gives effect. If the true position of Lower Canada alone were considered, the existence of her separate jurisdiction as to property and civil rights might be said to depend upon loyal adherence to her constitutional right to the exclusive competence of her own legislature in these matters.

Lord Atkin says that the British North America Act was a compact. Well, if it was a compact between the four original provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, by what right does this government violate it? This proceeding is nothing short of a violation. If, of course, this bill or resolution is submitted to the provinces and receives their endorsement, I shall have nothing more to say about it; there would be nothing to do but go on with the programme as outlined. But until the government obtain the consent of the provinces I maintain that they are violating—I use that word again—what is the cornerstone of the whole act, that is section 51, having to do with representation in this house. I say to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec that I had expected everyone of them to rise and take a stand such as the premier of Quebec is taking.

Mr. LALONDE: He is one of your good friends.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know nothing about his politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is the premier of Quebec, at present in charge of that province; he recently won a by-election, and I believe he will win the one which is pending. Evidently he represents the people of the province, or he would not take the stand he has taken.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. WHITMAN: Elected on a minority vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: So I say that the government's action is a violation of the British North America Act, by which violation Quebec has more to lose than any other province.

An hon. MEMBER: You have said that so often you must be sure of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can repeat it many times and still be sure of it, because I believe it is true.

I feel the time has come to do a number of things which could be considered when, in due course, we are in a position to go into this whole subject. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition should both receive acclamations. It would be a good thing for the country if they did not have to fight a battle in their ridings, as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had to do at the last election; they would then be free to go around the country and enlighten the public as to their policies. Another matter which we might attend to is to rearrange our seats on a much fairer basis than at present, as they do in the United States. In many other ways we could usefully amend our present ways and methods of conducting our elections in Canada. The way many of the seats are laid out to-day is nothing short of a gerrymander, and it will not provide fair representation in this house. Therefore, I again say to the government, be careful. I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), since he is fathering the bill, be careful too. I ask him to follow the path that was so well laid out by the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon in the quotations he gave from other ministers of justice and leaders in this country, who, in regard to this particular section, kept their hands off the British North America Act.

By amending this section of the act you are opening the door to anything that might come along. It will serve no useful purpose to go much farther at the moment. In reorganizing our Canadian elections I was going to suggest that we might follow one good thing the province of Quebec has done. I do not know whether it was done by the present or the previous government; but when they call an election they appoint a deputy returning officer in each riding and the opposition party names the clerk. I think that is an amendment we could adopt. That, together with the reconstitution of our seats on the basis of five, seven and nine, or as closely as we could follow it, would result in a great improvement in Canadian political affairs.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): The discussions on this resolution and the subsequent amendment have been interesting so far, but they have been somewhat philosophic or legal, or in some instances slightly prejudiced because of the home province of the individual who happened to be speaking. May I be allowed to crave the indulgence of the house to go a little further into the north country and deal with a part of our dominion which does not come in the public eye very often unless something extraordinary happens. I refer particularly to that part of Canada knows as the Northwest Territories.

There are four constituencies in Saskatchewan which run a long way north; mine happens to be one of them. It runs up to the sixtieth parallel, which is a long way north. Beyond that there is quite a large territory, possibly larger than many of us realize. As a matter of fact, it comprises 42 per cent of the total land area of Canada.

So far as this resolution goes, we are more particularly concerned at the moment with the number of seats which we may or may not get in our own particular province. That huge area of land in the Northwest Territories is represented in this house by just one member, and the people up there feel, and say, that they should have more than one member.

That great area is divided into four districts, namely, the Yukon, which is already represented in this house, the Northwest Territories which, in their turn, are again divided into three large districts, known as Franklin, Keewatin and the Mackenzie district. The Yukon district comprises something over 205,000 square miles. It is the smallest district in the north country. The Franklin district is 546,000 square miles in area; Keewatin, 218,000 and some odd square miles, and the Mackenzie district, 493,000 square miles. The total area of that northwest country is 1,463,593 square miles, or 42 per cent of all the dry land of Canada.

The Yukon has 1,730 square miles of fresh water, Franklin has 7,500 square miles; Keewatin, 9,700 square miles, and the Mackenzie district, 34,265 square miles. These figures are all taken from the Canada Year Book. I am dwelling on this because I want hon. members to realize just how much land there is in that northern part of the world. The area of that territory is twelve times that of the United Kingdom and one-half that of the United States. I repeat, that huge territory is represented by one member, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). According to the Canada Year Book, this member of parliament first took his seat in 1904. In 1940, 2,097 votes were polled out of a possible 4,914. The rest of the territory has a population of some 12,000, but has no representation. The people are now asking for at least one other member, who should represent the Mackenzie district.

A tremendous amount of wealth comes out of that area which we have possibly regarded as being arid, snow-covered and icebound. In 1941, a total of $9,500,000 was taken from that country in minerals, gold, silver, oil and other minerals, or $486 per capita. There is only one other province in Canada which approaches this figure, namely, Ontario, with $551 per capita. In that area they pay a yearly amount of something over $3,000,000 in salaries and wages. Over $3,500,000 were taken out in fur in 1943. Only three other provinces in Canada exceeded that figure. There are two huge lakes in that country, the Great Bear and the Great Slave lakes, each of which is half as big again as lake Ontario. The uranium deposits on the Great Bear lake have given that district world notoriety. It may well be that that area can be and probably is, if we only knew it, the most important district in the whole world to-day, because our information is that there is only one other place where uranium, the metal which is so valuable and so important in the minds of all peoples to-day, can be obtained.

The Northwest Territories are governed by a commissioner, a deputy commissioner and four councillors, who are appointed and who have their seat in Ottawa. These men are assisted by various departments of government, but they do not live in the Northwest Territories, and only occasionally do they get up there. Another significant thing is the fact that the stipendiary magistrate, the chairman of the board of trustees, the dominion land agent, the timber berth agent, the registrar of deeds and the mining recorder are all the same man. The residents of the Mackenzie district are not very happy about this; they feel the time has come for a change, and they certainly believe they should have representation in this house.

Another grievance is that they are taxed—of course everyone has that grievance—but they are not given representation, which is not supposed to be a good idea. They also claim that their exemption is no greater than that in force in other parts of Canada, though their living costs are greatly in excess of costs elsewhere. They say that living costs in the Northwest Territories are anywhere from 75 to 300 per cent higher than in other parts of the dominion. They also complain about fuel. In that country, where there is no wood, of course oil is important. When you get up to about 63 degrees north latitude you get pretty well out of the wooded belt, so that oil becomes of great importance for fuel. My information is that the Canol wells have been closed down. Apparently they now belong to Imperial Oil, and the residents complain that there has been a severe shortage of oil in that area for the last two years.

In reference to transportation they complain that the roads are quite inadequate. There is one road in the making, the Grimshaw-Hay River road, which they do not expect will be completed until 1947, and in the meantime no provision has been made for linking existing roads with the Alaska highway. The waterways, such as they are, require dredging from time to time. They particularly mention Slave river and Great Slave lake as being in great need of dredging operations. Air transportation is apparently a monopoly of C.P.A., and they claim their rates are the highest in the country. For example, the single fare from Edmonton to Yellowknife is $126.50, which they complain is entirely too high. The postal arrangements will also bear some looking into: three days a week by air. They claim their position is unique in that parcel rates are higher than letter rates. There is no parliamentary franchise in that country. Though certain letters and papers may be sent from this house to other countries free of charge, if you want to send them to the Northwest Territories you have to pay for them. As I have mentioned, mining operations are going on up there, and they have a further complaint in connection with mine wages. They say that the federally owned Eldorado mine—and I hope the minister concerned will listen to this—pays the lowest hourly rates underground of any mine operating in that country. Negus, they say, pays $50 for a 48-hour week, while the surface and millworkers are paid a little less. My information also is that the mine managers are hostile to labour organizations.

As far as health and welfare are concerned, their hospital arrangements are inadequate. They have one 15-bed hospital at Yellowknife, with one doctor. Dental service is inadequate and expensive. The Dog Rib Indians, who live in that territory, are said to be poverty stricken. They are at a very low level of culture indeed, and apparently the government is doing very little to look after them.

I have gone through this outline rather hastily just to give a general picture of the situation up in that north country. They are asking for more representation at Ottawa than they have at the present time. They are mentioned very casually in the resolution. Apparently some thought has been given to joining the Yukon with the rest of the territories or any parts of the territories which do not belong to a province, and arrangements are to be made to provide one member for such district when it is set up. They consider this to be entirely insufficient, and ask that the government, and particularly the minister in charge of this resolution, give serious thought to providing a little more consideration for these people living in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared address to deliver to the house this evening, and in consequence I shall not detain hon. members for any great length of time. However, I do not want this important resolution to pass without placing myself on record about it. I should like to point out that the membership of this House of Commons is based upon the principle of representation by population; yet as a matter of fact this principle has not been lived up to. Indeed, many of our principles and many of our sayings, while they sound well, have to be departed from in one respect or another. It is all very well to talk about representation by population or to say that all men are born free and equal, but as a matter of fact we know that such is not the case.

The principle of representation in this house by population has been departed from in several instances. For example section 51 (4), about which there has been so much discussion, provides for a departure from this principle. The act passed in 1915, which provided that the number of representatives in this house from the maritime provinces, as well as from the other provinces of Canada, should never be less than the number of representatives those provinces have in the senate, was another departure from that principle. The fact that we have a member from the Yukon is a further departure. If the amendment proposed in this resolution becomes law, we shall still not have representation by population, for it provides that the maritime provinces and the other provinces shall have at least as many representatives in this house as they have in the senate, and that representation from the Yukon shall be continued.

As a matter of fact, our representation is based upon other considerations besides that of population. We have, as I say, a member from the Yukon. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this afternoon suggested that we should have one from the Northwest Territories. I remember last session, or the session before, when this matter was being considered, that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) speaking of representation from Saskatchewan, suggested the principle that there should be not only representation by population but representation by areas or extent of territory. The hon. member who preceded me in the debate this evening, the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith), made a similar suggestion.

My reaction to this resolution, when I read it, was disquieting. It was disquieting for me to think that when the government comes face to face with a political difficulty it has to perform a major operation on the British North America Act, which is the foundation-stone of our constitution, in order to remedy that difficulty. Surely there must be some safer way, and therefore some better way of solving this difficulty.

If the government of the day—and it matters not what government it may be—comes up against a difficulty of this kind, and says to itself, "We will amend the British North America Act, and fix it up in that way," what foundation have we, or what feeling of security can we have in this country? It seems to me that every avenue should have been explored before taking such a drastic measure as that proposed in the resolution introduced into the house.

I support the view held by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), that the British North America Act should not be changed without consultation with the provinces, or without the provinces being first consulted. That opinion, as the hon. member for Lake Centre pointed out, was the opinion expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by Sir Robert Borden, by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and by many other prominent Canadians who have given careful consideration to the subject. The hon. member quoted several statements by these eminent men, and it seems to me they are food for serious consideration.

I hold in my hand, and I intend to quote it, a statement made in the debates of 1943 by an hon. member who at one time occupied a prominent place in the government of this country. I refer to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). This is what he said at page 4356 of Hansard for 1943:

> Mr. Speaker, the resolution now being considered by the house contains in my humble judgment, a dangerous procedure to which the House of Commons should give serious consideration before adopting it in the form in which it has been couched on the order paper. For a number of years it has been admitted in all branches of public opinion that no serious change should be made in the British North America Act without the consent and approval of the parties to the contract. I admit that in the past the federal parliament has been dealing from the point of view of its own authority, and has been amending the British North America Act, without consulting the provinces, which are a party to that contract. But I repeat that at least within the last few years the opinion has developed throughout Canada that the British North America Act should be considered as a sacred contract among associates, those associates being the provinces, and that nothing should be done to modify it without the approval of the contracting parties.

I think it is quite clear that whatever powers the dominion government possesses were given it by the provinces. Perhaps I should modify that statement because we have an unwritten as well as a written constitution. But I can say that a great many of the powers the dominion government possesses were given it by the provinces, and that the dominion has no right to change the constitution without consulting the provinces.

Reference has been made in this debate to the Quebec conference and the Quebec resolutions of 1864, which followed the Charlottetown conference. To keep the record straight, and perhaps for historical reasons, I should like to point out that in 1865 the people of New Brunswick rejected the Quebec resolutions of 1864 at the polls by a very large majority. In the same year the province of Canada sent a delegation to London to ask the British government to force New Brunswick and Nova Scotia into a union with her based on the Quebec resolutions, which the British government refused to do and replied in effect that it would not sanction a union unless the provinces first arranged a properly authorized agreement of union.

In 1866 the newly elected legislature of New Brunswick passed a resolution authorizing the appointment of delegates to arrange a union under terms and conditions which would protect the rights and interests of that province with special reference to the Intercolonial railway. In the same year the legislature of Nova Scotia passed a similar resolution without reference to the Intercolonial railway. In December of the same year delegates of the four provinces met at the Westminster Palace hotel, London, came to a properly authorized interprovincial agreement and sent this agreement to the colonial secretary with the request for a conference with him.

Early in 1867 this joint conference was held with Lord Carnarvon as chairman, Lord Tring drafting the necessary legislation. In the same year the British North America Act 1867 and the Canadian Railway Loan Act 1867 were passed by the British parliament to give effect to the interprovincial agreement 1866—not the Quebec agreement, but the London agreement —and at its first session the federal parliament passed the Parliament of Canada Act and the Intercolonial Railway Act, and by so doing undertook its obligations to carry out the interprovincial agreement of 1866, also not to legislate in any manner that is inconsistent with or repugnant to what is written in the 1866 agreement and the imperial legislation that gives effect to it.

I would point out that the proposed amendment of the British North America Act is not in the interests of the maritime provinces. We have twenty-six members from the maritime provinces in this house out of a total of 245. If this resolution carries we shall have in the next house twenty-seven members out of a total membership of 255. I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to section 52 of the British North America Act, which reads:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

I contend that if this resolution goes into effect it will disturb the present proportionate representation of the maritime provinces in this house. At the present time the maritime provinces have twenty-six members out of 245, and if we are to have only twenty-seven out of 255 when this resolution becomes law then the proportionate representation is being changed and section 52 is violated. Not only only that, as time goes on our representation will change even more. It will be only a matter of time, I believe, before the province of Nova Scotia will have as its representation in this house only the number of representatives it has in the senate. That will probably be the result should this resolution carry because of the increase in population that will take place in other parts of Canada. Nova Scotia would then find itself in the same position as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I think we are going beyond the provisions of section 52 of the British North America Act in proposing the amendment contained in this resolution.

I want to see Quebec have the representation it is entitled to, and I want to see the other provinces fairly represented. Under the present set-up and with the conditions that prevail at the present time, the representation appears to be unfair. When the minister introduced the resolution he said that up until the turn of the century everything went all right, that it was only since the turn of the century that any discrepancy or unfairness had crept in. This thought has occurred to me. Were not the fathers of confederation right? If we take a long-range view of it, may not the present arrangement work out all right in the end? The London resolution and the B.N.A. Act were intended to last more than a generation. The act worked all right prior to 1900; may it not work all right again?

In any event, I want to see Quebec fairly represented in this house; I do not want to see any province unfairly represented, or have more members than it is entitled to. I submit, as I have already submitted, that this proposed amendment is violating section 52 of the British North America Act.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in order that all sides of an argument may be fairly presented it is necessary to deal with many different points of view. Earlier in the day we heard the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in which he developed the historical side of this argument. Later, we had what was referred to by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith) as the philosophical side of the argument developed by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). Then, later, we had the legal side of the argument developed and elaborated by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) who has just spoken. Then we have had the administrative side developed, and reference was made to the difficulties of those who live in the great undeveloped areas of the north, the large number of men who went to work in the great mining areas in the Mackenzie basin just before the last election and were deprived of their franchise.

So far the practical side has not been touched upon, a study of the point of view of the man in the street. At the risk of falling a victim to the verbal claymore of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), I should like to refer for a few minutes to what I would call the practical side or the point of view of the man in the street. It is the man in the street who has to pay out money for such legislation or government as he receives, and for many years past he has thought that this country is overgoverned. He stops to think of the federal government, the provincial governments and all the municipal governments, and he keeps on saying that this country is overgoverned.

If he were to look at this little book called the Parliamentary Guide he would find, if his figures agreed with the rapid calculation I have made in the last few minutes, that in the senate there are some ninety-six seats, with one or more vacancies.

Mr. HACKETT: There are plenty of candidates to fill that.

Mr. PEARKES: I am told there are plenty of candidates but I am not one. In the House of Commons there are some 245 members. Then in the provincial legislatures there are the following memberships:

Alberta	60
Manitoba	55
British Columbia	48
New Brunswick	48
Nova Scotia	30
Ontario	90
Prince Edward Island	30
Quebec	91
Saskatchewan	55

According to the rough calculation I have made, that gives a total of 507 members in the nine provincial legislatures. I would hesitate to make even a rough guess as to the number of people exercising government in the various municipalities stretching across the country, but it must run into thousands. Is it any wonder that the man in the street suggests that perhaps we are overgoverned? What will his reaction be when he sees that the government is suggesting that there be ten members added to this house? I am afraid that he will start to figure up the costs, and his very first reaction will be: "I, the man in the street, raised their salaries by $2,000 last session, and now they want to do less work by having ten more men to help them out."

It will mean that these ten additional members will receive the indemnity that we here receive, and the first rough calculation would show that this means another $60,000 added to the taxpayer's burden. But it does not end there, because we are fortunate enough to get free railway transportation, and if we come from any great distance the taxpayer is kind enough to give us our travelling expenses. We also get free mail and a lot of free literature. If we are to add another ten members to this house, there will be an increase in the amount of that literature, which will mean that there will have to be an increment in every single department in order to provide those extra ten members with this information which is given out so freely by every department of the government. There will have to be ten extra stenographers. There will have to be extra waitresses in the cafeteria or in the parliamentary restaurant, as the case may be.

I have to share an office with another hon. member, who irritates me intensely at times because he has a loud voice and invariably speaks over the telephone, while I hardly use the telephone at all, and I shudder to think of having another member also put into my office. There are already not enough offices to go around. I thoroughly believe that if you are going to give ten more members to this house, we the Progressive Conservatives will get at least one of those ten—I hope so—but I dread to think of having another member put into my office because there just will not be room for three. So that I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the next step will not be to suggest enlarging this building if we have ten more members and you have to find ten more offices or even five more offices to accommodate them. Will it not be necessary to build an additional floor or, as my hon. friend besides me suggests, a lean-to on this building?

An hon. MEMBER: Put the Tories in the cellar.

Mr. PEARKES: So while I said at the beginning that I felt quite reasonably certain that I might fall a victim to the bowie knife, I have run that risk with my eyes open because I believe that there are a great many humble men throughout this country who really will wonder whether they are justified in paying out more money in order to be governed. I leave it there, and I ask the government to give consideration to that foolish point of view perhaps, because the man in the street is not a philosopher; he is not a lawyer; he is a practical man who has to pay out the extra money if he is to be blessed or cursed, as the case may be, by an additional ten members.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) was speaking, and as the clock pursued its inevitable course toward eleven o'clock I wondered whether it would reach it before the time arrived when I would have to rise in my place in the house, and I could not avoid being impressed with the thought aroused by the trend of his argument that ten more members would probably mean ten more speeches, or, as my hon. friend the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) suggests, perhaps a hundred more, depending upon how many times they spoke. I see the Minister of National Defence has caught the point.

It seems to me that one obvious feature has so far emerged from the debate. The question has come to the fore on what grounds the various parties in the house base their stand for or against the resolution. Since it is almost eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Friday, June 7, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—DISRUPTION OF TRAFFIC ON INLAND WATERWAYS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I understand an hon. gentleman is going to move the adjournment of the house to discuss another matter, so I thought I had better get in first. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) sent me notice of a question in reference to the movement of six hundred men into Cornwall, and I think I should answer immediately because this does affect the situation to a great extent. Immediately I read that statement in the newspapers I got in touch with the operators, from whom I received a telegram. I think it would be better to read this telegram, and also a telegram I have received from the union. This is the telegram from the operators:

> Referring to newspaper reports of to-day and with reference to our telephone conversation of this morning ship owners say that no arrangements have been made for a mass movement of men into Cornwall. They say that they have available at least six hundred men many of whom are returned men ready to man their ships and that any attempt to man any vessel or vessels will only be made after full and proper notice to the proper police authorities and in full cooperation with them. Meantime strikers are pursuing their acts of lawlessness the latest of which was the attack on the steamer Birchton last night in the Soulanges canal, when they seriously injured the cook, smashed up the galley throwing the galley stove overboard and committed other acts of vandalism. Also strikers last night forcibly removed the crews of the steamers Houson, Stewart, Richards, Mapleheath, Grainmotor and Kinmount while they were lying peacefully at dominion government property at Coteau.
> (Signed) George R. Donovan, Secretary,
> Dominion Marine Association.

I also received, in reference to the same matter, the following telegram from Mr. J. A. Sullivan of the Canadian seamen's union:

> View with alarm press release from ship owners in Montreal in which they state that they have organized and are prepared to move into the city of Cornwall six hundred thugs. They quote in their statement that they intend to get the ships out of Cornwall with or without the aid of the authorities. Such open defiance must be checked. They have accused this organization of violence but with their own words they have proven that they are the lawless ones. Surely it is time for the government to act in stopping such a procedure.

I have read these telegrams, Mr. Speaker, to give my hon. friend and this house some indication of where the Minister of Labour sometimes sits in these disputes.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. COLDWELL: What a hot spot!

Mr. MITCHELL: I have always taken the view—although sometimes my hon. friend has accused me of sitting on the fence; in this instance I would say it is a hot stove—that it is wise to be a conciliator. I suppose I have been chairman of more commissions on labour disputes than any other labour man in this country. To be successful, one cannot take sides. He has to bring the parties together. I thought I had done that this week—until this press story this morning, and the incident which took place yesterday on the St. Lawrence.

I told the union and the employers that I thought this carry-on or attitude by both sides was unwise. In my judgment it was stupid—and I say that to both sides. Sooner or later the dispute will be settled; it will have to be settled. Unless there is cooperation of both parties to the dispute, whoever presides over that dispute has an almost impossible task. I hope even at this late date that both sides will act like grown-up men, instead of children on a sand lot.

FOOD

WASTAGE THROUGH LACK OF CONTAINERS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the immediate threat of wastage of the current crop of small fruits, tree fruits, vegetables, butter and egg production and the fish pack in the province of British Columbia, because of the lack of necessary wooden or wood product containers.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 31 states, in part:

> (2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.
> (3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.
> (4) If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the house shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determined, if necessary, by a division.

Inasmuch as the motion has been presented at the proper time, and I regard it as a matter of urgent public importance, I consider it in order. If no objection is taken, the hon. member for Fraser Valley has the floor.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I asked for the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of national urgency, namely the immediate threat of wastage of the current crop of small fruits, tree fruits, vegetables, butter and egg production and the fish pack in British Columbia because of the lack of the necessary wood and wood product containers. I do so because I believe the matter is not merely of immediate national urgency, but that it is of international urgency.

The pack is threatened with extensive wastage because of the lack of wood and wood product containers to collect and transport it. This shortage, while brought to a head by the current lumber strike, was very serious long before the strike occurred. Because of the extreme shortage of lumber, few barrels, crates or hallocks have been produced this spring, because the lumbermen found it more profitable to convert their logs into building lumber than into boxes at the current ceiling prices. This situation got so bad that on April 30, Donald Gordon gave the box manufacturers an open permit to manufacture the necessary containers, the British Columbia fruit crop alone requiring 30,000 barrels, 16,000,000 boxes, 200,000 crates and 5,000,000 hallocks. But slight production had followed when the lumber strike closed all box factories.

The first small fruits are now ripening in the fields, and I now quote a wire I have received from the president of the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, dated May 20. It states:

Vernon, B.C., May 20, 1946.

G. A. Cruickshank, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Unless manufacture of berry crates, processing barrels, egg cases and vegetable crates is renewed immediately heavy losses to growers, processors, distributors and employees in these departments are inevitable. Harvesting of berries starts in about fortnight and if containers are not ready large part of heavy and valuable berry crop will be left in fields to rot. Not only domestic fresh market supplies affected but export of processed berries for Britain. Eggs for Britain from Fraser Valley affected and also vegetables from Fraser Valley Vancouver Island and interior. Urge your interest and assistance towards settlement ensuring resumption mills and woods operations. Tree fruits crop of record proportions from Kamloops through Okanagan and east to Creston in prospect and every day mills are idle means loss of boxes that cannot be made up during balance of season. Our federation confirms and supports vigorously representations of British Columbia coast growers association, Pacific coast poultry producers association and British Columbia fruit growers association. Our federation would value message from you regarding this crisis.

P. E. French,
President, B.C. Federation of Agriculture.

In the house for the past two months the greatest emphasis has been laid by all parties on food production, because of shortage in Canada and starvation abroad. In view of the immediate threat of wastage of the tremendous British Columbia crop of perishable foodstuffs, I should be derelict in my duty as a member of parliament if I did not move the adjournment of the house so that public attention may be directed to this grave situation.

My colleagues from British Columbia are equally concerned over the emergency. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for permitting this motion for adjournment. I shall be as direct and as brief as possible in anything I shall have to say. Perhaps hon. members will excuse me if, for once, I stick closely to my notes, for I wish to present the plight of the food producers and my proposed solution in as clear a manner as possible.

It is often said, sir, that the entire economy of British Columbia is dependent on the lumber industry, and that this is true even of agriculture and fisheries, for the great bulk of our pack in small fruits, tree fruits, vegetables, eggs, butter, and fish, is collected, packed and marketed both at home and abroad in wooden containers, whether they be barrels, crates, or hallocks. In wartime our producers have not only had great difficulty in getting farm labour to cultivate the crops, but, because of shortages in the lumber industry, each year they have found it more and more difficult to obtain the containers in which to pack and ship them.

Normally a great deal of the production is done in the winter time, so that an adequate stock is available at the beginning of the picking season, and during the packing season the box factories produce a maximum output which in the past has barely sufficed to save the crop. This past winter, however, the ceiling price on these containers was so low in comparison with the price for construction lumber that most of the manufacturers chose to turn out lumber instead of boxes. A grave situation developed, and as long ago as March 19, again on April 8, and again on April 24, I wrote to the wartime prices and trade board and the government, pointing out that unless box manufacturers were in full production we would have tremendous waste of food in the summer. I should like to quote one paragraph from Donald Gordon's letter in reply to my representations. It reads:

In view of the shortness of time remaining before berry baskets will be required in the British Columbia area, that manufacturers be permitted to sell on the basis of invoices open as to price.

I should like to repeat two things mentioned in that letter. Mr. Gordon gives as the reason for allowing a breach of the price ceiling on containers "the shortness of time remaining before berry baskets will be required in the British Columbia area." That was written on April 30, and it is now June 7. The fruit is ripe and is being shipped, and there are only a few containers available. In the next few weeks thousands of tons of fruit will ripen and there will be no containers at all. The production of containers, which began after April 30, ended completely with the general strike in the timber industry in British Columbia which began on May 17. We would have had a grave shortage even had the timber strike not occurred, because of the events I have related; but the timber strike was a calamity. The irony of it is that this year in Britsh Columbia we are having a record fruit crop. An announcement in the Vancouver Province of last week stated that the Fraser Valley crop was estimated to be one-third greater than any previous crop and that employment services were trying to induce women to come from the prairie provinces to help harvest the crop. The same is true for Vancouver island and the Kootenays.

I should like to quote a telegram received from the president of the British Columbia coast growers' association, which represents all the berry growers' associations of the lower mainland and Vancouver island. It is signed also by the president of the Pacific coast poultry producers' association. In case any hon. member thinks I am speaking without authority on behalf of the berry growers of the lower mainland and Vancouver island, I should like to give a list of the associations that make up the British Columbia coast growers' association. They are as follows:

Associated Berry Growers Cooperative Exchange, Hatzic; Pacific Cooperative Union, Mission; Fraser Valley Growers Limited, Mission; Central Fruit Distributors Limited, Mission; Maple Ridge Cooperative Exchange, Haney; South Fraser Cooperative Union, New Westminster; South Port Mann Berry Growers Association, South Port Mann; Coastal Growers Cooperative Association, Richmond; Richmond Berry Growers Association, Steveston; Surrey Berry Growers Association, Surrey district; Strawberry Hill Berry Growers Association, South New Westminster; Mt. Lehman, Dennison, Bradner Berry Growers Association, Mount Lehman; Yarrow Growers Cooperative Union, Yarrow; Dewdney Rhubarb Growers Cooperative Association, Dewdney; Saanich Fruit Growers Cooperative Association, Saanich; Gordon Head Fruit Growers Cooperative Association, Saanich; Vancouver Island Cooperative Fruit Growers Association, Saanichton.

The last three associations are on Vancouver island. I mention those associations because it has been assumed by some, perhaps with the best intentions but certainly without any knowledge or information, that we are not actually short of containers. The wires that I have quoted and those that I will quote later on show that I represent people who know the container situation in British Columbia. I am sorry to take so much time, but I think this matter is of vital importance. The telegram reads:

Berry growers and poultry men of this Fraser valley fearful of the effect shortage of berry crates and egg cases will have on their industry. On their behalf we would request your department to endeavour to bring about an early settlement of the lumber strike. Supply of crates and barrels on hand only sufficient for a few days operation and season starts in two weeks. Local associations met with union representatives to-day and try and solve our problems but additional help needed.

The only possible solution for this situation is to get the box factories going immediately on twenty-four hour production. The end of the timber strike would of course achieve this end. As I told the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) some time ago, I had a proposal which I think would end the strike. I refrained from introducing this proposal because deliberations were being carried on under Chief Justice Sloan, and I did not want to do anything that might interfere with the final solution of the strike.

I want to emphasize the fact that I am not talking about the lumber strike to-day. I am speaking on behalf of the important berry growers of the province of British Columbia, and other hon. members can speak on behalf of the tree fruit growers. I consider it my duty to bring before the house the seriousness of the situation. The only thing I want to say about the lumber strike at this time is that the loggers are not striking against the farmers and fishermen of British Columbia. They are not striking to sabotage food production in British Columbia. They are not striking to deprive veterans of lumber to build homes. They are producers just the same as the farmers and fishermen are producers. Many of them are veterans and it is not their desire to injure their fellow workers.

As I said before, I am not taking sides one way or another, I am simply pointing out what I believe to be the true facts. These men are striking against the logging and saw mill operators for higher wages, shorter hours and union security. They have shown they are not striking against the veterans by permitting lumber to pass through the picket line if used for veterans' buildings. They have shown that they are not striking against the farmers by returning to work without prejudice in the small box factory in Creston in the Kootenays, where the situation was most grave.

It has been suggested that I am overestimating the seriousness of the shortage of berry crates and barrels in British Columbia, and particularly in the Fraser Valley. It has been suggested by certain officials here, possibly in good faith but certainly without any knowledge of the facts, that the situation is not as serious as some of us say it is. I should like to quote one or two telegrams. The last one I received over the telephone just before I came to the house to-day. These serve to strengthen the stand I am taking. The first one reads:

Lumber strike preventing Sweeney Cooperage, Vancouver, supplying sufficient barrels for raspberry crop. Krause has only 2,000 barrels on hand, needs 10,000.

I am told by some that there are containers in sufficient quantity, but here is one concern in my riding which requires 10,000 barrels and has only 2,000 on hand. Shipping of the crop is just starting. These people know what they are talking about. I have another telegram from four large shippers of berries, both cooperatives and independent. These people know their business, and this is what they say in a telegram dated June 4:

IWA strike called over two weeks ago has resulted in absolute deadlock of cooperage operations causing acute barrel shortage. These barrels absolutely necessary for packing thousands of tons berries definitely confirmed for the United Kingdom. Loss of this business through lack of barrels will cost berry growers of the Fraser Valley one million dollars. Loss to the United Kingdom food ministry cannot be considered in monetary value alone but will result in untold loss of food stocks absolutely necessary to Great Britain. Suggest every effort be made to have cooperage operations resumed to full capacity immediately pending settlement between labour unions and industry so that barrel manufacture can begin at once as every hour of delay means untold loss to the berry industry and to millions who are depending upon these food supplies.

The British Columbia federation of agriculture wrote to me under date of May 30, and I should like to quote one paragraph as follows:

It is a hard road for the berry, tree fruit and vegetable industries of British Columbia and whether even in the event of an early settlement, growers can catch up with container needs, is doubtful.

I should like to quote briefly from the Chilliwack Progress, probably the largest weekly newspaper in British Columbia, published in the berry growing district. In the issue of May 29 they state:

With some strawberries already being picked and the main crop expected to start appearing on the market next week, the picture looks dismal for the growers in the district if the strike tie-up continues to hold up the box factories, berry officials report.

I could go on quoting, but I just want to emphasize the seriousness of the situation. I am told by some without the necessary knowledge that there are containers on hand. I admit frankly that strawberries are being shipped out of the Fraser Valley to-day, not by the crate but in carload lots.

Then there is the raspberry crop. I have referred to there being 2,000 barrels on hand, and there is an estimated crop of 10,000 barrels. That means that we shall have to divert our raspberry crates to care for the strawberry crop.

I can quote Donald Gordon, whose name is known to a few hon. members, in confirmation of what I say, speaking under date of April 30.

We know that the government cannot do the impossible, and we cannot expect crates or barrels to be produced over-night. The farmers are reasonable and know that that cannot be done. It may not be known to some hon. members that the only farm produce that I know of in Canada which has not been allowed to maintain its market is the small fruits. We have never been allowed to ship to the United States; our fruit has been allocated to eastern markets and to Great Britain. We have no particular quarrel with that, although we want to maintain our markets.

I want to make a suggestion to the government. There is one possible way of meeting the shortage of containers now. We are in a position to sell our fruits to the United States, and they will supply the containers if we are granted an export permit. But naturally the Americans must know to-day if they can receive our fruit—I am speaking of the raspberry crop—so that they can make their arrangements to send up the containers. We have plenty of containers to-day but the officials overlook the fact that the present expectations are for a very large crop of raspberries this year. If we are to be granted an export permit to ship to the United States it must be done immediately so that the Americans can make their arrangements for sending the crates and barrels in bond and taking the fruit back to the United States, thus saving the crop.

I have a quotation here from a man who is particularly well known to the Minister of Agriculture. I know it will be said that fruit is not the most essential food. I have never been accused in this house of having any love or particular admiration for any adult enemies of this country, but I do not think any member of this house has the right to sit quiet when food is being wasted while children in Europe and elsewhere are starving. There was a meeting in London recently of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers, and some prominent agriculturists were over there, at the expense either of their own organization or of the government. I quote what Mr. J. H. Wesson, of the wheat pools, Regina, said:

> Mr. J. H. Wesson, of the wheat pools, Regina, suggested three principles which should guide future food policies in all countries—that to destroy food was nothing short of vandalism; that restriction of production of necessary food was socially immoral; that when food was produced and not distributed to those needing it there was evident incompetent statesmanship between countries with too much and those with too little.

I do not want to take sides in the lumber strike, but in passing I may say that I am the only member of parliament elected from British Columbia who was endorsed by the organized loggers' union, I.W.A., at the last election. I represent the berry growers of British Columbia, and can claim some right also to represent the loggers because I had their endorsation at the last election. I say that neither the union nor the operators can find any justification for food being wasted while people are starving in Europe or anywhere else. But above all, the one body that has absolutely no right to allow food to be wasted at this time is the parliament of Canada.

I think I have indicated the opinions of the producers, either cooperatives or independent, of small fruits in British Columbia. I have also quoted a wire from the federation of the Okanagan. These people know whether or not there is a shortage of containers.

My suggestion to the government and to the Minister of Labour, if you like—perhaps not the Minister of Labour, after what I have said of the duty of employers and unions—is this: It is the duty of the Acting Prime Minister to put in a controller in the box factories in British Columbia to-morrow.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has brought this matter to the attention of the house, and I congratulate him on the very thorough way in which he has presented the views and the needs of those he represents. He has dealt with the berry production of the Fraser valley as well as that of the lower mainland. The containers required for that crop are largely barrels. I want to add a few words from the point of view of the production of fruit and vegetables in the southern part of British Columbia.

When this strike started on the 15th of May the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), making a statement in this house, said:

> The dispute is one which comes within provincial authority.

Two days later the minister of labour for British Columbia, writing to the Kelowna Sawmills, made this statement:

> Dealing with the persons responsible for this is the responsibility of the Minister of Labour for Canada.

So that once more we have the statement made here that it is a provincial affair, and in Victoria that it is a dominion affair.

Later, on another occasion, the Minister of Labour referred to the fact that any decision arrived at, after a conciliation board had sat, would have to be referred to the regional war labour board. That is a board set up under the dominion government; there can be no question about that. And the matters being dealt with—food, prices and wages—are matters which come under the control of the dominion government. It seems to me without any question that the authority lies with the dominion government to enter this dispute and to produce a settlement. The minister, on the day of the beginning of the strike, proceeded—Hansard, page 1549:

> Notification was publicized that a strike would occur to-day, and as there was evidence that the negotiations were breaking down, the Hon. George S. Pearson, Minister of Labour for British Columbia, consulted with me in the matter and recommended the appointment of a special commissioner.

He related how he had appointed Chief Justice Sloan to be an industrial disputes inquiry commission. Later, the minister goes on:

> I have not had a report from Chief Justice Sloan. However, the information received by me by telephone early this morning from the British Columbia minister of labour is to the effect that at the meeting held by the chief justice yesterday the negotiations came to an end because those representing the union took the position that the strike was going to take place at eleven o'clock this morning.

That brought that conciliation effort to a standstill. The operators could not see what good could result from proceeding with the discussion when the strike was on.

Then the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made a most earnest appeal to both parties to this dispute; and I must say that I was hopeful that both the disputants would take it to heart and a settlement would be arrived at. For when a minister of finance, speaking for the dominion government, makes such an appeal to disputants, it appears to me he would likely receive the support of the general public, and it has often been pointed out that no strike can last very long if it has not the support of the general public. However, the Minister of Labour on May 29 had to come to the house and give the replies which he had received from the disputants, and he read a statement from the Interior Lumber Association, from which I want to quote a word or two—Hansard, page 1986:

Negotiations on behalf of the owners have been conducted by Mr. J. H. Ruddock, industrial relations officer, Interior British Columbia Lumber and Box Manufacturers Association.

Then followed a long wire, at the end of which appear these words:

Furthermore present strike in largest box producing plant in interior British Columbia called in face of valid agreement which that plant has with Canadian Congress of Labour and which agreement has never been terminated either by C.C.L. or I.W.A. Under all circumstances in fairness to all concerned and particularly to avoid heavy loss to growers we again urge instructions be given for unconditional resumption operations leaving result to legal processes of conciliation and arbitration.

Again and again, to both parties to the dispute, the suggestion has been made, backing up the appeal of the Minister of Finance, that for the sake of food, for the sake of saving destructible food, the dispute should end and the matters in dispute should be subsequently settled.

At the very beginning of the strike I received a telegram from the president of the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association which I want to put on the record. It is dated the 18th, and the house will remember that the strike began on the 15th:

Tree fruit industry of British Columbia facing grave crisis through strike of International Woodworkers Association which has closed down all box mills in interior and thus shut off supplies of shook. Record crops of tree fruits in prospect. Every day's stoppage of mills means many thousands of containers will not be available. Only by operating at full capacity every day until end of season can needs be met. Only small proportion of season's requirements now supplied and consequently enormous losses impend unless mills resume operations immediately.

My understanding is that there is in sight a $20 million crop of fruits and vegetables in the southern interior of British Columbia, not including the area for which the hon. member for Fraser Valley speaks. The packing of early cherries began a few days ago at Osoyoos and Oliver, at the southern end of the Okanagan valley. I understand there is shook in sight which perhaps will take care of the cherries and a portion of the apricots, but there is no shook in sight at all for everything that follows—peaches, pears, plums, prunes, apples.

Now this disastrous dispute is a serious enough question in relation to the housing problem which is common to all Canada, and we must remember that these British Columbia mills send the necessary lumber a good many hundred miles east of the Pacific coast. The delay in the housing situation is a very serious matter, but it is a matter of delay. The lack of shook with which to make boxes and crates to send this perishable crop to market is not a matter merely of delay; it is not delay at all, it is destruction, and that is what makes it such an extremely serious thing today. It is impossible for me to foretell what possibility there will be of scraping together unusual and unexpected containers with which merely to get this stuff to the markets. It is possible that if it could reach the markets it could be taken away in small quantities by other means, paper bags or something of that sort, but that will not help us in the problem of getting the stuff to the market; and, Mr. Speaker, it is destructible stuff we are talking about.

We are being told every day of the need of producing every bit of food that is possible. Our particular international difficulty, true, is in respect of wheat and flour, but if wheat and flour are short, the people must tend to turn to something else. There is no question that vegetables would be the next thing they would turn to, and fruit to the extent that it is a valuable portion of the diet of the ordinary healthy person.

Besides all that it should be remembered that the area for which I speak has this one industry prominent in its work. Secondary industries have cropped up in support of the main industry; but it is not only the fruit growers who own this crop which may be destroyed who are in this lamentable difficulty; but it is all the labour they employ, it is all the stores in the town to which people, for lack of money, may not be able to go and buy their requirements; it is all the people of the interior of British Columbia from the Canadian Pacific main line to the international boundary and from the Alberta boundary to the boundary of the Fraser Valley riding. Not only is it serious from the point of view of the inability to market these fruit and vegetables, but because there will be a shortage of food purchasable by the people themselves.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a question was asked yesterday with regard to the matter under discussion as to which some information should be placed early in this debate before members of the house. Full information with regard to the position was not at hand yesterday, but I have considerable of it here at the moment. I think the general situation is best stated in a memorandum which I have in my hand and which I will read to the house.

There are prospects that one of the largest crops on record is maturing in British Columbia at present. Cherries will be ready in about two weeks, followed by peaches, apricots and plums. These are highly perishable fruits. The apple crop is being estimated at eight million boxes. Cherry containers are in fair supply but only about one-third enough boxes for the rest of the crop, and an inadequate supply of barrels for processing. The Okanagan depends mainly on the Okanagan box shook plants for its production. In lower Fraser Valley the deficit in the supply of containers threatens the loss of $1,000,000 worth of fruit for which there are no barrels or crates. One company alone, the Pacific Cooperative in Mission, needs 13,000 barrels for processing small fruits and 45,000 crates for raspberries. The over-all deficit in barrels is estimated at 35,000. Each barrel contains from 350 to 400 pounds of fruit. The supply of berry crates and hallocks comes mainly from three small mills at Yarrow, Mission and Haney and from Fraser Wood Products Limited, which makes veneer. These plants are now idle or nearly so through lack of logs for veneer.

That is the general position as stated by one who is interested in the ideas which are being put before the house by the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and by others. I have taken the trouble to-day to have the position reviewed by officials of the department, through getting in direct contact with British Columbia, and the information gathered is compiled in another memorandum, which is the result of conversations that took place within the last hour and a half. The statements made are to this effect:

Strawberries. The first picking started on May 30. From 1,500 to 2,500 crates are going to prairie markets daily. By the end of next week shipments will be up to 7,000 and 8,000 crates daily. The present supply of crates amounts to about 40,000 which are in the hands of the organized shippers. Independents are in a bad position. The estimated crop of strawberries for this year is 4,000 tons.

Raspberries. Expected to start picking about 24th June. Organized growers have between 35,000 and 40,000 crates on hand. Independent shippers are short. The estimated crop is 5,500 tons.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Barrels. The Pacific Union have on hand 13,000 barrels—5,000 new U.S., 2,000 new B.C., and 6,000 old barrels. Fraser Valley Co-Op. have all the barrels they will require for this year. Yarrow Co-op. have only about 1,000 barrels on hand and 1,000 promised. Their position is very short. New barrel requirements are in the neighbourhood of about 35,000. The actual shortage is about 21,000 barrels.

The statement is made that "we are unable to obtain or secure any more barrels from the United States at present". That is, I presume, for use in making supplies available to others than the Americans themselves, and there is no assurance that barrels would be supplied from the United States even if they were to be returned packed with berries, although it is stated there may be private commitments to that effect of which the department itself would have no information. That is the position as it is reported to us at the moment.

I do not intend this afternoon, though others may desire to do so, to discuss the pros and cons of the arguments that can be brought forward on either side of the labour dispute which is on at the moment, or to state what ought to be done in relation to it. I only point out that in the summaries I have read it is indicated that three or four companies are making containers and it would probably not be a difficult thing for someone to take control of these companies and operate them if that in itself would get the results desired. My understanding is, however, that the supplies of logs which would be required to make possible the manufacture of containers is something which goes much deeper than that and involves a problem which would have to be solved before the operation of the plants themselves would be effective.

The question which was asked yesterday, and the proposal which was made with a view to providing some solution for the difficulty, is however on a very much narrower basis than the basis upon which the discussion is taking place to-day. The member for Fraser Valley, rising in his place yesterday, stated:

I should like to direct a question to the government. I do not know which department it comes under so I have given notice to three ministers. My first question is, what steps are being taken to save thousands of tons of berries worth over a million dollars, now under contract to the United Kingdom from being lost, owing to the lack of barrels and containers?

I would like to take a few moments to deal with that first question and the background which makes it an important one.

In the first place, early in the war the British government did not desire to have fruit shipped because of the fact that it took up very considerable space and supplied less food value to those who required food than did some other types of food, and so a market for what is known as SO2 was not readily available. During the first period of the war our chief difficulty was to try to persuade the British to take SO2, and I might suggest that one of the members active in trying to bring that about was the member for Fraser Valley. He did on many occasions emphasize the importance of getting rid of this product, which provides an outlet for surplus, which cannot be sold, of fresh berries in the province of British Columbia. As a result of representations made by himself and others, and the efforts exerted on their behalf by the special products board, we did from time to time persuade the British to take certain quantities of SO2 in order to relieve the situation existing in British Columbia. Last year the British government asked for this product. They asked what quantity of it we could supply and we made arrangements to have supplied to them the quantity which was available at that time. This year, when I was in Britain in January, we approached the British government to find out whether they woud be willing to take SO2 this year, and in what quantity, and the understanding we reached with them was that they were anxious to obtain the product and would take whatever quantity could be made available to them this year.

I quite agree with what the member for Fraser Valley said a few moments ago. In spite of the fact that jam and fruit generally is not of the same food value as bacon, butter, wheat or products of that kind, when there are difficulties in obtaining butter, jam is a very good spread for bread to induce children to eat more of that commodity than they otherwise would, and it is particularly good for the type of bread which is being supplied children on the European continent and in Britain at the present time. It makes the bread more palatable and a better food because of the fact that it has jam upon it. So at the present time the British are placing perhaps more emphasis upon the obtaining of this product than they were at the beginning or even in the middle of the war. The net result is that officials of the department approached the fruit producers of British Columbia and obtained assurances that certain quantities of SO2 would be made available this year to the British government in barrels, and my understanding is that all the barrels necessary for the shipment of SO2 in the form in which the British government desire to have it, for the making of jam to be served on the continent or perhaps mainly in Britain itself, have been assured to make available the quantities which the organized producers of British Columbia agreed could be made available from that province. So as far as the first question is concerned I can only say we feel that provision has been made to make available to Britain, in containers suitable for the purpose, SO2 in the quantity which has been arranged.

The second part of the question is stated in these words:

> The second question—and these are straight questions—is, will the government grant an immediate export permit for five hundred tons of raspberries to the United States . . .

Later the hon. gentleman repeated the question in these words:

> . . . will the government grant an immediate export permit for five hundred tons of raspberries to the United States, barrels and containers for which will be supplied by the United States purchasers, thus permitting raspberry barrels on hand to be used for the present emergency in the marketing of strawberries. That is a straight question, and it is a vital one for the people of Canada.

The answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, if it will be helpful in the decisions that are to be reached, can be made just as direct as the answer to the other question. In the first place the Department of Agriculture is anxious to see that the SO2 promised, not by contract but by word of mouth, to the British government will be made available to them. The department is anxious to have that undertaking fulfilled in order to keep faith, if you like, with those who are expecting to obtain the product in order to provide food of the type I was discussing a few moments ago for the people of Great Britain. But we do not consider that we should press that matter to the point of making it impossible for the berry growers of British Columbia to be able to market their product. I think I can say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley or to any other hon. member of the house that there would be very little if any hesitation in issuing permits to have five hundred tons of these berries exported to the United States. Some further consideration might have to be given to the question whether more than that quantity should be exported, in view of all the circumstances, but I think I can say without fear of any other decision being rendered that every possible consideration will be given to requests for permits for the shipment of berries to the United States from the British Columbia area to make it possible to market fruit which otherwise could not be marketed as the result of a shortage of containers in that area. In other words if, as is suggested, the Americans are prepared to make containers available in which to ship to the United States berries which otherwise would go to waste in the province of British Columbia, then I do not think anyone in the government or in this house would take the position that these berries must be allowed to spoil in the fields instead of being shipped to someone, somewhere, who would utilize them and pay the producers for them.

On the other hand I should like to emphasize the fact that a market for SO2 has been represented to us as most important to the berry growers of British Columbia, and I repeat that one of those who have been most ardent in making these representations is the hon. member for Fraser Valley. That is only natural, since as he has stated this afternoon he represents the berry growers. So I would say that anything the department has said or done in regard to the matter has been with the view of protecting the position of the berry growers of British Columbia. As far as we are concerned at the moment the growers will be in a position to make up their own minds as to whether they wish to ship five hundred tons of berries to the United States, leaving it to the future to determine whether supplies can be placed in the other markets to which they usually send berries. We are not going to battle for them or against them in that matter; we think that is something in which they themselves are most interested. We will assist them in every way possible in doing what they desire to do. But I should like to say that in making the distribution of the five hundred tons, or any other quantity that is to be exported from British Columbia to the United States, I do not think anyone will expect us to issue a permit to any one organization. Whatever permits are issued should be distributed over the whole industry in British Columbia; and in making that distribution the interests of the berry growers of the province will be taken into consideration first. One of the factors to be kept in mind in arriving at any conclusion will be the question whether containers are available at the time the matter is under consideration; that is, some consideration has to be given to strawberries immediately, and to raspberries some two weeks hence, though I agree that provision must be made in advance so people may know what they are going to do, and they must know what the situation is going to be. When it becomes necessary to make a decision and when all the facts are known, the question whether or not containers are available will be one of the main considerations in the mind of the department in deciding what part of the product might be exported and what part might be marketed in our own country or in Great Britain, in accordance with the wishes of those who are growing the berries. In other words I do not want the house to think there is any controversy with regard to this matter which cannot be settled, better than anywhere else, among the berry growers of British Columbia themselves, as far as the marketing of the berries is concerned.

On the other question, dealing with the strike and the making of boxes in British Columbia, I have nothing to say this afternoon. I have not the information upon which to base any statement; therefore I leave that matter to be discussed by others who have the information at hand. As far as the marketing of these berries is concerned, however, no department of the government is going to do anything which will make it even possible for berries to rot unconsumed in the fields of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the matter brought before the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is indeed a serious one, in that it affects not only the supply of food, but also the livelihood of considerable numbers of farmers.

May I say first of all a word as to the remarks just concluded by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The information he gave in the latter part of his speech is not borne out by the information submitted to us by those who are growing berries and those who are in charge of the canning factories. In the first part of his speech he read from a statement which said that one concern alone were 13,000 barrels short, and that 45,000 crates were needed. Then, in the concluding part of his remarks he pointed out that from the further information he had it would seem as though there were ample barrels and ample crates. To me there is a conflict of view in what he has said.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not wish to be misquoted. If I left that impression, I did not intend to.

Mr. REID: I thought you did.

Mr. GARDINER: We had better straighten it out, then. The statement I made was that there are sufficient barrels with which to ship SO2 to Britain, but I did not say there were sufficient containers of any other kind to market fruit. I did say if there are not sufficient containers for the marketing of this crop and the handling of the fruit, permission will be given to allow the fruit to go to the United States.

Mr. REID: I am glad the minister mentioned something about fruit going to the United States, because there again the house has not been given information as to the price set for fruit going to Britain.

I do not think anyone will disagree with the attitude the farmers take, namely that they should be allowed an increase the same as those who strike for higher wages, and just as high a price as they can obtain, owing to the fact that all costs have increased. The fruit growers know about the market in the United States, and see a better local market this year on account of the fact that the price ceiling has been lifted on berries. I should be interested to know if the officials in the minister's department have set a price on berries which they have agreed to ship to Britain. I doubt if much of the fruit about which the minister has spoken will go to Britain, unless the price to the growers from the British authorities is as favourable as that which can be obtained on the local market.

As to the present strike, it is most unfortunate that the farmers must suffer loss. When the man who works for wages goes on strike he does not draw pay during the strike period, and in this way he sustains a monetary loss, according to the number of weeks or months he is idle. But in respect to the berry growers, the situation is more acute. The grower plants a crop, lays out either his own capital or that which he can borrow, and looks forward to harvesting the crop when the fruit is ripe. If anything goes wrong, there is a loss not only of food but also of financial returns to the farmer. Those returns must be obtained within a period of two to four months. If the crop spoils, then that farmer's entire livelihood, for the whole year, disappears. It is not just the income for one or two months, but the year's income that he loses.

I listened to the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon when he referred to jam instead of butter being put on bread. It is high time that at least some members of parliament should revise their views as to the value of fruit in the nation's diet. I do not know how many members read a report which was sent out only a few days ago on experiments in foods undertaken by the Department of National Health and Welfare in connection with the food conditions among Indians. What did they find? They found that a diet of flour, pork, sugar and tea was most deficient, but that when the Indians produced fruit, berries and so on, their improvement in health was very manifest.

Fruit is of greater value than some in this house and others outside have given to it. It contains vitamins and acids the body requires, and it is time we added more fruit to our food menus, rather than thinking of it as something extra to be taken and therefore not to be classed with potatoes, wheat and other grains.

Last year during the strike of employees of the American Can company farmers of one district in my constituency had to stand by day after day and see their crops rotting, although they were told that there was an ample supply of cans in the warehouse in Vancouver. I remember a delegation of farmers coming to me and saying, "Mr. Reid, if something is not done by the government, or if these men will not allow us to obtain cans, we are going to take the law into our own hands." They were serious about it. Those farmers from the municipalities of Delta and Richmond were prepared to take their guns, or staves and pitchforks, and move into the city of Vancouver, there forcibly to take cans from the warehouses. I advised them not to attempt to do any such thing. But I did say this, "You have a lesson to learn from the trade unions." I do not know whether that lesson will ever be heeded by the farmers. But if only the farmers could organize on the same scale and to the same extent as those in the labour unions—well, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, just how many in this country would eat? What would happen if the farmers did not get their just requirements, or what they actually need to enable them to produce the necessary crops?

To return to a discussion of the lumber strike and the effect it has had on the farmers in the Fraser Valley, it is a little unfortunate that action has been delayed until this discussion developed in the house—because every member from British Columbia, individually, has been appealing to the government for the past two weeks. The matter cannot wait much longer; otherwise the entire crop will perish.

The statement of the Minister of Agriculture that permission will be given for the shipment of at least 500,000 tons to the United States does not entirely solve the problem. There is also the question of the shipment of eggs, which require new crates, and the supply of these is short.

Added to that is the matter of fish shipments. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) has pointed out that fish is shipped in boxes in a frozen state. The situation is, therefore, serious not only for the man who ships fruit, but also for the poultryman, the fisherman and the fish packers.

I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of the strike—although this can be safely said, that it is high time the labour laws in this country were clarified as to the respective jurisdictions of provincial and dominion governments. If there is anything that has beclouded the issue and befuddled the public, surely it has been the process of passing the buck from the provincial government to the dominion government, and the dominion taking the stand at times that it is up to the provincial governments to come in and do something. I suggest to the Minister of Labour that more consultation be had with the provinces with a view to clarifying the matter and coming to some definite agreement or policy with respect to the labour laws of this country. They cannot be brushed aside. Perhaps this is not the time to settle this question, when we are in the midst of heated strikes, but measures will have to be taken to prevent similar situations from arising in other parts of the dominion.

I rose particularly to support the hon. member for Fraser Valley and also to speak on behalf of those farmers in my district who are wondering what the outcome will be. I plead with the government not to stand idly by and see this waste of good food and the loss of savings and capital of men who have invested their all in this business.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, as a British Columbia member who is deeply interested in this question I wish to say a few words on the matter brought up by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). May I say to the hon. member that he need not apologize for raising this very important question, and he certainly need not apologize for the way he has stated his case to the house. Perhaps it is not his case, but the case of the fruit growers of British Columbia.

The situation is so serious that I am sure everyone who speaks will be careful not to say anything that will help to make it worse than it is. The hon. member for Fraser Valley mentioned that there was a lumber shortage before the strike began, but I think it must be admitted that the strike has intensified the difficulty and perhaps precipitated the present crisis. If there had been no strike, while here and there, there might have been shortages of lumber for crates, it would not have been a very serious matter. The ultimate solution of course is a quick ending to the strike and it seems to me that only the governments—the government here and the government in British Columbia—can bring that about. I am frank in saying that I have no solution to offer, but I do submit that one of the ways in which an end of the strike can be brought about is first to ascertain the facts or the questions at issue and then give publicity to any offers of settlement made by the parties concerned. In this way public opinion may be brought to bear against those who will not acquiesce when a reasonable offer is made.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has pointed out, I think fairly, the difficulty of the position of the fruit growers in British Columbia. This crop must be harvested and shipped in a matter of days. There can be no delays. I should like to point out the social nature of our production in this day and age. It is quite clear that the British Columbia fruit grower does not grow the fruit alone. He takes part in the growing of fruit, but he cannot complete the operation until the fruit has reached the ultimate consumer. It is quite clear that before it reaches the ultimate consumer the lumber worker must take part in the fruit growing, as well as the box manufacturer and a host of other people. We can no longer leave our economic life to the chances of a struggle between the various groups engaged in production, each working for its own end.

Two or three important considerations must be kept in mind. The first is that quick action must be taken. We cannot wait even for a few days. Action must be taken immediately if the strawberry crop is to be saved. I followed carefully what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said, and I thought he indicated that he was going to give direct reply to the questions asked yesterday by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. But I could not discover any direct reply to the hon. member's last question.

Mr. GARDINER: We are prepared to give permits to export five hundred tons. That ought to be a sufficiently direct reply to the question.

Mr. MacINNIS: The permits should be issued immediately if they are required immediately.

Mr. GARDINER: The question asked was: Are you prepared to give permits for five hundred tons of raspberries which are not going to be picked for two weeks to be shipped to the United States? We said, "Yes." I do not know how that could be any more direct.

Mr. MacINNIS: I may be wrong, but that appears to be more direct that what the minister said a little while ago.

The second important point is that food should not be wasted. If there is any crime to-day more heinous than any other, it is the wasting of food. An appeal should be made to the parties in the dispute. We should not be hypocritical and talk about helping the starving people of Europe while we allow food to go to waste in this country.

The third important point is that we should try to find ways and means of settling this dispute. I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster when he urges that there should be more cooperation between the provincial departments of labour and the federal Department of Labour. We are not yet out of the war crisis, and the cooperation and direction which the federal Department of Labour gave during the war should be continued, at least where it can be continued with the consent and cooperation of the provincial department of labour. I believe the British Columbia department of labour is more than willing to cooperate with the federal authorities.

I hope that no effort will be spared to arrive at a settlement as quickly as possible. If it would help toward a settlement I suggest that this house go on record in the form of a definite motion asking the parties concerned to refer all matters in dispute to arbitration, the findings to be retroactive from the date the strike began, and thus start immediately saving this food and the livelihood of the farmers of British Columbia.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief observations in connection with this most important matter. I first of all must congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) upon the excellent presentation he made of this subject, so important to thousands of fruit growers in British Columbia. There is one thing about the hon. member for Fraser Valley—he hits straight from the shoulder, come hell or high water.

I listened with interest also to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who gave a clear and factual outline of the situation in the tree fruit industry. I listened to what was said of the waste of food, which I consider a crime, and to what was said about the shortage of crates and boxes and barrels and its effect upon the livelihood of a good many people in British Columbia. I am not going to go into all that again; I concur in what has been said. I speak not only as a member of parliament but as a fruit grower and as senior official of a fruit-growing organization representing a district of considerable size. I speak from experience. I know that at the present time there is an immense shortage of boxes and crates in the interior of British Columbia for products of the tree fruit industry. There is, I estimate, a shortage of from twelve to fifteen million such containers for the handling of this year's tree fruit crop.

I support the hon. member for Fraser Valley in his proposal that the government appoint a controller to get into operation these plants which are concerned with the manufacture of containers required in the shipping of perishable commodities. I think that is the first thing to be done.

I do not think it is necessary to have a lengthy debate on the matter. It is easy for most members to express their views in a few words. But I do wish, on behalf of the people I represent and on behalf of the tree fruit industry in the interior of British Columbia, to ask the government to give serious consideration to the proposals made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to associate myself with what has already been said by other British Columbia members as to the seriousness of this situation and to urge the government to take whatever action may be necessary to settle this dispute.

I should like to emphasize its seriousness from another aspect,—not merely to be critical of the government, but because the situation is fraught with dangers other than the danger to the fruit growers, which if not tackled immediately may involve us in situations which all members would wish to avoid. I want to read a dispatch appearing in to-day's Globe and Mail, reporting an incident which took place at Kamloops yesterday. It is found on page 19 and reads as follows:

> Kamloops, B.C. June 6 (CP).—The Canadian Legion branch here to-day announced its intention to get materials through to the veterans' home project here following the action of veterans last night when they crossed International Woodworkers of America picket lines to deliver chimney flues to the site.
> Legionnaires said they had requested the union executive to release flue material to complete 30 houses of the 100-home veterans' project on the ground the material was delivered to suppliers before the strike started, and did not receive a satisfactory reply

In a statement the legion spokesman said: "Regardless of whether labour or management is the blockade, we intend to see that the veterans' homes get the material required. We are not taking sides in the dispute, but veterans' housing has our priority."

The dispatch continues:

The picket line was unmanned at the time. The I.W.A. strike committee organized its pickets on learning of the legion's move, but reached the plant too late.

In common with other members who have spoken to-day I also am not going to take sides in this dispute, mainly for the reason I feel I am entirely unqualified, having no knowledge of the merits of the case. I have read that dispatch to suggest that the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was correct when he said that it is essential that our labour laws be clarified. I would urge upon the government that they consult immediately with labour officials in the provinces to see if a labour code cannot be devised for the settlement of such disputes, so that we can have in this very important sphere of our life the rule of law.

So far as the situation affecting the fruit growers is concerned, I feel there is no necessity to add anything to what has already been said. There is one suggestion I would make. I am not speaking on behalf of the berry growers, but I am very much interested in whether a permit will be given for the export of these berries. Information has come to me that a certain number of barrels are available in the province of Ontario. I suggest that if the barrels are available the government subsidize their shipment to British Columbia in an effort to relieve the container shortage that is developing there. Those of us who come from the interior fruit growing part of British Columbia are told that even if the factories were to resume work to-morrow they would not be able to catch up with the box requirements this season, and that some damage is already being done. We hope the strike will be settled immediately; and I put forward this suggestion, that the government look into the question of shipping these containers out to British Columbia with a view to repairing the damage already being done through the shortage of crates, owing to the length of time that work in the factories has already been stopped.

Mr J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): As one of the members from British Columbia I would be derelict in my duty if I did not rise and support the appeal made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) in this fruit crisis. I want to support him in his appeal to the government that they immediately put in a controller to take charge, because that would have an immediate effect upon the fruit crisis from which the province of British Columbia is suffering.

There are a number of fruit growers in my constituency in the Creston valley area, and while I am speaking here this afternoon I can picture the scene as it exists in British Columbia. The sun is shining brightly, and the pickers by the hundreds are out in the fields, picking the strawberries at this time. While they are picking, work is going on in the packing sheds. As fast as the berries are brought in they are prepared and taken to shipping points in the evening hours. But that is not all that is going on. While the picking and the packing are going on, men are working feverishly, putting together the containers into which this fruit is to be packed. They are not only working all through the day but, as I have seen them time and again, working all through the night hours by electric light preparing the containers for the packing of the fruit next day. These fruit containers come to the growers in knocked-down form, and the boxes and shooks have to be put together to be ready for the next day's packing. That is the picture when all is going well, when the shooks and boxes and containers and barrels and so on are all on the farmer's property.

But imagine what is going on in the minds of these fruit growers this afternoon. Nature has been exceedingly kind, and the harvest is there in all its fullness and beauty. There is, however, no peace in the mind of the grower. He knows that a matter of a few hours or a change in the weather conditions can mean the loss of that particular crop. So that he is wondering just what he is going to do, when he sees that the shed which is usually filled with box shooks and containers is empty, and he has nothing on hand with which he can pack his crop. This man is not a party in any shape or form to the strike which is now going on. He is the victim of it, and because he is the victim, and a very unwilling victim, we are appealing to-day. I for one would not like to say anything which would prejudice the case, because the matter is now being dealt with by the authorities in British Columbia. But I appeal to the government to put in a controller at once and to get these box mills opened and the boxes produced, so that the fruit growers of British Columbia can save their fruit crop. Then, when that has been done, time can be given if that is what the Minister of Labour wants. If he desires to give these people some time to cool off and look at the situation in full security, they will have ample opportunity to do so. But these things should not be done at the cost of the peace of mind and the livelihood of thousands of people all through our fair province of British Columbia.

I rise heartily to support the appeal made by the hon. member, and I so state.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): As the original seconder of this motion I believe I should say a few words.

I do not represent very many farmers; my riding is principally an industrial riding; but as a British Columbia member, especially as a colleague of my very good friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), I feel that I should add a few words about the present deplorable situation.

The house first knew of this matter some two weeks ago, when the hon. member for Fraser Valley had a warm exchange with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), as a consequence of which he announced that he intended to adjourn the house the following Monday. In the evening he co-opted the aid of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) and myself in his cause, and explained how for the past three months he had been endeavouring to get action on a situation which he saw as long ago as January was going to affect the packing of this crop. He has made the point, which may have been missed a bit, that the lumber strike was only the last blow as far as the shortage of containers was concerned. The root of the trouble was a price ceiling matter last winter, when manufacturers of wooden goods on the west coast found that the ceiling price on wooden containers was so low that it paid them better to put their logs into lumber. Because of that, over the last winter, when our cooperages and our box factories should have been building up a stockpile in anticipation of a heavy field crop, very little was done. He pointed out that he wrote repeatedly to the various government agencies explaining our situation, and finally, on April 30, because of the dire emergency, Donald Gordon did give this open price permit to the manufacturers, too late, however, to be of effective use, since the strike opened on May 17.

My colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and I were very much impressed with these arguments. Each of us has our own connection with this dispute. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni represents the riding in British Columbia which has without doubt the greatest number of loggers in it. He himself is connected with the logging industry. In my riding we have the greatest number of sawmill workers. Certainly the hon. member for Fraser Valley represents the berry growers of British Columbia. Each of us over the week-end telephoned to our friends; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, to the operators; myself, to the union leaders; and the hon. member for Fraser Valley, to the berry growers. We thought through these telephone conversations we had achieved some sort of settlement, and as a consequence of that we interviewed a committee of the cabinet on Monday morning, saying that we thought that if an appeal were made by the government to both sides of the dispute to save this fruit crop, action would be taken. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) made a straight appeal on behalf of the government and the people of Canada that afternoon; and the operators immediately agreed. That morning I had telephoned to the head of the I.W.A. in Vancouver forewarning him that the government was going to make this appeal and, because I have a very great sympathy with these sawmill workers in my riding, I suggested to him that he should be the first to say, "Yes, the union are not striking against the food producers, the union are not trying to sabotage the farmers; the union's strike is against the operators, and we will agree to go back to the box factories on the terms suggested by the Prime Minister", with the understanding that whatever final settlement was made in the timber strike would be made retroactive for those who went back to the box factories. I was very much disappointed, and I am sure the people in general were, when Mr. Harold Pritchett, leader of the I.W.A., refused that offer, because I am convinced that the people I represent, the people residing in the sawmill towns of Fraser Mills, Port Moody, Barnett and North Vancouver, do not want to see the fruit industry of British Columbia ruined. Actually the box industry is a very small part of the timber industry of British Columbia. All told, it may require 50,000,000 feet out of a total cut of 3,000 million, or not more than two per cent of the total, and the opening of these few cooperages and box factories would have very little effect on the eventual ending of the strike. So I say in all sincerity that I think the union leaders, not the rank and file, have certainly alienated public opinion in British Columbia by their refusal to accept the appeal made by the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of the government and the people of Canada two weeks ago Monday.

A year ago we had an almost similar situation in British Columbia, a container strike, but this time it was the American Can company's employees who were on strike. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has already pointed out, it was his riding which was affected the most. Instead of strawberries and raspberries it was peas. When the farmers were dumping their peas in the Fraser river public pressure became so great that the government put a controller in the American Can company, and afterwards a settlement was negotiated. The greater part of that crop was saved. It is our contention as British Columbia members that the government can do an exactly similar thing immediately in relation to the cooperages and box factories of British Columbia, to save, not all the crop, because I am convinced by the figures read by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that even a 24-hour a day production in these small box factories of British Columbia will not be sufficient to supply containers for this record crop we are expecting; but if such a controller were put in to-morrow morning, a very great part of that crop would be saved.

The Minister of Agriculture expressed a fear that there might not be sufficient logs to permit the operation of these box companies very long. I can assure him that there are enough logs in the water in my constituency of Vancouver North to keep the factories running throughout the summer.

Mr. STIRLING: And in the interior.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): There are logs in the water, in the harbour, across the lower mainland, and, I am sure, in the interior sufficient to supply material for these containers.

Mr. GARDINER: Are they available?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Yes, they would be available.

As far as the settlement of the lumber strike is concerned, I am not mentioning the issues of the strike at all, but I am concentrating on the strike as far as it affects these little box factories. Knowing somewhat of conditions in British Columbia, I believe there is very little likelihood, now that the Sloan report has been turned down by the union, of any settlement being effected for at least a month, because in the natural condition of British Columbia we are now approaching what is called the fire season there. The woods are so dry that logging operations are forbidden; the logging operators will not be operating for a month or six weeks, and they will, therefore, not be very strongly disposed to conduct further negotiations immediately, in view of the fact that they could not operate their camps in any event. If such is the case we can look forward to the complete wastage of our fruit, egg and fish harvest this summer, unless immediate action is taken by the government to instal a controller in the box factories and cooperages of British Columbia to-morrow morning.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? If a controller were appointed, is there any assurance whatever that the men would go back to work?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I feel very badly, I may say, in having let down the Acting Prime Minister previously. I did convey to him, at our meeting, the assurance I thought I had from the leaders that they would consent to accepting his appeal, which they did not do. I do not wish to put myself in the position of speaking on behalf of those who are leading the union. I do not, however, know of any strike in Canada where the government put in a controller, where the men have refused to go back. In the case of the American Can strike last summer, the men went back immediately.

Mr. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): I do not come from a rural riding, but my constituency is surrounded by fruit growers and particularly by small fruit farmers, and I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on the way he has presented his case to-day. I think he has set a very high standard for himself and for his future work in this house. However, there are one or two points he mentioned to which I wish to refer, and one was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair).

One point referred to was the open invoice which was permitted by Donald Gordon. That was merely an open invoice; it was not an open price, and it was something that was to be settled at a later date. It is a small point, but it is one to which reference has been made and I thought I should make it clear. Immediately that letter was issued, the wartime prices and trade board did send to Vancouver someone to negotiate with the box manufacturers for a price on crates and hallocks and eventually they arrived at a price which gave that industry the ten per cent increase. They no sooner had that adjustment made than the strike occurred, and naturally that tied up things entirely. As to whether that price would be sufficient now, it is not for me to say, but probably it would be open for negotiation. Certainly at the time the price was sufficient to maintain a profit.

It has been said here that the cooperages and box plants have been closed down for lack of logs or in consequence of converting their lumber to other uses. That is hardly the truth. The cooperage does not make lumber; it makes only barrels, and the barrels are not only distributed in British Columbia, but are exported almost throughout the world. One of the cooperage factories is next door to my closest neighbour in business, and therefore I know they have been going steadily ever since the war began, and there was no let-up in that cooperage plant prior to the strike.

I know it would help greatly if the box factories would open and get going. I know it would help considerably to have some of the fruit for which we have not packages exported to the United States. I know it would help if we could have the cooperages making barrels, because that is where our shortage is greatest. We have not enough to take care of the present crop; I understand that our shortage is 35,000 barrels. But putting in a controller, much as I should like to see it done in these industries, particularly the interior box factories, would not entirely solve the situation unless we included as well the logging operations in the greater part of Victoria.

I appeal to the box manufacturers, the workers and the loggers to try to settle the strike and to do so within the shortest possible time. It is going to have a continuing effect and this strike will spread to many other industries. This morning I had a long appeal from the pulp and paper association, the one I am most interested in, pointing out that a month is the maximum period during which any of them can run with the present stoppage of work in the mills; and if the pulp and paper mills go down, then again containers will be badly affected. I think, therefore, that a further appeal should be made to these people to resolve their differences and get back to work.

It should not be a matter of trying to see who can get the most out of the short supply of material. I do not think either side is wholly to blame in trying to grab for itself more than is really coming to it; but as far as the fruit is concerned the consumer in this instance can, I believe, help the producer or the farmer to take care of his fruit crop. It is not so long ago that we had to take our fruit to the factories or take it to our homes, not in to-day's modern type of boxes, crates and hallocks. Many a time we had to pack our fruit in whatever we could obtain. We packed our apples in bags and brought our berries in containers of many kinds, and I am sure the consumer to-day would be only too glad to bring home his berries himself in whatever containers he has. In that way he would help out considerably in the supply of crates, boxes and hallocks.

I appeal also to the producers. I think they can go a little too far in their price. The price ceiling has been removed and to-day they are not giving very much consideration to the consumer. If we want the price ceiling to remain in effect in Canada and operate fairly to all, the first thing we must do is to stamp out the man or woman who wants to be greedy or to take advantage of the situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

In the present situation our first obligation is to see that there is fair play. I am afraid that in this strike, from the point of view of the farmers, the situation is not what it should be. I understood last night that strawberries were selling at forty-five cents a hallock on the coast at this time of the year. I am sure that is too much. The consumer has some rights in this world, not only the producer, and I am a producer myself.

Yesterday the hon. member for Fraser Valley said that the berries were rotting in the ground. I am sure he did not wish to convey quite that impression. The height of the strawberry season will be about from the 17th to the 20th of this month. Raspberries will come a little later and cherries about the same time. I believe we have at the present time enough crates and barrels to take care of the immediate supply of strawberries and cherries and some of the raspberries. But if these containers are all used up for that purpose we are going to be short for the later crops. I quite agree with those who say that, no matter how quickly we get back into the production of crates and hallocks, we shall never catch up with the demand this year. This will be the largest fruit crop in the history of British Columbia. It is estimated that the apple crop in the Okanagan valley alone will amount to eight million boxes. I am sure that would sound like splendid news to the starving people of Europe and to the children in England who probably have not seen an apple for years. Are we, the workers, factory men and farmers, going to fight with one another and prevent that badly needed food from going to these people? Surely to heaven there is more humanity in the people of Canada than would seem evident at the present time. If there is anything anyone can say or do to-day, not to agitate the matter but to appeal to the sense of justice and the humanitarian feelings of people to get the men back to work producing so that others may eat, instead of having the food wasted, let us do it. I say it is flaunting providence for us to let this stuff go to waste to-day, and in the end we shall pay for it unless we take immediate steps to correct the situation.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I think all hon. members who have spoken this afternoon have emphasized the fact that one must be very careful not to say anything which would seem like taking sides. That is probably a wise attitude for hon. members to adopt, because even those from British Columbia cannot know the full facts of the case. One gets the viewpoints of the opposing sides, but not being on the spot, it is impossible for one to know which combination of facts to accept. There is, however, one thing upon which I think all hon. members, regardless of party, have shown complete agreement; that is, that the public interest is the most important matter we have to consider, and that in this strike the interests of the people of Canada and the whole economy of British Columbia are vitally affected.

This afternoon we heard, particularly from the mover of this motion as well as from other hon. members, how important this strike is in its effect upon the fruit crop, and I want to add a few words to show how important this strike will be in its effect upon the housing situation next winter; what an important effect the lack of the lumber which could have been produced during the period of the strike will have, particularly upon the comfort of veterans in the country during next winter, because I think inevitably these housing troubles fall most heavily upon the veteran. Then, of course, the whole economy of British Columbia is directly affected by a large-scale strike in our chief industry. I do not suppose we shall ever be able to measure accurately the extent of that loss to the province. So I cannot help feeling that whatever side one takes in this dispute, whether the side of the operators or the side of the loggers, the side of the public is much more important than either.

I should like to read an extract from an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of May 23 of this year, and which seemed to me to put the position very well. This was written before the failure of the last attempt at settlement by Chief Justice Sloan. The editorial states:

> A swift settlement of the woodworkers' strike appears likely through mediation of Chief Justice Sloan. When it is all over it will have been largely a pushing match between organized labour and organized employers. Each side will take up its respective position at the place where the dispute comes to rest and business relationships will be resumed from there.
> This is a rough method of arriving at industrial peace. The public, which has been squeezed in the test of strength, knows just how rough it is in its effects. Yet the government, representing the public, is content with its role as an ineffectual referee. Instead of making an intelligent analysis of the issues and informing the public of the facts, the government gives its tacit approval to the theory that economic might is economic right.

This is a long editorial; otherwise I should like to put it all on record, but in conclusion it says:

> The more that the rights and powers of unions are guaranteed and defined by law, the more their duties and responsibilities will be brought under the control of law.
> Until that time comes, labour and management in British Columbia will continue to batter out costly compromises by rule of thumb. The public would prefer a more sensible approach, based on law and equity.

On May 21 the Vancouver Province also published an editorial dealing with this matter. The editors of these newspapers probably know more about the merits of this strike than private members of this house can know, and the Province says:

> There are so many things in connection with the strike that revolt the common sense of the ordinary man, wherever his sympathies lie.

Three of those things mentioned in the editorial are:

> The idleness of nearly forty thousand men in the face of a serious building material scarcity.
>
> The utter waste involved in the loss of millions of work hours.
> The failure of either provincial or federal government to take a strong position though the interest of the public is paramount.

It seems to me these two newspapers have taken the position that has been taken by hon. members of this house, namely that the interests of the public are paramount and that it is time a lead was given by the government as to the manner in which this strike may be satisfactorily settled. With the failure of Chief Justice Sloan's last attempt I suppose the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will have other irons in the fire and other negotiations to put forward, and I know we all wish him success in those negotiations. But, as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) has said, this strike may easily go on for another month or so. While the woods may be closed down for that period, in order to reduce the fire hazard, I think it is almost equally important that the sawmills should be brought back into operation right away. I believe public opinion in the country and particularly in British Columbia, which is principally concerned, is probably pretty clear in connection with the strike. Of course the minister will know better than I what that public opinion is; but I suggest to him that in this, perhaps more than in any other strike we have had in the country since V-J day, there is a great opportunity for him to give leadership to that almost completely formed public opinion, and move in and bring about a settlement of the strike very shortly. I do not care what method he uses, whether it be through a controller in some plant, through a public appeal, or some other method at his disposal. Whatever method he uses, I am sure all hon. members will support him. If the debate this afternoon has done anything to clarify public opinion, then surely it must show to those who are concerned that we here consider the public interest of much greater importance than the difference between the two contesting parties.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this motion has to do primarily with the position in which the small fruit and tree fruit industries of British Columbia find themselves at this time. The situation is tragic. It is tragic for the men and women engaged in the industry and also for the other people in British Columbia. It is tragic, indirectly, for people throughout Canada and for those in other nations of the world where there is a great shortage of food.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) was right in bringing the matter before the house this afternoon. I am afraid, however, that it is only one part of the difficulty, because the tragedy goes much deeper. Lumber happens to be the chief product of British Columbia, and with the lumber industry tied up as it is to-day in that province, every activity in the province is affected. This tie-up also affects directly the prairie provinces and eastern Canada and those overseas markets to which we ship a large percentage of our lumber production.

I suggest that this afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should make a full and frank statement of his views on the whole situation. He has been in touch with it from the start. He arranged to have Chief Justice Sloan act as mediator. I believe that there was nothing official about the appointment, but that it was made only in an attempt to get the two parties together. The chief justice of our province is a young man. He was born there and knows the lumber industry from top to bottom. Only recently he concluded a thorough survey of the industry, as the sole commissioner, appointed under a royal commission, and he brought in an excellent report. I do not think anyone from that province would question his standing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID: Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN: On Monday of this week the chief justice brought in his recommendations as to the way in which this strike should be settled. He recommended:

1. A wage increase of 15 cents an hour "across the board."
2. An average working week of 44 hours in the logging industry, in the following manner: 48 hours in the months of April, May, June, July, August and September, with time-and-a-half pay above 44 hours, and a 40-hour week during the other months of the year. A straight 44-hour week in sawmills.
3. A voluntary revokable check-off for union dues.

It is understood, of course, that between April and September it is possible to work longer hours in the woods than during the winter months.

The premier of British Columbia issued a statement at once suggesting that both parties accept these findings. A joint statement was issued by Premier Hart and Labour Minister George Pearson, in which they said this, among other things:

With the national housing emergency still prevailing, with a food shortage in Europe aggravated by the potential slowing up of shipments of food stuffs and with the general disruptions of the economy of Canada and B.C. in particular, as a result of this strike, we appeal to lumber operators and workers alike to come to a common accord and resume their labours in conformity with the recommendations laid by the chief justice.

We feel that Mr. Justice Sloan has given a most careful and thorough study of these problems.

Then the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) made a statement in reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), as reported at page 2154 of Hansard for June 4. Dealing with the report of the chief justice the minister said:

I hope that both sides will have the good sense to accept what I call a very fair report. It is not often that I use an expression of that kind in the House of Commons. I always endeavour to walk down the middle of the road.

Mr. Coldwell: To sit on the fence.

Mr. Mitchell: Well, that is all right. I believe it is sensible, it is fair, and it is sound.

I do not know whether the minister meant that sitting on the fence was fair, sensible and sound, or that the report of the chief justice could be described in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is giving the best exhibition of sitting on the fence that I have seen in many long days. He wishes me to be frank, but he is afraid to be frank himself.

Mr. REID: Sometimes it is safer.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister meant that the statement of the chief justice was fair, sensible and sound. Then he continued:

> I hope that the I.W.A. will have the good sense to see to it that they recommend it to their membership so that the necessary assistance can be given to farmers of British Columbia in connection with the forthcoming crop in that province.

That was three days ago. Press dispatches this morning from the Montreal Gazette state that the chief justice and the minister of labour of the province have been in touch with our federal Minister of Labour continuously up to the present time. The I.W.A. has rejected the proposal put forward by the chief justice, whereas the operators have accepted it.

The Minister of Labour is in a difficult spot; there is no doubt about that. I have great sympathy for him. But a recommendation has been made. Responsible people have said it is a fair recommendation; and if the Minister of Labour believes that is so, then he should say so this afternoon, so that the people in British Columbia may have his statement before them.

Mr. ILSLEY: He said so, did he not? He said so the other day.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to have him say it to-day. I am afraid that in connection with these disputes we are getting into a position where everyone is neutral, with the result that there are certain people who have as their objective the creation of trouble of one kind or another in the country. Right along, the public have had a tendency to say, "Oh, well, it is just one of those things that cannot be helped. We have just to suffer and put up with it. After a while everything will be straightened out." I believe we shall have to devise some way of getting the actual facts before the public better than we are doing to-day, and also of having these strikes settled more quickly. They are upsetting the whole economy of the country, and we must devise some way in which they can be settled more quickly than they are under present conditions.

I would ask the Minister of Labour to go fully into the question when he speaks. So fas as I know, I believe everybody would be wise to get right back to work on the basis of the proposal the chief justice has made. It is only for one year; I understand it is recommended that the basis be accepted only for that length of time; during that time it might be possible to work out a solution more satisfactory to both sides. Action should be speeded up right away in order that we can have the wheels turning and supply the starving people in other parts of the world with food in so far as Canada is able to do so.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to state first that I am not going to take a non-partisan view; I am going to take a partisan stand on this matter. I notice that this debate has been brought about because a crisis now exists in connection with the packing of fruit. If it had not been that there was this crisis in fruit packing; if it had been just a case of the loggers being out on strike, then, if any one had risen and pointed out that the families of the loggers were suffering he would never have been able to be heard on this floor.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Did you try?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: No, I did not try. I just happen to know that.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member for Fraser Valley did on behalf of his farmers.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It was tried last year in connection with the Ford strike. This strike has been caused because for years there has been an exploitation of the loggers. I happen to know because I have worked in the camps and I have worked on the rigging. During the war the loggers received no wage rate comparable with those paid to war workers, especially in the shipyards.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): On the Queen Charlotte islands they got $18 a day.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: They paid high wages on the Queen Charlotte islands, but I should like to see the hon. member in one of those camps on the Queen Charlotte islands where it rains all the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was in Africa.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: He was in Africa where it is nice and sunny. I went through the battle of Prince Rupert and at times it was rather damp. I was sent by a government that did not have sand enough to conscript enough men to send over there. That is the answer.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You were conscripted!

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I was not conscripted.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You dodged the draft in the shipyards as long as you could.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: During the last war the camps were cleaned up by the I.W.W. They put blankets in the camp and had better meals served in spite of the opposition of the camp operators. We now come to another cleaning up process. During the war these men did not go out on strike. They abided by the rules laid down, and now they are asking for a square deal. I notice in these disputes that the blame is always placed on the industrial worker. I am not saying that that is done all the time in this house, but a great many times the strikers are blamed. In this case they are blamed for not separating the box industry in order that the box manufacturers may be supplied. Once you start that sort of thing, it will be just the thin edge of the wedge to break the strike.

These men live under constant fear. The very nature of the work makes their life in camp bitter and harsh. After years of struggle in the camps, these men have realized that the social conditions in the camps must be changed. These men live an isolated existence and they have a great deal of difficulty in forming a home. They work in the camps for three or six months completely isolated from their families, and then they come in and blow all their earnings. I do not blame them because I would do so myself if I were in their position. By means of this strike, they are trying to attract the attention of the people of the country to the conditions under which they live. This is one of the most dangerous occupations in the country, even more dangerous than mining. It is almost like war when you get up on the rigging and are working under high speed and constant tension.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate because I felt that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) had presented the case very well for the fruit growers. I sincerely hope that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will see fit to consider his recommendation to open the box factories. I know they are both too old hands at this business to walk into any obvious trap which would result in dissension being created between the government and the workers. From my own experience I have a feeling that the leadership of the unions might conceivably be anxious to have the government and the workers come to blows. That would be a most unfortunate thing to have happen.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald), with his vast experience in the lumber industry, has made some harsh statements with regard to the conditions under which the men live. I am glad that he took a partisan stand on the matter because I expected that that would be exactly what he would do. I happen to be familiar with the lumber industry and I can say that it pays the highest wages of any industry in Canada. One of the recommendations made by Chief Justice Sloan will result in dishwashers in the camps, the men in the kitchen, being paid $7 for an eight-hour day. That does not sound to me to be exploitation, especially when compared with the conditions that exist in other parts of Canada.

My hon. friend said that wages did not increase in the lumber industry during the war, but I would point out that there has been an over-all increase of 57 per cent. Of all the workers in Canada I think the loggers were probably the better treated. The operators were well treated at the same time. The lumbering industry is the one industry in Canada that has the least to complain about. As I say, wage costs increased 57 per cent. The cost of manufacturing or producing a thousand feet of logs increased 107 per cent at the same time.

My hon. friend said that there were no strikes in the industry during the war, but I found that it was not until Russia entered the conflict that the labour leaders in British Columbia began to be concerned about whether Canada produced any lumber at all. They certainly were not the least bit concerned about Great Britain getting any. I can assure the house about that.

I have tried to take some part in the settlement of this strike in British Columbia. My constituency has probably a higher percentage of lumber workers than any other in the province. I am probably a poor politician, but I took it upon myself to reply to the telegram which Mr. Pritchett sent to all members of the house asking for our opinion on this strike. I took it upon myself to wire back my views on the matter in specific terms. I did not quibble about the situation at all. I told Mr. Pritchett that I believed it would be a very fair settlement if there was a fifteen cents an hour over-all wage increase, but I said that I thought the forty-four hour week should continue for the present because we needed lumber so badly. That was about two weeks before Chief Justice Sloan brought in his recommendations.

I suggested also that the union security issue should go to arbitration. Mr. Pritchett replied to me in the following words:

If same sentiments existed with operators' representatives as you have expressed dispute could be settled in fifteen minutes.

There you have approval of substantially the same suggestions that were made by Chief Justice Sloan. Mr. Pritchett expressed his approval of that settlement at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: How long ago was that?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): On May 25.

Mr. MacNICOL: When did the strike start?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): On May 15. Mr. Pritchett, of course, would not miss the opportunity to create any dissension he could, because immediately he received my telegram it was broadcast all around Vancouver and British Columbia that the operators were weakening, that Gibson Brothers and certain of the small operators were looking for a settlement of the strike but that we were coerced into withholding a settlement. That has no foundation in fact at all.

Mr. REID: Have you communicated with him since?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I have not heard from him since. I do not care to communicate with him any more because, so far as I am concerned, he is entirely unreliable. They took my telegram with reference to fifteen cents an hour increase and a forty-four hour week, and then their paper came out with the statement that Gibson suggested that a fifteen cents an hour increase and a forty-hour week be given. That was absolutely untrue. My suggestion was a forty-four hour week. So that I have lost all sympathy with the leaders of the lumber workers. I feel that Mr. Justice Sloan's report was very fair and an equitable solution of a difficult problem out there. I believe now, unless the government steps in, that if a secret ballot were taken of the lumber workers they would return to work. I was talking with Port Alberni on the long-distance telephone last night. The union had called a meeting there to discuss Mr. Sloan's proposals, and they used the old strong-arm union tactics of no secret ballot. With 400 men there it takes courage for a man to stand up and attempt to go against the wishes of the leaders who want to continue the strike. I just wanted to put that statement on the record in reply to the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, now that the British Columbia members have expresed themselves with respect to the question of assuring an adequate supply of containers for the British Columbia berry producers, I believe it is fitting that the Alberta members should go on record with regard to this whole question.

We sympathize deeply with the British Columbia fruit growers, first because they live in our sister province of British Columbia, and, second, because they are our fellow agriculturists, fellow tillers of the soil. Theirs are the hazards from weather, disease and insects, and theirs are the anxieties concerning markets and prices which are common to all agriculturists everywhere, wheat growers and all other producers of primary products.

We are perturbed because of the danger too of the loss of great quantities of fruit, first, because it means the loss of food valuable and precious in this time of threatened famine, and, second, because the fruit which the people of Alberta use comes in the main from British Columbia.

We are anxious about the lumber strike. It is hard for us to understand fully this lumber strike, but the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) have given us some insight into the whole situation. We deeply regret that some formula has not been found and agreed upon, at least to tide us over a serious situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I call his attention to standing order No. 31, which requires that speeches must be relevant to the motion that is before the chair, and the motion before us is to discuss problems in British Columbia. I do not think I should permit the house to discuss what is going on in any other province than the one mentioned in the motion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can only guess at what Your Honour is saying, because it is impossible to hear you down here. I shall endeavour to speak loud enough so that Your Honour can hear what I am saying.

It seems to me that some formula ought to have been discoverable somewhere to tide us over not only a serious situation regarding fruit and egg and fish supplies, which are all endangered by the strike, but also a dangerous housing situation from which we are all beginning to suffer across this country.

We see in the situation a warning that the most careful attention must yet be given to the whole matter of equity and stability in our economy. The remarks of the two members who spoke just before me clearly indicate the sharp cleavage of opinion which exists in that part of the country and which must somehow or another be reconciled. Ways and means must be found of establishing and maintaining equitable and stable prices and wages and dependable and adequate markets as a fundamental basis for confidence in industry. Everywhere in this country to-day there is a loss of confidence. Just what are the causes we can only conjecture, but certainly something serious and earnest must be done. That is the way we feel about it.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) upon the excellent way he presented his case and upon the courage he exercised in bringing the whole matter to the attention of the house. I wish to assure him and all our fellow citizens in British Columbia that we from Alberta are with him.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I do not profess to deal in any knowing way with the situation at British Columbia, but I did like the presentation of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I want to point out how the situation in British Columbia affects us on the prairies. It does not affect us as vitally, of course, as British Columbia itself. Nevertheless in the part of the prairies from which I come we depend almost entirely for our fruit supplies on imports, chiefly from British Columbia; and in a year like this, when a great many parts of Saskatchewan have been visited with frost which is likely to destroy our crops of wild fruit, our fruit supplies from outside are more important than in ordinary years. To get our fruit from British Columbia we must get it in containers, so that we in Saskatchewan are much concerned to see that the proposal of the hon. member for Fraser Valley is carried out in the terms proposed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacINNIS: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would make a statement before the hon. member for Fraser Valley closes the debate?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no objection, although I have nothing to add, because I think hon. members have covered the waterfront already. But if the house thinks it necessary I shall make one or two observations.

I have not changed my opinion from the day I answered the question addressed to me by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). I think it was a fair and reasonable settlement, and I hope even at this late date the leaders of the men will have the good sense to accept it, in the interests of organized labour; let us put it in that way. I have seen the development of that organization in British Columbia. It had its genesis during the difficult period of the war. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) has said that there is a group of so-called leaders in this country who, prior to Russia coming into the war, were not greatly concerned about what happened to our way of life. I think that is a bald statement of fact and the country should know it.

Mr. MacINNIS: You should have known before the last election. You were so friendly.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether they voted for my hon. friend but they ran a candidate against me. My hon. friend, like myself, knows the game.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are people in this country who do not want settlements of disputes; they prefer disorganization and agitation all the time.

I think the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) made a reasonable request to the men's leaders. It would not have prejudiced their position at all if they had accepted his very sensible suggestion; the strike in the other part of the industry might have continued, but a service would have been rendered to the farmers who, under this present situation, are absolutely helpless. I do not wholly agree with what was said by, I believe it was the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald). I do not think men in public life render any service to their people or to the nation by discussing a dispute of this description in the language he used this afternoon. Let us be perfectly honest about this; there is no attempt on the part of the operators to destroy the men's organization; what is in question is the wage structure of the industry. I sometimes wonder what kind of world we are living in when I listen to some debates in this House of Commons. I appreciate that you have to talk to the boys back home. Yet the statement cannot be challenged that never in the history of Canada has the income of the farmers been so high or have the wages and salaries of people engaged in industry and commerce reached the plane they are on to-day. I am very glad of that condition.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or the profits of the corporations. Put in all three.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall come to that: I am glad the hon. member mentioned it. My mind goes back to 1919. I do not think we have now such war profiteers as emerged from the first great war, and it is to the credit of the government and of the Canadian people that we passed through the recent war without any serious accusations of dishonesty in connection with the billions of dollars which were spent for the successful prosecution of the war. Also let it be remembered that our money is worth more than it was in 1919. It is not fair to make such representations to working people as one hears from some members of the opposition, and I do not believe that our friends of the Conservative, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties, in their quiet or more sensible moments, believe some of the things they say.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Conservatives are always sensible.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall comment on that in a moment. What my Conservative friends want, for reasons best known to themselves, is a complete lifting of the price structure.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Nobody ever said that at any time.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is probably sorry that he said it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It never was said.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall take my hon. friend's word for it. I see that an hon. member representing another group, the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), is ready to jump on me. His party thinks you can maintain a stable price structure and at the same time increase wages out of all proportion to what they should be in conformity with that structure. Some of the younger men who spoke this afternoon have no personal knowledge of what we went through after the last war, so that there is some excuse for their ignorance. But I recall how the working classes suffered through the almost uncontrolled inflationary movement which took place particularly in the year following the ending of the first great war.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You are getting up pretty fast now.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true. My hon. friend is doing his part in that direction, too. I do not need to remind hon. members that it is not too easy to say the things I am saying at the moment, but I think that if all of us said them it would give leadership in this country.

Mr. JOHNSTON: We would be called to order if we said what you are saying now.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MUTCH: The hon. member is out of order. We are not in committee.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to take the position that you can protect the living standards of the farmers and working people without some measure of control. It is the privilege of those who take the opposite point of view to express it, but in that regard I think I know what makes the clock tick.

In connection with this dispute in British Columbia, all we asked was that these several factories which manufacture the necessary containers for the fruit should be reopened. I sometimes wonder what would happen if the farmers took a leaf out of some people's books and went on strike themselves. To my mind it is absolutely indefensible under the circumstance of this dispute. A concession on the part of the men's leaders of the kind proposed would in no way jeopardize their position; it would at least give public opinion, particularly in British Columbia, a different idea of the ability and the leadership of those who are supposed to be leading the men in the present dispute.

I might also remark that the location of this dispute is three thousand miles away over the mountains, in British Columbia; I have to be continually in touch with the provincial government, and it is difficult to administer a department when you have disputes, at the moment, from one end of the country to the other. For that reason I am inclined to agree with my Social Credit friends about the merits of decentralization: one should be right on the ground in order to face up to the difficult situation we have in British Columbia at this time. Let me, in conclusion, again suggest to the leaders there that they make this necessary concession to the defenceless farmers of that province.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understand I am not allowed to say anything in withdrawing the motion, but after listening to the last speaker I think anybody would be in order. I want to express thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, and to most of my colleagues, private members of all parties, for the cooperation they have given in the discussion to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: As it was mentioned by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, according to Beauchesne, second edition, section 250, it is the custom for the mover of a motion such as this to withdraw it when the debate is over.

Mr. MacKINNON: He did that.

Motion withdrawn.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN MONTREAL DAILY STAR OF JUNE 4.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I should like to draw attention to a matter which affects me and might affect any member of parliament; that is, regarding the use of the frank. An editorial in the Montreal Daily Star of June 4 involves my name in a matter with which I had nothing to do. Perhaps I should read the editorial to show what a member is up against. It is called "The Unsoft Impeachment", and it reads as follows:

From time to time the Star, in common with every other newspaper in Canada, receives through the mails scurrilous comment on its editorials, or news items. If they are unsigned, they immediately find a resting place in that large wastepaper basket that stands beside every editor's desk. If they are signed, their contents are considered on the merits and, if worthy of publication, published.

But to-day one such piece of comment arrived which fits into neither category. True, it is scurrilous, and it is unsigned, but it arrived under such distinguished auspices as to warrant further attention being given to it.

At the top of the Star's editorial page of Friday, May 31, torn ruthlessly from the rest of the paper, there stands, written with the customary elegance of the anonymous school, this comment on an editorial dealing with the Canadian lake seamen's strike: "This stinks!—You live fat on the labour of unpaid workers in your own plant!" (The emphasis is that of our correspondent.)

Now we are not in the least hurt by this unkind reference to our avoirdupois, nor to the odoriferousness of something that may after all only have been printer's ink, but we are somewhat astonished by the distinguished auspices under which this anonymous contribution to the higher criticism reaches us.

The editorial page with its written comment came to us from the House of Commons, bearing the House of Commons postage "frank" and, on the other side of the envelope, the "frank" of a member of parliament—"H.G.A., M.P." The parliamentary guide attributes these initials to the C.C.F. member for Skeena, B.C., who, oddly enough, is described as "seaman," and who is so far off his course as to have permitted some unkind friend the illegal use of his parliamentary "frank."

I lock my stamp in my desk every evening religiously, so that how this happened I do not know. I may say that I quite agree with the comment but I would not have put it in those words.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the dispute between the typographical union and certain newspapers centres in Winnipeg, will the minister make another attempt to bring together representatives of the union and the Winnipeg Tribune?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of the question. I shall be glad at any time to assist the parties to an industrial dispute in adjusting their differences, if they desire me to do so, and after consultation, of course, with the authorities in the province, which in this instance is Manitoba. But I have to receive a request and I have had no request from anyone.

C.P.R. EMPLOYEES—PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent him yesterday. Has the Department of Labour received a reply from the Canadian Pacific Railway, with reference to the report of the department's industrial relations officer on the matter of the restoration of pension rights to certain employees of the C.P.R., which was referred to the company last December. Also may I ask if a copy of this report has been referred to the other interested parties, namely, the unions that requested the investigation?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The reply of the company is being studied. It is not customary to give copies of these reports to any parties to the dispute, but in view of the peculiar circumstances of this dispute, which went back to 1919, we did so in this case. As soon as we have studied the matter I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the answer.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask a supplementary question? Since it is a dispute between two parties, and the government made an impartial investigation, if the report is referred to the company as one of the parties, should it not be referred to the other party as well, namely the unions?

Mr. MITCHELL: The company were not there when the evidence was taken in Winnipeg. We have to be very careful about these matters. I say that frankly, because if it becomes a practice to make these reports public we shall never get a frank report, since they will have an eye to public effect when we want a factual report.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister will give us a report as soon as he gets a definite reply?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

CUTTING OF PULPWOOD—PRISONER OF WAR LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question, notice of which I have not given him since the information reached me only while he has been on duty in connection with this debate. I have received advice to-day that the Department of Labour has issued an order withdrawing an additional three hundred prisoners of war now engaged in cutting pulpwood in the district of Kenora-Rainy River. Since one woods company alone in that district has been unable to obtain bushmen to fill 800 advertised jobs, and the deferment announced respecting prisoners of war in the sugar beet industry—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must confine himself to a question.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Will the minister arrange with the British government for a postponement of the return of these prisoners of war in the Kenora-Rainy River district?

Mr. MITCHELL: The situation is quite clear. These are not our prisoners of war but men who were taken prisoner by the British forces. We merely acted as custodian for them in view of the tremendous pressure in Great Britain on food and so on. The war is over and it is now a question of shipping space. If we had ships they could stay longer. But we expect to get most of our people back from Europe, soldiers, airmen and their wives and families. When that has taken place there will be no more ships at our disposal, and it is absolutely necessary to move all these people out as soon as shipping becomes available. I would rather see our men get home from Europe. That is our first obligation. If there should be a delay in that regard the prisoners can stay a little longer.

EXPORT OF TRUCK SPRINGS TO DETROIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Yesterday the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply promised to give an answer to a question which I placed before him regarding the export of steel springs from Windsor to Detroit. He is not in his seat and the minister is not here. Perhaps the answer can be given on Monday. I simply wish to remind him of the promise.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will be seen to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

200. Departmental administration, $422,774.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the house was last in committee of supply on the estimates of this department I promised to give some figures in connection with the item of $50,000 provided for the general administration of the department for publicity and information. When I referred to this matter last Friday evening I said that the total expenses up to March 31, 1946, were $24,959.68. A breakdown of these expenditures is as follows: Addressograph equipment and embossing of addressograph plates, $5,459.46; publication of "Canada's Health and Welfare", six editions, $8,871.01. This bulletin is published in both French and English. Twenty thousand copies in French are distributed, and fifty thousand copies in English. The aim of this publication is to keep Canadians engaged or interested in public health work informed concerning developments in national and provincial health and welfare services. The next item is books and periodicals, $657.65; Canadian (Press) clipping service, $1,427.44; film (strip) "Science of Living", $1,399.35; Immunization film clip, $1,411.88. For a biologcial and medical film library, prints of one hundred films on technical subjects, $4,741.24. For a book on care of the feet, $300. This is the cost of the technical illustrations for a booklet which has not been issued as yet, but work on which has been commenced. For Malaria pamphlet and poster, $225.20. For photos, display panels, picture layouts, $346.22. For "British Health", a picture display brought over here from the United Kingdom, $120.25. This makes the total of $24,959.68 to which I referred a week ago.

At that time I was also asked for a breakdown as to how the department proposed to spend the vote of $50,000 now sought under this item for publicity and information. That information is as follows:

Health and welfare bulletin	$23,000
Exhibits for rural fairs, six sets at $250 each	1,500
Photographic services, involving distribution of picture layouts, maps, etc., to newspapers and periodicals	2,000
Newspaper clipping service, within the department	1,500
Window displays and similar exhibits	3,000
Film circuits	3,000
Miscellaneous art work and photography	500

That makes a total of $34,500. The unallocated balance is $15,500. Generally speaking, this vote is sought for educational and information services which are not covered in any specific votes for information and education, under either the health or welfare branches of the department. This vote is to be used for services which will generally benefit the public as a whole, related to the work of the department as a whole.

Then I was asked for details of expenditures made in connection with publicity and information to persons outside the department. Under item 213, nutrition service, expenses of $30, $65 and $50 were incurred to three individuals whom I could name if that is required. Under item 212, the civil service health division, an expense of $210 was incurred for writing and research. Those are the only expenditures coming within that question.

I should refer briefly to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard last Friday night. In his speech he referred to a number of different items, the first of which, in the sequence in which they appear in the report, was an item of $10,000 for publicity in connection with the Indian medical service. This matter is dealt with at page 2082 of Hansard. As the hon. member said, this can be dealt with more adequately at a later time. But I would say now that his observations about this item, as all his observations on publicity, information and education, seem to have taken the word "publicity" in these estimates as used in some commercial sense. The expenditures made in the past and the votes now sought are intended for education and information in the broadest sense; and I should think everyone here would agree that the best possible thing we can do for the Indians and Eskimos of Canada is to help them to help themselves. That, very largely, is an educational and informational problem. The item of $10,000 sought for this purpose will be explained either when we reach it, or now, as preferred. The expenses planned under this item are definitely designed to put before the Indians and Eskimos of our country information respecting health, hygiene and nutrition which will enable them better to look after themselves.

The next matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard related to, to use his words:

> . . . another booklet called the "Master Menu Pattern," which, if you please, is a bright little document telling the people of Canada what food to take with them when they go on picnics in the summer and how best to make use of that food.

The pamphlet to which he has referred is "little," and I think it is brightly written; but it is not designed to help picnickers. The pamphlet nowhere refers to picnicking. If it has been distributed to persons who might occasionally go on picnics, no doubt they have found it useful. However, the purpose of the pamphlet, as anyone who looks at it can see, is to assist those who are engaged in planning the operation of camps for children and adults by providing them with simple instructions and suggestions concerning nutrition and the preparation of food.

In his speech the hon. member said that this—

> . . . breaks a good rule of advertising, because it is offered to the Canadian people as a whole, while there is no demand for it.

Then he goes on to say:

> That is the sort of advertising which one can readily approve, where there is a clear need by an obvious class, and where it is almost certain that this class will be only too anxious to read and study and apply that publicity.

With that description of the purpose and aims of such a pamphlet I should be very glad to agree. This booklet satisfies all the requirements. In the first place, it was prepared and issued in response to numerous requests from camp leaders in Canada. In the second place, it was directed toward camp leaders and specific groups interested in conducting children's and other summer camps, so that the food at those camps might make its full contribution to health. In the third place, it was distributed on request only to those in a position to use it. One thousand copies were printed, and the demand was so great that the supply was speedily exhausted. Another edition in French and English was issued, with the result that thus far 2,200 copies have been distributed. We have received a large volume of mail not only commending the publication but also asking for additional copies. These requests and comments come from boy scouts, wolf cubs, girl guides, Canadian Legion war services, the department of health and public welfare, Manitoba, the provincial board of health of British Columbia, the Saskatchewan department of public health, Manitoba pioneer camps, and private camps operated by schools and individuals as well as from the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the department of agriculture of New Brunswick, welfare organizations, girls' work boards and other agencies of various kinds interested in this work.

The preparation of the publication was not expensive. It seems to have met with general commendation, and we feel that we have done a useful job in making it available. This has been appreciated generally, as is indicated by the large volume of correspondence we have received.

The next item to which the hon. member referred was to fillers issued by the department. He chose one and made some fun of it. He said he did not know what a filler was. These fillers are issued frequently by the department for use in radio programmes and in newspapers. They are made available for use by originators of programmes or publishers of newspapers, as they see fit. They are prepared in the department, issued in mimeographed form and, apart from the time of preparation and the cost of the paper, there is no cost involved. We have found that this service is used generally and appreciated. A large number of these items are heard on the air and appear in the press every day. Generally, they seem to be utilized in a way which more than justifies the very slight expenditure of time and money involved in their preparation.

As to the hon. member's comments respecting style as shown in the quotation he used, might I say that every hon. member has no doubt had a good deal of experience with publicity, and all will realize that in respect of any advertisement there may be many views. Every bit of publicity or information issued will not please everyone. Some of us would like to have it written in some other way. To a great extent it is a matter of taste, and all that can be done is to secure the best possible assistance and advice, and to exercise judgment upon the results and use of the material.

Mr. STIRLING: Were they distributed on request, or is there a mailing list?

Mr. CLAXTON: These are sent out to publications and radio stations on a mailing list.

I promised to give the hon. member for Cape Breton South some further information in connection with the serum ACS. As I said, this was first the subject of inquiry in 1943 or 1944, when my colleague the present Minister of Veterans Affairs had authority over the health branch of the department. He made inquiries at that time, which he referred to when the matter came up in the house last week. Shortly after that, the matter was brought to my attention, and I raised with the representatives of the U.S.S.R. in Canada the question as to whether or not they had had any news from Russia of any serum or other possible cure for cancer, arthritis and so on. There was an exchange of correspondence with the ambassador here in which I offered full cooperation with him and he offered full cooperation with me in the exchange of scientific information. In reply to my inquiry he wrote to say that the material in question was not regarded as a cure for cancer or arthritis.

At that time a small shipment of ACS, which is the abbreviation for anti-cytoxic serum was secured by the Connaught laboratories. Unfortunately that was found to be contaminated, as serum often is, and it could not be used. Another lot was obtained from Johns Hopkins at Baltimore and that was tried out in a number of cases but without any results which would justify its continued use. However, as the hon. member may have seen, the newspapers carried a dispatch referring to this serum yesterday. We shall be glad to see that it is followed up to learn the possibilities.

I have tried to answer the questions of which I made particular note last week, but if there are any others I shall be only too glad to answer them now.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister has given a good break-down of the costs of publicity under departmental administration, and he has also given us the projected expenditures of $34,000 for the coming year. First, I should like to ask: Why ask for the $15,000? I can understand that some contingencies may arise and I should like to know whether this principle—I take it that it is a principle—of allowing for contingencies is followed in connection with all publicity items, or is it done only in connection with this one item?

Would the minister say something about the publication "Canada's Health and Welfare"? The cost last year of putting out six issues was $8,871, and the estimated expenditures for the coming year are $23,000, or about three times as much. How many more issues will be put out this coming year than were put out last year and will it cost that much more? I have volume No. 2 of November, 1945, and volume 8, of May, 1946. I can see that the contents might be of some interest to those engaged in public health work, but I do not believe we are getting our money's worth when it costs $1,700 per issue to put out this publication. From what the minister said yesterday, I understand that that is the monthly cost.

There are only seven pages. There are some personality sketches and then details of a film library. The issue before me contains four general articles with regard to the work of various provincial departments of health. I do not believe these articles are detailed enough to be of any value to a man who is professionally engaged in this work, and they would appear to be too short and too general and dealing with matters in too broad an outline to be of any great value to the ordinary man on the street. Does the minister not think the contents of this magazine could be incorporated in the contents of Health, which, I believe, is issued quarterly by a private organization? The $23,000 which would be saved could be applied, let us say to the neurological institute or to some other organization as was suggested by one of my hon. friends to my left. What is the circulation of this magazine and to what type of people does it go? Is it sent out on application or just a general distribution.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member asked whether this item for contingencies was justified and whether similar provision was made in the other votes for publicity. I think the item is justified, particularly in the case of a new department. Hon. members will have in mind that this department was created only on October 13, 1944. It is extremely difficult to get a pattern of the departmental requirements in a new and possibly expanding field down to definite figures within a period of about a year. Remember that these estimates were prepared in November and at that time the department had been in existence for just twelve months. We had been paying family allowances for only four months. A number of divisions had not yet been established and a large number of posts had not yet been filled. It was impossible to foresee with any great degree of precision the exact requirements with regard to publicity. A careful examination was made, based upon our experience during that period and the experience of the predecessor department. These items were put in and it was felt necessary to provide for contingencies in this and in some of the other large items.

With regard to the bulletin "Canada's Health and Welfare", this was first published in October, 1945. There were only six issues covered by the expenditures up to March 31, 1946. As to the necessity of this publication, we took the advice of everyone who has worked in this field and it was thought desirable that the department should have such a publication. It replaced a publication which went out of existence and therefore the net expense to the public owing to the change is not very great. We do not know of any other way of giving current information about matters of health and welfare of interest and concern to all those engaged in this field from one end of the country to the other. This publication, as the hon. member has said, has seven pages in addition to the cover. It has reference to recent developments in the health and welfare field and to recent legislation; it refers to conferences; it reviews books; it lists films and refers briefly to developments in other countries. There is no other way that we know of, of doing that. It would be quite wrong for the government of Canada to expect any private agency to do this for us. The Health League of Canada has a valuable publication, but its purpose is totally different from this, and I believe that it is sent to quite a different constituency. This bulletin is sent to the health officers of the dominion and the provinces, to teachers, to ministers of religion, to municipal health officers, to social service workers and to others who are working professionally in this field of health and welfare. It is not sent to the general public. From the experience we have had so far, we believe that the distribution of this publication is amply justified by the interest taken, that it is a useful instrument to have and that it should be continued. Its form will be changed from time to time as we gain experience, but that it serves a useful purpose we have no doubt whatsoever.

Mr. FLEMING: In the minister's comments on the break-down of the projected expenditure of $50,000 on publicity and information he gave us his views as to the basis on which this item should be made up. He has indicated projected expenditures of $34,500 and a balance of $15,500, to which he referred as a justifiable reserve. He did not, however, answer the question of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard as to whether the same principle had been followed in making up the other items on publicity and information. There are some fifteen items altogether relating to publicity and information in the various branches of this department, some of them for large amounts. Has the same principle been followed in connection with them, what one might fairly describe as the principle of projecting an expenditure of two dollars and then adding another dollar as a reserve?

Mr. CLAXTON: As the various speakers have been speaking, I have been going through the estimates, and so far I have found no provision for a similar contingency in the other items. We can find that out definitely as the items come up one after the other. If there are other provisions for contingencies they are of a minor nature. I shall be very glad to give the information as the items come up.

Mr. FLEMING: Thank you. I asked the minister last Friday night, May 31, if he would supply a good deal of information. Some of it he has given to the committee this evening. The information I sought covered all the items in the estimates with relation to publicity and information, and in that connection I asked for the expenditures on publicity last year and for the projected expenditure this year. If it is more convenient for the minister to give that information as we reach the various items, I have no objection to that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall do that.

Mr. FLEMING: One further question. May we assume that these estimates were prepared on the assumption that there will be no change in the functions of the department as a result of the outcome of the dominion-provincial conference? In other words, were these estimates prepared on the assumption that the functions of the department would continue as in the past year, unaffected by action on any proposals that were made by the government to the conference?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. FERGUSON: I notice that a recent issue of this pamphlet eulogized the life work of Mrs. Arthur Murphy, an aunt of mine. I am looking forward with pleasure to the day when the Liberal party will say something nice about Julian Ferguson, even when he has passed on. May I ask if these pamphlets are printed by the king's printer, or are tenders asked from small printing establishments throughout Canada which need as much work as they can in order to carry on?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer in regard to this particular publication. The practice is for the department to ask the king's printer to do the printing or to have it done, and he either does it himself or has it done. I have not the information here as to whether this was done by the king's printer or whether he had it printed outside. I would think the chances of its being done outside are considerable because the king's printer has been so much overworked during the last two years—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It has on it the "king's printer".

Mr. CLAXTON: That is not conclusive. That would merely indicate that it was done either by or through him. The king's printer has been so overworked that it has been impossible to get deliveries in adequate time, and a great volume of printing is done outside. Many printers in Canada are at this time one or two or three or four months in arrears in their work. That is the kind of delivery one gets on a large quantity of printing.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I suggest to the minister that it would be good practice for the future, where at all possible, to have this work done by outside printing establishments instead of endeavouring to increase the facilities of the king's printer.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was hoping, like the hon. member for Peace River, that we would reach a discussion of resolution No. 13, with regard to arthritis, under notices of motion on to-day's order paper; but since it seems that we are not likely to reach it and since I can find no item in the estimates where special mention is made of arthritis, may I say on this item that I have had a lot of correspondence on this subject. I have not had my correspondence on arthritis and old age pensions mixed up as the hon. member for Calgary West said his was, but I should like to refer to one letter which is typical of the correspondence I received. The writer asks that we strongly support a donation or contribution or grant—whichever is the appropriate term—of $10,000 to the Canadian rheumatic diseases association. I do not know what that association is, but presumably it has some standing or it would not be investigating matters of this kind. Frequent references have been made in this chamber to the subject of arthritis, but it does not seem to strike a chord of sympathy in the official mind, at least as strongly as some of us would hope for. I do not suppose it will be an easy matter to find a remedy for this disease. I shall not quote all the figures I have from various sources as to how many people in the dominion suffer from it, but everybody knows that the number is considerable, because everybody knows, I suppose, a good many people who suffer from it, some seriously. It may be that the sufferers do not die from the disease, as do the victims of cancer and other deadly diseases; but I am convinced that it is the real cause of the death of some people, because their hearts will no longer pump the blood through their twisted bodies, which have got into that condition through years of suffering with arthritis. I am convinced, therefore, that in many instances it is a killer; and if it does not kill in the same sense as a bullet, or cancer, or tuberculosis will do, it kills all the joy of life in those people who suffer from it.

The reason I say that there does not seem to be much interest in the official mind is that I put a question on the order paper one day, asking the minister in charge whether the Department of National Health and Welfare had investigated the method of treatment for arthritis and rheumatic diseases used by Doctor I. J. K. Golden, of Chicago; if so, what were the results of such investigation? The answer to both questions 1 and 2 was a flat "no". There was not even enough interest to go and find out. For that reason I think I should put on the record to-night a letter from a gentleman named J. E. Wilder. Apparently he has some belief in Doctor Golden. I know nothing about the treatment, but I shall read what Mr. Wilder says:

April 3, 1946

Honourable Brooke Claxton,
231 St. James Street West,
Montreal, Que.

Dear Mr. Claxton:

I read the article entitled "rheumatic study urged" in the Montreal Daily Star yesterday. I am very much interested in anything that can be done to relieve those suffering from rheumatism and arthritis.

In 1929 I was in Chicago trying to recuperate from a nervous breakdown and rheumatic trouble. Through another doctor I met Dr. I. J. K. Golden, 2238 West North avenue, who was making a specialty of the treatment of arthritis. I had him treat me and the results were so remarkable that I spent most of my time for the next month following up the cases that he treated and was the means of having many of my friends treated by him, all with almost miraculous results. I have seen people come into his office on crutches and after one treatment walk out without crutches or any aid from other persons. The treatment is a serum which he prepares himself and which is given intravenously and intramuscularly.

I was so convinced of the merit of his treatment that I arranged with Dr. George Morgan, senior, 4294 Western avenue, Westmount, who was connected with the Homeopathic hospital, to go with me to Chicago to see the results of four or five bad cases which Dr. Golden was to treat. Dr. Morgan was in Chicago several days and took notes on each case. When he returned to Montreal, he made a report which he submitted to the staff of the Homeopathic hospital. They asked him what kind of dope Dr. Golden used on him when he was in Chicago and refused to credit the report or to make further investigation.

Since 1929 I have visited Dr. Golden several times and had treatments from him. I have never had any recurrence of the rheumatic condition since my first treatment.

I could arrange to have anyone that you might appoint see some of the cases Dr. Golden is treating and the results he obtains. I would be willing to take care of some of the expenses incurred by their trip.

At present Dr. Golden's patients are those recommended by others who have been treated by him and those referred by other doctors after they have first done everything they could for the patient without his showing any improvement.

If you are interested in looking into this matter, I will be pleased to make an appointment with you at your convenience, to discusss it further.

Yours truly,
(signed) J. E. Wilder.

All that may or may not be worth while, but there is one significant thing about the letter which almost everyone here will recognize, that when a man offers to dig in his own pocketbook to help someone along he has some faith in the remedy, because people do not spend their own money unless they believe it will be applied to some good purpose or some purpose in which they strongly believe. When the writer said that he was willing to pay part of the expense, it seems to me evidence of something of which the minister should take cognizance. On April 15, that is twelve days after this letter was written, and when the minister must have had it in his hands, he replies to my question that they have made no investigation of Doctor Golden's work. It is sufficient evidence to convince me that not nearly as much importance is attached to this in the official mind as there should be.

I now come to another letter, written on April 4 from Montreal, from a man who apparently stands fairly high in a government department, because he was engaged for a while, I believe, with the national research council. I have a copy of the letter he wrote to the minister. I am not going to read it all, because I do not want to prolong this discussion; I want to convince the minister that the matter is important enough to have something in the estimates or the supplementary estimates to do something about it. The writer, addresing the minister at the House of Commons in his official capacity begins:

Dear Mr. Claxton:

Having been engaged for many years in research concerning the etiology and therapy of rheumatic diseases, I was very much interested in the questions asked by Messrs. Arthur Smith (PC-Calgary West) and T. J. Bentley (CCF-Swift Current) in Commons concerning the government's measures to combat arthritis and rheumatism.

Here, later in the letter, is what to me is a singular paragraph, supporting my contention that the departmental officials are not sufficiently concerned about this:

I may say that up to now we had to depend entirely upon the generosity of two American foundations (the Commonwealth fund of New York and the United States Sugar Research Foundation) whose board of advisers considered the work worthy of financial support. In view of the rather expensive nature of this type of research and because of its great practical importance, additional facilities would, of course, be very welcome and I thought it best to call our problem to your attention.

I note from press reports that you pointed out in the House of Commons that no application for such work has been received by the national research council. I may say that during tne war, the N.R.C. has subsidized my work on war research problems and now that these have lost their immediate importance, I submitted an application for a small grant on a different subject (lactation). I did so because the latter problem is less costly and I hesitated to ask for the rather substantial subsidy which would be necessary in order to expedite the progress of our work on rheumatic diseases .,. .

That is signed by Hans Selye, professor and director of the Institute of Experimental Medicine and Surgery, university of Montreal. I assume that he is a responsible medical man and cannot be classed as a quack.

Mr. LAURENDEAU: May I ask the hon. member a question: has he received a report from any medical association anywhere in Canada?

Mr. BENTLEY: I have only the ordinary medical journals, which I do not understand well enough to discuss here. I should like to give hon. members something more, but I cannot. I am presenting the case from a layman's point of view, from information I have obtained from people who appear to have some standing in relation to this subject. I have had advice from the minister of some journals, and have looked them up, but it requires someone with more knowledge than I have to give the house information from them.

When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) was speaking the other evening when this debate was opened, and suggesting that educational work was important, the minister agreed with him. There are many ways of dealing with this matter, and I believe that one important way, which was supported by the minister only a short time ago to-night, when he was discussing the pamphlet with reference to camping, is the matter of diet. We have organizations that are extremely interested in the health of the people. The Health League of Canada prepared a calendar, a copy of which I believe is in the possession of every hon. member, telling the kind of foods that are important. These illustrations can be found in all the schoolhouses throughout the country. Certainly, in all rural schools in Saskatchewan, you will find charts of this kind giving information on the question of diet. But if it is important that the right kind of foods be consumed by our people, I submit that it is equally important that the government should educate itself to the point where it recognizes the unwisdom of removing the subsidy on milk, thus increasing the price of that commodity to people who need it in their diet if they are to grow up to be healthy, with sufficient resistance against diseases of the kinds we have been discussing.

The thing is inconsistent because the problem that we are dealing with must be approached from all angles. The $11,500,000 to be voted here will be wasted money if, after all the advice and the education given the people, steps are not taken to make it possible for those in the lower income brackets to put that advice into practice. People in the upper income brackets suffering from arthritis will benefit by this education and the advice given, because they can take sea voyages; they can drink lemon juice; they can have all the milk they need; but a great many people are exposed to the education while they are left without the means of providing themselves and their families with the necessary diets to make it possible for them to avoid all these diseases.

If education is to be dispensed, I suggest that perhaps the minister might do well to turn his educational guns on the government, aiming it point-blank at them, and we shall sit back and sing, "Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition." It is of the utmost importance that we tackle this problem of arthritis in the right way. Some people say that there are 600,000 persons suffering from it. I do not know what the number is, but I know a good many people are the victims of this disease. I know many of them myself, and in my opinion there should be something in these estimates dealing specifically with research into all forms of rheumatic disease associated with arthritis.

I have taken this opportunity to bring this question up to-night because I am afraid that the resolution on the order paper standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River may never come up for discussion during this session, and I wanted the minister to have my views on the subject.

Mr. DANIEL: I wish to deal briefly with a matter that is of the greatest importance to a number of unfortunate people in this country. I refer to those who have lost their sight.

At the present time blind people over forty years of age secure a pension of $25 a month, 75 per cent of which is paid by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province. They can earn an additional $200 a year, without interfering with this pension.

In the entire Dominion of Canada, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, there are only 9,982 blind persons distributed across the nine provinces, there being 3,131 in Ontario and 3,152 in Quebec.

The council for the blind have requested approval of a six-point pension plan, which is as follows:

1. That a special act for the blind and prevention of blindness is desirable and should be enacted as soon as possible.

2. That pensions should be applied to blind persons after twenty-one years of age.

3. That pensions should be uniform, adequate and tied to the cost of living—at least $30 a month, under dominion-provincial agreement.

4. That permissible earnings or income limits should be raised from the present level to the minimum income tax level, that is, $660 single and $1,200 for married blind pensioners.

5. That all blind persons possessing visual acuity of 3/60 Snellens chart or less shall be granted a guiding and special assistance allocation of $10 a month.

6. That for persons who have entered Canada with good vision and who, through a serious illness or non-compensatable accident, have lost their sight, resident qualifications be reduced to five years.

Hon. members will see that the above plan is asking very little for each individual and a very small amount of money as far as the dominion government expenditures are concerned, to be distributed to this unfortunate group in the manner suggested.

At the present time blind pensions are not paid to anyone under forty years of age, which might be reasonable in the case of a lot of ordinary people, but members can realize that blind people from the ages of twenty-one to forty are just as much incapacitate and unable to work as those over forty. Consequently, I hope that the government will consider favourably and include in their estimates pensions for those between the ages of twenty and forty, the total of which in the whole Dominion of Canada is only 2,328.

It will also be noted from the six-point pension plan which I have read, that the blind ask permission to earn an amount equal to the minimum income tax level. This means that a single person, instead of being allowed to earn only $500, can earn $660 including pension, without affecting his pension.

The council of the blind are also asking for $10 a month guiding fee for those with only a 3/60 Snellens test, which is a very reasonable amount. Hon. members can, I am sure, readily appreciate that the blind are asking for very little, and those hon. members who have had contact with the institute for the blind or the council of the blind, or blind people individually, know that they are probably the most cheerful group of all incapacitated persons. One only needs to have one's eyes bandaged up, as from an accident or operation, for a week to appreciate fully the handicap of being unable to see.

Blind people are spread across Canada and not in percentages in direct ratio to population. The highest percentage in Canada is in

New Brunswick, where approximately sixteeen persons out of every 10,000 are blind, and the lowest percentage is in Alberta, where five persons out of every 10,000 are blind. The maritime provinces, as a matter of fact, have the highest percentage of all the dominion.

As far as races are concerned, they are pretty well equally proportioned. There are 2,417 English; 1,117 Irish; 3,636 French; 1,227 Scotch and the remainder of the 9,962 are divided rather proportionately among seventeen other races. While it has no bearing on the matter particularly, it is interesting to note that the proportion among religious creeds remains about the same, there being 4,869 Catholic and 4,258 Protestant.

While some members may try to figure how much it will cost the government to raise this pension to $30 a month and include those between the ages of twenty and forty, they should bear in mind that approximately 3,300 out of the total of 9,900, or one-third of the blind people in Canada, are over seventy years of age and are included in the regular old age pension plan, so that really under present regulations only those between the ages of forty and sixty-nine can be considered as getting any special consideration because of their blindness, and there are only 4,320 of these.

I shall not bore the house with further information, since a pamphlet containing all the information pertaining to the blind can be secured from the dominion bureau of statistics. I would ask the minister to consider seriously approving this six-point pension plan, which certainly is not unreasonable; and I hope hon. members on all sides of the house, regardless of political affiliations, will support the minister and the government in this worthy and justifiable undertaking.

Mr. BLAIR: Last Friday I made an appeal on behalf of those suffering from arthritis, and since that time this disease has been discussed a great deal in this house. It is a peculiar disease, and I should like to commend the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge on the commonsense speech he made the other day. We of the medical profession are ready to try any form of treatment which will give relief to these people. There is no doubt that new forms of treatment will be advocated from time to time, such as that suggested by the hon. member for Swift Current. Arthritis is a disease which will go ahead and cripple a person, and then suddenly for some unknown reason will cease, but it leaves the poor patient permanently crippled. The medical profession have tried various treatments, including diet. Various diets have been advocated over a long period. We have tried the injection of gold with considerable benefit in some cases. I have seen some patients considerably helped by bismuth, and there have been some results from serums; but that is not the answer, because the unfortunate patient is left crippled. His joints become ankylosed so that he is unable to move them, and no form of treatment will loosen them up again.

We want to get at the cause of this disease. Something is causing it, and we want to be able to stop it before it reaches the point where people are permanently crippled. No doubt there will be cures; some of them may be psychic, as far as that is concerned, but I cannot see that any person suffering from arthritis was ever cured in one office by one shot of serum. Incidentally, speaking of gold, the use of which is being widely advocated and which has its uses, at the present time I do not believe it is safe office procedure; that is, the patient should be in an institution when the gold treatment is tried. No doubt these cures will be pointed out to us from time to time; we shall be told that somebody has obtained marvellous relief from something, but it must be remembered that of itself the disease will suddenly stop. Therefore our knowledge of the disease should be increased by research.

I should like to say a few words about this pamphlet on public health and welfare which is put out by the department. I have regularly placed this pamphlet on the table in my waiting room, but I never find any person reading it, which is unfortunate. I realize that there should be value to a paper such as this, but I think the way it is written has something to do with the fact that it is not read. I believe that better results could be obtained if the people writing this paper would bring it up to date. Let us have an issue, for instance, in July, August and September on poliomyelitis and the first signs of it, something the people can understand. Let us have a paper on the causes or the early signs of cancer, something the people can read. Let us put out a paper that can be used. I remember the minister said this pamphlet was sent to schoolteachers. Let us put out a paper the teachers can use in teaching hygiene to their classes. Make it something useful.

The other night the hon. member for Eglinton produced one of the fillers issued by the department, a most ridiculous thing, and in this I am criticizing the propaganda being put out. Whoever wrote that filler quoted the other evening, advising people to use the remainder of their family allowances to buy "zest", certainly had a wild imagination. Many of these children are in their present position from the buying of too much "zest" by their fathers. The thing is unfortunate. I approve the propaganda; I think there is a place for it, but I contend that the pamphlet, the fillers and everything else are badly written and not producing the results they should.

Mr. SKEY: What is the government policy with respect to day nurseries in the large urban centres of the country? In asking this question, may I say that the day nurseries have been a great relief to those living in cramped quarters as a result of the present housing shortage. Many service men who have returned from overseas, some of them with children, live in rooms. The burden of the heavy taxation imposed at the present time has made it necessary for both parents to work, and the day nursery is the only answer for a great number of families. I may be wrong, but, as I understand it, the ministry of health and welfare has withdrawn the grants it used to give these necessary institutions.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Department of National Health and Welfare never made grants to day nurseries. Grants were made during the war by the Department of Labour for the sole purpose of increasing the supply of labour available to munitions factories by enabling married women to leave their children in places where they would receive adequate care during the daytime. It was done as a war measure and was discontinued by the Department of Labour when the need for war workers ceased. This is a matter coming exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and is generally regarded as a municipal or local responsibility. Any further question the hon. member may wish to ask in this connection should be directed to the Minister of Labour, but in view of what I have said I think the situation should be thoroughly understood.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark, and I was glad that as a doctor he did not take issue with me in regard to some of the remarks I made last week as to the nature of arthritis. In fact his remarks were along the same line as my own. I shall be very glad indeed to see that the officers of the department consider his various suggestions in regard to publicity. I must say it was never intended that this bulletin, "Canadian Health and Welfare," should be put in the waiting rooms of doctors. I thought doctors, particularly of the ability of the hon. member for Lanark, either had more exciting literature for their patients or their patients were so anxious to see them they had no time to read material of this kind. This is a publication intended for people working in the field of health and welfare and so far, as I say, it has been well received.

I should refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford, who referred to the representations made by the Canadian Institute for the Blind. I have seen the officers of the institute and, I think, of most of the provincial organizations during the year. They have put forward the same representations, and these have been given the most serious consideration. As I think hon. members know, in the proposals put before the provinces by the dominion we proposed that the federal government contribute on a fifty-fifty basis to the cost of reducing the age to twenty-one years, and increasing the amount to $30 a month, in accordance with the proposals of the institute, and we were also prepared to discuss with the provinces arrangements under which the permissive earnings of the blind might be increased in order to increase their incentive to look after themselves. I should add that if an agreement had been arrived at it was the intention of the government to introduce at this session, or as soon as possible, a special measure relative to the blind; and in these important respects we were fully in line with the suggestions of the institute. With regard to the fifth suggestion, that there should be a special allowance of $10 a month for those whose ability to see was minimal, the matter has been given consideration, but no final decision was arrived at. The final suggestion was that persons who entered Canada with their sight, and lost it, should be qualified for blind pension if they had residence of five years. We were also prepared to consider that suggestion.

On all these points, we substantially met the suggestions of the blind as put before the parliamentary committee on social security in 1943 and 1944. In addition, during the year the government created in this department a special division of blind control, and put in charge of it a doctor who has spent a large part of his life in serving the blind, either in the Department of Veterans Affairs, or through love of his work. I refer to Doctor F. S. Burke. Since his appointment, in cooperation with other doctors he has undertaken a survey of every case of blindness in Canada, in order to find out the causes of blindness, and also to learn what percentage of blind people in Canada might be cured by treatment or operation.

We believe a good deal of blindness could be prevented, and one of the proposals we made to the provinces was that we should share with them on a fifty-fifty basis the costs of providing treatment where such treatment would either prevent or cure blindness. We believed that this was the most substantial advance which could be made in our programme in dealing with this problem; the best way to deal with a blind person is to cure his blindness.

Studies made thus far indicate that a considerable proportion of blindness is either avoidable or curable, and we were prepared to assist in that work as I have mentioned. That survey and research are being continued. We hope also to do some research as to the causes of blindness affecting particular communities. One hon. member referred to the heavy incidence of blindness in New Brunswick. It is quite notable that in certain parts of that province the rate of blindness is probably three times as great as that in other parts of the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why?

Mr. CLAXTON: Nobody knows why; we would like to find out. It may be due to nutritional deficiencies. We would like to cooperate with the provinces and with other agencies in finding that out and in endeavouring to see that, whatever the cause may be, it may be corrected in the future.

I am very glad to say that the suggestions of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind are very largely those of the government, and that they were put forward in the way I have indicated.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current concerning arthritis, I have very little to add to what was said the other evening when this matter was discussed fully, as set out at page 2070 and following of Hansard. The hon. member has said, "we should do something about it". That is one of those things it is very easy to say. As the hon. member for Lanark has said, the question is: What can we intelligently do about it? What can we as a federal government do? That was the question I raised when the matter came up before.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not going to make a recommendation of what the minister can do, but I think something should be done. The only thing to do is, I believe, to follow up the recommendations of others, by way of making grants to organizations which are undertaking this research, or set up a federal research branch. Does the minister intend to do that?

Mr. CLAXTON: So far as I know, the Canadian rheumatic diseases association has no programme calling for any research, whatsoever. If it has that intention, such representations have not been made to me.

Mr. BENTLEY: Why not do it though your department?

Mr. CLAXTON: I went into that matter at some length, and I think the view I put forward carried the judgment of the house that the best procedure, so far as research is concerned, was not to have the federal government set up a new institute or agency to conduct fundamental research. We do not believe that is the most efficient way of using the resources of Canada. We believe that the best way is to assist those who require assistance in research, and who are competent to do research in those places where they are doing it or where they are able to do it.

Rheumatic diseases and arthritis are conditions which should be worked at not only by fundamental research workers but by clinical research workers, where patients are available. Those places would be the great teaching institutions and the hospitals in the larger cities. The most important work being done in this field is probably that being done by the Department of Veterans Affairs in the Toronto East General hospital, where 100 cases of arthritis are continually under examination by two officers specially trained in that field, and where they have a team of specialists working in conjunction.

As the hon. member for Lanark pointed out arthritis is a condition. We do not know what the disease is, but there are possibly thirty or more varieties of it. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to diagnose and to prescribe the best treatment.

The hon. member referred to the fact that there are probably 600,000 persons suffering from arthritis in Canada. There may be more than that, because lots of people over forty years of age have some sort of condition which might be described as arthritic.

Mr. FLEMING: A lot of ball-players in this house have been suffering from it since last Wednesday night.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, there has been a lot of it since then; since we suffered that trouncing on Wednesday night, we have been feeling an arthritic condition in the last two days.

This matter of arthritis is one of great concern, and if there is anything we can do effectively, I should like to see it done. But the manner we have suggested, of working through the national research council, and assisting those who want assistance to do work in connection with arthritis, seems to be the most sensible way of approaching the problem.

Mr. ADAMSON: Now that the Minister of Labour is in the house, I should like to make a suggestion with regard to day nurseries.

The CHAIRMAN: Day nurseries do not come under this national health vote.

Mr. ADAMSON: I believe they do. They are a definite consideration of the department, and were brought into being as a war-time measure. I want to bring out the fact that in a congested district such as my own, and such as is found in many parts of Toronto, war-time conditions still exist, and the need for these day nurseries is still a pressing one. I realize that, to a degree, war industries have ceased to exist; but the congestion is still there, and the lack of housing accommodation makes the continuance of these day nurseries a necessary part of the health and welfare of Canada. While I realize that they were brought into being as a war-time necessity, so that married women, the mothers of small children, could work in war plants, the necessity for these day nurseries still exists.

I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that he reconsider carefully his decision to have nothing to do with the continuation of this necessary and helpful service. Possibly it is a provincial matter, but during this transitional period when there still exists a congestion of workers the need for day nurseries still definitely exists. With all due respect, let me say that it is an unfair burden upon the municipalities to expect them to carry the whole cost of these day nurseries. I suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare carefully reconsider his decision about abandoning support for these day nurseries.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before leaving this general item, I should like the minister to comment upon the matter to which I drew his attention last Friday night, and I believe the hon. member for Lanark referred to it as well. I have in mind the work being done at a place of which I gained some knowledge lately, the Montreal neurological institute. Those of us who spoke last Friday night on this item referred to the research work being done there and the tremendous help being given to a great number of people who suffer from diseases other than those which have been mentioned during the course of this debate.

Reference has been made to the international reputation of this institution. It seems to me that, if for no other reason than national pride in having an international centre in this field within Canada, we should be prompted to do everything we can to enable that institution to do its best work. It is only a matter of a few weeks ago that Doctor Wilder Penfield, the superintendent of the institution, when addressing its annual meeting, implied that some of the work of the institution would suffer, even to the extent of closing down certain sections, because of lack of funds. I know there are always various technicalities that arise as between departments and as between governments, but I submit that the importance of this work and the self-sacrificing contributions of men like Doctor Penfield, Doctor Russel, Doctor Cone, Doctor McNaughton and those associated with them in their work should prompt us to find a way to give all possible support. I am sure that, knowing that there are those whose lives would be made happier and more free from some of the ills from which they suffer by the research that could be done there, should prompt our serious consideration of this matter.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should have referred to that because it was mentioned before by two hon. members. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the fine work being done by the Montreal neurological institute. As that happens to be in the constituency I represent, I was glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member. The reputation of the institute is, literally world wide and it has done a great work for Canada.

Doctor Wilder Penfield is one of the greatest brain surgeons, if not the greatest brain surgeon there is, and he has with him an outstanding staff. The hon. member suggests that on those grounds a grant should be made to the institution. No request that I know of has been made for a grant. I think here we must look at the position as it exists.

It is not a question of technicalities which may arise, as he said; it is a question of the realities of the Canadian constitution and the relationships which have been built up between the provinces and the dominion. There are a number of magnificent teaching institutions in Canada; there are a great number of churches which have done fine work, but that does not mean that everyone should receive a grant from the dominion government. It seems to me that here we have to look at the functions of government and consider which things can be done most appropriately and most in accordance with the lines of the constitution so that the essential needs of the Canadian people may be met.

We have made proposals to the provinces which bear on this, but at the present time I do not see how the dominion government could make a grant to a single educational or medical institution without creating a precedent which would expose the dominion government to demands from every kind of institution which ordinarily would look to the provinces for support. Those who want to change the existing relationships between the dominion and the provinces can discuss projects, change them, but that cannot be done on a piecemeal basis. You must have regard for the constitutional relationships that exist or you will bring about a chaotic condition. I do not think anyone could express greater admiration than I for the work of the institute, but so long as we have our existing constitutional relationships I do not think it is possible to expect the federal government to make a grant for a single purpose such as this.

Mr. KNOWLES: For my own part I would rather that we did this directly, but I should like to make a suggestion along the lines of the present practice. Last Friday the minister indicated that there was some sort of interdepartmental or joint committee on research under the national research council. I believe there is liaison between the minister's department and that committee through the person of a member of the committee. Is that so?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was the situation. There is a medical division of the national research council which considers applications for grants in aid of research.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply there is an item covering grants in aid of research. It is a mere bagatelle, but it seems to me that the minister who is interested in matters of health should see that his representative on that committee urge that some of the money listed for grants in aid of research should be granted to this institute. I hope the minister will see that that suggestion receives consideration.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to see that it gets consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON: In connection with the neurological institute in Montreal, has there been any curtailment of its work?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would think it is quite the contrary.

Mr. ADAMSON: There has been a curtailment of research owing to lack of funds in some psychiatric hospitals throughout Canada.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. FULTON: In connection with the matter of grants in aid to various institutions and the point just raised by the minister, I should like to bring up the general question of grants in aid of hospitals across the country. Apparently many hospitals, because of lack of building materials or lack of funds, have been forced to curtail construction and expansion work and now find themselves in urgent need of accommodation. This question was discussed by the minister and myself in connection with a specific hospital. I do not wish to go into local details on this general item, but I have had a letter stating that hospitals generally are finding it embarrassing because of the temporary suspension of the dominion-provincial conference and the fact that they are unable to get grants from the dominion government. There is in this letter one passage which I think is quite interesting. This is a letter from the Canadian hospital council, Toronto, which I understand represents hospitals across the dominion, addressed to the British Columbia hospitals' association. It reads as follows:

> The collapse of the recent federal-provincial conference is not making it any easier for hospitals to proceed with their construction programmes. Federal loans at low interest were contingent upon a favourable solution to the taxing question and, therefore, cannot proceed. Meanwhile, in most of the provinces provincial assistance is not materializing, the provinces also waiting for a solution to this impasse. The situation is becoming steadily more serious and we are fast approaching what could well be termed a national emergency. A few days ago the gravity of this situation which would quickly result in a break-down of our hospital facilities if a major epidemic developed as in 1918-1919, was discussed with the deputy minister of national health and welfare and we have since forwarded to him for the consideration of his minister and we hope of the cabinet a letter urging that in the interests of the citizens of Canada this matter be not left to any legal interpretations of who has the responsibility for health, or the political juggling of federal-provincial taxing rights, but that the federal government proceed at once to make funds available for the very essential expansion of hospitals. Under such circumstances, low interest loans might need to be repaid rather than amortized under succeeding annual grants to provinces as proposed last year but unless funds are forthcoming from some source hospital expansion will not proceed with sufficient rapidity to cope with the situation.

It is appreciated that the matter is one which, as the letter points out, has been made more difficult by the failure to reach immediate agreement at the conference. But I would ask the minister whether consideration has been given to the representations made by the Canadian hospital council, and, if so, whether there is any likelihood of action being taken by his department along the lines recommended in that letter?

Mr. CLAXTON: The question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops has been raised by a number of other hon. members through whom hospitals made application for assistance from the federal government. On that matter the constitutional position is very clear. Paragraph 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act places squarely within the jurisdiction of the provinces responsibility for hospitalization, and the legal position has been in accordance with the position during the seventy-seven years that we have had confederation. The only federal assistance that I know of that has been given to hospitals has been in connection with the discharge of federal responsibility. The federal government has exercised responsibility for hospitalization of members of the armed forces, veterans, sick mariners, immigrants, and Indians, and in respect of quarantine and leprosy. I think I am right in saying that a grant has never been made to a hospital by the federal government except in the cases I have indicated or others in which there is a federal aspect. In connection with the proposed introduction of health insurance on a nation-wide basis, it was recognized that there would have to be a wide extension of hospital facilities. The dominion proposals to the conference, at page 36 of the green book, provide for financial assistance in the construction of hospitals. That assistance was to be in the form of loans made through the provinces at or near cost.

It is greatly to be regretted that there has not been agreement. All I can say is that the question is being considered and that any further proposals the federal government may make in this as in other matters growing out of the conference will be made by the Minister of Finance at the time of introducing his budget, or at some time consequent on its introduction.

With regard to the hospital at Kamloops, the hon. member has made representations with regard to the matter, and it has been twice before an interdepartmental committee to see if the federal interest in the position was sufficient to justify a grant. I must say that we found the position to be very much like that of hundreds of other hospitals. It is used occasionally by veterans or members of the armed forces or Indians, but there is no special federal interest in that hospital which would justify its being treated differently from other hospitals across Canada.

Mr. FULTON: That is why I was not trying to discuss the local issue here to-night, although I was hoping that in the minister's remarks I might find a ray of hope for our hospital. The minister said that it might be made the subject of an announcement at the time of the budget. Does that mean that he is not in a position to say whether it is intended to make separate representations or to reach an agreement of this sort with the provinces outside the general conference? Can he say whether special consultations could be held so that recommendations of the nature of those contained in the letter I have read could be worked out?

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure the hon. member that the representations will be given the most serious consideration, but I am not in a position to go farther than that at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN: May I draw to the attention of the committee that there has been a considerable discussion on this item, much of which might more properly have come on various other items as we reached them. It occurred to me that the committee might be prepared to allow item 200 to pass now and proceed with the other items.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the general item carries, there is one matter I wanted to ask the minister about because I should like to have some information which will aid me in a discussion later. The matter I have in mind is the national film board, item 244 and following, for which there are appropriations amounting to over $1,000,000. In order to be able to discuss these items with some degree of understanding, I should like to have a number of questions answered at this stage so that I can be contemplating them before we get to the items. Would the minister prepare a statement, since he will not be able to answer these questions offhand, telling us how many films are now in the possession or under the direction of the national film board? Does the film board lease, lend or otherwise let out films to be used for educational purposes? If so, how many are so let out? To what institutions or agencies are they let out? Under what conditions are films let out? Has the board any lecturers using films of the national film board? How many films have to do with biological subjects, and how many have to do with geological or other scientific subjects? How many have to do with the subject of evolution? How many of these would tend to establish in the minds of the students the conviction that evolution is the true explanation of the origin and development of life on the earth? I am going to send these questions over to the minister so that he can consider them, and I should like him to give the answers as soon as he can because I am deeply interested in the subject of evolution and I want to discuss it when we come to the question of venereal disease. I think that for us to be teaching through films all over the country and teaching in our textbooks as a fact that men are descended from apes, and then expecting them to act like men descended from God, is an absurdity. So that I should really like to know a good deal about the matter of these films.

Mr. FLEMING: My short question relates to part of this first item we are on. I think it is clear from what the minister said earlier, and I am just asking his confirmation of it, that the writing and editorial work on the magazine "Health and Welfare" and on these fillers is all done by members of the staff and that no professional assistance is retained from outside the department. Can I have the minister's confirmation of that understanding?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; that is correct with regard to the matters the hon. member has mentioned. If we were preparing a film, or an advertisement for the newspapers, there would be outside professional assistance.

Mr. FLEMING: By advertising advisers?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not discussing the matter, but would the minister tell us under what item or department the UNRRA discussion will come?

Mr. CLAXTON: The Department of External Affairs.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I might impose upon the committee a minute or two more, I should like to ask the minister some further questions on films, and he can look the answers up at the time he is preparing his answers to my former questions about the films. Are any of the national films based upon the Bible and, if so, how many: do any of them give the recent findings of archaeologists like Sir Charles Marston, Sir Flinders Petrie, and others whose discoveries tend to establish the authenticity of the Bible historically and otherwise? If so, how many of such films are now available for distribution? What is the general nature and teaching of each? My reason for asking these questions is this: if it should be found that this domniion is paying over a million dollars for a service which is contributing to the destruction of the faith of the youth and is doing nothing to establish the faith of the youth throughout this country, that matter ought to be probed into and, I think, adequate measures taken.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure the hon. member that it is not doing that, but I would be glad to give such answers to his questions as I can when the items come up.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it would be only fair to the minister to let him know that that is the purpose behind the whole thing. My opinion is that our age is rapidly becoming a godless age. Our people were never intended to be a godless people. The sooner we return to a belief in God, a simple sincere belief in God, the sooner we shall lay a foundation for the great and powerful nation that we were designed to become.

National health branch—

201. National health branch administration, including contribution of $1,134 to the international office of public health, $212,986.

Mr. MERRITT: In this item there is a vote of $100,000 for publicity, which is up $80,000 over last year. I should like the minister, if he would, to give a break-down of the expenditure last year and of the projected expenditure of this $100,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The expenditure for last year was $17,179.19. I can give the hon. member the break-down of that sum: Occupational therapy films, $4,999.14; rural health films, $9,500; health displays, $219.48; health reference book, $180.99; a book on the control of communicable diseases, $2,650.37; a book, "Healthful Living", $532.74; and advertisements, $110; making a total of the amount I mentioned. The proposed expenditure of $100,000 will be as follows: on a French version of eight medical and public health films to be recorded at the request of the ministry of health of Quebec, $10,000. We have the English films and we have to make French-speaking sound tracks. Two film libraries, about one hundred prints, $5,000; 12 strip films to assits in classroom and health education work in the provinces, to be distributed through provincial departments of health and education, $20,000; newsreels, to report medical research, provincial achievements in the field of public health and to provide newsclips on such subjects as immunization, $15,000; standardized health publications, to eliminate overlapping and to fill in gaps occasioned by the present system of the federal and provincial departments of health distributing publications without reference to each other, $12,000; films to be produced at request of the provincial departments of health in accordance with interest indicated by the dominion council of health, $38,000; a total of $100,000.

Mr. MERRITT: Most of those new items refer to films. Would the minister say whether they are all produced by the national film board, and whether this sum therefore goes into the coffers of the national film board and back into the consolidated revenue fund, or does it go out of the government's hands altogether?

Mr. CLAXTON: A large part of the expenditure on films is made to the national film board for production of films. Part of it is for the purchase of prints and films produced in other countries.

Mr. MERRITT: The other question I have is: in view of the large film programme, would the minister say what sort of general supervisory control there is over this kind of expenditure to make sure that the money is being expended to attain certain definite ends? For instance, are these twelve strip films part of a plan to get over some particular points with regard to public health, or are they of general interest? What is the general policy of the minister with regard to that kind of thing?

Mr. CLAXTON: Each film is designed to do a specific job, and it is worked out only after the most careful consultation with authorities working in a special field, and also, if it is a film designed for educational purposes, with educational authorities. The amount of work which goes into one of these films, in the preparation of the text and in the screening and cutting, is great, and it takes a considerable time to produce it. Almost all the items I mentioned under this head are to meet needs which have been expressed by the provinces and by public health authorities, and a great part of the distribution and exhibition would be done through provincial agencies and in cooperation with them.

Mr. FLEMING: I notice that the minister said that certain of these films were being produced at the request of provincial authorities, sometimes for use in the schools, sometimes apparently for use in other places. Is it the policy of the department to make films on request of provincial authorities? Are these needs pointed out by the provinces in relation to a national health problem which he refers to in these various films? I take it that there is nothing local in the appeal of the films and the task they are intended to perform.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right. I have never heard of a single film or advertisement or publication which was designed to meet a local need. Usually the health officers of the provinces or municipalities express a necessity, inquiring whether we have a film on such and such a topic. If the request indicates a fairly widespread desire and seems to cover something that falls within the scope of the department's activities, the matter is likely raised at the next meeting of the dominion council of health, which consists of the deputy ministers of the dominion and the nine provinces and four lay members. The subject is discussed there. If it is felt that it is something that is desirable and suitable for projection in that way we next discuss it in the department, and if it falls into the general pattern of our activities for the year we proceed with it.

Mr. FLEMING: As regards the circulation of films once produced, is that left to the national film board, or is it administered entirely by the department itself.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is done by both means and also through film societies, provincial, educational and other authorities, and through national and provincial medical associations. Whatever means of distribution is appropriate for the pamphlet or film is used to meet the needs of the case.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we discussing the national film board? If so, some of us would like to say a word on that subject.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. FLEMING: Comparing these estimates with those for the preceding year, turning to page 159 I see that there is no provision this year for a director of health services, a special assistant to the deputy minister, a publicity assistant and a senior messenger. These items are all blank this year. The total proposed appropriation for salaries is $18,000 odd as compared with $36,000 last year, but the figure for temporary assistance is to be increased from $25,000 odd to $52,000 odd. What is the situation now in the department which explains this change?

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there any curtailment of service in the department owing to the blanks to which the hon. member has referred?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is an acting director and a publicity assistant. Was that the second item to which the hon. gentleman referred?

Mr. FLEMING: The second was special assistant to the deputy minister of health; the third was publicity assistant, and the fourth, senior messenger.

Mr. CLAXTON: It depends on the development of the work of the department. Either these positions are not needed, or they fall more properly under specific divisions of the department.

Mr. HAZEN: Did the minister refer to the acting director of health services?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Where does the item for his salary appear?

Mr. CLAXTON: The salary of the director of health services is fixed on a temporary basis of $6,900 and that item is included in the $52,860. It is proposed to have three assistant directors of health services at $6,600 totalling $19,800; one chemist, $2,820; three principal clerks at $1,920, or $5,760; one secretary to executive, $1,890; one clerk, grade four, $1,620; two clerks grade three, $1,590 and $1,380, or $2,970; one clerk grade two, $1,110; and nine other employees, making a total of twenty-two temporaries, totalling $52,860.

Mr. FLEMING: Are the three assistant directors of health services to be permanent officials?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Why are they shown as temporaries?

Mr. CLAXTON: Because the positions have not yet been made permanent.

Mr. FLEMING: Are they at present on the staff awaiting the time when they will be made permanent?

Mr. CLAXTON: They have not yet been appointed.

Mr. FLEMING: Is there to be an extended programme of work? This item contemplates an extension of staff that is likely to be permanent or semi-permanent. Is there such an extension of work in branch administration as to justify this increase in expenditure?

Mr. CLAXTON: This is part of an establishment which was worked out after the creation of the department in October, 1944, and modified from time to time. That organization, which was worked out in the first instance by the civil service commission and the treasury board, has been modified periodically and is now in a form which, we hope, will take care of the reasonable requirements of the department for as long as one can see ahead. It involves a certain amount of devolution. Where formerly there was a director of health services and other officers in the department, we expect now that there will be a director of health services who will report to the deputy minister, and under him three assistant directors of health services, one of whom will deal with the statutory duties of the department, another with laboratory work, having regard particularly to food, drugs and so on, and the third largely with promotional activities. They are, we believe, necessary in order to discharge the work of the department.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. HAZEN: Who was the director of health services last year?

Mr. CLAXTON: Doctor J. J. Heagerty was director of health services until his retirement just before his death. Since this is mentioned for the first time in the house, I should like to pay tribute to one who served for over thirty years in the government service and whose work was known throughout Canada as that of a great public servant, a distinguished doctor, and a man who did everything possible to promote the health and welfare of the people of Canada. It was with the greatest regret that we saw him retire, and with still greater regret we learned of his death during the current year.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask who is acting as director of health services now?

Mr. CLAXTON: Doctor Cameron.

Mr. KNOWLES: Included in this item is an amount of $1,134 as Canada's contribution to the international office of public health, and in that connection I should like to ask one or two questions. Is that the only contribution Canada makes to the field of international health? In asking the next question I may be guilty of touching off a forty-minute speech by the minister, but still it is an important matter. It is this: how are things coming along in the field of international health? I have in mind the proposal made at meetings of the united nations in London that as soon as possible there should be an international conference with a view to developing an international organization to meet the health needs of the present day. The minister is running back and forth, I believe, between his responsibilities here and meetings in connection with this matter, and I wonder if he could give us a statement as to how these matters stand at the present time.

Mr. CLAXTON: The invitation of the hon. member to start on a forty-minute speech on this subject is attractive, but I shall try not to work on such a hair-trigger that I may be touched so easily. This is the only vote in this department which includes anything for international health, but my impression is that the budget of the old league of nations would include an amount which would go to the old health section of the league, which carried on useful work from the time the league was started.

With regard to the proposed world health organization, this is one of the specialized agencies of the economic and social council of the united nations. The council has been meeting since May 24 at New York at Hunter college in the Bronx. I have been attending those meetings as Canadian delegate, when not in attendance at the house. One of the specialized agencies of the economic and social council, as I say, is the proposed international health organization. A technical preparatory committee met at Paris from March 18 to April 5, 1946. That committee had on it fifteen technical experts, one of whom was Doctor G. B. Chisholm, deputy minister of national health of Canada. He was honoured by appointment as rapporteur of the committee and presented the report to the economic council on the work that was done. That report was made in New York on May 28, and was well received. The matter is now receiving consideration by the economic and social council, and its observations on the report of the technical preparatory commission will be put before the international health conference which has been called to meet at New York on June 19. Canada will be represented there, and it is expected that the members of the united nations who answer the summons to that meeting will begin to work out the constitution of an international health organization, using as their basis the draft prepared at Paris by the technical preparatory commission.

The scope of the proposed international organization is extensive. It would deal with a large number of matters, principally through international cooperation. Hon. members might be interested if I quoted the first few lines of the preamble of the draft, which states:

> The states parties to this world convention recognize the following truths as basic to harmonious relationships between all peoples of the world.
> Health is a state of physical fitness and of mental and social well-being; not only the absence of infirmity and disease.
>
> The right to health is one of the fundamental rights to which every human being is entitled, without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.

I hope that gives the hon. member some of the information he wanted.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who will be Canada's representative at that meeting? Will it be the minister himself?

Mr. CLAXTON: I expect so, together with the deputy minister of national health. I am not in a position to announce the others, but we hope to secure the assistance of some representatives of the medical profession and professional organizations.

Item agreed to

National health branch—

202. Food and drugs, $365,032.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask a question dealing with this item and relating to the next two items as well. Is the minister satisfied that under existing legislation and regulations, and their administration, the people of this country are receiving adequate protection with reference to food and drugs, opium and narcotic drugs, and proprietary or patent medicines?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard, first, to the question of the administration of the Food and Drugs act, I think I can give that assurance to the hon. member. In discussing this with representatives of other nations, I find they are generally appreciative of the legislation we have in Canada and the way it is enforced. In the department we try to secure enforcement through cooperation; first, with representatives of the various trade associations and, second, with the people in business. The number of prosecutions is not very great, but this does not mean that the extent of sampling or analysis is not sufficient to maintain effective control over the quality of the food that is distributed in Canada. I have been greatly impressed with this branch, and we have every reason to be pleased with the way the officers do their work. It commands the general respect of the trade, as well as of technical experts.

With regard to drugs or medicines, there is a general impression that the federal government exercises control over medicines in order to ensure effective labelling of poisonous drugs or medicines. That is not so. The labelling provisions of the federal government require publicity and information as to the contents rather than act as a warning. The warnings are applied under provincial legislation. All the provinces have acts which require warnings as to certain types of medicines.

With regard to the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, I can say with confidence that Canada's administration has been recognized throughout the world as among the best to be found anywhere. That is largely due to the part played by Colonel C. H. L. Sharman, C.M.G., C.B.E., who recently retired, and who is to act on the international narcotics commission.

The number of addicts, in so far as they can be estimated, has been reduced materially during the war. The shortage of drugs and the need of using them for purposes in association with the war, led to more effective control. For one thing, regulations have been changed to provide that all narcotic drugs can be sold only on prescription, except for preparations containing small quantities of codeine, and that only in conjunction with other medicines. Control has been closely exercised, and we believe that the situation is consequently better than it has ever been before.

Mr. FLEMING: Is the minister satisfied that the present dominion legislation with reference to the labelling of drugs and food compounds is adequate to give protection to all the people?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think it is. The objections we receive are, if anything, that they are too severe. I must add, however, that we are getting more and more cooperation from people in business. Some years ago producers and distributors resented any kind of regulations. But now they realize it is in the interest of honest manufacturers and distributors to see that there are fair regulations and that they are effectively enforced. I think most of them are satisfied that that is so.

Mr. MERRITT: This vote is increased by almost 80 per cent over last year. That must represent a considerable extension in the department, or some new policy. If so, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned that, because it is caused by a considerable transfer of functions from the laboratory of hygiene to the food and drugs laboratory. It is an adjustment which has been found desirable. It will be found that in the vote for the laboratory of hygiene there has been a decrease amounting to some $48,320, and that sum represents a substantial part of the increase in this vote.

The other increases to a considerable extent consist of additional equipment which was not available during the war and which is necessary to supplement or replace equipment which is either worn out or out of date. If hon. members will look at votes in preceding years for this branch they will see that for several years no provision has been made for improvement of or increase in equipment. As a consequence of the war, substantial improvements have been made in equipment, and now that material is becoming available, an amount of $19,000 of this vote is set aside for this purpose.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
205. Quarantine and leprosy, $226,710.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the situation with regard to leprosy on the two coasts?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad to say that, viewed as a whole, the condition is the same as last year. We have two leprosy hospitals, one of which is at Bentinck, British Columbia.

[Mr. Claxton.]

At that hospital there was one admission and no discharge during the year. One patient remained from last year, and one was admitted during the year, so that the total number in the hospital stands at two, one of whom is a Chinese male and the other a Japanese male. Both cases are bacteriologically negative.

At the other hospital, at Tracadie, New Brunswick, we have eight patients remaining from last year, and one was discharged during the year, which leaves seven remaining in the hospital. So that the net position in Canada is exactly the same.

Mr. HAZEN: There are nine patients altogether.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: And it costs $197,000 to look after those nine patients.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hospital at Bentinck island costs $4,376 and that at Tracadie, $10,560, making a total of just under $15,000 for the two of them. The remainder is for quarantine.

Mr. BLAIR: Is the discharged patient supposed to be cured? While the number of patients is the same, there is a considerable additional amount. What is the reason?

Mr. CLAXTON: Included in the item for leprosy is the amount for quarantine. I have just pointed out that the total amount expended in connection with leprosy is just under $15,000, and that there has been no change in that for two years.

Answering the other question, I am informed that the patient who was discharged is cured.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
206. Laboratory of hygiene, $197,166.

Mr. FLEMING: My first question arises out of a brief statement in the report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1945, where, under the heading, "Penicillin", at page 39 we find this:

> This branch of the laboratory cooperated with the bacteriological branch in a study of the stability of penicillin.

What is the extent of the help given to research by this department or in connection with the medical branch of the national research council with reference to penicillin? As hon. members are aware, research and manufacture are being carried on in different parts of the country. Perhaps the greater part of that manufacturing is being done in Toronto in the old Knox college building. What is the extent of research carried on under dominion auspices?

Mr. CLAXTON: When penicillin was developed for use during the war it became at once apparent that there would be a great need of it. The federal government, through the Department of Munitions and Supply, acting as agent for other departments of government, bought for the Connaught laboratories the Knox college building in Toronto, equipped it, and paid the costs of operation of that plan throughout the war. At the Connaught laboratories new types of preparation were worked out and new techniques were developed. I believe it was among the leading establishments in the world.

The federal government also assisted the Ayerst, McKenna and Harrison, Limited, laboratory at Montreal in the construction of a plant for the production of penicillin at that point.

The third source of production in Canada was by commercial interests without government assistance in the Merck laboratories. The processes were all so new that they all did valuable experimental work in connection with the technical production, but the work done at the Connaught laboratories was outstanding and gave leadership, not only in Canada but in other countries.

The part played by the laboratory of hygiene of the Department of National Health and Welfare was to work out standards by which the efficacy of penicillin might be assayed. One of the functions of the department is to work out standards whereby drugs may be tested so that a physician will know that if he gives a dose of a drug, the drug will be of a standard strength to do the job that a drug of that quantity should do. The department carried out extensive investigations on the assay of penicillin, and the laboratory participated in collaborative studies with those arranged through the health section of the league of nations so that an international standard might be worked out. A Canadian standard has been prepared which is distributed to manufacturers, and their product is tested periodically by the department to ensure its efficiency, just the same way as other drugs are. A second low potency standard has been prepared for distribution to hospitals and clinical laboratories for use in controlling penicillin clarity.

Mr. FLEMING: What expenditures have been made to date by the dominion government in connection with penicillin, as regards both research and manufacture? What proportion of this estimate relates to the production of penicillin or to further research on penicillin?

Mr. CLAXTON: It would be quite impossible to segregate what is expended on penicillin, because that is only part of the work carried on by the laboratory. During the year, tens of thousands of assays are made and separate costs are not kept. There is no reason that we can see why they should be. As to the amount spent by the federal government on the production of penicillin, that would more properly come under the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply in the war appropriations. The Department of National Health and Welfare did not make any expenditure on production.

Mr. FLEMING: That would be the amount spent to acquire buildings?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

207. Immigration medical inspection, $84,905.

Mr. FLEMING: To what extent has the prospect of increased immigration entered into this item?

Mr. CLAXTON: We are having increased immigration this year in the form of wives and dependents of members of the armed forces, and we have had to send several extra officers overseas to do the work of the department in that connection.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

208. Child and maternal hygiene, $108,709.

Mr. MERRITT: Could the minister explain the publicity item?

Mr. CLAXTON: The amount sought last year was $67,000 and the amount expended was $31,449.15. Of that amount, there was expended on "Canadian Mother and Child," the publication to which hon. members referred, a total of $27,193.16. That publication is issued at the rate of about 8,000 copies a month in both languages through provincial government and local authorities. We intend to produce a film entitled "Mother and Child", and there was spent on research and preparation of the strip a total of $1,315.65. There was a smaller expenditure of $302.76 on a film script. Reprinting of booklets on children, $2,637,58. That totals the amount mentioned of $31,449.15.

The amount sought this year is $68,400 to provide for a continuation of exactly the same programme, with an additional output of "Canadian Mother and Child" and the completion of the film and film script to which I have referred. In addition, there will be a small poster on the importance of immunization and the distribution of some technical advice to physicians working in the child and maternal hygiene field, if, after consultation, that is considered desirable.

Mr. BLAIR: Will the minister explain the increase of $7,000 in travelling expenses?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is to cover the travelling expenses of the members of the scientific advisory committees who advise the department in this field. They are distinguished doctors who serve without recompense, and we pay their travelling expenses for the one or two meetings that may be held in Ottawa each year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this item there is a question I should like to ask which would apply to one or two other items. Perhaps the one answer will suffice. I have in mind child and maternal hygiene, public health engineering, industrial hygiene and possibly some other items. Has there been an extension of the services rendered by the department in this connection? I notice that there is an increase in the amount asked for. That does not worry me unduly. We should watch closely all expenditures, but in this field of health what some of us are mainly interested in the extension of services to the Canadian people. In these three fields has there been any increase in the services rendered and, if so, what has been the nature of that increase?

Mr. MacNICOL: May I suggest that we take the items one at a time. I have been waiting here all evening to speak on one item. If you are going to take three items together I intend to ask my question on one of them.

Mr. KNOWLES: The same answer may cover the three items. If it does not, I can ask it again.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are no changes contemplated in the work carried on under this item. As I explained, provision is being made for an extension of work in much the same way as it has been carried on, and for more complete cooperation with the provinces. It is to provide for two meetings of the advisory council as well as for a wider distribution of the book "Canadian Mother and Child".

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
209. Public health engineering, $138,443.

Mr. MERRITT: I notice that this item is almost three times what it was last year, and I am particularly interested in the amount of $30,000 being provided for publicity and information. I have looked up the report of the department for 1944-45 and I cannot find that any expenditures have been made before on publicity. I find that the duties of the department in that year were in connection with the supervision of public transport facilities, of federal public buildings; sanitary survey of shell-fish areas and the administration of the Public Works Health Act. Most of these duties were in reference to water supply for camps arising out of war purposes. Would the minister give a full explanation why this item is so much increased?

Mr. CLAXTON: The reason for the increase is that part of the functions of the division of public health engineering covered by this item have been met during the last four years out of the war appropriation. That refers particularly, for example, to an increase of $22,000 in transportation and travelling expenses, which up to now were covered by the war appropriation. That has been transferred to the ordinary peace-time estimates. The work includes supervision with regard to certain continuing government activities at places like Deep River, Chalk River, Defence Industry Limited, Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, Pickering and so on. We have also more work this year in connection with the international joint commission with respect to the pollution of boundary waters. The engineers of the two countries are going into that question, particularly regarding the pollution of the great lakes. Then there is sanitation; cooperation with the Department of Veterans Affairs and its wide expansion of hospitals and other facilities, including health and occupational centres. The work of the division will also be increased by our assuming responsibility for the health of Indians and Eskimos, which was transferred on November 1, 1945, to this department. These changes are the reason for the increase.

With regard to the item of $30,000 for publicity and information, the dominion council of health suggested that two films be prepared, one on pure milk and the other on safe water, the first at a cost of $14,000 and the second at $15,000. Then $500 is provided for reprints of booklets on sanitation and $500 for printing "Noise and Vibration Control", a booklet that aims at the elimination of noise in industry and commerce.

Mr. MERRITT: I think there must be some carryover between industrial hygiene and this item, because I understood that the prevention of noise was one of the chief functions of the industrial hygiene branch. I do not quite understand why a film on pure milk should come under public health engineering.

Mr. WINTERS: There is a great lack of uniformity in Canada in the field of industrial hygiene. Is the federal government co-ordinating precautions taken, for instance, against monoxide gas in industrial plants? It seems to me that industrial hygiene is a field for closer coordination with the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: We shall come to that item in a moment. In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who asked why a film on pure milk should come under this division, it must come under either this or some other division in the department, and this seems to be as appropriate as any other. The officers of the division of public health engineering cooperate closely with the officers in the provincial departments, and it is by reason of that association that this particular function is inserted here. The federal government does not have the enforcement of the law regarding pure milk, but we do cooperate with the provinces at their request in providing information and material that would be beyond the scope of any province to provide.

Mr. MERRITT: Where is it contemplated to show that film?

Mr. CLAXTON: It would be shown as a short at commercial theatres and be shown in the sixteen millimeter size on some of the rural film circuits, at farmers' meetings, meetings of women's institutes, meetings of municipal associations, and of voluntary organizations of all kinds. The commercial distribution of films has an estimated potential audience of one and a quarter million a week, and the distribution of films on a non-commercial basis is estimated to have a potential total of two hundred thousand.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
210. Treatment of sick mariners, $332,065.

Mr. FLEMING: I understand that the fees paid by vessels for this service approximate $200,000 a year, while the item is for $330,000. The scale of fees paid by the vessels was established a long time ago. They existed under part V of the Canada Shipping Act, which goes back to confederation days. Has any thought been given to an upward adjustment of the scale of fees so that they would be equal to the cost of the service provided to mariners on ships entering Canadian ports?

Mr. CLAXTON: The amount collected from the ship owners is based on the tonnage of the vessel. It varies from year to year with the number of ships arriving and with the size of the crews. The expenditures also vary with the incidence of sickness. Over the years I think I can say that the revenue compares favourably with the expenditures.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Navy League of Canada has for years been performing an efficient and useful service in providing medical assistance for sailors, so many of whom are indigents. I am in favour of this vote. I was under the impression that part of this money was used to take care of the medical necessities of indigent sailors. Many of them have no money to pay for medical services. If they all have to pay for services, disease will increase instead of diminish.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any place where the amounts which are paid by the different shipping companies are shown?

Mr. CLAXTON: The public accounts.

Mr. HAZEN: As to the item of professional and special services, what would come under the heading of "special services"?

Mr. CLAXTON: Sick mariners are treated and hospitalized at departmental hospitals where there are departmental hospitals adequate to take care of them, but that is only the case in a very limited number of localities. To a large degree sick mariners requiring hospitalization are hospitalized in general hospitals, to which the department pays a per diem rate. Similarly with regard to professional services, where the department has a doctor of its own, as it has in Halifax, Saint John, Sydney, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver, and Victoria, he does the work. But where there is too much work to be done by the departmental doctor, or where there is no departmental doctor, an outside doctor is hired on a fee basis and he performs the work.

National health branch—
211. Industrial hygiene, $103,151.

Mr. CLAXTON: This is where I should reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. This division has cooperated closely with the provinces and with war industry during the war to secure the enforcement of the conditions in the munitions contracts regarding working conditions. It has succeeded in ensuring a greater degree of standardization of practice than before. Primarily this matter does fall, of course, within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the department through this division has worked with the provinces and also with those holding contracts with the federal government. Here again there is a continuance of expenditure from the war appropriation to the ordinary peace-time vote.

Mr. MERRITT: The temporary assistance under that vote is up seven times over last year, and there is an item of $21,000 for publicity and information. Would the minister explain those two items?

Mr. CLAXTON: The item for temporary assistance is up $30,000. It involves two medical specialists at $5,100, or $10,200; one medical officer, grade 4, $3,540; two supervising nurses, one at $1,830 and one at $1,740, or $3,570; chemist, $2,820; and nine other employees, to bring the total to $36,135. That staff is largely staff which has been paid for out of the war appropriation, and it is made up as I have said. With regard to the item for publicity and information, there was an expenditure of $26.01 in preparing six posters which are partly prepared; and also on a booklet on carbon monoxide, $40. The estimate of $21,000 for 1946-47 would cover the completion of the posters, $16,000, and booklets, $5,000, on lead poisoning, dermatitis, manganese poisoning, chromium poisoning, care in the use of materials like chlorine, formaldehyde, et cetera. I should add that there is a monthly bulletin issued by this division, but it entails no expense except mimeographing and mailing.

Mr. MERRITT: The item is up even though war industries have largely been discontinued, I take it, and also even though on December 15 last, in the discussion on his estimates, reported in Hansard, page 3597, the minister said when discussing this item:

> To a great extent the industrial hygiene division of the department has to do with the improvement of standards of health in war industries, in consequence of actual contractual obligations they incurred with the federal government to do such work.

Further down:

> We hope that in consequence of this work, the work will be continued under provincial auspices. It is our desire to keep a small division operating, to cooperate with the provinces, but not nearly to the same extent as was done during the war.

Also during his remarks the minister said that in certain cases, particularly in British Columbia, the staff of the department had already been transferred to the provinces. It would seem that there must have been a change of policy between last December and now, because this department is not being handed over to the provinces. Is that the case?

Mr. CLAXTON: What I said when the matter was up last session about the changeover with regard to British Columbia was correct. But the actual requests for assistance made on the department with regard to carbon monoxide tests, and the investigation of a number of things which I can hardly pronounce, have increased, and the work of the department has been carried on on about the same basis as before.

Mr. HAZEN: From whom do requests come for this work?

Mr. CLAXTON: From various agencies of the federal government, from the provincial governments and from industry itself.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry that I was not in the chamber during the whole of the discussion of this item. But I do not think we should criticize the department for having a substantial amount for industrial hygiene, because it is an important matter. I am not sure just how much study has been made of industrial hygiene and what is done in our various plants to protect the health of the workers. I was greatly amazed some little while ago, in reading an important publication by a pioneer woman doctor in the United States who had done a lot of work in this field, to find that most of the European industrial countries, particularly Great Britain, France and Germany, before the war, were far ahead of the United States and Canada in the conditions provided and the safeguards they had put in effect. Before we criticize the government's programme or urge a smaller item, we should be fairly sure that what the provinces are doing is sufficient to meet the requirements of industrial life.

Mr. WINTERS: Just before this item is passed, I wish to say that I entirely agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver East has just said. I have had a small amount of experience in this field, and I know it is the most difficult thing in the world to lay down a programme on a national basis when each province has a different set of standards of industrial hygiene. For example, there is no standard laid down with regard to disposal of carbon monoxide fumes in motor transport garages, or to deal with disposal of sawdust and so on. If you try to find any information on standards with respect to washroom facilities, for instance, there is nothing in Canada that I know of that covers the whole field. You have to turn to standards set up on an arbitrary basis by a New York architectural association or similar institution. I realize that this is a function of the provinces, but I can think of no better programme in which the federal government could take part, with a view to coordinating the effort on the part of the provinces as a whole. This seems to me to be a field that is wide open and one in which more should be done, so that any money spent in this direction is all to the good.

Mr. MacNICOL: The two hon. gentlemen who have last spoken have touched on an important subject. If it were not for the lateness of the hour I should like to elaborate upon it. The large industrial plants themselves do what they can to protect the health of their employees, and so they should. When they consult an architect to draw up plans they ask him to lay out the plant with a view to conserving the health of the employees. I believe I have asked in previous years what the department does to assist in this matter. They certainly cannot interfere in the provinces, because health is a matter that is under provincial control, but this parliament and the government could assist through the medium of the provinces and the provinces could in this way assist industrial institutions. It is important that every possible safeguard should be provided in plants, large and small, to preserve and conserve the health of all workers. I should like to hear from the minister how the department assists, through the provinces down to the plants, or through the architectural association.

Mr. CLAXTON: The department does work closely with the provincial authorities. The specialized facilities provided by the division of industrial hygiene were utilized for its own investigations and by provincial health and labour departments, workmen's compensation boards, private factories, labour groups and other agencies concerned with the problem of health in relation to occupation. To meet its own responsibilities, and to assist and cooperate with provincial authorities in setting up their own industrial hygiene services, the department trained and lent to each of the provincial departments of health in Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and to the workmen's compensation board in British Columbia, a competent industrial hygiene chemist. By December, 1945, the provincial authorities in Manitoba and British Columbia had completed their own industrial hygiene divisions and assumed full administrative and financial responsibility for these. However, they ask that this department supply technical and consultant assistance as and when certain complex problems might arise. We still have industrial hygiene chemists in Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan and, later in the year, it is proposed to lend another to the department of health of Alberta to assist in a survey of occupational health hazards in the industries of that province.

In this field of activity there has been an enormous increase in interest since the outbreak of the war, owing partly to the fact that the federal government required it of industry which was doing war work, but also to the interest on the part of industry itself and of all workers, working together to improve industrial standards. Further, during the war a number of processes were developed including those using solvents, acetone paints and so on, to which new industrial hazards were attached. In all these fields we did what we could during the war, but it has been found that the interest and the need for the work have since continued. It is carried on in close cooperation with the provinces. With regard to carbon monoxide poisoning and some conditions in connection with mining, work is done in other branches of the government, but very largely by the provinces themselves. I hope I have indicated to the hon. member for Davenport and others who have supported the vote that it has been done in the sensible way, namely, in cooperation with the provinces and with industry, and that it is useful work.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a former occasion one of the answers which the minister gave was that part of the vote was to take care of the health of the workers in industrial war plants operated under the government. I believe also that something was said about preserving the health of the northwest territories. That would be purely under his department.

Mr. CLAXTON: This vote is limited to matters connected with industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know, but what about the mines? Do they not come under this? There is no government up there.

National health branch—

212. Civil service health division (including medical investigation division), $180,078.

Mr. MERRITT: There is a publicity item there.

Mr. CLAXTON: There was an expenditure of $230 in 1945-46 on the preparation of a booklet giving information to civil servants regarding services that will be furnished to them when this service is established.

Mr. FLEMING: I thought the service was established last year?

Mr. CLAXTON: It was announced in May, 1945. Since then, it has been acquiring staff and rendering partial but not full service such as will be given as soon as we can get doctors, staffs and space necessary to give a full service. The estimate here for publicity is designed to cover health education work in connection with the civil service either through films, lectures, pamphlets or posters.

That is considered to be an important part of the service when we have it established. The service will include examination and educational work, emergency care and so on.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has not yet given a breakdown of the total expenditure last year, unless that item of $230 was the only expenditure out of $25,000 appropriated.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Nor has he given a breakdown of the projected expenditures of $18,000 this year.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have not a breakdown for the $18,000. That is the estimate arrived at to cover items I mentioned, such as pamphlets, booklet, posters and so on.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the item had better stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: On Monday we shall take up the two bills standing in the name of the Minister of Reconstruction, one dealing with the national research council and the other with atomic energy.

Mr. FLEMING: In that order?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not necessarily. I am not sure of the order. We might ask for two new departments in supply, and if we get into supply for purposes of discussion we shall take justice, national defence and public works.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the leader of the house if we shall sit Monday night?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
